MR. TUPPER: This, then, is the hon. gentleman's policy—"The country may stand or fall, may be prosperous or the reverse, we are flies on the wheel, and those who say that the Government can advance the interests of the country know nothing of what they are talking about. The Government of the country is utterly helpless to advance its interests. All they have to do is to draw their salaries, discharge the administrative duties of their offices, and leave the country to stand or fall, as the case may be, without putting out a hand to save it, or to give it relief in any way." Such is the policy of the Government, for

I take the hon. gentleman to be a good authority for the policy of the Cabinet and of that side of the House; but I will not accept him as an authority for our side of the House. The hon. gentleman has put this as a question between the two parties, and says that the country is about to pronounce on this important subject. I rejoice to know that such is the fact, not only in the interests of the suffering country, which will have the means presented to it of relieving itself from the difficulties in which it has been placed by the mal-administration of public affairs and the failure of the hon. gentleman to fill the high position of Finance Minister in such a way as to carry on advantageously the financial and fiscal policy of the country, but also that the country is going to be divided on a question of great public import. I rejoice that the time has arrived when higher and more elevated questions will come up for discussion than personal politics, and I trust that the elevation of public sentiment which ought to attend the division of this country upon a question of such great national import, whether viewed rightly or wrongly by one side or the other, will be accompanied by that corresponding elevation of political discussions which it is, or ought to be, the desire of every Canadian to see brought about. I will give the hon. gentleman a better authority than his own as to our view as to what is necessary. There is no sort of difficulty now in arriving at an understanding of the respective positions of the two great parties. The place where the policy of any party is defined is on the floor of Parliament, where, in dealing with public questions, the one side presents a policy and the other side controverts it and presents its own. The hon. gentleman must therefore allow me to crave his attention to a resolution moved by the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald), which I had the honour of seconding, which defines exactly wherein we differ from the policy of the hon. gentleman. When the hon. the Finance Minister brought forward a proposal to lay an additional tax of $500,000 on the country, and, instead of embracing anything in that policy that was calculated to benefit the country, or foster its industries, he singled out the article of malt, or rather of barley under another name—not to protect it against the unfair competition of the United States and the heavy duties which are imposed on the other side of the line on our barley, but to place an additional duty on our productions, thus depressing and injuring one of the great agricultural interests of this country—when the hon. gentleman made that proposition we moved a resolution which embodied the policy of the Opposition party, and upon which we were prepared to take our stand fairly and squarely before the people of this country. We moved as follows:—

“Sir John A. Macdonald moved in amendment, seconded by Mr. Tupper, that all the words after ‘that’ to the end of the question be left out, and the words ‘this House regrets that the financial policy submitted by the Government increases the burthen of taxation on the people without any compensating advantage to Canadian industries; and further, that this House is of opinion that the deficiency in the revenue should be met by a large diminution of expenditure aided by such a re-adjustment of the tariff as will benefit and foster the agricultural, mining, and manufacturing interests of the Dominion,’ inserted instead thereof.”

There is our policy stated in our own words. There is the policy confirmed by the great Liberal-Conservative Convention which met a short time ago at Toronto, and upon which we, as a party, are prepared to take our stand. The declaration made at that Convention was a manly and straightforward act. We realize the fact that we are on the eve of a great struggle, and are about to go to the country for its judgment between the two parties, and for a party, on such an occasion, to fling out its banners to the wind and boldly affirm the principles maintained in Opposition, and which it is prepared to maintain in power, is an act worthy of the respect of a free people. I ask the House to contrast our policy with the platform of the Government, as propounded at the great Reform Convention held a few weeks ago. Examine that platform. Do you find any principle or policy propounded there? No, nothing but a return to the former evil of personal politics. The great Reform party did not dare to present themselves as Reformers or as men who could find anything to reform. Having sat on the Treasury benches for four years, without offering a single reform to the House, they knew that it would be useless to seek the confidence of the country as Reformers, but they asked the country to elect them to support certain individuals. Suppose those individuals were swept away by any calamity, which we would all deplore, then the platform of the party is gone and there is nothing to be seen. They have no principles; they have not even ventured to put the words "Free Trade" on their banner. They had not had the honesty to put "Fly on the wheel" on their banner. They have not dared to avow, as the hon. the Minister of Finance has avowed as the platform of his party, that they were advocates of no policy except to admit, with their hands hanging paralyzed by their sides, in the presence of a suffering country, that no people could be benefitted by Acts of Parliament. We believe that the policy of fostering Canadian industries is worthy of any party and worthy the support of the people of this country. We believe that the policy, carried out as it was carried out when we were in power, but carried out in a broader and more extended manner than before, will be beneficial to the people. We believe that closer intercommunication between the Provinces is a policy of great importance, that it is a policy of interprovincial trade. We believe that the Confederation of the British North American Provinces, which has been formed, and which has attracted, and which ought to attract the attention of the world by the magnitude of the territory and the extent of its resources, will be comparatively useless and fail in the great object its founders had in view if there is not found a method by which the commercial interests of this country may be knit together, and a great current of interprovincial trade established which will extend from one end of the Dominion to the other. We believe that reciprocity, which has been advocated by all parties and classes in the country, is clearly identified with the policy we have pursued and that we propose to pursue.

MR. MILLS: Hear, hear.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. TUPPER: I think I shall be able to show the hon. gentleman who is so anxious in regard to the matter, some tolerably good evidence on that point. We are asked to look at England. It is said we are a British Colony, and why do we not take the stand of the Mother Country and adopt the policy which England has pursued and is now pursuing. I reply that there is a great difference between this country and England, and you cannot discuss the question of Free-trade and Protection in any country except in connection with the relations of that country to those which adjoin it, and their fiscal policy. I say that if Canada was like England, unable to grow its own corn or rear its own cattle, unable to provide either the corn or the cattle it required for home consumption, I would be an out-and-out advocate of Free-trade in these commodities. I say a policy of Free-trade in corn and cattle was a policy that was eminently calculated to foster the manufacturing industries, and that such has followed its adoption in Great Britain. That policy had precisely the same effect which the abolition of the duties on tea and coffee had here, to a relative extent, namely, to cheapen the means of living to our artisans. But, while adopting the Free-trade policy, and extending it to her manufactures, be it never forgotten that England did not do so until she had, by a purely protective policy—by one of the most protective policies ever framed, except, perhaps, that in the neighbouring country of the United States, and to some extent it was quite as high as that which exists there—made herself mistress of the manufactures of the world. She did not adopt Free-trade in regard to manufacturing industries, until under her protective policy such a mass of capital had been brought into the country, and such an amount of skill and labour obtained as enabled her to distance all competitors. Had the same policy of Free-trade been adopted by other countries when England declared for it, she would have been successful in her Free-trade. But it was not so adopted, and I need not tell any person who is watching the signs of the times that many of the clearestmind men in England, and those who have been most enthusiastic and ardent adherents of the policy of Free-trade, are now looking the question seriously in the face, as presented by the stern and unanswerable logic of facts, and are asking themselves the question whether they have not gone too far, and whether, in the interests of England, they will not be obliged to recede. Other countries have followed the old protective example of England. Germany has followed it; France has followed it; the United States have followed the protective policy that made England the great country that she is, and gave her the prominence as a manufacturing country that she enjoyed in connection with her great deposits of coal and iron—I say that policy has attracted the attention of other countries which have followed it, and with what result? That the great markets England had in the United States, France, Germany, the greatest markets she possessed for her manufacturing industries, are becoming closed to her, because they have adopted the protective policy which made her the great country she is, and they are shutting her out of the markets which only yesterday she claimed as her own. I have in my hand, Sir, an article from the London Daily Telegraph which refers to that matter, as follows:—

“American calicoes are reported to meet with increasing acceptance in Manchester. The saws and cutlery of Philadelphia and Pittsburg are sometimes preferred to similar manufactures produced in Sheffield. The machine-made watches of Waltham threaten to supplant the solid horologic workmanship of Coventry. Leather from the United States evokes from the tanners of Bermondsey the confession that they are no longer able to sell the same material of a certain quality against the trans-Atlantic product. Agricultural implements bearing the trade mark of a New York Company are to be found exposed for sale in English hardware shops; and indentments from the colonies entrusted to firms in London and Birmingham for execution actually include American edge tools. The town last named was, until recently, regarded as the chief source of supply of small arms for the world; and it was confidently anticipated that the present struggle in the East would have imparted a potent stimulus to gun manufacture in that locality. But for the first time in the history of modern warfare that branch of industry in the midland metropolis has failed to reap any advantage. The Winchester rifle in use by the Turk is produced in Rhode Island.”

I give that to the hon. gentleman as an answer to those who say that the policy we propose is an un-English policy; and as evidence that some stronger and better argument than that is required to be brought forward in connection with it. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman would like very much not only to frame his own policy—and we are quite willing that he should do so—but he would also like to have the advantage of framing ours for us; and he accordingly has undertaken to say that the question as he would submit it to the country is a question of high or low taxation. He says that “if the people want high taxes, let them take the hon. gentleman opposite, and if they want low taxes, let them sustain the present Government.” Well, Sir, I am not disposed to allow the hon. gentleman not only to misstate our policy, but also to misrepresent it, as that statement of the question does most grossly, but I think I will satisfy the hon. gentleman himself, although I know that is a very difficult thing to do when he once has made up his mind, and I am not too sanguine about that, but I think I will satisfy a good many hon. gentlemen behind him of the accuracy of my assertion when I say that statement must not only be withdrawn as applied to us, but must also be reversed. I will show the hon. gentleman that it is the Government of which he is a member which wants the high taxes, and that it is the Opposition and the gentlemen who sit on this side of the House who claim to be the friends of low taxation. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows that the country has had some experience in that regard. The hon. gentleman knows that, under a tariff of 15 per cent., the late Government were enabled not only to provide liberally for all the public services of this country, but also to provide sixteen millions of current revenue for the capital expenditure of Canada, reducing the debt of this country by that much during the period we were in power. And the hon. gentleman knows that not only is that the case, but we further reduced the taxation upon the people about two millions per annum, and that, although our tariff was only a 15 per cent. tariff, we made, as I stated before, tea and coffee free. He knows, Sir, that instead of doing as he has done, instead of simply sitting down and taking things as they were, the course of the late Government was a course not only of prosperity, but of a condition of progress. He knows that the great North-West was brought into this country, that British Columbia was acquired, that Prince Edward Island was then made part of the Confederation. The hon. gentleman knows that he himself has stated in the most authentic manner that we had not only provided for all the necessary and incidental services of this country, but that we also had at the same time provided for the large, extraordinary additional and special outlays that took place at the same time; and yet the lowest taxes that were ever enjoyed by the people of Canada were enjoyed under the Administration of the gentlemen that he would fain lead the country to suppose were clamouring for high taxation. Now what is it that the hon. gentleman says? He says that, because our policy is a protective policy, we must necessarily be in favour of high taxes. The hon. gentleman assumes that it is the tariff that imposes the taxation on the country. The hon. gentleman's whole speech, all his Budget speeches, every Budget speech I have heard him deliver in this House, would lead any person to suppose that he was not master of the very first principle of taxation with relation to the country. Why, the tariff does not impose taxation. The tariff collects taxation. What does impose it? The taxation is imposed by the debt of the country. The taxation is imposed for the purpose of maintaining the public credit. The hon. gentleman ought to know, I say, that the Customs tariff is adopted as a means of collecting the taxation imposed by the public debt in order that the public credit may be maintained. A means must be found by taxation to sustain the public credit and carry on the ordinary administration of public affairs. Now, I wish to be understood distinctly upon this point at the outset, for this is a fallacy that underlies all the observations that fall from the hon. the Minister of Finance upon this question. Taxation is already imposed by the debt. Customs duties are merely the best mode of collecting taxes because we hold that they may be so levied as to furnish industry the means through employment of paying its taxation. Where we differ is not in the amount—though we differ there, and this to the great disadvantage of hon. gentlemen—of taxation we require, but our great difference lies in the mode of obtaining it. The hon. gentleman says that the prosperity of the country cannot be obtained and promoted by Acts of Parliament. We deny it. We say that you may make the very taxation, necessary to sustain the public credit by meeting the interest on the public debt and discharging the ordinary administration of public affairs, a means of so fostering our industries as to give to the people the money that is required in order to pay the taxes. And we not only say that, Sir, but we say that you may thus not only give them the means of paying the taxation, but you may bring people into the country to assist in paying, and retain those who would otherwise be driven out of it. The people of the country can be benefitted by Acts of Parliament, for what you can undo by Act of Parliament you may do. If you can by Act of Parliament destroy the tea trade of this country and drive it to New York, and if by Act of Parliament you can crush out the sugar-refining industry of the country and drive the capital invested in that great enterprise to New York, I want to know if an Act of Parliament cannot also bring them back to Canada? When capital is driven away, the people of Canada go after that capital, and where employment is furnished them; and this is what the hon. gentleman's policy has resulted in. I am now going to trouble the House for a few moments while I state the grounds for the statement I have made, that hon. gentlemen opposite want more money for the public service, and require more money to pay the interest on the public debt and maintain the public credit, and for the ordinary administration of the public affairs by Government than we do. The year 1874, the year the hon. gentlemen opposite obtained power.

MR. TUPPER.

proved and demonstrated beyond question, and beyond the possibility of cavil, that they have not only been an unfortunate Government but also that they have been an extravagant Government, and that, while levying three and a-half millions of additional taxes on the people of this country, they have been more lavish in their expenditure of the public moneys of the country than the gentlemen who preceded them. Now, Sir, I will take the hon. gentleman in the first instance upon his own figures—upon his own statement in the Public Accounts, and I would like hon. gentlemen who have the Accounts before them to look at the nineteenth page, on which there is what purports to be a comparative statement of receipts and expenditures from the year 1867-68, and so on to 1876-77. I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that, by this statement made out by the hon. gentleman himself and laid before Parliament, he shows that, in the first year he and his colleagues were in power, they spent $396,755 more than we did in the largest expenditure he puts down to us. The hon. gentleman states here—although I shall question its accuracy—that our expenditure for the year 1873-4 was $23,316,316. I need not remind the House that we were not in power for the last eight months of that year, but, taking the hon. gentleman on his own statement, I say he admits on this page of the Public Accounts that this Government, coming into power at a time of depression—at a time when he found it necessary to levy three and a-half millions of additional taxation—instead of exercising the most rigid economy spent in the first year $396,755 more than the expenditure of 1873-4; that in 1875-6 they spent $1,132,056 more than we did; that in 1876-7 they spent $202,985 more than we did, and that in the three years they spent $1,731,796 more than the expenditure of 1873-4. Now, Sir, that is the hon. gentleman's own statement, but I challenge its accuracy, and I shall be obliged to show the hon. gentleman that, in order to reduce his own over-expenditure for the three years down to that point, he was obliged to force the Accounts. He was obliged to take money voted by Parliament for capital expenditure and charge it to revenue. He was obliged to bring into that account services which in a comparative statement ought not to be found there. This is a very important statement. It is made for the purpose of showing not only every member of the House of Commons, but every intelligent man in the country, how the revenue compares with the expenditure, and how the expenditure of one year compares with another, and, perhaps more important than all, to enable every man to make a fair and just comparison between the expenditure of one Government or party and another. I will show that the hon. gentleman has placed a most unfair and improper statement in the Public Accounts. In the first place, hon. gentlemen opposite were in power eight months out of the twelve of that year (1873-4), and everybody knows that a Government can force expenditure or crowd it even though they may have but three months to do it in, or they can pare it down and exhibit economy. What is the first item in this $23,316,316. I take exception to the item of $69,330 of Customs refunds of former years. I am not going to enter into the question at this moment as to whether it was right to make this expenditure or not, but I will say that the money was taken out of the Treasury to be given away to a great railway corporation at a time when it was most important to the Government to obtain its support at that moment. I am not going to deal with that question, but I make the charge that it should not appear in the comparative statement as it does, because it is not an expenditure of that year. The next item I object to is that of $2,389,679 for Public Works charged to revenue in which there is the sum of $545,625 which has no more right to be there than has the money voted and expended in the construction of the Welland Canal, and I will give the House briefly the ground upon which I make that statement. That is a charge for money voted by Parliament for capital expenditure—and not only was it voted by Parliament for capital expenditure, but it was returned by the Minister of Public Works who sits by the hon. gentleman's side as having been expended on capital account. Mr. C. J. Bridges also says it was expended on capital account, and therefore I say it had no right to be put in the charge to revenue. I say that nothing can be more improper than to take a vote of money for one purpose—to be expended on capital—and then to put it to revenue account. If you do that, or if you take capital expenditure and place it to revenue charges, I say you can carry on the Government of this country for years without calling Parliament and Parliament has no control by its votes over the expenditure of the public money. Now, there is another item which might correctly appear in this account as an ordinary transaction but which must come out of it now. I refer to the $407,868 (see part ii. page 172 of the Public Accounts of 1874) expended on the Dawson route; and why do I take that out? The House will see that I am justified in doing so because the present Government took all that expenditure on the Red River road out of the expenditure chargeable to revenue and are charging every dollar of it at this moment to capital account under the head of Canadian Pacific Railway. I am dealing, as the House will understand, purely with the comparative statement, which professes to give the revenue account on one hand, and on the expenditure chargeable to revenue on the other. But, Sir, I say that, in an honest, fair comparative statement, you must take these three items out of the revenue accounts of 1873-4 for the reason I have stated. But take the $1,021,823, which I have pointed out should not have been placed to the expenditure of 1873-4, and you have, as our largest expenditure, $22,294,493 in one year. That is the largest expenditure which, I claim, the hon. gentleman can charge us with in a comparative statement. The hon. gentleman may tell you that there was $121,000 in one year, and $134,000 in another on the boundary survey; but that was exceptional, and in a sense he would be warranted in taking it out. He will find charged to us, however, in 1873-4, $144,906 to military stores, and a blank from that day to this under the head of military stores. Again, the hon. gentleman will not himself say that we are responsible for the extra Session, to which we came very unwillingly.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I do not know about admitting that you are responsible.

MR. TUPPER: We were quite satisfied with one Session, Mr. Speaker, as you know; and the hon. gentleman, therefore, will admit that, so far as that charge goes, it cannot fairly be put to us. The hon. gentleman also knows that, in the year 1873-4, we expended $283,163 on the Dominion land survey. What was that? Why, it was to survey the whole Province of Manitoba, or a large portion of it. It was an extraordinary expenditure. I do not take it out, I do not take any of these items out of the account, but I draw the hon. gentleman's attention to them as balancing any possible thing that he can find, that he can take out of these accounts. Their expenditure this last year was $90,521 for that survey. Why? Because our expenditure for 1873-4 had rendered it unnecessary for them to go on and expend the same amount of money. We, therefore, spent $172,642 on the Dominion lands more than they did; or, in all, there is $517,548 on items which I still think in that account are exceptional items, and, on a strict comparison, ought to come out. I, therefore, trust that I have satisfied the hon. gentleman that I have been extremely moderate, and have kept largely within the mark, when I take $1,021,823 out of that expenditure of 1873-4, and leave it at $22,294,493. Then I ask him to contrast his expenditure with that, and what will he find? He will find that his expenditure in 1874-5 was $1,417,678 more than ours. He will find that his expenditure in 1875-6 is $2,152,979 more than ours; and he will find that his expenditure in 1876-7, at a time when he was having deficit after deficit, is $1,223,908 more than ours, or nearly five millions in three years of expenditure made by this Government, over and above the largest average expenditure of our largest year—no less than $4,794,565. The hon. gentleman has undertaken to draw a distinction between what he calls ordinary expenditure and expenditure that is beyond the control of Parliament. Let me ask him what he makes of these expenditures. I take the Customs as an illustration, to begin with, not only of extravagance on the part of the hon. gentleman, but I am afraid of something a little worse than extravagance. The hon. gentleman's expenditure for 1876-7 was $721,604; ours, for 1873-4, was $658,299, or $63,305 less. What was that increase for? Can any person tell me? It cannot be because the law requires it, as I have heard it said by uninformed persons in the country: "But did not the law increase these salaries, and are not they compelled to increase them?" I say no. I say that all over this country there is no law that requires them to increase the salaries of Customs officials and that it is a matter of choice. But there is another reason why this increase should not have taken place. What did we do before we went out of power? We made a large increase in the Customs Department, and we did it by authority; the money was placed at our disposal by Parliament, and we were instructed by Parliament to make a large increase in that Department, and we did it; but it was not large enough for these gentlemen. They must add, the very second year they were in power, no less than $62,000 to the expenditure that we had made in the Custom Department; and to prove that it does not arise from any necessity on the part of the law requiring the Government to increase the salaries, I turn to the fact that the difference between last year and this is only $1,000. They increased $62,000 the second year, and they increased $1,000 last year. I am happy to say that the gentle admonitions that we have ventured in a kindly spirit to give them from this side of the House, Session after Session, have at last had a certain amount of effect, and have limited their action in some degree. But what renders it perfectly inexcusable to make this addition in the Customs Departments, is the fact that in the year 1873-4 we collected $14,325,192. If they had had an enormous access to the revenue—a great addition to the revenue—they might have said the work was so great that they had to get additional assistance; but what is the fact? Why, the fact is that in the year 1876-7 the collections of the customs had cost this country $63,305 more than it did under our Administration, and they actually collected only $12,546,987, or $1,779,205 less than we collected. They have taxed the people of this country $63,000 more, and collected nearly two millions less. Gentleman may ask "How can this occur? how can you account for this great accession?" Well, there is a point in that that I want to ask this hon. gentleman to account for. I believe the revenue fell off in the port of Montreal in 1875-6 about one million—I am speaking from memory, and perhaps I am not exactly correct, but I know this, that there was an enormous decrease in the revenue of Montreal. Well, we increased the salaries in 1872-3 and 1873-4 from $87,000 to $95,000 in the port of Montreal, under the readjustment that I have mentioned, raising the salaries as instructed by Parliament, we added $8,000 to the salaries in Montreal in the year 1873-4. One would suppose that was enough, particularly when you take into consideration that, instead of having an increased business, there was an enormous decrease in the business. What did they do? The Public Accounts for 1875-6 show an increase from $95,000 to $117,000; or $21,000 increase in a port where there was a million less revenue to be collected. What was that for? Why, $18,000 of it was for extra hands. Now I ask the hon. gentleman to account to the people of this country for that. I ask them, if they are unwilling to lie under the charge, not only of being an extravagant, but a corrupt Government, to tell me why they wanted $18,000 for extra hands in the port of Montreal? What earthly reason could be given, except that there was an election, and it was very important that Mr. Thomas White should be kept out. I know no other reason. I can understand how $18,000 could be used most effectively in such a contest. I can understand perfectly well how you can take hold of A, B and C by the score, and take them out of the ranks of the Opposition and silence them, or carry them over to the Government.

MR. MILLS: Yes; you understand it perfectly.

MR. TUPPER: I do. The hon. gentlemen opposite have given me too many illustrations; but it would be idle, after the developments that have taken place in the Courts, after the history and record that hon. gentlemen opposite have made for anyone to pretend to shut his eyes to the fact that money can be used, used enormously, and used most effectively in connection with such transactions as that. I gave the House the other night a little illustration of how it was done. Day by day, since I spoke the other night, Halifax men, who, the day the writ was issued, were hostile to the Government, but were afterwards found sitting on the platform side by side with the hon. member for Halifax, have since been promoted to high and important offices by the Government of Nova Scotia, in return for similar favours conferred, as I have shown, by the Government of Canada. The secret has transpired; and, more than that, at this moment men not only have been promoted, but other men go howling through the streets that they have not got the positions that were promised to them for going over to the enemy and changing their politics in that contest. I point to that as an evidence of the mode and the circumstances that have attended this large increase, this unaccountable increase in the Customs Department in the face of a heavily falling revenue. But, Sir, what more? The hon. gentleman has raised this question of the ordinary expenditure of the Government, and I think he will find that he has his answer. We find an increase in the Post-Office Department of 1876-7 over 1873-4 of $318,041. We find an increase in the Administration of Justice of $106,560. I may be told by those hon. gentlemen: "Ah! but that is your own Supreme Court Act." Why, Sir, I find that one of the few claims these gentlemen make, when they are hard driven to show what reforms they have accomplished, is: "Look at what we have accomplished for the country;

MR. TUPPER.

look at the Supreme Court Act and see what we have accomplished." Sir, we discussed that matter leisurely; we considered it carefully; we deferred it, and the country could afford to wait for its accomplishment. What have the hon. gentlemen done? Have they placed the people of the country under any enormous obligations? All that they have accomplished is that they have placed the people of the country under an additional charge of over a hundred thousand dollars—

MR. BLAKE: No, no.

MR. TUPPER: How much of it?

MR. BLAKE: But $50,000.

MR. TUPPER: I will take $50,000; but I tell the hon. gentleman that I am correct in what I stated. If the account which I hold in my hand is correct, then the amount is $106,000 additional for the Administration of Justice. I can hear the hon. the Minister of Finance telling the hon. gentleman that I am correct. I trust that will satisfy the hon. member for South Bruce when I say the Administration of Justice has cost this extra amount. I may be wrong, and the hon. gentleman may be right. I presume he is right, as he has had so much to do with that Department, and it may be that the increase for the Supreme Court is only $50,000.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman was saying that the Supreme Court was costing over $100,000.

MR. TUPPER: I said that the Administration of Justice was increased by $106,000, and that one of the great claims in connection with that was the Supreme Court Bill. I did suppose that the expenditure on that was more than $50,000, and I am glad to be corrected. I may here remark, Sir, that we find that appeals are going still from the people to the Privy Council in England, and we find that the only effect of the provision placed in the Bill by this House that the Court should settle Provincial questions is that the Premier of Ontario has intimated that he intends to appeal against the judgment of the Court, and to take the liquor decision to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I remark on that, that perhaps hon.

gentleman have not so much to plume themselves on as they would lead the country to imagine. Then, Sir, on Immigration and Quarantine there is an increase in the last year of $51,181 over our largest expenditure, and I need not call the attention of the House to the enormously disproportionate result of the expenditure which they have made. I need not point out to those who have looked at the return of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture and Immigration that some 7,000 people came up the St. Lawrence last year, instead of 37,000 in the last year that we held office. I am speaking from memory, but, at all events, there is an enormous disproportion in the results. What is the enormous expenditure for? What are hon. gentlemen making this enormous expenditure on the Immigration service for, when they are proclaiming to the world that there is not only not enough employment for the people in the country now, but, further, that, as far as they are concerned, people who want employment must go elsewhere to seek it? The hon. the Finance Minister says, in his declaration of principles, "The only thing we have to offer to the people of Canada to improve their position is greater frugality and hard work." Sir, the people are willing to be frugal and to work hard, but they ask for a policy from the Administration which does not compel them to expatriate themselves in order to get an opportunity of working hard. The hon. gentleman's policy is to send them to Boston, New York and Baltimore, the places which he has made the commercial capitals of Canada. The Government tell them "We are flies on the wheel, and are incapable of giving you that work which you desire." The people ask bread, and they give them a stone. Now, Sir, the next point I come to is the question of Pensions. The hon. gentleman has expended $56,078 more than we expended under that head. On Superannuation they have expended $40,384 more than we did, and the hon. gentleman must give me credit for this amount being $300 less than it might have been.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Certainly.

MR. TUPPER: The House will remember that I was at issue on a question of fact with the hon. gentleman opposite.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Of law.

MR. TUPPER: I said that, in order to get rid of an able and efficient officer, one as able and efficient as could be found in this country, the Government had given him $300 more than he was entitled to. The hon. gentleman made a sharp issue of fact—

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Law; not fact.

MR. TUPPER: Between himself and myself; but he has revised his judgment, he has corrected the advice of the Minister of the Crown who advised him in the matter, and has stripped away from one of the ablest and best public officers in the service of Canada, one who is as able to-day to perform his duties as any man in this country, and who is mentally and physically in the enjoyment of all his faculties, the sum of $300 of the amount which he had promised to pay him if he would give up his office to some hungry office-seeker; and that is the way he has retaliated on me for exposing the manner in which the Government were abusing the Superannuation Act in order to provide for their followers. Bad as it was to get rid of an able officer for that purpose, and to give him more than he was entitled to in order to induce him to make way for others, it was worse to break the pledged faith of the Crown, and to say to an old and valued public servant, "You shall not only be deprived of your office, but, after being deprived of your office, the Government of the day think it not beneath them to come back to you and say, We have been taught the law, and taught our duty by the hon. member for Cumberland, and we will strip you of $300 of the amount we pledged to you for the term of your natural life." They have not only so used or so abused the power of the Administration, the powers which they possess in this respect, but they are actually bringing in a Bill, or rather the Minister of Justice has already brought in a Bill, to prevent superannuated officers from being elected members of the House of Commons. No age entitles a man to superannuation while the Government require his services, and wish to retain them, for the age placed in the Act is merely nominal, and thousands of the most intelligent and most intellectual men in the country are sixty years of age; but the Government have so abused the power which was placed in their hands for the sole purpose of providing for the efficiency of the public service, and not for the purpose of providing places for their own followers, that they are actually bringing in a Bill to prevent the electors of Canada from electing the men they have pensioned for life.

MR. BOWELL: That is what they call the Independence of Parliament.

MR. TUPPER: Sir, the Bill was necessary, for, without it, next Session they would have had to face men who, in the full vigour and prime of their manhood, have been pensioned, and would have had to give an account, if indeed they should then be in a position to be held accountable any longer, for the acts which have been done. The increase in 1876-7, as compared with 1873-4, in Ocean, River, and Steam Service, was $54,635, and in Arts and Agriculture, etc., $46,676. Yet the Minister of Finance ventured to assert that they had reduced the ordinary expenditure of the country two million dollars per annum. I have shown that they have increased the expenditure of the country nearly five million dollars in three years over our largest expenditure. I trust I have satisfied the House that it is not a question of high or low taxation, any further than this, that, inasmuch as we governed the country with a small taxation, and inasmuch as we are prepared to govern the country again without those extravagant expenditures made by the present Government since they have been entrusted with power, all we ask is, not that the taxation of the people shall be increased, because we do not require so much money as the hon. gentlemen opposite, as we have shown by our economy in the past, and which we are prepared to practice in the future; but that the money shall be levied in such a way as to furnish employment for the people and provide the means of paying the taxation that is levied upon them. What we ask is, not the increase of taxation, but a readjustment of taxation. Let me give the Minister of Finance an indication; let me take the question of the sugar duties—a question which I am astonished to find he has made no reference to in the course of his address, especially after what took place a few evenings ago. After the strong antagonism brought to light as existing between the members of the Administration on that question, I had thought the hon. the Finance Minister would have found it necessary to give some reason why his colleague, who had declared that this was one of the most vital and important questions, should be placed in the position of going back to his constituents and telling them: "You are sold; your Independent representative, who fought your battle a year ago on the floor of Parliament, has deceived you, and sits with his mouth closed while the Finance Minister of Canada says he has nothing to propose by which the sugar-refining industry and West Indian commerce of the country will be in any degree promoted." I hold in my hand a speech made on the 9th March last by the hon. the Minister of Militia, in which he says:

"If the Government had applied that principle to sugar he would not have complained, but the principle applied to the manufacturers had been refused to the sugar refiners. The sugar interest demanded some consideration, because if some legislation did not speedily take place, he was afraid we were going to lose a large trade with the West Indies. That trade in the Maritime Provinces at the present moment involved from three to four million dollars a year, but the inevitable result of the present policy would be to drive the whole trade to the United States. We sent our vessels with outward cargoes, which we sold in the West Indies, and they were obliged to take the sugar to the United States to have it refined. Cargoes of sugar passed through the Boston refineries, and in twenty-four and thirty-six hours were imported into Canada again under a bounty of fifty per cent. Such a system could not continue very long. In a short time, when the Americans found out that they had destroyed our trade, they would dictate their own terms and then it would be seen how disastrous the present policy was."

to the people as a person prepared to sustain, on a great question of that kind, a disastrous policy? Does the hon. gentleman think that it would not be possible, by lowering the duties on sugar, to build up a great sugar-refining industry in this country with a great West Indian trade, increased shipping, and the development of the fisheries of the country? The Finance Minister in his answer to the people of Fergus, where he delivered an address, declared that the Government did not believe in promoting the prosperity of the country by Acts of Parliament; but his colleague tells him that they are destroying the commerce of this country for want of an Act of Parliament. I leave these hon. gentlemen to settle this question between themselves and justify themselves to the people of the country, if they can, for not so readjusting the sugar duties as to build up a great industry in Canada at a time when the country is suffering for want of employment, and the mass of the people are ready to take any wages if they can obtain work. The hon. the Minister of Finance leaves the tariff untouched by such legislation as would build up the commerce of the country, promote its prosperity, and increase its revenue; and does that when his own colleague expresses the distinct opinion that the sugar trade is one of the most important branches of trade to which Canada can look. One hundred and ten million pounds of sugar were consumed by Canada last year. Not only would the imports from the West Indies and refining of that commodity afford enormous employment, but in all its ramifications, it would be difficult to over-estimate the impulse given to commerce simply by a re-adjustment of the sugar tariff. The amount of sugar imported from the United States and Great Britain alone would consume thirty-two thousand tons of coal in the process of refining; and yet, with the West Indian trade dying, as the hon. gentleman's colleague has told him, and being carried away from Halifax to Boston and New York, the Finance Minister states that the Government of Canada is powerless to do anything to increase the prosperity of the country or benefit it in that respect. Does the hon. gentleman not know that it would afford an additional stimulant to the coal mining interests? Two objects would be obtained by such a policy, not only would we create a great sugar refining industry, which would employ a large amount of capital which has hitherto been invested ruinously, but a stimulant would be given to the coal mining interest. The Minister of the Interior quoted Sir A. T. Galt as an authority a few minutes ago. Let me refer to the position of Sir A. T. Galt, whom the hon gentlemen on the Treasury benches have held up to the people of Canada as the most able public man to be found in the Dominion. Let me draw attention to the fact that Sir A. T. Galt, a short time ago, while holding a high position on the Fishery Arbitration for which they had nominated him—and it must have been very painful for him to come into collision with their policy at the time he was holding that position—was called upon by the citizens of Toronto to give an address on the public questions of the day; and he then stated that there was no question of more vital importance to the people of Canada than the question of sugar refining. He said: "It is the most important question, because, on that question—the sugar refining industry—will be fought out the whole fiscal policy of Canada." That was the language of a gentleman who, as I say, is Independent, and not connected with either political party, and it is given to the people of this country as the result of a long period of public service and a long period of attention by one of the finest and ablest minds in this country. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman ought to know that a re-adjustment of the tariff does not always involve, even for revenue purposes, increased taxation. The hon. gentleman ought to know that Sir Robert Peel reduced the duties on sugar £10 per ton, and largely increased the revenue. Why? Because it is not only a necessary of life, but one of those articles that will be used by the people just to the extent you reduce its cost, and give them the opportunity of increasing its consumption. So that, if the hon. gentleman were to adopt the policy I urge upon him of not increasing the duties upon fine sugar, but of making such reduction of the duty upon raw sugars used for refining purposes as would enable that great industry to be brought into play, I believe—as stated in the letter I read the other night, which was written by the Minister of Militia to Sir Francis Hincks, in which he told him, or pointed it out to him, in the clearest and most succinct manner—that he might easily lower the duties on raw sugar, because the effect would be such as to secure an increased consumption that would make most ample compensation to the revenue. But those gentlemen, those “flies on the wheel,” compose themselves and look with indifference upon a suffering country, and say they have nothing to propose, keeping matters in a state which obliges and compels them to come down here and present the most deplorable statement as to the financial condition of the country it has ever been the duty of any Finance Minister of Canada to present. The hon. gentleman ought to know that this one industry would expend in this country something like a million of dollars, in the amount of money that would be paid out in connection with carrying it on. I ask him if that could be done without conferring a great indirect benefit upon the revenue of Canada? It is perfectly obvious that a policy of that kind would be eminently in the interests of the whole of the people of this country, and of the revenue of this country. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman’s answer to all this is what he gave in this collection of speeches. Suppose, he said, the Opposition had their policy; suppose this was carried out, and all the stimulus that they could have were given to Canadian industries and interests; all that it would accomplish, he said, would be to provide for 25,000 persons, and they not fully grown men, but factory hands generally. Now, Sir, this is just another of the fatal mistakes that the hon. gentleman makes in connection with our policy. He supposes there is no benefit to Canada and the country, and no benefit to the revenue, to accrue from this policy, except what will apply just to the mere number of persons engaged in that industry. Does the hon. gentleman not know that it is estimated that at this moment there are only 50,000 persons directly engaged in the cotton trade of Great Britain, and does the hon. gentleman not know that it is perfectly well understood that four millions of people in Great Britain depend upon that cotton industry for the bread they eat, that four millions of the people of Great Britain are dependent for their living to-day upon an industry that only gives direct employment to 50,000 hands? Well, Sir, apply that rule to this case—if the employment of 50,000 people will give bread to four millions of people, I want to know if an industry that will give employment to an additional 25,000 persons would not in the same ratio support a population equal to one-half the population of Canada. Then take the coal industry of this country. I ask the hon. gentleman, when he sees a great industry like the coal trade of Nova Scotia, in which $12,000,000 or $14,000,000 of capital have been sunk—sunk, lost and destroyed for ever, unless it is made a profitable industry—I ask him how he can stand with folded hands and look on indifferently upon a policy that leaves $12,000,000 of capital, with the amount of employment it could give to hundreds and thousands of our people, and the wealth and prosperity it could diffuse over a large section of this country; I ask him how he could do that and refuse the prayer of the coal owners of Nova Scotia and gentlemen who sympathised with them, that 50c. per ton of duty should be levied upon coal coming into this country? This would give a great impetus to that industry and be of a great advantage. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but that is the case. The hon. gentlemen have stated in another place that when I speak in Ontario I never have a word to say about the duty on coal, and that, when I speak in the Lower Provinces, I never have a word to say about duties on flour. Now, I challenge those gentlemen to find any speech I delivered, any single speech I delivered in the Lower Provinces, in which I have not advocated a duty on flour when advocating at the same time a duty on coal, and vice versa. I may have made some flowery speeches, Sir—

MR. DYMOND: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. If he advocated a duty on flour in Nova Scotia, I never knew about it; and I have read his speeches, and I have never discovered a line about coal in those he delivered during the picnic campaign in Ontario.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman knows I did not require to deal with this question of coal. The hon. gentleman knows that, here in Ontario, that, here in the Parliament of the country, that, here in the face of the whole people of the country, I have defined in the clearest and most emphatic manner my views and principles on that question, and the opinions I entertain and the policy I hold, year after year for ten long years, and this naturally has rendered it quite unnecessary for me to say in Ontario or in any portion of this wide Dominion, that I am advocating a duty on those articles. And the hon. gentleman knows that, in the great organ of public opinion with which he is connected, he has himself ample means of diffusing my sentiments on that question all over the Province of Ontario; and it would be paying a poor compliment, Sir, to that organ to suppose that any person, that any intelligent man in Ontario, does not know perfectly well what my sentiments are on that subject.

MR. DYMOND: I would merely remark to the hon. gentleman that, on the principle the hon. member has laid down, whenever he advocates anything in this House, it is wholly unnecessary for him to advocate it in Ontario. I am rather glad to hear it.

MR. TUPPER: Well, Sir, I would like the hon. gentleman to show me a speech in which I have ever dealt with this subject in the Maritime Provinces and have not dealt with the duty on flour. He says he does not know it, but he should have known it; and the hon. gentleman opposite, before he made this statement, ought to have known this, that, instead of having concealed my views with reference to the duty on flour, I went down to the floor of the Assembly of Nova Scotia, when I was leader of the Government of that Province, and proposed a duty on flour, and put it on the Statute-book of the country. And, when we came into Confederation, we came into it with a duty of fifty cents a barrel, I think it was; at all events, a duty on flour imposed by the Legislature of Nova Scotia. Why did I do it, Sir? I did it for this reason. I had gone on my knees, figuratively speaking, to the United States; Nova Scotia had used all the powers she possessed, along with the other British American Provinces, to prevent the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty; and when they did it I had only one policy to pursue. I told the people of Nova Scotia that, if we wished to get the treaty again, we had to put ourselves in the position we were in when we obtained it before. And I say that that is the true policy now for Canada. I asked them to tax the articles coming from the United States, and that was at a time when we could not get flour from Ontario, as now, free from duty, and when we were entirely dependent upon the United States for all our flour. The Province was asked to impose a duty on flour, and they did it, and it was on the Statute-book when we came into Confederation. Sir, I say if we want to revive the Treaty of 1854, under which both countries prospered, there is only one way of getting it, and that is by putting ourselves in the position we were in when we obtained it and not by going into negotiations, as the Hon. George Brown went into them, asking for concessions from the United States; and, when asked if he had anything to give in return, saying that we had already given all we had to give. They, of course, said: "Good morning to you. If we have it all our own way now, we will let matters stand as they are." I had the pleasure of meeting one of the most eminent men on the Fishery Commission from the United States at Sir A. T. Galt's dinner table and he asked me what the party lines were in Canada. I said: "The policy of the party with which I am connected is to endeavour to foster Canadian industries by such a readjustment of the tariff as will give them increased protection." "Ah!" he said,

“you and I could not agree, then, for I am an out-and-out Free-trader.” I said: “I am not certain that we would not agree;” and I asked him “What would you do if you were living in Canada, and if you knew that nature had provided in the coal fields of Nova Scotia the means of providing Boston and New York and the United States with coal at the cheapest rate, with the same advantage for Ontario; would you allow the mining industry of your own country to be destroyed by seventy five cents duty on coal going out of Canada into the United States, and would you be willing that Canada should receive 600,000 tons of American coal without charging a cent for duty?” “No,” he said, “I would not.” He said: “Free-trader as I am, I would meet the duty of the United States with precisely the same duty as they imposed upon me. There is no one in the United States more anxious to see you do it than the people of the Atlantic States, and I will tell you why. All you have to do is to pursue the common-sense plan of meeting the American as he does you, and put the duty on his coal: the duty will be taken off, and coal be supplied cheaper on both sides.” I give that to hon. gentlemen, and I ask if it does not appeal to every man as common sense. With such a lever as we have, what is it that keeps the duty of seventy-five cents on coal? It is the coal mining monopoly of Pennsylvania, and the moment you meet them in Ontario with a duty, as they meet you in Boston and New York, they will be only too glad to use the power they now use to keep it on, to take it off.

MR. MILLS: Why could not the hon. gentleman apply this rule to the tax on coal oil?

MR. TUPPER: I am glad the hon. gentleman has mentioned coal oil; and I put it to the Minister of Finance, how can he deny to the suffering miner of Nova Scotia a duty of 17½ per cent. on coal—which is all he asks—and compel every Nova Scotian to pay 33½ per cent. of protection for the Ontario industry of petroleum?

An Hon. MEMBER: Fifty or sixty per cent.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. TUPPER: An hon. member says fifty or sixty per cent.; but I will put it at the very lowest rate, and no one can say that there is not a duty of 33½ per cent. The coal miners of Nova Scotia believe that a duty of fifty cents a ton will send their coal to Hamilton. Does the hon. gentleman not know that a large contract for coal was called for at Belleville not long ago, and that the Nova Scotia dealers were only thirty-five cents above the United States, and, if the duty had been imposed, they would have obtained the contract. What is the use of crushing out our coal industry? There are no persons more interested in having it maintained than the people of Ontario. Destroy it? Let all the twelve millions that has been invested in it be lost, and Ontario will be at the mercy of the United States, and they will charge us for their coal what they please. But I want to know, as a pure question of revenue, can the hon. gentleman give this House any reason why he should put a duty on light that he does not put on fuel? Is light any more a necessary of life than fuel, or is fuel any more a necessary of life than light? If you ask the poor man in Nova Scotia to pay for a protection to the Ontario industry of coal oil of 33½ per cent., how can you refuse a protection of 17½ per cent. to the suffering coal mining industry of Nova Scotia? I maintain it would displace the coal from the United States. One of the leading coal dealers we had before the Committee proved that he imported ten cargoes of Nova Scotia coal into Ontario, and he got fifty cents per ton higher for it than was obtained for United States coal, because it was so much better, and not only so, but any quantity could have been sold. That was done, I think, at the time we had a fifty cents a ton duty on it.

MR. DYMOND: It was a year before it, 1869.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman says it was a year before. Perhaps it was, and, if so, it makes the case still stronger. And the reason it was done was this: Steamers were employed to carry flour down and coal up, and it was the fact of having return cargoes that accomplished the work. Now, I say, if you want to knit this whole country together from end to end, you must knit it together commercially. You must make every man feel, not that he is a Nova Scotian, not that he is of Quebec, but that he is a Canadian, and that he is interested in the development of Canadian industries and Canadian enterprises wherever they may be found. I am told, and I am glad to learn it, that in the Province of New Brunswick a valuable anthracite mine has been discovered, and I trust that, if that is the case, I shall very soon have the assistance of the hon. members from that Province in the great measure I am now pressing upon the attention of the House. But, if no American coal was displaced, if you placed a fifty cent duty on coal you would get $300,000 of revenue, and that would take off $300,000 taxation from other articles.

Mr. MILLS: From whom?

Mr. TUPPER: From the consumers; just as you got it off the consumers of coal oil in the Lower Provinces exactly. If we are to say that one Province in this country is to legislate for its own interest, exclusively, without regard to all the rest, then avow such a policy, and it would be consistent enough for some hon. gentlemen to avow that policy, and carry it out; but it is a policy that will not commend itself to the honest, independent intelligence of the fair-minded Canadian, let him be found where he may. I say, therefore, that, as a pure question of revenue, the hon. gentleman can give no satisfactory reason to the people of this country for protecting coal oil and not protecting coal. The hon. gentleman can draw no distinction, except the distinction that one is the industry of a weaker Province, that has not, perhaps, he thinks, quite as much strength to enforce its claims as that of the larger Province from which he comes. We are told, also, that the farmers are hostile; we are told that the agricultural interest of the country has no interest in this protective policy. I think they have a great interest. About as great an authority as, perhaps, ever existed in relation to Free-trade, was Mr. Cobden, the great author of Free-trade in England. What does he say upon this subject? In his speech in the House of Commons, on the 12th March, 1844, Mr. Cobden said: "The farmer's interest is that of the whole community, and is not a partial interest."

Mr. MILLS: Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER: "And you cannot touch him more sensitively than when you injure the manufacturers, his customers." Now, Sir, I give that to the hon. gentleman as, perhaps, about as high an authority as can be adduced. Every person knows that a large portion of our agricultural production can only be consumed in our home market; that, as there is a large amount of the produce of the farm that can only find profitable consumption in home consumption, that is not susceptible of being sent abroad without very great injury, it will be at once seen, what every farmer in this country appreciates, that the greatest value that his farm can receive is the building up of a manufacturing industry in his neighbourhood by which he will have a home market, and have a sale for the products of the farm, without being put to a great cost in their transport. Then, every person knows perfectly well that every pound, every bushel of grain that comes out of the United States into this country for consumption displaces a pound or a bushel of Canadian grain, and compels our farmer, instead of finding a home market for his crop, to export it. Every pound or bushel that is consumed in Ontario of corn or grain that comes from the United States displaces that much of our own consumption, and compels the Canadian farmer to seek, at greater cost and difficulty of transport, three thousand miles away, his market that otherwise he would find at home. What we want is as free a trade as the United States chooses in relation to these matters.

Mr. MILLS: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. The hon. gentleman said, a short time ago, that he was in favour of Reciprocity. I would like to know, if we had Reciprocity, what would be the condition of the farmer under these circumstances?

MR. TUPPER: Well, Sir, all that I can say is, that the hon. gentleman shows a very limited knowledge of the whole question. What the Canadian farmer asks is a fair field and no favour. He asks that, if his bushel of barley is met on the frontier of the United States with a duty of fifteen cents a bushel, the corn that comes out of the United States into Canada shall not come in free. He asks that the storehouses of the distilleries shall not be crowded with American corn, brought in to displace the products of the soil of Canada. I am not much acquainted with whiskey, but I believe that with a great many people old rye is a familiar beverage quite equal to whiskey made from corn. I believe that there is a very large portion of this country that is not well adapted for anything else, that is admirably adapted for the growth of rye; and I want to know whether it would not be better to clear up the land and grow rye upon it, than bring American corn for the manufacture of whiskey into the country free of duty? I think the hon. gentleman will find that, as far as the agriculturists are concerned, they understand this perfectly well. They would be quite satisfied with a Reciprocity Treaty that would give them free access to the markets of the United States for their products, but they are not believers in one-sided Free-trade. But I want to deal with one of the objections of the Minister of the Interior in one of his oracular enunciations on this question in Ontario. He stated to his countrymen that one of the great difficulties in this matter was that it would prevent an enormous trade in grain from coming from the United States through Canada, and he showed that that was worth half a million per annum. Well, I do not know whether he understands it better than those that are in the trade, but those who are in trade say that, if he had said it was worth $50,000 or $60,000, he would have been a good deal nearer the mark, as to anything that any Canadian can levy upon that trade, as it is in transitu. But I am happy to relieve his mind. The men best acquainted with the whole of the question, men whose business it is to carry on that very trade, say that he is entirely mistaken.

MR. MILLS.

MR. MILLS: No.

MR. TUPPER: No? Did not Mr. W. H. Howland, the President of the Manufacturers' Association, one of the great grain merchants of this country, treat with the most profound contempt and ridicule the argument of the hon. gentleman? Did he not point out that he had entirely lost sight of the first principle that applied to the trade, and did he not point out that of the trade carried on by himself; that, although they preferred the St. Lawrence, more than half of it goes through the United States, and goes through in bond, and that there is not the slightest difficulty in the business whatever? I merely throw that out to answer one of these objections that appear to have something in them when first placed before people who do not understand the question; but, when examined in the light of intelligence and information, dissipate and fade away, as do all the objections that the hon. gentleman raises to all these matters. Now, there is another reason why we should have a different tariff with the United States. I have said before that, as far as England is concerned, while we are most anxious to preserve her institutions and adopt her policy, as far as they are adapted to our own country, we feel as Canadians that we must look at the position in which we stand in relation to the fiscal policy of the great country alongside of us. We cannot lose sight of the fact that the protection that any tariff gives us against the manufacturers of Great Britain fails in its application to the United States, because the cost of transport is so much less from the United States than from Great Britain, and it is found insufficient. But let me draw the attention of these loyal gentlemen who want England to be considered, and England's policy to be maintained, to the startling figures to which I drew the attention of the House last year, and to the equally startling figures that the trade returns laid upon the table of the House by the Government show at present in relation to the matter. What do they say? Why, they show that in 1873 the imports from Great Britain were $68,000,000,—I will only use the millions, and leave out the hundreds of thousands and thousands—while our imports from Great Britain in 1873 were $68,000,000, they have fallen in 1877 to $39,000,000, a decrease of $27,000,000. Now, let us apply that test to the United States, and see where we are. While the imports from the United States in 1873 were $47,000,000, in 1877 they were $51,000,000—a decrease from England of $29,000,000, and an increase from the United States of $4,000,000. I think that ought to show from where the trade of Canada is coming. Well, Sir, take 1873, and you will find that we received in that year $20,000,000 less from the United States than from Great Britain, and that in 1877 we received $11,000,000 more from the United States than from Great Britain.

MR. MILLS: Why?

MR. TUPPER: I have already explained to the hon. gentleman that it is because the policy of this Government is an American policy. It is because it is inspired by men who could not work more zealously for the interests of the United States if they owed their allegiance to them: instead of to their own country. Look at the exports, and you find that the exports to Great Britain in 1873 were $38,000,000, and in 1877, $41,000,000. The country from which we are withdrawing all our trade still receives, with open arms, all we have to offer; while the United States, on the other hand, received $42,000,000 of our exports in 1873, and only $25,000,000 in 1877. What is the meaning of this? It is that, owing to the proximity of the United States to us, they are able to paralyze our industries with their fiscal policy. They are enabled to send to this country their surplus products, so that, when their own market is glutted, they make a slaughter market of Canada, and they are sufficiently near us to be able to paralyze our own industries. And, not only do they make Canada a slaughter market, but there is an hon. gentleman behind me who can say—

MR. MILLS: The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Robinson) told us a few evenings ago—

MR. TUPPER: I wish the hon. gentleman would keep still until I get through. It only protracts the time I regret to have to occupy, when I am interrupted.

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman objects, the interruptions must cease.

MR. TUPPER: I do not generally object to interruptions, but when an hon. gentleman persistently interrupts me—when he interrupts me for the purpose of breaking into a sentence, of breaking in upon a train of thought which is in my mind at the time—I do object. This country, Sir, is not only made a slaughter market for the United States, but it is the deliberate, settled policy of the United States to break down the trade and manufactures of this country. The United States Consul at Toronto, in his report to his Government, says: "We have got nearly all the trade of Canada, and we can get it all." There is an hon. gentleman behind me, who is in the iron trade. He found that he could get from an establishment in Oshawa the supply that he wanted, and he wrote to the parties in the United States, with whom he had been in the habit of dealing, that he could get it at a lower price than he could get it from them. They wrote back that they were very sorry he had not informed them before, for, if they had known it, they would have supplied him at a still lower rate. They would have delivered it, duty and freight free, at less than he could get it in Canada. This meant just the same as the action which was taken in relation to salt. On that article, while they maintained their prices in the United States, they were determined that no Canadian salt interest should prosper. They would rather sell salt for nothing. Manufacturers in the United States have come and offered manufacturers in this country large bonuses not to carry on their manufacturing, and, when they refused to accept them, they put down the prices so low as to destroy the industry. Every one knows how keen the Americans are in adopting every possible means to shut out Canadian industries. Everyone knows that a great industry in canning lobsters has grown up in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. How do the Americans meet us? With as cheap labour here as in the United States, we could compete with them in their own markets without any difficulty, under a fair and equitable tariff. In violation of the spirit of the Washington Treaty, if not of its express letter, they first imposed a duty of 18c. per dozen on the cans, and, finding that it was not enough to paralyze the Canadian industry, they are now proposing to tax the lobsters themselves 35c. per dozen cans, on the ground that they are not embraced in the treaty. When you have a great country with forty millions of people, giving their attention to everything that bears on the industrial progress of their own people, it behoves the Canadian Government to become equally alive to the necessity of protecting the industries of Canada against unfair competition. But we are told there is another fatal objection to this policy: "It will cause high prices; you cannot give protection without making the people pay for it." That is not correct either. Let me give an illustration: Under a protective tariff brought in by Sir Alex. Galt to protect boots and shoes, machinery for the manufacture of boots and shoes was brought into the city of Montreal; everyone knows that at that time the prices of boots and shoes were very high, that the effect of that protective tariff was to establish boot and shoe manufactories throughout Canada, and the result of it was that boots and shoes have been cheaper from that day to this than they could be obtained in the United States or in Canada before the protective tariff was enacted. Protection brings in capital which will go where industries are fostered, and where capital goes competition will follow, and where that comes skill will be developed, and increased skill and increased competition reduce prices. What is the reason why England is now practically shut out of the markets of France, Germany and the States? It is that under a protective tariff England introduced such an amount of capital into her manufactures and developed so much skill as to reduce the cost to the very lowest point; but under a protective tariff in those other countries, the same skill and capital have been brought to bear, and the result has been a fall in prices. Although the United States was one of the most highly protected countries in the world, it will be found that under that policy they have not only become a great manufacturing people, but, as competition and skill advanced, they were able to compete with England in her own favourite industry—that of iron. As I have stated, within a comparatively few years, the export of iron from Great Britain has fallen from $180,000,000 to $100,000,000. Why? Notwithstanding all the difficulties the United States has experienced, its protective policy has made it to-day one of the cheapest countries from which iron can be obtained. That is the result. If, therefore, the effect of fostering industries is to bring capital into the country as well as labour, and to develop skill and competition which will invariably bring down prices, the objection urged against Protection cannot be sustained. The truth is that we have but one policy to adopt in this country. The hon. the Minister of Finance says that the one thing he looks forward to is an increase in the population. Where is that increase to come from? If employment cannot be found for the people in the country because our manufactures and industries are monopolized by the Americans, there is no hope of an increase in the population in the older and settled districts, except from slow and natural causes. The policy the Government has pursued has had the effect of depopulating the country. It has sent away the most skilled and intelligent labour, the finest sons of Canada, to a foreign country to obtain employment their own country denies them. That is a fatal policy, and one which must induce us to forego all our aspirations for anything like a rapidly increased greatness for this country in the future, and to consent to become hewers of wood and drawers of water for our friends across the line in the great Republic of the United States. Canada has everything that a country can desire to make it a great manufacturing country. We have iron, coal and limestone. Ours is, perhaps, the richest country for minerals to be found on the face of the globe. We have open harbours; rapid transit and communication through a great portion of the Dominion; and, away in the Far West, mines of gold and silver that, in my opinion, are going to excel any on the American continent. All we require is a policy calculated to open up and develop our great natural resources, in order to make Canada all that the noblest aspirations of the most patriotic Canadian has ever supposed for a moment practicable. We are told that the United States presents an unhappy spectacle. The hon. the Minister of Finance, notwithstanding he had a deficit of $1,901,000, followed by a deficit of $1,361,000, and that to be followed at no distant day by another large deficit—with all those facts staring him in the face, he was so utterly indifferent to the necessities of Canada, that, after bestowing a few words on that trifling and comparatively insignificant matter that is before the House for its consideration, he wanders away to the municipality of New York to instruct the people of the United States respecting their municipal institutions. I think the hon. gentleman in the present hour of his country's necessities might find nearer home something that was worthy of his attention, and sufficient to tax all the ability he or his colleagues possess, in order to endeavour to extricate Canada from the deplorable condition into which they have brought her. The hon. gentleman, when speaking about the United States, is talking in the face of historical facts that cannot be controverted. He knew that their protective policy enabled the United States, not only by one gigantic stride to spring into the first rank of manufacturing nations, but in regard to its financial position everything has taken place that could be desired. He knew that, instead of running up a debt with the deficits of the country, they have reduced their gigantic debt to an enormous extent within the last seven or eight years. He knew that they not only reduced their debt but at the same time largely reduced the taxation on their people. Not only did they reduce the debt and taxation, but by their protective policy they have rendered themselves comparatively independent of Great Britain and foreign countries, and have turned the balance of trade from being over $100,000,000 against them to being to-day over $100,000,000 in their favour. Yet the Minister of Finance wanders away from the necessities of Canada in this, one of the direst and most gloomy hours of her history, to discourse to us about the miserable condition in which the United States is to be found. Hon. gentlemen opposite said: "You cannot meet the difficulty; your position is a peculiar one; the people of Canada cannot choose their fiscal policy. There is a power above and beyond us which controls our action, and, if we wanted to-day to have a different tariff with the United States and Great Britain, it would be refused." I join issue with the hon. gentleman, and say the time has come when I believe it is not only the duty of Canada to have a Canadian policy, but I believe they will meet with no difficulty whatever in carrying out a Canadian policy. Have we not had differential duties? I would like to know what the tea duty was, if it was not differential, if it did not operate on tea coming from the United States very differently from what it did on the tea that came from England? I want to know, when the National Policy was carried in the House, whether we had not a differential tariff, and if he looks in the Statute-book he will find that, when we proposed to have a duty on salt, we exempted in the act, we specifically exempted all salt coming from Great Britain and all British possessions anywhere. The hon. gentleman will find that policy has been fairly conceded as far as the Imperial Government was concerned; but there is a mode of meeting the question, which I am satisfied would avoid any difficulty whatever. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but I will give for it as high an authority as he. Sir A. T. Galt, in the speech to what I have referred, pointed out that it was not only the duty of this country to protect Canada against unfair competition on the part of the United States of America, but he pointed out—and he expressed himself as having entertained no doubt about it, and he is certainly as well qualified to express such an opinion as any man in this country whatever—that there would not be the slightest objection on the part of the Imperial Government to have the policy adopted. I say that this policy could be adopted—a revenue policy or such a policy with relation to goods coming from Great Britain or from British possessions as the necessities and the fiscal policy of Canada indicated, and another tariff for all the rest of the world. That would apply only to the United States practically, because our imports from other portions of the world are almost uniformly articles upon which there are specific and not ad valorem duties, and we could adjust that in the interests of Canada as we pleased. I have no doubt that this would meet the only serious difficulty represented by the hon. gentleman opposite as standing in the way of a true Canadian policy, and one that those who wish to see Canadian enterprise and Canadian industries flourish, feel it is time that the country should grapple with earnestly and deal with as I have mentioned. I shall now conclude my observations by thanking the House very much for giving me this opportunity of meeting the challenge thrown down by the hon. the Minister of Finance, and of broadly stating our policy, the policy on which we are proud to stand in the presence of the free and intelligent people of this country; and to that people I can assure the hon. gentleman we shall be most happy to submit the arbitrament of this great question, and bow to their decision with all the humility to which the will of the sovereign people of this country is entitled.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Mr. Speaker, I feel that I am trespassing very unduly upon the patience of the House, which has been now taxed by listening to a financial discussion of something like five hours, in craving the right of offering a few remarks on the speech which has been just delivered by the hon. member for Cumberland. I am very glad to be able to congratulate the hon. gentleman opposite for having stated his case on this occasion at least in fair and temperate language and, with some trifling exceptions, with far less vehemence than has usually characterized him on other occasions of the kind; and I may say I shall always, for my part, be glad to meet him as far as I can in discussing these important public questions in the self-same spirit. I do not doubt in the slightest degree the sympathy which my hon. friend has been pleased to express for my painful position; and I do not doubt, that to that sympathy I may confidently appeal; but, when he proceeds to impugn the accuracy of the Estimates which I on former times submitted, I must take leave to differ seriously with that hon. gentleman. It is perfectly true, and I have never attempted to deny it—that neither I, nor, as far as I know, any other man in this House, or indeed any man in an eminent position in the country in mercantile matters, ever attempted to measure accurately the extent of the depression which now exists, and which, from various causes, has been increased to a most unwonted extent. That fact, so far as it affects the accuracy of any Estimates submitted, I frankly admit, but I say that there is this all-important difference between the policy of this Government and the policy of the late Government, and between the policy which I advocate, and the policy which these hon. gentlemen advocate,—that those hon. gentlemen, on all occasions, and notably when they were imposing a very large amount of additional permanent charges, utterly mistook the position of this country, and utterly mistook the extreme inflation which then existed; that they mistook, as shown by their own statements made by their own Minister of Finance, a period of inflation for a period of permanent prosperity, that they declared it was possible, barely possible, but not supposable—those are their exact words—that our imports should not go on increasing from the figure of one hundred and twenty-eight millions, but that there was every reason to rely on a large and steady increase, and they even went into calculations to show what an enormous revenue was to be reaped from that increase. This is the point at issue between us—that those hon. gentlemen wholly mistook the position in 1873; that they based their whole fiscal policy upon a most ruinous supposition; and that they added enormously to the annual expenditure of the country on the faith of a dream and a delusion. Now, Sir, it is perfectly true that I did not expect in 1874 that we would require more than three millions of additional taxation; I am inclined to believe, in spite of all the prophecies of the hon. gentleman opposite, that we shall be able to get through with these three millions of taxation, because it is to be remembered that the taxation which was imposed last year, was not an additional tax, but rather a reduction of the burdens of the people, as indeed, the hon. gentleman himself admitted in the course of his remarks. To the statement that the two deficits to which I alluded have added to our debt $3,361,000, I take decided exception, inasmuch as I have shown that as nearly one-half of that sum by the operation of the sinking fund was applied in extinction of the debt; it follows that the total addition was very little more than one-half of the amount he has named. The hon. gentleman referred to a paper that I laid on the table of the House to-day, declaring that this statement, on the 10th of February, 1878, showed a deficit of $600,000. I think that, in all fairness, he should have read the concluding paragraph of that statement, which points out that in it, at an unusually early date, as he probably knows, the whole interest that had accrued, up to this time, on the national debt was charged, and also the whole of the subsidies for the year. In other words, that one and one-half millions which belonged to the latter half of the year was charged, under our system of paying the subsidies in advance, in the statement of expenditure brought down and laid on the table to-day, and, if allowance be made for that fact, it will be seen that, so far as the returns to this date go, they certainly do not show any probability of a deficit this year.

MR. TUPPER: I think the hon. gentleman should have added to that statement what the corresponding statement of the account was last year. I did not at all know that the account last year did not stand in precisely the same position. The hon. gentleman made a statement of fact and did not state its relation to the statement of the 10th February last.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I stated the relation to the receipts of last February—the relation to the expenditure I did not state, and for this simple reason with which the hon. gentleman, having himself been a Minister of the Crown, was, I supposed, thoroughly familiar—the expenditure statements are never very reliable because that part requires entries on account of the debt and other matters which often take place several weeks later one year than another. The expenditure statements are therefore, for the purpose of comparison, at this period of the year of very little use. The statement I made had reference to additional receipts received up to the 10th of February, which were, as I mentioned, very nearly one million of dollars in excess of those received during the preceding time. So far as the indications at present are concerned, they show no reason to suppose that our expenditure for the current year will much, if at all, exceed the expenditure for the year past, and, although I pledge myself to no prediction on the point, if we continue to receive during the next five months a proportionate increase, there is every reason to believe that the deficit will entirely disappear, or be reduced to very insignificant dimensions. Then the hon. gentleman proceeded to draw a contrast with a similar statement made for 1874. Now, he hon. gentleman ought to have known that at the time the statement that he referred to was made, an enormous amount—a perfectly unprecedented amount of Customs and Excise duties had been poured into the revenue chest. I believe that, in about ten days, one and a quarter millions above the ordinary receipts were brought into the Treasury in 1874, and, consequently, the contrast which he drew between the position now and the position with regard to the revenue statement then, is most gravely inaccurate in a vital point. The hon. gentleman declared that a protective tariff, as he called duties of 15 per cent., had had a most beneficial effect on our manufactures, and in fostering our industries. It was, I suppose, under that beneficial protective tariff that our imports increased in two or three years by ten millions, eleven millions and twenty millions a year. Now, I may be mistaken, but if so, my hon. friend opposite, and especially my hon. friend from Hamilton, will correct me, but I had supposed that the object of this protective tariff was to stop and not increase the imports into the country. If a protective tariff increased the importations into this country in the space of three or four years by thirty or forty millions, all I can say is that I suspect my hon. friend opposite would want extremely little of that kind of protection. Sir, it is quite true that the hon. gentlemen made tea free for one single year of their administration, and for one single year only; but I think they might fairly have added that, when they made the tea free, or very shortly after, they imposed so many millions of obligations, so many very unnecessary obligations on the people of this country, that they forced upon us the painful and unpleasant task of presently adding at least three millions to the annual taxes of the country. It may be perfectly true that the hon. gentleman protected the tea trade by paying $300,000 or $400,000 a year out of the pockets of the people of this country to a few importing firms; it is perfectly true that we took the tax off, and allowed tea to be brought into this country on even terms for all,—that we gave our ordinary merchants, not the great wealthy houses, I admit, but our ordinary merchants, the right of purchasing their tea wherever they could get it to most advantage; and, largely owing to that, the addition which I made in 1874 to taxes on tea had not the effect, as the House knows, of raising the price to the consumer by one single cent. He declares that the addition of 2½ per cent. gave no Protection. Well, we did not put that on for Protection purposes; we put it on for purposes of revenue; and I am glad to know, from the confession of the hon. gentleman, that we were fully successful in the object we designed to attain. But, worse than all,—worse than the crushing of the tea trade, a trade under which one ship per annum was in the habit of entering the St. Lawrence,—if indeed one ship per annum did enter the St. Lawrence, because the value of the protection to tea was this: that the great wholesale houses brought the tea from China and Japan via San Francisco, and even Boston and New York, to Canada,—in addition to the injury we did to the people of Canada by removing the tax on tea, we also refused to aid the great sugar interest of the country; that is to say, we refused to tax the people of Canada $400,000 or $500,000 or $600,000 a year, as was done for a good many years under the tariff of Sir Alexander Galt for the benefit of a single, no doubt deserving, but certainly sufficiently wealthy, firm of manufacturers. If it be true that there were $100,000 invested in that industry, which I do not doubt, all I can say is that, during the tariff which prevailed for eight or nine years in Canada, those gentlemen received, not cent. per cent., but I strongly suspect 700, or 800, or 900 per cent. on their investment. Sir, the hon. gentleman could not have given a better case in point. The hon. gentleman could not have called attention more forcibly to the mischief which arises from regulating these tariffs for the benefit of a few individuals. I believe, although these gentlemen kept their business very close, that I am accurate in stating that, under the operation of that tariff, two or three millions of dollars—I have heard it put as high as five or six millions, but I will say only two or three millions of dollars,—were taken out of the pockets of the people of Canada in order to make the fortunes of two or three wealthy gentlemen; as would be the case, not in the sugar industry alone, but in almost every other industry of a similar kind to which the same beneficent system of Protection should be applied. The hon. gentleman declared that he was glad to know that we were to appeal from Pilate to Cæsar. It strikes me that the hon. gentleman's recollection of the appeal to which he refers is slightly inaccurate; however, I am open to correction. It is put down as a high crime and misdemeanour that we are unable to believe that prosperity can be obtained by Act of Parliament.

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

As I had occasion to say somewhere else, if prosperity was to be obtained by Act of Parliament, could any folly, could any absurdity, could any blunder on earth equal ours? If we were able to give prosperity by Act of Parliament to the people of Canada, who, in all Canada, I ask, have so great an interest at this present moment in making the people prosperous by so cheap and easy a mode as myself and the other gentlemen who sit on these benches? At least, we may plead that, in this respect, we are innocent malefactors. It is evidently our interest to give prosperity; I can assure the hon. gentleman that it is our earnest desire to give prosperity; and if he could only convince me that I could make all men good, all men contented, all men wealthy, and all men virtuous by Act of Parliament,—for the one is just as easy as the other—I would ask to have the rules of the House suspended, and the whole Opposition re-adjusted at the earliest possible moment. But, he says, the union of the United States was preserved by Act of Parliament. Yes, Mr. Speaker, and by the bayonets of a million of American soldiers, who sprang forward to assist the Act of Parliament, which, otherwise, I fear, would have had every small effect in preserving the union that the hon. gentleman thinks was preserved in that fashion. The hon. gentleman goes on to declare that I myself showed by a recent enactment, that we could enrich the people to the extent of two millions by an Act of Parliament. Well, I am inclined to think we did save the people two millions of dollars or thereabouts by one action with respect to the repeal of the coal oil duties; but, mark—we did not put that money into the pockets of the people; we repealed that very bad law which the hon. gentleman and his colleagues had put on the Statute-book, and which was doing harm to the people of Canada to the extent of two millions of dollars. It was in that way, no doubt, that a considerable saving was made. It is in that way, and, so far as I know, in that way alone, that any considerable saving in that direction can be looked for. But mark the consistency of these hon. gentlemen.

These hon. gentleman, above all, and before all, are Protectionists; they desire to foster native industries; they call upon us to aid the struggling industries; and the only actual point to which they commit themselves is to attempt to crush out an Ontario industry. Had the measure, as introduced by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) originally passed, he would have placed the Canadian industry on precisely the same footing as the American importer; and he would have given nothing like the same measure of relief which we gave to the general public of the country; because it must be remembered that we reduced the duty on coal oil considerably more than the hon. gentleman at all proposed to reduce it. The hon. gentleman, perhaps wisely, fights very shy of the speech of his leader, delivered in the eastern townships. I am not altogether surprised that he prefers the resolution to the explanation of the resolution which I read to the House. However, he is prepared, it seems, to stand by the platform adopted by his friends at Toronto; and he twits us seriously that we have no platform. Sir, I think the policy of the Ministry has been announced at various times in a tolerably distinct fashion from this place by myself and other gentlemen who sit beside me. I think that no man can justly complain that the people of Canada were left in ignorance as to the policy which we thought best adapted to the circumstances of the country, and as to the policy which we were prepared at all hazards to justify and maintain. The hon. gentleman desires to have inter-provincial trade. The hon. gentleman desires, above all things that, at any hazard, coal shall be brought a thousand miles from Nova Scotia and shall be consumed by the Ontario manufacturer, whom he wishes to protect; and in that manner, the Nova Scotia coal owner is to be benefited, as in the case of these scanty harvests so eloquently depicted by his leader, the scanty harvests should be supplemented by compelling the people of the Maritime Provinces to pay double or treble prices for the flour they consume. And this is done as a means of cheapening the living of the artizans. Sir, it passes my comprehension to understand how the manufacturers are to be benefitted by paying twenty or thirty per cent. more than they otherwise would require to do for the coal which supplies their motive power; and, to go down to the Lower Provinces, how the fishermen or the seamen of that country are to be benefitted by being compelled to pay twenty or thirty per cent. more than they would otherwise pay for the flour which they are obliged to consume on their voyages. But the hon. gentleman declares there is no question as between him and us as between high and low taxes. I am very glad to hear it; I am very glad to understand such is the case; and I think those gentlemen who take an interest in Protection will do well to consider that it is not part of the policy of the hon. member for Cumberland to raise the taxes on anything if he gets back into power. I am quite aware that, in the various resolutions which have been submitted to the House, loop-holes have been left whereby those hon. gentlemen would not be entirely committed to any one thing, to raise the duty on any one single article, or to fulfil any one of the delusive hopes they have held out and are now holding out for the purpose of catching votes at the next elections. I do hon. gentlemen opposite this credit: I believe they know and fully appreciate the enormous difficulties which would attend the enforcement of that policy; and I have, therefore, not the slightest doubt whatever that the hon. member for Cumberland—when he comes back to power, if he ever does, of which I must fain express my doubt, at all events at the next elections—will find himself so crippled and confined on every quarter that, if he did make some slight readjustment of the tariff, he would be obliged to settle down on a general tariff not affording the manufacturers one whit more assistance or protection than that which he now condemns on our part, and which, by the way, was declared by the Dominion Board of Trade to be a fair revenue tariff no longer ago than six weeks. The hon. gentleman declares that the taxation imposed by the late Government was low. Had they put on taxation when they should have done so, had they made provision for the legacy left us, their taxation would have been no lower than ours is today. But he goes on and enunciates a most remarkable doctrine, to which I call the attention of the House. Taxation, the hon. gentleman declares, does not depend on the tariff; taxation goes to supply the interest on the debt and similar charges, and taxation is to be so imposed that it may afford the means of living—if I correctly understood him—to the persons engaged in the various industries. Well, Sir, how rich we might all become by the simple process of adding sufficiently to our taxation. The hon. gentleman proceeds to declaim against us as not only an unfortunate but an extravagant Government, because we are unable to adopt this simple mode of relieving our own difficulty and enriching the country at large. Then, proceeding to the hard facts of the case, the hon. member for Cumberland declares we have no right to accuse the late Government of extravagance because, in the first year of our administration—even assuming they were responsible for the whole of 1873-74—we spent $390,000 more than they did. That is to say that, the late Government having contracted a loan, the second half-year's interest on which alone would very nearly equal that amount; having left behind a legacy to the extent of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 for public works chargeable to income alone, having incurred a vast variety of expenses already enumerated, and which I will not now detail, we are responsible because we found ourselves obliged to provide for these expenditures which they had left behind, and over which, as I have said, we had no control whatever; and it was similar in the case of the second year. Of the $1,170,000 of excess in 1875-6, no man, who knows anything of the Public Accounts, can fail to perceive that at least $700,000 of that amount only represented the interest on sums expended on prosecuting certain public works which these hon. gentlemen had commenced before they left office, and that out of a total expenditure of $1,948,000 we spent no less than $1,100,000 on public works which had been voted for and put under contract by these hon. gentlemen before they left office. For the last year, as I pointed out, the whole $-00,000 of excess very little more than represents the interest on permanent investments which did not exist in 1873-4. The hon. gentleman then proceeds to make a charge against us that we put certain charges, which were properly capital, to revenue. Now, I have taken issue with the hon. gentleman on that question before. I say that the state, or condition, to which the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick railways had been reduced was such that that portion of the Intercolonial system required such a large outlay that it would have been a defiance of all sound principles, either in keeping accounts or in general economy, to have allowed these expenditures, which had arisen from these roads having been allowed to run down below their proper condition to be charged to capital. I say that when a road has been completed and properly fitted with rolling stock, the only course then is to close the capital account at once and not allow it to be reopened on any pretence whatever, except in cases where there are large improvements such as we have incurred on the Intercolonial; in other words, the capital account should never be allowed to be reopened, except in cases of expenditure which would justify the Government in making a loan to meet it.

An Hon. MEMBER: What about steel rails?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: We are not charging steel rails to capital. Of the question of refunds we have spoken before. I have merely to say that, in making a refund of $69,000, we did a simple act of justice to the Great Western Railway; and that was very little more than one-third of the amount allowed to the Grand Trunk by these very hon. gentlemen themselves. Regarding the Dawson route, which appears to have cost $400,000, I have merely to say that these amounts were expended, as my hon. friend the Premier informs me, before the hon. gentlemen opposite left office, and therefore, whether they be good or ill, we beg to disclaim all responsibility for them.

Mr. TUPPER said that was not the point. He did not say that the amount was not properly in the account, but that, inasmuch as it had been transferred to the head of the Pacific Railway, it could not go in any comparative statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it was not so at that time.

Mr. TUPPER said they could not strike a comparison between the years 1873 and 1877, when the expenses of that route were charged to revenue in 1873 and capital in 1877. It should be taken out of any comparative statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the route was given up altogether two years ago, but the amount charged in that particular year was entirely expended before the hon. gentlemen left office.

Mr. TUPPER said he had not taken any exception to that, but it ought to be omitted from any comparative statement.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I understand the point of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), but I cannot agree with him in the position which he takes. Then, coming to the exceptional items to which the hon. gentleman has referred, I think it might fairly be considered with regard to those items, that in the expenditure of 1873-74, is included only the first half of the loan contracted by Mr. Tilley, and that there is not included a portion of the expenditure actually incurred either on account of the Boundary Survey, or North-West matters, together with several other sums, amounting altogether to an amount quite equal to the exceptional items. However, as I have said on more than one occasion, if hon. gentlemen object to take 1873-74 as their basis of comparison, and would prefer 1872-73, I am quite willing to oblige them. I call the attention of the House to the fact that, as between the expenditure for the current year, 1877-78, and that for the year 1872-73, there is a difference of $5,100,000, not taking into account a good many items that may be fairly charged, all of which were due directly to the action and legislation of the late Government, and that, if you deduct that sum, as for purposes of comparison you ought to do, from the expenditure of 1877-78, you will find that our gross expenditure for the current year,—although we have a much larger population,—is less by one or two millions than the sum expended in 1872-73. As to Customs, in regard to which the hon. gentleman, if I understood him aright, imputed to us much more than extravagance—grave and serious corruption, I have only to remind him that the effect of the increases which were made in 1873-74—and a great many of them by certain Orders in Council, at or about the date of the end of October, or the early part of November, 1873, was not felt for a considerable time after the expiration of that year, and that a very considerable part of the increase is due to that cause; in other words, to the action of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues themselves. And if they collected $14,325,000 for Customs in 1873-74, I may recall to the House that the entire additional income was poured into the Treasury by the rush to anticipate the alterations in the tariff, and not under the tariff, for which the hon. gentlemen had made provision in their original estimate. They did not expect, according to Mr. Tilley's estimate, to collect more in 1873-74 than had been collected in 1872-73, and that was an amount of $12,954,000, and, in order to obtain that, he required an expenditure of $662,000, to which ought to be added from $20,000 to $30,000, for the effect of the changes made by the hon. gentleman. As to the items of increase in the Post-Office Department, I have admitted candidly, again and again, that the additions, though made for a very laudable and excellent purpose, were in excess of what we would probably have advised had we foreseen the extreme depression of the country and how seriously these increases would affect the revenue of that Department. But, although in one Department the hon. gentleman will find a considerable increase, owing to the large improvements of which the people have had the benefit, I think it will be acknowledged that that is the one service which more than any other tends to aid the diffusion of knowledge and education among the people of this country; and that, if there be any service in which the Government is justified in making somewhat larger expenditure than another, it is that service. Moreover, as the country grows and increases in population, it will, I believe, be found necessary to always encounter considerable additional expense for that purpose. It is true that we have not yet received the augmentation in the Post-Office revenue which we might have expected; but there are signs that it is beginning to recuperate. I think I am correct in stating that we have received $50,000 or $60,000 more in the first six or seven months of this year than we have done in a corresponding period heretofore; and I think these expenditures may, at no great distance of time, bring in a larger revenue than at present. In regard to the Administration of Justice, the Supreme Court was declared by those hon. gentlemen to be a very desirable thing in the interest of the people of this country. My information does not coincide with that of the hon. gentleman, but I do not believe that the right of appeal to England—if that right exists, a point on which I am not competent to offer an opinion—will be availed of to any appreciable extent. But, if it does exist, I think it is in the interest of the highest well-being of the people of this country that it should be discontinued. I know something of the cost of an appeal to England. Between the rich and the poor man it amounts to an utter denial of justice. I believe that there are few appeals to the Privy Council which do not involve a total cost of five or six thousand dollars, and to my certain knowledge the cost has often run up to $20,000 or $30,000. The cost of carrying a dozen cases of appeal to England would be more to the people of this country than the whole cost of the establishment of the Supreme Court. As regards other portions of the Administration of Justice to which attention has been called, the hon. gentleman had a full opportunity of discussing them when they were submitted, and I am not aware that he or any other member divided the House on the question, whether this increase was not necessary in the interest of the whole community. One large portion of the expenditure was caused by the necessity of assimilating the Administration of Justice in the hon. gentleman's own Province to that in the other portions of the Dominion, and I believe that was confirmed by the action of the Local Government of that Province. The hon. gentleman complains that we expended on Immigration $50,000 more in 1876-77 than was expended in 1873-74. If my calculation is correct, the increase was something like $35,000; but, be that as it may, the hon. gentleman declares that we obtain far less results than his Government did. If the hon. gentleman had looked at the returns in the Public Accounts, or had attended to the remarks I made on the subject, he would have noticed that $79,000 consists of loans to the Icelanders and Mennonites, which we have reason to believe will be repaid. And that $21,000 of that expenditure was caused by the necessity of repressing the extraordinary outbreak of small-pox in the Icelandic colony. But, Sir, I could not help thinking that my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) was imprudent when he declared that we were forcing the people of this country to expatriate themselves. Sir, did the hon. gentleman ever look at the United States census during the period from 1860 to 1870. Did he ever hear the statement made in 1873 by the officers of his own Department, or at least of the Department over which one of his colleagues presided, because if he did, he will know—and it is well that the people of this country should know it also—that during the administration of the hon. gentleman, and on his own premises, he must be gravely to blame for the fact that 600,000 or 700,000—according to their own statements—of the people of Canada were expatriated from this country to the United States; while, since we came into power, from various causes, the tide has been flowing the other way, and the expatriated Canadians whom the hon. gentleman drove out of the country are coming back under our benign sway. Now, I do not believe that the emigration from this country to the United States at this moment at all exceeds, if indeed it equals, the return emigration from the United States here, and all the evidence in the hands of the Department of Immigration goes extremely strongly to prove the truth of that assertion. The hon. gentleman complains bitterly of the use—or as he put it, the abuse—we have made of the Superannuation Act, and points out that we have added, in three years, the sum of $40,000 or thereabouts, to the annual expenditure under that head; while, in three years, if my memory serves me, the hon. gentlemen opposite ran it up from nothing to $60,000; and, although I do not complain of that, still I may point out to the hon. gentleman that, from various causes—no doubt partly from the beneficent disposition which led him, I recollect on one occasion to appoint a man who had passed that extreme period at which anyone can be retained in the service without a very special report of the Minister of the day in his favour—we found an enormous number of rather aged men in the service when we entered upon office. Now, Sir, the actual facts are these: We did increase the sum paid for superannuation by $41,000 in three years, but we got $4,000 more a year paid into the Treasury by our employés, and we abolished offices to the extent of $36,450. In other words, the net loss to the public, under those operations in three years, was about $1,000, or, to be more accurate, about $1,200 per annum. Touching the case of the unfortunate gentleman to whom the hon. member for Cumberland drew the attention of the House a year ago, I beg to state, that the faith of the Government was in no respect whatever pledged to Mr. Ratchford. Mr. Ratchford's office was found unnecessary, and he was, according to law, put upon the Superannuated List, being then a gentleman, if I remember aright, of 64 years of age. When the hon. member for Cumberland drew my attention to the fact that we had dealt too liberally with him (Mr. Ratchford), I took issue with him, not as to the fact, but as to the law of the case—I thought that we were correct in our argument, but, as the hon. gentleman seemed to doubt it, I did all he could reasonably expect—I referred the matter to the highest law officer of the Crown, by whose decision the Government is necessarily bound in such a case, and finding, to my regret, that we had been too liberal, and had misconstrued the Statute in that particular respect and given the gentleman $300 more than he was entitled to, we acted on the law and withdrew the $300. Sir, I cannot see anything in that course which either deserves the censure of the House, or in any way fairly exposes us to the reproach of having violated any pledge to that gentleman; and I can tell the hon. gentleman that Mr. Ratchford would have been superannuated at that time, whether his allowance had been $300 or $600, or whatever it might have been. The hon. gentleman declares he does not ask for higher duties, and that what he asks is for a readjustment of the duties. Well, it would give us the greatest possible pleasure to see the hon. gentleman explain to a convention of manufacturers how he would give them any increased protection without increasing the duties; and, although I have the highest respect for the adroitness of the hon. gentleman, still I think that, brought face to face with those hard-headed representatives of the manufacturing interests with whom I have been so often brought in contact in my official duties, he would find it extremely difficult to convince them that any possible readjustment of the duties which did not involve very largely increased duties would do them the smallest good or in the slightest degree satisfy the expectations he has raised. He is pleased to say that it would be an easy step for us, by the readjustment of the sugar duties,—of all things in the world, by a readjustment of the sugar duties—to offer a great benefit to a manufacturing interest worth millions, and at the same time to afford employment to a large part of our population. Now, Sir, I have this to say—that if you choose to lower duties in this respect, you must put on other taxes to make up the gap in the revenue.

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

AN HON. MEMBER: No.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Yes. The hon. gentleman has no ground for saying that, in this country, the conditions of which differ entirely from those of England, any reduction in duty would bring a corresponding increase in the consumption; he must bear in mind that, so great would be the reduction, it would be necessary that a very large amount indeed of additional taxation should be levied. I am not going to enter into minute details as to the effect of this on our West India trade. I am stating what the universal opinion of those with whom I have conferred upon the subject is, and it is this: that, if you lower those duties materially, you must supply the loss to your revenue from some other quarter. I have pointed out the results which flowed from the tariff introduced by Sir Alexander Galt in 1859, and which was maintained to the great injury, as I believe, of the people of Canada, and, as I know, to the great dissatisfaction of a great many of the people of Canada for eight or nine years. What that tariff did in effect was this: it created a few millionaires at the expense of the whole bulk of the sugar-consuming population of Canada. I object to that, Sir; and I take issue with the hon. gentleman when he says that a million dollars would be expended in wages or for any other such purpose, or in the purchase of material for sugar-refining in this country. Sir, the reverse is very much more nearly the case. If those duties were reduced as he desires, probably $100,000 would be spent in wages in this country and a million of dollars would be lost to the people of Canada; the whole, or the greater part of which would find its way into the pockets of the sugar-refiners. The hon. gentleman objects to my estimate as to the results of Protection. He declares that I have greatly understated the effects which might be produced by such a readjustment of the tariff as would exclude some twenty-five or thirty millions of dollars of our present importations. Well, Sir, I adhere to my statement; and, with respect to the cotton trade, which the hon. gentleman was good enough to declare employed some 50,000 hands—when he spoke, I presumed that he alluded to one particular branch alone of this trade—I have to tell him that the last returns from England show that the English cotton trade employs, not 50,000, but 500,000 hands, as nearly as may be; the hon. gentleman having, apparently, omitted a cypher, though an important cypher, in the statement he made. Sir, he declares that our policy as to the United States was this: that we had to go as supplicants to Washington; and when asked what we had to give, we had to reply we had nothing to give in exchange for the concessions we demanded. Sir, the hon. gentleman might have remembered why it was that the people of Canada had nothing to give. He might have remembered the terms of a certain Treaty of Washington, which stripped the people of Canada of the only means they had at that time in their power to present as an equivalent to the people of the United States, and he might have asked himself under whose administration, by whose guidance, and by whose advice were the terms of that shameful capitulation finally conceded.

MR. MASSON: Why did you send Mr. Brown if you had nothing to offer them?

MR. TUPPER: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if the Government of Canada did not name a gentleman who voted in this House for that Treaty, as the High Commissioner to carry out that arbitration—Sir Alexander Galt?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I cannot, for the life of me, see what matter it would make whether Sir Alexander Galt had voted for the Treaty of Washington or not, or whether he was the Commissioner in the arrangement of the sum to be paid for our Fisheries.

MR. TUPPER: If Sir Alexander Galt voted for a scandalous capitulation of the interests of Canada to the United States, I ask if he was a proper person to be named as Commissioner to act for the Government of Canada in carrying out the Arbitration?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: A man may be mistaken and may subsequently have seen the errors of his ways. I only hope the hon. gentleman may sometime be equally eligible to be elected a High Commissioner. I do not quarrel with the hon. gentleman for differing in opinion with me about that. I say the Treaty of Washington was an unworthy concession on the part of the Imperial Government, a concession which I opposed and which I have regretted, although it might have been necessary for us to accept it as being a thing impossible to refuse at that time—a point on which I am not going to enter into an argument at this present moment. I say it was a most unfortunate treaty for the best interests of the people of Canada, in my judgment; and, Sir, I can tell the hon. gentleman that, if the High Commissioner at that time had been as keenly alive as he ought to have been to the interests of the people of Canada, he had, as the protocols of the negotiations show, the power of obtaining most valuable concessions for the people of Canada in return for these fisheries, which chance he let slip, and hence no unimportant portion of the difficulties that we have had to contend with. The hon. gentleman complains that we will not impose a duty on coal, and he declares that, if we would only impose such a duty, he has no doubt whatever that the interests of American coal-owners would induce them at once to move for an abolition of their duty. I am afraid that he totally under-rates the value to the United States of America, or the importance to them, of the supply, chiefly of anthracite coal which they send to us. We must have that anthracite coal, and consequently the effect of imposing that duty would be, as my hon. friends opposite well know, simply to weight down the manufacturers of Canada without at all affecting the interests of the producers of the anthracite. "But," he says, "why do we impose a duty on coal oil and not on coal?" Sir, the duty on coal oil was not of my imposing; it was the hon. gentleman and his colleagues who imposed it. What we did was very largely to reduce the duty on coal oil, and his distressed Nova Scotia miner, even if he does pay 33 per cent. more than he needs, at any rate gets it 66 per cent., and perhaps 100 per cent., cheaper than he ever got it under the hon. gentleman's administration. The

hon. gentleman declares that all products imported from the United States go necessarily to displace our own. Well, Sir, I was under the impression that a very large proportion of the imports of the United States passed through this country as a means of transit, and afforded employment to our merchants, and our shippers, and our seamen.

MR. TUPPER: What entered into the consumption, I said. I drew the distinction.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: If it be so, I presume the reason is that, as was so well explained by my hon. friend from Can. corn because it is cheaper for us to buy American corn, and sell them other grain of ours. That is a commercial transaction by which, as I understand, both parties are benefitted. If it is true that our imports from Great Britain have decreased twenty-three millions and our imports from the United States have increased two or three millions, I suppose we buy from the United States and sell to Great Britain simply because we can obtain better bargains from the people of the United States in the one case, and better prices from the people of Great Britain in the other. If he declares that the policy of this Government is an American policy, I would like to know which is the more American of the two,—a policy which would assimilate our position in all respects to that of the United States, or a policy which would leave us, as in the mother country, free to trade wherever we find it most to our interest to do so. I perceive that the hon. gentleman, later on, proceeded to repeat his assertion that our policy was depopulating our country, and he intimated that he thought that in any case, we would be able, by a certain re-adjustment of the tariff, to bring a large number of additional population into this country. Now, I have frequently, on other occasions, been obliged to combat what I conceive to be a very grave error, in an economical sense. I say that the result of all these re-adjustments,—the result of all these attempts to foster particular industries—is not to bring additional people into the country, but rather to divert people from their natural productive occupations and to engage them, at great loss of capital, great loss of skill, and with great injury to the people themselves, in other occupations, as has been done to a very large extent in the United States, where the city population has increased within the past few years to something like twelve millions of people, a number out of all proportion to the natural wants and necessities of that country. I am opposed to that on many grounds; but chiefly because I believe that that unhealthy stimulus, that unhealthy collecting together of large masses of men in large cities, is a crying evil in the United States, and is one of the chief causes of the extreme depression which they now experience. Sir, it is computed by Americans themselves, by American writers of the highest position, that, of almost twelve millions of people who are unhappily collected together in a few American cities, something like four millions of people are in a state of semi-starvation, and are unable to obtain employment. That is the policy which is held up to us as a model and exemplar. But, as the hon. gentleman may, and with reason, accuse me of speaking on this subject without sufficient acquaintance with the facts of the case, perhaps he will attach a little more value to the message delivered by the Governor of the great State of New York to the Legislature of that State, but a very few weeks ago. This is what Governor Robertson, the Governor of the chief State of the Union, declares as the result of the fiscal policy of the United States:—

“The depression in all branches of trade, business and manufacture, and the wreck of our too numerous railroad, mining and milling ventures, have caused the throwing out of employ of a vast number of labouring men, who, without fault of their own, are now suffering extreme want. While it is true that legislation can do little for their relief, it is well to understand clearly the causes which have led to their distress.”

He goes on to say:—

“At the same time, another great evil was strongly developed; individuals and corporations engaged in various branches of manufacture, taking advantage of the necessities of the Government, rushed to Congress, and by every means in their power procured for their own benefit the levy of what we call Protective duties, under the false pretence of raising revenue for the Government, but really to compel consumers to pay exorbitant prices for the favoured article thus protected."

But, Sir, mark what follows:—

"Under the wing and stimulus of this so-called protection, new enterprises were undertaken; new and extensive factories built; new and needless railways projected and undertaken; new mines and foundries opened, and armies of labourers allured by high wages to these enterprises from fields of agriculture and other sober and rational employments of life. The few notes of warning raised against the certain consequences of this wild overaction were unheeded. Extravagance of expenditure, the absence of everything like frugality and economy obtained in all directions. The empty and delusive bubble thus raised could not endure, and, although kept afloat by the whole power of the Government so long as it was possible, it met at last the inevitable day of doom. Imaginary fortunes vanished in a moment, ill-advised railway schemes, mines, mills and factories were suspended, and tens of thousands of innocent and unfortunate labourers were left without employment or the means of subsistence. Instead of the high wages by which they had been enticed from other occupations to those enterprises, they received no wages at all."

"It is easier to discover the cause of this distress than to point out the manner of its relief. There can be but one permanent and effectual remedy. That is to return as speedily as possible to the condition of things that existed before the road to ruin was entered upon; by means of a return to specie payments, a sound and stable currency, and the reduction of the tariff to a strictly revenue standard.

"Under the influence of these measures all branches of industry will assume their old and accustomed regularity and success. All departments of labour will call for employees, to whom such wages will be paid as the business will warrant and the parties can agree upon. If a surplus of unemployed labourers still remains, there are open to all in this great country countless millions of fertile acres of land upon which every industrious man can be sure of securing, for himself and family at least, a comfortable subsistence. One of the greatest evils resulting to the labouring man, from the false and delusive appearances which have been displayed before them, is that they have been induced to leave the safe, peaceful and independent walks of agriculture to congregate in the large cities, and there to watch and wait for something that they fancy might yield them larger returns than they could hope for from the cultivation of the soil. But, by following faithfully and earnestly the road here indicated, it will not be very long before business and trade will be restored to their natural channels, and labourers receive full employment with fair wages."

That is the opinion expressed on the message lately addressed to the people of the State of New York, by the Governor, who is, at least, as competent as any member of this House to ascertain and declare to his people what have been the true results of the fiscal policy adopted by the people of the United States. There is only one other point made by the hon. member for Cumberland, on which I wish to say a few words, if, indeed, the House has patience enough to listen to such a long discussion. The hon. gentleman on this, on many occasions, has called the attention of the House to the fact that a very broad line separates the good and evil times which have overtaken this country. When they were in office, quoth the hon. gentleman, we had good times; when they were out, bad times followed—as a judgment on us, no doubt, for having committed the unpardonable sin of driving the hon. gentleman from office. Now, if that means anything whatever, it means this: that had the hon. gentleman remained in power, he could have averted the commercial distress which has overtaken this country. Let us see the result to which the hon. gentleman pledges himself in making such a boast. As I understand the case, the causes of distress in this country were chiefly these: one, at least, and a very important cause, was the depression which prevailed in the United States, and the almost annihilation of our trade of lumber to that country, which fell, as the House may have observed, from something like thirteen million dollars to about four and a half millions. Another cause which contributed at all events to injure a great many of the commercial community, was the remarkable fall in the value of goods, which left many of them with goods on their shelves of which they were unable to dispose, except at something far below cost prices. Another cause was, beyond question, the general depression which prevailed all over the world, as well as in the United States; and lastly, the chief cause was the bad harvest which existed in 1876. Are we to believe that, had the hon. gentleman been in power, it would have been within the compass of his ability to have reversed the financial depression in the United States, to have removed the world-wide depression which existed in every country of Europe? Would it have been in his power to have stopped the fall in the value of goods to which I have alluded, or to have given us a good harvest in 1876 instead of a bad one? If, indeed, the hon. gentleman could have done all these things, then I will confess that he is omniscient and but little short of omnipotent, and I can only express my extreme astonishment that he ever allowed us to drive him from office. As I understand the case, the distress of Canada has arisen very largely from this fact: that during a period of three or four years we imported some eighty or one hundred million dollars' worth of goods more than we legitimately required. The estimate is a very large one, I know; but I am very much afraid it is not much in excess of the truth. Thus, in the ensuing year, from those two causes, we lost thirty or forty millions of income on which we might reasonably have relied. The returns from one very valuable source have fallen from thirteen millions to something like four millions and a half; and in another case, as the House knows, our agricultural exports, have sunk from twenty-one millions to seven millions; being a loss in those two directions, of fifteen or sixteen millions in a single year. Now, Sir, I would like to know if any Government could have prevented the country from being poorer, when the country had engaged in operations of that kind. The loss of fifteen or sixteen millions arising from the almost total destruction of our lumber trade with the United States and the failure of our harvest, represented the diminished importations of fifteen or twenty millions, and the loss of one or two millions consequent thereupon. It appears to me the more closely the matter is investigated, the more carefully the House considers the question—and I hope hon. members will carefully consider it—it will appear to them clearly and distinctly that the causes of the depression are not under our control, and not such as may be removed by Act of Parliament, and, least of all, by assimilating our policy to that of the neighbouring country, in which, by the confession of their own authorities, the degree of distress and the permanent injury to-day far exceeds ours. I thank the House for the attention with which they have listened to these observations, and I may take occasion, at a somewhat later period of the Session, to extend my remarks a little in respect to this matter.

Mr. PLUMB said he presumed that the hon. the Minister of Finance would admit that Governor Robertson was a Free-trader and represented the Free-trade party.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he had always entertained great respect for Governor Robertson, but that respect had undoubtedly now increased. He understood the hon. gentleman was especially qualified to speak of Governor Robertson, for, if he (Mr. Cartwright) was correctly informed, he was at the head of the party under the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) had served in the United States before attaining his present legislative position here.

THE PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. YOUNG moved that the Public Accounts of Canada for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1877, and the supplementary statement of income and expenditure during the current year, be referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY ARRANGEMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 6.]

(Mr. Thomson, Welland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. THOMSON (Welland) explained that the Bill was intended to reorganize the bond system of the Canada Southern Railway Company. The financial affairs of the company had become involved in a great deal of confusion; and it was found that, unless some re-organization was effected, the company would collapse, and go into bankruptcy; and, consequently, such arrangements had been made as to give satisfaction to all classes of the bond-holders, over three-quarters of whom had assented to them, and petitioned the House for their adoption. These arrangements would make the company solvent and prosperous, and enable it to pay in cash its floating debts and the interest on its bonds.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said he did not intend to oppose the Bill at this stage; but, when it came before the Committee, he would offer amendments to it, in conformity with the prayer of certain petitioners that had been presented to the House, with respect to the retention and permanent location of the head offices of the company, and other matters, and, in case it came back to the House unacceptable to himself, he reserved his right to propose amendments there or to oppose in toto, as he might then feel advised.

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What are the other purposes mentioned in the title of the Bill?

Mr. DESJARDINS: They refer to power to amalgamate, and to hold United States bonds in case the company does business in the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have looked through the Bill very hurriedly, but my impression is that power to amalgamate with any other company the Directors may choose to select is asked for, and I think that is an extravagant power to seek. I merely wish to call attention to it, as that is probably the portion to which the attention of the Committee will be directed.

Mr. DESJARDINS: I understand that the powers in question are of the same nature as those that were obtained by the Royal Canadian Insurance Company last year.

(Mr. Casgrain.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. BOLDUC said he must ask the hon. gentleman to let the Bill stand until the views of shareholders to whom it had been sent could be obtained.

Mr. CASGRAIN said he would have had no objection to the request had not the Bill been already submitted to a general meeting of the shareholders held on the 5th of February inst., and approved.

Mr. HOLTON said that, as eight days must elapse before the Bill could be considered in Committee, every necessary precaution could be taken, he thought, against any hasty or inconsiderate action affecting the interests of shareholders.

Mr. DOMVILLE said, before the Bill finally passed, every proper provision should be made in the interests of those who had been so unhappy as to have suffered from the calamities of fire. He had nothing to say against the company, but, before the House placed it in such a position as to enable it to get rid of its obligations, they should see to the shareholders paying up the calls now owed.

Order for second reading read.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had to ask his hon. friend to let the Bill stand for several reasons, into which he would not enter, though one of them, perhaps, was conclusive. He thought that this was not a private Bill, and that, if they had any right to pass it, it was as an amendment to the public Act. It could not be proceeded with as a private Bill—at least, this was his then impression. At all events, it could not then be proceeded with, as various matters connected with the position of Mr. Stewart relative to the deposit of money had to be considered.

CARILLON CANAL AND DAM.

QUESTION.

MR. CURRIER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the canal and dam and other contemplated improvements at Carillon during the present season?

MR. MACKENZIE: It is the intention of the Government to do so. It is a matter very much to be regretted that circumstances over which the Government had no control has prevented this work from being proceeded with as we desired. Mr. Page is at present perfecting arrangements with the object of proceeding with it as soon as the season opens.

OVERPAYMENTS BY STEAMBOATS

QUESTION.

MR. CHEVAL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place in the Estimates a sum of money to provide for reimbursing the proprietors of steamboats such as the steamboat Cultivateur, which paid in the St. Ours Lock a sum of $321, when the vessel ought to have paid in reality but $138?

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland): I may inform my hon. friend that it is not the intention of the Government to submit any such amount in the Estimates.

DEEPENING THE CHANNEL AT THE MOUTH OF THE MIRAMICHI.

QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to prosecute, during the coming season, works for the deepening of the channel over the Horse Shoe Bar at the mouth of the Miramichi River?

MR. MACKENZIE: The arrangements for the season are not yet made, but, as usual, dredges will be sent where they are most wanted, and, if they are most wanted at this place, they will go there.

MR. MITCHELL: Then I suppose we are not to get any.

MR. MACKENZIE: Oh, I did not say that, by any means.

Mr. MITCHELL: It looks like it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have no desire to even imply that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I take that inference from it, and I wish it to be so understood.

IRON RAILS IN CAPE BRETON.

QUESTION.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to aid the construction of Eastern Railway Extension in Cape Breton,—now subsidized by the Statutes of Nova Scotia—by a transfer of iron rails?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Government in the first place have already apportioned the rails, under the resolution of the House, to those roads which were conceived to be feeders to the Intercolonial Railway; and we had no authority to apportion any rails for any other purpose. All that were to spare—about 70 miles—we expect to be used; and these were apportioned to certain roads, as the return brought down to the House shows. It is impossible, therefore, for the Government to entertain any further proposition in that direction; and other roads have been refused on account of there being no rails for disposal or on account of such roads not being feeders to the Government railway. Of course, if the projects which have been aided through that Order in Council do not carry out the arrangements that were made for building their respective roads, it will then be for the Government and the House to consider what disposition may be made of the rails which would be otherwise apportioned to these roads.

RED AND ASSINIBOINE RIVERS.

QUESTION.

Mr. ARCHIBALD, for Mr. SMITH (Selkirk), enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to remove the obstructions to navigation on the Red River between Pembina and Lower Fort Garry; and whether it is the intention of the Government to improve the Assiniboine River so as to permit of its being navigated by steamboats of light draught?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is the intention of the Government to make some improvements in the way of removing boulders and some slight obstructions of that kind in both rivers, which will render a long course navigable, without incurring any very heavy expense; and we expect to be able to do that out of the Fund for the Improvement of Rivers which will be found in the Estimates.

MAIL COMMUNICATION WITH THE BRITISH WEST INDIES.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. LANGEVIN moved for, 1st. A return of all correspondence, since the 1st January, 1875, of and with the Postmaster-General, the Minister of Public Works or any other Department, relating to Mail communication with the British West Indies; 2nd. A return of all correspondence had between the Government of Canada and the Imperial or any Colonial Government with regard to a subsidy for a line of steamers between Canada and the British West Indies. He said he wished to remind the hon. the First Minister that, last year, he (Mr. Langevin) had called the attention of the House, and especially of the Government, to this matter. He understood that certain arrangements had been made in this regard, but he was told these were not concluded between the Government of Canada and the companies that ran steamers between Halifax or New York and other ports and the West Indies. At all events, he desired by means of this motion to obtain the correspondence and the facts connected with this matter. He regretted that, so far as he was informed, it did not stand in a better position than was the case last year. A gentleman who now or lately was travelling in the West Indies had, the other day, written him a letter showing the great inconvenience existing, owing to the fact that these postal arrangements were so defective. This gentleman said that, on letters sent to New York via the subsidized steamer for Halifax, the charge was sixpence; and on letters to Halifax tenpence or a shilling, his correspondent forgot which — nearly double, because Canada was not in the Postal Union; and this gentleman also said: — “The Governor-General of the Danish islands of St. Thomas and St. Luce, a short time ago, stated in the Legislative Council that, at present, nearly the whole civilized world has joined the Union, with the exception of the few British West India Islands, those countries which have not entered the Union, or such as have no regular mail service, and whose political system is such as to give no guarantee for the fulfilment of those obligations which they would have to undertake towards other countries in the event of their entering the Union.” He (Mr. Langevin) did not suppose that this Governor-General referred to Canada, but, at all events, these were the facts:—We were not in a better position than those countries; no such arrangements of any kind existed in our regard; and the postal communications between Canada and the West Indies were very defective. Last year, if he remembered aright, the hon. the First Minister, looking at this question from a broader point of view than mere postal arrangements, had stated that we could not supply these islands with flour, for example, because the trip was too long to permit flour reaching there in good order; and, therefore, that we could not rely on the growth of a trade which would allow this or any other Government to undertake to subsidise a line of steamers to that point; but he (Mr. Langevin) was now told that a Canadian firm was manufacturing flour for the Brazils, necessitating much longer trips; and it was said that flour could be made to stand the influence of the sun in that quarter for three weeks. And, if flour could be sent to the Brazils, it could, without doubt, be sent to the West Indies; consequently, he did not think that any ground remained or the statement, of the hon. the First Minister in question. He would leave this part of the subject to the hon. the Minister of Militia, who, being a ship-owner, and largely concerned in the West India trade, knew a great deal about it; but he could not refrain from saying that the claims of Canada in this respect were very great; and particularly under the present circumstances, when trade was in so languishing a condition, they should certainly endeavour to find new outlets for our commercial enterprise. He understood further from the letter mentioned, that an arrangement had been made between the Cunard company and the British Government, whereby a new contract had been entered into, in this relation, by that company. He did not know that the hon. the First Minister had been informed of this, but he had heard that the subsidy had been renewed in connection with the sending of a Cunard steamer from Halifax to St. Thomas. He hoped that the Government had taken advantage of this circumstance to have this steamer extend its trips to the British West Indies, in order particularly to give us the benefit of postal communication, and had communicated with the British Government to this end. He was, of course, quite in the dark as to what might have passed between the British and Canadian Governments on this subject; and this was why he moved for this correspondence. He trusted his motion would be considered by the Government, as it deserved some consideration; and that it would furnish members who were of the same opinion as himself in this respect with an opportunity to express their views.

MR. FORBES said this matter had received a great deal of attention and called for more, both at the hands of the Government and of the House. The Province of Nova Scotia, in particular, was largely interested in it, as that Province probably did more business with the West Indies than the other three or four Provinces together. This subject had been before the country since 1866; a great deal had been done in urging it upon the Government; and the Government had again and again led them to believe that they intended to have considered it upon its merits, which were not, slight, but very substantial. In 1866 a Commission was appointed with delegates from the different Provinces with the object of bringing this question before the different Governments of the West Indies; they did so, and those Governments then entered heartily into the subject, and they would, no doubt, have at once joined with the Provinces in the establishment of a line of steamers, but Confederation, in the meantime, was brought about, and it was not done. However, a report was made, and from it he would read as follows :—

“The communication between British North America and the West Indies was now very unsatisfactory, the only regular service being performed by a steamer leaving Halifax once a month, the day of her sailing depending on the arrival of the European steamer there, and that of her arrival at St. Thomas being consequently uncertain, and not so timed as to meet, with regularity, intercolonial steamers which distribute the mails among the Islands. In consequence of this, letters from North America frequently lie for several days in the post-office at St. Thomas, and the time occupied before replies could be received was such as to deter merchants in the British Provinces from sending orders to Demerara or the Windward Islands.”

This service was performed by one boat, which went to St. Thomas, landed the mail for the Windward Islands, went from St. Thomas to Bermuda, and from Bermuda to Halifax. It again returned; and it performed this service once a month. Letters were under this system, when proper connections were not made at St. Thomas, frequently delayed, not for a few days, but for a month before they reached their destination. In 1871, a memorial was presented to the Government, signed by a large number of Senators and members of the House. He would read this memorial with the permission of the House :—

“HOUSE OF COMMONS,
“OTTAWA, 2nd March, 1871.

“SIR,—I have the honour to forward to you the enclosed memorial, asking for more mail accommodation between the Dominion and the British and Foreign West Indies, trusting this is the proper channel, and that you will bring it to the consideration of the Government, at your earliest convenience.

“I am your obedient servant,
“J. F. FORBES.

“Hon. ALEX. CAMPBELL, “Postmaster-General.
“Ottawa.”

“To His Excellency The Right Honorable John Baron Lisgar, of Lisgar and Balieborough, P.C., G.C.B., G.C.M.G., &c., &c., Governor General of the Dominion of Canada, &c., &c.

“The Memorial of the Senators and Representatives of Nova Scotia, and the other Provinces comprised in the Dominion of Canada, “HUMBLY REPRESENTS,

“That the Mail accommodation between the Dominion of Canada and the British and Foreign West Indies is altogether inadequate to the trade now existing, and is a great barrier to the increase which better Mail accommodation would develop.

“That this Dominion carrying on so large a trade with these Islands should only have one Mail a month, and that sent by the British Government, calls for some consideration, particularly as these Islands furnish so large an amount of business, and absorb so many of the products of the Dominion of Canada.

“The value of the trade between the British and Foreign West Indies and Canada, carried on by Dominion vessels, amounts to about seven millions per annum, of which Nova Scotia contributes about three, and this, large as it is, would, no doubt, be greatly increased if fostered by better Mail accommodation.

“Occupying as the Dominion now does, the proud position of being the fourth maritime power in the world, it is not without confidence we place the interest of this industry in your hands, knowing the estimate you place upon it, and feeling you will do it that justice which its magnitude demands.

“Considering the importance of the trade now existing between the West Indies and the Dominion, the amount of tonnage employed, we can well understand the inconvenience suffered by the large and important community engaged in the business by having only one mail a month, and that the time has arrived when the people of the Maritime Provinces, who are so largely interested, can ask with justice to themselves and the Dominion, the establishment of a semi-monthly Mail Service between the British West Indies and the port of Halifax, Nova Scotia, all must be free to admit.

That memorial was, as could be seen, very largely signed. The question at that time received a good deal of attention, and the Government appeared to be anxious to do something to forward that service. That interest of the Government still continued and still would continue to exist. He hoped the time would come when the Government would effect something. In 1872, there was another memorial forwarded to the Government, the names appended to which were, unfortunately, not kept, but they had a copy of the memorial which he would read. It was dated 24th April, 1872 :—

“A memorial of the Representatives of the Dominion of Canada humbly urging that the people of those Provinces, fully alive to the necessity of more direct and efficient mail communication between the Dominion and the West Indies, desire to press the consideration of this important service upon the attention of the Government that in carrying forward Railway enterprises to benefit the distant Provinces of the West, it was highly desirable to foster the Eastern interests, which would make the Dominion one of the first maritime powers in the world.

“That the Governments of the different West India Islands offered the Commissioners who visited them in 1866, to supplement any grant which might be given by the Governments of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Canada to establish a semi-monthly mail service between these Islands and the Dominion.

"That as large subsidies had been given to the Allan Line and a Gulf Line of Steamers fostered, they trusted with these facts before them, the Government would give that consideration to this interest which its importance demanded and increase the Mail accommodation between these countries."

These memorials had been followed up by addresses from time to time, until the present moment; yet this subject, although it had received a good deal of consideration, had not yet received that consideration which its magnitude demanded. In 1870-71 the trade between the United Provinces and the West Indies amounted to the sum of about seven million dollars. The business between countries which could afford such an amount of trade, despite insufficient mail accommodation, could not be an insignificant one. In 1876-77, that trade, instead of being as it was in 1871, dropped to $5,160,000; a fall of nearly two million dollars since 1870-71. This, certainly, could not be an evidence of the necessity of fostering that trade, so far as the increase was concerned; but it showed that, owing to the neglect of fostering it, a large amount of trade had been lost to us. Those islands had increased in population, as also had the Dominion, and still our trade had sunk two millions. This was a grave consideration for the people of the Dominion, especially of the Maritime Provinces, who were largely interested in this trade. If this question had been taken up years ago, when it might have been taken up, when we had a large revenue which gave us a surplus year after year—instead of amounting to five millions of dollars, it would have amounted to the sum of eight or ten million dollars. The trade of the United States with the West Indies amounted, according to the Premier's own statement last year, to the sum of thirty-five million dollars. The West Indies were anxious to trade with us. Bermuda, that little Island which had three thousand military and ten thousand inhabitants, had established mail communication between it and New York, and all the money they could afford to spend they paid to the United States. Their supplies of beef, pork, &c., were tendered for by merchants of the United States, and thus this trade was lost to the Dominion; and, unless we could offer better facilities for communication, we could not hope for any increase of trade, as they were not inclined to take away their business from where it could be done cheapest. If the Government had even established a monthly steam service some years ago, our business would have been largely increased. He spoke with feeling, because the Maritime Provinces largely depended on their trade with the West Indies. They had a growing trade; fish, lumber, vegetables, to a large extent, finding their way to that market. He hoped this subject would receive the attention of the Government. In 1876, the present Minister of Militia, who was then outside the Government, like himself, an independent member of this House, stated that:—

"There is nothing at the present time which so much tends to hinder a satisfactory or successful line of commerce between the tropics and the Dominion, as the unsatisfactory position of the sugar duties. Until they are adjusted or placed on a basis that will more fairly represent the value of the raw material, as compared with that of the refined article, it is out of the question that any line of trade can be successfully undertaken. The House must understand that it is only for a very short time that returns can be obtained from the West Indies, and it is therefore of the greatest possible importance that during these six or seven months we should have such a demand in our own markets for the raw material from the West Indies as would furnish traffic between the two countries. We have plenty of produce to supply them, and build up a satisfactory trade with them, if the sugar duties were adjusted on a proper basis so that we could bring back that article as return cargo. With regard to our communication with the Islands at present, my hon. friend fell into a mistake when he said it was not well conducted. It is done by the Cunard Line, and everybody knows the Cunard Line is satisfactorily managed; of course, there are other channels of communication with the West Indies—besides cable communication—but I do not look upon this question so much from a mail point of view, as from a trade standpoint. I believe, at the present moment, when the manufacturers of the Dominion are looking for customers for the articles which they produced, nothing would so much tend to relieve them as foreign trade, and, if we can successfully establish such a trade with a country like the West Indies, and bring back a return trade, it is our best policy."

These islands did not pretend to manufacture, and we had to supply their wants or our neighbours to the south, who had at present got the trade and intended to keep it in spite of us. He hoped the Government would take this matter into consideration, notwithstanding there might be some difficulty in raising the money, especially at the present period of depression, and he did not hesitate to say that the whole money would come back into the coffers of the Dominion. The Board of Trade had also given the matter serious consideration with respect to coal. A large amount of coal was used in the West Indies, which had become a station for so many steamers, backwards and forwards, and we could supply them with coal without any difficulty; in fact, we were the proper people to supply them. If some steps were taken, no doubt they would take their supply of coal from Nova Scotia. Some time ago, a return had been moved for, relative to tenders received for the performance of this work, as well as the amount of those tenders, and the answer given was that these matters were under consideration. The tenders were asked for by the late Postmaster-General, now Lieut.-Governor of Ontario. He believed that tenders had been received, but had never learnt what those tenders were or what was their amounts; but, at any rate, such exorbitant figures were asked that the Government did not see their way, then, to accept. But matters were now changing their complexion, and the business of the country was reviving.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Where?

Mr. FORBES said they would, no doubt, have to pay a large sum, but it could not be considered a large sum if weighed with the advantages that would accrue from this connection. It might have been that the sum, considered apart from this, was thought exorbitant and the tenders therefore, rejected. He felt certain, from reference to 1875, that the matter had received the serious consideration of the Government. In looking over the records of 1875, they found the Postmaster-General claimed that, since his accession to office, he had established direct postal communication with the West Indies. If that was the case—and he did not know nor did he think it was, and he had no reason to believe it was—it showed that the Government had taken this matter seriously into consideration. Then, again, he found that the Postmaster-General claimed the paternity of this beneficial action, and also that, actually, the Premier had claimed it. He felt sorry to have to bring these things up, but these books were handed from one to another, and it was difficult to know what reliance to put upon a great many statements contained in them, particularly in reference to this case. If correct information could not be obtained from these books, where was it to be sought? He felt satisfied they would obtain direct communication now that a gentleman from Nova Scotia, who was largely interested in this service, was in the Cabinet, and that he would place his single eye upon this enterprise, and see that it was carried through. It was one of those things which our people considered a grievance which the Government should rectify. He had been told that Western Canada yielded grain which was incomparable, which could stand any climate. Why should not Ontario transmit it to these islands? They required beef, pork, etc., besides manufactured articles, and we could supply them. Steamers arrived there loaded with products of the United States. It was marvellous that the people of this Dominion should let others eat their bread that they should be eating, and allow a trade to the extent of several millions of dollars to pass by them, just for the want of money to be spent on steam service, when such an amount was used every year to develop our western country, which still craved for more. To supply the West Indies from the Dominion would be a great boon to us, and a great consideration for them. He believed the Postmaster-General was anxious to have this enterprise carried out, but the finances of the country might have been low; however, he believed better times were coming, and he hoped the Government would see its way to attending to this business and give our people better communication with the West Indies.

MR. PALMER said that, as a representative of a portion of the Dominion largely interested in this connection, he ought to add the weight of his voice, and of whatever might be his information on this subject, to that of his hon. friend. He held that the Government had not dealt with the subject in the way they should have done; but the hon. member for Queen's, who professed now to be an Independent member, should have pressed this matter some years ago, when he acted as a supporter of the Government, when it probably would have had more weight than during the last days of their existence. But it was better late than never. Perhaps members who did not live down by the coast were not well acquainted with the business which had formerly been done between the Maritime Provinces and the West Indies, but which had lamentably fallen off, especially in latter years. This falling off was owing, to a great extent, to this want of communication; although, no doubt, it was the fiscal policy of the Government which finally killed the trade, and until a change took place in that policy, of course the mail communication would not have so salutary an effect as it otherwise would. He thought it important, however, that this communication should be established, which could be done by a moderate outlay. Although a large, perhaps the largest, portion of the carrying trade with the West Indies was done by Canadian vessels, yet the direct trade of Canada was very small compared with that of the United States; whereas the number of articles produced in Canada and used all over the West Indies, was larger in extent than the number raised in the United States. We had coal, flour and provisions. Of course, in former times it was extremely difficult to get those provisions down to the coast; but now, since the establishment of the Inter-colonial Railway, we had a means by which flour and other produce could be sent from the west of Canada to the West Indies. He wanted the members from Ontario to understand that there was no greater outlet for their produce than the West Indies. Let them look over the statistics of the trade of the United States, and see the enormous quantity of flour sent from that country to the West Indies. There they could meet competition, there the doctrine of Free-trade could have a fair trial, for there was no discrimination in the West Indies between the United States and the Dominion, or other countries. One thing which operated against us was the opinion entertained in the West Indies against Canadian flour; they believed it would deteriorate under the influence of the climate. It required a more extensive communication, which would give a more extended knowledge of the flour of Canada, which his hon. friend the member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) had proved would stand a climate very much more trying than that of the West Indies. If a moderate sum of money were given, by which a direct line of communication could be made from some maritime port there, to Halifax or St. John, or some other port, so that it could be carried, probably, in steamers which might also carry freight to that country, every part of Canada would be considerably benefitted. An inwards and outwards trade would grow up, and, if the fiscal policy of the Government were changed in the direction pointed out by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) the other day, we would have a means of return trade. There was no direction in which the prosperity of the country could be advanced so much as in that. He was sorry to see, the other day, that the Minister of Finance, in his Budget speech, stated to the House that he depended very much for the prosperity of the farming interest of Canada on the very small amount they would have to pay hereafter for the transport of their products. If that was the one reason why Canada was to prosper, his hon. friend the member for Queen's (Mr. Forbes) must weep over it, because he must feel that it was perfectly destructive to the prosperity of his constituents, and he

MR. FORBES.

(Mr. Palmer) felt that his constituents would have to pay seriously for the prosperity of this country. He was glad that his friend, the hon. member for Queen's, had some idea that the country might possibly prosper without sacrificing its shipping interest. If a small amount for transportation was necessary, it was impossible for the shipping interest to prosper. And the agricultural interest, which was of paramount importance, could not prosper if the shipping interest languished.

MR. MITCHELL: That only meant on the Intercolonial road.

MR. PALMER said he did not wish to raise any party question. He desired to impress upon the House that this subject was a germ of prosperity that could not evoke or bring out any hostile feeling on any side. The trade he sought to develop could not possibly injure us. The West Indies produced articles that Canada could not produce. They could never be a carrying people because they could not produce ships. They required almost everything grown or manufactured here. There was scarcely a Canadian product or article of manufacture that could not find a market, if the trade were properly fostered in the West Indies. If the House considered the enormous number of the people, and their close proximity to us, they would be surprised to find that this trade should be so neglected, more neglected than any other trade. They had an enormous trade with Europe especially with England, they were looking for a trade with Australia, and for a trade on the Pacific; but here was a trade at their doors entirely neglected—true, they supplied them with lumber and fish—but the whole market of the West Indies for products of the west, and for coal and other goods, could not be better supplied than from Nova Scotia and some other parts of Canada. It was for these reasons that he impressed upon the Government and this House, the importance of offering, at all events, some sum of money,—first of all, to project some direct means of communication to the most convenient distributing point in the West Indies, and he ventured to assert that, before very long, some enterprising firm, endeavouring themselves to develop this trade, would be enabled to carry those mails themselves. He had no further remarks to offer, except to express a hope that the hon. gentleman would, as an Independent member, press the matter upon the Government as strongly as he could.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he was sure the House would be obliged to the hon. member for Queen's, and the other hon. gentleman who had spoken upon the subject, for having brought this interesting matter before the House; but they would observe that, as to the general features of the remarks that had been made, they did not apply to the Department over which he had the honour to preside. No doubt the importance of the subject was as great as that attached to it by the hon. gentlemen who had spoken upon it, and no doubt the deliberations of the Government in reference to it might have been somewhat checked by the commercial depression which the trade of the country had encountered. But, so far as his Department was concerned, he begged to call the attention of the House to the fact, to which he had the honour of explaining to the House last year, namely, that Canada was not within the Swiss Postal Union, and, in consequence, it was impossible for them to adopt the uniform postal rates which happily prevailed in other countries which had had the advantage of the Berne Postal Union. They had received complaints in the Department of the high postal rates charged for letters transmitted by ships to the West Indies, and not particularly to the West Indies, but to other places. Those rates were large, but he hoped the time was not far distant when this country, as well as all civilized countries in the world, would be within the beneficent influence of that Postal Union which had yearly improved postal facilities, and, so far as it extended, rendered postal rates uniform. He hoped the Department over which he had the honour to preside, would shortly have to report that they had obtained that advantage; but, in the meantime, all they could do was simply to correspond with those countries, with the view of obviating the difficulties, which were not new and which had existed for some time. The Postal Department had already done a great deal for the amelioration of certain evils which existed, and for the expansion of the system which previously prevailed in regard to the transmission of mail matter; and he trusted that in a short time they would be able to do more. The Government were quite as anxious as his hon. friend, not only with regard to the West Indies, but other countries with which Canada wished to communicate, to facilitate postal arrangements which would be for the convenience of the people. As regarded the hon. the member for Queen's, who had quoted from the Parliamentary Companion to show the achievements of his (Mr. Huntington's) predecessor in office, and of the hon. the Prime Minister, he might say for himself that he did not think the views of public men in this country were always registered in the Parliamentary Companion, and it might have suited the gentleman who wrote those sketches to give them credit for achievements which had never been made, or perhaps the writer thought some things had been achieved by them, and was mistaken. But, speaking for himself and other members, none of them dictated their political opinions to the author of the Parliamentary Companion, and therefore he was sure his hon. predecessor had no intention of claiming any honour for the achievement of something which had not yet been accomplished.

MR. FORRES said that he had quoted from the Parliamentary Companion to show that the records of the hon. gentleman indicated promises which had not been fulfilled.

MR. MITCHELL said he simply rose to call attention to an important omission on the part of the mover of the resolution. If he recollected aright, a short time ago advertisements were issued and tenders invited by the Government, for the establishment of a line of steamers, and the advice of scientific men was obtained in relation to the character of steamers that would best serve the interest of the trade. A number of tenders were sent in to the Government, and he should like to know what had been done in relation to those tenders, and what were the reasons which prevented the Government from accepting any of those tenders, and why the policy which had evidently inspired those advertisements had been abandoned? The people were led to believe that steamers would be subsidized, and that a policy had been adopted approving a grant of money for opening up a trade with the West Indies. The public were deceived, and the whole thing ended in smoke. He should like the Government to explain in respect to this, and whether there were any important and serious obstacles to the prosecution of a policy which he was sure this House would approve of.

MR. DOMVILLE said this question had been brought up on the Opposition side of the House this year to show the importance of it to the country, and that the Government manifested so little anxiety in regard to fostering a West Indian trade. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Forbes), and also the hon. the Minister of Militia, had talked about this West Indian trade in the House, but nothing had been done. While he was in favour of establishing a proper postal communication with the West Indies, he was not prepared to admit that it would do anything in the way of trade. If they got a regular system of postal charges, it would be very convenient; but he did not think it would increase the trade with that country one iota. The whole West Indian trade, he might say, fell off in consequence of the sugar duties. The hon. the Minister of Militia spoke very strongly last year in favour of an alteration of the sugar duties, and these duties had been discussed every year, for several years, with no result. They found that at St. John scarcely a single cargo of sugar or molasses was imported direct. Only a few years ago cargo after cargo arrived direct to that city. The main reason for this change was the ad valorem duty, and, if a proper scale of duty were fixed, the trade would go on as formerly. Look at their importations. They should make their importations suit this country, and not suit other people? All the sugar that used to come from the West Indies now came from Glasgow or Liverpool; consequently they had nothing to bring back in their vessels. Our West Indian business was altogether lost. Another difficulty was the smuggling that was carried on at the coasts. They had seen cargoes of molasses seized by Governments, and, although it was apparent that the cargo had been smuggled with a view to defrauding the revenue, the offenders were not fined more than a nominal sum. There was a great parade made and then the cargo was given up again. Again, with regard to the question of oil. The tariff said oil was not to be imported from the United States except at a certain test, and it was not allowed to be brought from Upper Canada, except under certain tests; and yet, when it was done, before the Departmental orders were sent down, the whole thing was shuffled round and the oil consumed. Now, while matters were conducted in this careless manner, how could we expect to load our vessels to the West Indies and bring back sugar and molasses? It often occurred that two cargoes were in port at the same time, one of which had paid a sugar duty of $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents, and the other $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents, although both had loaded almost at the same time, and arrived in port at the same time. Consequently, the trade fell into the hands of those who loved to cheat their neighbours, and Parliament and the country allowed them to defraud the revenue and violate the laws without trying to punish them. This had been repeated over and over again; but he must admit that, coming from the Lower Provinces they had certainly little to expect from the Upper Provinces; they had mainly to look out for themselves. He would press upon the Government, however, that it was high time that the tariff was so arranged as to foster the West Indian trade.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. PLUMB said that a few days ago he had occasion to address the House at some length. Owing to the incomplete arrangements and sudden pressure at the opening of the Session, he found in the manuscript of the report of his speech many errors, and, although he thought everything should be done to avoid corrections and additions to the text of speeches taken down by the shorthand reporters, he was obliged to alter it very considerably. He submitted the alterations to the manager of the Hansard, who was satisfied they were necessary in order to bring out the obvious meaning. Afterwards the speech was printed in the Hansard. It was not submitted to him in the proof for correction, but he supposed from having revised the manuscript that the speech would appear all right. He asked for several copies of the speech to be sent to him, and when it came he found in it more than one hundred errors, most of them of a very grave character and distorting the meaning in many ways. He was quite prepared to make all allowance for the pressure which was caused by the long debate on the Address, and he had no doubt, after having spoken to the reporters on the subject, that the errors were caused in a great measure by very clumsy, careless proof-reading, and this, he believed, had been changed. He did not rise for the purpose of finding any fault with the Hansard reporters; he knew they were willing to do their best; but he rose in justice to himself to state that the Hansard report did not convey the meaning he had in view. The speech reported did not contain the material point, in fact many material points, which he meant to convey to his constituents, and he had no means of defending himself or of getting any redress except by making an explanation to the House.

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY ROUTE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. DECOSMOS moved for a return containing a copy of every report of the Chief Engineer, Acting Chief Engineer, or any other Engineer or Engineers of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in the possession of the Government, suggesting or recommending a survey, in 1876, of the whole or part of the route between Burrard's Inlet and Yellow Head Pass; with a copy of any order or instructions sent respecting the said survey; also, a copy of every report or reports from each and all of the said Engineers, in possession of the Government suggesting or recommending a survey, in 1877, of the said route between Burrard's Inlet and Yellow Head Pass; with a copy of any order or instructions sent respecting such survey. He said his reason for making this motion was the fact that, from time to time, they had heard the hon. the Premier state, with respect to the Pacific Railway, that he had always acted on the recommendation of the Engineer. They had also heard it stated by the hon. the Premier, during the Session of 1876, that the railway route had been located as far west as Fort George in British Columbia. If the railway had been located as far as Fort George before 1876, it naturally arose that there was no necessity whatever for a survey in that year of any portion of the route between Yellow Head Pass and Burrard Inlet. He should, therefore, like to see the report of the engineer or engineers, on which this survey had been founded. Again, the route from Yellow Head Pass to Port Moody, or Burrard Inlet, was re-surveyed in 1877, but he found nothing whatever in the report of Mr. Fleming, the Chief Engineer, to induce him to believe that Mr. Fleming had recommended a survey of that route in that year; on the contrary, if there was any evidence at all in the report, it was adverse to any recommendation from the Chief or Acting Engineer. It would be recollected that, in the Chief Engineer's report of 1877, page 61, the following comparison was made:—

"A comparison of the estimates which have been formed, shows that route No. 2 from Yellow Head Pass to Burrard Inlet, may, with a judiciously selected location, be established and completed for about $2,000,000 more than route No. 6, terminating at Waddington Harbour."

Now, the Waddington Harbour route was the one in which the location had been made, as was stated in 1876. The southern route, No. 2, according to Mr. Fleming, would cost $2,000,000 more than the Waddington Harbour route, which would be equivalent to fifty miles more railway, at a cost of $40,000 a mile. It would be recollected that some references were made to the Admiralty in the year 1876, and the result of the enquiries, made by them was summed up in the Chief Engineer's report in the following manner:

"From the naval testimony furnished, taken in conjunction with the Admiralty charts, the following deductions may be drawn:—

"1st. That a terminus near the outlet of the River Skeena would prove the nearest to the Asiatic coast, but that no decided opinion can be offered respecting the nautical advantage of a terminus in that quarter, as the waters have not been properly surveyed.

"2nd. That, as far as known, Burrard Inlet, an arm of the Strait of Georgia, and particularly English Bay, at its mouth, is the best harbour and the easiest of approach from the ocean.

"3rd. That the Strait of Georgia is separated from the ocean by two archipelagos, one to the north, the other to the south, of Vancouver Island.

"4th. That the approach by the north of Vancouver Island to the Strait of Georgia is hazardous and objectionable.

"5th. That the approach by the south of Vancouver Island is through passages more or less intricate between, or at no great distance from, islands known as the San Juan group.

"6th. That the most important islands of the San Juan group are in the territory of a foreign power, and that, from their position, they hold the power of assuming a threatening attitude towards passing commerce.

"Accordingly it is held important, if practicable, that the railway should terminate at a harbour, to gain which these islands need in no way be approached.

"On the outer coast of Vancouver Island there is no lack of harbourage, the whole southern and western shores, from Esquimalt round to Quatsino, 240 miles, being indented with harbours.

"An unbroken line of railway, from the railways of the Eastern Provinces of the Dominion to one of these harbours on the outer coast of Vancouver Island, would be exceedingly desirable. All the difficulties of navigation to be encountered in reaching the Mainland from the ocean would then be avoided."

Now it must be apparent to every member of this House that the Chief Engineer could not have recommended the survey of the Fraser River route in 1877; and, when they considered that that survey must have cost a large amount of money, probably $50,000 or more, it was right that they should be placed in possession of every document that would throw light, not merely upon the expenditure, but on the cause of that expenditure. He, therefore, moved that resolution.

MR. DEWDNEY said he considered it very desirable that the House should have every possible information with regard to this matter, and he, therefore, proposed to add to the resolution: "Also a copy of all reports or other papers which induced the Government to delay the location survey until 1876." He was aware that there were other papers in the hands of the Government than the reports of the engineers, and, as these might have had some effect in influencing the Minister of Public Works to order the survey alluded to, he asked for those words to be inserted in the resolution.

MR. DECOSMOS said he did not see the force of the proposed addition. The Government of the Dominion paid the Chief Engineer, and the Acting Engineer, and, if the Government had acted upon their advice, it would be seen from a review of their reports.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is not necessary that the amendment should be made. I shall bring down all papers in the Department having reference to the matter.

MR. DEWDNEY said, that being the case, he would not inflict on the Government the reading of a long letter he had had the honour of addressing to the hon. the Minister of Public Works, as he promised that would be brought down with the other papers. He thought there might have been other papers which had led the Government to take the course they had; but he could not see why his hon. friend the member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) should object to the survey. Some few years ago the hon. member said:

"Confederation on proper terms will give us population; will give us means to employ labour remuneratively; will enlarge our commerce, and build up our industry. If it gives us public works, if it gives us a railroad from a point on the Fraser, below Yale, to Savona's Ferry on Lake Kamloops, and if we connect Lake Okanagan with the Spelmacheen River by railway, which is only about thirteen miles, not only will the whole country, from Osoyoos lake, on the boundary, behind the Cascades, be opened up and connected with our chief commercial city, with a cheap and speedy means of transportation, but all this tract of country, traversed by the railways and lake communication, will be utilized in producing wheat and wool and other articles for exportation. Victoria then will be built up, and will be the chief commercial city of British Columbia, with all other parts of the colony tributary to her. This is what Confederation on proper terms would do for us."

These were the views of the hon. gentleman some years ago with regard to the Fraser River route, and he was sorry to see him now so bitterly opposed to even a survey being made of that route. The hon. gentleman had now spoken about the estimates of last year in the reports of the cost of the different routes, and had stated that the Burrard Inlet route was estimated to cost two millions more than the Bute Inlet route. He (Mr. Dewdney) believed—in fact he knew, that a report had already come down, and would be laid down before the House, he believed, before very long, that would show a very different state of affairs. He found in the report of Mr. Marcus Smith the following in regard to the location of the Fraser River route:—

"The proportion of excessively heavy work is estimated to extend over 57 miles, including an aggregate of 7 to 8 miles of tunnelling. I do not think it probable that a better survey would materially alter this estimate."

He was glad to see a report brought down by the Minister of Public Works estimating the distance of extremely heavy work at 43 instead of 57 miles, and also that the tunnelling was little over two miles instead of seven or eight miles. He thought that was quite sufficient to convince any one that the House ought to be grateful to any one who had been the means of bringing about the survey of that road. He asked the hon. gentleman to add to his motion, "also copies of all reports or other papers which induced the Government to delay the location survey until 1876."

MR. DECOSMOS said he was glad that the hon. the Prime Minister had been pleased to say that he would bring down the papers having reference to the Fraser route. With regard to the utterances of his hon. friend the member for Yale (Mr. Dewdney), in reference to something which he (Mr. DeCosmos) had said some ten years ago, he could assure his hon. friend that the position he occupied now, compared with that he occupied some years ago, proved that he was a progressive and not a standstill politician. During the progress of this Session he had heard reference made to what this or that gentleman of the respective parties had said at some previous time, as though it made any difference to the public what opinion they held last year or the year before, provided they were right now. He believed it was better to be right than to be consistent. Now, with regard to the extract that had been read, in which he spoke in favour of the railway from Yale to Savona's Ferry, while that hon. gentleman was connected with the Government of British Columbia as surveyor, the prevailing impression was that the only route through British Columbia would be by Fraser River, Eagle Pass and Howse Pass to the Bow Port, south Saskatchewan; and he (Mr. DeCosmos) did, at that period, speak in favour of the route by Yale. The first exploration party through Howse Pass, led by Mr. Moberly, brought back such information as induced the Chief Engineer, Mr. Fleming, to strike out that portion of the route altogether. Before that time they had the Palliser expedition, and the report of that also led the public mind in the direction of the southern route; but further explorations, both within and without the Province of British Columbia, brought conclusive evidence that the route of the railway, to be of general advantage to the Dominion and of special advantage to the Province of British Columbia, and to be the means of building up a gigantic commercial city on the Pacific coast—a city that in his judgment would be the greatest city of the Dominion and would be the great outlet and inlet of that vast territory west of the 110th meridian and north of it also—to do this the true line of the railway, so far as he could gather from the last report, was north even of Yellow Head Pass, taking the Pine River route and passing through the rich agricultural lands of Red River, to the north of Manitoba, and then north of the Saskatchewan, and through the Rocky Mountains into a tract of country which Mr. Selwyn, the geologist, and Mr. MacCoun, the botanist, had said was the best portion of territory in British Columbia for settlement. By that means, when a railway was brought down to the common point at Fort George, it could be diverted to Bute Inlet, and, if necessary at any later time, to Fort Simpson. It would form the most advantageous and shortest line of the three or four lines now in operation or in course of construction to the south, in the States, and this would be giving them a great advantage both as regarded ocean-going and inland traffic. He thought this reason was quite sufficient why he should change his views formed on the limited data possessed by him some eight or ten years ago. He was perfectly willing to change his views every day in the year provided he could make them better. He could not accept the proposed addition to his motion.

Motion agreed to.

CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES ON INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. POULIOT moved for a statement showing all claims against the Government, still unsettled, for damages caused by the Intercolonial Railway:

1. For lands taken;
2. For damages caused by water and otherwise, by reason of work not having been done which ought to have been done, or work not having been done in a proper manner;
3. Damages by fires caused by the locomotives;
4. Damages caused by the killing of cattle on the line;
5. Damages resulting from loss or injury to goods.

He said he desired hon. members to understand the position in which the French Canadian population stood to the Intercolonial Railway, and to cause to disappear certain ideas which prevailed as to this portion of our population being disagreeable in conduct, or meddling, as found in certain quarters. He would go further, and show that not only was this population very peaceful, but also that they endured grievances with more patience than the English-speaking part of the population. The facts were as follows: At the outset, a legion of employés had been sent into that quarter by the Government; and none of these employés understood French, though the population was French-Canadian. These employés, engineers, etc., had entered the fields lying contiguous to the line, broken down fences, and damaged the crops. This was the manner in which their people had been treated. And this system of bad treatment had been continued. What had they next seen? The contractors, with a great number of employes, had followed, and the farmers, whose properties were situated along the line, had suffered severely, their fences being broken down, their fields and crops damaged, etc. The farmers had sought to prevent these things being done; but these people only replied: "Oh, we do not understand you; go off." This was the response; and more than that—these persons had not only broken down the fences of the farmers and passed into their fields, but when they proceeded with the work, they treated the farmers without any ceremony at all. In many instances, these persons prevented the farmers going directly from one part of their properties to another, obliging them to make considerable detours sometimes of one or two miles when they wished to go and cultivate portions of their farms. The resident population had been very badly treated in these and other respects; and, when they made complaints, the reply always was "We do not understand you; go off." Moreover, the people there had been employed by the contractors, and they certainly had worked cheaply enough—for 80c. a day; and it was supposed that, under the circumstances, at all events, they would be treated and paid in good faith; but this had not been done, and the contractors and sub-contractors had acted as if these people could be made to work for nothing at all. This was what had taken place in his own county. Again, those from whom land had been taken for railway purposes had been treated very badly; and, in very many cases, the proprietors interested had received only about one-quarter of the real value of their property; and, altogether, they certainly had not obtained fifty per cent. of such value, though he knew that the Government had probably paid more. Persons who were not qualified for the duties in question had been employed. Officials had been sent to settle these matters, and the Government paid as much at the end, and would have paid less if proper persons had performed the services; and these difficulties still existed. He hoped that the Government would see that this matter was settled. Again, serious damage had been caused along the line from water, owing to the fact that parts of the work had not been done in a proper manner; and the contractors had gained money—it was all they looked to. He had seen a list of extras, which, relatively speaking, were very considerable, that the contractors had received when the road was finished. And portions of these works were not to-day completed. Furthermore, crossings had not been filled in properly; these, in places, had never been finished, and yet the contractors had been well paid. Great cause for complaint existed in these regards. He would ask the hon. the Minister of Justice on what he had relied in reference to the action taken concerning the claims made upon the Government touching the damages that had thus been caused.

MR. LAFLAMME: In reply to the hon. gentleman I would say this: as to the facts, I took the report of the officers of the Department of Public Works; and, as to the law affecting the case, I took the law of the country.

MR. POULIOT thanked the hon. the Minister of Justice for his answer. The hon. the Minister of Justice had long practiced in our Courts of Justice; but there proceedings were not conducted after this manner.

MR. LAFLAMME: I would inform the hon. gentleman that, in accordance with the law, which is now perfectly well known, and in accordance with a Statute passed a few Sessions since, any individual who has a legal claim to make against the Government can present a petition to the Court of Exchequer and secure the application of this law to his case.

MR. MASSON: But how much will that cost?

MR. LAFLAMME: Not more than an ordinary case in the Superior Court. Even the costs in the Exchequer Court are less considerably than they are in the Superior Court, and justice is there administered upon the spot in question; and, after a petition is presented and the facts stated, before the Judge of the Exchequer Court, the decision is given; and, if this is not considered satisfactory, it can be taken before the Supreme Court. As to the system of procedure which affects these cases, it is quite as simple and perhaps less complicated than that in vogue in the Courts of Justice in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. POULIOT said that the persons who had made these complaints, had not been treated by the Government as they would have been in an ordinary Court of Justice. The Government had obtained reports in this regard; and, upon them, the hon. the Minister of Justice and the Government had informed the parties interested, who preferred these complaints, that they had no right to be paid for the damages they had sustained. Again, loss had been suffered owing to fires caused by the locomotives of the Intercolonial Railway; and in this connection, again, injustice had been done the population. Fences along the track had been destroyed; cattle had been killed through negligence, and farmers, for even one or two months at a time, had been unable to put their cattle into the fields adjoining the track, owing to the fact that the fences had not been rebuilt during this period. Fences along the track were even not yet re-erected, and this was a cause of great complaint. He thought that justice ought to be done to those who were interested in this connection. Another cause for complaint consisted in the fact that persons were sent down there by the Government to enquire into these matters who did not understand one word of French. He protested against one nationality being treated in a different manner, and being preferred to another; we should all be placed on an equal footing. He would relate an instance in this regard which occurred to him. Last summer some farmers from his parish had gone to establish themselves at Metapedia; and had taken some things with them, including a stove. They had been exposed to inconvenience and loss, owing to the manner in which their effects were taken care of; and, when they complained, the answers received were, "I have nothing to do with it," or "It is not my fault," etc. An end should be put to these inconveniences, and, above all, this portion of the population should not be incommoded. Under the present state of things, the French-Canadians were treated worse than any other section of our population, and he defied the English-speaking portion of the population to endure these grievances so long as the French-Canadians had done. Means should be taken to terminate the existence of these evils. In the first place, the French-Canadians should have a French-Canadian representative on the staff of the Intercolonial Railway, which now consisted of eight or nine chief officials, not one of whom either was a French-Canadian or understood their interests. The Province of Quebec was not properly treated in this connection, and he hoped that the members for the Province of Quebec, to whichever party they might belong, whether Conservative or Liberal, would act as wisely as did the members representing Ontario in the House, who were united for the protection of their rights, when both parties united together to make the Confederation. This was a matter to which attention should be paid in view of the approaching elections. These matters had to be settled, and the people would judge the Government as a jury did a criminal in the dock. Another demand they had to make was this: that all these grievances should be judged by one of their own people; and that this railway should be placed on the same footing with other railways. Quite a number of prosecutions had been taken against the Grand Trunk Railway Company in his district and county, and they had been heard before the Courts of Justice; and the Grand Trunk Railway, he might remark, was managed on the same principles, and few French-Canadians were employed on it in high positions. In these suits, the complainants gained their suits, though, of course, they sometimes lost; but their grievances were heard and judged upon in Court, and he thought that the same rule should be followed in regard to the Government railway. He had already said that he did not accuse the Government of wrong-doing with reference to those difficulties; but those wrongs had been done by their employés, and they should have been stopped long ago. As for that also, both Governments were to be blamed in the same manner; but the late Government, he would say, was more to be blamed, because much more wrong was done when they were in office, and the Intercolonial was under the control of the Commissioners. These grievances had arisen from acts committed by these engineers and others. The French-Canadian population should be placed on the same footing and treated the same as the English-speaking population, and equal justice should be meted out to them. They did not ask for any favour to be showed them; they simply demanded that justice should be done them. But, in the past, they had been most unfairly treated; and this had been the case while the late Government was in office. The contracts for supplies of sleepers for the railway had been mismanaged, and French-Canadians had not been considered qualified for positions on the railway; for example, it was not found possible to find among the French-Canadians of the Province of Quebec a qualified person to be a store-keeper. They brought one from Nova Scotia.

AN HON. MEMBER: No French-Canadians need apply.

MR. POULIOT hoped that the Government, learning all these facts, would see that justice would be done the French-Canadian population, and that the French-Canadians were not treated in any different or more unfavourable manner, than any other section of the population of this country.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MR. ROBITAILLE said the hon member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), in submitting his motion, had complained that there were not proper water-courses provided, thereby increasing the flow of water and destroying property to a large extent; that the farm crossings in that section of the country had not been properly filled in, and in some places had not been filled at all; that the engines on the road, not being properly arranged to prevent accidents from burning embers, were the means of setting fire to the fences along that section of the country, destroying not only railway, but farmers', fences; that the employés of the road could not speak the French language, though that part of the country was solely inhabited by French people; that not even a store-keeper or an officer holding the lowest position was taken from the Province of Quebec. The hon. member had further declared that a short time ago sleepers were wanted for that section of road, and the notices inviting tenders were printed in English and not in French, though the district was inhabited only by French people. The stipulations contained a provision that the lumber used should be of a kind not found in the Province of Quebec; that, when it was found necessary to procure certain lumber in connection with stone foundations of walls, which could have been more easily obtained in the locality, it was brought from a distance, probably outside of Quebec, at a great cost, at the same time leaving six or eight masons idle for one week. He (Mr. Robitaille) knew nothing of these facts; but he presumed that the hon. member for Temiscouata, being a devoted supporter of the Government, must have been cognizant of the facts, or he would not have dared to accuse his friends as he had done. It would appear that, when the inhabitants, who suffered from the depredations committed along the line, had lodged complaints with the Government, some gentlemen were sent down to the locality, but they did not call on any of the parties complaining, or give them an opportunity to establish their complaints. These gentlemen did not speak French, and they made a report to the Government that the complaints were not founded in fact, and, indeed, that there was nothing to complain of. It might be very well for the Minister of Justice to say that these men, if they had any complaints, might institute actions against the Government in the Supreme Court.

MR. LAFLAMME: Not in the Supreme Court.

MR. ROBITAILLE said it must be remembered that great cost was involved in instituting any suit. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) had very properly said that at the time of the building of the Grand Trunk the farmers had lost cattle on the road. They did not complain so bitterly, because they could bring the Grand Trunk before the ordinary Courts, which could not be done with the Government road. It would be possible for the Government to offer more facilities to parties along the Intercolonial road. Some two or three bridges, and a long section of crib wharfing belonging to the Metapedia road, which was built before the Intercolonial, had been destroyed because the engines on the Intercolonial had not been properly guarded and had not proper fire-guards on. He mentioned that to the Superintendent of the road last summer, and he promised to look into the question, but, of course, he did not do so. He (Mr. Robitaille) complained that, at the Metapedia station on the Intercolonial road, it was impossible to obtain tickets for a more westernly point than Rivière du Loup, or to have baggage checked to such a point; whereas, if they went to Campbelltown, fourteen miles distant, in New Brunswick, they could obtain tickets for Point Lévis. It happened that Metapedia was the nearest station on the Intercolonial Railway for the whole population in the district of Gaspé. At certain seasons of the year it was impossible to cross over from Gaspé, in Quebec, to Campbelltown, in New Brunswick, and the people were then obliged to go to Metapedia. Here was a whole population of 36,000 people troubled in this way, without any reason for it that he could discover. It might be, as the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) had suggested, that Quebec counted for nothing in the present administration of affairs. It looked very much like it, when it was found that, for the small position of store-keeper on the Intercolonial Railway in Quebec, they could not find a French-Canadian who was supposed to be competent to fill it; but, if they could not find a French-Canadian, surely the Government could find a man of English extraction who could speak French. It was a most extraordinary fact that in the section of the road where the people were all French there was not to be found a single employé who could speak French. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) had mentioned a case which looked like a hardship—where a small farmer had a lot of cattle destroyed. All these circumstances showed a mal-administration of the road. They would find that the road had been badly administered from the very beginning; and the more they looked into the matter the more they would find that such was the case. The hon. gentleman who had brought forward the motion did not understand why none of his compatriots should find employment on the Intercolonial. The reason for this was that the representative of the Liberal or Rouge party of Quebec in the Administration had sacrificed the interests of the Province for personal advancement. They found that one after another had entered the Cabinet and made use of that position to obtain positions of emolument. They had sacrificed the interests of the Province of Quebec to their personal interests and aggrandisement; and, if the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) had not found it out yet, he would find it very soon.

MR. MACKENZIE rose to a point of order. He said the motion was one for papers, and if the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Robitaille) intended to make an attack of that character, he should have given proper notice of it.

MR. ROBITAILLE said he had endeavoured to place in English the attack made by the hon. member for Temiscouata, and, as the representative of an important county in the Province of Quebec, he had added a complaint which he had a right to make, with the view of directing the attention of the hon. the First Minister to the state of affairs on the Intercolonial Railway. He had stated the conclusions at which he had arrived, and the whole people of Quebec believed as he did.

MR. Fiset said the officers of the road should, perhaps, pay more attention to its management, especially where it involved the interests of inhabitants along the line. But the Government could not be held responsible for the decisions of those official arbitrators. He admitted their decisions would occasionally prove very hard to submit to. In the county of Rimouski, where the great majority of inhabitants were French, but where there were many people who spoke English, it was very painful to the former to have to submit their cases before a tribunal that did not understand their language; but he did not see how they could blame the Government for submitting to the law, which provided that, in the cases where proprietors had complaints to make, they were to submit them to the official arbitrators. If these arbitrators did not render satisfaction to the inhabitants, they ought not to lay the responsibility of their decisions on the Government. In the Board of Direction, as the hon. the member for Temiscouata remarked, French Canadians were, perhaps, not represented as they ought to be. But could that be held as a reproach to the Government? When, in 1869, 1870, and 1871, the late Government had the control of the road, how many of their compatriots were employed on the surveys?

MR. MASSON: This is a Government of Reform

MR. Fiset said that was undoubtedly true; but, in regard to complaints made for damages on the line for animals killed, and damage by fire, the Government could not be held responsible in such cases. It obliged its officers to make a report after they have held an enquiry. The Government was obliged to base its decision on their report. The hon. member for Bonaventure said it was very inconvenient not to be able to get tickets at the Metapédia station to travel to any part of the Dominion; but that station was in the hands of an old company. But all the stations were organized, and tickets could be got to go everywhere. The hon. member for Temiscouata's remarks were not properly interpreted by the hon. member for Bonaventure. His intention was not to blame the Government so much as the defective administration of the road, for which the Government could not be held responsible.

MR. TUPPER said he judged from the cheers of the gentlemen around him, when the hon. the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) was speaking, that he was saying something very bad about the Government. But he was afraid that both the hon. gentlemen who had preceded him had not confined their remarks to the Government of the day, but applied them as well to the past Government. He did not know what they had stated, and would not, therefore, endorse any of their remarks. With reference to the remarks of the Minister of Justice he quite agreed with the hon. the Prime Minister that it would be very inconvenient to enter into a general discussion on the management of the Intercolonial Railway under this motion. He would merely notice the remarks of the Minister of Justice that there was a legal remedy in case of complaints. He wished to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that this was entirely illusory. It was impossible to get any redress in that way. He would bring before the House a case in which cattle had been killed upon the Intercolonial Railway. A man claimed fifty dollars for the killing of his cow; the fence along the road was down, the Government had neglected to have it repaired, owing to the neglect of the manager of the road, and the cow was killed. The hon. the Minister of Justice could hardly expect the owner to claim redress in the Supreme Court of this Dominion for fifty dollars. The general complaint was that no investigation in those cases was ordered. The complainants wrote a letter to the General Superintendent, or some officer who was more easily reached, perhaps, than he, and received in return an acknowledgement of the letter or something of that kind; but no payment was given or investigation made. He took this opportunity of suggesting to the Minister of Public Works the absolute necessity of finding some means of satisfying claimants for these small amounts, for which the Supreme Court offered no kind of redress—a means by which, when parties made claims of this kind, they could have, at all events, the satisfaction of feeling that their cases had been fairly dealt with, and, if refused payment, that the refusal was based on evidence.

MR. MACKENZIE said the subject of claims for damages which the hon. member for Cumberland had referred to was not immediately connected with the motion. All he could say was that, instead of no enquiry being made, there was an enquiry made. Either Mr. Luttrell, or one of the chief officers, was directed in such cases to make an enquiry. In a case, for instance, which occurred some weeks ago—perhaps two months ago—the party complaining testified that the fence was down, while the trackmaster, who passed the night before, said the fence was up then. It might be alleged that the trackmaster was interested in maintaining his own good conduct; but in that case he had directed enquiry to be made, either by the Superintendent or his deputy, personally to ascertain the true state of the case. Another case where great complaint had been made was the killing of one or two horses at a crossing in New Brunswick. They had ascertained, beyond doubt or cavil, that the train was approaching at a sufficient distance to warn the gentleman who had charge of the horses of its approach; the whistle was sounded at the proper time, but he either was thinking of something else, or the wind was against him and prevented him from hearing the sound, or there was some other reason, and his horses were killed. There was no legal liability of the Government in that case. Another case was that of a fire in the neighbourhood of the line. All the officers on the train, the conductor, engineer and fireman, testified positively that the screen was over the top of the funnel, and, in consequence, it was impossible that sparks could have escaped in such quantity as to have caused the alleged fire in the neighbouring premises. There was a little testimony to show that some persons had seen sparks falling sufficiently large to cause fire, but, if they had to pay for every fire alleged to be caused by sparks from the engine, they would continually be imposed on. His hon. friend assumed, as a matter of course, that every fire had been caused by fire from the railway. He had given strictest orders that, wherever there was doubt, it should be given in favour of the plaintiff. But, where there was no doubt, some enquiry was absolutely necessary, if the Government meant to do anything with the railway. They must manage the railway as an ordinary business concern, and endeavour to do what any private company would consider necessary to do and no more. The general impression seemed to be that, whenever accidents occurred in proximity to the railway, because it was Government property, the Government should suffer rather than the individual. There was no reason in that. If the Government had done wrong, had violated the law, it should pay; if not, it should not be held liable for damages, any more than a private company. With respect to the damages in the counties of Temiscouata and Rimouski, when the present Government came in, the railroad was about finished in these counties—in fact it was entirely finished; and there was a multitude of claims for damages. He found that Mr. Stephenson had acted as valuator on the road from Miramichi up. He continued him in that capacity, and appointed a Mr. Gagnon to act with him. These two men made their report to the Government, rejecting almost the whole of the claims. He found their report gave a great deal of dissatisfaction, and, after much trouble and expense, he found he could do nothing more than to send the Dominion arbitrators there. The hon. member for Rimouski was mistaken when he said the arbitrators only spoke English. One of them was a Frenchman.

MR. FISET: I admitted that fact.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had misunderstood the hon. gentleman, then. He thought it desirable to employ a counsel who could speak French and English indifferently, and who was there all the time. The arbitrators went from place to place, examined the ground, and spent many weeks there. Their report, generally speaking, coincided with that of the previous valuers, and a number of the complainants did obtain a small compensation. Quite a number of new claims also sprung up which had never before been adjudicated upon. The complainants had the privilege of appearing by counsel, a privilege of which many availed themselves; in short, everything was done which he, as Minister of Public Works, could do, to have these claims satisfactorily adjusted. As to the specific charge that an individual had lost a portion of a cooking-stove through negligence of the official, he had not heard of it until a few days ago, and had directed an enquiry to be made into the matter. If the Government were responsible for the loss of a portion of the cooking-stove, they would pay for it. As to the charge that no French Canadians were employed on the road, that was an alleged fact of which he was not aware. He believed that every man who had been appointed station-master was either of that nationality, or was one who had been formerly employed on the road, and had been retained on the recommendation of those who spoke French more frequently than English. When first told of the constant employment of English-speaking men on the line, coming from a distance, he made enquiry in this particular section, and found that, out of forty-four men employed, thirty-eight were French. The foreman of the shops at Rimouski was a Frenchman, and a number of the engineers were Frenchmen. He deemed it very desirable that no complaint should be made on that score. Anything he could do to remove any just cause of complaint in a matter like that, he would do with great earnestness and zeal. It was a fact that, when a railroad traversed a country, through which no railroad ever ran before, it took some years before things settled down; but before long it would be found that these complaints would be reasonably disposed of. To show the nature of some of the complaints, they were charged heavy damages because boulders had been removed from properties immediately adjoining the railway. The Government was not liable for acts of the contractors, and he thought that, in any case, considerable benefit was done to the properties by clearing the soil of boulders. Most of the complaints were about water-courses.

Some complained that, owing to the sheds being built so high, the crops were prevented from ripening. He had endeavoured to examine personally into all the complaints, and to give orders that everything should be done that was in the power of the Superintendent and those under him to do, to have the course of the railway administered so as to afford as slight annoyance as possible. He felt sure that his hon. friend behind him (Mr. Pouliot) had been misled by a number of unreasonable complaints when he spoke as he had done. It would be very difficult for the Government to do more than it had done.

MR. MASSON asked if the hon. the Premier would explain about the fires caused on the farms adjoining the road, and the fences which were burnt. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) had said that the only answer given in these cases was that the engines were not arranged so as to stop fires. He knew the people thought the Government was wrong on this question.

MR. MACKENZIE said there must be some mistake in that. No such answer could have been given. The hon. gentleman might have thought it was given, or have been misinformed.

MR. MITCHELL said he was glad to have an opportunity to air his grievances in relation to the Intercolonial road. He thought he was one of the most long-suffering men in Parliament. His hon. friend the Premier had stated that, in every case that came up, he had personally ordered an investigation. No doubt he had. He recollected an investigation which had been held, and in which they refused to pay a poor man the value of his cow, forty dollars; but he had brought the question before the House, and had kept the House occupied on it until two o'clock in the morning, when he finally obtained compensation for that poor man, at a cost to the country of a night's sitting, and of a night's sleep to the members. He felt deeply interested in this question, for he had an application from another of his constituents who had lost five cattle out of a herd of ten, run through by the locomotives in a most flagrant and an unjust manner. He informed the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that he intended to take the same means, if necessary, to have that man paid for his loss. The hon. the Prime Minister had said that, in every case which had occurred, he had ordered the strictest investigation to be made. He (Mr. Mitchell) took the liberty, as a representative, to ask for the papers in the case of the five cattle that were killed. He received them this Session, and found that there were not one-third of the papers there; he found there were missing a number of private documents, affidavits, the testimony of five or six witnesses examined by one of the officers of the Government.

MR. PALMER: That is nothing,

MR. MITCHELL said it was a great deal to him and his constituents. He could bear out the hon. member for Temiscouata in his statements, if the evidence of his (Mr. Mitchell's) constituents was of any value, with regard to the arbitrary conduct and the flagrant violations of the rights of private citizens, by those engineers—than whom the Emperor of Russia was not more despotic. He did not blame those officers alone; some of them held office under the late Administration, when there was some check on them; but, under the present Administration, there was no check on their conduct. His hon. friend the Premier had stated that in every case an examination had been held; but those examinations, from the testimony given him by his constituents, were conducted with a view to exonerate themselves and free the railway from any blame in the matter, and let every poor man whose cattle were killed, or fences burnt, take the consequences. One of his constituents had stated to him a case.

AN HON. MEMBER: About a cow?

MR. MITCHELL said yes, about a cow. He had visited Barnaby River, an Irish Catholic constituency, which, he was proud to say, would give him, whenever he required it, a majority of votes. On that occasion two persons came to him, one of them a poor woman whose only cow had been killed on the line, and who gave him those papers, and said: "Mr. Mitchell, here are the facts." They had applied to Mr. Luttrell, who gave, as answer, the bald statement that that the Government was not liable, taking the legal exception that cattle had no right to run within three miles of the railway. Could that offence of trespass on the part of the cattle be compared to the killing of a cow? If it took him every night until one or two o'clock in the morning, he was bound to get justice done to that poor woman. The other case was that of a man named Murphy.

AN HON. MEMBER: Mike?

MR. MITCHELL: No; Tim. He said they had killed his young horse; the only one he had, and the principal means of earning a support for his family. The horse was in a pasturage, the fences were down along the line for a quarter of a mile, and yet these gentlemen said the fences were up; the train was passing, and, scared by the noise, the horse ran across the railway, ahead of the locomotive, and was killed, and they refused to pay. What were the trackmasters paid for? Every few miles several men were employed by the Government to look after the condition of the track, and yet these men, through their neglect, permitted these accidents to occur. A poor man's cattle and horse were killed; judges were sent to examine into these matters, and the examination ended in a refusal to pay. The objection of the hon. member for Cumberland was well taken. He (Mr. Mitchell) was not present when the hon. the Minister of Justice gave his legal opinion as to the remedy that ought to be taken. But a poor farmer could not be expected to be able to fee a lawyer to plead his case. It would cost him a thousand dollars to get to the Supreme Court. He would ask his hon. friend the member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) what it cost him to bring his case before the Supreme Court.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Hear hear.

MR. MITCHELL said he would ask the hon. the Minister of Justice what it cost him to defend his case when his election was contested? Did they propose the same judicial remedy in the case of the loss of a five-year old horse of the value of one hundred dollars or thereabouts? No; but they left Mr. Luttrell or Mr. Bruce or some of their employés, to deal with the case as they thought fit. There was another case which came up last year, and he held an hon. member opposite responsible for what had been done in that case.

Several Hon. MEMBERS: Name.

MR. MITCHELL said he would not name the hon. member, as he would probably rise to answer him on the subject. The hon. member had pledged his word that compensation would be made for the cattle killed in the case referred to.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: What I said was that it would be very cheap for the Dominion to pay for the cattle, compared with the alternative suggested by the hon. member.

MR. MITCHELL said he thought so too. What the hon the Minister of Finance had said was this: He (Mr. Mitchell) had, a couple of evenings after he had obtained payment for the cow, crossed to speak to Mr. Brydges, of whom he must say, although he did not care very much for him personally, that he had managed the road pretty well. He had crossed over to Mr. Brydges shortly before the Speaker took the Chair, and was conversing with him about the merits of the case. The hon. the Finance Minister enquired what it was that he (Mr. Mitchell) wanted. To which he answered, that he wanted payment to be made for the cattle which had been killed, and that, if this was not looked into, he would have to inflict another night's debate on the House. The hon. the Finance Minister then said he would have it paid, and payment had not yet been made.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: No doubt it will.

MR. MITCHELL said the facts of the case were that a poor but very respectable man, who lived about two miles from the station, had let his herd of cattle, about eleven or twelve cows, out to water. The railway passed close to his farm. The gates of the farm had remained open all winter; the trackmen had seen them open and had made no protest. These cattle had strayed out towards the railway, and had got on the track. The locomotive had started from the Miramichi station on a perfectly straight road, with a very slight down grade; they started from that terminus; they blew the whistle; they saw the cattle on the line, and they did not slacken their speed, but they went right through those cattle and killed, at a blow, four cows. The Government ought not to employ engineers and conductors who would permit such a state of things to exist. It was not because a man was on the track that he was to be run over and killed. It was the duty of the conductor to stop the train and save life. Cattle might be constantly on the road, and it might be partially due to the neglect of the farmers, but conductors should not consider themselves thereby justified in running the train through them. Those officials should be taught that they could not legally or wilfully run through herds of cattle and destroy them, and the Government must be taught that they were responsible to the people who had lost these cattle. Mr. Luttrell, when complaint was made, simply wrote off that the Government was not responsible, on account of some legal quibble. The poor people were suffering throughout the country; dozens of cases of that kind took place. He was glad the hon. member for Temiscouata had brought this question up as it gave him an opportunity to place the gravity of the case before the House. With regard to the general management of the Intercolonial Road, he would not, to-day take up the time of this House in relation to it.

An Hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

MR. MITCHELL: Do I understand the hon. member for Montreal Centre to say "hear, hear"?

MR. DEVLIN: The hon. member is mistaken. I did not say, "Hear, hear." I was not giving any attention to the hon. member's remarks.

MR. MITCHELL said he was very glad in both cases. It made very little difference to him whether the hon. member for Montreal Centre regarded his remarks or not. And it made very little difference to the country whether the hon. gentleman gave any attention to the subject or not. He would not take up the time of this House in discussing the question of the Intercolonial road. When the occasion presented itself, he would endeavour to lay before the House and the country some evidence in relation to the mismanagement by officials on this road.

MR. PALMER said he differed from the hon. the Minister of Justice in regard to the law he had laid down.

MR. LAFLAMME said that complaint had been made in regard to land damages, and he had stated that, if the parties were not satisfied with the decision of the Government, they had a remedy by applying to the Exchequer Court.

MR. PALMER said the statement of the hon. Minister was calculated to mislead. With respect to all those subjects, with the single exception of land taken possession of by the Government, the law afforded no remedy. Any person having cattle killed on the railway had no legal remedy against the Crown. When the present Act was before the House, he (Mr. Palmer) complained to the then Minister of Justice, and desired a different provision to be inserted. In cases involving land, application could be made to the Crown to recover possession by petition of right; but no person could enter a Court and complain that the Queen had done wrong. He referred to this point because, in New Brunswick, there had been several cases arising out of injuries received on the Government railways. A lady had an ear taken off through the clear fault of a conductor on the railway. Complaint was made to the Government, but no notice was taken of the application. The case went before a jury and a verdict was rendered for $1,000. An appeal had been taken on the ground that no remedy lay against the employes of that road. Another case was that in which a fishery officer seized a boat in utter defiance of the law. The fisherman obtained damages amounting to $900, the remedy being sought from the officer. That case was also to be fought out, on the advice of the hon. the Minister of Justice, by the Government denying the liability, while admitting that a wrong had been committed. In such cases much depended on the party into whose hands the claim fell. If the officer was friendly, the person got a remedy; if unfriendly, no remedy was given, and on investigation it had sometimes been found that the representations made by the officers were false in fact. He submitted to the House whether it was not desirable that some cheaper mode of dealing with those claims against the Government should be adopted, such as by local tribunals, and thus do away with officialism. He hoped the Minister of Justice would be able to submit to the House during the present Session some measure to remedy what was now a public wrong.

MR. THOMSON (Welland) said he would feel disposed to look with suspicion upon any claim not supported by officers of the railway, brought before Parliament. It could not be possible that officers of the railway who were sufficiently intelligent to fill their position should be so utterly stupid and unreasonable as not to settle damages, if the people had legitimate claims, when they were brought up. Cattle had no business on a railway track, and had a right to be killed. If every train was to be stopped for every cow that got on the track, it would never arrive at its destination. All an engineer was obliged to do, when cattle were on the track, was to blow the whistle and endeavour to frighten them away, and if he saw no danger he was justified in driving among them. With regard to the cattle story told by the hon. member for Northumberland, it was evident the poor man had appealed to the hon. member's sympathies. As George Stephenson said, "It would not hurt the train, but it would be very awkward for the cow." On one occasion the company with which he was connected killed seven head of cattle, three being thrown on each side and one in front, and was not compelled to pay for them. If cattle were killed while crossing the railway track while passing along a public road, the company was not liable, because the driver of the cattle should not have allowed them to be on the track at that time. No such claim could be brought against a railway company, and certainly not against the Government.

Mr. DOMVILLE said the question of killing cattle, which had been made a ludicrous subject, was an important one to the poor people whose cows were killed. It was very easy to declare that the people had a remedy; but he desired that they should be recompensed for the loss they had sustained. Some cattle were killed the other day at Rothsay. An application to the Government officials brought an answer from Mr. Brydges to this effect: "I beg to say that if your cattle had not been out of your barn they would not have been killed." No recompense could be made to poor people. Ministers travelled through the country stating that the country was going to grass. They cut down the expenditure for gas in the public offices and prohibited a clerk from warming his tea in order that 20c. might be saved; but when a cow was killed on the Government railway the owner could not be recompensed owing to a technical difficulty. If a judicious course had been followed by the managing director, since he had been in charge of the Intercolonial and an effort had been made to meet the requirements of the people, the present feeling, which was one of detestation, not against the Government only, but the administration of the railway, would not have prevailed along the whole line. If the Government knew what was transpiring in connection with the road they would not submit to it. The line was managed by a gentleman who resided in Montreal and drew a salary of $8,000 per annum, and, when people applied to him, they received the answer, "We regret we killed your cattle, but we cannot pay you." In private life, if one man did an injury to another, he was liable to damages. If a locomotive stood opposite a barn and burnt it down in daylight, and an appeal was made for damages, the parties would receive an answer to the effect that, under the law, the Government was not called upon to pay the damage, provided there was a certain kind of screen on the top of the funnel. It was not just that Government railway engines should burn down private property in broad daylight and screen themselves behind the plea that the engine funnel was properly protected and call an employé to declare that he put on the screen that day. While it was proper that the Government should not allow themselves to be imposed upon, nevertheless, when a sound and honest claim was preferred, it should be investigated. Cases brought to the attention of the Government did not however, receive proper cognizance.

Mr. MACDONNELL said he dissented from the view of the law as laid down by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Palmer). It was new law that the owner of cattle was justified in permitting his cattle to stray upon other persons' lands. Under British law, the owner must take proper care of them and not permit them even to stray on the highway. While they might pass over the highway, if they remained an undue time, they were trespassers. He did not hold that it was justifiable to kill cattle which were trespassing, but, if they were trespassing on the highway, and the railway owned by the Government was a highway in that connection, the owner of the highway had a right to use it, and, if the cattle were killed, they were not liable to pay compensation.

Mr. PLUMB said it was a curious circumstance that the Government should declare that Government railways were, to a certain extent, beyond the law by which the people were afforded redress from ordinary corporations in case of property being destroyed by fire or cattle killed. Frequently the farming community had suffered from railways having been run through their lands, and had been subjected to annoyances therefrom. Public officers were not always ready to listen to complaints, but they should show consideration to persons submitting claims, while they should require rigid proof before recommending the payment of damages. A poor man iving on the line of the Intercolonial could not prosecute a claim against the Government. Such cases should be met in a spirit of fairness, rather than one of strict justice. The Government had established a great system of railways throughout the country, and would constantly be subjected to claims for damages, and it should be understood that the people through whose lands the lines run, would be treated with kindness, because the safety of the passengers depended very much on the spirit in which the law was administered by the superintendents and other officials into whose hands the management of the railways was entrusted. Cases had occurred in which the parties aggrieved had taken the law into their own hands, and it was very bad policy on the part of the Government to attempt to stand rigidly upon their rights, when, perhaps, a little yielding would save great trouble and annoyance, not only to the people in the neighbourhood, but also to the passengers travelling over the roads.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said that many farmers would find the finest market in the world if the Government would pay them for all cattle killed on their railways. While the Government should be just to such parties, their duty to the people required them to guard that nothing more than justice was done, and, if the Government were not liable for damages, they should not pay them. He therefore objected to the liberality which some hon. members were disposed to show when dealing with those cases. All the Government had to do, after ascertaining their liability, was to pay a fair and reasonable, but not liberal, sum.

Mr. CAMERON said that, under the common law of Great Britain, to which the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell) appealed, cattle had a perfect right to pass along a highway. No doubt the Government desired to do what was right in the administration of the Intercolonial Railway, and the subject under discussion was unworthy of occupying so much of the time of the House.

Motion agreed to.

MR. PLUMB.

THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex) moved for a statement of the number of miles of the Intercolonial operated on 1st July, 1873, and the cost of operating the same; also a similar statement for the years beginning 1st July, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877.

Motion agreed to.

THE LACHINE CANAL.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE AND CONTRACTS

Mr. CARON moved for copies of all complaints made against any inspector or other officer of Sections 6, 7 and 11 of the Lachine Canal, with copies of all correspondence between the Department of Public Works or any of the officers thereof with any person in relation to such complaints; also copies of contracts entered into for the enlargement of Sections 6, 7 and 11 of the Lachine Canal, with the specifications accompanying such contracts, and the Engineer's estimates upon which payments have been made in respect of such contracts.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The estimates for payment I am quite willing to give, but the estimates of the engineer in preparing his specifications are always confidential; I cannot give them.

Mr. CARON said that, after the statement of the hon. the Premier, he would withdraw that part of his motion.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

VISIT OF THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL TO BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MOTION FOR DETAILS OF EXPENSES.

Mr. MITCHELL moved for a return in detail of the expenditures incurred from the Treasury of Canada for the expenses of the journey of His Excellency the Governor-General and suite to British Columbia and back in the year 1876; also the expenses of his tour to Manitoba and the North-West in the year 1877.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I must object to the motion. I think there are sufficient details given in the Public Accounts, unless, indeed, the hon.

member takes upon himself to assume that, as a matter of course, these accounts have been made out unfaithfully, and that His Excellency and those immediately attending him here have deliberately falsified the Public Accounts. I think it is disrespectful to His Excellency to make it. It is the first time I have ever known such a motion being made, and I think it is an ill return for the services of His Excellency during the period he has represented this country. The motion appears as though the hon. member would imply something wrong on the part of the Governor-General, and is in its very essence almost an insult to the very person to whom we are so greatly indebted. If the hon. member for Northumberland does not withdraw his motion, I must ask hon. gentlemen to vote it down.

MR. MITCHELL said he looked upon the remarks of the hon. the Premier as very discourteous to the hon. members of this House. He moved this motion, not out of disrespect to His Excellency, not because there was anything wrong in the accounts; the latter was the hon. the Premier's suggestion, and the cap seemed to fit very well. He had made no charge, and did not imply any charge against the correctness of the Public Accounts, and he had no intention of being guilty of disrespect to the head of the Government of this country; but, as an independent member of this House, he had the right to ask information as to every account and every subject in connection with the Treasury of the country, when they found that the taxes, the money that was taken from the pockets of the people, were enormously increased, and that the expenditure of public money had also enormously increased during the last few years. And, when they found, too, that the expenses connected with the head of the Government had largely increased, and that money was taken out of the Treasury to meet this that was needed for other purposes. It came with a bad grace from the head of the Government to challenge him, as a representative of the people, as to his right to an explanation of this increased expenditure. Because he asked for information that the people had a right to get, the hon. the Premier attempted to impute other motives to him. He had been asked, outside this House, what those journeys cost, and, when he had heard it remarked that they had cost the country a great deal larger sums than appeared in the accounts, he thought it right to ask the question in this House. Let the hon. Premier divide the House upon his motion if he dared. If he stood alone he should be able to go back to the country and tell the people the reason why the hon. the Premier had chosen to object to a motion he had a perfect right, as a representative of the people, to make. He publicly disclaimed any idea of disrespect to His Excellency, in the motion. He had the highest respect for the Governor-General and recognised the service he had done to the country. The eloquent language in which he had spoken of the resources of this country would go forth to the world and be of great benefit to Canada. Yet, his motion had been repudiated and it had been stated that he had personal motives in bringing it forward. He had taken this course, purely from a sense of duty, because he believed it was due to His Excellency that the misrepresentations about his journeys should be put right; and, that, if more money was spent in that than appeared in the Public Accounts, the people ought to know it. He had heard statements made abroad not creditable to the hon. the Premier nor to those connected with him, but he had never believed them. He knew, however, that gentlemen on the other side dare not put such a motion on the paper, because it would be held to be discourteous; therefore, he, an independent member, had taken that course.

MR. DOMVILLE: You are independent?

MR. MITCHELL said he was independent, and it would be better if there were more independent members in the House. He had asked the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) to second the motion, but he had declined, and the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches had declined to allow it to pass. They said it was an insult to the head of the country; he denied this. He repeated that it was conceived without the least motive such as the hon. the Premier had chosen to impute to him, and he trusted the House would not deny the people the only means they had of obtaining information to which they were in every way entitled. The motion merely asked for certain details with regard to an item in the Public Accounts, and the hon. the Premier said sufficient details would be found in the Public Accounts. He might make that objection to three-fourths of the motions that came before the House, and yet such a ground never was taken by the hon. gentleman. He (Mr. Mitchell) was not prepared to say that more money had been expended upon these journeys than appeared in the public accounts; 700 pages of figures was too much to wade through for people who were not accustomed to it. He wanted an authoritative statement from this House so that he might put it before the country next summer whether they had spent thousands and thousands of dollars for the purpose of advertising the country. If he were to state that a quarter of a million of dollars had been expended in connection with Rideau Hall out of the Treasury, it would startle the country, and if it was not true he wished a statement to that effect to be put before the House. If it was true, it was discreditable to the country. He held in his hand a resolution, moved by the hon. the member for Chateauguay, and seconded by the hon. the Premier, declaring that the salary of the Governor-General ought not to be so large, and asking for it to be cut down from $50,000 to $35,000 per annum. In 1868, when they were fixing the Governor-General's salary—

MR. HOLTON: No; you were not fixing it.

MR. MITCHELL: No. it was fixed the year before.

MR. HOLTON: It was fixed by you under the Union Act.

MR. MITCHELL said it was fixed by them under the Union Act at £10,000 sterling, and the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) voted for its reduction in the following year.

MR. MITCHELL.

It was moved by Mr. Holton and seconded by Mr. Mackenzie, that the salary of the Governor-General be reduced to $35,000 per annum. They had moved that resolution, and yet the hon. the Premier said he (Mr. Mitchell) desired to insult the distinguished head of the country, because, forsooth, he wished to remove an impression which prevailed throughout the country with regard to this expenditure. He had been asked: "Is it possible that, while this enormous expenditure is going on, you sit there, and, knowing these things are done, yet dare not ask a question with regard to them?" He had asked the question and the hon. the Premier had told him that this act was an insult to the Governor-General. His motives were not to dispute the great service which the Governor-General had rendered to this country; he believed that all his relations with the country had been of the most friendly, social and hospitable kind, that in the discharge of his duties he had been of great service to Canada and well deserved the thanks of her people. It was not in regard to His Excellency that he made this motion, but in regard to the perpetuation of an expenditure which would be established as a precedent when the next Governor came. He had heard various rumours about certain nobility in connection with the future government of this country when our present respected Governor left us, and he would repeat again that His Excellency had well earned the money that had been spent in connection with his high office, but he did not desire to have an extravagant system established for those Governors-General who perhaps would not earn it. He recognized the great services, the great ability, and the liberal expenditure of his own means, he was told, of the present Governor-General, and wished entirely to disclaim anything of a personal character in his motion. All he wished to do was to put a stop to this extravagant expenditure, which this country, especially in the present depressed state of trade, could not afford. It was the duty of the representatives of the people to put a stop to the enormous expenditure of public money that was going on, and let him tell those gentlemen who looked upon this independent motion of an independent member as an insult, that, though, in 1868, they considered $35,000 was quite sufficient to cover the salary and everything connected with the Governor-General, they now seemed to think $50,000 or $60,000 too little. He did not desire to give figures. He moved his resolution in silence, and had hoped that the hon. the Premier would let it go for what it was worth. But the hon. gentleman had chosen to take another course, and he was welcome to do so. He (Mr. Mitchell) felt that he had only done his duty to the country and his constituents in bringing forward this motion.

MR. TUPPER said he regretted exceedingly that this motion should have been made, and considered it undesirable that such a matter should be discussed in this House, but no person could, for a single moment, question the strict right and propriety of any hon. member of this House making such a motion as the one under consideration. He might say that he had also expressed his regret to his hon. friend (Mr. Mitchell) who had placed the notice on the paper, and had hoped that it would have answered his purpose not to press his notice to a motion. But the motion had been made, and no hon. member on either side could question the strict right and propriety of the hon. member for Northumberland in bringing it before the House, if he found it necessary, in the discharge of his duty and in the public interest, to do so. He (Mr. Tupper) regretted very much that the motion had been made, but he regretted still more that the hon. the First Minister had—he hoped simply in the first blush of the moment—felt it his duty to resist it. He trusted the hon. gentleman would not persist in dividing the House upon this motion. He did not see how it was possible for the First Minister of the Crown and the leader of this Parliament to take the ground publicly before the country that the Government would refuse to permit a motion to pass for investigating the expenditure of public money, however low or high the party might be to whom this expenditure referred. He said simply it was a course the hon. gentleman could not defend in this House, and which he could not defend before the people of this country. He (Mr. Tupper) regretted that the motion had been made, because he felt, in common, he believed, with every member of this House and the great majority of the people, he might almost say the whole, that Canada owed a great debt of obligation to the present Governor-General. Under Lord Dufferin, Canada had enjoyed the privilege of having a Governor more eminently Canadian in his sentiments than perhaps anyone who had filled that high and distinguished office before. He was eminently Canadian, and believed most thoroughly in the future of this great country. He (Mr. Tupper) believed that the information His Excellency had obtained, and the expenditure in connection with his making himself, as he had made himself, at great personal inconvenience, familiar with every section of the country and its resources, and the great and wonderful ability he had exhibited in laying before the people, not of Canada alone, but of the world, the position this country enjoyed, its great resources and the great advantages it possessed, would be of incalculable value to Canada, and it was upon that ground mainly that he regretted the motion had been made. He could not defend it here or elsewhere, but, while he was perfectly prepared to defend the Government in the expenditure they had made with regard to His Excellency's journey in the North-West, he could not support the proposition to vote down the motion. He trusted the hon. the First Minister would feel that he would best discharge the duties of Parliament, and of the high office he occupied, if he did not call for a division upon the question. It was certainly within the province of every member of this Parliament, and of every member of a British Parliament in any part of the world, to bring forward such a motion; and for the hon. the Premier to follow the course he had proposed, would be to lay down a most fatal precedent with regard to the rights and liberties of the people.

MR. HOLTON said he quite agreed with the hon. member for Cumberland

(Mr. Tupper) that no Government had a right to withhold information from the people as to any expenditure of public money, but he (Mr. Holton) understood the hon. the First Minister to say that all the information that could be given in reply to this motion was to be found in the Public Accounts, and he understood the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) to say that he could himself give the House the figures referred to if those figures were called for. This established the fact stated by his hon. friend the First Minister.

MR. MITCHELL: That was not what I said.

MR. HOLTON: I cannot be interrupted. I only wish to point out briefly that, by the hon. member for Northumberland's own showing, the House is already in possession of the information sought by the motion.

MR. MASSON: He did not say so; let him explain it.

MR. HOLTON: No; while I am on my feet I wish to state—

MR. MITCHELL: Then you are misrepresenting what I said.

MR. HOLTON: The hon. gentleman said he could give the figures if he desired.

MR. MITCHELL: I said that I could give the figures from the Public Accounts, but not the figures that I wished to obtain; and that rumour says the expenditure much exceeded the figures in the Accounts.

MR. HOLTON said that the Public Accounts showed the expenditure for this particular service. For that expenditure, the Ministry of the day was responsible to Parliament, and, if details were sought as to the personal expenditure of the Governor-General and his family in regard to these journeys through the country, there was no doubt that those who asked for these details were casting suspicions on the good faith of that high functionary himself.

MR. MITCHELL: Not at all.

MR. HOLTON said he could not but feel that a motion of this kind, made at the present moment, when that distinguished nobleman, whom they all admired so much and recognized as having discharged his high functions with signal ability and impartiality, was on the point of leaving us, was a sort of Parthian arrow which ought not to be shot at him by this House. The acceptance of this motion would be to attack His Excellency the Governor General, as it were, in the rear.

MR. MITCHELL: It is attacking him in front, in my opinion.

MR. HOLTON said that, when His Excellency was on the point of leaving this country, it could not but be ungrateful to His Excellency's feelings—and it was besides, he thought, ungenerous—for the House to pass such a motion. If a motion of this kind, impugning the good faith or in any way attacking this distinguished functionary had been made earlier in his term of office, when he could make and unmake Ministers, there would have been some courage in taking that course; but to do this now, when he had officially announced to them his early departure from the country, was, he (Mr. Holton) might say, an evidence of something he could not characterize as courage. He would not characterize it in any positive way, but simply in a negative manner, and say that it did not come up to his standard of political courage or civic courage. For his part, he was very glad that the hon. the First Minister had taken the stand he had with regard to this motion. It was a motion which was not fit to be made; under all the circumstances of time and place, this was a motion which was not fit to be made; it sought for information already in possession of the House; a full explanation of these items could not be given; and, therefore, he hoped that the House, by an overwhelming majority, would reject it.

AN HON. MEMBER: It is a public question.

MR. HOLTON said he was rather surprised, he confessed, to hear the hon. member for Cumberland intimate his purpose of voting for this resolution. He did hope that the House, by an almost unanimous vote, would pronounce against the attempt which he would not characterize as it deserved, but which, he felt very strongly, was an improper attempt to cast opprobrium upon a distinguished nobleman who had served them so well and faithfully and who was on the point of returning to England and surrendering his high mission to the Gracious Sovereign from whom he had received it.

Mr. MASSON said there was nothing in the expressions made use of by his hon. friend (Mr. Mitchell) in moving this motion which called for a protest against them on the part of the House; if such had been the case, he would have been one of the first to vote against the motion. But nothing of the kind existed. In fact, his hon. friend had said nothing at all that called for any remark, in making his motion; and he quite agreed with his hon. friend on his right (Mr. Tupper) that it was very unfortunate that the hon. the First Minister should have taken the position he had on this subject. He also agreed with his hon. friend from Cumberland in saying he would have preferred the motion not to have been made, but neither he nor they could afford to go to the country and say that, although this was a question with reference to which they had a strict right to make enquiry, they had refused it when his hon. friend (Mr. Mitchell) said that the Public Accounts did not supply all necessary information regarding this matter. He was informed that when His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales made his recent trip to India, a detailed and complete statement of all his expenditure was given to the Parliament of England, and the First Minister there was, he (Mr. Masson) begged to say, as loyal as the First Minister here. He did not suppose that we were going to be more loyal than they were in England. For his part, he must say this: that as a public man in this country, and, moreover, as a French-Canadian, there was no man and no Governor, apart from Lord Elgin, who would leave this country in possession of more sympathy, more good-will, more respect, more love, or more esteem on the part of the French-Canadians than would Lord Dufferin. They had observed the tour which His Excellency had recently made through all their institutions; and they were proud of the position that His Excellency had taken in this connection and the way in which His Excellency had received their tokens of esteem and respect; but here, in this House, they were bound to do their duty. If the thing was to be done over again, he might advise his hon. friend not to bring forward this motion, but it was there before them. An hon. member on his own responsibility had asked for a return, and the hon. the First Minister would have better consulted, in his humble opinion, his duty towards Parliament, had he (Mr. Mackenzie) allowed this motion to pass without any comments, and not obliged hon. members sitting on that side of the House to vote against the opinion the hon. gentleman had given them. He would support the motion of his hon. friend, and he hoped it would be carried. He trusted that they would receive the estimate concerning the expenditure in question, not that he had any doubt as to its correctness, but because he did not wish the precedent to be established that the Parliament of Canada did not possess the same rights as did the Imperial Parliament, when it enquired into every detail of administration, whether it related to the Crown or not. It was well known that, in England, the most searching enquiry had been made into the expenditure of the Royal Household of Her Gracious Majesty the Queen herself. A strict investigation had been made into the expenditure of the Prince of Wales on his trip to India, and he therefore said that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Holton) had done what Talleyrand said a statesman should not do—he had shown trop de zèle, in the present circumstances.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac), said he could only reiterate almost literatim, if it were possible, the remarks that had fallen from his hon. friend the member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson). He considered that the hon. member for Northumberland had only asked in this motion for what the people of Canada should be informed about—as to details; and, although he was not personally conversant with the matter, he accepted the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mitchell) that these details had not been entered into and submitted to the House, as they should have been. The hon. members sitting on that side of the House would not yield to the hon. the First Minister in regard to their loyalty to the Sovereign, or in their appreciation of the great and good work that had been done by His Excellency the Governor-General, in advancing the interests of this country. But, at the same time, if an hon. gentleman rose and asked for information which should be in the possession of the House, and which he had a right to have, the hon. the First Minister should come down and say: Certainly, this information shall be furnished in its entirety. For his part, no matter what expenses were incurred by the country in inducing His Excellency and Lady Dufferin to visit the different portions of the country, he thought the money had been well spent; and that, even if His Excellency expenses had exceeded one-half of the appropriation paid in connection with the Immigration system, he had proved to be the cheapest immigration agent that the people of the Dominion of Canada had ever had. He asserted, in common with his hon. friend the member for Terrebonne, that, if an hon. member and a private member of the House rose in his place and asked for information as to the expenditure of any part of the public money, it should be granted to him.

MR. MACKENZIE said he understood the hon. member for Cumberland to take it for granted that the hon. member for Northumberland had stated that this did not comprise all the expenditure.

MR. TUPPER: Decidedly.

MR. MACKENZIE said if it did not, whatever additional expenditure there was, they were quite willing to give in the same way that this was given; but what the hon. gentleman asked for was the details of this expenditure, and this he could not consent to.

MR. MITCHELL: Allow me to explain what I do mean.

MR. MACKENZIE: Certainly.

MR. MITCHELL said he did not wish to put the hon. the First Minister or himself in a false position. He did not want to obtain the expenditure in detail as to every twopence half penny, but the general items such as any gentleman would put in his bill, and the total, showing what the expenditure was. His hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) had stated that all this information was contained in the Public Accounts; but he would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that it was impossible that the expenditure in connection with the Manitoba trip should be there, because the Public Accounts for that portion of the year were not as yet issued. He desired to obtain information regarding this expenditure, and he was quite willing to accept the proposition of the hon. the First Minister. He did not wish to aggravate or continue the debate. He had thought he would have, in self-defence, to read extracts from speeches delivered in 1873, but he did not desire to do so. He did not wish to prolong the discussion, which was unpleasant both to himself and hon. gentlemen opposite; and, he, therefore, accepted the explanation of his hon. friend. What he wanted to get was the gross cost of the two trips and the general details.

MR. TUPPER said he was quite certain a feeling of great relief would be created by the proposal of the hon. the First Minister to supplement anything that was not contained in the Public Accounts.

MR. MACKENZIE said he could not allow the motion to pass as it stood; it called for details.

MR. MITCHELL: Then I will go ahead.

MR. MACKENZIE said $2,300 were charged for supplies, and the details were asked for; and, by this very fact, doubt was expressed as to this amount having been actually paid.

MR. MITCHELL: I positively disclaim any doubt as to the correctness of the accounts.

MR. MACKENZIE said that to pass a motion of this sort would naturally and inevitably lead to the conclusion that something suspicious was attached to this statement of $17,524. He was quite willing to bring down a statement of the Manitoba expenditure in the same general way in which this was done; but he could not humiliate himself or the personage alluded to by asking for details of every item that had been paid in connection with these accounts. The statement for the British Columbia expenditure was very full, and he would bring down a similar one for the Manitoba expenditure.

MR. MITCHELL: To show how unfairly you have been charging me, I am willing to meet the hon. gentleman half-way, and strike out the words "in detail."

MR. HOLTON: The House should accept the undertaking of the hon. the First Minister to bring down a supplementary statement and the hon. member for Northumberland should withdraw his motion.

MR. MITCHELL: I will do nothing of the kind, Mr. Speaker.

MR. TUPPER said that every day motions were made concerning which it was stated that certain portions were already submitted, and yet the motions were allowed to pass. Whatever was not already before the House could be supplemented, and his hon. friend (Mr. Mitchell) would strike out the words "in detail," the only ones to which the hon. the Premier took exception.

MR. MACKENZIE: Oh, no.

MR. TUPPER: Then the information already before the House will be supplemented.

MR. MACKENZIE: Why ask for information already before the House? If it was simply a motion for the expenditure made on the Manitoba trip, that would be a different thing; but it asks for what is already before the House, unless the details are demanded. It is all here.

MR. MITCHELL: The Manitoba expenditure is not there; and it is quite possible that some of the British Columbia expenditure is not there. If it is not, bring it down in a return and say so.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is not possible. It is all here.

MR. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said he had spoken on the assumption that the whole of the accounts were not there.

He was quite willing to endorse the position of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mitchell) in so far as to say that the House and the country had a right to be informed of, and have, the whole expenditure.

MR. LANGEVIN said, from what had been said, he thought the motion could be so framed as to meet the different views expressed without asking for the details of the accounts that were now in the Public Accounts; but they should have a statement as to any additional expenditure that had been made since the 1st of July last.

MR. MACKENZIE said the motion read: "for a return in detail," etc; and then followed as mere addenda—"Also the expenses of his tour to Manitoba and the North-West, in the year 1877."

MR. MITCHELL: Mere addenda? This forms part of the motion, and the hon. gentleman insults me by drawing such an inference.

MR. MASSON said he thought the hon. the Premier would see that he was stretching his position rather strongly. It very often happened that papers were asked for and the answer was: "You will find such and such a paper among papers that have been brought down." There would be no harm in bringing down again the British Columbia expenditure.

MR. MACKENZIE: Of course there would be.

MR. MASSON said if the hon. gentleman wished to gain a point because he desired it, he (Mr. Mackenzie) might do so; but, if the hon. gentleman wished to meet the House, as he (Mr. Masson) considered the hon. gentleman was in duty bound to do, he (Mr. Mackenzie) should not meet it in that way. It would be simply reasonable to make it read for a return of expenditure made in British Columbia, and, also, for expenditure incurred in the tour to Manitoba and the North-West. His hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie), a reasonable man, would see that this was a reasonable proposition.

MR. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend will see that the items of the British Columbia expenditure are in the hands of every hon. member—every dollar of it.

MR. MASSON: And also the expenditure for the Manitoba trip?

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

MR. MASSON: Then make a general motion for the whole expenditure.

MR. MACKENZIE: What is the use of asking for what is in the hands of every member of the House.

MR. MITCHELL: I have the right to ask for this information or I have not. If I have, the hon. gentleman has no right to refuse it.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he could only join other hon. members in regretting that this motion had been made at all; but, as it had been made, they could not but admit that any hon. member had the right to ask for a return as to the expenditure of any of the public money of the country. While this was the case, the House, at the same time, had the right to consider whether it was proper, under the circumstances, to grant the motion in the terms in which it was asked. He must say that he agreed with the hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who had stated that, under the present circumstances, it was ungenerous, and not only ungenerous but discourteous to ask for a return in detail of that expenditure; and he was very glad, therefore, to hear that the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution had agreed to strike out the words "in detail." They now had before the House the British Columbia expenditure in pretty full detail; and, accordingly, he did not think it necessary for the House to ask for a return to be again given of these expenditures, and, as the hon. the Prime Minister promised that a return of the Manitoba expenditure would be brought down, he thought that the object of his hon. friend (Mr. Mitchell) would be gained. He, therefore, sincerely hoped that, under the circumstances of the case, his hon. friend would withdraw his motion in consideration of the promise made by the hon. the First Minister, and thus remove any semblance of a discourteous motion being made in the House with regard to the exalted personage who so worthily filled the office of Governor-General.

MR. DECOSMOS said that he was one of those who believed in paying public officers large salaries. He thought that, if we so paid our Governors and our Governors-General, we would be benefitted by it; but he did not believe in paying them enormous salaries beyond the ability of a Province or of the Dominion to meet. He also considered that, when a Governor-General or a Governor visited any portion of a Province or of the Dominion, his expenses should be such as were worthy of his position. On the other side of the line, no matter how successful they had been in managing their affairs, generally speaking, they had paid too small salaries to their chief officials, and the consequences of this course were visible. He could make no objection to the respective charges with respect to the Governor-General's trip to British Columbia, but he would, nevertheless, fail to do his duty if he did not present another view, regarding some of the items in question, to the House. It was this: it was, and had been, felt in British Columbia that extortion had been practised on His Excellency the Governor-General, when in that Province. He believed that those who were familiar with the lobby utterances had heard these extortions spoken of. He would cite one or two items:—For special coaches, for instance, $3,000 was charged. Now, these special coaches were only used to move the Vice-regal party 140 or 150 miles. Another item, $850, was set down for the use of a steamboat. In British Columbia, the opinion prevailed that these were extortionate charges, and he, therefore, took it that he was simply doing his duty in asking the Government, on this occasion, to bring down the expenditures with respect to these two matters, because he believed that, not merely the Governor-General's party, but also the people of British Columbia, disclaimed entertaining any feeling of sympathy with any person in their country who would take advantage of the Vice-regal trip to place money in his pocket.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he would suggest that they might very fairly accept the proposition made by his hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). His hon. friend from Northumberland might accept the statement, which was really given in considerable detail in the Public Accounts, as to the British Columbia trip, concerning which, moreover, the hon. gentleman had the assurance of the hon. the Premier that it embraced the full amount then expended; and, accordingly, his hon. friend might alter his motion so as to include the Manitoba expenditure, which would be brought down in the same fashion. This would maintain the principle for which hon. gentlemen opposite were contending; it would give the House all the additional information it could desire to have in this relation, and it would prevent them being placed in the very awkward position of having to demand a minute detail of expenditure which was impossible at this distance of time, he feared, for His Excellency, in any shape or way, to afford. If the motion was amended in that direction the Government had no objection to its passing.

MR. DOMVILLE said he did not believe that the words "in detail" referred to any of the private information to ask for which, it was stated on the other side of the House, would cast a slur upon them. No one wished to know what the Governor-General had done with this money. He regretted very much that the question should have come up, especially at a time when we were governed by so illustrious a gentleman as Lord Dufferin, who had given such eminent satisfaction throughout the country, and who had done everything he could, not only to win the affection of the Canadian people, but also to place Canada in the first rank among the powers on this Continent; but, still, as it had come before the country, they were not to be told by hon. gentlemen opposite: "We will baulk the whole thing, or withdraw the motion." He was sure that His Excellency, if on the floor of the House, would himself say that he courted the fullest investigation, and that he was willing they should obtain the whole account of this expenditure. It was unfair to the hon. member for Cumberland to say that he (Mr. Mitchell) was casting a slur on His Excellency in asking for the details of this expenditure. The words "in detail" were evidently inserted without much thought; and, from what he knew of the hon. gentleman, he (Mr. Mitchell) would be the last man to throw any slur on Lord Dufferin, Her Majesty's representative in this country. On that side of the House they were loyal members; they had no "pull down the flag" there; and they were willing to grant Lord Dufferin any sums of money that were necessary; but they felt, or rather the mover of the resolution felt that, in the future, this country should not be called upon to pay the large sum of money that had been expended in this relation heretofore. Whatever the income was, it should be expended, and nothing else should be voted. If it was necessary that Government House should be repaired, this should be done; but as to this country paying $40,000, $50,000, $60,000, or $70,000 or a larger sum per annum, for expenses incurred by the Governor-General, this was not to be done. The people would not stand it. They all knew this country was in a very poor state when poor creatures had only one meal a day in the backwoods. Were they justified in so spending large sums of money? It was unfair to twit any hon. member with attempting to cast any slur on the representative of Her Majesty, when he was merely doing his duty. He trusted that no indignity would ever be offered any representative of the Crown from that side of the House.

MR. HOLTON: I beg to move fin amendment that all the words after "that" be struck out.

MR. BLANCHET: I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman has spoken.

MR. DEVLIN: How many times have you gentlemen spoken? You have spoken half-a-dozen times.

MR. BLANCHET: I have not spoken once.

MR. HOLTON: No doubt the point taken is a good one.

MR. BLANCHET: You have taken it before a great many times.

MR. HOLTON: It is a good point, but it is a very small one.

MR. BLANCHET: I am sorry to tell my hon. friend I regret that it took such a small point to put him down.

MR. BOWELL said the hon. member for Chateauguay should be the last man in the House to accuse any other member of taking small points of order. If his recollection served him aright, no hon. member had availed himself of the rules to so put down other hon. gentlemen more than the hon. gentleman (Mr. Holton). He had no desire to prolong this very unpleasant discussion. He could assure the House that, when he had consented to second the motion, he had not the remotest idea that it would be accepted in the manner it had been, and certainly, had he supposed, for a moment, that it would have been received as a reflection on the eminent personage, who was now Governor of this Dominion, he would have refused to do so; but he remembered, very well, when questions of this kind used to be brought before the House by the hon. gentlemen who now occupied seats on the Treasury benches—then in Opposition—it was not at that time considered indecorous and insulting to the representative of Her Majesty here to comment and comment very freely on the expenditures that were incurred in keeping up Rideau Hall. They had on record motions made by the very hon. gentleman who had taken such a high stand just now, against paying the representative of Her Majesty here the salary His Excellency now received. Had the hon. gentleman (Mr. Holton) forgotten the language he used towards Her Majesty's representative in this country not many years ago, and, also, with reference to the eminent personage who at present represented Royalty in this country? He would read a few expressions which were then uttered by the hon. member for Chateauguay, and contrast them with the language which the hon. gentleman had that evening used; and he (Mr. Bowell) thought that this afforded a very fair representation of the Government in office and the Government out of office. The House would bear in mind that a memorial had been presented to His Excellency, demanding that he should not act in accord with the advice given him by his then Ministers; and, because His Excellency, at that time, refused to act unconstitutionally, the hon. member for Chateauguay said:

"The practical result was that, in the reply, this memorial had been scorned by the representative of the Crown. The worst public insult had thus been put upon the Parliament by the Governor-General, acting on the advice of men who were themselves under impeachment for crimes which almost amounted to treason."

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. BOWELL said he would not discuss the point whether the fact that certain charges had been made, which the hon. member who made them did not—he would not say, dare not—appear to sustain before the Judges, was true or not; what he did say was this: that to contrast the language then used with the language used that night, certainly illustrated what he had just stated. The hon. the Minister of Justice, who was not very choice either in his language, on that occasion said:

"As for himself he had simply to say, as a Frenchman, that his blood fairly got up at the outrage and insult which had been perpetrated on the people and their representatives."

There were plenty of similar extracts, which he could give, to show the difference, between the views held by hon. gentlemen opposite when in and out of office. He would repeat that, had he supposed for a moment that this motion would have been received in the spirit it had been, and could by any possibility be construed into an insult on Her Majesty's representative in this country, he would have been the last person to second it; but it asked for information which the House and country had a right to receive, and, upon that ground, he did not hesitate to second it. He thought that the words "in detail" might well be struck out. The British Columbia expenditure was given with as much detail as he thought this or any Ministry would lay before the House; but there could be no possible objection to the motion remaining in its present shape.

It was true that the British Columbia expenditure was there upon record; but how often were special motions made in the House in order to have a full statement of certain expenses which might have been incurred in the public service laid before the House, so as to save the House the trouble of looking through every document to find them.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said that, in order to solve the difficulty, he would move in amendment, that all the words after "return" be struck out, and that the following words be inserted:—"Of the expenses of the journeys of His Excellency the Governor-General and suite to Manitoba, and the North-West, for the year 1877, not included in the Public Accounts of 1876-77."

Mr. HOLTON said he was exceedingly obliged to his hon. friend (Mr. Pope) for giving him the opportunity of making the motion in amendment, which he had proposed to offer a few minutes previously. He would not offer any observations with respect to the debates of 1873 or 1868, which he had been invited by his hon. friend opposite to enter into.

Mr. MITCHELL: You had better go into them.

Mr. HOLTON said that every man must be the best judge of his own course; and he did not think it then necessary to go into those debates; and he would not do so even on the very fascinating invitation of his hon. friend from Northumberland. He would move in amendment to the proposed amendment:

"That all the words after the word 'Return' be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—"Of the expenses of the trip of His Excellency the Governor-General to Manitoba, similar to that contained in the Public Accounts with respect to His Excellency's trip to British Columbia, be laid before the House."

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: That is not an amendment. It is the same as the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Compton.

Mr. HOLTON: It is similar, but not the same.

Mr. MASSON said he did not think that this amendment was in order; but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Holton)—he was very sorry to have to say so—wanted to have his own way.

Mr. SPEAKER: My impression is that the amendment to the amendment is in order. While one asks for a return concerning the expenses incurred by His Excellency the Governor-General, it does not attempt to define the way in which this return is to be made; and the other amends it by defining the form in which the return shall be made.

Mr. TUPPER said he was gratified the House had come to a common agreement on the course to be pursued, and it was of little consequence whether the amendment of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) or that of the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) was adopted. The House, in both amendments, affirmed precisely the same thing. He expressed the general regret of hon. members that the hon. the First Minister found it necessary to impugn the motives of the hon. member for Northumberland in submitting the motion. Had it been suggested that it would have been well to submit the details, as the hon. the First Minister had supplied all the information with respect to British Columbia, the present very unpleasant and unfortunate debate would have been avoided. He desired, however, to direct the attention of the hon. the Premier to the exception he took to the motion on the ground that the information was before the House, and to show that, when he (Mr. Tupper) drew the attention of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) to the fact that all the information asked for was contained in the Public Accounts, the hon. the First Minister did not think it necessary to state that the motion should not pass. He was glad, however, that, after that somewhat unfortunate discussion, hon. members on both sides of the House had come to the same conclusion, and the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) would be quite prepared to withdraw his amendment in order to allow that of the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), which affirmed the same proposition, to be adopted.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was surprised at the statement made by an hon. member in regard to what he (Mr. Mackenzie) had said to the House. He declared in his first speech that the information was contained in the Public Accounts. He did not impute motives to any hon. member, but stated that asking for any further details impugned the motives or accuracy of those persons who kept the accounts and was an insult to the party interested in the accounts. Some hon. members had stated that, when His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales returned home after his visit to India, his accounts were sharply looked after by the House of Commons.

MR. MASSON: And a statement was given.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had the report of the debate at hand, and he would read what was said at that time. The remarks offered were as follows:

"Mr. C. B. Denison asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he can inform the House whether accounts have been rendered of the expenditure of £60,000, granted in aid of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales' journey in India, and whether any further vote is likely to be asked for?"

"The Chancellor of the Exchequer: Yes, Sir, very full accounts have been sent in to me of the expenditure incurred by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales during his recent visit to India. I may say, in passing, that the way in which those accounts have been prepared reflects very great credit on Sir Bartle Frere, Colonel Ellis and others who have been employed in the keeping of the accounts, and show that great economy was exercised throughout that expedition. The accounts have been very carefully audited by Sir William Anderson, and I have gone through them with him. There still remains a small number of outstanding bills to be provided for, but there is a sum of money unexpended, more than sufficient to cover those bills. There certainly will be no occasion for any supplementary vote. On the contrary, there will be a small surplus of, perhaps, a few hundred pounds left over when the accounts have been finally settled. I think I shall be only expressing the feeling of the House when I say that we ought not to ask His Royal Highness to repay that small surplus into the Exchequer. It may very fairly be left in the hands of His Royal Highness, considering that he expended his own money in the purchase of works of art and specimens of Indian manufacture, which are being exhibited at the South Kensington Museum. I think, Sir, the whole account reflects great credit upon all concerned."

MR. TUPPER.

No demand was there made for accounts, and no statement of details was laid before the House. When Sir Charles Dilke made his famous motion, in 1872, for returns showing the amount charged in the Estimates since the commencement of the present reign, for various purposes; also showing, for each year since the accession of Her Majesty, the gross amount of revenue derived from the Duchy of Lancaster, the Prime Minister at the time immediately took objection to the motion. After giving reasons why no such returns should be asked for by the House, that hon. gentleman stated that, under all the circumstances, he felt bound to oppose the motion, and to ask the House to vote down the motion for those detailed returns. The motion was voted down, only the mover and seconder in a House of about 300 members voting for it. That was precisely a similar case to the present one.

MR. MASSON said the hon. the First Minister had stated in his remarks that a very full statement of the expenditure of the Prince of Wales had been given.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had stated that no accounts had been asked for, and that they had simply been audited.

MR. MASSON: And a very full statement of them given?

MR. MACKENZIE: Neither given nor asked by the House of Commons.

MR. MITCHELL said he was surprised at the position taken by the hon. the Premier in that discussion which hon. members had designated as a painful one. The hon. the First Minister had declared that the motions submitted by the hon. member for Compton and the hon. member for Chateauguay were substantially what he had assented to in the insulting remarks addressed by the hon. gentleman to him. That statement was incorrect, and what the hon. Premier said was that all the information asked was contained in the Public Accounts.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is true.

MR. MITCHELL said the hon. gentleman had been compelled to admit the fact that the expenses to Manitoba were not included in the Public Accounts.

He (Mr. Mitchell) had already stated that, in submitting his motion, he had no personal feelings against His Excellency, and he did not desire to aggravate the debate which had been already too unpleasant. He did not, however, consider that the accounts for the Manitoba trip were all that the House had a right to expect, and that thousands of dollars had been expended of which they had no right to ask for details. The hon. the Premier should withdraw the insulting language used towards him (Mr. Mitchell) when he had a right to submit the motion, and, in doing so, disavowed the intention of insulting the representative of Her Majesty. While they were not furnished with such details of the expenditures as they would wish, and he was not placed in a position to deny the statements he had repeatedly heard in connection with the British Columbia trip, he would accept the amendment of the hon. member for Chateauguay rather than prolong the discussion; but he placed on the Government the responsibility of having refused to furnish particulars in the Public Accounts of expenditures which had grown to enormous proportions. Hon. gentlemen opposite might consider the debate a triumph, but he was satisfied with the result, and public opinion would be aroused to the fact that expenditures were made, of which the people knew little, which must cease, and, when the time of trial before the public tribunal of the people arrived, the responsibility connected with those expenditures would rest on the Government and their supporters, and not on those who had endeavoured to obtain information respecting them, which hon. gentlemen opposite had refused to give, although the House was perfectly entitled to obtain it. With these remarks, he would leave the matter with the House, feeling satisfied that, whatever might be the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite, the public opinion of the country would declare that the member for Northumberland, notwithstanding the slanders of the hon. the First Minister, had done his duty.

MR. POPE (Compton) said that an examination of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Cha-teauguay revealed the fact that it was identical with his own, and, if there were laurels to be gained, he was willing they should be carried away by that hon. member. At the same time, he desired the House and the country to understand that he held the doctrine, that, however high might be the personage who expended the public money, Parliament had the right to inquire into that expenditure. He entered his protest against the statement made by the hon. the First Minister, that the House had not the right, under all circumstances, to make such an investigation.

MR. PLUMB said he was surprised at the tone in which the hon. the Premier had met the resolution brought forward by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), and the manner in which he had endeavoured to stifle the enquiry. The comparison instituted by the hon. Minister between the present motion and that made by Sir Charles Dilke in the British House of Commons, was almost an additional insult to the method by which he had endeavoured to prevent perfectly proper inquiry. Any attempt to prevent the submission to the House of details of expenditures of the public money, no matter in what direction, was an act that no hon. member in his calmer moments would approve or would uphold before the people. Every hon. member, except one or two, who had been foremost in bringing about the present position of matters and in stifling enquiry, would endorse that statement, while they felt the highest respect for the exalted personage whose name had been handled so freely in the course of the debate. It was unnecessary that any hon. gentleman should apologize for speaking upon the question, and state that he entertained the highest respect for the exalted personage whose name had been brought in question in connection with the expenditures. They had the same right to speak of the acts of the Governor-General as of those of the Government; and they were, moreover, justified in declaring that the whole debate was due to the manner which the hon. the First Minister chose to adopt towards the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), and from which his friends knew the amendment of the hon. member for Chateauguay would not extricate him. The Opposition were perfectly willing, under the circumstances, to accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for Chateauguay, although it scarcely differed from that proposed by the hon. member for Compton. He regretted the discussion which had taken place, but it was somewhat satisfactory that it had taken its present turn, because the difference between the professions and practices of the present Government became daily more manifest.

MR. DEWDNEY said he concurred with hon. members in the expression of regret that the motion had been brought before the House. He did not propose to enter into the debate, except to answer a few remarks made by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos). The hon. member had referred to two items of expenditure in British Columbia,—$3,000 for coach hire, and $900 for steamboat expenses. He (Mr. Dewdney) was, to a certain extent, responsible for the first item. When His Excellency arrived at Victoria, he (Mr. Dewdney) came down from the upper country in order to see what he could do to afford information, as he understood His Excellency intended to travel through a portion of his district. He was then informed that it was proposed to take the Victoria coaches and drive through the interior. He told His Excellency's aide-de-camp that that would be found impossible, as the only means of travelling through their mountainous country was in through brace coaches, with strong and safe brakes. And it was after that conversation an arrangement was made with the Stage Company to carry the Governor-General through the country. The items, no doubt, appeared large, but, if hon. members knew the inconvenience that must have been caused to the Stage Company running a regular line and carrying the mails over 500 miles, they would understand that such an undertaking necessarily involved a large cost. It was under those circumstances that what might appear to be a heavy charge was made. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr.

MR. PLUMB.

DeCosmos) had no right to use the word "extortion," and it did not lie in the hon. gentleman's mouth to make such a charge. A reference to events of a few months previous would reveal the fact that he had been guilty of extortion in obtaining from the Government $600 for a loan which he said he had negotiated for it. Not only did the hon. member extort $600—

MR. SPEAKER: That is unparliamentary.

MR. DEWDNEY: Not only did he receive from the Local Government of British Columbia $600, but with the connivance of his own late colleagues.

MR. SPEAKER said the remarks of the hon. member were entirely irregular.

MR. DEWDNEY said he was only showing that it did not lay on the lips of the hon. member to make a charge of extortion.

MR. SPEAKER said the matter could not be brought up in that way.

MR. DEWDNEY said the hon. member had attacked a personal friend of his who was unable to defend himself, and he wished to show what weight should be attached to the utterances of this hon. gentleman. He was prepared to give the House the details with regard to the other item for the steamer Royal City. The steamer was chartered at a reasonable figure per diem; indeed, at no greater cost than the steamer was chartered at every day when required for service. It was on account of the delay of His Excellency's party while in the upper country, that the amount reached such a sum.

MR. DECOSMOS said that, as the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Dewdney) had taken occasion to call in question an utterance of his and make a personal charge against him of indulging in extortion, he considered it his duty to offer an explanation to the House.

MR. DEWDNEY said that, if the hon. member was allowed to make an explanation, he would ask to be allowed to give the matter in detail, to make his story good.

MR. SPEAKER said that, if he permitted the hon. member for Victoria to offer an explanation, the hon. member for Yale would have the opportunity of replying. He had prevented the hon. member from proceeding so soon as he observed the drift of his observations.

MR. DECOSMOS said that, as an insulting charge had been deliberately made against him by the hon. member for Yale, common justice demanded that he should be allowed to offer some justification of his conduct.

MR. SPEAKER said he did not allow the hon. member for Yale to produce evidence, and it would be well if the hon. member for Victoria did not claim the right to enter into any justification.

MR. DECOSMOS said that, in order to meet the views of Mr. Speaker, he would put in a simple denial, and, as between the words of the hon. gentleman and himself, his would be preferred. With respect to the defence entered by the hon. member for Yale against his remarks regarding the exorbitant charge of $3,000 for coach hire and $900 for a steamer between Savona's Ferry and Kamloops, the hon. member had stated that the coaches were used for 500 miles. He (Mr. DeCosmos) denied that they could have been used that distance, for it was only 140 or 150 miles from Yale to Savona's Ferry, and, beyond that, a steamer was taken. That was the information they had in Victoria, and he believed the correspondent of the Toronto Globe would confirm its accuracy. That was only one of a number of charges which appeared in the Blue-books, made against the Government of the Dominion, in 1875-6, by the personal and political friends of the hon. member for Yale, amounting to $83,497. It was quite natural for the hon. gentleman to be engaged in defending contractors.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) said it was very unfortunate that this lengthened and somewhat angry discussion had taken place on a subject respecting which the House and the country had good cause to congratulate themselves—namely, the visits of the Governor-General to the distant Provinces. He believed that, had the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) been in those parts of the country during the visits of His Excellency, the present motion would not have been made. If ten times the amount had been expended, it would have been amply repaid. The visit of the Governor-General to the North-West would do more to settle that country than a whole army of emigration agents sent to the other side of the Atlantic. With regard to the expenses incurred, whatever might be the extravagant charges made elsewhere, of which the hon. member from British Columbia (Mr. DeCosmos) had complained the Government could have no hesitation in bringing down the statements of expenditure in Manitoba, as of course they would do, and he was quite confident they would be found moderate in the extreme. Having seen somewhat of the management of the expenditure of the Governor-General in that Province, he believed that the very greatest care was exercised that no payment that was not absolutely necessary for the proper progress of His Excellency through the country was made. With respect to the parting speech made by the Governor-General in Manitoba, picturing in such eloquent terms the resources and great future of the North-West, a friend, who happened to be on the other side of the Atlantic last autumn, and who was in a position to meet a great many business men in London and on the Exchange, told him (Mr. Smith) it was no unusual circumstance to see gentlemen take out of their pockets a copy of that speech, and make further enquiries about the North-West, of which they had heretofore heard so little, but which they felt must be an admirable country for the emigrant, when so spoken of by the Governor-General of Canada, and doubtless deserved all that had been said about it by His Excellency.

Motion, as amended, agreed to, as follows:—

“That an Order of the House do issue to the proper officer for a return of the expenses of the trip of His Excellency the Governor-General to Manitoba, similar to that contained in the Public Accounts, with respect to His Excellency's trip to British Columbia, be laid before the House.”

PRAYERS.

THE CASE OF JUDGE LORANGER.

EXPLANATIONS AND REMARKS.

MR. SPEAKER said that a communication had been addressed by the Hon. the First Minister to Mr. E. U. Piché, Assistant Clerk, who was alleged to be the author of a letter that had appeared in the Minerve, and Mr. Piché had sent a letter in reply.

MR. MASSON said that the first letter in question was not before the House, as it had not appeared in the Journals of the House. If the reply of Mr. Piché was to appear on the Journals, so should the letter which provoked it.

MR. HOLTON said that, if the hon. gentleman wanted to place the letter in question in any way on the records of the House, it was for him to take the proper steps to effect such a purpose. Meanwhile, he did not think it was exactly in accordance with the fitness of things that the hon. gentleman should seek to intercept the correspondence that had ensued in consequence of the statement which he (Mr. Masson) himself had made in bringing this matter before the House.

MR. MASSON said that he was not trying, nor did he desire, to intercept anything. He only wished that action should be taken in accordance with the rule of Parliament, which required that every paper read before the House, relating to any person in the House, must or should be laid on the table of the House. It was for the hon. gentleman opposite to ask that the letter should be so placed before the House. This had not been done.

MR. HOLTON: It was for you to deposit it.

MR. MASSON said not at all. He had had no occasion to do so. He had only desired an explanation. He contended that, there being no paper before the House in this relation, no subsequent action could be taken before the House relative to a fact which was not really before it.

MR. HOLTON: But it is before it.

MR. MASSON said the hon. gentleman might carry his point; but he did not think this could be done on good grounds. He contended that everything Mr. Speaker read from that Chair must be laid on the table and appear in the Journals of the House. It was impossible for Mr. Speaker to take cognizance of anything, in his capacity as Speaker, which was not on the Journals of the House; and this would not be admitted in England. He felt confident that he was right; but he had not the slightest objection to the paper being read.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he would suggest that, as the first letter was read by a private member, and was not on the Journals of the House, the reply should be read by the hon. the First Minister. This would avoid the necessity of inserting this reply in the Journals, under the then circumstances.

MR. MACKENZIE said the position of the matter was this: A letter had been received by the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) purporting to have been written by the Assistant Clerk of the House, and the hon. gentleman had directly interpellated him to know what he proposed to do.

MR. MASSON: The leader of the Opposition did so.

MR. MACKENZIE: Some one, at all events, did so; and I said the most natural course to be pursued was to give the person accused an opportunity to make an explanation to the House.

MR. MASSON: I beg your pardon — to yourself.

MR. MACKENZIE said that was the same thing. He (Mr. Mackenzie) thought he was capable of stating his own case and of making an explanation. It was to be made to himself, as leader of the House, if at all, and therefore to the House by natural implication. It was not for himself that he was to ask an explanation from the official in question. As leader of the House, he had addressed a letter to Mr. Piché, calling his attention to this matter, but at the time he had been under a misapprehension. He had supposed that Mr. Piché had been appointed Assistant Clerk by the Crown; but he found, however, on examination, that this was not the case, as Mr. Piché was an officer of the House, appointed by Mr. Speaker, though both the Clerk and the Deputy Clerk were appointed by commission from the Crown. He had then desired Mr. Piché to address his explanation to Mr. Speaker, to whom he (Mr. Piché) was naturally responsible, although he (Mr. Mackenzie) was still bound, as leader of the House, to take cognizance of any irregularity and confer with Mr. Speaker about it. Mr. Speaker produced the explanation which that gentleman had made; but he did not know what it was. He had not seen it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Masson) knew very well how he could have the first letter entered on the Journals of the House, if he so desired it.

MR. MASSON said he did not object to the paper being read. He did not know what this paper contained; he only maintained that the correspondence should not be referred to by Mr. Speaker until it was properly before the House.

MR. SPEAKER said he had a word or two to say on the subject. He had meant in the first place to ask the House whether they wished this matter to appear on the Journals or not. His own impression, he confessed, was that there was no necessity for this unless the hon. member wished to take further proceedings regarding it. This matter affected an officer of the House, but it was of no great public importance, unless so rendered by something that would occur or be developed hereafter. In possession of the explanation, the House should determine what was to be done in the matter.

The Assistant Clerks read the following communication to the House in English and French:—

“OTTAWA, 25th February, 1878.

“To the Honorable Timothy Warren Anglin, Speaker of the House of Commons.

“SIR,—I have the honour to lay before you, in accordance with the instructions of the Honourable the Prime Minister, the letter under date of 22nd February, 1878, with which he honoured me, together with my reply to that letter.

“I have the honour to be, Sir,

“Your obedient humble servant,

(Signed) “E. U. PICHE.

“Clerk-Assistant, House of Commons.”

“OTTAWA, 25th February, 1878.

“The Hon. A. Mackenzie,
Prime Minister, &c., &c.

“SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter dated 22nd inst., received by me in the afternoon of the 23rd, and which is in the following terms:—

“‘Office of the Minister of Public Works, Canada.

“‘OTTAWA, February 22nd, 1878.

“‘SIR,—I beg to call your attention to a letter with the initials “E. U. P.” (the words “Chambre des Communes, E. U. Piché” being inscribed in the address,) said to have been written by you to J. B. Brousseau, Esq., Advocate, Sorel, and published in the Minerve of the 18th February, 1876, respecting the proceedings taken against Judge Loranger before the House of Commons during last Session.

“‘I will be glad to know from yourself whether the letter in question was written by you, and if so, whether you desire to offer any explanation which I can communicate to the House.

“‘I have the honour to be, Sir,

“‘Your obedient servant,

“‘(Signed) A. MACKENZIE.

“‘E. U. Piché, Esq.,

“‘Clerk-Assistant, House of Commons.’

“In reply to that invitation, I venture, Sir, to offer the following remarks.—

“To the first question I have to reply, that it is impossible for me to recognise the pretended letter in question, unless the original is shown me.

“It dates back to the 13th March, 1876, nearly two years since; and, as I have written more than one letter to Mr. Advocate Brousseau, I should have had to learn it by heart, in order now to be able to bring it back to my mind.

“In it, however, mention is made of certain facts, of which I still retain a recollection, but this is not sufficient to enable me to identify it.

“There is one thing which surprises me, (if it is written by me) and that is that the word “confidentially” which I invariably put at the head of all of my letters of any importance, in order to make its private character doubly inviolate,—is not to be found in it.

“This, my first answer would excuse me from giving any other, for, if I perfectly understand your letter, Honourable Sir, you express a desire to have an explanation from me, only in case I should acknowledge the letter in question as my own production.

“But I am so happy to have the opportunity which you have had the kindness to offer me, that I shall take advantage of it, not to obey an order, for you do not give me one, but in order to fulfil, spontaneously and freely, a duty, which his honour imposes on every gentleman, even though he may be only suspected of being the cause (involuntary) of mischief worked out by others, and is only the victim of a publication at the very least unlawful, and for which he could not in any case be held responsible.

"I ought, at first, to explain that several of my communications with Mr. Brousseau,—very lengthy on account of details on points of law and procedure,—were almost always written, I will not say in haste, but rather like lightning (comme à la vapeur) without my being able to revise them, and not remembering at the end what I had written at the beginning or even in the middle.

"Consequently there crept into those communications many imperfections of language, and more than once my idea and my wish were greatly misrepresented.

"And it, in truth, the letter which is attributed to me contains all the long, incoherent, and even contradictory expressions, which have been read from it, it is the best proof of what I have just advanced.

"However, to the impartial reader this long letter, when it is first analyzed and then considered as a whole, may be reduced, so far as the Honourable Mr. Blake is concerned, to saying 'he had his own secret about it.'

"These words, which are there to speak for themselves, assuredly do not mean to imply that he had revealed his secret or his thoughts on the subject to any one.

"Moreover, I was writing to a colleague and friend who, in frank and unrestrained converse, had too thoroughly learned what I thought and knew of the Hon. Mr. Blake and of his character, not to attribute to an unfortunate slip of the pen, in extreme haste, a word, a phrase, of a nature to cast the slightest doubt on his impartiality and his honour.

"As regards the Hon. Mr. Laflamme, who, it must be remembered, was not a Minister at the date attributed to the letter in question, we had been acquainted from the very outset of our professional career, and the familiarity, nay, the intimacy of our relations, during many years was, in my humble opinion, sufficient to justify the unrestrained freedom of my language in a private letter, a friendly chat, which never should and never could, except by a shameful profanation, get beyond the friend to whom it was addressed. But it is my duty to add that, if I ever complained of his absence, I never intended to allude to his attendance in the House, or to the discharge of his parliamentary duties; and, in relation to the proceedings in Parliament against Judge Loranger, I heard him say:—'That he did not like to take it up or to meddle with it, because Judge Loranger had been one of his patrons in law.'

"Finally, in order that this explanation may not run on to an excessive length, and convinced as I am that, if it be a good thing never to commit a fault, it is still nobler to make an honourable reparation; permit me in conclusion to say that, whether the letter in question be or be not mine, and if it contains one word or sentence implying the idea that the Hon. Mr. Blake or the Hon. Mr. Laflamme have ever, in any manner in relation to Judge Loranger, done or said anything whatsoever derogatory to honour or to duty, I hereby repudiate and disown every such sentence, every such word, as not having been, as not having been possible to be, and not being, the expression of my thought, of my will, or of the truth.

"The whole humbly and respectfully submitted.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your obedient humble servant,

(Signed), "E. U. PICHÉ,

"Clerk-Assistant,
"House of Commons of Canada."

MR. TUPPER said that, when this matter was first brought under the notice of the House, the hon. the First Minister had stated to the House that they would see the propriety of no step being taken until he, as leader of the House, had had the opportunity of placing himself in communication with the party inculpated who was not in a position to defend himself or offer an explanation on the floor of the House; and that he (Mr. Mackenzie) would then inform the House what course he proposed to take. He would now like to enquire what was so proposed. He was quite certain he need not say it was impossible that this matter could rest where it now stood. The letter which had been just read did not pretend to deny the genuineness of the letter that had been read to the House in the first instance. In the latter letter an hon. gentleman who held at the time the very highest and most important position in the House—that of Minister of Justice, was thus referred to:—

"But he has your requisition (not as Minister of Justice but as the political friend of those who showed it to him) he appears struck with it, and has regretted that all these details were not put in the first requisition presented him."

It was impossible,—having reference to the very high position the hon. members mentioned in this letter held, who were referred to there in terms utterly inconsistent with anything like due regard for their own self-respect, or the respect due to this Parliament,—that the explanation which had been offered could be accepted as any justification. He would like to ask the hon. the First Minister what steps he proposed to take? He took it for granted that measures would be adopted to put so important a matter as this on the Journals of the House, and that the Government would take such means as were in their power to obtain the original of which the letter in question purported to be a copy, and of which it was not denied, or pretended to be denied, that it was a copy. There was abundant admission in the statement just read to the House to show that there was too good reason to believe that letter which had been read was a copy verbatim et literatim of the letter in question.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he thought that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) was a little precipitate in asking this question. The letter in explanation had only just been read; he had had no opportunity of seeing it before, as he had already mentioned.

Mr. TUPPER said that he was not in the House at the time. If he had heard the statement, he would have, at once, felt the propriety of allowing the hon. gentleman time to consider the paper which had been read to the House, before making any such statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is this matter to be entered on the Journals of the House?

Mr. MASSON: I think it should be. The letter that provoked the answer and the reply should appear there.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Of course, if one part is inserted there, the other also should be; but I question the propriety exceedingly of putting it on the Journals.

Mr. MASSON said the hon. gentleman might be right. Of course, he had no objection to such a course being taken, if the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Blake), and the hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lafamme) had no such objection. He, personally, did not desire it to go on the Journals of the House. He would simply remark that the whole thing was not so much an accusation against the Assistant Clerk as a direct accusation from this Clerk against the hon. member for South Bruce especially. There was no equivogue in the letter in question; and Mr. Piché said therein that the ex-Minister of Justice had a certain petition in his hands, not as Minister of Justice, but as a political friend. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) was willing that this matter should not be placed on the Journals of the House he was quite willing that this course should be pursued.

Mr. SPEAKER said that the matter had better be left over for two or three days for consideration.

PAYMENTS FOR PRINTING CONTINGENCIES IN 1873.

MOTION TO REFER RETURNS.

Mr. DYMOND moved that a return to the order of the House for copies of the accounts, vouchers and papers connected with the payments for printing, as entered in the Public Accounts for 1873-74, as made out of the contingencies of the Department of Justice, to I. B. Taylor, the Citizen Printing Company, and J. G. Moylan, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts. He said that the return came down on the previous evening, and he thought hon. gentlemen would agree that as it was a matter of account it had better go straight to the Committee.

Mr. HOLTON said it was usual to refer these returns to the Committee. There was no notice, and it was not usual to give notice, but to refer these returns from the Departments to the Committee.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said that notice of motion ought to have been given. If any motion of that kind had been made from his side of the House, it would have been met with an objection.

Several Hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said no hon. member knew better than the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) that the rules of the House ought to have been observed. He did not know what the returns were, but he thought the rules of the House ought to have been complied with and notice given.

MR. HOLTON said he would only remark that it was very much the custom of this House to refer matters brought down in reply to Addresses that were in relation to accounts, to that Committee, and to do it in the manner proposed by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond). It was the usual practice, and no harm could come from it, not could any one complain that he had been taken by surprise. The Address was moved for these papers last Session, he believed.

MR. DYMOND: At the commencement of this Session.

MR. HOLTON said the papers were moved for, as he was informed, at the commencement of the Session, and they were brought down last night, and it was now proposed to refer them to the appropriate Committee. The same thing was done every day. Of course, it was quite in order to insist upon a notice being given, but cui bono insisting upon a notice in the present case? They had had experience of lengthy debates springing up on notices of motion, to the great hindrance, he thought, of the business of the House. These returns would go to the Committee, who would enquire into their merits as to whether there was anything in them worthy of being brought to the notice of the House, and if such should prove to be the case, it would appear on the report of the Committee. He thought that in the interests of public business this course should be allowed. He quite admitted that, if the hon. the member for Frontenac insisted on the rigour of the law, he could say those returns should not go to the Committee unless notice was given; and when that notice was reached in regular order it would perhaps be the end of the Session.

MR. PLUMB did not see why they should depart from the rule of the House on this particular occasion. As long as it continued to be a rule he thought it should be observed, and no man was a greater stickler for the rules of the House than the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton).

MR. KIRKPATRICK.

MR. DYMOND said his motive in making the motion now was not to take the House by surprise, but to take the course which appeared most just towards those whose conduct or acts might be impugned in the return brought down. He felt sure that the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), after the appeal of the hon. the member for Chateauguay, would have yielded, and he hoped his hon. friend from Niagara would yield too. He did not wish to say one word to provoke debate. It was now a matter of public property, inasmuch as the returns had been laid upon the table of the House, but as an act of simple justice the sooner it went before the Committee and the less said about it before it went there the better. He appealed to both hon. gentlemen simply on these grounds.

MR. PLUMB: I shall not withdraw the objection. If the hon. gentleman wishes to provoke debate, he can do so.

MR. BOWELL said there must be some reason for adopting this unusual course. A report was brought down and laid on the table one day, and reference to Public Accounts Committee was now sought to be made.

MR. HOLTON said the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee had moved a reference of a statement in manuscript to that Committee the previous evening, just as this was made now. This related to the Public Accounts too. Probably hon. gentlemen on the other side did not wish the subject-matter of those returns to be considered, and it would be for the House and the country to judge whether, by insisting in this unusual way upon the rigour of Parliament, they would not a little rather the subject-matter itself did not engage the attention of the Committee.

MR. ROWELL said the hon. gentleman brought forward the same argument on the previous evening when he wished to gain his point.

Several Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. BOWELL said he knew nothing of the contents of that return, nor did he know what the hon. gentleman had in view in taking the course adopted by him. The case referred to by the hon. gentleman was not analogous.

MR. SPEAKER said that, as an objection had been made, the motion could not be allowed.

MR. DYMOND said he should place the notice of motion on the paper.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 25) To regulate the sale and disposal of bottles used in the manufacture of mineral water and other drinks.—(Mr. Macdonald, Centre Toronto.)

Bill (No. 26) Respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Mitchell.)

Bill (No. 27) Respecting the Northern Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Cook.)

Bill (No. 28) To revive and amend the Act incorporating the Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Scrier.)

Bill (No. 29) To authorize and provide for the winding-up of the Canada Agricultural Insurance Company.—(Mr. Kerr.)

OFFICIAL REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

REMARKS.

MR. POULIOT said, before the Orders of the day were called, he wished to direct the attention of the House to the fact that it had been arranged with the contractor for the Official Report of the Debates that speeches were to be reported in the language in which they were spoken, and then translated by the official translators of the House according as they were required. He had spoken in French the previous night, and had expected to have had his speech reported in French, but had received an English report. He had no fault to find with the report. The gentleman who had made it showed great ability, and had given the complete sense of what he had said, but not the spirit. A speech necessarily lost in spirit in the translation, especially under such circumstances, and he thought the French-speaking members were entitled to have their speeches reported in that language. He was aware that there were French-Canadian reporters fully competent to do the work, and he trusted the Committee would take this want into consideration, and see that it was supplied.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said the hon. member had the privilege of revising his speech in manuscript, and of supplying any omission, and if he could put in the spirit he might do so.

MR. HOLTON said the hon. member for West Middlesex had not caught the precise point of his hon. friend's complaint. The hon. gentleman had stated that arrangements had been made stipulating that speeches should be reported in the language in which they were delivered. His speech had been delivered in French, and had been reported in English, and the English version of the speech submitted to him for revision. This was the ground of his complaint, which he (Mr. Holton) considered a very reasonable one. The point was that French speakers should have French reporters to take down their speeches as they were delivered, and then they would be translated into English by competent translators. That was the understanding, the violation of which the hon. gentleman complained of.

MR. POULIOT said the next time the hon. member for West Middlesex spoke, he would have his speech taken down in French and give him the manuscript in that language to revise.

MR. MASSON said it was a very unfortunate state of things that speeches should be taken by reporters in a different language from that in which they were spoken; but it had existed several Sessions. He had spoken in French at the beginning of the Session and the report was given to him in English. It was difficult, he regretted to say, at the present moment, to find a French reporter.

MR. POULIOT said he could obtain one to-morrow.

MR. MASSON said that up to the present the speeches had always been reported in English, but he hoped this system would be altered in the future, if possible. He had often felt this difficulty himself. He did not know whether, in the arrangements made with the Hansard reporters, they were obliged to get French reporters. The gentleman they had was a very able man whose reports gave satisfaction.

MR. LANGEVIN said the report adopted by the House the other day stated that speeches should be reported in the language in which they were uttered. Probably his hon. friend the member for Terrebonne spoke for Montreal, but in Quebec there were two or three reporters who were quite competent to report the speeches in French in the first instance. The conditions of the agreement should be fulfilled. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) had a right to complain that he had not got a French report of his speech. If the contract price was insufficient to allow the contractor to afford the expense of French reporters, the price should be increased in order that the French members should be placed on the same footing as the other members. He would ask the Debates Committee to take up this question at their next meeting.

MR. MITCHELL said he would add a few words in support of the remarks of his hon. friend the member for Temiscouata, to whose speech of the previous evening he had listened with great interest, and which, he was sure, his constituents, especially those who spoke the French language, would desire to read. There were a great many grievances in connection with the management of the Intercolonial road which the hon. member had ably exposed. If there were not money enough to pay competent French reporters, then more money should be given for that purpose.

MR. DESJARDINS said that, in 1875, a motion was adopted to have the report printed in English and French in the one volume, the result of which was the volume was not complete, the French speeches being lost to the generality of English readers, and the same with reference to the English speeches as regarded the French readers. Last year, the House decided to have two complete volumes—one in English, and the other in French. When, a couple of years ago, they decided to have the speeches reported in the different languages, a considerable difficulty arose. There was only one competent French reporter in the Dominion. Since then, however, a number of others had come to the front, who might be made available. At present they had engaged a gentleman whose qualifications were considered very high, who reported the speeches in English, translating them as they were uttered. Up to this moment, no complaint had come to the Committee that the French reporting had not been satisfactorily done. He could easily understand the mode in which the French speeches were given to the public could not, under the circumstances, give satisfaction. The speeches were translated into English as they were uttered, then re-translated into French, so that the dress in which they last appeared would be very different from the original; and the speakers might find it difficult to recognize the spirit of their discourses. The observations of the hon. member for Temiscouata would be seriously considered by the Committee, and measures adopted to remove the cause of his complaint.

RETURN OF GOVERNMENT ADVERTISEMENTS IN NEWSPAPERS.

REMARKS.

MR. BOWELL said he desired to call the attention of the House to the incompleteness of a return laid on the table. Early in last Session he moved for a detailed statement of the expenses, during the years 1874, 1875, and 1876, of advertising on behalf of the Government, for any public service of the Dominion, the amount paid each journal respectively, and the purposes for which the money was paid; also the amount of subscriptions to papers, and whether for Departmental service or for circulation in Europe. That return had been laid upon the table of the House the last day of last Session, and it had been printed for the Journals only and not for distribution. His principal object in moving for the return was to complete the returns of the details moved for in 1874 by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) which was not only printed in the Journals of the House, but for circulation. He found, however, that these returns contained only items of payments to different newspapers in the Dominion for advertising, and that only partially. There was nothing whatever in the return relative to subscriptions, whether for the circulation of newspapers in this country or in Europe. He found, however, that there was a report on this subject. The Clerk of the Printing Committee had written to the Department asking when he could obtain the complete return. He received a reply from Mr. Courtney stating that it would take a very long time to complete the return, and recommending that the Clerk of the Printing Committee should proceed and have the return printed as it stood, which had been done. Mr. Ord added, at the back of a leaf: "I have commenced the return, but have put it off for summer recreation." Whether the clerk completed the return during the summer recreation or not, he was not aware. On referring to the return laid before the House he found the latter part contained a memorandum to the effect, that "the advertising accounts for Public Works, Militia and Post-Office Department are paid by warrant on departmental checks, and charged direct to the several services to which they belong (see Public Accounts for the years above mentioned)." He referred to the Public Accounts and came to this conclusion that, taking this return and also the Public Accounts, one had an admirable illustration of knowing exactly how not to do it. He found, on reference to the Public Accounts of these four years, that in all the items which he had asked for in detail, and which were given on the previous motion of the same character in 1874, they were charged to "sundry persons." On going through a few pages, from page 53, in the different Departments, he found $445, $348, $314, $425, $931, $68, $4,905, $1,895, $1,258 down to $1,537, $1,175, and as low as four and five dollars, charged to "sundry persons." It must strike any one who looked into the Public Accounts that the official term "sundry persons" was put in order to avoid giving the information asked for in his motion. He did not pretend to say that this return was of such vital importance that it should have received greater attention than others; but this was not the first instance when returns asked for by members on his side of the House came down in a similarly incomplete shape. He had occasion to complain once or twice last year on similar grounds. He brought this question up in order to have it determined that, when the House consented to a motion, the information asked for should be laid before it.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was sorry the return was not what the hon. gentleman desired. The general course was to refer these motions to the deputy heads of Departments, to furnish the information required. He sometimes looked after the returns himself, when his time permitted it, but he took it for granted that the deputy heads of the Departments saw that the returns were completed.

MR. BOWELL said that was just the point. The clerks or deputy heads seemed to treat those returns in such a manner and with such contempt as they pleased. He remembered that, last Session, he had called for returns respecting the distribution of the old rails and correspondence in that connection, and had simply received a reply from the Superintendent, Mr. Brydges, stating that no correspondence existed; but, when he called the attention of the House to it, they obtained an extensive correspondence.

MR. MITCHELL said his hon. friend was very unreasonable to expect any details after the decision of the House. Yesterday one of the returns in which he felt an interest was very imperfect; not one half of the correspondence and none of the evidence being contained in it.

MR. STEPHENSON said that on the 24th March, 1877, a return was ordered to show by whom the supplies to the North-West Police Force were furnished, and the price paid, the point to which they were supplied, and the cost of conveyance; also, all correspondence showing whether such supplies were called for by tender, &c. The information had not been given to this day, and it seemed they were never going to receive it. He would like to know from the hon. the First Minister, whether such would be the case.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he taken a memorandum of the hon. gentleman's remarks, and would be able to inform him to-morrow.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

DEBATE RESUMED.

Mr. MCCARTHY said that, in resuming the debate on the motion made by the hon. the Minister of Finance, that the Speaker do leave the chair, he could hardly hope to add anything to the subject which had been so ably discussed, both by the hon. the Finance Minister and by his hon. friend the member for Cumberland. But it was, no doubt, an exceedingly important debate, and the questions discussed, at all events some of them, would form, at the next elections, the turning point as to whether the hon. gentlemen who sat on the other side of the House would continue in their places on the Treasury benches. The first question was the comparative position of the expenditure of the former Government with that of the present one. This was, no doubt, an exceedingly important question, more especially from the standpoint of hon. gentlemen upon the Government side of the House, because, during the number of years they were in Opposition, it formed a very strong and prominent plank in their platform that the then existing Administration were not only extravagant, but that they were corrupt, and that they were corrupt and extravagant, more especially, in their conduct of that portion of the expenditure which came more immediately under their control. Ever since Confederation, commencing at its earliest period, and going back to that large and influential Reform Convention which was held in the city of Toronto, at which the First Minister and other prominent members of the party were present, they found this plank in the Liberal platform. On that occasion it was laid down in the most unmistakeable terms. He would read the resolution which received unanimous consent at that convention, and which had been followed from that day until the day these gentleman obtained the height of their ambition, and succeeded to power. The resolution read as follows:—

“And this convention regards it as the first duty of the Reform Representatives in the Legislature to apply themselves to a thorough overhauling of the Departmental system, the curtailment of the lavish annual expenditure, the enforcement of strict economy in every branch of the public service, the gradual liquidation of the public debt, and the reduction of the Custom duties as rapidly as is consistent with maintaining the public faith.”

This was the resolution of the great party of which the hon. the First Minister was now the leader, but which was then led by the Hon. George Brown. He thought it was not too much to say that, from every hustings and every platform, and frequently, from their positions in the House, they reiterated the substance of these resolutions; they clamoured for reform and complained that the Government were guilty of the most lavish extravagance. It was true that the hon. gentleman, in comparing the expenditure of 1873-4 with that of the last year that had been submitted to the House, had been able to boast—a boast which he was unable to make heretofore—that, comparing the expenditure of 1873-4 during a portion of which the present Government were in power, with that of 1876-7, there was a reduction in what he called “ordinary expenditure” of an amount in the neighbourhood of one and a quarter million dollars. As this was made a very prominent point by the party in power, as they sought to make it a great question, one upon which the electoral body of this country would determine on which side they would cast their ballots, it was desirable that an analysis should be made of this ordinary expenditure, in order to determine whether the economy claimed was in reality such as ought to entitle them to an increase of confidence at the hands of the electoral body of this country. In doing so, he had taken the liberty of analyzing this ordinary expenditure, and he trusted it would be found he had not adopted any unfair system; he would consider the expenditure of 1873-4 as contrasted with that of 1876-7 in the only fair way, and he ventured to say that such comparison would bring out properly the question of economy, and expose several extravagances of the Government, to the people of this country. For that purpose, he would take out of the account, in the first instance, the expenditure upon several items; the Militia service, and the Public Works chargeable to revenue, and he would add to those items, other items which, it appeared to him, ought to be treated separately, because there was no corresponding expenditure in the year 1876-7 to answer that of 1873-4. They should remember this was a comparative statement of expenditure. And on this, again, the question did not arise as to whether the expenditure of last year was improper, or whether the expenditure of 1873-4 was right or wrong. But the point sought to be established by the hon. the Finance Minister was that they had cut down this ordinary expenditure, while the gentlemen who had preceded them in office, had permitted it to grow to a very large amount. The items he would take in the first place, were: first, the census, upon which there was a difference of expenditure of $31,923.59. This was a small item, it was true, but it was a fair item. The census expenditure was larger in 1871, 1872 and 1873 than in 1873-4, and it was constantly decreasing; and before long, until the next census was taken, it would altogether disappear from the Public Accounts. Taking the items of Militia and Defence, Public Works, and the North-West Territory organization, the Boundary Surveys between this country and the United States and between Canada and Ontario, and the item of Military Stores, the Customs refunds, of which they had heard a good deal, viz., the $69,000 paid to the Great Western Railway, it would be found that, while in 1873-74 there was an expenditure upon those different items of some $3,151,070.67, during last year there was only an expenditure of $1,820,821.89. These items when compared showed:

Total under the head of "Ordinary Expenditure" $8,324,076 17 6,835,078 18
Showing an apparent difference in favour of 1876-77 of $1,488,997 99;

but, deducting the items under the following heads from both years:

| | 1873-74. | 187-77. | Difference. |
|-----------------------------------|------------|------------|-------------|
| Census..... | $39470 34 | 7546 75 | 31923 59 |
| Militia & Def. | 977376 27 | 550451 87 | 426924 40 |
| Public Works | 1826001 03 | 1262823 27 | 563178 76 |
| N.W. Territory Organization | 12262 60 | | 12262 60 |
| Boundary Survey with U. S. | 79293 60 | | 79263 60 |
| Boundary Survey, Ont. | 2430 00 | | 2430 00 |
| Military Stores | 144906 00 | | 144906 00 |
| Customs, Refunds | 69330 02 | | 69330 02 |
| Total | 3151070 67 | 1820821 89 | 1330248 78 |

Showing that on these items there was expended in 1873-4, $1,330,248.78 more than in 1876-7. So far as the Census was concerned, owing to the gradual decrease in this item, he thought it was quite plain that there could be no economy claimed in that item of expenditure. With respect to the item of Militia and Defence, it was quite true they had cut it down nearly, or over four hundred thousand dollars, the exact figure being $425,924.40. It was probable that this retrenchment was necessary in the altered state of the finances of the country, and he would not find fault with the Administration in this respect. But he could not help recognizing the fact that, in 1873-74, the military forces of the country had been kept in a state of efficiency, while they had been starved by the present Administration. Then, upon the item of Public Works chargeable to revenue, he found there was a difference of expenditure between the two years of not less than $563,178.76, but was it a proof of economy to charge certain sums to capital instead of to revenue? This sum which the late Government had charged to and included in the ordinary expenditure, chargeable to revenue, would, under the management of the present Government, have been paid out of capital, and so our debt would have been increased, and it made little difference to the taxpayer whether this sum would be paid out of revenue or capital. The money, it might be assumed, had been properly expended; but, on the one side, out of the revenue of this country there was $563,000 more expended upon public works than during the last year of 1876-7. Now they had heard a good deal from the hon. gentleman at the head of the Finance Department, about the sums that the Administration had to pay last year in connection with the North-West Territory. He was willing to compare accounts on that point also. He thought those were items which ought, properly, to be deducted from both sides of the account. In a comparative statement they were bound in fairness to eliminate these items from both sides of the accounts. They amounted to $764,865.93 during last year as compared with $838,000.65 the former year. In other words, the expenditure of the Administration in connection with the North-West, embracing the items Indian grants, Dominion lands, Dominion forces of Manitoba, and Mounted Police of the North-West Territory, were heavier during the year 1873-74 than during the year 1876-77, as shown on this statement:—

|---------------------------------|--------------|------------|
| Indian Grants..... | $146,068 31 | 301,596 00 |
| Dominion Lands..... | 283,163 78 | 90,521 71 |
| Dominion Forces, Manitoba, } | 209,169 42 | 29,969 17 |
| Mounted Police, N. W. T. } | 199,599 14 | 352,749 05 |
| Total..... | 838,000 65 | 766,865 93 |

Or an excess in the year 1873-74, of..... $71,134 72

The balance were items which belonged to both periods, and which could be fairly and properly contrasted together, which he would proceed to do. Taking, for the balance of these items, these two different sets of figures and comparing them, they obtained the following result: That in 1873-4 there was expended upon those items $4,335,005.35; in 1876-7 this expenditure amounted to $4,249,390.35, an apparent difference in favour of the Administration of $85,615. To this reduction they were fairly entitled to credit unless it could be shown that there were exceptional items of expenditure during that period which would take away very much from the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches the claim they advanced of having reduced the expenditure during that period, and of having practiced economy, if not parsimony. On looking into the statement which showed this apparent reduction of $85,000, what did they find? They found that, in the year 1873-74, the item of Legislation alone, owing to the second Session, was something in the neighbourhood of $200,000, the exact figures being $194,281.38; the items of Pensions and Superannuations showed an increase of $5,250.25 and $11,962.84 over-paid, as compared with Mr. Tilley's estimate. So, taking these figures, which amounted to $211,494.47, as against $85,000, they had this result: that, whilst the Government expended upon these items $85,615.49 less than their predecessors, if they added to that the amount incurred on account of the second Session and overpaid on Pensions, Superannuations, etc., they found it left a deficiency of $125,878.98. He thought the matter had been put fairly, and it simply amounted to this: Taking out the North-West expenditure, which was large in 1873-4, and large last year, but not so much as in the former year, and also the items of Militia and Defence, Public Works, expenditures in the North-West Territory, Survey of Boundaries with the United States, Boundary Survey of Ontario, the item of Military Stores, which was nearly $150,000, and Customs refund, there being no corresponding expenditure in this last year—taking, he said, these items out, the result was fairly deducible in the manner he had attempted to show; namely, that, while the expenditure upon these items was greater in 1873-4 in the North-West, Public Works, Militia, there was no reason to complain of that expenditure; that, in the one case, these charges had gone against revenue and not capital account; while, in the other, the large item in Public Works had gone to capital account, or as much money had not been expended. The result might thus briefly be summarized:

1873-74 1876-77.

Ordinary Expenditures (taking out the items of Indian Grants, Dominion Lands, Dominion Forces, Manitoba, and Mounted Police, N.W.T., and the

| Or an apparent Saving in 1876-77 | | 85,615 49 |
| But against this apparent saving is to be set off the expense of extra Session..... | 194,281 38 | |

| | $211,494 47 | $85,615 49 |

|---|--------------|--------------|
| Showing that the expenditure of 1876- 77 was the most by Items under head of North-West Ex- penditure..... | 838,000 66 | 754,865 93 |
| Census, &c | 3,151,070 67 | 1,820,821 89 |

Comparing these two years, therefore, they found this result: that last year—the year in which the Government had cut down everything they possibly could, with the view of meeting the electors, in which they had reduced the expenditure, as compared with the former year, from $8,569,774.11 to $6,835,078.18, with the preceding year, for both of which years they were responsible, they had not yet succeeded in reducing the expenditure of this country to the same state in which it was in the year 1873-4, when the present Government succeeded to office. He had not attempted in this statement to deny the responsibility of the late Administration for the expenditure of 1873-4; he had not attempted to quibble about that point, because it was almost impossible to say whether the present or the late Administration were responsible for that expenditure. They knew, however, one fact: that the former Government submitted their Estimates to this House, and it would be, probably, not unfair to bind them to their Estimates, though, if they went into a very careful analysis, they might find that these Estimates had been exceeded in some cases, as some branches always were. Acknowledging the responsibility of the late Administration for 1873-4, he had been able to show that the expenditure of last year—the death-bed repentance in the matter of economy of the present Government—fairly analyzed and judged, and fairly contrasted with the year 1873-4, gave, not a decrease, but a slight increase of expenditure over the latter year. Concerning the item of Militia and Defence, before passing it, he had a word of complaint to make. While the present Government had starved the service, while they had, in point of fact, no substantial body of men drilled in this Dominion sufficiently large to be depended on in a case of emergency, they had, in a manner most inconsistent with their professions of economy, increased the expenditure in one matter connected with the Service, the Military College at Kingston, in a most extraordinary way. This College, to which his hon. friends opposite were entitled to all the credit, which was condemned by all the practical militia officers in the country, and which could hardly be justified in view of the poverty of this country, had cost, up to this period, the sum of $89,389.05 for construction, and there had been two Estimates since then submitted to this House for further expenditure amounting to $70,000, making a total of $159,389 for construction. He believed one of these items proved very essential in the former Kingston election, and this year's estimate of $30,000 was no doubt inserted in view of another bitter election contest in that city. Whether that were so or not, the construction of the Military College had cost $159,000; and its management, including actual expenditure and amounts estimated, formed a sum of $127,466 more, and all this to educate thirty-eight cadets, to teach thirty-eight young gentlemen to be as efficient as West Point cadets, he presumed. They had no money to expend in instructing company officers or in drilling men, but they had something like $300,000 to expend in teaching thirty-eight cadets how to direct great bodies of men when this country might be invaded by great armed forces, he presumed from the other side of the line. They would have skilled officers, fit to be major-generals, but would lack company officers and men to be led. He submitted to the House that, in view of the economy which had been practised; in view of the wonderful presence which the hon. the Finance Minister always had of the reaction which had overtaken the country, and in view of the declining revenue, this expenditure on the Military College was wholly unjustified and should not be continued, considering the other circumstances to which he had referred. But, if the Government were entitled to credit for the reduced expenditure last year, what could be said on their behalf respecting the expenditure of 1875-6. It was idle to tell the House, and could impose on no reasonable mind, that the gentlemen who succeeded to power in the fall of 1873, were not in a position before the financial year of 1875-6 to practice that economy of which they had heard so much, when these hon. gentlemen were in Opposition. And yet this item of ordinary expenditure, in that year, was greater than this last year, 1876-7, as he had already shown, by $1,488,997.99, and it was greater than the expenditure of 1873-4 by a very considerable amount, $235,697.94; that was, the expenditure of 1875-6 was $8,569,774.11, which, contrasted with that of 1873-4, $8,324,076.17, gave a difference of $245,000. The gentlemen opposite understood practising economy only for the purpose of catching the electoral vote. He did not understand practising economy for the sake of catching the electoral vote. The economy which they preached while in Opposition was a searching economy. He would again quote the words of the resolution of the Reform Convention previously mentioned. "They were to apply themselves to a thorough overhauling of the Departmental system, the contraction of the lavish annual expenditure, the enforcement of strict economy in every branch of the public service." And yet they were in power during eight months of 1873-4, also during the financial year of 1874-5, and each year the expenditure increased and reached its maximum in 1875-6, when it was $235,000 more than 1873-4, and one and a half million dollars more than this last year. If this approaching appeal to the people had such a beneficial effect on the management of our finances, as was apparent by comparing the expenditure of this year with last, the people might again cry out for triennial Parliaments. But, taking the year 1875-6, he thought they had a right to deduct from the expenditure of 1873-4, the items of Census, and North-West Territory organization, the boundary survey of Ontario, Military stores, Customs refunds, extra Session; and adding to the expenditure of 1875-6, which they had a right to do, the amount given to the relief fund in Manitoba, $83,000; the result of the expenditure of 1875-6 as compared with 1873-4, was that, the hon. gentlemen who talked of economy practised extravagance to the extent of $604,781.14. He had spoken so far, simply with regard to what was called "Ordinary Expenditure," but would now consider "Charges on Revenue," as to which, there was no doubt but that the present Government had paid considerably more than their predecessors. In any comparative statement, it would not be fair to contrast the item of Charges on Public Debt, which could not be controlled, which he did not pretend the Government could control, and which would, probably, have risen to the same, or nearly the same amount, had the hon. gentlemen of the former Administration remained in power. But let them consider Charges on Revenue, which were items within the control of the Administration of the day. He found that Charges on Revenue had swollen from $4,736,442.23 to $5,196,896, an excess of $458,454.36; that was on charges on revenue, fully, as he submitted, within the control of the Administration of the day—an increase of expenditure by very nearly half a million dollars. The item of public works would not explain this increase. It had been said by hon. gentlemen opposite that the cost of public works, Intercolonial Railway, Prince Edward Island Railway, etc., had been necessarily greater under the present than under the former Administration. That plea would not answer, because, in 1873-4, the amount expended on these items chargeable to revenue was $37,847.32 more than last year. He had a right to add that to the $458,000, and found, thereby, the extravagance in this branch of the public service amounted to half a million dollars, during the time of admitted depression.

The hon. the Finance Minister admitted frankly that the expenditure of $300,000 was attributable to the Post-Office Department. He (the Finance Minister) admitted that, under the circumstances, that was not a proper expenditure. When an hon. gentleman admitted all they had to say against him, not one word could be added. But even that admission would not help the hon. gentleman. With regard to the Weights and Measures Act, the hon. the Finance Minister threw the onus of the Act on the hon. member for Cumberland, who, he said, had insisted on having it placed on the Statute-book. The House would remember that the hon. the Minister of Militia was very active last year in moving the repeal of the Act, and no doubt he did not accept office until he understood that his policy with respect to Weights and Measures would be carried out. What were the facts about the Weights and Measures Bill? Not one dollar had been spent on that service in 1873-4. He believed the hon. the Finance Minister had stated that a large sum of money had been expended by the former Administration on this service; but, on reference to the Public Accounts, he would find he was mistaken. Not one dollar was spent in 1873-4. The law was on the Statute-book, but it was clear that the Act did not come into force until an Order in Council was passed in the month of December, 1874, more than a year after the late Government had been out of office. Why was the responsibility of this Act always cast on the hon. member for Cumberland, when the present Government, knowing that this Act of Parliament could not be carried into effect until an Order in Council was passed, and knowing that the revenue of the country was decreasing, passed this Order in Council and insisted on putting this hundred thousand dollars per annum upon the people of this country, and then tried to escape the odium by charging the responsibility of the Act to the hon. member for Cumberland? He contended that for this excess in the charges upon revenue, somewhere in the neighbourhood of half a million dollars, the Government could not escape the responsibility. As an example of this increase of expenditure he would take the port of Montreal. In the year 1873-4, there was $5,639,008.80 of duties collected, the expense of which collection amounted to $95,765.68; this expenditure was extravagant, according to the hon. gentleman opposite, and ought to have been curtailed. How was it curtailed? The next year, that amount of $95,000 became $99,823.09; the year following it became $117,275.43; and the last year it was $117,989.20. During the period the amount of receipts has been decreasing; last year the collections were $3,878,507.28. While the work decreased, the expenditure in connection with the work, in this particular port, and he expected others would show a like result, increased in inverse ratio. That might be accounted for in the same manner as the expenditure in connection with the Military College. It had been said at the time that the expenditure was increased in order to aid in defeating Mr. White and electing a supporter of the Government from Montreal. So much for the annual expenditure of this portion of the statement. He now desired to draw the attention of the House to another argument of the hon. the Finance Minister, which appeared to him to be an exceedingly unfair one; namely, that the late Administration were responsible for the position in which they left the affairs of the country; that this Administration had no power, in consequence, to reduce the expenditure, no matter how strongly they desired it, owing to the numerous public works entered upon by the late Administration. What had been the public expenditure of which these hon. gentlemen so loudly complained? On turning to the public records, he understood the complaint referred to expenditure in connection with the Pacific Railroad and expenditure on canals. He understood the complaint was that that expenditure was unjustifiable, and that the hon. gentlemen in the present Administration had no power to reduce it—that they were obliged to go on finishing these public works. He could satisfy any man that the late Administration were no more responsible for entering upon those public works than the gentlemen on the other side of the House. He would again quote from the resolutions of the Toronto Convention of 1877: "That, in the opinion of this Convention, one of the first and most important duties of the Government and Legislature under the reformed constitution, will be the improvement of the internal navigation of the country." Considering that, at the very birth of Confederation, these hon. gentlemen proclaimed it as their policy that one of the most important matters that could engage the attention of the Administration, under the new state of affairs, was the improvement of inland navigation, and the enlargement of the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals, he hardly thought it consistent on their part to charge the whole responsibility of these works on the late Administration. It was unfair to charge their want of economy in this respect to their predecessors in office, when the agitation which they inaugurated throughout the country was based on the necessity of the construction, without delay, of these public works, which he, at all events, did not think ill-timed. And, if there was one expenditure which they insisted should be made, it was that in connection with the Pacific Railway. He did not mean to say that they contended it ought to be constructed within ten years; they carefully guarded themselves against any statement of that kind, but they insisted that the work should be entered on without delay, and, when the work had been entered on and was being prosecuted, they wanted to escape the responsibility of that expenditure also. The following strong language was used in the Globe of the 3rd February, 1871:

* * * "And one through British territory is a necessity, if the new Dominion is to have anything like a chance of fulfilling its destiny, and developing its resources. * * *

* And how, not only the line through British territory may be carried through from strictly commercial considerations, but must be, if British authority is to be maintained on this continent and our new Dominion made practically, as well as in theory, a great fact. * * *

Instead of the fact that the North Pacific is under construction being an argument for allowing the Canadian project to lie, in the meanwhile, in abeyance, it affords the strongest reason possible for its being pushed through without delay. Politically, it is a manifest and pressing necessity; while commercially, it is an undertaking of the very highest importance for Canada. In this way alone can this country have any chance for her fair share in the lucrative trade. * * * Our neighbours know the value of the prize involved, and are making gigantic efforts to secure it exclusively for themselves. Our rulers will be traitors to their country and to British connection, if they lose a single season for making it practicable and convenient for settlers to go to Fort Garry through our territory, and in putting things in a fair way for the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is a question not merely of convenience, but of national existence. It must be pushed through at whatever expense. * * * Without such a line a great British North America would turn out an unsubstantial dream; with it, and with ordinary prudence and wisdom on the part of her statesmen, it will be great, a glorious and inevitable reality."

He wished to ask could the party which used that language, could the representatives in this House pretend to say that the responsibility of the immediate construction of that road rested solely upon the gentlemen whom they succeeded in office? Was it a fair or creditable agreement, and would it not be better to share the responsibility equally with their predecessors, and be willing to give up their contention that for this expenditure their opponents were alone responsible.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Look at our votes on the question.

MR. McCARTHY said he had looked at the votes, and found that not one of the hon. gentlemen opposite could ever condemn the construction of the Pacific Railway. Their only opposition was in regard to the pledge for its completion within ten years; and, as soon as they came into office, they obtained the extension desired, and therefore they changed the policy from that of the previous Administration, and carried into effect their own policy. He was speaking now, in regard to the argument that the present Government should not be held responsible for the expenditure in connection with the Pacific Railway. He contended that they should be held responsible, because they had obtained the extension of time desired, and the expenditure had been carried on in their own way, and according to their own ideas.

Another matter for which the hon. the Finance Minister took credit to the Government was the reduction in the rate of interest. It really did seem to him almost puerile, he would not use the word that rose to his lips—contemptible—for a Minister of the Crown to claim credit for any reduction in the average rate of interest which was paid upon our national debt. The late Administration never made that boast.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Because they could not.

Mr. McCARTHY said if the hon. gentleman would look at his accounts he would find that the rate of interest during the term of office of his predecessors was decreased from 5.21 to 4.33.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. gentleman was making a serious mistake.

Mr. McCARTHY said the reduction made by the hon. the Finance Minister was from 4.33 to 4.08, making a difference of 25 cents. That was his boast.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. gentleman was making a mistake; he was comparing two different statements.

Mr. McCARTHY said he was proceeding to point out that neither party was entitled to any credit for that reduction. The reason was apparent. In early times in Canada they had to borrow money at higher rates than to-day; and was the hon. gentleman entitled to any credit for that, or for the fact that the Dominion had grown, and, instead of being the old Province of Canada, was now a great country with a much larger population, greater resources and larger revenues? Did the hon. gentleman suppose that he was to go to England in 1874 and borrow money at 6 per cent. as had been done twenty years ago, or did he pretend to say that he was entitled to credit for having borrowed money at four or five per cent.? Surely it was a change which came in the natural course of events. The Dominion having attained its present proportions, could hardly be expected to pay the same rate as the old Province of Canada, of twenty or thirty years ago; therefore, when the debentures, which were drawing high rates of interest, became due, it was, a matter of course that money should be borrowed at lower rates. On turning to the Public Accounts, he saw the figures which he gave to the House a few minutes ago were not exactly correct. The reduction made by the hon. the Finance Minister, was from 5.23 to 4.74, or equal to 49 cents. He desired to assure the House, that he had not the slightest desire to mislead it. The error he had made, however, did not alter his argument. He said the hon. the Finance Minister was not entitled to any credit for that reduction. What his party claimed and asserted was that, when a large amount of the public debt fell due, and the hon. the Finance Minister had an opportunity of reducing the rate of interest, it would have been criminal if he had not availed himself of it. But had that rate of interest really been reduced, and was it merely a nominal, or a real reduction? As he understood it, the rate of interest was calculated on the gross debt of the country. They all knew, and no one knew better than the hon. the Finance Minister, that we did not get par—100 cents in the dollar—for our promises to pay; but, on the contrary, on the forty-four million dollars which he understood had been borrowed by that hon. gentleman, we had had to pay a discount of very nearly four millions. The rate of interest on the gross debt was now stated at four per cent. but it was not very difficult to ascertain that the rate of interest we paid was much more, irrespective of the terms, as they might call the discount. So that the reduction was nominal, not real; it did not truly represent what we actually paid for the money we had borrowed, but merely what we had to pay on debentures to recoup the lenders. In any event, he contended that it would not have redounded to the credit of the hon. the Finance Minister to say that he borrowed money in 1874, 1875, or 1876 at a less rate of interest than that at which money was borrowed by Canada twenty years ago. But how did the hon. gentleman borrow the money? Did he not show the silver side of the shield to the London money market when he raised his loan? Did he not dwell upon the management of the affairs of the country, not by the present Government, but by the Administration that preceded them, and point out the public works which would aid the revenue and tend greatly to the development of the country, and be of public utility? Under these circumstances he floated his loan, not upon the strength of what his own Government had done, but upon the acts of his predecessors. So what was he entitled to credit for? There was another point in connection with the hon. gentleman's remarks on Friday to which he desired to draw attention. It was an unfair argument to use, either in that House or elsewhere, to state, what of course was simply a fact, that the public expenditure increased between 1867 and 1873-4, something like ten million dollars. The hon. gentleman, in making that statement, ought to have been prepared to show that the expenditure was imprudent and unnecessary, and that when this Government succeeded to office they cut down that expenditure. It was idle for the hon. gentleman to contend that the expenditure of an additional ten millions was wrong, unless he was able to show that, when the present Government had the opportunity, they had at once used it to reduce that expenditure; on the other hand, it had been clearly shown that, instead of reducing it, they had increased it. He now proposed to point out to the House how the items of expenditure occurred, to show that no responsibility rested at the door of the late Administration. The debt had increased between 1873-74 and 1877, and the hon. the Finance Minister had stated that he had no power to keep it down and so he was not responsible for it. The same argument ought, in all fairness, to apply to the late Administration. Contrasting 1873-74 with 1867 it would be found that the annual payment for the debt and subsidies had increased from seven to ten millions, items over which no party could exercise any control. And the increase in the other items of expenditure was as follows:—

The Administration of Justice, which had since increased under the administration of the present Government, showed an increase from 1867-68 to 1873-74 of $167,000; Legislation, $188,000; Geological Survey, $69,000; Emigration, which advanced under the cry for emigrants, $258,000; Public Works, $1,699,000; Ocean and River Service, $228,000; Lighthouse and Coast Service, $362,000; Fisheries, $45,000; Expenditure in connection with and owing to our acquisition of the North-West, and other smaller items, $1,146,000; and the charges on revenue increased $2,850,000. Those were the various items which aided to increase the expenditure within that period. While it could not be denied that the expenditure had been increased under the late Administration, still it was equally clear that the necessary increase formed no palliation or excuse for the increase upon the maximum expenditure of that period by the hon. gentlemen during their incumbency of office; for their increase admitted upon that. Referring again to the question of interest, he found that, if his statement was incorrect, the Public Accounts were incorrect in regard to that point. On pages 12 and 13 it was stated that the average rate of interest paid was 5.21 in 1867 and 4.28 in 1874.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said they were totally different accounts. The reduction made affected the rate of interest on amounts borrowed abroad.

Mr. McCARTHY said he was speaking of the whole debt, not as to what the hon. gentleman had borrowed.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. member had referred to the express statement made by himself the other night.

Mr. McCARTHY said he had evidently misunderstood the remark of the hon. the Finance Minister. He did not, however, think that his argument was weakened by the fact that, if they took the whole debt in 1867, the rate of interest paid was 5.21, and in 1874 it was reduced to 4.28, which was equal to 93 cents. He was entitled to say that, notwithstanding the boasted manner in which the hon. gentleman had floated his loans in the London money market, and with the assistance of the silver side of the shield which the hon. gentleman has shown, he had not much to boast of.

After Recess.

Mr. McCARTHY said that, when he left off speaking at six o'clock, he had just referred the question of interest, concerning which, from the statement that had been made by the hon. the Minister of Finance, he was under the impression that he must have made some mistake; but he found that, in the references he had made—he had taken them from the Public Accounts of last year—having since looked at these Accounts, he was perfectly correct, and that the only statement of interest that appeared in the Accounts was a statement respecting the whole public debt and these statements to which the Finance Minister referred, had been added to the Public Accounts of 1876-77 now, for the first time, to show that the hon. the Minister of Finance, in the loans he (Mr. Cartwright) had made on the London money market, had been able, to some extent, to reduce the interest. He thought, perhaps, that the old statement, which had also again been placed in these accounts for this year, was a fairer test, and, referring to that statement, he found that the average rate of interest which the debt bore in the year 1867, was 5.21; and the average rate of interest which it bore under the late Administration on their vacating office, or rather on the 1st of July, 1874, to which period all these accounts and comparative statements were made up, was 4.28; so that the reduction that was made in the rate of interest payable upon the whole public debt during the period that the late Administration held office, was from 5.12 to 4.28, showing a difference of 93 cents, while the rate of interest had been reduced during the period that these hon. gentlemen had occupied seats on the Treasury benches, from 4.28 to 4.08, showing a difference of 20 cents; so that if this was a matter upon which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) had a right to congratulate himself and claim credit for, it was to the extent of having reduced the average rate of interest that we paid on our liabilities, by the enormous sum of 20 cents; and if this was a right and proper subject for glorification, then he thought that the hon. gentlemen sitting on the Opposition side of the House might very well say that the 93 cents by which his rate of interest was reduced during the seven years when they held office, was a much worthier subject for the admiration of the country. But, if the hon. gentleman was correct, he thought that he (Mr. Cartwright) ought also to claim credit for having reduced the rate of interest on the assets, because he (Mr. McCarthy) found that the assets of the Dominion, which, in 1874, were bearing an average rate of interest of 5.12, were now only bearing interest at the rate of 4.86. He supposed that what was sauce for the goose was also sauce for the gander.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Not always.

MR. MCCARTHY said that, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) was entitled to credit for the reduction of interest on our liabilities, he ought also to place to the other side of the account the reduction that had taken place in our assets. He had pointed out, he thought, that neither party, and no Government, and no Finance Minister was entitled to any credit for this reduction, because, if it was looked at from this point of view, it would be seen that, if the money had been borrowed at three per cent. and we paid a discount of thirty per cent., the average rate of interest would have been less, but the public debt would have been larger. But what they had to look at was not the average rate of interest but what, in effect and in truth, they were actually paying upon the money they received. Now, from this hon. gentleman's loans of forty-four millions, if they took the discount of nearly four millions out, they would find that instead of forty-four millions, they had received but forty millions of dollars,—he was now speaking, of course, in round numbers—and if they took those four millions out of the actual receipts, they would find that, instead of paying nearly four per cent. they were paying 4.40, irrespective altogether of the four millions of dollars which they had paid as discount or otherwise as bonus. So much for the question of interest, concerning which, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) seemed to think he was entitled to credit, and to so much credit that he had introduced this new abstract relating to interest in the Public Accounts, showing a comparative statement of the debt of Canada, payable in London on the 1st of July, 1867, and the 1st of July, 1877; and it was because we were near the general elections, he supposed, that they were indebted to the hon. gentleman for his remarkable compilation, which exhibited the skill that the hon. the Minister of Finance had shown in connection with his various trips to London. He had now done, he thought, with the Public Accounts. He had endeavoured to show that, taking this last year, which unquestionably was the year in which the last sum of money was spent by this Administration, it did not compare favourably with the year 1873-4; and that still treating them as comparative statements, there was a difference in favour of the former Administration; and what, perhaps, was still more important, he had shown that comparing the expenditure of this last year with that of 1875-76—that was, comparing these hon. gentlemen with themselves, and not contrasting them with any other Administration, but looking at their expenditure one year as compared with another—there was a difference against these gentlemen of one and three-quarter millions of dollars, or thereabouts; and he believed he had shown that, to the claim of economy, which these hon. gentlemen had set up, and to which they had laid claim, they were not fairly entitled. There was another quality which, he assumed, it was necessary for a Finance Minister to possess. His hon. friend the member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), in his very able address the other evening, had pointed out that on frequent occasions, the hon. the Finance Minister had prophesied deficits when we had surpluses; while, on other occasions, when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) ventured into the field of prophecy and told us that the cloudy day was past, that depression had gone by, and that an equilibrium was approaching, he had been equally fallacious. He (Mr. McCarthy) proposed to follow up that same style of argument, and point out how that hon. gentleman's estimates had compared with the results. In 1875, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) estimated that there would be in the then next financial year a yield from Customs of fifteen and a-half millions; but how much was the hon. gentleman out? The fact showed that he was out over two and a-half millions—$2,676,163 was the error which that hon. gentleman had made in his forecast of the future. His estimate for Public Works was $1,700,000; and the actual result received from that source of revenue was $1,479,000. The hon. gentleman was again out in his calculation, and on this occasion the amount was $220,000, or nearly one quarter of a million short. On the other hand, the hon. gentleman had estimated that other sources of revenue would produce about one million dollars; but so far was he astray, even in these times of depression, that these other sources of revenue had produced $1,391,000, so that his estimates were $391,000 too small in one case, and about three millions too much with regard to the other two items of revenue. This statement showed that the hon. gentleman was eminently qualified to fill the position of Finance Minister, and was gifted with that foresight and prescience which the hon. gentleman claimed for himself so loudly on all occasions, while he (Mr. Cartwright) denounced his predecessor, the Hon. Mr. Tilley, who, he stated, had been so far out in his financial estimates. He would now take the next year. There might, with relation to the preceding year, be some excuse for the hon. gentleman's inexperience. They knew that the hon. gentleman had desired to be Finance Minister many years ago, and that he had then quarrelled with his leader and deserted his party.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to state his authority for that statement—a statement which I have informed the House was false.

Mr. McCARTHY said he did not know what the hon. gentleman termed false; but he knew that the hon. gentleman did desert his party. He knew that the hon. gentleman did desert it at the time when Sir Francis Hincks was made Finance Minister, and he knew that the hon. gentleman then claimed to be an Independent; and he knew that the hon. gentleman then balanced himself upon that pole until he fell into the arms of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who were the first to offer him an office. When the hon. gentleman had interrupted him, he was on the point of making another reference to this prescience which so eminently fitted him for the position he filled. In the following year, the hon. gentleman estimated that the revenue from Customs would be $13,500,000; but, unfortunately, he fell short on this occasion also by nearly one million. There was a slight improvement exhibited in this respect, it was true. He did not know what the hon. gentleman would have developed into if he had been made Finance Minister in 1869, because they saw what the hon. gentleman was in 1874, when he was out about three millions in his estimates, showing a decided degree of improvement with the experience which he had gained in office. As to the other items, he did not know that there was much room to assert any claim for improvement, or much to boast of. For Excise, the hon. gentleman's estimate was five and a-half millions, and that fell short after two or three years' experience in office, when surely the hon. gentleman ought to have been able to arrive, with some degree of accuracy, at the probable amount of revenue which was to be derived from that source, by $538,000, or something over half a million. On Miscellaneous, the hon. gentleman was again too short in his estimate; the estimate was $1,200,000, and the receipts under this head $237,000 more than that, or, in other words, $1,439,327. Of course, a great deal of excuse was to be made for that hon. gentleman, because they all remembered that this large estimate was based upon the fact that the Georgian Bay Branch of the Pacific Railroad was to be built, and that the country between Ottawa and French River was to be opened up; and from that source the hon. gentleman anticipated that the revenue would so largely exceed what it turned out to be in the result. These were facts which they ought not to disregard at this period in the history of this country, because a good deal must necessarily depend in the appeal which was about to be made to the people, on the wisdom and judgment and knowledge that had been displayed by the hon. the Minister of Finance. He now proposed to invite attention to what, after all, was a more important question than the comparative statement of expenditure between the two years that had formed the subject of so much controversy. He proposed to draw the attention of the House to what appeared to him to be a most remarkable state of the trade of this country. He found that, in the year 1872, we imported from Great Britain $63,148,736 worth of goods, and from the United States during the same year, something over $35,000,000 worth; the difference in favour of the Mother Country being over $17,000,000. He also found that, for the year ending the 1st of July, 1877, our imports from Great Britain had fallen off from $63,000,000 to $39,000,000, the exact figures being $39,572,239; and that our imports from the United States had increased from $35,000,000 to $51,000,000; or, in other words, that while in 1872 we imported $17,000,000 more of goods in value from Great Britain than from the United States; in 1877, we imported $11,000,000 more in value from the United States than from Great Britain; showing a difference of about $30,000,000 in the course of trade. This was a startling exhibit. The manufacturers of this country had been complaining that, during the past three or four years, this country had been made a slaughter market of by American manufacturers; and one of two things must be true—either that the Americans, notwithstanding their system of Protection which was so much decried in some quarters, were able to compete successfully in this country with the manufacturers of the Mother Country, or else that the Americans poured their goods at slaughter prices in upon this country and destroyed in that way the national industries of this Dominion. To show that this was true, he asked their attention to the figures concerning our exports. In 1873, we exported to Great Britain $1,603,000 worth of manufactured goods, in round numbers; and in 1877, we exported to Great Britain $2,179,000 worth. In other words, our exports to Great Britain had increased during these four years over half a million. But how was it with the United States? If our power of competing with the Mother Country had been progressive, did they find that this was the case with the country which was represented to be burdened by such an enormous system of Protection. The figures in the Trade and Navigation Returns showed the contrary. They showed that in 1877 $1,601,000 worth of manufactured goods were exported to the United States, against $1,774,000 in 1873; in other words, our exports to the United States to-day were nearly half a million less than they were in 1873; while our exports to Great Britain were nearly half a million more than they were in 1873; and, altogether, our exports to Great Britain had advanced in value from thirty-one millions in 1873 to forty-eight millions in 1877, while our exports to the United States had fallen from forty-two millions to twenty-five millions; and we had increased our exports to the Mother Country by over two millions—very nearly three millions—mainly, of course, with reference to the large item of lumber, while our exports to the United States had decreased to the tune of sixteen millions. What he particularly directed attention to was this: That our exports of manufactured goods—not of lumber, or of natural products—to the United States had fallen off, while exports on the part of the United States to this country, had largely increased. What did this prove? Did it prove that our manufacturing industries were in a proper or fair condition? He had heard the argument, and been met by the statement on frequent occasions, that the Administration of Sir John A. Macdonald had not put on Protection; that they were content with a 15 per cent. tariff; and that it was now merely an electioneering cry when it was said that protective duties ought to be imposed at this period.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. McCARTHY said he was glad to hear hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear," but he wanted to know to what these figures pointed? If we were able, in 1873, to export to the United States, goods to the value of $42,000,000; and if we were then able to send manufactured articles there to the value of very nearly $2,000,000; and if we were not able now to send these goods to the value of more than $1,250,000, was not this because the United States were now flooding our markets with their goods; and he wanted to know whether, under these circumstances, remedial legislation was not required, and whether some protection should not be offered, or whether we were to remain as flies on the wheel—that was to say: not to take any steps to do now what was unnecessary to be done in 1873? The accusation which the Opposition made was that these circumstances pointed conclusively to the fact that either this country had been made a slaughter market of, or that the protective system in the United States was a success; and he did not think it made any difference upon which horn of the dilemma the hon. gentleman chose to be impaled. The result was that this country required, in 1877, a different system of legislation from that which it required in 1873. By the census of 1871, he found that, of a total population of nearly three and a-half millions, there were engaged in industrial pursuits 187,942 persons, who were mainly heads of families. He had looked to see how many were engaged in farming pursuits, because the industrial and agricultural pursuits were said to be opposed to one another, and he found that 369,279 were engaged in latter. In 1871, $77,000,000 were invested in industrial pursuits, and the annual wages paid amounted to $40,000,000. He desired to know if the people who had invested their capital in an industry to enable them to pay such an enormous amount per annum were not entitled to protection against the foreign manufacturer south of our line. He contended that an industry, which was sufficient to induce people, in 1871, to invest their money in it to the extent of nearly $30,000,000, and to induce 187,000 people to settle in this country, ought to be protected by such legislation as might be found necessary. But what had been the course of the hon. gentleman opposite? They could not tell the extent to which the manufacturing industries had been endangered because there had been no census since 1871, but they knew the manufacturers were complaining, and that bankruptcy prevailed to a great extent, though they were not able to place figures against figures, and to show accurately what the loss had been. On some subjects, however, they could make a comparison, and to those subjects he proposed to invite attention. If they took the tea trade, which was mainly built up during the Administration of the last Government, and compared that trade to-day with that trade in 1873-74, they found that in 1873-74 they were importing altogether of green, Japan and black tea 12,364,485 pounds; while, to-day, we were importing 13,374,035 pounds, a slight increase. But where was that coming from? A great portion of that tea had been formerly imported direct; but, now, whence did it come? In 1873-74 we imported direct of the two classes of teas 4,570,757 pounds, according to the returns from China and Japan; but to-day, we were importing from those countries, 1,251,296 pounds; or our direct trade with those countries had fallen since 1873-74 from four and a half millions of pounds to one and a quarter million,—a loss in the direct trade of three and a quarter millions of pounds. Where had this trade gone? It had been alleged that the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite was to make Boston and New York the markets for our merchants. He thought these returns conclusively proved that statement. They found that in 1873-74 Canada was importing, through the United States, 1,715,904 pounds of tea; but, to-day, we were importing, through that country, 6,170,402 pounds; so that we were taking four and a half millions of tea more from the United States, which did not grow it, and where it was not a product, but was brought from China and Japan. The United States became, in that sense, the middleman, and so supplied our people. He thought the statement of his hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) the other night, was, beyond all question, true, that the policy before 1873-74 was to open a direct trade between Canada and China and Japan, and that since that time the policy had been to destroy that trade and to give the profit, which we ought to have been making, to the people of the United States. The Finance Minister had said that was the trade of one vessel. That was one way of being witty, but it was being witty at the expense of the country. If they took up the sugar question, they would find the same result. He did not propose to weary the House with all the figures he might quote, but the result was that, in 1873-74, we imported of the higher classes of sugar 78,491,708 pounds; whereas, now, we imported 97,000,000 pounds of that class of sugar. Of the coarser kinds of sugar, including melado, cane juice, etc., we imported 23,000,000 pounds in 1873-74, and now the importation had fallen to something over three million pounds. The statements, therefore, which had been made by the members of the Opposition, were borne out by the returns made by the Government itself. Now, he would ask, What policy ought to be pursued? There was a distinct issue between the gentleman on the Treasury benches and those on the Opposition side, in reference to this question. To use the language of the Minister of Finance, the Government were prepared to fight to the death, in order to leave matters as they were, and the hon. gentleman was aware that on the Opposition side they were prepared to stake their political fortune on a different policy. The Ministers were prepared to hold that there was not to be a different policy pursued from that which was adopted during the years of the American war, and the period which succeeded that war. But the Opposition contended, that what was quite sufficient protection, and what those accounts showed to have been sufficient, up to 1874, had ceased to be a sufficient protection; and they claimed that the tariff ought to be so re-adjusted that the industries of this country would be protected. Perhaps no greater flattery could be given to the late Administration than had been given, practically, by the hon. gentlemen on the Government benches. In effect they said: "Your tariff from 1867 to 1873—the tariff which we found in force when we took office—was so wise that it needs no amendment; that it does not need to be altered; that it shall be kept like the laws of the Medes and Persians." It was unfortunate that the Opposition could not accept the same view. They were Reformers. They claimed that the circumstances of the country required reform in this direction, and they were not going to say that the tariff of 1873 must suit the country for all time. As to the farming industries, while so much could not, perhaps, be said in regard to them, still they, also, were entitled to protection. They were entitled to have their products protected, for they did not get fair play. They were entitled to get reciprocity of trade or reciprocity of tariffs, and that was all they wanted. If they could send their wheat, their barley, and their coarse grains into the United States, they were prepared to compete with the Americans, and to allow the latter to send their products here. They had every reason to complain of the Chinese wall which was raised against them by the American Government, while our Government took no steps to protect them since the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty. It had, however, been said that we had nothing to offer; that there was nothing left; that such had been the conduct of the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald), when, as an Imperial Commissioner, he signed the Washington capitulation, as it had been called, that we could not hope to have reciprocity. That was an argument which would not bear investigation. Why, if that were true, was the Hon. George Brown sent to Washington? He (Mr. McCarthy) believed that the hon. Senator was desirous to show his fitness for a diplomatic mission, and it had been said—though he had no means of knowing the truth—that Mr. Brown had left the Government before because he was not entrusted with a similar errand. Well, Mr. Brown went to Washington. He (Mr. McCarthy) believed he had converted a clerk in the Statistical Department. Five thousand dollars had been spent, and the only convert that had been made had been this clerk, who, when the hon. Commissioner went as an ambassador from Canada, was hostile to reciprocity. The result was that we had no reciprocity, that the hon. gentleman's scheme proved so utterly unsatisfactory to the authorities on the other side of the line, that they were not prepared to entertain it. But what was the effect of the Washington Treaty? We had had a value placed upon that: we now knew exactly what our fisheries were worth. Our own Commissioner, after full and patient investigation, had signed an award that our fisheries were worth five and a-half million dollars for ten or twelve years, and that was over and above the right which we had obtained to fish in American waters. We were, therefore, entitled to about half a million dollars per annum. We imported from the Americans $51,000,000 worth of goods. Did any hon. member mean to say that, if we shut out the American goods to that extent, we could not compel them, notwithstanding that we got half a million dollars a year for our fisheries, to agree to reciprocal trade with us? It was idle, therefore, to say we had not got it in our power to protect our farmers, miners, and manufacturers against the Americans, and could not force the American manufacturer into reciprocal trade with us.

Mr. CHARLTON: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the export of manufactured goods from the United States to Canada is $51,000,000?

Mr. McCARTHY: We imported that amount, whether manufactured or not; and on that amount, whether the goods were manufactured or not, there was a profit to the American exporter considerably more than the half million dollars which our Commissioner had held to be due to us, as the annual value of our fisheries. As far as the fisheries were concerned, the treaty was only for ten years. It might have been a capitulation, as the hon. the Finance Minister had mentioned, but he would ask him to look around him and see who were the gentlemen who voted in favour of that treaty, and whose names were recorded in the division list. He found there the name of Burpee—could it be that that was the Minister of Customs? He found the name of Smith, of Westmoreland—was it possible that that was the present Minister of Marine? He found the name of Holton—was that the hon. gentleman who was so active in aiding the Ministry on points of order in this House, who was, in fact, a sort of outside Minister? Yet, the hon. the Minister of Finance called this a disgraceful capitulation. He was also told that one of the gentlemen who voted for that capitulation was a gentleman named Coffin, though he had really forgotten that such a gentleman occupied a seat in this House. Was that the present Receiver General?

Mr. DYMOND: The hon. the Minister of Customs was not a member of the House at that time; it was another gentleman of that name.

Mr. McCARTHY said at all events, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Burpee) was a member of the House now, and supported and endorsed the Ministry of the day; and he thought it would only be decent if the Minister of Finance would refrain from throwing dirt at his colleagues in speaking of this as a disgraceful capitulation. So much for the Washington Treaty. It might be put an end to at the termination of ten years and then we would be as we were. He had never pretended that, looked at in a purely abstract light, a system of Protection was to be preferred to one of Free-trade, and that it was wise, or would be good statesmanship for the country, to build up against the laws of nature manufactures which could not exist in the Dominion without such aid. But what was the difference between the northern part of the United States, and Canada? In regard to manufacture, our climate and natural products were, to a great extent, similar to theirs, and were we not in so good a position to manufacture north of the line as our American cousins on the south of the line? We could not, however, hope to compete against such an unfair system as we were now competing against. It was absurd to pretend that our manufactures could exist when the American markets were shut against us, while ours were open to them. What we wanted was not to inaugurate a system of Protection, but to initiate such a system as would remedy the mistakes made against the doctrines of Free-trade, by our friends south of the line. If they were doing violence to what hon. gentlemen claimed to be a proper system of trade, we had to enact such laws as would meet that difficulty, and protect our own manufacturing industries, and the other branches of industry in this country, against that system. It was scarcely open to argument, whether reciprocity would not be better than Protection. He had never heard any hon. gentleman say that it would not be, but, granting that our American cousins had made a mistake, it behoved us to send an agent, possessing the wisdom of the Finance Minister, or the Minister of the Interior, on a special mission to instruct them as to their duties in this respect.

MR. MILLS: There is a great deal to be done at home on that.

MR. McCARTHY said he hoped the hon. gentleman would attend to the matter. He had no doubt he would find a great deal of employment. We had to deal with the question as we found it. He would read an extract from a work which he was sure hon. gentlemen opposite would accept as an authority on this subject. He referred to Prof. Cairnes' Work on Political Economy. Prof. Cairnes was an ultra Free-trader, but he did not pretend that there might not be circumstances which would render Protection necessary for a country. Arguing against the system of Protection in the United States, he said:

“For example, the position is sometimes taken that, admitting all that can be urged economically in favour of Free-trade, a nation has got other interests to take account of than the production and distribution of wealth. It has to consider its moral, social and political advancement—ends to which the working of Free-trade, it is alleged, is not always favourable. For the tendency of Free-trade, even on the showing of its supporters, it is argued, is to turn the industry of a nation mainly into a few channels—those channels name in which it happens to enjoy, in relation to competing nations, exceptional advantages; so that, in the practical result, the nation adopting it is compelled to confine its industry within comparatively narrow bounds. Free-trade thus tends to circumscribe industrial experience, and by doing so to interfere with that practical education which a nation derives from the prosecution of industry. Far better, it is urged, deliberately to sacrifice some of the results of material prosperity, if by this means we can secure scope for a wider and more diversified cultivation, such as is furnished by an industry branching in numerous directions and offering to enterprize a varied field. I cannot deny that there is a certain basis of truth in the considerations just stated, and that circumstances may even be imagined in which they would possess real cogency.”

The argument on the other side of the House was that every man in this country who was not a farmer had mistaken his vocation; that all we could do here was to raise grain and breed cattle; that all we could do in this Dominion was to raise a herd of cattle and cultivate the soil, and that encouraging any other pursuits was dangerous in the extreme, impolitic and unwise. But he put it to the hon. gentlemen whether a variety of industries was not necessary to the prosperity of any State. No State had ever attained greatness without it, and, therefore, apart from the material wealth, we had other things to attend to—to build up this nationality under the British flag in North America. He had said all which he proposed to say on this very important question, and he wished that, without doing violence to his feelings, he could withhold from the House the remarks which he proposed further to make. He understood that this was the proper time to complain of grievances. When the House was asked for a supply, it was right that hon. members should see that those gentlemen, who claimed to be entitled to ask it, those gentlemen who were the servants of the Crown and who would have the spending of the money, were deserving public servants; were deserving of trust; and it was because he noticed in a document which was before him, matters which he considered detrimental to the best interests of the country that he thought it right and proper to bring it on this occasion to the attention of the House. In one of the Finance Minister's picnic orations he found that he had characterized the conduct of the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) and a Senator, a gentleman of the other Chamber, occupying a high position in this country, in terms which he (Mr. McCarthy) could not describe as otherwise than disgraceful and unbecoming that gentleman's high position, unworthy of the office which he held, and calculated not merely to degrade the public men of this country in the estimation of Canadians, but in the estimation of the world. The hon. gentleman might speak as a private individual as he pleased. But he ought not to forget, and it would surprise him (Mr. McCarthy) that he should forget, as he (Mr. Cartwright) seemed to be continually aware of it, that he was the Finance Minister of the Dominion of Canada, and, speaking in that capacity, with all the responsibilities attaching to that position, he thought the language used on that occasion, and which he found circulated broadcast over the country with regard to an hon. member of this House, and an hon. Senator of the other Chamber, was such as should not have been used, and he was astonished to find it endorsed by the great Reform party at a meeting held under their auspices. The hon. the Finance Minister had said:

"I dislike exceedingly to have to deal severely with my public opponents. I would rather meet them on questions of public policy than discuss those iniquities; but it is our duty as free electors, as administrators of a free Government, when we see acts of this kind committed, to call things by their proper names."

And he proceeded to call things by their proper names. He would repeat the language he applied to a member of this House, one who had led the Government for the last twenty years, and who would yet lead the Government, and that before very long.

"Of the three culprits, Mr. Cumberland, the managing director of the road, who was the immediate instrument in the embezzling, or the stealing (to speak in plain English), that highly respectable individual, Mr. Senator McPherson, the highly respectable receiver of the stolen goods, well knowing them to be stolen —"

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Hear, hear.

MR. McCARTHY: The hon. Finance Minister remembers the words used by him.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I do, right well.

MR. McCARTHY said the hon. member admitted it. Then, it was his duty, not merely as a member of this House, but also a servant of the Crown, to see that the embezzler and the receiver of stolen goods was brought to justice. It ill became an hon. member of this House who, when the hon. member for Kingston was present, was dumb, never opened his lips, behind his back to speak of him in the terms he had quoted. He asked if, in the opinion of the House, the hon. the Minister of Finance was not recreant to every sense of duty and honour in pursuing such a line of conduct. He would read further if the hon. the Finance Minister desired it.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I do desire it.

MR. McCARTHY said he would continue to read:

"Mr. Senator McPherson, the highly respectable receiver of stolen goods, well knowing they were stolen."

Several HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. McCARTHY said the hon. the Finance Minister's legal education was very incomplete; his name, it is true, had been entered on the books of Osgoode Hall, but he had never taken his degree. When he spoke of another as being a receiver of stolen goods, he spoke of a criminal offence. They knew what the evidence was; it was contained in the appendix of the last Session. The accusation arose from two circumstances; one, that the Northern Railway Company, through three of its Directors, contributed to the fund raised for the hon. member for Kingston, a fact of which the hon. member for Kingston remained in ignorance until last Session. The report of the Committee appointed to investigate the matter, said: "Sir John A. Macdonald states he was not aware of the fact, and his statement was sustained by that of Senator McPherson." So far, then, as the hon. member for Kingston was concerned, it was sworn by him and by Senator McPherson, that he was ignorant from whom that money came. His fault, if any fault existed, lay only in the fact that he did not enquire where that money came from when the testimonial was presented to him. Was that a criminal offence, that it should be so spoken of by the hon. the Finance Minister, whose words would be read, not only here, but in the Mother Country? What would be said to the hon. member when he would endeavour to raise another loan in the English market? He would be told that he, himself, was, in 1862, thence to 1869, a follower of the hon. member whom he had maligned, that a great party acknowledged him as their leader, and that it was a curious country where men like Senator McPherson and Sir John A. Macdonald were the leaders of public opinion; a thief and a receiver of stolen goods, according to the hon. gentleman. He did not rise to protect the reputation of these men, but, as one of the representatives of the Dominion upon the floor of Parliament, to say here to the hon. gentleman's teeth, that his conduct was scandalous in the extreme. He proposed to allude further to the speeches of the hon. gentleman who was let loose last summer upon the country. In his address at Napanee he not only vilified the character of the two hon. gentlemen referred to but he had cast reflections on the honour of this House. He used the following language with respect to the hon. member for Kingston: "He (the member for Kingston) bribed everybody whom it was possible to bribe. He bribed the Provinces by agreeing to assume their debts; he bribed the members by doubling their indemnity; he bribed the Civil Service by bonuses and increasing the salaries of 1,381 of their number." He bribed the members of this House, did he?

An HON. MEMBER: Not of this House.

MR. MCCARTHY said not of this Parliament, but of this House, he understood. On consulting the records, he found that one of the members bribed was the hon. Minister himself; he swallowed the bribe without making a wry face; he never rose in his seat to attack the increased indemnity. That was a unique specimen of his way of managing affairs. He exposed in England the silver side of the shield, and here the brazen side. He did not know which position was the most honourable or dishonourable: whether to be a bribee or a briber. The hon. the Finance Minister was the bribee, the hon. member for Kingston the one who administered the bribe. He regretted to have to bring this matter up on this occasion, when their attention ought to be engaged on more important matters, and to divert the attention of the House from the question which he had imperfectly discussed in the early part of his address; but he felt compelled to do so in order to show the wrong which had been inflicted on the characters of hon. members of this House.

MR. PATERSON said he would endeavour to enter into statistics which, he feared, would prove not very interesting to the House, nor could they be made interesting by him; but the House would agree with him that some of the statements which had been made by the hon. member for Cardwell should be refuted. He desired to give credit to the hon. gentleman for the ability with which he had treated the question. He had seen it stated in the organ of the Conservative party, the Mail, that the party were deficient in brains. He believed they had secured in that hon. gentleman what they had sighed for. But it would be a fair subject of criticism whether the abilities which that hon. gentleman possessed, had been used in a manner worthy of him. He would not deny that the hon. gentleman had the ability to deal with figures, that he had obtained a classical education, and had knowledge sufficient to deal with statistics correctly. But if he took that view with reference to his powers, he was forced to a conclusion that was not creditable to him.—that having the judgment and the ability to handle figures properly, he had failed to do so. When an hon. member assumed to criticize official documents and statements emanating from the Department of the Finance Minister, and in going through the figures, in the endeavour to institute comparisons, only selected such figures as suited his own purpose, the House must conclude, either that the hon. member was unable to deal with the subject, or that, possessing the ability, he had put it to a wrong use. He did not know on which horn of the dilemma the hon. member would rather be impaled; he was prepared to give him his choice. The hon. member had struck out, in his comparison, the items concerning

Public Works, Militia Estimates, North-West Boundary Survey and Survey of the Province of Ontario, expenses connected with the North-West organization, in the expenditure of the late Administration, but held that everything that had been expended by this Government should be maintained firm and intact. What could be thought of such a kind of criticism? In a comparative statement, they should be guided by the result. If any of those items might be struck off, why should not he or any of his hon. friends strike out, in like manner, items of expenditure in the year 1876-77, so that the ordinary expenditure, reduced by that process, would show that his hon. friend the Finance Minister had actually expended nothing during the past year. This was not the first time the hon. member for Cardwell had dealt with figures in that manner. The hon. member, who was recognized as one of the leading statesmen of the Opposition, had appeared on public platforms side-by-side with the hon. gentleman whom he recognized as leader, from time to time, and attempted the same criticism in Cobourg, in September, as he had done to-night. He (Mr. Paterson) had attentively read the remarks of the hon. gentleman uttered on that occasion, and had observed the careful manner in which he would cite figures from returns of years that suited him, while of other years, he was careful to say nothing. He (Mr. Paterson) would, with the permission of the House, bring before it a few points, as illustrative of the manner in which his hon. friend criticized the financial dealings of the Government of the day, and the way in which, on that occasion, he dealt with such grave questions. He instituted, on that occasion, comparisons between the years 1873-74, 1874-75, and 1875-76; on other occasions, between the years 1873-74 and 1874-75; for the latter of which this Government was responsible. In reviewing the items of ordinary expenditure, he stated that in the item of Civil Government, the Mackenzie Administration spent in 1874-75, $25,550 more than in 1873-74. But he forgot to state that in the year 1875-76, the Mackenzie Administration expended less on that item by $41,690, than the Macdonald Administration. If he had forgotten, it was rather remarkable that he should select an amount which suited his purpose. With regard to Immigration in 1875-76, he said that $67,276 had been expended by the present Administration over the amount expended by the late Government in 1873-74. As in the previous instance, he told only the half truth. He might have continued to say that in the year 1874-75, the Mackenzie Administration had expended $15,892 less than their predecessors. So that it was apparent the hon. member for Cardwell could handle figures to suit his purpose, that he did not make his statements in the fair manner which would be expected from one occupying a distinguished position in the Conservative party. He (Mr. Paterson) would not take time to explain why an increase took place in the items alluded to in certain years, but he was aware that good reasons could be given by this Administration. His object in bringing up this question to-night was to show that the hon. member for Cardwell did not give fair figures, but only those which suited his object. With regard to the Weights and Measures Act he remarked this extraordinary statement made by the hon. gentleman; that the country had expended on it nearly $100,000 annually. He admitted the late Government were responsible for the introduction of this measure, but contended that the Order in Council passed by the present Administration was the immediate cause of the annual expenditure to the country of $100,000—an expenditure which he said did not exist under the previous Administration; thereby inferring that, if his party had continued in power, the Weights and Measures Act would have brought itself into existence, would have appointed officials and have gone over to England and purchased the necessary machinery. Was that the style of reasoning which the hon. member expected this House to accept? He attempted to-night to fasten the onus of that measure on the Government, because they passed the Order in Council. But what did he expect the Government to do when they found the law on the Statute-book, when the Commissioners had gone to England, and had expended large sums of money to purchase the standard weighing machines. That measure could not be charged to the Administration of to-day. He also stated that, while under the Reform Government, a deficit of nearly two million dollars existed, during the period of the Macdonald Administration, there were surpluses amounting in all to $10,185,288. Here, again, he failed to do justice to the subject. He gave credit to the Macdonald Administration for the full amount of the surpluses during their administration, but charged the present Administration with the deficit of the one year, the only deficit which existed at the time he made the speech; but failed to do justice to the Mackenzie Administration by failing to give them credit for the surplus they had the year before. Had he done that the account would have stood as follows: In 1874-75, revenue, $24,648,718, expenditure $23,703,074, leaving a surplus of $945,644; in 1875-76, revenue $24,587,587, expenditure $24,488,372, leaving a deficit of $1,900,785. Thus the deficit of the two years, setting the surplus of the one against the deficit of the other, was but $965,141; and deducting the amount of the sinking fund, etc., the deficit would be wiped out altogether. The hon. member for Cardwell had proceeded to make further deductions from his statements. The next deduction he made was a most remarkable one. It had the advantage of being supported by testimony which was generally admitted to prove a thing—the testimony of two witnesses; but there were exceptions to the rule, and in some cases even the evidence of two parties was not sufficient to establish an allegation. In this case there was the testimony of the hon. member for Cardwell and that of a member of the other branch of the Legislature. But there were exceptions to every rule, and the House required some more direct means of information than the general knowledge possessed by those witnesses. The hon. member for Cardwell had said he would give this statement in a nutshell. It was a good

was not always convenient to go into details. The statement was that taxation had increased from $22.50 per head, under the Macdonald Administration to $37.93 under the Mackenzie Administration. If that were not a serious state of affairs, what could possibly be considered a serious condition. The Mackenzie Administration had been in power three years when the hon. gentleman made that statement. It called for a close scrutiny of the representatives of the people of this country to determine whether that charge was well founded or not. He (Mr. Paterson) had gone into the matter carefully, and he was happy to say the result of his investigation had been a complete acquittal of the Mackenzie Administration; and, as a natural consequence, it fastened upon the hon. member for Cardwell either the charge of ignorance or of wilful misrepresentation. He did not desire to mislead the House, and he therefore asked any member who was sceptical on that point to follow him through his argument. On the 1st July, 1874, he found from the Public Accounts that we had a total debt of $141,163,557, and we had assets at that time amounting to $32,838,586; deducting the assets from the debt, left the net debt at $108,324,965. They found that in 1876—and these were the figures that he must state, for it would be remembered that the hon. gentleman made his speech in 1877, and these were the figures to which he must have referred—the total debt on the 1st July, 1876, was $161,204,687, and the total assets were placed at the same date at $36,653,173; deducting the assets from the debt this would leave $124,551,514 as the net debt. By this they found that we had increased the debt by $20,041,436 in the two years, but that there was also an increase in the assets of $3,814,587; deducting the increase on assets from the increase on debt, this left a total net increase of indebtedness of $16,226,549. He might fairly enquire whether the Government had not increased their receipts on the money invested in 1874, for the purpose of showing that this stated increase was even less, but he would take the figures as they stood. He would call the attention of hon. members to the fact that, according to the public records, the public debt had only increased $16,000,000, and he called to their remembrance the population of the Dominion, 4,000,000, and ask them to divide the $16,000,000 by that. This would give an increase of indebtedness of only $4 per head, while the Government had been charged with having increased the debt $15 per head. The hon. gentleman made a still more remarkable statement. He next propounded the question as to another result which would follow the Administration in power. He told them—and here again was a wonderful similarity between the working out of a problem by a worthy Commoner and a worthy Senator, both agreeing to the very cent—he told them that in the year 1870, $3.50 was the tax per head, while it was $5.76 last year. Not content with making it $5.75, in order to show how accurately they worked it, they put on the other cent. And then they had a prophecy from the hon. gentleman, who was not disposed, it seemed, to allow the hon. the Finance Minister to have the whole realms of prophecy to himself. The hon. gentleman ventured on prophetic grounds, and declared that the current taxation would be $6 instead of $3.50 per head. They would take him on his prophetic utterances, and work it out for him. It would take no great intelligence on the part of hon. members to ascertain this fact: if the debt in 1870 was $3.50 per head, and if this year it was $6, the increase of taxation per head, made by the present Administration, would be $2.50. If there had been an increase of $2.50 per head, that increase multiplied by four millions, the number of population now, would give a net increase of taxation of ten millions. This was not at all a difficult problem. Then let them examine the accounts in detail, to show whether this amount of expenditure had been added. He found that in 1870-1—and they might satisfy themselves that these carefully collected Public Accounts were correct—they had a gross revenue of $19,335,560. The population then was about 3,500,000, so that was an average taxation per head of $5.52. He found that the receipts from taxation that year—the receipts from taxes proper, leaving out other sources of revenue—was $16,320,387, or an average taxation per head of $4.66. Coming to the figures of 1876-7, he found the receipts were $23,400,000, and the population about 4,000,000 or an average per head of $5.85. He was aware that the hon. the Finance Minister made that amount less by certain reasons—perfectly legitimate reasons—but he (Mr. Paterson) did not wish to give the Opposition advantage of any side issue, and therefore, took the amounts as he found them in the Accounts. First, he would beg to call the attention of the House to the slight mistakes made by the hon. gentleman in his oracular utterances on the occasion referred to. He (Mr. Paterson) found that the taxation proper for the year referred to by the hon. gentleman, 1870-71, amounted to $19,150,000, or an average of $4.79 per head of the population. The increase on the gross receipts was simply 33 cents per head, and on the actual taxation receipts the increase was 13 cents per head. This was an error of not much account; it was only $2.17 out of $2.50; and on a comparison of the gross receipts it was only a mistake of $7,420,000 out of $10,000,000—a very little affair. On the basis of the receipts of taxation, it was simply an error of $2.37 out of $2.50 per head, or only an error of $9,480,000 out of $10,000,000. He did not desire to be hypercritical, but it did seem to him that, when the hon. gentleman got up to criticise the statement of the hon. the Finance Minister, he ought not to fall into these little errors. He would not dwell longer upon this point, but would pass on to notice some remarks that had been made by the hon. gentleman in the course of his speech. He (Mr. Paterson) had not the least doubt that the people of this country would profit, not by his utterances, but by those of other hon. gentlemen in this House who would speak upon this subject, who would thoroughly dissect and review the figures of the hon. gentleman, and be prepared to defend the Ministry. For himself, he had experienced some difficulty in following the hon. gentleman's figures, but he gathered from his remarks that he was entering into a comparison of the ordinary expenditure as between the year 1873-74 and the year 1876-77, and that he desired, in instituting that comparison, that important items, such as the saving of $563,000 on Public Works, should be struck out, and should not be given to the Government by way of credit, and that the saving of $426,924 on Militia and Defence should also be taken from the credit of the Government. True, they saved it; true that by dint of economy they had managed to expend less in these two Departments; but the answer of the hon. gentleman was that the late Administration was as economical as this, and therefore, without any other reason, he appealed to the good sense of this House that these savings should be struck out from the credit of the Government. He (Mr. Paterson) was at a perfect loss to understand why these should all be struck out. The hon. gentleman was very modest in his demands. He would ask him on what grounds he could ask that these legitimate savings of the Mackenzie Administration should be struck out? Every item that was saved should be left there, to their credit. The hon. gentleman asked that the last four items should be struck out also, because the expenditure terminated with the year 1873-74, and he also wished to charge them with $83,000, spent on account of relief to settlers in Manitoba, which the present Government did not expend this year at all. This was an example of the modesty that characterised the hon. gentleman in his demands. He asked that the country would yield to his wishes, and strike out every saving effected by the Mackenzie Administration, stating that they had no right to any credit for this saving; but time would show that the Macdonald Administration had never approached the economy which had been approached and effected by the hon. the Finance Minister and his party. They had to rejoice that the Public Accounts and documents of the past were within the reach of every man in this country, and he would tell the hon. gentleman that in the

MR. PATERSON.

Public Accounts of this year also, attempt to force the figures as they might, they could not contradict the accuracy of them, and they showed that this Government had reduced and cut down the expenditure as much as any Ministry could possibly have done. They had effected a saving in the items he had quoted of $2,171,127.71, and deducting $682,129.72, the increase of certain items, from the saving effected, they had a net result of saving effected by the party of economy, through the Ministry of that party in this House, of $1,488,997.79 over and above that of the Macdonald Government. The hon. gentleman alluded to the fact, and it was a fact that was rather awkward for the hon. gentleman to explain away, that the taxation was increased by the Macdonald Administration, but he said that increase was necessary. It was not his (Mr. Paterson's) purpose to argue whether it was so or not at this time. The line of the hon. gentleman's argument was to establish a comparison between the Macdonald Administration and the present Government, and he had made that comparison in such a manner that it would reflect unfavourably on the Administration that now occupied the Treasury benches. But, for the sake of the comparison, and not going into the question whether the expenditure was right or wrong; assuming for the moment that they were proper estimates and in the direction of economical retrenchment such as this country demanded in a period such as we were passing through, and such as they might expect at the hands of the financial adviser of the Crown at all times, he would place before the House and the country matters of fact, which no one could dispute, and which would convince the House and the country that the finances, administered as they had been by the hon. the Minister of Finance, had been managed in a manner unequalled since Confederation took place. He begged to remind the House that the expenditure of the Macdonald Administration increased nearly $10,000,000 in seven years, and that the expenditure of the Mackenzie Administration had increased barely $200,000 in three years. The gross expenditure of the Macdonald Administration increased from $13,486,092 on July 1st, 1868, to $23,316,316 on the 1st July, 1874. He also begged to draw attention to the fact that the ordinary controllable expenditure of the country had increased under the Macdonald Administration by nearly $5,000,000, the figures being $3,630,298 in 1867 and $8,324,086 in 1874; that under the Mackenzie Administration, a comparison of the gross expenditure for the year ending 1st July, 1874, with that of the year ending 1st July, 1877, showed an increase of barely $200,000, the difference being between the figures $23,316,316 and $23,519,301. He would remind the House also that the ordinary controllable expenditure, during the same period, had been reduced by the Mackenzie Administration by nearly one million and a-half dollars, instead of increased by five millions; namely, from $8,324,086 in the year 1873-74, to $6,835,000 in 1877. He proposed, with these remarks, to leave that portion of the hon. gentleman's speech. He thought that he had shown, perhaps conclusively, to some members of the House at least, that, if the present Administration was entitled to the support of the country on one ground more than another, it was on the ground of economy. Every principle advocated by them when in Opposition had been supported and carried into effect when they came into power. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) had given a resumé of the great Reform Convention, as he termed it, of 1867, in which it was laid down as one of the principles of the Reform party, that there should be economy of public finance combined with efficiency. The hon. gentleman was right as to this point, and he (Mr. Paterson) must congratulate him that he was to be found, occasionally at least, reading good sound literature, which would do him good and give him benefit; and he would recommend his reading more of that kind of literature for the informing of his mind and storing up of necessary facts. He did not pretend to deny, and he believed other gentlemen would agree with him, that, after spending much time in reading heavy literature, a gentleman should be permitted some little recreation; that is, should read light works of fiction as a relief to the mind. He did not object to this course, and would not object to the hon. gentleman spending some little time in reading "Tupper's Proverbial Nonsense." But he would give the hon. gentleman a hint: let him do it as a means of recreation simply, and not for the purpose of storing his mind with misleading statements to lay before this House. Next, as to the question of trade. The hon. gentleman had become somewhat bolder this year; last year he scarcely said anything upon the question. He simply said that there was just as smart men in the United States as in the Dominion of Canada, and therefore he thought that, as the United States of America, having wise men in its midst, had adopted Protection to the extent of prohibition, it would be right for Canada to do the same. He simply threw that out as a suggestion. But tonight, the hon. gentleman had come out, and said he was ready now, he had made up his mind now, that in the interests of the country, the fiscal policy of the United States should guide the gentlemen who controlled and managed the fiscal policy of the Dominion of Canada. He, in common with other speakers, laid this down as a broad platform which they who ran might read; but it would be found, in one part of his speech, that he entirely repudiated that doctrine, as did one of the leaders of that party, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), and they said they did not mean this but only a readjustment of the tariff. The hon. gentleman would not be able to get through this Session without giving some idea of what this readjustment meant; and he might tell hon. gentlemen in Opposition that, if they meant to fight their battles before electors in this way, they would be very much deceived; they would not be listened to on the hustings with such an equivocal cry. They read the resolution of Sir John A. Macdonald as their policy, which was a resolution any man might vote for, if it was not for fear of making himself ridiculous, to readjust the tariff in such a way as to foster and benefit the mining, agricultural, and all other interests of the country. Who would object to that, if it could be done, if such could be accomplished? But the people would say, "We will not be content with this. If you lay that down as a platform, point out to us what part of the tariff may be readjusted, so that we can see if these benefits can be secured." They told the House it was not their place to formulate a tariff. If the country was on the eve of bankruptcy, and under the foot of the United States, as represented by them, he called upon them to rise in their places and tell the country how that tariff might be readjusted, so that it might gain a better position. There was one part of their policy, and only one part, that these gentlemen in Opposition had made plain. They had endeavoured to make political capital by circulating broadcast throughout the land statements to the effect that the country was in the most miserable plight—approaching ruin, and was being crushed with legislation. In other lands, from whence we hoped to draw emigrants with capital and skill to this new country, these statements, coming from members of this House, would carry a weight with them that they ought not to carry. The United States Emigration Agent would get these speeches of the hon. gentlemen and place them in the hands of intending emigrants, and thus deter them and thus injure our land. To pour contempt on their own country was the policy of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy) and the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper.) They were in favour of Protection to the amount of prohibition, and they were, therefore, forced to prove that Canada was ruined under the present system, and that the United States was more blessed than we were. He came now to some hints that they had thrown out with regard to a readjustment of the tariff, and, as they had never been given before, it would be well to consider them. They had gone into particulars how they would readjust the tariff with regard to one or two items, if they had the power. In the first place, if he did not misunderstand the hon. member for Cumberland, the first article that claimed a readjustment of tariff was coal oil, because he told the hon. the Minister of Finance that the proposition of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) was a far better one for dealing with the question than the one proposed by the Government. The tariff on coal oil at that time was 15c. per gallon on oil coming from the United States, and an Excise duty of 5c. levied on home manufacture. The hon. member for Stanstead proposed that the import duty of 15c. should be lowered to 7½c. per gallon and that the Excise duty should be left as it was. And now the hon. gentleman claimed that the hon. the Finance Minister had taken advantage of the suggestion of the hon. member for Stanstead, and that what he had voted down one year he had put in force the next.

MR. PLUMB said the hon. the Finance Minister had promised the hon. member for Stanstead that he would accept his proposition.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: No, no.

MR. PATERSON said what the hon. the Minister of Finance did say was that he would deal with the question the next year. He trusted they would accept this denial in a proper spirit, made simply to set the hon. member right. He would read the remark of the hon. the Finance Minister. It was this: "While I am prepared and willing to consider the question next year, I cannot accept the proposition of the hon. member for Stanstead; for in any revision that may take place in this matter the Excise duty must also be taken into consideration." He trusted the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), and the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) would accept this as proof of what the hon. the Finance Minister did say. What was the proposition of the hon. the Minister of Finance? To reduce the import duty to six cents per gallon, and to wipe out the Excise duty altogether, thus giving the manufacturers or refiners of coal oil in this country six cents per gallon protection, and to the consumer, his oil at a less price. What was the proposition of the hon. member for Stanstead? He proposed to reduce the import only from 15 to 7½c.

and to leave the Excise duty of 5c., leaving to the oil refiner of this country a protection of only 2½c. per gallon. The Finance Minister gave 6c. per gallon protection to the men engaged in the oil trade. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) proposed to give them 2½c., and that was not given to them either, for the price of gold was at that time 113½ in New York, and in London 115, therefore the difference in the price of money, and the inspector's fees, &c., swept away that 2½c. protection, and thus would the Opposition, by their policy, kill this important industry, and at the same time cause the consumer to pay more for his oil than now. This coal oil question had been dealt with by the hon. the Finance Minister in a statesmanlike manner; and the excessive duty had been left on the Statute-book one year longer, to give them the testimony, the living testimony, which was engraven upon, and burned into, the minds of the people, as to what would be the effects of the policy of over-protection that was advocated by these hon. gentlemen. Under that excessive protection, and under that duty, which approached nearer than any other on the list to the duties levied under the American system, was brought into existence the only ring that, he believed, was ever formed among Canadian manufacturers. While this was the case, and while the hon. the Finance Minister was attempting to wipe away that evil, and effectually break up the ring, he (Mr. Cartwright) did not rush to the other extreme, like an unthinking or incapable man might have done, but took care, at the same time, not to treat with rashness a great refining industry, which gave employment to from 3,000 to 4,000 of our people, which took the raw material from the earth, not importing it like other industries, and which brought two millions of dollars into this country in 1872-73. The hon. member for Cumberland proposed to benefit the manufacturing interests of this country, by readjusting the tariff in such a way as to leave the manufacturing industry connected with the refining of coal oil without a single cent of protection to wipe out the six cents of protection, per gallon, that the hon. the Finance Minister had given it.

AN HON. MEMBER: No.

MR. PATERSON said yes. No hon. gentleman could prove to him that the contrary was the case. One other item respecting which the hon. member for Cumberland had condescended to hint the duty might be readjusted so as to make them all rich was the sugar duty. He confessed to approaching this object with a sense of its importance. He recognised the fact that it was a subject which might well engage the attention of all the members of the House, and of all the Ministers in the House. He desired that this industry should be restored in our midst, if this could be done without paying too great a price for it; but he must confess it seemed to him that the difficulties which were to be met with in connection with the readjustment of the tariff, in such a direction as to bring into existence the sugar-refining interest, were almost insuperable. They had the statement of the hon. the Finance Minister, in this relation, before them; he accepted this statement as well founded, and he believed it was very clearly demonstrated that the country was now benefitted, owing to the present position of the sugar duties, to the extent of half a million dollars a year. It was, consequently, a serious question for the hon. the Finance Minister, or any one who might succeed the hon. gentleman, to attempt to revive an industry which could only be revived by taking $500,000 out of the pockets of the consumers of this country. He desired that this industry should be again brought into existence in Canada; but he questioned whether the country was prepared to stand or pay such a price as half a million, in order that two refineries might again be brought into operation. At any rate, it would hardly do for the hon. members of the Opposition to say that this industry would employ any more hands or be more beneficial to the country than was the coal oil refining industry which they proposed to wipe out altogether. He hoped that success would attend the efforts of any hon. gentleman in readjusting the tariff in such a direction as would revive the sugar-refining industry; but exceptional circumstances existed in connection with the sugar duties, and while this was the case, it would be a most difficult matter for any Minister of Finance to so readjust the tariff as to bring back prosperity to that industry and at the same time not take a vast sum of money out of the pockets of the people of Canada. He thought the hon. the Finance Minister was not to be blamed because he hesitated to attempt to restore this industry when such an attempt would involve the taking of half a million out of the pockets of the people of this country. The readjustment of the tariff with reference to the article of tea was also advocated. A great cry had gone up in the country because our direct tea trade had been damaged. They were told by some hon. gentlemen that it was irretrievably ruined. He confessed that he would like a direct tea trade very well, but, if it was necessary that the people should pay $300,000 or $400,000 more for their tea in order that eight or ten importing houses might profit from this trade, it was a fair question for consideration on the part of the Administration whether they would not consider the claims of the consumers of greater importance than those of a few importers; and he did not think that the Government should be severely blamed because they attended to the interests of four millions in preference to those of eight or ten men. And if we did not import tea direct, we had wholesale dealers who handled the article largely and who preferred to have the duty as it now was, and to buy their tea in the American market to being forced to go to Montreal and deal with eight or ten men who had the exclusive importation of tea in their hands. He did not wish to disparage the latter; these were noble men, and he was glad that they had succeeded as they deserved, being active business men; but he trusted that these gentlemen, as well as the House, would recognize the fact that it was a serious matter to ask the hon. the Minister of Finance to do in their interest that which would compel him to take $300,000 or $400,000 of the money of our people in order to accomplish it. Hon. gentlemen might determine for themselves whether such attempts towards a readjustment of the tariff would be calculated to make every one rich or whether, on the contrary, they were not calculated to make every one, manufacturer as well as consumer, poorer. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) who now led the Opposition in the absence of the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) had also intimated in a vague sort of a way that he thought a great deal of prosperity might be created, and that every one might be made rich by the imposition of a duty and the readjustment of the tariff in the direction of a duty on coal and on flour. He, for one, was very anxious indeed, and sincerely desirous that we should have an inter-provincial trade, if there were any means by which it could be secured and made profitable to us; but he saw this difficulty in the way: if we attempted to force a trade which any section of the community would feel was forced upon the country to their detriment, then any benefit we might expect to derive from it would be more than destroyed by the feeling of antagonism which would be roused between different sections of the community; and what was desirable above all things was that harmony and good feeling should prevail among the different Provinces of this Dominion. If it was impressed on the minds of the inhabitants of any one Province, that a tax was imposed on them, which did not bear equally on all the inhabitants of the Dominion, the former would feel aggrieved, and resist that tax as unjust. This would not be conducive to the harmony that should prevail in our midst. If a duty were placed on coal, it would be felt by the people of the Province of Ontario, and also of a large part of the Province of Quebec, to be the imposition of a tax that would hurt them, and be contributed by them and not by other sections of the community, without in the least degree helping to develop the coal interests of Nova Scotia. They were told by hon. members from the Maritime Provinces that the imposition of a duty on flour—to which he himself would not object from a manufacturer's standpoint—would be objected to there, and that the people of those Provinces would not consent to it because it would be a tax borne by them but not shared in by the rest of the Dominion. It would be local taxation, unjust in its nature, and they would not feel happy under it. Such were the difficulties which would be experienced in that direction. Without desiring to be uncharitable towards the hon. member for Cumberland, he recognized the fact that the resuscitation of this subject on the floor of Parliament at the present time and at this particular season was simply an electioneering dodge, by means of which it was trusted that, through the use of some vague expressions in the House, and vague resolutions, which would mean almost anything or nothing, the agriculturists of Ontario and the coal-owners of Nova Scotia would be made to believe that he (Mr. Tupper) and his late colleagues would, if restored to power, raise them to a condition of prosperity greater than they now enjoyed, and that then undiminished, if not increased, prosperity, would be theirs. Let them ascertain by the light of history what the conduct of the hon. gentleman had been with reference to this matter; and whether, if the present Ministry was to be displaced from power, in order that these hon. gentlemen might accede to office, any ground existed for believing that these hon. gentlemen, if reinstated on the Treasury benches, would act in a more consistent manner, or fulfil any more faithfully their pledges, than they had done on previous occasions. He remembered that, in 1867, duties were imposed on most of those articles which were vaguely hinted at by the hon. member for Cumberland as desirable articles on which to impose duties; and he also remembered that these duties were taken off in 1868, by the same Government that imposed them. He recollected distinctly the remarks that were made by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, when the duty was taken off flour by his own Government, having been on only one year. The right hon. gentleman then said that the duty was imposed for the purpose of showing the Americans our independence of them, and was maintained for a certain length of time; but being found to work injuriously was then repealed as a step in the right direction. In view of the fact that the hon. gentleman had put on this duty in 1867, declaring that it was right and proper, and had taken it off in 1868, because experience had shown that it was wrong to continue it, could they believe what he hinted at now, when he promised, if in power in 1879, to re-impose that duty. This was not the only point to which he could refer in this relation. In the year 1870, the hon. member for Cumberland brought in what he termed his famous National Policy in connection with which the same course was pursued. Duties were then imposed on these articles; and in less than a year—it was certainly not more than a year afterwards—that very same hon. gentleman, aided by his colleagues, had themselves deliberately voted down and crushed out of existence the policy which they had declared was a national policy, and the only policy that was adapted to the interests of this country. And this was the policy which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) had the hardihood now to stand up and declare was the policy that should be endorsed in the interests of Canada. That hon. gentleman on another occasion had sought to shirk the responsibility for this vote, and to show that the then Opposition had repealed the duty in question. The hon. gentleman had dared to say that an Opposition, which relatively was not as numerous in proportion as the Opposition of to-day, had been the means of repealing it, and had endeavoured to induce the House and country to believe that the repeal of this duty was entirely due to the Opposition of that day. What were the facts? They were on record. It was well that it was not a matter of mere remembrance on his part or on the part of the hon. member for Cumberland. They had the Votes and Proceedings to consult with reference to that question. The hon. gentleman had told them on a previous occasion, that he (Mr. Tupper) had voted for one amendment which added certain articles to another amendment that was proposed; and that, when the original amendment as amended was proposed, which was to repeal the duties on grain, coal and flour, he voted against it. This was true. The hon. gentleman had voted in favour of the motion of the Hon. Mr. Blanchet to add certain words to the amendment of the hon. member for Chateauguay, who moved that the Bill be recommitted forthwith for the purpose of so amending it as to repeal the duties on coal, coke, wheat and flour. In amendment of the hon. member for Chateauguay's amendment, it was moved by the Hon. Mr. Blanchet to add to it salt, pease, beans, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat, and all other grain, Indian meal, oatmeal, and flour or meal of any other grain; and the hon. member for Cumberland and all his colleagues in the Ministry at the time present in the city, voted for the amendment of the Hon. Mr. Blanchet, whose name he used because he did not remember the county the hon. gentleman then represented. The question was then put on the amendment of the hon. member for Chateauguay, that the duties on all articles he had enumerated should be struck out; and on that occasion the hon. member for Cumberland and his colleagues, it was true, had voted against this amendment; but it was carried. But these hon. gentlemen, instead of following the course which is adopted under such circumstances by Imperial Governments, on finding themselves outvoted on a vital question of policy and ordered by the House to strike off the duties on certain articles which they declared should be maintained for the well-being of this country, held on to office, accepted the amendment, swallowed their principles, and trampled under foot what they had said was for the well-being of the country. And their names were so recorded in the Votes and Proceedings of the House. These hon. gentlemen had not followed the example which British statesmen set them, under such circumstances, and resigned; they would not resign, and, if their sense of honour, as Ministers, did not compel them to stand up and maintain that principle, what guarantee had the country now for believing that, on their mere statement, these hon. gen-

tllemen, who were simply individual members of the House, could be entrusted to do what, as Ministers of the Crown, their sense of honour had not compelled them to do. The hon. member for Cumberland had used the argument that such duties should be imposed, because now, if we approached the American Government with the view of securing reciprocal trade relations, we had nothing to offer. There was some force in this argument. He would remind the hon. gentleman that, if we occupied this position, the hon. gentleman had himself to blame for it, and call his attention to the fact that, when we had the advantage, which the hon. gentleman now thought would be a lever to compel the United States to give us reciprocal trade relations, he himself deliberately voted it out of existence, and the hon. gentleman had not done so ignorantly, because the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) had, at that time, moved a resolution, in which he stated that, whereas negotiations were then proceeding at Washington, it was desirable that those duties should be retained on these articles in order that they might have this lever to strengthen the hands of the Commissioner at Washington with the view of obtaining such trade relations. And, with these facts before him, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) had deliberately voted down that resolution. We had had besides, in the possession of the country, another lever, which was more important, and more likely to secure such relations, which were of vital importance in the interests of the great agricultural portion of this country; and that lever was our fisheries. He would now call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the statement that was made by the Committee of their own Privy Council with reference to this matter, in order that the hon. gentleman should not say that he (Mr. Paterson) exaggerated the value of that lever when he said that these fisheries would have enabled us to compel, on the part of the United States, reciprocal trade relations with regard to the raw products of this country. He would quote a portion of this report which had been submitted to His Excellency the Govern-

General, and in which this was declared most emphatically under date of July 28th, 1871. The Committee the Privy Council, of which the hon. gentleman himself was a member, in this report said :

“The United States had never pretended to claim a right on the part of their citizens to fish within three marine miles of the coasts and bays according to their limited definition of the latter term, and although the right to enjoy the use of the inshore fisheries might fairly have been made the subject of negotiation with the view of ascertaining whether any proper equivalents could be found for such a concession, the United States was precluded by the original correspondence from insisting on it as a condition of the treaty. The abandonment of the exclusive right to the inshore fisheries without adequate compensation, was not, therefore, necessary in order to come to a satisfactory understanding on the points really at issue. The Committee of the Privy Council forbear from entering into a controversial discussion as to the expediency of trying to influence the United States to adopt a more liberal commercial policy. They must, however, disclaim most emphatically the imputation of desiring to imperil the peace of the whole empire in order to force the American Government to change its commercial policy. They have for a considerable time back ceased to urge the United States to alter their commercial policy ; but they are of opinion that, when Canada is asked to surrender her inshore fisheries to foreigners, she is fairly entitled to name the proper equivalent.”

He desired to draw particular attention to the following statement :—

“The Committee of the Privy Council may observe that the opposition of the Government of the United States to reciprocal Free-trade in the products of the two countries was just as strong for some years prior to 1854, as it has been since the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty, and that the treaty of 1854 was obtained chiefly by the rigorous protection of the fisheries which preceded it, and that but for the conciliatory policy on the subject of the Fisheries which Her Majesty's Government induced Canada to adopt after the abrogation of the treaty in 1854, by the United States, it is not improbable that there would have been no difficulty in obtaining its renewal.”

With these facts before them, the present leader of the Opposition, at that time the leader of the late Government, was then engaged in Washington in bartering and giving away the only lever we had whereby we could secure what would be the greatest boon that our agricultural community could obtain ; and while one member of the Administration was doing this at Washington, the hon. member for Cumberland was doing his duty in cutting away the other means which the hon. gentleman now declared would be a lever whereby we could secure such reciprocal duties. While the right hon. gentleman was bartering and giving away, without adequate compensation, our fisheries at Washington, the hon. member for Cumberland and his colleagues were voting down the duties imposed on articles that, according to his present statement, would be sufficient to force the Americans to give us such trade relations. He thought enough had now been shown to enable hon. members to see how utterly fallacious the arguments and statements of the hon. gentleman were. It was now a little too late in the day to protect our manufactures. There was a time in 1876 when this argument had some force ; but it had now become somewhat stale, and it would scarcely do. These hon. gentlemen would be apt to subject themselves to being placed in a rather awkward position if they dealt with this matter much more. He desired to call the remembrance of the hon. members of the Opposition to the fact that the manufacturers and commercial men of this country had signified through what they themselves admitted was their mouthpiece—the Dominion Board of Trade—by the adoption of a unanimous resolution that the protection which was given to the manufacturers by this Government was a fair and reasonable protection and all that they required. This being the case, the manufacturers had plainly intimated to the hon. members of the Opposition that, in seeking to enforce upon them Protection which they did not desire, these hon. gentlemen might subject themselves to a rebuff somewhat akin to one which might be received from some young lady if an individual offered his services to see her home as a means of protection, and was told by her that she was quite able to protect herself. He would not wonder if the manufacturers should tell these hon. gentlemen—“We are much obliged to you for these offers of Protection and the attempt to take us by the hand and lead us up the highway of prosperity, but we are quite competent to manage our own affairs; and we have told you in as genteel and authoritative a manner as we can, speaking through the Dominion Board of Trade, that we consider that our interests are perfectly safe in the hands of the present Government; and we have put on record our unanimous resolution that the tariff given us by this Government is of a sufficiently protective nature to satisfy us in this respect, and we ask for no more than we have now." It was high time for these hon. gentlemen, when they were told by the manufacturers themselves, that they did not need any more Protection, to quit any attempt to force it upon them. Again, he would remind the hon. members of the Opposition of the position in which they placed themselves, as members of the House, in voting money for the exhibition of our manufactures in other countries. If the views which these hon. gentlemen expressed were correct, they were guilty of squandering the public funds; for what was the use of exhibiting our manufactures in Australia, in the United States and in France, at great cost to the country, if our manufacturers were not able to hold their own against the world in the the markets where their goods were shown? The very fact of their voting this money proved that our manufacturers were able to do so, and in view of this fact, he asked these hon. gentlemen, for the sake of consistency, and of saving what little credit they might have remaining for logic, to abandon the enunciation of the idea that Canada could compete with the United States 3,000 miles away, but not in our own land. This position was too preposterous for intelligent men to take at the present time. The hon. member for Cumberland had also gone on another tack the other night. The hon. gentleman had found a little difficulty in making his statements agree—that he (Mr. Tupper) was the most loyal man in this country; that the party which he led was pre-eminently loyal as compared with the party of which he (Mr. Paterson) was a humble member; and that their attachment to the British Crown was of a much more enduring and ardent nature than the attachment to it of the members of the party to which he (Mr. Paterson) belonged. The difficulty that presented itself, was this: while the hon. gentleman made these professions on the one hand, on the other hand, he advocated the creation of a tariff barrier that would engender ill-feelings between the two countries, and disturb the harmony which now existed. Recognizing this fact, the hon. gentleman came forward with the suggestion that it was competent and possible, and he thought the hon. gentleman also said desirable, that we should impose differential duties, and that as concerned Great Britain, the duties should be levied on a revenue basis; while a prohibitory tariff should be imposed with regard to all the rest of the world. This practically meant the United States, because this was the only other country interested in this matter. He would beg to remind the hon. gentleman of the motion which the hon. members for Hamilton (Messrs. Irving and Wood) moved in the House two years ago, asking that this very course should be adopted, or at least, that an attempt be made in that direction by memorialising the home Government with the view of having this done; but what did the right hon. leader of the Opposition then do? He (Sir John A. Macdonald) attempted to cast ridicule, not only on this motion, but also on the hon. gentleman who introduced it, and voted it down. Nevertheless, the very same hon. gentleman now came forward and said that this was a policy which might be adopted, and respecting which no difficulty would be experienced in carrying it into effect. This was another of the logical positions taken by the hon. gentleman. Without discussing whether it was advisable to levy differential duties, even supposing that it could be done—and he thought that it could not be done, and that, if possible, it would be most inadvisable to do so—he would remind hon. members that the United States had framed their tariff in no hostile spirit against Canada. On the contrary, the United States had framed their tariff against the world; and, so long as Canada did the same thing, even though our duties were higher than theirs, the United States would have no right to, and would not, complain; but, if such differential duties were imposed, then the United States would have a right to feel incensed, and have a pretext for retaliatory legislation in that respect. He would ask hon. gentlemen, if retaliatory measures were adopted, which country would suffer most—Canada or the United States? The former undoubtedly would; and hence the hon. gentleman's retaliatory policy and differential duties would not stand examination. He had no idea that the hon. gentleman seriously meditated such a thing. It was a mere electioneering device, by means of which the hon. gentleman endeavoured to lead the people to think that he could maintain his claim and the claim of his party to pre-eminence for loyalty over the other party, and at the same time advocate duties which he (Mr. Tupper) pretended were in the interests of this country. He would now refer for a moment to the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy), who had addressed the House so eloquently. The hon. gentleman had read some extracts from speeches delivered by the hon. the Finance Minister on several occasions to the electors of this country, in the course of which the hon. the Finance Minister referred to certain hon. gentlemen in language which the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) thought was too strong. He (Mr. Paterson) would not say that he would have used precisely the same language nor did he believe that the hon. the Minister of Finance would have done so without any cause for provocation, and if he (Mr. Cartwright) had been the object of fair criticism himself; but it was possible for a man who had been smitten on one cheek, and who had turned to his assailants the other cheek, and had been smitten on that also, to think that, perhaps, he had fulfilled the Apostolic precept; and that he had then liberty to give back to these gentlemen some of their own change. If it was to be charged against the hon. the Minister of Finance that his language was strong on that occasion, it was to be borne in mind that such was also the nature of the language that had been used towards him, one of the responsible advisers of the Crown in this country. It was all right, in the estimation of these hon. gentlemen and of the rank and file of the Conservative party, that the hon. the leader of the Opposition should go through the country and in public places, without a particle of proof for, or any documents in support of, his assertions—which the hon. the Finance Minister had—denounce the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) as a man who had been corrupted and bought like a beast in the shambles. He asked whether the public men of the country were to stand this system of perpetual villification at the hands of their opponents, which was continued without the production of any public documents to substantiate such statements. He deplored as much as any man this personal villification of the public men of this country. He thought that he had never made this mistake, and he trusted he never would, though human nature was terribly roused on such occasions; but if ever a man was justified in using strong language, it was the hon. the Finance Minister when his character was attacked without a shadow of reason to substantiate these calumnies. This was patent to the House and the people of this country. During the past year or two the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) had risen in the esteem of the people and to the first rank among our public men in their appreciation. One reason for the venom shown against the hon. gentleman was due to the fact that he (Mr. Cartwright) had at one time occupied a high position in the Conservative party, which he had left, not because there was any prospect of the Reformers or the then Opposition attaining to power, but because of the corrupt acts which the hon. gentleman had witnessed there. The hon. gentleman, however, now found himself in proper company, being associated with men who held principles in common with himself and which were as dear to him as to them. The charge of coalition made in this relation could never be sustained, for, admitting that the hon. gentleman had, after that time, given the late Government an independent support, he (Mr. Cartwright) had always maintained the very principles which the Reform party upheld, and he had been instrumental in putting them on the Statute-book of the country, and, if there was one of these principles for which the hon. gentleman had counted, it was that grand principle: that with efficiency in the public service they should have economy. He would point out to the population of this country that the hon. the Minister of Finance had, in the most fearless and undisguised manner, given effect to that fundamental principle; and it was only necessary for the people to know this, to disabuse their minds of the calumnies which had been heaped upon that hon. gentleman. Wherever the hon. gentleman had for the first time appeared, whether in the western or eastern parts of the country, before the people, and given them in his eloquent manner the plain straightforward statement of the affairs and finances of the country, and his reason for leaving the Conservative party, they saw the truth of his declarations beaming from every line in his countenance; and they believed that the hon. gentleman was an honest and a capable man; and in the largest part of the Dominion of Canada no man was more honoured than the hon. the Minister of Finance, who had so ably a short time ago delivered the Budget speech of the Government.

MR. WALLACE moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. MACKENZIE said it would be observed that he had given notice that the Government business should henceforward have precedence on Thursdays. He proposed to make this motion on the day following.

MR. MASSON said that it was unprecedented for the Government to take Thursdays for that purpose at so early a period in the Session. Not one of the Government Bills had as yet been read the second time.

MR. MACKENZIE said he would propose a compromise. The Government would take one-half of next Thursday and all the subsequent Thursdays.

MR. PATERSON.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said the first Thursday in March last year was still a private day.

MR. MACKENZIE: But we did not spend a week on the Address last year.

MR. MITCHELL: You had some business to submit last year, but nothing at all this year as yet.

MR. TUPPER said it was customary to give a little longer notice in this respect. This was quite unprecedented.

MR. MACKENZIE: So was ten days' debate on the Address unprecedented.

MR. TUPPER said that no measures were now pressing for public attention. If the hon. gentleman would consent to allow this matter to stand, say until after Friday, this would give them an opportunity of reaching all the notices of motion on the paper.

MR. MACKENZIE said that this would be no satisfaction at all to the Government. He was already conceding an opportunity for reaching these notices of motion.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he hoped the hon. gentleman would remember that private members had only had one evening yet.

MR. HOLTON said that, under the Orders, notices of motion only went on till six o'clock.

MR. DYMOND said only Public Bills and Orders would suffer by the change.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was desirous to meet the views of the hon. gentlemen opposite in all reasonable ways. He should expect, however, that, after this first Thursday, the Government would have Thursdays.

Motion agreed to and Debate adjourned.

House adjourned at

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MOTION TO ADJOURN.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is known that His Excellency the Governor-General is giving a very remarkable entertainment to-night; and I think it would be but courteous for the House to adjourn for the purpose of affording an opportunity to members to attend. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Masson, that the House shall adjourn to-day at six o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 30) To grant certain powers to the Agricultural Mutual Insurance Association of Canada, and to change its name.—(Mr. Macmillan.)

Bill (No. 31) To amend the Act incorporating the Sydenham Harbour Company.—(Mr. Gibbs, South Ontario.)

Bill (No. 33) To declare Life Assurance Policies non-forfeitable.—(Mr. Trow.)

COLONIZATION RAILWAY BILL.

(Mr. Mills.)

FIRST READING.

MR. MILLS introduced a Bill (No. 32) To facilitate the colonization of Dominion lands by providing for the incorporation of railway companies and aiding the construction of railways traversing Dominion lands. He said it was provided in this Bill that any number of persons might form themselves into an association for the purpose of constructing railroads between the points designated; that on the payment of a certain sum of money, and the fying of certain papers in the Department of the Interior, these persons would thereby become proprietors of such railways subject to the fulfilment of the conditions imposed; that at least 50 per cent. of the capital required for the construction of such a railway should be subscribed, and that 10 per cent. of the amount so subscribed should be paid up; that a Board of Directors should be appointed, with power to pass by-laws for the management of the affairs of the railway company; that, the persons who were appointed directors should be at least shareholders to the extent of $5,000 each in the railway; that certain officers of these companies, the secretary and treasurer, should not be members of the Board of Directors; that any railway so voluntarily incorporated for the purpose of constructing railways in the territory of Canada, could receive aid by grant of public lands; that the Government should have power to appoint a director upon such Board of Directors in such company for the purpose of protecting the public interests; also that in the construction of a certain portion of the railway, they should receive a certain part of the lands to be granted along the line of these roads for the purpose of aiding to construct these roads; that the Governor in Council might, if they deemed it expedient, instead of granting land to such a company, pay over to it as the road was being constructed the proceeds derived from the sale of such lands, until the amount paid to such company did not exceed the sum of $10,000 per mile; that, before any arrangement to aid in the construction of railways through the agency of such companies should be binding, the contract or arrangement should be laid before the House of Commons, at least for one month, in the usual manner; that no company could be incorporated under this Act and receive aid for the construction of such a railway having the same general direction as the Canadian Pacific Railway within forty miles of such road; and, further, that the provisions of the General Railway Act of 1868, and the Acts amending the same, should, so far as they were not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, extend to companies incorporated under this Act. These were the general features of the Bill, the principle of which would be described and discussed more fully when it was submitted for the second reading.

MR. TUPPER said he would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether it was not necessary to proceed by resolutions.

MR. MILLS: I think so.

MR. SPEAKER: It has become the practice to introduce them after the first reading.

MR. BOWELL said he would like to ask whether the Bill fixed the price of land, which it was proposed to grant as a subsidy, and the number of acres per mile. He understood the hon. the Minister of the Interior to say that, in case the Governor in Council decided to retain the land under their own control, it would be disposed of, and the money paid to the parties who were constructing such a road, until it reached the sum of $10,000 per mile. In case land was given instead of money, was it proposed to fix the price of the land.

MR. MILLS: No; not of the land granted to such company.

MR. BOWELL: But as to the subsidy—the number of acres is fixed?

MR. MILLS: Yes.

MR. BOWELL: Is the number of acres provided for?

MR. MILLS: Yes. That depends upon the location of the road. The hon. gentleman can see what the provisions in this particular are, when the Bill is printed. The further west you go, the more liberally will it be possible to aid railway construction.

DOMINION GOVERNMENT PENSIONERS.

QUESTION.

MR. DECOSMOS enquired, Whether there is any established rule or order prohibiting a pensioner of the Dominion Government from drawing his pension whilst employed out of Canada under salary from the Crown?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I do not know that there is any rule or order to that effect; but what I presume the hon. gentleman refers to is, perhaps, the case of certain officials in British Columbia who were pensioned under the terms of the agreement with British Columbia, and my recollection is that in the case of those gentlemen a particular stipulation was made that, if they received employment under the Crown, their pensions lapsed pro tempore.

ST. JOHN HARBOUR COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

MR. DOMVILLE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place the Harbour of St. John, N.B., under commission for the purpose of making the necessary improvements to facilitate commerce?

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland): I may say, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. gentleman, that the Government has come to no conclusion in the matter at all; but I may say to him, further, that the Government are prepared to consider favourably any proposition that may be made them by those who are interested in this matter.

ISLE BRULÉE WHARF.

QUESTION.

MR. ROY enquired, Whether it is true that in the year 1877, and by order of the Government, instructions were given to Mr. Talbot, or any other person, authorizing an examination of locality and certain soundings in connection with the contemplated construction of a wharf at Isle Brulée, in the county of Kamouraska?

MR. MACKENZIE: I have not been able to ascertain that, and I would be glad if the hon. gentleman would repeat his question on a future day.

BAY OF CHALEURS RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

MR. ROBITAILLE enquired, Whether the Government considered the Bay of Chaleurs Railway a feeder of the Intercolonial Railway, and whether it is the intention of the Government to aid in the construction of the said railway by the loan or gift of iron or steel rails, or in any other manner?

MR. MACKENZIE: I am not aware what is known as the Bay of Chaleurs Railway. I have no knowledge of its location, or of where it begins, or where it ends; and it would be impossible for me, without such information, to answer the second part of the question. I would be very glad if the hon. gentleman would give me some information on that point, which he might do privately; and I would be afterwards prepared to answer his question.

MIRAMICHI VALLEY RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in the distribution of iron rails to feeders of the Intercolonial Railway, to appropriate any and what quantity of old rails to aid in the construction of the Miramichi Valley Railroad—a road which will be one of the most important feeders which the Intercolonial can possibly have?

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, I do not know that it is one of the most important feeders of the Intercolonial Railway; it may be so, and it may not. That is not a question. It is a matter open to debate.

MR. SPEAKER: That part of the question is out of order.

MR. MITCHELL: He need not answer that part of the question. My object is gained.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, Mr. Speaker, the Government have no iron rails to dispose of, or that they intend to dispose of, and what they do not have would be of very little use. The Order in Council which was passed under the authority of a resolution of this House disposed of all the rails that the Railroad Superintendent said would be available; and, as I said in reply to a question put on another day by my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. MacKay) if the roads which have had the rails assigned to them are not proceeded with, it would be then open for Parliament to make some other decision with respect to those rails that would not be used by the roads to which they were assigned.

TELEGRAPH LINE FROM CHATHAM TO ESCUMINAC.

QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to construct a line of telegraph from Chatham to Escuminac, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee of the House last Session?

MR. MACKENZIE: I have no recollection of the recommendation of any Committee on the subject; but the subject has not been discussed by the Government at all.

MR. MITCHELL: I can tell the hon. gentleman that a Committee did recommend it.

PASSENGER AND FREIGHT DEPOT AT ST. JOHN, N. B.

QUESTION.

MR. DOMVILLE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to purchase any land in the vicinity of the passenger and freight depot at St. John, N.B., with a view of erecting a new station-house for passengers; if such is the intention, what properties are proposed to be purchased?

MR. MACKENZIE: The Government have no intention of the kind at the present moment. The subject has been under discussion in the Department, because the hon. gentleman is aware that this passenger station is at least a very unsatisfactory one; and the Government have been considering what steps should be taken to effect some improvement there; but no decided action has been resolved upon with respect to any properties, or, indeed, as to the precise plans which may have to be adopted, only something will have to be done before long to remedy existing evils at this station.

FOG-WHISTLE ON RACE ROCKS.

QUESTION.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to construct a fog-whistle on Race Rocks, in accordance with the recommendation of the Agent of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for British Columbia.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland): I may say to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, that the Government have not come to any conclusion on this subject yet, but it is now under the consideration of the Government.

MILITARY CAMPS OF INSTRUCTION.

QUESTION.

Mr. THOMPSON (Haldimand) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to form Military Camps of Instruction this year; if so, at what points and of what strength?

Mr. JONES (Halifax): I may state to the hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that this question is under the consideration of the Government, and is not yet decided upon.

SURVEY OF PACIFIC RAILWAY BETWEEN RED RIVER AND BATTLEFORD.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved for all reports of Engineers, memorials, papers and correspondence relating to the survey and location of the line of the Pacific Railway, between the Red River and Battleford, and not heretofore laid before Parliament, and also all reports, memorials, papers and correspondence relating to the proposed line of said railway between the same points but south of Lake Manitoba. He said, in making this motion, he conceived that the importance of the location of the Pacific Railway, or any part of it, was such, bearing as, it did on the settlement of the North-West, that it justified him in detaining the House for a few moments while he pointed out the reasons why he wished these papers to be brought down; and what report it was that he found was missing from among the published reports of the Engineer of the Pacific Railway. All the eyes of the Dominion were now turned towards the North-West, and he thought that, in a very short time, it would be found that the politics of this country would greatly tend to centre on the proper method of developing and settling that great country. He had had the very great pleasure last summer of paying a visit to the Province of

Manitoba. He did not intend to trespass upon the time of the House by giving his views as to the sights he had there seen, or the pleasure he had derived from his trip; but he might merely say that, though he had read a good deal about that Province, and about the fertility, the richness, and the productiveness of the soil, as well as about the natural resources of the country and the sturdy character of its people, he was almost inclined to say that the half of the truth, in these respects, had not been told them. He had been very agreeably surprised to find what was the nature of that country, and that the Dominion possessed such a region, open and ready for settlement by the people of our own Province, and by the thousands who were destined to come to come to this Dominion from the old country and the other countries of Europe. It was evident that the proper settlement of this territory must be a matter of chief importance to this House. The great amount of public money which was being expended there justified both sides of the House in looking upon this question irrespective of party interests; and he was sure that the country, and he hoped that the Government, also, would not consider this motion respecting the location of a portion of the line from any party point of view, but as a matter which was to be settled in conformity with the best interests of the country. Hon. members would be aware that, for all practical purposes, as he supposed, they must take it for granted that the location of the Pacific Railway east of Red River was settled upon. A large amount of money had been spent there; but no important amount of money had been as yet expended west of Red River except for the construction of the Telegraph Line. The question as to the location of the Pacific Railway west of Red River was still open for consideration. It was true that His Excellency the Governor-General in his Speech from the Throne at the opening of Parliament had informed the House that the reports and surveys were now completed, and the location of the line settled upon, with the exception, perhaps, of the British Columbia section. He knew that the location of the line had been determined upon, so far as the engineers were concerned, west of Red River, and as far as Battleford at all events; but he proposed to call the attention of the House and Government to some facts connected with the line, in the hope that the hon. the Minister of Public Works might yet look into the matter and see whether or not the location that had been made was the correct one. He was not prepared to admit that the surveyors and the engineers were the best persons to settle the policy of this country or the policy as to where this railroad should run. It was upon the Government that they must cast the responsibility for this decision—the Government who possessed the confidence of the country must take the responsibility, and they must not shirk it by stating that the engineers reported in favour of this or of that route, and therefore they must accept it at all hazards without any further enquiry. Engineers, they knew, were like all professional men—they were apt to become very much prejudiced sometimes, and to take peculiar views.

MR. HOLTON: Hear, hear.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said that an engineer would want to get a straight line, or to avoid some other difficulty, and would not locate such a line altogether from the point of view that the interests of the country or the policy of the country demanded. The very Bill which had been introduced that afternoon by the hon. the Minister of the Interior gave evidence of this. We were spending millions of money in building the Pacific Railway, and we had located it so far out in a certain direction that it was not going to benefit that country, and the Government had brought down a measure that day to give more public land and public money at the rate of $10,000 a mile, because if we gave the land we were giving the money's worth. We were going to give large subsidies to more railways in order to build them in the same direction as the Pacific Railway, leading out to the west, showing that we were not going to build only the Pacific Railway but two Pacific Railways, in particular, if the location of this line west of Red River was persisted in, as was the case at present. Hon. gentlemen would be aware, from the reports, that the Pacific Railway west of Red River was located to cross the Red River at Selkirk, a point about 30 miles north of Winnipeg, and not far distant from the northern boundary of the Province of Manitoba. It then skirted across near the corner of Manitoba, and up on the east side of Lake Manitoba, to what were called the Narrows of Lake Manitoba. It was admitted in the reports presented to Parliament by Mr. Fleming, that this section of that country was not as good as that which lay south of Lake Manitoba; and it was on all sides admitted that the country lying south of Lake Manitoba, and stretching through the centre of the Province of Manitoba, was one of the richest description possible, and of the most fertile character, and the best adapted for settlement, perhaps, of any in the North-West. There was no land equal to it, perhaps, until one came to the Peace River District, in the far, far West; while, on the other hand, the land over which the line passed was of such a character that even the engineers were compelled to report that a great part of it was unfit for settlement. If this was the case, he then asked the House to now consider what report they had obtained with reference to the location of this road. They had this report of Mr. Fleming's, which had been brought down, and distributed among hon. members. It was a very pretty book, indeed; it was very nicely got up; and it contained a great deal of information; but in this book there was no report of the engineers who had traversed the section of the country between Selkirk and Mossy River, at the south end of Lake Winnipegosis. They had in it the report of Mr. Cunningham, an Engineer who had located the line from the south end of Lake Winnipegosis to Livingstone in the West, but as to the important tract of country lying between these points he could find no report.

MR. MACKENZIE: Between which points?

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Between Selkirk and Mossy River. Last year, before a Committee of the Senate, Mr. Fleming was examined on matters appertaining to this question; and Mr. Fleming then stated that this line was located by Mr. McLeod, who was also called as a witness; and he was asked: "Who located the line from Selkirk and Shoal Lake?"—that was part of the way between Selkirk and Mossy River—and Mr. McLeod replied: "It was located subsequently by Mr. Kerr." Now, no report had been brought down by Mr. Kerr that he could find in any of the reports. It was very strange that in all these reports all the engineers admitted that they had never gone over this section of the country in the summer. It had always been traversed by them in winter. Mr. McLeod, in his report, said he went west and south of Lake Manitoba, and returned back over the location of the line in winter, in the month of January; also that he passed over it in a few days. The lakes and swamps were then frozen over, and this engineer could not tell what was the character of the country. He said that he could tell when he came to a muskeg, and that was all. This was not the period of the year when the country ought to be examined. He was sorry to say that, in the Province of Manitoba, he had not heard any difference of opinion as to the selection of this line. He regretted to say that he had heard a universal condemnation of the location of the line between Selkirk and Livingstone. He did not take that as conclusive evidence, but he did take it as justifying him in looking into the matter, and as justifying the Government to look further into the matter to see whether a mistake had been made by their engineers or not. He was there last summer,—he was free to admit that it was a very wet summer,—and he saw the Bishop of Rupert's Land, who had just come down from the Narrows of Lake Manitoba. He asked him some questions about the country, and the Bishop said it was very wet, and that the country through which the railroad was going to cross was all under water. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) said it could be drained. The Bishop shrugged his shoulders and said that the land was below the level of the

MR. KIRKPATRICK.

Lake, and it would be very difficult to drain it. This was such an astonishing statement that he made some further inquiries; and he found a gentleman there, a very intelligent man, who was a sub-contractor and helped to put up the Pacific Telegraph line, who went over this country with the view of taking a sub-contract from Sifton, Ward and Company, contractors from Selkirk West. He would mention this gentleman's name in order to give his friends opposite every authority that he had. This gentleman's name,—a rather ominous one for hon. gentlemen opposite,—was Macpherson. They were told that all the people who came from the country of the Macphersons had predatory instincts; but he had not heard any accusation that they had lying instincts. He did not suppose that there was any charge of unveracity against the Highland races; therefore he would take what this sub-contractor told him about the line until he found it was not correct. He described to him that he had gone over this tract of country with the view of taking a contract, and that he travelled from the Red River westward along the located line,—he went in the month of June,—and when they came to the muskegs, five or six miles west of Red River, they had to cross them on snow-shoes in the month of June, and even then he said they sometimes broke through up to their middle. He told him that he had a pole with him 20 feet long, pointed with iron, and they could not find bottom with it. These statements caused him (Mr. Kirkpatrick) to look into the matter, and he found the engineers admitted that there were some muskegs there. But Mr. Fleming stated,—Mr. Fleming, who had never been over the road, stated that the muskegs were only two or three feet deep. Where was the report of the engineer which proved that? The report of Mr. Kerr had not been brought down; Mr. McLeod had not been over it; Mr. McLeod stated that it had never been traversed in summer. There was one point which he had described by a person who had been over it in summer. There were very few persons who had been over it in summer, except the persons who put up the telegraph line. That was put up in winter; and he might remark, by way of parenthesis, that that telegraph line never ticked between the months of May and September, because all the poles had fallen down. They were put up in winter and fell in the summer into the swamps, because there was not land enough to support them. He looked at Mr. Fleming's report again about this line, and he found he described it as being in some places very low, but that it was capable of being drained into Lake Manitoba after they got past Shoal Lake and up near the Narrows. He said it would be 40 feet above the lake. Unless the road-bed was a sufficient height to prevent the frost from getting under it, it would certainly injure it; and, if they dug a ditch three feet deep, and raised the roadway three feet,—it ought to be that height, at any rate, if the grade was forty feet above Lake Manitoba,—there would be no difficulty in carrying off the water. Now, there was a report from Mr. Fleming, an eminent gentleman, but that report was not gained from any personal inspection of the country. He took it from his engineers. He had got another book by Mr. Fleming, in which he described this country; and he would ask the serious attention of the House to the character of this country which he described, as to its capability of being drained. In this report of the Canadian Pacific Railway for 1877, at page 97, he found a very useful table of the levels of all the various stations on the Pacific Railway. The level of Lake Superior as the starting point, and then the height of every eight mile station above Lake Superior. He found for thirty-eight miles before they reached Lake Manitoba on this located line, the land was sixteen to twenty-four feet below the level of Lake Manitoba. Could any one suppose that this report was correct? Here they found it shown, and there could be no question about it. The level of Lake Manitoba above Lake Superior was 253 feet; Mr. Fleming said correctly that it was 750 feet above the level of the sea. The next station before they came to it was 229 feet above the level of Lake Superior; the next station was 232 feet; the next station was 245; the next station was 247 feet—all below the level of Lake Manitoba. How were they going to drain this lake? How were they going to make an embankment which would be 40 feet above the level of the lake for 38 miles,—an embankment over 40 feet in height, even if the land was level with Lake Manitoba? He called the attention of the Minister of Public Work to this report, and to the levels that were there given; and asked him what explanation could be given to the country for this extraordinary statement? Did this evidence or did it not bear out the statement that he (Mr. Kirkpatrick) heard in Manitoba,—that they heard from all sides in Manitoba? He asked the hon. members from Manitoba to tell the House whether it was not there currently reported that the land was below water, and whether it was not authoritatively borne out by the report on the table of the House. To show the character of this report, Mr. Fleming said on page 39 that, for about twelve miles up to the Narrows of Lake Manitoba, the level was generally low; he had shown them that it was below the lake level, and he asked the House to look into it, and see whether this report was correct. What did they find in the evidence that was taken before the Senate Committee last year, as to the minuteness of this survey which had been made? They were told that it had cost some six millions of dollars to get this survey of the Pacific line made; and yet they found no report of this important section between these two points. They found the evidence given that they did survey it south of Lake Manitoba; but in what manner? They never put an instrument over it; they simply went by the cart trail, and where the cart trail crossed these gullies of the Little Saskatchewan and some other rivers, they could not see a place to cross it. They said these large gullies would be so expensive to cross as to preclude the possibility of constructing a line that way. There had been some old surveyors sent up there to survey it, and they were called and examined; and they gave a very different statement,—that there were plenty of places, if they went up one side of this cart trail—plenty of good points to cross the Little Saskatchewan and other rivers; showing that the surveys of Mr. Fleming's engineers had not been of that complete nature in this important section of the country,—the first part of the country that they wanted to get settled, the first part of the great North-west where they wished to attract population, where there were thousands of bushels of grain waiting to be transported, and where the necessity of constructing railways was so evident that hon. gentlemen had brought in a Bill to construct a railway which should be a rival to their own Pacific Railway, instead of building a railway through the Province of Manitoba. He was told on good authority that there were not a dozen farms capable of being settled upon for miles on this located line,—on this marshy country that he had called attention to. In consequence of this report to the Senate Committee last year, Mr. Fleming himself admitted that it would be desirable to make a more thorough examination of the land south of Lake Manitoba; and Mr. Marcus Smith was sent out there, and had given his report, which hon. members would find at the end of the annual report of the Minister of Public Works for 1877, wherein he described the two or three lines which were proposed to be located. He suggested a deviation to Caerlaverock, a deviation to Quill Lake, and a deviation to Swan River. Mr. Smith passed over this line from Barclay; he did not make any extensive examination of it; but seemed to refer principally to the reports which had been made some years ago, and he wound up his report in this way:—

“From all the information obtained up to this time, it does not appear advisable that any alteration should be made in the line as located in this district. There, however, appears to be a feasible line, which, after passing the south end of Lake Manitoba, takes a northwesterly course, skirting the eastern base of the Riding Mountains and the north end of Duck Mountain and joining the located line in the valley of Swan River. The country is described as level and thickly wooded with spruce, poplar and some maple. Small lakes, surrounded by extensive marshes, are, however, found throughout this district.”

“From the level of Fort Pelly there is no difficulty in descending over the low ground to Duck Mountain from Swan River. The country was found, on examination, to be nearly level, thickly wooded with spruce, poplar, and some maple. A few small lakes and marshes were also found; soil, sandy loam, and admirably adapted for farming. Generally speaking, the land between Fort Pelly and Lake Manitoba is, for the most part, well wooded, and the soil is of excellent quality.”

Now, this line, where they had excellent land, was disregarded. This feasible line, which Mr. Marcus Smith reported as feasible, was disregarded. Why? Because it would make a line perhaps from twenty to thirty miles longer. Now, this House had no evidence—and the Government, if they had any evidence, had not laid it before the House—to show that the line south of Lake Manitoba would be twenty or thirty miles longer than the located line. There was no evidence that they would be able to go in a straight line from Selkirk to the Narrows of Lake Manitoba, as they proposed to go. There was, on the contrary, plenty of evidence to show that they had to make considerable detours to get around these muskegs and swamps; or they would have to erect extensive works in order to cross them; and this line, where no settlement could take place, where people could not be induced to live, and where no crops could be raised, was taken in preference to the garden of the North-west,—to the garden of the prairie Province,—because it was some twenty or thirty miles shorter. Had it come to this, that the policy of this country, in settling that line, was to retard the settlement of the North-west, in order that they might have from ocean to ocean a Pacific Railroad twenty miles shorter? If that was the policy, let the House know it. He did not believe that this House or the country would endorse it. He did not believe they would say that for the sake of saving twenty miles in the length of the Pacific Railway they would go through two or three hundred miles of country incapable of settlement, leaving land admirably adapted for settlement, where the people were to-day waiting for the construction of this line, where it should be the first duty of the Government to construct the line,—where, contemporaneously with constructing the line east of Red River, they should be constructing it west of Red River, where there was a population waiting to find an outlet for their produce. He would ask the hon. the Minister of Public Works to scrutinise carefully these reports that had been laid before him, and not to take his engineers' word as gospel for everything. He would ask that hon. gentleman to find out which of these engineers had gone over this land in summer. He would like to find out whether they had sounded these muskies, and how it turned out they had located the line sixty feet below the level of the lake into which they proposed to drain the country. In order to show the House and the country that these reports were not to be confided in as they ought to be, and could not be trusted, he would call the attention of the House to something which appeared there, which was a blunder of so egregious a nature as to call for the dismissal of the engineer, if it was his blunder, or if it was the blunder of the Government it was of so egregious a character as to call for the dismissal of the Government that perpetrated it. They had authority from this House to construct a Pacific Telegraph line after the line was located. They sent their surveyors out to locate that line. These surveyors sent in their location of that line, and upon these reports, after the line was located, they gave out their contract for the telegraph. What did they find? The contract No. 2, from Livingston to Edmonton, was given out, and the specifications stated that it was entirely through prairie country. The contractor took his contract on that basis; but, when he came to go into it and put up his telegraph line, it was found that for 140 miles it was through a dense wood. Surveyors had gone over this line, and had sent in their reports to the Government, that the line was through prairie country, and the contract was given out on that basis; and yet it was found for 140 miles to be through a dense wood. How could the Government justify that? In the interview that he had with the contractor, he told him that for 140 miles it was through a dense wood. His contract was for 517 miles.

MR. TUPPER: Fuller's contract?

MR. KIRKPATRICK said it was Richard Fuller's contract. He asked if these fact did not justify him in asking the House to pass this resolution, asking that these reports be brought down, especially the report of Mr. Kerr, the reports of any engineers who had gone over that line, and not merely the reports of any engineer who had gone south of Lake Manitoba, also any addresses that had come down from the Legislature of Manitoba, and any correspondence that would show the nature of the country through which this line had been located by the Government or by their engineers? He hoped the motion would pass, and that it would cause the Minister of Public Works to look into this matter again, to see whether some change could not yet be made in the location of the line.

MR. RYAN said the question of the location of the Canadian Pacific Railroad west of Selkirk was of the utmost importance to his constituents. The Pembina Branch traversed the whole length of the county of Provencher and crossed the whole breadth of the county of Selkirk; both the Pembina Branch and Canadian Pacific, east of Red River, ran through the county of Lisgar. But, unless the location of the Canadian Pacific west of Red River were changed to the south of Lake Manitoba, the county of Marquette would be left without railroad communication until such time as private enterprise should supply the want. The county of Marquette was territorially very large, embracing between one-half and two-thirds of the Province. In the western part of the county were found the largest agricultural settlements, and the most extensive farms that existed in the Province. For several years past the farmers of West Marquette had raised more grain than the whole of the rest of the Province. During the past season their surplus produce amounted to between 250,000 and 300,000 bushels. When he left Portage La Prairie there was not any local market for grain; the nearest being Winnipeg, sixty-one miles to the east, where sixty cents per bushel was then being paid. The ordinary freight rates from Portage La Prairie was fifty cents per hundred weight, or about thirty cents per bushel. If a farmer undertook to freight his own wheat to Winnipeg, it took him four or five days to make the trip. He could take between thirty and thirty-five bushels at a load with one team. By the time he paid his hotel bills and got home, there was comparatively very little left to pay him for his thirty or thirty-five bushels of wheat and his four or five days' work. Very many farmers in West Marquette, whose granaries were bursting with wheat, who had from five hundred to two thousand bushels of grain, could not raise fifty dollars in cash. The result of the position was that, unless an effort were made to give the farmers in that county some practicable outlet for their surplus, they would not be justified in raising more grain than they could themselves take off, without hiring help. Agricultural implements and machines, everything that had to be imported into the Province, was excessively dear; labour, as in all new countries, was dear; and the opinion of the most intelligent farmers in Marquette was that, until the present state of affairs was altered by the opening up of the county by a railroad, it would not pay to raise grain more than they could themselves and with their own families harvest. These were, it is true, local considerations, but they were of such a nature as to affect the interests of the Province, and, in a certain measure, those of the Dominion. He was well aware that the location of the Canadian Pacific Road was, to the full extent, a national question, to be decided upon broad national reasons. As such he had always endeavoured to treat it, and proposed still to do. Unless he and the other advocates of the Southern route could show to the House that it was in the interest not only of the county of Marquette, not only of the Province of Manitoba, but in the interest of the Canadian nation, that the road should go south of Lake Manitoba, they could not expect the location to be changed. This was what he proposed to show to the House. No single utterance of any public man had done so much to create and direct public opinion in the House and throughout the Dominion on the subject as the speech of the Premier delivered in the House during the Session of 1875. He did not know whether or not it was strictly in order to quote the speech, but, as he desired to put the case fairly, and, as the argument in favour of the Northern route could not be more strongly put than it was by the Premier, he would venture to quote those portions of the speech relating to the question. In the Hansard of 1875, page 507, the hon. the Minister of Public Works was reported as follows:—

“The distance from Red River to Fort Pelly is 280 miles, and of that distance there are only, so far as we know at present and I think we have information of nearly the whole route, about eighty miles of prairie, the remaining 200 miles passing through an exceedingly fine woodland country, where the best timber is to be found that has yet been discovered in any portion of the North-West Territories, and on the whole, it presents the most favourable features possible for a railway. The gradients are easy, the line is direct, and the timbers and the land are of the finest. It is quite true that this change of route caused some disappointment to the people of the town of Winnipeg and those living south-west of Lake Manitoba, where it was originally supposed the railroad would pass; but we cannot allow the general welfare of the public to be sacrificed for the benefit of a locality; and the committee will see it would be very seriously sacrificed if the former route was adopted, when I tell them the route we have adopted is thirty miles shorter than the one originally proposed, and we will save, at the very least, $1,100,000 by taking the route we have taken—a route which we are led to believe passes through, at least, an equally favourable country.”

It was not a matter for wonder that such a speech, under all the circumstances of its deliverance, should have exercised a very great influence on public opinion. It was made not only by the First Minister of the Crown, but by the Minister of Public Works of the Dominion, who, as such, had every possible means of obtaining information on the subject. If the statements contained in the speech were true, then there was an end of argument, and he and those, who, like him, advocated the Southern Route had only to accept the situation. But he did not believe that they were true, and he thought he would be able to produce testimony on the point, which if not as full as he could desire, would at least be sufficient to satisfy the House. The arguments of the Premier in favour of the Northern Route resolved itself into the following four propositions:—

1st. That between Selkirk and Livingstone, 280 miles, there were 200 miles of exceedingly fine woodland country and 80 miles of prairie.

2nd. That the country traversed by the Northern Route was, at least, equally as good as that traversed by the Southern Route.

3rd. That the Northern Route was thirty miles shorter.

4th. That the Northern Route would cost at least $1,100,000 less than the Southern.

He contended that of these four propositions not a single one was true, and that the Premier, when he made them, was not in possession of that full information which alone could have justified his assertion of them. With respect to that portion of the line between Selkirk and Shoal Lake, a distance of forty-six miles, and the portions between Shoal Lake and Mossy River, a distance of 126 miles, it was an unfortunate circumstance that the reports of the location surveys by Messrs. Carr and McLeod had not been given in the Report of the Canadian Pacific Surveys of 1877. He did not like to impute improper motives, but he felt that he would not be discharging his duty if he did not at least comment on their absence. If a very strong and especial necessity existed for the publication of any of the reports of surveys, it existed with respect to those two, for the reason that there existed a rival line to the one to which they related; a rival line which, while it would be immeasurably more favourable to the interests of Manitoba, would also, its advocates maintained, be more favourable to the interests of the Dominion. Even if it could be established that the located line was the one that ought to be chosen in the interests of the Dominion, it was only fair to the people of Manitoba that the fullest information within the reach of the Government should be afforded them, so that they might know that they were not called upon to see their interests sacrificed before the public weal required it. He could not help regretting the non-publication of these reports. As to the quality of the land and the quantity and quality of wood on the Northern Route, he would give the House evidence collected from various sources. With respect to the portions between Selkirk and Mossy River, he could not, for the reasons alluded to, give the reports of Messrs. Carr and McLeod as he would have liked to do. The Blue-book which he held in his hand was the Report of Minutes of Evidence taken before the Committee of the Senate appointed to inquire into and report on the route of the Canadian Pacific Railway, from Keewatin westward, etc. He would read from the report the evidence of a Mr. Frank Clayton, who, in reply to the following questions, gave the following answers (pages 24 and 25):—

“By the Hon. Mr. Aikins:—

“Q. You have the field notes and maps of that portion of Manitoba where it has been surveyed east and west of Lake Manitoba?—Yes; I have charge of all those notes.

“Q. Could you refer to them and tell us what they show with reference to that country between Selkirk and the Narrows of Lake Manitoba, in the vicinity of the location line of Railway?—It must cross that belt to go to the Narrows. The country immediately adjoining the located line to the north-east, near the Narrows, is described by Mr. Dubé in his official report to the Department of block-outlines comprising Townships 21 to 24, Ranges 4 to 9, west of the principal meridian, as follows:—

“The surface throughout the whole extent of country above mentioned is comparatively level, or gently undulating, there being alternating stretches of low, wooded ridges in the highest places not exceeding ten or twelve feet above the general level and swampy land with marshes and muskegs. These alternating ridges and marshes have a general north-westerly direction about parallel to the shore of Lake Manitoba. The ridges are composed of clay or clayey loam, with limestone gravel, and in some places, beyond a distance ten or fifteen miles from the lake, very stony. The marshes and muskegs are numerous, many of the latter being impassible for carts, and contain numerous small lakes and ponds. There are also several lakes of fair size, which, during the summer season, are the abode of numberless wild fowl. The largest of these lakes is Dog Lake, which is over twelve miles long by six or seven wide, occupying the westerly part of Range 8 west, and the easterly part of Range 9 west, in the

Townships 23 and 24, and I apprehend it is about forty square miles in extent. In this lake fish of several kinds, including gold-eyes, whitefish and pike, abound. In Township 24, Range 4 west, is another marshy lake which, with its marshy shores, includes not less than a whole township in extent. The third is Swan Lake, occupying the north-west part of Range 5 west and the north-east part of Range 6 west, in Township 21, and, with its surrounding marsh, is over ten square miles in extent. The fourth in extent, and nearly as large as the last, is situate in the easterly part of Township 23, Range 5 west. From these, in decreasing extent, are lakes and ponds innumerable. One of which, about half a square mile in extent, situate in the northerly part of Section 13, Township 22, Range 5 west, is remarkable on account of its being surrounded (except three or four short breaks) by a natural stone wall from four to eight feet thick and two to five feet high above the surrounding marsh. The lake is shallow, with shelving beach of clay and gravel and bottom of fine soft mud; it has some small fish, but no apparent inlet or outlet. The soil of that part along the shore of Lake Manitoba, and extending from ten to fifteen miles inland, and also that around Dog Lake, is rich black loam of excellent quality, though in some places the limestone gravel crops out in some of the ridges. At greater distances from Lake Manitoba the ridges are in many places very stony. The timber throughout is chiefly poplar of the three kinds found in Manitoba, and commonly known as white poplar or aspen, black poplar or balm of Gilead, and cottonwood; the latter, though less plentiful, attains greater size than the others. On the points of ridges which terminate at lakes or large muskegs, some oak is to be found, generally of small size; some of a fair size and quality are found along the shores of Lake Manitoba, while scattered over the country east of Dog Lake, and from about the sixth correction line northwards, some spruce is found, generally of small size, though in some instances attaining a diameter of two feet or more at the stump.

“The Canada Pacific Railway and Telegraph line runs from Section 5, Township 21, Range 5 west, about north 50° west to the Narrows of Lake Manitoba, about Section 23, Township 24, Range 10 west.”

The field notes above quoted referred to the country east of the Narrows of Lake Manitoba and west of Selkirk. Mr. S. J. Dawson also gave the following evidence to the Committee, in reply to questions asked by the Hon. Mr. Aikins:—

“Q. Have you been over the located line from Selkirk westward to the Narrows?—I have, not been over the direct line. Many years ago I explored the country and passed not far from where that line now is.

MR. RYAN.

“Q. What is the adaptability of the soil for immediate settlement?—It struck me at the time as being a low swampy region between the Stone Fort and Lake Manitoba.

“Q. Did you find the country interspersed with numerous muskegs, and occasional areas of better soil?—That is the character of the country.

“Q. Would your remarks apply to that portion of the line immediately west of Selkirk on the located line, or to the country further west?—Immediately west of Selkirk the land is tolerably good, but it soon becomes low and swampy.”

Although the report of the location survey between Shoal Lake and Mossy River, made by Mr. H. A. F. McLeod, (a distance of 126 miles) had not been published, yet that gentleman has given the following evidence before the Committee (pages 36 and 37):—

“Q. You have located a portion of this line in connection with the Pacific Railway survey?—Yes; I have located the line from Shoal Lake to Mossy River, the outlet of Dauphin Lake.

“By the Hon. Mr. Sutherland:—

“Q. Does the line run through a portion of the lake?—No; you can hardly call it a Narrows; it is quite a small pond a foot or so deep.

“Q. What season of the year were you there?—I think it was in the beginning of November.

“Q. Was the ground frozen?—It was about the 10th November, and we had snow when we commenced.

“Q. Is there any valuable timber in the region you surveyed?—No; it is not valuable except for fuel. It is principally poplar. There is some oak along the lake—small sized oak.

“Q. Did you observe any trace of fire in that country?—Yes; there had been fires in that country long ago, but not lately.”

Mr. Milner Hart answered the following questions before the Committee in the following manner (page 14):—

“Q. What is the character of the country east of Lake Manitoba? Have you been there?—Yes, I have been there. I do not call it a very good country; it is not as good land as that to the south of Lake Manitoba. It is a gravelly country, full of large swamps.

“By the Hon. Mr. Scott:—

“Q. Is there much wood in it?—Yes; it is full of poplar timber.

“Q. Not such forests as we have here?—No; islands of timber.

“Q. What is the extent of those groves?—Perhaps about fifty acres in each grove, with swamps between. The woody islands are gravelly soil, and dry.

“ By Hon. Mr. Aikins :—

“ Q. What is the country between Shoal Lake and Lake Wiunipeg ?—It is a tolerably good country.

“ Q. Is it fit for grazing or tillage ?—It is fit for grazing more than for tillage.”

Mr. E. W. Jarvis, giving evidence before the same Committee, gave the following answers :—

“ Q. Have you been through the country between the west side of Red River and the Narrows of Lake Manitoba ?—No ; I have never been up there. I cannot speak as to the kind of country there is in that section, except from hearsay.

“ Q. Is the telegraph line constructed from Selkirk west to the Narrows ?—Yes.

“ Q. Do you know that there has been any difficulty in keeping up the line from Selkirk to Northcote ?—Yes ; there has been great difficulty in keeping it up. A year ago the line was down for two or three months.

“ Q. Do you know why the line was down ?—Yes ; the poles had been stuck up in the snow and frozen moss, and when the snow melted they fell. The contractor could not get in there in the summer, and he had to do the work in the winter.

“ Q. Why could he not get in there in the summer ?—I believe it was too swampy to go in there in summer.

“ Q. Has the line been repaired ?—Yes ; it has been repaired.

“ Q. When ?—It was repaired last summer,—sometime last July.

“ Q. Why were the facilities for re-erecting the line in the summer greater than they were before, when the line was constructed ?—I do not presume the facilities were any greater, but absolute necessity compelled them to go in there to open up the line again. The trouble was to go in there originally. The materials were distributed along the line in the winter, and there would be no very great difficulty after that in re-erecting the poles in the summer.

“ Q. Do you know whether those surveys were made across the Narrows in winter or summer ?—I believe surveying parties were out at both seasons, but I heard parties speaking of the difficulties of locating a line there in summer. I never travelled over that line myself.”

From the Report of the Canadian Pacific Railway, 1877, pages 186 and 187, he read the following extracts from the report of G. C. Cunningham :—

“ The timber at the commencement of the survey at Mossy River is chiefly grey poplar of sound quality, and from ten to fifteen inches in diameter. The country here may be described as alternate strips of timbered land and meadow, the timbered land bearing to the meadow the proportion of about two to one. This character of country and timber gradually changes as we ascend towards the Duck Mountain, the timber becomes larger and the opens fewer.

“ On turning the north-east corner of the Duck Mountain, we enter the valley of the Swan River, and here the timber is not so good, owing to the fact of the country having been burnt over some ten years ago, for a distance of 20 miles along the railway. The large timber has consequently fallen, and a thick undergrowth of poplar has sprung up.

“ It will thus be seen that for the length of the surveyed line from the Mossy River to the Fort Pelly Barracks (100 miles) with the single slight exception noted above, timber can be obtained on the line of railway in sufficient quantities to meet the requirements of construction, and for a considerable distance, namely, from the 25th to the 60th mile the timber is of such quality and in such quantity as to render it valuable as an article of commerce.”

Mr. Cunningham, the engineer, from whose report of an explanatory survey the above extracts were taken, claimed it was true that, throughout the whole hundred miles between Mossy River and Livingstone, the soil was rich and fertile, excepting the last ten miles running along the edge of the gorge of the Swan River Valley, where he admitted the soil is stony and light. He also admitted that there were a considerable number of swamps on the line. His opinion of the quality of the land was in a measure contradicted by the evidence of D. E. R. Lucas, given before the Senate Committee as follows :—

“ By the Hon. Mr. Aikins :—

“ Q. You located a portion of the Pacific Railway line ; from where ?—From the south end of Lake Winnipegosis to Livingstone.

“ Q. At what season of the year did you locate that ?—In winter.

“ Q. Have you ever been over it in summer ?—Yes ; I was over it on the exploratory survey during the previous summer.

“ Q. What is the character of the soil through which that line passes ?—I know nothing as to the soil. It is woody and probably sandy soil.

“ Q. You could judge pretty much from the timber as to the character of the soil ?—The timber is spruce, tamarac, poplar, and a good deal of swamp elm. There is very large spruce timber around the Duck Mountain.”

And also by the report of Marcus Smith, the acting chief engineer, who, on page 184, Report of the Minister of Public Works, 1877, said :

“ Beyond the first hundred miles west of Selkirk there is a long stretch of land of inferior and variable quality on both lines. But at the valley of the Swan River (222 miles from Selkirk) the located line enters on a very extensive fertile tract."

The land described by Mr. Cunningham as rich and fertile throughout, from Mossy River, westward, to the valley of the Swan River, is described as inferior and variable. He would give another extract from the report of Mr. Smith, who said on page 189 of the same Report:—

"The line (telegraph) is erected and in operation between Selkirk and Livingstone, 271 miles. Where it crosses certain lakes, ponds and marshes, a number of poles require to be more permanently secured."

So far as concerned the statement made by the Premier, that between Selkirk and Livingstone, the located line traversed 200 miles of the finest woodland country, where the best timber was to be found that had yet been discovered in any portion of the North-west country, the testimony quoted would establish beyond a doubt that the Premier was in error. The only testimony which went to prove that valuable woodland existed on the located line was that quoted from the report of Mr. Cunningham to the House, which only claimed that timber of quality and quantity to render it valuable as an article of commerce was found between the 25th and 60th mile west of Mossy River—a stretch of 35 miles which, after allowing for the intervening strips of swamp that the report stated separated the belts of wood, would be reduced to about 25 miles. The two hundred miles had dwindled to 25. As to the superior quality of the soil along the southern route, he thought he had evidence that would satisfy the House. E.W. Jarvis gave the following answers before the Senate Committee (page 19):—

"Q. Have you been over the tract of country from Winnipeg west to the Little Saskatchewan south of Lake Manitoba?—Yes; I have followed the northerly cart trail which touches Lake Manitoba.

"Q. In crossing the Little Saskatchewan have you been ten or twelve miles south of where the cart trail crosses it?—No; I have not.

"Q. What sort of country is it from Winnipeg to the Little Saskatchewan?—It is prairie nearly all the way.

"Q. Is the soil good or indifferent?—It is very good; it is one of the very best portions of Manitoba."

MR. RYAN.

Mr. Milner Hart, before the same Committee, also gave testimony (pages 12–14). Mr. Hart's testimony was, upon several grounds, entitled to very great weight. He had for several years held a responsible and important position under the Dominion Government in Manitoba; one which he had fulfilled with credit to himself and benefit to country. His character stood deservedly high as an official and a citizen. In the discharge of the duties of his office, as Inspector of Surveys, it was his duty to examine every survey that was made west of the Winnipeg meridian. In doing this he had traversed the Province in every direction west of Winnipeg, and west of the boundaries of the Province, wherever surveys had been made. He had probably seen more of the land between Winnipeg and the neighbourhood of Fort Ellice than any other living man. Many of the Government engineers, who ventured to speak of the quality of the land along the proposed Southern Route, had done nothing more than pass through the country on the old cart trails. It was well known that the obstacles to travel on the prairies of Manitoba and the North-West arose chiefly from the rich alluvial nature of the soil. A fall of rain that would be of no consequence where the soil was sandy, gravelly or stony, would render travel impossible on the best prairie land. Therefore it was that the old cart trails avoided the best agricultural lands, wherever it could be done, and followed the ridges which, as a rule, were more sandy or stony. Persons, therefore, who only travelled along those cart trails were frequently misled as to the quality of the soil throughout the country. Mr. Hart had travelled in all directions, at all seasons of the year, and his testimony was to the following effect:—

"By the Hon. Mr. Aikins:—

"Q. Have you been Inspector of Surveys in Manitoba and the North-West?—Yes.

"Q. What portion of the Province of Manitoba and the North-West did you inspect surveys in?—From Winnipeg, the principal meridian, westward.

"Q. How far west?—To range 26, west.

"Q. That would be as far as the neighbourhood of Fort Ellice?—About twelve miles east of that point.

“Q. What kind of country did you find from Winnipeg west to the boundary of the Province, as to soil?—The soil as a general thing is very good.

“By the Hon. Mr. Macpherson:—

“Q. How many miles would that be?—About seventy-eight miles. There is about ninety miles of good land to the boundary of the Province.

“By the Hon. Mr. Aikins:—

“Q. Would there be any difficulty in constructing a railway over this ninety miles?—None whatever. It is a very level country and dry. There are a few swamps south and west of Westbourne.

“Q. Are those swamps of any great extent?—Not very great; one of them extends to the west a few miles.

“Q. From the boundary of the Province to the Assiniboine, ninety miles westward, what kind of soil is there through that country?—There is about fifteen miles of sandy country to go through, a little west of the boundary. After that the soil is a fair sandy loam.

“Q. Is it inviting for settlement?—Yes, a very fair country for settlement.

“Q. Is there any timber?—The timber is scarce immediately along this base line, but north of the Riding Mountains there is an abundance of timber.

“Q. What extent of land has been explored north and south of the fourth base line?—I have inspected the whole of the survey west to the full extent of the Province, and from the boundary west to within ten miles of Fort Ellice, a belt thirty-six miles wide, between lat. 49.50 and 50.20.

“By the Hon. Mr. Macpherson:—

“Q. Do I understand you to say that the whole of the country, with the exception of the sandy belt fifteen miles wide, is a fine country for the production of cereals?—Yes, the greater portion of it is.

“Q. Is there any part of Ontario that you could compare it to?—From Red River to the south end of Lake Manitoba the land is so superior to anything I have ever seen, that it is difficult to make a comparison.

“Q. From Portage La Prairie westward—what is it like?—There is some land in the vicinity of Brantford I could compare it to. It is not heavy soil; it is sandy loam.

“Q. Then we are to understand that up to the western boundary of Manitoba the land is very superior, and west of that it is excellent?—Yes.”

As to the quality of the soil from the neighbourhood of Fort Ellice, where the evidence of Mr. Hart stopped, on to Thackeray, where the Southern road rejoined the located one, Mr. Alexander Russell, a very competent witness, gave the following testimony before the Committee (pages 25-26):—

“By the Hon. Mr. Aikins:—

“Q. You had charge of a party on the boundary survey under the British commission?—Yes.

“Q. You also had charge of a surveying party for the purpose of making a special survey from Winnipeg westward?—Yes.

“Q. What was the object, and what were your instructions?—The principal object was to determine longitude 102° west, as a base line for surveys.

“Q. Where did you start from?—From Winnipeg, at the Red River, and continued the line westward to Fort Ellice; thence seventy-five miles north; thence forty-eight miles west; thence twenty-four miles north; thence seventeen miles west.

“Q. From the 102nd meridian westward, what is the character of the soil?—It is a good sandy loam.

“Q. Did you go as far north as the railway line?—Within a very short distance of it; about fifteen miles south of the line.

“Q. What is the character of the country from Fort Ellice westward of the 102nd meridian?—The soil is good, but rather lighter than what I have described further west.

“Q. What kind of soil is it on the 102nd meridian?—It is sandy strips, but on the whole good throughout; fit for settlement with few exceptions.

“Q. What is the appearance of the country?—It is a rolling prairie, with small islands of timber on the southern part. On the eighth base there is a good deal more timber. The soil between Touchwood Hills and the Assiniboine is generally well adapted for settlement.”

Mr. S. J. Dawson, speaking before the Committee, on the comparative quality of the soil on the two routes, makes the following replies (page 35):—

“Q. Do you feel yourself in a position to offer an opinion as to the located line between Selkirk and Northcote?—In so far as my opinion goes, I would prefer the line going to the south of Manitoba Lake, but then there might be engineering difficulties which I am not aware of that would make it advisable to take the present line.

“By the Hon. Mr. Macpherson:—

“Q. Apart from the engineering difficulties, which line would you prefer as a road for the railway?—Apart from engineering considerations, I would judge the line south of Lake Manitoba to be the best, because it would pass over a very large extent of country fit for immediate settlement, and, at the same time, by tapping Manitoba Lake, it would open this lake road for settlement also.”

In comparing the quality of soil on the rival routes, Mr. Marcus Smith said (page 184, Report of Minister of Public Works, 1877):

"Comparing the extent of good lands that would be crossed by the located line and the suggested deviations, the latter have probably the advantage for the first 100 miles, viz.: to the western boundary of Manitoba, as the lands of the Province are generally fertile, and in that portion that would be traversed by the lines proposed, they are comparatively dry and free from timber; and are therefore eligible for rapid settlement; a good system of drainage, however, is required throughout the Province.

"Beyond the first 100 miles from Selkirk there is a long stretch of land of inferior and variable quantity on both lines. But at the valley of the Swan River the located line enters on a very extensive fertile tract. On the suggested deviations, after passing the boundary of the Province, the quality of the land becomes inferior, and only a small proportion is fit for cultivation westward, up to the bend of the North Saskatchewan. On the deviation from the Little Saskatchewan north-westward to Quill Lake there are considerable tracts of good land fit for cultivation."

As to the quality of the land on the Northern or located line, there was no reason to refuse the evidence of Mr. Smith as his subordinates had been over it. He (Mr. Smith) admitted that the land for the first 100 miles was inferior to the land on the Southern line. He also admitted that, from the end of the first 100 miles from Selkirk, the land was inferior and variable until the valley of the Swan River was reached, on the Northern line, a point 222 miles from Selkirk. The report of Mr. Cunningham, above quoted, showed the fertile portion of the Swan River to be 20 miles wide, after which no land fit for settlement would be found on the Northern line until the Nut Hills were reached, a point only 29 miles from Thackeray, where the two lines would unite, just north of the Touchwood Hills and near Quill Lake. A perusal of the report of D. E. R. Lucas, page 199 of the Canadian Pacific Railroad Report, 1877, and the conclusion of the report of H. A. F. McLeod, page 203 of the same work, would satisfy anyone that the land between Livingstone and the Nut Hills was unfit for settlement. But as to the quality of the land on the Southern Route, west of the boundary of the Province, he (Mr. Ryan) was not prepared to accept the testimony of Mr. Smith, because the Government engineers, having merely travelled through the country on the old trails, were not in the same position, for the reasons above given, to speak of the quality of the soil throughout the country, as were Messrs. Hart and Russell, who had pursued a different course. The testimony of Messrs. Hart and Russell proved that, on the Southern line, taking the Quill Lake deviation between Selkirk and Thackeray, the points of divergence and convergence of the two roads, a distance of about 359 miles, the whole country, with the exception of a sandy strip fifteen miles in width, was fit for settlement. This conclusion was strengthened by the fact that the latter part of the quotation, before given from the report of Marcus Smith, admitted that "on the deviation from the little Saskatchewan north-westward to the Quill Lake there are considerable tracts of good land fit for cultivation," thus in a measure contradicting the former part of the quotation. The whole weight of testimony, therefore, established the fact beyond question that, whereas the much greater portion of the Northern route was unfit for cultivation, the Southern route was all fit for settlement and cultivation, with the exception of a sandy strip about fifteen miles in width. As to the respective lengths of the routes, the Premier stated that the northern one was thirty miles shorter than the one originally proposed, and also that it would cost at least $1,100,000 less than the southern one. The Premier spoke of the one shown on the map published with Public Works Report, 1877 (page 184) as the Swan River deviation. He (Mr. Ryan) had never advocated the Swan River deviation, which, as any one could see by glancing at the map—two sides of a triangle being greater than the third—was longer than the located line. But, in order to show how recklessly the Premier had spoken, and how far wide of the mark he was in his calculations, he would take a glance at the question. The Engineer-in-Chief had submitted to the Senate Committee a calculation on the same subject; the House could contrast the two. Mr. Fleming said (page 5 Report Senate Committee):—

"You ask me to furnish you with the comparative distances of the located line and the route by Winnipeg, and the estimated cost, which I will now give you. The located line from Northcote to Selkirk is estimated to be twenty-four miles shorter than a line round the southerly end of Lake Manitoba running thence to Selkirk.

"The located line from Northcote to Selkirk is estimated to be thirty-two miles shorter than a line from Northcote by the south end of Lake Manitoba to Winnipeg and Selkirk.

"The cost of the first, allowing for track, rolling-stock, &c., would probably exceed the cost of the located line by $600,000; but as the located line involves an extension of the Pembina Branch twenty miles, that section may, in estimating the first cost, enter into the account; that would reduce the difference to about $100,000 in favour of the located line.

"To bring the main line round by Winnipeg from Selkirk, and around the south end of Lake Manitoba, the extra thirty-two miles may be estimated at $800,000; or if the twenty miles of the Pembina Branch be deducted, $300,000.

"The money spent east of Selkirk, on located line, to end of December..... $260,000

"West of Selkirk, on located line, up to same period, say..... 60,000
 $320,000

"I had some difficulty in estimating the cost, and I adopted a rule of proportion. Including grading, rails, rolling-stock, &c, I estimate it at $25,000 per mile. The difference between the cost of the two routes is $100,000 in favour of the located line.

"By the Hon. Mr. Aikins :

"Do you suppose the cost of construction would be so great, if you had not to carry the road through such soft ground as that near the Narrows?—I am not prepared to say that there would be any difference. I would not venture to say that it would cost any more or less. I would take them both at the same price."

The Premier asserted that the located line was 30 miles shorter and would cost $1,100,000 less than the Southern Route. The Chief Engineer estimated the located line 24 miles shorter, and, deducting the extension of the Pembina Branch, necessitated by adopting the Northern Route, 20 miles, would leave four miles in favour of the Northern Route, which, at $25,000 per mile (the amount adopted by the Chief Engineer) would amount to $100,000. The difference between the calculation of the Premier and that of his Chief Engineer was only a million of dollars. He (Mr. Ryan) had always believed that the Minister of Public Works, when giving the House information on such questions, took his figures and facts from his Chief Engineer; and he would like to hear the Minister of Public Works explain to the House and country the nature and sources of his information on this question, upon which he and his Chief Engineer differed so widely. But he (Mr. Ryan) was not prepared to accept the calculation of the Chief Engineer as it was; $25,000 per mile was altogether too high an estimate. It was well known that the Swan River deviation traversed a country at least equally as favourable for railroad construction as that through which the Pembina Branch ran. The only river to be crossed on it was the White Mud river, which would cost little to bridge, as it was not wider than the length of the Chamber, and the banks were only a few feet higher than the stream. It was not assuming too much to say that the cost of the road could not, in any case, exceed that of the Pembina Branch per mile. The Minister of Public Works had, during the last Session, given them an estimate, of the cost per mile of that branch, to which he would call the attention of the House.

GRADING—$3,000 to $3,500 per mile.
 The Premier said from $3,000 upwards, not to exceed $3,500. (pages 1637-8 Hansard of 1877.)
 He (Mr. Ryan) would take the extreme sum..... $3,500

STEEL RAILS—The Premier estimated at $6,078 per mile, but he (Mr. Ryan) thought that too little, and would call it 90 tons at $54.62 per ton; from Montreal to Winnipeg $21.20; in all $75.82 per ton. (Page 1633 Hansard 1877)..... 6,823

ROLLING STOCK—Per mile. (Page 1633 Hansard of 1877)..... 2,000

TIES—2,400 per mile, at 40c. each being the same rate charged in Contract No. 15, C.P.R. Report 1877, page 390, and being about what they could be got for..... 960

BALLASTING—2,500 yards per mile at 33c. per yards. Contract No. 15, page 390, makes only 1,603 yards per mile..... 825

FISH PLATES—4½ tons per mile, at $54.62 per ton, at Montreal (page 385 C.P.R. Report 1877), freight to Winnipeg $21.20; in all $75.82 per ton..... 341

|---|----------|
| BOLTS AND NUTS—1,750lbs. per mile, at $93.29 at Montreal. Freight to Winnipeg $21.20; in all $114.49 | 100 |
| SPIKES—2½ tons per mile, at $40, and freight $21.20—$61.20..... | 153 |
| SURVEYING AND ENGINEERING—Say $500 per mile..... | 500 |
| Total, per mile..... | $15,492 |

Of course he was not an engineer, and for the smaller items which did not enter into the calculation made by the Premier, he had to take the estimates of gentlemen who were well acquainted with the subject. Although the Premier had estimated the cost of surveying, engineering, &c., at $1,500 per mile for the rough country between Lake Superior and the Red River, yet he felt sure that $500 per mile would cover the same expenses over the beautiful prairies south of Lake Manitoba. On the whole he, (Mr. Ryan) felt sure that the cost per mile would not exceed the $15,492, because he had calculated on the prices paid for rails, etc., in 1874 and 1875; whereas, it was well known that prices had fallen materially since then. The difference estimated by Mr. Fleming as four miles at $25,000 per mile in favour of the Northern Route would have to be reduced to four miles at $15,492, say $15,500 per mile or $62,000. And when it was considered that the Swan Lake deviation would avoid the heavy bridging of the narrows of Lake Manitoba and the numerous muskges between there and Selkirk, one could not avoid coming to the conclusion that the Swan Lake deviation would have been actually the least expensive. But he had never advocated the Swan River deviation, but always a road running south of the Riding Mountains. Of the two deviations shown on the map referred to, and called the Quill Lake deviation and the Caerlaverock deviation, both of which ran south of Riding Mountains, the Quill Lake one was preferable. It was a remarkable circumstance that, although the report of Marcus Smith stated that the Swan Lake deviation was from twenty to thirty miles longer than the located lines, and, although it stated that it required over nine miles of track to cross the valley of the Little Saskatchewan, yet it did not give any estimate of the comparative lengths of the Quill Lake and Caerlaverock deviations and the located line. He (Mr. Ryan) had got a competent person to scale them on the map, and the result obtained was that there was no appreciable difference. As no actual survey or measurement of these deviations had ever been made, other engineers who, like the Government ones, had merely walked over the ground, were just as well able to estimate the probable length. He would, therefore, give the results of a calculation made by Mr. Jarvis before the Keewatin Committee. (Page 23, Report Senate Committee):—

“Q. What would be the difference in length between the proposed line of yours and the located line between Keewatin and Caerlaverock Station at the elbow of the North Saskatchewan?—As near as I can scale it on the map, my line would be eleven miles shorter.

“Q. Without having chained the ground could you form an estimate?—Yes; I think from the map I could form an estimate sufficiently accurate.

“Q. Have you any means of forming an estimate of cost between the Southern Route and the located lines?—Starting from Keewatin, I should say the Southern Line would cost less,—because, although the expense may be somewhat heavier in the neighbourhood of the Riding Mountains,—all that expense would be more than balanced by the heavier work on Section 15 of the located line.

“By the Hon. Mr. Girard:—

“Q. Is there not a difficulty on the south line as compared with the located line?—Yes; there are difficulties at the crossing of the Assiniboine. That would be the heaviest work on the line. This Southern Line might be described as starting about two miles from Keewatin on the present line, and running westward to the north shore of Shoal Lake, thence to the Red River, crossing it a couple of miles north of Winnipeg, and passing eight miles south of the south shore of Lake Manitoba, and running due west to the Little Saskatchewan; thence in a general north-westerly direction to the Assiniboine River, near the mouth of Shell River, and from there direct to the junction of the present line at Caerlaverock.

“By the Hon. Mr. Wilnot:—

“Q. You say that that course is about eleven miles shorter than the present located line?—Yes.

“Q. Without requiring connection from Winnipeg to Selkirk?—It would not require a north branch from Winnipeg.

“By the Hon. Mr. Macpherson:—

“Q. You say, in calculating the distance, you have not considered the branch from Winnipeg to Selkirk at all?—No.

“Q. So that there would be a saving by your line of eleven miles in the length, and saving by not having to construct the branch of another twenty miles?—Yes; the total saving would be thirty-one miles of railway. Starting out from Selkirk from the end of the present located line, the saving would be about the same as starting from Keewatin, excepting the branch line to Selkirk. I make my calculations from Mr. Fleming’s map.

“Q. In the construction, the distance might be increased by the difficulties of the country, in 600 miles?—Yes. I see that the difficulties in crossing the Little Saskatchewan, which I spoke of in my former evidence, can be avoided by taking a route twelve miles south of the cart trail.”

It had been stated by Mr. Hart before the Committee that, for a length of four or five miles of its course, about twelve miles south of the cart trail, the Little Saskatchewan River could be crossed by a road at any point without difficulty. It was to be regretted that no explanation of this evidence had been given in the report by Mr. Smith. The Government had very properly spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in making exhausting surveys on other portions of the line where the difficulties were well nigh insuperable. It was due to the pioneers of Manitoba, the men who for the last five or six years had been fighting under great difficulties the battles of civilization upon the borders of the “Great Lone Land,” that an exhaustive survey of the country south of the Riding Mountains should be made, especially as the expenditure involved was, comparatively speaking, very small. In the interests of the nation, also, it was necessary that this should be done. He believed, as the result of inquiries he had made during the recess, that a better line than any yet suggested could be found. If the line ran west, as shown on the map, through Township Thirteen, until it reached the dividing line between Ranges seven and eight, it might be there deflected to the north-west, and passing by Palestine, could cross the Little Saskatchewan, near the Riding Mountain House, where its valley was contracted to a gorge some 200 feet wide and about 200 feet deep, and keeping close by the southern flank of the Riding Mountains it would escape all the broad, deep valleys of streams running into the Assiniboine, and rejoin the Quill Lake deviation at Shell River. Of course, such a line would be very direct, and, while it would undoubtedly traverse a better country than any of the other routes, it would be, perhaps, the shortest possible line. It was not for him to say positively that such a line was possible; he had heard it favourably spoken of, and he believed that it was the duty of the Government to be in a position to say that they had all requisite information on the subject, and that it either was, or was not, possible. From Lake Superior to Selkirk, the road must needs go through an inferior country, and one unfit for settlement; it seemed to him, an unpardonable folly, as soon as the fertile prairies were reached, to run away north from the good land into a wilderness of wood and muskeg wholly unfit for settlement. The country south of Lake Manitoba was so rich that it would certainly soon be opened up by railroads—if the Pacific Railroad did not go there, roads constructed by private enterprise would soon take possession of the field. The loss would be greater to the Dominion than to the Province. The result would be that the whole trade of the country south and west of Lake Manitoba would pour down on the road running south through American channels, instead of going by the Canadian Pacific—a result which all hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House would regret. He hoped the Government would not hesitate in the matter; they were bound to decide and act at once. If they did not intend to build the road south of the lake, and proceed with the construction at once, it was due, to the people of Manitoba that they should say so at once, and permit some local company to build a line south and west of Lake Manitoba.

MR. PLUMB said he was very glad the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) had brought this motion before the House. He trusted the papers would be brought down in accordance with the hon. gentleman’s request. There could be no doubt that it was of the utmost importance to the House that it should be placed in possession of everything which pertained to the location and construction of the great work—the Pacific Railway—they had in hand. There could be no doubt, too, that the House should be in a position to judge as to the merits of the respective lines which it might be possible for the road to traverse across the prairies of the west. There were two conditions undoubtedly that would affect the location of this line, which would in many respects conflict with each other. It should be in the power of Parliament to judge intelligently of these conditions; and it was not proper that the House should be governed merely by the opinions of engineers who looked only at engineering facilities, and did not look at the questions which would affect the judgment of those who had broader and larger views in regard to this great work. Of course, it was a location of a line which was to be settled probably for all time to come. It was true they had been told by the Government that a large portion of the line had already been determined upon, but it seemed to him that, rather than attempt to save something at the moment by building perhaps the most direct line, it should always be taken into consideration that the proposed railway was intended for opening up the country and promoting its settlement, for promoting and facilitating its agricultural interests, and for the transportation of freight. In the first place, freight would be its principal support; for it could not be expected that there would be much passenger traffic at the outset, but that it would be principally supported by the improvement of the country which it traversed. The better the country through which it went, the more it would remunerate the Government for the great outlay made in its construction. As he understood, the line was about to be placed considerably north of the best land in Manitoba, and considerably north of the present settlement of Manitoba; and much of it ran through a country not at all available for agricultural purposes. It had been selected by the Chief Engineer and those acting with him, with a view to get the most direct line. But a line running a distance of 2,700 miles should not be altogether located with respect to its absolute directness. It would have no great competitor in that respect, for it would be a shorter line than any other likely to come into competition with it at any time. It was well known, too, that, if the road was located too far north, there would be, as Manitoba increased in agricultural importance, local lines assisted by local grants, and they would take the business to the southward. There was great truth in what the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Ryan) said in that respect, namely, that the tendency of business would be to go southward and not to go northward of our line; and that our line would be impoverished by a system that then it would be too late to mend. There was another very important consideration in the proposal of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). It would be remembered that the Pacific Railway resolutions were hurried through the House by whip and spur, at half-past three in the morning, when scarcely any debate was permitted, by the dominant majority which controlled the House in 1874. Soon afterwards a resolution was submitted in regard to the erection of a telegraph line. Gentleman on his (Mr. Plumb's) side of the House earnestly remonstrated with the Government, stating that the telegraph line would be absolutely useless, and the money thrown away which would be expended upon it, unless it were constructed along the route of the road. They were met by derision when they ventured to make these suggestions. They could now point to their record and show that they were right. He could show, from information that he had received, as well as from the reports, that part of the line was not near the railway, and would be entirely useless for the purpose for which it was constructed. They knew the fact now that, if the telegraph line was intended to facilitate the working of a single line of railway, and if it was two, three, or four miles, or even one mile distant, when an accident occurred during a snowstorm, or the breaking of the track, to have to go back ten or even two miles to find the line in order to send signals, would make it practically useless. There could be no doubt the line was further away than that. It had been put up in such a way as not to work at all. To use the expression of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), it had not made a trick between Selkirk and Battleford during the last year. They had been assured that the telegraph line was constructed on the line of the railway. How could it be so? The line was not determined upon; this discussion showed that. Although the telegraph had been nominally put up on the line of railway from Fort William to Battleford, they knew perfectly well, from evidence before them without going any further, that it had deviated very largely from the line which would be adopted for building the railway. It was an absurdity that a man who should go out to set out telegraph poles over hundreds of miles of prairie should absolutely locate a line of railway while doing so. The House knew it was impossible; yet, they were put down by a tyrannical majority in the House, when they took this position, and forbidden to open their mouths about it. He remembered one afternoon when he vainly struggled to get the floor, in order to place his views on record, and when the House refused to allow him to do so. He thought then, that the time would come when the laugh would be on their side; he believed they had it now. He trusted that the papers would be brought down in regard to this motion of the hon. member for Frontenac, which had been so ably seconded by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Ryan), in a conclusive argument. These were questions that affected the whole country, and this House would be recreant to its duty if it did not, on all occasions, promote and stimulate inquiries upon this and kindred subjects which affected the general interests of the Dominion of Canada.

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, in moving this resolution, said very properly that the location of the Pacific Railway was, to some extent, a matter of policy as much as of engineering; but, on the other hand, there is a very close and intimate connection, sometimes, between what he terms policy, and engineering, which is an inevitable element to be considered in connection with the location of a railway. In this particular instance there was one object held in view particularly, and that was to make the line as short as possible. Another object held in view was that the line should, as nearly as possible, traverse the country which would be most accessible as land to be settled; that the line should, in other words, follow the general direction of the arable land to be found in the western territories. It is well known, for instance, that a very large portion of the North-West territories, extending from the boundary northward, is comparatively barren, except where some streams pass through the salt desert. It is known that this land, which is comparatively barren, extends close up to the bend in the Saskatchewan; it is known on the other hand, that the natural trend of the country which is accessible to settlement is north-west, that it runs, in fact, almost parallel with the isothermal lines, which will be found traced on any map. It is known beyond all question, the hon. member for Marquette notwithstanding, that, after reaching the region of the Little Saskatchewan, the country becomes light and very sandy as you go westward, and unless the line deviated pretty sharply to the right after passing that point and kept to the eastern bank of the Assiniboine, that a comparatively poor country would be reached and traversed. It is known, on the other hand, that the valley of the Swan River, and the land north and west of that point in the general direction of the line of railway, is available for settlement—more available for settlement than any portion of the land which will be traversed by the line south of Manitoba, except the first one hundred miles, as Mr. Smith states in his report. The hon. member for Marquette, who seems to be somewhat personal in his remarks, spoke of my having stated untruths to the House.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. member corrected himself by calling them inaccuracies.

Mr. RYAN: I did not mean to say, neither do I think I said, that the hon. gentleman stated untruths. What I did say, or thought I said, or what I intended to say, was that the statements contained in the speech relating to the quality of soil on that route were untrue.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not see very much difference in the words "untrue" and "untruth." Perhaps the hon. member for Marquette may be able to detect some difference; I cannot. With regard to this matter, I have simply to say that, in my speeches concerning the Pacific Railway, the statements I make about the country, about the engineering, and the land, and statements in general when giving information to the House upon all points connected with the Pacific Railway, are not my statements, but the statements I derive from examining engineers, reading their reports, and personal conversations with those who have traversed the country. They may be wrong; sometimes they are wrong, but I take the best means in my power to obtain correct information. I have taken means lately to obtain correct information from some of the engineers here at present, and, with respect to the quality of the soil, these gentlemen tell me that the muskegs west of Red River are as nothing compared to the muskegs east of that river. The Julius muskeg east of Red River has a depth of from seventeen to eighteen feet for two miles, with an entire width of from five to six miles. This constitutes a more serious difficulty—which has to be overcome at a very heavy cost—than anything in the nature of muskegs west of Selkirk. Mr. Fleming, and all the other engineers to whom I have spoken, express an opinion that, although the country is exceedingly flat north of the line from Selkirk to Mossy River, still there was no part of it, or very little, but what might be drained by ordinary ditches on the side of the railway. Any one who examines the profile of the road, and gentlemen may examine it if they desire, will see that it would be almost impossible to find a country with such a magnificent profile to follow as that of the surveyed route Mr. Fleming recommends. On the other hand, Mr.

Smith has stated, as gentlemen may see in the report which he has just made, that, in his examination of the South route proposed, he finds that we should have to encounter very serious difficulties. He pointed out that one of the rivers to be crossed is 225 or 250 feet below the general level at the prairie, while it is a mile wide at the surface and over 1,000 feet at the bottom of the ravine. He points out that it would lengthen the line nine miles to cross that one river, and that to keep within the maximum gradient which is adopted on the time—52.80 feet to the mile—it would be necessary to have very heavy excavation. One of the gentlemen who spoke referred to the evidence given by Mr. Jarvis, engineer. I have reason to believe that the evidence, as reported in that pamphlet, is not the evidence Mr. Jarvis believed he was giving; that Mr. Jarvis considers some statements put down to be contrary to the sense of what he was understood to say. I have reason to know Mr. Jarvis knew nothing of the main fact of which he spoke, and that, like the hon. member for Marquette, he spoke wholly from the evidence of other parties, who were more or less interested, as Mr. Jarvis was, in the Southern route, which he desired to be chosen. It is quite true it would be desirable always in constructing a railway which the Government is constructing entirely, to consider local interests so far as local interests would not seriously interfere with the general welfare of the country, and the general welfare of the scheme of railway; but I object altogether to the ground taken by the hon. member for Frontenac. He asks, "What is twenty miles to accommodate the people on the south shore of Lake Manitoba?" There are only a few thousand people there at the present time, and lengthening a line by twenty miles would amount to a very great deal. It means a permanent tax of at least $2 on every passenger who travelled over that line for all time to come; it means an addition of from twenty to thirty cents per ton on all freight passing over it for all time to come. It is a very large item indeed, as the hon. gentleman will find. If he consults any railway authority, and if he makes a computation of the number of passengers we hope to pass over the road, he will find it will be a very large tax indeed upon the country. The Government can have no possible object in this matter, and they have none, and I have no object to serve but the general welfare. I have no interest to serve of any kind whatever, nor has the Government, as a whole, any object but to select the best line in the general interests of the country, I will therefore be exceedingly obliged to any hon. member of this House who, either in public, as the hon. the member for Frontenac has done or in any way, will assist me to get possessed of information that may be of use in locating the line of railway where it may be most desirable to place it. And when a mistake is made, if any mistake should be made, I shall only be too glad to have any information that may be obtained, and I shall use it undoubtedly in the general interest of the public, irrespective of all private and local considerations. When the hon. member for Marquette was good enough to say that he did not impute any motives,—but one could not help feeling curious when the reports of Mr. Kerr and Mr. McLeod could not be found—he conveyed an impression against some one, either Mr. Fleming or myself, that the reports of these engineers were unfavourable, and we were afraid to present them for fear they might militate against the scheme. I am no admirer of the whole of Mr. Sandford Fleming's career, or the engineering works he has been connected with in some instances, but I believe him to be one of the very ablest engineers who has ever lived in Canada. I believe that he is thoroughly competent to fill the position he holds, and I am bound to be directed, to a very great extent, if not wholly, by his reports, both as respects engineering and other considerations. A man may be a very eminent engineer, and not be capable of preparing and writing a very excellent report. He may be technically a very able engineer, and not be possessed of those qualities which would fit him for another occupation, and particularly may not be possessed of those qualities which are essential to enable him to present an elaborate report to the public. It is one of Mr. Fleming's particular excellencies that he shines almost as much as author, as engineer. He has been able to compile one of the most interesting and intelligent reports which, I venture to say, have ever been presented in any country by an engineer having a great work in charge. It is quite true Mr. Fleming may be wrong, or his information may be incomplete; but I say this, that the hon. gentleman who has spoken of it, has presented not one particle of evidence to impugn the conclusions at which Mr. Fleming has arrived, and which are endorsed by the opinion of Mr. Marcus Smith, who is acting as Chief Engineer in Mr. Fleming's absence. I have still to discuss many matters connected with the railway with the engineers and officers who know more or less of other portions of the line; but I may say that at present I have no reason to believe that Mr. Marcus Smith or Mr. Fleming, have, in this particular matter, made any mistake. I do not think they have. If they have made any mistake, and the country and this House has been led astray by mistakes, to which all men are liable, I shall not hesitate one moment in correcting these mistakes in the interests of the public; but I must protest against the tone which the hon. the member for Marquette has adopted in discussing this matter, and I must remind him that no county, however important,—that the bursting granaries of Marquette, however important they are, and they are important, are not sufficient to induce the Government of Canada to deviate from a line for this railway which is believed otherwise to be in the general interests of the country. Our object is to have that line constructed, in the first place because we are bound by treaty obligations to construct it, and in constructing it we are bound to take a line which we believe will be most advantageous, not to the few settlers who may be on these or other spots at the present time, but a line which will prove most advantageous in the general interest to the settlement of the North-West country. It is no secret; anyone can see from Mr. Smith's report, that he is strongly convinced of the propriety of even a much greater deviation from the existing line. It is tolerably evident that many gentlemen who have good information as to the character of the soil and country generally of the North-West believe it will be advantageous to continue the line to the right from west of Lake Winnipegosis to a point near Fort Pelly, over the bend of the Saskatchewan to Fort A La Corne, and traversing the country from that point by Lesser Slave Lake, cross the Smoky River between the Rocky Mountains and its junction with the Peace River and continue on to the Pine Pass. That deviation is spoken of now, and if we were entirely at liberty to take our own time and make our own selection, it might be, and perhaps it is, advisable. But I merely mention this to show how much and how little we know of certain districts at the present time. I have had conversations with Mr. Rowan and Mr. McLeod, who have surveyed the line from Mossy River eastward, and the latter informs me that in no place did he find on the whole line, any of those muskegs more than five feet deep. Mr. Rowan entirely corroborates that statement, and while I have no doubt there is more dry land south of Manitoba, I do doubt exceedingly that, taking the general line from one end to the other, from Fort Pelly as the objective point to the west, there is more good land to be found on the south than on the north, while I do know that when the line reaches the neighbourhood of Fort Pelly it reaches a rich, fertile district which does not exist in the central plateau west of the Assiniboine and east of the Battleford River. There is no objection to furnish all the information we have in the Public Works Department to the House. I do not know that there is much to be furnished; a very large portion of it is of a character perhaps not placed on paper. Mr. Fleming converses with engineers for days on their return, passing over in conversation the various portions of the country which they have examined, and obtained oral evidence to guide him in deciding upon the ultimate line and final location of the railway. I am indebted to some extent to this kind of information for what I know of the country, and what I am obliged in my official capacity to communicate to the House. I will not discuss some of the points of the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb). The hon. gentleman, in a matter of this serious character, might for five minutes rise above his excessive party predilections; he might have one spark of patriotism and general business capacity to show to the House, instead of endeavouring to make political capital out of every motion brought before Parliament. I regret that the hon. gentleman could not do that; but he must choose his own course, and the weight of his opinion in the House will be weighed very much by the tone and manner and object of his discussion on similar motions. I have only to say, in regard to this particular matter, I have done all in my power to obtain correct information as to the two routes which are projected, and I am not to be led astray by any selfish considerations or local interests from choosing that course which I believe to be in the general interests of the country.

MR. TUPPER: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the line has been definitely located between Selkirk and Fort Pelly, or whether the question of altering that location, of bringing the line by the Southern Route, is still under the consideration of the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE: I can answer that with perfect frankness. The road was located between those points, but at the same time, as long as actual construction had not commenced, I feel it will be quite possible yet,—if the Government, if the engineers have made any mistake,—with the sanction of Parliament, to make a deviation, such as in the general interest may be thought desirable. It would be a useless piece of mockery to ask Mr. Smith to pass over other lines of route, unless the Government thought such a change was possible, if it was desirable for it to be pursued.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) said he had equally with the hon. member for Marquette and the other representatives from Manitoba, contended that the Pacific Railway should pass to the south of Lake Manitoba, and this he had persistently urged on the Government; nor had he in anywise changed his opinion that, for the rapid development of the North-West and in the interests of his Province, this was the best route. The hon. the Minister of Public Works had said that after reaching about one hundred miles west of Manitoba, the land, for a considerable distance further west, was very indifferent in quality. Having gone over the ground, which he (Mr. Smith) presumed his hon. friend from Marquette had not, he must, in honesty, corroborate the statement that in that portion of the country the land was very light and not well adapted for agriculture or, at any rate, for wheat crops.

MR. RYAN: I would like to ask if the hon. gentleman has gone over any portion of the country except that portion traversed by cart trails.

MR. SMITH said he had not in that particular quarter; there he had only traversed the ordinary route. A reference to the report of the Acting Chief Engineer, Mr. Marcus Smith, on the difficulties to be overcome on the route in question at the crossings of the Little Saskatchewan, the Bird-tail Creek and the One-Arm Creek, showed there was no doubt these difficulties did exist, and would have the effect of lengthening the road. On the other hand, in the eastern portion of the country lying north of Lake Manitoba, many swamps would unquestionably be found, while, after the Narrows were passed, much of the land is good and suitable for cultivation. If, unluckily for the people of Manitoba, after further careful consideration of the relative advantages of both routes, it should be deemed necessary, in the general interest, to adopt the latter, he trusted the Government would give, and he understood it was their intention to give, facilities and liberal assistance for constructing railways through the fertile lands south of Lake Manitoba, thus, in a great measure, making up to the present settlers for being deprived of the advantages of the main line. It was very natural and proper for the people of Manitoba to look to their own interests in the first instance; and, both as one of her representatives and individually, he should certainly greatly desire to see the railway carried through the settled parts of the Province, and trusted this might still be done. After the frank explanations and encouraging assurances just given to the House by the Hon. the Minister of Public Works, he (Mr. Smith) felt that the matter could, with confidence, be left in the hands of the Government, and he believed that the people of Manitoba would be satisfied with a solution of the difficulty, which, in any event, would ensure to them, as soon as practicable, railway communication with those parts of the Province more immediately in need of it.

MR. TROW said he had no desire to take any part in this discussion, but it was a pleasure to him, and he was sure it would be to a very large majority of the inhabitants of Manitoba, to hear that the location of the line had not been definitely fixed. He would by no means stick up his opinion against that of eminent engineers as to which was the best route, but having spent some four months of last summer in the North-West, he might say, from his own observation and from information he had received from parties who stated that they knew both routes thoroughly, that the Southern route was preferable. He had followed that portion of the route south of the lake from Winnipeg, or Selkirk, to Prince Albert Mission, and in his journey had deviated from the beaten track in many cases fifty or sixty miles, which was not usually done. He went expressly for the purpose of gathering information, for his own satisfaction, at his own expense. He deprecated the rash and unguarded statements of the hon. member for Frontenac with regard to hearsay evidence, and after hearing his remarks, thought that he, an eminent lawyer, would certainly not accept hearsay evidence. The hon. gentleman maintained that hearsay evidence was inadmissible, and it was understood that the hon. member for Frontenac had made a flying visit to Winnipeg, and only remained there a day and a half, or two days at furthest; consequently the information he had gathered might not be of the most reliable character.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Was it two days?

MR. KIRKPATRICK: I was there a week.

MR. TROW said that a large number of the inhabitants of Winnipeg fancied their city was the hub of creation, and considered, that from its central position, the railway should be located at that particular point. Of course it was not for him to say what the Government policy should be, but having traversed the country, he perhaps might suggest that, if the Pembina branch was utilized to Selkirk, there would be no need for the Government to take their line there. He could understand the Government would wish the line to touch there, because it was the head of navigation. The hon. gentleman, a short time back, advocated a line through the North-West from Rat Portage across the Red River direct to Winnipeg, but he (Mr. Trow) had come to the conclusion that the present location at Selkirk was the right one, because it was the head of navigation for larger boats on the Red River at the confluence with Lake Winnipeg and Lake of the Woods. Should this location of the road run south of Lake Manitoba from Selkirk, it would accommodate hundreds of settlers. A very large proportion of the settlers were on the line of route from Selkirk to a short distance west of Portage la Prairie and Rat Creek. Now, in constructing a line south of Lake Manitoba, there was a high ridge of land a short distance from the lake for a few miles south of the lake; it was wet, marshy land, but there was a high ridge of land extending the whole of the route to the head of Long Lake, and he should say it would be found a good location for the construction of a railway clear to Palestine. The line would pass over thirty-three townships from Selkirk to Fort Ellen, and in looking over the map he could not calculate that the line would be lengthened by going that route. He fancied that there would be very little difference in the length of the route. He did not know that there was any necessity for carrying the line direct west, south of the Riding Mountains and across to the Little Saskatchewan. After passing Portage la Prairie the road might deviate to the north-west, connecting with the present line of road at Livingston or Fort Pelly without crossing those large ravines that the hon. the Premier had just mentioned. He had crossed the Little Saskatchewan and found there were difficulties just as the hon. the Premier had described, but there were natural ravines in that river which could be crossed diagonally and no apparent engineering difficulties existed. But there was no necessity to cross the Little Saskatchewan; they might cross the Assiniboine at Fort Pelly, or a short distance beyond. If the line deviated to the north of the Riding Mountains, much better timber would be found; there was very little timber on the other route. The line was very good the whole way from Selkirk until it arrived at Fort Ellice; afterwards, as the hon. the Premier had stated, the land was very light to the south of the Saskatchewan, and a very large proportion of it was not suitable for agricultural purposes—excepting for pasturage.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he was glad to hear that this question was still capable of being enquired into by the Minister of Public Works, and that the line was not definitely located. He hoped justice would be done to both routes that were being surveyed. He should like to ask the hon. the Premier if the engineer had been over these routes in summer?

MR. MACKENZIE: I cannot recollect for the moment.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said that was an important point. With regard to hearsay evidence he could give the source of his information to the House if required, but this information led him to read Mr. Fleming's report, where he found a lot of blunders as to the land, and very serious discrepancies with regard to the elevation of certain portions of the route. He would only say this: that the evidence contained in Mr. Fleming's report was not sufficient for Parliament to come to a conclusion upon, and unless further evidence was in the hands of the Minister of Public Works which the House had not got, a conclusion ought not to be come to upon the subject. With regard to the question whether the Government would be justified in making the line twenty miles longer by altering the route, he thought the country would sooner pay the additional expense of the twenty miles, than that the line should run over some 250 miles of land unfit for settlement.

IMPORTATION OF CANADIAN CATTLE INTO ENGLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. HIGINBOTHAM said that, before the Orders of the Day were called, he would like to ask the Government, in view of the Act now before the House of Lords respecting the importation of cattle from foreign countries, which would seriously affect the trade of this country, whether they had made any representations to the Imperial Government, that might relieve Canada from the effect of that Act?

MR. MACKENZIE: The Government have made representations, Sir, to the Imperial Government respecting the treatment of Canadian cattle after they are landed in England, as it was quite clear that no cattle disease existed at all in this country, as we have taken pains to preserve our cattle free from infectious diseases. We have also made representations respecting the treatment of Canadian cattle in another respect. Complaints were made that, after Canadian cattle were landed, they were compelled to stand in a hard stone yard for nearly 24 hours, sometimes, until they were formally inspected; and the Committee of the Privy Council has given orders that animals shall be taken to a place where they will be properly treated and have proper rest, and not be subjected to the treatment they did receive, which injured them very materially in quality, and, of course, was injurious to their sale. We do not absolutely know that the Privy Council Committee, acting under the Imperial Act, will exempt Canadian cattle from the regulation requiring foreign cattle from the continent of Europe to be slaughtered immediately on disembarkation; but my own impression is, from the way in which the Imperial Government has met our representations on other matters, that there is every likelihood that these cattle will be exempted from that treatment unless signs of disease in this relation appear on this side of the Atlantic.

HARBOUR WORKS AT SOREL.

REMARKS.

MR. BARTHE said that, before the Orders of the Day were called, he begged leave to call the attention of the Government to the answer made to an Address which was voted last Session respecting the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, and the works these Commissioners were prosecuting at Sorel. This reply had been brought down by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries a few days ago, and, on referring to the motion which called for it, and which had been voted by the House and granted by the hon. the Premier, he found that this answer was no answer to that motion at all. A number of complaints were made by the people of Sorel regarding the matter at issue. They complained that money was being wasted on these works; that the contracts had been awarded in an unjust manner; and that salaries were given which ought not to be granted. To verify these statements, he thought it was in the interests of his constituents and fair to the Government, that he should ask for the necessary information. He had accordingly moved last Session for copies of these contracts, and the correspondence that had passed in this connection between the Government and the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, under whose control these works were, though it was well known that the Government paid for them. He would not read the whole motion that he had made, but in the last part of it he had asked for—

“Copies of any report made by Mr. John McCarthy or any other employé of the Montreal Harbour Board at Sorel, showing why the pay of day labourers and of many others employed by the month or by the year was reduced while that of the said Mr. John McCarthy was increased from $600, which his predecessor, Mr. Pierre Côté had, to $2,000; also copies of any contract, in relation to the leasing of the wharves, lands, shops, etc., of Messrs. John and Daniel McCarthy, either with the Government or with the Harbour Board of Montreal, defining the duties of the aforesaid employés, Messrs. McCarthy and Mackenzie, or of any other subordinate employé, in the carrying out of the said works; also, copies of all contracts awarded to any person whomsoever for the repairs of dredge-boats, the erection of any building, the repairing or building of engines, machinery and boilers, the purchase of wood and coal or any other contract generally; the names and residences of those who obtained such contracts and works generally with or without tenders, mentioning the amounts of each such contract; also the amounts paid since 1875, whether by contract or otherwise, for provisions, bread, meat, groceries, etc., for the board and maintenance of the men employed on the said works, and to whom such payments were made.”

He found that, to this part of the Address which was voted by the House and granted by the Government, no answer at all was given. The only answer that was brought down was contained in a Blue-book, entitled, a Report of a Select Committee of the Senate, concerning the employment of the two men in question. The petition sent to the Government was a general petition, and this Committee had only reported with reference to these two employés. Several pages of the report were erased, and the correspondence at the end of it was left blank. He considered that this was no answer at all to his motion. He might further state that complaints were made in his locality with regard to this subject; and he felt that it was his duty to call the attention of the Government to it. He thought that the making of this answer was an insult to the House, and an insult to the Government who granted it, and an insult to himself, who asked for it, because it was no answer at all; and he believed, moreover, that this had been done on purpose. He would say no more regarding the matter; but he hoped that the Government would do justice to his constituents, and that the information he required would be brought down, because, if his constituents had reason to complain in this relation, he must sustain their right to do so. He trusted that the Government would attend to this matter during the present Session, because, if it was delayed until another Session, this would render all his efforts, in this respect, useless.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had a perfect recollection of stating, when his hon. friend had moved for this return, that he had no objection to the motion passing, with the distinct understanding that the Government could only furnish what papers or information that they had in their possession. The hon. gentleman was mistaken when he (Mr. Barthe) said that public money was expended on these works. Not a cent of public money was so spent. Under the authority of a special Act, respecting the improvement of the harbour of Montreal and river improvements, the Commissioners were authorized to borrow money, and the Government were authorized to advance the money and charge them interest; therefore, the Government might refuse to advance this money and the Commissioners might then borrow in the open market. These particulars were such as should be required by a return to an Order of the House from the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal and not from the Government. He was unable to state at the moment, as the hon. gentleman had not given him notice of his intention to bring up this matter, what communication had been sent to the Harbour Commissioners; but he had no doubt that they were only written to and forwarded a copy of the statement which the hon. gentleman desired. Any papers whatever that the Government could give would, of course, be brought down; but the Government could not go beyond the authority conferred upon them by the special Act in question, and meddle with matters with which they had, in a general and in a particular sense, no concern. The utmost they could do would be, if the Commissioners misconducted their trust, to dismiss them and appoint others in their place; but no evidence had, as yet, been produced to satisfy the Government that there had been such a departure on the part of these Commissioners from the duties and the proper execution of their trust, and to warrant a resort to so extreme a measure. All he could say to the hon. gentleman now was that he would see what communication had been sent to the Commissioners and what reply had been made by them; and, if anything further could be granted with the powers the Government had, they should, of course, have no objection whatever to exercise these powers and procure it.

MR. TUPPER said he had no desire to interpose between the hon. gentleman who had brought this matter before the House and the hon. the leader of the House, but he rose for the purpose of entering his protest against what he conceived to be an evasion of responsibility, of which the hon. the Premier was guilty in stating the position upon which he (Mr. Mackenzie) had taken his stand.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, Sir, I think that this is not the time to debate the question. I have given my answer to the hon. member (Mr. Barthe), and if the hon. member for Cumberland wishes to discuss it he must bring the question before the House in the proper manner.

MR. TUPPER: I have no desire to discuss the question, but if the hon. gentleman—

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is discussing it, Sir, and with a view to censure the Government. I object. I call the hon. gentleman to order.

MR. TUPPER: I am speaking now to the question of order; the hon. gentleman had better not be quite so impetuous. The point is this: you have allowed the hon. the First Minister to discuss it, you have not restricted the hon. gentleman to an answer to the question asked him, but you have allowed him to discuss elaborately a question of public policy and the question relating to the responsibility of the Commissioners appointed by the Government and the moneys expended by them which are guaranteed by the Government, and you have allowed him to discuss that at length. I rise for the purpose—

MR. SPEAKER: I have allowed him to make a statement.

MR. TUPPER: You have allowed him to make a statement with reference to that matter; and what I propose to do is, not to discuss the question, but simply, as a matter which I think is of very vital importance has been brought under the notice of the House in the statement that the hon. gentleman has made, to take exception to that statement.

Several Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. TUPPER: There is no violation of order. I am merely stating what I propose to do.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is out of order.

MR. BARTHE said he wished to say one word in explanation. An address had been voted, and in that address certain papers were asked for which were wanted in order that his constituents might see whether the complaints that were made were well grounded or not. Of course, they understood that the Government guaranteed these payments. His constituents were largely interested in these works; and he desired to secure the papers in question in order to enquire into this matter, concerning which his constituents complained that a family compact existed.

SURVEY OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY BETWEEN RED RIVER AND BATTLEFORD.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for the further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Kirkpatrick, for all reports of engineers, memorials, etc., relating to the survey and location of the line of the Pacific Railway between the Red River and Battleford, read.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said that, when the House adjourned the previous evening, he was expressing his pleasure at having heard the announcement made by the hon. the Minister of Public Works that the Government were still open to conviction upon the question of locating the line of the Pacific Railway west of Red River. He fully concurred in the hon. gentleman's remarks that no local or sectional influences should be allowed to decide the important question as to the location of any part of this railway. He thought that the hon. gentleman was quite right in disregarding any local or sectional influences, and he did hope that the hon. gentleman would, at the same time, disregard any preconceived opinions he (Mr. Mackenzie) might have in this respect, and that the matter might be fully and fairly entered into as to where it was best for this line to be located in the interests of the country. They must remember, when they spoke of the best interests of the country, that it related to the settlement of the great North-West, to open up which we were doing so much and spending so much public money, and for the colonisation of which this railway was, in a great measure, undertaken. The country would not hear of the building of the Pacific Railway if it was not for the fact that it would act, more than anything else, as a colonization agent for the settlement of the North-West. He wished it to be distinctly understood that he had not sufficient knowledge or information as to where the line should be properly located. He would not express a decided opinion with reference to the location of the line south of Lake Manitoba; but he contended that, in view of the evidence before the House, the report of Mr. Fleming and the evidence taken and laid before them in the appendix to the report of the Senate Committee last year, this evidence, so far laid before the House, largely preponderated against the located line; and he made this motion in order that the Government might bring down any further information they had in their possession, to show that the line selected was the proper one. He would point out to the attention of the Ministry, and of the House generally, the important fact that, as far as they knew, no engineer had ever been over that line in summer. This was a very important fact. He would also like to call the attention of the House to a very important letter which he found was brought down last year by Mr. Fleming—this was a letter that had been written by Lieutenant-Governor Morris, under date of May 8th, 1875, some three years ago, in which he directed attention to the very important difference existing between the country which was to be traversed by the located line, and the country lying to the south of Lake Manitoba; which was admitted on all sides to be one of a very superior character, and a great deal better than the country north of it. In justification for bringing this motion before the House, he might mention the fact that, in Manitoba, no two opinions were entertained as to where the proper location of the line should be. There was no question about this; and, if the report of Mr. Fleming and the evidence in question were true—if there was no mistake on that point,—he was sure that the hon. the Minister of Public Works could only come to the conclusion that the line as located was a mistake, and that the hon. gentleman would take steps to make further enquiry into the matter, and send some competent person over the line at another season of the year to examine and report upon it.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had nothing to add to his remarks of yesterday. He admitted, not only the right, but the duty of his hon. friend the member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) to bring forward this matter, and he had done it in a way with which no fault could be found. It was his utmost desire to obtain all possible information as to this and other parts of the railway route, and to take such measures, in concert with the engineers, as would result in promoting the general interests, and, if it could be done without interfering with general, to likewise promote local interests. With regard to seeking further information, he could only say the Government was seeking information every day, about every part of the line, and anything that could be done in so vast a country to procure further information, he believed had been done, and would continue to be done until they reached a point where they must stop, and proceed, if it were possible, under the Act of 1874, with its construction. The various statements respecting the character of the soil were conflicting. He had taken care to-day to ascertain from one of the engineers—at least his deputy did—in what manner he had ascertained the character of the soil of the country while traversing and surveying it in the winter. The engineer, Mr. McLeod, stated that in every place where there was any softness, openings were made, and the ground carefully sounded, and that the bottom was in all cases found to be firm, the soft places generally ranging from a few inches to a few feet; in some places, from five to six feet, and, in a bog near Red River, to ten feet. Mr. McLeod was the gentleman who had been engaged from Shoal Lake to Mossy River, a distance of 126 miles, which was confessedly the worst part of this route. The part from Red River to Shoal Lake, forty-five miles, was surveyed by Mr. Forrest, who reported it to be very good land, not at all marshy or wet. From Mossy River to Livingstone, one hundred miles, had been traversed by Mr. Lucas, who was also present at the interview. The information of those engineers differed so materially from the statements of hon. members that he was compelled to come to the conclusion that the evidence of parties who had surveyed the land must be superior to that which was obtained by hearsay, from people who were, to say the least, very strongly interested,—he did not mean in a corrupt way—but on account of living in or near Winnipeg, in obtaining a deviation of the line in their direction. Those opinions should always be taken with a certain allowance; while the opinions of men who had gone over the ground carefully, and whose professional reputation was at stake, must be superior in every respect to that made by parties who were desirous that the railway should traverse the country where they lived. All things being equal, it would be very much preferable that the road should traverse a well-settled district.

But, if other reasons of a general character caused it to traverse a different route, it was only unfortunate that those people should be located in a place through which it was impossible to carry the railway. He had given the House, in all frankness, any information he had been able to gather in addition to the evidence contained in Mr. Marcus Smith's report, and, while he was willing to bring down all information, he did not think there was anything behind which could materially affect the question. He would refer to one point. It seemed to be taken for granted that every engineer entrusted with the location of certain portions of this section of the road must have made a report similar to that of Mr. Cambie. That was not the case. The latter was a survey for the purpose of obtaining definite information. A special report was absolutely necessary to give the character of the country, the quantities of materials to be removed and required to be filled in at one time. In these other cases, the general character of the country being known, there was scarcely anything to report. The only place where there were any engineering difficulties was at the crossing of the Narrows at Manitoba, respecting which the engineering department had all information. The reports of officers along the line consisted principally of the usual field notes of engineers and surveyors, and not the plotting of the road. If there was any further information required, it would, of course, be brought down, so that hon. gentlemen would have the utmost possible information with regard to the road.

MR. TUPPER said he would like to remind the First Minister that he owed the opportunity of making this extensive statement to the courtesy of the Opposition—a courtesy which the hon. gentleman had refused to him in a similar case.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was not desirous to give any part of the speech he had given, but did so in the interests of the House. He considered the object of the hon. member for Cumberland had been to raise a discussion, when the subject had not been put before the House. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had merely given reasons why the report was not extended. He had not entered upon a discussion of the principle involved, but merely made a statement. The opening remarks of the hon. member for Cumberland seemed to him to intend to controvert the position taken by the Government on the question, which would have been quite out of order.

MR. MASSON said he remembered what had been said last year, and, he believed, the year before, that the Government were completely aware of the fact that the route adopted was the worst with regard to the quality of the land; on the other hand, the hon. gentleman knew the route south of Lake Manitoba was the best, and traversed one of the finest countries in the world. He would like to ask the hon. the Premier whether he had caused to be made, before adopting the route by the Narrows, entailing an immense expenditure in building the telegraph line, an instrumental survey of the route which the people in general and common sense indicated should have been adopted. He saw by the report that the Government had not done this. In fact, instrumental surveys had only been made last year; the survey by which they had arrived at the conclusion that the crossing of the little Saskatchewan would involve very serious difficulty and increase the distance about nine miles; that the crossing of other rivers would cause difficulty had not yet been ascertained by instrumental survey. The primary duty of the Government was to take the common sense line; that route which would materially benefit the rest of the country, and if, after experience, it was found that serious difficulties existed—and that could only be ascertained by instrumental surveys—the Government was at liberty to have explorations made in the other parts of the country.

MR. MACKENZIE said an instrumental survey had been made last season. He would have preferred that his hon. friend had given him notice, as he would have liked to refer to Mr. Fleming's report in order to ascertain what instrumental surveys had been made formerly. The Committee of the Senate, which had been composed of gentlemen entirely favourable to the Southern route, and with a view evidently to adopt that route, had refused, at first, to receive Mr. Fleming's report, and it was only on his informing them that, unless they received it, he would, necessarily, have to get it printed himself, that they accepted it. He had not that report before him, but hon. members would understand that any one walking over that country, descending into the deep valleys which had been formed by such streams as Bird Tail Creek, the Little Saskatchewan, and the Assiniboine, would see that an instrumental survey was not necessary to show the very great difficulty of descending and ascending those valleys and gorges. He had stated yesterday that some of them were between 200 and 250 feet below the general level of the prairie, and that it required an extension of nine miles to surmount one difficulty shown by the instrumental survey last year. The number of those valleys would account for the entire mileage apart from the extra mileage. He was not able to state whether Mr. Fleming had made instrumental surveys of those valleys or not, but an experienced engineer would see that very great difficulties existed, even before an instrumental survey was made, to ascertain the precise length of the road, and the grade required to overcome the ascent and descent, each way respectively. That was what Mr. Marcus Smith had acquired during the present year, and his information was before the House.

MR. MASSON said the House would perceive that the hon. gentleman was wrong, and had, unwittingly, no doubt, misled the House yesterday, when he said the question was still an open one, and that it would be considered whether the route should be changed or not; but he now stated the simple fact of an engineer walking over the country was sufficient to prove that it was impossible to make a road in that direction. What was the use, therefore, of the House and the country expecting that there would be a change of policy and a change of route.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. MACKENZIE: My impression is that the hon. the member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) asked a question across the House, whether this line was absolutely fixed or not, because, if absolutely fixed, little use could result from discussing it. I said it had been fixed where it had been located, but, of course, not so absolutely but that it could be changed with the consent of this House. I think these are the very words that I made use of. I said further, that it would have been a mockery to Parliament and the country to have pretended to send engineers over these routes again, unless it was with the view of making a change, if that change should be found to be in the public interest. I have not stated the determination of the Government since they have obtained this information, because, before determining, we have to consider the whole question, and I was quite willing, as I stated, that any hon. gentlemen should put me in possession of any further information he might have before we finally determined upon this point. If the hon. gentleman will tax his memory a little he will find that I have reported what I stated yesterday.

MR. RYAN: Yesterday, I said that certain statements made by the hon. the Minister of Public Works were untrue. I was not aware that the expression was unparliamentary; I did not mean to impugn the veracity of the hon. gentleman, nor do I think I did. I meant to say that the statements he made were incorrect; I did not doubt that in making them he thought they were correct.

MR. MACKENZIE: The explanation is perfectly satisfactory, and I accept it with all possible cordiality.

Motion agreed to.

EVIDENCE ON COMMON ASSAULTS BILL.

[BILL No. 3.]

(Mr. Dymond.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. DYMOND said it would be in the recollection of the House that, during last Session, he introduced a Bill, the object of which was to allow persons charged with criminal offences an opportunity, if they so desired it, of giving evidence upon oath on their own behalf. That measure was discussed somewhat exhaustively by the House, and it was evident, from opinions expressed in not at all an unfriendly spirit on that occasion, that, although the conclusion arrived at might be to a large extent favourable to the principle of the Bill, the time had not come for so radical a change to be adopted. He observed that a similar measure had recently passed its second reading in the British House of Commons, and that it had been referred to a Select Committee, in order to receive further consideration before it finally became law. On perusing the report of the debate on that Bill, it appeared to him that the reference of the Bill to a Select Committee might be rather intended to shelve it for the present, than with a view to its early adoption. There was evidently a degree of immaturity in the views and sentiment of those who took part in the debate, both as to the scope and details of Mr. Ashley's Bill, that would prevent it, for some time to come, from becoming the law of the land. He noticed, however, that the opinion he expressed last year, and which he still entertained, that, ultimately, the measure he then introduced, or a similar one, would be successful, had gained strength, in a portion, at all events, of this Dominion. In New Brunswick, a few days since, the Lieutenant-Governor in his speech at the opening of the Legislature, spoke as follows:—

"The administration of justice being a matter of Provincial concern, I would draw attention to the state of the law respecting evidence in criminal cases, in the hope that a change may be made by the Parliament of Canada—in which body alone the power to legislate in such matter exists. I regard it as conducive to the good administration of justice, as well as to the interests of the public, as in fairness to the persons charged with crime, that all persons so charged should, whatever the magnitude of the crime, have the right to give evidence in their own behalf. The existing state of the law, however advantageous it may be to the guilty, is clearly prejudicial to the innocent, and, if the object of the existing law were the protection of guilty persons, little could be said against it. I will ask you to join in an address to His Excellency the Governor-General, praying for this alteration in the law."

Although that was, perhaps, a somewhat extraordinary utterance for a Provincial Government to put into the mouth of the Executive, still, it indicated very clearly that, with a most intelligent portion of the people of this Dominion, the view that such a law would be conducive to the ends of justice had rapidly gained ground. But he did not propose, on the present occasion, to trouble the House by re-introducing the Bill of last Session. He mentioned, when speaking on the Bill last year, that, in consulting an hon. member of this House, now unhappily no longer with them, it had been suggested that they should proceed experimentally or tentatively with regard to a matter of this kind, and that such legislation might fairly take place with regard to certain crimes and offences, although it might not be expedient to make the measure general. He had acted in accordance with that suggestion on the present occasion, and he now asked the House simply to consent to the second reading of a Bill enabling persons charged with the minor offence of common assault to give evidence in their own behalf. He was happy to know that several gentlemen who spoke in opposition to his Bill of last year were favourable, more or less, to the principle of the present measure. The former Bill had been withdrawn on the suggestion of the hon. member for South Bruce, then Minister of Justice, although he (Mr. Dymond), after reading his hon. friend's speech—as usual a very able one—over and over again, had not been able to ascertain whether his hon. friend was really favourable or opposed to its principle. However, as the hon. gentleman's speech had induced him (Mr. Dymond) to withdraw the Bill, he would pay his hon. friend what he hoped would not be regarded as an equivocal compliment by applying to his arguments the remark made regarding a celebrated preacher of the olden time: "He prevailed the more because he was not understood." In regard to the present little Bill, it was perfectly well known that the offence to which it applied was one which might be dealt with either in the civil or criminal Courts, and that, while, in a criminal Court, a person charged with the offence of assault was precluded altogether from giving evidence on his own behalf, if an action were brought at common law both parties were able to be examined and tell their respective stories. In that respect, the offence of assault differed from many other crimes on the Statute-book. Again, they were perfectly well aware, from every day experience, that persons charged with common assault did not, as a rule, belong to the criminal class. They were people who, in their every-day walk of life, were accounted respectable, and it was owing to some sudden heat of temper, some unusual provocation, perhaps by their being overtaken by liquor, or by some other accidental circumstance, that they found themselves in this unfortunate position of defendant on a criminal charge. Therefore the objection that, in criminal cases, the offenders would not prove credible witnesses, existed to a very limited extent in these assault cases. Then, again, they knew that it very often happened that the party who was most in fault was the first to obtain a summons. The man who was the most vicious, the most disposed to be revenged upon his neighbour, was always the first to hasten to a magistrate. In a large number of assault cases, where the facts were of a more or less confused and doubtful character, the person charged took out a cross summons, in order to obtain a hearing, and thus, in a very roundabout and inconvenient manner, really obtained the privilege which, by this Bill, was to be accorded as a matter of right. When a cross-summons was tried, it had this disadvantage,—each party was in turn placed first at the bar, and then in the witness-box, or vice-versa—the one in the witness-box at the time alone being examined, and thus all the facts of the case that might be ascertained by both parties standing on a common level had to be brought out by a circumlocution method, if, in fact, they were ascertained at all. In many cases, too, a cross-summons was not obtainable. The defence might be that there was no assault, and, consequently the person charged could not say he had been assaulted. Under these circumstances, he was not able to defend himself against the charge. It frequently happened there were no independent witnesses of the actual assault, and the defendant had no one to testify in his behalf. A case of this kind came under his (Mr. Dymond's) notice a short time ago. A very respectable merchant was charged with assaulting his servant. It was a little domestic squabble, in the course of which the servant girl proved untractable and refused to perform some service for her sick mistress. Her employer put his hand upon her shoulder, perhaps somewhat roughly, to induce her to move more quickly. Technically, an assault might have been committed, but not a word was said of it for nearly three months, when the period during which the girl could take out a summons had almost expired. It happened that she had then confided her griefs to a person who had some feeling against her former employer, and, at his suggestion, she applied for a summons. There were no persons but the defendant and his wife and the complainant present when the alleged assault was committed. The defendant was precluded from speaking in his own behalf, and he asked to be allowed to put his wife in the witness-box, but was, of course, told by the magistrates that her evidence was inadmissible, and that they must decide the case upon such evidence as was actually before them. He believed that, in the present state of the law, persons of malicious disposition were encouraged to take proceedings of this kind; but that, if it were known that those against whom summonses were applied for would be placed upon a level with the complainants, and the defendants would be able to testify on oath in answer to the charges against them, these cases would be far less numerous than at present. It had been suggested to him that possibly the Bill might take effect only in cases where there were no witnesses. It was often hard to say who were or who were not actual witnesses. A large crowd of persons might testify as to what took place immediately after the assault, but very few or none might have seen the assault committed or would understand the circumstances that led to it. He thought, therefore, that this measure was just in principle, as it would place both parties on a common and equitable footing; it would simplify legal procedure by obviating the necessity for cross-summonses in many cases, and would discourage vicious and revengeful litigants. He was indebted to a legal friend in the House so far as the drawing of the Bill was concerned, and he (Mr. Dymond) ought to apologize, perhaps, as a layman, for coming forward to reform the criminal law. He could only say with regard to this what he said last year, that the laymen were the sufferers rather than their legal friends by the defects in the law. They did not often find legal gentlemen proceed to personal violence or to using any weapons more dangerous than their tongues; but laymen, being unfortunately not always well versed in the law, and not possessing that discipline and restraint which was characteristic of the legal mind, were much more likely to get into trouble. Under these circumstances, he trusted the sense of justice of the legal gentlemen would lead them to assist in redressing what might be called a grievance. The first clause of the Bill made it competent for a person charged with common assault to give evidence in his own behalf; the next, that the wife or husband should be a competent witness on behalf of the defendant; the next, that, where another crime was charged, and only a common assault was proved, in the opinion of the judge, the person so charged should be able to testify on his own behalf, and that the wife or husband of the person so charged should be a competent witness for the defendant; in no other cases but common assault should the privilege be accorded, except as in the previous section provided. He hoped the Bill would commend itself to the judgment of the House. He purposed, should it pass the second reading, to move its reference to a Select Committee, consisting mainly of legal gentlemen, in order that they might give some attention to its details, and amend it in any particular that might be found desirable.

MR. PALMER said he was very much in favour of the principle of the Bill, but he thought this was the first time that an attempt to amend the criminal law had been made by a private member.

MR. DYMOND: Oh, no.

MR. PALMER said that, at all events, this ought to be a matter the Government themselves should take up, and no private member should endeavour to deal or tinker with the general criminal law of the country. He had no objection to this particular Bill if the Minister of Justice would take it up. He agreed with the hon. member that it would be an improvement upon the criminal law of the country, but, at the same time, he objected to private members bringing in little Bills respecting the general criminal law. When he discovered last Session that this Bill would affect the whole of the criminal law, he did not think it right for a private member to deal with a question of that kind, and he protested against it now.

MR. BABY said that, before the Bill was sent to the Select Committee, perhaps the hon. the Minister of Justice would give his views on the matter. The first clause, which appeared to be very mild, would change in toto the whole criminal law. It laid down that a man should be his own witness in his own case—a thing quite unknown in our criminal law; and secondly, that a wife should testify in favour of her husband; and the third clause was that, in a case in which the charge of assault had been the ultimate result of a verdict, then the judge should allow the party accused to be called upon, and should accept his evidence. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dymond) said that he was not a member of the legal profession, and that, furthermore, the laity was obliged to suffer more or less from the making of the laws by members of the legal fraternity. He could well see that the hon. gentleman had not studied the laws of this country, because how could the Judge order the jury to find a verdict for assault in a charge of murder? Before this Bill was accepted, the Minister of Justice should give his views upon it.

MR. DYMOND.

MR. IRVING said it was due to his hon. friend the member for North York (Mr. Dymond) to say that, since the time his Bill was introduced a year ago, there had been a considerable change in the views of jurists in England upon this subject. His hon. friend from North Victoria, (Mr. Cameron) last Session, exhaustively answered the subject, and the general feeling then was that the period had not come for legislation upon the subject. There had been an interesting discussion of late in the papers upon this question, on which the British House of Commons had been largely influenced by the opinion of Mr. Russell Gurney, for twenty years Recorder of London, and by the Attorney-General. But the principal reason for the change of opinion was that, according to the law or well-established rule of criminal trial, the prisoner was given a certain number of chances, as it were, to play out, according to the legal rules of the game. Modern rascality had rather overthrown that view, so that now it had become desirable, in the aid of the prosecution, to have the right of examining a prisoner, not so much to extricate him, but, if possible, to ascertain what was his view, consistent with evidence, as to the case laid before the Crown. It was not solely on humanitarian views, and for the purpose of extricating the prisoner, that this course was thought advisable, because the tenderness of the law of England and of Canada was that, whatever fair statement a prisoner could make, either by his own mouth or by counsel on his behalf, passed to the jury almost the same as though under the sanction of an oath. It was true that the Bill in the British House of Commons had gone to a second reading, but he might make this explanation: The Government of England had noticed, in the Queen's Speech, the necessity for a change in the criminal procedure, and that they were about to deal with the whole question; but that, while they were prepared to enact some measure whereby parties charged with criminal offences could be heard in their own behalf, still it should be accompanied by such safeguard as should save them from being entrapped into unfair admissions on the one hand, but, on the other hand, such as could fairly be incorporated with the principle of the criminal law of England. To show how far the matter had met with the general approval of eminent jurists in all parts of the world where the system of examining witnesses prevailed, he would read the answers given by the Chief Justice of the Court of Appeal in the State of New York, and the Chief Justice of New Jersey, in answer to a question put to them on the subject from the Government of England. The Chief Justice of New York wrote: "The change has not given very great satisfaction; at least there is a very great difference of opinion as regards its justice and results." The Chief Justice of New Jersey wrote: "The system, with regard to the elucidation of the truth, has worked well. It leads, however, to so much perjury that it is generally thought that the testimony should be received without any religious sanction." And in England the introduction of the principle in affiliation cases had unquestionably led to a great deal of perjury. With this basis of facts, with the law of this country based upon the statute and the common law of England, he rather thought that no great violence would be done to those unhappy parties who were tried between now and twelve months hence, if we waited until this question had been deliberated upon by jurists of great experience, both in the executive, and judicially connected with criminal prosecutions. But the matter did not stop here. The trifling cases to which his hon. friend (Mr. Dymond) had referred were to his (Mr. Irving's) mind wholly insignificant, and formed no necessity for a deviation from the law of England, which Canada was trying to follow. But his hon. friend thought that, because he had found in one or two cases the witnesses connected with common assault cases were respectable, therefore it might be said that generally the persons accused were not of the criminal class. If his hon. friend had had any experience, he would have known that assault entered into almost every case on the Statute-book. He (Mr.

Irving) could not call to mind, except by stating some minor offences which it was not necessary to go into now, one offence on the Statute book classed under injury to the person, with the exception of homicide, in which the crime charged could not be reduced to common assault. Stated broadly, there was no exception in the whole of that long Statute relating to injury to the person, except in the case of homicide. He would now ask for the ear of the hon. the Minister of Justice, because these matters to which he had been addressing himself up to the present had been rather of the nature of matters of expediency with regard to the question; but now he would point out the difficulty which lay at the root of the Bill, and which must destroy it in his mind, and must prevent it from going to a second reading, unless it formed an entirely new Bill. The Bill said that, when another crime was charged in the information or indictment, and the Justice or Judge, at the close of the evidence for the prosecution, was of opinion that the only case apparently made out was one of common assault, then the defendant should be a competent witness in his own behalf. Now, if, in every case which might be a charge of injury to the person, the Judge, at the close of the prosecution was called upon to rule and say: "I find that, under this section, there is no case made out except of common assault,"—assuming that the trial was one for assault with intent to do grievous bodily harm, and the Judge should say: "I see no intent to commit a felony, I think the crime is common assault and, therefore, that the prisoner may be examined,"—it made the Judge a judge of fact. He would like to draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice to the principle introduced by this clause. It made the Judge a judge of fact, and enabled him to impeach the prisoner upon his trial; it gave him power entirely opposed to the whole root of the English law, namely, to determine upon this question of fact; it gave him a power which the Crown now had over a prisoner, who was delivered in charge to the jury to be prosecuted. The jury could not be discharged of the case, and it placed the procedure in such a way as to practically stultify one of the principal safeguards in the trial of prisoners. If it were possible to follow such a course as the Bill proposed, and if this Judge had so directed the jury, and the prisoner was then called upon as a witness in his own behalf, what did he say? The judge had already stated that there was no evidence of the felony, and that he should be tried for misdemeanour. The prisoner was sworn and he said "Yes, I did commit the felony; I did assault the man with intent to do grievous bodily harm," and at that moment the man was entitled to an acquittal. He had been purged, so to speak, of the felony charge, and could not be tried for that again, and by pleading that he was guilty of the felony, he was entitled to an acquittal on the charge of misdemeanour. There were instances in which a Judge, in a case of assault, finding that the felony was developed, as it were, in the evidence, had power to discharge the jury in order that the incriminated party might be placed upon his trial for felony; but this would be impossible under the proposed Bill, because the offender would be put, in the first instance, upon his trial, as for the felony, and when the Judge had expressed an opinion which acquitted him of that, it would be impossible to charge him with the minor offence. He appealed to the lawyers of this House, whether he had not given a fair statement of the practice pursued, and if this were so, he thought it not too much to ask the hon. the member for North York to withdraw his Bill or leave it in the hands of the hon. the Minister of Justice to bring forward a Bill, dealing with the major question of examining witnesses in their own behalf, and under what circumstances.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said he concurred in the statement that the principle involved in the measure was one that could be properly adopted by the House, though, at the same time, he declined to commit himself to the whole of the details. The arguments used in opposition to the Bill referred to difficulties which were not likely to arise in practice. For example, it was contended that the third clause infringed on the rights of the jury to be the sole judges of the fact. While it was true that the law, at present, handed over to the jury the sole adjudication on the question of fact, it frequently occurred that the Judge would state to the counsel for the Crown that there was no evidence which would justify him in sending the case to the jury. The present Bill simply empowered the Judge to decide whether a certain degree of an offence had been sustained by evidence or not. The arguments which had been advanced were precisely similar to those used against the proposal to permit defendants to give evidence in civil cases. The argument in regard to perjury was stronger in regard to civil cases than in those of common assault, in which the pecuniary penalty was light, comparatively; whereas, in civil cases, character and property might depend on the testimony given by the parties interested. In regard to assault cases, he was satisfied that some such measure as that proposed would be adopted. In his own experience, he knew a case which exactly illustrated the remarks made by the hon. member for North York in regard to cross-summons. In that case, the plaintiff obtained an information, and the defendant was brought before a magistrate. In the meantime, the defendant proceeded to another magistrate and laid information against the prosecutor, and both cases were tried. The defendant, in the first case, was dismissed; the prosecutor, in the first case, was fined. The testimony was thus taken in an indirect manner. The present Bill provided means whereby the whole evidence would be taken before one magistrate instead of before two magistrates, which was the case at present. As to the hon. member for North York not being a professional man, and yet introducing a measure affecting the criminal law, he held that, as an hon. member, he had a perfect right to introduce any measure which he considered to be for the welfare of the community at large, and it was for the House to discuss whether it was one which should meet their approval or not. He had no doubt the hon. the Minister of Justice would be only too glad to receive the views of any hon. member on matters of legislation. Probably difficulty might arise under the third section of the Act, as had been pointed out; but that furnished no reason why the Bill should be stopped at its present stage, because, when it was referred to Committee, it could be amended. From the general drift of the debate, the conclusion must be drawn that the general sentiment of the House was in favour of the principle of the Bill, and that while there was some differences of opinion in regard to its details, it should be sent to a Committee, and its progress not stopped at the present stage.

MR. DESJARDINS said that he regarded the Bill proposed as embodying a principle he had opposed last year, in another Bill proposed by the hon. member for North York. This Bill was of such an exceptional nature, that he did not believe that Parliament would be justified in making any innovation in this respect; such legislation as that proposed was calculated to add to the injustice which it was desired to avoid. An hon. member had protested against the idea of learning from experience obtained, or to be obtained, in this relation, elsewhere, and of finding out in that way what would be the value of such a law; but he, for his part, was not of this opinion. He considered that, if any innovation of this character were made in our criminal law, it would probably be the first step in the direction of the legislation already objected to by the House last year. It seemed to him, they had already gone too far in the way of accepting sworn evidence from interested parties. He heard it stated that the operation of this Bill would be to afford facilities for offering proof in their behalf, on the part of persons who, in some exceptional cases, might otherwise be exposed, more or less, to injustice. He believed that law ought not to be sanctioned to remedy exceptional wrongs. By consenting to the second reading of the Bill, they would accept the principle which it contained, and that, in his view, would be committing a great error. It was the tendency and the error of a certain school to adopt the pretention that the moment an individual was called before a criminal Court, it was necessary to look upon such a person in the light of a victim. In the case of the legal proceedings to which this Bill more particularly referred, he contended that, as regarded what were called the respectable class in society, and honest and peaceable people, the law, as it stood, afforded them abundant protection. Besides, they were aware that, in cases of assault, great temptation was offered towards weakening respect for the solemn obligations of the oath, because such assaults were, for the greatest part of the time, brought into Court during moments of strong excitement, when human passions were so warmly brought into play that those concerned in them were tempted to make any declaration whatever, in order to attain their object, which was to avenge themselves, in using the Court as a tool for that purpose. It appeared to him, that existing legislation, both with reference to our civil and criminal Courts, was as guarded as possible to protect society against the committal of injustice, notwithstanding the apprehensions entertained on this score by the hon. member for North York. To proceed in this direction would be, from his point of view, to depart from the special character of the English jurisprudence in this connection, and English legislation in these particulars, as was well known, had the reputation of being the mildest and most humanitarian of all the systems that existed among civilized nations. If hon. members were disposed to change the principle of the criminal law of England, and adopt the French code, under which the Judge was accustomed to question the accused, and weigh his declaration, then it would deserve the serious consideration of the House; but he thought that they ought not to adopt the method of conducting our legal proceedings as suggested by the rule here submitted. He trusted that the hon. the Minister of Justice would adopt this view, and not request the House to endorse the principle of the Bill introduced by the hon. member for North York, nor consent to the second reading of the Bill.

MR. MOUSSEAU said he concurred in what had been so well said by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving). The legislation which was proposed by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) was altogether inopportune; and the House ought to await legislation in this sense by the Imperial Parliament, before taking any action in this matter, in order that they might have the benefit of the experience which could thus be obtained. He would remark that a Bill had been introduced by Mr. Ashley into the Imperial Parliament in this direction, which Bill the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) had very imperfectly copied. An inclination was, however, shown to repudiate the principle of the Bill, and to wait until the Attorney-General of the Imperial Government would present a measure, having for its object the general reform of the whole system of criminal law, and to adopt something of the nature of the French criminal code, which provided for the questioning of accused persons, though not on oath, in order to enable them to avoid the temptation of committing perjury. In the second place, the passage of this Bill was far from desirable. The essential principles of English legislation were completely opposed to it; and one of the principles that was as old as the world and as wise as wisdom was that no person in such cases should bear witness in his own behalf. The very principle of English law was that a criminal should not be a witness in his own case; and to pass this Bill would be to strike with a fatal blow, this most sacred principle of our legislation. It was true that this was but a commencement; but, if this was consented to in connection with cases of this kind, the existence of the present law of England in this respect was threatened. If it was once permitted, the extension of the principle at stake would be attempted; and it would be most injudicious to allow so dangerous a principle to enter into our criminal legislation, which was so wisely designed, and which was the best by all odds in the world, for he thought it was the general opinion of the House that the English criminal law was the wisest, and mildest, and the most admirable that existed in the whole world. If a principle so dangerous as this one was sanctioned and introduced into our legislation, its application would subsequently be extended and brought into operation, even in connection with capital offences. Then there was another matter which had been so admirably dealt with by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Baby) and the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving). This related to the third clause, which he could not characterize otherwise than as a simple absurdity, as it substituted in the most complete manner the Judge for the jury, making the Judge in this respect, who was under the present system only judge of the law, both judge of the law and judge of fact. The absurdity of this proposition had been ably shown in English, and he proposed to say a few words respecting it in French. This clause, if adopted, would overturn the principles on which our present criminal law was based, and in reality substitute the Judge for the jury. It would make it possible for a Judge formally to declare, even in a case of the gravest character, whether for murder, for homicide, or for any other serious assault, after the evidence adduced on the part of the Crown had been heard: "I am of opinion that a case of common assault has only been made out; and, in consequence, I direct that the prisoner at the bar be called to give evidence in his own behalf, if he so elects"—thus virtually placing the result of the trial in the hands of the accused. The Judge would thus, in fact, assume the functions of a jury; and this would involve the introduction of the most dangerous possible principle into our criminal legislation. The Judge, in being clothed with the power of making such a statement, would be practically empowered to decide upon the case itself. It was well known that juries were not disposed to act contrary to the opinions expressed in this relation by Judges; this was a sort of prejudice on their part; and it would be heightened if the principle involved in this Bill became law. And, as had been so well remarked by the hon. member for Hamilton, its adoption would lead to still worse results, owing to the absurdity of the proposition which might lead to a witness accused of a common assault being placed in the witness box and testifying that he was not guilty of common assault, but of a felony. For all these reasons, he hoped that the Government would intervene and prevent such legislation being engrafted upon the existing system of criminal law.

MR. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said he was only sorry that this Bill had been somewhat circumscribed in its proportions. He agreed with the hon. member for North York last year—and it was in very little that he did agree with the hon. member—as to the general principle contained in his previous proposition. The hon. gentleman had seen fit to moderate his views on this point, and he was willing to accept that modification. Of course, as a Conservative and Tory member, he should be very much disinclined to alter the criminal laws now prevailing in the Dominion of Canada, which had been copied from or modelled on those of the old country; but he thought we lived in a progressive age, and that this was one improvement which we should make in our criminal code. There were a great many other points on which he thought this might be revised and amended; but he did think it better in cases of common assault, where the evidence related to facts, that the defendant's mouth should not be closed. He really thought that, in the interests of persons who were likely or liable to be brought up before a magistrate in the prosecution of these laws, the defendant should have something to say for himself. It was the function of the judge to decide as to the credibility of a witness, and, where there was only common assault committed, those who committed it did not go into highways but rather into byways to commit it. They did not call a large number of witnesses to see them commit these assaults; and the plaintiff, taking advantage of that circumstance, swore out an information which was entirely dependent for its success or sustenance on the affidavit, and on the evidence adduced by the one party. There were only two parties to this sort of crimes, one being the plaintiff and the other the defendant. The plaintiff went into Court, stated his own story, and under the present law they shut the mouth of the other person who was present on that occasion. He thought, under these circumstances, that this Bill was not intended to take advantage of cases where there were a number of people who had seen and were able to prove what had transpired on such an occasion; but it was intended, according to his notion, to meet a case where there were but two parties, one the plaintiff and the other the defendant. Under the present law the defendant was given the right to swear away a man's reputation, or his character. He considered it amounted to this in a large measure, as the opposite party was not allowed to be heard. He did not wish to travel into the general discussion of the principle involved in this Bill, but, as it had been modified in the manner it had been, he thought the House should not hesitate for a moment in adopting the principles involved in it.

MR. GUTHRIE said that, while approving of the Bill, he did not intend to add much to what had been so well said by the hon. gentleman who had introduced it. He rose to notice one or two objections which had been urged against the Bill by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving). That hon. gentleman seemed to think that, in a small matter of this sort, this House ought to stay its hand until some Committee of the House of Commons in England considered the subject. This seemed to him to be a most extraordinary doctrine. He, for one, contended that they were just as competent as those gentlemen in England to decide such a question for themselves, and he thought it was something the House would not listen to—to say that a measure of this sort was to be deferred, if it was of any public interest or any public good, until a Committee appointed by the Imperial House of Commons considered it—and it was a very large question in all its ramifications—and had reported. Were they to wait, if they approved of the principle involved, as was suggested by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving)? But the matter that the hon. gentleman seemed to think most seriously of by way of objection to this Bill, was that it would introduce a vicious principle, would make the Judge the judge of fact. Had the hon. gentleman overlooked this, that the Judge was the judge of fact now in Ontario, in a great majority of criminal cases? Had he overlooked the fact that the great majority of criminal cases were now tried without juries at all, and that the Judge was the judge of law and of fact? Besides these cases of common assault were, for the most part, disposed of in a summary way by the magistrate, and, without jury; the magistrate was there the judge of fact, as well as of law.

MR. IRVING: By the prisoner's consent. It is by the prisoner's consent that a Judge will dispose of the fact; and there has been no legislation to take away from a British subject the right to be tried by jury.

MR. GUTHRIE said very well. His hon. friend, the member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving) had overlooked this fact that, under this Bill, they did not compel a defendant to go into the witness-box and give evidence in his own behalf, but they gave him his choice in the matter of being tried with or without a jury; and, if the defendant was in the happy position of having the Judge's opinion in his favour, so far as a graver offence was concerned, at the close of the evidence for the prosecution, viz: if the Judge then ruled that a case of common assault had only been made out, though the defendant knew in his own mind that evidence might be extorted from him on which it would be possible to convict him of such graver offence, the defendant and his counsel were allowed, under this Bill, to exercise a wise discretion in respect to keeping the defendant out of the witness-box, and allowing the case to go as a case of common assault, if they chose to do so. There were no practical difficulties in the way. What did they find further, in their experience of criminal Courts? In cases of murder, the Judge, at the close of the evidence for the prosecution, was called upon to pronounce whether any evidence had been adduced to justify the case being submitted to the jury, and it was ruled that it should not go to the jury until, in many cases, the Judge pronounced that there was no evidence, or, he might say, that there was evidence of some lesser offence having been committed.

MR. IRVING: Not with reference to a charge for murder.

MR. GUTHRIE said he referred to criminal cases. His hon. friend must be hardly driven, when he rises often to interrupt him while he (Mr. Guthrie) was attempting to answer those objections of his. In the first place, the hon. gentleman denounced, as a vicious principle, what was practiced almost universally in criminal cases of common assault, where the magistrate was the judge of fact as well as of law, and this was the practice now. He (Mr. Guthrie) supposed nineteen out of every twenty cases of common assault were disposed of summarily by the magistrate, and never went before a higher Court at all. What would be the position of such a case under this Bill? At the close of the case for the prosecution, if the Judge were of opinion, where a graver offence than common assault was charged, that a graver offence was not made out, and that a common assault was apparently established, the defendant might be examined, and if he did exercise his privilege of becoming a witness for himself, and if the result was that his own evidence established the graver offence, should they say that any harm would thus be done to the public? Were they to protect criminals? Were they not to endeavour to have the truth elicited? It was not reversing the Judge's opinion if the subsequent evidence of the defendant made out that a graver offence than common assault had been committed, which the previous evidences had established, for the Judge was then entitled to say, "Here is additional evidence;" and, at the close of the evidence for the prosecution, "I was of opinion that the graver offence was not made out; but, now, when we have heard the evidence of the defendant, I consider there is evidence sufficient to have the case go to the jury on the graver charge." As he

MR. GUTHRIE.

Mr. Guthrie) said before, the defendant and his counsel must exercise their own judgment—the option lay with them. The defendant was not compelled to become a witness by this Bill; he knew the consequence of becoming a witness, and that any public interest would be endangered, or that this Bill involved any vicious principle, he was unable in any way to see. He thought the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving) was entirely carried away by the feeling of opposition which he was sure the hon. gentleman entertained to the whole principle of allowing prisoners to be witnesses in criminal cases. As his hon. friend from North York had said, this Bill proposed the very best kind of case that they could select as a test to see whether it was practicable in any criminal case to allow defendants to be witnesses. They all knew, as he had said before, that the majority of these cases were tried by magistrates. He supposed that at least nineteen out of every twenty such cases were disposed of in a summary way by magistrates, and it was often a very great grievance that one man was allowed to give his evidence and the other man—the only other party to the transaction, had his mouth closed; and it was idle to say that the defendant, by himself or counsel, in such cases, could rely upon a denial. A denial would not be accepted as against the positive evidence of the prosecutor, and, consequently, the defendant was then completely at the mercy of the prosecutor. In some cases, for instance such a case as was mentioned by his hon. friend from North York (Mr. Dymond), where a man and his wife could both be witnesses for the defence if such a Bill as this were in existence their mouths were now closed—they did not have the privilege of giving their evidence, but they might turn round and have the prosecutor proceeded against for perjury. In the great majority of assault cases there were only two parties to the transaction, and a prosecution for perjury was not even open to a defendant. He could get no satisfaction whatever; his lips were closed, and his story was not listened to. They admitted all the evidence of a defendant in actions for damages arising from cases of common assault and from all assaults. Could any gentleman in the House belonging to the legal profession say that, in his practice, that principle had worked in any vicious or harmful way. We had the very same principle in civil suits, and in the same manner by receiving such evidence as this proposed to be permitted to be received in criminal cases. After all, the great majority of these cases were only quasi-criminal proceedings. The whole punishment consisted generally in a small fine; it was only a question of a fine of money and the payments of costs or what damages the defendant should pay. While we permitted on the one side—if the proceeding took the form of a civil action for damages—all the parties to be sworn, was it to be said that, when a case took the state of a criminal proceeding before the magistrate, they were only to hear the evidence for the prosecution? He hoped the House would pass the Bill, and try the experiment; and, if it was found to act disastrously, then they need extend the principle no further; but he took it that there was no danger whatever in adopting the principle of the Bill.

MR. APPLEBY said his hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Palmer) took exception to any legislation of this sort coming from a private member of the House. While he (Mr. Appleby) thought it was desirable that all legislation in reference to public matters, such as criminal law, and the law with reference to banking, etc., should come from the Government side of the House, still this rule had been deviated from. His hon. friend from St. John himself had, in 1874, introduced to the House a Bill to abolish the Usury Laws throughout the Dominion, and, although he was not successful in having that law applied to the whole Dominion—

MR. PALMER: My Bill was exclusively applied to New Brunswick.

MR. APPLEBY said his hon. friend introduced a Bill to abolish the Usury Laws throughout the whole Dominion, and, though not successful in having the Bill carried in that shape, it was carried with reference to the Province of New Brunswick, and he was bound to say that that Province was under very great obligations to the hon. gentleman for that measure. When his hon. friend introduced the measure he did last year, although it was received with a great deal of favour by gentlemen on both sides of the House, it was felt to be rather premature. The country was hardly then prepared for such an Act, and it was thought, on the whole, that it should be withdrawn, and his hon. friend, in deference to the wishes of the House, withdrew the Bill. The hon. gentleman now seemed determined to arrive at the point at which he aimed—not by assault—but by siege, step by step, and it gave him great pleasure to lend his humble aid to the hon. gentleman in this respect. He (Mr. Appleby) remembered distinctly that it was not a great many years ago, when parties in civil suits in New Brunswick were not allowed to testify in their own case; he remembered when a law was passed allowing all parties interested in these suits to testify on their own behalf. It was then felt that a very great injury would occur to the morals of the country. At last, however, the law had been found to work admirably. He had no objection to this law—in fact they felt it would be hardly possible to carry on the business of the country if they went back to the old Statute in that respect. Having some little experience in this matter, he knew that a very great deal of injury must result from the present system, especially in connection with cases of assault, and he had known parties engaged in a petty assault, say: “Well I don’t care, I will go to the Magistrate first, and have the man brought up; his mouth will then be closed; he cannot testify, and I will have my fine.” Without attempting to enter into the merits of that Bill, he had great pleasure in giving it his humble support. He thought the objection raised by his hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Irving) was a fanciful one. He considered it was not a supposable case; he did not think it possible that the case of a party, willing to go into the witness box, and committing himself, would arise. He had great pleasure in supporting the Bill.

MR. APPLEBY.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he congratulated his hon. friend from North York on the Conservative reaction that seemed to have taken place in the hon. gentleman’s opinions during the past year. This was very good evidence of the reaction that was taking place in the country, though it was disputed by hon. gentlemen opposite. Last year, and during two or three years past, the hon. gentleman had introduced a Bill of a very radical nature, with a view of reforming the criminal law; but this year, the hon. gentleman had introduced a very harmless Bill indeed; and he (Mr. Kirkpatrick) did not think it would create a revolution if it was passed. He did not, at the present time, agree with the general principle that was embodied in the Bills introduced by the hon. gentleman during previous years, to the effect that criminals should be allowed to give evidence in their own behalf. He had not yet made up his mind as to the advisability of introducing this reform into our criminal law. A great many objections were made to it, and some of them had been ably stated by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving) and some other hon. members. He thought that the country was not yet prepared to adopt the system of allowing criminals to give evidence. They did not know what other steps must be taken, or in whose behalf these persons were to give it. Was it to prevent unjust acquittals or unjust convictions? If it was to prevent unjust acquittals, they must remember he thought that they ought not to take away the only chance an innocent man had of escaping. They knew it was a general principle in law that it was better that nine guilty persons should escape than that one innocent person should be found guilty.

MR. MILLS: You deny an innocent man the only chance he has of escaping.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said that this was not the case. The hon. gentleman must remember that, if accused persons were to be examined at all, and allowed to give evidence, they would be subjected to severe cross-examinations. Those persons could not simply come forward and make a statement, but counsel would cross-examine them; and it must be further borne in mind that, generally speaking, the counsel for the Crown was a man of more experience and ability than the counsel who defended the prisoner. This was very frequently the case, and the Crown counsel, in many cases, would be able to confuse and draw damaging evidence from the witness who was a criminal, perhaps as to character, to show such person was the associate of thieves, or of the criminal classes, and thus create in the minds of the jurymen a very strong prejudice against the defendant. He doubted very much whether, if that change was made in the law, it would be in favour of the criminal. This was a very small Bill. It only concerned persons charged with common assault. It was altogether confined to Police Court cases; a case that came before a jury was generally one for aggravated assault or some serious offence. His only objection to the Bill was that if accused persons were allowed to give evidence, an inducement to commit a much graver offence—perjury—would be presented, and, if the Magistrate before whom such a case was heard, convicted the defendant, against his own evidence, of common assault, and fined him $5 or $10, he (the Magistrate) must send such defendant up for trial for the much graver offence of perjury.

An Hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said yes. If a man, when charged with common assault, swore that he was not guilty, and the evidence on the other hand was conclusive enough to the mind of the magistrate to convict, he must commit him for trial for the graver offence of perjury. This seemed to him to be conclusive. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) was astonished at the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) telling them, in answer to the excellent argument of his hon. friend from Hamilton, that, if the Judge was of opinion that the evidence did not make out the graver offence, and the prisoner was then allowed to give evidence during which he either admitted that he was guilty of a graver offence, or, if, when subjected to a severe cross-examination, the truth should be drawn out of him and it was proved that he was in reality guilty of a graver offence, the Judge and jury would find him guilty of the graver offence. It would be contrary to all the principles and ideas of justice, to convict a man on his own evidence, when this man would not be a competent witness if charged with a graver offence or if charged with a graver offence, the Judge, on finding no evidence to convict, ordered that the count in the indictment should be stricken out, and allowed him to be called after stating that there was no evidence to support the charge. In other words, this would be entrapping a defendant to give evidence on his own behalf, on which to find him guilty. The argument in favour of the Bill was this: it affected a quasi-civil matter, the offence of common assault. He would ask why they should stop here? If this Bill was to become law, another very important provision should be inserted in it, and it should be made to apply to cases of trial for obstructing highways, in which defendants should then be allowed to give evidence. In this respect, a most important civil right might be in question. This would not affect the knocking of a man down, or fighting, or a petty quarrel; but a question of great moment might be at stake, and yet the mouth of the person who was charged with such an offence was stopped, and he was precluded from giving evidence. He had, the other day, seen a case in Court, where a man was accused of damaging a bridge. Because he had asserted his own right, and he could not give evidence in support of that right, this man was put on trial for that most serious offence, and if the case had gone on, he might have been exposed to most serious and heavy punishment. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) thought that, if the Government was going to allow this Bill to go through, they should take this matter into consideration, though it might be no argument with the hon. gentleman opposite to say that a Bill of that nature had been passed in England last year, allowing such persons to give evidence in such cases. If this Bill was passed, he hoped that some such clause would be inserted in it.

MR. CAMERON said that the hon. member for North York had introduced last Session a large measure of reform, if it could be termed a reform— which he had opposed on the ground that the proposed alteration was vicious in principle, and that it would be found very dangerous in practice. He was not prepared, on the present occasion, to give the same kind of opposition to this Bill. He thought that, while it was open to objection, perhaps, in many of its details, yet it might well be referred to a Special Committee. When they came to consider the matter generally, the first question to be borne in mind was that, in altering the general criminal system, we should endeavour to alter it on some sound principle. Was any hon. member in favour of the alteration proposed? Where both a civil and criminal remedy were open to the same person, the same rule of evidence should apply in both cases; and if this Bill was passed, its principles would carry them even further than the mere provisions of the Bill extended; and, if it was adopted, there could be no practical reason why, in that class of cases which came within the same principle, such as nuisances, and possibly prosecutions for libel, and many other cases, where the civil and criminal remedy was open to the same person, the law of evidence should not be placed on the same basis. If the Bill was referred to a Special Committee, it would be proper for them to consider whether the principle involved should not extend to other classes of cases besides common assault. He confessed, however, that he saw very great force in the objection which the hon. member for Hamilton had urged with reference to the third clause of the Bill; and he did not think that it had been at all answered by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). It seemed to him that the practical, as well as the theoretical difficulty pointed out by the hon. member for Hamilton, rendered it absolutely necessary that, before this Bill should become law, the third clause should be struck out of it. The difficulty, no doubt, existed which his hon. friend from Hamilton had pointed out; this Bill took away, not only from the prisoner, but also from the prosecutor or the party privately interested in the proceedings, as well as the general public, the right to have a jury pronounce upon whether the evidence was sufficient to convict a person of the felony or felonies asserted or charged in the indictment, or not. The law of England now gave this right to every prisoner; and also to the prosecution which, in many cases, was as much entitled to the opinion of the jury and as much benefitted by that opinion being taken upon it, as the prisoner would be; and the third clause would have the effect of taking away that right altogether from the prosecutor and all those interested in the administration of justice, as well as from the prisoner. He thought, therefore, that unless they were prepared to say that Judges alone, even without the prisoner's consent, were proper persons to decide upon questions of fact as well as upon questions of law, in criminal cases, thus abolishing, in fact, trial by jury altogether, they could hardly adopt this third clause at all, as it now stood. Other matters of detail, if the Bill was referred to a Special Committee, would, no doubt, be disposed of; and these could be considered when they came before the House. However, as the hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Palmer) had remarked, this matter was really one of such large importance, not merely the detail as to prosecutions for common assault, but the general question of the alteration of the criminal law was one of such grave importance, it would be proper that in case an alteration of that kind was required, the Government should assume the responsibility and charge of it, more particularly as the hon. member for North York had read an extract from a newspaper showing that this was considered a matter of grave importance in the country, and that in one of the Provinces of the Dominion it had been made a matter of address from the Lieutenant-Governor, if he remembered aright. If this was considered of such serious importance as that, surely the attention of the Minister of Justice might well have been directed to it. The hon. gentleman ought to take charge of so grave and serious an alteration in the law. On the whole, if the matter was left to a division, he should feel bound to support the second reading of the Bill, though he did not accept it in all its details. This was, however, a matter of detail. He understood that under Parliamentary law, a Bill was to be read a second time, unless the objections to its principle were such as to warrant Parliament in rejecting it in toto. He did not think that these objections existed in this case, and, therefore, he was in favour of the Bill being read the second time, and referred to a Special Committee.

Mr. McCARTHY said he did not rise to oppose the Bill, because he sympathized with its principles, and was in favour of such an extension of the law of evidence as would, in every reasonable case, permit the whole truth to be ascertained; and he knew no better way than to permit the party who was accused, to give evidence, at least on his own behalf. But, in the measure which had been submitted by the hon. member for North York, he agreed with the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving) that a great mistake had been made. The principle of the Bill involved not only that evidence should be given by accused persons, in cases of common assault, but also in cases of much more serious character. There was no doubt of the technical accuracy of the argument submitted to the House by the hon. member for Hamilton. The learned Judge must, according to the manner in which the Bill was drawn, when called upon determine whether, as a matter of fact, there was or was not evidence of more than common assault, and, if he determined that point in the negative, the defendant became a witness. That fact had to be conclusively determined for the purposes of that trial—so that it was absurd to say that, the Judge having exercised his power and declared that there was no case beyond that of common assault, the defendant could not enter the witness-box and tell the Judge the case bore a more serious character. If that was to be considered the principle of the measure, he felt bound to oppose it; but, if it was only a matter of detail which could be dealt with before the Committee, he saw no objection to the Bill beyond the fact that it did not go far enough in one direction, while it went too far in another. There could be no possible reason why a person charged with nuisance, which was a quasi-civil offence, a matter of civil right, should not be permitted to give evidence. There was no reason why, in a case of forcible entry into property, the party accused should not be granted the same privilege. He was recently concerned in a case of nuisance, technically so called, where a man was accused of having closed up a portion of the side road. Had the dispute been in regard to the possession of the posts across the lane between the owner's and adjoining lot, the defendant would have been a competent witness; but, as the dispute was between the defendant and the public, the defendant's mouth was closed. In this particular case he did not, however, think the defendant suffered any injustice because advantage was taken of the fact that the defendant was not allowed to give his evidence. He got better off than if he had been able to go into the witness-box. But, in such cases, the end they were striving to attain, namely, to find out on which side justice lay, was not so well attained in matters of that kind when the evidence of those whom this Bill affected was not allowed to be given. As far as his view of the subject was concerned, the hon. member for North York, having obtained an expression of opinion on the whole favourable to the principle of the Bill, ought, perhaps, to be content to allow it to stand for another year, when the whole matter might be taken up by the Government, and dealt with in a broader manner and wider spirit than the present Bill treated it. Changes in the criminal law ought, no doubt, to be made with very great caution. It was dangerous to introduce small measures, or pass them, without Parliament giving them very full and grave consideration; and, therefore, although there could be no objection to the present Bill, as the opinion of the House appeared to be in its favour, yet it could be more properly dealt with by the Government, and, perhaps they would have an expression of opinion from the hon. the Minister of Justice, which would enable the hon. member for North York to deal with this measure in the way suggested. If the Bill was forced to a second reading, he would vote for it, assuming that its main principle was that a party should be entitled, in a case of that kind, to give evidence in his own behalf; but he would do so only on the understanding that he would not be called on to support the third clause of the Bill.

MR. LAFLAMME: It is evident from the expression of opinion by hon. members who have spoken on this Bill that its general principle is considered acceptable to them as a sound principle to be introduced, particularly in cases of common assault. The objection made by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Palmer) was that a Bill of this description ought not to be introduced by a private member, but should receive the consideration of the Government and be brought forward as a Government measure. The hon. gentleman must remember that every Session there are measures of this kind introduced by independent members, and the late lamented Mr. Hillyard Cameron never allowed one Session to pass without attempting to carry some improvements in the criminal law, and, indeed, it is desirable that other members should take up the same subject and submit or introduce amendments. The question is not certainly of such an important character as would justify the intervention of the Government in a matter of this kind, and every one seems to admit that cases of common assault are the best to experiment upon. It is well known to members from Quebec, though they seemed to have forgotten, or not taken the trouble to enquire, that it is contrary to the principle of the laws of that Province that, in civil matters, though it is allowed in every other Province than Quebec, the party interested should be allowed to give his statement of the case. In other Provinces such was found to be a material progress, something most advantageous, from which they would not be willing to recede; a principle accepted as a great improvement. If, as undoubtedly the opinion of those who have tried the experiment proves, the right of parties to be examined as witnesses in their own behalf has proved to be beneficial, I submit to the hon. members from Quebec, who oppose the present measure on that ground, that there is no reason why, in a case of simple assault, a man should not be permitted to give his testimony, if, in a case involving perhaps his whole fortune, he is allowed to give testimony; and that practice has been found to be conducive to the ends of justice. Certainly a man who is accused of assault has not declined in his moral position, and there is no reason why his testimony should be less valuable than if he were contending for a few pounds in a Court of Justice. Therefore, the moment this principle is admitted, I believe it would unquestionably be an injustice to deny this advantage—if it is an advantage, and so it has proved in civil matters—to parties giving evidence in cases of assault; and as to the danger which some hon. members anticipate from its too wide extension, and allowing it to be introduced in every criminal case, I say, let this measure be tried. This is, certainly, a class of cases where no injury can follow its adoption; and, if, after it has been in force two or three years in cases of assault, it is found desirable to extend it to every case which is more of a civil than a criminal nature, the principle can be extended until the whole community will be at liberty to judge and appreciate the benefit of the introduction of the Bill, and, perhaps, claim its application on a more extensive scale. The objection which the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving), and the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy) have taken as to the third clause of the Bill is open to discussion and examination, and, as I do not intend to discuss the measure to-day—having only examined the principle of the measure—hon. members will be prepared to admit that the question as to how far it might be desirable to apply the principle to the administration of justice, will be best decided in the Committee to which the hon. member for North York proposes to refer the Bill. I believe, under such circumstances, it is really a measure which deserves the consideration of the House, and which will prove a benefit after it has been in force for some time.

MR. PALMER: What measures affecting the criminal law did the late Mr. Cameron ever get through the House?

MR. LAFLAMME: Several.

MR. PALMER: State one.

MR. LAFLAMME: I refer the hon. member to the Statute-book.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the late Mr. Sandfield Macdonald, when a private member, introduced a Bill relating to trials by Judges.

MR. DYMOND, in reply, said it would afford him the greatest possible pleasure to comply with any suggestion, within his power, made by the hon. member for Cardwell, especially as that hon. gentleman and other hon. members had dealt with the measure in so fair and cordial a spirit. The hon. member had suggested that the question should be left over for a year, and then dealt with by the hon. the Minister of Justice; but could the hon. gentleman predict who would be Minister of Justice twelve months hence? and he (Mr. Dymond) was not prepared to allow his Bill to incur these chances of a coming change which the hon. gentleman and his friends were almost daily prognosticating. The hon. member for Cardwell could not even foretell who would be member for North York a year hence; and, if the hon. member for Cardwell had his will fulfilled, there would be a change also in that direction. He hoped, however, the hon. member would be disappointed, and that he would meet the hon. member for Cardwell in the next Parliament. Without pretending to speak from personal knowledge of past events in this country, he was aware that a large number of Bills had been introduced by private members, more important and radical in their nature than his measure. He would remind the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Palmer) that the law in England which first gave prisoners charged with felony the right to be defended by counsel was introduced by Mr. William Ewart, and carried by him in 1836, after being discussed in four successive Sessions. He would also remind that hon. member that the Bill was introduced and carried by Mr. Henry Aglionby, a private member, which abolished the old law whereby men condemned to death for murder were executed within forty-eight hours after receiving sentence. Fourteen days after that Bill became law, a man was convicted, whose innocence, in consequence of the time allowed by that change in the law, was so far proved that his sentence was afterwards commuted; and he observed by the newspapers a few days ago that this man—forty years after the trial—was said to have discovered, in New South Wales, the person who committed the crime for which he was committed. He might, if it were necessary, mention several other Acts of that kind which had been carried by private members, and which he hoped would justify him, in the view of the hon. member for St. John, for having introduced the Bill under discussion. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving) had furnished him with one of the best arguments for the passage of the Bill, in stating that, probably, important changes in the criminal law, in that direction, would be made in Great Britain. With all respect for the manner in which those reforms were dealt with in the Mother Country, he ventured to remind the House that they were generally very tardy in coming into operation. No doubt Mr. Evelyn Ashley's Bill was shelved by being referred to a Select Committee; and amendments in criminal procedure were sometimes discussed for years in England before they became law; while, on the other hand, this House, in passing this measure, would be testing the principle in a manner which all legal members had said was open to the least possible objection, so that, when the time came and the country was ripe for a larger measure of reform, they would have had considerable experience from the step which he trusted the House was about to take. He thanked the hon. members for their very fair and generous treatment of his measure

Motion made and question proposed:—

(Mr. Irving.)

Order for second reading read.

MR. IRVING said that, after the Bill was read the second time, he would allow it to stand over for a few days, to admit any amendments to be made, in case they were proposed. The objects of the Bill were, comparatively speaking, very few, although contained in several clauses. By the statute law, it was necessary that a bill or promissory note should be stamped on the day upon which it was drawn, and that the stamps should bear upon the face of them, the date corresponding to the date of the note. There were very considerable transactions wherein bills were drawn in the United States or other countries, and sent here for acceptance or payment, and, by reason of the time that must necessarily elapse between the date on which the bill was drawn, and the date it reached Canada, it was wholly impossible for acceptors to affix the stamps the day the note was made. The Bill, therefore, proposed to supply this omission in the Statute, which, in some recent decisions in the Courts of Ontario, had been brought to light. The next clause referred to promissory notes drawn and payable in a foreign country, but which might come, in the course of business transactions, into Canada, and proposed to bring these notes or bills under the same law as that which related to bills of exchange—which provided that stamps should not be affixed to such bills. The third clause provided that the protective provisions of the statute law, which provided that bills not being stamped at the proper time entailed a penalty of double stamps being affixed, should also be applied to the instruments spoken of in the first instance, drawn in foreign countries and payable here. The fourth clause provided that, in the case of unstamped notes found among the assets of a deceased person, the circumstances connected with said notes not being known, the executor or trustee should have the power to give validity to these instruments by affixing stamps at once. The fifth clause proposed that, in the case of a suit to recover upon an unstamped bill, the Judge might, under certain circumstances, allow double stamps to be affixed, where, in his opinion, it was required in order to maintain the validity of the instrument. He was not clear whether, legally, that provision was absolutely necessary. It had been suggested to him by a learned Judge, for which reason he had incorporated it in his Bill. The last clause was one manifestly necessary. It provided that every instrument liable to stamp duty should be admitted as evidence in any criminal proceeding, although it might not have the stamp required by law affixed thereto. The Bill was a copy of an English Act passed some years ago, and was equally necessary here to make our Stamp Law perfect.

MR. MACKENZIE said the fourth clause was one that required some examination. The principles of the first and second appeared to have been practically acknowledged, namely: to apply to promissory notes what already applied to bills of exchange. The hon. the Finance Minister was not present, but, as the Bill was to stand over for a few days, it would be carefully looked into and amendments suggested at a later stage.

Bill read the second time.

BIENNIAL SESSIONS.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

MR. BUNSTER moved:

"That an Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she may be graciously pleased to recommend that a measure be submitted to the Imperial Parliament for the purpose of amending the 20th clause of Section 4 'Legislative Power' of the British North America Act, 1867, so as to have a Session of the Parliament of Canada once in every two years instead of once in one year as at present exists, unless in cases of great public emergency, when His Excellency the Governor-General, by and with the advice of his Executive, shall have the power to call such extra Sessions as may be deemed expedient in the interim, thus saving to the country one-half the present enormous expense of legislation which may be said to cost annually, say, in round numbers, House of Commons $350,000, Senate $200,000, which amendment would be of great advantage in saving of time to the public men of the Dominion and would be the means of saving so large an amount of the public revenue as would materially help to build many miles, annually, of the Canadian Pacific Railway."

He said he knew that all hon. members of the House who had the interests of their country at heart would support his motion. The finances of the Dominion required careful consideration at the hands of gentlemen on the Treasury benches, and it behoved them to husband the public revenue and resources of the country, and do away with the extravagant expense involved in holding Sessions of Parliament every twelve months, when experience taught them that one Session every two years would amply suffice. The cost to the Dominion, under the present system, as he had shown by the resolution under consideration, was $350,000 for the Commons, and $200,000 for the Senate, annually. He would ask was their legislation worth that to the country? Was it worth even $50,000?

An Hon. MEMBER: $100,000.

MR. BUNSTER said it meant a hundred thousand dollars worth of broken promises given to the people of British Columbia, or rather a hundred thousand broken promises. He knew the motion he had proposed would not be very palatable to some members of the House, as it was a matter that immediately affected them now, and he might add that it would probably affect them more closely at the next general elections. He looked with confidence to the decision of the people outside this House, whose mouths they merely were, on his course in this matter. This question involved the saving to the country of the sum, at a moderate estimate, of $450,000;

and, when they had used the pruning knife in other Departments, the total reduction would amount to, say, one million dollars. Such saving and economy would provide the means of building many miles of the Pacific Railroad. His object in bringing forward the motion was to urge the husbanding of their pecuniary means, so as to enable them to build that great national highway across the continent, of which every Canadian would be proud. They had sufficient evidence that the road would pay in more ways than one. It would prove remunerative to the Custom-house by the large influx of immigrants which it would cause. The people of this Dominion were now paying to the Customs, more than any other people, in proportion to their population, in the world. The Dominion had a public domain, which it was folly and criminal to neglect; and, owing to this neglect, the Americans were enabled to sell to Canada an immense amount of produce and cereals. Only a few years ago a sum of $750,000 was offered to the people of Vancouver Island, to forego the building of the railroad from Nanaimo to Esquimalt; but the people of that Province, believing that the railroad would be carried out in its entirety, according to terms, indignantly refused the offer. And, to-day, the paltry sum of $500,000 was placed in the Estimates for railway construction in British Columbia. The deficit, also, of $1,500,000, announced by the hon. the Finance Minister, was another reason why they should husband their resources, as guardians of the public weal. Those were sufficient reasons for the adoption of his motion. The development of the great public domain lying west, which could afford homes to an immense population, was alone a sufficient reason to husband the resources of the country, in order to enable the Government to prosecute the work of opening and developing the great North-West, and thus contribute, in time, to the realization of the bright dreams of future greatness and prosperity which had been indulged in by his lamented countryman, the late Thomas D'Arcy McGee, and others.

Motion negatived.

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. DECOSMOS moved for a return containing a complete copy of every special and general report of the Chief Engineer and Acting Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway in possession of the Government, respecting the cost of constructing the line of the Canada Pacific Railway, (including the bridges) between the head of Bute Inlet and some place or port in Vancouver Island. He said the question that he proposed to raise was of more immediate importance than that of the hon. the member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster) in favour of biennial Parliaments. He would state that the members on the floor of this House, the hon. the Minister of Public Works, the press, and the people generally, had been under an impression that, if the railway passed from Fort George to Bute Inlet, and thence to a first-class port on Vancouver Island, it would be necessary to expend a vast sum of money in constructing the latter section. Now, he was persuaded, from reading the report of Mr. Fleming, issued during the past year, that he had never recommended that the railway should be constructed from the head of Bute Inlet to Vancouver Island at present; that there was nothing at all in the report to indicate that the railway should now be constructed on the mainland beyond Waddington Harbour; but, that thence, a ferry should be used to reach Vancouver Island until such time as the Dominion could afford to complete this section of the railway; and that thus a vast sum of money, which was said to be enormous—twenty millions of dollars—need not be expended at all. It was to get the report in favour of Waddington Harbour being made a temporary terminus, if there was such a report before the House, that this motion was made, in order that they might at once have the evidence that the railway need not be located on a line objectionable and injurious alike to the Dominion and to the Province of British Columbia. In saying this he begged to draw the attention of the House to a matter of very great importance in connection with selecting a port as the western terminus of this railway. He had before taken occasion to intimate to this House that there were only three ports south of British Columbia, in the territory of the United States, where a trans-continental terminus on the Pacific could be established. The first was San Diego, near the 32nd parallel, on the Mexican border, towards which the Texas Pacific Railway was now in progress. The next place where a railway terminated was San Francisco Bay. From that bay northerly, no other point could be made the terminus of a trans-continental railway, except Puget Sound, opposite Victoria. Now, they would discover from this fact that, if the Canadian Pacific Railway were to become a competing line with American lines, the greatest care should be used in locating the route of the railway, and more especially the port on the Pacific where it should terminate. He doubted whether those who gave their attention to public statistics or the commercial interests of the Dominion in this House, had ever turned their attention to the position of San Francisco, which, to-day, was one of the greatest commercial cities in the world. We had to look at the present position of San Francisco in order to form a correct judgment as to where the terminus of our Pacific Railway should be located. In order to give the House some idea of the business done by San Francisco, and the importance of that city, he would read some of its statistics for 1877, and would compare these statistics with those of the whole Dominion of Canada for 1877, now before the House. In the first place, he would take the imports. The imports of Canada amounted to $99,327,962, the imports of the port of San Francisco, not including treasure, were $75,713,292. That new country, scarcely thirty years old, had imported nearly as much merchandise as the whole of the Dominion of Canada. The exports of Canada were $75,875,393, while the exports of San Francisco, excluding treasure, were $61,911,237. The aggregate foreign trade of the port of San Francisco for last year was $137,624,509; within $40,000,000 of the aggregate gate foreign trade of the whole of this Dominion. In drawing attention to this fact, he again drew attention to the importance of selecting a port in the Pacific Ocean where we could successfully compete with the ports of the States in a trans-continental and trans-Pacific business. The total Customs revenue of this Dominion from all ports was $12,000,000 and over, the total Federal revenue received from the port of San Francisco alone was $3,803,034. If they took the port of Montreal, our largest commercial city, they found the total Customs collected there last year amounted to $3,878,507, while the port of San Francisco, in Customs alone, paid to the Federal treasury $6,692,432. As our object in taking this railway to the Pacific was not merely to open up the intervening country to settlement, but to engage in the commerce of the Pacific, he would show what proportion of the commerce of San Francisco went to other countries than the States and territories of the United States. There was merchandise, exclusive of treasure, to the amount of $44,351,425, sent from that port by sea to Europe and foreign countries on the shores of the Pacific Ocean; $2,999,312 to New York by Panama; $2,561,500 to New York by clipper; and $12,000,000 sent east by rail. The foreign imports of San Francisco amounted to $34,012,496; the domestic imports—by Panama $3,700,788; by rail $18,000,000, and by clippers $20,000,000. One half of the imports came from the United States, and the other half from foreign countries round the shores of the Pacific Ocean and elsewhere. Another fact, showing the great country we had to contend with in building a terminus on the shores of the Pacific, was that the estimated value of the productions of California, of all kinds, in 1877, was $144,650,000. The treasure exports in that year were $57,688,783, the treasure imports $6,242,855 and the total coinage of silver and gold at the San Francisco mint, and the largest coinage ever made at one mint in one year by any nation of the world was $49,772,000. With regard to the shipping—and if anything would show and prove conclusively to this House and to this Ministry the necessity of selecting the most capacious and accessible port on the Pacific as our western terminus, it was the statistics of the arrival of vessels alone at San Francisco;—the arrivals of American vessels from domestic ports last year numbered 3,482, with an aggregate tonnage of 1,099,205 tons; American vessels that came from foreign ports 274, an aggregate of 348,234 tons; foreign vessels from foreign ports 246, with a total tonnage of 236,858 tons; American vessels coming in from fishing voyages 18, tonnage 4,501; American vessels from whaling voyages 16, tonnage 2,270; making the aggregate number of vessels 4,036, with a total tonnage of 1,631,068 tons. Now, if a young community like San Francisco, only 30 years old, had grown up to be such a giant in commerce as to employ 4,036 ships with a tonnage of nearly two millions, to do her business, it could be easily seen by this House that we required a first-class port on the Pacific in order to do the business of this Dominion. But he would further claim the indulgence of the House in order to give some idea of the business done by railways which supplied the great port of San Francisco. The leading commercial newspaper of that city, in its admirable annual report of its commerce and navigation for 1877, stated as follows:—

“ Our railroad progress during 1874 was the most marked of any year since the completion of the trans-continental road. During it, several narrow-gauge roads have been projected and built, while the Southern Pacific has been completed over hundreds of miles of territory and finished as far as Fort Yuma in Arizona, to which point trains with goods and passengers are now constantly running. The heavy imports of steel rails, noted in another column, shows the vigour with which the work has been pushed. No long time will have elapsed before the Iron Horse has reached the Rio Grande on the borders of Texas. Then an immense tract of country, abounding in minerals and with large quantities of fertile lands, will be open to settlement, while the trade of San Francisco will extend to New Mexico, Colorado, and even Western Texas. The following extract from the report of the Railroad Companies gives more important points with regard to the railroad system of the State :

There were a few more points in connection with the wealth of San Francisco. The gold, silver and lead crop west of the Rocky Mountains, for last year, amounted to $75,919,013; total exports of flour to China, Japan, New Zealand, England, and countries in and around Pacific Ocean, 435,000 barrels, value $2,567,495. Total wheat exported, 127 vessels carrying 4,929,690 centals, valued at $11,017,353; total wool clip 60,612,000 lbs; wool exported 52,584,902 lbs.; total goods manufactured in the State, estimated value $50,000,000. The population of San Francisco was 300,000, it having increased since 1870 from 150,000. This was an increase at the rate of 100 per cent. during the seven years, and should she continue to increase her population in the same ratio she would have in 1891 at least one million people. Her assessed property last year was $300,000,000, but in reality it was worth about $500,000,000. She had 188 steamers and steamships in the China, Australia, Panama, and coast trade. Now it was not generally known, at all events it had not been alluded to in connection with this railway, that California had but a small number of square miles of territory in comparison with British Columbia. The whole of the American States washed by the Pacific Ocean measured only 362,888 square miles; of that California had 188,982; Oregon 102,606, and Washington 71,300 square miles. He had occasion recently to get a fair approximate measurement of British Columbia, and found that she had 330,000 square miles of territory, thus giving to the two principal Pacific States, California and Oregon, with Washington Territory only 32,888 square miles more than they had in British Columbia. Behind the States mentioned, which formed the Pacific seaboard of the United States, they found Arizona, with 130,800 square miles; Nevada, 83,500; Utah, 109,600; and Idaho, probably 100,000 square miles; a total of 443,900. The total number of square miles of United States territory west of the 110th meridian was 812,788. It had been generally asserted that the Canada Pacific Railway was only to be built for the benefit of British Columbia, or, in other words, to carry out

... a mad or insane agreement that was made by the late Administration with British Columbia." It had always appeared to him, whilst occupying a seat on the floor of this House, that the true Great West of Canada was unknown apparently to Ministers of the Crown as well as to the members of Parliament and the country. That Great West must find its chief port in British Columbia. Let any one take up a map and look at the country between the head of Lake Superior, Fort William, and the west shores of Vancouver Island, and they would discover that all the country west of the 110th meridian must of necessity do its business at a port on the Pacific Ocean. If any one would take the trouble to examine the country from the 49th parallel, extending to the north of the 60th parallel, and from the eastern boundary of British Columbia to the 110th meridian, he would find a large tract of country that was capable of settlement, a country rich in minerals as well as pastoral and agricultural land. That tract of country measured 257,000 square miles, and, if added to the total area of British Columbia, would make a territory of 587,000 square miles that must do its trade from the Pacific Ocean. And if they followed down the 110th meridian until it intersected the international boundary and stretched away to Mexican territory, and took in all the States he had mentioned, they would find that it cut through a portion of Montana, leaving Idaho and Washington territory on the west, through the eastern line of Utah, and stretched down the eastern boundary of Arizona. They might, therefore, expect that our civilization and their civilization would be built up from that meridian westward. He would take another point. If they started at Fort Chippewyan, Lake Athabasca in 59° north, which was near the 110th meridian—if they measured the country east and west from these points, they would easily perceive how true it was that a port in British Columbia must do the trade of that great country. If they stretched a line from Fort Chippewyan to the head of Bute Inlet, by the Peace River Valley and Pine River Pass, following the Pacific Railway projected line 250 miles, from

Stewart River to the sea, they had a distance of 958 miles from where the 110th meridian intersects Lake Athabasca; and if they took another line, from Fort Chippewyan to Fort William, on Lake Superior, including the projected line from Battleford to Fort William (961 miles) they had 1,411 miles. Now, was it to be supposed that wheat would be carried from Port Chippewyan to Fort William on Lake Superior, 400 miles further than to Bute Inlet, to find water communication to the ocean, when it could be moved 1,000 miles by rail to a port in British Columbia, and save the cost of 400 miles of land transportation, besides lake and river transportation to Montreal? He need not adduce evidence to show the fertility and resources of the true Great West, further than to draw attention to a recent lecture by Mr. Macoun, botanist, who was sent out by this Government to explore that country. That gentleman said: "As to the capability of the country for producing grain, the barley and wheat raised at 59° north latitude took the bronze medal at the Centennial, and the size and quality of all vegetable products was astonishing; all the weeds which in Ontario are small and stunted, are there, in the North-West, in some cases as high as a man's head." This extract showed that this country north of 60° parallel, the northern boundary of British Columbia, and 958 miles north-east of Bute Inlet, was a good country for growing all kinds of cereals. Before he sat down he might call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to a matter which he (Mr. DeCosmos) had before taken occasion to refer to in that gentleman's presence in private. He (Mr. DeCosmos) thought that the portion of this great country east of the Rocky Mountains, along the watershed of these mountains, along the eastern boundary of British Columbia and to the 100th parallel ought to be explored, and explored thoroughly, so that at the next meeting of Parliament they might determine what that country was worth for minerals and for pastoral and agricultural purposes. Having given the House the benefit of these facts, and shown hon. members the necessity of some 300,000 square miles east of the boundary of British Columbia being supplied with some port on the Pacific coast within our own territory, he took it that this Government would make a very great mistake indeed if, for the paltry consideration of a few millions of dollars to-day, it should select the wrong route. If the route by Bute Inlet cost a few millions of dollars more than any other route, that would be a mere nothing in comparison with the advantage that we would derive as a commercial people from selecting the best sea-port which we possessed on that coast.

MR. MACKENZIE said he presumed that some mistake had been made in the wording of the last line of the motion in which the word bridges was introduced.

MR. DECOSMOS said the motion was intended to include any estimate that had been made with respect to bridges as well as anything else, and the words "including bridges" ought to be in parenthesis.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was no objection at all to the motion. He was not aware of the existence of any report of this kind except a hurried report of Mr. Marcus Smith respecting bridges that was not already before the House; but, if there were any, they would of course be brought down.

ALLOTMENT OF MINORS' LANDS IN MANITOBA.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. SCHULTZ moved for a return of all parishes in the Province of Manitoba for which the minors' land are unallotted; all correspondence between the Dominion Government and the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba in reference to the same. He said he had moved this motion thus early in the Session that he might have an opportunity of placing before the Government some of the grievances of which a portion of his people complained, with a view to their being considered and, if possible, redressed. He had often had occasion to bring the matter up before, and trusted now that this was the last time that it would be requisite. Long as was the interval between the passing of the Manitoba Act and the present time, a portion only of the lands granted by that Act had been given to those who were entitled to receive them. The delay had caused and was still causing the greatest possible damage and loss, and the recipients of the land last allotted, that of the parish of St. Andrew's found when they knew where their lands were situated that they either had been or were in process of being denuded of the timber which alone made them valuable. Again, in the case of the parish in question, the largest in Manitoba, a very great grievance existed in the fact that the allotment which had been made did not cover the lands which were chosen by the parish at the invitation of the Dominion Government through Lieutenant-Governor Archibald, and consequent upon this fact many people had received their allotment in bogs and swamps where they were utterly useless, and where it was distinctly understood and agreed that no land should be given. He (Mr. Schultz) had drawn attention to this fact early in the Session that the hon. the Minister of the Interior might have an opportunity of carrying out in good faith the promises of the Government to this parish especially, and he would respectfully urge that the Dominion land agent at Winnipeg be at once instructed to ascertain the number and holders of such claims, and that immediate steps be taken for the drawing of good land out of the unallotted portion of the St. Andrew's Block or rather the block which should have belonged to St. Andrew's, in lieu of the useless lands of which they were at present the recipients. Indirectly connected, too, with this matter was the grievance caused by the state in which the contractors had left the portion of the Pembina branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway between St. Boniface and Selkirk. Although called for in their contract, scarcely a decent crossing has been laid between these two points and the inconvenience, loss, and damage caused to the river settlers, who constantly had occasion to cross the line, was very great indeed. In addition to this nuisance, their hay had been stolen, wasted and destroyed; their wood cut for rails almost within sight of their houses, and any attempt at redress rudely repelled by those engaged on the works. Under the circumstances, he thought that not one penny more should be paid the contractors till their private wrongs had been redressed and until the road itself was put in a condition to be a benefit instead of the nuisance it was at present. Touching the questions of roads to the rear, it was a very general feeling expressed in all parts of his constituency that the Government should lend their aid, and on all sides the proposition was made to be allowed to pay the Relief Wheat accounts into a fund which should be expended for local improvements, and that the full sum should not be exacted when grain was at its present depreciated price, but that bushel for bushel or something near it should be accepted. In matters concerning the river belt, patents were issuing but slowly, and the regulation which necessitated a separate application for the hay privilege was felt to be a burthen in its increased expense and the trouble necessary to be taken. Again, now that the necessity for running side lines has been felt, it seemed that some modification of the existing law regarding surveyors was necessary and desirable. He trusted that the Government would give these matters their attention, as they were of vital interest to many, and that, in addition, they would see that every power was given to the natural guardians of allotted minors' land to protect these lands from spoliation during the minority of their recipients.

Mr. MILLS said that no allotments had been made since those that were mentioned in his annual report were concluded, and all the information that they could give in reply to this motion was contained in that report. He expected, when the House rose last April, that these allotments would have all taken place before the present date; and they had done everything they could do to hurry on the work; but, as the late Lieutenant-Governor could only give a portion of his time and attention to this work, they were obliged to avail themselves of his leisure in making these allotments. Up to the time of the retirement of Mr. Morris from the office of Lieutenant-Governor, this work was not completed, and, when Governor Cauchon was appointed, he (Mr. Cauchon) was instructed to proceed with all possible speed with the allotment of these Half-breed reserves. Mr. Cauchon had, however, been written to by certain persons who protested against it proceeding on the report made to the Government, by parties appointed for that purpose. He (Mr. Cauchon) was also informed that there were a number of persons who had rights in this connection, and who had actually settled upon portions of these reserves, and before these reserves had been made, whose rights had been overlooked. They had written to Winnipeg for all the papers connected with these lands, which were yet unallotted, with the view of giving directions in the matter. These papers had not as yet been received, and, until they came to hand, no action could be taken; but he trusted that the work of allotting the Half-breed reserves, which had not yet been distributed, would be again begun at a very early date, and that it would be completed before the Session terminated. He thought, however, that at the present moment no further information with reference to these allotments could be given the hon. member; and there was no correspondence of any consequence that could at present be brought down to the House.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

WELLAND CANAL CONTRACTS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Mr. LANGEVIN moved for a return showing: 1st, the amounts of the six lowest tenders received in September or October, 1873, for Sections 2, 3, 6, 7, 12, 13 and 14 of the new Welland Canal, together with names of tenderers; 2nd, the amounts of the six lowest tenderers; 3rd, the names of the tenderers to whom these sections were awarded; 4th, copies of the Orders in Council awarding such Sections;

5th, copy of all correspondence relating to such award. He said he did not intend to go into the subject at any great length; but he must say that he had brought forward this motion in order to show that the hon. the Minister of Public Works, when he stated at meetings held last summer that the late Government had again and again passed over tenders which had been received, and had shown favouritism in giving out contracts to certain contractors who belonged to the Conservative party, was certainly in error; and that the hon. gentleman, when he was so speaking, forgot that one of the first things which he or his Government had done when they acceded to office was exactly that with which the hon. gentleman reproached his opponents; this was the reason why he asked for this return. He (Mr. Langevin) desired to establish, if common report could be relied on—and such report must be and was based on the statements of tenderers in these cases—that such tenders were passed over, though these tenders were much lower than those of the tenderers favoured by the Government; and also that, in all these cases, the former tenderers were treated—he would not say unjustly, for he sincerely hoped that the hon. gentleman, when he brought down these papers, might show that the favoured tenderers had been so selected because, under the circumstances, they should have been chosen—but passed over, though quite able to fulfil these contracts, while their offers were lower than those which had been accepted by the hon. the Minister of Public Works. The hon. gentleman had prided himself on the new contract system adopted by the present Government as better serving the interests of the public than the system which had been in vogue under the late Administration. He regretted that the hon. gentleman had made use of such language, in this respect, as was attributed to him—though the hon. gentleman, perhaps, had not been properly reported or in the heat of the moment he might have employed expressions not so guarded as the hon. gentleman would have made them at another time—and had so attacked his predecessors in office. He was sure that the hon.

gentleman must have observed that he (Mr. Langevin) had not so acted in the House towards the hon. gentleman; and, as he had acted in this relation in the past, so he would deport himself to the end. He (Mr. Langevin) had always remembered the difficulties attending the position of Minister, and, consequently, he had not attacked the hon. gentleman's motives, or found fault with him, unless there was apparently good cause for doing so. The hon. gentleman had stated at those meetings that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had not done what his predecessors had done—he had not opened the tenders which were sent to the Department. He (Mr. Langevin) would take this opportunity to say to the hon. gentleman that, whenever tenders were called for by his Department he (Mr. Langevin) had never opened a tender unless he had either the Deputy or the Secretary of the Department to open them with him; every tender so opened was endorsed by the officer present, and by himself; the envelope was marked with the date and hour when it was endorsed, and signed by both; each envelope was numbered; a statement was made out with respect to all the tenders, giving the number corresponding to that of the envelope and tender, and this statement was signed by that officer and himself; consequently there could have been no tampering with these tenders afterwards or at that moment unless the hon. gentleman would suppose—which he did not imagine could be the case—that he (Mr. Langevin) or the Minister of the time could have been in any way party to tampering with these tenders, with the officer of the Department. He did not believe that the hon. gentleman would make any such accusation against any of his predecessors. When these tenders were so opened, they were handed over to the Chief Engineer of the Department, Mr. Page, or to the engineer Mr. Page would select for the purpose, to be extended. The hon. gentleman knew very well, though this might not be as well known to the House, how this extension took place. These tenders were based on a schedule of prices, according to which the tenderers stated that they would fulfil the contract in question. The quantities being then in the hands of the engineer, the latter would extend them with the prices, and show what was the bulk sum of the contract so tendered for; after this was done, the tenders so extended were handed back to the head of the Department, who, calling in the Chief Engineer and the Deputy of the Department, then ascertained what were the respective positions of such tenderers—whether they were men of experience, whether they were known to the Department, whether their sureties were proper sureties, and the prices such as would give guarantee to the Department that the contract would be fulfilled. After these matters were examined into, a report was made in every case—unless the lowest tender could be accepted—to the Council, and an Order in Council, on the report being passed, was drawn out, authorizing the head of the Department to pass over the lowest tender, or the two or three lowest tenders, and accept the fourth or fifth tender as the case might be. Under these circumstances, no favouritism could be shown to any person unless the hon gentleman would suppose that the whole Government and the whole Council would show such favouritism. These Orders in Council, these tenders, and the reports of the engineers were now in the Department, and the whole thing could be investigated; hence the system that was followed under the late Government was a proper one and not a system of favouritism. It was based on regard for the interests of the public; and, in this light, they had considered whether the tenderers could execute the contract, and whether the sureties were proper sureties. The hon. gentleman said that the present Government had adopted a new scheme; insisting upon having a certain sum of money deposited as guarantee that the tenderer would fulfil his contract, and then they decided that a certain sum should be kept out of the contract price; this amounted to 20 per cent., if he was not mistaken.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is not as high as that. It is 5 per cent.

MR. LANGEVIN said that the hon. gentleman stated they either did that, or retained a mortgage on real estate. When the papers called for were brought down, the House would see whether the new system was more favourable to the Government than the old system. No doubt the hon. gentleman would say that tenderers, who, in many cases, could not be accepted, were eliminated under the new scheme; this might be so, but the hon. gentleman could see by comparing the two systems, whether he (Mr. Mackenzie) had obtained as low prices in the successful tenders by his system as was the case under the old system. If he correctly remembered the statement they had had of accepted tenders, he thought the hon. gentleman would perceive that the prices were higher under the present system. Of course, he was to a very great extent, speaking without proper data before him, because he could only refer to successful tenders; but the hon. gentleman would find out when this return came down that, under the new system, he had not obtained, as he (Mr. Langevin) at all events believed, better prices, or as favourable a position, or as favourable results as were secured under the previous system, although he (Mr. Langevin) did not say that the former system was a bad one, or worse than the latter. When the statement came down—and he hoped that it would be very shortly presented to the House—hon. members would see whether he was right or wrong; but he believed that his statements would be borne out by the facts, and that the tenders received by the late Government for sections 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 12, 13 and 14 of the new Welland Canal were lower than the tenders which had been afterwards accepted by the present Government for the execution of these works. It might be that he was mistaken in this matter, and, if this was the case, he would be very glad to acknowledge such error.

MR. MACKENZIE: I have no objection to this motion. The hon. gentleman says he never said anything in this House in the way of imputing any motives to me; and he thinks I did very wrong in saying anything that might be colourably construed into imputing motives to him. The hon. gentleman himself may not have done so; but he knows what his leader did. Let me make a quotation for his benefit as follows:—

“It was the practice of the present Government to make the first question concerning contractors—how did he vote at the last election? A man might offer to build miles of railway or a portion of a canal at half price, but if, by some hocuspocus, he was found out to be a Conservative, although his was the lowest tender, Mr. Mackenzie, the head of the Government, would tell the Minister of Public Works: It must not be given to that man, but to another who was true to the cause.”

I characterized that as a gross slander, and I now characterize it in the same way. The hon. gentleman and his colleagues are together responsible for this statement, and I shall hold them responsible for the statement.

MR. PLUMB: Who is responsible for the statement on your side.

MR. MACKENZIE: If the hon. member for Niagara would learn to command his temper, it would be a little benefit to himself as well as to the House. Now, what I have said about that is this: that in not one single instance was there ever a political opponent passed over to my knowledge; in not one single instance was a political friend ever favoured to my knowledge. I have acted invariably as I have stated, and constantly in concert with the officers of my Department, not one of whom was appointed by myself. I have stated that, if it were true that, because a contractor for the Goderich Harbour was excepted at $212,000, when there was a tender for $180,000, and if that mere fact proved corruption, then—and I say so still—we were far less corrupt than the previous Government, taking their own ground, for we succeeded, by our system and our care in letting contracts, in giving sixteen out of nineteen millions to the lowest tenderers, while the late Government succeeded in giving seven out of twenty millions to the lowest tenderers. Now, I impute no motives to the hon. gentleman. I have no doubt but that, in the general rule of letting contracts, what I have stated here is correct. I said that the usual practice in the Department was that, when the chief engineer reported against giving a contract to a particular person for reasons assigned, we then took the next lowest tender, unless we assumed the responsibility of differing from our professional adviser. That was my case, Sir; and those gentlemen who loudly proclaimed in all their picnic speeches that there was corruption in the letting of contracts by this Government, ought to follow up this proclamation by an investigation. They ought to be prepared to prove what they state—that there was corruption practised. They ought to be prepared to bring this matter before a competent tribunal; and they are not doing their duty to the public when they fail to do so. I have challenged them in public, and I have challenged them in this House, and I challenge them to-night again to do this. With reference to the contracts in question, that the hon. member for Charlevoix thinks were let under his system for a lower rate, I really cannot tell whether they were or not. I have not looked into the point, but I know this—that the contracts he refers to particularly were let under the old system. At least, that is my impression at the present moment. All the tenders were received before the hon. gentleman left office. They were about to award them at the time they left office, but there was some precipitation in the manner of their leaving office, and they were not let. The chief engineer recommended, for reasons assigned, that the work should be advertized afresh. It was advertized afresh, and this was done early in the course of the winter of 1874, under, if I recollect aright, the old system. The new system I believe to be the best, because it has secured us from the class of contractors, or a class of parties who called themselves contractors, but who were merely speculating upon offers without any real intention ever to enter upon the work. We found ourselves for weeks constantly occupied in calling upon one and then upon another, and one after another failed to accept the contract until we came to the seventh, eighth, tenth or twelfth tenders before we could obtain any letting of the contract. And, at all events, Sir, whether it is the best or not, our intention was to have the contract system so arranged that we would not reach, almost invariably, the last tenderer before the result was practically obtained, and we could accomplish what we desired in the new system. It may be, Sir, that the hon. gentleman is correct, for anything that I know, in his assertion that he thinks that under the system which required no security the prices were lower. Probably they may have been. We know, Sir, that, under the system that prevailed without any security, a large number of contractors failed, and the Government lost large sums of money; while, under the present system, I am bound to say that the work is much more satisfactorily done than was the case under the old one. In no instance, as I have said, have I departed from the strictest rule that can be drawn in awarding contracts; and so much has that been the case, that I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman will find, if he examines the names of the contractors and their avowed political opinions, so far as I am aware at the present moment, that a much larger number of those who receive contracts are our political opponents, and not our political friends. If I am correct in my knowledge of the particulars and my remembrance of the circumstances, I believe that the last contracts that were let on the Welland Canal were, to a very large extent, to the amount of nearly two millions I think, and with only one exception, let to gentlemen who were opponents of the present Administration, simply because they happened to be in the position of being either the lowest tenderers or the second lowest, as was the case in two or three instances where the chief engineer declined to give too large a work to one party. The tenders will, of course, as the hon. gentleman knows, take some time to copy with extensions; but, I will have them brought down as fast as it is possible to do so.

Mr. TUPPER said that the question raised by this motion was a very important one, and it was more important because he understood the hon. the Minister of Public Works to say that he was not prepared to controvert the statement that the effect of the change in letting these tenders had been to advance the cost to the country.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think the hon. member would not desire to misrepresent me. I said I did not look at the prices and was not prepared to say whether the hon. gentleman's assumption or belief was correct or not, but I believe it was incorrect.

MR. TUPPER said he had not intended to misrepresent the hon. gentleman, but he had understood him to say that he was not prepared to controvert the statement of the mover of the motion that the effect had been to increase the prices. The question appeared to him (Mr. Tupper) to be a very important one. The hon. the Minister of Public Works had claimed credit to himself and to the Government of which he was a member, for adopting a different mode of letting contracts; the effect of which he had claimed to be a great saving to the public, and a great advantage to the country. He (Mr. Tupper) had ventured in another place to differ in opinion with the hon. gentleman as to what the natural effect of the new mode of letting contracts would be. He said that it was desirable, in the public interest, that as wide and as extended competition should take place as possible, when a public work was offered for competition. He believed the alteration instituted, the change of system made by the hon. the Minister of Public Works was calculated to limit the competition, and he would point out to the House, very briefly, why he thought so. The hon. gentleman asked for the deposit of a very large sum of money before he would receive a tender at all, and the forfeiture of that sum was involved, provided the party to whom the contract was awarded refused to go on with it. Now, what was the result? It was to limit the number of applications. Very often the time was very limited in which people could make their calculations; a person put in a tender in good faith, intending to act upon it, but he was still engaged in obtaining the information necessary to convince him if it would be safe to carry on the work. The effect of requiring a large amount of money to be deposited, which might be forfeited, was to deter persons who were not satisfied as to the character of the work from putting in tenders; whereas the contract might otherwise have been awarded to them in the interest of the public. But it might be said that there was another reason, which not only limited the number of applicants for that public work, but was calculated to throw contracts into the hands of the supporters of the Government of the day. It was notorious that, though this money might be forfeited to the Government, again and again the Government had given up that money, where the party had been given the contract and not only failed to go on with the work, but had arranged with other parties to withdraw, and throw the work into the hands of parties with whom perhaps he was concerned, at a higher price, and yet the money had not been forfeited, but given back. The fact was this: if one believed he had sufficient interest with the Government to get them to give him back his money, he might tender; but, where another man had not the influence requisite, and was, perhaps, a political opponent of hon. gentlemen opposite, and believed they would be glad, if he did not go on, to take his money from him, it was calculated not only to limit the number of tenders, but to unfairly favour the political friends and supporters of the Government of the day. He believed the system had been found to operate in that way, and not to the advantage of the country. He now came to the question raised by the hon. the Minister of Public Works—that of showing that a larger number of tenders had been passed over by the late Government than by the present Government. The remarks he (Mr. Tupper) had made would show a very sufficient reason why that should be. If anything were done to limit the number of tenders sent in, the effect would be to cause just the disparity in the amounts of public money tendered for and passed over at lower rates in one case than in the other. But the hon. the Minister of Public Works had made one declaration for which he (Mr. Tupper) thanked him very much, in his utterances on this subject in another place.

MR. TUPPER.

He had shown by his speech and by the detail which he had submitted to this House, and the greater detail which he had given in his public addresses on this subject, that he had given this question of the awarding of contracts the most exhaustive examination which could possibly be given to any question. The hon. gentleman, after having employed a great staff of officers, at a great cost to the country, for weeks and months, in order to give him this information, was obliged to state that he was not in a position to say that the late Government ever awarded a contract corruptly. He thanked the hon. gentleman for that statement, because the hon. the Minister of Public Works had the fullest means of coming to a conclusion; and, if there had been anything improper, he had the means of establishing that in the fullest manner; but, having exhausted all his powers of inquisition into the proceedings of his predecessors in the Public Works Department, he said he was not in a position to bring forward a single charge of corruption, in regard to a single contract, against his predecessors, because he had no such evidence to offer. The hon. gentleman said there was a much larger number of lower tenders passed over by the late Government than by the present; but he must not forget that the public interest might sometimes be consulted—in fact, his speech just now had proved that the public money might be saved—by passing over a lower tender, rather than by accepting it. He had stated that, in many instances, by accepting tenders too low, the parties failed to perform the work, and, instead of benefit, loss had accrued to the country. Hon. gentlemen must remember that, in the first letting of the Intercolonial Railway contracts, they had the melancholy example of people rushing into contracts and failing to fulfil them, because there was not enough money in them to enable them to carry out their contracts, and the case was so strong as to justify the Government in asking the House to supplement payment to those parties for the work they had performed at a loss, and thus an additional loss had accrued to the country. There was no argument in the amounts the late Government had passed over. The hon. gentleman said he passed over $3,000,000 worth of lower tenders; and that established the fact that the public interest might be just as much consulted in passing over a lower tender, if the work were not likely to be done satisfactorily under it, as it would be consulted by accepting it. But he understood his hon. friend who had brought forward this motion to assume that, when the late Government went out of office, tenders had been advertized for for all these contracts in the Public Works Department. If he (Mr. Tupper) wanted to give to the hon. gentleman or to this House evidence of the desire of the late Government to act fairly—if he wanted to prove that, in dealing with public contracts, they had no object to serve, no view in relation to the question but the public interest alone, he required no better evidence than that they went out of office with a large number of contracts ready to be awarded to the parties to whom they wished to award them, but they left them unawarded. If there had been a disposition, or if it had been the custom to deal with these contracts in any sense except in the interest of the country, these contracts would have been awarded, so far as they had the power to do it legitimately and fairly, to their own friends, but these contracts were left unawarded.

Mr. BLAKE: While these contracts were left unawarded, our lobbies were infested by expectant contractors.

Mr. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman had established his (Mr. Tupper's) case. He thought it was evident, according to the hon. gentleman's own statement, that the late Government were able to resist the pressure of any number of lobbies—if there were contractors attempting to use that pressure. At all events, whether that pressure was used or not, it was insufficient to induce his hon. friend the Minister of Public Works of that day to award these contracts or to recommend the Government to award them, and they were left unawarded. He wanted no better evidence than that of the way in which the late Government dealt with that important branch of the public service. They went out of office and the present Minister of Public Works took the place of his hon. friend (Mr. Langevin). What, knowing that these contracts had been offered to public competition according to law, knowing that under these advertizements contractors had spent time and money in the investigation of what they could afford to tender for that public service for, knowing that they were entitled under the law to have the contracts which they had legitimately obtained, awarded to them, did the hon. gentleman do? He understood him to say that the new Government re-advertized; that they would not even discharge the duty incumbent on them until they had given other parties an opportunity of coming in and competing for those tenders which had been already dealt with as the hon. gentleman was bound to deal with them under the law. He understood his hon. friend (Mr. Langevin) to say that the effect of that had been largely to increase the cost of the works.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does he say so?

Mr. TUPPER said he understood him to say that was the rumour, and he could understand how that would arise. Those gentlemen who had sent in tenders, who had spent their time and money to ascertain the amount for which they could do the work, and who, under the law, were entitled to the contracts, found that they were let to other parties, at much higher rates than those for which they had tendered. The amount for which they were let was a matter of public notoriety, and these gentlemen knew what they had been prepared to do the work for. That change was not very beneficial to the country. If it should prove to be correct, if the hon. gentleman brought down the papers without going to a Committee, the House could have an opportunity of seeing and the country of judging, whether this change in the Administration of the day was attended with such great benefit to the administration of this Department, and with the saving of money on Public Works, which hon. gentlemen pretended. Were any of those who were crowding the lobbies pressing hon. gentlemen opposite to give them a chance if a change of Administration took place? Did he understand the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) to mean that contractors of only one side would press the Government of the day to give them contracts?

MR. MACKENZIE: Only one.

MR. TUPPER said he understood that contractors, whether Liberals or Conservatives, were likely to press their claims, as far as they could. However, the first effect of the change of régime in the Public Works Department was an increased cost. If it were a fact, as he was told it was, that, notwithstanding the enormous depression in the cost of material, in the cost of labour, in the cost of everything that entered into the fulfilment of a contract; and if, as the Minister of Finance had placed it on record over his own signature, these works could be performed for thirty per cent. less than previously; if, under the new system, the country, instead of gaining that 30 per cent., had lost it, that would be great evidence that the change of system had not been beneficial. The Minister of Public Works had given a very grandiloquent challenge to the Opposition to take a Committee. What did he mean by that? Had he forgotten that his challenge had been previously accepted? Had he forgotten that the leader of the Opposition had moved an amendment to a resolution, asking for a full and exhaustive investigation into the affairs of the Northern Railway, and that the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) was virtually adopted by the House. That matter was referred to a Committee. What sort of a Committee did they get? Did the hon. gentleman think that the House had forgotten, or that the country would ever forget—

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not think it ever will.

MR. TUPPER: That the hon. gentleman used his power to pack the Committee with six to three. Did he forget that, when that Committee came to sit upon that very important question, a very remarkable indication was given to hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House, as to how they would always fare with such Committees. They had said that, if there was a disposition to have a fair Committee that could arrange the matter, they would give the Government a majority, and take half a-dozen fair-minded gentlemen, members of the House, from both sides, to deal with it. The First Minister refused, and packed the Committee two to one; and how did they use their power? The hon. gentleman had been asked whether Mr. Miall, an accountant—one of the ablest officers of the Government in this country—had been sent to Toronto on the Commission which sat there, and whether he had made a report. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had stated that no report had been made. That was his (Mr. Tupper's) recollection, and he had no doubt that the hon. the First Minister made that statement under the impression that he was stating what was correct. Mr. Miall was called before the Committee as witness, and he was asked, "Did you make a report upon this question?" and he was compelled to answer, on his oath, that he had made the report. Then, when it was moved that that report should be submitted, the packed majority of that Committee was used to prevent its being read.

MR. SPEAKER: I think I must call the hon. gentleman to order. The word "packed" has been used. I did not notice it at first, but the appointment of a Committee must be the action of the House, and, in this case, I think the Committee was specially chosen by the House. It cannot, therefore, be said to have been packed.

MR. TUPPER: I withdraw the word "packed," and will say arranged by the House.

MR. MACKENZIE: Order.

MR. TUPPER: I should be very sorry to use an unparliamentary expression. The case is too strong of itself to require a strong expression on my part to bring it home to the feelings of hon. gentlemen opposite.

MR. SPEAKER: I think the proper word would be "appoint" or "select."

Mr. TUPPER: I will take "select." I am replying to the challenge of the hon. gentleman that he should submit this matter to a certain tribunal, and I think it is right to point out the objections which we have to that tribunal. I say that the treatment which we received from that Committee, or from the portion of it which was selected by the votes of hon. gentlemen opposite, was not such as to encourage us very much to submit any other case to the Committee selected—I use your own word, Mr. Speaker; it is a very good word, and I thank you for having suggested it—by hon. gentlemen opposite. I give that as an answer once and for all to the remarks of the hon. gentleman. He went on to say that, if the power of the Committee thus selected was to be used to close the mouth of the witness, to prevent the testimony which the Opposition were able to offer from being brought before that Committee, it was not very encouraging to them to seek from hon. gentlemen opposite the selection of a tribunal before which such an investigation should take place. But there was a great committee in which he had perfect confidence, and that was the great public of this country—a great committee to which they were prepared to carry these questions; and he believed that, when they submitted them, with the evidence which they had to sustain their position, they would be able not only to have the evidence carefully examined and received, but he looked forward to the deliverance of that Committee with a great amount of equanimity. The hon. gentleman had said that no Government influence had ever been used in the awarding of contracts since he had been in power. He (Mr. Tupper) did not intend to go into that question at length; but the hon. gentleman must not forget that very curious things had taken place with regard to the awarding of contracts. One important case had been examined by the Parliament of Canada, and it had been proved that several of the hon. gentleman's colleagues had addressed letters showing their particular desire that a certain person should obtain a contract, and a Committee of the Senate, after having examined the hon. the Minister of Public Works and obtained all the testimony in relation to the matter which it was possible to obtain, came to the conclusion that, after the contractor had been set to work, the contract had been wrested out of his hands and given to persons whose claims had been forced upon the Minister of Public Works by his colleagues in the Ministry. He (Mr. Tupper) need not refer to the notorious Goderich Harbour case, because it was a matter so thoroughly historical, and so well understood all over this country as to need no reference to it by him. But the fact was that the hon. gentleman had a colleague, so potent and influential a colleague, whom he was so anxious to obtain, so reluctant to part with, who had been in and out so often that he (Mr. Tupper) was not sure whether at that particular time he was a colleague of the hon. gentleman or only a political supporter, that all that was necessary was for him to say that a man was his friend in order to induce the Government to take $30,000 of the people's money, and hand it over to that friend. With facts like these, patent and notorious to the whole country, the hon. gentleman must not take too high a ground as to the mode in which public contracts had been awarded, and must not expect to cover such cases by the challenge he had thrown out to submit them to a tribunal, practically of his own selection.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had referred to what he called the notorious Goderich Harbour job. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had said already that that contract was awarded to the person who received it upon the recommendation of the chief engineer. He found that, under the late Government, J. Courtney & Co., were the lowest tenderers for section No. 1, of the Lachine Canal, at the sum of $498,685, but the contract was let to A. P. Macdonald & Co. for $619,254—$120,569 higher than the lowest tender. Was that corrupt? If the hon. gentleman said that, where one was passed over and a higher tender accepted the action was corrupt, it necessarily followed that the action of the late Government, in that respect, must have been corrupt. For deepening and clearing out feeder on the Welland Canal, G. Harvey was the lowest tenderer at $98,700, but the contract was awarded to H. W. Manning & Co. for $105,450. For another section, H. J. Sutton & Co. were the lowest tenderers at $97,920, but the contract was awarded to John Brown, a well-known partizan of hon. gentlemen opposite, at $120,480—or $22,560 more than the lowest tenderer, “on the ground that the two lowest are too low, and next two have each a contract”—thus reaching Brown. John Brown also received the next contract for exactly the same reasons as the last, for an advance of $10,315 over the lowest tenderer. On another section, Peter McGraw, who tendered for $261,681, was passed over and the contract was given to John Ginty & Co., well-known partizans of hon. gentlemen opposite, at $311,970—or $50,290 higher than the lowest tenderer, and they knew the latter to be a good contractor, who had finished a contract on the railway in very good order. Paul Ross, who was well-known not to be a partizan of the hon. gentleman opposite, had tendered, in another case, at $244,850, but the contract was awarded to John Elliott & Co., well-known political partizans of the then Government, for $276,664—or $31,814 higher than the lowest tender. And so he might go on quoting page after page until a sum of over $2,000,000, he believed, was reached, where gentlemen, when in office, had passed over the lowest tenderers, and awarded the contracts for higher amounts; but his general statement was correct that the present Government had awarded contracts to the lowest tenderers in $16,000,000 out of $19,000,000. That was an incontrovertible fact which showed exactly what the result of their system was, in giving the contract invariably to the lowest tenderer where that could be done in the public interest. He had never said, and he did not now say, that the hon. gentlemen opposite awarded any contract for corrupt reasons. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) seemed surprised that he (Mr. Mackenzie) should have said so. The hon.

gentleman was so used to a system of slander himself—was so used to imputing evil motives to others, that he was surprised when others did not occasionally impute evil motives to him.

MR. McCALLUM asked what about section No. 1 on the Welland Canal.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not remember, for the moment, what No. 1 section was, but, if the hon. member would place a question on the paper, he would answer it. The Government had nothing to hide respecting contracts. Hon. gentlemen opposite had brought up the question of the Goderich Harbour contract, which had been completely answered long ago. The mere fact that one of his colleagues recommended a contractor as a good man was nothing to allege against either himself or that hon. gentleman, because every man, whether a colleague or not, had a right to state his impressions regarding a particular contractor. On the Gatineau Boom question, which the hon. member for Cumberland had stated had been investigated by an impartial Committee, he (Mr. Mackenzie) might say it was impossible to obtain an impartial Committee of the Senate. He had repeatedly explained that the reason why Harvey and Palen were passed over was because it had been proved, to his satisfaction, that their tenders were not in within the proper time, and Harvey would not have been entitled to obtain a contract, in any case, because he was a mere servant of the Department, receiving a salary. It had been said that a person was given the contract, and afterwards had it taken from him. That was not correct, and the party never had the contract. An irresponsible person told him that his was the lowest tender sent in.

MR. ROCHESTER: I ask the hon. the Minister of Public Works if that gentleman had not been in the habit for years of following that same course.

MR. MACKENZIE: He was not in the habit of following that course.

MR. ROCHESTER: I know he was.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. member had asked him a question and had received an answer.

MR. ROCHESTER said if the hon. the Premier would give him a Committee—not a partizan Committee—he would undertake to prove what he had stated.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was afraid it was a partizan Committee that the hon. member wanted. It would be an intolerable system that a foreman should, without having the authority of the Minister, his deputy, or his secretary, intimate to a contractor that his was the lowest tender, and that he might proceed with the work. It would be a senseless and unbusinesslike system, and one which had never been permitted to his knowledge. In regard to the statements of the hon. member for Cumberland about a packed Committee, he would not refer to the offensive expressions which had been constantly used by that hon. member towards the House—expressions which were offensive in the last degree to hon. members. The hon. gentleman had implied that the members who were elected to serve on the Northern Railway Committee, did not act the part of conscientious, upright judges. At the same time he was obliged to acknowledge the very fact that it was alleged was proved. The hon. member knew that the House, without a division, required the repayment of $27,000, besides the surrender of a mortgage on a hotel, being money that was improperly taken out of the public Treasury through the Northern Railway by the hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends for political purposes; and he was amazed that the hon. member for Cumberland should have dared for a moment to mention the Northern Railway Committee, or anything respecting the Northern Railway, when he knew the intimate connection which had existed between that company and his own political friends.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. the Minister of Public Works had read over a number of contracts awarded to parties who sent in the lowest tenders and asked him (Mr. Tupper) if that action was corrupt. He replied in the negative. That hon. gentleman, however, after having expended much time and money in investigating contracts let by the late Government, was obliged to say that there was not a single case in which their action had been corrupt.

MR. MACKENZIE said he never alleged there was.

MR. HUNTINGTON said the remarks of the hon. member for Cumberland had been slightly suggestive, and the country would not consider the time of the House wasted while he summed up the conclusions at which the hon. gentleman had arrived, and the manner in which he had indicated the policy of his party. That hon. gentleman seemed very much surprised at the hardihood of the hon. the Premier in declaring that, if there were grave charges made against him or his Government, there should be a Committee of investigation, and the House should ascertain what were the facts and purge itself, if that became necessary. The hon. gentleman's answer amounted to this: that he had not confidence in the House. He had insinuated that a certain Committee struck last year was of such a character that justice could not be done to hon. members of the Opposition in that enquiry; that was to say, the hon. gentleman attacked the parliamentary system of Government by majorities. The hon. gentleman believed, apparently, that a Committee must be under the control of the principles which he professed, and, therefore, he declared he would appeal to another Committee—a Committee of the people, as he did last summer in his addresses, when there was no one to reply, and when he indulged in all sorts of misrepresentations, attacking the public and private character of his adversaries—and not to their representatives, because, forsooth, he dare not trust the representatives of the people in Parliament. The hon. member for Cumberland was the leader of the Opposition at that moment, and he flaunted in the face of the House the battle cry with which he intended to appeal to the people. What did he say to the country to-night? He said, "It is true we have made accusations of all kinds against hon. gentlemen opposite, and charged them with this, that and the other; that we were afraid to repeat those charges, on our responsibility to Parliament, and did not desire to have them investigated in a constitutional manner, because a Committee cannot be formed to give a judicial decision because we don't control it." The hon. gentleman's political life had not begun at this moment. He (Mr. Huntington) could remember a Committee being struck when the hon. gentleman was not so careful and anxious as he (Mr. Huntington) was, under the circumstances, not to reflect on the conduct of a certain Committee, which he remembered and the consequences of whose labours were well known to the country; he remembered that the hon. gentleman allowed himself and his party to take advantage of a Committee on that most important occasion, and there were no complaints of this kind. The Committee entered on the enquiry, and the House knew the result. Did the hon. gentleman suppose the people were so blind as not to be able to judge for themselves respecting the evidence taken before a Committee? A Committee such as that on the Northern Railway, or any other Committee, did not suppress the facts proved before them. He did not say that Committees appointed by the hon. gentleman when he had a majority undertook to suppress the facts, but he was ready to shield himself, when it became necessary, behind the system which he condemned to-day, and behind his condemnation of which he thought he could justify himself before the people for making groundless charges which he dare not take the responsibility of formulating and attempting to establish before the House. He had invited the attention of hon. members to this fact, because it was desirable the country should understand that hon. gentlemen opposite made charges which they dared not attempt to substantiate under the forms peculiar to the House, and which prevailed under the British parliamentary system. He hoped the fact would go out to the people—and the hon. gentleman would have an opportunity to explain it when he again went among the people—that the great Conservative party, whose power was flaunted in their faces dared not submit the charges of which they professed to have ample proof, to an investigation by the only constitutional authority. He wished to sum up the facts in this way: Hon. gentlemen opposite had been a long time framing charges against the Government; they had been very bold and defiant; sometime it appeared to him they were offensive in the manner in which they hurled epithets at the Government side of the House; but it was a peculiar kind of bravery which hon. gentleman opposite displayed—and he wished the people to understand it, as no doubt they would—they sheltered themselves behind their irresponsibility, and declined, when they made those charges, to assume the responsibility which hon. members ought to assume. Take the fact to which the hon. the Premier had first alluded. If the statement made by the right hon. member for Kingston with respect to the policy which the Government had adopted, and under which the public works had been administered were true, the hon. the Premier was not fit to occupy a seat in the House. It was the duty of the right hon. gentleman to have formulated his charges, and asked for an investigation so that he might establish them; and, if he dared not adopt that course, it was his duty to have held his peace. They discussed the public affairs of the country primarily before the people; but it was necessary that in Parliament, under matured and time-honoured rules, men should protect the Constitution and the Treasury and show their devotion to their principles, and not adopt a mere system of idle, irresponsible slander which the hon. gentleman had consecrated and sent forth to the country as the policy under which he intended to go to the polls. He believed the hon. member for Cumberland would find that his utterance to-night was a most unfortunate one. It was an admission that all the accumulated falsehoods of his party for the last four years were idle as the wind, that he dared not formulate them in this House and bring them before a Committee, and his only hope was to blind the people by misleading them when he addressed them. The hon. gentleman would repeat to the people charges which he dared not formulate in Parliament; and in order to make it appear that he was not responsible in that regard, he condemned the system of Parliamentary rule by majorities, the very system by which he and his party undertook one of the most important investigations that had recently occurred, and he now endeavoured to shelter himself behind the most flimsy of excuses, and declare to the people, "We wish to blind you by wilful misrepresentation, but we are afraid of employing the ordinary parliamentary machinery to substantiate our charges." But on their side they would take very good care that hon. gentlemen opposite should not altogether profit by this system of irresponsible slander, and that the people of this country should see what creatures of insincerity they were.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said that the challenge which had been thrown out by hon. gentlemen opposite, to refer any matter to a Committee, would be accepted on exactly the same terms as the Opposition asked the Government to refer charges made against them. The position taken by hon. gentlemen last year, and by any hon. member who was not afraid to submit to a fair arbitration, was that an equal number should be chosen by each side, and one as umpire. They would find no objection to hon. gentlemen opposite appointing a Committee if they would take four members and give the Opposition three. When the Opposition asked for a Committee, under very trying circumstances, the Government took six members and gave them three. Let that fact go to the country, and let the hon. the Premier remember that, when a man's reputation was at stake, and the matter was to be submitted to an important tribunal, he refused to give an impartial tribunal. They forced on the Opposition a Committee on which they had six members as against three opponents. Was that the act of men who had a just cause and could declare to the people that they were willing to do justice? Let the hon. the First Minister submit charges brought by the Opposition to a Committee of which six members supported the Opposition and three the Government. While they looked for justice from the House they did not expect, judging from the example last year, they would obtain an impartial Committee. If they could receive such an offer they would accept it. He looked forward with the same confidence as had been expressed by the hon. member for Cumberland to the result which would follow the submission of the whole matter to the people, and he was satisfied they would condemn such one-sided tribunals and feel that hon. gentlemen, who were forced to get a Committee that would carry them through, with a majority of six to three, and were not willing to submit their case to a fair arbitration which everyone could understand, acted unfairly and unjustly. He would submit to the tribunal of the people the question whether they were not perfectly justified in not submitting their case to such a tribunal, when they asked for fair play and justice. Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, contended that they had submitted the charges in connection with the Pacific Railway matter to a Committee when the present Opposition had a majority in the House. That was true; but the then Government took three members of the Committee, and gave the then Opposition two. That was all the Opposition now asked; but the Government was not content unless the proposition was six to three. Was that the kind of thing hon. gentlemen opposite intended to boast of before the country—that, with a Committee, in which they had a proportion of six to three, they had obtained a decision against them? Was that course of action one which would carry the next elections on an appeal to the people? Let hon. gentlemen opposite understand that there was a sense of justice in the hearts of the people, and that justice would be meted out at the next elections.

Mr. BLAKE said he regretted exceedingly that the customary, the immemorial mode of Parliamentary investigation should have received so rude an assault at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite, as it had done tonight. The Opposition claimed for themselves the exclusive possession of the title of "patriots," and they denominated the members of the other side "partizans." He was quite aware that all the hon. members opposite were perfectly independent, impartial, and unbiassed. They knew the discriminating judgment with which those gentlemen followed the course of their leaders. They knew how often, when their leaders had taken steps from which many of them would have recoiled, they hesitated to follow. They knew how the members of the Opposition had separated themselves from their leaders, when there were indications that they had taken a wrong course. It seemed impossible to strike a Committee to suit those gentlemen. The practice of the Opposition when they were in power was to take every man on the Committee which their strength would give them, and that was the principle which the occupants of the Treasury benches now acted upon. The principle of selection was that each member voted for one man on the Committee, with a view to this result being arrived at, that the strength of the party should be represented on the Committee. The hon. member for Compton had suggested a plan for the construction of Committees of investigation which, he thought, would obviate the danger of a partizan decision; but where, he would ask that hon. gentleman, would they find the umpire in the House? That gentleman and his friends had stigmatized all the members of the majority as partizans. They had declared that it was impossible to get anything like fair play from the Government side of the House, and that the umpire must be got from the Opposition side. He was the last man in the world to think that a Parliamentary Committee, composed necessarily of men engaged in party politics, was the best tribunal for the investigation of facts. He had always said with reference to these Committees that he never attached too great importance to their deliberations, owing to the very mode of their constitution. But what he had attached importance to was that such Committees gave a fair machinery for the elucidation of the truth by the evidence and testimony brought before them. They had men on both sides who were interested from their political predilections, from the views they took on public questions, in seeing right and fair play to one side or to the other, and therefore there was a fair opportunity of getting out the facts. He had observed, in the small part he had borne in these investigations, that the Committees were disposed to prosecute the enquiry to a great length, to admit questions of sometimes very doubtful relevancy rather than that it should be said the investigation was stifled. With the safeguard indicated, he did not believe that the system of enquiry by Parliamentary Committees could be improved by any process known to the House. Hon. gentlemen opposite had not suggested any better plan. If the statement were true that the majority of the House were composed of partizans, he would like to know what two persons against three could do? The majority would just be as strong for actual results as six against three. The majority was a majority, whichever way the matter was put.

MR. DOMVILLE said that one of the members might get sick.

MR. BLAKE said he thought there was one slightly indisposed now. He was a little amused at an expression which fell from the hon. member for Cumberland, which threw some light on his usual mode of attack. At the suggestion of the Speaker, the hon. member withdrew a phrase he had used with reference to the selection of Committees. The hon. member said the case he was expounding was so strong in itself that strong language was not necessary to describe it. Well, it appeared that, when the hon. gentleman had a strong case, he used moderate language, and, when he had a weak one, he used language the very reverse of moderate. The House now knew the hon. member's own estimate of the cases he presented. The reply of the First Minister to the charge of corruption in letting contracts was as follows:—"You urge, because, upon the advice of my Chief Engineer, I passed over the lowest tenderer, who was too low according to the report of that officer, and awarded the contract to another, that you have established a case of corruption. I point you to a score of cases, involving millions of dollars in which upon the same premises the same conclusion had been reached. I ask you if you argue that, because we have passed the lowest tenderer because he was reported by the Engineer to be too low, we are corrupt? Do you say that? If you do, then your own motives stand condemned. If not, you prove the inconsequentiality and insufficiency of the argument on which you seek to condemn me." He (Mr. Blake) had heard nothing worthy of the name of an answer. Hon. gentlemen opposite declined to ask for a Committee to try their charges on a ground which cast an aspersion on the House and on the parliamentary system. They said in effect:—"We decline to give you the justice of an investigation. We, beforehand, denounce any tribunal known to the Constitution by which the facts can be brought out. We decline that, and we tell you beforehand that, without investigation, without enquiry, without the examination of the officers and other parties concerned we will bring our allegations before the public at the polls, and induce them to be the judges upon our statement, instead of asking them to be the judges upon the evidence we were able to bring before the Committee, but did not." In taking this course, the Opposition practically declared that a Committee selected by the House, not by the Government, was a tribunal unworthy of the confidence of the people, and before which they could not expect fair play. Now, when the Postmaster-General made his charge, he proposed to refer it to a Committee which would have been struck by the House. He (Mr. Huntington) did not decline that tribunal, and he (Mr. Blake) could not believe that the member for Compton (Mr. Pope) was serious in suggesting that an umpire should be appointed in such matters. He regretted that this statement had been made. It appeared that they were to be subjected—instead of fair inquiry, instead of a fair opportunity being afforded both sides to submit evidence—to the attacks of political opponents based on innuendo, suspicion, and suggestions, without an attempt to get at the facts and to arrive at a conclusion from them. And they knew, from the hon. member for Cumberland, that the weaker the case the worse was the language used. Reference had been made to the Goderich Harbor contract, and the letter he wrote to the Minister of Public Works in regard thereto. Ministers received a great many letters from members of Parliament in reference to contractors, and he was sure the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) could bear him out on that point. He did not, in saying that, mean to suggest that the administration of that gentleman was wrong, and he appealed to the hon. member as a candid man if there was anything wrong in the letter he wrote in regard to the Goderich Harbour contract? If there was anything wrong in it, he would like to know what it was. He showed that he was not ashamed of that letter by producing it. He felt that the case was so plain, so clear, so beyond question that even the band of patriots opposite in their own hearts must feel that he had done nothing wrong.

MR. ROCHESTER said he thought the hon. the Minister of Public Works would agree with him that, at the time this boom contract was made out, it was late in the season, and the officer who had been entrusted with this Department for twenty or thirty years, and who proved himself invaluable in that capacity, saw that, if he could not get it made in a certain time, he could not get it made when the ice was on. He believed it was in the month of March, and the time for getting the material and getting the work done was very short. After the tenders had been received the officer told Mr. Palen that his was the lowest tender up to that time. He (Mr. Rochester) knew that there was a great deal said last Session with regard to the tenders being sent in before twelve o'clock on a certain day. It was proved before the Committee that Mr. Palen and Mr. Harvey both mailed their tenders before twelve o'clock on that day, yet for all that the hon. Minister insinuated that these tenders were not in time, and that they were put in after Mr. Merrill, the officer in charge, had given Mr. Palen information which led him to go and make a tender lower than the others. He (Mr. Rochester) rose for the purpose of defending that officer. The Government knew that this officer, who had displayed the highest ability in the works at the head of the Saguenay river, who had been their officer for thirty years and upwards, never was guilty of what he had been charged with. The hon. member for South Bruce, in referring to that Committee, had said what was very true, and he did not dispute it, that, apart from the general mode of electing Committees, it was properly constituted. He said two to one was quite right. He would ask the hon. gentlemen whether, if he were a judge, and in a trial eleven of the jury came in with a verdict, and one held out, which way he would decide? Would it make no difference? He (Mr. Rochester) thought it would make a difference if there were three on one side and four on the other; but three on one side and six on the other, he did not think was fair or right. He was not going to say anything more with regard to the boom business; he simply wished to defend the character of the officer who was at the head of the Public Works Department for thirty years. It had been insinuated that Mr. Merrill had done what was wrong; he (Mr. Rochester) said, without fear of contradiction, that Mr. Merrill's character was well known from one end of the country to the other, and the man who would throw out insinuations against him would not be believed. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) had thrown out an insinuation about the county of Carleton becoming acquainted with the course their representative was pursuing. If the hon. member had any idea of trying the county of Carleton at the next election, he (Mr. Rochester) was not afraid to meet him. The county knew who their representative was; he (Mr. Rochester) had never tried to get a contract for anybody, and he had never done anything since he had been in Parliament to be ashamed of. At the next election the hon. gentleman would know whether the people at Carleton were satisfied with their representative or not.

MR. PLUMB said they had wandered far from the original question in discussion. It was one in respect to the letting of contracts on the Welland Canal, and the first question that came up very naturally involved the different modes of letting such contracts pursued by the present Government and the late Government. His hon. friend from Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) had said, and very truly, that under the system pursued by the late Government there was a much larger scope for contracts, for the system of bidding for works was not based as it was now, upon the depositing of a sum of money by the contractors before their bids could be received. The contractors hesitated about making tenders because of this deposit, for, if they did not get their contracts through one cause or another, they did not know when or whether they would get their money back. He (Mr. Plumb) knew of occasions where large sums which had been deposited had been returned without the knowledge of the House, and the Government had been compelled by the Opposition to bring down a return disclosing the fact. On his side of the House they considered that it was desirable in no way to restrict competition for contracts, that contracts should be perfectly open to competition as a public right. Notwithstanding the views held by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, he believed the system of requiring contractors to deposit a large sum of money was one which would much restrict such competition to the detriment of the public interest. He thought that the system of tendering should be left very much as it was when the Department of Public Works was in charge of his hon. friend the member for Charlevoix. The hon. the Premier himself, in his very first speech during the summer campaign, expressly stated that he could not charge that there had been anything improper in the letting of contracts by the late Government. These pic-nic speeches were not published until a month after they were delivered, and they appeared to have been subjected to careful revision, therefore, the speakers must accept them as given to the public. The hon. the Premier, in reading a list of contracts awarded by the late Minister of Public Works, had stated:

"I don't say that the Government gave out contracts corruptly, because I do not know they did so; I merely give these facts, which, if they had just been reversed and tested by their suspicious minds, would have formed the ground work for innumerable charges or insinuations of corruption."

He (Mr. Plumb) said the late Government could defend their system of letting their contracts, and defend them upon grounds that would be accepted, not only here, but elsewhere; and there was no reason to draw the conclusion which the hon. the First Minister attempted to show could logically be drawn from the statement he gave in his speeches last summer. Now a great deal had been said with regard to their refusal to accept a Committee, and on the occasion of a large meeting last summer the hon. the First Minister was reported to have made use of this extraordinary language with regard to the right hon. member for Kingston and certain charges which he had brought against the Government in his picnic speeches of the previous summer. The First Minister was reported to have said: "At the outset of the Session I challenged him (the right hon. member for Kingston) to produce his evidence before a Committee of the House of Commons." If that challenge was made, it was made in a very low tone.

"I challenged him," said the hon. the Premier, "to proceed with his investigation and make his stump speeches in my presence in Parliament, and I twice offered him a Committee of his own choosing—on one occasion I said I was willing that he should be the whole Committee himself, though I am now bound to say, after his recent speeches, that I would have some slight suspicion that I would hardly get fair play. What has been the course of the hon. gentleman (the member for Kingston) in regard to this matter? He allowed Parliament to meet and rise without making a sign that he wanted an inquiry—without making the slightest attempt to proceed with his proof—and the moment he is clear of his responsibility as a member of Parliament he commences his annual peregrinations, accompanied by those who, after he has stated his so-called facts, stretch them as far as the credulity of their very credulous audiences will allow."

He could only say that these audiences—as they of the Opposition always went into the enemy's country, not adopting the usual course of the hon. gentlemen opposite and going among their friends to hold their meetings—were what his hon. friend the Premier said they were, composed of credulous people. He (Mr. Plumb) had no doubt that this might be the Premier's opinion, for these people had certainly received the statements of Mr. Plumb and his friends, without any signs of dissent, wherever they went. The House had heard something to-night with regard to a certain Goderich Harbour contract, from his eloquent and hon. friend (Mr. Blake) whose voice he was glad again to hear in debate, and he was happy to see that the hon. gentleman still retained very much of the vigour which they used to admire so much, although it was often turned against them, and if there was any severity in the mode of attack on the part of the Opposition against the Government, they had a very able instructor in that hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman had spoken of having written a letter, and he (Mr. Blake) had commented very strongly on the strictures of the Opposition side of the House upon that,—a letter which recommended certain contractors as his friends, to the head of the Government, the hon. the Premier.

MR. BLAKE: No, no.

MR. PLUMB said it was not in regard to the letter that so much complaint was made. The complaint was based on the fact that the contract was not given to the lowest bidder, who was a responsible person, recommended by a member of the Reform party, a late member of Parliament, a man of good judgment, who was on the spot, and perfectly capable of judging with regard to the responsibility of the contractor who made that lowest tender. They knew perfectly well that a letter from the Chief Engineer, giving reasons for withholding the contract from the lowest bidder, was written about the time that this question was started in the House, a letter in which the Engineer stated that he did not give the contract to the lowest tenderer, because, forsooth, that gentleman was not an experienced contractor, because his offer was too low, and in their tender solicitude the Government declined to give the contract, although he proposed to give very good security, for fear that they would ruin him. It was not the custom of the Government to deal in this manner, he believed, with gentlemen who were trying to obtain public contracts; but the fact was—and though it was an oft-told story, it might be as well again repeated, in order that the whole of the facts might go together—that this person was at that very time a public contractor, executing a very large contract at Meaford Harbour, if he remembered aright, and there was no reason whatever to show that he was not quite as competent to judge of his own affairs as were the hon. gentlemen who controlled the awarding of contracts. It was quite certain that the man knew his own business. It was quite certain, too, that he (Mr. Tolton) had published to the world that he could have made large and satisfactory profits out of that contract at the price at which he had offered to take it. To his (Mr. Plumb's) own knowledge, one of the sub-contractors had stated that on the price which he had agreed upon for the ironwork, he would have made a profit of $5,000 or $6,000 himself; and, if there was this large margin of profit for the lowest contractor, what could have been the amount that was shamefully put in the hands of the man who bid for and took the contract at the figure of $30,000 more? It was not worth while for the Ministerial side to stir up this question in the House, for it would not bear investigation. Although his hon. friend (Mr. Blake) had claimed that he did not intend, in writing that letter, to recommend his friend Moore to any special favouritism, and he (Mr. Plumb) was bound to accept this statement and acquit the hon. gentleman of such intention, the contract itself was a matter which they could surely discuss and investigate. The returns were before the public, and it was well known that there was a difference, and an inexcusable difference, of $30,000 between the amount for which the work could have been done by a responsible contractor and the amount for which the contract was awarded. He did not charge that this was favouritism or improper conduct, but certainly the facts were there, and the public not only could, but they would, judge and they had judged the matter.

MR. PLUMB.

He was constantly charged with taking partizan views. He would like to know what example in this respect had been shown members of the Opposition by hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House; and how far, during the few years that he had been in Parliament, he had been instructed in these matters by the gentlemen who had taken principal parts in the debates on the other side, and who had exhibited the most violent partizanship. He would like to know if it was not remembered that, on certain occasions, language was used towards himself and his friends by those hon. gentlemen something like this: that the Opposition were a baker's dozen; a corporal's guard; the shrinking and trembling few who sat behind the dishonoured member for Kingston: who did not remember that this language had been used, and that it had been thrown in their faces year after year, when the Opposition were but fulfilling their legitimate duty as members of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition criticising only the public acts of the Government, and criticising them in a legitimate way as they were bound to do if they fulfilled their duty? And these acts were those of the hon. gentlemen who now sat before them, acts which the Opposition proposed and intended to criticize in a becoming manner within the limits of parliamentary rule. They did not intend to follow hon. gentlemen opposite into the regions of personal abuse, or to take a leaf out of their book. They had the opportunity through the example and the authority of one of the hon. gentlemen who formed part of that roving commission—who went through the country during last summer, and who, on the very first occasion that presented itself, had referred to the speeches of gentlemen on Opposition side of the question in the summer campaign;—following the lead that had been thus given, they had a perfect right to bring up matters of the kind now under discussion, and they intended to bring them up whenever they saw a proper opportunity, which he fancied would be oftener than hon. gentlemen opposite would like. Reference was made to parliamentary Committees and their fairness. He knew something of these Committees, he had had the pleasure of being placed on one when he first came into Parliament; and, when it was hoped by stretching the investigation to bring some sort of charge against his hon. friend the member for Cumberland or to cast suspicion upon him, he remembered very well the tone of that Committee. He had never seen anything like the bitter partizan feeling that was shown on that Committee. He also knew that when his hon. friend (Mr. Domville), who was on the Committee, moved in the House, at the instance of the parties immediately implicated, that they might be represented by counsel before the Committee, a technical objection was taken to the proposition, he regretted to say, by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), who was always so fair, so judicial, and so impartial when his partizan feelings were not concerned. When the evidence was concluded, a report was drawn up and brought into the House in the absence of two members of the Committee and without their concurrence, and the report was communicated in advance by a member of the Committee to a leading newspaper of the country in order to prejudice public opinion against the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper). The gentleman who sent this report was called to account and censured severely for it by the House. At this time his hon. friend (Mr. Domville) was lying ill and could not attend the Committee; and such was the haste to bring out the report, that it was published in advance of its submission to the House, and without affording the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) or himself—for he (Mr. Plumb) was then absent—an opportunity of discussing it, or of bringing in a counter report; and the evidence of all this was contained in the Journals and reports of the House. This was a specimen of what the Opposition was to expect from Special Committees. He did not say this with any disrespect. He did not speak or intend to refer to them improperly. He did not say that there were packed Committees in the House. He did not say these Committees were otherwise than fairly selected; but he supposed he might change a vowel, and say that picked Committees, at any rate, were chosen, and this term was not offensive, or beyond the limits prescribed by Parliamentary propriety. It was too late to talk in this House, constituted as he had seen it since he had been in it, with a mechanical majority at the back of the hon. the Premier, about dealing fairly with questions in connection with which partizan feelings were roused. It was too late to talk about fairness in this respect. He had not intended to make any extended remarks on this subject; but he could not sit still and listen to the unfair statements that had been made, and the diatribes that had been uttered in this connection without saying a word in reply.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. PLUMB said he thought that diatribe was parliamentary. He thought that he could show the derivation of the word, and prove that it was not at all offensive. If so, he would change the phraseology, and say that he could not listen to the eloquent and manly speech of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington)—he supposed that this form of expression was all right—without rising and attempting to say, in his imperfect way, a few words upon their side of the subject. If these were thought to be conceived in a partizan spirit, he could only say they were uttered in all sincerity. He trusted that the impression that might be conveyed by the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite would not be permitted to go to the country unless they were answered, as they might be, fully, properly and conclusively, by hon. gentlemen on his (Mr. Plumb's) side of the House; and he thought that, in all questions of this kind, the hon. members of the Opposition had the best of the argument.

MR. LANDERKIN: I would like to ask the hon. member for Niagara a question, if he will answer it. In referring to the Goderich Harbour contract, he stated that the sureties of the person who was the lowest tenderer were good and sufficient from a financial point of view, and wealthy. Will he have the kindness to inform me which of the sureties he referred to?

MR. PLUMB said he would answer the question. He had not referred to the sureties at all. He never said that they were wealthy and good. He knew nothing about them. He had stated that the contractor was recommended strongly by Mr. David Stirton, the present Postmaster of Guelph, and long a faithful supporter of the Government in Parliament, as a gentleman who was a responsible public contractor. He (Mr. Plumb) had a right to suppose, at any rate, that Mr. Tolton was an experienced public contractor, because, when he made the tender, he was then successfully carrying on a very large work for the Government at Meaford Harbour. The reason assigned for not giving this gentleman the contract was that he had offered too low, and that he was not acquainted with such work; but this story was very much like the old story of the kettle, which was said to have been cracked when it was borrowed and whole when it was returned. The reasons stated by the Government Engineer in a letter written to the Minister of Public Works when a resolution of enquiry was pending, stated also that one of the sureties offered by the lowest tenderer had given trouble to the Government on some former occasion when he had been surety on a contract. He believed that this was Sheriff Sutton. The letter of the Chief Engineer seemed to be a statement made to order long after the occurrence.

MR. LANDERKIN: I understood the hon. member for Niagara to say that the sureties were good and sufficient.

MR. PLUMB: I presume the hon. gentleman will accept my word.

MR. LANDERKIN said that he was quite willing to do so. He would simply draw the attention of the House to the fact that, sometime about a year previous to that time, one of those sureties was a tenderer for a contract at Chantry Island. Mr. Sutton was a member of the firm concerned in this contract, and he understood that this was the Sutton who had offered to become surety for Mr. Tolton; but that firm did not get the contract, although they tendered at the rate of some $14,000 or $15,000 less than Mr.

MR. LANDERKIN.

Andrew Lindsay, who received it. He would like the hon. member for Niagara to explain how this occurred, and why it was that the people's money was thus wasted when a contractor, who was a good and efficient man, to use the hon. gentleman's own words, offered to carry out a contract which involved only half of the outlay attending the contract now in question; why was a difference of $14,000 then passed over, and the contract given to another party, who was not any more capable than that gentleman was of completing it?

MR. PLUMB: I do not know anything about it.

MR. LANDERKIN said the hon. gentleman ought to know about it when he attempted to speak upon this subject. He (Mr. Landerkin) did not intend to speak on the question, but merely to show the hon. member for Niagara that, when he (Mr. Plumb) endeavoured to speak with that fairness and impartiality with which the hon. gentleman himself said he did, he should give both sides of the question. It was very important that the facts should be arrived at, and, if Mr. Sutton was a good and efficient man when he became a surety, he was quite as good and efficient to tender for a contract, which, by the way, he (Mr. Sutton) did not get, although the contract price was some $15,000 less than that of the man who obtained the contract.

MR. CAMERON said he did not think it was a very important question at the present moment, whether Mr. Sutton, the Sheriff of Bruce, was a sufficient surety for Mr. Tolton or not. The contract was not refused to Mr. Tolton on account of Mr. Sutton's insufficiency, or because he was not a perfectly responsible security. If they were to judge by the report—

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman will find that stated in Mr. Page's report.

MR. CAMERON said that he had this report before him. If they were to judge by the ex post facto report made by Mr. Page on the 15th of February, 1877, that was not the case; they did not know what the grounds were upon which the contract was refused to Mr. Tolton. All they knew was that Mr. Page, three years after the transaction had taken place, had, speaking from recollection, written a letter about it. This was after the controversy had arisen upon the subject, and, he thought, after the matter had been brought before the attention of the House. Mr. Page there only professed to speak from memory, and the substantial ground assigned by Mr. Page in that report for not giving the contract to Mr. Tolton at that time was that Mr. Tolton was unknown to the Department of Public Works; that Mr. Tolton's tender was at the time looked upon as low, and that some trouble was taken to ascertain whether he was acquainted with such work; but no information could be obtained about the matter. When this subject was under discussion on a former occasion in the House, he (Mr. Cameron) had ventured to say that the hon. the Minister of Public Works ought to have known who John S. Tolton was, and whether he was a competent contractor or not; inasmuch as, some months before this tender of Mr. Tolton's for the Goderich Harbour works was refused by the Department, he (Mr. Tolton) had been working under the hon. the Minister of Public Works himself. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) on that occasion interrupted him (Mr. Cameron), and, by referring to Hansard of last Session, it would be found that the hon. gentleman had stated, in the most peremptory manner that he (Mr. Cameron) was incorrect in his statement; and that Mr. Tolton was not and had not been a contractor under the Public Works Department at that time. This was the substance of the interruption of the hon. gentleman on that occasion. He (Mr. Cameron) was not then very familiar with the details of the matter; but shortly afterwards he looked it up, and he then found that a report had been presented to the House by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, signed by his own hand and dated in the month of January, 1875, in which the following language was used:—

“Meaford is situated on the Georgian Bay, nineteen miles from Owen Sound and twenty-two from Collingwood. The sum of $15,000 has been voted by Parliament, which the Municipality has supplemented with the sum of $10,000, making a total of $25,000. Various works are in progress for the improvement of the harbour (Appendix 15, page 65).”

On turning to Appendix 15, page 65, he found that the resident engineer reported to the present Minister of Public Works under date of 1st July, 1874, with respect to the Meaford Harbour:—

“The contract was awarded to Mr. J. S. Tolton in the beginning of December, 1873. The works were commenced without delay and have been regularly and systematically carried on. There is no reason to doubt that these works will be completed within the date assigned, the first day of October next.”

Now, this contract was refused to Mr. Tolton because he was unknown to the Department of Public Works at the beginning of February, 1874; but here they found in the report of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, founded on that of his engineer, that John S. Tolton had been doing work of exactly the same kind under the hon. the Minister of Public Works for three months before the time when this Department of Public Works and its chief engineer and its undoubtedly most industrious head were unable to discover who John S. Tolton was, and they had to take considerable pains to make enquiry in order to ascertain who this John S. Tolton was, and whether he was competent to do harbour work or not. He (Mr. Cameron) thought he had shown, that the statement which he had made last Session was correct.

MR. MACKENZIE: Was the contract completed at the time referred to?

MR. CAMERON said that, if the hon. gentleman had listened, he would have heard him (Mr. Cameron) distinctly read that the work was commenced at the beginning of December, 1873, and went on up to February, 1874—when this report was dated—in a satisfactory manner; and there was no reason to doubt that it was finished by October, 1874. It had not then been done; and Mr. Page reported in 1877 that the reason why he did not give the contract to Tolton was that he (Mr.

Page) did not know who Tolton was; and they were informed that Mr. Page had taken a good deal of pains to find him out. What very great pains must that gentleman have taken in this respect, when he (Mr. Page) himself had this very contractor working under him at that very moment. This, however, was just an example of what he (Mr. Cameron) had seen more than once: that, although no doubt the hon. the First Minister was usually very accurate in his recollection, he (Mr. Mackenzie) was sometimes mistaken, and he also sometimes ventured to correct hon. gentlemen in the House as to their statements when, on investigation, he himself was proved to be wrong.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman will see that I corrected him simply because I had the statement of the chief engineer to that effect. The hon. gentleman will also see, in regard to the report he refers to for that half-year as being signed by my own hand, that these reports are made up as a mere matter of routine, and a mere history of works under progress. I never even read any anything of this nature unless it concerns a departure from the policy of which I approve, in which case, of course, I read and correct it to suit my own views of policy; but a mere statement of routine facts I do not think that I am called upon to read. Besides, that contract was given in the month of December, almost immediately before this; and my impression is still—although I am not able to say so to-night, because I am not absolutely certain about it—that the Public Works Department did not give out that contract at all. I think it was given out by the local authorities.

MR. CAMERON said that the work was certainly done under the hon. the Minister of Public Works. The hon. gentleman's own report said so, and his engineer's report said so. The work was given out in December, 1873, to Mr. Tolton, and it was going on in February, 1874, at the very time when Mr. Page said he did not know who Mr. Tolton was.

MR. CAMERON.

MR. MACKENZIE: Now, the hon. gentleman will observe that the report to which he alludes was up to the 30th of June, 1874. I never saw it or knew of it until long after the 30th of June, 1874, because it was not prepared at the time.

MR. CAMERON: No doubt the hon. the Minister of Public Works cannot carry every detail connected with his Department in his head, and nobody blames him for doing so; but I think before he interrupts and contradicts a statement made by a gentleman in this House, he ought at any rate to be sure of the facts, and I think I have shown that he contradicted me last Session, when he was not sure as to the facts, and when he was mistaken as to what the facts really were.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not think it.

MR. CAMERON said that the reason which was presented for not having given this contract to Mr. Tolton by Mr. Page was manifestly insufficient and incorrect. Among the papers brought down, there were some documents which showed that Mr. Tolton had been recommended in the strongest and in the most emphatic manner—a matter to which his hon. friend from Niagara had just referred, and he thought, if he recollected aright, that among the official documents brought down to the House, there were a telegram and a letter received from Mr. Stirton written on the 1st June, 1874; and Mr. Stirton was a gentleman who was well known to the House. to the public, and to the hon. the Minister of Public Works, who had taken upon himself on his own responsibility, to recommend Mr. Tolton in the strongest manner; and, speaking of that gentleman's responsibility, it was perfectly incredible that Mr. Page's explanation, given in February, 1877, as to the reason why Mr. Tolton had not obtained the contract, could be true. It was impossible that Mr. Page could have taken considerable pains to find out who Mr. Tolton was, because at that very time, amongst the documents in his hands, no doubt, when he (Mr. Page) was investigating these tenders, were Mr. Stirton's letter and Mr. Stirton's telegram. There was also the fact to which he had already referred—that, at that very time, Mr. Tolton was working under the hon. the Minister of Public Works. This hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had, in his remarks a few moments previously, referred to the Palen case, and stated as the reason why that contract was refused to Palen, that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had ascertained on enquiry that Mr. Palen's tender and Mr. Harvey's tender had been mailed too late. He took issue with his hon. friend on that statement. The hon. gentleman would ascertain on enquiry that such was not the case, because Mr. Palen had asked for an investigation on the subject, and had offered to prove, by sworn evidence, not only his own, but that of disinterested witnesses, that his tender was mailed in due time; but the hon. the Minister of Public Works had never condescended to receive such evidence; while, on the simple assertion that the tender was mailed too late, the hon. gentleman had suddenly given the contract to a man whose tender was very considerably higher. There was no investigation made into this matter by the hon. gentleman.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes, there was.

MR. CAMERON: There was a decision, but no investigation.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes.

MR. CAMERON said how could it be pretended that there had been such an investigation when the man interested in the matter of fact at issue offered to furnish evidence under oath respecting it, and the hon. Minister of Public Works declined to receive it? Was this an investigation? Was it an investigation to hear one side and not the other; and, when sworn testimony was offered, to refuse to receive it? No delay had been asked. Mr. Palen had offered, on the day following, to furnish such sworn evidence, though the hon. gentleman refused to receive it within two or three days afterwards. All this evidence, however, which had been set aside by the hon. gentleman, had been heard before a Committee in another place, where it was conclusively proved that this tender was not mailed too late but in due time; and it was also shown there that the testimony of an officer of high standing in the Post-office Department corroborated Mr. Palen's evidence on the subject, in a very great degree.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do think that the course which the hon. gentleman is pursuing is a very extraordinary one. If he means to take this matter up, he had better give notice, and I shall attend to it.

MR. CAMERON: I am only replying to my hon friend. I am not bringing the matter up.

MR. MACKENZIE: Then the hon. gentleman will allow me to say a few words. I say that the envelopes on the letters proved that they were not mailed in time. I say that the officers of the Department brought up all the letters in the post-office. I say that the usual practice would show that those gentlemen who, I believe, had both tendered before for public works—one, at all events, had—could have put their tenders into the Department in time; and I have no doubt in my mind that the tenders were purposely made up after the contents of other tenders were known.

MR. CAMERON said the Committee in another place had unanimously come to a different conclusion from his hon. friend the First Minister on this subject. Even those who agreed with him in politics had come to a different conclusion. He did not propose to discuss the details of that Palen story over again.

MR. MACKENZIE: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to go over one part of it?

MR. CAMERON said he had no objection to a reasonable amount of interruptions, but he thought the hon. gentleman was transgressing the usual indulgence shown by the House.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am sorry I interrupted the hon. gentleman.

MR. CAMERON said that, proceeding now briefly to the general subject before the House, it seemed to him that the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) had effectually answered the challenge thrown out in a very bold and daring manner by the hon. the First Minister and the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington). They had taken the view that a Committee of this House was the only tribunal to investigate the question whether contracts had been improperly let. He (Mr. Cameron) denied that the verdict of a Committee, or even of the House, had the slightest value or effect upon public opinion, and that was the ground taken by the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake), who said that the only use of a Committee was to elicit evidence.

MR. BLAKE: I did not say "the only use;" I said "the chief use."

MR. CAMERON said he would accept the hon. gentleman's statement. He had also said that Committees composed of members selected necessarily from the spirit of partizanship—of which it was impossible for a man taking an active part in politics to divest himself—could not give a report or a decision except that which would be derived from the partizan view of the majority of that Committee.

MR. BLAKE: What I said was that I did not, myself, attach such weight to the deliverance of a Committee as other people might.

MR. CAMERON said he thought that accorded substantially with what he had said; that no weight attached to the deliverance of a Committee. Who was right—his hon. friend from South Bruce (Mr. Blake), or his former colleagues? They said, "Go to a Committee and let them purge the Government, if possible." His hon. friend from South Bruce said, "Go to a Committee, let them give a deliverance; the Committee is necessarily composed of men of partizan feelings, but they will sink those partizan feelings in order to elicit the evidence properly." But suppose the Committee were not necessary; suppose they had the returns brought down in answer to a motion—as in the Goderich Harbour case and in the Palen case. A Committee was not necessary, if they could appeal to the Parliament here, and to the great tribunal of the public, to which they would all have to appeal before long. In the cases to which reference had been made, they had the information officially communicated, and that information was before the public; and they might depend upon it, when the public had to decide upon these cases, the majority of the electors of this country would not say that in either of these cases the Government was free of blame. The country had the evidence before it.

MR. MACKENZIE: Evidence of what?

MR. CAMERON said they had evidence of the facts which formed the legitimate ground for argument as to whether the Government of the day had done right or wrong. The report of the Committee would be merely the statement of a majority of the members, as to whether the Government of the day had done right or wrong.

MR. MACKENZIE. Not at all.

MR. CAMERON said the public would look to see the names of those who signed the report, and would not attach great weight to that report, as his hon. friend from South Bruce (Mr. Blake) had stated.

MR. MACKENZIE: Would they not look at the evidence at all?

MR. CAMERON said he did not say so; but the evidence was before this country, as printed in the public returns.

MR. MACKENZIE: There is no evidence.

MR. CAMERON said he thought the earnest appeal, the strongly-worded challenge thrown out by the hon. the First Minister and the hon. the Postmaster-General, had been met by the remarks of the hon. member for South Bruce, which had shown that a Parliamentary Committee was valueless as a judicial tribunal, and was only valuable to elicit the information and the evidence on which the public could judge for themselves. The public would judge for themselves. They would not care whether the majority of the Committee reported one way or the other in these cases; it was for the country to decide whether the Government was deservedly to blame or not. A good deal had been said in the tu quoque style of argument with which the Prime Minister so frequently favoured the House when his action was attacked, by attacking the leaders of the Opposition, as to their action when they were in the Government. As a young member, who was not in Parliament at the time, he did not care, and he did not think the people of the country cared whether the late Government were right or wrong. If a better system had been inaugurated and had not been carried out by the present Government, the country would hold them responsible, even if the former had been improperly administered. The late Government was not on its trial here. They did not care whether his hon. friend from Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) could produce bushels of letters from persons in regard to contracts which he had let. The people did not care whether or not the Public Works were properly administered by his hon. friend from Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) when he was at the head of that Department, but they did care to see whether, for the last four or five years, that Department had been properly administered by the present Prime Minister, and whether the present Government had used, or had abstained from using, any influence to interfere with their due discretion in awarding contracts. He (Mr. Cameron) did not say that the hon. member for South Bruce had written a letter that was improper, but he thought he would have pursued a wiser and more proper course if he had not written the letter at all. They found that a letter had been written by his hon. friend from South Bruce (Mr. Blake), and another letter by the then member for Wellington (Mr. Stirton), which recommended his particular friend.

MR. BLAKE: No.

MR. CAMERON said that the hon. member for South Bruce had said that the gentleman he recommended was his friend; that he had told him justice would be done in the premises. The member for Wellington wrote that his friend Mr. Tolton was a good man.

MR. BLAKE: Will the hon. gentleman do me the justice to point out a word in my letter which is a suggestion or a recommendation to my hon.

friend the First Minister to give the contract to Mr. Moore?

MR. CAMERON said there was nothing in words more than to give an intimation to the Prime Minister that Mr. Moore was a friend of the hon. member for South Bruce. Mr. Stirton, no doubt, had given an intimation that Mr. Tolton was a friend of his, and although Mr. Moore's tender was $30,000 more than that of Mr. Tolton, and Mr. Tolton was a skilled contractor at that time, yet more confidence was placed, he would not say in the recommendation of the hon. member for South Bruce, but in his letter of introduction, than in the recommendation—for it certainly was a recommendation—of the hon. member for Wellington. He thought the Minister of Public Works, in speaking of the contracts awarded on the Welland Canal and other public works had intimated that the contracts had been awarded to bona fide contractors, not to men who tendered for the purpose of selling their contract. He (Mr. Cameron) thought the records of the Court lately showed that at least one contract for the Welland Canal had been let to a contractor who had no previous experience in that way, a man whose political service to the party were not of an insignificant character, and that it also appeared that that gentleman was so fortunate that, as soon as the Government simply said, "You shall have this contract or a share of it," he was able to sell it out immediately afterwards for $12,000 in cash, to another party.

MR. MACKENZIE: Who is that?

MR. CAMERON: Mr. Jeremiah Merrick, who sold the contract which he got on the Welland Canal.

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. Merrick never got a contract. The firm was Manning & Co., and Manning has sold no contract as the hon. gentleman is aware.

MR. CAMERON: A contractor, whose political views did not entirely agree with those of the Ministry of the day found it convenient to get a colleague or partner whose political views did accord with those of the Government, and who possessed considerable political influence, and, so soon as by that holy alliance they had obtained a contract, the politician, who knew nothing about contract work, resigned his interest on the payment of $12,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Was the tender of Messrs. Manning & Co. the lowest?

Mr. CAMERON said he did not know whether it was the lowest or not, and that point was quite immaterial for his present argument. The hon. the First Minister had urged that the present system was the best that could be adopted, and prevented abuses and tenders being submitted and contracts being obtained by parties who were not bond fide contractors. He (Mr. Cameron) therefore mentioned a case where the party was not a bond fide contractor, but a well-known politician who entered into partnership with another party, and afterwards received $12,000 for retiring. Those facts showed the subject was, to-day, a most difficult one to deal with. He did not desire to blame the hon. the Minister of Public Works unduly. The task of justly and properly giving out contracts on tenders in a manner which was entirely in the public interest, was the most difficult task any member of the Government had to discharge. While he did not wish to press unduly on the hon. the Minister of Public Works, yet, when he urged that he had adopted a most perfect system, into which no abuses crept and by which no injustice was done, it was a perfectly fair and legitimate argument for the Opposition to refer to individual cases in which they believed the public interests were sacrificed and had suffered. When they found that political influence had been used in these cases, they could not avoid coming to the conclusion that even under the administration of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, abuses would occur and transactions take place which did not look well, even though the motive of the Minister was perfectly fair and proper. It was a difficult subject to deal with, and the hon. the Minister of Public Works was entitled to have consideration shown him; but, when he claimed so much, more probably than any Government could be entitled to, he must expect to be met by the Opposition, and receive his answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government had not yet received an answer.

Mr. CAMERON said, they would meet at Philippi, at the next general election. The hon. member for South Bruce had spoken somewhat feelingly of the great difficulty he encountered in getting through the lobbies on account of the crowd of public contractors frequenting them during the time the hon. member for Cumberland was a member of the Government. They did not wish to see contractors in the lobbies; but it was better to have them in the lobbies than in the House; and it appeared that, under the present Administration, contractors had not remained in the lobbies, but had obtained seats in Parliament.

Mr. YOUNG said, although the discussion had arisen on a motion for papers, it was of very considerable importance, and he was glad it had arisen, for no discussion could have shown more clearly the position of hon. gentlemen opposite. No party ever occupied a more humiliating position than they did in the matter now before the House. They had for two or three years been making a series of grave charges against the Government of the day—not ordinary charges, but grave charges of corruption—and now, when they met those hon. gentlemen face to face, and the Government demanded that they should come forward and formulate these charges, the hon. members opposite made all kinds of excuses why they should not do so. The usual action taken by an Opposition in England and in this country, when they made an attack upon their opponents, was to proceed to make good their charges; and this was the first occasion when an Opposition made charge after charge, and, when challenged to the proof, were afraid to attempt to do so. The course pointed out by constitutional rule and parliamentary practice to be taken in matters of this kind, where charges were made against the Government of the day, was for those members making them to come forward and formulate the charges in a motion, and ask for a Committee of investigation. When charges were made by the Liberal party when in Opposition, they did not go through the country repeating those charges without seeking to prove them in Parliament; they took the regular parliamentary course of action. For instance, when they made their charges with respect to the Pacific Railway Scandal, they asked the House for a Committee, proved their charges to the letter, and the House and the country knew what was the result. When certain charges were made with respect to the Northern Railway, the same course was pursued, and the charges brought home to the offenders. In reference to the Secret Service, the evidence was also tabled and quite brought home to hon. gentleman opposite by those who initiated the enquiry. Why did hon. gentleman opposite not take the same course? There could be only one reason—and the country could not fail to see it—that they were not sincere, and because they believed an investigation would prove that their charges were foundationless. The House was told that a Committee should not be asked for by hon. gentlemen opposite because it might be of a partizan character, and that they would appeal to the ultimate Committee—the people of Canada. How much stronger their case would be if they asked for a Committee and proved their charges before they went to the people. They might rest assured the people were too intelligent not to perceive the truth, and would interpret their conduct in refusing to follow the regular constitutional procedure as convincing evidence that they could not prove their charges. If an investigation took place it would be shown that they were as unable to substantiate their assertions against the Government as they were incapable of excusing the many shameful transgressions of which their party was guilty when in power. In regard to the Goderich Harbour matter, every candid and fair-minded man must entertain a feeling of indignation at the unfair, unjust and scandalous interpretation which the Opposition had sought to place upon the letter written by the hon. member for South Bruce. So careful was that hon. member that no mistake should be made with respect to that letter that he purposely inserted words which indicated that the contract could only be let in a fair and straightforward manner, and it was evidently written for no other purpose than simply to introduce one of his constituents, who had a right to ask for such a letter, to the hon. the First Minister. He never knew anything in connection with public life more unfair and scandalous than the interpretation hon. gentlemen had again and again sought to place on that letter, and more particularly was that the case when they knew that their leader, the hon. member for Kingston, had entirely exonerated the hon. member for South Bruce from the slightest impropriety; yet the hon. gentlemen opposite, in hope of a miserable party advantage, still attempted to draw an unfair and unjust conclusion from one of the most straightforward and innocent letters ever written. There was really no necessity for the hon. member for South Bruce or any of his friends to take the slightest notice of any of the remarks of hon. gentlemen on that point. The people of Canada were able to read the letter for themselves, and ninety-nine out of every hundred would acquit the hon. member for South Bruce of the slightest suspicion of wrong-doing. He believed there was scarcely a man even among the party of the hon. gentlemen opposite who did not believe the hon. member for South Bruce would rather retire from public life for ever than do the slightest act which would cast a stain on his public career. The answer to the attack of the Opposition with respect to the Goderich Harbour matter was very simple. The contract was determined soon after the present Government came into power. The Minister of Public Works, as the House was aware, acted to a large extent on the advice and recommendation of his officers; and, in this case, Mr. Page, the chief engineer, recommended that the contract should not be given to Mr. Tolton. The hon. the First Minister acted upon the advice of his officer, who he believed acted in good faith and who he had good reason to suppose acted in the interest of the country; and the very fact that he acted upon the advice of his officer was strong evidence that he had taken the right course. There was another important fact, namely, that two other firms were offered the contract before it was awarded to the gentleman who ultimately obtained it.

MR. BOWELL asked why the other parties did not take the contract?

MR. MACKENZIE said Ellis & Co. did take it, but afterwards backed out.

MR. BOWELL asked became of them?

MR. MACKENZIE said they had not come forward with the requisite security.

MR. YOUNG said the fact that this contract was offered to two other firms before it was given to the one which obtained it—which a simple reference to the facts of the case would prove—was the best evidence that there was nothing in the charge. It was something which might almost make the angels weep, to think of the Conservative party, at this time of day, commencing to talk about corruption. Some hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to see corruption to right of them, corruption to left of them, corruption behind them, and corruption in front of them. They scented corruption everywhere. The members of the Liberal party did not experience this sensation. They breathed a pure atmosphere, and the only corruption which the Opposition scented was the remaining effluvia of the Pacific Scandal, which would remain as long as the Conservative party existed, for

“You may break, you may ruin
The vase if you will;
But the scent of the roses
Will linger there still.”

These gentlemen professed to be afraid that they would not get justice from a Committee obtained in this House on account of its partizan character. The members of the Liberal party did not take that ground when the majority of the House was against them; they had faith in the truth of the charges they made, and adopted the parliamentary course. But the real fear of the Opposition was that justice would be done, and that the people would perceive the baselessness of their charges, not one of which would bear close investigation. All they had, as a party, upon which to appeal to the people was their comparatively stale slanders. They had no principles, no policy to offer to the country; their whole stock-in-trade consisted of baseless charges; and the reason they would not go before a Committee was their dread of being robbed of their election thunder, which would leave them without a single plea upon which to ask the verdict of the country in their favour.

MR. ROBINSON said he regarded with some little distrust the organization of their Committees and the reports they brought in. He remembered the report of the Committee presided over by the hon. member for North Norfolk, established, as more than one Committee had been established, for the purpose of contributing something to tarnish the reputation of the hon. member for Kingston. The member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald) had risen in his place and stigmatized that report as one of the most unfair that had ever been brought to the attention of the House; and, if his brief had not been spirited away from him, he would have made a bitter speech. In the manly course which he took at that time, he felt called upon by a sense of duty to the country to tell this House that the Committee quoted every British precedent against the position of the right hon. member for Kingston, while they refused to quote precedents in his favour. He even used stronger language; he said, if there was confidence or truth in any language, that there was not one tittle of evidence shown by that Committee that the hon. member for Kingston had misappropriated one dollar of the Secret Service fund. When that was said by a supporter of the Government, it did not become them to taunt the Opposition with suspicion of any reports of Committees organized through their influence. The hon. the Finance Minister had stated in his Budget speech that the Northern Railroad Company report covered all those concerned in it with infamy. He would ask whether the hon. the Finance Minister was not one of the consenting parties who gave the Great Western Railroad $69,000 on the eve of a general election. Allusion had been made to the report on the Northern Railroad. What was the result of this report of two Committees in which the Attorney-General was prosecutor, and all the evidence taken under oath? The result was that the Northern Railroad, perhaps the most successful line in this country, had misappropriated the sum of $27,000 during a successful running of a period of about twenty-five years, in which its annual earnings, its ordinary income, approximated to $900,000 per annum. Would it be a grievous matter to say to this House that, during one year, $27,000 had been misappropriated, out of an income of $900,000? That was the sole result of the two Committees, that $27,000 had been misappropriated,—$27,000, after twenty years' working, out of a sum of, at least, eight or ten million dollars. There was more actual corruption in the one day of the giving out of the contract for the construction of the Georgian Bay Railroad, in the one operation of our steel rails, in the one day's writing of the letter of which so much had been said, than there was, according to sworn testimony, before Committees presided over by a most distinguished legal gentleman of this House, during the entire period of the running of the Northern Railroad Company. He should be glad, if time permitted, to bring up some more of those matters which might expose the character and political conduct of the hon. gentlemen opposite to this House and the country.

Mr. DYMOND said he united in the surprise expressed by the hon. member for West Toronto that so very small a sum as $27,000 should have been misappropriated out of the funds of the Northern Railway. When they observed the excessive innocence and guilelessness which the hon. member displayed last year, when he described himself as sitting in the House as the representative of the Northern Railway, his seat being provided by funds improperly taken out of the company's treasury, and to-day stated it was no wonder that in an undertaking of that magnitude only $27,000 had been misappropriated—for the hon. member did not attempt to deny the misappropriation,—the House could only feel astonishment that $270,000 had not been taken instead of $27,000, especially when they remembered that the hon. member for West Toronto was President of the Railway.

MR. ROBINSON asked if the hon. member for North York approved of the letter sent by Senator Simpson.

Mr. DYMOND said the hon. member need not make himself look more ridiculous than he did already. The hon. member had already sufficiently astonished the House by his remarks and by the extraordinarily innocent demeanour he had assumed, although he (Mr. Dymond) was disposed to believe the attitude of the hon. member was quite natural to him. He would now leave the hon. gentleman, who had surprised the House by repeating his escapade of last year on a small scale, and with his sublime innocence, his beautiful unconsciousness, his utter incapacity to discern right from wrong. The hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) had fairly given up all idea of appointing parliamentary Committees. According to his doctrine, no parliamentary Committee need be appointed in this House hereafter for ever. It was no use to appoint a Committee of this House now, because the majority supported the hon. the First Minister. It would be no use to appoint a committee when the great Conservative reaction had accomplished its purpose, because everybody would then support the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald); the same argument would apply in the one case as in the other. But the hon. gentleman was not only at issue on the question of majorities, he attacked the practice of appointing Committees altogether. He said the reports of Committees were of no value; that the evidence taken by Committees was of no value; that papers brought down to the House by Ministers of the Crown, and placed on the table—papers that might disclose all the facts or might not—were quite sufficient for him to go to the country and ask for a verdict upon. In that respect the innocence and unconsciousness of the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) was about on a par with the innocence and unconsciousness that his friend the member for West Toronto (Mr. Robinson) had developed. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) was flying in the face of doctrines that he (Mr. Dymond) had heard laid down within the Chamber by the hon. gentleman's leader himself. He remembered when the conduct of the parliamentary Committees on election petitions was impugned by the hon. member for South Bruce the language used towards the hon. member for South Bruce by the then leader of the Government, now the leader of the Opposition (Sir John A. Macdonald), was almost insulting. He then held that to impeach parliamentary Committees, formed for the trial of election petitions when every man's political proclivities were at their utmost stretch, was an insult to those Committees and an insult to Parliament. They might as well dispense with all Committees, even the Select Standing Committees of the House, for they were all formed on one principle. There was the Public Accounts Committee, for instance. What was the use of that Committee if the doctrine of the hon. member for North Victoria was to be accepted? Perhaps it was no wonder some hon. gentlemen had a very poor opinion of the Public Accounts Committee. He (Mr. Dymond) remembered an investigation taking place before that Committee last year and he fancied that his hon. friend from Frontenac did not find the affair to turn out as well as he had expected. Hon. gentleman opposite were evidently getting sick of Committees. And why? Because they had had Select Committees nearly every Session on one thing or another, and, although they had themselves been parties to the appointment of these Committees, and although some of their ablest men had been amongst those appointed on these Committees, every one had ended to their confusion. They appointed a North-

Mr. Dymond.

West Committee; he did not think hon. gentlemen opposite gained much by that proceeding. Nobody said that Committee was not properly constituted; it brought out the facts relative to the North-West troubles in the very best and ablest manner; and what did the Opposition benefit by it? They obtained nothing but a scandal on their leader and a disgrace to his followers. Then they had the Penitentiary Committee, presided over by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), and the Fraser-Reynolds Committee, of which the hon. members for Niagara and King's (Messrs. Plumb and Domville) were members. They could not say that the latter was not a fairly-constituted Committee, or that it was improperly conducted. It was one of the Committees appointed by this House in connection with the Public Accounts Committee, and no objection was raised when the appointment took place. He found that this Fraser-Reynolds Committee afterwards appointed two of its members to examine some of the most important statements submitted to them, and to present a report. They did so, and he found that this report was unanimous. It showed, for instance, that ninety bars of Low Moor iron, cost price £44 sterling, were sold to the Government for $365; it showed that charcoal tin plates, costing $204, were sold to the Government for $305; that oil, costing 32c. per gallon, was sold to the Government for 60c.; that bolts and nuts, costing $1,222, were sold for $2,295; and that brass tubes, sold for $1,895, cost only $2,219. This was the sort of evidence that sub-Committee obtained and unanimously reported; the names appended to the report being those of "A. H. Dymond," and "James Domville."

Mr. DOMVILLE: No, no.

Mr. DYMOND said yes, these were the names appended to the report of the sub-Committee, to which the main issues were referred. There they were, not three to two, not six to three, but one for one, a perfectly unanimous report. They agreed in every particular.

Mr. DOMVILLE: No, no.

Mr. DYMOND said every cause of difference between himself and his

hon. friend was eliminated before that report was made out. And now a word or two with regard to the Goderich Harbour case. He found from the speech of the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government last year, that the next tender to Mr. Tolton's was Mr. Neilson's, which was $200,000, or about $18,000 over Mr. Tolton's, and that the reason this was refused was because Mr. Neilson had been a defaulter in two other contracts. Then it was stated that Messrs. Hatch had tendered, but that was only after the contract had been re-let. There was one other tender, lower than that of Messrs. Moore & Company, sent in by a Mr. Ellis, but he never answered the letter informing him that his tender might be accepted, if his securities were satisfactory. That was the reason why Mr. Moore and his partners received the contract. There was nothing from first to last which implied that the contract must necessarily go to Mr. Moore; he only received it in consequence of his being the lowest tender after the others had been removed out of the way for the reasons already stated. He thought the line taken by hon. gentlemen on the other side with regard to this particular case was most unfair. They attacked, by implication, if not directly, the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) and the Government of which he had been a member, in consequence of his letter to the Premier—a letter which even the leader of the Opposition declared to be a most creditable one to the writer, and which could not therefore be discreditable to the receiver. There was another power at work, however. There was their old friend Mr. David Stirton, and he (Mr. Dymond) well remembered the stream of gushing affection in which the hon. the member for Kingston alluded to him. "Good David Stirton," he said, "honest David Stirton." "He pleaded for his friend, and his plea was rejected." He (Mr. Dymond) wondered what Mr. Stirton would have thought had he heard himself thus all at once taken into favour by hon. gentlemen on the other side. He (Mr. Dymond) contended that the refusal to adopt the advice of Mr. Stirton more than counterbalanced any conceivable blame that could attach to giving the tender to a supposed friend of the hon. member for South Bruce, assuming that any question at all could arise with regard to giving the tender to Messrs. Moore & Co., which he denied. He said that the conduct of the hon. the Premier in regard to the Goderich Harbour contract, instead of implying in any way that he had done wrong, was one of the clearest proofs that had ever been offered of the thorough rectitude with which he carried out the business of his office. He (Mr. Dymond) challenged anyone to meet him before his constituents or anywhere else and discuss this Goderich Harbour job, as it was called. With anything like a fair audience, he would stake the whole management of the Public Works Department upon the verdict given with regard to this matter. If his hon. friend the Premier had refused to act upon recommendation of his old and warm friend, Mr. David Stirton, and insisted on taking the advice of his chief engineer, he was doing that which he was bound to do. As a Minister who had not then been many weeks in office, he was necessarily subject, and properly subject, to the advice of the chief members of his staff. In following the recommendations of the chief engineer, he only did that of which his supporters had not the slightest reason to be ashamed. The hon. member for North Victoria, in discarding Committees altogether from the Parliamentary programme, in voting them out-of-court as tribunals no longer available for Parliamentary purposes, overlooked the fact that, if a Committee had been authorized to enquire into the Goderich Harbour contract, they would have arrived at just those facts he seemed desirous to ascertain. The hon. member disavowed any imputation of corruption, and yet his whole speech was one of inuendo, which he might not have been able to make use of if that Committee had been appointed and investigated the facts. They were told that the testimony of the chief engineer was not given until last year, but, if a Committee had been appointed, they would have had Mr. Page before them, and asked if he really gave the advice alleged to the hon. the Premier at the time the contract was let, or not. They would have put him upon his oath and submitted him to cross-examination, in order to ascertain whether, as was imputed by the hon. member for North Victoria, that letter was an after-thought, or whether he had really, at the time, told the hon. the Premier what he now said he told him, with regard to the contract. If he had given that advice, it was impossible for the head of the Government to disregard it. Mr. Page was no friend of the Premier or of his Government; he was not appointed by him, and had no motive whatever for particularly desiring to assist the election of the member for South Bruce. Mr. Page was an independent officer; and to make such an allegation against him, was to insult and degrade the whole Civil Service. They should endeavour to uphold the character of their public officers. If Mr. Page had stated to the Committee that he had simply done his duty in regard to this matter, then it would be impossible for the Opposition to go round the country and impute improper conduct to the Administration; and how could they, with any regard for parliamentary practice, or common fairness, sit in that House without calling for an investigation, and then, in the country, slander the hon. the Premier right and left, and impute that he had been guilty of corruption in giving to Mr. Moore, instead of to Mr. Tolton, the Goderich Harbour contract. And supposing that the hon. member for Kingston was compelled to go before a Parliamentary Committee to prove what he had stated, that "no Conservative can get a contract," the Government could call up the Mannings, the John Browns, and the Gintys, men whose history and connexions everybody knew, and parade them one after the other before the Committee, and ask the hon. the member for Kingston, whether he could then say "no Conservative could get a contract." He would not, it was true, dare to say in that House that no contracts were given to Conservatives by the present Government; but the moment he got into the country he would assert it, and in the absence of authoritative proof would, no doubt, revive the old story and play the same tune. He (Mr. Dymond) had only one word to say as to a declaration made by the hon. the member for Kingston, during the late recess. The hon. gentleman had said that he would not appeal to Committees of the House of Commons, because they were partizan Committees, but that he would appeal to the Senate, and there justice would be done to him. That showed he did not absolutely object to Parliamentary Committees; but, instead of having for his judges men who were responsible to the people, and who in a few months would be put on their trial before the people, and punished if they failed to do justice, he went to a House filled with his own nominees, where he was sure to have a majority which, in the House of Commons, he could not command. He would go to a House composed of men not a few of whom owed all they possessed in the shape of public reputation to the nomination the hon. member for Kingston had given them, and not to the people's House, composed of men sent there by the people and responsible to the people. He would not go to the representatives of the people, but to his own nominees, and ask them to do justice against those whom he had accused. This was only an old trick of the hon. gentleman played over again. They all remembered the history of the Pacific Scandal Committee. That Committee, they well knew, was appointed by this House on the ordinary system, and was a perfectly fair Committee, so far as the political sympathies of its members were concerned, having regard to the constitution of this House at that time. But even that Committee, three of the members of which were the hon. gentleman's (Sir John A. Macdonald's) devoted friends and followers, would not suit him; he was afraid to meet it; and, after a time, by intrigue, he got rid of that Committee, and appointed three of his own Judges, just as he now elected to submit his accusations to three or four of his own senatorial nominees. This was going back to the system of the times when responsible governments did not exist in this country. He (Mr. Dymond) was not surprised at it. The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) was a creature of that period. He had never thrown off his old habits and associations, habits of intrigue and corruption which had surrounded him from the time he entered public life, and which never found its defence so impregnable as when it could entrench itself under the shelter of parliamentary irresponsibility.

MR. DOMVILLE said that, with reference to the Fraser-Reynolds Committee, as it had been called, there never was a more unfair Committee in this or any other country,

MR. DYMOND: Why did you sign the report?

MR. DOMVILLE said he was asked to sign the report, but, at the time, he thought that, in all decency, he should have an opportunity of going through it before it was presented to the Committee. He said that the parties present at that Committee put in evidence which they knew to be false. He spoke now in a parliamentary sense. They put in an invoice purporting to show that the iron charged for was ordinary iron, and tried to make the people believe that the price given was for ordinary iron, whereas it was a speciality.

MR. DYMOND: We knocked the iron out of our report.

MR. DOMVILLE: If we could knock the Dymonds out we should be all right. What they complained of on that side was that the Dymonds were too many for them. Did they think that he would ask for a parliamentary Committee if he had a case to come before the House?

MR. DYMOND: Not likely.

MR. DOMVILLE said the hon. member said "not likely"; it was not likely that he would ask for a Committee if that hon. gentleman would sit upon it. The report, which was said to have been passed fairly, was never signed by his hon. friend the member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) who was on the Committee with him, and he (Mr. Domville) did not hesitate to say that that report was not passed fairly and was not based upon the honest facts of the case. His hon. friend (Mr. Dymond) might laugh, but he meant what was honest—

MR. DYMOND: That's right.

MR. DOMVILLE said he meant what was honest between man and man. It was all very well to make out a case that would read well before the public and think they were doing what was right. He might refer them to the speech made by the hon. the First Minister on the 5th July last, at some place in Huron, when he talked about steel rails. It was very nice talk, they knew; representing that they were travelling there on behalf of Her Majesty, and talking about "bringing slanderers to book," "total depravity and original sin." It perhaps sounded well at the time, but it was very ridiculous now. Before going further, he would like to ask the hon. the First Minister to name the gentleman in the House who he (Mr. Mackenzie) found had a contract when they came into office and who also was a strong supporter of the leader of the present Opposition.

MR. MACKENZIE: Go on.

MR. DOMVILLE said that, if the hon. gentleman did not name that member, he would say there was never a more unfair or slanderous attack than this made by any hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman would not give the name of the member; and what was more, the charge was incorrect and untrue. He had asked the hon. the Premier to state who that member was.

AN HON. MEMBER: He dare not do it.

MR. DOMVILLE: He dare not do it, an hon. gentleman said. He (Mr. Mackenzie) dare not do it with honesty. The hon. gentleman might do it; but he would not be surprised if the hon. gentleman had been led into making a charge respecting which he (Mr. Mackenzie) was not thoroughly posted. Why should the hon. gentleman have commented on the fact that the late Government had not asked for tenders? It would have been more ingenuous on the part of the hon. gentleman to have said: "We did not do it, either; we tried hard, and we found that our friends who had seats on the floor of the House, and their friends, could not obtain contracts by public and open tender above fair rates, and we had to abandon it." The papers brought down to the House last year showed that, whenever public tenders had been asked for on the Intercolonial, the supporters of the Government, the Ministers, and their firms, had not been able to secure the contracts; and yet, in the face of this, those hon. gentlemen sought to make the country believe that the members of the Opposition had obtained contracts unfairly and were corrupt. He thought that the days of corruption were over. He had a few papers respecting acts of corruption in his desk, it was true; but he thought that these were finished; that it was admitted by the the country that the penalty had been paid; and, when the country had voted down corruption and said a man had been corrupt and put him out, he presumed that this would have been an example to the whole nation. He never imagined that the cry of corruption would be again brought up; but really this cry was made so often that he began to think there was something in it, and believe that the members of the Opposition were pure; that they never had had any contracts; and they never had done anything. Without beating about the bush he would say he had heard a statement in the papers, and denied publicly before the whole country. That statement referred to the company in which he now had, and for a long time had had an interest. This company had expended a large amount of money, but had never obtained anything unfairly or unjustly; and to make the statement in question behind his back, and in the absence of those who were connected with this company, was unfair, because the hon. gentlemen knew that they never had any contract when these hon. gentlemen come into power; they were not then contractors for the Government, and he, as member for the county of King's, was not a supporter of the Opposition and at the same time a contractor. He declared this openly and publicly. He had asked the hon. the Premier to name the member referred to, and if the hon. gentleman would now repeat that charge, he (Mr. Domville) would meet it at once. No reports in this relation, which were incorrect and untrue, should be sent to the country. He could hardly believe that the hon. gentleman would make such a statement if certain it was untrue. Still, the hon. gentleman might have been prompted to do so by some persons desirous of doing the Opposition injury, and of placing them before the country in an unfair light. He now asked the hon. gentleman to take this public opportunity to state that this charge was correct or retract it. He would not designate the accusation as being a false accusation, as he might, in such case, be brought up for using unparliamentary language, but then it was so hard to tell what language was parliamentary; an expression which, on one occasion, was unparliamentary was parliamentary on another. He had now explained that he had no contract, and that he had never sat in this House with a contract in his pocket, though he had in his desk papers which proved that hon. gentlemen in the House who were supporters of the Government did have contracts. It was highly unfair for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) to have made the insinuation in question before the country; its correctness he now publicly denied, and he publicly challenged those who had made it to state that it was a fact and bring forward their proofs. Charges that the members of the Opposition were unable either to defend their positions or prove the truth of the accusations of corruption which they adduced, should no longer be made by hon. gentlemen opposite.

MR. MCCARTHY: I do not think—

MR. MACKENZIE: The debate had better be adjourned.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Adjourn; adjourn.

MR. MCCARTHY said that the motion of the hon. member for Charlevoix was a fair and proper one, though this had been denied, and the statement of the hon. gentleman had been equally fair and proper.

MR. MACKENZIE: The debate will be adjourned.

MR. TUPPER: No adjournment is moved, Mr. Speaker, and it is not competent for any person to move the adjournment while the hon. member is on his feet.

Mr. McCARTHY: No adjournment has been moved.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You had better instruct the Speaker.

Mr. McCARTHY: Perhaps the hon. the Premier will instruct him.

Mr. SPEAKER: Hon. members called out "adjourn," which is quite parliamentary. The hon. member has a right to proceed if he chooses. I call on hon. members to give the hon. member a hearing.

Mr. McCARTHY said that, as he had the floor, he would say what he had to say, and hon. gentlemen opposite would find that they could not stop him.

Mr. DYMOND: We want to make it easy for you.

Mr. McCARTHY said he was very much obliged to the hon. gentleman, but he would close his remarks this evening. He was quite willing to sit there until the debate was closed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But it will not be closed this evening.

Mr. McCARTHY said the motion before the House was a fair and proper motion, and the observations of the mover were not such as to call for the remarks that fell from the hon. the First Minister in reply. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had, however, taken advantage of the absence of the leader of the Opposition to quote his words and challenge, in the right hon. gentleman's absence, these words to be sent to a Committee. The hon. gentleman had also taunted members of the Opposition with their refusal to do so. For his part he had referred in the course of the summer to this Goderich Harbour job—as he did not hesitate still to call it—and he proposed to refer to it there. He would tell hon. gentlemen opposite that when he referred to any matter behind their backs, and this they sometimes had to do in these discussions, he was not afraid to repeat it to their faces. He would show why he thought there was something in this charge, and tell the House why, in his judgment, it would be absurd to refer it or any other charge to a Committee selected in the manner in which Committees were chosen in the House. They had it from the hon. gentleman who led the opposite side of the House, that no justice could be got from a Committee of the other Chamber. These were the words of the hon. gentleman, uttered with reference to a Committee chosen, not to decide a question of politics or a question which had become one of dispute between the two parties in the country, but a Committee which was selected simply to decide whether a man had got a contract, whether he was entitled to hold that contract, and to what compensation, under all the circumstances under which it had been taken from him, he was entitled from the Government of the country. This Committee, having taken evidence, and having heard the whole case, had decided that this man was entitled to recover damages from the Government in view of the manner in which he had been treated; and yet they were told here—and he supposed it was quite parliamentary to insult the other Chamber, and quite parliamentary for the leader of the House to say that no honest or fair Committee could be got there,—that it was not right to say a single word against a Committee which happened to be selected by the great majority who supported the hon. gentleman opposite. He did not understand that this was the rule of this Parliament, but he did understand that the honour of the other House was just as sacred and just as much in their keeping as the honour of this Chamber; and he did not think that it lay in the mouth of the hon. the Premier—

Mr. MILLS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY: Is the hon. the Minister of the Interior going to keep order or not? His old habits stick to him. He is always desirous of instructing. At one period of his life he indulged in that performance, and he had better wait until his turn comes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You are very severe.

Mr. McCARTHY: Oh, yes; very. He supposed it was not proper for members of the Opposition to desire to have a fair hearing; but the hon. the Premier had a right to speak as often as he chose. That hon. gentleman was the only member of the House who had the privilege to do exactly as he pleased. This appeared to him to be the rule of the House: that the hon. gentleman should speak as often as he chose and interrupt members when he chose. To return to the subject, he would say that, under these circumstances, it was idle to pretend that a Committee could be obtained in this House whose decision would be viewed as that of an impartial judicial tribunal. It was utterly impossible to suppose such a thing. The hon. member for South Bruce had given up that plan; and all that the hon. gentleman contended for was that the evidence brought before that Committee would be used and would be useful in discussing the question before the people of this country; but how would any report of that Committee be used. It would be flaunted in their faces on every hustings and on every platform through the country. It would be said:—"See what an impartial Committee, chosen according to the rules of Parliament, have decided. Is not this an end to the matter, and conclusive?" Was not this the argument the hon. gentleman opposite desired to have? Was not this why they called upon the Opposition to go before a Committee, simply in order that they might be whitewashed, and go before the country and say that they (the Government) had been whitewashed, and there was an end of the charge? What did they know? They knew, and hon. gentlemen opposite ought to know, that it used to be the practice of this Parliament, as it was of the Imperial Parliament, that contested elections should be decided by Committees; and what was the result? It was found that it was impossible to get justice, and that these Election Committees were not impartial tribunals; and so the House parted with the privilege of deciding whether gentlemen were entitled to seats in the House, and handed it over to the Courts and Judges of the land. These Committees had been generally found to decide such questions according to the political sentiments of the majority of their members; and this was the whole and sole argument in favour of the change.

MR. MCCARTHY.

They knew that these Committees were sworn; and yet their decisions were always looked upon with suspicion, and had always given rise to such scandal that another tribunal had to be chosen in order to say whether hon. members of the House were properly elected or not. Hence it was neither fair nor reasonable to ask that charges which were made should and must necessarily be submitted to Committees. He did not understand that there was any rule of that kind. He did not pretend to be a very old politician; he had not been very long in public life; but he knew that, during the six or seven years of which he could speak, the hon. gentlemen opposite, when in Opposition, had made the whole country ring with charges of corruption, and he did not know that they always brought them before Committees; or one out of twenty, or one out of one hundred before Committees; and yet these hon. gentlemen now said that every charge made against them should and must be taken before a Committee. Some experience had been had respecting Committees since hon. gentlemen opposite had attained to power; and, not only was this the case in this House, but also in the Local Legislature of Ontario, when the hon. member for South Bruce was there, and the hon. leader of this House led that House. They had already some evidence as to how those hon. gentlemen dealt with charges, respecting which they now very loudly proclaimed: State the charge, let it be taken down by the Clerk and referred to a Committee, and let the Committee decide upon it. But, when the Hon. Mr. Cameron, the leader of the Opposition in the Local House, formulated a charge of the most serious character, in his own language and words, that a gentleman now upon the Bench, to whom he (Mr. McCarthy) would not refer by name, who had occupied a seat in the Cabinet of the late John Sandfield Macdonald, had been bribed by the members of the then late Opposition, what was the result? When this charge was formulated, as hon. gentlemen opposite said ought to be done, was he (Mr. Cameron) allowed to send it before a Committee—even a Committee to be packed by the hon. member for South Bruce? No. He (Mr. McCarthy) had the records of the Ontario Legislature with him, and these showed that they first had to cook up the charge to suit themselves; they altered it, and then took it before a Committee to get an acquittal.

MR. DYMOND: Will the hon. gentleman read the original charge and the substitute?

MR. MCCARTHY: I have the papers and the floor.

MR. DYMOND: Surely the hon. gentleman will allow me to interrupt him?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has the floor.

MR. MCCARTHY said he did not have the slightest objection to the hon. gentleman interrupting him, if he did it fairly. They were called upon to formulate their charges against hon. gentlemen opposite. He understood that it was the rule of Parliament that, when an hon. gentleman stated what he meant by a charge, that was conclusive, and words were not to be put into his mouth, nor was he to be told that he used such and such words when he said those were not the words that he used; or, at all events, if they were such words, they were not the words he intended to use; but, on that pretence and pretext, the hon. member for South Bruce escaped from the charge that was then made—

MR. BLAKE: No, no.

MR. MCCARTHY: By the Hon. Mr. Cameron, and refused to allow it to go before a Committee in the way in which it had been framed.

MR. BLAKE: No, no.

AN HON. MEMBER: That is not true.

MR. MCCARTHY: The hon. gentleman need not say "No, no." He had got it all there. The Hon. Mr. Cameron made the charge in this way.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Read, read.

MR. DYMOND: Read the original charge, and the one that was finally sent before the Committee.

MR. MCCARTHY said the Hon. Mr. Cameron moved, seconded by Mr. Carling, that a Select Committee be appointed to enquire whether any, and if any, what, corrupt inducement was offered, or what offer was made to the Hon. E. B. Wood, a member of the House, to induce him to resign the position of Treasurer of Ontario, by the Hon. Edward Blake or any other member of the Administration, while members of the Opposition in the Legislative Assembly, such Committee to have power to send for persons, papers, and documents and to report thereon, etc. This was the charge as Mr. Cameron desired to put it, and surely it was wide and broad enough; surely the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) did not desire to escape because he had not been the exact instrument who bribed Mr. Wood, a colleague of the late John Sandfield Macdonald. The Hon. Mr. Blake however moved in amendment, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie:

"That the following words be inserted in the said motion, immediately after the word 'that'—the Hon. Mr. Cameron, a member of this House, having stated in his place, that a corrupt inducement or offer was made to the Hon. E. B. Wood, a member of this House, to induce him to resign his position as Treasurer of the Province of Ontario, by the Hon. Edward Blake, while a member of the Opposition in the Legislative Assembly."

Mr. Blake wanted to eliminate part of the motion which was too wide in its character, and to change the charge. And so the hon. member who now called so loudly upon the Opposition to make their charges, moved that the words "while members of the Opposition" be struck out.

MR. BLAKE: Hear, hear.

MR. MCCARTHY said, admitting that it could not well be proved that Mr. Blake had been instrumental in bribing Mr. Wood, a member of John Sandfield Macdonald's Cabinet, yet they dared not go before a Committee and let it examine whether they, while members of the Opposition, and then members of the Administration of which Mr. Blake was the head, had not been guilty of that dastardly act. And this was some evidence as to how those hon. gentlemen would deal with any charges formulated against them. This was the way in which these hon. gentlemen wanted to act here.

As had been stated by an hon. member, the Opposition did not ask for such Committees, they did not require them; but they were willing to leave these charges to the great tribunal of public opinion, and to accept the documents, such as they were, which had been dragged from the hon. gentlemen opposite, under Orders of the House. This was not the only evidence they had got. There was also a Committee appointed under the leadership of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) in the Local House with regard to what was known as the Proton transaction in the county of Grey. The Committee met, took evidence and reported. The report sustained the charge; but the Hon. Mr. Blake sent the Committee back with the report.

MR. BLAKE: No, no.

MR. McCARTHY: The hon. gentleman need not say no. I recollect the transaction very well.

MR. BLAKE: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I did not send the report of the Committee back.

MR. McCARTHY said he spoke from memory, and he might be incorrect as the hon. gentleman; but Mr. Mackenzie's name was mentioned; and if his recollection served him aright, the hon. member for South Bruce in the House—

MR. BLAKE: Mr. Mackenzie's name was mentioned as what?

MR. McCARTHY: As moving the sending back of the report.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman is all wrong.

MR. McCARTHY: I am not wrong in substance.

MR. BLAKE: You are all wrong. I can assure the hon. gentleman that this report was not dealt with at all while either myself or the hon. member for Lambton were members of the Local House.

MR. McCARTHY said he accepted the statement of the hon. gentleman. He was wrong perhaps as to that point; but what he meant to say was substantially the same thing, and this was: that the report in question which was brought down upon that charge, was sent back to the Committee by the same party now backing those hon. gentlemen here, for the purpose of securing a finding different from that at which the Committee at first arrived.

MR. BLAKE: No, no.

MR. DYMOND: It was not returned to the Committee. The hon. gentleman is quite wrong in his statement as to the facts.

MR. McCARTHY said the Committee changed the report. Hon. gentlemen opposite might quibble about terms, but he was substantially right. This was what had then been done, and yet these hon. gentlemen here loudly proclaimed that everything should be sent before Committees. They had sufficient evidence as to the manner in which Committees had been conducted under the auspices of hon. gentlemen opposite to show that no fairness could be got from them. The hon. member for South Bruce said the evidence might be taken before a Committee, but all the Opposition wanted and required was to test the whole case before the people of this country with respect to this charge, and this they were willing to do. He would like to know whether it would not be an idle ceremony to go before a Committee to have the evidence which they already possessed taken over again. With reference to this Goderich Harbour matter, what did they find? They found that the Order in Council which was made at the time made no reference to those facts, respecting which he thought he would not go too far, if he called them manufactured evidence—evidence which had been manufactured after the charge had been made throughout the country. Before the matter had been mentioned in this Chamber at all, or brought before the attention of the House, the facts connected with it had substantially become public; and it was then known that this contract had been given to Mr. Moore, although he was not the lowest tender. It was known that Mr. Stirton had interfered. It was known that there had been an interview with the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) and further—which had not yet appeared in the papers—that there had been an interview with the Hon. Mr. Brown with regard to this matter. The papers were before them, and if anything was calculated to arouse the suspicion of any fair and impartial-minded man, it was the papers which had been brought down. First of all, the hon. member for South Bruce, who had never done wrong, who never spared a foe, who never put a charitable interpretation on anything which a foe of his might do, thought it necessary to write this letter to the Premier and ask him to forward the letter he had written in regard to Moore among the other papers:—

“SIR,

“With reference to the address carried yesterday, for papers in connection with the Goderich Harbour Contract, I have to request that the private letter which I wrote you on the 2nd January, 1874, before the tenders were received, and which was the only communication between us on that subject, may be included in the return.

“I have, etc.,

“Your obedient servant,

“EDWARD BLAKE.”

Innocent member for South Bruce. The hon. gentleman was so careful of the high-handed manner of which they had heard so much, that he desired that this innocent letter—this letter which was perfectly well known to the public, this letter which had been proclaimed to the public, and was well known long before—should be sent down with the other papers. And they found this letter among those papers—childlike and bland, he might call it:—

“MY DEAR MACKENZIE,

“David Moore, of Walkerton, asks me to inform you that he is about to tender for the Goderich Works, and do so, accordingly. I told my friend Moore that an introduction was unnecessary, as you would let the work fairly, without respect of persons.

“Yours truly,

It had been proclaimed from the house-tops, that this Government were going to do what was right, were going to give the contract to the lowest tenderer, that the corrupt system had been done away with, and that Mr. Moore did not require any introduction. The tenders were: Tolton, $182,000; George Neilson, about whom there was no explanation, $200,000; Ellis, $212,000; Moore, Clendenning and Company, $212,540. What did the Order in Council say? The excuse was that poor Mr. Tolton was a farmer, unknown to the Department of Public Works; a poor innocent agriculturist, whom hon. gentlemen cared so particularly for that they feared he might be ruined by taking the contract. The hon. member for North Victoria had pricked that bubble, had shown that a man who was at that very time doing his work under contract satisfactorily, was neither a farmer nor was he unknown to the Department. The Premier got up and said that he, the practical Minister of Public Works; that he, who did not allow a stone to be put on the top of another without his knowing it, signed these reports without looking at that, and that the evidence under his own hand was not to be taken as showing that he knew anything about it; and he had alleged that the statement of Mr. Page was not true. If it were true it ought to appear in the report. The law required, he believed, that, when a higher tender was accepted, the reason for rejecting the lower tender should appear in the report. The whole thing had been passed over without any explanation in reference to Mr. Tolton, without any mention of Mr. Neilson, but with the simple statement that, out of sixteen tenders, Moore's was the third lowest. Were they to accept the evidence of Mr. Page on this subject? Every word of the report showed it was not true. They were bound in the parliamentary sense to accept the view that the Minister of Public Works had conceived the statement to be true; but, under responsible Government, it would not do for the hon. gentleman to shelter himself behind Mr. Page or any one else, and upon that issue he was quite willing to take the same ground that some hon. gentlemen—who had talked about corruption on the part of the Conservatives, and had preached so much about political morality, which those transactions did not sustain—had taken. And he (Mr. McCarthy) was not afraid to leave it to any body of electors, even if they were those represented by the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr.

Young), or even the hon. member for North York.

Mr. DYMOND: Let us try it.

Mr. McCARTHY said he had not the slightest objection to try it. He simply, however, desired to draw attention to matters of importance in reference to the proposal to submit this matter to a Committee. He did not think it was incumbent on members of the Opposition to submit everything to a Committee. Whatever he had to say he would say to hon. gentlemen face to face, without being afraid to meet them. He did not think that he was bound to accept such evidence as that as conclusive proof of innocence, and he did not think he was bound to send such a case to a Committee when the House had enough before it to prove to every independent elector that this charge had been made out. He did not think that hon. gentlemen opposite could be serious in saying that documentary papers brought down by the Government themselves were not to be treated as evidence. Some hon. gentlemen opposite had been so satisfied on the production of the papers that their seats were vacated that they resigned. The present Minister of Militia and the late Minister of Militia did not wait for the report of a Committee before they resigned. In the Palen matter the charge was equally strong. It was easy for hon. gentlemen to say: "Why do you not formulate your charges?" They had said that at the commencement of last Session, but at the end of the Session the members of the Opposition were said to be ferocious; they had formulated charges too often; they had gone through the country making charges, but there was not one of those charges that was not brought to a test vote, and upon which hon. gentlemen would not have to answer to the people; and these charges the Opposition would have to substantiate before that impartial tribunal to which they would all, before long, have to appeal.

Mr. RYMAL said he was delighted with the course the discussion was taking. Some of the old fire that had well-nigh waned and nearly expired was beginning to manifest itself. He expected to see some charges which had been made in the country formulated, although Committees did not seem to be in favour with hon. gentlemen opposite; but, he expected that, before the Session was over, they would feel it necessary to formulate the charges they had made. His hon. friend who had just sat down, the member for Cardwell, who had addressed the House in that lordly pomposity, grandiloquent swell, and turkey-gobbler strut which characterized him, had been rather severe on some friends of the Government. It was crushing to have a man of his weight fall upon them. He (Mr. Rymal) had suffered somewhat in listening to him. He did not think the hon. gentleman was to be blamed for taking up needlessly the time of this House. If he remembered aright, a satirical writer, in one of the journals of Western Canada, when referring to the orators at a Conservative picnic last summer, said the mantle of the late John Hillyard Cameron had fallen upon his hon. friend, and that he (Mr. McCarthy) would furnish brains to the Conservative party in time to come. It appeared to him (Mr. Rymal) that the mantle was too large for the child. It appeared to him that the hon. gentleman had accepted in good earnest the satirical writing which he had referred to, and thought the mantle of the departed statesman had actually fallen on his shoulders. He did not appear to him (Mr. Rymal) to be cut out for a statesman. He might be mistaken, but surely the resemblance was not very great. He did not believe that, if the late John Hillyard Cameron could see his successor, and be allowed to express an opinion, he would think the resemblance very remarkable. It was like Hyperion to a satyr; it was like mud to marble; or like a singed cat to a Bengal tiger. He asked the shade of the mighty departed to pardon what was almost a profanation in the comparison—comparisons were somewhat odious, but the one in which he had indulged was ludicrous in the extreme.

Mr. ARCHIBALD moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 34) To incorporate the Calais and St. Stephen Railway Bridge Company.—(Mr. Appleby.)

Bill (No. 35) To amend an Act entitled an Act respecting la Banque Jacques Cartier.—(Mr. Casgrain.)

Bill (No. 37) To provide greater convenience and safety for passengers on Railways in Canada.—(Mr. Trow.)

G. B. BURLAND LETTERS PATENT BILL.

(Mr. Casgrain)

FIRST READING.

MR. CASGRAIN introduced a Bill (No. 36) To extend, in favour of George B. Burland, certain letters patent to a period of ten years.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think that this is one of the Bills which ought to be explained even in its introduction.

MR. CASGRAIN said that the object of the Bill was briefly this: Some precedents in this relation already existed in this country, and one notably in England. The object of the Bill was to extend, in favour of Mr. Burland, the time for which he had obtained certain letters patent. Mr. Burland had gone to a heavy expense in order to carry out his undertaking, which was in the general interest of the public, as its effect was to prevent, in this country, the counterfeiting of bank notes. When the Bill came up for the second reading, he would be able more extensively to explain the intention of the Bill.

MR. MACKENZIE: Of course, I do not intend to oppose the introduction of the Bill, but it is one of a class of Bills on which the House looks with a great deal of suspicion, as it relates to the conferring of rights beyond those which are conferred by the Patent Law; and I have to warn the hon. gentleman that, unless there is something very special in it, that would commend it to the attention of the House, I shall be under the necessity of opposing it when it comes up for the second reading.

Bill read the first time.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON THURSDAYS.

MR. MACKENZIE moved:

“That the Government business shall have precedence immediately after routine proceedings on Thursdays, for the remainder of the Session.”

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on Mr. Cartwright's proposed motion: “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go again into Committee of Supply,” read.

MR. WALLACE said he trusted that the House would bear with him while he endeavoured to give his views on some of the points that had been raised in this discussion. He would endeavour to do so as briefly as possible. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) had taken the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy) to task, for dealing in figures, and using them unfairly; but he thought that, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) had been inclined to do what was right himself, he would have put his figures more fairly before the House than he did. It was difficult to take figures in different sets, place them in different positions, and make them prove the same thing. The hon. member for Cardwell had presented the figures concerning the expenditure for the years 1872-3 and 1875-6, and, contrasting them, had brought about certain results; but when the hon. member for South Brant took the figures of 1873-4, and 1875-6, and contrasted them, he (Mr. Paterson) brought about very different results. Having done so, the hon. gentleman sought to lead the House to infer, and, through the House, desired the country to infer, that the hon. member for Cardwell had misrepresented the facts as shown by those figures. He (Mr. Wallace) did not put much faith in what was proved by figures. In the hands of a skilful manipulator—although it was said that figures could not lie—they might be made to prove whatever such a person wished; he, therefore, would not deal largely in figures, but he should rather devote himself to the discussion of general principles. The hon. member for South Brant had said he would submit for the consideration of the House and of the country four unanswerable facts. One of these unanswerable facts was that the hon. the Finance Minister had managed the finances of this country as they had never been managed before. The hon. gentleman contented himself with that assertion, and did not go on to prove in what respect the hon. the Finance Minister had acted differently from his predecessors. He asked how did the management of this hon. gentleman differ from that of those who had preceded him in that position? Had that hon. gentleman adopted any different system of raising funds for carrying on the business of the country? He apprehended that no one would say that such was the case. The hon. gentleman either raised money in this relation by borrowing from England or by increased taxation, and in this respect he apprehended that the hon. gentleman did not differ in any way whatever from his predecessors. Again, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) had been obliged to come down and chronicle a deficit for this year; and, in this regard, he was pleased to say that the hon. gentleman did differ from his predecessors for a number of years past; and he did not think that this difference did any credit to the hon. the Finance Minister, or that it was such a difference that the country should feel grateful to the hon. gentleman for bringing it about. It was true that in the past we had had deficits; but, if he remembered rightly, we had not had one or two deficits so great as those which the hon. gentleman who now controlled the finances of this country had been obliged to submit to this House, and in this respect he agreed with the hon. the member for South

MR. WALLACE.

Brant, that the hon. the Finance Minister had managed the finances of this country differently from his predecessors, but not in a way, he thought, to elicit the admiration of the people of this country, or of the hon. members of the House. Another difference to which the hon. member (Mr. Paterson) had referred was that, under the Administration of the right hon. the member for Kingston, the expenditure of this country had in seven years been increased ten millions of dollars; and the hon. gentleman went on to show that, under the Administration of the present Government, the expenditure during three years had only been increased $200,000. This was correct, but, admitting that this was the case, what did it prove? Did it prove that in the one case there was extravagance, and in the other case economy? A greater expenditure did not constitute extravagance; neither did a less expenditure always constitute economy. He held that economy lay in a wise and judicious expenditure of money; and a large expenditure might be more economical, in fact, and more in the interests of the country, than a small expenditure might be. The hon. gentleman did not tell the House, or the people of this country, that, while this increased expenditure was going on, this Dominion was being added to by Provinces, and that, during the period in question, the Government of the day had had to provide for the administration of Government in British Columbia, and in the North-West and Manitoba. All this, as a natural result, had added to the expenditure; and, in the year 1873-4, to which the hon. gentleman had referred as one of the years of large expenditure under the late Administration, the Province of Prince Edward Island was added to this Dominion. This, also, had necessarily added to the expenditure of the country, because it was not possible to take new territories into this Dominion, and to provide for giving postal facilities and other facilities for carrying on the commerce of the country, and for the Administration of Justice, without increasing the expenditure. And there was this remarkable difference between the expenditures of the late Government and of the Government now in power: that, while the late Government was increasing the expenditure, they had a revenue equal to meet that expenditure; whereas the present Government, with less expenditure, had not the revenue to meet it. Then, again, the hon. gentleman came down to the trade question, and he said that it was the duty of the Opposition to point out how the tariff could be so readjusted as to benefit the agricultural and mining interests of the country. Circumstances, it was said, altered cases; and the different circumstances of to-day, compared with what they were when the hon. member for South Brant was in Opposition, had entirely changed the views he had formerly entertained. When, in former times, that hon. gentleman and his friends were in Opposition, they had contended that it was no part of the duty of the Opposition to provide a policy for carrying on the government of the country; that, when they got into power, it would be time enough for them to propound such a policy; and that it was not their duty to furnish brains to the Government of the day. But the hon. gentleman now said that it was the duty of the Opposition to point out the manner by which certain results could be brought about that would be beneficial to our agricultural and mining interests. He (Mr. Wallace) was not authorized to propound a policy for the Opposition, but, if it were necessary that they should propound one, he thought he could show how the interests of the agriculturists of this country could be promoted by legislation. Take for instance the article of oats, which were largely grown by our farmers. Why, he knew as a fact that American oats had been brought into this country, thus reducing the price of Canadian oats; and last year, when Canadian oats, in the Toronto market, had touched 47c. and 48c. per bushel, American oats were brought in and delivered on the track at 43c. and 44c., thus immediately bringing down the price of our oats to that figure, doing therefore a positive injury to Canadian agricultural interests in that respect. He knew that this year the same result was being brought about; and that corn also was brought into this country free of duty in large quantities to the detriment of the growers of corn in this country and of the producers of coarse grains of other kinds in Canada, and of those who had to provide food for their animals in this country, because, if this corn was not brought in here, the other articles would be in better demand and would therefore command better prices. He thought that it was plain therefore that, if the Government were to adopt a policy that would impose a duty of from eight to ten cents per bushel on oats, or an equal amount of duty on corn, it would benefit our agriculturists to that extent. "Oh," but the hon. gentleman would say, "that will hurt the consumer." He (Mr. Wallace) was not so sure about the truth of that assertion. It was true that the man who bought the oats and corn would buy them at a little less price than he would under those circumstances; but it was equally true that the money with which he paid for these oats and this corn would go out of this country, and be entirely lost to its productive labour, owing to such admission of foreign produce. That money would then go to the employment of American instead of Canadian labour, and, therefore, he thought that the Government of the day, if they saw fit to take into consideration Canadian interests, could so legislate as to promote these interests better than was the case at present. Again, with regard to the manufacturing interests, for he apprehended that the hon. gentleman gave up the case entirely, because he (Mr. Paterson) himself said that he was in favour of the Government of the day adopting a policy that would benefit Canadian manufactures, and he fancied that the hon. gentleman consequently saw that it was possible, by legislation, to benefit that interest, the hon. gentleman apparently could not see how, by legislation, it was possible to benefit the mining interest or the agricultural interest. He (Mr. Wallace) believed that he had shown how the agricultural interest could be so benefitted, and he thought that he could also prove how this could also be effected in the case of the mining interest. Take, for instance, the article of coal. We had large quantities of it in Nova Scotia, and we consumed large quantities of it in this country. It, therefore, by imposing a duty of 75c. or $1 a ton on coal, we brought Nova Scotia coal into greater use, and made a greater demand for it, he would ask would not that assist the mining interests, or one branch of the mining interests, of this country? Again, if they would take the article of iron and the articles manufactured from it, and the articles manufactured from copper and lead, all of which we had almost to any extent in this country, and imposed duties upon them, we would prevent, in any measure, the importation of these articles into this country, and compel their manufacture and use here, and he asked if such a policy would not be conducive to the advancement of the mining interests of the Dominion? He thought that this was so plain that no man, who honestly and anxiously desired to listen to proof, could fail to see that such a policy would be just to these interests in this country. The hon. gentleman had spoken of what he called the National Policy, and he was very severe on the hon. member for Cumberland in this connection. He would not attempt to defend the hon. gentleman, who was abundantly able to defend himself from all aspersion that might be cast upon him; but he would say that this was not given up, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) stated, in order that the late Government might be able to retain office. He looked upon the action of the late Administration in this respect in this light, that, feeling that the then Opposition was hostile to that policy, and that it could not be continued, they yielded to the inevitable; but, because the late Government did so, it did not follow that, commanding the confidence of the country in other respects, and believing as they did that they were better able to govern the country in those particulars, they should then have retired from office. Because they were defeated on one issue, and on an issue which was not a Government issue, was it necessary or advisable that they should have handed over their positions to their opponents, in whom the country had less confidence, and who were decidedly hostile to the policy in question. These hon. gentlemen had not given up the National Policy; and so far were they from doing so that they were prepared to go to the country, and to stake their political existence, as it were, upon it. Did this look like an abandonment of that policy? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) said these hon. gentlemen were not sincere, and that this was an electioneering dodge. He (Mr. Wallace) thought that the imputation of motives without the power to sustain them by facts was a wrong proceeding on the part of hon. members on either side of the House. It was a very reprehensible practice. The hon. gentleman had alluded to our fisheries, and had pretended that the late Government gave them away. Now, was this true? Was it the fact? Had it not been shown within the last few months that this was not the case; when Commissioners had decided that the United States should pay to Canada the sum of five and a half millions of dollars, in compensation for the superior advantages obtained by American fishermen in Canadian waters over those conferred on Canadians in American waters; and this award was not given for the use of these fisheries by the Americans in perpetuity, but simply for their use during twelve years, the period for which the Washington Treaty, so far as the fisheries were concerned, was to be in force, unless sooner annulled by the contracting parties. Was it fair, then, to say that the late Government had ceded and given away these fisheries by which alone Canada could hope to secure reciprocal trade with the United States? With reference to reciprocity, he did not think, although he should be very willing to see reciprocal trade with the United States established, that our prosperity at all depended upon it. He could look back to the history of this country, and he believed that he could prove that such was the case. We had had such reciprocity from 1854 to 1866, but, during some portions of that period, Canada, as hon. gentlemen would find, was not very prosperous; and we had experienced commercial disasters in 1857 and 1858. He did not consider that reciprocity would at all either prevent disaster or create prosperity, so that, if we had such reciprocity to-morrow, it would not be so great a boon as many of the Canadian people believed. Why did he think so? One of his reasons for it was that the Americans, as a people, were the exporters of almost the very same articles that we exported. They exported the produce of the farm and of the forest, and these two things were largely what we had to export. And, this being the case, reciprocal trade with them would be unfavourable to us some years, although it might benefit us other years. On the whole, he did not believe that reciprocity was necessary to the prosperity of the Canadian people, or that it would create prosperity, if other circumstances as well did not tend to promote our prosperity. The hon. gentleman had also quoted the opinions of the Board of Trade. A few years ago this Board of Trade, as a body, was not considered by hon. gentlemen opposite to be worthy of any notice whatever; but now, since that Board had expressed an opinion which might be construed favourably to the views held by the Government, it was proclaimed by these hon. gentlemen to be an authority. But, if it was an authority now, was it not an authority then? And, if it were right now, why was it not right then? It might just as well have been right then, and wrong now, as right now and wrong then, though it might now enunciate views opposed to those of our manufacturers who were asking for increased protection. The action of these hon. gentlemen showed that they were ready to suit themselves to circumstances. They accepted the opinions of any body of men or any individual while these were favourable to their own views; but, the moment these opinions were adverse to them, then such views were held to be worthless, and no weight should be attached to them. The hon. gentleman had spoken of immigration, and said that the hon. members of the Opposition were doing everything in their power to prevent immigration into this country, and were thus impeding its progress. Now he (Mr. Wallace) held that, at the present moment, to induce any one to come to Canada, except he were prepared to go on our wild lands and settle there, was to do a positive wrong to such an individual and to the country. Could anything be more cruel or more wicked than to prevail upon people to come here, when, in our cities, towns and villages, men were to be found without employment and in a state of starvation, because they could not get any work to do; for not only were many of our countrymen working on half time, but many others could not find anything to do at all. If this was true—and it could not be truthfully gainsaid—was it in the interests of the country that a large expenditure of money should be incurred to bring such a class of persons into the Dominion? Were our labouring men employed as they ought to be? No; and how was it with respect to our lumbering operations? Why, the men were being paid from $8 to $10 a month, on which they had to keep themselves and their families. Ought, then, any man to be induced to come to this country at the present time in search of employment? He maintained that it was wicked and cruel to do so; and, therefore, if the members of the Opposition, in exposing the true position of the country were doing anything to prevent this great wrong, they were doing justice to the country, and acting in the interests of humanity. The hon. gentleman said that the members of the Opposition were the advocates of higher duties, which, if imposed, would have a tendency to create ill-feeling, as it were, between the Old Country and the Dominion; that the manufacturers, the artisans, and the mechanics of Great Britain would then become unfriendly to us, and that such a course would produce, as it were, antagonism between the two countries. The hon. gentleman also held that, if we discriminated against the Americans, it would be the cause of quarrel with them; and that the former would resent it. He (Mr. Wallace) apprehended that we ought to legislate in the interests of the Canadian people. We were not to consult the interests of the Americans as to what duties we would impose. We should do what was right with regard to our own interests, and, if the Americans felt displeased and offended in consequence of this course being pursued, with them would lie the fault and the blame, and not with us. If we only did what we considered to be just in our own interest, how could any other people feel aggrieved thereat. Had we not full liberty to do as we pleased, so long as we only looked after our own interests? He would go further. He would not say that he would discriminate against Americans as against other peoples of the world; but, as a British subject, he would not hesitate to give a preference to British people in the Canadian market. The reason was obvious; the British people received Canadian products on more favourable terms than did the Americans. The British workman was taxed to maintain an army and navy to protect the commerce and people of Canada, in case such protection would be required. It was only a matter of duty, as British subjects, to admit the products and manufactures of Britain into Canada on better terms than those of other countries. He did not mean to say that they should discriminate against Americans in favour of other foreign nations; but it was a duty that Canadians owed to the country that gave them protection to give the artizans and manufacturers of that country the preference in their market over those who were, if anything, hostile to them. Those were the reasons which should induce Canada to admit the products and manufactures of Great Britain and of British Colonies, on better terms than those of other countries. The hon. member had said that he deprecated the system of villification that was adopted by hon. members of the Opposition. He would ask the hon. gentleman if he had forgotten that certain hon. members of the Government had designated hon. members of the Opposition as thieves and receivers of stolen goods. Was that not villification? If the hon. gentleman deprecated this system of villification, why did he impute improper motives to others? Why did he stigmatize the policy of the Opposition as an electioneering dodge. Was that the way to prevent villification by indulging in it? Did he forget that the distinct characteristics of the two parties, as placed before the country by his party, were, that the one was the party of honesty and purity, and the other the party of dishonesty and corruption. and yet this hon. gentleman stated that he deprecated the system which had been adopted by the Opposition. If they did adopt this system, and, he admitted, there was far too much of that sort of thing throughout the country with both parties, which was not calculated to raise this country in the estimation of the people of the world, to whom did the responsibility attach? Was it not, in a great measure due to the former Opposition, who went through the country slandering their opponents, when fighting for office, almost heedless of what they said with reference to the Government of the country and its supporters? They did not deal with special charges, as did the present Opposition. They raised general cries of corruption without showing the special cases of corruption. In not a single instance had the Opposition of to-day adopted this system of charging the Government with general acts of corruption. They had taken hold of individual cases and said, without deciding finally on the merits of these cases, that the circumstances surrounding them required explanation. He would take, for instance, one of these subjects, which was so fully discussed last year, the Goderich Harbour case. Did not that require explanation? The evidence on the face of it showed an improper transaction, so far as the transaction could explain itself. He did not say that everything connected with it was wrong; but, when they saw the contract was given to one contractor, at thirty thousand dollars over the tender of another, there was certainly something that required explanation. In another instance, the Kaministiquia land purchase, there appeared to be something wrong. There was no man in this Dominion who had gone to Kaministiquia and had seen the lands for which five hundred dollars per acre had been paid, who had seen the country in which these lands were situated, who would not hold that five hundred dollars per acre was a tremendous price to pay them. Taking away the fact that the Government railway would pass that point, he did not believe any one in the Dominion would give ten dollars an acre for it. Did not that transaction require explanation? He did not say there was anything wrong in it, but that it looked suspicious, and the Government was bound to account for this comparatively large price paid for land in that part of the country. In the matter of the Fort Frances Lock, the Opposition demanded an explanation. They knew that an expenditure was going on at Fort Frances Lock which had not been authorized by this Parliament, since that work could not be considered a portion of the Pacific Railway, and, therefore, that expenditure required explanation also. So, in almost every transaction in which alleged wrong was imputed to the Government, there was, on the face of it, evidence to sustain the charge; and it was for the Government to show that in these matters they had acted properly. And he held that, in this course of the Opposition, there was no villification; it was their duty to look into the expenditure of the public revenue and see that there was nothing wrong in that expenditure. Having said so much about the remarks of the hon. member for South Brant, he would now touch briefly on some points made by the hon. the Finance Minister in his Budget speech. That hon. gentleman, as usual, brought forward the prophecy he had made in 1872 and 1873 and prior to those years. There was a class of men in every community who were given to prophecy, and, if their predictions came true, they said: "I told you so." The hon. the Minister of Finance belonged to that category. He had predicted disaster in 1872, but had not stated his future course in accordance with that prediction. If he believed in his own prophecy, his conduct was most extraordinary. If the ship of state was, as he said, approaching breakers, was it not his duty to shorten sail and make every preparation to meet the emergency? He declared he was not responsible for the expenditure of 1873-4, but his own expenditure, the expenditure for 1874-5, for which he was responsible, exceeded that of 1873-4 by nearly half a million dollars. If he saw danger ahead, he should have prepared for it by reducing his expenditure. He could have done it then, since he had succeeded in doing it now, when it was a political necessity. The hon. the Finance Minister had shown, and he (Mr. Wallace) gave him credit for it, that he had reduced the expenditure on Civil Government, from $883,000 in 1873-4 to $812,000 in 1876-7. But his economy began too late; it began only when necessity compelled him to it. The expenditure for the same service in 1874-5 amounted to $909,000 against $750,000 in 1872-3, the last year of the old Government. And now the hon. the Finance Minister stated that he had brought economy to a point than which it was impossible to get lower without injuring the efficiency of the public service. He would ask hon. members on the Government side to compare that statement with the language used by them when in Opposition, that the old Government was corrupt and extravagant; that, if they obtained power, they would reduce the expenditure. According to their own showing, they were guilty of one of two things: either they were dishonest in 1872-3, when they accused the late Government of extravagance, or they were dishonest now in not reducing the expenditure to what it was then. It was true they had been able to reduce one ordinary expenditure by one and a-half million dollars. But by what means? By stopping the Militia Estimates in a great measure; by a slight saving in the Civil Government, not less than it was in 1872-3, but less than in 1873-4, which, they contended, was the last year of the old Government. They had increased the expenditure in connection with the Administration of Justice, but that, he was willing to admit, was a necessity. These gentlemen had, in point of economy, exercised their ingenuity almost to a fault, but had not succeeded in reducing the expenditure to what it was in 1872-3. In Militia and Defence they had reduced the expenditure from $1,248,663 to $550,000, but was this a wise retrenchment? The most of it consisted of a saving in the drilling of men. He did not suppose they had reduced the staff or departmental expenses. The item of Police they had reduced from $49,000 to $11,000; Pensions had increased; the expense of Legislation had been reduced, for which they also deserved credit.

MR. MITCHELL: They want all they can get.

MR. WALLACE said they had increased Arts and Agriculture from $10,000 to $65,000. The expenditure on the Census had been reduced, but that could be explained by the fact of its being nearly completed. They had largely increased the expenditure on Immigration; this expenditure was, as he had explained before, a very bad one. Marine Hospitals also had been increased, which were also connected with Immigration, and in which a great saving could be made. The next item was an increase in a most dangerous direction; he referred to Pensions. Every public officer should be paid a salary sufficient to support him, and there should be no pensions given. Public officers should be taught prudence and economy, and to make provision for their old age, instead of looking forward to pensions. This system of pensions was a pernicious one. There was also a very large increase in the Superannuation Fund, from $53,000 to $104,000. The danger in connection with this system was that the Government, for the sake of giving offices to their friends, would superannuate men who were abundantly able to do their duties. This system should be abolished; there should be no superannuation fund, because it was open to abuses. The members of the Civil Service were as well paid as men employed outside the service, and were subject to no fluctuations of business; they knew exactly what they were going to get, and should be able to make provision for their old age, without the aid of a superannuation fund. Another item largely increased was Miscellaneous Expenses, from $63,000 to $105,000. That item might be quite correct, but was it not one in which these gentlemen could have exercised economy? The item of Mounted Police had also largely increased. These different increased expenditures might be all right, because, as the country increased in population, the internal expenditure must also increase. He did not say they were the result of extravagance, but it showed that, when these gentlemen accused the old Government of extravagance on the score of increased expenditure, they were not acting fairly in not admitting that the whole increase might have been due to the same circumstances to which, no doubt, the present Administration attributed their increased expenditure. The hon. the Finance Minister, in his Budget speech, took great credit to himself because he had been able to borrow money at a low rate of interest. He believed the credit was due, not to that hon. gentleman, but to the late Government, for the simple reason that it had been able to meet its engagements and, at the same time, reduce the taxation; and, if there was any evidence better than another of a community being able to meet its liabilities, it was the fact that while creating charges on the revenue, it was more than able to meet all the charges on it. While taking credit to himself of being able to negotiate loans at a low rate, he was, in reality, giving credit to the preceding Government. He also gave himself credit for prescience in going into the English market to borrow at the time he did. He said, if they had been obliged to go last year, he would perhaps have failed in floating the loan, and, if he had, the country would have been bankrupt,—an unpleasant prospect for the contemplation of Canadians. In speaking of our loan as compared with that effected by corporations and other countries, he said the corporation of Birmingham had put a loan of one and a half million pounds upon the market and it was tardily taken up. He did not mention the circumstances, the way in which payment of that loan was to be made, or the prospect of its being paid. Again, he said Natal put a loan upon the market at three and a-half per cent., which was tardily taken up. Had it come to this: that the hon. the Finance Minister of this great Dominion, with its resources at his back, went into the English market, and could not do better than Natal. He prided himself on being able to make a loan more advantageous, and he (Mr. Wallace) doubted whether it was more advantageous, as he had not stated whether the Natal loan was floated at or below par. What was Natal, a colony with a population of 300,000, only 20,000 of whom were Europeans, and with an income of £250,000 and an export trade to the value of about £1,000,000, in comparison with the Dominion? The hon. the Finance Minister congratulated the people of this Dominion, whose revenue exceeded $20,000,000, that, with all the resources of this country at his back, he had been able to make a loan on somewhat better terms than that colony. Again, he stated that Portugal had only succeeded in floating a loan, tardily, at six per cent., thus comparing that little kingdom, now fully developed, to this extensive country in which there was more land unoccupied than half-a-dozen Portugals could be taken out of and scarcely be missed. Did he not put Canada on a low level when he said we could not borrow at a better or as good a rate as the kingdom of Portugal? The other case he referred to was the Metropolitan Board of Works; but it had borrowed better than Canada, because it had borrowed at three and a-half per cent. Then, again, he said that taxation could not increase wealth. He (Mr. Wallace) admitted that it was impossible to legislate wealth any more than honesty. But it was equally true that, by legislation, industries could be stimulated so as to create wealth. And this was what the hon. gentlemen opposite did not try to do; they did not try to legislate in a manner calculated to promote the prosperity of this country. The hon. the Finance Minister proceeded to say that, in 1881, the Dominion would require to borrow about $30,000,000. It was not a pleasant prospect that, while our revenue was decreasing and we were piling up a debt, we had to face the prospect of having to create a further debt of thirty million dollars in two or three years. The supporters of the Government all said that this indebtedness was due to the extravagance of the old Government, who undertook public works which created this immense debt. It was true the old Government did assume the responsibility of advising this country to undertake certain great public works, but they did not do this on their own responsibility alone, but at the solicitation and instigation of the now governing party then in Opposition, as much, almost, as at the instigation of their own party; so that, for the construction of these great works, one party, he held, was not more responsible than the other. But, for the manner in which these works were carried out, the party who constructed them must be held responsible. The old Government, in making provision for the construction of what might be considered the greatest responsibility of the country, namely, the Pacific Railway, had adopted a means which would not have greatly increased the debt. It was proposed to put a burden of thirty million dollars on the people of this Dominion. The proceeds necessary for the construction of the railway were to be got out of the lands of the country; so that the plan of the old Government would have been to put an indebtedness of thirty million dollars on the Dominion, an interest of about one and a half million dollars annually at five per cent. No one would say that, considering our great resources, this liability was a very great one. It was true it might be said that a great railway of that kind was too serious an undertaking for a people numbering only four millions, but he considered that four millions of people were better able to do, to-day, an undertaking of that magnitude, than forty millions would have been half a century ago. The advanced machinery of to-day gave greater facilities for carrying on and completing the work; for instance, the steam pump, the steam drill, every possible machinery that could be named, were called into requisition at the present day. So that four millions of people to-day were equal, in this respect, to forty millions of people fifty years ago. The resources of the country could, he thought, be better utilized in the prosecution of this great work than had been done by the late Government, or than was being done by the present Government. He knew that the views he entertained on this subject were at variance with the views of, perhaps, nearly all the hon. members of this House; but, notwithstanding this, he believed he was correct. He was not advocating anything new in advocating what he intended to put before the House. He was only taking what existed and making better use of it than was being done by the party in power. Before the power of the people for the prosecution or performance of a work could be estimated, their resources must be ascertained. What were the resources of the Dominion? The Dominion had an occupied territory of thirty-six millions of acres in extent; this, at the low rate of twenty dollars per acre, must be worth $720,000,000 at least. Other property, personal property and money invested in manufactures, put at a low rate, and added to the value of our occupied lands, would give a total of $1,000,000,000, at the very lowest, according to the census of 1870-1. Then, again, there were the vast territories in the North-West to use for the purpose of constructing these great works, if they could be used, and he saw by the speech of His Excellency the Governor-General, made at the opening of the Session, that, by the treaty lately made with the Indians, the Government had become the possessors of a territory of four hundred and fifty thousand square miles, of about two hundred and ninety millions of acres of land, which would prove a great source of wealth hereafter. It was only by using every possible means, by drawing, in some shape or other, on the future of the country, that we could build the Pacific Railway.

MR. TROW: I understood the hon. gentleman had said it was cruel to bring out emigrants, and now he seems to be in favour of utilizing our waste lands, and of bringing out emigrants.

MR. WALLACE said he was glad the hon. gentleman had asked that question. He had said it was cruel to bring out emigrants when there was nothing for them to do, and he said so still. Around our cities, towns and villages everywhere, were to be found unemployed, starving men. There was scarcely any work around our farms for farm labourers, for the simple reason that farmers only required the labourers during the haying or harvest season. It was cruel to bring out men to labour in our woods, when they could only get ten dollars per month. What we wanted in this country was a class of emigrants that would devote their energies to the cultivation of the soil of Canada, of which we had millions of acres still unoccupied. But, of course, these emigrants must be able to live until the ground was sufficiently cultivated to afford them subsistence, and, to enable them to do this, the Government must find them employment. He was speaking, when interrupted, of the resources of the country in relation to the policy of constructing these great works that were now under consideration. He estimated, as one of the resources we had, the vast territory awaiting cultivation; as another, the mineral wealth and other undeveloped sources of profit that should be properly utilized. To develop these resources of wealth, it was necessary to construct this great railway, and it was not only in our power to do this, but it might be done in such a manner that, instead of being a burden, for the time being, upon the industries of Canada, it would actually be a great assistance to them. He intended to show how this could be done. They knew that money was active; by it, industry progressed. What was wanted was men and money; men to cultivate the land; men to work, and money to exchange for the products of their labour. The country was suffering from a depression now, and could any one wonder at it when, on the 31st day of December last, all the currency at our disposal amounted to nineteen million dollars. This was all Canada had for carrying on the business of the country; it naturally followed that a large part of the business was done on credit. Credit was the circulating medium instead of money. Now, he proposed to give a good currency to the country, and this would bring the men to this country, and the men would bring the labour, and the currency would pay for it. He thought this country was bound by obligation, not only to the people of British Columbia, but also to the Imperial Government and to the whole Dominion, to complete the Pacific Railway by the year 1890. To complete that work and to finish the other works that were in course of construction by the Government, perhaps $125,000,000 or $150,000,000 would be required. He suggested that for this work they should utilize the resources of the country instead of paying interest to English capitalists. The hon. the Finance Minister smiled. He knew that hon. gentleman was an able financier, and yet he simply smiled when the people were crying to him for bread. Like Nero, who fiddled while Rome was burning, he smiled at the poverty around him, and did not undertake to make an effort to relieve it. But the hon. gentleman had been told so often that he was incompetent that it was useless telling him again; the hon. gentleman knew and felt and acknowledged his own incompetence to manage the affairs of the country, and to the hon. gentlemen who sat behind him, and who still supported him, he had acknowledged it. He expressed a want of confidence in himself to deal with the distress from which the people of this country were now suffering. Now, he (Mr. Wallace) proposed to borrow from the people of Canada, a sum equal to the cost of the public works now undertaken. It might be said that the people could not lend it; but first let them consider how the loan could be raised. To borrow twelve million dollars would require three dollars per head of the population; and he would ask if the people were not able to lend that trifling amount per year at interest when the American people could and did lend to their Government some ten or fifteen dollars per head without interest? The people of the United States lent the Government $300,000,000 without interest, and that was used, not to create industry, but to destroy it. He asked, if such a system of raising money could be adopted to assist the Government in its direst extremity, why could it not be used for other purposes? He believed the wealth of the country could be used in this way for carrying out public works. He proposed to borrow from the people of the country instead of the capitalists of England, during the next twelve years, a sum equal to $125,000,000 or $150,000,000 by the issue of Dominion currency, and by issuing not more than $12,000,000 a year, which, in twelve years, would be $144,000,000. He was satisfied that yearly sum would be absorbed into the business of the country, and that it would stimulate industry in a proper way, instead of increasing it by money borrowed from abroad, which was soon exported to pay for imported goods, and which tended more to raise the price of that which was already produced than to increase production; whereas, the currency which was not exportable would remain in the country and would permanently stimulate production, which, in turn, would add to the comforts of the people and the wealth of the country. The Canadian Pacific Railway must be built by Canadian resources if it ever was to be built, for it was not to be supposed that any capitalist would put his money into a railroad for the benefit of the Canadian people unless he believed that he should ultimately be paid for the money advanced. If his plan were adopted, the road, when completed, would be the property of the country instead of belonging to the capitalists. He held that no one should say the road was not to be built by Canadian resources, and that they intended to swindle the people of the Old Country out of the money invested in this line. In order to keep faith with the public creditors, he would restrain the Government from entering upon the construction of any other public works until those now under construction were completed, except such works as they should make from the revenue of the country after making ample provision for the payment of interest upon the indebtedness created and for carrying on the current expenditure of the country. In order to maintain public credit, the currency should only be issued for indebtedness heretofore or now created, and, by this course, Canadian indebtedness would be rendered equal to gold. To give perfect security for this indebtedness, he would make the currency convertible into three classes of securities. He suggested the issuing of a Dominion lands prospectus, in which the price of the land should be fixed. To show his meaning he would give nominal figures. For instance, land within a mile square from a station along the line of route he would sell at $10 an acre; within five miles from a station at $5 an acre; ten miles from the line of railway at $3.75; 15 miles from the line at $2.50; twenty miles from the line at $1.50 an acre; within twenty-five miles of the line at 50c. per acre, and beyond that we would give it to settlers. This currency, then, we would make payable in Dominion land scrip, bearing interest at 6 per cent. per annum and for which Dominion lands would only be sold. This would be an inducement for the people to get hold of this currency. Every young man and almost every old man desired to have a piece of land of his own and this would, in a very short time, become a favourite investment with the people of this country. As another security he would issue Treasury notes for $100, payable in currency at one year from date, bearing interest at five per cent., and by this means he thought the Government would get a large share of the money that was now deposited in the banks. He believed this would be an advantage to the country. Banks, at the present time, paid from five to six per cent. on deposits, but the rates they charged for advances to their customers were so high that people could not afford to borrow. And the banks had scarcely any money of their own, that was, gold—which, according to our system, was the only legal money—only about $5,000,000 the remainder of their business was done on credit. They received money on deposit at five or six per cent., advanced it to the people at seven, eight, nine, ten, and sometimes more, per cent. It was this high rate of interest which the banks were charging that had as much to do with the depressed state of trade in this country as anything. No man could borrow money at, say, nine per cent., and invest it in business with a hope of realising a profit. Usury was the best trade in Canada; a man who lent out his money received a better return for it than by embarking in business. These Treasury notes would give the artisans and others the means of investing their small savings at a good rate of interest, and with the very best security. But there was one class of men who were almost as base as the Israelites in their worship of the golden calf. For gold, they must have gold. For this class of men, he would have Dominion bonds issued, payable in twenty years, at four per cent interest payable half-yearly in currency. It was not necessary to have any gold about it, because he would have the Government take this currency in payment of every debt due to the country. When the Americans issued a currency to carry on the war, they were afterwards obliged to discredit themselves. They said: "This currency is good for the payment of all debts we owe, but not of debts owing to us. If you have Customs duties, you must pay them in gold." They could not help themselves because they required gold to pay for the goods necessary to carry on the war, that they had to buy from other countries. The Canadian Government would take this money at its face value, and would not depreciate its own credit. Then he would advocate that the currency should be issued only in the following rates: $1, $2, $5, $10, $100, $1,000. The amount to which these notes should constitute a legal tender, should be: $1 notes up to $10; $2 notes up to $20; $5 notes up to $50; $10 notes up to $100; and $100 notes up to $1,000; and the $1,000 note for any sum over that amount. Copper coin should be a legal tender for ten cents; silver coin for the fractional parts of a dollar. Gold coin he would not make a legal tender at all; he would make all contracts hereafter made in gold in this Dominion void; but all contracts heretofore made should be payable in gold or in currency at such a rate of discount as would make it legal in gold if its current value was below par. He would have Dominion land scrip issued in only two amounts, denominational $100 and $1,000, and such should only be given for currency. The currency notes,

Treasury notes and bonds of $100 and upwards should never be re-issued, but be destroyed as soon as they were sent back for payment. Then, again, he would not allow the banks or any corporation to issue any bill or any promise to pay, or any other token of value to pass current as money in this country. He held that it was the duty of the Government to create all the money or currency that was issued for circulation in the Dominion. He would give banks currency upon either of the following securities, but not for gold or any other security: 1st, for Dominion or Provincial legal tender notes at par; 2nd, for coupons for interest payable by the Dominion within two years of date at which exchange was made; 3rd, for Dominion bonds, payable within two years of date of exchange, with interest upon the bond at the rate of two per cent. per annum from date of exchange till maturity of bond. He would also loan currency to the banks upon the following securities and no other, and upon the terms named: Upon coupons for interest payable by the Dominion within five years, he would loan seventy-five cents of currency for each dollar of the security; upon Dominion bonds maturing within five years, he would lend banks ninety cents of currency for each dollar of the security. Hon. gentlemen would say this was all very well for doing the financial business of the country within the Dominion, but how was it to be done outside? He would ask them, in return, how they carried on the import business of the country now? How was it done in the United States? We had no gold of any consequence in this country, except what was brought here by immigration, or what was received in payment of our productions or what was dug out of the earth in Nova Scotia or at Madoc. But this currency would be of the same value out of the country as it was within the Dominion; the value would be regulated by its purchasing power in this country and it would be taken in payment just in the same way as we received American greenbacks, knowing that they would purchase anything in the United States to the extent of their face value. It would, no doubt, be said that it would be depreciated currency. Admitting this to be true—though he denied that such was the fact—it would not be worse than the present condition of affairs in the country. If more was imported than sent out of the country, the difference must be made up in gold or added to the indebtedness of the persons importing the goods. Those goods had to be paid for, and the property of the country was sacrificed to get gold to make payment, and the depreciation of property was far worse than any depreciation of its currency could be. The depreciation of property stopped production because there was no stimulus to cause production, and that stoppage of production produced commercial collapse. In the case of a depreciated currency, the only man who would feel it, would be a merchant who, having purchased goods out of the country, required gold to pay for them. The people who would suffer would be those who had mismanaged their business and bought more goods than they required. Such trades became ruined, but there was the same flow of currency as before, and the business of the country proceeded as usual; whereas, in the other case when the circulation was diminished by the withdrawal of gold, industry was brought to a standstill and ruin was abroad. Thus, even admitting that it was a depreciated currency—which he did not admit—it must be remembered that one dollar only represented one hundred cents, and not a certain quantity of goods at any time. Gold did not depreciate in law, but its purchasing power changed in accordance with its abundance or scarcity. It declined or advanced according to the abundance or scarcity of the articles desired to purchase with it. If gold was plentiful, the articles would advance in price; and if scarce, the price of those articles went down. That would not be the result with currency. One of the good effects which would result from the adoption of the currency system was, that it would give stability to the Government institutions, because every man who passed a dollar of that currency, had that, in addition to his patriotism, to cause him to maintain the institutions.

With bank notes, the people could leave the country, but, if their wealth was invested in the Dominion currency or securities, they had a reason for maintaining its institutions. With a currency system, the public works could be carried out with far greater advantage than at present. If the system of borrowing money in England was continued, it must stay the industrial interests. Canadian business men were in a great measure doing business on bank capital. Municipalities had borrowed money largely to construct railways, and interest was being paid on not less than $500,000,000, involving an annual charge of $20,000,000 or $25,000,000, or $4 or $5 per head on our debt, outside of what was required to complete public works already undertaken. In placing those views before the House he was aware that he would be viewed as a visionary or as a crazy man. It was true he might be a visionary, but he saw in the introduction of that system an end of the difficulties between capital and labour, which threatened to overturn the social system. That was evident, not only from the labour strikes which had occurred in the Dominion, and which had proved even more disastrous in the United States and Great Britain, but from the Communism of France and Internationalism of Germany, all of which sprang from the same source. The tendency of such a system as he had sketched would be to have an unrestricted and expanded industry, which was able to make the world a paradise compared with its present condition. He only asked that Parliament would let industry alone, but give it, if necessary, easier methods of exchanging products and an easier monetary system. There should not, he thought, be any misery in the world that was not caused either by misfortune or crime; and he knew an abundance of misery that was not caused by either. That state of things was largely due to the accursed monetary system that caused the most abject poverty and created colossal fortunes, for it invariably created a system of credit which proved disastrous. The misery which so largely existed was not due, either to the system of Free-trade or Protection, but entirely to the system of credit being a necessary consequence of the false monetary system which regulated the trade of the world.

Mr. OLIVER said he could not endeavour to reply to the latter part of the speech of his hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace). He knew there was an hon. member in the House who would be perfectly able to answer that part of the address when he had a fair opportunity; and such a fine scheme as that put forward was, perhaps, worthy of the serious attention of the hon. the Finance Minister. In criticising the finances of the country, the hon. member for South Norfolk seemed to reflect on the present Government for the superannuation scheme. That was a matter, of all others, that should not be imputed to the present Government. It was a scheme matured by one of the Finance Ministers of the late Government, and it became the law of the country before the present Government came into power; and, after having become the law, it was impossible to change it. The hon. member appeared also to find fault with the Government because the expenditure for pensions had been increased. It was true the pensions had increased, but that increase was due solely to the $50,000 which had been granted yearly to the veterans of 1812-13, and he was sure he had only to mention the fact to obtain the approval of hon. members for that increase. The hon. member for South Norfolk had censured the Finance Minister for not putting a stop to the extravagant expenditure when he saw that breakers were ahead. He stated, moreover, that the hon. Minister had prophesied, previous to the present Government taking office, that breakers were ahead, and that he was censurable for not having taken in sail after he came into office. It would be found, however, that there was such a volume of steam on the ship of state that it would take a longer time than Government had yet had for power to stay the vessel. It was also stated that the Opposition were bringing individual charges against the members of the present Government and their supporters, while those gentlemen, when in Opposition, brought general charges. It would, however, be remembered that the leader of the present Opposition had made a certain general charge against the present Government, particularly against the hon. the Minister of Public Works, having stated that it was only necessary to be a supporter of the Government in order to get as many contracts as any man desired, and it was only necessary to be a supporter of the Opposition in order to receive a refusal. As to individual charges, hon. gentlemen opposite brought forward the Goderich Harbour matter. The hon. member was not able to say there was anything wrong in regard to that contract, but said there were suspicious circumstances connected with it. The House had heard, since the debate commenced, that all the evidence necessary to condemn the Government for the Goderich Harbour contract was in the possession of hon. gentlemen opposite. If there were suspicious circumstances connected with the letting of that contract, was it not the duty of the hon. member for South Norfolk to have ascertained whether his suspicions had any foundation or not? It was not the duty of the Government, when suspicions were cast on them, to prove that they were without foundation; but it was the duty of the Opposition, when they made an accusation, to prove it. The hon. member had also referred to the suspicious circumstances connected with the purchase of land on the Kaministiquia, alleging that $500 per acre was too high a price. An investigation of the facts would show that $54,000 were paid for 105 acres of land, including buildings to the value of $9,000 or $10,000, thus reducing the price paid for the land to $45,000. Any hon. member owning land at Fort William, with its prospects of growth, would not sell an acre of land for $500, and a lot within the town plot could not be purchased for anything like that sum. If the Government would take fifty-four acres of that land and offer it for public sale, they would be recouped for every dollar paid for the 105 acres. Much had been said in regard to the Neebing Hotel; a property on that land. He did not propose to discuss the question of the buildings or land, for the hon. member for South Norfolk had a motion on the notice paper on that subject; but he was prepared to say that the Government could have their money recouped with interest if they would deed back the property to a certain company. If the price of the buildings and lot paid by the Government, with interest thereon, was not sufficient, the company would give a bonus of $500 in addition. That was no game of bluff, but the money was forthcoming to recoup the Government if they desired, for every dollar they had invested in the Neebing Hotel. The hon. member for South Norfolk had alleged that the Liberal party, when in Opposition, had never brought any specific charge against the Conservatives. In reply, he would refer to the charge brought by the hon. the Postmaster-General, when in opposition, relative to the Pacific Railway; that with respect to the Northern Railway; that with regard to the Secret Service money; and, if those were not specific charges, he did not know what the term implied. The hon. member for South Norfolk had stated that he would be sorry to bring emigrants to Canada unless they possessed sufficient money to go to the North-West and become settlers there, and that in every town and village in the Dominion were to be found hundreds of workmen in a state of starvation, asking for municipal aid. He read in the papers not very long ago that events occurred in various towns and cities in which the workmen exhibited anything but want of money, and that presents were made by them to the leader of the Opposition. That did not show they were in the depressed condition complained of. He had received a note since the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) commenced his speech, stating that there were two contractors for sections of the Pacific Railway in the city at the present time who are prepared to give $2 a day to all men who were willing and able to work.

MR. ORTON asked if the contractors were prepared to pay the transport of the men.

MR. OLIVER said he was not prepared to answer the question. He had no doubt the contractors were prepared to give every man who was willing and able to work $2 a day when he reached the place and commenced work, and would be willing to advance money to good men to enable them to proceed there. If men were now working in the lumber regions for $8 and $10 a month, would it not be wise for them to see those contractors and make arrangements to go out to that section of country, where they would not only earn a certain weekly sum, but obtain 160 acres of land for a homestead, and acquire a comfortable position in a few years? The hon. member for South Norfolk had censured the hon. member for South Brant for having stated that he thought, or suspected, the present party in Opposition were not sincere on the policy of Protection. There were ample grounds for this suspicion, however, and he would furnish the House with a single instance. It would be remembered that, about a year ago, the hon. the Minister of the Interior, who was an extreme Free-trader, was seeking re-election. The right hon. member for Kingston, and those who supported him, opposed the hon. gentleman's election; while, at the same time, they supported the present hon. member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island, who was also an extreme Free-trader. If the right hon. leader of the Opposition and his supporters were sincere in their desire to have a protective policy, it was their duty, not only to oppose the hon. member for Bothwell, but also the hon. member for Queen's, because both advocated extreme Free-trade views. That was one ground upon which the hon. member for South Brant rested his position. In regard to Protection, the hon. member for South Norfolk had stated that he desired coal, lumber and all other interests protected. The hon. member did not, however, accord with the present acting leader of the Opposition (Mr. Tupper), who had declared that, in revising the tariff, he would allow raw material to come in free of duty, while the hon. member for South Norfolk advocated a 75c. or $1.00 duty per ton on coal, and protection for lead, copper and iron. If those materials were protected, it would become necessary to follow up the whole system, and protect articles made out of those materials, with the result that the consumer would have the whole duties to pay. The hon. member for South Norfolk had spoken of the deficit of the present year, and intimated as much as that it was a very large one as compared with the deficits that had taken place in previous years. They found, however, that in 1858 the deficit was $3,375,317; 1859, $1,494,744; 1860, $1,973,989; 1861, $1,999,000; 1862, $2,064,331 and 1863, $870,490. Those were deficits that occurred when the late Government was in power, and they were large as compared with the deficits which had taken place since. Hon gentleman opposite had endeavoured to prove four or five propositions during the debate. They were: first, that a depression existed in the country; second, that Protection was required for manufactures; third, that products coming from the United States into Canada reduced the price of products raised in this country; and fourth, that Canadians paid the duty on grain exported from the Dominion. These were the propositions which hon. gentlemen opposite had endeavoured to prove since this discussion arose. First, he was free to admit that there was a depression in this country to a limited extent.

MR. BLANCHET: To a great extent.

MR. OLIVER said to a limited extent. They could go to the towns, to the villages, and to the cities, and they would find a considerable amount, but outside that they would not find the amount of depression which was supposed to exist. They could travel through the rural districts of this country and they would see more permanent improvements going on during the last three or four years, than had gone on for a dozen years previous to that time. They could go to some towns and to the villages and see more buildings being erected at the present time than had been erected for a number of years before.

MR. BLANCHET: They cannot find any tenants.

MR. OLIVER said these were marks of progress in the country. If they travelled through the whole country and examined the natural progress which was evident, they would come to the conclusion that we were making great advances.

MR. PLUMB: Notwithstanding, we have to pay a deficit.

MR. OLIVER said he need only refer to the monetary institutions of the country, which had been so severely condemned by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace), and he ventured to say there was more money lying at deposit, belonging to the people of this country, in the banks, in the building societies, and the Government Savings Banks than there ever was before.

MR. BLANCHET: It shows there is no confidence.

MR. OLIVER said there was more money lying waiting for investment in these monetary institutions than there ever was before, and that was a mark that the depression did not exist to such a large extent as was supposed. He had good authority for stating so. He had the authority of a gentleman who had been quoted by hon. gentleman opposite—he referred to the president of the Manufacturers' Association, a gentleman who was thoroughly conversant with the financial state of the country—that was Mr. Howland, of Toronto. Last October, when the manufacturers met in Toronto, he was the president of the organization, and in opening the meeting he made a speech—as presidents generally did—in which he said :—

"The main question for discussion by the Convention would be the depression of trade in Canada. Various reasons had been given for the depression, but it simply came to this, that some class or other could not pay their debts and were unable to secure fresh liabilities. Who were these people? The answer was very simple. They heard a good deal said about the fine crops this year, and that they were to put things right. Why, they had had as good crops for the last ten years, and the farmers were better off than they ever were before. The farmers were less in debt than in any previous year. The farmer certainly was not in a depressed condition, and so far as agricultural produce was concerned there was no question about it that this country had produce sufficient to make the best times they could desire if upon that the prosperity of the country depended."

He (Mr. Oliver) thought that was high authority, the authority of a gentleman who had been quoted on many occasions by the leaders of the Opposition, and one who was thoroughly posted in this particular branch of industry.

MR. PLUMB: Is he a farmer ?

MR. OLIVER said he (Mr. Howland) was a gentleman who dealt largely in farm products, a gentleman who, perhaps, bought and sold more of the products of the farm than any other single individual in this country. He had been given as good authority by gentlemen on the Opposition benches, and he (Mr. Oliver) had a right to quote him as such in reference to the prosperity of the farmers throughout the country. He therefore quoted that speech as a proof that the depression did not exist to so large an extent as was represented by hon. gentleman opposite. He (Mr. Oliver) held that the continual discussion in reference to the extraordinary depression which was supposed to exist was an injury to this country. When leading journals of the country stated, in their editorials, that the whole country was bankrupt, it was a very great injury to the commercial transactions of the country and retarded the settlement of the country. It would be better, if they possibly could, to give the exact state of the depression without exaggerating it in the slightest degree. The next proposition was that the manufacturers required more protection. Was there a single particle of proof before the House that the manufacturers required more protection? It was true that some of them had failed recently. Some boot and shoe manufacturers had failed with liabilities to the extent of $300,000 or $900,000. Was that in consequence of a want of protection?

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

MR. OLIVER said it was not in consequence of a want of protection, because there was a very small amount imported in that line of business. It was on account of something else, and that was, that the establishments were not conducted on true commercial principles. These manufacturing institutions which commenced without capital and without skill, and which had to draw upon the banks for what was required, were sure to go down in a short time. There was no proof that the manufacturers of this country required more protection: They had had an opportunity two Sessions ago, when it was stated that they were in a deplorable condition and were becoming bankrupt one after another, to prove before the House, or before a Committee of the House, that they required more protection; but they failed to do it, and they refused to answer the questions which were put to them at that time in regard to the matter.

Mr. BLANCHET: Does the mining industry require protection, and does the agricultural industry require protection?

Mr. OLIVER said there was no proof that the manufacturers required protection, and the export of manufactured goods was a very good criterion by which to judge of the prosperity of those institutions. In 1873, the exports amounted to $2,389,433, and in 1877 they were $4,681,759, an increase in three years of one hundred per cent. That was a very good index to the prosperity of the manufacturers of this country. They had also before them the resolution which had been referred to as having been passed by the Dominion Board of Trade, stating that 17½ per cent. was quite enough protection for the manufacturing institutions of this country. It must be recollected that the Board of Trade of to-day was not the same as it was a few years ago. It would be remembered that, by the Bill passed by his hon. friend from Hamilton, enabling Boards of Trade to be established in various districts, and under a subsequent Bill of the Government, Boards of Trade had sprung up in many districts outside of the cities. Before that they were generally representatives of cities. The Boards of Trade were composed of gentlemen who were manufacturers and merchants, and surely they were gentlemen who of all others ought to know whether the manufacturing interests were sufficiently protected or not. He had here one of the most valuable papers printed in the Dominion—the Hamilton Evening Times—which was, to a limited extent, a paper supporting Protection views.

Mr. PLUMB: A very limited extent.

Mr. OLIVER said that, last fall, that paper issued a supplement proving to the people of Canada that the manufacturers of Hamilton had prospered more than any other manufacturers in the world. The paper mentioned Gurney's, Copp's, and other stove factories, and showed the rapid increase each of these manufacturing industries had made. He had a few figures taken from the Census returns of 1871, which was the only document that he could find which would give them an insight into the manufacturing industries of the country, which gave the amount of capital invested, the cost of the raw material, the wages paid every year, and the value of the article produced. He would read to the House a few of these. In the broom and brush factories in this country, the interest, at eight per cent. on the investment, with the raw material and labour, was $356,317 a year at that time, and the value of the article produced was $528,665—a net profit of $172,248 or forty per cent. on the investment. In the cabinet-ware and furniture lines, the interest on the investment at the same rate with raw material and cost of labour, was $2,767,209, and the value of the article produced was $3,580,978—a net profit of $813,769 or twenty-nine per cent. Then they had leather of all kinds. On that the interest at eight per cent. upon the investment, with the raw material and wages, amounted to $6,984,846.

Mr. PLUMB: May I ask the hon. gentleman what year that was?

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. OLIVER said it was 1870. He was giving the figures that appeared in the Census—which were the only official figures which had any reference to the manufacturing industries of the country. On leather of all kinds the amount, as he had said, was $6,984,846, and the value of the article produced was $9,184,932, a net profit of $2,200,084, or thirty-one per cent. In agricultural implements, eight per cent. upon the money invested, with the raw material and cost of labour, amounted to $1,834,400, and the value of the article produced to $2,685,393, showing a net profit of $850,993, or forty-six per cent. And he called the attention of the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) to the fact that he (Mr. Oliver) had a large factory of this kind in operation within the boundaries of his own county, one of the largest factories in the west, and last year it had declared a dividend of thirty per cent., being a joint stock company, and a few days ago it had declared a dividend of twenty-eight per cent.

MR. PLUMB: I would like to get some stock.

MR. HAGGART: What business?

MR. OLIVER said that factory was presided over by one of the cleverest men, one of the most practical manufacturers they had in the west; a man who appeared before the Board of Trade at the last meeting and discussed the trade question in such a manner as to carry conviction even to some of those who favoured protection in the past. Then let them take breweries—that much abused interest. In breweries, eight per cent. on the investment, with the raw material and wages, amounted to $1,328,614, and the value of the material produced amounted to $2,141,229, showing a net profit of $812,615, or sixty-two per cent., which was a very handsome profit. Taking the whole industries in the Province of Ontario, the total value of the articles produced was $114,706,799; the capital invested at eight per cent. amounted to $3,029,920 yearly; wages to $21,415,710, and the cost of the raw material to $65,114,808; in all amounting to $89,560,430—a net profit of $25,146,361 or twenty-eight per cent. In the Province of Quebec, the gross figures were these: the interest on capital, with the yearly wages and raw material, amounted to $59,191,447, and the article produced was valued, according to their own statement, at $77,205,182—a net profit of $18,014,735 or twenty-four per cent. And were not these figures sufficient to convince the people of this country that the manufacturers had sufficient protection? Was there any hon. gentleman here who could show that seventeen and a-half per cent. was not sufficient protection? He could give them an instance of what took place in Oshawa the other day. There was an agricultural manufacturing establishment there which required a large amount of malleable iron. They went to Buffalo to see what they could purchase it for there, and they came back to the malleable iron works in Oshawa, and, when they added the duty to the expense of bringing the iron to Oshawa, they found that they could purchase the Oshawa iron at the same figure that they could the Buffalo iron. They bought $10,000 worth from time to time and paid $1,750 more than they could have bought the iron for in Buffalo, taking the duty off. It thus appeared that the Buffalo manufacturers manufactured $10,000 worth of iron cheaper than the Oshawa manufacturer by $1,750, and the result was that the Government of this country lost the duty. The $1,750 was not paid into the public Treasury, but into the pockets of the manufacturer in Oshawa. If it had been paid into the Treasury, the whole people of this country would have had the benefit of it, but, as it was, the manufacturers of Oshawa alone got the benefit of this protection. He did not intend to say that the protection was too much, but he wished to prove that there was sufficient protection to enable the manufacturers of this country to manufacture to advantage. He alleged that labour was as cheap here, that everything which entered into the manufacturing establishments as raw material was as cheap here as on the other side, and, if they came to the conclusion of hon. gentlemen opposite, labour must be cheaper here, because they said our labouring men were moving to the other side. If labour and material and everything connected with the manufacturing of iron in this country were less than in Buffalo, would not $1,750 be a sufficient protection for the manufacturer in regard to $10,000 worth of goods?

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READING.

The following Bills were severally read the second time:—

Bill (No. 27) Respecting the Northern Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Cook.)

Bill (No. 28) To revive and amend the Act incorporating the Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Seriver.)

(Mr. Burk.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he begged to call attention to this Bill, which was a very short one, containing only one clause. It would be remembered, perhaps, by the hon. the Premier that, last year, he (Mr. Gibbs) had introduced a Bill of somewhat the same nature and character, to which exception was taken by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) and the then Minister of Justice, and also by the leader of the Opposition. This Bill provided that this harbour property might be sold to any purchaser or purchasers. Now, he apprehended that a good deal of attention would be attracted to this Bill by parties more immediately connected with it and resident at Whitby, which was one of the harbours comprised in the constituency he had the honour to represent in Parliament. Objection had been taken to his Bill last year that it was not in the interests of the public that property of this kind should pass into the hands of private individuals. He thought that the exception was well taken at the time, and, without hesitation, after he had heard the argument of the then Minister of Justice, he yielded to the objection made, and had the Bill modified in the direction pointed out. He merely called the attention of the Government to the same provision in this Bill. He did not know whether any opposition would be offered to it, but he thought that, in the public interest, the hon. the Premier would pardon him for directing attention to this matter.

MR. MACKENZIE said that his attention had been directed to this Bill before it came up for the second reading, and also to the opinion given to the Local Legislature by the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench in this relation. This Bill was, in fact, rendered necessary by a clause contained in the will of Mr. Draper, the gentleman who bought this harbour some years ago, and who paid the Government a large sum of money for it. A small sum was still due to the Government, and the opinion of the Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench was that, as this Government and Parliament had the sole control of harbours, it was not competent even in a matter affecting the property and civil rights as they were understood in the Constitutional Act, for the Local Legislature to give the legislation required by the will. It was on this account that the parties interested had come here to seek legislation. He saw the Bill before it was formally read the first time, and he had informed the gentleman in charge of it that, of course, the Government would have to examine it with more care after it was read the second time, and before they could allow it to pass. Nevertheless, he was obliged to the hon. gentleman for calling his attention to it now. The Bill would be read the second time and referred to the Committee on Private Bills, where they would see it was in conformity with what the law required and, at the same time, respect the private rights which were involved in the transaction.

Bill read the second time.

CANADA AGRICULTURAL INSURANCE COMPANY BILL.—[BILL No. 29.]

(Mr. Kerr.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. WOOD said he would like to have the Bill explained. It was a very important Bill, and the House was not in possession of the reasons why it was introduced.

Mr. KERR said that the object of the Bill was rather apparent, he should judge, from the wording of the Bill. It was intended to enable the company to wind up its own affairs, voluntarily, and save as much as was possible for the creditors of the company and the shareholders, as any hon. gentleman might learn. Not only had this company suffered from losses, but more especially on account of the gross irregularities—he might almost say rascalities—committed by the late president and managing director, and, consequently, the company's affairs had become so involved that it was unable to carry on its operations. As soon as these irregularities were discovered, the company appointed a competent auditor to make a thorough examination into the actual state of its affairs; and on this report, after careful and full examination, the shareholders unanimously resolved to wind up the affairs of the company and to apply to the House at this Session for liberty to do so. It was further provided in the Bill that its affairs should be wound up by two valuers, Mr. Ross and Mr. Fish, two very competent men, in order to save the loss and destruction of assets which almost always occurred, more or less, when concerns of this kind, as well as private estates, were wound up under the Insolvency Act. Ample opportunity for further explanation would be afforded before the Committee if such were required.

Mr. PALMER said that one point contained in the Bill was rather novel. He did not wish to throw the slightest obstacle in the way of the Bill, but he observed that it provided that the affairs of the company should be administered by persons who were appointed by the stockholders, and not by the creditors, who were really the persons who were interested in the matter. This, of course, was a principle entirely opposed to the principle of the Insolvency Act or of the administration of assets. He thought that this would probably be a rather vicious principle in legislation. He did not doubt but that his hon. friend was entirely right, and that the two persons mentioned would be very likely to administer the company's affairs very much better than the creditors themselves; but still he thought that legislation of this kind ought not to take place without the consent of the creditors themselves.

Mr. CARON said it would be necessary to explain whether all the stockholders were on a footing of equality; whether all the calls had been paid up; and whether there were different classes of stockholders. Some shareholders might have paid up from 20 to 25 per cent., and others only 10; and, of course, the latter would be in a very much better position in the winding-up of the company than the former. Distinction should be made between these two classes of stockholders, and, before the Bill was submitted for the last reading, he should like to know exactly how the matter stood.

Mr. KERR said he understood that the object of the Bill was to place the creditors on an equitable footing.

Mr. POULIOT said that the losses of the company had been very heavy. He thought that all the shareholders should be on the same footing.

Mr. LANTHIER said he saw nothing at all in the Bill providing for the protection of those who were insured in the company, and whose policies were still unexpired. He believed that something should be done for their relief.

Bill real the second time.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

DEBATE RESUMED.

House resumed the debate on Mr Cartwright's proposed motion to go again into Committee of Supply.

MR. OLIVER said that, when the Speaker left the Chair at six o'clock, he had finished one particular branch of his subject, in which he had proved that the manufacturers of this country did not require any more protection than they already had. As he had stated in his opening remarks, the proposition was made by hon. gentlemen sitting on the Opposition benches that the manufacturers did require more protection; and it was for them to prove that this was really the case. He had endeavoured, to the best of his ability, to prove, and, he believed, that he had been successful in proving, that the manufacturers did not require any more protection than they now had. He might say that it was nothing but natural that the manufacturers should ask for more protection. It was human nature to do so. It was human nature, no matter how fast we were making money, to wish to make more, and all classes of the community felt the same on this subject. It did not matter how fast we were making money: the faster we were making it, the more we desired to make it. If they viewed the manufacturers, not only in their own establishments, but also if they followed them to their mansions and saw their surroundings and everything connected with their establishments, they would come to the conclusion that the manufacturers did not require any more protection, though they asked for more. This could not be denied, and they had adopted various schemes for the purpose of securing that protection. The manufacturers well knew that it was impossible for them to get protection without securing the co-operation of the people of the rural districts; and their aim had been to endeavour to bring about a state of public feeling throughout the length and breadth of the country in favour of protection for all classes. They had sent, during the last summer, a gentleman through the country to try and organize manufacturers' boards or manufacturers' committees in every section, so as to create public feeling in its favour in each of these sections; but he was happy to say that this gentleman had been very unsuccessful in his operations. After having spent about six or eight weeks through the country, that gentleman had succeeded in securing about fifty delegates, who met in convention in the city of Toronto during the latter part of October; and now, the last plan that the manufacturers had adopted was to secure the services of the right hon. gentleman from Kingston and the gentlemen who followed that hon. gentleman, to create a public feeling in the country in this respect. The manufacturers thought that, if they could get a distinguished gentleman like the hon. member who represented Kingston, and the hon. gentleman who represented Niagara, and others, to hold public meetings throughout the length and breadth of the country, they would be able to create a public feeling in the country in this regard, and bring pressure to bear on this Legislature, so as to obtain further protection. He wished to say, however, that, in the rural districts, the farmers and those who were interested in the pursuit of agriculture, were too intelligent to permit of that plan succeeding. The agriculturists knew what was good for them. They were too intelligent to be led away by any such statement. One of the arguments that was used by the advocates of Protection, was this: "If you give us protection, we will not increase the price of the goods that we make." This was one of the statements made at one of those public gatherings. Now, was there any sane person in this country that could believe such a statement as this? What was the object of asking for protection, except to obtain higher prices? Would the reduction of duties on goods that we imported not decrease the prices of these goods? And was it not illogical to come to the conclusion that the addition of taxes on such goods would not increase the prices of the goods so affected? We had proof positive that this would not be the case. We had had, and we had still, an industry in this country that was for many years largely protected. He referred to the manufacture of coal oil. He would like to know whether, after this interest had got protection, and sufficient protection to exclude American oil from this market, these manufacturers had not increased the price of their oil? This was the case, and they increased the price of the oil as soon as ever they secured the protection to a very large extent; and as soon as that protection was taken off from coal oil the price of it immediately came down. He had an extract, which he had taken from a public document that was issued in Washington, with reference to the prices of goods in 1860 and 1870. He would give the figures, which were as follows:—

“In 1860, 100 bushels of western corn would buy 23 barrels of corn meal, and in 1870 it would purchase only 22 barrels. In 1860, 100 barrels of hives would buy something over thirteen pairs of men’s boots, and in 1870, only six and a half pairs; in 1860, 100lb. of Kentucky tobacco would buy 50lb. of manufactured tobacco, and in 1870, only 22lb. In 1860, 100lb. of Saxony wool would buy 37½ yards of cloth, and in 1870 only 24 yards. In 1860, 100lb. of merino fleece would buy 14½ pairs of blankets, in 1870, 8½ pairs. In 1860, 100lb. of common wool would buy 41½ yards of carpet, and in 1870 only 35½.”

He thought that these figures were quite sufficient to convince any one that, if the manufacturers of any country could secure protection, they would increase the prices of their goods. It was nothing but natural that, this should be done, and anyone who was carrying on business in any country would not be conducting it according to true commercial principles unless he did increase the price of his goods when opportunity for doing so presented itself. He had another extract which he had taken from a speech that was recently delivered by the President of the Grangers’ Association in the Western States. It was as follows:—

hoe made in Pennsylvania without protection. He would buy as good a hoe from Sheffield for half the money.”

These were the figures; and he thought that they were sufficient to convince any one that further protection would increase the price of manufactured goods in this country. Before he passed from this subject, he might state that, in the speeches which had been delivered during the recess by gentlemen who held protective views, one class of the community had been forgotten. These gentlemen professed to advocate a policy of Protection for miners, for manufacturers, for farmers, and for almost every other person in the community; but there was one class—the labouring class of this country—which had been forgotten, and there was to be no protection for them. If a duty of one dollar per ton were put upon coal, it would increase the cost of fire to the labouring man as well as to the rich man. There was no word of protection for the labouring class. They knew that, when manufactures became numerous, they drew labour from other countries, and that the pay of the labourer or the workingman was regulated according to demand and supply, and, if a large number of the working class came into this country, in consequence of the increasing manufactures of this country, then the wages of the labouring man would be decreased instead of increased; so that there was no Protection foreshadowed in the policy of the gentlemen opposite for the labouring classes. He was glad to learn that the policy of the Opposition was fairly defined, at all events to some extent, although there seemed to be various opinions on the Opposition benches with regard to Protection. One of the leaders of the Opposition, the hon. member for Cumberland, (Mr. Tupper) desired to have raw materials allowed into this country free of duty, with the exception of coal for manufacturing purposes. And the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) desired to protect coal, iron, lead and copper—everything that came from the mines, from the farm, from any manufacturing institution in the country

There was a great difference of opinion existing in the Opposition ranks with respect to what protection should be given. He saw, by statements of the right hon. member for Kingston, that the protection which he foreshadowed was to have Canada for the Canadians. This reminded him of Robinson Crusoe on the island. He had the island to himself, raised his own produce, manufactured his own materials, and that appeared to be the policy of the gentlemen of the Opposition. If Canada was to be for Canadians, what was the good of the head of the Department of Marine and Fisheries establishing lighthouses throughout the length and breadth of the coast, so as to provide for the safe navigation of our waters; of spending enormous sums of money, and taxing the people of this country for these enormous works? If Canada was to be kept for Canadians, the fewer of these public works the better. The next part of his subject was the other proposition which gentlemen opposite endeavoured to prove: that the importation of American produce reduced the prices of Canadian grain. This proposition had been made on the floor of the House and outside the House. It had been made that afternoon by the member for South Norfolk, and time and again during the recess. Was there any proof that such was the case? He believed it had been laid down by writers on political economy that, when the surplus raised in a country over consumption was exported to a foreign market, and there sold, the price obtained in such market regulated the price obtainable at home. That was the correct principle as laid down by writers on political economy. If that was the case, there was not one product in this country that could be affected in the slightest degree in this way. For instance, he would take the article of cheese, which was produced in this country and shipped, to a very large extent, to the mother country; he believed the export had reached the enormous amount of five to six million dollars, according to the last Trade and Navigation Returns. Cheese was protected in this country—not a single pound of American cheese had been imported into the Dominion.

MR. OLIVER.

A very large amount had been shipped to England within the last four years; it had come into competition with cheese manufactured in the United States, and the prices realized in England established the prices obtained in Canada. Wheat had been largely exported from the American States, and from Russia and other countries to Great Britain. He believed that England, as a rule, was the only country that did not raise a sufficient amount of breadstuffs for the consumption of her own people, and into England flowed the surplus of the balance of the world. Canada, as a rule, sent four to five millions of bushels annually, and the United States twenty-five millions of bushels annually. Thus our four millions of bushels came into competition with their twenty-five millions, and if of equal quality obtained the same price, and the price obtained regulated the price here. If the whole twenty-five millions of bushels were drawn through Canadian ships, viâ the St. Lawrence, it would not decrease or increase the price of wheat in our market. The surplus wheat of all the countries had to flow into England, our small amount, with the rest, to be sold in the English market, and the prices there realized regulated the prices throughout the length and breadth of the world. What was the first thing that the commission merchant or the miller did in the morning? He referred to his despatches concerning the English market. He received a cable despatch twice a day from Liverpool, and on that he based the prices for the home market. The price in England regulated the price in Canada. The next product he would refer to was oats. His hon. friend from South Norfolk stated that bringing in oats from the United States reduced the price of Canadian oats. This also was a fallacy. The same arguments which applied to wheat applied also to oats; about two-thirds of the Canadian export of oats went to the English market and one-third to the United States market. It was true that Canadians were importing oats this year and last year, but they were imported for the purpose of reshipment to the English market. A general statement had been made that the Americans were flooding the Canadian market with their products; this was a fallacy and a misstatement. Americans did not flood our markets with their products, but Canadians went to American markets, purchased their products, and brought them into our market. The policy advocated by the hon. gentlemen opposite would prevent Canadians from purchasing in American markets for the purpose of realizing a profit. Another statement of the hon. gentlemen opposite, to which he wished to refer, was that we paid a duty upon our products going into the United States. This statement he had frequently met with in speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite on the floor of the House, and many times during recess; that we were hewers of wood and drawers of water for the people of the American States, was the favourite expression used. If the Americans were flooding our markets with their manufactured goods, selling them so low that our manufacturers could not compete with them, he would reverse the position, and say that the Americans were hewers of wood and drawers of water for the people of Canada. There was one argument to be derived from the importation of corn into this country, that, when there was not enough raised in any one country for its own consumption, an import duty upon that commodity would increase its price in that country. Canada did not raise a sufficient quantity of corn for the consumption of its people. An import duty, say of ten cents per bushel on corn, would increase the price, not only of American corn imported into, but also of Canadian corn raised in, this country, which proved that the Americans did not pay the duty on corn imported by Canada. If an import duty of ten cents per bushel were put on corn imported into Canada, it would not raise the price of corn in Chicago one cent per bushel. The same rule applied to wheat going into England, which country required one hundred million bushels more than it could raise; and, if an import duty were put upon wheat imported into the English market, it would increase the price both of foreign wheat and of wheat raised in that country, and the consumer, and not the exporter, would have to pay the duty. The same statement referred more particularly to barley. Gentlemen of the Opposition said that Canada paid fifteen cents per bushel on barley. The Americans did not raise a sufficient quantity of barley for their own consumption and required ten millions of bushels from Canada. If the duty were taken off Canadian barley, in place of increasing Canadian barley, it would reduce American barley. He was glad to state that our producers had got another consumer for this commodity. He had been told that this year Canada had exported about three millions of bushels to the English market. Purchasers in Canada for this market came directly into competition with purchasers for the American market. The English purchasers paid the same price for our barley, thereby proving that the Americans themselves paid the duties on barley going into their own country. Commission merchants, who were now shipping large quantities to New York in bond, for English brewers and maltsters, came into direct competition with the American purchasers, and whoever paid the highest price got the barley. If the English purchaser got it, it went through in bond to the English market. There was another strong argument: it did not matter what the duty was, the consumer at all times paid it. The American and the Canadian merchants competed with each other in the English market, purchasing goods, the one subject to a tariff of 35 per cent., and the other to tariff of 17½ per cent. He would ask hon. gentlemen opposite whether the English merchant discriminated between these two purchasers? Did he ask either the tariff which would be imposed on his purchases? Would he say to the American that he would reduce the selling price 35 per cent., the amount of duty he would have to pay, and to the Canadian, that he would take 17½ per cent. off his purchases for a similar reason? No; he sold to both at the same price, and the duty was paid by the purchaser; and, in the end, he who wore or consumed the goods had to pay the duty. There was another view to be taken of the import duty on wheat. There were mills in Canada running twenty-four hours a day which could not be supplied with Canadian wheat, and oatmeal mills which could not be supplied with oats for manufacturing purposes. There was one in his own county which manufactured a thousand bushels of oats every day. It was impossible for those mills to obtain in Canada a sufficient quantity to keep them going twenty-four hours every day, and a portion of their supply had to be taken from the Western States. There were mills on the Welland Canal, at Goderich, Guelph, Galt, and other sections of the country, which, if unable to get western wheat, would be compelled to run a third of the time, which would have a very injurious effect on the Canadian market. These millers had local agents in all the Canadian markets, and, if they were deprived of the privilege of going to the Western States to supplement the grain bought in this country, their institutions would be seriously crippled, and unable to produce any such large quantities as they did at present. It would be the means of causing them to withdraw their agents, the local buyers, out of the local market. Every one knew what effect this would have on the local trade. When there were many buyers, the farmer obtained the worth of his produce, but, when the number of buyers was small, the farmer had to sell his produce for less than its worth. There was another statement with reference to corn. This question had been discussed so often and so well that he need scarcely refer to it; but the corn imported into this country was used for feed as well as other purposes, and if a duty were put on corn imported it would have the result of increasing its price in Canada, and not decreasing it in the Western States. Stock was another thing which it was desired to protect. He need not say that, in the older Provinces, the amount of stock imported was very small, the great bulk being imported into the newer Provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia. At present, there was a ten per cent. duty on imports of stock. All desired to see these two sections of the Dominion, into which a large number of Canadian and of our fellow subjects from across the Atlantic were at present going, settled as rapidly as possible. An extra duty of ten per cent. on stock going into these Provinces would have to be borne by settlers, and would retard the settlement of that country. There were one or two things to which he would refer, before passing on to figures in relation to the finances of the Dominion, and these were a statement made by his hon. friend the member for Cumberland, and one by his hon. friend from Cardwell. They both advocated a discriminating duty on tea coming in viâ the United States. Previous to the present Government coming into power, there was a discriminating duty of ten per cent. on tea viâ the United States. When the present Government came into power, and revised the tariff in 1874, this ten per cent. duty was cancelled, and since then tea had come in from the United States on similar terms with other countries. The Opposition desired to have this discriminating duty replaced. Canada imported about from five to six million dollars worth of tea every year, and, if a discriminating duty were levied upon tea viâ the United States, it would increase its cost and also the cost of that coming in by the St. Lawrence, ten per cent., and in all probability have the result, as expected, of getting the whole of the tea consumed in the Dominion by the St. Lawrence, except the amount bonded through viâ California on the Pacific Railway to Canada. The whole amount would come by the St. Lawrence, and pass through the hands of five or six merchants of Montreal, into whose pockets the ten per cent. would go, and not into the public Treasury. He was glad the hon. gentlemen opposite had given their views on the subject; it was well the House and the country should know that they desired to tax the people six hundred thousand dollars a year, for the purpose of benefitting five or six merchants in Montreal. It was well the people should know that they desired to create monopolies in this country, and that five or six hundred thousand dollars per year would be taken out of the pockets of the people and given to five or six merchants in Montreal. Another subject advocated by the Opposition, was an increase of the duty on sugar. It was predicted some years ago, when the Finance Minister refused to increase the duty on sugar, that the refineries would cease, and the Americans would raise the price of sugar. That prediction had not come to pass. There never was a time when sugar was cheaper than it was at present. What was the demand made by these refineries? It amounted simply to this: that, as American manufacturers had a drawback from their Government on all refined sugars exported by them into this country as well as elsewhere, the Canadian Government should impose an increase of duty on sugar coming from the United States, of one cent per pound. Last year, the consumption of sugar in Canada amounted to 112,000,000 pounds; according to last returns, 93,000,000 pounds for 1876-7—an average of 100,000,000 pounds. What would the people be paying to those refineries in Halifax and Montreal, if the Government adopted this policy? It was well the people should know they would be taxed one million dollars per year to keep up those two manufacturing establishments, with their five hundred employees and half-a-dozen directly interested in the business. They said there was no profit in it. He referred them to the refinery of Mr. Redpath, Montreal, which had only been twenty years in operation, and the parties who went into it had realized colossal fortunes, and they desired that the people should be taxed as much as one million dollars per year to support these establishments. There was a very remarkable statement made by the hon. member for Cumberland, and also by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Robinson), with reference to the destruction of the English market by the importation into England of American goods; that all the manufactories of cotton, in England, were being destroyed because American manufacturers were pouring goods into that country. Another statement was that the Free-trade policy of England was destroying its export trade. He would read an extract from the Trade and Navigation Returns of England, which conveyed very different information. The extract was given in the New York Evening Post, with reference to the importation of English goods into the American market. The extract stated:

“During the eight months ending 31st August last year, the export of cotton goods to this country (the United States), from the United Kingdom of Great Britain, increased to 44,562,000 yards as compared with 40,109,600 yards the previous year, an increase of 4,452,400 yards in eight months.”

Did that show that the Americans were flooding the English markets with their cotton. With regard to the statement referring to the destruction of the export trade of England on account of Free-trade, he would quote additional figures. The exports of England in 1822 were £37,000,000; in 1842, during twenty years of peace and protection, it increased only some £11,000,000, or to the amount of £48,000,000 in 1842; from 1842 to 1853, under partial protection, it increased to £93,000,000; from 1853 to 1875, under Free-trade, it amounted to the enormous amount of £223,000,000; beside £58,000,000 of exports, the products of other countries. This was a conclusive answer to the statement made by hon. gentlemen opposite that the English export trade was diminished or injured in the slightest degree under Free-trade. It proved, on the contrary, that the export trade was improved, and that the Americans were not, to any great extent, flooding the English market with their goods. He desired to say a few words, particularly, with reference to the Budget speech. His hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy) had stated that the present Administration desired to fix the responsibility of increasing the debt upon the late Government. He did not believe that was really the case. He knew that his hon. friend had delivered himself at Cobourg, and had stated there that the debt, when the present Government came into power, was $22.50 per head, and that it had increased to $37.93 per head. What was the inference to be drawn from that statement? Did he wish to convey the idea to the people that the Government had recklessly and without cause increased the public debt from $22.50 to $37.93 per head since they came into power? What was the inference to be drawn from that statement? That he was trying to fix the responsibility on the Government, and he should be the last man who should say the Government was trying to fix it on the Opposition. The Government merely defended itself against the attacks of the Opposition. But did the hon. member state a fact when he stated that the debt was $22.50 per head when the present Government came into power? Any one who would take the Public Accounts could see for himself that the debt was then $27.81 per head—a difference of over six dollars. Where did the hon. gentleman get his figures,—from the Public Accounts or from that pamphlet which had been circulated throughout the length and breadth of the country? Was it the duty of a public man to take an insufficient basis for his figures; to make statements of which he was not sure? Was that a means by which to educate the people of this country in politics? He had made a statement at Cobourg which was not correct, and, if he were an honourable man, he would return to Cobourg, the first opportunity he found, and tell the people there that he had made a mistake of $6.43 per head when he addressed them respecting the public debt. It had been to fix upon the Government that they were the cause of the increase of the public debt. Was it a fact that the present Government had increased without sufficient reason the public debt of the people of this country? The debt from 1867 to 1873-4 had increased to $32,693,394. He did not say this money had been improperly expended except on one item. It had been said by a colleague of the late Government that eight millions of that money had been improperly expended on the Intercolonial Railway, without any good purpose, and might as well have been thrown into the Atlantic. This gentleman had been a member of the late Government, and should have known whether the money was properly expended or not. The debt had been increased since 1873-4 by $24,883,738, according to figures in the Public Accounts. To what purposes had that increase been applied? They knew that the Intercolonial Railway had been finished since the present Government came into power, that the Government was improving inland navigation, had completed the Prince Edward Island Railway, and were building the Pacific Railway, and completing the surveys as fast as possible. It was not the case, as the hon. gentleman had alleged, that the policy of the Opposition was now being carried out in the constructions of the railway, that the time desired by the Opposition was the time fixed for the completion of the railway. But it was in consequence of the foolish bargain of their predecessors that the Government were allowed to build the road in a limited number of years, and they knew that any Government had to carry out in good faith the acts and obligations of its predecessors. They knew that even in municipal councils they had to carry out the obligations and the contracts entered into by their predecessors; and this Government had to do the same. He was not saying that all those undertakings which their predecessors had left to them were foolish; he might say that a great majority of them were works in the public interest. The improvement of navigation and the railway between here and Manitoba were matters of the deepest interest; and, if they ever desired to see the country in the position it ought to be, that railroad to this prairie Province would have to be carried out, and that territory would, in the course of time, be the stronghold of the Dominion. It was the largest undeveloped and unsettled country that we knew of, at the present time, upon the face of the earth; it was an outlet not only for the people of Canada, but for other countries; and it was to be hoped that England would be able to reproduce herself on this continent; that a great power in connection with England would be built up in this Dominion; and it was necessary that these four or five hundred miles of railway should be constructed as fast as possible to provide facilities for people to settle in that country. He had stated that these were laudable objects, and he held that the Opposition ought not to condemn the Government for carrying out obligations which, had the Opposition been on the Treasury benches, they must have carried out themselves. If there had been one single undertaking entered into by the present Government that they were not obliged to enter into, he should be one of the first to say that they had done wrong. His hon. friend the member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy) stated that the total debt of the country in 1873-4 was $22.50 per head instead of $27.81, and to-day, according to the Public Accounts, it was $33.30 in place of $36, as stated by him last year. A gentleman who held the high position the hon. member held, who represented an intelligent constituency and held an important position in this House, ought to be careful when he was quoting figures from the Public Accounts. His speech showed conclusively to him (Mr. Oliver) that the hon. gentleman did not understand in the least degree the tables he was examining, unless it was McPherson's book he was looking over. Another wonderful statement that gentleman made was in a speech of his to the people of Cobourg, where he stated that the whole taxes levied on the people of this country in 1870 was $3.50 per head. He (Mr. Oliver) had made a calculation with reference to the year 1870, and he would ask the hon. gentleman—who he was sorry was not in his place—why he took 1870? Why did he not go back to 1867? He might just as well. Why did he not take 1873-4, or 1872, or some other year in place of 1870, when making a comparison between the expenditure of the two Governments? The expenditure of the country had been raised from 1870 to 1873-4 by $3,000,000. It was $15,000,000 in 1870, and it was over $23,000,000 in 1873-4. Taking 1870, under these circumstances, showed a desire on the part of the hon. gentleman to convey a false impression to the people of the country—for he would not accuse him of ignorance; he must have known that the expenditure of the country had increased between those years, from $15,000,000 to $23,000,000. The hon. gentleman went to the Cobourg pic-nic, and there stated that expenditure of the late Government was $3.50, when they went out of power, and that that was the highest expenditure the late Government had ever made. This was stated evidently for the purpose of creating a false impression in the minds of the people, for in place of $3.50 it was $5.83 when the late Government went out of power. He (Mr. Oliver) meant the whole taxation, the whole disbursements of the Government, because he held that the whole expenditure of the country was a tax upon some part of the people. The taxation per head, then, was $5.83 in 1873-4, and what was it to-day? $5.84; one cent increase in four years. He said, again, there was not the slightest necessity for the hon. member for Cardwell making such a statement, and he trusted the hon. gentleman would take an early opportunity of correcting the false impressions he had conveyed. The expenditure in 1867-8, as had been stated in this House, was $13,486,092, and in 1873-4 it was $23,316,316. This was an increase of $9,830,224; while, during the three years' reign of the present Government it had only increased $202,000. He thought this spoke well for the Government of the day, and that it was a convincing proof that, considering the reckless extravagance which prevailed when they went into office, they had done well in keeping the public expenditure equal to what it was in 1873-4. In the account for interest, management of public debt, and subsidies to the Provinces the increase from 1867 to 1873-4 was $2,285,808; the increase since that time was $1,233,528. He was now speaking of that part of the Public Accounts which was supposed to be uncontrollable, and which was uncontrollable; and it did not matter what Government was in power, these items would still go on increasing. He next came to the question of interest. In 1867 the interest amounted to $4,098,523, and it had increased in 1873-4 by $1,454,005; and in 1876-7 by $931,199. That increase was in consequence of the borrowing of that money which he referred to a short time ago, and which had to be paid. He was rather amused at his hon. friend the member for Cardwell when he got into the tables of interests. He was in the right church, but in the wrong pew; he was in the interest table, but in the wrong table. Anyone who looked at the table from which the hon. gentleman quoted would find a large amount of public debt without any interest being payable upon it, and there were assets there, too, that did not bear interest, and this table was not the proper table to quote the interest from, but the table following. And, more than that, the hon. gentleman said that the present Government and the present Minister of Finance were not entitled to any credit for reducing the percentage of interest, because the Canadian people could offer more security for borrowed money now than in the past. While the hon. gentleman's party was in power, they had surpluses, and they boasted of surpluses almost every year, so that the country must have been as good then as it was now. And we were told that they had the best Finance Ministers that ever blessed any country: Sir Francis Hincks, Sir John Rose, Sir Alexander Galt, and Lieutenant-Governor Tilley, all eminent men; while here was the gentleman who now controlled the finances of the country—an incapable. The hon. the Minister of Finance was termed by gentlemen opposite an incapable—one who admitted that he was not able to deal with the finances of the country. The Conservatives had the greatest men who ever lived to manage the finances of the country before 1873-4, and yet they failed to do that which this incapable Finance Minister had done since— and this was to reduce the rate of interest. This was a proof beyond dispute that the present Minister was not an incapable. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) laughed, and made a very small thing of this reduction of the percentage of interest. Let them see what it would amount to. The average rate of interest paid from 1867 to 1874 was $5.38 per hundred dollars, and the average interest since that time was $4.84, a difference of 54 cents on one hundred dollars, or a difference upon the debt of $133,000,000 or $718,000 a year. That was a very large saving for the country to be brought about by this incapable Minister of Finance, after having been unsuccessfully tried by those eminent Finance Ministers who had gone before him. The lowest interest paid by the late Government was $5.23, and by the present Government $4.74, or a reduction of 49 cents upon every hundred dollars, and this upon $133,000,000 would be a difference of $650,000 a year. And yet these gentlemen on the Opposition benches would go before the people of the country and say to them that the present Minister of Finance was an incapable. But his works would speak for him— would speak louder than those statements made by gentlemen on the Opposition benches. He (Mr. Oliver) hoped the hon. the member for Cardwell, the next time he took upon himself to investigate the Public Accounts, would not pursue the same course as he had in the past, for what faith could be placed upon the statements of a gentleman who made such grievous mistakes? The hon. gentleman made an error in his speech the previous evening when he stated that the training of thirty-eight cadets at Kingston Military College had cost $300,000. The cost was $26,556, or a difference of over $273,444 out of $300,000. What confidence could be placed in a man who deliberately made such a statement? The hon. gentleman was subject to such grievous mistakes, and, if he had only made them outside of the House, it would not have been a matter of wonder, but to attempt to convince gentlemen of this House by such assertions was a different thing. In his speech the hon. gentleman condemned the Government for increasing the expenditure in connection with certain items which it was impossible for any Government to control—such items as the Postal Service, the collection of Customs, the collection of Excise duties, and other things which were included in the charges upon revenue. He pointed out that the present Government had increased the expenditure in the Post-office Department since 1874 by half a million dollars; and no sooner had he done so than he went back to justify the late Government for the increase of expenditure in that branch between the years 1867 and 1874. If there was a justification for an increased expenditure from 1867 to 1874, there was also a justification for an increase in the period since then, and he believed that he could show those gentlemen opposite that this expenditure would go on increasing until this country and the vast territory in the North-West had been fully developed. The Post-office system was only partially developed as yet. Since 1874, the Government increased the number of Post offices by 463, the mileage travelled by 1,860,078 miles, the number of pieces passing through the Post-offices by 31,076,700, the money order offices by 112, the amount of money orders by $678,932, the post-Office Savings Banks by 43, the number of depositors by 548. There was an increase in three years of 50 per cent. upon the packages going through the post-offices and an increase of one-sixth on the mileage travelled. No one in this House or outside would say that 1,800,000 miles could be added to the system in 1876-77 without increasing the expenditure in connection therewith, and whoever ruled this country that increase would go on. Another part of the finances to which he would refer briefly was that called the controllable expenditure, though there were matters of expenditure which came under that head which, in his opinion, were almost uncontrollable and that were fixed amounts upon the revenue of the country. He referred to the gratuities or annuities to the Indians of the North-West, and he was sure there was no one in this House or outside that would begrudge one single dollar which had to be paid to the Indians for the acquisition of their title to that vast country in the North-West, and which opened up a territory of such magnitude to the people of this Dominion. There had also been an increase in the amount expended in the administration of criminal justice, and he was very much pleased with the remark of the hon. the member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) justifying that increase. It was an increase which would commend itself to any fair-minded man. The cases hitherto carried before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council could now be heard before the Court that had been established here, and, as the procedure was less expensive, a great boon was conferred upon the people. The trials in connection with the Intercolonial Railway had been sufficient to show that the establishment of that Court was in the interest of the people. The number of contract jobbers had been largely reduced by that Court. So loosely had the contracts for the Intercolonial Railway been let, that, in every case where a claim had been preferred and adjudicated upon by that Court, the amount had been largely reduced. But there were items which were controllable, and a few of these he would notice. First there was the civil service. His hon. friend from Cardwell had stated, in his pic-nic speeches last fall, that the cost of the Civil Service had been increased by $25,000, while, as a fact, it was decreased last year by $45,000. Here was a branch of the public service, which it was said the hon. the Premier had packed with his friends; it was stated that he could not go through any Department in the Ottawa Buildings without stumbling upon friends of the hon. the Premier—that he packed them in every Department without anything for them to do. The facts he (Mr. Oliver) had just stated proved the very reverse. It had been increased from 1867 to 1874 by $289,244, and from that period up till last year a decrease had been effected in this Department of $45,032 and up to the first of last July by $71,492. Then, with regard to the penitentiaries, from 1867 to 1873-4, the expenditure in this item increased $186,182, and the decrease since had been $92,383. There had been one penitentiary added since 1874, the penitentiary of Manitoba, and yet the expenditure in connection with the penitentiaries of the country had been reduced by $92,383. The expenses in connection with legislation had been reduced, but that he need not speak upon. The expenses in connection with Dominion Lands had been decreased. The expenses of lighthouses had been reduced by $65,779, and the item of marine hospitals by $4,054. As he stated before, it was impossible for any Government going into power, to reduce the public expenditure all at once. They knew that, in a commercial establishment, if extravagance was once encouraged, it was a difficult matter to decrease the expenditure afterwards. In private families, if they cared to carry it so low down, they knew how easy it was to cultivate habits of extravagance, but very difficult to get rid of them. What was the position of the late Government when they left office? By a return brought down to this House, on the motion of the hon. member for Cardwell, it was shown that, during the last ten months of their reign, 629 new appointments to the public service had been made. The new salaries amounted to $322,943, and 1381 had their salaries increased by $152,350, altogether making an increase of $475,293 in this Department. This was proof positive that extravagance reigned supreme before the late Government went out of power, and it was impossible all at once to reduce such an extravagant system of Government. He would draw attention to the comparison between the expenditure of the late and the present Government in two other Departments. The Department or the Administration of Justice, cost in 1873-4, $29,377; it now cost $21,484, a saving of $7,893 in three years—the Department that was once presided over by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) under the late Administration, and now presided over by the hon. the member for St. John (Mr. Burpee). The Customs cost in 1873-4, for salaries and contingencies, $59,078, while the present head of that Department had reduced it to $51,087, a decrease of $8,991. He thought the figures he had quoted showed conclusively that the present Government had reduced the public expenditure as much as possible, consistent with the welfare of the country, and that the career of the late Government had been marked by extravagance. But it was said that it was the present Government who were on trial at the present time, and not the Opposition, and therefore nothing must be said of transactions of those on the Opposition benches because they were not on their trial. But they knew that, if the verdict went against the present Administration, those gentlemen on the Opposition, would come into their places, and it was in the interests of the country, therefore, that the acts of the two Governments should be fairly compared, and he was confident it had been done or would be done between now and the next election. Nothing would hinder him from discussing this matter at public meetings in the country. The present Government had reduced the public expenditure, had carried out as far as possible all the pledges they gave before coming into power, and, if they were displaced and the leaders of the Opposition again occupied the Treasury benches, the country knew what would happen; they would undo all that had been done, and would repeat the history of the period before they were driven from power. There was just another clause in the speech of the hon. member for Cardwell that he desired to notice. This was a reference that had been made by him to a statement by the present Minister of Finance, made in his pic-nic speeches, where he had charged gentlemen on the Opposition benches with high crimes and misdemeanors, and with doing various acts not in the interests of the people of this country. He would read the extract referred to. It showed that the hon. the Minister of Finance wished to deal with the leader of the Opposition, and not with any of his supporters. The challenge was given to the leader of the Opposition only, and if he had put the brief into the hands of the hon. member for Cardwell, the latter gentleman would not find it a paying one to him. Now, the hon. the Minister of Finance had made certain charges against the leader of the Opposition and several of his followers. The hon. member for Kingston had been sitting in that House for two or three weeks, and had never referred to those charges, and if he still continued to sit, without referring to them, the verdict of the people would be that he was guilty. If he denied those charges.

the hon. the Finance Minister had promised to meet him here or anywhere. The extract alluded to was a formal challenge to the head of the Opposition, in which the hon. the Finance Minister stated: "My challenge is to himself alone, and I have to tell him that, if he so desires, I am ready to confront him before his own constituents, or on the floor of this House." If this challenge was not accepted, the people of the country would return against the hon. the member for Kingston a verdict of guilty of all charges brought against him, and the people would also say that these gentlemen were capable of preferring charges in the country; but when they came, face to face, in that Parliament, with the gentleman against whom those charges were preferred, they were unable to substantiate them.

MR. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) said he desired to notice what appeared to be one or two paradoxical expressions which had fallen from the hon. member for South Norfolk in the course of his address. That hon. gentleman seemed to lay the entire burden of blame upon the Government that men were unemployed, and in the next breath, spoke of the steam-pump, steam shovel, and steam-drill, and stated in so many words that those and other improved classes of machinery would do to-day the work of forty men as compared with the work of four men a few years ago. The expression appeared to be a paradoxical one, and the hon. member should have remembered that it would have required at least ten times the amount of work which existed at the time prior to the introduction of this class of machinery to afford employment to the same number of men. The hon. member had spoken of the cruelty of bringing emigrants to Canada, and yet, when he came to contrast the Dominion with old and wealthy countries, he spoke of Canada as a land of plenty compared with them. He concurred with the hon. gentleman that we had reason to be proud of having a country which possessed resources equal, if not superior, to any country on the face of the globe. The hon. member had referred to Protection and the readjustment of the tariff, and yet, in the next breath, had stated that what the industries of the country required was that Parliament should leave them alone. The hon. member had further stated that he had no confidence in figures; but he (Mr. Macdonald) hoped to show the House that there was confidence to be placed in figures. He hoped to be able to show from figures the causes of the depression, and to present them in a light so clear that any one who was unprejudiced would admit their force. It could not be denied that this country had been passing through, and had not yet emerged from, a period of commercial depression. Possibly undue prominence had been given to this subject in Parliament; possibly the Depression Committee itself had not had the best effect upon the country. Commercial men knew better than any other class how many unprincipled persons had availed themselves of the discussion then going on as a reason for their suspension, thereby taking advantage of their creditors and securing a settlement for their own benefit. He would briefly call the attention of the House to some of the causes which had brought about the present state of affairs. If they would look at the first table in the Trade and Navigation Report now brought down, they would find that the gross imports for the last ten years amounted to $998,000,000—he would omit the hundreds of thousands for the sake of brevity. For the first of these years the amount was $73,000,000; for the last $99,000,000, and the average for the ten years was $99,000,000. A careful examination of that table, in which would be found the imports for the ten years, would reveal the fact that in four of those years, namely, 1872, 1873, 1874 and 1875, there was an enormous increase of imports. For the first of these years, for example, the imports, instead of being $99,000,000, that being the average of the ten years, reached $110,000,000, or $15,000,000 in excess of the previous year (1871). In the next year (1873) the imports were $16,000,000 in excess of the preceding year, making an excess in the two years of $32,000,000. The average of those four years was not $99,000,000, as already stated, but

$122,000,000, or an excess in each year of $22,800,000, and amounting in the four years to $91,000,000. This excess was made up in the following way: In 1872, $11,000,000; in 1873, $28,000,000; in 1874, $28,000,000; in 1875, $23,000,000; making a total of $91,500,000. If that amount, $91,000,000, were deducted from the gross amount of $998,000,000, there would remain $906,000,000, being an average of $90,000,000 per annum. It might be claimed by some that this amount would be insufficient for the wants of the country during a period of ten years; but if they looked for a moment, they would find that ninety millions per annum would have given seventeen millions over 1868, twenty millions over 1869, sixteen millions over 1870, and only two millions less than 1876. The first point he wished to make was this, that, in those four years of excessive importations, this country had imported $91,000,000 more than it required, more than it could pay for properly; that it became embarrassed by over-importations during those years, and that, from that hour to the present moment, it had never recovered from this improvidence. In confirmation of that position, he desired to call the attention of the House to the exports. Canada exported in the same period of ten years $739,000,000. He knew there were those who maintained that the exports were no standard of a country's ability to pay for its imports. He took the opposite position. What for example did our exports consist of? Our exports consisted of the products of the mine, the forest and the fisheries, animals and their products, cereals, agricultural implements, manufactured articles, miscellaneous productions, gold and bullion. He asked hon. members to consider how it was possible that, when our imports were so largely in excess of the exports, we could expect to bring upon ourselves anything but distress and embarrassment. But some hon. members would say: "Have we nothing else?" Yes, we had the products used in this country by 4,000,000 people. Let them add that amount to be remitted in the form of exchange. But, after deducting the $91,000,000 which he claimed was imported in excess of our actual needs—to meet the arguments of those who claimed we had something else to remit—he would say there would still remain $166,000,000 for home consumption, as already referred to, and bills of exchange to be drawn against capital or credit, or in other words over and above all our exports an average of $16,750,000 per annum, or $166,798,000 during the ten years. That, he submitted, was not only a fair but a liberal calculation, and those figures, if they showed anything, proved conclusively that in those four years the country imported that amount of $91,000,000 above its actual need and ability to pay promptly, and was to this hour suffering from that mistake. It would be a fallacy to suppose that that large indebtedness could have been incurred without interest. He added, for the mistake of the first year on $11,000,000, an interest account of $783,000; for the second year, on $39,833,000, $2,788,000; for the third year, on $68,202,000; $4,376,000; for the fourth year, on $91,508,000, $6,405,000—or, in all, an interest account during that period of four years of $14,354,000; or a total debt to the country of $105,862,000. He knew there were some hon. members who would say that was a fallacious way of putting the matter, because a large amount of that sum had been paid. True, a large amount of indebtedness had been paid, but a large amount had since been incurred; and he claimed that if, during these years of depression, the merchants of the Dominion had been able to maintain their credit by meeting new purchases, the balance still remained against this country, and that was the true secret of the distress that had overtaken its industries. As an evidence of the force of what he stated as to its exports, it should be borne in mind that, when there was no depression, the exports most closely approximated to the imports. For example, in the year 1870 the imports of the country were only 1 per cent. in excess of the exports. Taking the years of the crisis, in 1872 they had risen to 34 per cent. in excess, in 1873 to 42 per cent., in 1874 to 43 per cent., and in 1875 to 58 per cent. In 1870 the excess of imports over exports was only $1,240,000, and then there was freedom from this anxiety. In 1875 the excess in that one year was $45,000,000, and in the four years of inflation to which he had referred the excess of imports over exports had risen to $153,000,000. If those figures were not conclusive he might speak from morning till night without making the case clearer. They found that to that sad result all the Provinces of the Dominion, with but one exception, contributed. That Province was British Columbia, and he referred to it approvingly, to the wisdom of its merchants, the forethought which they had exercised, and to the satisfactory results which were the consequence reaped by them to-day. It was a noticeable fact that in 1875 the imports of British Columbia were $250,000 under its exports; in 1876 they were about the same; and in the year 1877, just closed, the one almost balanced the other. In Ontario, he was sorry to say, the evil was found perhaps to exist to the greatest extent, the excess being $23,000,000 in 1875, $13,000,000 in 1876, $22,000,000 in 1877, or, in one Province alone, an excess in three years of $58,000,000. He claimed that this was the solution of the crisis, as any one would realize who would look at the matter dispassionately. The imports being largely in excess of the consuming power of the country, ordinary sales could not legitimately be effected. A large brigade of travellers had to be added to the existing army, and sent through the country from Dan to Beersheba. If a good man would not buy, sales must be made to the next best man. If there were not enough men in business more men must be put in business. Values fell, an unhealthy competition was felt among traders in every town and municipality, among banking institutions and railways throughout the entire country, and all as the result of those excessive over-importations. He contended that this amount of $105,000,000 had laid upon every man, woman and child in this country a debt of $26.50, which would remain until the entire amount was liquidated, and any thoughtful man who looked at the question could not fail in arriving at this conclusion. But there were some who said that such could not be the case, because this was not a public debt, and hence it could not rest upon every man, woman and child. It rested upon them in this way: During the period of financial prosperity new schemes were entered into, and during the period of depression these schemes had had to be abandoned. The men who hoped to secure full work were very glad to obtain half work, and some quarter work, and hence the supply in the labour market became greater than the demand. There must have been some cause to bring such a state of things about, some cause leading to the phrenzy with which men became seized, some cause for leading men to set at naught the old fashioned way of acquiring wealth by the slower and surer process, and seeking by their efforts to become hastily rich. Let them see if they could find any cause for this sudden inflation. An examination of the Public Accounts would show them that, during the ten years, the total expenditure on capital account was $68,000,000, an average of $6,800,000 per annum; but that, during the four years of inflation, which they were now considering, it was $44,000,000, or an average of $11,000,000 per annum. It thus appeared that, during those four years, there was an increased expenditure of $17,647,000, forming to that extent a producing cause; this, with others to which he had referred, tending to bring about that result. He was not criticising the expenditure made during those years, 1872, 1873, 1874, and 1875. The expenditure was made in the construction of the Pacific and Intercolonial Railways, and other public works, and for the payment of the debts to the various Provinces. He would assume that it was made for the best interests of the country, but he was merely showing that in that period of inflation that increased expenditure of $17,000,000, could not but have its effect in stimulating the results which it had helped to bring about. A still more serious cause of disturbance was found in the sudden increase of circulation and discount of our banks. In 1869 and 1870 the discounts were $56,000,000, and in 1874-5 they had risen to $133,000,000. They could not to-day look at such a result without feeling that it bordered on madness, or without wondering that the country had not been ruined. They had then, as a producing cause, the increase in the expenditure on public works and payments to Provinces, $17,000,000; increase in discounts $77,000,000, and adding these together, they would find in those four years an increased discounting power and an increased amount spent on public works, amounting in all to $94,000,000; or, in other words, $24 for every man, woman and child in the country. Was it any wonder that a number of men launched out into schemes that were wild and delusive, speculative and dangerous, and that they should in prosecuting them have lost what it had taken years to recover; and years would yet elapse before the evil would be entirely overcome. The question would naturally be asked, who was to blame? He was very glad to agree with the hon. member for South Norfolk in the opinion that the banks had had a great deal to do with the depression. He (Mr. Macdonald) blamed the banks very much, and he also blamed the importers—the class to which he himself belonged—and every man should have his own share of the responsibility of having contributed to the bringing about of these results. He blamed the English merchants, with their cheap and ruinous credit. If he were asked to blame the American merchants, he replied he could not, for they were conservative in their credit, expected to be promptly paid, and, unless payments were satisfactory, accounts were closed. He could not, therefore, blame the American merchants. Then he was asked to blame the Government.

AN HON. MEMBER: You cannot do that.

MR. MACDONALD said he had sat in the House to very bad purpose if it was thought he was not prepared to blame the Government, if they deserved it. But he would be a dishonest man if he were to attempt to charge the responsibility of this depression upon the Government. In Montreal the other day, the representatives of one of the largest commercial interests in our country, the wholesale dry-goods trade, held a meeting, and what was its object? Was it to blame the Government for the depression? No; it was to take the blame upon themselves, and to consider whether or not measures could not be provided whereby credit could be shortened, and a sounder system of trade established. They took the responsibility upon themselves, and that, he maintained, was where it ought to rest; and they in the West were prepared to take their share of that responsibility. He had thus endeavoured to show where the blame rested, and he now intended to produce the proof of that allegation. He had held that the banks were to blame. He asked the House to look at the fall which had taken place in various bank stocks, and their diminished dividends; and he asked any intelligent banker in this country to tell him if he was not prepared to admit that unlimited credit had been one cause of the crisis. Wholesale men had had their profits and their losses, and the whole country was suffering from the losses which had been thus sustained. The English merchants had been called upon to sustain their share of the loss. The American merchants had not contributed to the crisis, and the bad debts they had incurred during this period had been of an infinitesimal character. He wished to ask at this point, as they had heard a great deal about Protection, this question. Would Protection have saved the country from the depression which had come upon it? They must bear in mind that no system of Protection would answer the purpose of its advocates, unless it were an elaborate one; this meant the construction of mills and other places for manufacturing purposes. But, assuming that that had been done, and that arrangement had been made to provide in some other way for the displacement of the revenue—which would be the natural consequences of shutting out foreign goods—would Protection, in the sense in which it was advocated, have saved the country from the crisis? He claimed that, it would not. Instead of over-importation we would have had over-production, and with this difference.

that, instead of the English merchant bearing his share of loss, as he had to do during the present crisis, Canada would have had to bear it all herself. He desired to call the attention of the House to a few instances in the course of trade, to which he had called the attention of the House in the Sessions of 1876 and 1877. In the year 1873, the imports from Great Britain were $68,000,000, and the imports from the United States $47,000,000: a gain in favour of Great Britain of $20,000,000. He would only detain the House by comparing the years 1873 and 1877. In 1877, the imports from Great Britain were $39,000,000, and from the United States $51,000,000, or $11,740,000 in favour of the United States. Thus between those years the trade with Great Britain had declined $39,000,000, while the increase in the trade with the United States was steady and uninterrupted. In 1876 he had called the attention of the House to this matter in these words. Referring to the progressive growth of trade with the United States, he had said:

"I venture to make this statement, that that thing will go on, and that, while the imports from Great Britain will steadily decrease, those from the United States will steadily increase."

An Hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. MACDONALD said if the hon. gentleman would allow him to finish the quotation, he would answer him afterwards:—

"Unless you build up such barriers as I cannot defend, before another eight years you will find the trade with the United States, now amounting to $50,000,000, will reach the volume of $100,000,000."

How far this statement had been justified they saw to-day. The eight years had not yet passed, but one had passed, and the increase for that one year was just the proportion they would expect to find in the first year in bringing about the result he had spoken of in the remaining seven. Taking the present year, our trade with Great Britain had declined $1,162,000, and our trade with the United States had increased $5,242,000. Now, a word or two about Protection. Last year, in addressing the House on this matter, referring to the protection which Canadian manufacturers had as against the United States, he had used these words:—

"With the cost of freight between the United States and Canada, our position was not bad, and perhaps in a month or two, when gold would probably be at par, the Canadian manufacturer would have a protection of twenty per cent. against the Americans."

Those remarks had been verified. That was the precise position of the case to-day, and the Canadian manufacturer had, as against the American manufacturer, a protection to-day of twenty per cent. Was that enough? He fancied that there were some other parties to consult as well as the manufacturers. He had not one word to take back as to what he had said in this House on this subject during any former Session. He had never made one inconsistent remark on the subject from the first time he addressed the House to the present hour. The changes that had taken place had from that moment all been in favour of the manufacturer, who had to-day a protection of twenty per cent., as against five per cent. in the first year that he (Mr. Macdonald) came into the House. But there were surely others who had to be consulted as well as the manufacturer. What about the consumer? He wondered very much—seeing that there was a protection of twenty per cent. under the present tariff, $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. freight, then say ten per cent. for the profit of the wholesale man, which was moderate enough for his risks, and twenty per cent. probably for the retail man, making about fifty per cent. if the consumer would not be apt to say: "Stop, we do not want to pay more than 50 per cent. on the first cost of an article." The Canadian manufacturer had to-day a protection of 30 per cent., as against the English manufacturer, an amount which he (Mr. Macdonald) thought entirely too much. He had a $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. tariff, he had the ocean freight, the inland freight, the ocean insurance, the railway traffic from the United States, and, before the goods were laid down in this market, they gave the Canadian manufacturer a clear protection of 30 per cent. Would they put any more on a country to which we owed everything; a country which, if need be, was prepared to defend us with all her resources. Were they prepared to put anything more on a country that had made us what we were? They ought to look forward as true patriots to the period when they would be able to remove to some extent the barriers which existed between the English and Canadian manufacturers, and thus to cheapen the price on their goods rather than to increase it. If he (Mr. Macdonald) were a Canadian manufacturer, he would be very fearful that the clamour for the increased tariff might appear as if it were intended for his own personal enrichment. He should be fearful that a thoughtful man would realize either that he was deficient in energy or in inventive power, or in having suitable arrangements, and that the clamour which he raised was intended only to put the surplus into his own pocket. He contended that the protection which the tariff gave to-day was abundant for any man who had brains, energy and character. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had done him the honour to refer to a review which he had written, or which he (Mr. Tupper) supposed he had written, at any rate the hon. gentleman had read an extract from that review. He (Mr. Macdonald) was reminded by the reading of it, of an illustration of imperfect punctuation. It was a notice in a barber's shop, to this effect: "What do you think? I will shave you for nothing and give you something to drink." After a man had been shaved he asked for something to drink, and pointed to the notice, but the barber said: "Oh, no. Let me read it:—What? Do you think I will shave you for nothing and give you something to drink?" He (Mr. Macdonald) intended to read that circular in the same way. In the first place the hon. gentleman did not read the preceding paragraph at all, which read thus:—

"Canadian goods have not been profitable to the jobber. Manufacturers have themselves to blame. Large sales made in the early season might have left the manufacturer and merchant a profit. A surfeit followed, prices fell, and the result was unprofitable to both. Until Canadian manufacturers, in certain lines at least, learn to exercise more judgment in their productions, so that they can be handled by the merchants without loss, it would be wisdom in them to say less about Protection."

Now he would read the paragraph which had been read by the hon. gentleman. Alluding to American drummers, etc., it said:

"If they are willing to undertake the risks they are welcome to the trade. We would be opposed to any policy which would have the effect of shutting them out, but we naturally ask, if they have the utmost freedom of access to our Dominion, should we not have equal access to theirs? If they are allowed to compete with our merchants here, should our merchants not be allowed to compete with theirs on the same terms?"

He (Mr. Macdonald) desired neither to change or fritter away any word which he had stated there. If it meant anything, it meant that he would be opposed to build up a wall to shut Americans out. But he conceived that the matter referred to there was a perfectly debatable one, and he did not see why we should not trade with them as they did with us. Nor was there any hon. member in this House, who, more than the hon. member for Cumberland himself, would deplore that that should be attempted by coercion which could better be secured by suasion. Nor would that hon. gentleman take the responsibility of irritating those who were our best customers. Among the Americans there were those who sympathized with us, who were warmly attached to us, and who desired closer relations. One of their best writers had said:

"Though ages long have passed,
Since our fathers left their home;
Their pilot in the blast,
O'er untravell'd seas to roam.
Yet lives the blood of England in our veins
And shall we not proclaim,
That blood of honest fame,
Which no tyranny can tame
By its chains."

In bringing these remarks to a close, he would ask what the lessons of this crisis were? They were these, that a large volume of business was not always an evidence of prosperity. It was evident that the prosperity of this country during these years of inflation was a fancied prosperity. It had no real substantial basis, and the truth was the real way to success was not the rapid way, not the modern way of making haste to be rich, but it was the calm, slow, sure and steadfast way of securing wealth as the result of persevering effort. Now there were a great many cries about Protection and a great many cries about the readjustment of the tariff. They might be right, perhaps, but there was something which we wanted a great deal more than either the one or the other, that was, character.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. MACDONALD said yes, they wanted character. He was sorry to say that the debates on the floor of this House did not tend to elevate the moral tone of the country. They required that their merchants' first object when difficulties stared them in the face should be to secure their creditors, and do what was right and honest, and not to make plans for their own aggrandizement. In closing, he would say that, in that land of which they were all proud, the men who had made England a great country had been great men, they had not owed their greatness to Protection, they had themselves been great, they had left their impress on their country's history by reason of their greatness, by reason of their indomitable energy, by reason of their perseverance, by reason of their sterling honour. He referred to such men as Sir Titus Salt, to such men as Sir Francis Crossley, to such men as George Moore the eminent philanthropist. These men had left their names as a sacred legacy to their country, and their country had accepted that legacy as a sacred trust, and the country pointed its young men to those names as models upon which successful commercial careers could be framed. He also referred to such men to-day as John Bright and Samuel Morley, and those who belonged to that class, men of broad views and high honour, who had become great without Protection. There were several lessons which might be learnt from the crisis which might benefit the young men who were coming forward, and among them was this, that self-reliance was a nobler lesson to teach than dependence. Its results would be more lasting and more satisfactory. As regarded the deficit, he understood the hon. the Finance Minister to say that he thought it might be made up by the increase in the revenue during the year, and that he looked upon the change which had taken place as an evidence that that would be accomplished. He (Mr. Macdonald) would have been glad if the deficit had been larger. That might appear a very strange remark; but, if it had been larger, it would have shown that men more fully realized the severity of the crisis and were bracing themselves up to meet it. His reason for believing that the deficit would not be met, was one which had not been mentioned by anyone who had addressed the House, and which ought not to pass unnoticed. It was this. It must be borne in mind that the goods which three or four years ago cost $99,000,000 could be bought to-day for $80,000,000, and, although the amount of bulk and the amount of weight which came into this country might be increased, it came at a diminished value of twenty per cent.; —that must seriously affect the calculation of any Ministry, and he felt that it would be unfair to charge the present Ministry, as it would be unfair if the case were reversed to charge hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side, if they were on the Treasury benches, with matters of this kind beyond their control. Under all the circumstances, the course adopted by the Minister of Finance was a wise course, a patriotic course. To him it appeared the only safe course which could have been adopted, and, in concluding, he would say that a tariff which gave to the Government revenue, while pressing, at the same time, as lightly as possible upon the consumer, which gave to the manufacturer all the protection that he needed, and which gave the purchasers goods at reasonable prices, was the best tariff for the Government, was the best for the manufacturer, and was the best for the people.

MR. HAGGART said that, before discussing the general question under consideration, of which they had heard so much, he would go back and reply to some of the answers made by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) to the statements of the member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace), charging the Government with maladministration during their continuance in office. The hon. member alleged that the Opposition made general charges, instead of particularizing. Had they not particularized in reference to the Kaministiquia Terminus, the Goderich Harbour and the Foster contracts? In answer to the statement that land used as a terminus for the Pacific Railway, on the Kaministiquia, would readily sell at present for the amount paid by the Government, the House had to consider that it was not the amount that could be now obtained for the land, but what would be its value if there were no railway there; for the Pacific Railway Act so directed the land to be expropriated. Now, that the House might see how far that had been carried out, a year or so before the Kaministiquia was selected as a terminus, this same land was sold by auction by the Ontario Government, for from $4 to $8 per lot, for which the Dominion Government paid from $250 to $300. The Opposition contended that the expenditure of $54,000, for the purchase of this land, had not been in any manner satisfactorily explained by the Government. Had they not particularized in connection with the Goderich Harbour job? Had they not shown that a person introduced by Mr. Blake got the contract for a sum of $30,000 over and above an old and responsible contractor, who would fulfil all the conditions required by the Government? He (Mr. Haggart) had made a charge in this House which he had particularized, and to which he had never heard a satisfactory answer from the Government or their supporters—that was in reference to the payment made to the Hon. Mr. Foster of $65,000 for rails delivered at Renfrew, which had been paid for as if they were to be used on the Georgian Bay Branch, a road 120 miles from the place of delivery. The payment was said to be in error, and was intended to be made on the contract for the extension of the Canada Central Railway. But it could not be so, for the Canada Central was the contractor with the Government for the extension, and the payment was made to the Hon. A. Foster. Another payment of $42,000 had been made to the same individual on the Georgian Bay Branch before he had produced the vouchers that he had performed the services, as the Order in Council required. These charges had frequently been made throughout the country and the Opposition had been answered that they dared not make them in the House. They had made them here again and again, and now they were told to formulate them and ask for a Committee. Experience had taught them that Committees were used for white-washing Governments, and not for condemning them, and they confined themselves to bringing out the facts and letting the country judge. As to the extraordinary statement of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) that the manufacturers in this country were prosperous, and suffering nothing from the depression, and, as to the labouring class, that he had authority from a contractor on the Pacific Railway to offer $2 per day for all the men he could find, and that he, no doubt, would assist them to get to the work,—it must be gratifying to the labourers in Ottawa to hear such news, who too well know the rate of wages prevailing, knowing that hundreds of men could be hired, and were being hired to work, from daylight to dark, on shantymen's fare, for the taking out of timber at wages from $8 to $12 per month, and that the highest price for a man and team of horses was $1 per day, and that large numbers of teams were looking for employment and willing to take 75c. per day. And yet the hon. member made the statement that any man who was willing to work could go up and, perhaps, have the cost of his passage paid and receive $2 per day. This was a statement that would strike with surprise the employers of labour in this section of the country, knowing, as they did, that any one in earnest could obtain 1,000 men for less than one-half the sum offered. An argument used by the same hon. gentleman was that the price of cereals in this country would be fixed, even if we had a protective duty, by the price at Liverpool, as we were exporters of cereals. But, if the Trade and Navigation Returns were to be believed, we imported more wheat and flour from the United States than our total exports of the same article; so an argument that would apply to a country that had a surplus to export would not apply to this—a country which had become an importer of grain to supply the wants of our own community. If the figures in the returns were correct, we imported 500,000 bushels of wheat more than we exported. In his section of the country they knew that the price of their cereals and produce was fixed by the price for which the lumbermen could import pork, oats and flour from Chicago; and the raising of pork had been almost given up on account of our farmers not being able to compete with the western farmers in price. What they contended was that, by a protective tariff, they could so arrange matters that the produce raised by our agriculturists would be greatly increased in value. With regard to the public debt, the correctness of the figures mentioned by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy) was brought in question. He had not had the opportunity of looking into that statement to see whether it was correct or not, but, owing to the care which the hon. gentleman generally took with regard to the figures used in the course of his arguments, he felt that the statement in question was correct. That hon. gentleman, he (Mr. Haggart) knew, would not attempt to falsify figures; and he felt convinced that they were at all events as likely to be correct as those mentioned by the hon. member for North Oxford. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) complained that the hon. member for Cardwell had had the audacity to state that the expenditure in connection with the Military College was in the neighbourhood of $300,000. The hon. gentleman might have said so, but, if so, it must have been a mere lapsus lingue. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) was too well acquainted with this item to make any such statement seriously, or with the intention of misleading the House. The remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) in this respect were entirely unfounded in fact. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver), to use a phrase common in the debates of the House, had the audacity to say that the gentleman who presided at the annual convention of the Manufacturers' Association, had in his speech supported the views which the hon. gentleman held. The hon. gentleman had quoted from that speech; but he had forgotten to read the latter portion of the clause from which the quotation was taken. He would make up for that omission. The hon. gentleman evidently imagined that hon. members were entirely ignorant of the real nature of the speech in question. The portions which the hon. gentleman had forgotten to read were as follows:—

“Another class of people were the villagers, mechanics and workmen dependent upon manufacturers. Here would be found quite a different state of things; their trade or position was depressed financially, and they were suffering. The next thing to do was to discover the reason why the circumstances of this class were in a depressed condition. It was owing to an abnormal and extraordinary competition from the United States in manufactured goods * * *. The balance of trade, owing to the extraordinary state of the tariff, was now turned to seventeen millions against us. For fear that somebody might say that the increase from the United States was on free goods, he had looked at the figures, and had found that, in 1872, the free goods from the United States amounted to $31,000,000, and, in 1876, to $25,000,000, a decrease of $6,000,000. The dutiable goods from the United States, in 1872, were $17,000,000, and, in 1876, $21,500,000, an increase of $4,500,000. This four and a-half millions of excess was in the period of a general decline of our imports of $33,000,000. It was not possible to deny that the Americans had got a market for their manufactures during the last four years * * *. At the lowest calculation Canada had, between 1861 and 1871, lost 80,000 people a year that had been educated in the country, and who were worth to her half a million of such men as we got by assisted immigration. To use a vulgar expression, our country was getting little better than a breeding ground for the Americans.”

Gentlemen on both sides of politics who had been supporters and strong opponents of the Government for a number of years had, at that meeting, unanimously resolved that the policy which this country required was a protective policy. The hon. gentleman had alluded to the large amount of money in the banks as proof that the country was now prosperous; but, on the contrary, this was always evidence of depression in commerce and in manufactures. When commerce was active and manufacturers were flourishing, people did not deposit their money in the banks, but, instead, invested it in manufactures. Consequently, the argument which the hon. gentleman made use of in this relation was true in a sense opposite to that in which he intended. For the current year, large amounts were asked for building railways in the Dominion. There was one railway which was a necessity to the country, and which every one wished to see constructed immediately—the branch which would connect Thunder Bay and Fort Garry. The same necessity applied to the railway from Pembina to Fort Garry. There was no immediate need for the Georgian Bay Branch of the Pacific Railway, or for a connection by means of the Canada Central Railway. He lived in a portion of the country which would be most benefited by it; and he would say, without fear of contradiction, that they did not want that railroad to be built at present; and that it would be a useless expenditure of money to do so until the line from Thunder Bay to Fort Garry was completed. He would draw the attention of the Government to the policy laid down by all writers of Political Economy, that large expenditures in advance of the requirements of the country were ruinous, and should not be encouraged. As to expenditures on the Welland Canal, it was true that these had been instituted by the late Government; but this was done when the financial condition of the country was prosperous, and when we had large surpluses every year; but, in view of the present depressed condition of the country, there was no necessity for the large expenditures which were now being made in this relation on undertakings which were not profitable. This was a wrong policy, and the principle he had mentioned was laid down by the favorite author of hon. gentlemen—opposite on Political Economy. The railway communications in which the country was particularly interested were those from Thunder Bay to Selkirk, and from Pembina to Selkirk, in order to develop the magnificent North-West, so that our young men who were now emigrating in thousands might settle there. The Government ought to abandon their immigration policy of spending large sums of money—about $200,000 annually—in inducing a class of immigrants to come to this country, such as had no comparison to the class we were losing every day. Their efforts should be directed to the directing of our own young men to that region; and the money that was spent on Meennonites and Icelanders could be more profitably employed in assisting them to that country. They could not understand why foreigners had money advanced to them to pay their passage, were looked after and directed the whole way, while there was not even an arrangement made by which they might be in any way assisted to the same destination. He hoped to see the sum heretofore voted for that purpose dropped from the Estimates. In this country, at present, there was no surplus work to be obtained by the artizan class; and the condition of affairs in his county and the adjoining counties was such that no artizans need go there in search of employment. It was useless to say that there was no depression or want in Canada, and that our manufactures were flourishing. In his and the adjoining constituency, there were more manufactures than in any other section of the community in comparison to the population outside of the cities; and the universal complaint that was made there was that, owing to the neglect of the Government to establish a sufficiently protective tariff, their manufactures were nearly ruined. In Carleton Place, where there were large manufactures, and in other places, workmen looked with longing eyes at brother workmen who chanced to be carrying home a bag of flour.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. HAGGART said this was the case, and this was where a few short years ago these men were prosperous and earning good wages. Again, we were forced to compete with the Americans with regard to sawn and square timber in Canada. We would have in Quebec, for our sawn lumber, our deals and our square timber, a good market if it were not for American competition. The trade returns furnished the following statement:—Lumber, sawn and planks, not being of mahogany, &c., paying a duty of 17½ per cent., total imports into this country 26,414,000 feet; entered for home consumption, 12,794,000 feet, and this left, he supposed for export, 13,620,000 feet. The amount of oak exported was $1,501,020 worth, of which $44,414 worth was not the produce of Canada. The value of deals exported was $7,794,393, of which $262,918 was the product of all other countries. The white pine exported was worth $4,211,752, of which the product of all other places amounted to $15,060. The value of staves exported was $396,340, of which the product of all other countries was $2,436. Now, every person at all acquainted with the lumber trade of Canada knew that these statements from the Trade and Navigation Returns were altogether wrong. More than one half of the oak exported came from Michigan, and a far greater quantity of white pine, deals and staves than was here given, came from the same place, and had the effect of making our exports appear larger than they really were. But what our lumbermen next complained of was that foreigners could bring timber into their market, undersell them, shut up their mills and stop their operations, when they could not send a load of culls to the United States without paying $2 per M. duty—we allowing them the use of our canals, harbours and markets, without their contributing a cent to the revenue. The argument used was, "Oh, the people of Great Britain, if they do not get them in Quebec, will buy them in the United States." The buyers in Britain were conservative in their habits, and would obtain their supplies through the old channel. Americans would be unable, unless at a far greater cost, to find a market without using ours. The result of the policy adopted by the Government was having its effect on the country. Gentlemen who had supported them all their lives were now opposing them, as the member for North Lanark (Mr. Galbraith) would find when he appeared before his constituents for re-election. That hon. gentleman represented a constituency in which resided persons belonging to the artizan class, who had emigrated from Scotland, and there had been townships in it in which there could hardly be found a voter who did not support the Reform ticket, but, at the last local election, a Conservative member was returned for it; and it was expected—and he hoped this would be the case—that at the next general election, a Conservative and Protectionist would be elected to represent that constituency in the House of Commons. The only possible reason for this change among people who had inherited Reform principles from their forefathers, and who had been Reformers all their lives until recently, was that the present policy of the Government affected their pockets. They saw that, if they invested the whole of their means in manufactures, they would drag and eke out a miserable existence. They had hoped for better days, but no helping hand had been lent them by the Government. The hon. the Finance Minister asked: "How will you increase the prosperity of the country by adding to the burdens of the population?" But no such idea was entertained. Protectionists did not intend or desire to increase the burdens of the community, in any manner, in the adoption of a tariff. What they desired to secure was such a readjustment of the tariff as would prevent foreign goods coming in here and destroying our manufacturing interests, and that would preserve for these interests a steady market. What difference did it make to the community if we had to raise twenty millions, whether it was obtained by the imposition of 25 per cent. on one article and 2 per cent on another? Mention was made of the poor consumer, who, it was said, would have to pay more taxes under a protective tariff. Protectionists did not advocate anything of the kind; and did not intend that the consumer should pay any more taxes than at present. They simply desired to secure such a readjustment of the tariff as would encourage manufactures that would thrive in this country; and the manufacturers said to the Canadian people: "If you will grant us adequate protection, we will not only sell to you as cheaply as other countries can, but in course of time more cheaply." They did not want to impose any burdens on the community; and they said, further, that, when they reached such a stage, they would add to our riches by exporting to other countries. It was a fallacy to say that consumers would have to pay increased taxation under the protective system proposed. This was an absurdity, and an incorrect theory. They wished to protect our manufacturers from the fluctuations of trade, and no more; and prevent manufacturers in England, the United States, or elsewhere, from selling goods under cost in our country, in order to secure the market for themselves—which, once obtained, would result in prices being raised 100 per cent. The statement which he now made was founded on evidence which had been brought out before Committees of this House, and before a Committee of the Imperial House of Commons, in connection with an enquiry into the relations between capital and labour. The chairman of that Committee, in his report, had stated that, if workmen would only consider the very large amount that the country had lost in sending goods into foreign countries, and selling them below cost, with the view of keeping possession of the trade there, it would surely decrease the tendency to strike amongst them. By such evidence the House would see that a manufacturer, without a protective duty, would have to compete for years with them, without a profit, which was impossible for our manufacturers to do on account of their limited capital. Our manufacturers wished to be protected against anything of the kind; and they said, "Do this and we will not interfere with commerce, or with the amount of taxation levied in the country." Our commerce, under such a condition of things, would be as great as ever; and our shipping interests, etc., as prosperous as ever. They only required sufficient protection to enable them to employ to some advantage their small capital and to make a living in this country. He thought that this would be granted; and that the day was coming when their request would be favourably heard and decided upon by the people. At the same time, they said to the agriculturists, "We will protect your market here against being flooded by American cereals." In Canada, we now consumed more grain than was raised in the country, if we were to believe the Trade and Navigation Returns; and, with protection, we could thus control our own markets. The great and true argument used by Cobett when he appealed to the agriculturists of Great Britain for support, in advocacy of Free-trade, was that the operation of Free-trade there would secure the expansion of their manufactures; and he said that, when this was brought about, and when plenty of employment was thus applied to the artizans, the class that would most benefit from this state of things was the agricultural class. And the class to which Protectionists must appeal for support in Canada was the agricultural class; and the moment it was shown that they would benefit more from Protection than any other class in the community, which was the case, their support with regard to the protective policy was assured. The farmers would so benefit from the adoption of a protective system, owing to the increase in the price of the commodities which they had to sell that this would certainly bring about; the nearness of their market and the diversity of farm produce required would recompense the farmers for their support of this policy; while native goods would be sold them at less rates than was the case with imported articles, and the revenue at the same time would suffer no loss. Protectionists admitted that a revenue must be raised, but it could be obtained through the readjustment he had mentioned. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald) said, "why should we impose extra duties on a country that has done so much for us?" referring to Great Britain; but, while increased duties should be imposed on articles of American manufacture, discrimination could be shown in favour of English goods. American goods could be prevented from injuring our industries by means of such a policy, and at the same time, our trade with Great Britain need not be affected.

MR. PLUMB said they had been treated that day to a large measure of oratory on various subjects; but, without attempting to reply in detail to much that had been said on the opposite side of the question, he would briefly notice some of the arguments that had been adduced by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver), from whom they had been treated to a most extraordinary harangue. He could not call it anything else.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. PLUMB said he thought he was perfectly in order. "Harangue" was a good word; that hon. gentleman seemed to have suddenly found his voice, which had very seldom been heard in the House of late; and he (Mr. Oliver) had certainly given them the most extraordinary and discursive speech that they had ever heard in the House almost within his recollection. This speech reminded him very much of a story he had heard with respect to a gentleman of Virginia, who, with his young nephew, had been attending a public meeting. This was a very quiet old gentleman, very sententious, and he made very few comments; but, when they got into the wagon and were driving home, the young fellow, who thought he had made a splendid speech at the meeting in question, said: "Uncle, I made a speech?" "Yes, I heard it," and nothing more. Presently the young fellow spoke up again: "I spoke to-night about an hour." "Oh, yes, you spoke for an hour and 43 minutes by the watch,"—nothing more. A pause. "Well, what did you think of my speech, uncle?" "Well," was the reply, "I will tell you. A smart man would have made that speech in ten minutes, and a very smart man would not have made it at all." This he (Mr. Plumb) thought was about as fair a comment as one wanted to make on the speech of the hon. member for North Oxford, in which there were some points so extraordinary in their nature that he would notice them.

MR. MASSON said he would interpose this point. The hour was late, the subject one of serious importance, and the debate could not be finished that evening. He thought an adjournment was then advisable.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was, of course, desirous of meeting the wishes of hon. members on both sides of the House. They had sat somewhat late on the evening previous, and had then occupied the time, in his opinion, very unprofitably.

MR. LANGEVIN: Hear, hear.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for Charlevoix said "hear, hear." The debate, however, had been very profitable for them, and he would hardly like to inflict upon his hon. friend (Mr. Langevin) a great many nights of the same sort.

MR. LANGEVIN: Hear, hear.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was only consideration for the hon. gentleman and his friends that induced him to refrain from doing so. He begged to heartily congratulate the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) on being the leader of the Opposition. Could the hon. gentleman give them any information as to the intentions of his friends with regard to the continuation of the debate? He felt bound to say that he would like the debate to close on the next night that it was continued. Of course, he did not wish to hurry those who desired to speak on the subject. Every hon. member had an equal right to speak; but, on the other hand, up to the present they had spent a very large portion of their time in debate; and a number of their speeches were simply a recapitulation of arguments and statements made on a former occasion. He would like to have some understanding to the effect that, if possible, they should close the debate on the Tuesday night following, even if they then sat somewhat late. With that understanding he would consent to an immediate adjournment.

MR. MASSON said he had no authority to tell the hon. gentleman how long hon. members on both sides of the House had to speak; but the hon. gentleman should remember that the greater part of the evening had been taken up by one of his supporters, which evidently proved that the question was a very important one in which gentlemen on both sides of the House took an interest, and on which they desired to speak. He could not tell how long the debate would continue; but it would last as long as hon. members wished to speak on the matters at issue. He was sure that the hon. gentleman could no more control the members on his side of the House, than the right hon. member for Kingston could control members of the Opposition in connection with a question like this.

MR. MACKENZIE: We can control them so far that we could go into committee in five minutes.

MR. MASSON: I say that the right hon. member for Kingston, notwithstanding all the influence he has with us, and the respect we have for him, could not pretend to have such control over this side of the House. We heard the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue say the other day, that they had no leaders; but evidently they have a pretty powerful one, when he can make his followers stop speaking at will.

MR. PLUMB moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. MACKENZIE: I consent to it, and I hope we will get through with the debate in another night.

Motion agreed to, and Debate adjourned.

DOMINION GRANGE BILL.—[BILL 18.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 4th March., 1878.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 33) To extend to the Province of Prince Edward Island, the Railway Act, 1868, and certain Acts amending the same.—(Mr. Mackenzie)

Bill (No. 39) Respecting the Canada Vine Growers' Association.—(Mr. Smith, Peel.)

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY RETURNS.

QUESTION.

MR. DOMVILLE: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to know whether, during the recess, which lasted eight months and some days, the hon. the Premier had time to prepare the balance of the Intercolonial papers which I asked for last year. These have not been brought down, and what are brought down are not really what I asked for. I do not know whether he has a right to disregard the Orders of the House with respect to the bringing down of papers.

MR. MACKENZIE: As to that, I allowed a number of the motions to pass with the perfect knowledge that it was impossible to comply with them without employing an enormous mass of clerks. I so explained at the time, and I told the hon. gentleman that he would have to accept a number of the motions with that qualification. I will make enquiry about those that are still missing, however, and let the hon. gentleman know.

MR. DOMVILLE: I am not satisfied with that explanation.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot discuss the matter.

MR. DOMVILLE: I am not going to discuss the question; but I wish to say I am informed, and I believe credibly, that information concerning these papers was sent up during recess, which has not yet been brought down.

THE ALLEGED PICHÉ LETTER.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the hon. gentleman whether he has made up his mind as to what action he will take respecting the letter read by my hon. friend from Terrebonne (Mr. Masson), and also the letter which was read by Mr. Piché.

MR. MACKENZIE: When the hon. member for Kingston was absent, a reply was read by the Clerk, sent in by Mr. Piché, giving the statement that he had to make in reply to the letter in question. I stated on that occasion that I wrote a letter calling his attention to it, under the impression that he was appointed by commission. I found, however, after having written him the letter, that I was mistaken in that, and that he was an officer of the House, amenable directly to the Speaker; and, therefore, I told him to make his communication to the Speaker. It was really addressed to me, but delivered to the Speaker. I explained this to the House at the time. Of course, I quite understand that, under certain circumstances, it could become necessary for myself, as leader of the Government and of this House, to do and say certain things in reference to a matter of general interest affecting the employés of the House, or, at all events, as leader of the House, to bring them under the notice of members; but in this case, I conceive it to be pre-eminently the duty of the Speaker to deal with that matter; and I therefore intimated to him that I should leave the matter in his hands, where it rests at present.

Mr. MASSON said the hon. gentleman had not at first been ready to decide whether these letters should be entered on the Journals of the House, as he (Mr. Masson) had recommended, and had said that he (Mr. Mackenzie) would take that question into consideration, and, on the recommendation of the Speaker, it had been left over for a day or two until the hon. the Premier should determine respecting the proper mode of bringing it before the House. He thought the hon. the Premier should give them his advice as to whether these papers should be put on the Journals of the House. He contended that it was their duty to require that this should be done. The letters had been read and submitted to the House by the Speaker in the most formal and solemn manner, and read by the Clerk at the Speaker's own request; and he held that, before the Speaker took any action upon it, the matter must be before the House. Consequently, he considered that the hon. the Premier should see that these papers were laid before the House, and inserted in the Journals of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: If any action of the House is to be invited, I presume it is necessary to have all the documents relating to this matter on the Journals. As I understood it, the matter was first introduced in rather a conversational way, and the hon. the First Minister, as leader of the House, was called upon to take action respecting it. He, after consideration, chose to refer the matter very much to myself. The result of this was that I brought down the answer which the party accused of having written an improper letter chose to make to that; and I submitted it, not solemnly, as I take it, but informally, because I intimated my views that it should not be entered on the Journals, but treated as a paper laid before the House in the ordinary way, unless subsequent action was determined upon; and that then, if it were deemed proper, all the papers should appear on the Journals, the letter which was the groundwork of the complaint as well as the reply to that letter. However, in that reply, Mr. Piché has declared he cannot believe that the letter published in the newspapers is an exact copy of any letter he ever wrote. Under those circumstances, my impression is that, before any other action is taken, he ought to have the opportunity of examining the original, and comparing it with the letter published. He might then be called upon, perhaps, for some further explanation or reply. I think that, under these circumstances, it is not for me now to make any decision on the subject, as the reply of Mr. Piché declares solemnly and positively that he cannot believe that some expressions attributed to him in the letter published were used by him.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the matter could not by any possibility rest as it was. The answer of Mr. Piché did not appear to be satisfactory. As the party who had written the letter was an officer of the House, and unable to speak for himself, he would say no more about it; but, otherwise, he would be inclined to use the very strongest language that would be parliamentary, as to the style of that letter. If Mr. Piché did not write the letter in question, he ought to have an opportunity to exculpate himself. If, however, he (Mr. Piché) did write that letter, literatim and verbatim, as it appeared, or a letter which was in substance the same as that, then it seemed to him that the House could not allow the matter to rest in its present position. This was a question of the greatest importance, affecting an officer of the House, and, although he was not appointed under the great seal, like the Clerk, or under commission, he (Mr. Piché) held a situation quite as responsible and almost as dignified, in his opinion, as the Clerk of the House. The Assistant Clerk stood substantially as high in position, though not in rank, nor in the nature of his commission, as the Clerk; and it was due to the dignity of the House, to the usefulness of this officer, to the country, to the Judge concerned, and also to the hon. gentlemen whose names had been mentioned in the letter, his hon. friend from South Bruce and his hon. friend the Minister of Justice, that this matter, which was one of the greatest importance, should be looked into. He should feel that it was his duty to make a motion for an enquiry respecting it, unless something was done.

MR. HOLTON said it appeared to him that the right hon. member had better make the motion he proposed to submit to the House, and then the House would be in a position to consider this whole matter. He thought that his hon. friend from Terrebonne, in taking the responsibility of reading a letter purporting to come from an officer of the House, in which the names of certain public men were used somewhat freely, ought to have been prepared to produce the original letter; and, until the hon. gentleman was so prepared to act, he was in no position, nor his friends for him, to take any further action in this matter. He (Mr. Holton) assumed that his hon. friend from South Bruce, and his hon. friend the Minister of Justice were abundantly able to protect their own honour, if it was to be brought into question, in this regard. As to the officer whose position was assailed, he considered that his hon. friend from Terrebonne would see that he (Mr. Masson) was in no position to proceed further in this matter until he produced the letter, the accuracy of the published copy of which had been denied by the officer impugned.

MR. MASSON: It was not denied.

MR. HOLTON said that such, he thought, was the present position of the case. If the right hon. member for Kingston, than whom no member of the House knew better what was due to the House, and what was fitting conduct on the part of officers of the House, even of an officer appointed by himself (Sir John A. Macdonald), and what should be done under these circumstances, had come to the conclusion that it would be his duty, in any event, to submit a motion to the House, then his conviction was that the House ought to wait until such motion was before it.

MR. MASSON said, in the first place, the genuineness of the letter in question had not been denied; and, in the second place, the first time he had seen the letter was when it was published in the newspapers, as he had previously informed the House, and therefore the insinuation of he hon. gentleman—

MR. HOLTON: I made no insinuation.

MR. MASSON: Was quite unworthy of him. As soon as the letter was shown him in the press, he had called the attention of the House to it. He had not seen the original of the letter, and, if he had, he would not have known whether it was genuine or not, as he was not acquainted with Mr. Piché's handwriting. He had considered it his duty to bring the matter before the House, and the Speaker had, after several days' delay, submitted an explanation from Mr. Piché, given at the request of the hon. the Premier. This explanation was read and laid on the table. He contended it was his duty, in the first instance, to bring the question before the House, and that this being the case, it was now the duty of the Government, as far as he understood it,—which was responsible for the dignity of the House, and of every member of it, of the hon. member for South Bruce himself, and of the employés of the House—to bring the matter before it.

MR. SPEAKER: It is for the House, of course, to take any action at all it pleases in the premises. As far as I am personally concerned, I must confess I regard the letter as a not very positive letter, and the denial of it has raised very grave doubt as to its accuracy. The gentleman says he has no recollection of ever having written any such phrases or sentences, and that he cannot believe he was ever capable of writing anything of the kind; and this is almost as much as one could say of a letter, the very existence of which was perhaps forgotten at the time he was called upon for an explanation.

CALAIS AND ST. STEPHEN RAILWAY BRIDGE COMPANY BILL.—[BILL 34.]

(Mr. Appleby.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman who is the mover of the Bill will recollect that, when a similar Bill was moved on a former occasion, the mover was entirely unprepared with the plans and information that were absolutely essential in considering the question of bridging a navigable stream, and more especially when that navigable stream is an international boundary. I venture, therefore, to remind the hon. member for Carleton that it will be quite useless to go before the Committee unless he is fully prepared with the information that was required last year on a similar occasion.

MR. APPLEBY: I believe the promoters of the Bill will be here when the matter is taken up by the Committee, and I presume that they will be furnished with all the information that will be necessary.

Bill read the second time.

THE DUTIES ON CANADIAN TOBACCO.

QUESTION.

MR. BOURBEAU enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government during the present Session to modify the Act 31st Victoria, chapter 44, and the Acts amending the same, by reducing the duties on Canadian tobacco?

MR. MACKENZIE: I may say to the hon. gentleman that the Finance Minister is out; but we have no intention of making any change in this duty.

KING'S COUNTY, N.B., POSTAL SERVICE

QUESTION.

MR. DOMVILLE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant extra postal service for the county of King's, N.B.?

MR. MACKENZIE: It is quite impossible to answer a question of that kind unless we know what particular postal accommodation the hon. gentleman wants; but, if he will put a question on the paper, specifying some particulars, it will be answered. The postal accommodation in every county is regulated according to its wants by the hon. the Postmaster-General, in the best way possible to serve the public interests; and it is impossible to give any other answer than this to a question of so very general a kind.

BAY OF CHALEURS RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

MR. ROBITAILLE enquired, Whether the Government consider the Bay of Chaleurs Railway a feeder of the Intercolonial Railway, and whether it is the intention of the Government to aid in the construction of the said Railway by the loan or gift of iron or steel rails, or in any other manner?

MR. MACKENZIE: I have no doubt, from the explanations that the hon. gentleman gave me, that this road would be a feeder to the Intercolonial; but the Government have no rails, either of iron or steel in their gift for the purpose of disposal to any road at present. I have mentioned in reply to similar questions, at least twice, and I think three times, to the House, that the quantity of iron rails which were available, was, in length, about seventy miles; and that these had been apportioned among a number of roads. If, however, some of them are not proceeded with, it will then be open to the Government and the House to make a redistribution of them if it is thought proper. At present, there is nothing available for that purpose, nor is this road at present in such a state of progress as to warrant a grant, as far as I am aware of, though I have no hesitation at all in saying that I consider it would be an important feeder to the Intercolonial

LAKE ST. JOHN RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

MR. DE ST. GEORGES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in the distribution of iron rails, to set apart a certain quantity for the construction of the Lake St. John Road; and if so, how many?

MR. MACKENZIE: I can only make the same reply to this question—namely, that we have no iron rails at our disposition for the aid of any road; and the resolution of Parliament was in any case confined to those roads which were feeders to our own Intercolonial. Of course, in the event of these roads not being proceeded with, and of rails being available, it will then be a matter for discussion as to what may be done in this and other cases.

THE WILLIAMSBURG CANALS.

QUESTION.

MR. GIBSON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to commence the enlargement of the Williamsburg Canals this coming season; if not this coming season, when may the enlargement be expected to commence?

MR. MACKENZIE: It is not our intention to do so at present, for the reasons which I explained at length last year. In the first place, there is no insuperable difficulty in getting past this point, although the canal is sometimes of great use to vessels of slender power. Yet it is possible to pass that and some other of the smaller canals of the St. Lawrence by powerful steam tug power being applied; and we have obtained a vessel for the purpose of testing that after the improvements on the Galops Rapids are completed up here; and, until that is fairly tested, the Government do not propose to commence the enlargement of this particular class of canals on the St. Lawrence, which may be passed in this way.

PROPOSED ISLE BRULÉE WHARF.

QUESTION.

MR. ROY enquired, Whether it is true that, in the year 1877, and by order of the Government, instructions were given to Mr. Talbot, or any other person, authorizing an examination of locality and certain soundings in connection with the contemplated construction of a wharf at Isle Brulée, in the county of Kamouraska?

MR. MACKENZIE: I cannot find that any special instructions were issued by the Department to any officer to survey this particular part; but Mr. Talbot, acting under general instructions as to the improvement of points of navigable interest on the River St. Lawrence, did undertake, last year, a survey of the spot indicated by the hon. gentleman, though no report has yet been made—except as concerns a few answers given in reply to my questions on Saturday—to the Department, so far.

DOMINION LANDS OFFICE IN MANITOBA.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. SCHULTZ moved for a return of all moneys received by the Dominion Lands Office at Winnipeg for payment of lands in the Railway Reserve, and copy of instructions to Dominion Land Agent in Manitoba in regard to squatters on the Railway Reserve. He said he desired to bring this matter early before the notice of the Government, because they must be already aware, from petitions sent down and from the press of Manitoba, how great the grievance was felt to be which compelled those who had, in good faith, settled on lands in the Railway Reserve, to make a present payment of one dollar an acre for such lands, with a reserve price of, perhaps, five or six dollars,—and it must be remembered that if there was settlement upon these lands at all, that settlement was due, in a great measure, to the action of the Government themselves. Hon. gentlemen would remember that this question of throwing open this Railway Reserve for settlement had been frequently urged by him, and that, apparently yielding to the belief that such a course was advisable, the Government themselves introduced a Bill which carried in its provisions some measure of relief. While this Bill was pending, many persons, relying upon the good faith of the Government, as indicated by the introduction of this Bill, had gone on and settled on certain portions of these railway lands, only to find now that, disregarding the principle which they themselves established in the introduction of this Bill, a large price was asked by the Government from the occupants of these lands. Now, he (Mr. Schultz) held that, under the circumstances, no one occupying these lands should be compelled to pay more than one dollar per acre for them. In the first place, this was the established Government price for lands, and that estimate had been fixed by the Premier himself when, in a discussion with the hon. member for Cumberland last year, he stated that he doubted whether the lands reserved along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway would be worth even one dollar an acre to the contractor. He (Mr. Schultz) would ask the Government to remember the arguments he had used before in regard to the difficulty which was experienced by the Ontario emigrants in finding land at all, on account of the numerous reserves, and he would urge the Government to take the most lenient view of these cases. Again, there was the grievance arising out of the want of main highways. He had frequently before explained to the House the peculiar and disadvantageous position in which most of the new settlements in this country were placed. Shut out from the river highway by a long stretch of minors' lands, these struggling communities had suddenly felt the pressure from the other side of this premature Railway Reserve, and, as no practical aid had been afforded by the Local Government, the task of building their roads had devolved on these weak settlements. He (Mr. Schultz) had always contended that, while the Dominion Government enjoyed the benefit of the sale of the public lands, they were morally bound to assist, at least, in the making of main highways. The people of the settlements in question were not exorbitant in their demands; and, at a series of meetings held, the expression of the resolutions adopted was unanimous in favour of asking the Government simply to allow the relief loan to be paid back in local improvements in the way of roads. This request was not at all unreasonable, and he (Mr. Schultz) trusting that, pending the decision of the Government in the matter, no further steps should be taken to compel the payment of these relief loans. The Government should, he thought, in its own interest, construct a main line of road from the penitentiary to Winnipeg, which, in addition to its value to this public work, would be of infinite value to the settlements beyond, whose roads could be made to converge to this trunk line. He trusted that this matter would receive the immediate attention of the Government, in view of its importance to the settlers in question. Before closing, he desired to draw attention to the very great annoyance and loss which was being caused residents of the settlements east of Red River, by the unfinished state of the Pembina Branch, there being scarcely a crossing along its whole line, and all remonstrances having proved unavailing, when directed to the contractor or his agents, and he thought that this work should not be received nor the contractor paid when the line was in its present state.

MR. MILLS said he had no objection to bring down the communications had with the land office, at Winnipeg, or with parties who had settled upon those lands contrary to the instructions of the Government. They had, however, no return from Winnipeg yet. Hon. gentlemen knew that instructions were issued by the Department, giving permission to parties to settle upon those lands, and informing those who had already settled, contrary to instruction, on the lands reserved for the railway, that they would be permitted to enter their accounts in the books of the land office at Winnipeg, and pay one dollar per acre towards the price which they might be called on to pay for those lands. It was impossible, at present, to fix any price upon the lands in the railroad reservation. That would be arranged afterwards, however, between the Government and any railway company formed for the purpose of constructing that section or perhaps the whole railway. It would be quite improper, at present, for the Government to say at what price those lands would be sold. Those parties who had settled there went there notwithstanding they had received notice that they were not to settle on the railway reservation. It was thought, in the public interest, that those lands should be thrown open for settlement, provided settlers would take the risk of having to pay such prices as might afterwards be considered fair compensation for those lands within the railway limit.

WELLAND CANAL CONTRACTS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

MR. LANGEVIN moved for copy of a return showing the amounts of the six lowest tenders received for Sections 17, 18, 19, 20, 27, 28, 33, 34 and 35 of the new Welland Canal, with the names of the tenderers and copy of the Order in Council awarding the contracts for such sections; also, for copy of all notices and letters issued by the Department of Public Works calling either by the public press or otherwise, for tenders for the supply of railway spikes for the Canada Pacific Railway, with copy of all answers or tenders received from the 1st January, 1876, to the 31st December, 1877, and the names of the parties to whom the contract or contracts were awarded, and for what quantity and what price in each case; and also a similar return for spikes required for the Intercolonial Railway, from the 1st January, 1872.

MR. PLUMB said he was very glad that his hon. friend, who had great experience in connection with public works, and who was well informed on matters connected with one of the great public works of Canada, the Welland Canal, had brought forward this resolution. They had long known that, in the interests of commerce, the work of enlarging that canal should be speedily proceeded with; that it should be brought as rapidly as possible into a condition for navigation, with due regard to economy, and, at the same time, with a proper regard to the forwarding interests which would be affected, and the interests of those who lived near or on the banks of the canal. It was supposed that some delay had occurred in the prosecution of the work. The sections at the end of the canal, towards Lake Ontario, between Thorold and Port Dalhousie, were well forward; a large amount had been expended there, and the work was almost ready for use. He had made personal observation of that part of the canal, having had frequent occasion to pass it, and he observed that the work was very nearly completed. It was quite true that the outlay, which was a very large one, upon locks, masonry, and an expensive work at Port Dalhousie for the accommodation of vessels, was entirely lost to the country until the other parts of the canal, of corresponding size, were completed, so as to afford a passage for vessels having the draught for which the locks were to be constructed throughout the entire canal. He regretted to say that it was a common report that the contracts for the middle sections of the canal had only now been let. The work at both ends of the canal had been nearly finished. It was very much like building the roof of the house before constructing the wall on which the roof was to rest. The canal was nearly finished at both ends, and nothing had been done in the middle; and the contracts which had just been given out, he was led to believe, would occupy three years in completion. In the meantime, that valuable masonry and the clay banks would be constantly suffering from disuse, and it was well understood that the nature of the soil was such that the damage or expense to the country from having this disused ditch, if he might call it so, until it became a canal, would be very great. The work, at present, yielded no return, and it was impossible to understand what policy could have induced those in charge to so delay the completion of the centre of the aqueduct over the Welland River, one of the most important parts, and the cutting between Thorold and Port Robinson, also a very important part of the canal. It was to be hoped that the papers would be brought down at an early date, that the House might thereby be placed in possession of information required for a discussion of that very important subject. He was very glad that his hon. friend had made this motion, and had no doubt but that the remarks he had made would be supplemented by other hon. gentlemen who were in possession of information on the subject which he (Mr. Plumb) did not possess. Living in the neighbourhood of the canal, however, he could not allow a resolution of this kind to be brought forward without drawing the attention of the House to the condition of that great artery of commerce, one of the most important in the whole system of river and lake navigation in the Dominion. He therefore begged to second the motion.

MR. MILLS.

MR. McCALLUM said a large portion of the work was in a forward state; but the larger part of the work, between Thorold and Port Colborne, had been let only a short time, and would take a long time before completion. He had no doubt, from present progress, that it would take three or four years, at least, before the canal was completed so as to allow vessels to pass through drawing even 12 feet of water. He hoped the Government would consider seriously the advisability, if not the necessity, of deepening the canal so as to allow vessels to pass through drawing fourteen feet of water, in order to enable us to get the trade of the west to the seaboard. It would seem, from the record of the proceedings of the Canal Commissioners of the State of New York, that they had made quite a reduction on the tolls, and, sooner than lose the trade of the west, were favourable to removing the tolls altogether; and this country would derive no more revenue from the Welland Canal than at present if it were only deepened to 12 feet. But, if the canal had 14 feet of water, it would get the principal part of that trade coming through the Erie Canal now. As long as the Americans had an advantage of two feet of water, 14 feet on the St. Clair flats, and at Toledo, Chicago, Milwaukee, Buffalo and on the Erie Canal, the trade would go that way. But, with fourteen feet of water in the Welland Canal, even if the Erie Canal had free tolls, trade must go by the Welland Canal and the St. Lawrence to the ocean. The Government should take this question into serious consideration. There was yet time to obtain the additional depth, because it would take four years before the canal was completed from Thorold to Port Dalhousie, and they could raise the locks and prepare that portion of the Welland Canal for fourteen feet of water while other work was being carried forward. There were difficulties in connection with the work on the canal, and several slides had taken place this winter. The Government should push the work forward as fast as possible in order to obtain a return for the money expended on it; that was, if they were to get a return, which he did not think they would, to compensate for the expenditure of deepening the canal to fourteen feet.

MR. NORRIS said he was very glad to see that his hon. friend from Niagara (Mr. Plumb) seemed to take considerable interest in the progress of the work on the Welland Canal. He stated that it was all completed at Port Colborne and Port Dalhousie.

MR. PLUMB: I made no such statement.

MR. NORRIS said he would accept the hon. gentleman's denial. He believed the work was now under contract and was progressing as fast as possible, and part of it had been under contract for some time. He believed, so far as the fourteen feet of water was concerned, his hon. friend from Monck (Mr. McCallum), was quite correct. The Government should undertake, at as early a date as possible, to deepen the canal to fourteen feet of water, and he believed they were laying out their plans with a view to that possibility at every available point. Everybody on the Welland Canal was satisfied that the work was being done as fast as was necessary, or as it could be done.

He fully concurred with the hon. member for Monck that it would be to the interest of the Dominion that we should have fourteen feet of water in the Welland Canal, in order to compete with our neighbours across the line. He had no doubt the Government had taken that matter into consideration, and, on more than one occasion, at interviews, they had agreed to take the matter into consideration.

MR. THOMSON (Welland), said he thought the Minister had told them last year, or the year before, that the locks were so constructed that they could be turned into fourteen feet of water at any time that commerce required it. Now, it appeared to him that there were such extraordinary changes taking place in the mode of transit that it would be very difficult to say whether fourteen feet would be necessary for the future commerce of that canal or not. Canals were not now found to be as necessary for the traffic of the great West as some years ago; and as it would cost a great deal of money to make that canal, with a fourteen feet depth of sill, instead of the intended twelve feet, and as money was very scarce, interest ranging from six to eight per cent., it would be better to wait till money became more plentiful and interest fell to nearer two per cent. than eight, before spending more money on the Welland Canal than was necessary to speedily complete it on the present design. To go on increasing the public expenditure more than was necessary for the present commerce of the country, was to pay too much for their whistle. The people of the country would be perfectly well served by the canal for the next twenty-five years as it was being finished now. If, at the end of ten years, it should be necessary to increase the depth to tide-water it would be more prudent for the Government then to enlarge it to the fourteen feet than to incur an increased expenditure now, when it was not certain whether there would be commerce for it or not that twelve feet sills would not accommodate.

MR. MACKENZIE: I appreciate the anxiety of hon. members concerning the prosecution of a work of such magnitude, both in its physical and commercial aspects, as the Welland Canal, as regards its future, more, perhaps, than its present position. I can only say that nothing has been wanting on the part of the Government to push that canal to completion with all possible haste. Mr. Page, chief engineer of the Department, has devoted almost his whole time to that purpose, although he has been occasionally at the Lachine Canal; still, almost the whole of his time has been taken up with the Welland Canal. The hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) is mistaken in thinking that even a vessel drawing twelve feet will not be able to come through the canal for some years. Such a vessel will be able to pass through the old aqueduct. I observe the hon. member intimates his decided negative to that proposition. I oppose Mr. Page's opinion to his, and the House can judge between them. That is Mr. Page's proposition, and he informed me very recently that he was taking the necessary steps to have that accomplished.

AN HON. MEMBER: When?

MR. MACKENZIE: It will be done this winter. We will have twelve feet of water over it this winter. We will take up the floor and lift off a small portion of the old arches of the aqueduct in order to obtain twelve feet of water, so the completion of the new aqueduct will not necessarily stand in the way. As to the deepening of the whole canal to fourteen feet, hon. gentlemen will remember that this is a matter that has cost a very great deal of money; and what the Government did was fully explained two years ago. It was this: all the works which were necessary to be executed in the beginning—that is, foundation works, or the deepening of any part of the lake level—will be deepened to fourteen feet. But a very large portion of the expense means an addition to the height of the walls of the lock—descending the mountain. That can be done just as well as now, when the trade of the country may seem to justify it. From remarks of hon. gentlemen on various occasions it seems to be a matter of much doubt, and of much more doubt now than formerly,

MR. NORRIS.

—I have not that doubt, however,—whether the canal will take the enormous volume of the North-West trade to the extent at one time anticipated. The tolls on the New York and Erie Canals have been materially lowered, and an agitation is now proceeding in the State of New York to have those tolls entirely removed, claiming that it would be more for the benefit of the State, as a whole, that they should defray the entire cost of working the canal than lose the volume of trade which, under such conditions, would probably pass through it. I do not think that any route can compete with the St. Lawrence route when once it is made, by an enormous outlay, complete in all its details, for promoting internal navigation; and the Mississippi and the St. Lawrence will continue, in my opinion, to be the great arteries of commerce from the interior of this continent. Nothing has been done upon the Welland Canal but what will facilitate and promote the ultimate deepening to the depth spoken of—fourteen feet. That depth is almost wholly for the use of our foreign trade. There are very few of our own harbours on the western coast of Ontario where we can count upon such a depth of water. We can attain it, with some difficulty, at a number of the principal ports. At Kincardine, for example, it is with very great difficulty that we have been able to maintain eleven feet of water. A large expense has been incurred to keep the depth of water at Goderich which we expect will be realized when these works have been completed, in consequence of the prevailing storms in filling up the mouth of the harbour. The United States Government appear to have made up their minds finally to have a depth of fourteen to sixteen feet over the great water-courses from the head of the lakes down to Buffalo. The St. Clair Canal has a depth of sixteen feet; St. Clair River has been deepened, partly by ourselves and partly by the United States Government, but the passage through Lake St. George has yet to be dealt with, and it is uncertain what may be the cost to obtain such a depth as is required to bring vessels drawing fourteen feet into our canals. Two years ago, or more, the United States Government sent us an estimate of the amount they proposed to expend upon waters forming partial boundaries between the two countries, viz., the Detroit River, Lake St. Clair, and River St. Clair. The amount, I believe—I speak from memory—was estimated at $2,900,000, and their proposition was that we should undertake a proportionate amount of that expense compared to our frontier. Our response was simply that, although we owned one-half of the frontier, the vast bulk of the commerce was that proceeding from United States ports and not from Canadian ports, but expressing our willingness to undertake to obtain that depth of water in proportion to our marine and trade. There is no doubt, in my judgment, that the way will be clear for this trade beyond the lakes to pass through the Welland Canal; but whether we will be able, below the Welland Canal, to obtain that depth, without an enormous expenditure, is a question to be fairly considered on its merits. In the meantime, hon. gentlemen who are interested in the Welland Canal ought to be content with the explanations I have given, that the fourteen feet has been attained on the summit level, and in places where we afterwards will have to deepen in order to obtain it; and what will be wanting will be simply to add to the height of the locks. As to the allegation that the Government had left some of the works until too late, the whole matter has all been in the hands of the chief engineer, and he informs me that the works now in progress will be completed in sufficiently good time to enable the trade to be carried through probably early in the year after this present summer.

MR. MCCALLUM: Did I understand the hon. the Minister of Public Works to say that the Welland Canal would be prepared for twelve feet of water this spring. I think, certainly, he did not mean to convey that idea to the House when he expressed doubts in regard to the old aqueduct.

MR. MACKENZIE: I said this: that the aqueduct would be in a state to take vessels through, drawing twelve feet, the coming spring.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY OF SPIKES FOR PACIFIC RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. LANGEVIN moved for copy of all notices and letters issued by the Department of Public Works calling, either by the public press or otherwise, for tenders for the supply of railway spikes for the Canada Pacific Railway, with copy of all answers or tenders received from the 1st January, 1876, to the 31st December, 1877, and the names of the parties to whom the contract or contracts were awarded, and for what quantity and what price in each case.

MR. MACKENZIE said he would ask the hon. gentleman to add to his motion, the words "And also a similar return with regard to the Intercolonial Railway, from 1st January, 1876, to 31st December, 1877."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILWAY LANDS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. PLUMB moved for copies of all correspondence, reports, negotiations, Orders in Council, or other documents, relative to the selection of the terminus and station grounds of the Pacific Railway on the Kamistiquia; the acquisition of lands and other property for such terminus and station grounds; also, the names of all of the valuers of such lands and property and the date of their appointments, and the instructions given to them; also a return showing whether such valuers or either of them have, subsequently to such appointments, received any other Government appointment, the name of such valuator or valuers, the nature of the appointment and the emolument attached thereto; also, the date at which the Government gave notice of the expropriation of such lands in the town plot at Fort William and elsewhere in its vicinity, the amounts paid and yet to be paid for lands and property for such terminus and station grounds, the names of the persons to whom such payments were made and to whom such payments are due, and the quality of such land and property purchased from each person, together with a statement of the several lands and properties purchased for such terminus and station grounds or for which notice of expropriation has been given, with the names of the several proprietors and the price thereof; and a statement showing the whole quantity of land so purchased or to be purchased, together with all correspondence between the Canadian and Ontario Governments on the subject of such lands. He said the subject of the location of the terminus of the Pacific Railway, even though it were only a temporary terminus, was one that must be fully discussed, and would be fully discussed, in this House. No discussion could be satisfactory in regard to this until the papers came down and the House had full information before them. He trusted the House would, at the earliest date, be placed in possession of the information asked for by his motion.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD moved for a statement of the reason, in each case, for the superannuation of the persons in the Civil Service mentioned in the return laid before the House on the 18th February. He said the present reports only gave the name of the person to whom the superannuation was given, without stating the specific reason.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the Government had no objection to give the information asked for, but, if the hon. gentleman wished for the present practice with regard to superannuation reports to be altered, it would be well to have the alteration properly defined.

Motion agreed to.

LEASES OF RIVERS IN QUEBEC.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. Fiset moved for a statement showing the rivers at the present moment under lease in the counties of Rimouski, Gaspé and Bonaventure, and also those on the north coast of the St. Lawrence from the river Saguenay down to the Mingan Islands; the year in which each of such rivers was leased, and for what length of time; the name of the lessee, and the annual sum which he pays to the Government for his lease. He said that, in the Province of Quebec, they had a great number of rivers which were under lease; their number was, perhaps, twenty-eight or thirty, and the revenue which was thus provided amounted to about $2,800; and this was more considerable when they took into consideration the great disadvantages that it created with respect to the resident population. In the county of Rimouski, they had four principal rivers: the Rimouski, Métis, Matane, and Metapedia; and along each of these rivers lived a population which was by no means rich; nevertheless, in accordance with a law passed by the late Administration, these people were forbidden, not only to take salmon, but to fish at all, in these rivers. This law provided that whoever violated this law by fishing in these limits and rivers, or who should use in them any fishing apparatus without the permission of the lessee, or injure such fishery, should incur a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, with costs, or be subject to imprisonment for a period not exceeding two months, and the confiscation of such fishing apparatus and of all the fish so taken. In the county of Rimouski, they had no serious complaints to make respecting those who held these leases, by whom, indeed, they were treated in the most liberal manner, but, notwithstanding this fact, on the north side of the river, this system occasioned an inconvenience and an annoyance to the population which he believed was very considerable. In Rimouski county they had, above all, the Metapedia River, which was frequented by salmon which could be easily taken, though, in consequence of the existence of the law mentioned, the people could not prosecute this valuable fishery. And the statistics which he had in his hand showed that several persons had already been fined in that district for fishing without permission in these waters. At Matane, for instance, last year, one Mr. Harrison, for such an offence, had been condemned to pay $5; and, on the north shore, Mr. Darveau, and many others, had also been fined because they had so offended. To a certain extent, the rivers which were not frequented by salmon were more advantageous to the residents for fishing purposes than those in which salmon were found, for the following reason: that the rivers which were not frequented by salmon were not under lease; and, consequently, the population which lived along their banks, could fish in them. In view of these facts, he thought that the law ought to be so changed as to permit the resident population to exercise the privilege, which was quite important to them, of fishing in all these rivers. On the north side of the St. Lawrence, the state of matters in this regard was still worse. They had there an Indian population, which was permitted to fish in certain rivers, but the consequence of this restriction had been that the supply of fish, which had been quite abundant in those rivers, had been well-nigh exhausted, as was admitted in the report with respect to the River Bersimis. This was also mentioned in the report of the fishery overseer who stated that this river had been entirely fished out, owing to the use of seines, etc.; and, further, that he did not believe that these had been employed judiciously. The Indians were prohibited from fishing in their manner, but, if this were not permitted, what were these people to do? Could it be supposed that these poor Indians could have the means of buying lines and flies, etc., for the purpose of taking salmon? It was absurd to make such a pretension. Besides, with respect to several of these tribes, where the means of taking salmon made use of by the Indians was prohibited, the quantity of these fish had thus been increased; but it was to be borne in mind that this result had been accomplished to the great detriment of the Indian population. Permission was, however, given to lessees to catch salmon in these rivers, and these lessees possessed the means necessary to the purchase of the very considerable amount of apparatus they employed for this purpose; and, in consequence of the outlay, these people were interested in taking as great a number as possible of salmon, and hence they destroyed much more fish than the Indians could do with the limited means they had for taking these fish. And, moreover, under the present system, the rich were favoured to the injury of these poor people. Glancing at the Report of the Fisheries Department for 1876, it would be seen that, despite the means that had been employed for the purpose of protecting salmon, the number caught annually had not increased. For instance, in the division which extended from Point Lévis to Cape Chatte, in 1868, the number taken was 4,545; in 1869, 5,758; in 1870, 9,574; in 1871, 4,432; in 1872, 3,379; in 1873, 4,726; in 1874, 3,342; in 1875, 4,171; in 1876, 5,436. Hence, the returns showed that about the same number of salmon were there taken at the present time as were taken in 1868. Again, if the River Rimouski was selected for illustration, it would be found that in 1869, 57 salmon were taken in its waters; in 1870, 18; in 1871, 68; in 1872, 47; in 1873, 43; in 1874, 73; in 1875, 27; in 1876, 35, and in 1877, 40. As to other rivers, the most important was the Godbout, where, in 1870, 390 salmon were taken; in 1871, 509; in 1872, 275; in 1873, 130; in 1874, 273; in 1875, 210, and in 1876, only 214. And in the River Moisie, 281 were caught in 1873; 256 in 1874; 97 in 1875; and 68 in 1876. He could continue to furnish such illustrations, but, to do so, would only weary the House. If the introduction of salmon into, and the increase of salmon in, our rivers was to be encouraged, the present system was not the one which should be adopted in order to effect this object. Its effect was rather to enable a few gentlemen to amuse themselves by angling; for our rivers, so favoured, were not numerous. It was all very well to provide this very agreeable sport for these gentlemen; but, nevertheless, in order that this might be done, and in order that sport might be furnished for a few rich people, it was not advisable to deprive these poor mountaineers of their supply of food. In 1873, the attention of the House had been drawn to this subject by the Hon. Mr. Pournier, who then made some very judicious observations, which, unfortunately, had not been carried into effect. And this year, he (Mr. Fiset) considered it to be his duty to again call the attention of the House to this very important matter, and he hoped that the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would see that justice, in this regard, was done the poor population in question, and above all, the poor Indians who lived on the north shore of the St. Lawrence. He had occasion, last year, to visit that locality; and he had then had opportunity to hear the very bitter complaints which these people made in this relation. He trusted that these remarks would receive favourable consideration, and induce the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to amend the laws which in this respect to-day existed.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland): I do not understand the French language well enough to appreciate the observations of the hon. member; I will take the opportunity, at a very early day, to secure all the information possible with respect to this subject.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) moved for copies of the annual returns of the capital, traffic and working expenditure for the two last financial years of the Canada Southern Railway Company, required to be made to the Minister of Public Works under chapter 25, 38 Victoria and chapter 14, 39 Victoria, Statutes of Canada.

MR. MACKENZIE said his impression was that the general report of the Superintendent of Railways contained the largest amount of information the Government could furnish. They could, of course, apply to the company for such information, but he was afraid it would not reach the House for two or three weeks to come. If the hon. member would state the exact information required, he would endeavour to give it as soon as possible.

MR. MACDOUGALL said the object of his motion was to ascertain why the Act of Parliament requiring this company to furnish such returns, within twenty-one days after the assembling of Parliament, had not been complied with.

Motion agreed to.

WINDSOR AND ANNAPOLIS RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD, for Mr. TUPPER, moved for copies of all papers, correspondence and Orders in Council, connected with the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, the Windsor Branch and the Western Counties Railway, and all papers and Orders in Council and correspondence in connection with the purchase of an annuity by the Western Counties company, or the guarantee of an annual sum of money to that company for a special number of years.

MR. MACKENZIE said he supposed the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) only required those which had not been published. He would recollect that, in October, 1873, Orders in Council were passed by the late Administration affecting the Windsor Branch of that railway, and that, based upon these Orders in Council, an Act was passed in the Session of 1874, to confirm the agreements entered into with the Western Counties Company for the transfer of the Windsor Branch to that Company upon certain conditions. They had no other correspondence, except with reference to carrying out the statute of 1874. He was aware of no correspondence with reference to the purchase of an annuity by the company.

Motion agreed to.

LAPSED APPROPRIATIONS OF 1876-7.

MOTION FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD, for Mr. TUPPER, moved for a copy of all Orders in Council relating to balances of appropriations of 1876-7 which may have lapsed, and been carried over to the following year in accordance with the 35th section of the Act 31st Victoria, chapter 5.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he believed the whole of the information asked for would be found in the Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

PEMBINA BRANCH RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR COPY OF TENDERS.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD, for Mr. TUPPER, moved for copy of tenders received for the construction of that portion of the Pembina Branch Railway together with copies of all reports, correspondence and Orders in Council relating to the letting of this work.

MR. MACKENZIE said he thought there were no tenders other than those received for the branch three years ago. There was Mr. Debrowski's, and, when the Government decided to finish the remaining part of this road, Mr. Whitehead was directed to proceed with it at the prices which he had for the balance of the road. The reason for proceeding with it at that particular time was because the rails for the main line were at St. Boniface, or thereabouts, and it was impossible to get them down the river without great labour and expense, and it was deemed best, therefore, to have the entire branch finished, so that they might get the rails down by the line to the crossing place at Selkirk. They had no objection to the motion passing, and they would bring down other papers connected with the matter.

Motion agreed to.

THE NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE AND THE INDIANS.

MOTION FOR COPIES OF TENDERS.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD, for Mr. TUPPER, moved for returns of all tenders received, and contracts let, for the supplies furnished the Indians and Mounted Police in the North-West; also, for those furnished the public works at Battleford and the Fort Frances Locks and Canals; also, for all tenders received and contracts let for freighting all the above supplies; also, for returns of the accounts, giving quantity, quality, description and expenditure incurred for the supplies of all kinds purchased and freighted, otherwise than by public tender, for the above works; also, for returns of all labour and superintendence employed either by the day, month, or year, on all works in the North-West, Manitoba, and on the Fort Frances Canals; also, for the returns of all accounts showing the expenditure that was incurred owing to the non-arrival of the supplies at the different points in the North-West for the Indians, as the latter had to be fed by supplies purchased at retail prices at those places during the time they had to wait.

MR. MILLS said he had no objection to the motion; but some of the matters there referred to were still matters of correspondence, which it would not be advisable to bring down in their present state.

Motion agreed to.

SURVEY OF LINGAN HARBOUR.

MOTION FOR COPY OF REPORT.

MR. McDONALD (Cape Breton) moved for copy of the report of the survey of the harbour of Lingan, Cape Breton, and copies of all correspondence between the Minister of Public Works and any other person relating to the same.

Motion agreed to.

EXPENDITURE ON PUBLIC WORKS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. OLIVER moved for a return showing the sums expended on Public Works chargeable to income, during the fiscal years 1874-5, 1875-6, 1876-7, for which votes had been obtained in the Estimates of 1873-4.

Motion agreed to.

THE DAWSON ROUTE.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. LANGEVIN moved for copy of all correspondence, reports and documents relating to amounts claimed by Messrs. Carpenter and Company, on account of their contract for operating the Government road commonly known as the Dawson Route; also copy of all Orders in Council authorizing the payment of amounts from the first of January, 1877, to the present time, and a statement of the sums so paid from time to time, and dates of such payments.

Motion agreed to.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

LACHINE CANAL TENDERS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. LANGEVIN moved for return showing the amounts of the six lowest tenders for Sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 11 of the Lachine Canal, with the names of tenderers, names of parties to whom the contracts were awarded, and copies of the Orders in Council relating thereto; also the date mentioned in the contracts for the completion of the work, and the gross amount of work done as per engineer's progress estimate up to the 31st of January last.

Motion agreed to.

EXPENDITURE ON PACIFIC RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. RYAN moved for a statement showing the amount of moneys disbursed up to January 1st, 1878, upon contracts Nos. 13, 14, 15, 23 and 25 of the Canada Pacific Railway.

Motion agreed to.

MAIL BETWEEN QUEBEC AND CHICOUTIMI.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. CIMON moved for copies of all correspondence in relation to the carrying of the mail between Quebec and Chicoutimi, since the 1st January, 1877. In making this motion, he said he would ask if the hon. the Postmaster-General had taken into consideration the complaints of the people of Chicoutimi relating to the system of carrying the mails between Quebec and Chicoutimi last year, during the season of navigation, whereas that system had been very defective. The hon. the Postmaster-General would remember that, during previous years, there had been a daily delivery of the mails between these places; but, under the system which the hon. gentleman had adopted last summer, the mails had been delivered between the places mentioned only three times a week. With the previous system, which was in operation for a number of years, the population generally, and commercial men were well satisfied. He did not know to what influence was due the order from the Department, that henceforward, during the season of navigation, they should be treated in the manner he had mentioned, in order to meet the views of certain strangers from Toronto and the Province of Ontario, who passed the sultry portion of the summer at Malbaie, but, to satisfy the demands of these people, the interests of the population in question had been set aside and disregarded. The mails, last year, had been despatched by the Grand Trunk Railway to St. Denis, whence they were conveyed by steamer to Malbaie. As far as Malbaie was concerned, this was all very well, because there the mails were delivered daily, but the result of this system had been, that the people of Chicoutimi, in lieu of being supplied with a daily mail, were furnished with their mails only three times a week, as the mails were taken from Malbaie in vehicles which arrived in Chicoutimi two days after their arrival at Malbaie. The hon. the Postmaster-General would perceive how inconvenient this system was; and he trusted that the hon. gentleman would have it remedied next year.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he was led to take this opportunity, the first that had presented itself, to make the following statement:—The other day, he had said that, this year, the mails stopped at Baie St. Paul every day or four or five times a week; and the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) had then stated that he was in error, and that the boat only stopped at that place twice a week for mail purposes. He had since written to Quebec, and, having ascertained that the hon. gentleman was right, he wished to take this opportunity for saying so.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he could only give the hon. gentleman about the same answer that he had given to the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) on this subject the other evening. There was no disposition on the part of the Department to sacrifice the interests of one portion of the population in order to suit the convenience of another portion. He had given orders, and he was sure that the hon. gentleman would not object to it in this case, that, when the papers were brought down, the returns should show the actual trips made. When these were in his possession, he would see where the difficulty lay; and, in case such existed, he would have it removed, if this were possible.

Mr. LANGEVIN: The trips made all the way from Quebec to Chicoutimi?

Mr. HUNTINGTON: From Murray Bay below, because we know that, from Quebec to Murray Bay, the mail is delivered daily.

Mr. LANGEVIN: I think it would be better, and more satisfactory to all interested, to furnish a complete statement. There are probably five or six way offices.

MR. HORTON moved for all correspondence respecting the establishing of bonded warehouses at the village of Carronbrook and town of Clinton in the county of Huron.

Motion agreed to.

REMOVAL OF NEW CAMPBELLTON CUSTOM-HOUSE.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. CAMPBELL moved for papers and correspondence in connection with the removal of the custom-house from the port of New Campbellton, Great Bras D'Or, to the Island of Boularderie, in the county of Victoria, Province of Nova Scotia. He said that he could not comprehend why the custom-house should have been removed, placing the people who had invested their money in buying land or building in close proximity to it at so great a disadvantage. The custom-house and the bonded warehouses had been there for fifteen or sixteen years, but now it had been removed to an island five or six miles away, and property in the neighbourhood had been very much depreciated.

MR. BURPEE (St. John) said that so far they knew of no correspondence whatever with regard to the removal of the custom-house, and, before the notice of motion was made, they had no idea that it had been removed. They had since telegraphed to the Collector at Campbellton, who had replied that no change had taken place.

MR. CAMPBELL said he held in his hand Government papers, stating distinctly that it had been removed, but, as they were marked "private," he did not care to lay them before the House. If the custom-house had been removed without the knowledge of the Collector of Customs, perhaps he would have it carried back to its original position.

MR. DOMVILLE said the hon. the member for Victoria (Mr. Campbell) had the correspondence in his hand, but because it was marked "private" he had some delicacy in reading it. If the Government were anxious to have it read it could be read, but perhaps it would not suit their views. He did not know how they could say there was no correspondence on the subject.

MR. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said he would ask the hon. the Minister of Customs, whether he meant to say that there was no custom-house at Boularderie, and that there was one at Campbellton?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the motion would have this good effect, that it would give the necessary information to the Minister of Customs, who was not able to answer a question on the paper—and the only one, in fact—respecting his own Department.

MR. BURPEE (St. John) said he had made enquiries at the Department here, and they had telegraphed to the Collector at Campbellton, who said no removal had taken place.

Motion agreed to.

POST-OFFICE CHANGES AT CAMPBELLTON.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. CAMPBELL moved for papers and correspondence in connection with the changing of the post-office at the port of New Campbellton, to a way office, and the reduction of the salary of the postmaster; also a statement shewing the amount of postage stamps disposed of by the several post and way offices during the year 1876 and the year 1877, in the county of Victoria, Nova Scotia. He said the Government had spoken of the number of way offices they had made into post-offices, but in this case they had reduced the post-office to a way office. He had complained to the Postmaster-General of the injustice done to Campbellton by the alteration, and he had admitted that it was a mistake and should be corrected. He found, however, that the postmaster at Campbellton had had his salary reduced from $40 to $22, while from the Postmaster-General's returns it appeared that Campbellton post-office stood second in the county in regard to the amount of its revenue. He found, also, that wherever there was a Grit postmaster he received four times as much salary for less work. He thought this should be explained.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Everybody understands it.

MR. CAMPBELL said that at the next post-office the postmaster received a salary of $87, and the next $87.53, the next $80 odd, and so on, while Campbellton, which would compare favourably with any of them in point of revenue, only paid its postmaster $22. It was not as if the man had started at that salary, but the very fact of reducing it looked so glaring.

IMPORTATIONS OF HORSES, CATTLE, AND SHEEP.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. HIGINBOTHAM moved for a statement of the number and value of all horses, horned cattle and sheep imported into the Dominion from the first day of February, 1877, to the first day of February, 1878; also number and value exported during same period.

MR. LITTLE said he had understood that the hon. member intended to embrace in his motion what he himself desired, in addition to the above motion. He wished to include information respecting all the live stock imported into, and exported from, the Dominion of Canada, so far as regarded our trade relations with Great Britain, her other colonies, and the United States, together with the value of the same, and the duties collected on each from the 1st of January, 1877, to the 1st of January, 1878.

MR. ROULEAU.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman, doubtless, has no objection to include this in his motion.

MR. HIGINBOTHAM said he had not the slightest objection to it. He had explained to the hon. member that he could not alter his resolution without the consent of the House, and this he had intended to ask for.

Motion agreed to.

BRITISH COLUMBIA FISHERIES.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

MR. DECOSMOS moved for a return containing a complete copy of the report of the Inspector of Fisheries for British Columbia for 1877, with a statement of the expenditure connected therewith. He said he wished to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that, as yet, no report had been placed before the House respecting the fisheries of British Columbia, and more particularly as regarded its salmon fisheries. Last year, according to the returns laid before the House, there was about $70,000 worth of salmon shipped; and this year the increase in the salmon industry had been so great that nearly $400,000 worth of these fish had been exported from this Province. During the year 1878 it was expected that fully $1,000,000 worth of salmon, pickled and canned, but mainly canned, would be sent out of the Province; and it was evident that an export of such great value as this was entitled to the consideration of the House and of the Government. He hoped, when the return was brought down.

the members for British Columbia would be able to offer to the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries useful suggestions with regard to providing certain rules and regulations which were absolutely necessary, in order to promote this industry, as well as preserve the fish. And when the report came down, all those who were interested in this fishery, and in that western Province, would have an opportunity of reading what the Inspector had been doing in this particular.

OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.

MR. CHRISTIE moved :

"That the interests of public morality and the physical well-being of all classes of the community alike, render it desirable and necessary, that there should be a strict and uniform observance of the Lord's Day on all the public works which are under the control of the Dominion Government; that, in the opinion of this House, there should be an entire closing and cessation of labour on all canals, railways and other public works which are under the control of the Dominion Government, during the twenty-four hours comprehending the Lord's Day, save and except only such services as may be of absolute and unavoidable necessity."

He said that he did not intend to occupy the time of the House at any length; that the resolutions spoke for themselves. For many years he had taken a deep interest in the question of sabbath observance. He believed it was very closely connected with the prosperity and the well-being of the country; and he felt it his duty not to allow the present Session to pass without bringing this question up to the consideration of the House. He, perhaps, ought to state that these resolutions were first submitted two years ago by the late Mr. Gordon, then member for North Ontario. It would be remembered how ably and how earnestly that gentleman had advocated the cause of sabbath observance on that occasion; and a few weeks later, when he felt that his work was done, and that the hand of death was laid upon him, on the very morning he died, he called his daughter to his bedside, and sent him (Mr. Christie) this message: "Tell Dr. Christie, the member for Argenteuil, that I lay my last, my dying request upon him to place my resolutions on sabbath observance before the House of Commons during the last Session of the present Parliament." He need not state that he considered this very solemn and very touching message a solemn legacy of duty which he hoped the House would now aid him in carrying out to a successful issue. In moving these resolutions, he did not ask for the introduction of any new principle in our legislation, but simply for the extension of one which was now recognized and acted upon. They all knew that it was the avowed policy of the present Administration to secure the observance of the sabbath, and to reduce the amount of service performed on that day in all departments to a minimum; but, notwithstanding all that had been done in this regard, it was still a painful fact that there still existed a very considerable amount of Sunday labor on the canals and railways, and in other department. On our canals, they found that great diversity of practice existed as regarded their closing on Sunday. Our largest and most important ones, the Welland, Lachine and Cornwall Canals, were closed during the whole day, whereas the series of canal locks, known as the Carillon and Grenville locks, were only closed during a portion of the day, from seven in the morning to seven in the evening, while the St. Anne's and St. Ours locks were open during the whole day. Many of his constituents had long complained of the desecration of the sabbath which took place in this connection, and they had repeatedly petitioned the House to close these canals on Sunday; but, despite all these remonstrances, the evil complained of was still continued, and still exercised a most demoralizing effect, familiarizing the mind of the public with Sunday labour and disturbing the peace and quiet of the inhabitants along this great highway of navigation. Now, he thought it could not be urged that any real necessity existed why these canals should be kept open during any portion of the Lord's day. The goods that passed through them then were not generally of a perishable nature; and not the slightest difficulty would be experienced in passing all goods and the crafts through them during the six days of the week. And the experience which they had already had on the canals that had been so closed, he thought, had abundantly established the fact that the adoption of this course would not involve any serious inconvenience to the public or any loss to the trade and commerce of the country; but, on the contrary, that it would have the most beneficial result, both as regarded the prosperity and the morality of the people. He was aware it was urged in this House two years ago, when these resolutions were up before the House of Commons, that this would be inconvenient and that it would afford boatmen an opportunity of visiting taverns along the shore; but he was convinced that this view was entirely fallacious, and that these fears were quite groundless. To his mind, this pretension was not borne out by the experience of those who had resided in the vicinity of the canals that had been closed, and, in his opinion, it was perfectly monstrous to suppose that the temperance and morality of the boatmen could ever be promoted by robbing them of their sabbath and depriving them of all the benefits of religious instruction, or that the interests of morality would ever be advanced by the open and unnecessary violation of any of God's commands. His contention was this: that, as our largest and most important canals had been so closed with most beneficial results, the regulations should be more uniform and he extended to every canal and lock throughout the Dominion. Perhaps he might remind the House that, ten years ago, in May, 1868, a resolution of this House was adopted ordering these very canals to be closed on Sunday; but, in order to meet the views of some of the forwarders, the Administration of the day appeared to have compromised the matter and closed them only during a portion of the day. He trusted that the House would not go back on its own record, and would see to it that this resolution was carried out, and that these canals and every canal and lock throughout the Dominion was closed. There was some diversity of practice too, in this respect, in the Post-Office Department. In the Province of Ontario, and throughout the whole Dominion, the Province of Quebec excepted, the postmasters were permitted to close their offices to the public during the Lord's day; but, in the Province of Quebec, the postmasters were required to keep their offices open, at least during one hour on that day, either before or after divine service, as might be most convenient to the public. He knew, as a matter of fact, that, in some sections of the Province of Quebec, the post-offices were then closed, because the public sentiment would not tolerate any other course; but, in other places, where the public sentiment was divided on this point, the postmasters were kept in a state of anxiety lest they should be compelled, under this regulation, to open their offices, and be forced to do violence to their consciences, or to resign their postmasterships in consequence of such order. They looked to the House for relief, and requested that the regulations should be made uniform, and that they should have the privilege of the whole sabbath, as well as the rest of the Dominion. If no inconvenience had been felt in Ontario, none should be felt in the Province of Quebec, and he ventured to express the hope that hon. gentlemen from that Province would aid him in this matter. It was not a party question, but was one on which all parties and creeds might unite to secure the better observance of the sabbath, and the great boon of the whole sabbath to the postmasters in the Province of Quebec. He was happy to congratulate the Administration on having stopped the running of mail trains on the Intercolonial railway on Sundays. That was a step in the right direction, and would meet the approval of the country. He would not now speak of the desecration of the sabbath which took place in connection with our railways. The hon. gentleman who seconded the resolution intended to take up that branch of the question. There was only one other point to which he (Mr. Christie) desired to call the attention of the House for a moment. It would be remembered that, two years ago, an hon. member from Montreal pointed out that a great deal of sabbath labour was carried on in this Chamber and in these buildings, and that, if they favoured sabbath reform on canals and public works, they should look nearer home. He (Mr. Christie) quite agreed with that hon. gentleman. He did not speak from personal knowledge or from his own observation, for he had not had occasion to visit this Chamber during the Lord's day, but, if it was true that the library and the reading room and post-office were open during the sabbath, and that the employés of the House were deprived of the day's rest which God had given them, and from attending divine worship, he thought it was an abuse which should be corrected. He would not speak of the divine obligation which rested upon them of keeping the sabbath, because he believed that was fully recognized by the House; nor was it necessary to prove that the sabbath was necessary for the welfare of mankind; that it was no arbitrary institution, but one designed for man's benefit, in accord and harmony with his being. It was his full belief that the man who observed the Sabbath would not only enjoy a greater measure of health, but would obtain a greater degree of prosperity and happiness, than he who disregarded it. What was true of the individual, was equally true of the State. He expressed the earnest hope that hon. members would give this question their serious consideration and support, and that the Government would carry out the reforms to which he had so briefly and imperfectly alluded.

MR. GOUDGE, in rising to second the resolution, said he did not propose to enter into the merits of this question, because he believed it was conceded on all hands that the Lord's day should, as far as possible, be separated from work in connection with the public Departments. His principal object in rising was to speak with reference to the management of the railways in the Province of Nova Scotia, and to express what he believed to be the public opinion with reference to the running of sabbath trains within that Province. The different religious bodies had, he believed, memorialized the Government on that subject, and he was glad to know that the Government had listened to the expressions of opinion which had been presented to them and had given an order, so far as the management of the Intercolonial Railway was concerned—the only one in the Province over which they had any control—that the sabbath traffic should be reduced to a minimum. He read the order which had been issued to stop the running of freight or special trains—

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD :
Special trains ?

MR. GOUDGE said yes, special trains, except in cases of special emergency. He congratulated the Government and the country on the fact that the train carrying the mails from Canada to be placed on board the mail ship at Halifax did not now run on Sunday, and that the mails were despatched on Saturday instead. While he, and he believed the people of Nova Scotia, had very strong views on this subject, he was glad to believe that the Government had, as far as it was in their power, at least upon the Intercolonial, lately endeavoured to reduce the sabbath traffic upon the road; and he hoped their efforts in that direction would be continued.

MR. MCKAY (Colchester) said he was very much pleased to learn that the Government had stopped the Sunday mail train. He knew it was very difficult to put a stop to it; but, while there might be a reasonable excuse for the termination of that train at Halifax on Sunday morning, he objected to the running of freight trains on Sunday. He lived near a very important station on the Intercolonial Railway, and he knew that a great many freight trains ran on Sunday. It had been news to him to receive a reply to a memorial, similar to that referred to by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Goudge), stating that orders had been given to stop freight and special trains, because he knew that freight and special trains continually ran.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was obliged to the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McKay) for the information he had given. He was not aware of any freight trains passing over the road on Sundays, though it was found absolutely necessary that trains reaching Halifax early on Sunday morning should be allowed to conclude their journey; otherwise another week would be lost in regard to the steamers. The Intercolonial Railway formed a link in a long line from the interior of the continent, and, if they hoped to retain a large portion of the traffic from the interior, they must be ready to terminate the journey in a reasonable way, and not to stop at Amherst or elsewhere for twenty-four hours with a car-load of passengers. They, therefore, arrived at a conclusion, which, he believed, was acceptable to the religious bodies generally, that they should reach Halifax at eight or nine o'clock on the Sunday morning. The train from St. John to Moncton would reach there earlier. As to the other question, there were great differences of opinion as to the obligatory character of the sabbath under the Christian as compared with the Mosaic dispensation. All were agreed that one day in seven should be observed as a day of rest, and, as a rule, all in this country admitted the sanctity of the sabbath day. It was the desire of the Government to limit, as far as possible, the engagements in regard to labour on that day, both on the canals and on the railways. With regard to freight trains, it had occurred to him that it was quite possible that there might be a difficulty in stopping some trains. Some, for instance, were loaded almost entirely with fresh meat, and some of the cars were built specially for the purpose, with an apparatus worked from the axle of the carriage upon which the car was set, in order to keep the air cool and the car thoroughly ventilated. It was possible that some of those trains might have been endeavouring to reach the steamer on the Sunday morning, and it was impossible to stop them without destroying the freight. He would, however, make enquiries on that point. As to the canals on the Ottawa River, with which his hon. friend from Argeuteuil (Mr. Christie) was more immediately connected, a resolution, not quite so stringent as this, was passed in the Parliament of the Dominion in 1869 or early in 1870, regulating the time for the traffic on those canals, and requiring the boats to stop at seven o'clock on sabbath morning and not to proceed till seven o'clock on sabbath evening. His hon. friend complained that, even at these hours, persons with little or nothing to do gathered at the mouth of the canal and sabbath profanation ensued, and proposed that the twenty-four hours should be held sacred there as it was on the Welland Canal. He (Mr. Mackenzie) thought his hon. friend's resolution was, perhaps, a little too sweeping in its terms, and it would be better to modify it somewhat so as not to bind the House, and, through it, the Government, under cases of very great inconvenience. Of course, whatever resolution was passed by the House the Government would feel bound to enforce to the best of its power, and, if the resolution were worded as this was, great inconvenience might result. If the resolution were modified a little the Government would endeavour to avoid any traffic which could be fairly avoided. One of the cases in regard to which complaints were seriously made by two or three religious bodies in New Brunswick had been a special train on the Intercolonial, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) had found that it was a train which had been procured by a religious denomination to carry a number of people to the opening of a church at some little distance.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That did not make it any better.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not state whether it was better or worse, but it was said that it was no worse to do that than to hire a hack on the street. It was doubtful whether or not it was conducive to public morality to engage a train on Sunday, even to carry people to the opening of a church; but, at all events, there was no evil motive: the motive was a laudable one, and the object a laudable one.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said he agreed with the hon. member for Argeuteuil (Mr. Christie) that, as far as practicable, they should urge the strict observance of the Lord's day. It was neither a sectarian nor a political question, but was one properly in the interests of morality as well as of the physical benefit of the community at large. He knew that the hon. gentlemen would agree with him that, while he was exceedingly anxious, and honestly and devoutly so, that this holy day should be observed with the utmost strictness, if they could not possibly carry out the principle to the fullest extent they desired, those who were at the head of the Department, and especially the leader of the House, the hon. the Minister of Public Works was the best able to say whether it was practicable or not to give effect to the resolution. As the hon. the Premier had stated that he was willing to go as far as possible to meet their wishes in that respect, while keeping within the bounds of what was practicable, he (Mr. Macdougall) would submit whether they could not give practicable shape to what they desired by modifying the resolution to a certain extent, and at the same time affirming the principle. He submitted the following amendment to his hon. friend from Argenteuil:—

“That the interest of public morality and the physical well-being of all classes of the community require that the Lord's Day should be strictly observed by persons engaged in the Public Works under the control of the Government of Canada, so far as it is practicable to do so; that, in the opinion of this House, there should be a cessation of labour on the Lord's Day on canals, railways, and other public works which are under the control of the Government of Canada, so far as, in the opinion of the Government, it shall be found practicable to do so.”

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member offer this as an amendment?

MR. MACDOUGALL: I offer it for the consideration of the hon. gentleman.

MR. CHRISTIE said the amendment affirmed the principle for which he was contending, and, if it would meet the views of the House better than the original motion, he would be willing to accept it. He accepted the assurance of the Premier that the canals would be looked into and closed on Sundays. That was the point at which he had been specially aiming, and he should be satisfied with that assurance. His views were quite unchanged, and, if these reforms were not carried out, and if he should be spared, and be again returned to this House, he should take up the question again and again, and endeavour, as far as he could, to secure the strict observance of the sabbath on the railways, on the canals, and in the Post-Office Department.

MR. MCCRANEY said the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Christie) deserved the thanks of the House for bringing this matter forward. He strongly approved of the resolution and thought it was a step in the right direction. He looked upon the Government of the country as the guardian, to a certain extent, of the public morality and he considered it was their duty to see that the Lord's day should be observed as far as possible on the canals and railways of our country. No individual or nation ever became great or good that continually broke the divine command, but, on the other hand, the individual, corporation or nation that adhered the closest to the divine law was the most prosperous. He did not know that in Ontario they had much to complain of. He recollected very well when the post-offices in that Province were open part of the Lord's day, and when they were closed it was at first considered by some a hardship, but now the moral sentiment of the people of the Province had become so strong that they would never consent to have them opened on the sabbath again. He trusted the Government would do everything in its power to carry out the expressions of the resolution.

MR. PLUMB said this matter had many times been urged upon the Government without effect, and he was rather surprised now, when a resolution affecting public morality was brought forward, to see his hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Macdougall) propose a modified resolution, leaving this great question of public morality to the private judgment of the Government. He did not think that, in great questions of public morality, the right of private judgment should be assigned to the Government of the day. A great principle should be affirmed, and should be binding on the country; it should not be left to any person who might be in charge of the public works of the country to say how far such liberty should be extended. This was not a question of expediency. He could not imagine that the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Christie) would accept a modification of a principle which was, he believed, acceptable to everyone in the House. Six days of labour was certainly sufficient for a labouring man, and he had no doubt that it was in the interest of the workingman that his hon. friend had brought down his resolution. It was a great public question, and, if the hon. gentleman left it entirely in the hands of the Government, he would be leaving the consciences of the labouring men in their hands.

MR. SPEAKER said he understood the mover of the original resolution accepted this as a substitute.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it must be moved as an amendment if brought in at all.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said he quite sympathized with the object his hon. friend from Argenteuil (Mr. Christie) had at heart in moving the resolution. When the late Mr. Gordon first moved such a resolution, he (Mr. Ross) had concurred with him, and he held the same opinion still. He did not agree with his hon. friend from Niagara (Mr. Plumb) that the resolution, in its modified form, should not be acceptable to the House. After the expression of the leader of the Government as to his views on sabbath labour, he thought it was clear that the matter was safe in the hands of the present Administration. How it might be under different circumstances, he was not prepared to say; but the public opinion of the country would sustain any effort of any Government to obtain the cessation of public labour on Sundays on railways, canals, and other public works.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) moved his resolution as an amendment.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought the purpose of the mover of the original resolution would have been served if he had been satisfied with the statement of the hon. the Premier, and had withdrawn his resolution; but he had not done so, and, instead of his own resolution, which laid down a broad and strong principle, an amendment had been proposed, which it was impossible for the hon. gentleman consistently to accept. How could the hon. member give up a principle, which he said was not only desirable, but necessary to the public well-being, and hand it over to the Government, or allow such a phrase to be put in as "as far as practicable"? He thought the amendment conveyed, substantially, the views of the Premier, but it was not consistent with the principle asserted in the original resolution. He supposed they all agreed that there should be a day of rest, and the law pointed out what that day of rest was. He would suggest, as they had but one interest in this matter, that great care should be taken in preparing a resolution which had to be carried out. He thought, if the hon. mover of the amendment would carefully consider the language of his resolution, he would find that very many cavils could be raised against it. He would suggest that the debate should be adjourned, so that the hon. gentleman could have communication with the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, and settle on some practical resolution, which would embrace the views of the Government, of the Premier, and of the majority in this House. The amendment would not affect post-office labour at all, and he had understood that one of the objects of the mover of the original resolution was to prevent post-offices being kept open on Sunday. He also understood that he objected to the employés of this House, or the other House, being kept at work during Sunday. This amendment would not affect them, as it referred to canals, railways, and other public works.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said he only desired to meet the wish of the House, and give effect to the principle as far as it was practicable to do so. He had been surprised to hear his hon. friend from Niagara (Mr. Plumb) berate him for moving a resolution which, in its spirit, was intended to carry out the principle which his hon. friend from Argenteuil (Mr. Christie), himself, and others held dear. He had been surprised to hear the hon. member for Niagara endeavour to make a little political capital out of that.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order.

MR. DOMVILLE said he was very glad to see that the House had taken this matter up. He did not like to see trains continually passing before his door on Sunday. It was an example to others. People could not work seven days in the week. They saw great public men breaking down from over-work, and much more might officials be expected to break down from having to work every day in the week. There might, of course, be occasions when it was necessary to swear in a Minister or remove an official, on which a special train might be run. "Needs must when the devil drives." But, generally, the running of these trains on Sundays was abominable. He said this without wishing to make capital out of it, but in the interest of the public; and he hoped the House would pass unanimously such a resolution as would ensure that work which could be left aside on Sunday would be left aside, though, as there was certain work which must be performed, they could not lay down a cast-iron rule.

MR. PLUMB said perhaps he might be allowed to say one word in reply to the extraordinary remarks of his hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Macdougall). He had risen, he thought, in the interest of morality, to sustain the motion of the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Christie). It was evident that the motion of the hon. member for East Elgin was a temporizing with this great public question, and he had spoken on behalf of the hon. member for Argenteuil, who had made it a speciality, who had made it his study, who represented a particularly sabbath-observing constituency.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) asked if the hon. gentleman was in order.

MR. SPEAKER said the hon. member had spoken before the amendment was put. He therefore thought he was strictly in his right, but he put it to him whether it was fair for him to reply to a speech which he (Mr. Speaker) had cut short.

MR. DYMOND said he had not been surprised at the conduct of the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), because he was appearing in his usual rôle, and, seeing how harmless his efforts usually were, they might be very safely passed over. It might be well to let some persons severely alone, and, perhaps, that would be the best course to take with regard to his hon. friend. He (Mr. Dymond) rose, not to pay any attention to his hon. friend, but to refer to a statement that, because an hon. gentleman laid down a broad abstract proposition and enforced it upon the House, he was precluded from accepting any qualification of that proposition, even though it should be shown that the House would support it, and that it was utterly impossible to carry out the original proposition. His hon. friend from Argenteuil was not alone in holding strong views on this subject and on other questions of an abstract nature. He (Mr. Dymond) himself held strong views on some questions of that kind. On the question of war, many persons with whom he was acquainted—he was not ashamed to say he was one—objected to bear arms under any circumstances. He would be willing to bring that subject before the House if it would be productive of any service, but that, surely, would not preclude him from voting for a practical proposal in favour of international arbitration. No one could doubt the sincerity or sense of responsibility resting upon his hon. friend from Argenteuil, when they remembered the injunction laid upon him by one who was gone, and when they knew how intimate were the terms between the hon. member and the late member for North Ontario. Remembering these things, they ought to say nothing that was not complimentary or kindly in its terms, in regard to the hon. gentleman. The amendment suggested that they should leave the question, which it was impossible to deal with in its broadest sense, in the hands of the Government. The Government were well acquainted with the feeling of the House and the country, that the sabbath day should be observed as far as possible—or, as the amendment put it,—practicable. What could be more intelligible or reasonable? There was a great deal of superstition with regard to the sabbath, as well as with regard to a great many other things. He believed that, the better and more religiously-minded a man was, the better man and the more prosperous he would be; but that did not involve the laying down of arbitrary rules for others, especially when those rules had reference to public affairs, and if observed too rigidly might interfere seriously with the interests and rights of the public. They were here as trustees of the nation. Supposing many of them were opposed to bearing arms, that would not justify them in abolishing the militia; everybody would not feel inclined to have his throat cut rather than fight the invading enemy. There were persons who did not object to drive in a buggy to their church, or even, as they had heard, to hire a special train to open a church on the sabbath day, and he was not inclined to judge or blame them for doing so. The House should be careful that it did not bear too heavily upon those who had different opinions. Their duty was to do nothing knowingly and intentionally which would be at variance with the conscience of others. They should work out that rule as far as they could, but should not go further. It was true, as the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) had said, that many cavils might be raised with regard to this matter. It had seemed to him that one cavil had been raised that night by the right hon. gentleman in reference to the character of the present amendment, as contrasted with the original motion. It had seemed to him that there was no reason whatever for objecting to that amendment or to its being substituted for the original motion; and, although there could be no objection, he supposed, to a resolution being framed binding the Government in more explicit terms, he thought they would all leave the House with a good conscience if they adopted the amendment and let the matter remain there for the present. Members of the House were sometimes charged with not observing the sabbath day. He did not think there was much reproach due to them on that account. He had been struck, before he was a member and since he had had a seat upon the floor of the House, with the appropriate manner in which the sabbath day was observed by a very large proportion of the members in Ottawa. When they considered that there were over two hundred men at the Capital, away from the associations of home, away from influences which, perhaps, ordinarily induced them to observe the sabbath with more or less propriety, and saw how large a number retained the practices which they were accustomed to observe at home, he thought it was highly creditable to the House of Commons. He did not see any greater immorality in writing a letter to one's family at a desk in the House than in sitting in one's lodging engaged in that sort of conversation which was likely to spring up when there was nothing else to do. He believed that in these things they should have liberty; that religion was the foundation of all true liberty, and that the Christian religion was the freest and most liberal of all religions. It was true—as to the employes—that, if the House were kept open, there must be somebody to take charge of it and somebody to attend to the wants of members, and he did not feel any more compunction in asking a page in the House to bring him a glass of water on the sabbath day than he would feel in asking his servant at home to perform the same office. Sometimes, in such matters, exceedingly good people went a little beyond reason and common sense. He believed that the members of this House were desirous of observing the sabbath day, and of observing it too as Christian men. That was also the wish of the majority of the people. He believed that the Government were sensible of the wishes of the people, and that they might safely leave the question now before them in their hands.

MR. BUNSTER said he thought the opening of the post-offices throughout the Dominion for one hour on Sundays would give general satisfaction to the peasantry of the country. If, when coming from public worship, they could go to the post-office and get their letters, they would return home feeling that they had saved themselves some trouble on the week-day. It would make a happy home; and, if a young man received a love-letter, it would make him pleased; and they all knew that—

“One Sunday well-spent Brings a week’s content.”

He did not believe in these arbitrary laws that they should not ride on a railway on a Sunday if necessity compelled them to.

Amendment (Mr. Macdougall, East Elgin) agreed to.

Resolution, as amended, agreed to.

THE MILITARY COLLEGE.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. LANGEVIN moved for a return showing the names of all the cadets that have been admitted at the Military College, Kingston, from the opening of said College, and giving the names of those that are now following the courses of that institution. He said he desired to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence to this subject now as he had last year and the previous year called the attention of his predecessor to it. He had then pointed out that the regulations of the Militia Department, for the admission of cadets at the Military College, were so framed that young men of the French race, from the Province of Quebec, could not take advantage of that College. He had then stated that he did not ask for those young men any special regulations, but had contended that the regulations should be framed in such a way that they should not be excluded, but should be put on a similar footing with the others. He believed 40 or 44 young men had passed examinations and been admitted to the College; and, out of these, there was just one single French-Canadian, whose education had been more English than French, and who was, therefore, able to find his way through. It was not that young men from the Province of Quebec could not compete with others, and take degrees. He was proud to say that Mr. Wurtele, who was of Scotch or English origin, had been admitted with very large points, and that he had kept them and had continued at the head of the College, and had won, the other day, the medal given by the Governor-General to the College. That showed that their young men were able to compete with others. He was not disparaging the others, who had done very well indeed; but he was showing that, if these regulations were amended, the French-Canadians also could go to the College. According to the proportion of the French population, there should have been fifteen pupils in the college instead of one. The Government certainly must wish that the young men from the French districts should be there competing with the others.

MR. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

MR. LANGEVIN said he had no doubt that the hon. gentleman’s “Hear, hear” was sincere. This was not a political question; it was one on which they must all agree. He had pointed out this matter to the present Minister of Militia, to the General commanding the Forces, and to Col. Hewitt, who was at the head of the College, and they all seemed to agree that the remarks he had made were correct, and to be disposed to meet his view, which they thought in the interest of the country. Supposing things remained as they were, and the Militia of the Province of Quebec had to be called out under arms, they would have 2,000 or 3,000 French-Canadians called out. How would they feel to be commanded by officers who did not know their language, who would not feel with them, who would not know their habits, or, if they chose, their prejudices? They would say, and it would be natural: “We cannot fight under those men, who do not know our language, our habits, or our customs; they don’t understand us and we don’t understand them.” Though they might not understand English, as a rule, so as to be able to speak it fluently, if they were under arms and were properly commanded, they would, as in the past, fight well and do honour to the country; but, if they were left without officers of their own language or blood, how could they have confidence in strangers to command them? He knew that other officers would occupy the chief position, but their immediate officers should be those who could speak their language and understand them; who could explain to them the words of command; who would, at all events, look after them; and the result would be to secure proper service, which, as things were, they could not expect. He called the attention of the House to these regulations. One of the points in reference to admission to the College was this:—

Let them reverse that, and suppose they said: “The cadet must know his French grammar, and write French correctly under dictation.” How many of the English cadets, who came to the school, would know their French grammar, and write French correctly under dictation? He did not suppose there would be two out of a hundred—perhaps not out of a thousand. If they asked the English-speaking members of this House to know French grammar, and write French under dictation, he was afraid a great many would be sent back, and would not pass their examination; and, if the other case were put to the French members, he feared many would fail. He suggested that the regulation should be changed to read that the cadet should know the grammar, either English or French, according as he should be of French or English, Scotch or Irish origin, and should write either English or French, as the case might be, from dictation; but, of the other language, he should know enough to read and write, though perhaps not correctly, and to understand others. He thought that was fair. They might have a French-Canadian officer who might not, as he (Mr. Langevin) and others did not, speak as good English as his non-francophones friends, but they were understood, and they were not too bashful on that point. If a French officer understood enough English to write a despatch or a report, that was all that was wanted. He would give an illustrious example of that. When the French Prince Imperial went to Woolwich, the great difficulty was that he did not know

MR. LANGEVIN.

English thoroughly. Nevertheless, when the question was put to him whether some examination should not be passed by him privately, he would not consent. He worked harder and obtained private lessons in English and got through the school after a while; but he (Mr. Langevin) had no doubt that, if he had had to go through this examination, and to know his English grammar and write English correctly under dictation, he could never have been admitted. And yet he (Mr. Langevin) thought that young gentleman would have been a credit to any military college. His professors had given the best testimonials in his favour, and what proved that they acted impartially was the fact that he passed the same examination as the others, and stood very high on the list. He (Mr. Langevin) believed that, though his French-Canadian countrymen were not princes of the blood, they were able to compete with others in the examinations, if they were given the chance. He had made other observations to the hon. the Minister of Militia, which he would not renew at present; but he called the special attention of the Government to the fact that this was the third year he had brought up this question; he did it as a matter of duty, and he hoped that this time justice would be done.

MR. JONES (Halifax) said he presumed the object of his hon. friend was to place the views before the House which he had again so ably expressed in regard to the preliminary examination of the young French gentlemen on entering the institution at Kingston. His hon. friend might be well assured that the only object of the Government was to render the College as available as possible to students from all parts of the Dominion—to the young French gentlemen as well as the English; and the regulations had been modified from time to time to meet that object. The particular point which the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) had referred to had already engaged the attention of the Department, and regulations tending to meet that view had already been adopted. It was some what difficult to establish a different code of examinations on all branches in the College which would put the cadets of the different nationalities on an equal footing; of course, it was an object that, as a rule, they should be examined, as far as possible, on those branches on the same authorities. But, at present, there seemed to be difficulty in acceding to the views which the hon. gentleman had so ably laid before the House, that, in the preliminary examination at least, those young gentlemen who did not understand the English language sufficiently well to write it from dictations should be examined in the French language. That, he was prepared to admit, was only a reasonable request, and one to which the Government would cheerfully give acquiescence, to meet which the Government had already made rules. But the hon. member would see that, perhaps, it would not be wise to carry that alteration beyond the preliminary examination at present. The time might come when more cadets would offer than could be admitted, and when a competitive or compulsory education would be necessary. Then, and not until then, could any difficulty arise, because, at present, the great object was to get cadets into the College and not to keep them out; but, when the whole number for which the College was contemplated was obtained, a compulsory and competitive examination would be necessary. The alterations which had been made in the regulations would remove the complaint of his hon. friend, and allow young gentlemen of French origin, who did not understand English sufficiently well to write from dictation, to undergo the preliminary examination in their own language. The hon. member was, of course, aware that, in working out an institution like this, which was new in the country, they had to go on from year to year, and accommodate their rules to the necessities of the case. There were no cast-iron rules about it which could not be changed, and the Government was extremely anxious to meet every reasonable proposition which might be made from time to time. The College, so far, had proved eminently successful, and it was a matter of serious regret that it was not taken advantage of to a greater extent. A large and efficient staff of professors had been engaged, and, if the number of pupils was larger, the expense pro rata would not be much greater. The Government was anxious to place the College on a high standard, and it might be in the interests of the College to look to the Imperial Government to see if they could not obtain some recognition in favour of young men who might come out of that institution with honours. Colonel Hewitt had made a very favourable report of the cadets; he had stated that, for physical development, mental culture, and ability in the different branches of the institution, the young gentlemen educated in this College, and who would complete their course in a few years, would, in his opinion, be qualified to fill any position in the Imperial service, as well as gentlemen coming from any institutions in the Old Country. That opinion ought to be very satisfactory to this country, coming from an officer of such high standing. The one object which the Government had in view was to make the College useful for the objects for which it was started, and they had already changed the regulations as to the preliminary examination in a way which, he thought, would meet the objections of the hon. gentleman on that point.

MR. LANGEVIN said he had been much pleased to hear the statement made by the Minister of Militia. The hon. the Minister of Militia had already intimated to him, after an interview they had had together, that he would probably meet his views. He hoped the hon. Minister had also not forgotten the question of text-books, which was an important matter. Of course, there were a number of colleges, high schools, and seminaries, and the books were not always the same; and the books used for these examinations should be the same as those used in other colleges and schools. At the same time, when these regulations were properly drawn and published, as he had already suggested, they should be circulated in such a way that every college, high school, and seminary should have French and English copies, so that the professors there should know the examination required of these young men when they came to be admitted to the College. For example, there was German, a knowledge of which was required in certain cases. It was true that it was optional, but, nevertheless, it was not only for show it was put among the branches there; there must be some reason for it. In some of the examinations it might be required, and, therefore, it was very necessary that the different seminaries should know that German was a language in which examination would be made before the College examiners. Another matter which deserved consideration by the Government was that, after making these changes in the regulations, they would require the help of the fourth estate. If the newspapers did not come to the relief of the Government or Parliament, these regulations would not be known. They must be widely circulated, and, as this was a matter not in any manner connected with politics, they should be published in the different newspapers of both parties, so that every one would be informed of those changes. Having said so much, he hoped that, when these regulations were properly known and circulated, a different result would be apparent. They could not expect twenty or thirty French-Canadians next year, but, if five or six or eight entered the College, he would say that the time of the House had not been lost in discussing this question.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said that, with regard to the text-books, the Government thought that, at present, there would be no necessity to change the text-books for the preliminary examinations, because the German grammar was not compulsory; and, in the branches which were laid down for the preliminary examination, the public examiners would have a certain latitude given them as to the books on which those examinations were to be made. He was not prepared to deal, at once, with the proposed change in the text-books for the compulsory or competitive examination. He had stated, he believed, that the Government did not think it necessary to do that until there were more applicants for admission to the College than it was prepared to admit.

Mr. LANGEVIN said they might have a larger number of pupils than last year, and then the examiners would have to compel these young cadets to pass in that examination. In that case, those who had to pass an examination after the preliminary examination would have the advantage. He asked that the French-Canadians of Quebec might be placed on the same footing as military-students from other parts of the Dominion.

Mr. JONES said that it would require some little time to consider this, particularly as they were not called upon to deal with that view of the question at the present moment. Of course the hon. gentleman might rest assured that they should deal with it in a liberal spirit.

ENLARGEMENT OF ST. PETER'S CANAL.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. CAMPBELL moved for correspondence in connection with the change of contractors for the enlargement of the St. Peter's Canal; also statement showing what funds are still in the hands of the Government belonging to Mr. Tuck, the original contractor, and whether the Government are taking any steps for the payment of labour and materials supplied to Mr. Tuck before transferring his contract; showing also how many years the present contractor is allowed to finish his work, and if the enlargement has been let by tender and contract. He said he should like to know how many years this canal was to be under construction. It was a small affair in the beginning, but it had been two years under construction and was hardly begun. It was supposed that the Government had security from the contractor before the contract was given, and that they had kept back part of the money due to Mr. Tuck under the contract, and, if so, it would be well for them to consider the claims of the labourers who had worked all the summer on the canal, and had not been paid. He also thought the country should understand what arrangements had been made with the present contractor; there was a good deal of mystery about it that ought to be explained.

MR. MACKENZIE said this motion was a grotesque mixture of motion and question, and it was quite impossible for it to be passed unless it was amended.

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said that, while the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) was amending his motion, he would like to make a few remarks with regard to the labourers upon this canal. He was informed that Mr. Tuck, the first contractor, was indebted to them to the extent of nearly $3,000, and he mentioned this fact to the Government in order to enquire if there was any way by which these men could be paid. The men to whom this money was owing did not happen to be persons who had been trading or dealing with the contractors, but simply labourers, and the loss they would sustain would be very serious. He understood that the Premier had guarded against the recurrence of such a case, but he would like to ask if there was no clause in the contract with Mr. Tuck, under which there was any possibility of having these men paid the amounts due to them.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was sorry to say that it was entirely out of the power of the Government to make any provisions for the payment of labourers employed by a contractor; there was no such provision in any of the contracts. But, in Lower Canada, it was the law of the land, under the local authorities, that workmen had a lien upon the materials or anything whatever that could be laid hold of, in connection with the contracts which might exist. Under that provision, the Dominion Government were enabled, in one case, to pay all the workmen on one of the river contracts there. With regard to Mr. Tuck's men, in the first place, the Government never received any notice that men were unpaid until after they heard that Mr. Tuck had failed to proceed with his contract. At that time, there was a balance in the hands of the Government, on account of Mr. Tuck, of about $800, but, of this sum, $400 had to be taken to pay some obligations for which the Government were responsible, and the only money in the hands of the Government at present was $400. The contract had not been let afresh to Mr. Kennedy, the present contractor, but had been assigned to him by Mr. Tuck, and Mr. Kennedy had previously proved himself to be an excellent contractor, and the Government were glad to have him take hold of the work. Anything that it was possible for the Government to do to protect the workmen or those to whom the contractor was indebted, they were willing to do, but he did not know that it was in their power to do anything. Under the contract, a certain sum of money was to be paid to the contractor, and the Government paid it in monthly instalments on a certificate from the engineer. These payments were made subject, as a matter of course, to a reduction of 10 per cent., retained in the hands of the Government, but this 10 per cent. was usually advanced, to a greater or less extent, to enable contractors to get all the advantage they could of what money they were fairly entitled to, when that could safely be done. A considerable part of that 10 per cent. was advanced in that way to Mr. Tuck, as it was advanced to almost every contractor. The contracts provided that this might be done, and, as the Government were always desirous of aiding contractors as far as it was safe, in the public interest, to do so, some advance from that reserve fund in their hands was usually made, upon the recommendation of the engineer superintending the work. In this case they had not been aware that any parties were in arrears until it became too late for the Government to retain any money in their hands. If they had, they would simply have had to retain it subject to actions that might be brought by the parties interested.

MR. CAMPBELL said he had amended his motion, and would now move for all papers and correspondence in connection with the change of contractors for the enlarging of the St. Peter's Canal; also statement showing what funds are still in the hands of the Government, belonging to Mr. Tuck, the original contractor, and showing also, the time within which the contract is to be finished, and also a copy of the tender and contract under which the enlargement has been let.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I would like to ask the hon. the Premier whether he is going to give us the hour to proceed with notices of motion, which he more than half promised us last night.

MR. MACKENZIE: Oh, no. The hon. gentleman is mistaken in saying I promised it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I only said, "more than half." You see that we lose all to-morrow.

MR. MACKENZIE: The position is simply this: So many motions have already been carried that the Departments are quite as full of work as they possibly could be, and it would serve no purpose, except to lose the time of the Government to-day, to proceed with those notices now. I think that the hon. gentleman ought not to expect it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Very well; all right.

MR. MACKENZIE: But I promise him that, on Monday next, if necessary at all, I shall afford him every facility, for a good portion of the day, in taking up these notices.

MR. HOLTON: Besides, if the debate closes early to-night, we can take up notices of motion before we adjourn.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

ADJOURNED DEBATE

Order for resuming the debate on Mr. Cartwright's proposed motion: "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply," read.

MR. PLUMB said that, when the House adjourned on Friday evening, he was about to proceed with the debate which then occupied its attention. Before he would attempt to deal with the general question, which would no doubt interest the House during the whole of the discussion that would take place on the speech of his hon. friend the Minister of Finance, he would briefly advert to statements which had been made—though perhaps these were not entirely relevant to the question,—by the hon. gentlemen who had spoken on the other side since his hon. friend (Mr. Cartwright) addressed the House; and he would take them in reverse order, as they would then, perhaps, be fresher in the minds of hon. members, and as hon. members might then, perhaps, more readily apprehend what he had to say on the subject. The hon. member who preceded him—the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald), for whose opinions, as a business man, he had the highest respect, and who, personally, knew the esteem with which he (Mr. Plumb) regarded him—had given them one of those addresses which it was always pleasant to hear in the House, and which was characterized by that gentleness and persuasiveness of manner by which the hon. gentleman always attracted, took, and kept the ear of the House; and he regretted that he must, on this occasion, differ in toto caelo from the hon. gentleman, with regard to the arguments which he (Mr. Macdonald) had advanced, and the conclusions which he had reached. His hon. friend had spoken well; but he had spoken from a peculiar standpoint. His hon. friend was largely engaged in commerce; he had been an eminent and successful example of what could be done in Canada by unaided industry and indomitable perseverance; but, throughout his whole career, he (Mr. Macdonald) had taken one single line; and, when he argued upon commercial subjects, upon financial subjects, and upon subjects of political economy, he (Mr. Plumb) could not but suppose that the hon. gentleman's views were, to a certain extent, biassed by the peculiar interests which he so worthily represented. He could not blame the hon. gentleman for this, or blame him for presenting his arguments to the House in the form which they would naturally take from his own personal standpoint, and from his personal predilections. That hon. gentleman had told them, in the first place, that he would give them the real causes, generally speaking, for the enormous sufferings which we were enduring from the commercial depression which, it could not be denied, existed in this country; which, it could not be denied, still existed in the greatest severity, and which it might now be the policy, and he thought it was the policy, of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to treat lightly as a passing cloud, and to say that it was no longer preying upon the very vitals of the community. In fact, that was the statement of his hon. friend the Finance Minister last year, who, instead of being a croaking prophet of evil, as he was when he (Mr. Cartwright) took the office of Finance Minister, was then airy, cheerful and hopeful, stating that we had passed over the worst of the storm, and that the country, though it still felt the effects of the ground-swell, was coming into smoother water. His hon. friend from Centre Toronto took, he (Mr. Plumb) was bound to say, with all respect to him, an empirical view of the situation. The causes of the depression lay deeper and were more lasting and enduring than any he (Mr. Macdonald) had referred to. They lay in great changes in the general condition of the commercial and financial world. They did not lie in the question whether Canada imported a few million dollars' worth of goods more or less, or made a few million dollars' worth, more or less, of bad debts. They did not lie in the fact that the importers of Canada, always excepting his hon. friend, filled their warehouses with the merchandise of England and the United States, which they forced upon people who were not competent to conduct business and incompetent to pay for their purchases; or gave such persons long credits, and placed them in positions to compete with each other and with sound merchants in the most injurious manner, all of which was calculated to hurry this country into bankruptcy. These were among the causes, but they were slight causes, as his hon. friend would at once recognize. He had, with amazement, looked over the statements which from time to time appeared in the newspapers in advertisements with regard to insolvent estates; and he had thus seen that men were trading all over the country on no capital, and when the assignee took hold of their estates, cases were found where whole families were probably living out of a business involving a stock of $5,000 or $6,000, or even less. And he had, consequently, been amazed that it was not seen at once that these men could not carry on a successful business on such capital. This was one of the causes of the depression, and it was an immediate cause; it was a cause that was before them all the time. They knew what it was; but the causes of this great depression, which were worthy of the examination of the hon. the Finance Minister of Canada, and which were of national importance or national consequence, were deeper and farther reaching; and he ventured to say that they would continue far longer than by any of them would desire to imagine that they could continue. The Opposition were charged with wishing to detain the spectre of hard times for their own benefit; but could it be possible that gentlemen were so far prejudiced by party spirit that they could imagine that any man having the interests of Canada at heart would desire for a moment to interrupt the career of her prosperity. It was unworthy even of the most bitter partizan, or of the most unscrupulous politician to make any assertion of the kind, and he hurled it back to the other side of the House.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. PLUMB said hon. gentlemen opposite might applaud sarcastically, but he would say it was unworthy of them, for those hon. gentlemen knew that the members of the Opposition had a common interest with the general community in the prosperity of the Dominion; they had no desire for any benefit to themselves, for there could be none in having the depression continue; they only wished to look at it with the eye of common sense. He never heard, except on the floor of the House, or read, save in a few platform speeches delivered during the past summer, that there was not still the greatest anxiety felt in all the commercial and financial circles of Canada in regard to the business of the country. He had not heard that the clouds were lifting, though God grant that they might soon see a glimpse of clear sky, and he did not care how soon it came, nor should it have any connection with the political situation here; and he might say that the party which desired to make political capital out of either the one question or the other, was unworthy of the confidence of the people of Canada.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. PLUMB: Yes, hon. gentlemen might say "hear, hear," and he thought they would say it a good many times before he had finished with the remarks which he intended now to make in this House. His hon. friend from Centre Toronto, he thought, went a little out of his way when speaking of the depression. He (Mr. Macdonald) had said that the manufacturers, if they had more character, more intelligence, and more capital, would not require protection, but would succeed without it. Those, he believed, were the hon. gentleman's words; if they were not, he was open to correction.

MR. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto): I would like to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that I never made such a statement in this House with reference to the manufacturers as a class.

MR. PLUMB said he had taken down the hon. gentleman's remarks exactly as he uttered them, and he thought he had the report of these remarks with him, though he did not wish to insist upon it, because he was very much astonished when he heard them; and he thought they were heard by other hon. gentlemen. The hon. gentleman had said—"They wanted capital, they wanted intelligence, and they wanted character." The hon. gentleman also told them—and he considered that the utterances of a gentleman of such large experience should be very guarded with respect to business affairs, because he (Mr. Macdonald) was an authority in these matters—that the protection of 17½ per cent., which we now had, was almost equal to 30 per cent. The hon. gentleman had led them to suppose that the cost of transportation, of bringing goods here from England, added 12½ per cent. to the present tariff; but he omitted to state to the House and take the House into his confidence with respect to the fact that the great accumulations, the great increases of the imports of Canada had not come from Great Britain. What the Opposition had complained of was that the United States were undermining the British markets here; and that the imports from the United States were increasing from year to year, while those from Great Britain were falling off from year to year. And he spoke with the statistics to sustain him in making this statement. There was certainly not a protection of 30 per cent. against the United States. It cost no more to send goods from Lowell, Mass., to Toronto than from Lowell to Cleveland. It cost no more to send goods from the principal manufacturing points in the United States to the principal cities in Canada, than it did to send them to the western cities of which they held the market. It was a mistake to say so, and he ventured to state this with all due deference, for in all matters of this kind he deferred to the hon. gentleman, and he could not wish to attempt to assume that he was in this House an authority upon such matters, such as the hon. gentleman ought to be; but such an authority, he was afraid, the hon. gentleman showed himself not to be in this relation, and he thought that, if the hon. gentleman reconsidered the case and looked over his figures again, he would not insist upon what he had stated here. His hon. friend from Centre Toronto was preceded by his hon. friend the member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver). He (Mr. Plumb) might, at this point, say that, before his hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) sat down he alluded to the course which was recommended by the hon. the Finance Minister in regard to not dealing with the tariff at present, and not providing for the deficits which were growing and increasing upon the country, which he (Mr. Plumb) ventured to say, from what he knew of the business of the country, there was no reason to suppose were to be lessened at present by any change in the condition of the country. His hon. friend said he (Mr. Cartwright) had no other thing to do but to continue the policy of masterly inactivity and to rest upon the wheel a contented fly as long as he (Mr. Cartwright) was not disturbed from his position. His hon. friend had also said that Free-trade had made England; and that the Crossleys and the Brights were the result of the Free-trade system of England. He (Mr. Plumb) denied this in toto; he said there never was a country which was a stronger example of the benefits of the protective system than England was to-day; and that the whole result of the great ascendancy of England in that direction had been due to the fact that she was a sedulously protected country until she had acquired, by improvements in machinery, by great experience, by the intelligence of her manufacturers, and by her world-wide commerce, the power to become, for her own special and selfish purposes, a Free-trade country.

MR. MACDONALD: I hope the hon. gentleman will excuse me, for I never like to interrupt a speaker; but, to the best of my recollection, from the beginning of my remarks to the end, I never used the word free-trade, I do not think that this word is to be found in the remarks I offered to this House.

MR. PLUMB said the hon. gentleman had made an explanation which was not an explanation. He had not stated that the hon. gentleman had used the word free-trade. He had said that the hon. gentleman spoke of the present policy of England, which was a Free-trade policy. The hon. gentleman was arguing in that direction altogether—that this policy made the Brights and the Crossleys. Now, he said that, if the hon. gentleman accepted his side of the argument, he would say that the protective policy of England made the Brights and the Crossleys; they had no issue, and they were all right. He (Mr. Plumb) was perfectly willing to let the hon. gentleman accept the dilemma, and leave him there. Having disposed of that part of the hon. gentleman's argument, he would refer to another point; he was amazed to hear the hon. gentleman say that, although the deficits were great and growing, he wished, great as they were, that the deficit had been greater. The commercial authority upon the other side of the House had made that statement; but he could not concur with the hon. gentleman in that view; and he thought that very few hon. gentlemen in the House, including the hon. the Finance Minister himself, would be in sympathy with the hon. gentleman, especially considering the difficulties which the hon. the Finance Minister had to deal with in the deficit as they now stood. The line of argument which the hon. gentleman used in that respect was that, if the deficit had been greater, he thought the country would have sooner taken the alarm and taken in sail. He (Mr. Plumb) had not followed the hon. gentleman very closely on this point, but the idea the hon. gentleman seemed to convey was that the business men of Canada, the statesmen of Canada, or the men who were entrusted in this House with the affairs of this country, and to whom was delegated the legislation of Canada, were so insensate that they needed to have the teachings of such deficits staring them in the face in order to arrest their headlong progress. This might be so; but he did not undervalue the intelligence of the Government in such a way as to accept that line of argument or to bear it without entering his earnest and solemn protest against it; and he further believed that, in this respect, at least, if in no other, he should be in accord with the sound judgment and the common sense of the hon. gentlemen who usually controverted his opinions in this House, and to whose views, certainly, in most directions, he was happy to say, he was in opposition. They, then, still proceeding in inverse order, had had one of the most extraordinary harangues ever delivered to the House. The word harangue had been objected to as unparliamentary. He would again use the word "harangue," because he knew it was a word of parliamentary propriety. He had been looking it up in the dictionary, and he had high authority for its use. One of the most extraordinary harangues that ever was delivered in the House was delivered by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver.) He should not attempt seriously to deal with arguments such as the hon. gentleman had brought forward, and which were listened to and applauded with the usual discrimination with which the opposite side of the House applauded anything, no matter how untenable or how illogical it was.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. PLUMB said that, if this pleased hon. gentlemen opposite, he was very glad indeed, because it showed that they were very easily pleased; this was all he had to say on that point. The hon. member for North Oxford had given them the information that eight millions of money had been improperly squandered by that reckless and profligate Administration which preceded the embodiment of all the virtues that now held power, on the Intercolonial Railway. He could fancy the frowning figure of the grand old Reformer standing behind the hon. gentleman while that statement was made; and it was fortunate for the hon. gentleman that he (Mr. Brown) was not then in the gallery, because he (Mr. Plumb) thought the hon. gentleman would have felt that scourge which was made proverbial—for, under command of Mr. Brown, the cat was more used than the compass in the steering of the ships in which the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk had long ago embarked. Yes, he could remember that four, five, or ten years ago, the hon. gentleman's leader had said that, for the sake of getting Confederation, he would build six Intercolonial Railways, with all the expenses attached to such an undertaking. The hon. gentleman from North Oxford had evidently forgotten that fact. He was somewhat surprised when, for the sake of making a particular argument and gaining a partizan triumph—as he (Mr. Plumb) was told from the other side of the House when those hon. gentleman threw their sneers at him—the hon. gentleman had made such a statement which was sure to recoil on his head. He remembered perfectly well reading the debates, not long ago, that the most strenuous, the most eloquent, and the most ardent advocate for the Intercolonial Railway, no matter at what cost,—for they never knew at that time what it would cost—was the Hon. George Brown, the leader, and the inspirer, and the governor of the party which his hon. friend the member for North Oxford so worthily represented in the House as the embodiment of Government principles in North Oxford. That hon. gentleman had also made a long statement touching the prosperity of our manufactures. The hon. gentleman had showed from statistics, perfectly accurate, of course, of the census returns of 1871, that the manufacturers had made large profits

prior to that time, and he did not deny that they were prospering; but, if money was invested in that line, on the information given by the hon. gentleman through such a channel, he was afraid investors would not get very large dividends. He would call the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. gentleman had read statistics concerning the manufacturing industries of Canada in 1869 and 1870. The Opposition, however, claimed that, in 1869 and 1870, under the benign rule of his right hon. friend the member for Kingston and his confreres, and under the statesman-like direction which then had the helm of state, our manufacturing interests were prosperous; a fact which no one disputed. He (Mr. Plumb) accepted the statement of his hon. friend on the other side, and thought he was right in bringing forward an exemplification of the arguments used by hon. gentlemen on his (Mr. Plumb's) side of the House; they had never argued the other way; they had always said that, during the period between 1860 and 1873, and before the crisis in the United States, everything throughout the interior of Canada was prosperous. After the collapse of the great inflation in the United States; after the disasters in that country, our commercial crisis followed. The Americans then began to undersell us in our own markets; their disasters forced them to seek this as their market, and whereas the 15 per cent., generally levied, was protection enough prior to 1874, and we needed no additional revenue, the addition of 2½ per cent. in 1874 gave us no additional protection. On the contrary, it was less than we had before under the different condition of affairs growing out of the United States bubbles. They could not sell us anything and we could sell them everything for many years prior to 1874, when, through an inflated currency in the United States, through a speculative system, through an abandonment of honest, regular, straightforward labour in that country, they created such an increase of prices, such a state of things among themselves, that Canada could furnish them with everything and they could give us nothing in return. This state of affairs in the United States brought about the crisis, and not the tariff system alone, which had been so decried.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Yes. No.

Mr. PLUMB said that was because he had hit hon. gentlemen too hard. He had taken away their chief argument; he was taking the bread out of their mouths, but it was the bread of misrepresentation, and not the bread of honesty. This was exactly the whole argument.

Mr. YOUNG: What is your statement?

Mr. PLUMB: We will explain that in good time. My hon. friend from South Waterloo should first make his own statement.

Mr. WOOD: Where is your statement?

Mr. PLUMB: I know the hon. gentleman. I have been in his county, and know something of the feeling there on public questions. That gentleman might back up his trade argument by reference to the resolutions of the Board of Trade, but he (Mr. Plumb) recollected when the resolutions of the Board of Trade were always sneered at by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House; they did not acknowledge the authority of the Board of Trade; they did not acknowledge that it was capable of forming an intelligent opinion upon the fiscal and financial affairs of the country; they derided it, because it did not suit their line of argument. If that Board of Trade was not an authority at that time it was certainly not an authority now. The gentleman who brought forward the resolution, who was its president, had been called to account by the Hamilton Board of Trade, that of the constituency which was represented by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood). A meeting was held and a resolution was proposed condemning his course. That motion was voted down and the gentleman was sustained at the meeting of manufacturers and mechanics and other gentlemen interested in trade in Hamilton. The House would, however, not deem the circumstance very significant when they were told that it was the casting vote of the gentleman censured, as Chairman of the Hamilton Board of Trade, that maintained him in his position. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) had stated that Mr. Howland, an excellent authority—who, by the way, had been President of the Dominion Board of Trade, which the hon. gentleman derided as having no authority in the country and whose expressions of opinion were not worthy of being quoted—had stated that there was no depression. The hon. member had stated that Mr. Howland was a large dealer in produce perfectly capable of knowing that there had been a large crop and that, consequently, the trade depression was passing away, because, forsooth, Mr. Howland stated that the business of the produce merchant was generally prosperous and there had been a large harvest in Canada in 1877. They had no doubt of the harvest and they congratulated the country on last year's large harvest and desired to congratulate the agricultural interests on the prosperity and gains that ought to have crowned the labours of the husbandman, which formed the basis of the prosperity of every country. The present Government had, however, thrown upon the farmers so many burthens incidental or direct that, when they had large crops which would yield large profits, they were materially reduced. They permitted the cereals of the Great West to come into this country unchallenged and free of duty. They permitted a tax to be levied on barley, which was the principal crop of Western Canada, to the extent, through the malt tax, of 72 cents per bushel upon a production which was now worth less than 50 cents a bushel in our markets, and in many parts of Canada was absolutely unsaleable. Just below Ottawa, on the St. Lawrence River, two-rowed barley was grown which would not germinate with American barley, and, therefore, was not saleable in the United States market for mixing with barley grown there; thus, the growers, who depended on a home market, had their crops lying in their granaries unsold. Those farmers were beginning to learn, though they did not hear it from their representatives, who did not look very closely after the interests of their constituents, that a tax of 72 cents was levied upon malt which was the production of barley, and that the two-rowed barley had no market except at home and to a small extent in England. Those who were acquainted with agriculture, knew that the farmer himself could not reach the English market. He had to go to the middleman, to pay commission and expenses, and thus very little of the profit fell to him, and, when the grangers attempted to make shipments to European markets, they found so many difficulties presented to prevent them availing themselves of any except the ordinary market at their own doors, that they had been compelled to abandon the attempt. That was the so-called agricultural prosperity. His hon. friend from South Oxford had told the House there was a manufacturing industry in the town of Ingersoll that had paid a dividend of 30 per cent. He (Mr. Plumb) congratulated the shareholders, for he had not heard of such prosperity anywhere else; he would, however, wait and see what the balance at the end of three or five years showed. He was prepared to admit that in exceptional instances, arising from advantageous position or special circumstances, prosperous manufactories had been established in the Dominion; though, under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, but few of them had escaped loss. When the great Reformer went to Washington to treat with the United States, he proposed to admit American manufactures, of the kind referred to as prospering in North Oxford, duty free, in order to try the doubtful advantage of the kind of reciprocity he (Mr. Brown) was willing to accept. In congratulating the shareholders of the prosperous industry to which reference had been made by the hon. member for North Oxford, he (Mr. Plumb) was entitled to claim that one great source of the prosperity of that part of the country had grown out of the fact that, owing to the success of the manufacturing establishments cited by the member for North Oxford, there was a good home market for the farmers. The hon. member for North Oxford had indulged in a three or four hours' speech, in the course of which he had brought in all the public accounts and general statistics of Canada, and he would probably go into the United States and Great Britain, to boot. He had now concluded his reference to the hon. member for North Oxford, and would come now to what he would call the case in hand—the Budget speech of the hon. the Finance Minister. He had the curiosity, a few days ago, to examine the utterances of that hon. gentleman as a prophet of evil in 1873, when he made that famous speech upon which he based his entire financial reputation. That speech, he was surprised to find, was an old familiar one. He knew every line of it, as if it had been written and spoken by himself, because it was simply the speech which the hon. gentleman repeated on all occasions, with some little variations, for the platform and picnic-parties and which he occasionally seasoned with a little pepper or put into it a few condiments or a touch of vitriolic acid; but the great basis of the speech, the whole line of argument in the speech was perfectly familiar to him (Mr. Plumb). The hon. gentleman began by saying that the Government which had the country in charge—before, unfortunately, the hon. gentleman and his friends obtained office—had increased the public expenditure from 1867 to 1873, from $13,500,000 to $22,000,000, an increase of $8,500,000, while the hon. the Premier, with that lack of exactness which distinguished him on many occasions, said it was $10,000,000; $1,500,000 was of no great consequence. The hon. the Finance Minister had always dwelt with much emphasis upon the increase of $8,500,000 in the public expenditure, and his statement would lead the public to suppose that there had been a great deal of recklessness and something worse involved in it. He (Mr. Plumb) had gone through the Public Accounts from 1867 to the period when his hon. friends had retired from office, and he could give the items which constituted that increase, and he could appeal to the House and the honest sentiment of the country when he stated that every item was justifiable, nay, necessary from the circumstances of the case, and also that he did not find that his hon. friend the Finance Minister had lifted up his manly voice to protest against that expenditure while it was going on. But the hon. gentleman was a prophet and critic after the fact. The expenditure from 1837 to 1873 increased as follows: on 30th June, 1868, the expenditure was $13,486,022; that in 1873-4 was $23,316,316; but he intended to show that the expenditure for 1873-4 was increased largely by supplementary items on schedule A, which it might be fairly claimed did not belong to the nominal and real expenditure that year, although he admitted in that year Mr. Tilley stated to the House that he intended and expected, by the legislation of the spring of 1873, to add considerably to the public expenditure; and as he did not take the view of the present Finance Minister, that deficits could go on and increase without providing taxation to meet them, he stated that during that and the following year about $1,500,000 of surplus revenue would be received, and that amount would provide for the items which had been added to the public expenditure by the legislation of May, 1873. The items by which the public expenditure had been increased, and which had been repeated by the hon. gentlemen who had already risen on the other side of the House, and which would be repeated by everybody else who spoke on that side, were the following:—Civil Government, Administration of Justice, Police, Penitentiaries, and Legislation; altogether $780,712 for the whole term. No one would dispute the necessities of the case; the enlargement of the area of the country, the addition of British Columbia and of Manitoba, the opening up of the North-West, the increase of population, the general position of the country and the general legislation required and justified an increase of expenditure, and made it obligatory and absolutely necessary. The hon. the Finance Minister had not risen in his place during the seven wasteful years and challenged those items of expenditure in any sense which would entitle him now to give the public to understand that that increase of $8,500,000 was one for which the late Government should be arraigned before the country, and be held responsible in any blameable sense, or except in the ordinary sense in which an Administration was responsible for the conduct of public affairs. The next items were Geological Surveys, Arts, Agriculture and Statistics, and the Census—$122,195. It happened that the Census fell within that period of seven years, and, accordingly, largely increased the aggregate of these three items,—a fact which no one would venture to challenge. The next items were, Immigration and Quarantine, and Marine Hospitals, $73,000. The Opposition could safely challenge the record in regard to Immigration, and were willing that the Government should make as much use of that item as they pleased. Hon. gentlemen opposite could not, however, afford to compare their immigration record with the record of the Department when it was administered by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope). They on his (Mr. Plumb's) side of the House threw down the gauntlet and hoped it would be taken up by the Government, in order that the country might learn what they had to say in that direction. On Pensions and Superannuations there was an outlay of $64,474, and he would deal with that question subsequently. The Opposition had something to say as to the policy of the Government in respect to superannuations, and they could recite a tale of hardship and injustice which, if hon. gentlemen opposite had any feelings, would cause them to blush for shame, and rouse the dormant indignation of the country against them. There was an item of $500,234 for Ocean and River Steam Service, $50,234 of which was the increase for the seven years. A large portion of that service was rendered necessary by the addition to the Confederation of those Provinces which had entered it during recent years, and by the natural growth of the commerce of the country—an increase during those seven years almost unparalleled in the progress of any country in the world. The next items were Fisheries, $45,675; Miscellaneous Expenses, $9,709; Customs, $150,906; Excise, $127,906; in both the latter cases the revenues had very largely increased. Everyone knew that the receipts, both from Customs and Excise, were so largely in excess of the proportion of increase, that the augmentation of the expenses was not by any means a percentage which could be challenged, nor could it be shown that the Government had not exercised the same proper and far-sighted economy which had characterized their whole conduct of public affairs; and, when they took up the record, he challenged hon. gentlemen opposite, fairly and honestly, to refute that argument. Then there were the following items:—Culling Timber, $13,706; Post-Office, $770,468; Public Works, construction, $1,699,732; Public Works, revenue, $1,763,393. If hon. gentlemen would take up the question of Public Works constructed on capital account, and Public Works chargeable to revenue, and dissect the items, it would plainly appear there had been no impropriety in the expenditure of the public money in that direction, and it would be time enough for them to base their arguments, in respect to the recklessness of the late Administration, when they had been able to prove that the expenditure had not been made in an economical manner. The mere fact of the figures showing an increased volume was no argument; they merely showed a certain amount had been expended. With the rapidly increasing revenues of the country, and the large surpluses which were rolling up year after year, there was, no doubt, every possible inducement to lead the late Government into extravagance, but they had resisted the temptation, although they could not turn round and say to applicants for Government contracts, as the hon. the present Premier would have been able to say, that there were deficits to meet and no revenue which would warrant the expenditure; but the late Government expended upwards of $10,000,000 of surplus revenue on works properly chargeable to capital. These were the arguments he would apply to the assertion made on the floor of the House, on every public platform and in the press, that, from 1867 to 1873, the late Government augmented the public expenditure by

$8,500,000, according to the figures of the hon. the Finance Minister, and $10,000,000 according to the very accurate statement of the Premier. In addition to those items, there were others into which he would not enter, which had arisen out of the changed condition of the country, by the opening up of the North-West, and the troubles which had there prevailed; the surveys of the Province of Manitoba, and providing for Civil Government there; in short, the establishment of proper administration over that vast and fertile territory, which was, in the future, to become the great source of capital, revenue and prosperity, if those holding the reins of power, to whatever side of politics they might belong, were true to the best interests of the Dominion. The item of $146,068 for Indian Grants he presumed would not be questioned. Other items were:—Dominion Boundary Surveys, $283,163; Dominion Forces in Manitoba, $409,768; North-West Territory Organization, $12,262; United States Boundary Survey, $79,293; Military Stores, $144,906; amounting in all to $1,144,790. When looking carefully at the items on which the increase occurred, it would be found that they were all of a character perfectly legitimate and necessary in view of the condition of the country, and he was surprised that gentlemen on the other side of the House should have made such reckless statements and have placed themselves in the position they now occupied in respect to this nominal, this proper, justifiable and defensible increase. For it was justifiable and defensible in every point, and he challenged the other side to take up the expenditure from 1867 to 1873, item by item, and meet him upon the arguments which he should adduce in respect to that expenditure. He knew perfectly well that it had been used in all directions as an argument against the late Administration. He had never noticed a speech made by them upon a public platform, in which public expenditure was touched upon, where he did not see the increase in question brought up as a justifiable charge against the late Administration; so unreasonable, so untenable was their position, however, that it was only necessary to state the items for every sensible, candid and reasonable man, every man not blinded by party feeling, to see through its fallacy. The fallacy was clearly shown in the statement which he now placed before the House and before the country, and he challenged its contradiction. He asserted also that there was no period in the history of Canada where any Government was so eminently justified in a liberal outlay as was the Government that held the reins of office up to 1873. There was no period when the country had been so prosperous, when it experienced so rapid a growth and poured such a flood of wealth into the public Treasury; and there were no indications of that great crash which followed it except the natural indication that such periods of prosperity must be followed within a certain time by a corresponding period of depression; but whether they would come sooner or later it was not given to the mind of man to know exactly. The only person to whom it had been vouchsafed to have that entire and correct prognostication of the future, the only person for whom the veil which hid the future was withdrawn, for whom the curtain was lifted that he might look upon futurity—look upon the seeds of time and tell which should germinate and which should not—was the hon. the Finance Minister. That hon. gentleman said what he (Mr. Plumb) should presently quote, a little while before the late Administration went out of office—and they must take his utterances as those of the Government, because the hon. the Premier had claimed that the hon. the Finance Minister was acting in accord with him years before he took his position as Finance Minister in the present Government. The words of the hon. gentleman as reported, were as follows:—

“Mr. CARTWRIGHT deprecated the mixing up of matters connected with the Treaty in this discussion, the more so as the financial statement made this afternoon was one which all members ought to regard with great gratification. We were all aware that fears had been entertained, when the Confederation scheme was under discussion, that the financial arrangements were likely to be a source of danger to the young nationality, and he, for one, was glad to find those apprehensions had been more or less frustrated by the extraordinary expansion which had lately attended the commerce and resources of the country. He considered this was not due to the Government alone, although he was willing to admit that they were entitled to some credit, but that all who supported the scheme of Confederation would also claim such credit.”

The hon. the Finance Minister supported the scheme of Confederation, and he was therefore entitled to part of the credit. When the echoes of the speech of the Finance Minister—not then the Finance Minister, but probably feeling some prophetic shadowing of the honour that was to fall upon him, namely, that in the near future he would be selected by the Reform Administration as their financial authority in this House—had scarcely died away, the hon. the Premier (Mr. Mackenzie) arose and addressed the House, and this was his view of the situation. Mr. Mackenzie “spoke in the strongest language”—he used strong language in those days; but he was one of the Reform Opposition—“of the speech of the Minister of Inland Revenue, and referred to the course he (Mr. Mackenzie) had pursued with regard to the subsidies to the various Provinces. He did not look with serious apprehension to any great national calamity; but the financial policy of the Minister of Finance was calculated to bring on a commercial depression.” Again, in 1873, upon Mr. Tilley's Budget speech, the present Premier made the following remarks:—

“Mr. MACKENZIE said that every one would rejoice at the statements that had just been made, and every one would accept all those statements as being perfectly accurate, unless prevented from being so by mere accident. He wished, however, to ask the hon. gentleman whether, in calculating the amount of Customs duties, he had included free goods.

“Hon. Mr. TILLEY said the percentage he had named was for the whole imports entered for consumption.

“Mr. MACKENZIE thought so, and in that case the statement was quite illusory. One of the principal charges made against him by the member for Vancouver (Sir F. Hincks) during the late electoral campaign, was that he and those acting with him politically were Free Traders, and persons likely to be concerned in the representation of any such city as Hamilton for instance. But what would the manufacturers of Hamilton say when they learned that there was to be no change, no protection, and the policy announced and promise made during the election were not to be carried out? * * * He did not believe that the Pacific Railway would materially affect Canada, as a means of transporting produce from the West to the East."

He (Mr. Plumb) wished the House to notice the delightful vagueness of all these statements. They did not advocate a new financial scheme, or a change of the existing system, but contented themselves with the very broadest platitudes, such as were common stock among them when they sat on his (Mr. Plumb's) side of the House. If his (Mr. Plumb's) party were to follow their example—and imitation was the sincerest flattery—and were to take a leaf out of the book of the gentlemen opposite, they would also adopt vague terms; but they did not pretend to give, and they should not give, any uncertain utterances with regard to the fiscal and financial management of this country; they should give it in such a way that gentlemen opposite would be entirely satisfied they had nothing to charge his party with in that direction. He would now refer to a remark made by the hon. member for West Montreal (Mr. Workman) who, he regretted to observe, was now conspicuous by his absence from his seat in the House. He wished that gentlemen had been present to listen to him; but, as his (Mr. Plumb's) right hon. friend remarked, Mr. Workman was like the gentleman who was mentioned in the letter of one of the House officials read to the House the other day, he was tojours absent—doubtless for prudential reasons. He was sorry the hon. member (Mr. Workman) was not present, because he always charmed the House with his utterances of wisdom, and there was no doubt that, after a fresh interview with his cook, he would be able to give the House some very important information. Mr. Workman said in 1872: "The House and the country ought to be proud of the statement of the Finance Minister." He (Mr. Plumb) could also quote a sentence from the comments of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), on Mr. Tilley's Budget speech. That hon. gentleman, who sat behind and above him (Mr. Plumb), was now a loud advocate of the Free-trade policy of his leaders, and had commended it but a few days ago in a grand oration which went over and through his (Mr. Plumb's) head like the reverberation of thunder; but, in 1873, "he hoped the Government would fulfil the pledge given by the Premier to introduce a protective tariff in the country." This, however, was in 1873, on the debate on the Budget, and on that occasion the present Finance Minister, while congratulating the late Finance Minister (Mr. Tilley) upon his lucid statement, said he considered that too sanguine a view had been taken of the income; but he (Mr. Plumb) did not find any of the searching criticisms upon the financial condition of the country which the hon. gentleman led them to suppose he had always been in the habit of uttering in this House. A few days afterwards he made that remarkable speech in which he said: "Whatever I may say is but repeating over and over again what you are all familiar with." On that occasion another gentleman distinguished for his great patriotism, for his adherence to high principles, and for other qualities which he would not mention, also addressed the House. This was the member for East Middlesex, Mr. David Glass. He (Mr. Glass) felt it his duty, as an Upper Canadian with strong feelings of patriotism, to express his entire disapprobation of the attempt to throw odium on the Finance Minister and the distinguished leader of the Government. These were the utterances of hon. gentlemen in 1873. Up to that time this shadow of a cloud had not fallen upon the country; the present Finance Minister had made his prophecy, but nothing had come of it. However, in 1874, as the mouth-piece of a new Administration the Finance Minister (Mr. Cartwright) made his first Budget speech. It was a speech full of gloom and darkness and distrust, and the country was alarmed and disturbed by his predictions of the evil to come. He brought down to the House an enormous aggregate of Estimates for 1874-5, and to add to that Budget, he brought down supplementary estimates for the current year 1873-4 of a magnitude never previously brought before the House of Commons. He (Mr. Plumb) wished at this point to claim the attention of the House for a few minutes, while he spoke of a peculiar feature in this unusual action of the Finance Minister. A great deal depended, in all the examination into the financial affairs of this country at that time, upon the position which the country was in when the hon. the Finance Minister took the management of its finances. He brought down a statement showing what the expenditure of 1874-5 would be, and, in doing so, stated that the Government had been forced by the legislation of 1873 to make an enormous addition to the current expenditure of the country. But he made one very remarkable statement, which attracted great attention in the House and in the country. He said, in effect: "You cannot expect that, even with the great commitments of our predecessors pressing upon us and staring us in the face, I shall cut down the expenditure of the Department of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works." Even in view of the terrible disasters which were about to fall on the country, the present depression in trade, the decline in the revenue, the increase of indebtedness, they could not expect him to do this. Why that was one of the directions above all others in which the expenditure might have been reduced. There must have been many public works upon which, with great propriety and without disadvantage to the country, the expenditure might have been dispensed with, or greatly reduced until some more fortunate condition of affairs enabled the country to go on with them. Although it was one of the most important, it was one of the easiest Departments to regulate; provided, always, that it was not over-ridden with political considerations, which prevented it from being properly dealt with. It might have been the pressure from the outside of hungry partizan contractors, which made the Finance Minister unwilling or unable to deal with it. He brought down Supplementary Estimates which were to be added to the expenditure of the current year 1873-4, and, with more ingenuity than candour, charged them against his predecessor, Mr. Tilley.

MR. PLUMB.

These Supplementary Estimates were double the amount—he might almost say three times the amount—of any that had ever been brought down. They amounted to nearly twenty-five hundred thousand dollars to be added. Mr. Tilley stated, in his Budget speech the year before, that the Supplementary estimates made necessary by the legislation of 1873, would be somewhere about fifteen hundred thousand dollars. The system of bringing down large Supplementary Estimates was pernicious; it was one that should not be tolerated to any large extent; one that should not be resorted to, except under circumstances of weighty consideration. It was very evident no Parliament could have control over the finances of a country if, after having voted an expenditure that must be adopted, item by item, in full view of the current receipts of the country and its financial condition, they should be called upon to pass amounts which had been added to the expenditure of the previous year. He did not say this on purpose to condemn any Government, but he said it was a bad system, a pernicious system, and one that ought not to be indulged in. In this he (Mr. Plumb) was sustained by the authority of Mr. Gladstone in his evidence before the Committee of Public Accounts in 1862. If there was an item of the Supplementary Estimates of 1873-4 which could properly be placed in the Estimates of 1874-5 the Finance Minister was false to his duty if he did not put it there, or if he refrained from doing so for the purpose of a temporary triumph over the gentleman who was his predecessor, or for the sake of misleading a newly-elected House, not familiar with public affairs. If the hon. the Finance Minister did that for the sake of obtaining a political triumph, for making a point which was more or less objectionable against his predecessor, it ought to deprive him of the confidence of the financial world. The man who held the position of Finance Minister of Canada should be above party considerations, and should never allow himself to indulge in those party utterances marked by party prejudices which might be allowed, although objectionable, in his colleagues. He ought to stand apart, and to hold himself above and aloof from party squabbles, in order to hold the confidence of the country, and he could not command that confidence if his power was used for party purposes or party triumphs. He had already given his authority upon this question of Supplementary Estimates. Mr. Gladstone—who, apart from certain erratic conduct which he had displayed during the last few months, held and deserved to hold a high place in all matters of finance in England—gave evidence in 1862 before the Public Accounts Committee of the House of Commons to this effect: "Supplementary Estimates are one of the greatest evils that the House could endure." The objection urged against them by Mr. Gladstone, and which he had repeatedly pressed upon Parliament, was "that he regarded such Estimates with great jealousy. Though very plausible in theory, he thought that no practice tended so much to defeat the efficacy of Parliamentary control as the easy resort to Supplementary Estimates. To render this control effectual, it was necessary that the House of Commons should have the money transactions of the year presented in one mass, without which the House would not know where it was." They had constantly this evil presented to them by a Reform Government, and now, while they were taking the current year's expenditure, and were told that in certain items there was a large reduction, they had better wait until they got to the end of it, and see what additions were brought down in the Supplementary Estimates, in order that they might know what the aggregate was, and then they could judge better and more intelligently as to the expenditure of the year in comparison with that of the years which preceded it. Of course, it might be, and it was necessary frequently to bring down Supplementary Estimates. It was necessary in 1873; the legislation made it necessary. But this was not the case in 1874. From the Schedule A of the Supplementary Estimates of 1874, he would read from among other items and things—"Militia, Police Force in Manitoba, $60,000;" "Hudson Bay Company, $20,000." Admitting that this latter was a proper charge, it did not belong to that year at all, but to the previous year, and it should not have been used to swell the abnormally large expenditure of 1873-4. Then there was the Red River Road, construction and working expenses $235,000. He should like to know how much of that expenditure accrued out of arrangements with contractors.

MR. MACKENZIE: Not one dollar.

MR. PLUMB: I did not say what the contracts were. I think the hon. the Premier is rather premature in his remark; this would seem to be a sore subject with him.

MR. MACKENZIE: If my hon. friend will allow me, I may state that the whole of that amount was expended before the present Government came into office.

MR. PLUMB said then a good deal of it was spent during the troubles in Manitoba, and it was spent for a legitimate purpose. He did not insinuate that it was spent for anything else, but the hon. the Prime Minister seemed to feel it rather a sore point. He should show something further with regard to the Red River Route by-and-bye. The increase between 1868 and 1873 was as follows: In items of the accounts open in 1868, grouped together for convenience and condensation, they found an increase in the following:—

|--|-----------|
| Civil Government, Justice, Police, Penitentiaries and Legislation..... | $780,712 |
| Geological Survey, Arts, Statistics and Census..... | 122,195 |
| Immigration, Quarantine and Marine Hospitals..... | 303,690 |
| Pensions and Superannuations..... | 64,474 |
| Ocean and River Steam Service and Lighthouse and Coast Service.... | 500,234 |
| Fisheries..... | 46,675 |
| Miscellaneous Expenses..... | 9,709 |
| Customs..... | 180,996 |
| Excise..... | 127,996 |
| Culling Timber..... | 13,476 |
| Post Office Department..... | 770,468 |
| Public Works, Construction..... | 1,699,732 |
| do Revenue..... | 1,763,393 |

These items together amounted to $8,668,358

In addition to the above appeared the following items in 1873-4, which were not in the accounts of 1867-8, namely:—

|------------------------------------|-----------|
| Indian Grants expenditure..... | $146,608 |
| Dominion Lands..... | 283,163 |
| do Forces, Manitoba..... | 409,768 |
| Organization N - W. Territory..... | 12,262 |
| U. S. Boundary Survey | 79,293 |
| Military Stores..... | 144,906 |
| Manitoba Settlers | 69,330 |

Amounting in all to$1,144,790

All the above sums amounted to $9,813,496, and upon these the Finance Minister and his colleagues and backers based their charges against the financial administration of the late Government and their defence of their own lamentable failures — failures which could no longer be concealed or palliated, and which had caused general anxiety to be felt throughout the country. The increases occurred during a period of constantly augmenting obligations arising out of the arrangements of Confederation, the admission of new members to the Confederacy and the formation of a Province in the North-West Territory. The receipts during the seven years from Customs increased nearly 70 per cent.; from Excise 85 per cent.; from the Post-Office 100 per cent. On these three items alone the increased receipts were about nine millions of dollars. Prosperity so unexampled during a period of decreasing taxation was a sufficient justification of a liberal outlay, notwithstanding which, an aggregate of nearly twelve millions of the surplus revenue was applied to works chargeable to capital account and to a sinking fund. They, on his side of the House, were willing, and had always been willing, to accept the expenditure of the year 1873-4 as the one by which they were willing to compare their administration of affairs with that of the present Government, by which they were willing to test their economy; by which they were willing to test, item by item, the expenditure of public money, providing they were dealt fairly with as regarded 1874. For they were not willing to accept items which had been added by the present Government since they came into power in the Supplementary Estimates for 1873-4, brought in by Mr. Cartwright; items not contemplated by

MR. PLUMB.

Mr. Tilley when he made up his Budget in 1873, and brought in his financial measures of that year, or resulting from those measures; and he might say that no one had ventured to question the clearness and fairness of the statement made by Mr. Tilley. Whatever might be Mr. Tilley's opinion as to the sources of future revenue; whatever might be his opinion as to the power of the country to sustain this large expenditure which seemed to be inevitable; whatever might have been his opinions upon the past, present or prospective financial position, he could have no object whatever in increasing or diminishing the actual statement of facts which he had to bring before the House in his Budget speech. Mr. Tilley was a member of the party then in power, that came to the House with a clear and sufficient working majority after passing through the election of 1872, and there was no indication in the spring of 1873 which should have influenced Mr. Tilley in preparing his statement to gain any political advantage even if he were capable of being so influenced. The statement had been prepared long before Parliament met, because it did not meet until the month of April that year, if he remembered rightly. There was no reason, from Mr. Tilley's knowledge of the country's affairs, to lead him to suppose that any change was imminent, and, therefore, until he (Mr. Plumb) had better evidence, he should take his stand upon the financial statement of Mr. Tilley; and he trusted the time would come when his hon. friend the Finance Minister would no longer express regret, in making his Budget statements, that he had no hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House of sufficient financial ability to discuss them, for he (Mr. Plumb) ventured to hope that, if the hon. the Finance Minister continued to represent his country in Parliament, Mr. Tilley might, at some future day, confront him here in this House; and he ventured to predict that the statement he (Mr. Plumb) had made in Mr. Tilley's defence would be fully borne out by that gentleman himself. He would say this further. He had read, with astonishment, the statement of the Finance Minister, made in public, with regard to the administration of affairs in 1873-4, and he should be justified in bringing it before the House even if it had not been referred to in the very first debate following the meeting of this Parliament. The hon. member said that he had often asked himself whether, in the spring of 1873-4, those gentlemen were not like a drunken crew which had burst into the spirit room and were endeavouring to scuttle the ship. Was that the language that should come from a man who had charge of the finances, and to whom was entrusted the delicate operation of making loans, and of meeting the great financiers of England? Could he go there with such a report of such an utterance upon record? If there had been the slightest foundation for any hostile criticism, it should not have taken such a shape. One might have supposed that the hon. gentleman himself had been ashamed of his utterances, were they not deliberately published weeks after they were made, and had they not then borne the impress of having been carefully considered, revised and corrected, probably under the auspices of the hon. gentleman himself. He (Mr. Plumb) could say, with truth, that no provocation, however great, could have justified a responsible Minister of the Dominion of Canada in using such language. But there had been no provocation. The Opposition had contented themselves with criticizing the affairs of the Government, as they had the right to do, in a spirit which was perfectly proper and justifiable. They had criticized the public acts of the Government, the public record of the Government, the practice versus the professions of the so-called Reform Administration. They had a right to compare the previous promises of those gentlemen with their present position; to take up the record and see whether these hon. gentlemen had kept their promises to the country; and they would be recreant to the duty entrusted to Her Majesty's loyal Opposition if they did not criticize carefully, scan carefully, scrutinize carefully, word after word, figure after figure, everything appertaining to the interests of the country, so long as they confined themselves to a fair, honest, open, just, candid examination of the position.

Yet, for this, they were abused on every platform in the country upon which the Ministry had appeared, hounded in the newspapers, pursued by vituperation and detraction such as he (Mr. Plumb) had never before known in this country to have been poured on the heads of politicians, and he had lived in Canada many years amid much strife and party bitterness. He could only say that nothing in the legislation of 1873-4 justified the unfavourable criticism of the hon. the Finance Minister, but that it should rather challenge his admiration, as showing the far-reaching statesmanship, the prudence, the forecast, and the judgment of the men who had been entrusted, year after year, with the government of this country, and to whom the country owed, in a large measure, that prosperity which had existed up to the time that hon. gentlemen opposite took the management of its affairs, up to that evil day when the administration fell into their feeble hands. He had been looking over the Statutes of 1873, and had failed to find in those Statutes any thing which justified the criticism of the hon. the Finance Minister or his colleagues upon the legislation of that Session; and he had failed to find anything that did not grow legitimately out of the necessities of the situation. Was there any fair objection to, or could there be any unfavourable criticism on, the readjustment of the subsidies? It was a purely proper financial transaction. It was found that the subsidies had been placed upon a basis which was proved incorrect; it was found necessary, upon a reconsideration of the principle on which the subsidies were fixed, that, in the interests of justice, in order to carry out the principles and the spirit of Confederation, these subsidies should be readjusted. It was also perfectly fair and proper that New Brunswick should have the compensation which was due to her for the surrender of her export duties under the stipulations of the Treaty of Washington. The readjustment had been accepted by a large majority of the House, and those propositions which became law in 1873 were passed by this House, upon a fair, open debate, and he failed to find anything in the records or debates of that day which justified any such language, or any approach to such language, as had been used by the hon. the Finance Minister for the purpose of gaining a paltry political advantage, which was sure to be reversed the very instant the rays of the lantern of truth would be flashed upon it. He failed to find any justification for one single word uttered upon the public platforms, condemnatory of the acts of the hon. gentleman's predecessors. The only truth that could be found at the bottom of all their outcry was, that it confirmed the saying that

Is he, who loudest cries, ‘Step Thief.’”

It was because the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches were conscious that, in their administration of public affairs, they had been guilty of departing from every principle which they had enunciated to the country before they went into office. That was the reason of those violent tirades which could not pass for argument, which might be all very well addressed to a mixed crowd at a political picnic, but which would not bear close and clear investigation before a body constituted like the Parliament of the Dominion, even though its majority supported the hon. gentleman, from whom, though the Opposition did not expect justice, they expected to obtain a candid hearing, and to force a just judgment, even from those who had been characterized as the mechanical majority of the other side. But there were men who rose above party considerations; who, occasionally, at least, had a spasm of patriotism, and who would listen to arguments. One of the arguments in justification of the predecessors of the hon. gentlemen opposite, upon whom the present Administration put all the sins of the decalogue, was that, during the legislation of 1873, which occasioned all the increase of expenditure of 1873-4 which could fairly be charged upon it, they had done nothing not absolutely justifiable in the interests of the country, and absolutely laudable in those interests. The party of the Opposition stood upon their past record, and were willing to go to the country and appeal to that record, and compare it with that of the last four years

during which the Administration of affairs had been in the hands of those gentlemen who had stated, on entering office, that they intended to elevate the standard of public morality. If the hon. the Finance Minister had really believed his own predictions, if he had really believed that the legislation of 1873 was the profligate act of a crew that had broken into the spirit room and were about to scuttle the ship, to use his own language, it was his duty to shorten sail and keep off the lee shore. He came into power, being assured in his own mind that there would be a deficit, assured from his own view of things, from the conclusions which he had drawn, that it was necessary to take in double reefs, to curtail the public expenditure in all directions; and he (Mr. Plumb) ventured to say that, if his predecessor, Mr. Tilley, had been at the helm at that time, he would have done exactly as Sir John Rose did when he found there was to be a deficit; he would have prepared for it either by readjusting the tariff in such a way as to produce more revenue, or by reducing the expenditure. But his hon. friend the Finance Minister prepared for it by increasing the expenditure; he prepared to go on in the same course as that which he had characterized as profligate, which he had said was that of a drunken crew who were scuttling the ship; he prepared to lend a hand at the scuttling, not to try and get the ship into harbour. No, he found the spirit room and he thought it advisable to take his grog and his chance with the rest—and so he did. He imposed taxation on the country which, he said, would meet the probable expenditure. Instead of that, the Dominion had had nothing but deficit and disaster since the hon. the Finance Minister took the helm. His taxes, which were to have raised the revenue to three million dollars, left us with a deficiency of two millions; a growing deficiency, to which now nearly two millions must be added. And how did he propose to meet it? Mr. Tilley had said, “the principle of increasing the public expenditure without, at the same time, providing for it, either by anticipated increase of revenue or by taxation, is an unsound one, one which would bring discredit upon the financier of any country." He proposed to deal with that question, not in the year 1873, because there would be a surplus of some \$750,000 for that year, and of \$913,151 for the succeeding year, which would cover the \$1,500,000 then proposed to be added to the public burdens. But, after those periods, Mr. Tilley proposed to deal with the public expenditure, and to deal with it in the direction of protecting the industries of the country. Mr. Tilley had said it was not necessary, in view of the surplus of that year and of the year 1874, that any new taxation should be imposed. But he (Mr. Plumb) ventured to say that, if Mr. Tilley had had the direction of public affairs, if he had seen what was manifest when the panic began in the month of September, 1873, if he had seen that it was unavoidable that the Dominion would be reached by that wave which had swept over the United States, which had stricken England, and which had threatened to engulf the whole of the commerce and industries of the civilized world in common ruin; if he had seen all this, he (Mr. Plumb) did not think he would have said, "You cannot expect me to reduce the expenditure of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works; to do anything except to go on in the way of our profligate predecessors and increase the public expenditure in every direction." He (Mr. Plumb) did not believe in this paltry show of economy in the financial statement and Estimates of this year and the next. He wanted to investigate the Estimates and the expenditure, and see whether it was an honest economy; whether it was an absolute and permanent reduction of controllable expenditure, or whether it was merely a sham retrenchment for ulterior purposes and, for the time being, starving some great item which would have to call for added expenditure hereafter, probably a double expenditure, on account of the false economy which had reduced it in order to make a point in the current Estimates. When this had been looked into, and when it was ascertained that the Finance Minister's statements had stood the test of close scrutiny, and had no supplemental Estimates to add to the expenditure of the current year or of the next, it would be time to congratulate the Government on its economy; but, until then, he should not do so. Every one knew how easy it was to mislead the public with masses of figures. He knew the statement had gone abroad, with regard to the expenditure of 1873, that the late Government had entered into obligations amounting to \$131,000,000. What did the items consist of? Among them was thirty millions for the Pacific Railway. The Pacific Railway expenditure was guarded by the express provision that the public burdens should not be augmented or unduly increased by the proposed subsidy of thirty millions of dollars, and nobody knew that better than the hon. gentlemen on the other side. That principle was affirmed, almost word for word, by the hon. member for West Middlesex two years ago, accepted by the House, and perfectly well understood. But the late Government did not commence the building of the Pacific Railway. It was taken out of their hands. The thirty million dollar subsidy could have been no burden on the hon. the Finance Minister, because the very instant that gentleman and his friends came into power, under the tyrannical rule of that great majority which the Finance Minister had at his back, new propositions, entirely at variance with the plan of the old Government, were taken up and hurried through the House at half-past three in the morning; a proposition which had not only reversed the whole scheme of the late Government, but had committed the country to so vast an outlay, that no man in the House could measure it, instead of the limited sum of thirty million dollars, which the late Government were justified in promising as a subsidy in the then state of public opinion with regard to railway matters, which had been greatly modified by the panic of 1873, and by the failure of the great enterprises through the world. The hon. the Finance Minister had no right to throw that in as an item of the burdens, because he relieved himself from it the first opportunity, and adopted a worse plan. Then, he said, in addition to that, there was forty-one million dollars of public debt which was to fall due, and the renewal of which had to be arranged for. And he added that amount to the public burden, and he made people believe, people who had not that aptitude for simple addition which he had stated every senator ought to have, that the forty-one million dollars, which was a mere ordinary business transaction, the changing of one security for another, was an additional burden thrown upon his shoulders by his predecessors. It was the most natural thing in the world to re-borrow for that maturing debt; it did not create a ripple in the financial world to have that debt renewed; it did not create a new obligation, but was merely an adjustment of the old debt, which he had effected at a low rate of interest. These items were seventy-one millions already out of the \$131,000,000. He (Mr. Plumb) had taken up the expenditure of this Government since they came into power, upon those works to which they said the profligacy of the previous Administration committed them, and he had summed it up and knew how much had been expended over the very small amount in that line. He had the hon. the Finance Minister's own statement in his Budget speech as to how much more would be required, and he failed to find in that anything like the sum which he had stated before the public. He stated that he required for the enlargement of the canals, the Pacific Railway Survey, and for carrying out all the obligations which were upon his hands, a certain sum. It was not a very vast affair, it would not ruin anybody, even in the pre-ent condition of the country, if there were proper expenditure to be made in the interests of the country; and, he ventured to say, there was not a man in this House who would not willingly vote the money, despite the deficits which had arisen out of the incompetent financiering of the Minister of Finance. He had only to look at the statement to see the utter fallacy of the whole reasoning, which had been built up in order to condemn the previous Government in respect to the management of their Finance Minister. His statement had been so misleading and fallacious in that direction that it was difficult to put confidence in it in any other. He would now refer to another point upon which the hon. the Finance Minister was misleading the country, perhaps not knowingly, but the country had been misled by his claim that he had relieved the public burdens largely in the reduction of interest upon the public debt. Almost one-half of the hon. the Finance Minister's Budget speech of last year and of the year before consisted in his exculpation of himself from blame, in regard to the loans which he had floated in the English market. He had made the most astounding statement last winter that the four per cent. loan of 1876, £2,500,000 sterling, had been made at a moment so auspicious, so well justified, so exactly in the nick of time, that if he had delayed a few days in presenting it to the public, there would have been a loss, to use his own words in one of his picnic speeches, of "several per cent." He talked of "several per cent," on a loan of such magnitude—why, one per cent. was \$125,000; but that was a trifle. There were no such fluctuations as several per cent. in the value of good public securities, and there ought to be none in the public securities of Canada. At the same time that the hon. the Finance Minister told the people that that loan had been floated at a moment which was the only time when it could have been floated with the success which had attended it; at the very time he made that statement on the floor of this House, in the month of February succeeding the date of negotiating the loan, South Australia had offered for public competition a loan also bearing four per cent. interest, and had received from 96 per cent. to 98 per cent. for it; whereas the Finance Minister's loan, which had been so successfully floated, in the "very nick of time," had obtained, when the allowances made in the way of interest were taken into consideration, not 89 per cent., or, he thought, 82½ per cent. was nearer the mark. Now, it might be that the great Dominion of Canada had not reached the height of credit which South Australia had attained; it might be that some of the utterances of the hon. the Finance Minister had not tended to increase the public confidence in the present or future financial position of Canada; it might be that the people of England had obtained a glimpse of the brazen side of the shield which the hon. the Finance Minister habitually presented to the people of Canada, while he presented to the confiding capitalists of London only the silver side; and again, it might be that the credit of this country had not attained the height to which its great resources entitled it. If that were the case, he did not think it would be necessary to look farther for reasons than to the unsound utterances of the gentlemen who had sought to degrade the position of Canada for the sake of throwing obloquy upon their political predecessors. In connection with the statement that the public burdens had been decreased, he would say this: that upon the loan which had been made at four per cent., the money received into the Treasury was not, by nearly eleven per cent., the amount which Canada was represented to own; that was into the public Treasury, out of the loan of \$12,500,000, came but \$11,100,000; a discount of \$1,400,000 or thereabouts, and there had been nothing gained by it. A five per cent. loan, having the same period to run; if it could be floated on the London market at 105, or 5 per cent. premium, which he (Mr. Plumb) did not think would have been an extravagant price, if Canada had the credit on the London market which she ought to have, and would have had, but for the representations that had been made on the floor of the House and elsewhere,—such a loan, by having thirty years to run, would have represented $4\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. interest to lender and borrower. A 4 per cent. loan sold within a fraction of 89 per cent., would have yielded exactly $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. also. There was no advantage in getting a low rate of interest at a sacrifice of the principal, except to boast of to those who did not know, when they looked at figures, what figures meant. Besides, these loans have been made for the purpose of prosecuting public works and in order to get capital into the country, and the reductio ad absurdum would be made by stating that, supposing the Finance Minister had made a 3 per cent. loan, he could have boasted still more. Now, a 3 per cent. loan, to pay $4\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. interest, would have to be sold at 73 per cent.; and we would be a loser of 27 per cent. of immediate capital, leaving us but \$9,125,000 as the proceeds of a loan of \$12,500,000; and, with equal propriety, the Finance Minister might have boasted of reducing the rate of interest. Had the hon. the Finance Minister sold a 5 per cent. loan at 105 per cent., he would not only have received 11 or 12 per cent. more, but the premium of say 5 per cent. also—16 per cent., in all, of present capital. And on a loan of \$10,000,000 he would have got \$1,600,000 more money, and would have been none the poorer as to the rate of interest; and on the loans he had made at 4 per cent., which he was congratulating the country upon, there had been no saving of interest as compared with a 5 per cent. at 105; and in the aggregate of 4 per cent. loans negotiated by the Finance Minister, the country had lost immediate capital to the amount of upwards of five million dollars. The country would scarcely be prepared for such a statement as he (Mr. Plumb) was making, but the proof was irrefragable; the statement he had made in regard to the loan at 4 per cent.—namely, that, although nominally at 4 per cent., it cost us $4\frac{3}{4}$ —was one which he could establish by calculation, and for its proof he could refer to the highest authority, to the authority which was accepted everywhere in the largest loan transactions in the United States with regard to making investments of long date upon public securities. He made that statement, and was willing to assume all its responsibility. Therefore, the loans of which they had heard so much were merely nominally 4 per cent. loans; they never were really 4 per cent. loans; they were loans upon which the country paid an equivalent of $4\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., taking into account the discount and the interest allowances made by the hon. the Finance Minister. He doubted the policy of floating Government securities at any rate which should compel the sale of them much under par, or having quotations made constantly, on the London market, of Canadian securities very much below par. That was, of course, a mere matter of opinion. He doubted the policy of making loans without public tender. No man could afford, in dealing with the finances of the country, to place himself in any position which needed elaborate explanation; no man making loans, taking the responsibility of choosing his own time, beyond the control of Parliament, and dealing with large sums, wherein a difference of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. or $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. represented a fortune, should do so, except in a manner open to the world; and he should not be necessitated to give the elaborate and painful explanations to be found in the Budget speeches. The terms upon which loans of that kind should be negotiated were that they should be offered at the proper time, under proper precautions, with a proper regard for the condition of the money market; taking advantages, as every financier should do, of the advice of distinguished financiers, but not governed completely by them, because a man must act upon his own judgment in such things; he could not rely entirely on the advice of those who might have interests antagonistic to his. He should then offer his loan by open public competition to the highest bidder. Other Governments did so. France offered her loans to public competition, even in the very worst of the crisis which followed the disasters in which she was involved and which ended in her distressing humiliation. France thus commanded the confidence of small investors who, even in the worst of times, offered four, five, even ten times as much as the loans proposed. He (Mr. Plumb) had had personal experience for many years in the United States, previous to his residence in Canada, in this connection. He had been a large offerer for loans, and he knew what he said when he held that no man, holding a similar position in the United States to that of the Finance Minister of Canada, would have ventured, in former days, to have offered a loan without giving sufficient public notice, without receiving sealed bids, not bearing on the outside the names of the parties bidding, but simply numbered—carefully opened in the presence of disinterested gentlemen, the contents scrutinized and noted, and the award made in every case to the highest bidder, so that those who offered even the smallest fraction above the next highest price, would get their due consideration, and so throughout. This was the course which should have been pursued. It was one—he was only stating a general principle—which should govern us; and, if the hon. the Finance Minister had not succeeded in getting as high a price for his loan, in that way, he would not have been blameable, because he would have followed a safe precedent; one that could always be justified, because it would obviate in the people's minds the suspicion of combinations; and all the discussions which had taken place in this House on the subject would have been unnecessary. And had the hon. the Finance Minister adopted this system, he (Mr. Plumb) doubted whether the country would not have been the gainer. But the course pursued placed the borrower in this dilemma: In the first place, when a loan was made by Canada, for instance, en bloc, without competition, it fell into the hands of the great capitalists and the great bankers, who distributed it afterwards at their pleasure to smaller investors, making their profits upon it. When a second attempt was made by the same Government to float a loan, the borrower was in the hands of the people who took up the first loan; he could not get out of their hands, if they chose to make use of their power; they could make a price in the market to suit themselves. It was well known that large loans which were not constantly dealt with in Lombard-street or the Stock Exchange, could not be sold by forced sale without greatly depressing the regular price. It was well known the price could be put down at any time by throwing a large amount on the market. If it had been desirable at all to put a price on the Finance Minister's last loan, the broker would say that the last quotation was the price to be taken, and a quotation could be made at any time in the interest of large loan-mongers. Quotations could be made by men who wanted to get hold of the security at their own prices, and were interested in depressing the price. It required no financial skill and very little financial judgment to float the loan. The condition of the money market in England during that period and long afterwards, was one which, he ventured to say, despite the postulate taken by the member for North Oxford, was one which inevitably followed a great depression. It was a condition of great plethora; there was a sluggishness in the money market, and nothing was more opposed to what was stated by the hon. member for North Oxford than the conclusion he attempted to draw that a great plethora of money, a very large accumulation in the banks, was an evidence of prosperity. It was exactly the reverse. The London Joint Stock Bank and the other banking establishments of London were so loaded with money that they had to stop interest on deposits. The banks were lending money, according to the London quotations, at 1 and $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum, year after year; and, when the hon. the Finance Minister went to negotiate his loan, these gentlemen, who kindly took the stock, would deposit the bonds in the banks and borrow the money at less than one-half the interest they were drawing. Although, if to-day the stock was not quoted at the price which the Finance Minister nominally obtained for it, there was a large profit gained by any large subscriber who had held it, for he could have borrowed money on it at half the rate which it yielded, because there was, therefore, a great difference in his favour in the interest he received and the interest he paid. It was astonishing that it was contended for a moment that there was any merit, financial skill, or peculiar ability, in putting upon the London market, when money ruled as it did, the comparatively trifling sum borrowed by Canada. At the same time, it was well known that many foreign borrowing countries were falling into discredit. That fact did not touch Canada unfavourably; did not react upon us; it operated to our advantage. Turkey, Egypt, Spain, Russia, the South American Republics, and other countries had drawn enormous sums of money from English capitalists. Their loans had been distributed through England, investors being tempted by the high rate of interest offered. The bonds of foreign railway companies had been sold at rates that also promised a very high rate of interest. But those facts did not affect the negotiation of the public securities of the Dominion. On the contrary, the banks in England were looking for safer investments for their money, which was lying idle in consequence of the withdrawal of confidence in railway companies and want of faith in the countries which had formerly been the chief borrowers, and, when such a state of affairs existed, that was the moment to take advantage of the condition of the money market. The Dominion being part of the British Empire, governed according to English law, and, to a great extent, under the control of the traditions and opinions which were accepted by England in her financial transactions, any default in the payment of interest on the debt and the provision of a Sinking Fund, was an impossibility, and that afforded an additional reason why the loan should have been made with more ease and at a higher price than had been obtained by the hon. the Finance Minister. If the hon. gentleman had floated a 4 per cent. loan at par, there would have been something to boast of, and he would then have been entitled to make up an account of the amount of interest saved to the country. The manner in which that account had been drawn up—he did not refer to anything but that special item in the Public Accounts and official documents—in order to hoodwink the people, was one which would not bear examination, and in making up any statement in regard to interest on that loan the rate of interest must be calculated upon the proceeds of the loan, because, by parting with principal, we paid a far higher rate than the nominal rate on the bonds. Yet, for the purpose of obtaining credit in regard to finance, the Government claimed that a 4 per cent. loan could only have been negotiated at that critical moment; that, as the Finance Minister had stated, it could not have been made a few days later, and the people were told he had reduced the rate of interest paid by Canada to 4 per cent. He (Mr. Plumb) had clearly shown that the hon. gentleman had brought it down to one-quarter per cent. less than 5; practically, he had not reduced it at all, for he could have floated a 5 per cent loan at 105. That was the true state of the case, and it deprived the Finance Minister of a good deal of the merit which had been claimed for him as a successful financier, claimed by his partizans in puffing up his financial achievements. It did not lie in the mouth of any hon member to say that, at a time when there was such a plethora of money in the London joint stock banks they could not make profitable loans, or that it was any credit to go with Canadian securities and obtain a loan in England. It was decrying the credit of Canada. It was placing the Dominion on a very low level to say there was any necessity to have a combination of the great financiers of London to take a paltry loan of \$12,500,000, which was as nothing in the great transactions which took place every day in a country which was of necessity the great financial centre and the exchange of the world, and where the tendency always was for money to accumulate and lie idle. The House had had a statement showing how the loan had reduced the general rate of interest, and, if the other statements were of a like character, there was little foundation for them. The hon. the Finance Minister had stated that the receipts of the country through the two great sources of revenue—Excise and Customs—had been for some time declining, but that now it happened they were beginning to revive. Up to the 1st July, the end of the last fiscal year, there had been a persistent and continuous decline. If there had been a slight spasmodic increase, it was due more to the fact that, during the last two or three years, owing to the necessities of the case, in the absolute stagnation of trade the imports had fallen down to a point so absolutely low that it was absolutely necessary, in spite of the hardness of the times and of the gloomy prospect ahead, for traders to replenish their impoverished stocks. But he did not believe there was any increase which could be relied upon as an indication of improvement. He could not admit there was any authentic information that would lead the House to believe there was the slightest change for the better, in the business situation; but the hon. the Finance Minister believed that, although he was face to face with another deficit, although the Opposition could show by the Public Accounts that the receipts and expenditures chargeable to revenue did not balance within \$3,500,000, there being a deficit to that amount, and he declared he had nothing to offer the House for the purpose of making up that deficiency. Some paltry charge upon the expenditure he might strike out, some false economy he might propose, but the general policy of the Government was unchanged. He (Mr. Plumb) ventured to say that nothing could be more disastrous, nothing could be more unbusinesslike, than to permit that state of affairs to continue without, in some way or another, attempting to remove the difficulty. The Government caused the first deficiency in the history of Confederation, amounting to \$1,900,000, by a failure to retrench or to impose taxes. Another deficiency followed it, and another deficiency would occur in the present year, in spite of all the reductions which had taken place on public works, and the exercising of economy, reducing somewhat the public expenditure which had swollen with tremendous rapidity in the controllable expenditure since the present Government came into power. Nevertheless, the Finance Minister had shown no disposition to meet the case and deal with the great questions which were connected with the fiscal affairs of the country in the spirit of a financier or statesman. There might be a reason for that result. They were approaching a crisis; they were coming to a point when those hon. gentlemen were to be judged. They were coming to a time when those hon. gentlemen, who had been supported by a mechanical majority, would have to appear before another tribunal and answer for their administration of affairs during the last four years, which had not been such as to meet with the satisfaction of the country. There was a reason why hon. gentlemen opposite manifested no disposition to deal with that great question. The best interests of the country might suffer, its credit abroad and position in the eyes of the world must suffer, simply because at this moment those hon. gentlemen refused to deal with the pressing fiscal questions, though, on it being manifest that the revenues of the country would not meet the expenditure, the Finance Minister was bound either to cut down the expenditure or increase the revenue. The hon. gentleman should have exercised prudence and economy in the right direction, but he had failed to do it. In 1874, when the hon. gentleman had brought down his Budget, he proposed that an increase to $16\frac{2}{3}$ per cent. should be made to the principal list of taxable imports for the very good reason that if that sum were multiplied by six it would make 100, and would therefore be easy to calculate. At all events, that was the reason given. When the hon. the Finance Minister was dealing with questions which he did not understand, he made a change. He had not endeavoured to deal with the tariff in view of the changed condition of the country, or to approach it in a statesmanlike manner, but simply added $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and afterwards he had gone before the people and endeavoured to persuade them that the Government had afforded more Protection than their predecessors because they had increased the tariff from 15 to $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Was such a course statesmanlike on the part of hon. gentlemen who had charged that the fiscal affairs of the country had been grossly mismanaged by their predecessors in office? Was that to be expected at the hands of the Finance Minister who claimed to possess a monopoly of all the financial information in the country, and who had expressed regret that there was no member on the Opposition side of the House who was able to cope with him in regard to financial questions?

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess

MR. PLUMB said, when the House adjourned, it would be remembered that he was discussing at some considerable length the consequences of the policy which had been adopted by the hon. the Finance Minister in making his loan. The plan that he asserted was the true one for borrowing on the part of any Government, and the manner in which borrowing should be conducted; and the fact that open tender was the only system which would be entirely free from question or suspicion; and he now wished to say that the hon. the Finance Minister did not succeed in placing his loan as he (Mr. Cartwright) would wish them to understand, merely compelling the country to pay an interest of four per cent., but actually by the conditions of his loan made the rate $4\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., and did not in any way reduce the rate of interest below that of five per cent. of the then going rate on the market, that was to say, 105. He did not speak of these things without positive proof.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. PLUMB said, hon. gentlemen might say "hear, hear," and laugh at the statement; but he could say that, if they attempted to dispute his assertions in this respect, they would find that they and not himself were ignorant of the subject. The amount paid for this loan, under all the circumstances, was one which was extraordinarily advantageous to the country, considering the fact that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) who went to England and negotiated it, had done everything in his power, prior to making those negotiations, to lower the credit of the country by the statements that he had made with regard to its position. The Budget speech of 1874 was more calculated to cause disaster to and depress the credit of this country and throw distrust upon its financial administration, upon the position of its public men, and upon the manner in which its affairs had been carried on, than any utterances which had been made in this House since he had the honour of knowing anything of its affairs or of the course of its debates. It came from an authoritative source. It was a very different thing for a Finance Minister to rise in his place and make a deliberate statement of that kind from what it would have been for a private member to have done so, no matter what the purpose was—whether to damage his opponent or to elevate the position of his own party, when what was expected to be a calm and authoritative statement of the condition of the country was made by a gentleman to whose hand the financial affairs of the country were entrusted, from what it would have been had a private member not in authority risen and delivered ever so violent a statement. This went to the country and was read in England, and it represented that the most reckless extravagance had marked the administration of his predecessors; that an incompetent set of men had conducted these affairs, and that they had carried the country almost to the verge of bankruptcy owing to the obligations they had assumed and thrown upon it. Why, the language used with regard to the Pacific Railway might be taken as a sample of the whole tone of the speech; this was, if he remembered right, that the engagements for that Railway would have increased the public expenditure nearly $150,000,000; and he had since heard that the gentlemen who undertook to complete that work in ten years should be held up to public execration for having pledged the country to such an impossible, gigantic, reckless, and destructive enterprise. He would again repeat, because they were constantly referring to this subject, that, in view of the knowledge which the late Government had of railway construction in the United States, and of the fact that four or five men had built the road from San Francisco to a point north of Utah, in fact almost by their own enterprise, though with Government aid, it was true; yet these men had taken the initiative and had carried the line over a route much more difficult than anything which was ever contemplated in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. They ran it over an ascent of 7,000 feet at the highest point, and built it in four years, at a period, moreover, when labour was high and everything inflated in the United States, in consequence of the war. Under such unfavourable circumstances, those men had carried their undertaking to a triumphant success, and never were their lands depreciated below par, and the net earnings of the road were now enough to pay large dividends and interest on the whole stock and bonds, though he believed the process of diluting the stock had gone on to a frightful extent, thus making it represent a very much larger capital than the road even cost during the period of its greatest inflation. This being the case, it was no rash undertaking for the gentlemen who represented the then Government of Canada to say that they would build the Pacific Railway in ten years, provided always that they did not increase the burdens of the people; this was the proviso which rendered their position a perfectly impregnable one, and he was surprised that year after year, and day after day, in fact, whenever there was a public utterance of the Government or its partizans, in some way or another this charge was brought against the late Government; this accusation was lugged relevantly or irrelevantly into almost every speech or discussion; and hon. gentlemen opposite were never tired of saying that this was a reckless undertaking, or of denouncing the late Administration for having lent themselves to it. Probably, by this time, those hon. gentlemen had almost persuaded themselves that what they had so often stated was true. Once for all, it might be said that the plan of the late Government for building the road was eminently justifiable with regard to the period when the undertaking was proposed; but he might say that the language quoted the other day from the leading organ of the party now in power and then in Opposition, by his hon. friend the member for Monck, language used in 1871, urged, threatened and induced, by every possible argument, the then Government to proceed with the construction of the Pacific Railway at once, and told them that if this was not done they were not true to the country and its interests; that they should carry out the great trust reposed in their hands, and that they should do it without delay. He now referred to the Globe newspaper. There was no thought of delay then. He did not know that there was even a trail across the prairies at the time save that pursued by the Indian, the adventurer or the employés of the Hudson Bay Company. The then Government knew nothing save by the most cursory examination of what was the condition of the country to be traversed by the road; and he thought it did not lie in the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite to deal any longer with that particular question in that disingenuous manner. With reference to the expenditure since the period of 1873-4, he might say he approached it with a certain degree of diffidence. There were many conditions attached to any comparative statement, and, except these with the statements on which they were based were in the hands of the person who had free access to the public archives, and who was familiar with the statement in the way that could only probably be attained by gentlemen who were in office—there were many points in regard to which any comparison might necessarily be controverted, and regarding which, perhaps, some mistake might be made by a person speaking, as one might say, from the outside; and he was in this relation warned by his hon. friend the Premier, who had seen fit in his public utterances to denounce an hon. gentleman who attempted to deal with questions of public expenditure. The Premier had poured out the vials of his wrath upon the head of that unoffending gentleman who ventured to examine the Public Accounts. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) said that this hon. gentleman, who had had long experience in public affairs, was a neophyte and a tyro. What right had he to speak of the expenditure, or to criticize public affairs? But was this the language of the true Reformer, or of the man who was supposed to be the leader of the party which sought to have every man take an intelligent interest in the affairs of the country, and examine into public questions, and judge for himself, and take up his own line and views? And he (Mr. Plumb) here affirmed that the humblest taxpayer in Canada had a perfect right, in public or in private, to criticise the public acts of the Government or of any man connected with it, without being subjected to the taunt that he was a neophyte or a tyro. The claim of the hon. gentleman who had ventured to do so, was simply this: he had come into public life long before the hon. the Minister of the Interior, who professed to know all about public affairs, or the hon. the Minister of Justice, and almost before any hon. gentleman who sat upon the Ministerial benches, with the exception, he thought, of the hon. the Postmaster-General, of the hon. the Premier, and, perhaps six months after, the hon. the Minister of Finance, and that hon. gentleman had as good an opportunity to be conversant with public affairs as any gentleman in the Ministry, and a little better; and yet, forsooth, they were told that that hon. gentleman must not venture into the sacred regions of criticism upon the public affairs of this country; that gentleman had shown that there had been large increases in the public expenditure under the present Government; but no one in this House had ventured to meet his arguments. They had heard, in this debate, of everything else, and of all sorts of economies which the Government had instituted, but they blinked the grave question which had been put home to them with such clearness, and driven directly in with such logical force. They had not ventured to meet it, and they could not meet it. Now, he would venture, notwithstanding the sneers of his hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie), to take a few figures out of those accounts, and see how they compared with what was done by the previous Administration—that reckless, improvident and extravagant Administration of which they heard so much. They were told, when the hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, that the public offices had been so crowded with clerks that it was impossible to get through them. Well, if this was the case, they would have room enough in the new building that was, perhaps, for their accommodation; and the details of the expenditure showed that, however reckless and extravagant the late Government might have been, this Administration had far exceeded them in that respect. The total appropriation for Contingencies in 1873 was $176,709, and for Extra Clerks, $13,704. In 1875, the former item reached $212,327, and the latter $38,821; while in 1876 Contingencies amounted to $171,000, and the appropriation for Extra Clerks, $31,617, showing an increase of nearly 100 per cent. with regard to that item of expenditure for extra clerks for which the late Government was so much denounced, and in connection with which this Government had found it necessary to provide enlarged and extra accommodation, though not in the very best architectural taste, he was sorry to say. Still, enlarged accommodation had been furnished for men who had been employed by the Government, and the outlay for such extra service was very much larger than that made by the previous Government, and for which it was so loudly condemned. In the item for Canals, Improvement of Rivers, and Railways, there had been a steady increase. These were items that did not come before the House in the ordinary statement, but had to be looked up, and it required a great deal of labour to collate them. These were the points on which judgment could best be formed, because they were not so obvious as others. It required great labour to tabulate statements of this kind, but he would vouch for their accuracy. He would only come up to the year 1876. He did not regard 1877 as yet completed. They were upon the verge of a break-up of the present House, and whoever came in next year came in after the deluge, and the accounts could be made up afterwards by Supplementary Estimates. If the Government were a little short in their calculations, there was no difficulty in bringing up the arrears by resorting to the convenience of Supplementary Estimates; that was, if they were in power to make them; and, if not, what mattered? Better to take the year 1876 than the year 1877, for the purpose of an intelligent and accurate comparison. In 1875, the amount paid on the Welland Canal, for salaries, was $58,883, and for repairs and ordinary incidental labour, $88,450. In 1876, the amount paid for salaries was $64,243, and there was paid for repairs and ordinary incidental labour, $81,376. On the Lachine Canal, it had been found convenient to pay $27,898 in 1875, for salaries, and that had been increased to $43,010 in 1876, while the labour, which had cost $30,000, in 1875, cost only $29,000 in 1876. In 1875, on the Beauharnois Canal, the amount expended in salaries was $15,401, against $13,400 in 1873, and $15,600 in 1876. The labour on that canal cost, in 1873, $9,880; in 1875, $12,153; while in 1876, it amounted to $17,171. It might be remarked, in passing, that all these works were yielding less revenue than formerly, that there was a decline in business, and that the price of labour had, or ought to have, fallen, so that there should have been a reduction in two ways: first, in the amount of labour required, and secondly, in the price paid for it; but they had not seen any evidence that this economical Administration had brought this reduction about. On the Cornwall Canal, the amount spent in 1875, on salaries, was $15,219, and on labour, $7,098. In 1876, it was $8,595 on salaries, and $11,690 on labour. On the Chambly Canal, $14,000 was spent on salaries and $16,000 on labour in 1876, as against $12,946 for salaries, and $13,000 for labour in 1873. On the Ottawa and Rideau Canals, $24,000 had been paid for salaries, and $19,000 for labour in 1876, against $28,000 for salaries and $14,000 for labour in 1873. On the Ottawa River Works in 1873, $14,000 was paid for salaries, and $18,000 for labour; in 1875, $22,000 was paid for salaries, and $59,117 for labour; and in 1876, $20,104 was paid for salaries, and $33,000 for labour. Many of these items were undoubtedly meritorious. He did not object to any necessary expenditure, but it was very extraordinary that, when the Finance Minister preached his sermon of despair in 1874, he evidently felt he had sufficient warning to curtail the public expenditure in every direction; and he (Mr. Plumb) said it was sound policy, when the hon. gentleman found that the deficit was increasing year by year, for him to take some financial measure to prevent the constant accumulation and the recurrence of those deficits which alarmed the business community, created great distrust in the public mind, and endangered the credit and character of the country abroad. As soon as it was discovered that these deficits were inevitable, the true financial policy was either to curtail public expenditure and bring it within the limits of the revenue, or to put on some form of taxation which would cover the amount of the deficit. In these remarks, he (Mr. Plumb) was justified by the remarks made by his hon. friend the Premier in this House, as they appeared in the Hansard report in the month of March, 1876. They expressed, perhaps, in more clear and vigorous language than he (Mr. Plumb) was able to use, the very point and position he was taking as to protecting the country either by taxation or economy against the recurring deficits which had now swelled to so frightful an extent, and threatened, unless promptly and vigorously dealt with, to wreck the financial position and credit of Canada. At page 288 of the Hansard of 1876, the hon. the Premier said :

“When the revenue of the country fails to supply the amount of money that might be advantageously spent on public works and promoting the development of the country, we have simply to avoid the expenditure that can most easily be avoided in order that, like prudent men, we can keep our expenditure on a par with our income.”

Had this been done? He asked for a reply. The Premier further said :

“It is always in the power of the Government, if honestly disposed, to make a certain reduction when the state of the public revenue demands it. The true cause of Canada's prosperity, for many years, arose from the fact that it was a cheaper country to live in than any other on the continent. When we follow any commercial or financial policy that will leave us in a position of having a deficit, of making Canada a place that no emigrant will care to come to, that would be standing still or retrograding.”

These two sentences were not directly consecutive, but they were in the course of the same speech and were connected in the argument. He desired to call the attention of the House to the first, and he wished to make it emphatic. The Premier of Canada, himself, gave in it an utterance which might be the groundwork of all the financial criticism of the Opposition. He affirmed that, either in one way or the other, the revenue of the country should be made to correspond with and to meet the expenditure of the country. Where would they be if this policy of the Finance Minister were carried out, as it might be carried out, to its logical conclusion? There was a deficit this year, which happened to be only a trifling $2,000,000. Suppose it were $5,000,000—if the arguments and conclusions of the Finance Minister were sound, there should be no change of his policy even then. The Finance Minister had said he did not intend to resort to taxation; he had not shown that he intended to curtail the public expenditure to meet the emergency, and it was too transparent a thing to deceive anybody. It only meant a short suspense of expenditure; it did not mean that the item for Militia was permanently reduced $400,000 or $500,000. The necessities of the country were the same, and he trusted that the Militia policy was not changed since the accession of the present Minister of Militia to the Cabinet. Although the utterances of that hon. gentleman, before he entered the Cabinet, did not accord with a large expenditure upon the defences of the country, he (Mr. Plumb) trusted that he (Mr. Jones) had modified his views so far as to be in accord with the other gentlemen on the Treasury benches; and he hoped that their views would be in accord with the general views of the country, which he was satisfied was in favour of a judicious expenditure on the Militia service. Again, he desired to say that all the argument which he had adduced with respect to the necessity for meeting the deficit by vigorous means and measures, either by peremptorily curtailing the public expenditure, or by taking such steps as would bring into the Treasury a sum sufficient to meet the deficit, was entirely justified by what the hon. the Premier had stated in the words just quoted. Notwithstanding all the loud professions which they had heard, notwithstanding the assertion that there had been a diminution in the expenditure of the country, he (Mr. Plumb) undertook to say that on every item of the controllable expenditure of the country, there had been an increase since the present party came into power, and the members of this House must not mistake what that meant; they must not be misled by speeches from the Government side in respect to that expenditure. He (Mr. Plumb) alleged that the items of departmental expenditure were, to a large extent, controllable. During the year, there had been a large diminution in the item of telegraphing. Since the public attention had been called to that expenditure, there had been a violent attempt to reduce it. That showed that these items were under control, and could be reduced. There had been no special reason this last year why the amount for this purpose should have been less than before, but the effect of calling the attention of the public and the Government to the subject had been that there had been a spasmodic attempt, at the eleventh hour, to carry out some of the reforms promised when this Government came into power. It was a sort of death-bed repentance, but it was too transparent, and it was only necessary to dissect the items in order to discover the hollow pretence and juggle which "kept the word of promise to the ear, but broke it to the hope." The Finance Minister, in the course of his picnic speeches, when he distinguished himself by the manner in which he treated his opponents, when he discussed public questions in a way which he (Mr. Plumb) hoped no hon. gentleman on the Opposition side would ever adopt, had stated that the reckless Government which resigned in 1873 had thrown burdens on the country which made him sometimes ask himself if they were not like a reckless, disorderly crew who had broken into the spirit room and were then endeavouring to scuttle the ship. The hon. gentleman said that there was a burden of liability thrown on the country by his predecessors of $131,000,000, which he was compelled to face; in other words, that when the present Government took an account of their position they found that additional burden thrown on them in 1873. The hon. gentleman said :

"We had, in all, a sum total of what I may call liabilities, capable of being ascertained, amounting to $131,300,000, in addition to our debt. Now, the House will see the magnitude of the task imposed upon us by observing that this sum is as nearly as possible equal to the total indebtedness of the entire Dominion upon the 1st July, 1877."

Now, if this meant anything, it meant that the Finance Minister was bound, by law, when he came into office to meet or provide for \$131,300,000 of liabilities. According to the figures that he had been able to collect, showing the expenditure on capital account or on public works originated prior to 1874, in the category which the Finance Minister referred to as making part of the burthen of \$131,300,000—that expenditure was \$31,858,000. The Finance Minister now said he must expend on the Welland and Lachine Canals, \$5,500,000; on the Pacific Railway, \$6,000,000; and for miscellaneous purposes about \$5,000,000. These sums amounted in the aggregate to \$16,500,000, which, added to the sum already expended, amounted to \$48,358,000, and this was more than was properly to be charged to works or expenditures thrown on the finances of the country by the late Government, for there was no reason why they should include certain outlays for the Pacific Railway, steel rails, Foster payments, Kaministiquia lands, and Fort Frances locks, which did not, in any sense, belong to the commitments of the late Government. Here was a vast discrepancy—a discrepancy of \$82,942,000, and yet there had been no repeal of any legislation of the late Government, except of the Pacific Railway scheme; but the Finance Minister swelled his list of liabilities by adding \$30,000,000 for that scheme, and \$35,000,000 for renewal of maturing debt. Here was \$65,000,000 to be wiped out at once, and \$17,000,000 more might be found in exaggerated statements of the sums to have been expended on the canal scheme, and more improvements. The whole of the actual expenditure made, and to be made, under the profligate legislation of the late Government, as the Finance Minister was continually pleased to style it, was thus shown to be a sum, the interest on which, at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., would amount to about \$2,300,000. But there was no need of hurrying much of this outlay. A prudent financier would have delayed it until the country was able to bear it without difficulty. There was a sum of \$6,000,000, which the Finance Minister said was needed to complete the necessary portions of the Pacific Railway, but it was difficult to know what the necessary portions of the Pacific Railway were. There were certain matters in respect to the policy of the Government in building the Pacific Railway which, he presumed, would come up for exhaustive discussion when the hon. the Minister of Public Works made his usual statement; but, considering what had been done, he (Mr. Plumb) very much doubted whether the estimate of the Finance Minister of \$6,000,000 for the work which the Government might consider necessary, was not a very vague and uncertain estimate. Already they saw some of the fruits of the policy of the Government in regard to that gigantic undertaking. They had built a road from the Kaminstiquia, which was a very doubtful and shady business at best, which he intended to discuss at length at some future time.

Several HON. MEMBERS: No; don't.

MR. PLUMB said, perhaps hon. gentlemen would hear more about that than they would like. The course taken had been to change the route from that by Lake Shebandowan, to strike Port Savanne, near Lac des Mille Lacs, and running on beyond that point into a wilderness, which was utterly incapable of any sort of improvement, for 35 miles, simply, it would seem, for the purpose of pleasing some people who wanted, or held a contract. There was nothing there but beaver, muskrat and bullfrog. This was not the kind of management which they should expect from the gentlemen who had promised to initiate such a wonderful policy for the Pacific Railway. This item of \$6,000,000 might be considered one of the controllable items—a floating item, which might be made larger or smaller, according to the policy which was pursued in this work. They had been met by a statement in regard to the famous steel rails which were embellishing the land at Fort William, where stood the now famous Neebing Hotel. Some also were at Nanaimo, where they remained as a monument of the improvidence of the Ministry, and others were scattered over the Dominion, from Halifax to Red River. It had been thrown in the face of the Opposition, that they had sanctioned the contract for purchasing these rails, because they could not avoid agreeing to it after the thing was done; but it was done without the previous sanction of Parliament. To-day, those rails could be bought, free on board, for £6. 5s. per ton, or about \$30, which cost \$54 per ton; making a difference of more than 50 per cent. They would have to make up a new account of the loss on those rails; they had thought it a frightful thing to discover that there was a loss of \$1,500,000, but now they could add \$6 a ton to that sum on 50,000 tons, or \$300,000. The few that had been laid had been used without the authority of Parliament in order to conceal the Ministerial blunders which had characterized the operation from the beginning to the end, if it was not something worse. In addition to that sum, the hon. the Finance Minister stated he would require, altogether, \$13,500,000 as renewals. He had spent, according to the Public Accounts, a further sum of \$31,655,000; making, altogether, \$61,588,000, out of which must be deducted \$13,500,000 for renewals, leaving \$48,000,000 as that Ministerial bugbear which, they were told, would swell the expenditure to \$130,000,000, which was to ruin the country; all of which was due to the recklessness of the Government which preceded this model Reform Administration. When he looked at that statement with a critical eye, and noticed the exaggeration which pervaded the whole of the statements so industriously put before the Government by the present Ministers, and repeatedly stated, first by the Finance Minister, and afterwards with less accuracy by the gentlemen who followed him and depended on his inspiration for their facts—it was a bogey; it was as if a pumpkin had been scooped out and made into a rude likeness of a human head, and placed at night at the corner of a road, with a lighted candle in it, to frighten the country bumpkins. When they came to examine the sum still to be expended, it amounted, at 4 $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., to \$1,425,000 per annum. The hon. the Finance Minister had begged the whole question in his Budget speech when, in order to justify himself for allowing deficits to increase, he said the revenue had declined to \$22,000,000, but that it was the lowest point which they could touch. He (Mr. Plumb) undertook to say that, if the affairs of the country had been properly administered, and proper economy exercised, every one of the improvements proposed by Mr. Tilley could have been carried out, and all the charges upon revenue would still have fallen below the sum of \$22,000,000 a year, with ample means provided for laying aside a sinking fund. If \$22,000,000 was the lowest figure to which, according to the Finance Minister, the public revenue was likely to fall, why was the improper, reckless, ruinous policy adopted by the present Government when the expenditure was considerably below that sum, because it must be remembered that, when they took office in 1873, we were on the rising tide. There had been large surpluses year after year—\$3,750,000 in one year,—and these large revenues had enabled the late Administration not only to meet all their requirements with a liberal and generous expenditure, but to invest upwards of \$10,000,000 of surplus revenue in permanent works which might properly have been charged against capital. Moreover, it parted with revenue to the amount of from \$1,200,000 to \$1,500,000 in abrogating the duties on tea and coffee. The acts of the present Government in the line followed by the late Government were justifiable, and it was only when they had departed from the policy laid down by their predecessors they were amenable to public criticism; when they followed it they did well, but when they departed from it they showed their utter incapacity to strike out a policy for themselves, and carry on the administration of public affairs according to their own judgment. The hon. the Finance Minister had treated the House to a long disquisition on the question of taxation, and pointed them to the terrible example afforded by the neighbouring Republic. He (Mr. Plumb) was one of those who did not think it was desirable on all occasions and in all discussions to drag in, relevantly or irrelevantly, the example of the great Republic which lay contiguous to the Dominion. The American people knew their own business and understood the management of their own affairs, and it did not become Canadians to be so free with their criticisms of the policy adopted year after year deliberately by the people of the United States, where there was universal suffrage, where every man had the power to express his opinion on public affairs, and where it had been possible to change a Government once in two years in its administration through Congress. It could not be supposed that the Congress of the United States did not represent the people, but that they represented Mr. David Wells, the Chicago Tribune, Mr. John Quincy Adams, or any other gentleman who might choose to have a theory of Free-trade, and air it for the public benefit or for the instruction of the Minister of the Interior. The American people knew how to manage their own affairs, and it became us to let them follow their own course. It was, however, important to consider what effect our relations with the United States had on our trade, and how far the administration of their affairs affected us. There could be no doubt it did affect us most seriously. We lived on a frontier extending thousands of miles, in peaceful relations with our neighbours. He hoped we might be as parallel lines, not diverging, but never meeting. As regarded the policy of that country, we were told it was overburdened with taxation. Taxation meant property and business and a people able to pay it, and they had adopted that policy, which many hon. members opposite were inclined to favour,—the policy of the universal admission of the people themselves to a vote upon public affairs, and of universal suffrage, which enabled the whole people to call to account their rulers. As the United States had adopted that principle and assumed their taxation voluntarily, it did not lie in our mouths to sneer at any policy they adopted. He could tell hon. members, for their consolation, that, whatever might be said in this House in regard to the policy of that great country, would have very little effect upon the action of the United States relating to their own matters. They would continue to manage their own affairs as they thought best and to prosper, although they might have, as all commercial and rapidly-growing countries where there was immense business activity would have, a temporary check and depression. We had seen the depression come, but we had also seen the American people rise, revived and refreshed from their misfortunes, and come up to the mark smiling, and proceed with their work, and they had never suffered a permanent check since he had known anything of the political history of the country, from the policy of watching their own interests, protecting their own people, and having their own markets for themselves. He was surprised at the statement of the hon. member for North Norfolk, (Mr. Charlton) that the policy of the United States between 1845-6 and 1857 was a Free-trade policy. Nothing could be more absurd; they never adopted a Free-trade policy. There were concessions made in respect to the tariff. The South was always in favour of light duties. The general expenses of the Central Government were not large. Each State bore its own burthens, and there was no general system by which the Federal Government was permitted to make large expenditures. It made no improvements except on harbours, and it built no roads. It did nothing which belonged to the States, which were jealous of the interference of the Central power. In 1865 a tariff was adopted—they might call it what they pleased—a revenue tariff, or incidental protection, or accidental protection, or any kind of protection, of 40 per cent. on many articles; 100 per cent. on schedule A, 40 per cent. on schedule B, 30 per cent. on C and 25 per cent. on E; the schedules B and C giving from 25 to 30 per cent. protection. Those schedules fairly embraced all the articles which required protection, in order to stimulate, foster and develop the industrial energies of the United States. But hon. gentlemen opposite would never meet them in fair argument, because they set up a man of straw for themselves, and had great satisfaction in knocking it over. They were, however, quite welcome to that line of action. Hon. gentlemen opposite said the Opposition desired to adopt the present high tariff policy of the United States. He denied that in toto; they never advocated any such policy. The Opposition were constantly accused of wishing to build a Chinese wall around Canada, but it was left to the hon. the Minister of Militia to talk about putting up a wall, as he had desired to do between Ontario and Quebec and Nova Scotia—a little wall of his own. But the Opposition had never talked of adopting any such course. With respect to the taxation of the United States, it was undoubtedly large, and it had been swollen by improvident expenditures. The present tariff of the United States was one which they (the Opposition) would never dream of attempting to justify. It was framed, in the first place, by Mr. Morrill of Vermont, in Congress, in 1861, under circumstances which made it not a "Morrill" but an immoral tariff,—and no one in Canada, no matter how strong his Protectionist proclivities might be, ever justified that tariff or argued in favour of it, or ever proposed, in even a remote way, that it should be the policy of this country.

MR. MILLS: Yes.

MR. PLUMBS said no one would think of it; he denied it utterly and appealed to the House to support him in that denial. When the Morrill tariff was established it was because the check on tariff legislation was removed by the secession of the members of the Southern States. The instant it was known the tariff was to be changed, so strong was the feeling against the South that anything that looked like a policy they had advocated met with disfavour. The men who wished to have a protective tariff at that time came into power and that tariff was adopted. It had since, however, been somewhat modified; but it was utterly incorrect to say that such a policy had been thought of by the people of this country.

MR. MILLS: Not by the people, but by the hon. gentleman's leader.

MR. PLUMB said it had certainly not been thought of by any hon. member on the Opposition side of the House. Such had never been done; but hon. gentlemen opposite had made political capital out of it, and, if that plea was taken away, they would not have a leg to stand upon. Those hon. gentlemen would, no doubt, continue to insist on this point, but the Opposition disclaimed any such wish on the part of the Opposition or of the people, and he had had as large opportunities of judging as the hon. the Minister of the Interior, even though he were not educated at a western college. Whenever that argument was used by hon. gentlemen opposite, it showed they had no confidence in their own knowledge of what the Opposition really wished and advocated. They first invented an argument and then refuted it. It was their common mode of warfare, but it never convinced any one. He advised them to meet the question honestly if they expected to have any influence with the people, who were beginning to see through the Government who were trying to humbug the people. His hon. friend the Minister of Finance also made constant complaint of the tendency of population to converge into large cities. He (Mr. Plumb) did not know what could be the reason of the gentleman's extraordinary hatred to the collecting of the population of the country into towns and cities. There had been no such aggregation of people in Canada as to make it necessary to call the attention of the House to the prevailing misery of the crowded city of New York. Nothing should induce any man, he should think, to bring forward, for the sake of argument, and as an awful warning to Canada, the misery and squalor of the crowded back-slums of New York and London. It was no argument of any consequence to Canada, where the towns and cities that were springing up were simply peopled with an industrial population. But he could understand why the hon. gentleman used this argument; it was because these villages and towns had an interest in that sort of industry which he was doing his best to destroy.

MR. MILLS.

Look at Hamilton; why was it a city? It was built up by manufactures. He wondered the gentlemen who represented that city did not take the matter up and say, "We have no such wretched examples as the hon. the Minister of Finance gives us to shun." Any course which would lead to the building up of towns, the increase of the value of the neighbouring property, the making of home markets, it was the policy, it would appear, of the Government side utterly to destroy. As far as the argument respecting New York was concerned, it might be an awful example, but it was entirely impertinent and irrelevant in reference to Canada. With regard to the indebtedness of towns and cities of the United States, did it flow from the fact that there were large manufacturing industries in those places? The large manufactories were not centred in the great cities. The iron and coal of Pennsylvania had not built up large cities near the mines. The manufacturing industries of Massachusetts had not built up large cities where the centres of such industries were found; Lowell and other manufacturing towns there were not large, comparatively speaking. Fall River, which had only eight or ten thousand inhabitants, was full of manufactories. He did not at all understand the argument which said that industrial populations collected in large towns, stimulated by a high tariff, necessarily engendered misery and ruin. And now they were brought face to face with what was said by the hon. the Minister of Finance, and accepted by the gentlemen on his side to be the policy which they proposed to adopt as an issue which should be taken between the two great parties at the coming struggle. The opinions of the other side upon this subject was a mass of inchoate theory, not worth one single good grain of practical common sense. Why, in our library there were more than 250 volumes upon political economy, upon tariff, and upon general fiscal affairs, every one of which pretended to give some special information on those subjects, and most of which differed from every other. Now, he would like to know exactly what was to be the policy of the Government. How was the country to choose between so many opinions. Every man thought he had a special gift which enabled him to talk about fiscal affairs and to judge of principles of political economy. He had been told by an experienced politician in the United States, whose name, if he mentioned it, would be recognized in this House, that he had a great deal of trouble in every successive Legislature of a great State lying near us, when they come to appoint Committees. There was one thing, he said, that was most remarkable: every man thought he was qualified to be placed on the Banking Committee—that he had a special gift that way. It was so in regard to this financial question. Of the 250 volumes in the library, it would be found that each had, in some degree, a special theory of its own. There were gentlemen in this House who also held such theories, but, when they argued upon subjects that came home to the great body of the people, the people did not care to come there and read through those 250 volumes to see which theory was right. They wished to know how far the theories of Free-trade and Protection affected their pockets, and of this they were able to judge without considering musty theories. All that the farmer wanted to know of the policy of the country was whether it would enable him to get the best price for his crops. The farmer did not care what views of tariff or fiscal policy were propounded; he was looking to his own special interests, even though those views were propounded by the hon. the Minister of the Interior himself, with that subtle logic of which he was so great a master. Although, at Fergus and at other places, he endeavoured to make the Canadian farmer believe that the consumer always paid the duty upon the farmer's produce, when he sold his bushel of barley on the other side of the line, he found he had to pay 15c. to the United States Government and to pay Customs duties besides. He only got 85c. a bushel for his barley, while his neighbour, perhaps his own brother, living across the river, had sold his bushel of barley and had got his dollar a bushel for it. The hon. the Minister of the Interior might argue until he was black in the face, but he would never get over that. The consumer did not always pay the duty, and, to say that he did so upon Canadian grain sold in the United States, was to utter an impertinent absurdity. The farmers in the North-West did not care which party was in power; they only cared whether any policy of the Government would affect their industry and their prices. They did not want to know the views of David. A. Wells, or the Chicago Tribune, or any such authorities; nor did they care for the long row of figures brought forward by the Minister of the Interior, in the report of that gentleman, as chairman of the Depression Committee; nor for the fact that somebody did something in connection with the Chats Canal in 1853. Why, they might as well go back to the discovery of America. His hon. friend the Minister of the Interior distinguished himself in 1876 by his conduct as chairman of the Depression Committee. His line of policy, the manner in which he would administer the affairs of Canada, in which he would protect the Canadian people, and would sympathize with and endeavour to foster national industry, might be inferred from the report. The report of the Committee began with a letter from the Collector of the port of New York, conveying information that the Commission of the United States had decided not to have a drawback upon the exportation of refined sugar. The hon. gentleman had the evidence of gentlemen in Canada upon the subject, but he refused to receive it, and treated the people offering it as though they were culprits before him. It was discovered now, that, notwithstanding the confident assertions of the Minister of the Interior, the Americans did pay a drawback. There were few gentlemen in the House who knew anything about sugar duties. He (Mr. Plumb) knew everything about it, and he would show to the House something of the conduct of the Minister of the Interior with regard to it. The hon. gentleman discarded the evidence of the manager of the sugar-refining establishment in Montreal, and the evidence of Mr. Bunting, a large importer of raw sugar, who, if he gave evidence to sustain the opinions of the Opposition, gave it rather against his own interest than for it. He would rather have the testimony of people who could possibly know very little about the question. This was seen all through the report. When a man came before him who knew anything about it, he brow-beat him. One of these witnesses said: "You wish me to give answers I do not intend; you drive me frantic; I come here to give such evidence as I can fairly give, whether it may be against your wishes and interest, or in favour of them, and I will not be brow-beaten by any man here, but give evidence in my own way." The report also said: "If we adopt a policy of protecting Canadian industries, we must make up our minds to lose the whole revenue on the 17½ per cent. list." This was rather an extravagant proposition to be made by a gentleman so well versed in fiscal matters, so entirely competent to deal with such questions as the hon. the Minister of the Interior, who knew everything, who read everything, who understood everything, who had his mind made up in every possible subject from pitch and toss to manslaughter. He (Mr. Plumb) was inclined to doubt whether they should lose the whole revenue on the 17½ per cent. list, because there were many articles Canada could not undertake to manufacture, because he thought there were only three or four large lines of staple manufacture which could be admitted here, and they were not those which formed the long list at the 17½ per cent. rate. But the Minister of the Interior argued in that report that, by adopting a policy of protection—by this Chinese wall, they heard so much of—we should gain an accession to our population of fifty thousand people. These fifty thousand workmen who would find employment here would have, say two persons depending upon each of them, thus adding 150,000 to the population; but we got, in return for whatever we lost in the 17½ per cent. list, the labour, the expenditure, and the money left in the country by those 150,000 people. Perhaps that would be all, but he (Mr. Plumb) could see a great deal more, admitting that these arguments were sound and based on sound principles, which he denied. He could see we should gain very largely. But the hon. Minister was fearful that we should lose our revenue. Suppose that we did, we should not be doing any more than was proposed to be done by the great leader of the Liberal party when he went to Washington to procure a reciprocity treaty for us. He professed to give up all our revenue. He was not only going to do that, but he would admit into this country manufactures of all kinds, taking off our tariff at the rate of one-third per cent. a year for three years, until we came upon a basis of Free-trade. At the same time, he proposed that the Government on the other side should do the same thing by us; but, inasmuch as our average tariff was then 17½ per cent., and the tariff which he proposed to deal with was an average of 45 per cent., it would be clearly seen that, when we came down to a point of admitting goods practically duty free, the American manufacturers would still be protected and our manufacturers would be ruined in competition with them on a one-sided Free-trade basis. In addition to that, the hon. the Prime Minister engaged to enlarge our canals in four years. He engaged to spend millions of dollars upon the Caughnawaga Canal, a scheme totally unpractical and as wild and visionary as was ever promulgated. Although there would be no egress for vessels going down the Caughnawaga Canal to New York, he proposed to have fourteen feet of water in the mitre-sills and spend millions of money on that canal. He pledged himself to do that, and to do it in four years; at the same he would have cut off from this country a large part of the revenue by the abrogation of the tariff upon American goods; and it was very certain that, from the date of that treaty, we should never have any importations from Great Britain. All British goods would come through the United States. Not only would he have annihilated our revenue by this policy, but he would have pledged the country to a large expenditure on the top of the so-called ruinous policy, which the hon. the Finance Minister had described as the policy of his predecessors, and have pledged the country to what might have been irretrievable ruin. This party of reform, of economy and liberal ideas, actually, in addition to the burden which had been put upon the country by the profligate Government which had preceded this model political party, proposed, by the draft treaty, to strike down at one blow the greater part of our revenue, and to commit the country to that enormous expenditure; and, after all, the plenipotentiary of Canada, Mr. Brown, had made concession after concession to the American Government, and said, "We have got your best offer; we will accept it as a basis, and should we at a future time decide to accept it, we will advise you of the fact." They had been told by the hon. the Finance Minister that he had no policy to propose. He asserted that he had reduced economy to its lowest figure; he had taken it to its utmost consequence; he could go no farther in that direction. He had economised in that alarming manner which had increased the public expenditure in all directions, and the efforts at economy could go no further. But, at the same time, he said he had no policy to propose. He did not even offer the proverbial stone when asked for bread, but he said a great issue was about to be presented to the people. He said, in effect, that he should go to the people without policy; he should go to the people declaring the Government had no more power to alleviate their distress, or ability to relieve their wants, than flies on the wheel. That was one of the statements with which he proposed to go to the people. He proposed to go to them upon the issue that the expenditure of the country had been increased in every Department since the present Administration came into power, with the explanation that the late Administration had almost wrecked the ship of state. Well, he (Mr. Plumb) proposed to meet him on that issue. He had no policy to offer except a policy of inactivity, of cowardly supineness. He dared not meet the questions of the day, but met the people who were suffering, begging, imploring, with the contemptuous assurance that the Government, as such, could do no more for them than flies on the wheel. Why, there should have been some movement at least in the direction of relief; some attempt to deal with the crisis, at any rate; to have a commission upon the affairs of the country, to have examined in a proper spirit into the depression which had overtaken our manufactories, a commission which should not take the statements of people who did not live in the country in preference to those who did. He knew they had a policy which was well understood in the country, a policy of vituperation and slander, of hounding down every public man who dared to hold opinions opposed to theirs. It was a policy of endeavouring to drag down the right hon. member for Kingston, of striking him below the belt, of bringing up every possible charge against him in order, if possible, to crush him, because they knew that he was the leader of the great party of which he (Mr. Plumb) was a very humble member; because they hoped thereby to damage, to some extent, that party. But he (Mr. Plumb) could tell them that that party did not depend for its strength entirely upon any leader. There were great principles which that party held and intended to carry out, which it intended to present to the people, and which would be appreciated at the great arbitrament of the approaching elections. The present Administration had a policy which they pursued with the relentless ferocity and untiring scent of the sleuth-hound. He (Mr. Plumb) knew that Committees had been formed for the purpose of fastening unjust charges upon the right hon. gentlemen who led his party, every member of which had a right to rise and defend him against those charges, because, he being their leader, they were, in a certain sense, responsible for his every act, and, if any point of dishonour could be fastened on him in his dealings in public life, it must necessarily revert upon his followers. The Opposition threw down the gauntlet and challenged the gentlemen on the other side to continue the policy in which they had distinguished themselves, and had placed themselves on a bad eminence. The right hon. member for Kingston never struck below the belt, never took base advantage of his enemies, never responded in kind to the foul attacks made upon him; he scorned to descend to such a level. As a statesman, head and shoulders above any of his assailants, he could afford to look down on them with the scorn which was felt by all the people of this country who had measured them at their true value. The principles of the great Liberal-Conservative party were the undying principles held and supported by the gentleman whom the supporters of the Government had pursued with such untiring hate and unrelenting ferocity. He was speaking generally in respect to the right hon. gentleman, and he hoped he was not transgressing the rules of Parliament. He could tell the present Administration that they were greatly mistaken if they supposed that, by hounding down and persecuting one single man in Canada, they could advance their own interests. The reaction which he (Mr. Plumb) had said had taken place in Canada was constantly increasing. It had begun like the eddies which preceded great floods; they were the precursors of the mighty deluge which would sweep away the insecure foundation upon which those gentlemen had placed themselves. He had seen as much of the Canadian people during the past summer and autumn as any hon. gentleman opposite, and he had seen evidence of what he had stated. He had stood face to face with the people of Canada. The Opposition, in their great meetings, did not confine themselves to their own strongholds; they went where the people were against them—the exact reverse of which policy was adopted by the gentlemen opposite. The members of the Opposition had every opportunity of seeing something of the state of public feeling in the strongholds of the Government. They had been at Newmarket, at Barrie, at Millbrook, at St. Thomas, at Ailsa Craig, at Acherstburg, in Glengarry, in Dundas, in Haldimand, in East York, at Hamilton.

MR. WOOD: The people were against you there.

MR. PLUMB said the people certainly were against them, but it was a pressure against them of an admiring crowd. The hon. member and his friends were careful not to swell the crowd, but judiciously kept aloof. It was a splendid wind-up to a series of triumphs such as had never been known in the political history of Canada. Haldimand, which had returned by acclamation the hon. member who now represented it (Mr. Thompson), turned out from twelve to fifteen thousand people to meet them. In the strongholds of the enemy, these meetings were, of course, attended by many people who held opposite views to their own. These people were asked to make any objections they thought proper. They wished to discuss the questions with the people in the fair and impartial manner which had always characterized the Opposition, and had expressed their readiness to answer any interpellations. They did not intend to brow-beat those who opposed them, but were prepared to argue with them dispassionately, so that they could not go home and use with their neighbours the arguments that we had exploded. They were interrupted but once, and that was, when they had challenged anyone to say what reforms had been instituted by the so-called Reform party, one of the voters asked what about the election law, and he (Mr. Plumb) answered that almost the only reforms in connection with the election law were the ballot, of which the Premier said he was not in favour, and the provision which prevented the prosecution of an election protest going on during the Session of Parliament. That was a reform, as he had stated, in a very wrong direction. His hon. friend beside him would corroborate the statement that that was the only interpellation made during the meeting. He had heard of other reactions—of that one in the county of Lambton. He thought that county was pretty well known as a model reform district; that it had always returned a Reformer; but now, he was credibly assured, that, in that county, in the centre of everything that was Reform, if he might not designate it by another word, that point from which the standard was elevated in 1874, or where, at least, there was a pretence of elevating it;

there, at this moment, there were twelve hundred Conservatives enrolled in the Liberal-Conservative Association. He understood that, not very long ago, there had been a meeting of the County Council; that, at the same time, there was a meeting to organize the Liberal-Conservative Association; and he understood, the Warden of the county who, by some strange accident, there being no reaction, was a Conservative, and the majority of the reeves of the townships, although there was no reaction, being, by some strange coincidence, Conservatives the County Council was adjourned to attend the Conservative meeting, and the Warden of the county was elected president of the Conservative Association—yet there was no reaction anywhere in that county. The Premier had assured them that, from personal observations, he could tell the public there was no reaction, nothing to indicate any change in public opinion; but he would find that the people had weighed them in the balance and had found them wanting. The influence of that reaction was to be seen in this House to-day. He well remembered, when he came in, that the Conservatives stood a small but compact body, presenting an undaunted front to the foe, and that they were taunted with being a “corporal’s guard,” with being the “shrinking baker’s dozen following the dishonest member for Kingston,” with being an “inefficient Opposition,” “not daring to express their opinions,” but they were biding their time, they knew their opportunity well, they had allowed the Government plenty of rope, and now they were at the end of the rope, and the result need not be mentioned for it would be very well known.

MR. DYMOND: He who came to the end of the rope hung himself.

MR. PLUMB said the hon. member was nothing if not critical and eloquent and brilliant. The right hon. member for Kingston had said he was neither critical, nor eloquent, nor brilliant. What followed? He left the conclusion to his hon. friend. The reaction was manifest in more than one direction. It was manifest in the altered feelings of this House, in the attitude taken by the gentlemen on the Government side when a member of the Opposition rose to address the House. He remembered when he remonstrated, a few years ago, not with violence, but with calmness, upon the insane idea of building a telegraph for the Pacific Railway before the line of the road was decided upon. He knew it was a ridiculous waste of money, that it could be of no possible service, that it was for the use of the road itself that the telegraph line was principally designed. He did not see that the contractors for building the telegraph line were to be entrusted by the Government with the arduous and important duty of mapping out the track of the Pacific Railway. The line of telegraph from Fort William to Edmonton was completed. They knew that it was not on the line of the road; yet, when he had attempted to direct the attention of the House to it, the hon. members of the other side, the claqueurs—

MR. SPEAKER declared the expression out of order.

MR. PLUMB said there had been a decided change. These gentlemen had seen that the small minority which they had derided was quite competent to conduct the business of Her Majesty’s Opposition in such a way that, if it did not command their respect, at least, it commanded their deference, and they were rather quiet just now when the Opposition rose to make a statement. He was one of those who were singled out as the special mark of the small wittings on the other side, gentlemen who used their heels and hands as a means of argument, and who, to the best of his recollection, had never given evidence to the House that they ever used their heads in any direction. Now, they were told there was no policy with which the other side intended to go to the country. They were told the Administration could do nothing towards meeting the demands of the people of Canada; that there was no issue. Well, there was an issue so broad that nothing could bridge it over. There must be a stand on one side or the other; there should be no compromise; they had nailed their colours to the mast, and intended to keep them floating there until they carried their forces to victory. The Government had no policy but vituperation and a fiscal policy which had accumulated deficits upon a prostrate country; they saw the people starving, but they drew their salaries and paid no heed to their appeals; they said no Government could do anything to aid the suffering industries of the country. Well, the Opposition would meet them upon that issue. They offered nothing to the great outcry raised all over the country for aid to alleviate the great depression. Their whole course had been to aggravate, as far as his observation extended, that depression. They had not even made a movement in a contrary direction. There was nothing left to be hoped for from the present Government; and he believed the public would rise in their might and power, and place at the head of affairs, the very first opportunity, those who would endeavour, at least, to enquire into and meet in some manner, if they could not fully alleviate, the great distress and suffering which prevailed. He knew it could be said that the distress and suffering were too deeply rooted to pass away in a day. But the policy which ought to be adopted was not a palliative policy; it should be a permanent one. The Opposition did not believe in any temporary expedient by which there might be a slight increase in the tariff to meet the exigencies of the moment; they did not believe in any temporary palliative, but a deeper and larger diagnosis than had ever been made by hon. gentleman on the other side. It was not for the Opposition to prescribe, until called upon by the patient, although the patient was ill, and nigh unto death. They could criticise the practice of the professional gentlemen who stood around the bed-side, but these gentlemen had no right to ask them to measure out the dose until they called them in to feel the patient's pulse and note the symptoms. But, when called in, they would be prepared, to prescribe. The hon. member for South Grenville knew well it was contrary to all professional etiquette to act until the attending practitioner was dismissed. He trusted the patient would soon see it was for his own interest, if he expected to live, to dismiss the quacks in attendance, and call in those who could make an intelligent diagnosis and prescribe properly. He thanked the House for its attention, and would not tax its patience further than to express his obligations to it; and he trusted that the discussions on the questions he had treated would continue until they were brought before the country; when, he doubted not, the result would be in favour of the Opposition side of the House.

MR. BERTRAM said the hon. member for Niagara had told the House that there were in the library two hundred and fifty volumes on political economy. He had no doubt, if he could judge by the length of that gentleman's speech, that he must have read some of those volumes. He only hoped that he would not undertake to read the whole two hundred and fifty volumes before next Session, or it would be necessary to hold a special Session for the purpose of listening to his future address. He (Mr. Bertram) confessed that he was further disappointed when his hon. friend sat down, considering the position which he held in the ranks of the Conservative party, the ability with which he had to-day given his views to the House, that the hon. gentleman had taken his seat without offering to the House any amendment. He had hoped that the hon. gentleman, in the long address which he had made, would have enunciated some policy, but he had not done so. The question arose in his (Mr. Bertram's) mind as to how long the hon. member for Niagara had been a Protectionist of such pronounced tendencies as he now was. No doubt the zeal of new converts was always much greater than those who had held their opinions a long time. He felt almost inclined to hazard the assertion that the hon. gentleman must have been, at some period of his life, as strong a Free-trader as he was now a Protectionist. Before entering on the subject matter before the House, he desired to notice one or two items at the beginning of the hon.

member's speech. He had declared that the opinions of the hon. member for Centre Toronto were not valuable because they might have been biased by his own views of business. Yet, with a remarkable neglect of that statement, the hon. gentleman, in criticising the position of the hon. the Finance Minister when he went to London, offered to this House an opinion that, because he was at one time of his life a large operator in the United States, his authority should be accepted with regard to the operations of the hon. the Finance Minister in London. If that theory in the case of the hon. member for Niagara held good, certainly the hon. member for Centre Toronto was as capable as any one of giving an opinion as to the causes of the present depression. But he had disputed the statement of the hon. member for Centre Toronto that, in place of 17½ per cent., some kinds of goods imported into this country had actually had a protection of 80 per cent., on account of the expenses incidental to bringing those goods to this country. He (Mr. Bertram) did not believe that any hon. member of this House, unless he had had an opportunity of testing the case, could tell exactly what any line of goods might cost. He had no doubt that bulky goods, such as the hon. member from Centre Toronto imported from England, would cost nearly that amount. The duty would really equal 30 per cent., particularly when it was borne in mind that, in that trade, there were other expenses which must properly be charged to the goods; such as having to send home buyers to the old country. In connection with this, the hon. member for Cumberland made a very curious mistake in his speech in reply to the hon. the Finance Minister. He adverted to him merely to show how even such an eminent authority as that could be mistaken. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) declared that the rate of freight from Liverpool to this country, compared with the rate of freight from the United States to this country, acted as a differential duty in favour of the United States. The hon. gentleman would, no doubt, be very much surprised to learn that a great part of the heavy goods imported into this country, cost actually less money laid down in any of the Canadian ports, Montreal, Toronto, or Hamilton, from Liverpool than from New York or any of the Eastern States. There was another mistake which the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) had made in speaking of the opinions of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald). He had represented to the House that he had not followed the hon. member for Toronto very closely. In saying that, he must have been correct. The position which the hon. member for Centre Toronto had taken was this: he wished that the deficit had been larger this year, thereby expressing the opinion, from his standpoint, that, if it had been larger, the import would have been less, and that the importation of a smaller quantity of goods would have been of benefit to this country, even if it caused a decreased revenue. But, passing from those items, he now came to the general discussion which had been before the House. He thought it could hardly have been a matter of surprise to anyone who gave even ordinary attention to the condition of affairs in this country that, when Parliament met and the Public Accounts were submitted, it would be found we were face to face with another deficit from the continued depression of business, intensified by the poor harvest of 1876. This conclusion was almost inevitable, and the only speculation which could be indulged in by any hon. member who spoke on the matter was as to amount of this deficit. Nearly twenty years ago, in 1858, we had a deficit which, compared with the deficit of this year, was as 39 per cent. to six and a-half. It would be remembered that that was a period in the history of the world when the last great wave of depression passed over it. For four years after 1858 there was an average of about $2,000,000 as a deficit yearly, and that under the rule of the right hon. member for Kingston. In 1863, under the administration of Mr. Sandfield Macdonald, the deficit fell under $1,000,000, and gradually, year by year, up to the time of Confederation, it was reduced until it was entirely wiped out. In considering our present position, he did not think this House or the country at large need be under any apprehension. There was, after all, a silver lining to the cloud. The information given to the House by the Finance Minister was of a very cheering character indeed, that during the past year we had for seven months nearly $1,000,000 more than we had in the previous year. He was one of those who believed very strongly in meeting all our engagements promptly. The public creditor had to be met, and it was a matter of great consequence, particularly in a young country like this, that all engagements should be met promptly. It was, therefore, in order for this House to consider whether they should impose any increased taxation or not. He thought they would be led to a just conclusion if they examined the condition of the revenue returns which had been laid before the House this year. If they examined those returns carefully, they would find that, by a moderate computation, the deficit this year in two of the largest sources of revenue, as compared with the ordinary revenue from those sources, was two or two and a-half millions per annum. When, therefore, it was taken into account that the country was not now in a normal, but in an abnormal condition, it would be wrong, in the face of the change which had taken place, to impose any additional taxation. He did not consider that taxation was a good thing in itself. He did not believe that taxation was a productive force. It could not add to the productiveness or the wealth of the country; and it must be borne in mind, also, that many interests had grown up in Canada under the present tariff which would be affected by any change which might be introduced. That tariff had existed in Canada for many years, with trifling variations; 15, 17, and 20 per cent. being about its range. Many industries, too, had grown up in Canada—of which he would speak hereafter—which depended somewhat upon the fiscal policy of the country, and it would be a great mistake, therefore, to change backwards and forwards, because such a proceeding had a tendency to cause a feeling of insecurity. The question had been raised in the House that the Finance Minister had no policy, that he could do nothing; and it was broadly charged against him that, in his opinion, Parliament was entirely powerless, as far as the commercial depression was concerned. He (Mr. Bertram) was very certain that, if the Finance Minister was to express an opinion on the subject, it would be found that he did not agree with the broad assertion that Parliament was powerless. Parliaments had a great deal to do with the prosperity of a country, and a Parliament could do two or three things in the matter of taxation. It was within the power of Parliament to increase or diminish taxation, or to adopt a national policy, in regard to which independent members of the House might be somewhat at a loss to know what it really meant. The one instance of national policy, given by the hon. member for Cumberland, was a policy that would place a duty on coal for the purpose of protecting the people of Nova Scotia; also a duty on flour for the purpose of protecting Ontario farmers. So far, however, from that being a national policy, if he (Mr. Bertram) were obliged to give it a name, he would say it was a policy which was to rob Peter and pay Paul, and then rob Paul to pay Peter back again; and in that operation there was no doubt that some money was dropped by both Paul and Peter. He had stated that he did not look with any degree of apprehension on the deficit this year, or the depression under which we were now suffering; the time for apprehension was when we were in the fever heat of inflation. That was a time when the disease existed, and when the fire was burning; now, he believed, we were only suffering from the pains of convalescence. We were only getting well, and getting reduced to the ordinary condition of things. There could be no doubt that we experienced some difficulty in coming down from the highest state of inflation in which we were some years ago, to ordinary work-a-day life. There was a very marked difference between the present depression and that which existed in 1858. During that period, the farmers of the country were the great sufferers, while at the present time he believed that farmers, more particularly those of Ontario, would have passed through the crisis which now existed without any trouble whatever, had it not been for the poor harvest of 1876. If any difficulty was being experienced just now, it was mainly experienced by business men, and he would here take the opportunity of remarking that, if they, as a class, had been the greatest sufferers, they had also been the greatest sinners. It could not be doubted that there were too many business men in this country—too many individuals seeking to earn a living in that way—and the sooner that something happened which would drive men out of such employment, where a living could not be earned, the better it would be for the whole country. He was somewhat surprised to hear the hon. member for Cumberland state very broadly, in his reply to the Finance Minister's Budget speech, that the present Government was responsible for the depression. The hon. member said that, when he and his friends were in power, with a 15 per cent. tariff, the Treasury was overflowing. Everybody was then rich and the country prosperous, whereas now, with a 17½ per cent. tariff, the country was suffering from a depression. He (Mr. Bertram) did not think that the hon. gentleman would, in his calmer moments, be at all inclined to say that the present Administration was responsible for the depression. The only argument to be drawn from a statement of that kind would be to again reduce the tariff from 17½ to 15 per cent., and by that means regain prosperity. He had always been a careful listener to the speeches delivered by the hon. member for Cumberland; but there was one matter in a speech delivered by him not many days ago, which he (Mr. Bertram) would like to refer to, namely, the alleged bungling method in which the Finance Minister had floated his loan in the London market this year. The matter was brought up by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy), who took a different ground altogether, and claimed that the Finance Minister could not receive any credit for reducing the amount of interest by his loan made in London. At that part of his speech where the hon. member was discussing the amount of reduction in interest, he (Mr. McCarthy) was somewhat mixed in his figures and he did not catch the exact amount of reduction stated by the hon. member. This proposition, however, was plain that, if the Finance Minister could not receive any credit last year for the manner in which he had placed his loan on the London market, he was certainly entitled to no blame. He thought that would be clear to every hon. member, and, therefore, the entire speech made by the hon. member for Cumberland last year, was, even by the admission of his friends, altogether a mistake. During the discussion many extraordinary charges had been made against the Administration, charges which he could not attempt to consider in detail. The different manner which hon. members viewed their charges was, he might remark, very singular, and this circumstance had struck him very forcibly after listening to the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart.) He went over some of the charges made against the Administration, such as the Goderich Harbour contract, and declared that the charges were very serious indeed; and yet, when he came to speak about charges against his own friends, they did not appear to amount to anything. When individual charges were brought forward on the floor of this House and disposed of, they should be allowed to rest, and no doubt the country would be able to appraise accusations made by the hon. gentlemen opposite at their just value. But there was one question on which he proposed to trouble the House for a short time. It was a charge made against the Administration, and, if it were correct, should be subjected to proof. It had been charged by almost every member on the Opposition side of the House that the members of the Government had been extravagant in their expenditures. He considered it a very serious charge, and, if it were proved conclusively, no doubt it would detach from the Government many of the supporters who now voted with them. The

hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy), and also the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), endeavoured to prove this accusation of extravagance against the Administration by citing isolated facts. The latter hon. member had brought forth isolated facts from the Public Accounts. He (Mr. Bertram) confessed—probably it was due to his want of knowledge and acumen—that he was entirely unable to follow the hon. member for Niagara through the statements in which he charged extravagance against the Government. It was only by a comparison that they could arrive at any definite conclusion on that matter, and it was not by making comparison of any isolated year, whether 1873-4, or any other. It was by the general tendency of the expenditure, and having made as critical an examination of the accounts as he had been able to do, he proposed to give to the House the result of that examination. It was, and would be, proper, in making a comparison of that kind, not only to compare the administration of the late Government with that of the present Administration, but, in the first place, to compare the late Government with themselves, and afterwards to compare them with the present Administration. There was an important fact to be borne in mind, that this country was not stationary. There was no more prominent fact apparent to any one who would take the trouble of examining the Public Accounts than that, year by year, and almost every year, the expenditure of the country had increased. Let the House look for a moment at the circumstances of the Dominion. We were a young country, taking up new territories, growing in population, and, if we were to become stationary, it would simply mean death. We were, however, not stationary, and he hoped the expenditure within reasonable limits would increase. The part of the expenditure which he thought probably deserved the most careful consideration of every hon. member was the departmental expenditure. Without being able to give an opinion as to whether the service in the Departments could be performed better for less money, he had an idea, and he believed it was generally shared in by others, that, although the country had many civil servants who were eminently capable for the performance of their duties—men who would grace any station in life; men whom the country could ill do without—yet there were found, at the same time, in some Departments, barnacles, who could with advantage be swept away and their places left vacant. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) had declared to the House that he had no faith in figures. He (Mr. Bertram) thought this was rather an extraordinary admission. If the hon. gentleman had said he had no faith in some of the deductions which were drawn from figures, then he could understand what he might have meant, but when he stated boldly that he had no faith in the figures themselves, what were they to go by? If he entered on a comparative statement to find out whether the hon. gentlemen on this or on the opposite side of the House had been most economical in the management of the country's affairs, he could do nothing except turn to the Public Accounts, and, if hon. gentlemen would be kind enough to turn to page 19 of the Public Accounts, they would see the figures, while he gave the results of the examination he had made of these accounts. He would begin, first of all, with the ordinary expenditure, then take charges on revenue, and finally the whole amount paid out of the Consolidated Fund. He proposed to examine each of these items under their several heads. In 1868-9—and he wished it to be understood that, in naming that year, he meant the financial year closing on the 30th of June of the last year mentioned—there was spent, for ordinary expenditure, as they would observe on page 19, $3,459,485.42. He would now take 1870-1 as a year, in which to compare those hon. gentlemen with themselves. No special expenditure was made during this year. He did not wish to go into the year 1873-4, and make a comparison with it; but he would select 1870-1 as a year which would be absolutely fair. He, moreover, deducted from 1870-1, for the purpose of comparison, two items which had no exist-

tence in 1868-9, amounting to $20,000 odd, leaving the expenditure for that year $4,590,077.84. It would be remarked that the excess during those two years—from 1869 to 1871—was $1,140,592.42, or an average of $570,296.21; and he took this to be the ordinary advance which existed during the administration of affairs from 1867 to 1874. If this was the ordinary advance, what would make the expenditure by adding it together for the years that ensued until those hon. gentleman went out of power? Five years at $570,296.21 each would make $6,310,966.47. He deducted from the year 1873-4, for the same purposes of comparison, all those items that had no existence in 1868-9, which reduced the expenditure for that year to $7,177,853.49. If they compared this with the amount he had spoken of, what would it show? This—that the late Government increased the expenditure for the year 1874, with all those items out of it that had no existence in 1869, by $866,887.02. If they applied the same rule to the ordinary expenditure for 1877 by adding the eight years average advance, what did they find? This—that the expenditure would be $8,021,855.10, as against that made by the present Administration, namely, $6,060,242.25, which showed conclusively a decrease in favour of the present Government of no less a sum than $1,961,612.85. He now came to examine in somewhat the same method, the charges on revenue; but in this respect, he thought it could not be said that the hon. gentlemen who controlled the affairs of the country in 1873 were not responsible for these charges on revenue. They were responsible for the expenditure of every farthing of these charges, which in 1874 were $4,736,442.28, and, as he could only go three years forward from that date, for the same purposes of comparison, he would go three years backwards. He would take the year 1870, when these charges amounted to $2,351,724.89. These figures showed an increase from 1870 to 1874, of $2,384,717.39, and, in the same ratio of increase, if this expenditure had been kept up, the year 1877 would have seen a total expenditure of $7,121,159.67; but what was the actual amount under charges on revenue? It was $5,194,896.64. In other words, the present expenditure was less on this statement by comparison by no less a sum than $1,926,263.03. But it might be urged by the hon. gentleman who then controlled the Government that British Columbia and Manitoba had come into the Dominion, and that the increase was therefore necessarily larger. He quite admitted that fact. Between 1870 and 1874, it was larger than between 1874 and 1877; but this fact must be borne in mind, that, in 1877, they had another item under the head of charges on revenue, which very nearly equalled the amount under those two heads. The expenditure under this heading for British Columbia and Manitoba in 1873 was $106,245.38, and in 1874 it was $122,213.10; but they had an analogous expenditure in 1877 for weights and measures, and other two items, the amount being $116,637.80. He thought that the hon. member for Cumberland made a very unfair comparison indeed when he compared the revenue from Customs and the expenditure on Customs, and declared to the House, as something for which the Administration was to be blamed for, that, under the Administration of the right hon. member for Kingston, they had collected so many millions of dollars with a certain expenditure—he thought he had the figures there—in 1874, the Customs charges were $658,299.34, and the collections over $14,000,000; while in 1877 the charges were $721,000 and the collections $12,546,000. He did not think that a comparison of that kind was worthy of the hon. gentleman. Why, the collections were not made by percentage. They could not discharge an officer, because some years the imports were less than in others. If they were to judge of the hon. gentleman by himself, he could give an instance which went entirely against his present views on this point, and which happened under his own auspices. The hon. gentleman was Minister of Customs in 1872. He appointed an officer to the port of Lindsay, at a salary of $1,000 per annum. The collections there in 1874 were only $4,452.01, and apparently so arduous were the duties on that inland station, that, in the month of October, 1873, another officer was appointed, with a salary of $400 a year, which made the expense of collecting $4,452.01, $1,480.02; whereas, in the sister port of Peterborough, some thirty miles distant from the town of Lindsay, the revenue collected that year was $13,381.81, which was collected by one officer at a charge of $1,167.42; so here the hon. gentleman himself, while Minister of Customs, had, of his own accord, done the very thing for which he blamed—and he (Mr. Bertram) thought wrongly—the Ministers who now occupied the Treasury benches. He would now come to the question of the Consolidated Fund expenditure, and he would be very brief. In 1872-3—which was the year he took for considering this expenditure as the pivot year, because these hon. gentlemen claimed that they were not altogether entitled to bear the blame of the whole expenditure in 1874; therefore he proposed to take the year 1873 as the year in which the amount was by no means so large as for the latter year,—the expenditure was $19,174,647.92, and, as they could go forward from that for four years to 1877, he would go backwards for the purposes of comparison four years, which brought him to 1869; and he desired, therefore, to compare the expenditure of 1869, namely, $14,038,084 with the expenditure of 1873, $19,174,647.92, showing an advance in the four years of $5,136,563.92, which, added to 1873, if the same increase had been kept up for the four years, would, in 1877, have been $24,311,211.84, or $791,910 more than was actually expended during that year. He did not think that this was at all unfair, as the late Government were really responsible for that increase in 1874. There was another method of comparing the expenditure of 1877 with 1873—by deducting from the gross expenditure all the items that had no existence in 1873, and the increased fixed charges. He had under his hands the items for the years 1874, 1875, 1876, and 1877, but he would not trouble the House with them. He only designed to compare the last year, 1877, with 1874, and must deduct, therefore, from the gross expenditure of 1877 those items which had no existence in 1873. What were they? We paid in 1877 on interest account and subsidies no less than $2,772,249.99; we had paid for Mounted Police, $352,749.05; and for weights and measures, etc., taking them altogether, those items amounted to $3,241,636.84. If they deducted this amount from the expenditure of 1877, they would find that it amounted to $20,277,655.63; from which, if they deducted the expenditure of 1873, namely, $19,174,647.92, they got an increase for the four years, of $1,103,022.01; this was the increase for four years, while the increase for only one year under the late Government from 1872 to 1873, was $1,722,096.69. He had gone through this comparison carefully, and he could guarantee to the House that the figures he had given them were correct, and he believed that the system by which he had gone into this subject was one whereby they could tell, both comparatively and absolutely, whether this charge of extravagance was well founded or not. It, therefore, seemed to him that the charges that had been brought, and of which he had spoken, when examined in this way with some degree of criticism, had fallen entirely to the ground; and he must, consequently, exonerate these hon. gentlemen in the matter. He did not say that some expenditures had not been made which could have been saved to the country. He believed such was the case; but, in the main, comparing the expenditures of the present with those of the late Government, he believed that those of the present Government had been moderate in the extreme. What were they asked to do under the present circumstances? They were asked to readjust the tariff. They had not been informed by the leaders of the Opposition this Session as to what they desired to do, and he thought that he might fairly take the ground that the position they took up last year was that to which they still adhered; they were, therefore, asked to encourage our mining, manufacturing and agricultural interests. He supposed, by placing higher duties on those goods which we imported, so far as the mining interests were concerned, it would work somewhat in this way: that, if we found in Canada a mine, whether of copper, silver, gold or anything else, the country would be so much the richer. Yet, these hon. gentlemen proposed to tax that mineral, and make the people of this country pay more for it than they would otherwise have to do, simply because the country was richer for having that mineral in it, and, therefore, they would be required to show some very good and sufficient reason indeed why they should do so. In considering the manufacturing and agricultural interests of this country, he had been led to examine the resolution that had been offered to the House for its acceptance, whereby they were to readjust the tariff so as to affect those industries jointly. He could understand the position of his hon. friend the member for Hamilton, when he said it was impossible to protect the farmer of this country, but that the manufacturers could be protected, and he thought the hon. gentleman could show some reason for such a position. He had determined to find out, if it were possibly, some one interest in which the manufacturer and the farmer were alike interested; but he could find no such interest, save that of the woollen manufacturer. In looking over this matter, he was led to consider what the United States had done in connection with this industry; and it was a case perfectly in point, and which suited exactly what these hon. gentlemen wanted to do in the present instance. They desired to protect the farmer and manufacturer together. In 1866, a convention of woollen manufacturers met in Syracuse, New York, for the purpose of considering what was to be done by themselves in order to obtain better trade. They were then suffering under great depression, and they desired to come together and find out what could be done under the circumstances. It would be remembered that the duty on woollen goods was increased in 1861 by the Morrill tariff, and that an enormous impetus was given to that business during the war. These manufacturers then made enormous fortunes; but, when the war was over, notwithstanding the protection they had, they met to consider the difficulties under which they were placed, and they formed resolutions in this connection. He had forgotten to tell the House that a number of wool-growers attended this convention, and they were prepared to join the manufacturers in making a representation to Congress as to what they wanted,—just in the same way as might have to be done to this House—and Congress was so determined to carry out the views of these men that it almost entirely abrogated its functions in favour of the manufacturers and farmers, and gave them the very tariff which they wanted. Now, he desired to show to the House how that tariff had worked out in the United States. Here was a case where the manufacturers and the farmers themselves were allowed to do in the Legislature pretty much as they pleased and he desired to tell the House what position they were in, and what condition their trade was in after the protection they had enjoyed since 1867. The duty on wool on the 27th March, 1867, the date of the Act passed by Congress, was for wool, price 32c. per pound and under, 10c. per pound specific, and 10 per cent. ad valorem. That was the protection farmers got. On woollen cloths, shawls, etc., there was a duty of 50c. per pound, and thirty-five per cent. ad valorem. On flannels, etc., not exceeding 40c. per pound, there was a duty of 20c. per pound, and thirty-five per cent. ad valorem. That surely was a tariff under which they could flourish. Now let them see the amount of exports and imports of woollen goods in which these farmers and manufacturers were concerned. In 1869, the United States imported $34,628,427 worth of woollen goods, and exported the amount of $163,438, and he supposed this industry might have been called at one time an infant industry, and they protected it for the purpose of enabling it to export goods to foreign countries. In 1870 the United States imported $34,490,668 worth of woollen goods, and exported $124,000 worth; the other years followed in the same ratio. He need not read them to the House, and these gentlemen who were calling loudly for protection to the industries of the country could understand how it had worked out in that way, and how it would work out if they came here and were to demand that the same thing should be done. They had heard them again and again declaring that the people of the United States knew exactly what they were doing; that they were sharp business men. Here was a case where they had gone to Congress and had been met in a liberal spirit. Did the House suppose that our manufacturers and farmers would be able to frame a tariff which would do them more good than these sharp business men in the United States? In reference to the farmer, he found that the price of wool in 1860—and the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) to the contrary, notwithstanding, the period from 1846 to 1870 was the revenue tariff period of the United States, and no member of this House could place his finger on a period in the history of the United States that was more prosperous than that time—in 1860, in price of wool, Saxony fleece was 54c.; in 1860, it was 46c.; merino, in 1860, 48c.; and in 1869, 39c.; extra pulled, in 1860, 42c.; and in 1869, 32½c.; with other kinds in the same proportion. What happened to the wool production? In 1867, the very year that this Bill passed Congress, there were 120,000,000lb. of wool clipped in the United States; in 1868, there were 160,000,000lb.; and in 1870, after this Bill had gone into operation, the clip had sunk to 110,000,000lb. and that with the price of wool much below what it had been under ordinary circumstances; and he might add that, during that year, a wholesale slaughter of sheep took place in the United States. He had an opinion given by an eminent manufacturer in the United States. Speaking of that duty, which was imposed in 1867, Mr. Edward Harris, one of the largest woollen manufacturers in New England, wrote this letter:—

“This (the duty) has put down the price of fine wool in Europe so low that it enables their manufacturers to produce their fine goods so low that they can and will eventually drive us out of the market. It is worse to the American manufacturer than Free-trade, by 50 to 60 per cent; while the poor wool grown is killing off his fine-wool sheep. I venture to suggest that we have a tariff simply for revenue, that the Reciprocity Treaty be renewed, and that all duties on the raw material be repealed.”

That was the opinion of one of the largest manufacturers in the United States. He (Mr. Bertram) would ask hon. gentlemen in this House what reason they could give for imposing a further duty on woollen goods imported into this country?—for that was the real question before the House. The only reason that could be given was one that declared that we had to compete with the pauper population of England, that wages were so much lower in England than they were in this country, and that we must have a duty to protect our workmen. In the first place, this statement was hardly correct in itself, because within a number of years past the price of labour in England had advanced very materially; but, when he told the House the proportion which wages bore in this country to the gross product, it would be seen that that argument entirely failed. He stated on his own responsibility that the sum of from 17½ to 20 per cent. on the gross product would pay all the wages of any ordinarily well conducted woollen factory in this country. If they had enough protection to pay all the wages around a mill, he asked what good reason could be urged for increasing that protection. The same thing applied to the manufacture of cotton. He did not say that all the factories were alike, because there were business men and business men—some could conduct their business much better than others. But there were cotton factories in this country in which 17½ per cent. on the gross product would pay every dollar of the wages which they required to pay. These were two large industries. Let them take another—the agricultural implement-makers. A very small amount, some $60,000 worth, he believed, of agricultural implements of all kinds came into this country. Agricultural implement-making was an enormous business that did not need protection, and did not ask for it. He might mention more, but, if this held good in these two or three industries, it did in regard to all, and, speaking from a Protectionist standpoint, he alleged that 17½

per cent. was ample for all the industries of this country. If they increased it, they would incur great danger of the troubles now existing in the United States, namely, that they would send far too many people into business in this country, and the end would be worse than the beginning, and we would come to the same state of things as the States, where the workshops were idle, the furnaces cold, and the workmen out of employment. He would conclude his remarks by asking the House to consider with him, for a moment, the circumstances in which this country was placed in connection with the levying of a higher rate of tariff. Under the reign of the right hon. member for Kingston, the country had a well-defined policy. The one question, so far as he (Mr. Bertram) could discover, from reading, as he had not the honour of a seat in the House at the time, between the parties was that the Liberals were always desirous of keeping the duties down as low as possible. But there was another great question of principle involved. It was only within the last two years that the Conservatives had adopted the cry of Protection; that they had adopted it as a policy; that they asked that duties should be levied, not for the purpose of revenue, but for the purpose of protection. He (Mr. Bertram) considered that, in this country, placed as we were, we had been more than ordinarily successful. We were now at a period in our history when it would be very dangerous indeed, in his estimation, to alter this well-defined policy. We were entering upon a new phase in our national life. We had acquired territories almost equal to half a continent in the great North-West, and we had also recently acquired British Columbia, the riches of which, he believed, were only very imperfectly understood, even by the inhabitants of that country. Now that we were starting in this race of progress, were we to go back on those principles which had served us so well in the past? Were they to be asked to embark in a new vessel on a strange sea? He was afraid that, if they did that, their course would be marked by wrecks on many of the quicksands.

Although it had been stated again and again that the people of the United States were still strongly in favour of Protection, still there was no doubt of the fact that they were desirous of changing in some way their present regulations. He denied that Protection in the United States had been eminently successful, and thought that any one, who would recall the troubles which occurred in the United States last summer, when the mechanics went into the streets with arms in their hands, and rapine and bloodshed spread through the cities, would agree with him that we would not desire to see anything of that kind in this country of ours. We had a mighty domain, we had room for everybody who might come to us, while, in the United States, although not by any means thickly populated, they were almost on the verge of land which was fit for cultivation; and he asked hon. gentlemen, who were inclined to adhere to a policy of this kind, he asked those who had been considered the Conservative party, who were desirous now of change, to consider this question very seriously, and not to plunge the country into a perilous course, which, if successful, as he did not think it would be under their management, would land us into trouble, out of which we would not get for many years. He had no faith in what were called protective doctrines. He would be prepared to adopt almost any policy that could be shown to be in the interest of the country, and it was because he believed the well-defined and long established policy of a revenue tariff was the best policy for this country that he was prepared to give his unhesitating support to the gentlemen who now occupied the Treasury benches.

MR. McCALLUM said it might be imagined from the remarks of the hon. gentleman who had just spoken that the Opposition wanted to tax the people in order to encourage Protection for Protection's sake. He denied that altogether, and would say for once and for ever that those gentlemen opposite had better stop putting up their puppets and knocking them down. The Opposition were not in favour of extreme Protection, they were in favour of a revenue tariff; but they alleged that that tariff should be collected on the articles which came into this country in competition with our own productions. The present Government had increased the taxation, but they had put that taxation on articles which we could not produce ourselves. They might as well adopt direct taxation at once as tax the tea consumed by the people. The Opposition were neither for Free-trade nor Protection, but were in favour of fair trade. They wanted fair trade with their neighbours to the south, and he asked hon. gentlemen if they considered we now had fair trade relations with the United States? He had been pleased to listen to some of the remarks of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald) because he knew he spoke from experience. That hon. gentleman was largely engaged in commerce, and as an importer of foreign goods into this country, and he would like to ask him if he had understood him correctly to say that one of the causes, or the cause of the depression, was over-importation?

MR. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto): Yes.

MR. McCALLUM asked if the policy of the Opposition in this House since 1874 had not been to induce the Government to adopt a policy which would decrease importation; if they had not pointed out that the Government alone could stop importations into this country? He could show the hon. member, who had stated that he would be a dishonest man if he blamed the Government for the depression, that, according to his own doctrine, the Government, and the Government alone, were responsible, because they alone could decrease importations. If the hon. gentleman were an honest man, how could he go before the people and give his support any longer to the Government? The hon. member said, further, that the manufacturers should learn self-reliance. How were they to have self-reliance if the goods coming into the country and destroying them were the cause of all the depression? The hon. gentleman said that the insurance and ocean freights gave a protection of thirty per cent., the insurance giving a protection of 12½ per cent. He (Mr. McCallum) was not willing to take the statement of the hon. member without deduction. If he took pig iron, which he thought was the heaviest article coming into this country, the cost would be twenty-five per cent for insurance and freight; but, taking the average list of the goods brought into this country, they did not cost two and one-half per cent. That was the fact, and he would leave the hon. gentleman there. The hon. gentleman might take which ever horn of the dilemma he chose when he said that the cause of the present depression was over-importation, and he (Mr. McCallum) had shown that the Government alone could stop that importation or decrease the importation into this country.

AN HON. MEMBER: How?

MR. McCALLUM: By raising the duties on the articles. Did not the hon. member know that the Government had the power of taxation? The hon. member had been supporting the Government, and, if he did not know these things, he should learn them. He (Mr. McCallum) was amused at the hon. the Finance Minister, and would pay a little attention to him. He was amused the other night, when he was addressing the House in his Budget speech, and when he came to speak of the deficit, and hon. members on the Opposition side of the House said "Hear, hear," the hon. gentleman asked if it was a source of gratification to them. The House would recollect, when he delivered that funeral oration on the finances of this country in 1874, the cheers with which he had been greeted. He held the hon. gentleman's Budget speech in his hand, that speech which had been printed and scattered broadcast over the country, and it had cost $1,375 to publish it, to destroy the credit of the country. The Opposition did not cheer the other night, and had not cheered in 1874. He had looked at the exhibition which the hon. gentleman had made of himself the other night, trying to build himself up and crying down the former Government by falsifying figures, and he (Mr. McCallum) had been very sorry to see him make such an exhibition of himself. The hon. the Minister of Finance had told them the other night that freights were very cheap to the old country, that the freights from anywhere on this side of Lake Superior to the city of London the greater were one farthing to one halfpenny per pound. That was gratifying news to the people of this country, and the farmers would be gratified to hear it, and he gave his opinion that freights would never be higher than that. What was the fact? If any hon. member took a glance for a moment at this question, they would see that the hon. gentlemen opposite had always contended that England was the market for our produce, but it could not be a source of much congratulation to the farmers to know that it would cost from 55c. to 60c. per bushel to take their wheat to England. That was the market the hon. gentleman gave them. The hon. gentleman said they should not encourage home industry, and make a home market, but they should send their wheat across the Atlantic to England, and it should cost them 55c. to 60c. for freight. If they went to the North-West, they would find that the wheat would not bear transportation to England at all. It was, therefore, necessary to encourage home industry. The hon. gentleman found fault with the right hon. member for Kingston, and other members, for saying, "Canada for the Canadians." Why should they not say so? Was it not in the interests of the Government and the country to lay the foundations of a great State? Let them look at the trade relations between this country and the United States. What encouragement had an agriculturist in this country? There was a premium offered against every man who tilled the soil in the Dominion, and the Finance Minister had told the House that the only hope for this country was for the farmers to settle the wild lands and consequently increase the receipts from agriculture. But how could the agriculturist look for a bright future when the Americans were allowed to come in and undersell him in his own market? They gave a protection of 17½ per cent. to other industries, but they gave nothing to the farmer. The argument of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) was—I have enough protection for myself, but I must feed my men on flour made from American wheat. The farmers understood this thoroughly.

MR. MACKENZIE: They do.

MR. MCCALLUM said the day was coming when the people would say: Let us have fair play; give us fair trade with our neighbours. The hon. the Minister of Finance found great fault with the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), and said he had given away everything we had, by which we could obtain reciprocity with the United States. He found fault with that hon. gentleman for giving up the National Policy. He (Mr. McCallum) did not think the hon. member for Cumberland had given that up. They were now trying to revive that policy in order that they might again have a lever. The hon. the Finance Minister also said the right hon. member for Kingston was guilty of a scandalous wrong, in the negotiation of the Washington Treaty, in not obtaining reciprocity with the United States, and had stated that he (Mr. Cartwright) had opposed it. Did he (Mr. McCallum) understand the hon. gentleman to say that?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Opposed what?

MR. MCCALLUM said the hon. gentleman, in making that statement, was throwing dirt round the House, and in the face of his own associates. Two or three gentlemen who were now Ministers, had voted for that Treaty, but the hon. gentleman said it was scandalous, though there were a dozen of his present supporters who had voted for it. He (Mr. McCallum) had looked over the Votes and Proceedings and could not find the hon. gentleman's name. Where was he?

"He that fights and runs away
Will live to fight another day;
But he that is in battle slain,
Will never, never fight again."

The hon. gentleman likewise stated that an increased tariff decreased importation. They all knew that the Minister of Finance had had it in his power, with the support of this House, to prevent importation, and the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald) had given the weight of his honesty and standing in this country to the statement that over-importation was the cause of the depression, and had stated he would blame the Government, if they were to blame. After the statement of the Finance Minister, no doubt the hon. gentleman would now believe it.

MR. WOOD: It was when you were in power.

MR. McCALLUM said, if they had been in power for the last four years, public affairs would have been in a different position from that in which they were to-day. If hon. gentlemen opposite would look at the Trade Returns they would see what took place when the present Opposition were in power. Last year there was an increase in imports, and they had exceeded the exports by a very large amount more than they did the previous year. Then the hon. gentleman also stated that, if they placed a duty on breadstuffs coming into the country, it would raise the price to the consumer, but would not increase the price to the producer. They said if they taxed coal they increased its price to the people of Ontario, and if they taxed flour they increased its price to the people of Nova Scotia. Another doctrine of the Finance Minister, the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver), and the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), was that the foreign market, the English market, regulated the price of breadstuffs in this country, so there was no use in placing a duty on flour. If that were true, why did they send Mr. George Brown to Washington to offer so much for a Reciprocity Treaty? Both those statements could not be true. They had offered for a Reciprocity Treaty to give away $5,500,000, which had been awarded us for our fisheries, to build the Caughnawaga Canal, and to give everything else to the Americans, except our allegiance.

MR. McCALLUM.

He (Mr. McCallum) did not believe that the foreign market ruled the price. The duty of the Government was to protect the industries of the country as far as possible, and to make a home market. The hon. member for North Oxford had told them about the Intercolonial Railway; he had also flung dirt about the House. He (Mr. McCallum) must say, that politicians who were not governed by honest principles should have a good memory. He had flung dirt round the House, and even at his leader. He (Mr. McCallum) remembered when the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) advocated the North Shore route for the Intercolonial.

MR. MITCHELL: But he went back on it after.

MR. McCALLUM said that such was the case; but it was after the Government had settled the route, and not until then. In fact, it was not until the matter was determined, and the hon. gentleman thought he could make a little political capital out of it, that the hon. gentleman went back on his view. Did the hon. member for North Oxford know that when he was throwing his dirt round the House—

MR. SPEAKER: I may suggest to the hon. gentleman, as he seems rather fond of that expression, that it is not a very proper one.

MR. McCALLUM said he bowed to the Speaker's decision. Perhaps it was not a very proper expression, but he was not the first who had used it. The hon. member for South Brant had applied the brush rather thickly; he had used varnish, and it was amusing to see how thickly he applied it to the Finance Minister, and also to see how the right hon. gentleman trotted across the House to supply the varnish. It had reminded him (Mr. McCallum) of a back woods schoolhouse, where there was a Mutual Admiration Society. The hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Bertram) had drawn a comparison between 1876 and 1877. But why should the expenditure in 1876 have been more than that of 1877? If the hon. the Finance Minister could pare down the expenditure so close this year, why could he not have done it last year? Because they were going before the people, and the hon. the Minister of Finance even confessed that they had not been perfect. He said that the sky overhead was getting dark and gloomy; he heard the storm rising, the billows rolling, and he knew he had got to meet the indignation of the people. He began to cry for mercy, and the question was whether he would get it or not. Death-bed repentance was not the best kind of repentance. He should have repented in 1874, and not put it off until the last day. He now asked to be forgiven, and promised to be better in the future, but he did not really think the people would pardon his many offences. The Minister of Public Works once said, during the time of the late Administration, that he could not get through the corridors because there were so many officers appointed, so many useless men loitering about belonging to the Civil Service that he could scarcely make his way round the public Departments. He (Mr. McCallum) had taken the trouble to go over the list of the persons employed. He saw that, in 1873, there were 314 employed in the Civil Service; in 1874, 327; and in 1877 405. This was only an increase of 78; so that it took this Government 78 more men to conduct its affairs than the former Government had. From this statement of the hon. the Premier it was, of course, to be presumed that he intended when he came into power to keep down the public expenditure, and yet he was putting this country to the expense of from a quarter to half a million to erect the building opposite to put these officials in and hide them out of the way. How did it happen that such changes came over hon. gentlemen when they happened to change their coats—their political coats he meant. If a man changed his political coat, and joined the party opposite, why he was everything. Although, before, he had been called a mixer and a muddler, if he changed his coat, the organ of that party suddenly discovered that he was a man of marked ability, political purity and economy. He was labelled in that way and sent through the country. Where was that sweet-scented man, whose sins were so rank that they smelled to Heaven, who not long since joined the party? He was away in Manitoba. Where was another gentleman of this House, who undertook to raise the tone of public morality? He had to part company with the members of this House for his sins committed at his election; he was now chief organizer of the Grit party in the Province of Ontario, who endeavoured to put down bribery and corruption with plenty of money. And they would see how the hon. the Finance Minister had changed. If he looked at the Globe newspaper of to-day, he would hardly know himself. What did that newspaper say in 1872 of him—of this man of ability, purity and economy? It said: "Mr. Cartwright voted to reward foul murder in the North-West." This was a strange thing to say against a man of such purity as the hon. the Minister of Finance. If he looked over the Globe, he would find that, on the 18th December, 1867, he voted for the adoption of a route for the Intercolonial Railway which he knew to be inimical to the best interests of the Dominion. On the 11th December, 1867, he helped by his vote to "subvert the Parliamentary safeguards respecting the control of money." On the 5th May, 1868, he "frustrated economy," having helped to vote down Mr. Holton's motion for the reorganization of the Civil Service. On the 19th May, 1868, he voted down Mr. Blake's motion for the better securing the independence of Parliament. They had had a sufficient exhibition of the independence of Parliament in this House. He was very much amused the other night when, in reply to one of the gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House, one of the Ministers said that, at the time the late Government went out of power, they could hardly get through the corridors for expectant contractors. But the late Government kept them outside; while the present men in power had let them into the House. On the 15th May, 1869, the present Finance Minister "delivered the Treasury into the hands of the most unprincipled of men," by helping to vote down Mr. Mackenzie's motion respecting the Fortification grant, as follows:—

"That no sums shall be expended on such works until a separate estimate for each work to be constructed shall be submitted to Parliament, and that the amount to be expended in each year shall be voted from time to time."

The Globe further stated that Mr. Cartwright, on the 16th June, 1867, voted for the "violation of the constitution" in the matter of the Nova Scotia subsidy; on the 17th June, 1869, voted for the "corruption of members of the House," having helped to vote down Mr. Holton's motion respecting the payment to Colonel Gray for codifying the laws; on the 19th June, 1869, voted the "Chantray Island job;" on the 10th May, 1870, voted for the Manitoba Act, thereby becoming a party to "one of the most iniquitous and blundering of measures;" on the 28th February, 1871, voted against the abolition of Dual representation; and, lastly, on the 18th June, 1872, voted for the "abdication by Parliament of its constitutional right to control the public expenditure on the Pacific Railway," having helped to vote down a motion by Mr. E. B. Wood respecting the money asked by the Government for the construction of the Pacific Railway, as follows:—

"That the $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land be only disposed of by special annual votes of Parliament from time to time as shall seem to Parliament right and proper, so that Parliament shall not be divested of its most important constitutional function, viz, control over the public expenditure of the country."

In those days the hon. the Minister of Finance was described as a mixer and muddler; to-day he was all that was good. And now he would say a few words with regard to Protection. He would ask the gentlemen of this House, if they fancied for a moment that the trade, the agriculture of the Province of Ontario, had not suffered by the action of the Government; whether it was not an injustice that the Americans should be able to come over here free of duty and undersell our people. If they went to the other side of the boundary they had to pay 20 per cent., which was a great injustice. The Government, by their action in this matter, were robbing every man who dealt and sold in Ontario, and driving him from the country; because, if he went to the States, according to this fresh arrangement, he had two markets for the products of his labour, Canadian and American, but, as long as he stayed here, he had only a market in Canada, and the Americans had that equally with him. This was a position which the people would not stand, and which they would make the hon. the Finance Minister answer for. He would ask what this Government had done; what this Prime Minister had done, that he should be held up to the admiration of this House. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) said the other night that he was in his proper rank and with his proper associates. Probably he had at last found his proper associates. What had he done since the promises he made in 1874 with regard to the finances of the country? What had the hon. the Finance Minister done in face of the present condition of the country? He said that he could do nothing, and, folding his arms, waited for what might turn up. With regard to the money he borrowed, it was very questionable to his (Mr. McCallum's) mind whether he obtained it on advantageous terms for the people of this country. Other bonds in the market were disposed of at 93, but the hon. the Finance Minister, after the discount was paid, only received about 90. If a farmer in this country sent his man to market with a load of wheat, when it was selling at 93 or 94 cents, and if, instead of offering it in the market, that man went to some private individual who gave him 90c. for the wheat, the farmer would ask the man's reasons for making such a bargain, and would tell him to go about his business. And this was what the people of this country would say to the hon. the Finance Minister in regard to the borrowing of this money. With regard to Protection, he wished all classes to have fair play. He believed it was admitted that we wanted a revenue tariff, but his party contended that it should be collected chiefly from goods which came into competition with the productions of our own country.

MR. NORRIS said he did not intend to go into the figures and the statements with regard to the financial policy of the Government. These had been well discussed on both sides, and they had gone to the country as they were delivered in this House, and, if the country discussed them intelligently, he had no fear of the result. He was sure that the present occupants of the Treasury benches need not be afraid of that discussion. He noticed that a great deal had been said upon the causes of the depression from which the country was now suffering, and, as a business man of the country, perhaps he should know something of those causes and their effects. He regretted we had such a great depression of trade, but great as it was he did not hesitate to say that it did not equal the depression that existed across the border. He lived close to the border of the country, and was in a position to know something of the depression which the United States had suffered under during the last three or four years. Now, with regard to the causes of that depression, he fully agreed with the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald) that the large importation into this country two years ago was one great cause. When they compared the importations of 1872 up to 1875 with those of former years, he thought that every intelligent man would see that they could not expect anything less than depression and a great financial calamity. In those four years the importations into this country amounted to $490,725,673, and the exportations during the same time to $299,765,687, the balance against us being $190,959,986. He thought that this must be admitted to be one of the great causes of the depression from which this country was now suffering. He would mention another which had helped to make this depression what it was. The importation, of course, had been reversed; but, when he looked at the exports of this country for the last few years, when he looked at the one item of exports of lumber to the United States, which was, to a great extent, our only market for lumber, and saw the great falling off in that article alone, he came to the conclusion that this was one of the items which caused the present depression. He noticed, in the exports of lumber to the United States, that in 1873 they reached the large sum of $13,204,000; in 1874, $9,871,000; in 1875, $6,694,000; in 1876, the small amount of $4,970,000; in 1877, only $4,789,000. This showed a decrease in 1877, from 1873, of $8,414,000, and the decrease in this large item in four years, had amounted to $25,000,000. He thought no one could fail to admit that this was one great item of export that had fallen off to an unparalleled degree, and which must be one of the great causes of the great depression. He would ask hon. members what control the Government had over the United States market? They could not raise the price of lumber in that country, they had no means to regulate the American market to suit Canada, and Canada had consequently to bear her share of the depression. It mattered not what Government was in power, they could not have succeeded in preventing the great reduction which had taken place in that item. He would refer to another cause. It was well known that the shipping interests of the whole Dominion had been, for the last three or four years, in a deplorable state, owing to the commercial dullness all over the world. He referred more particularly to their own inland markets; but he was informed that, in other parts of the Dominion, the shipping interests were no better. He could not see what any Government could do to better this interest. The business was running in the same direction, working in the same way as previous years, and, in common with that of their friends across the border, was in a depressed state. All that could be done was to wait for better times, which would probably come at some future day, and do as their neighbours did, who were exactly in the same position. He noticed in speeches of the Opposition throughout the country, and even here on the floor of the House, that, when asked why they did not increase the Protection to manufacturing interests when they were in power, they replied that there was no agitation on the question then, they had no complaints from manufacturers in those days, and, consequently, no necessity existed for Protection. Their memories must be very short, or else they desired to hoodwink the people of this country. He recollected that, years before they left the Treasury benches, the Manufacturers' Association held meetings which he had attended as a delegate two or three times in succession, and he recollected well coming to Ottawa as a delegate for the purpose of having an interview with the then Finance Minister, Sir Francis Hincks, upon the matter. If his memory served him aright, he thought the hon. member for Cumberland was at that meeting, and he knew that Mr. Tilley was there also. That meeting, which was a very large and influential one, made its complaints, which were not few; and all he could say was that their cries were unheeded, and they were allowed to go home without obtaining a single promise of raising the tariff, either then or in the future. In those days there were similar complaints to those made to-day; and the then Government never gave any attention to them. The Opposition might act differently to-day, if they had the power, but he doubted it. It was true they had shortly afterwards imposed a duty on coal, flour, wheat and salt, but the manufacturers were neglected and forgotten. He intended to tell this House, as it had been told many times before, that, with their own votes, about ten months afterwards, at the next Session of Parliament, at all events, they destroyed this National Policy tariff, and left the other as it was before. He was rather surprised at the speech of the hon. member for South Lanark, the other evening, whose principal grievance was that the Americans were allowed to send into this country, to the Quebec market, their oak and pine from Michigan, to compete with Canadian timber, which permission he considered a standing grievance against the present Government. If the hon. member for South Lanark would look into this matter, he would find there was no cause for grievance. The principal part of the oak production in Michigan and Ohio was carried on by Canadian lumbermen, by the use of Canadian capital, Canadian enterprise and energy. Canadians had penetrated the woods of Michigan and Ohio, and had brought the timber thence through Canada to Quebec, to be transported across to the English market, employing in their enterprise, Canadian capital, thousands of the Canadian people, Canadian vessels on the lakes, and at Quebec, furnishing employment to a very large number of men, who depended entirely on this trade, employing, besides, a large number of Canadian and British vessels to freight the lumber across the ocean. The hon. member for South Lanark wished to destroy this trade, the whole profits of which, if it had to be carried through the Erie canal, would be diverted into the pockets of Americans, as it would, no doubt, be shipped from New York in American ships. He would ask how it was possible that any hon. member could advocate a policy of that kind? If no oak were brought from Michigan and Ohio to Quebec, none would reach that port at all; because there was no oak in Canada. Some hon. gentlemen might doubt his word as to the oak region of Canada being exhausted, but he had been engaged in that business for many years, and he knew all the oak regions in Canada, and he now stated the truth when he said there was no oak in Canada, and, if oak were wanted at Quebec to ship to Europe, it must be obtained from the United States. He had listened to the hon. member for Niagara for several hours, but had failed to see anything in his address worthy of note. But he noticed that the hon. member took extra good care to emphasize his words when he told the House that he was not a Protectionist; that he disclaimed any such Protection as they had in the United States. He (Mr. Norris) did not know what the principles of the hon. member for Niagara were, nor, he believed, did any one else in this House. The hon. gentleman had not said whether he was a Free-trader, but he had said on the floor of this House he was not a Protectionist. These hon. gentlemen had gone through the country making speeches on every occasion. They told the people that if they did not get reciprocity in trade, they should get reciprocity in tariffs. This was a statement to be found in almost every speech. He had endeavoured to understand what it meant, and, if he were to believe the hon. gentleman to-night, he had not yet understood it. Reciprocity of tariffs must mean that, if the Americans charged forty per cent. duty, the Canadians should do the same. If they charged twenty cents per bushel on wheat, fifteen cents on barley, or fifty per cent. on cotton goods, we must charge in like manner. But, according to the speech of the hon. member for Niagara to-night, that statement meant nothing. The hon. member made a great grievance of the duty imposed on Canadian barley by the Americans, of 15c. per bushel. But what would the Government do to prevent that? Another argument was that there was no malt imported into this country, consequently a duty on malt would not benefit Canada. We imported no barley, and, therefore, it mattered not what duty the Americans put on Canadian barley, we had no power to prevent it. They would impose a duty to suit themselves. He was very glad that now, at all events, there was a prospect of the Canadian farmers obtaining a market in other parts of the world for their barley. He sincerely hoped that market would open up to their benefit, and that they would no longer have to depend on the Americans solely for the sale of their barley. He understood the hon. member for Niagara to state that, ever since this Government had been in power, they had had deficits year after year. Well, he found, on looking over the Public Accounts, if he understood the matter, that this was not the case. In 1873-4, he found a surplus of $888,675; in 1874-5, a surplus of $935,644, no deficit there; in 1875-6, a deficit of $1,860,000; in the last year a deficit of $1,460,000; making a total deficit on the two years of $3,520,811, the surplus deducted from which left a net deficit of $1,391,000, so that his hon. friend was actually astray in his calculations when he said we had a deficit every year. The hon. member had said he was not a Protectionist, but only wanted to readjust the tariff. What did he mean by readjusting the tariff? No one understood what he meant. He (Mr. Norris) did not think it necessary for him to delay the House any longer. He had endeavoured to show plainly a few of the unfortunate items which had caused the depression, one of the chief causes of which was the large importation of goods into the country. When he looked across the border and saw the deplorable state of affairs there, he could not but come to the conclusion that, if Canada had pursued a similar policy, its affairs would be even worse than they were. He had always upheld the manufacturing interests, and believed they ought to be protected to the fullest extent; but, when he considered the remarks of the hon. member for Centre Toronto that a duty of 17½ per cent., with other incidental expenses, amounted to 25 per cent., they had drawn pretty near the line. He had always advocated, openly and above board, Protection to home industries, and he was of the same opinion to-day. There were some manufacturing interests which required a little increased Protection. He, for one, would never hesitate to advocate those interests, and would continue to do so while in this House.

MR. BUNSTER said he feared that, it being now twelve o'clock, he would not have time to give the discussion the attention it merited, but he was glad to see that it had taken a course in a right direction; to see that the people of the Dominion had come to the views of their sister Province, which he had advocated on the floor of this House for years. Notwithstanding the hon. member for Lincoln, on one occasion, had opposed the Protection for which his Province had craved in the interests of the Dominion, yet, he now stated he was in favour of Protection.

MR. NORRIS: I have always upheld Protection to home industries.

MR. BUNSTER said he was very glad to hear it. Judging from the exhibit given them the other day by the hon. the Finance Minister, it was certainly time to take into consideration Protection to our home industries. He differed in opinion from the hon. member for Lincoln when the latter stated that this country imported no barley. He had not the Public Accounts before him, but, if his memory served him aright, the Province of British Columbia alone imported some 800,000 bushels; hence, the reason why British Columbians asked for Protection. If there was one step in the right direction towards fostering our resources, it was in the way of increasing our tariff, which would result in giving an increased revenue and enable the Government to prosecute, with greater facility, public works, such as deepening our canals, which had been spoken of by the Premier; building up our railroads and other important works; and which would likewise have the effect of giving confidence to our young Canadians, who were to-day leaving our shores to seek in foreign countries an avenue for their enterprise, which was denied them at home. It being now twelve o'clock, he would not proceed further, but would move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. MACKENZIE said he saw no reason why the debate should be adjourned. The hon. gentleman could continue his speech, and after him the House would, no doubt, hear one or two others.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said no progress would be made by delaying the adjournment. He thought also the motion of his hon. friend was to adjourn the House till Thursday.

MR. BUNSTER said he did not wish to intrude on the time of the House, as they were now into the holiday, but would continue his remarks, since his motion had failed. This question of Protection was one which would be decided on the next elections, and he believed the people would decide in its favour, and send representatives to this House who would see that they were protected. In view of the fact which appeared in the newspapers, that failures were of frequent occurrence in the Dominion, it was desirable that the Government should initiate a policy for the fostering and protection of Canadian industries. He trusted that the question would receive at the hands of the House the consideration to which it was fairly entitled.

MR. MOUSSEAU moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. BUNSTER.

MR. GALBRAITH said that, before the motion to adjourn the debate was carried, he desired to take that opportunity of offering a few remarks. He had intended to follow the hon. member for South Lanark, when he concluded his address the other evening, but the member for Niagara secured the floor, and the adjournment took place immediately afterwards, so that he had not had it in his power to say anything respecting the statements made by the hon. member for South Lanark. He was anxious to correct those statements; in fact to rebut them, because he did not think they were calculated to reflect advantageously on the people of the riding, which both he and the hon. member represented. The hon. member had spoken of the great destitution which existed in the county from which they came, and had attributed that destitution to the improper policy of the Government, and to the want of that Protection which he believed the manufacturing industries of the country demanded. He thought he was in a position to know quite as much as the hon. member, what the position of affairs was in the county of Lanark. He was not aware that such destitution as had been described existed, nor did he know that the interests of the county of Lanark could be benefitted by Protection to the extent which the hon. member would lead the House to believe. The principal industries in that county were the woollen business and the foundry business, or the manufacture of agricultural implements. When the Depression Committee examined a gentleman who carried on perhaps the largest manufacturing industry of agricultural implements in this section of the country, that gentleman stated that he had all the Protection he desired. With the Protection he possessed he was not afraid, he said, to compete with the people of the United States, or any other country. It was well known that the woollen industry in that part of the country consisted principally in the manufacture of tweeds. The Americans, it had been said, made a slaughter-market of Canada, and were destroying that industry; but an examination of the Customs returns revealed the fact that the amount of tweeds, at a Customs valuation, imported into all the Provinces of the Dominion during the past year, was $13,715 worth. He would ask the House if that amount could have any appreciable effect in depressing the manufacture of tweeds in Canada? It was well known it could not. In regard to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald), the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) stated the other night that that gentleman spoke from a very peculiar standpoint. He did speak from a peculiar standpoint. Perhaps no member of the House possessed a better knowledge of trade between different countries with which we dealt, and he boldly asserted, whilst addressing the House the other night, that the manufacturing industries of this country had all the Protection they required, giving at the same time reasons for that belief. The hon. member for Centre Toronto appeared before his constituents as an Independent candidate. He was elected as such, and at once took up that position in the House which he still maintained. He (the speaker) believed the hon. member referred to had stated what was correct when he said that he was just as ready to find fault with any part of the policy of the Government of which he did not approve, as he was to approve of what he believed to be for the prosperity of the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite could not, therefore, taunt the member for Centre Toronto as they had been in the habit of taunting members on the Government side of the House with being one of those who formed a mechanical majority and a servile following of the Government. The hon. member had taken a different position in the House, and his utterances should have as much weight with the hon. gentlemen opposite, as he (Mr. Galbraith) was sure they would have with the people of the country. Another interest which the hon. member for South Lanark appeared to imagine ought to be largely protected was the lumber interest. He (Mr. Galbraith) believed there was no interest—apart from the agricultural interest—in this section of the country upon which the people were more dependent than that, and a considerable amount of the destitution—if such destitution really did exist—which the hon. member for South Lanark had spoken of originated from the depressed state of that interest. There was one class of the people who, on account of the depression in the lumber trade, were not in as favourable a position as they occupied a few years ago. He referred to that class who were not connected with our manufacturing establishments, and had no regular calling to follow, but were dependent on such employment as they might be able to obtain among their neighbours. Formerly, during the winter months, many of them found ample employment at good wages in the shanties, but since that interest had become depressed, these people were thrown out of employment. At the same time, from his knowledge of the village in which he resided, and other villages throughout the county, he did not believe that so much destitution existed as was represented. With respect to the woollen interest, he might state that for a long time past all the mills, in that section at all events, had been running at full time, and that he understood no reduction in wages had taken place. The employers of labour in that industry stated that, if they were not sustaining loss, they made no profit in the business. However, that was a matter which did not affect the persons employed, and so long as they obtained all the work they were able to do and as high wages as they received in the best of times, with the low state of the provision market, they certainly could not be suffering any extra privation. With regard to the lumber interest, he was prepared fully to endorse the statement made by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Norris). The entire quantity of sawn lumber, bearing duty, imported into all the Provinces of Canada during the last year, was under thirteen millions of feet. At present there was lying in the little village of Carleton Place, waiting for a market, nearly double that amount of lumber, and until such times as the Americans were in a position to purchase the lumber, and until a change took place in that regard, he did not expect anything but a depression to continue in the country. It was impossible for the present Government or any Administration to force the Americans to come to Canada and pay the same price for lumber they did a few years ago. The lumber which formerly brought from $10 to $14 could be bought during last summer and the previous summer at $6 and $3. The consequent depression on that trade had a very sensible effect on the general interests of the whole people in his neighbourhood. Another matter which the hon. member for South Lanark had endeavoured to deal with—in fact, a good deal of what the hon. member did say was a rehash of what he said twelve months ago in the House—was the Georgian Bay Branch, and he ventured to state that the construction of that railway was not necessary at present, and for the reason that our people did not want it. That was a mistake. If the amount of depression of which the hon. gentleman had spoken really did exist, certainly the construction of that railway would be a great benefit to the people in that section from the employment it would afford and the amount of money that would be circulated. But there was another reason why, it appeared to him, it would be wise for the Government to proceed with the construction of that road as soon as possible. It was generally admitted that money could be obtained in England at a rate as low as Canada had ever been able to obtain it. He believed it was also admitted that the wages for labour were as reasonable as perhaps they would ever be in the future, and, if destitution did exist, was it not wise on the part of the Government, with a view to economise as far as possible the expenditure of the people's money on the construction of public works—works that must be constructed by the Government, and respecting which the Government were charged with indifference—to endeavour to construct them under the circumstances in which the country was now placed. He thought the carrying out of these works would be a very great advantage. He doubted whether it was wise to advocate sectional interests in the House, but hon. members were there to discuss matters affecting the whole Dominion, and it was only by members who understood the needs of their own sections expressing their wants on the floor of Parliament, that the Government and the House could ascertain what was necessary to be done. The construction of this railway would, however, open up a large section of country and greatly benefit this part of the Dominion. There was another point of view from which it appeared to him that the road should be built at as early a day as possible. We were living on the borders of a great Republic. We did not know in what position the people of Great Britain might be placed in regard to the war in Europe. We had every reason to believe that, in the event of England becoming involved in war, that party which had twice attempted to make trouble in Canada were very likely to endeavour to make trouble again, and under those circumstances it would be of advantage to the country if a railway ran from Quebec to Georgian Bay, passing through the interior of the country, for such would be a road which any party invading the country could not very well reach. For these reasons, it would be a wise policy on the part of the Government, at an early day, to push forward the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch, and extension of the Canada Central Railway. The hon. member for South Lanark had made considerable trouble last year about the rails which had been borrowed by the Canada Central Company for the extension of its road. Whatever members from other parts of the Dominion might say, he did not believe it lay in the mouths of hon. members representing any of the constituencies in this section to say anything about the matter. A long time ago a large amount of money was borrowed from the Ontario Government to build a road from Brockville to Pembroke on the Ottawa river. That road was extended to Almonte. The money was entirely expended; the people of Renfrew, as well as the people of Lanark, were liable for the amount of money borrowed, and, before they could secure the construction of the road to Pembroke, they were compelled to impose on themselves large burdens in the shape of bonuses.

When it was found that a few rails were necessary for the completion of the line within the stipulated time, the Government were justified, taking the securities they did, in lending the rails to the company at that time, as it was done in the interests of the people of Renfrew and this part of the country generally. He believed there was now a probability that such an arrangement would be carried out as would enable the Government without any difficulty to recoup the country both for the rails borrowed and the money paid for the surveys on the Georgian Bay Branch. They had heard a great deal lately about protection to agricultural interests, and a strong attempt had been made to prove to the agriculturists of Canada that they were very badly used by the policy which had been followed by the present Government. He believed, and he thought the great body of the farmers themselves believed, that, so far as the agriculturists were concerned, they had nothing whatever to expect from any legislation that might take place in Parliament with respect to protection for their products. The day had gone by when a majority would be found in this House, whether under this or any other Administration, who would consent to impose a tax on the breadstuffs of the people and he doubted very much whether, if there were such a tax imposed, it would remain in force any longer than the National Policy of the old Government. If they did succeed in imposing such duties, they would be compelled very shortly to repeal them, and he was not very sure that the leader of the Opposition would be able to reconcile the conflicting opinions of his own followers with respect to a matter of this kind. The hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) was exceedingly anxious apparently that a heavy duty should be levied on pork coming into this country, and they heard a good deal about reciprocal tariffs. The tariff, however, on meats was reciprocal, and on meats sent into the United States as well as on meats which came thence into Canada, a duty of one cent per pound was paid, and so far as this was concerned the tariff was reciprocal, and they had no reason, with regard to the arguments used by hon. gentlemen opposite, to find fault with it. Other hon. gentlemen sitting on the Opposition benches did not take that view. He remembered that last year, when the senior member for Ottawa resigned his seat and went to his constituents again, he (Mr. Currier) took credit to himself for having assisted in voting down the National Policy, and, more than that, he stated that, at the time that policy was voted down, he had brought up a resolution to put pork on the free list—which was defeated on account of some irregularity; and, further, that, when he resigned his position in the House last spring, he had in his desk, and was prepared to move in the House, a resolution to place pork on the free list. He (Mr. Galbraith) would like to know how the hon. member for Kingston was able to reconcile the conflicting opinions existing between the hon. members for South Lanark and Ottawa; hence, he thought that, so far as the agricultural interests were concerned, the farmers need not expect any legislation here that would benefit them by means of any special duties levied on articles which they produced. He believed, however, that there was one way in which our agriculturists could be benefitted; and this was the only way in which he knew that this could be expected; and he had had the opportunity during the past summer of conversing with a great number of them. He had held a few meetings in the riding which he represented. He had heard a great deal in the House about the reaction, and he had seen a great deal in the newspapers about it; but he could tell hon. gentlemen that, so far as these meetings were concerned, they saw no sign of it whatever.

MR. MACKENZIE: So say we all.

MR. GALBRAITH said that, so far as the farmers were concerned, he did not believe that one in a hundred could be induced to admit that a protective policy could benefit their peculiar interests; but he would tell the House what the farmers of the country did expect at the hands of the Government and what he believed would really benefit them; this was such an arrangement by the Government of the duties on goods coming into the country, that farmers could purchase what they did not produce at the lowest possible price. This was the protection the farmers wanted; it was the only protection that was calculated to do them any good; and it was the protection which the Government was prepared to give them. With respect to the reaction, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) had told them that, so disgusted had the old Reformers of North Lanark become with the policy of the present Government, that at the next election they were going to send a supporter of the Opposition to the House. A gentleman was out in this riding as the nominee and candidate of the Conservative party, who occupied, socially and morally, a very high position amongst them, and, with his friends, he had been prosecuting a very earnest canvass for a good many months past; and those gentlemen imagined that with the Conservative and the Protectionist vote in the riding, they had a good chance of carrying the election; but he believed that the Reformers of North Lanark had not forgotten their principles, and that, like the Reformers all over the country, they had an abiding faith in the honesty of purpose, and the political integrity and ability of the hon. the First Minister and his friends on the Treasury benches. He thought that, when the election took place, the Reformers of North Lanark and of the country generally, would show that the reaction was a thing of the past. Such a thing did not now exist. With respect to the hard times they heard so much about, he (Mr. Galbraith) considered that their people were as well off in that respect as the people in any other part of the country. He was satisfied that, so far as they were concerned, with the exception of that class he had already spoken of, they had no more reason to grumble now than they had had during perhaps the better times in the past. He supposed the poor would be always with us, and that some parties would always require assistance, public aid and support. His belief was that now, taking it as a whole, the prosperity of their section of the country was equal to what it had been, so far as the means of living were concerned. He had in his hand a paper published at Carleton Place that morning, from which he had taken a short clipping. Carleton Place was a municipality in the constituency of the hon. member for South Lanark. They had had in that village a good deal of difficulty lately with respect to the building of a High School, and an article had appeared in the last issue of this paper in which the writer stated that, owing to the hard times, it was inexpedient for the people to be asked to raise sufficient means at present to do so, and advised that the matter should be allowed to lie over. Another writer, in reply to that advice, wrote as follows:—

“Now, sir, there are some people who always complain of hard times. We have two foundries, two extensive machine shops, three cloth factories, two tanneries, two door and sash factories, with blacksmiths', shoemakers', saddlers' and carriage shops, all in full blast and running full time, besides a large number of resident railroad employes; provisions and fuel are cheaper now than they have been for years; rents are moderate; labour in good demand; and our taxes are not as high as in some of our neighbouring villages.”

Such was the testimony of his own constituency. He gave it for what it was worth. He would not have troubled the House at this late hour had it not been that the statements made by the hon. member for South Lanark must have left the impression on the minds of hon. gentlemen that the people of the county were little better than a host of paupers, who, to use the hon. member's own words, “looked with hungry eyes upon a bag of flour in the hands of a fellow-workman.” That statement was a libel upon the people, and he felt it to be his duty, as one of their representatives, to take the earliest opportunity of contradicting and repudiating it.

PRAYERS.

HOHELAGA BUILDING SOCIETY
INCORPORATION BILL.

(Mr. Jetté.)

FIRST READING PROPOSED.

MR. JETTÉ moved for leave to introduce a Bill to incorporate the Permanent Building Society of Hochelega, and for other purposes, and asked that the rule should be suspended to allow the introduction of the Bill.

MR. SPEAKER said the time allowed for the introduction of Private Bills expired on the 4th instant, and the rule could not be suspended unless the Committee who reported on the Bill recommended it in its report.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Tupper.)

FIRST READING.

MR. TUPPER introduced a Bill (No. 42) To amend an Act entitled an Act respecting the Intercolonial Railway, passed in the 39th year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria.

MR. MACKENZIE said he would like the hon. gentleman to state the object of his Bill.

MR. TUPPER said that the petition which he presented two days ago, signed by His Grace the Archbishop of Halifax and a very large number of the merchants of that city, would fully explain the objects of this Bill. The hon. the First Minister would remember that, when he introduced this Act respecting the Intercolonial Railway—an Act which was necessary for the purpose of extending that railway from its then terminus at Richmond, farther into the city of Halifax—he (Mr. Tupper), raised the question whether it would conflict with the rights of the City Railway then in operation in Halifax, and he understood the hon. the Premier to state in reply that there would be no interference with any vested rights under the charter of the Halifax City Railway Company. That railway company had certain rights given them by the Legislature of Nova Scotia previous to that Province becoming part of the Dominion, and the petitioners contended that their rights had been taken away by the Act which amended the Intercolonial Railway Act. The Intercolonial Railway Act provided for the construction of a railway from Rivière du Loup to Truro, but it was afterwards found desirable and necessary to extend the line into the city of Halifax, and the hon. the Premier introduced a Bill for that purpose. He (Mr. Tupper) raised the question then, at the request of the Halifax City Railway Company, and, indeed, it was raised in both Houses, whether the Act proposed at all interfered with the rights of this company; and he believed that the answer here from the First Minister, and also from the Government in the other House, was in the negative. It was now found, however, that the right that company enjoyed, to have an arbitration in certain contingencies specified in their charter, was taken away by that Act, and the official arbitrators for the Government would be substituted instead of the arbitration provided by the charter. The object of the present Bill was simply to restore to the Halifax City Railway the rights they had enjoyed under the Local Legislature, the power of which, in this respect, was transferred by the Act of Union to this Parliament and this Government, and to restore to them their original rights, whatever they might be, so that any claims they might make might be subject to the same arbitration provided for under the local Acts. He had intended to leave the Bill on the table and to explain it on the second reading; but, of course, he presumed that the main object was to draw the attention of the hon. the First Minister to the matter, because, if he saw the propriety of allowing this Act to pass, perhaps the Government would treat it in their own way.

MR. MACKENZIE said it would be very wrong for him to prejudge the Bill until he saw it and considered it; but, as he looked at it at the present moment, the Bill of the hon. gentleman was introduced in order to force upon the Government another kind of arbitration than that which was provided by the Government Acts. The arbitration that these parties wanted was one to decide what damages would be due to them because the Government had chosen to take its railway into the city, and they had a railway previously on the street in question. He had declined the arbitration in question. The Government had as good a right as any company to take its railway there; and to say that, because the street railway was in existence there, that it had an absolute right to the entire railway traffic of the city, was too preposterous to be considered for a moment. As to the actual damage done by crossing this company's track, he was quite willing to give arbitration, but the company would not accept the amount the Government were willing to pay for that damage, and any further arbitration than that he could not possibly consent to. At the same time, he should look at the Bill, and consider anything the hon. gentleman had to say with reference to it, because he did not wish to be the instrument, as the head of the Government, in doing any injustice to anyone; and he did not believe that any injustice had been done. As to any assurance he might have given when the hon. gentleman had asked him a question about this matter, he had no recollection of such a question being asked in that categorical way with reference to Mr. O'Brien and his railway. He had no recollection of this, but it might be so. He was quite sure that he had never ventured to give any legal opinion in this House.

STAMPS ON BILLS AND NOTES BILL.

(Mr. Laurier.)

FIRST READING.

MR. LAURIER introduced a Bill (No. 43) Further to amend the Acts respecting stamps on Bills and Notes. He said the object of this Bill was simply to provide, by stamped paper, for the duties that were imposed on bills and notes.

MR. MACKENZIE.

HOMESTEAD EXEMPTION ESTATES BILL.

(Mr. Mills.)

FIRST READING.

MR. MILLS introduced a Bill (No. 44) To provide for the creation and registration of Homestead Exemption Estates in the territories of Canada.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not know that we have territories in the American sense of the word. We are in the territory of Canada now.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is mistaken. Our territories are known in the Acts of Parliament as the North-West Territories.

MR. MILLS said the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) himself introduced this expression to designate those portions of Canada which lay outside the boundary of any Province, and it was in that sense that he used the expression in this Bill. He referred not simply to the North-West territories, but to the territories, the possessions of Canada, that lay outside of the limits of any Province. The term was defined in the Bill itself in order that there might be no misapprehension with regard to its meaning. The Bill provided that any person having an estate in fee simple or a life estate in any lands in the North-West territories, if these lands lay outside the boundaries of an incorporated town or village, should register them as a homestead exemption estate, and that the property so registered should not be liable for any debts incurred subsequent to the time of its registration, except those incurred for taxation or with the consent of the parties specially interested, or who were on the register as the owners of this life estate. The Bill provided that, if the proprietor was a married man, the name of his wife should also be entered upon the register along with his own, and that the estate should not be sold or disposed of except with her consent; and this homestead estate should be treated as the joint estate of the husband and wife. The Bill also provided that, in case the proprietor was not married at the time, but might subsequently become married, his wife's name should be entered in the register. There was also a provision in the Bill that, after the death of the husband, his wife should remain in possession of the property during her life, and that, after her death, any minor children might possess the estate until they attained their majority. There was also a provision made that, in case of inheriting other property, or that there was a devise made to her, she should elect whether she would retain the homestead exemption estate or the estate devised to her, or the one she inherited. These were the principal provisions of the Bill.

THE MINISTER OF MILITIA.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, before the Orders of the Day were called, he begged leave to make a statement. During his absence, he had received a memorandum, signed by the Chief Justice of Nova Scotia and Justice Desbarres, of which the hon. the Premier had had communication, and which, with the permission of the House, he would read, as follows:—

"The undersigned, perceiving by telegraphic despatches from Ottawa, that they were assailed in opprobrious terms by the Hon. Mr. Jones in the debate on the Address, deem it due to their personal character to state the circumstances out of which so unexpected and so bitter an attack arose. In August, 1869, the then Governor-General, Sir John Young, was expected at Halifax on an official visit. It was the first official visit of Her Majesty's representative since the passage of the Dominion Act. A meeting was called by the Mayor to make arrangements for the reception of His Excellency, and the Judges of the Supreme Court, having conferred together, thought it their duty to attend and take part in the proceedings. They went, therefore, in a body, to the City Council chamber. In the course of the discussion that ensued, Mr. Jones addressed the meeting, using very warm language, to which the Judges listened in silence, till he uttered these words—'when the British flag is hauled down from the Citadel Hill, I shall take off my hat and cheer.' Four of the Judges, the late Judge Johnson, the late Judge Dodd, the Chief Justice, and Judge Desbarres, at once rose from their seats and left the room without saying a word, but to mark their strong disapprobation of so disloyal a sentiment. This fact was witnessed, and the objectionable speech was heard, by a crowded audience, and, if any one was daring enough to question so memorable an occurrence, it could be easily and abundantly proved. That it was everywhere discussed, and instantly found its way into the press, were unavoidable consequences, nor is it to be wondered at that the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir Hastings Doyle, should desire to hear from the Judges themselves the expression used by Mr. Jones, which led them to leave the meeting. We, neither of us, heard of Sir Hastings Doyle's letter to Mr. Tupper before its recent production. We must confess, therefore, our astonishment that Mr. Jones, after the lapse of so many years, should have attacked us without notice in the House of Commons, and stigmatized an incontrovertible fact as a foul slander. As for the further charge that the Chief Justice misled Sir Hastings Doyle, that was a thing not easily done, and it was certainly never attempted by him.

"W. S. DESBARRES.

"Halifax, 18th Feb., 1878."

MR. JONES (Halifax) said he was perfectly well aware that the learned Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Desbarres had forwarded that statement to the right hon. member for Kingston, and, indeed, he did not see very well how they could avoid taking that course. It was well known in Halifax that the learned Chief Justice was the author of what he (Mr. Jones) still stigmatized as a foul slander, and it was never made public until the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) published the letter which General Doyle wrote him in 1872. Of course this was the first time he (Mr. Jones) had the honour of meeting that slander in the way he did meet it on that occasion. He thought hon. members would recollect that, when the hon. member for Cumberland brought that question before the House in 1870 or 1871, he (Mr. Jones) used as strong language then as he used on the present occasion; but, because the learned Chief Justice was not given as the authority, the learned gentleman did not think it necessary to come forward and make a statement which he was compelled to do to justify the position he took then. He (Mr. Jones) had placed the Chief Justice in this position: that he was obliged to make the statement he now had made or rest under the stigma of having made what he (Mr. Jones) still maintained was a foul slander. With reference to the statement he made on that occasion, he had only to refer to the facts as to what took place on that day? The learned Chief Justice said all the Judges left the room. But all the Judges did not leave. Judge Wilkins remained, and made a long speech—

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He says that only four Judges left.

MR. JONES: Very well, four. Judge Wilkins remained and made a long speech, and there was no more loyal or consistent man in Nova Scotia to-day, or at any previous time, than the present Judge Wilkins; and he challenged the hon. gentleman or the learned Chief Justice, or any other man, to point out a single utterance of Judge Wilkins, who remained and took part, after the several gentlemen had left, in the subsequent discussion, that pointed to his having made use of any language inconsistent with his position and his loyalty to the Crown. If he (Mr. Jones) had made such a statement that implied disloyalty to the Crown, did any one suppose that Judge Wilkins would have remained there and taken part in that discussion, or that he would not have brought it forward, and referred to it at some subsequent period? No; but it was because the learned Chief Justice, with that anxiety to convey information which had always been his characteristic, rushed to General Doyle and made this statement to him, which was now brought before the public for the first time, that all this was done. It had never been made public until now; and the learned Judge was obliged now to take a position from which he would, no doubt, shrink, if he had not been driven into that corner. But he (Mr. Jones) had evidence that was as good as that of the learned Judge or of Judge Desbarres on this occasion. He might simply point to the fact that this matter was discussed and was the subject of discussion in the local papers, and he had been informed by those whom he had caused to make investigations that not one of the papers opposed to him—which would naturally have made the worst of any statement coming from him—had made use of the language on the following day which the learned Chief Justice attributed to him as having used. He had also caused those papers to be examined, and they made no statement with regard to his having said what the Chief Justice alleged that he did say, on that occasion. That, in the first place, was very strong evidence. But he had other evidence of moment with which to meet the statement that the learned gentleman had sent here, and which, he repeated, he was obliged to do in his old days. He (Mr. Jones) was not unwilling to be charitable to an old gentleman of eighty years of age, and to imagine that he might at that time of life take up a position, which, in his younger and more vigorous days, he would have scorned to take toward any man. He (Mr. Jones) took the opportunity of asking every gentleman who was present what their opinions were in regard to the matter, and their reply he would read to the House:

“The undersigned citizens of Halifax, who were present at the meeting in the City Council Chamber, on the 10th August, 1869, with reference to the proposed reception of His Excellency the Governor-General of Canada, have had their attention drawn to a charge made by Hon. Mr. Tupper in the House of Commons, that Hon. Mr. Jones, at such meeting said he would cheer when the British flag was hauled down from the citadel. They emphatically contradict the statement of Mr. Tupper, who was not present. They affirm that Mr. Jones did not use the words attributed to him, and that the report of his remarks published in the Morning Chronicle the day after the meeting, and recently quoted by him in the House, according to their recollection, was substantially correct. Robert Boak, John Gibson, William Duffus, William Esson, Alexander Anderson, Robert L. Weatherbe, Douglas M. Story, William P. West, Henry Lawsou, Charles Annand, W. S. Fielding, James Butler, P. C. Hill, W. E. Weir, P. H. Senior, Robert Taylor, Peter Ross, W. J. Lewis, John Taylor, Alexander Stephen, F. D. Corbett.”

Now, he thought the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), who knew the standing of many of these gentlemen, would not venture to say there or elsewhere that, wherever those gentlemen were known—gentlemen like John Gibson, the Hon. Mr. Hill, and all those gentlemen who had put their names to this statement—they were not commercial men of the highest standing, and that their word was not as good, and better, than that of the learned Chief Justice, in a case of this kind, because they were men who were not blinded by their political feeling, who went to that meeting, and who had given their statement in regard to it. More, there were three or four of those gentlemen whom he had named that had attended this meeting as his political opponents. There was the Hon. Mr. Hill, a leader of the Government; Dr. Lewis, one of the first merchants in Halifax, and Mr. Story, another gentleman, who formerly associated with the party to which the hon. member for Cumberland belonged. And all these gentlemen had joined in this declaration that the statement made by the learned Chief Justice, and repeated here by the hon. member for Cumberland, was emphatically what he (Mr. Jones) termed it—incorrect, and a foul slander. He would leave the matter there, and, if the hon. gentleman thought he had made any capital out of it against him, he was very much mistaken. The hon. gentleman had brought it before the electors of Halifax before, and they had endorsed his (Mr. Jones's) position on it. The hon. gentleman had only supposed, by bringing it up here and having it scattered over the country, it might injure him, where he (Mr. Jones) was not known. But he (Mr. Jones) had given a certificate to this House from men of the highest social, political and commercial standing in Halifax, and men whose words would be taken before that of the learned Chief Justice himself in a matter of this kind. The anxiety with which the learned Judge had thrown himself into this matter justified exactly the position in which he (Mr. Jones) had placed him in when this discussion was first raised. He (Sir William Young) had allowed his political feelings against him (Mr. Jones) and the party with which he was associated to place him in a humiliating position, and a position from which he, doubtless, would willingly extricate himself to-day, when his statement was made public, but which the people of Halifax knew he could not justify, because those who were present on that occasion and who heard the whole proceedings, denied the correctness of his (Sir William Young's) statement.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not desire to renew the discussion. The hon. gentleman was called upon to vindicate his own position, and he (Sir John A. Macdonald) had therefore no objection to his reading the paper in question to the House; but the hon. gentleman was a little inaccurate in supposing that an attempt was made in the paper he (Sir John A. Macdonald) had read to establish that all the Judges had retired; on the contrary, the terms used in the memorandum showed that it was the intention of the signers to mention that all the Judges did not retire. It stated that four of the Judges at once rose and left the room; and this proved that all the Judges did not leave. He had only one thing more to say; the hon. gentleman referred to the newspapers of the day published immediately afterwards, and especially to the Morning Chronicle, as proving that he did not use the language quoted. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) would now read to the House what the Halifax Express of the next day said.

MR. JONES: It did not say that.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I will read what it did say, which was as follows:—

“So far all was well, when Mr. Alfred Jones rose and began to deliver what was evidently a carefully prepared harangue. He had not spoken three minutes when his violent language produced a great amount of noise and general disorder; the disposition of the meeting was evidently not to listen to the mouthings of Mr. Jones, but the Mayor, in a most peremptory manner, demanded that he should be heard, and that he should cause any one attempting to interrupt Mr. Jones to be removed from the meeting; this produced a temporary calm and the speaker proceeded. It was plain, however, that what Mr. Jones wanted was a row, and accordingly, almost immediately, he gave utterance to language so unmistakably disloyal about the British flag disappearing from Citadel Hill, that a scene of uproar ensued which beggars description. At this point, when the rowdiness of the repeal party was at its climax, and the friends of loyalty were determined that Mr. Jones should not be heard, the venerable Judge Johnston rose, and the old man eloquent, though he did not open his lips, showed by his look and bearing how completely he was shocked at what he had been obliged to hear. Chief Justice Sir William Young, Judge Desbarres, and nearly the whole of the leading men in the meeting took up their hats and left."

That was the statement made by that paper on the next day, and it is to be found on page 148 of Hansard of this year. I am not at all saying that this statement is correct or not, but I merely correct the statement which the hon. gentleman made, that the press did not corroborate substantially what the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Desbarres related in this connection.

MR. JONES said he wanted to point out that the press exactly bore out the statement he had made. The Express, as the hon. gentleman was aware, was bitterly opposed to him (Mr. Jones); and it said that his language on that occasion referred to the British flag disappearing from Citadel Hill. Of course, in his statement the other day, he acknowledged having made use of the language that the British desired them, as appeared from the language of the Governor-General, to take an independent position. When she hauled down her flag and took her troops from this country, he had enough confidence in the intelligence of the people of this country to believe that they would shape their own destiny in the direction their interests pointed out, and he had alluded in that way to the disappearance of the flag from the hill, as was borne out by this paper, which exactly corroborated what he said; and it corroborated his language to the very letter, because it was only afterwards that the Chief Justice had desired to make political capital out of it, and that some people had done what they dared not have done at the time. This was only an after-thought. It was only afterwards that these people had made out that he had said that, when the British flag was taken down, he would take off his hat and cheer. He would point out to the right hon. gentleman that the evidence which was brought forward, instead of proving that, proved exactly the correctness of the statement which he (Mr. Jones) made. With reference to the Chief Justice, he (Mr. Jones) might treat him in a very different way if he desired. He could bring witnesses, and among them an hon. member of the House, with regard to that gentleman's public career; but, owing to the Chief Justice's age, and for no other reason, he would refrain from doing so. He did not consider, in this relation, the Chief Justice's high position, because he held that any man, no matter what his position might be, was not to shield himself by his judicial robes from public criticism and parliamentary enquiry. When he had listened to the right hon. gentleman the other night stating he (Sir John A. Macdonald) wondered that the hon. the Minister of Justice and other hon. gentleman had not taken up the question with respect to the learned Chief Justice, he (Mr. Jones) was amazed at the position taken by the right hon. gentleman in putting a Judge and a Chief Justice above the High Court of Parliament. He held that, when a Chief Justice, or any Judge, or any person acting incompatibly with his position, came down and mixed in ordinary political discussions, his conduct was open to public criticism by this House, and he did not shrink from discussing it. He had in his hands remarks which were made with reference to the learned Judge in bygone days by an hon. member who sat on the floor of the House, which, if he was to read them now to the House, would place that learned Judge in a very unpleasant position before the people of this country; but he would spare the old man on account of his age, though he had not the same feeling for the men who used such language as had been employed in the course of this discussion.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Read.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would crave the indulgence of the House for one moment. The hon. gentleman said that the newspaper from which he (Sir John A. Macdonald) had read exactly bore out what he (Mr. Jones) had said. Now, this newspaper said that the hon. gentleman gave utterance to language which was unmistakably disloyal. Did the hon. gentleman say that this exactly bore out what he had said? He wished the opportunity of making a remark or two which he had intended to have made in the first place; this was with respect to Sir William Young. Sir William Young was Chief Justice, and, of course, like everyone else of them, he (Sir William Young) was responsible for his conduct, and amenable to attack if he had done anything wrong. But he was not aware that the Chief Justice had done anything wrong. It was a question whether he was right or wrong in the statement he made to Sir Hastings Doyle, and he had a right to make that statement if he chose.

MR. MACKENZIE: If it was true.

MR. JONES: If it was true.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said, of course, the Chief Justice had a right to make that statement if he believed it to be true. He maintained that the hon. gentleman must say he (Sir William Young) believed it to be true. The hon. gentleman had stated that he was astonished to hear him (Sir John A. Macdonald) place Sir William Young above the High Court of Parliament; but he certainly did not place the Chief Justice above the High Court of Parliament. The hon. gentleman was not quite the High Court of Parliament. He thought he said that Sir William Young's status was quite equal to that of the hon. gentleman's; but he certainly did not place him above the High Court of Parliament, nor had he entered into any comparison. Before he became Chief Justice, Sir William Young was for many years leader of the Reform party in the Province of Nova Scotia, while Mr. Justice Johnston, his opponent, was for many years the leader of the Conservative party there. Both were elevated for their merits by their party to the Bench when an opportunity occurred, and both were distinguished Judges, and he believed that both were satisfactory Judges, and both had been and were now respected Judges. And those two Judges thought that the language in question was disloyal, and that they would not listen to it; and, consequently, they had retired. Sir William Young was no political friend of his, and never was.

MR. MACKENZIE: Oh, yes, he is.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he knew the Chief Justice perfectly well; he was a Unionist, certainly, and he went in strongly for Union, like the hon. the Premier; and, in that sense, he was a political friend of his; but no, Sir William Young was no political friend of his because he had now retired from the arena of politics. He might have known him (Sir William Young), but he did not think he had ever met him until he was Chief Justice, and, therefore, he was not a political friend of his (Sir John A. Macdonald's). However, his sentiments were strongly in favour of Union, and as Chief Justice and Judge, Sir William Young was certainly entitled to all the respect due to his position, unless, by his own conduct, he forfeited it. He wished to say no more, and he would not have said so much had it not been for the hon. gentleman, who ought to have read his paper and confined himself as much as possible to the remarks drawn out by his statement, which, of course, he (Mr. Jones) was called upon to make.

MR. JONES said he had just one word to say. He regretted that a matter affecting himself should have occupied so much time of the House. He had thought that the explanations which had taken place years ago had been sufficient to the people of this country. They had been sufficient to his own people, and he was extremely sorry that this matter should have continued the subject of debate before the House to the interruption of the ordinary business of the country. He would not have taken the course which he was now pursuing had it not been for the right hon. gentleman's remarks, which forced him to make the statements he had just now made. The right hon. gentleman said truly enough that the learned Judge was the leader of the Reform party in Nova Scotia, and that the late lamented Judge Johnston was the leader of the Conservative party there. That was perfectly true, and, in 1859, when the elections were run in Nova Scotia, the hon. member for Cumberland happened to hold a position under the leadership of Judge Johnston. It was during the time of the visit of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, when that gentleman showed his loyalty by his refusal, over his own signature, to attend the reception of His Royal Highness, simply because the present Chief Justice had obtained his position of Chief Justice on that occasion. The hon. member for Cumberland was, as he (Mr. Jones) knew, at that time editor of a daily paper, called the British Colonist, in Halifax.

MR. TUPPER: I rise to a question of order. I can only say it is impossible to discuss this question in its present shape. The hon. gentleman has no right to say I was editor of the Halifax Colonist; I never was the avowed editor of that paper; I may have written articles for it in an editorial capacity, but the hon. gentleman has no right to say I was the avowed editor. I never was the responsible editor of any paper in my life, though, like most other public men, I may occasionally have inspired, or perhaps penned, an article that appeared in an editorial way; but the hon. gentleman has no right—and I think you are a sufficient authority on that point—on that ground to charge me with being the editor of a newspaper. The hon. gentleman has rather abused the right of explanation in proceeding to discuss this question which has already been fully dealt with, I think, by myself.

MR. SPEAKER: Any statement as to a fact being correct or incorrect, is not out of order.

MR. JONES: The hon. gentleman has evidently acknowledged the position I was going to place him in, and, as I am desirous, as far as possible, of sparing the feelings of that old gentleman, the learned Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, I will refrain from reading the evidence which I hold in my hand, respecting his early life, as portrayed by the hon. member for Cumberland. That hon. gentleman commenced his public career by abusing public men; the first day he entered public life he took that course—

MR. TUPPER: I call the hon. gentleman to order.

MR. SPEAKER: Unless the House is prepared for a long debate, and a motion is made to justify debate, the matter had better drop.

MR. JONES: I am not going into a discussion, but I merely wish to reply to the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) who says the learned Chief Justice was elevated to his present position for his merits. There is just one speech here—

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. SPEAKER: It is possible that the hon. gentleman may find some other means of publishing it.

MR. MACKENZIE: Allow me for one moment, Sir. The right hon. member for Kingston has spoken three times, evidently with the view of inducing the House or the public to believe that something was wrong in this matter. He has endeavoured to the utmost of his power, by dragging in extracts from newspapers, and otherwise, to bring accusations against the hon. the Minister of Militia, and he has no right now to get his followers to call order, or to stop the hon. gentleman.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I must object to that statement. The hon. the Premier says that I dragged in newspapers in order to make accusations against the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman himself said he appealed to the newspapers published the day after the proceedings referred to, and, in consequence of that appeal, I read an extract from one of them, as he requested.

MR. SPEAKER: As a matter of personal explanation, I would state that the hon. gentleman, of course, by the indulgence of the House, and not otherwise, would have the right to say anything in explanation that is calculated to defend his own conduct or explain it away, but it seemed to me that the hon. gentleman was retaliating a little; and that, I think, was scarcely in order. It is for the House, of course, to take action in the matter.

MR. JONES: I was just alluding to the point raised by the hon. gentleman, and was just going to reply to his statement that the Chief Justice was placed in his position on account of his eminent merits—to give, in two words, an extract from the speech delivered by the hon. member for Cumberland on that occasion.

MR. TUPPER: I rise to a question of order. If the hon. gentleman likes to take the responsibility, it will, of course, be in his power to say anything he chooses; but I would like to ask the hon. the First Minister and the hon. the Minister of Justice, and every hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, whether they would think it fair that the hon. gentleman should go back and bring forward—

MR. JONES: Hear, hear.

MR. TUPPER: Yes; and bring forward statements made in the heat of discussion. I am quite willing that hon. gentlemen should have any advantage they may claim; but I do not think that it is desirable, from the hon. gentleman's standpoint, or any other, that he should bring forward any statements I ever made with reference to Chief Justice Young, in the course of a heated controversy between political parties.

MR. JONES: It was made in the House.

MR. SPEAKER: I think that is probably a matter within the discretion of the hon. member himself. It has occurred to me, since I sat down, that the loyalty of the hon. gentleman has been impugned in this House. In support of that attack, the evidence of Chief Justice Young was quoted on a former occasion and it has been adduced again to-day. The effect of adducing that evidence I regard as a repetition of the attack on the loyalty of the hon. gentleman; and anything he may be able to produce to-day to weaken the value of the evidence of Sir William Young, I think ought to be produced.

Some HON. MEMBERS; Read.

MR. JONES: I have evidence which I am now going to read.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Read it all; go on.

MR. SPEAKER: Order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I rise to order. I believe that the hon. gentleman, before going further with this matter, should put it right by moving an adjournment or making a motion.

MR. JONES: I think, Mr. Speaker, you have accorded me the right of making a reply with reference to the standing of the gentleman who has come here to assail my position. Now, in the House of Assembly, on March 13th, after the learned Chief Justice had taken his position, and after he was in the position, when he should not have been assailed, according to the doctrine of the right hon. member for Kingston, the hon. member for Cumberland concluded a speech in the following words:—

“I do not shrink from avowing that a man who would act as he (Sir William Young) has done, has forfeited all right to public respect and the confidence of the people of Nova Scotia.”

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for the House to resume the adjourned debate on Mr. Cartwright's proposed motion, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply,” read.

MR. MOUSSEAU said that the motion before the Chair was, of course, purely and simply that the Speaker should leave the chair in order that the House might again go into Committee of Supply. This motion, in accordance with the usage in vogue in the Imperial Parliament, had been preceded by an exposition of the financial position of the country from the hon. the Minister of Finance. This statement had been somewhat like all others of the kind delivered by the hon. gentleman. In it were explained and pointed out the policy of the past, the disappointments of the present, and the little hope there was for the future. It was not the general custom that lengthened debates should ensue in regard to these financial statements. They were usually allowed to pass as a matter of course; but, nevertheless, in this instance, such manner of procedure had not been observed, and, in the face of the great difficulties revealed in this Budget speech on the part of the Government of the day regarding its administration of public affairs, each hon.

member found it his duty to inform the House, his electors and the country what he thought of the situation; and hence he, as a humble member of the House, craved the indulgence of the House while he made a few remarks upon the important subject before it. He considered that, in order to obtain a correct view of the situation and of the legislation of the hon. gentlemen opposite, it was important to examine how the affairs of the Dominion had been administered under the Conservative régime; and it was also important to know the exact state of the situation, when, in 1867, the different Provinces of which the Dominion was then composed, joined together and united their great resources. Confederation was brought about when we had a public debt of $93,046,051.73. This was the amount of all the liabilities of the two Canadas and the new Provinces, when the four Provinces entered into the Confederation. Let them see how this debt and these loans had been increased during the six or seven years that the Conservatives held the reins of power, which was from the fiscal year beginning the 1st of July, 1867, to the fiscal year beginning the 1st of July, 1873, or the 1st of July, 1874, if, as some hon. gentlemen had argued, it was necessary to place upon the shoulders of the Conservatives the very heavy expenditure of that year. In 1868, the Conservatives had increased the public debt and extended our liabilities to $96,896,666.20; and the year following, these were increased to $112,361,998.39; in 1870, the public debt was increased to $115,993,706.76; in 1871, these liabilities had been slightly diminished, to the extent of about one million; in 1872, they were increased to $122,400,179.36; and in 1873, the last year when the Conservatives were in power, the statement of our public debt on the 1st of July, showed that it had attained the figure of $130,778,098.53; hence, during the six years that a Conservative Administration occupied the Treasury benches, the public debt was increased to the extent of $37,738,046.80; and, in view of this fact, it would be seen that the annual increase had, during that period, been

$6,289,674.46. This period extended from the 1st of July, 1867, to the 1st of July, 1873. With the permission of the Speaker, he would show the House what had been done during those six years with these thirty-seven millions odd; what had been done for the country; and what had been done to promote its advancement, its wealth, and its prosperity. He would, in the first place, show how this sum of thirty-seven millions had been employed; and, when he had finished that part of his task, he would mention the very considerable increase that had been made to the public debt since the hon. gentlemen opposite who sat on the Treasury benches acceded to office; and also demonstrate how they had employed, or rather squandered, these additional millions. In the first instance, they had the amount which had been paid by the Dominion to the Hudson Bay Company for the North-West Territories—which was three hundred thousand pounds sterling. He need not enlarge upon this point. Everybody knew the importance of the acquisition of these territories, and, even in the Speech from the Throne, the importance of colonizing that immense and valuable region was mentioned. Next came the Intercolonial Railway, the building of which was so essential and so necessary in order to unite, with an iron link, the Maritime Provinces and old Canada. The construction of this important railway was decided upon in the first convention that was held on the subject of Confederation; and upon it had been expended up to the 1st of July, 1873, the amount of $14,520,073.89. He would notice next in order the cause for discontent, which appeared to be legitimate, in the case of Nova Scotia, which led to the increase of its subsidy by $50,000 a year. Later still the Conservative Government decided to remove the troubles and difficulties which existed in connection with Lower and Upper Canada, and assume a debt amounting to ten millions, increasing the public debt of the Dominion by that amount. This policy was extremely beneficial in its results, and it rendered immense satisfaction to the Province of Quebec, which, especially as to its northern section, where a very numerous and very rich population resided, had, from year to year, without hesitation, contributed millions in aid of the Grand Trunk and other railways, and had entered into the Confederation without any railway whatever; but, thanks to the very wise and liberal policy which was pursued by the Conservative Administration, the Province of Quebec had undertaken to complete its railways. Later still, during the period in question, the subsidy of the Province of New Brunswick was increased by $150,000 a year. Everybody remembered this was done apropos of the duty levied on on wood, the abolition of which was rendered necessary under the Washington Treaty negotiated in 1871,—at least during the period that this treaty existed. Later still, our liabilities were increased owing to the subsidy, $208,216 granted to the Province of British Columbia on its admission into Confederation; and, subsequently, a subsidy of $170,000 was granted to Prince Edward Island, when, in 1873, it followed the example of British Columbia. There were also other very considerable expenditures made—such for instance as those rendered necessary by the building of post-offices, the improvement of harbours, and the carrying on of other public works. Now, if they enumerated these amounts, and added them together, they would find that these sums included, up to the 1st July, 1873, the payment of fourteen and a half millions of dollars on the Intercolonial Railway; the assumption of an extra ten millions of debt by the Dominion; an increase of the subsidy of the Province of Nova Scotia, $50,000 a year, representing a capital of at least one million; and of that of New Brunswick by $150,000 a year, representing a capital of three millions; the subsidy of British Columbia and other allowances, in all $208,216, representing a capital of four millions; and the subsidy of Prince Edward Island, $170,000, representing a capital of over three millions, besides considerable expenditures made on various important public improvements—amounting, in all to $37,120,073.89. This was all done by the estimable gentlemen who inspired and guided the policy of the day; by the true statesmen who made the country prosperous, who advanced its power and greatness and who accomplished Confederation; and all these expenditures had been met by the revenue and surpluses—over ten millions in six years. By these gentlemen and in this manner, the public debt had been increased by this sum of thirty-seven millions during all those years when the Conservatives held office; and that was from 1867 to 1873. This debt had been created by the acquisition of the North-West Territories, which had been so extremely advantageous to the Dominion; by the construction of important public works and by the increase of Provincial subsidies—a step that had been wisely taken, and which had established peace and harmony in the Dominion. There was much in all this that reflected the highest honour and credit upon the Conservative party and the distinguished statesmen who directed the destinies of this country from the 1st of July, 1867, to the 1st of July, 1873. And it was also to be borne in mind that the late Government had acquired all this extra territory, made all these increases of subsidy and assumed all those millions of debt for the just relief of Lower Canada—all of which was necessary and advisable—without increasing the taxation of the country; and not only had the Conservatives accomplished all these great deeds without making any addition to the taxation, but also, after they had added thirty-seven millions to the public debt, they had reduced the taxation by about two millions a year. Such was a true statement of the facts; and these were the statesmen, and this the party that had been calumniated during so many years by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and who, in the year 1873, had, by force of such calumny, been driven from power; but what had the hon. gentlemen opposite done since their accession to office? In the year 1873, these great statesmen, whose talents had been so greatly undervalued, and who had for a long time previously been crying out that the Conservatives were running the country into the ground, and ruining it by reason of the taxation they imposed; these great men, whose worth had been so greatly misunderstood, these distinguished statesmen, and these remarkable exponents of the purity of Reform, at last attained office. They had been, for the space of some twenty-five years, in Opposition, and hungering for portfolios. During that period, the country had not seen fit to return them to power; the confidence of the electors was not reposed in them; and, finally, they had recourse to means which he could not mention in parliamentary language; but he might say that these means were such as no honest men would employ; and thus the hon. gentlemen opposite had attained office, to the great misfortune of the country. And what had these great Reformers, these great men, these great statesmen, who had been misunderstood, and these great geniuses who had been deemed incompetent, done from the time when they reached office up to the present time. On the 1st July, 1873, the public debt of the Dominion amounted to $130,778,098.53. The members of the Conservative Government had been somewhat reasonable; they had increased the debt of the country by two, three or four millions a year; but these hon. gentlemen said, "We will do better"; and, consequently, they increased the public debt by ten millions a year. Such was reform. And the very first reform that these hon. gentlemen established was to increase the public debt from $130,778,000 on the 1st of July, 1873, to $141,163,551.33 on the 1st of July, 1874. This was a mere bagatelle, and this was their first act of reform. This was their first startling display of genius. This was the first experience that the country had of their distinguished ability. And this was done in order to show how consistently they had shouted, during twenty-five or thirty years, for economy, and for the reduction of the public debt; in a word, this was a convenient way of showing the difference between white and black in the estimation of these hon. gentlemen. They wished to continue the same policy. On the 1st of July, 1875, they had increased the public debt by about eleven millions, the debt then amounting to $151,663,401.62; and on the 1st of July, 1876, the debt was brought up to the nice little sum of $161,204,687.86; while, during the year ending on the 1st of July, 1877, it amounted to $174,675,834.97. These hon. gentlemen wished to distinguish what was probably their last year—at least he and everybody else in the Dominion hoped so—by increasing the public debt to the extent of thirteen and a quarter millions. Hence, if they compared the state in which the Conservatives left the finances of the country with that in which they were found to-day, they would arrive at this result:—On the 1st of July, 1873, the debt of the Dominion amounted to $130,778,098.53, while on the 1st of July, 1877, it had reached the very large figure of $174,675,834.97. This was a very nice little amount; but it represented a small sum of $43,897,736.44, or nearly forty-four millions, in the space of four years, against the thirty-seven millions by which the Conservatives had increased the public debt during the seven years they held the reins of power. Thus, it was evident that the administration of affairs had been so excellent that these gentlemen should have a new lease of power; and that the electors ought to return them to office. The Conservatives had added to the public debt at the rate of a little over six millions a year, while the hon. gentlemen opposite had increased it to the tune of $10,974,434.11 a year. These figures were indisputable. They were taken from the Public Accounts themselves—accounts which were signed and laid before the House by those hon. gentlemen. The Government and its friends, crushed under the array of these figures, had endeavoured to alter the situation and change the position, by making two objections to this exposition of the real state of affairs. The first, he found in the speech of the hon. the Minister of Finance and he would read it to the House before he discussed it. The hon. gentleman said:

"It will be observed therefore, that on our gross revenue for the years 1877-8, if it does not exceed the estimated amount, our receipts per capita would amount as nearly as possible to $5.79 per head as against

$5.86; in 1872-3, allowing for the nominal addition on account of the Post-Office; while the sum actually paid in taxation will amount, if we receive all we expect to get, to $4.79 per head as against $4.90 actually paid into the Treasury in 1872-3."

All these theories and these speculations per head were simply absurd; they could not stand a serious examination. This simply and purely proved that, at a certain time in the history of this country, the population was less numerous, and that the taxation in accordance with the number of the population was more or less per head. It was not by any means at all worthy of serious investigation. In the first place, these figures were to be verified; and in the second place, when such a result was arrived at, and it was seen that the figures were $2, $3, or $4 per head with regard to taxation, the brutal truth no less remained that the present Government had, in the space of four years, increased the public debt by 44 millions while the late Government and the Conservatives had increased it in six years by the amount of only 37 millions. Not only was this the case, but, in addition, this remarkable circumstance was to be borne in mind—they had before them this brutal fact: that, while the Conservative Administration had increased the public debt by thirty-seven millions and paid interest on it, it had done so without adding a cent to the taxation of the people, while the present Government had increased the public debt by no less a sum than forty-four millions—of which, anon, he would speak further—and had been obliged to add seriously to the taxation of the country and to declare a deficit nearly every year. This history reminded him of a story told of the treasurer of a poor municipality, situated at no great distance from here. This secretary-treasurer entertained very extensive and liberal views; he entered into many improvements and, consequently, plunged the municipality into debt. One day one of the electors of the municipality came to him, and said, "Sir, our expenses are very extraordinary," mentioning that they were £100 or £200 or some such amount. "Ah, well," was the reply, "it is very different, very different at present from what it formerly was; you see, you now pay so much taxes per head, while formerly you paid a large lump sum." "Well," was the answer, "that may be perhaps according to the population; but I would much rather pay one pound in taxes when I had the means to pay it with than fifty cents when I am ruined." Such, no doubt, would be the reply of the electors of the Dominion to the hon. the Minister of Finance. The second objection that was made to the figures in question, or rather the second excuse which these hon. gentlemen gave for that terrible increase in the public obligations, was that the considerable increase which was made in 1873-4, was due to the legislation made, and the expenditure voted by the Conservative party during the Session which was held in 1873. To this pretension, several replies were to be made; the first was to exhibit a comparison, which was a very sad one for the hon. gentlemen opposite. They began by stating that, "in 1873-4, we spent a great deal of money, it is true, but it is all your fault; you voted these expenditures, and you occasioned them by your legislation in the spring of 1873, your last Session." Then the matter assumed a very doleful aspect for the hon. gentlemen opposite. It was necessary to tell these hon. gentlemen who put forward such a statement, that during twenty years they had acted the part of hypocrites; for, notwithstanding their record to the contrary in the past in this respect, they now said that these expenditures were proper and legitimate, and their first act on attaining power was to endorse and continue them, and not to reduce the public expenditure, which, in Opposition, they had strongly condemned, by so much as a single sou. Was this common sense? The conduct of these gentlemen was the strongest possible denegation of their past record that had ever been exhibited by any party or body of men. What? During a period extending over twenty years, in this country, and, above all, in the Province of Quebec, they had loudly proclaimed that the Conservative party was spending too much, imposing too heavy an amount of taxation on the population, corrupting the administration of affairs, increasing inordinately the public expenses, creating a great number of useless offices to which enormous salaries were attached without being governed in these respects by the dictates of common sense, and forcing, by their administration, the emigration of our population; and yet, when these very hon. gentlemen attained to power, their very first act gave the lie to all these their pretensions; they endorsed the acts of the late Government which they had condemned, and abated not the expenditure by one jot, but, on the contrary, largely increased it. Such was the humiliating spectacle presented by the hon. gentlemen opposite; for nothing was more humiliating and disgraceful for a political party than was the making of such an avowal and such an admission. He would go further and he would say: suppose, for the sake of argument, that the Conservatives retained office until the 1st July, 1874, though, of course, this was not the case; and that, as a consequence, they were responsible for all the expenditures in question, all those extraordinary expenditures which appeared in the exhibit for 1873-4. How did the case then stand? In lieu of adding thirty-seven millions of dollars to the public debt, they would then have increased it to the extent of $48,117,499.60 during seven years of power. Assuming this to be the case, the Conservatives, in the course of seven years, would have added to the country's liabilities at the rate of $6,873,928.51 per annum, while the honourable gentlemen opposite, during only three years of power under such supposition, would, as would be seen on examination, occupy a much worse position; that of the Conservatives, in contrast, being infinitely better. It would be observed that, in accordance with this statement, the hon. gentleman opposite would have added the sum of $33,512,283.64 to the public debt, during the space of only three years, representing an increase, during this brief régime; by the nice little sum of $11,170,761.21 per annum, contrasted with $6,873,928.51 per annum, during the Conservative Administration. This exhibit evidently gave to the Liberals an indisputable superiority over the Conservatives. Hence, whatever the standpoint was from which they viewed the situation, they arrived at results which were terrible and inevitable; and these were, that these hon. gentleman had increased the public debt and our obligations, during the three or four years that they had been in office, by ten or eleven millions a year—ten millions if they made the tenure of office of these hon. gentlemen begin on the 1st of July, 1873, or eleven millions if they made it begin on the 1st of July, 1874. This was a very important difference; and it contradicted in the most signal manner, and inflicted a cruel blow upon the past record of the Liberals while in Opposition. These hon. gentlemen had increased the taxes and expenditure; they had not lessened the expenditure made in 1873; and their followers never uttered a word of protest. They did nothing save, during the past two years, further to add to the expenditure. It now remained to be seen what these purists, these great Reformers, and these illustrious elevators of the standard of public morality, had done with these thirty-three or forty-four millions of dollars. They had paid out money in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, on which, up to the 1st of July, 1877, twenty-two millions addition had been expended, while the last exhibit, made in 1873, showed that the Conservatives had spent fourteen and a-half millions on this railway; or, if the Conservatives were made responsible for the expenditure up to the 1st of July, 1874, seventeen millions and three-fourths; hence the Liberals had expended on this railway eight millions or four and a-half millions, according to the mode of calculation employed. They had also expended money on the canals, a few millions, and the balance they had expended on a multitude of objects, first among which came the steel rails. When members for constituencies in the Lower Provinces showed signs of being somewhat recalcitrant, the hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to send down a few iron rails, and these were replaced by steel. It had been proved that these hon. gentlemen had in this regard used the credit of the Dominion to the extent of at least a million, while many imagined that this was the case to the amount of no less than one and a-half millions. Again, a few thousand dollars had been squandered on the Goderich Harbour; $109,000 had been paid out apropos of the extension of the Canada Central and the Georgian Bay Branch; and many persons—who, no doubt, were inspired by evil motives, and who had no love for these hon. gentlemen—pretended that in this manner had been settled a debt, by the contracting of which the Liberals had acceded to power in 1873. Further enormous sums had been squandered on the St. Frances Locks; and this waste had not only been enormous, but it had also been illegal and unconstitutional, as had been victoriously established last Session. Still more: there was a certain little hotel, the Oliver Hotel at Kaministiquia, in the purchase of which and of the Kaministiquia lots, the public money had been squandered, and for which the electors of this country had been made to pay very dearly. There was another very considerable item of expenditure which related to the Supreme Court. He well remembered that, when his friends were in office, the Liberals, in the press, in their newspapers, and even on the floor of the House, to his knowledge, had been accustomed to call the Conservative majority which supported Sir George Etienne Cartier and Sir John A. Macdonald a servile and sheepish (moutonnaire) majority. This was all very well; but, since the Conservatives were in Opposition, the Liberals had, over and over again, proved that this term, in which there was so little delicacy and which was so unparliamentary, humiliated and applied to them far more than it did to the supporters of the late Administration. This he said by way of preface to show that they had never given way to the opinions of their leaders as much as the hon. gentlemen opposite. The Supreme Court, which was of no utility at all to the country, had cost us last year no less than $51,485.10 in salaries, while the following items appeared in the Public Accounts for 1877, part 2, page 248,—

ing library, fitting up Supreme Court, and facing basement walls of Western Block, $61,801.25." There was no means of knowing whether the whole of this amount was devoted to arrangements connected with the Supreme Court or not. It was for the Government to explain the matter. If so, this Court had cost the country over $113,000 for one year only. This was not all. This Court would entail on the country a still heavier expenditure. Now, and for some time past, it had been stuck in a little hole, unworthy of the first tribunal in the country. He remembered when a question was put to the Government whether it intended to build a Court-house, and the reply had been in the affirmative. Later on, it would be necessary to build a Court-house for the Supreme Court, and also for the Exchequer Court, which sat in all the important cities of the Dominion. Hence, they would yet have to consider this matter, which would necessitate a very considerable addition to the expenditure. He would only say this: his intimate conviction was that this was the greatest waste of public money that any Government had ever rendered itself guilty of. This $51,000 odd, which had been paid out in salaries, besides the sums that had been expended for repairs to the Court—and, by the way, the old library had been turned into a Court-house for this purpose—might as well have been cast into the sea; it had been shamefully squandered. While dwelling on this part of his speech, he wished to be well understood; he was of opinion, and he had always been of opinion, as a public man, that respect was due to our Courts whose prestige was, in some degree, the safeguard of our free institutions; consequently, what he said, he desired to be well understood; he had no personal feeling against the Judges of the Supreme Court; he believed that all these gentlemen were eminent Judges, capable of honourably and creditably filling the positions they occupied; but he did maintain that this was a perfectly useless institution, and one that was exclusively created in order to create patronage, and with hostile intentions which, later on, he would mention. As he had said at the time, he now repeated that the article in our Constitution which provided for the establishment of the Supreme Court was inimical to their interests, and those who had brought about Confederation had, in some measure, taken steps which would have rendered this provision useless for fifty and, perhaps, a hundred years hence. There was no raison d'être for this institution. In the United States, the laws of the Federal power were interpreted and executed by Judges who were delegated and named to do so by a body which was independent of the central Legislature; and then there were Judges who were appointed either by the Governments or Legislatures, or the people of the several States. Under such circumstances, it was to be easily understood why the central power should, in order to provide for the wise administration of proper laws, find it necessary to place their execution in the hands of the Judges of a Supreme Court; but in this country, what need had we of such an institution? All our Judges were created by this same law,—by this same Federal Act of 1867—they were all thus created Federal Judges, and Federal officers. This had been the case since the 1st of June, 1867. These Judges were all appointed by the Federal Government, and their authority was based on Dominion laws. Matters were in such a state here that the central power should not have done, in this regard, what had been done in the United States, where a Supreme Court had been established under the circumstances to which he had referred, and, in view of the state in which our finances were, he maintained that the Supreme Court here was perfectly useless, and that all the money which had been expended, upon it, had been utterly squandered. Still more: it had been sometimes said that the Conservatives would have done the same thing, and that the establishment of the Court was due to the Conservatives. He was proud to stand there and contrast the conduct of the Conservative members with that of the Liberal members, in this regard, before 1875, and before the hon. gentlemen acceded to power. Twice, in fact, previous to that period, it was proposed to introduce a Bill to provide for the establishment of the Supreme Court; but, on each occasion, the Conservatives, in conjunction with the Liberals from Lower Canada, had exerted such a strong pressure on the Government that its introduction was prevented; but, as soon as the Liberals reached office, what was seen? What had then been done by the servile and sheep-like majority that supported hon. gentlemen opposite? After having inveighed against the establishment of the Supreme Court; after having strongly censured the Conservatives at the general elections of 1871 and 1872, as well as on every other possible occasion; after having condemned the Conservatives because the Supreme Court clause had been inserted in the Confederation Act; after having taken this course, they attained power in 1873, and in 1875 they became in their turn a really servile and sheep-like majority; and, bowing themselves before their leaders, exclaimed, "Strike, if you please, we are prepared to receive your blows." After having, in such a manner, repudiated this Bill, and after having condemned the establishment of this Court, they consented to its establishment, and everybody found that it was an admirable institution, and they voted for it. He would not enter into what these hon. gentlemen had said, nor would he impute interested motives to them in this regard. Everybody knew that these hon. gentlemen had created this Court for the best of objects, and in order to perfect the administration of the laws of this country. Everybody knew that they were perfectly disinterested. Everybody knew that nothing would insult these hon. gentlemen so much as to say that they had adopted this course in order to become Judges. Nothing would insult them so much as to say that they had done so in order to place themselves on the Bench. Nothing, above all, would insult them so much as to say that they had appointed themselves collectors of Customs, to postmasterships, or to any other positions of emolument. Of course, nothing of the sort was true. These hon. gentlemen had only one thought, and that was to sacrifice themselves on the altar of their country; although they had established the Supreme Court and named a crowd of other Judges. He would not shock the hon. member for Quebec Centre—the late member for Arthabaska—by hinting that these hon. gentlemen had been at all actuated by unworthy motives. They had never done these things. It was a principle advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite that such things should not be done. Besides, he had made no such charges in what he had said. He had merely presented the state of the finances. He had reminded the House of the terrible position in which these hon. gentlemen stood; they confessed that they were incapable of facing the difficulties of the situation. In order to complete his task, he did not require to say much. He had only to repeat what the hon. the Minister of Finance said. The hon. gentleman had declared, while announcing his third or fourth deficit, that he was unable to cope with the difficulties of his position. In reply, the hon. members of the Opposition sought to show the means by which this could be done, and they had invited the hon. gentleman to take that course. He would now allude to the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald), who had been a great Protectionist, but who now no longer voted for Protection. This hon. gentleman, while speaking of the causes of the crisis, had mentioned one cause which he (Mr. Mousseau) had had the honour of twice pointing out during the course of the two last Sessions. This related to the excess of our importations, and the frightful extent in which the figures of our imports exceeded our exports. The hon. gentleman had told them, with charming simplicity and with superb naïveté, that the Government was not the least in the world to blame with relation to these excessive importations; that the Government had not done this; and that the real fools were those who had gulled themselves in this respect, and these were the importers. According to the views of this very excellent man, they were there for nothing at all; there was no way, whatever, by which they could legislate for the good of the country; and they were to leave things to right themselves after their own fashion. They were to remain in a corner of the country; they were not to bring any pressure to bear on the Government; and, whatever happened, they were to fold their arms, and say to the sufferers, "You are in the wrong; you do not know how to carry on trade; you do not understand your own business; do what you please." But no, they were there to prevent abuses and rectify wrongs. He had rarely seen the incapacity or incompetence of the Government so openly confessed as had been the case on the part of this hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald), a supporter of the Administration. He would now have the pleasure, or rather the sad pleasure of performing his duty by placing before the House the difference and contrast between the financial administration of the two parties. On the one side, he placed all the Conservative party had done for the country, in extending its territories, and in advancing its greatness, its prosperity and its wealth; and on the other side, he placed the truths which had been extracted from the Public Accounts and the costliness of the present Administration. These hon. gentlemen had increased the charges of administration and the public debt, far more rapidly, in proportion, than had been the case under the Conservative régime, as he had conclusively established. He had also equally shown that they did not hear of this money being at all well employed except on the canals and the Intercolonial Railway, and that the greater part of the balance had been squandered. He would ask how was it that, in so few years, and in so short a period, a party, which appeared to have some vitality and such excellent principles and such opportunities, had fallen so low. In England, politics were conducted in a serious manner. There, they followed the teachings of political economy, rather than the mere dictates of party. In England, the two great parties possessed ideas, and a certain array of principles, from which they did not swerve. In England, those who held the reins of power, acted in a generous and liberal manner, and sought to effect, for the benefit of the people, the greatest amount of good that was possible. There they endeavoured to discover whether any new doctrines of political economy, or any new principles, or any new measures were applicable to the situation in which they found themselves, and would give satisfaction to the people; and there those who sat on the Treasury benches did not seek to place themselves on the Bench, in collectorships of Customs, or postmasterships; nor did they seek to attain power in order to contradict their past record, but with the view of carrying into practice the principles and ideas which, while in Opposition, they had professed. There they sought to do their duty. In his naïveté, he had imagined that the hon. gentlemen opposite would follow out such a course. In his naïveté, he had believed that the Liberals from the Province of Quebec possessed sterling principles and sterling men, and that, once they attained power, these men would earnestly devote themselves to the task of warmly promoting the prosperity and good fortune of the country. He had had a great fund of simplicity, and he had believed all this. But, at length, these hon. gentlemen acceded to office. They had seen these hon. gentlemen in power. They had witnessed their advent to power with a very large majority at their backs—such a majority as no party had previously had in this House. They saw this majority, and they had expected that sincere men, devoted men, earnest public men, and statesmen, with such a majority and such a party, would fulfil its programme, and carry out the promises which they had made to the country, and the policy which they had so loudly and for so long proclaimed. But what happened? These hon. gentlemen took their seats on the Treasury benches. They numbered in their ranks able and distinguished men. He did not say they came to office, but rather that they were coming to it every year. A great going-down-hill (degringolade) began at once to manifest itself. What had the leader of the Lower Canadian Liberals done towards the end of their first year of office? He went on the Bench; and at the expiration of a few months more, after the Supreme Court Bill had been passed, another member of the Government, the second Lower Canadian leader, became one of the Judges of the Supreme Court. That gentleman, who was successor of Mr. Dorion, appointed himself a Judge of the Supreme Court. Mr. Dorion made himself Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench on 1st June, 1874, and Mr. Fournier appointed himself Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court on 1st September, 1875. Since the accession of these hon. gentlemen to office, they had done nothing. They had not attempted to grapple with the pressing difficulties of the situation. The history of the United States or of England or of France showed that, in great commercial crises there, the statesmen had recourse to measures proportionate to the importance of the events to which they owed their birth. In France, they saw an instance of this truth. When that country was, to a certain extent, invaded by foreign productions, the French people passed laws of a Draconian nature, and protected their commercial and industrial interests. And they saw the same thing done in the United States. We were, at present, in the midst of a serious and terrible crisis, which was worthy of study, the causes of which were well known and for which it was easy to find remedy. He did not see that this position was at all absurd. Events were not so much at fault as the men; and it was conceded that we had not true statesmen, or men endowed with foresight and wisdom at present at the head of our affairs, and this was a matter which would be decided at the approaching elections. The hon. members of the Opposition appealed to the electors for their verdict. It was known through works and writings and speeches and serious studies, in two Parliaments at least, that one of the causes of the existing crisis was excessive importations; these had reached an excessive figure, and, to a certain degree, the country was exhausted and over-indebted everywhere, not only with respect to the Federal and Provincial Governments, but also with reference to municipalities; the state of indebtedness was frightful; and, in face of all this, an urgent remedy was required. The hon. gentlemen opposite should do as they were advised, and endeavour to put an end to the constant drain made at the present time on the part of England and the United States upon our resources. They should seek to keep our money here—in lieu of having it sent abroad—in our own country, among our own population, and among our workmen. History taught that this was the right policy to pursue. The example set us by other nations also taught it, and it could, at least, be tried; but the hon. gentlemen opposite would not even do this; they contented themselves by saying—“We are in power, and it is necessary to leave things alone.” They never said anything else. Not one of the hon. gentlemen who formerly had loudly proclaimed what they would do when they came into power rose in the House to announce to the country that they would carry into effect all the measures which they had formerly advocated, or one of the economies that they had formerly recommended; nor did they seek to induce the adoption of such a course. On the contrary, when the hon. members of the Opposition reminded those hon. gentlemen of the doctrines which they had formerly preached and so ardently admired and professed, these hon. gentlemen replied in adverse speeches, in which were enunciated opinions diametrically opposite to those they had formerly advocated, and even met those advances with hostile votes. Later in our history, when the people came to judge these matters and review the past record of this Administration—above all of that which related to these last four years—they would form a very poor opinion of our public men, and especially of those who, since 1873, had administered our affairs. Yes, this examination would yet be made; and, he would ask, how would it result? On the one side would be seen those two remarkable statesmen, Sir George E. Cartier and Sir John A. Macdonald, who had performed great and eventful deeds; who had given their lives to the country's service; who had founded and laboured in the interests of the Dominion; who had consecrated all their talents and all their abilities to the endowment of this country with her present free and magnificent institutions, and who, above all, had attended to her future requirements in the acquisition of the great North-West. It would be observed that these two statesmen had been for long years in power; that their actions had been visible to the people; and they had not taken advantage of their positions to appoint themselves to lucrative offices. And later, when history was read, it would be seen that the Conservative party had been faithful to these distinguished men, giving them every possible support, in order to carry into execution their magnificent projects, and their really magnificent schemes. It would be recognized that these men had, during many years, devoted themselves to politics; and their sole interest, and only object, was to promote the greatness of this country; that they were always animated by the purest patriotism; and that one of them died a poor man, but rich in glorious souvenirs. And what would history say with regard to the Conservative party? This:—that during twenty-five or thirty years, and, above all, during the few last years of its retention of office, it had always sought the amelioration of the condition of the people, and always worked in the interests of the country, and with the object of founding here a magnificent, a great, a rich, a prosperous, a contented, and a happy country. But, on the other side, what did they see? They saw a body of men—he did not know whether he could call them a party, so greatly were they disorganized—and a party of men, who not only dared to work counter to the policy of those great statesmen, but also to calumniate and villify them. Later, these men attained office, and these men, after having reproached their predecessors with many great faults, many great crimes, and many great errors, had certainly done exactly the contrary of what their professions signified, though the hon. members of the Opposition lost no occasion to remind them of these facts, and to recall to their memory their past promises and their past record. Those who read history would see more; they would see a young member of that party, and now a young Minister, seek to represent the Conservative party and Sir George Cartier as a great party, and a great man. They would see that hon. gentleman represent—in one of his speeches delivered in this House, in the Session of 1874, in reply, he (Mr. Mousseau) thought to the speech from the Throne, —Sir George Cartier as certainly being an eminent statesman, as a statesman of high aspiration, and as a man who was always master of the situation. And more than this, they would see this young Minister not only do these things, but also endeavour to induce the English electors of Lower Canada, among whom Sir George E. Cartier was popular, to believe that they would continue the late statesman's policy; and they would further see that hon. gentleman after having done all this, throw mud in the face of that great statesman, and seek to throw discredit upon his past by saying that Sir George Cartier ran away at the battle of St. Denis.

MR. LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to interrupt the hon. member. I never said that Sir George Cartier ran away at the battle of St. Denis; but I affirmed, as a matter of fact, which has never been denied, that he was not at all at the battle of St. Denis.

MR. BABY: If my memory serves me rightly, the hon. gentleman said that history revealed the fact that Sir George Cartier did run away.

MR. LAURIER: No, no.

MR. TASCHEREAU: I was present at the time, and what was said was simply this: that, as a matter of history, Sir George Cartier was not present at the battle of St. Denis, but left the field on the morning of the day when the action took place.

AN HON. MEMBER: That is not the case.

MR. SPEAKER: I must call hon. gentlemen to order. The hon. member, as I understand it, made an allusion to something that was supposed to have been said by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had a right to rise and make an explanation as to what he said or as to any misapprehension of what he said if the hon. member chose to permit it, but no other member has a right to interpose.

MR. MOUSSEAU said he permitted the interruption with pleasure. The explanations of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue were something like other explanations that had been made from the Ministerial benches during the present Session. The hon. member said he had stated such and such things, and, in accordance with parliamentary rules, he accepted the denial; but the hon. gentleman went further. He (Mr. Laurier) said that all he stated was that Sir George Cartier had left the field in the morning. He was surprised that such a calumnious charge should have been made, and he regretted to say that the hon. gentleman offended in this respect. The late Sir George Cartier was present at the battle in question. With regard to the events of 1837-8, his opinion was well formed; and it had long been placed on paper. He had only to say that the hon. gentleman was continuing the same system of blackening characters and of contradiction which hon. gentlemen opposite had always adopted towards their opponents. When it was necessary to flatter in order to obtain votes, Sir George Cartier was praised; and it had even been announced that the late statesman's work would be continued by these hon. gentlemen; but, when this was no longer thought requisite, these hon. gentlemen sought to tarnish the glories that history shed over Sir George Cartier's name. The hon. gentleman did this in the most complete manner. Sir George Cartier was present at the battle; and had only left it after five hours' participation in the conflict—in the course of the afternoon—and had afterwards again taken part in the fight. If the hon. gentleman wished to have convincing proof concerning this historical fact he had it to offer; and, in order to satisfy the hon. gentleman, he would read it. It was monstrous that these hon. gentlemen should insist on calumniating in connection with the events of 1838, so illustrious a man as the late Sir George Cartier, who had been the object of their unworthy calumniations during the course of thirty or forty years while in public life; but history did the late statesman justice. Dr. Wolfred Nelson wrote a letter with reference to the aspersions cast in this relation upon Sir George Cartier, and this he would read to the House. It was as follows:—

“In view of the fact that I am called upon to give my testimony regarding certain events that took place at St. Denis in 1837, I will do so, in the interests of virtue and of justice. I owe this to my friends and the country in general. I affirm, upon my honour, that several days before the descent of the troops by the Chambly River, Mr. Papineau arrived at St. Denis and took refuge in my house; that was towards six o'clock in the morning of the 23rd of November, 1837. I went into the room which Mr. Papineau occupied, to inform him I had just learned the troops were in the upper part of the Parish of St. Ours marching towards St. Denis, and that I was on the point of leaving the house in order to discover their position; and I did not return home until the evening, after the battle, which lasted until toward half-past four o'clock. I did not again see Mr. Papineau until towards the end of November, 1838, at Albany. The statement is wholly false that I told or ordered Mr. Papineau to go away at the beginning of the battle, which opened about nine o'clock in the morning; and it is equally false that Mr. Papineau seized a gun to go and fight at six o'clock, when the enemy did not arrive on the ground until nine o'clock. We were ignorant of Mr. Papineau's place of refuge. Between nine and ten o'clock Mr. Papineau sent a message to me, asking whether he ought to leave the spot. I replied that he should not do so, and that, whilst I remained on my feet there, he was in no danger, but that in case I fell, he should come and take care of our friends. It is also equally false that I was named or elected general on this occasion. On the contrary, I was the aide-de-camp, the sub-altern of Mr. Papineau, and not his superior; and unreservedly obeyed his orders and suggestions. It is true that Mr. Henri Cartier remarked that it would be well to retreat in view of the heavy losses caused by the enemy's fire, the lack of munitions, and the consequent flight of a number of persons. I was strongly opposed to this step, but, nevertheless, Mr. Henri Cartier rendered us vigorous assistance during the day. Mr. Georges Cartier never made any allusion to retreat, and he, as well as his cousin, Mr. H. Cartier, valiantly and ably contributed to the success which attended the combat; and these gentlemen only left me when I myself was obliged to leave the place, nine days after this date, in connection with the second expedition of troops against St. Denis when resistance had become impossible. I sent Mr. Georges Cartier towards two o'clock in the afternoon [and not in the morning, as the hon. the Minister of the Interior stated] to seek ammunition at St. Antoine, and he promptly returned with success after being absent for about an hour. Mr. Georges Cartier did not wear a blue cap on the day of the battle. If I saw Henri Lapparre during this day, it was at the beginning of it—I do not remember having seen him afterwards. Whether he concealed himself in a chimney in his fright, as he himself admitted, and then escaped through a window with others, or not, I do not know. But, in any case, if he acted courageously and bravely during the battle, it seems to me that I could not but have remarked it, in the same way as I observed the striking deeds of so many others.

“Montreal, 21st August, 1848.”

Here was the truth with regard to the historic fact in question. It was thus reported in the newspapers of that day; and it furnished the complete refutation of the shameful charge that had been made against that late distinguished statesman. He hoped that the hon. the Minister of the Interior would at least withdraw part of his statement. But, furthermore, this was always what happened in the case of men who wished to carry on politics like the hon. members on the other side of the House—men who believed that politics only existed for their own well-being, for the benefit of themselves and of public men, and not for the well-being of the people. One could readily understand, above all, after the crisis came in 1875, that a new system of political economy was advanced and developed on the floor of the House by the hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. members of the Opposition had then hastened to tender their support, which was quite considerable, to these hon. gentlemen touching the adoption of a policy suitable to the necessities of the country. They had made the offer; and replaced on the tapis the questions which were common to their friends while in power, and they had in a certain measure proffered the olive branch to those hon. gentlemen with the object of producing and restoring peace and prosperity and good fortune to the country at large; but these hon. gentlemen had refused it, because they feared that by accepting they would lose popularity and create discontent in the Province of Ontario. Then there happened what occurred to all public men in such circumstances. He understood the position of these hon. gentlemen. They made the profession of politics the means of benefiting their friends and of bestowing places upon themselves instead of using it for the public good; and he hoped that, in view of these facts, the hon. gentlemen opposite would receive their reward at the approaching elections in utter discomfiture. One day when Napoleon III. occupied an embarrassed position, and discontent was being manifested, and when it was necessary that something should be done in order to calm and satisfy the popular excitement, one of his familiar friends said to him:—"Sire, do something great—Faites Grand, Sire." That was to say, accomplish great deeds, and striking feats of arms; your popularity will be restored, and your return will be easy. He believed that when the hon. gentlemen opposite came into power their friends did not say to them, "Do great things," but "Do little things" (Faites peu) and, in truth, they had done little things. In fact, their whole policy had been remarkably petty. These hon. gentlemen had shown no elevation of soul, and no breadth of ideas; they had not understood the important duties imposed upon them by a great commercial crisis, the disastrous effects of which they could certainly have lightened, though he frankly admitted that they could not have brought about its entire disappearance. These hon. gentlemen might have lightened the consequences of this crisis; but they had only the courage to avow their incapacity. They could create Judges and appoint Collectors of Customs and Postmasters and Inspectors of Weights and Measures; they were quite equal to the performance of things like these, but they had not attained office to promote in any way the well-being and the prosperity of the country. However, they would shortly appear before the electors after five years' tenure of office; and he was sure, that, when the country knew, as the House now knew, the utter incapacity shown by these hon. gentlemen in dealing with public affairs, and understood their utter want of patriotism, they would treat these hon. gentlemen in such a manner at the polls that they never would return to office.

MR. LAURIER said that, before the question was put, he had one observation to make. One or two insinuations had fallen from the hon. gentleman, to which he wished to reply. The hon. gentleman had said that, on a former occasion, he (Mr. Laurier) had eulogized Sir George Cartier, not because he admired Sir George Cartier's character, or the position he took, but because he desired to court the favour of the English-speaking and Protestant population among whom Sir George Cartier had been popular. It seemed that it was impossible for the nature of the hon. gentleman to suppose that a man could ever be prompted by a noble sentiment. It was impossible for the hon. gentleman to imagine that, when he referred to his former leader, he (Mr. Laurier) was actuated by a noble motive; but, on the contrary, the hon. gentleman must presume that he was inspired by vile and mean motives. He had no objection to the hon. gentleman, or any other man, in or out of the House, measuring himself by his own standard. He did not object to any man in the House attributing to him (Mr. Laurier) the same motives whereby he might himself be guided. He (Mr. Laurier) would not stoop to deny this charge. He considered that it would be beneath him to do so. And, satisfied as he was, that no man in the House, whose soul was somewhat elevated, would believe that, in doing what he had done, he had been inspired by sordid motives; and satisfied as he was, on the other hand, that any man in the House whose soul was debased would still persist in the charge, notwithstanding his denial—when he had spoken of Sir George Cartier as he did, he had expressed his honest mind, and stated what he then thought; and he more than ever now considered that Sir George Cartier had not left a follower in his party. There were men who pretended, at this moment, to be followers of Sir George Cartier; but certainly—and, as he had said elsewhere, he would there repeat—the sentiments which inspired Sir George Cartier, in his lifetime, were not those which actuated his followers at the present moment.

MR. MASSON: Prove it.

MR. LAURIER said he would, in this relation, instance the language that had just been used by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), and, if this were endorsed by the hon. gentlemen opposite, that term applied, not only to the hon. gentleman himself, but also to all those who shared the same views. He (Mr. Laurier) had frequently spoken of Sir George Cartier. It had been his duty, on several occasions, to speak out what was in his mind with respect to the former leader of the Conservative party; but, whenever he did so, he had always expressed the deep admiration he had for his manliness, and for his character. But it seemed that the hon. gentleman could not believe that in this he was sincere. The hon. gentleman said, forsooth, that, in order to make political capital for himself and the party to which he belonged, among the Protestant and English-speaking population of Lower Canada, among whom Sir George Cartier was popular, he had done so. This was the charge that was now brought against him and the Liberal party; but, as he had previously stated, he would not stoop to refute that accusation. He would not say what were his motives when he thus spoke, because he was satisfied that there was not one gentleman who would not be convinced that he had there expressed his honest opinions. With regard to the charge brought against him, that he had slandered Sir George Cartier, by stating that he (Sir George Cartier) was not present at the battle of St. Denis, he had merely stated what had been said over and over again. He had never insinuated that Sir George Cartier had left the battle-field on account of cowardice. He believed that no man had ever made such an insinuation, for Sir George Cartier was undoubtedly a brave man. He had, however, stated what he believed to be a positive fact, and what had been told him by a friend of his who was present at the battle; and his statement was that, in point of fact, Sir George Cartier was not present at the battle. It mattered little at the present moment whether this was the case or not, with reference to the memory of the deceased statesman, because the latter was known to be in sympathy with those who fought there; and he was quite sure that, if Sir George Cartier had been present at the battle, he would have done his duty to his country, as others had done on the day in question. He had merely affirmed what was stated to him as a matter of fact, and he still believed it to be such, notwithstanding the so-called proof which the hon. gentleman had adduced to the contrary. He knew that Sir George Cartier was present on the battle-field some time during the day; but a particular friend of his, who was also one of those who fought at that battle, said that Sir George Cartier was not present at the fight. This was what he had ventured to say. He would certainly be the last man to accuse Sir George Cartier of cowardice on that or any other occasion. He did not propose, at that moment, to take up the figures which had been mentioned by the hon. gentleman, as he had had no time to verify or compare them; but the hon. gentleman had made remarks with reference to the Supreme Court which merited notice. The hon. gentleman had chosen to attack the Supreme Court, and had said there was no necessity for its establishment. As to this, he could certainly not do better than refer the hon. gentleman to the opinions expressed by the very man of whom a few moments since he (Mr. Mousseau) had been making such a eulogism. If Sir George Cartier was now on the floor of the House, would he have endorsed the hon. gentleman's language in this connection, and say that there was no necessity for the Supreme Court? The hon. gentleman had first affirmed that Sir George Cartier was a brave and courageous man. He (Mr. Laurier) knew that this was indeed the case; but, for once in his life, if they were to believe the statement of the hon. member for Bagot, Sir George Cartier had exhibited cowardice, and not only once but twice. He (Sir George Cartier) was a coward, if, in 1869 and again in 1870, he had proposed to introduce the Supreme Court Bill, and was silenced by the opposition of his French Canadian supporters. This was the first news he (Mr. Laurier) had that Sir George Cartier was ever guilty of cowardice. His impression had rather been that Sir George Cartier had dictated to his supporters, and that the latter had never dared to remonstrate with him.

MR. MASSON: You know better.

MR. LAURIER said he did not know better, though, perhaps, the hon. gentleman knew better. He believed that the hon. gentleman had voted once or twice against the party which was led by Sir George Cartier; but, if so, how many Conservatives had the courage to do the same thing? How many members of the Conservative party from the Province of Quebec had had the courage to act in opposition to the will of the deceased statesman? It was well known that Sir George Cartier was a despot with regard to his party.

MR. MASSON: No.

MR. LAURIER: It was well known that Sir George Cartier had always dictated to his followers, and that he had always said in Lower Canada that he would carry measures in spite of the opposition of his friends or of the Judges, or of reason, if it were necessary. Did the hon. gentleman not remember the Judicial Act of 1857, when the members of the Bar of Montreal, including the supporters of Sir George Cartier, went to him and opposed the Act, and that the answer of Sir George Cartier was that he would have the Act passed in spite of the representations of all the Judges and all the lawyers of the land; and it now appeared that in 1869 and in 1870 the Supreme Court Bill had not been passed in consequence of representations made by the followers of Sir George Cartier. These gentlemen who made those representations to Sir George Etienne Cartier must have whispered them; must have gone to him very quietly, in a very docile manner. For it was not to his knowledge that any of those gentlemen, on the floor of this House, or on the hustings, or in the public press, ever expressed an opinion adverse to the Supreme Court Bill previous to the time it was introduced by this Government. Then the Supreme Court was not in any way a necessity, but, previous to that time, it was always advocated as a necessity, as a crowning part of the Confederation scheme by the hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House,—and he was not sure that, if he looked at the public press of his Province, he would not find some article from the hon. member for Bagot in support of that Bill.

AN HON. MEMBER: Why did you not look through?

MR. LAURIER said he had not had time. But he believed that, if he did, he would find some strong argument in favour of the Bill from the pen of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau).

MR. MOUSSEAU: No; there is none.

MR. LAURIER said perhaps there was not. But it would surprise him a great deal if the hon. member had not commented favourably upon the policy followed by his leader, as he had always commented upon that same policy in regard to Protection. He was quite sure of one thing, which would not be contradicted—that, if he were to search through the papers of his Province, he would find articles from the hon. gentleman, who was now in favour of Protection, adverse to Protection during the time that Sir George Etienne Cartier spoke against Protection. There was a statement in regard to the Supreme Court which somewhat astonished him, in the mouth of the hon. member for Bagot. He had stated that all the money which the Supreme Court had cost the country was money shamefully squandered. The hon. gentleman was a member of the Lower Canadian Bar, and knew better than anybody else how many appeals to the Privy Council had been saved by the introduction and establishment of the Supreme Court; he knew that the number of appeals to the Privy Council, since the establishment of the Supreme Court, had been vastly decreased. If that were the case, if the numbers of those costly appeals had been decreased by the establishment of the Supreme Court, would any one from Lower Canada say that the money voted for this purpose was squandered money? Would it not rather be a fact that that Court had proved an actual benefit to the whole Province? No one could dare challenge that statement. The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Taschereau) had put a notice on paper, asking for returns in that respect. He (Mr. Laurier) asserted that the report, when furnished, would prove conclusively that the establishment of a Superior Court had been a great benefit to this Dominion at large, and especially the Province of Quebec.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) said that he thought it due from him to apologise to the House for protracting a debate which had already continued so long, and in which so many hon. members on both sides of the House had taken a part. He would, however, assure the House that his remarks would be very brief. He proposed to discuss as concisely as he could some of those financial matters which had interested them considerably during the last two weeks. The House would have noticed that the line of argument, if argument it could be called, pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite was to point to items of increased expenditure to be found in the Public Accounts under the present Administration, without at all crediting them with such decreased expenditure as was equally well substantiated by the same authority. He expected better of hon. gentlemen—some of whom, at least, seemed to approach the question with professions of candour and fairness. The hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) was particularly anxious to fasten the charge of extravagance on the present Administration, while, at the same time, without any hesitation whatever, he justified the enormous increases which took place in every Department of the Government during the seven years of the old Administration. Not a word of censure could he utter against the extravagance of his own party, and not a word either to excuse or justify even the smallest increase by the present occupants of the Treasury benches.

In dealing with the Public Accounts, he (Mr. Ross) proposed to examine them fully and impartially and, instead of giving the totals of increased or decreased expenditure, he would give percentages. This method of analysis would not only be more easy of reference, but would place in a more palpable form the relative merits of the two Administrations before the House. In the first place, he found that the increased expenditure for all purposes during the seven years of the existence of the late Administration amounted to 73 per cent., or to an average of 10 per cent. per annum. During the last three years he found the increased expenditure of the present reckless, extravagant and corrupt Administration, as they had been told it was, was only one per cent. in three years, or one-third per cent. per annum. He held that this was the true basis upon which to decide as to the extravagance or economy of the two Administrations. The circumstances of the country now were very different to what they were some years ago, and if they could show that, with increased obligations, necessitated by opening up new territory in the west, and by the management of large public works which had been begun by their predecessors, and which the present Administration was compelled to complete—if they could show that the ratio of increased expenditure was less than it was under the old Administration, they, on the one hand, justified themselves for any increase by the altered circumstances of the country, and, on the other hand, justified the economy of the present Government by showing that, under such altered circumstances, the expenditure had increased at a much smaller ratio, if it increased at all, than under the old Administration. Let hon. gentlemen recollect the fact that the average expenditure under the old Administration was ten per cent. and that the average under the present Administration amounted to but one-third per cent. per annum. Let him deal with some of the matters in detail as set forth in the balance sheet appended to the Public Accounts. Let him first take up the charges for debt and subsidies, and they would find a large increase in the item of interest; an increase for which the country had a right to require an explanation at the hands of the present Government. But the explanation was easy. His hon. friend for Niagara had justified the ordinary expenditure of the country as much because it was the result of the management of the old Administration as for any other cause; but the expenditure in the matter of interest was justifiable upon broad public grounds, and these were: first and last, the necessities of the country requiring a large expenditure for public works. He found that, during the last three years, they had expended $21,677,036 on public works chargeable to capital account; that expenditure was necessitated by the public improvements which the country required to be perfected. It was justified by the fact that these public improvements were for the development of the resources of this country, and if any further justification were needed, they could have it from hon. gentlemen opposite in the fact that the greater portion of these public works had been begun by themselves, and had been carried on by the present Administration, not from choice, but necessity. But, while he called the attention of hon. gentlemen to the large increase in the item of interest, let the House not forget another fact, that the rate of interest had been very largely reduced. If the present Administration had been obliged, in the interest of the public service, to go to the English market and borrow money, was it or its supporters to blame for this, if the necessity had been imposed upon it by the previous Administration? Even if that necessity had not been imposed upon it, if it went there to borrow money, it was its duty to obtain it at as cheap a rate of interest as was possible. Now, what do the Public Accounts show? Just this, that the average rate of interest of the present Administration was less by one-half per cent. than the average rate at which the preceding Administrations were able to borrow. This item of interest alone represented the sum of $700,000 per annum, and if that were capitalized according to the admirable system of arithmetic practiced by hon. gentlemen opposite, it would be found that it represented the sum of nearly $18,000,000. That was to say that, at the present time, we were able to use in the management and construction of the public works, $18,000,000, for which, contrasting the rate of interest paid by the present Administration with that paid by their predecessors, we were practically paying no interest at all. Leaving the matter of interest and returning to the cost of management, he found that the present Government were managing a debt $24,000,000 greater than their predecessors, managing also a larger Sinking Fund than the late Government managed, with $54,795 less per annum. He found, moreover, that the average of their premiums and discounts during seven years was $37,883; that the average premiums and discounts paid by the present Government during the last three years was $24,081, or $13,000 less. Leaving that department of the Public Accounts, and coming to what was, perhaps, the most important department,—the ordinary expenditure,—he would present a few facts for the consideration of the House. He would take up the items one by one and hon. gentlemen would notice he did not omit from that catalogue a single item except census, which appeared on the face of this statement. It would be found that under the late Administration, in Civil Government, the increase in seven years was 49 per cent., while the present Administration, so reckless, corrupt and extravagant, had effected a reduction of 8 per cent., or a total of $71,492. Take up the next item—the item of the Administration of Justice. Under the late Government there was an increase of 58 per cent. in seven years; under the present Government, an increase of only 23 per cent. Presently he would refer to that increase and the cause of it. The item of Police showed an increase under the late Administration of 147 per cent. in seven years; under the present Administration the reduction in three years had been 80 per cent. And yet this was extravagance. Take up the management of Penitentiaries. The increase in the cost of managing our penitentiaries under the late Government was

88 per cent.; the present Government has been able to reduce the cost by \$82,693, or 23 per cent. In Legislation there was an increase of 42 per cent. under the late Administration, and a reduction under the present of 24 per cent. Geological Survey, 240 per cent. increase by the late Government; reduction by the present Government 2 per cent. In Arts, Agriculture and Statistics they found an increase in seven years of 244 per cent. This item, under the present Administration, had increased 143 per cent., but to the cause of this increase he should refer presently. The cost of Emigration and Quarantine had increased only by the small amount of 428 per cent. in seven years under the late Administration; under the present, in three years, that increase amounted to 22 per cent., which increase he would also refer to presently. The cost of Marine Hospitals was increased by the late Administration 216 per cent.; this the present Government had reduced by six per cent. in three years. With regard to Superannuation, in three years the gentlemen opposite increased the item by 402 per cent., and yet the present Government was blamed by every organ of the Opposition, and by hon. gentlemen opposite, for increasing the same item 61 per cent. There was also a large reduction under the present Government in Militia expenditure, amounting to \$428,925 and on Public Works chargeable to income \$563,178, the percentage respectively being 55 and 31. Under the late Administration the increase in the management of Lighthouses was 208 per cent. in seven years; this had been reduced in three years by 12½ per cent. The cost of the Fisheries were increased by 150 per cent. in seven years by the late Administration, and 23 per cent. during three years under the present Government. The item Miscellaneous showed an increase of nine per cent. under the late, and three per cent. under the present Government. In Indian Grants, the increase, although not without justification, he supposed—he did not condemn it—was 2,000 per cent.; while the present Government had only increased this expenditure by 45 per cent. In the management of the Dominion Forces, which was an item only created in 1871-2, the increase was 42 per cent. in two years; the reduction, since the the late Government went out of power, had been 85 per cent. The management of Dominion Lands from 1870-1 to 1873-4, increased nearly 2,000 per cent.; this the present Government had been able to reduce in three years by 68 per cent. These items exhaust the whole ordinary expenditure of the Government. Summarized, it simply amounts to this: that in seven years the old Administration increased the ordinary expenditure of the country from \$3,630,298 in 1867-8, to \$8,324,076, being an increase of 129 per cent.; while the present Administration reduced this expenditure, in three years to \$6,835,078, or a reduction of 17½ per cent. If they capitalized this reduction of \$1,488,998 for the comfort and consolation of hon. gentlemen opposite, what did they find? That by their economical management of the ordinary expenditure alone, they were able to save to the country a sum of money which if capitalized at 5 per cent., for that was about the rate of interest hon. gentlemen opposite paid, represented the large sum of \$29,779,960. He had now given a general review of the ordinary expenditure of the country, and he would next call the attention of the House to matters in which there had been a decrease. He would first notice some items in regard to which the opinions of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House differed. The first item he would take was the Militia, in which a reduction had been effected amounting to \$426,928. He was prepared to justify that decrease, although there were many gentlemen in that House and, perhaps, many in the country, who believed Canada required a vigorous and active militia force. He thought that in the present circumstances of the country the Government ought to be congratulated on having reduced, by a sum of nearly half a million, the expenditure on Militia. But again, there was a large decrease in the cost of public works chargeable to income, and his hon. friend the member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) in speaking on this point, said the policy of the present Administration seemed to be to starve our public works. On examining the Public Accounts, however, he did not find that the policy of the present Administration in the matter of public works appeared to be a starving policy. Let them take the expenditure on public works chargeable to income, and it would be found that hon. gentlemen during the seven years of their Administration spent per annum, on an average, \$767,567. During the last three years the present Administration, which had been charged with starving public works, spent an average of \$1,656,279 per year, or more than twice as much per annum, on an average, as hon. gentlemen opposite. This did not appear to him to look much like starving public works. On public works chargeable to capital account, the hon. gentlemen opposite had spent, during their seven years of office, on miscellaneous public works, the sum of \$524,666, or equal to half a million in round numbers. During the last three years the amount expended per annum, under this head had been \$3,481,522, or nearly seven times as much. And yet they were charged with starving public works. On the Pacific Railway, the late Administration spent during four years an average of \$383,873 per annum; the present Administration spent, on an average, \$2,194,652 per annum, or again about six times as much. Or take the whole account for public works chargeable to capital account, they found that since Confederation \$68,051,325 had been expended in this department; the late Administration spent an annual average of \$6,625,622, and the present Administration an annual average of \$7,225,678. He would leave these facts without comment, for the consideration of the House; they spoke for themselves, and showed that the policy of this Government, in regard to public works of every character had been a most liberal policy; that their policy in regard to the Pacific Railway was a liberal, comprehensive and energetic policy, and a policy that commended itself to the approval of every right-thinking man. He would refer to another item in which an increase had taken place in the ordinary expenditure—the Administration of Justice. He had already informed the House that the average percentage of increase in the Administration of Justice under the old Administration was 58 per cent. in seven years. He found, however, on reference to the Public Accounts that, in order to make the comparison between the two Administrations a fair one, it was necessary that the eliminating policy of the hon. the member for Cardwell should be applied here, and if they eliminated the expenditure for the Supreme Court amounting to \$51,485.10 from that account, they would find that, while the increase under the late Administration was 58 per cent. in seven years, as already stated, under the present Administration it would be found to be only 12 per cent. in three years. In one case it was at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, in the other case it was four per cent. per annum. Let them next take the department of Immigration. His hon. friend from Niagara was very bold when he came to discuss this department of the public expenditure. He staked his political existence on the fact that there was great extravagance in this department. But what were the real facts in this case? An enormous increase? Reckless expenditure? Not at all, simply an apparent increase of \$35,379 in three years. To arrive at the normal expenditure of this department it would be necessary to look into the accounts somewhat closely, and on doing so it would be found that there were several items which could not by any rule of fairness be regarded as ordinary expenditure. First there is the item of \$47,700 charged as a loan to the Icelandic colony; next there is \$32,000 entered as part of the Mennonite loan, and, again, there is the sum of \$21,733 for the suppression of small pox at Gimli. The two first items were mere advances to these settlers, for the repayment of which the Government held ample security. The last item was purely exceptional. Now, if they deducted those three items from the whole expenditure of last year they would find that instead of the expenditure on immigration in 1876-7 being larger than the expenditure of the last year of the late Administration, it was actually \$66,048 less; or, if hon. gentlemen did not admit that they were responsible for the expenditure of the year 1873-4, they might compare it with the expenditure of 1872-3, and they would find \$34,582 less. These were the facts in regard to the expenditure in that department, and he thought the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) should carefully repeat his examination of these items in the Public Accounts. He trusted, he (Mr. Plumb) would, on an early day and in fewer words than he usually requires to express opinions, give the House the benefit of a recantation of his strong statements on this particular point. There was another noticeable fact in regard to immigration. The ratio of increase in the expenditure under the late Administration, was 428 per cent, as he before stated, but the influx of immigrants increased only at the rate of 179 per cent. That is, the cost increased three times as fast as the results. There was another fact in regard to this expenditure, which was said to be so abnormally increased, namely this: that while the expenditure for immigration was actually reduced during the past three years 20 per cent., or, in all, over \$66,000, the actual results were only affected $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. If this is compared with the expenditure of the old Administration, whereby an increase of 428 per cent. in the money expended secured an increase of 170 per cent. in the number of immigrants settling in Canada, it will be readily seen how satisfactorily the department is now conducted. Another interesting fact is that, during the last three years, a greater number of those who land in Canada are disposed to remain here and make it their home. It is said by hon. gentlemen opposite that trade in this country is so depressed that immigrants could not be expected to settle here while the present fiscal policy was continued. They were told that there were no inducements held out, that there ought to be no inducements held out, to emigrants from a foreign country to enter Canada in its present depressed condition; but he might give a few facts in connection with the movements of emigrants which would, perhaps, enlighten hon. gentlemen with regard to the merits of the fiscal policy of the present Administration. Take 1873, for instance. He found that while 99,000 emigrants landed in Canada in that year, 49,059 of those removed to the Western States. Take the year 1874, the last in which the gentlemen opposite were in office; they found that 80,022 emigrants landed in Canada, and of that number 40,649 removed to the Western States. Take the year ending 30th June, 1875, the first year in which the present Administration had full command of the affairs of this country, they found that 36,706 emigrants landed in this country, and only 9,214 left for the Western States; and that last year, 1877, the number of emigrants who came here was 32,716, of which only 5,640 removed to the Western States. The fact was clear that, under the late Administration, when, as they alleged, Canada enjoyed her halcyon days, that out of a total number of emigrants who landed here, of 80,000, 40,000 removed to the United States; but under the present Administration, when everything was depressed, industry was languishing, trade upon the verge of ruin, mills and manufactories closed, what did they find? That instead of finding 40,000 of our emigrants rushing on to the United States, only 5,640 left us for that country. Let him notice another fact in that connection; that, although Canada may be in a state of depression, yet, so far as the movements of immigrants from the other side of the Atlantic could be taken as evidence of the prosperity of this country, we must be in a much more prosperous state than the Americans. During the last three years, immigration to the United States declined 65 per cent., while immigration to the Dominion of Canada, in the same time, declined only $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. and this fact was further substantiated by the statement made by Mr. Ward in Congress, a very short time ago, He said:—

“Year after year, the plight of our labouring men throughout the country and especially in the regions depending on manufactures and commerce, has grown worse and worse; every year since 1872, the attractions presented to the labourers of Europe have sensibly diminished, until in the last fiscal year, the immigrants to our shores were less by nearly three hundred thousand than four years ago."

This was corroborative evidence that the movements of immigrants from the other side to this, was, to a certain extent, an indication of the relative prosperity of the two countries. He would also cite another fact in the same connection. The hon. member for Cumberland, in his vigorous and able speech of a few days ago, said that the tendency of the fiscal policy of the Government was to cause Canadians to expatriate themselves; and the right hon. member for Kingston, in his address at Hamilton, said:—

"Until we get Free trade or a reciprocity of tariffs, your struggling manufactories will be closed, your skilled artisans who should find employment in their own country will drift off to a foreign country, and get employment there. Our best and bravest and strongest will be drawn off to work in foreign manufactories and mills, because they cannot find the employment they should at home."

He could have supposed that his hon. friend, in making a statement of that kind, so broad and sweeping, would have enquired carefully to ascertain whether such a statement as that could be substantiated by evidence of an unequivocal character. He found, however, on examining the immigration reports of the United States that that statement was not at all borne out, as the following statistics from the United States immigration returns would show:—In 1871, the year for which hon. gentlemen opposite would all admit they were responsible, 47,024 Canadians settled on the other side of the line; in 1872, 30,454; in 1873, 42,021; in 1876, only 21,616; thus, only one-half the number of Canadians was expatriated, as the hon. member for Cumberland put it, under the fiscal policy of the present Administration, compared with the number under the fiscal policy or mal-administration of the hon. gentlemen opposite. There was another item of increase with which the hon. member for Niagara had found fault, that of the Department of Arts and Agriculture. He would ask the

MR. ROSS.

Opposition to be candid on that point, and deduct from this increase the sum of \$50,556 expended in connection with the Philadelphia and the Sydney Exhibitions, and instead of an increase they would find a decrease of \$3,884. The next increase to be considered was that of Pensions, an increase with which they were obliged to deal, because it occurred in the Public Accounts. The Government were charged with an abnormal increase in that department; but if they deducted the sum of \$50,000 awarded to the veterans of 1812, the increase, instead of being extraordinary, only showed the small increase of $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in three years. So, in dealing with all the items on a fair basis, they found that every increase, where one occurred, was not only justifiable, being necessitated by the requirements of the public service, but it was very much less than the ratio of increase under the old Administration. It could not be supposed that this country, as it increased in population, as its public works became more extensive, as the wants of the people increased, as the business in every department became heavier, would not require a corresponding increase of expenditure. No reasonable man could condemn a reasonable increase in the expenditure of the country. But what he would press on the attention of the hon. gentlemen opposite was this: That, notwithstanding the increase in population and the increased expenditure necessitated by the enlargement of our public works, the ratio of increase, where any existed, was proportionately much less than the ratio under the old Administration. The Government were charged with having extravagantly increased the ordinary expenditure. If they (the Opposition) could justify themselves for increasing the ordinary expenditure 129 per cent. in seven years, and the total expenditure 73 per cent., surely they would admit that the present Government had just ground for claiming that they had economically managed public affairs, when, in one case, they could show there was only an increase of one-third per cent., and in another case a reduction of about 23 per cent. in three years. Another item criticized, was the charges for collecting the revenue, for the increase of which they were very much blamed. The increase of the cost of collection of Customs was referred to as a grievous fault; applying the same principle of investigation to this expenditure already applied to other items, he found that, during the last seven years, under the old Administration, the cost of collecting Customs increased forty per cent, or six per cent per annum; under the present Administration, the cost had increased $9\frac{1}{2}$ per cent or three per cent. per annum; one half the increase of their predecessors. But they were told that, while the cost of collecting increased, the amount collected diminished. This was true. But could it be pretended that it was possible for the Government to dismiss officials at either small or large ports, because the amounts of collections became smaller? The whole Customs machinery must be kept running; Custom houses must be increased as settlements were extended. And while he was prepared, as particularly as any hon. gentleman opposite, to hold the Administration to a strict account for any unreasonable or abnormal expenditure in any department, he was not prepared to condemn them if they were able to justify that increase on the ground of public necessity. Then there was the cost of collecting the Excise duties, which, under the old Administration, increased 160 per cent. or 23 per cent. per annum; under the present Administration the increase was two per cent in three years, or two-thirds per cent. per annum. In the expenditure of the Post Office Department, the average increase under the old Administration was 18 per cent, or 125 per cent. in seven years; under the present Administration, it was eight per cent. per annum, or 24 per cent during three years. The increase of collecting revenue from public works, under the old Administration, was 200 per cent. during seven years, or 29 per cent. per annum; under the present Administration, this was reduced, in three years, by the sum of \$37,837. He would refer to another fact. He found that, while the revenue from Excise, under the late Government, increased 72 per cent. in seven years, the cost of collecting increased 160 per cent., or more than twice as fast as the revenue. And yet the Opposition stated that their management of the Excise Department was exceedingly economical. While the revenue from Public Works increased 68 per cent. the cost of management increased 200 per cent., or nearly three times as fast as the increase of revenue. With reference to the whole cost of collecting our revenue, these facts were apparent. That the aggregate cost of collecting the entire revenue, under the old Administration, showed an increase of 153 per cent. in seven years, or an average of 22 per cent. per annum; while the entire cost under the present Administration increased nine per cent. in three years, or an average of three per cent. per annum. If they deducted extraordinary expenditure, such as the Weights and Measures Act, the Adulteration of Food Act, the increase of Post-offices, for which latter item hon. gentlemen opposite did not appear to blame the Government—the increased expenditure under the old Administration, as compared with the present, stood as follows: under the old Administration, 22 per cent; under the present Administration, $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum. This was the comparative expenditure of collecting the whole revenue. Another point on which much had been said by hon. gentlemen opposite was the item of Contingent Expenses. He admitted that in this item there was always room for considerable economy or extravagance. He found that with the increased work thrown upon the departments, by the introduction of Prince Edward Island into Confederation, and the increased work thrown upon the department on account of establishing the Government in the North-West Territories and by additional work arising out of an increased population, the increase of contingent expenditures for 1876-7 as compared with 1872-3, the last full year of the old Administration, only amounted to \$4,241.18, or an average of \$326.24 for each of the thirteen departments, controlled by hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. Was there a gentleman opposite who was prepared to say that this was an extravagant increase in the public contingencies. Let such an hon. gentleman take the increases which had been necessitated by the union of Prince Edward Island, by the acquisition of the North-West Territories, and by the increased population, and if he could say that to increase the contingent expenses of each department by the sum of \$326.24 was an extravagant, reckless increase, he did not understand the meaning of the words. Let him examine in detail the increases in the departments. Take, for instance, the Department of Justice. The amount of contingencies in this department in 1872-3, when presided over by the right hon. member for Kingston, was \$6,572; in the year 1876-7, under the present Administration, it amounted to \$2,760, about one-third the amount required by their predecessors. The Department of Customs, when presided over by the hon. member for Cumberland, in the year 1872-3, amounted to \$18,736; in 1876-7 it amounted to \$15,769, or about three thousand dollars less; and yet his hon. friend, the member for Cumberland, would denounce the extravagance of the Government, while there was a reduction of three thousand dollars in the contingencies of that department as compared with his own management. In the Post-office Department the expenditure was \$35,712, while in 1876-7 it was \$33,858, or nearly \$2,000 less. These are indications which could not be disputed—which hon. gentlemen opposite could not question. They showed that the charges of extravagance and reckless expenditure were not sustained by an honest, candid and close investigation of the Public Accounts. He would like to give another item on which a good deal had been said, and regarding which, he regretted to confess, there was room for saying a good deal; that was the deficit. It was to be regretted that a deficit had occurred year after year—that it had occurred at least two years in succession. Every Canadian must regret that depression which had overtaken all the business departments of this country, and which had reduced the consuming capacity of the people so much as to cause a deficit in the Budget of his hon. friend the Minister of Finance. Well, let them consider that deficit and see whether it was so extraordinary as hon. gentlemen opposite said it was. These hon. gentlemen told them in the first place that in 1875-6 there was a deficit of \$1,901,000. In 1876-7 there was a deficit of \$1,460,000, making for the two years a deficit of \$3,361,000. That, he confessed, seemed to be a very large amount of money which this country would be obliged to make up in some way. But he would ask the House if that was a fair way to put the case. If the Administration were to be charged with a deficit in 1875-6, why not give them credit for the surplus in 1874-5? If they deducted that surplus, the deficit was reduced by nearly \$1,000,000. The Administration, again, were charged with being responsible for the expenditure of 1873-4, but if so, they must be credited with the surplus of 1873-4. If they took those two surpluses, and deducted them from the deficit, about which certain hon. gentlemen had said so much, what did they find? They found that the deficit, instead of being \$3,361,000 amounted to the sum of \$1,535,392—that was a million and a half. But there was another item for which they had a right to claim credit. They had applied to the extinction of the public debt, during the last three years, the sum of \$865,355 more than the hon. gentleman opposite applied during the last year of their Administration; so that the real deficit—deducting their surpluses, and the amount placed to the credit of the sinking fund—at the present moment really amounted to \$670,047.20. That was a balance of accounts which he challenged hon. gentlemen opposite to dispute. On the one hand, were placed the two years surpluses which were rightly entitled to be credited to the Administration, and, on the other hand, they were charged with whatever deficit might have occurred, leaving an average deficit of about \$150,000 per annum since the present Administration took office. He had noticed that hon. gentlemen opposite referred very slightly to the loan about which so much was said last year. His hon.

friend from Niagara took a peculiar line of argument in dealing with that loan. Last year they were told by the hon. gentleman himself, and by the hon. member from Cardwell, that the loan entailed a great loss on the people of this country; that, in fact, it was a reckless bargain. They went so far as to question the bonâ fides of the Canadian agent in London. This year he noticed the tone of the hon. member for Niagara was much altered. He as much as said, "The loan has been effected, the money has been borrowed and borrowed very cheaply, and the Canadian agents managed to make practically nothing out of it; but it was such an easy thing that the hon. Minister for Finance does not deserve any credit for it. The time was opportune, there was a plethora of money in the English market, and he could not help but borrow on favourable conditions." He was glad to notice that what these gentlemen so much condemned last year, they were now obliged, under altered circumstances, to approve of, and he ventured to say that if hon. gentlemen opposite reflected upon the expenditure of the present Administration, and compared it with their own expenditure of three years ago, their tone would also be altered, and they would more than commend the present Administration for their careful and economical management of public affairs. Another circumstance in regard to which he wished to make a remark was the burdens which were imposed upon the people of this country. The House was led to believe by hon. gentlemen opposite that the present Administration had largely increased the burdens of taxation from which the people were suffering. These hon. gentlemen went so far as to say that during their Administration their policy was one of low taxation, while that of the present Administration was one of high taxation. He wished to give a few facts from which it would be seen under which Administration the people of this country had been most seriously burdened. Take, for instance, the last year during which the party opposite were in office, 1872-3, and what did they find? They found that the average amount of money paid per capita by the people of this country, in Customs and Excise, was $4.90, while the average amount per capita in 1876-7—that was last year—was $4.42, or 48 less per capita than the burdens imposed upon them by the previous Administration. But hon. gentlemen opposite might tell him that the taxation then imposed did not meet the wants of the country, and that if the deficit which had occurred was added to the taxation, the burdens would, of course, be much greater. Well, the deficit, large as it was, represented exactly 36½ cents per head. If the taxation which would be represented by the deficit was added, in order to make the account balance, it would be found that the people of this country were taxed 11½ cents per head less than they were taxed in 1872-3, the last year of the old Administration. If he made a comparison with the year 1873-4, which, perhaps, would not be quite as fair, the result would be much more favourable to the present Administration than the comparison he had made. The expenditure per capita in 1873-4, was $5.37, as against $4.42 per head under the present Administration. He did not propose to continue his investigations of the Public Accounts at much greater length. He had endeavoured to condense his remarks that hon. gentleman opposite might see that, when the ratio of expenditure under the two Administrations was estimated on a fair basis, the charges of reckless extravagance made against the present Administration were not just, and could not be borne out by a fair investigation of the Public Accounts. But they were told that the reduced expenditure in 1876-7 was a death-bed repentance, or an expenditure for which the present Administration must not receive any credit. His hon. friend for Niagara went so far as to repudiate entirely all investigation and all comparison with the expenditure of 1876-7. He said: "I will not take that into account at all, I will make all my comparisons with 1875-6." Well, supposing it was a death-bed repentance — if, in the last throes of this reckless Administration, they could reduce the expenditure of this country, and save $1,488,000 to the people, was not that an act for which they deserved credit. Contrast this economy with the death agonies of the late Administration. In 1872, when his right hon. friend from Kingston felt the pangs of approaching political death, how did he deal with public expenditure? Did he reduce it? No; he increased it by $2,000,000 or $3,000,000. And when the hon. member was making his last will and testament, by which he was to receive certain funds whereby he might, if possible, ward off the dread avenger, what did he do? Did he deal economically with the public funds or with the public loans? No; but he placed upon record that Sir Hugh Allan should receive thirty millions of Canadian money and fifty millions of acres of land, in consideration of advances made, to help him at the general election. That was an instance of a death-bed repentance on the part of gentlemen opposite! Coming down to a later date, he found from a document which he held in his hand—a document brought down in answer to his hon. friend from Cardwell—that when his hon. friend at the last dread moment of his term of office knew he could no longer control the destinies of this country, and when he was bidding farewell to his political associates anxious to provide for many of his true and trusty followers, he ordered, as his last will and testament, that nine of them should be provided for by the Secretary of State at an expense of $4,690, and that the salaries of nine others should be increased to the extent of $1,650. To his hon. friend from Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin), then Minister of Public Works, he said: "Provide offices for 28 of my supporters and increase the salaries of 171 more. Never mind the cost, These were true men." And his hon. friend from Charlevoix did as he was told, at a cost of $40,620. In his own department, that of Justice, over which he had himself so long presided, he provided situations for 75 of his supporters, and increased the salaries of 11 more, at a cost of $79,960. To his trusty friend presiding over the Department of the Interior, he said "Bear this in mind, that you provide offices for 19 of my friends, and increase the salaries of 25 others, at a cost of $19,080. Then, turning to his hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), at that time Minister of Customs, he said: "We have fought many a hard battle together—my interests are your interests, and I therefore hand over to your keeping 111 of my faithful friends. Provide for them liberally, and on those already in our service do not fail to bestow substantial favours," and, according to this return from which he was quoting, the Minister of Customs responded, and 111 new officers were appointed and the salaries of 636 increased at a total cost of $125,262. In the same way he placed six new officers in the Militia Department and increased the salaries of 18; he placed 84 in the Inland Revenue Department and increased the salary of 96; he placed 17 in the Finance Department and increased the salary of 24; he placed 41 in the Department of Agriculture and increased the salary of 15; he placed in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, at that time under the care of his hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), 159 new officers and increased the salary of 49; and last, but not least, he ordered and decreed that the Post-office Department should be taxed to maintain 77 new officials and increase the salary of 311; in all, he ordered, as his last will and testament, that 629 new officers should be appointed at an expense of $322,943, and that the salary of 1,381 should be increased at an additional expense of $152,360. He (Mr. Ross) referred to these matters for the purpose of showing the contrast between the death-bed repentances of the late and this, which was alleged to be, the death-bed repentance of the present Administrations. In the one case provision was made for political supporters, while, in the other, an effort was made to reduce the expenditure. A codicil to the will referred to provided that the right and trusted friend of the testator, Mr. S. L. Tilley, should receive the Lieutenant-Governorship of New Brunswick, while another friend, the member for Antigonish, should receive a judgeship; in fact, the whole body of his friends on the opposite side seemed to have been provided for when the hon. member was in the throes of his political dissolution, and the country was saddled with an enormous expense in order that these men should not come to want. If it is proper that the dying hours of an Administration should have been spent in providing for its political supporters, then were the dying hours of the late Administration happy indeed. But if it is the duty of a Government, at all times, to guard the interests of the people—to promote wise legislation and prevent extravagance, then there need be no fear but even the death-bed repentance of the present Administration, if death-bed repentance it really is, will compare very favourably with the last scene in the career of an Administration of which the country is now happily relieved, and whose return to office is in the far distant future. He had not yet seen anything to justify the hope that hon. gentlemen opposite, were they restored to power, would not repeat the same reckless extravagance in the administration of public affairs which had characterized them in the past—an administration which had brought reproach upon the country, and from the consequences of which it could only be extricated by the most rigid economy and the most judicious management of all its affairs.

MR. LANGEVIN said that, when he observed the Minister of Inland Revenue rising before six o'clock, he thought his intention was to call the attention of the House to some remarks of his which might have been overlooked, and that he wished to explain or rather to apologize for the words he had made use of. He (Mr. Langevin) was sorry to say that the hon. gentleman, instead of apologizing for these words, persisted in them without trying to make amends for the insult which he had thrown at the man whom he would not have dared to meet when living. He had hoped the hon. gentleman would have apologized for what he said the other day when he made a statement to the effect that it was surprising Sir George Cartier should have been so well spoken of. While the House did not believe that such surprise was real, they were anxious to hear what fell from the lips of the hon. gentlemen as well as the contents of his letter to his leader the Minister of Public Works. The hon. gentleman, in his remarks regarding Sir George Cartier, tried to minimize that party which had increased year by year to such a degree that their opponents were obliged to acknowledge its strength, and, being forced to meet them before the public, were trembling for the result. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had said that Sir George Cartier had not a follower left in the House. He (Mr. Langevin) did not know the exact meaning which the hon. gentleman attached to these words; but, if he meant that the policy of Sir George Cartier had been forgotten by those who succeeded him in the House, by those who had followed him from the time they entered Parliament, he was perfectly mistaken. Sir George Cartier was a great man in his day, and was acknowledged as such by his opponents, who now entertained a very different spirit towards him. He was sorry to say the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue was not amongst those who acknowledged his worth and his great deeds. The hon. gentleman should have remembered that Sir George Cartier's whole career was devoted to the good, the interests, and the progress of Canada. Whenever a great undertaking was set on foot they were sure to find their late leader in the Province of Quebec, Sir George Cartier, supporting that measure in every possible way. For example, the Grand Trunk Railway was a great undertaking, which hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House always opposed—an undertaking which, to a great extent, had made this country what it was, and which to-day was being completed by the Intercolonial at one end, and, he hoped, by the Pacific Railway, in the course of a few years, at the other. The Victoria Bridge was another great undertaking that some hon. gentlemen opposed also; but Sir George Cartier and his friends—those followers who it was alleged could not be found in the House, but who, nevertheless, were on the same side with himself that day—supported that undertaking. The Intercolonial Railway was another great undertaking which hon. gentlemen on the opposite side supposed would certainly destroy the credit of the country. They said: "It will cost twenty or twenty-five millions of dollars, and we cannot afford to expend that sum; we would have direct taxation for it; we have not the means, and the Intercolonial Railway should not be set on foot." Sir George Cartier, with the leader of the party, the right hon. the member for Kingston, supported that measure and carried it successfully, after having made it a condition of the Union of the Provinces. That was only one of the great measures that Sir George Cartier supported and advocated in this House, and to which his followers also gave their support. Sir George also fought for many years successfully with his supporters in Lower Canada in order to carry Confederation. He was determined that no Province should tyrannize over another, and he saw that the time had come when there should be a change in the Constitution, when the boundaries of the country should be enlarged, and when the great British Provinces on the north of this continent should be united politically; he, therefore, went to work, without fearing the consequences, and, although it was declared that the then Province of Lower Canada would be swamped by such a union, that it was useless to fight against destiny, as it was called, Sir George Cartier had more courage, hope, and confidence in the future of the country. Sir George, as the head of a political party, attended all the Conferences, and, with the aid and support of the present leader of the Opposition, backed up by a large majority from the Province of Quebec, as well as by the representatives from Ontario, carried the great measure of Confederation. The men who supported him were still in the House. They were the supporters of Sir Geo. Cartier and the leader of the then Government, the present leader of the Opposition. The same men were here to support them in the same way that they had supported Sir George Cartier. They held the same policy, the same doctrines, supported the same party; and he had no doubt, when they again obtained power, they would carry other great measures to completion.

MR. LANGEVIN.

Sir George Cartier possessed one great quality—he loved his country. He worked to elevate the position of his compatriots of French origin, but he never forgot that in this country we had men of every origin and creed,—and it must be said, to the glory of his memory, that he always supported what was right, and rendered justice to men of all nationalities, races, or creeds, and could never be charged with having committed an injustice to anyone because he belonged to another race or creed than his own. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue must have forgotten what he stated at an earlier period of the Session. The hon. gentleman stated that he was a great admirer of Sir George Cartier's candour and courage. He was surprised that the hon. gentleman should have that admiration for the manly character and courage of Sir George Cartier, after what he had stated the other day, when he spoke after the hon. the First Minister. The following was from the Hansard report of the remarks:—

" * * If he (Mr. Mackenzie) recollected aright, Sir George had used words, but, when it came to the use of weapons, he was the first in the flight, and the others were after him; it was a race and not a battle.

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: You will not, I am sure, slander the dead. Sir George Cartier fought at St. Denis from morning until night.

"Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not want to slander the dead; I never had a difference in my life with Sir George Cartier, and I have no reason to say an unkind word of him. The right hon. gentleman took up Sir George Cartier's name to suit his purpose; but I must not use it to bring out the truth, it appears—the old story. He can do what he likes, but we must not mention any name.

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: You are mistaken.

"Mr. MACKENZIE: That is the popular rumour; perhaps the right hon. gentleman was there also.

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have the personal testimony of Dr. Wolfred Nelson, who told me himself, and who was in command at St. Denis.

"Mr. LAUBIER: It is matter of history that Sir George Cartier left the field of St. Denis before the battle of St. Denis had commenced."

He took issue with the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue; that slander had been stated in the House for the first time, and he would meet it squarely. Such a statement would never have been made in the presence of Sir George; the hon. gentleman would never have dared to have made it in his presence. Perhaps he (Mr. Langevin) was not able to do as much justice to the subject as others could; nevertheless, he claimed the right to defend the memory of his late leader, Sir George Cartier. He had been the bosom friend of Sir George; he was brought up in his law office, and, from the time of entering that office, even to the time of his death, he never ceased for a moment to be his personal friend; and, therefore, when his memory was so assailed by a Minister of the Crown, he claimed the right to come forward and take issue with the hon. gentleman. That hon. gentleman had not stated what history declared, and what was in accordance with the facts. He would now proceed to give the proofs of what he had just stated. In 1840, when the question of the battle of St. Denis was brought up, the actors in that scene were still living—Sir George Cartier, also Doctor Wolfred Nelson, and a number of others who were in that battle. This question having come up in a discussion either in Parliament, or out of it, allegations were made by persons present at St. Denis, not only about the case of Sir George Cartier, but regarding others who were present at that battle. He would not refer to the other matter, because they had nothing to do with a subject that was not now under consideration, but he would read a portion of an affidavit made by Messrs. Bourgeois, Chenet and Boulanger. It said:

“We further certify that we saw Mr. G. E. Cartier taking part in the battle in the house of Mme. St. Germain, going from one part of it to the other, and obeying the orders of Dr. Nelson. He was only absent from the house for about an hour, the Doctor having sent him to St. Antoine to procure, at the establishment of Mr. Perrin, merchant, and at every other place possible, all the ammunition that he could find. Towards two o'clock Mr. Cartier was sent away, and he returned as quickly as he could in order to continue to take part in the battle. We, moreover, certify that Mr. Cartier did not separate from Dr. Nelson save on the second expedition of the troops, when the Doctor himself left the village of St. Denis. We certify, besides, that the troops fired with cannon on the boats which crossed from one to the other bank.”

Another affidavit was from Mr. Henri Cartier, a cousin of Sir George Cartier, who was present at that battle. He said:

“It is also false that Mr. Cartier went to St. Antoine to escape danger; he made this trip on the order of the Doctor to obtain ammunition for us; he was scarcely more than an hour absent. I myself announced to Mr. Cartier the misfortune that befel Mr. Perrault; he then returned to see the wounded soldiers, and we then went together to see Mr. Perrault.”

Another was an affidavit of Mr. Faneuf, who was also there. He deposed:

“On the 23rd of November, 1837, at an early hour in the morning, Messrs. Georges and Henri Cartier left St. Antoine, with a certain number of citizens to go to St. Denis. When leaving, the said Georges Cartier told me to remain at the school-house, and to make as many balls and cartridges as possible, as they might have need of them in the course of St. Denis. Between two and three o'clock in the afternoon of the said 23rd of November, 1837, that is to say, towards half-past two o'clock, Georges Cartier came to the school-house to get all the balls and cartridges that I had made; and went to the store of Mr. Firmin Perrin to secure all the ammunition he could find there, and then the said Georges Cartier proceeded to St. Denis. I remember perfectly the uniform that the said Georges Cartier wore on the 23rd of Nov., 1837; he wore a black cloth American cap, and an old reddish overcoat, which fitted him well; this was an overcoat which he had borrowed from his brother, Côme Cartier, who was of the same size as the said Georges Cartier. I also declare that the said Georges and Henri Cartier only separated from Dr. Nelson, when the latter was obliged to leave St. Denis on the occasion of the second descent of the troops upon the village of St. Denis, the 1st of Dec., 1837. It was generally known in the village of St. Antoine and the neighbourhood, before the battle of the 23rd Nov., 1837, that Mr. Papineau was at St. Denis, during several days before, organizing, in company with Dr. Nelson and several others, the means of resistance.”

In Christie's History of Lower Canada, there was an affidavit from François Lajoie, who deposed:

“I, François Lajoie, tinsmith, of St. Denis, certify that on the 23rd of Nov., 1837, I crossed from St. Antoine to St. Denis, towards three o'clock in the afternoon, in company with Mr. Georges Cartier, when Mr. Georges Cartier returned from St. Antoine with cartridges and munitions, which he brought for the battle that was then taking place at St. Denis, between the troops and the citizens of St. Denis and the surrounding parishes. Mr. Cartier quickly reached the house of Mme. St. Germain, where they again fought quite near the crossing."

Another deponent, François Xavier, on 23rd Nov., 1837, said :

"I, the undersigned, François Xavier, Merchant, of St. Denis, certify that on the 23rd of November, 1837, I saw and met Mr. Georges Cartier in the house of Mme. St. Germain during the battle which was then taking place, and which began at half-past nine o'clock in the morning. To the best of my knowledge I saw Mr. G. Cartier until towards two o'clock in the afternoon, between noon and about one o'clock; Dr. Nelson having given order to the combatants who were in the upper storey of the house to descend to the first storey, Mr. Cartier came down like the others to the first storey, where the fight was continued. I spoke to and conversed with Mr. Georges Cartier, and I can state that he bore himself with courage and resolution. I also saw Mr. Henri Cartier in the house, who took part in the battle. I heard that Mr. Henri Cartier had spoken of retreat to Dr. Nelson, believing that they could not withstand the troops; but this did not prevent Mr. Henri Cartier from continuing the fight. Mr. Georges Cartier never spoke of retreat."

He also read the affidavit of Dr. Wolfred Nelson, who commanded at St. Denis. [Vide p 821.] Those three last affidavits were in Mr. Christie's History. Mr. Christie, as hon. gentlemen knew, was not a friend of Sir George Cartier; nevertheless, he rendered justice to his memory as an impartial historian. Other historians had written on the subject, but he had had but a few minutes to look over the papers; nevertheless, those documents were the real basis of what history would say about matters connected with Sir George Cartier. Mr. Turcotte, an historian, at page 90, said :—

"Sir George Cartier even took part in the insurrection of 1837, and was present at the battle of St. Denis.

The last authority he would quote on the subject was Mr. L. O. David, who was not a friend of Sir George Cartier, and who nevertheless rendered justice to him as any fair and true-minded man would do. Mr. David said :—

"When the warrants were issued he left the town and went towards St. Antoine. He was at St. Denis, the 24th November, 1837, under the command of Wolfred Nelson. It was he whom Nelson directed during the fight to go to St. Antoine to seek assistance, and ammunition. He seems to have zealously accomplished the mission confided to him, and nothing justifies the charges of which he has been made the victim in this relation. Moreover, Mr. Cartier never could have been a coward. Nothing was farther from his nature."

Having quoted these affidavits and historians, he was sure the House and the country would see that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had slandered the memory of Sir George Cartier, when he said that history would just say the contrary of what he had read. He thought the hon. gentleman would not write a history of this country. The history of Canada should be written by a man who would do justice even to an opponent, and, moreover, justice should always be given to one who was dead and now in his grave, and who could not defend himself. If his (Mr. Langevin's) testimony could be added to what he had read, he could repeat the exact words he had read from this affidavit. He was a friend of Sir George's, though a much younger man, and a young man in politics, and he met him when he and others were leaders in their Province. He had this statement from the lips of Dr. Wolfred Nelson himself, who had always spoken in the highest terms of the courage displayed by "young George," as he called him,—that he (Sir George) was a courageous young man, and had done what very few men would have done, for he carried on his shoulders bags of cartridges which were liable to have exploded and destroyed them and the bearer. He hoped this would be the last time they would hear of this disparagement of the dead, and this slandering of Sir George Cartier. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had appealed to the speeches of Sir George Cartier in defence of the Government Supreme Court measure. It was well known that, when the Supreme Court Bill was brought before the House by the late Government, it was more with a view of a discussion upon it than passing it; it was merely to have the question considered, and to see whether members of Parliament from all sections concurred in having a Supreme Court; and it was found that the time had not come; that the members, the people, the press and the representatives of the people thought the time had not arrived; that they could do very well without it; that there were other tribunals from which justice could be obtained, and that a measure of that kind should be delayed. But the present Government brought in the Supreme Court Bill. They were not favourable to it before, but when they came into office they said to themselves that they wanted the patronage of six fine places on the Bench, and the patronage connected with that Court, and so they brought in the Bill, and it was passed. There was a large majority supporting the First Minister and the Minister of Justice, and the measure became law and a sum of $56,000 was added to the annual expenditure of the country. The other day he believed it had been stated that it was hardly $50,000. It was more than that; it was $56,000, or nearly $57,000. True, hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, the Minister of Inland Revenue amongst them, had stated that it was a most important measure, because it had reduced the costs to suitors. He did not know if the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had consulted the hon. the Minister of Justice on that subject. He wondered if the Minister of Justice would agree with him that the result had been to reduce the costs of suitors before that Court. He thought the hon. gentleman, from his own experience, and he (Mr. Langevin) from his own experience, might say that the costs of that Court were not such as to warrant them in agreeing with the Minister of Inland Revenue. He (Mr. Langevin) thought the hon. gentleman had been deceived about the costs of that Court. He wanted to be well understood. When he spoke of these costs he did not speak of the personnel of the Court. He was very careful about these things, because last year he had been accused of attacking the Judges; but he denied that charge. He did not then, and he did not now, attack them; but he said the system was a bad one, and the cost too great. When five or six gentlemen on the opposite side of the House had the benefit of going before that Court, passing through it and having to pay its costs, they would say that justice did not cost less there than it cost before it was established. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue in speaking of Sir George Cartier, had said that he was a despot in his party. He (Mr. Langevin) did not know what he called a despot; but, if it meant a man who had a mind of his own, who tried to convince others that he was right, and who tried to carry important measures through, then Sir George Cartier was a despot. But that was not despotism. Sir George Cartier would try to convince his followers, and the House and the country, that he was right, and he succeeded very many times; but he was open to conviction, and, if his friends could show him that it would be better to modify his measures, he was always willing to yield to them, provided, in his conviction, the interests of the country would not be sacrificed. A despot had no friends; but Sir George Cartier had as many friends as there were persons who knew him. The other day the Minister of Finance had admitted, with great candour, that in 1874 he had imposed $3,000,000 of taxes more than was imposed in 1873. Of course, the law being there, the hon. gentleman could not deny it. But, upon going further, it would be found that in 1875-6 there was an amount of $500,000 in addition to the $3,000,000, and that, though this $3,000,000 of taxes had been collected, and the $500,000 added, nevertheless there was a deficit in 1876 of $1,901,000. In 1877, one would have thought that, after imposing $3,500,000 of taxation over and above that imposed by the late Government, hon. gentlemen might have made both ends—revenue and expenditure—meet, but they found another deficit of $1,460,000 in that year. From 1874 to 1877 the Government had collected $11,000,000 over and above what the late Government collected in 1873, and they had had deficits amounting to

\$3,361,000. Hon. gentlemen had stated that the expenditure in the year 1873-4 was over \$23,000,000, and that, though the present Government had had large expenditures to meet, they had increased the expenditure only \$400,000 in 1874-5, \$1,000,000 in 1875-6 and about \$200,000 in 1876-7. So that only one million and three-quarters had been added to the expenditure of the country since 1873-4. Hon. gentlemen should remember that, while the Government had been adding this amount to the expenditure, they had starved a number of services; that they had diminished considerably the expenditure on public works; that the late Government in their day had expended, out of the revenue, ten and a half millions on public works, while these gentlemen, after having added \$11,000,000 to the taxes of the country, found themselves, after four years, with a deficit of three and a third millions. He had heard the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) speak of the great saving that had been effected by hon. gentlemen on the other side. He (Mr. Langevin) could not dispute his figures, they were so long and so elaborately got up that very few persons could follow them; but there were some figures that could not be denied. The Government could not deny that they had expended eleven millions more than the late Government did in 1873-4, and had a deficit of $3\frac{1}{3}$ millions. The hon. gentleman said "Oh, you have increased the debt of the country \$23,000,000 or \$25,000,000," but the hon. the Minister of Finance had admitted that the increase of the debt during the time the present Government had been on the Treasury benches had amounted to \$10,000,000 a year. And now, after four years, the hon. the Minister of Finance said this increase had been stopped. How had it been stopped? He had admitted that he had a deficit of a million and a half the present year and that he would not provide to meet it by revenue. Therefore, that deficit must be added to the debt of the country. On the other hand, the Minister had told the House that \$30,000,000 was required for public works—canals and other public works. That must also be added to the debt, and therefore, he (Mr. Langevin) did not see how he could say that the increase of the debt had been stopped. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) had said that the late Government increased the number employed in the Civil Service; if they did so, they increased its efficiency. They increased that service because they had a larger revenue to collect, and this necessitated a larger staff; but the gentlemen opposite, on the contrary, had increased this service out of a decreasing revenue. If they turned to the accounts they would find that the percentage of people employed was now much larger than when they had a better revenue. The hon. member for West Middlesex took as his text the return made to this House in answer to the motion of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy) while that return had been shown to be a very incorrect return; and should that return be referred to a Committee, he had no doubt that they would report that it was not a clear and true return. But he supposed the Opposition must not speak of Committees to which they should refer these returns. It was said such returns would not be allowed to be referred to Special Committees provided the proposal came from his side of the House. He had no doubt that, if they on his side of the House asked for a Committee upon this return, as they had not a majority, the hon. the First Minister would find some reason for refusing them. Notwithstanding this, they were taunted that they did not ask for Committees, but they knew how these requests had before been treated. He could refer the House to matters which had transpired in Committees, but he was bound to speak in general terms of Committees or he should in all probability be put down. The hon. member for West Middlesex wished this House and the country to understand that they were about to appear before the country in a short time to run their elections, and that, when they (the Opposition) gave an account of their stewardship, the people would find them wanting; that the people would find the hon. gentlemen on the other side were the incarnation of purity; that they were the best men to be found to represent any country, and that their good deeds would be approved by the people, While listening to the hon. gentleman, one might almost believe that the Opposition were the Government, and the hon. gentleman's friends the Opposition; but he had alluded to what they had done five, six or ten years ago. Hon. gentlemen found fault with the Opposition when they were in office, and condemned their administration. No matter what they did, every act was a bad act; every measure a bad measure. Hon. gentlemen had been in office four years; it was their turn now to take their trial before the people. The people would not ask what the late Government did in 1873 or 1870, or since Confederation. They would ask hon. gentlemen if they had carried out their promises, or if they had not increased the debt of the country. While in Opposition they were always clamouring about the increase made in the debt; they told the people at the hustings that, if ever they were in office, they would stop the increase of the debt. They had been in office four years, and yet had not decreased the debt a single dollar. Was that in accordance with their professions and promises in 1873 4, the people would ask? No, the electors of the country would say that they had increased the expenditure of the people upon a decreasing revenue. They would say, here were the Public Accounts, and the departmental Blue-books, and they were the hon. gentlemen's own tale; they were not written by their opponents but by themselves; and what did they show? That, whilst the revenue was decreasing year by year, they had increased the cost of collecting the Customs and the Excise instead of reducing it. And what about Immigration, the people would ask? While in Opposition those gentlemen found fault and said that Department was distinguished by reckless extravagance, and there had been expended upon it a much larger sum than was required. These same gentlemen had now been in power for four years, and they had reduced the expenditure in that Department, but with what result? They had a much smaller number of immigrants coming into the country; and whilst, on the one hand, the immigrants coming into the country cost five dollars a head, they now cost fifteen or sixteen dollars a head. The people could not shut their eyes to these facts. They would have these Blue-books and these figures, and would see that the professions and the performances of the hon. gentlemen were quite different. They had said their predecessors were reckless men, who could not be trusted; and what had they done? They had acted worse than their predecessors, therefore, the people would say they had no confidence in them. That the people had already come to that conclusion; that they had for the last two or three years understood the gentlemen on the other side, was shown by the recent elections. He was glad that the hon. gentlemen said they were going to the country. Let them go by all means, and let hon. gentlemen tell the country what the present Government had done. They had not acted in the interests of the country; they had not diminished the burdens of the people. Instead of reducing the expenditure they had increased the burden of the people by millions, in their five years of office, and how then could hon. gentlemen opposite expect the support of the country?

MR. BLAKE said he would not enter into the discussion of that part of the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Langevin's) discourse which occupied the greater portion of his time. He did not understand the Minister of Inland Revenue to impugn the courage of Sir George Cartier; and those who knew Sir George Cartier in his later years, while he sat in this House, must feel that there was every probability of the hon. gentleman's statement being correct, because, if there was one good quality amongst the other good qualities which distinguished him, it was his undaunted courage and tenacity of purpose. But this was of little consequence to hon. gentlemen now; and he did not propose to enter into a discussion as to whether the late Minister of Militia ever fired a treasonable shot or the present Minister of Militia made a disloyal speech. These were matters which might be alluded to, but which were not of such pressing and vital interest as other subjects, some of which had been touched on in the debate on the motion now before the House. Nor was it his (Mr. Blake's) purpose to enter into any general discussion of that subject; he was just as averse to a speech of figures as he was to figures of speech, but he should have to trouble the House with a few figures upon a point in which he had taken a peculiar interest, and which he was therefore more conversant with than with the general financial expenditure. The increase in the expenses of the Administration of Justice had, during the picnic campaign, been attacked by hon. gentlemen in general terms, but specific terms upon that point they had not condescended to use. The hon. member for Cumberland, in his speech delivered a few days ago, referred to a gross increase in the expenditure of this Department, as he estimated it, but the only particular upon which he uttered a complaint was that connected with the creation of the Supreme Court. He (Mr. Blake) was prepared, if hon. gentlemen opposite would condescend to particulars as to the increase in the Administration of Justice, to challenge the propriety of any complaint upon that score. He was prepared to show, and would show in a few moments, that the attempt to create a ground of complaint, by the mere statement that there had been an increase of expenditure, such as appeared, would be utterly fallacious, and would be overborne by a comparison with the increase of expenditure that took place two or three years before the present Administration came into power. But he would not enter into an analysis of those expenditures compared with those of the Liberal party, nor how far these expenditures of the Liberal party were the direct consequence of the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite, unless and until some hon. gentleman should be pleased to condescend to particulars on this matter, and point out any item in the Administration of Justice, the propriety of which he challenged. He (Mr. Blake) challenged hon. gentlemen opposite to name the particular point on which they had a complaint, and then they would have an investigation, and upon it, he did not doubt that the Liberal party would enter triumphantly. There was one item which had been challenged, first, by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper); second, by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau); and lastly, by the hon. the member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin); and this was the item with respect to the creation of the Supreme Court. Let him first deal shortly with the quantum of that expenditure, in order to see how far the hon. gentlemen opposite, as a party, were in a position to complain of the quantum, irrespective of the creation of the Supreme Court. In 1869 and 1870 the right hon. member for Kingston was the leader of the Government and Minister of Justice, and in that two-fold capacity he introduced the Bill. Next to him, the late Sir George Cartier was the most prominent member of the Government of that day, and he, of course, was responsible for, and promoted that measure. The hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) was also a prominent member of that Government which introduced that Bill, and he promoted and sustained that Bill. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) was also a member of that Government. So also was the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Robitaille)—he (Mr. Blake) did not recollect whether or not that hon. gentleman acceded to office a little after the introduction of the Bill, but that was the policy of the Government of which he was a member—and these were all the members of that Administration who now retained seats in this House.

MR. MITCHELL: The member for Compton.

MR. BLAKE said the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) would excuse him for having forgotten him—he had occupied the same position. These gentlemen brought forward two Bills. The hon. member for Charlevoix had said they brought forward a Bill for consideration and discussion; they brought it forward, he said, in order that hon. members might consider whether it was a good or a bad Bill, whether it was wanted and whether the details were suitable. If they brought the Bills forward for discussion, why did they not discuss them or give the House an opportunity of discussing them? They never gave the House an opportunity of discussing them. The hon. gentleman had made hold to say that the Liberal party opposed the Bill for the creation of a Supreme Court. He denied the charge, and called the hon. gentleman to the proof. The Liberal party did not oppose that Bill; the only member of the House who addressed an observation to the House regarding that Bill, as he believed, was the humble member who was now speaking, and that was on the occasion of the second Bill, when he took occasion to enquire of the right hon. member for Kingston, who was introducing it, as to the purport of some of its provisions, disclaiming any reference to the principle of the Bill, which was not then before the House. The first Bill, it was said, was introduced for consideration, for discussion, for deliberation; but it must be presumed that all such discussion took place silently. And what did it result in? It resulted in the production of a second Bill, the next Session. The second Bill, introduced in 1870, after the Government had had the advantage of the advice of their supporters, contained the same provisions as the first in regard to the number of Judges necessary for the proper administration of justice in the Supreme Court. In both Bills the number was seven; in the present Supreme Court Act, introduced by the Liberal party, the number provided for was six. The hon. member for Charlevoix had cast an imputation upon that party—couched in language which a year or two ago was condemned as a mode of expression in parliamentary procedure—that their sole object was to obtain places for their friends. That, he had said, was the motive which induced the Liberal party to bring forward the Supreme Court Act. He had alleged that it was to possess this privilege of patronage that the Liberal party had asked the House to assent to the creation of a Supreme Court. If, then, that measure was introduced merely to extend the patronage which it was in the power of a certain party to bestow, it must be remembered that it was supported on two occasions by the hon. member himself while a member of the Government, and that, while the Liberals asked for six judges, the hon. gentlemen asked for seven. The latter proposition, if carried into effect, would have caused an increased expenditure of seven thousand dollars a year. A motion was made to reduce the amount of the salaries allotted to the Judges by $1,000 a year; but against that motion, the right hon. member for Kingston voted, coinciding with the view of his (Mr. Blake's) hon. friend, the then Minister of Justice, who stated that, after having intercourse with members of Parliament on both sides of the House, he had formed the opinion that the sum proposed was the smallest with which it could be hoped to fill the Court in the way it ought to be filled. He (Mr. Blake) concurred in that view, as he was convinced that the most eminent legal and judicial talent of the country could not be induced to remove from the places in which their social and professional lives had been passed, even by the superior attractions of Ottawa, merely because the House would not assent to a very moderate increase upon the salaries of the Judges in the various Provincial capitals. He had, he thought, sufficiently pointed out that, as far as the main expenses of the Court were concerned, the judicial staff had been founded upon a more economical scale than that which hon. gentlemen opposite propounded. Regarding the salaries of officers and incidental expenses, no complaint had been made; and he ventured to say no complaint could be made. The officers were few in number, the salaries were certainly not excessive, and the incidental expenses had been kept down to the lowest possible point. The hon. member for Charlevoix, who was usually very accurate upon such subjects, had stated the other day, on being appealed to by the hon. member for Cumberland, that the expenses which he (Mr. Blake) had stated were $50,000 had reached $56,000 or perhaps $57,000. He (Mr. Blake) was under the impression that the Public Accounts of last year would show that it was a trifle under $52,000; but whether it was $52,000 or $56,000, it was pretty nearly as far off from the supposed cost of the Court mentioned by the hon. member for Cumberland, and the expenditure even at that price was not, he thought, to be complained of. So much as to the question of the expense itself. With respect to the policy of creating a Court, the institution of such a Court was provided for by the Constitutional Act. During the second Session held under the new Constitution, hon. gentlemen opposite thought that our national existence had reached such a stage as to render it necessary to place the cope-stone on the edifice, so far as the Administration of Justice was concerned, by the creation of a Supreme Court. They brought forward a Bill which, he might be pardoned for saying, was rather a crude measure; but that Bill they did not press. It must be assumed, from what the hon. member for Charlevoix and the hon. member for Kingston had stated on former occasions, that they took counsel with their friends as to the submission of the measure to public discussion. What was the result of that private counsel? The result, as he had already stated, was not its abandonment, but its prosecution; because, in the next Session of Parliament, after mature consideration, after getting the opinion of the country so far as they could get it, though without availing themselves of public discussion in the House, they did not reintroduce the measure, but introduced a new and very different Supreme Court Act, but still it was a Supreme Court Act, reiterating the proposition that the time had arrived in our national existence when the establishment of such a Court was right and proper. The hon. member for Cumberland and the hon. member for Charlevoix had said that the measure was introduced for consideration and deliberation, and to ascertain what the feeling of members was; and that they could afford to wait, and did not, therefore, press it. The right hon. member for Kingston had been more frank on former occasions. He had told them that it was the objections raised by some of his supporters from the Province of Quebec which induced him to pause in the carrying out of that Act, but he felt it would be entirely unworthy of his former position in this House, of his present position, and his position in the country, to take any other attitude than that of a supporter of the Supreme Court Act. And so these hon. gentlemen, utterly ignoring the slightest notion of the solidarity of a party, the slightest notion of their being responsible for any act of their leader, thinking they could afford to dissent from the old-time, well-known, thoroughly understood policy of their leaders when they were in Government, and from the policy of their leader now he was in Opposition, condemned the Liberal party because they had succeeded in engrafting upon the Statute-book, after eight years of a national existence, a Bill which those hon. gentlemen thought should have been there after two years of that existence. He was amazed to hear the hon. member for Cumberland objecting—in moderate tone, for him, it was true—but still casting a slur upon the Supreme Court as a subject for the Liberal party to be proud of. The hon. member for Cumberland must have forgotten that he himself supported the Bill creating the Supreme Court, in all its stages through this House. There was one amendment, proposed by a private member, and adopted by a great majority, of which he would presently speak, against which the hon. gentleman's voice was raised with that of his leader. If he (Mr. Blake) read rightly, the hon. member for Cumberland voted against the amendment and for the Bill. But, when the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Baby) proposed a long amendment, with a preamble, stating that the time had not come for the establishment of this Court, the leaders of the Opposition, including, he believed, the hon. member for Cumberland, voted against it; then, upon the motion for the third reading, a motion was moved for a six months' hoist, and against that were to be found recorded, the names of the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald), the hon. member for Northumberland, New Brunswick, (Mr. Mitchell), the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tapper), and the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Robitaille), all members of the late Government and leaders of the party which sat opposite. The hon. member for Cumberland, throughout, sustained the Bill. He affirmed the proposition that it was not only fit that a Supreme Court should be established, but that it should be then established, and by the Act then under the consideration of the House. And having affirmed that proposition, the hon. gentleman now thought it consistent with his dignity and position in this country, with his attitude as the second in command of the gentlemen opposite, to declare against the Statute, and to say that the creation of the Court was premature, and a subject of which the Liberal party had very little to be proud. He (Mr. Blake) had now pointed out what the right hon. member for Kingston thought his position called him to do; and he (Mr. Blake) had no doubt he would continue to sustain the policy he had previously sustained. The hon. member for Cumberland had a different opinion of what the dignity of his position required of him, and he (Mr. Blake) would not quarrel with that either. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) used much stronger language, and spoke of the scandalous waste of public money caused by the creation of the Court. That was a censure upon his leader, the right hon. member for Kingston, on his deputy leader, the hon. member for Cumberland, and upon other gentlemen sitting on the front benches of the Opposition whom he sustained and whom he desired to replace in power. These gentlemen, when they were in power, sought to engraft that Supreme Court Act on the Statute-book and sustained it in Opposition, after a long interval of reflection, and after taking a full view of it from that different standpoint from that which they had occupied for many years. After all these years of deliberation and consultation, which were required to enable them to make up their minds, those gentlemen had ultimately decided to support that which, while in Government, they had proposed—the creation of a Supreme Court—as a fit and proper thing to be done at the time, and in the way it was done. Let him go a little further. The right hon. member for Kingston, in making the speeches which wore the hand-book of his followers, declared that this Bill had been found by the Liberal party in his pigeon holes. He said it was his Bill which they had taken and put on the Statute-book, so that they had no right to claim the credit of it. But, as had been pointed out by his hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) it was not his Bill after all. He fathered it, but it was another person's child, and the country had to pay for the production of it. He (Mr. Blake) did not complain of that, except when the hon. gentlemen claimed the Act as his own and declared that no one else should touch that sacred thing without proclaiming: "This is the work of the right hon. member for Kingston." This was rather strong, when the Public Accounts proved that an eminent Judge had been paid for it out of the public funds. Such as the present Act was, it was not the one which the late Minister of Justice introduced, though he (Mr. Blake) admitted that it was largely based upon the previous measure which, indeed, was frankly stated by the Minister of Justice himself when he brought it under the notice of the House. The hon. member for Cumberland took another position when he spoke upon the measure, which rather amused him (Mr. Blake). He pointed out that the measure was rather a failure because, as he alleged, appeals were going fast and free—he believed that was the expression—to the Privy Council, notwithstanding the creation of the Supreme Court. He could have understood an hon. member or a party who, when the measure was before the House, had supported the policy that the appeal to the Privy Council should be abolished, and had believed that this Court would be more useful in proportion to the completeness of the abolition of that appeal, and more lame and impotent, and would less subserve its purpose in proportion as that appeal was preserved in its fulness; making the complaint which the hon. member for Cumberland made, that, notwithstanding the creation of the Canadian Court, appeals were still made to the Privy Council. But, for a member and a party which, when a proposal was made with the design to prevent appeals to the Imperial Court which was then about being created by Act of Parliament, though it was not then in force and had since been practically abolished; which, when a clause was proposed to make the appeals final as against the appeals to that projected Imperial Court, declaimed and spoke against it, and recorded their votes against the proposed clause,—to now declaim that, notwithstanding the creation of a Canadian Court of Appeal, there were still some appeals to the Privy Council, did appear to be a monstrous piece of inconsistency. A year or two previous to that time, the Imperial Parliament had determined upon altering their Appellate Court, upon creating an Appellate Court by Act of Parliament, to which they intended to transfer the appellate jurisdiction of the Privy Council. The Act referred to was not absolutely in force, because it was to be called into force by proclamation; but it was the contemplation of the Imperial Parliament, and the opinion of hon. members in this House at the time that that policy would be completed by that Act being called into force by proclamation, and that, thereafter, appeals from all the colonies from which appeals lay would be brought to that Court. His hon. friend the member for Hamilton had, at a late stage of the measure, introduced a clause which, saving the prerogative, was intended to be and was efficacious, for the purpose of rendering the decisions of the Supreme Court final as against any appeal to that new Court; and hon. gentlemen opposite treated that proposal as, practically, a disloyal proposal. The right hon. member for Kingston had said it was a blow, if not a fatal blow, at the connection; that it would break the golden link of that connection; that the right of appeal should be preserved in its integrity; that nothing whatever should be done, in the slightest degree, to impair or prevent it. The right hon. member admitted the clause did not absolutely preclude an appeal, but pointed out that it threw certain obstacles in the way of appeal, which he thought ought not to exist. He (Mr. Blake) did not object to the right hon. member for Kingston enunciating that policy, because it was the policy which he had enunciated before, in his second Supreme Court Bill. In the first Bill, nothing had been said on the subject of appeal to the Queen in Council—if there had been, he (Mr. Blake) should have approved it—but, in his second Supreme Court Bill, the right hon. member for Kingston expressly provided, after years of deliberation, consultation and advice, for an appeal from the decision of this, the highest Canadian Court, in every case in which the sum involved exceeded five hundred pounds sterling. The right hon. member was, therefore, not inconsistent when he objected to anything which would interfere with the the right of appeal. But the hon. member for Cumberland who voted against that clause, with the right hon. member for Kingston, was very far from being consistent, when he stated that there were some appeals, notwithstanding the passage of the measure by the present Government. That was a proposal of the right hon. member of a most retrograde character; for, in the Province of Ontario, during a great many years, the decision of its local Court of Appeal had been final in all cases where the sum involved was less than four thousand dollars. The hon. member was proposing that the decisions of a higher Court should be final for a sum not more than half that in which the decision of the local Court of Ontario had for many years been absolutely final. He (Mr. Blake) considered that this question as to the appeal placed the hon. member for Cumberland in a very unsatisfactory position. His (Mr. Blake's) own opinion was that it should, if possible, be wholly abolished, or that, if not, it should be so regulated and restrained as to confine appeals, if any, to a very large and important sum, so as to reduce to a minimum what he regarded as a very great evil.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The appeal to England?

MR. BLAKE: The appeal to England. He did not complain of the observations of the hon.

member for Cumberland in so far as they indicated that the existence of appeal was a blemish, but he did complain of his observations, as coming from a quarter which had resisted even the slight fetter upon the Bill which was carried in Parliament. It was singular that from the Province of Quebec came the principal complaints with reference to the creation of this Court. That Province had made far the greatest use, in times past, of appeal to the Queen in Council, of any of the Provinces. It had experienced to the greatest extent, the evils, the grievances which resulted from the existence of that right of appeal; it had availed itself to far the greatest extent of the benefits which had been conferred on it, in common with the other Provinces, by the creation of the new Court. He would tell hon. gentlemen what the practical result in the Province of Quebec had been for some years before the creation of the Court, from statistics which he had collected on an occasion when it was his duty to do so in an official capacity. The number of appeals permitted in the Province of Quebec between the 1st January, 1871, and 1st January, 1876, was ninety-three; but in forty-eight only of these was the preliminary step of giving security taken, so that very nearly one-half of them were just allowed, but no security was given, and nothing further was done. Of the forty-eight in which security was given, only thirty-eight, or not much more than one-third of the total number allowed, were successfully prosecuted. Of these thirty-eight, twenty-nine were adjudged upon, which comprised nineteen affirmations and ten reversals; so that the practical result of the appeal to England, as far as the Province of Quebec was concerned, in this long period of five years, was that there were ninety-three appeals allowed, twenty-nine adjudged upon, and but ten reversals. The figures in the latter part of that epoch were, perhaps, still more instructive. From June, 1874, to March, 1875, forty-six appeals were allowed, in twenty of which the security was deposited, and twelve of which were effectually prosecuted. In order that hon. gentlemen might understand how it happened that there was such a very large number of appeals allowed, without further steps being taken to prosecute them, it was necessary to consider a little the question of cost. In these nineteen cases in which judgments were affirmed, costs were ordered to be paid, according to the custom of the Privy Council, to the respondents. The Clerk of the Court certified that the aggregate of costs so taxed to the respondents was £7,646 sterling, making an average of £402 costs taxed to each respondent. The best authorities, including Lapp and Simons, a well-known authority on costs, estimated that the costs between party and party, of the appellant, who had to bear a larger proportion of the costs, exceeded the costs of the respondent by forty pounds, so that to get the party and party costs of the appellant that they must add that, making £442 costs. The best authorities also considered that 22½ per cent. should be added for extra costs between solicitors and clients, in order to ascertain the total costs to come out of the pockets of the unfortunate suitors, and that made the average cost of appeal from Lower Canada no less than £1,034, or about $5,000 in some cases, no doubt, less, in others more; but the fairest way to ascertain the burden was to take the average based on this calculation of the whole number of cases in five years, and the amount thus obtained was five thousand dollars. But those costs did not include the allowance for such extra costs as had been incurred of late years, when Lower Canadian counsel had been retained to cross the Atlantic, to argue cases which were dependent on Quebec law, and where suitors had felt it hopeless to look for a judgment at the hands of Judges who, however impartial and intelligent, were not conversant with that law, when their cases were argued by counsel, however intelligent and acute they might be, who also were not familiar with it. In order to avoid that, to get such justice as they could before such a tribunal, counsel had been specially retained in these cases to cross the Atlantic for that purpose, and such costs were not included in this sum. Here were thirty-nine causes effectually prosecuted, in which, therefore, these costs had been incurred, and these costs, so incurred, amounted to over forty thousand pounds sterling, or two hundred thousand dollars, and the practical result to the people of the country was that, in ten cases—he did not know of what value—the judgments were reversed; so that, to get a general result of reversing ten Provincial judgments, there was a total cost of two hundred thousand dollars taken out of the pockets of unfortunate suitors, giving an average of $5,000 costs in each case. The right to appeal from the Province of Quebec was limited to sums over £500 sterling. What would be the position of a man who, having obtained a judgment for £500 or thereabouts, was threatened with an appeal to the Privy Council? He went to his lawyer for advice, and was told, in the first place, that it would be, as the average proved, between two and three years before he could hope to file a judgment. If this appeal was prosecuted, he was told he would have to wait two or three years more before he could get his money. He was also told that he would have to advance, at once, to his lawyers, here and in England, a very large sum to pay the expenses for printing, preparing the case, paying the fees, and instructing counsel. For this he must advance £500 more. He asked "Will I get interest on it?" The answer was, "No." He asked, "Will I get it back?" He was told that he would get part of it, in case he won, but that he would lose $500 in any case. "What," said the unfortunate suitor, "I am to lose a fifth of my deposit at any rate, I am to wait six years for my money, I am to raise this money and lose the interest on it, and then I may lose my case after all. What is the worst?" The lawyer would be obliged to tell him that the worst was yet to come, that, beside the five hundred pounds sterling, he would have to pay, in case of being beaten, the costs of the other side, about four hundred pounds sterling, making, in all, nine hundred pounds sterling of costs, besides losing the debt. The suitor would naturally ask whether he had not better compromise, and would be answered by a lawyer in the affirmative, and be told that the majority of these appeals were presented only as a means of forcing a settlement, as it was known that, if honestly advised, when an appeal was threatened, it was better to mitigate the demand, however certain the suitor might be of success, and to take a percentage of his claim than to prosecute the appeal and win. That was the liberal state of things, with reference to this golden link, this blessing, which hon. gentlemen desired to be continued to their constituents and their clients. Now, they knew the reason why ninety-three appeals were allowed, and only thirty-nine effectually prosecuted. The reason was that, in the great majority of cases, these appeals were presented with the deliberate view that the party would be advised that it was better to submit to a reduction in the amount of his judgment, an unjust diminution, however confident of success, than to run the risk with its disproportionate and incomprehensible expense, for the chance of success. If he (Mr. Blake) was rightly informed, and he had obtained his information from good authority, in numerous cases, compromises of demands, which the counsel were positively assured were well founded and in which they were sure a judgment must be ultimately obtained, were made, simply because the parties could not afford these inevitable costs and run the risk of losing the debt besides, and being ruined in the prosecution of the appeal. Were the Government guilty of an attempt to deprive the people of Quebec of a blessing, of a protection, of a cherished right when they attempted to give them—not depriving them, as they did not deprive them of the cherished power of appealing from their own local Court direct to the Privy Council—when they attempted to give them a Court which held its sittings within four or five hours' journey from their principal city; a Court, one-third of which was guaranteed to be chosen from their own bar, conversant with their own law; a Court to which they were able to send their own counsel in whom they had confidence, at comparatively small cost, to argue their cases, and in which certainly economy and expedition of decision ought to be and was, in his opinion, more sure than in the tribunal to which he had referred. Could any honest man compare the tribunal to which he had referred, with the incidental difficulties attending it, with the tribunal created by this Act, and not say that a substantial boon had been accorded to the whole Dominion, especially the Province of Quebec, which, apparently, found the greatest amount of dissatisfaction with the decisions of its local Courts, judging only from the greater number of appeals made to this inadequate, expensive, dilatory and unsatisfactory tribunal—the Queen in Council? What was the system which previously existed? The appeal was made to the Queen in Council. They went before a number of eminent jurists, doubtless; but they were versed in a Constitution, one of whose cardinal principles, the omnipotence of the Imperial Parliament, was entirely opposed to our cardinal principle of the limited power of the central Parliament, and the absolute power, within their own sphere, of the Local Legislatures. The written Federal Constitution presented points important and difficult, which the British Constitution, not federal and not written, could never present—points of importance and difficulty which, he did not hesitate to say, the most acute intelligence and the most profound learning in the laws and the Constitution of such a country as Great Britain very inadequately provided those who possessed them for the adjudication of, unless they lived under such a constitution as ours, and were daily conversant, as we were, with the nature of those questions, the difficulties which they raised, the modes adopted for their solution, the general understanding which we were slowly and painfully gathering round us as to the real meaning and extent of our Federal Constitution. He did not think it was possible that that class of questions which most of all was likely to be obscure and difficult, and which was most likely to be the subject of appeal, could be as satisfactorily interpreted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as by persons who lived among ourselves, or could be as satisfactorily argued as by counsel who were conversant with the customs, Constitution and the modes of action of the country. The hon. gentleman had said that these Judges were highly cultivated, and were the best interpreters of the law. The Imperial Parliament had said that they were entitled to make the laws; but we were jealous of that principle, and would not hand over to a Parliament in London the determination of what our laws, our civil rights, or our constitutional system should be, so far as we were, capable of modifying it, and, of course the House knew that the Local Legislatures had enormous powers of altering their Constitution; we had a profound conviction that no other persons than ourselves were equally able to understand and appreciate what we wanted and to put it into law. But the moment the question of the interpretation of the law arose, they were told that, though they made laws, they were unable to provide amongst themselves a tribunal which was fit to satisfactorily interpret them. Why, that proposition was humiliating and those who said we could not pick six or seven men out of the Dominion to whom we were willing to entrust the final determination of our laws condemned themselves, condemned the country, did not look forward to our expanded development, but declared that we were unequal to the exercise of the powers we now possessed. The hon. member for Charlevoix said he was anxious for an appeal to the people. The last time the hon. gentleman went to the people he did not seem to be anxious about it. But he had come back by a protracted process which he (Mr. Blake) would not discuss. The hon. gentleman objected to the costs of the Court, and he regretted that the hon. member had been put to such a large expense in his own case. He believed there was some miscarriage in reference to the printing of the volume in the Charevoix case. It was a circumstance which involved blame on some one, but, if they looked at the rules of the Court, it would be found that the printing was an expense dependent on the Court of Record. The rules were under the control of Parliament, and could be rescinded or amended by action of the House if they were found objectionable. It was necessary that all expenses should be cut to the lowest point consistent with the fair preparation of the cases. He ventured to hope, and he would be disappointed if his hope were not realized, that it would be found as a rule that the expenses of the Supreme Court only exceeded by some trifle the expenses of the Appellate Courts in the Provinces, and he saw no reason why they should do so more than about $100. And so as regarded time. The delay ought not to be great. The period in which the suitor was kept in doubt ought not to be long, and he believed that, in those particulars, the Court would soon vindicate itself. Since the Court had been instituted 68 appeals had been entered, 19 from the Province of Ontario, 23 from Quebec, 19 from Nova Scotia, 3 from Prince Edward Island, 2 from New Brunswick, 1 from British Columbia, and 1 from Manitoba. It, therefore, appeared that Quebec, although smaller in population than Ontario, furnished 23 appeals against 19 from the latter Province. But that was not the only work before the Court. Of the 68 appeals, 46 were actually argued, some of the balance were dismissed, and others abandoned. But the Court also exercised the functions of an Exchequer Court, and, in the short period during which it had exercised those functions, twenty petitions had been filed under the Act in cases amounting in the aggregate to more than $3,750,000, or an average of $180,000. Those important questions, the Court was called upon to consider as an Exchequer Court, independent altogether of its principal duties as the Supreme Court. He gave those figures because the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), when he delivered his speech, attacking the financial transactions of the Government, indicated that the Supreme Court formed almost the entire aggregate of the increased expenditure, and, when he (Mr. Blake) told him the cost had been $50,000 instead of $100,000, the hon. member said he was very glad, as he would be enabled to tell the people the cost was only $1,000 a case instead of $2,000. The Court had not long been established. It was not to be expected that, as an

Appeal Court, it would be able immediately to develop the business which would ultimately go to it, but the vast mass in value of litigation before it as an Exchequer Court, and the important number of cases before it as an Appeal Court, did indicate that it was reasonably well received by the people of this country, and that its Judges would have sufficient work to perform. Nor did he think any other justification need be given for the creation of the Court than this: that the Government provided, what seemed to be absolutely essential, one tribunal by which there would be uniformity of decision in the election cases, altogether apart from the great advantages to which he had referred. It was utterly impossible that a system should continue by which the various Provincial Judges should dispose of the election cases in the various Provinces, laying down different rules in each decision, and giving no certainty as to what the meaning of the law was; but, as there was one law common to the Dominion, it should receive one interpretation. He did not expect the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) to agree that such was one of the duties of the Supreme Court. He was not so unreasonable as to expect that hon. gentleman to concur in that statement; but he, perhaps, would agree that, if the Supreme Court had given a different decision in the Charlevoix case, it would have been a good tribunal. It would have been disastrous to the country and to Parliament if our common Election Law was to be interpreted according to their views by the different Provincial Judges, and the people never know what the real interpretation of the law was. One common Court, responsible more particularly to the Dominion Parliament, owing, not merely the appointment of its Judges, but its creation to Parliament, was essential. The right hon. member for Kingston went further than he (Mr. Blake) did. The right hon. gentleman was of opinion that, as soon as the Court was established, it should take primary cognizance in all election cases; but he (Mr. Blake) was not prepared to say if a general election took place, they could possibly have the advantage of the primary jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, as it would be impossible that six Judges could try all the election cases, from British Columbia to Halifax, if the right of appeal were superseded by original jurisdiction. Unfortunately, they were unable to provide for the original trial of all election cases by that one Court, but being so unable they were bound, according to the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, to provide one tribunal. This was not a policy simply introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite when in office, for the consideration of the House, and in order to console their supporters, but they embodied it in law, and the Election Law provided that, as soon as the Supreme Court was established, it should take cognizance of those questions. Whether they regarded the quasi-political functions or the other functions of the Court, if they were not able to point out that it was part of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, which they had failed to carry out, but which the present Government had accomplished, and if they were obliged to admit that, hon. gentlemen opposite had opposed, instead of supported the Government measure, they were prepared to vindicate the creation of the Supreme Court before the people as an act, both on account of its policy and on account of the dignity of the country, eminently proper, and to ask the people to agree with them that it was created not a day too soon, at an expense not one shilling too great, and it was a course which they would approve. At the same time he held that, in a political sense, it was the reverse of fair and candid for the Conservative party, for the hon. member for Cumberland, and others who had followed and led him, while sustaining such a measure when in office, to attempt to say one word against it now. Even if there were flaws and difficulties in the Act, those men's mouths were, or in decency ought to be, shut respecting it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Bruce has given a long and very interesting account of the Supreme Court, its creation, formation, and the expenses attendant upon it. I may say, he rather dragged the subject into this discussion; it was a matter of episode rather than relevant to the motion under discussion; nor was it an answer to any remarks made by the hon. gentlemen from Bagot or Charlevoix. It would have been infinitely better if the hon. member had allowed the discussion on the question before the House to close, and that matter would have come up more appropriately when the Estimates were being considered and the Administration of Justice was being discussed. As for myself, the hon. gentleman says I am bound to support the Government with reference to the Supreme Court Bill. I did support the Government in reference to that matter, and I supported the resolution to fix the salaries as they are at present, although some of my friends around me voted against me, and supported a proposition to give lower salaries to the Chief Justice and the Puisne Judges. My hon. friends exercised their opinions, and they had a perfect right to do so, and I do not think they are open to the charge of ignoring their duty to their party, their duty to their leader, or the accusation of not sufficiently keeping up the solidarity of the party, which the hon. member for South Bruce has thrown out to them as a reproach. Why, these gentlemen are independent members of Parliament. They have a right to express their opinions, and I think no one has more frequently exercised that privilege than the hon. member for South Bruce himself. That hon. gentleman, when it pleased himself, came into the Administration of the present First Minister; that hon. gentleman, when it pleased himself, left that Government and became an independent member; that hon. gentleman, when it pleased himself, returned to the Government; and, during the interregnum between his first resignation and his second advent, I think he gave rather a weary time of it to my hon. friend the Premier. I think that the question of solidarity did not exactly enter into the mind of the hon. member for South Bruce then, and I have some idea that, with a view to performing his duty to his constituents, and with a view to carrying out his own principles conscientiously, he shot directly into the back of the Premier on the question of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Bill. I also remember that he, neglectful of that same solidarity of party, and without that same sense of party duty and obligation of which he now speaks, when we charged the Premier with having been guilty of a breach of the law during his fit of temporary independence, went, when the vote was being called for, out of one door, Mr. Justice Moss out of the other, and the Minister of the Interior out of another. These gentlemen chose rather to sacrifice their duty to their leader than their duty to their consciences, and now feel what a respect the hon. the Premier has for them, for the independence they showed, and for their neglect of their solidarity, by giving them situations under him. It is, therefore, rather hard that the hon. member for South Bruce should attack my friends for acting regardless of the obligations of party. The hon. gentleman said that I voted for the Supreme Court Bill because I fathered it, although the child was not mine. I do not think it was exactly wise of the hon. member for South Bruce to say that. He alludes to the fact that a fee was paid to Mr. Justice Strong, who was counsel for settling that Bill. The hon. gentleman surely knows that in England every Bill that is drawn by the Government is settled by the Parliamentary counsel, who are employed for that purpose. He should know that Sir Henry Thring makes £20,000 a year, and Sir Wm. Ryley makes £10,000 a year as Parliamentary counsel. Mr. Thomas Holland, counsel for the Colonial Office, settles all the Colonial Office legislation. At the time the British North America Act was settled, the Colonial Office handed that measure over to the consideration of Sir Wm. Ryley altogether. So that even had it been true that the Supreme Court Bill had been drawn by Mr. Strong, the Government of which I was a member would have the same right to claim that measure as Mr. Gladstone would have to claim the merit, as he does claim it, of being the author of the Act for the disestablishment of the Church of England in Ireland, although he never settled one single line or clause in that Act. But I stated in my place, when this question was up before, that that Bill was settled by myself and Mr. Archibald, now the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, and was submitted to Mr. Strong, whose great ability has been recognized by the Government, which made him a Supreme Court Judge, and by myself before that, in making him a Judge in the Court of Chancery in Ontario. Besides that, I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that I received suggestions from many Judges, and from very many other persons, and I was glad to get them. But the Government of which I was a member and myself were responsible for that measure, and we have a right to claim, in the same way as the Premier claimed it, when the Government was charged last summer with the paucity of its legislative enactments, the credit for it; for did not Mr. Fournier state, in his place in the House, that he would scarcely have had the courage to introduce the Bill if he had not had the assistance of the measure left by his predecessors? I do not propose to enter into a discussion about the merits of the Supreme Court Bill. That question is now a matter of law, and, if the Parliament hereafter thinks proper to deal differently with the subject, and remove every obstruction in the way of the appeal to England, it will do so. I still think that link, that privilege of appealing to the Throne, is a golden link. I think that the fact that every subject of Her Majesty can appeal to the foot of the Throne is a great privilege, and it is a wholesome check on our colonial Judges, without any disparagement to them. It builds up one mighty connection, from the Crown, the head of the law, of the Church, and the nation, down to the Courts in every colony. I think it is a golden link, and, if I did not think that I should, perhaps, be trespassing on the patience of the House, as the hon. member for South Bruce has to-night, I would be quite ready to defend that opinion now. The time, I dare say, will come when I shall have an opportunity of doing it. Perhaps it will not, for, although I participate in my hon. friend's wish for an early appeal to the people, I may have the misfortune of disappearing from the stage altogether, but "Sparta has many a worthier son than me," and I have no doubt that my place will be worthily filled. But, whenever the time comes, I shall be prepared to vindicate my position and the opinion I hold, that it is necessary to keep up our connection with the Mother Country, and that there should be an appeal to the foot of the Throne. The hon. member for South Bruce objects to the appeal being too easy, and to any appeal at all except for large and important sums. My idea is that the appeal is not to be judged by the sum, but by the importance of the case. The hon. gentleman knows that the greatest questions connected with the rights of the people have been decided on matters of infinitesimally small importance, so far as the sums of money involved are concerned. So I think he has taken a commercial, rather than a legal, view of the matter. But my hon. friend from Charlevoix was treated by him (Mr. Blake) to a little bit of sarcasm because he ventured to say that he would like an early appeal to the people. The hon. gentleman said it did not lie with him to call for an appeal, because he was not returned at the last general election. Now, Sir, in 1874, it is true the present Opposition was subjected to a great storm of obloquy, and hon. gentlemen opposite said we were submerged by the wave, and would never rise again. But now, so great is the change in the country and in the feeling of the people, that, although we were overwhelmed, we know that there is a reaction in the country, and ask it, as a privilege and a boon to our party and our country, that we may have the opportunity of appealing to the country, and at the earliest moment convenient, and we are willing to abide the result. I have been led away to make these few remarks by the speech of the hon. member for South Bruce, but I address the House, not for the purpose of continuing the discussion, but rather to take a step which I hope will close it. The debate has been a very long one. My business prevented me from hearing the best part of it, but I have had the advantage of reading the speeches that have been made, and I see that the administration of affairs by the present Government, especially in its financial relations, have been gone into on both sides so fully and exhaustively that I feel I cannot add much, if anything at all, to what has been said for the information of the House. I, therefore, do not feel myself at liberty to detain the House at any great length. It has never been, as everybody knows who has been kind enough to watch my course, a claim of mine that I am an adept at figures or financial matters, and, therefore, it would be absurd in me to add more than a general opinion to what has been said by gentlemen who better know the subject, and who have addressed themselves to it so fully and so exhaustively. But, in the position I now hold, I think it is well that, at this stage of the debate, and in order to reduce the stream of discussion, which has been widening, into a narrower channel, I should lay before this House a resolution in amendment to the motion, which will be expressive of the policy of those with whom I am associated, and, I believe, the policy which will be acceptable to the country. In bringing forward this resolution, I am doing what, perhaps, I am not called upon to do. The hon. the First Minister very truly said, some years ago, that they, the then Opposition, were not called upon to find a policy for the country; that the responsibility of finding such a policy rested with the Ministry of the day; and that the constitutional duty of Her Majesty's Opposition, the constitutional duty that was thrown upon them was to criticize the administration and legislation of the Government, to hold them in check, to warn them when they were going wrong, to censure them when they had gone wrong, and generally criticize and observe upon the course of administration and legislation. If the Opposition chose to take a further step, they might do, certainly, but it is not forced upon them, and it is not forced upon them in reference to any subject. It is not forced upon the Opposition to find a new policy with regard to matters of revenue, and tariff, and expenditure; they could not, of course, because they have not the power to do so. As far as matters of tariff are concerned, it is impossible for the Opposition to enter into details or explain before the House and the country their policy; they have not the material; the Government alone have the opportunity, and the only opportunity, of collecting the facts upon which a tariff can be formed. The Finance Minister has already informed you that, even with all the materials he has at hand, it is not an easy matter to form the tariff; and it would be presumption in the Opposition to attempt to do so; I shall, therefore, confine myself to general principles. Now, as to matters of finance and matters of tariff, the policy of the Opposition has been announced on several occasions in no uncertain manner. Going back to 1876, we find that the policy of the Opposition was announced in a motion which I moved in going into Committee of Supply, seconded by the hon. member for Cumberland. I moved as an amendment:

“That this House regrets that His Excellency the Governor-General has not been advised to recommend to Parliament a measure for the readjustment of the tariff, which would not only aid to alleviate the stagnation of business deplored in the gracious Speech from the Throne, but also afford fitting encouragement and protection to the struggling manufactures and industries as well as the agricultural products of the country.”

That was the resolution of 1876, and then we had the satisfaction of getting not only the ordinary Opposition vote to support it, but several of the hon. gentlemen who usually support the Government but who forgot, for the time, their stolid allegiance. In the last Session, the same policy was announced. I again moved an amendment:

“That this House regrets that the financial policy submitted by the Government increases the burden of taxation on the people, without any compensating advantage to Canadian industries; and further, that this House is of opinion that the deficiency in the revenue should be met by a diminution of expenditure, aided by such a readjustment of the tariff as will benefit and foster the agricultural, mining and manufacturing interests of the Dominion.”

That was the policy supported by the whole of this side of the

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

House during last Session, and the Minister of Finance has referred to a series of resolutions, passed by Conservatives in Toronto, in favour of this policy. It is merely a series of resolutions voluntarily passed by a number of gentlemen expressive of their views, without any object whatever. They were signed by about seven hundred gentlemen, representative men, most of them, from all parts of the Province of Ontario; and from their standing and their character, their resolutions deserve every respect, and, no doubt, will receive every respect and consideration, even from those who are opposed to their views. These resolutions I cordially endorse. They were quoted by the hon. the Minister of Finance in his speech, therefore I need not read them again. I propose to move a resolution that you do not now leave the chair, and that it be resolved, in the following language—and then, I state, of course, in this resolution, the policy we are prepared to take. During its debate, I shall assist, as far as possible—and I hope this will meet the approval of hon. gentlemen—I shall assist the hon. the First Minister in bringing the debate to a close to-night. I move:

“That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that this House is of the opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the Tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country, eventually, a reciprocity of trade.”

AN HON. MEMBER: Is that all.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It may be too much for you. That is the resolution which I submit to this House, and I do not think any hon. gentleman will say we have not taken our stand upon a policy. It may be a policy which the hon. gentleman does not think a good one; if so, he will have the advantage. The hon. gentleman will go to the country and, I have no doubt, point out the fallacy of it; and, if we are wrong, we must submit to the consequences of our error. But we believe that resolution embodies and embraces a policy which will be accepted, and accepted warmly by this country, and that this country will declare, in the words used in that resolution: "That the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy." Now, we are often asked: what is a National Policy? The gentlemen on the opposite side brought in a measure, in a previous year, which they called a National Policy. That is practically Free-trade, is announced to be Free-trade, but obstructed a little from reaching entire perfection, by the necessities of revenue. But, if it were not for these necessities of revenue, I understand the policy of gentlemen opposite would be Free-trade; but the policy of the Opposition is as announced in the resolution. Now, Free-trade may be all very well in its way. In the abstract, Free-trade is the liberty of buying in the cheapest market, and selling in the dearest. In the abstract, it is a proposition not to be disputed; but, when brought down to the concrete, when the needs of nations are considered, and the peculiar needs of Canada are considered, it is found impossible to carry it out. All the countries, even England, have found out that it cannot be carried out except as a proposition in the abstract. But Free-trade does not mean that the nation is to open its own doors to every other nation, whether those nations open their doors or not; Free-trade means free trade. Free-trade between nations means that the vendor and the vendee, the seller and the purchaser, shall be equally free, and enjoy equality in their market. And, as we hear of Free-trade and its objects alluded to so much, let us ask where is Free-trade to be found? Not anywhere. I know of no place in the world where it is to be found. In Germany, for a short time, Free-trade, or a quality of Free-trade, was carried out; but Germany was then not a nation, but a congeries of friendly nations that had a programme of Free-trade of the old variety—but, with the exception of that country, Free-trade was never carried out anywhere. But Free-trade, in the sense used by hon. gentlemen opposite—in the sense in which it is pressed in England by the bigots, if I may use the expression, who make political economy a superstition more than a religion—the Free-trade which has been argued in England, which has been argued here, and which has been argued in the United States, would never make a nation. There are national considerations, Mr. Speaker, that rise far higher than the mere accumulation of wealth, than the mere question of trade advantage; there is prestige, national status, national dominion,—and no great nation has ever risen whose policy was Free-trade. Look at history; look back on the annals of nations, and point out the great nation that has ever risen out of a policy or from a principle of Free-trade. Everyone knows it is said continually about England, that England has accumulated an enormous mass of wealth; but it was not Free-trade that gave her her wealth—it was gained in the long Peninsula war, while all continental Europe was convulsed and paralyzed. England, in its isolated position, with the silver streak described by Gladstone separating it from all the storms and all the wars and all the destruction that was visiting continental Europe, went on its way rejoicing. England was in the position of being a large country, a large manufacturing country, an agricultural country to a large extent, and having a backbone of agriculture to retire upon, and with all these great national advantages possessing perfect peace and perfect security. It had also the great national advantage of coal and iron; and during the whole period of those wars it had not only the great and overwhelming and paramount advantage of perfect peace and perfect security, but it had also a tariff which gave to the manufacturers the whole control of the English market, the whole control of the colonial market of the vast colonial empire of England. She had these advantages, and, when peace returned and found the nations of Europe with all their industries paralyzed, for they had to commence de novo and to get rid of an enormous amount of taxation created by years and years of war, and to generate capital anew, England had the whole commercial world at her feet. During that long war, England's artizans had acquired great skill, and her manufactures had acquired capital to employ that skill, and, when the war terminated, England found the whole commercial world at her feet. And then came the cry of Free-trade. England offered to open all her ports to the world if the other nations would open their ports to her. How generous. Anyone could see that she had the best side of the bargain; for, if these markets were open to her, she could have control of them for ever. With all her advantages of capital, with all her advantages of skill, with her immense array of artizans, anyone could see that, if she had induced the continental nations to adopt a Free-trade policy and open their ports to her, she would control their markets for ever. And for years and years she did control their markets, in spite of all the nations in the world, and it was only by slow degrees, as the nations recovered from the commercial stagnation caused by that twenty years' war and began to accumulate capital that she lost her supreme ascendancy. Those nations did not take the advice of England; they did not submit to the voice of the charmer; they kept their duties. They felt the burthen of the enormous debt with which they had been overwhelmed and that they were compelled, for revenue purposes, to keep those duties up. The consequence was that they were deaf to the voice of the charmer, and by slow degrees those protective countries have arrived at an equality with England herself, and are competing with her in the markets of the world, fighting with her on equal terms, and sometimes more than equal terms, for the traffic of neutral nations. And, more than that, we are engaging England herself. What is the consequence? The stroke was a bold one, and the Government played a magnificent game. They said to other nations: "We will throw open our doors to you if you throw open your doors to us." It was a magnificent game, but it had not succeeded. Other nations would not play the game, and the consequence was there was a cry in England—in London, in Sheffield, in the great centres of English manufacturing industry—that the English people will not keep their doors open to all the world, when all the world are closing their doors to England. A striking example of that occurred only on the 14th February last, when the Chamber of Commerce in Sheffield deliberately declined to agree to the proposition or resolution adopted at Birmingham, expressing undiminished confidence in the principles of Free-trade and urging the Government to faithfully adhere to that policy irrespective of the action of foreign nations as regards tariffs. The Sheffield Chamber of Commerce declined its support on the ground that such a resolution would be practically telling France and other foreign countries that they might impose what tariffs they pleased on British goods without running the risk of retaliatory measures. So we find in other parts of England that cry has been raised, and it will have its effect in the lifetime of many men in this House. I am an old man, but I think I may live to see the time when that cry will be successful in England; the time when, if reciprocity in trade and equitable commercial treaties cannot be obtained, the people of England will say: "We will not allow our industries and our accumulated capital of so many years to be swept away by nations who do not give us a chance of competing in their markets, and who, by their legislation, specially exclude England." I would like to call the attention of the House to an article in the Saturday Review for February. It is entitled "British versus Foreign Labour," and is written principally with the view of showing whether the skill of the British artizan was not being outdone by superior skill elsewhere. Certain portions of it apply to the subject on which I am speaking, and I shall therefore read some extracts to you:—

"But if the superiority which our work-people formerly possessed is passing away from them, the means of subsistence of this ever-growing part of our nation is being endangered. It is not the foreign market alone that is put in jeopardy; that would be lost first, of course. But the home market also will be invaded, for nothing is more certain than that pre-eminence in neutral markets determines pre-eminence everywhere. If we cannot hold our own when we meet competitors on equal terms particularly, we cannot meet them at home. The alternative would then be to submit to be undersold in our own markets, or to revive protection. In that well-known work, Mr. Brassey has established conclusively that high wages do not prevent the country from attaining the greatest manufacturing prosperity, and in his recent lecture he addresses a fresh illustration of the same proposition. He has no misgivings respecting countries where cheap labour and a low standard of living prevails."

He goes on to say—

"The only country which fills me with apprehension is that in which labour is pre-eminently better paid than in our own, and where the standard of living is higher as well. We refer, of course, to the United States."

The locomotive manufactories of Pennsylvania, as he points out—

"Have supplied the railways on every market with engines, and are now supplying our Australian colonies, thus beating our own manufacturers in markets where they have competed, and in every branch of industry in which they ought to be foremost. It has been reported that the engines they turn out are of inferior workmanship. We are slow to accept explanations of this kind, remembering that the Americans allege precisely similar reasons to account for the pre-eminence of the Lancashire cotton trade. But even if it were correct, it would not touch the fact that, with a fair field and no favour, the Pennsylvanian locomotive manufacturers turn out an article which is preferred to the British. The fact will lose none of its significance when we further bear in mind that the United States have been supplying both Turkey and Russia with arms in the present war, and supplied France in 1870, and that, likewise, American corn and American beef are having all competitors in our own markets."

But that cannot possibly be. There are great protection countries, and in America there is great misery and great suffering. We are told the depression of that country is terrific; that we are in a happy, blessed state in comparison with that country. Yet, with all their depression, with all their bad trade, and with all their strikes, the people of that country are successfully competing in the English markets, and not only so, but in all the markets to which England has access—beating Eng'and out of the field, despite those disasters. True, they have suffered as this country has suffered. But there is this difference. We have no manufactures here. We have no work-people; our work-people have gone off to the United States. They are to be found employed in the Western States, in Pittsburg, and, in fact, in every place where manufactures are going on. These Canadian artizans are adding to the strength, to the power, and to the wealth of a foreign nation instead of adding to ours. Our work-people in this country, on the other hand, are suffering for want of employment. Have not their cries risen to Heaven? Has not the hon. the Premier been surrounded and besieged, even in his own Department, and on his way to his daily duties, by suffering artizans who keep crying out: "We are not beggars, we only want an opportunity of helping to support ourselves and our families." Is not such the case also in Montreal and in Quebec? In fact, is not that the state of things which exists in every part of Canada as well as in the United States? But this must also be borne in mind, that, when the depression is over and times become prosperous, there will be found manufactories in the United States where men will be required to work. The manufactories and the men are there, but we have not got them here. If we had a protective system in this country, if we had a developed capital, we could, by giving our manufacturers a reasonable hold on our home trade, attain a higher position among the nations. If our factories were fenced round to a certain extent with protection,—I do not mean that we should adopt a tariff like that of the United States, which I believe to be in many respects an unscientific one,—and impose a tariff such as the necessities of Canada may demand, our national prosperity would be enhanced. The United States tariff, which grew out of the necessities of the war, is unscientific, and wants readjustment. No doubt it will be readjusted; but, if so, it will be in a protective spirit. Let anyone read the remarks of Mr. Everts, who, on this side, is said to be a Free-trader, and it will be found that such a belief must at once be dispelled by his written observations, for he says he is in favour of the continuation of a reasonable protection for the manufacturers of the United States. I say then that, if our manufacturers had a reasonable Protection, if they had a hold upon our four millions of people in the same way as the manufacturers in the United States, then there would be a basis whereby they might be enabled to go in by degrees and develop their resources like those of the United States, who, as I have pointed out, can compete with and undersell England in every part of the world. The consequence of carrying out the principle of Free-trade to its utmost extent will prevent capital from being generated to any appreciable degree. As John Stuart Mill said in the celebrated passage so often quoted: the very fact that a nation commenced a particular industry first gives them a control over that industry. By getting the start in this way, capital is generated and a system of manufacture is formed which will prevent any rivals from successfully competing with them. So long as we have a Free-trade system, we can only have substantially one description of industry, and that is—agriculture. Agriculture must be, and will be, in our time, at all events, and for many ages, the back-bone of the Dominion of Canada. It will be a chief, a paramount interest. That interest claims and requires in this country, as in the United States, a home market. No country has ever risen to any rank in the scale of nations or civilization which possessed but one industry. That may, perhaps, be a proposition too broad with respect to manufacture, because we know that nations have risen to rank which had but few manufactures. But if, from the limit of their territorial extent they had no agricultural population, they were soon swept away. Carthage fell because it was only a manufacturing and commercial country. Athens fell for the same reason. So also with Genoa and the Hantz towns. All these merely manufacturing States, which were confined, from the smallness of their extent, to trade and commerce, were swept away because larger and more powerful nations overcame them. But no nation has arisen which had only agriculture as its industry. There must be a mixture of industries to bring out the national mind and the national strength and to form a national character. Take the instance of Russia. When it was merely an agricultural country—before the time of Peter the Great—it was a country of serfs, a barbarous country, a country of no more weight in the great European system than if it had been at Patagonia. But, when Peter the Great, barbarian as he was, desired to make his darling Russia a great country, he fell upon something else which had the effect of making his countrymen something more than mere tillers of the soil. He went away and worked as a common ship-builder in Holland and England; he introduced German artisans to foster every kind of manufacture. That fostering policy has been continued by Russia up to the present time, and now she possesses a large, an enormous, an increasing manufacturing industry. Russian goods are found now in the very centre of Asia. Russian goods are under-selling England, even in neutral countries. The Russian system is a protective system; it is a prohibitory system. Russia is now far on the way to Samarcand, to China; she has got possession of these countries as far as their markets are concerned. And what is the reason that there is such a cry in England at this moment against Russia? It is because Russia, by expanding herself and her commerce, is, by slow degrees, ousting England from those markets which she formerly claimed as her own. Russia has now become a great manufacturing country, and, as such, is rising rapidly, not only, as we all know, in strength, in power, in prosperity, but in wealth. True, in proportion to her size, her numbers and her extent of territory, her manufactures cannot compare with those of an older country like England or Germany. She is a young country; but, as such, has made greater progress in manufactures than any other.

We must, by every reasonable means, employ our people, not in one branch of industry, not merely as farmers, as tillers of the soil, but we must bring out every kind of industry, we must develop the minds of the people and their energies. Every man is not fitted to be a farmer, to till the soil; one man has a constructive genius, another is an artist, another has an aptitude for trade, another is a skillful mechanic—all these men are to be found in a nation, and, if Canada has only one branch of industry to offer them, if these men cannot find an opportunity in their own country to develop the skill and genius with which God has gifted them, they will go to a country where their abilities can be employed, as they have gone from Canada to the United States. Having said so much about a National Policy, I will call the attention of the House to what that policy is. It should consist of a judicious readjustment of the tariff which would benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing, and other interests of the Dominion; a judicious readjustment of the tariff will mean, to a certain extent, an increased duty upon certain articles; upon those articles which we can produce ourselves, which this country is fit to produce, which our climate can produce, which our people are able to manufacture. It can be well understood that a judicious tariff may, on the whole, be a moderate tariff, although on particular branches of manufacture desirable to be protected, the duties might be higher than they are at any given time. For instance, if we adopted the policy which we ought to do, of enlarging our free list, admitting into our market the raw material, the quasi raw material, which may be required for the purpose of assisting in our manufactures, we produce a diminution in the volume of taxation, and if we take the duty on tea and sugar and other necessaries which cannot be manufactured or produced in this country, why, that is a direct charge to the country, because, as we cannot manufacture or produce those articles, every farthing put upon them falls upon the consumer. We can well understand that we may raise the duty on woollen, cotton and other goods, but lower the duty on articles of general consumption which we cannot produce, and the volume of taxation may be less in fact, although it may be raised, at any given time, higher than it was before. If a man were obliged to pay a cent more on his cotton, and had a cent taken off his tea, it would be found, by calculation, that he was a gainer by the operation. It is not the tariff, but the debt that makes the taxation. If we incur a debt, the moment we incur it our obligations begin, and these obligations have to be carried out, and it matters not how this is done, we increase the debt pro tanto; it is the debt which makes the taxation, and the tariff only regulates the mode by which that debt can be defrayed. Taxation is imposed by the debt, and not by the tariff, which is simply a mode of collecting appointed by legislation, and it is a subject of fair arrangement and fair readjustment to determine where it would press the least heavily upon the people and most benefit and encourage their interests. The hon. gentleman opposite sneered at the statement that thousands of our people had left this country to seek for employment in the United States. Why, the fact is notorious that the Government of the Province of Quebec have been taking steps to bring back their people.

MR. DYMOND: Why did they want to come back?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I did not say that. I said that the Quebec Government has established agencies to induce these people to come back and re-settle in their own Province, and has failed in its endeavours. If those people had not left this country, our Government would not have tried to bring them back. And yet, the hon. member for West Middlesex denied it in toto—said it was a mistake. Let any man visit any of the manufactures in the United States, and there he will find the Canadian artizan, toiling and doing well, and, therefore, not going back; when, if Canada had had a judicious system of taxation, they would be toiling and doing well in their own country. My hon. friend from West Middlesex quoted the immense emigration from this country in the time of the late Government, and said that showed that our policy could not keep the people at home. The hon. gentleman took a year in which there was a war going on in the United States, when every man could get $800 to $1,000 bounty.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): I quoted the year 1872, about seven years after the war.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman cited several years.

MR. ROSS: But the comparison was drawn in 1872.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: When the hon. gentleman's speech appears in the Hansard, we shall find he quoted the year during which the war was going on in the United States. He spoke also as if the depression could be denied. Who denies it? Is it denied in Ottawa? Would any man who walked the streets in Ottawa deny the depression? We have a great authority in this respect in the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Ontario, in whose mouth his advisers have put the statement that he was glad to tell them that the depression was passing away, especially in the lumber trade, and yet that trade was never more depressed than at the present moment. There is no depression in the lumber trade? Let anybody look at the Gazette; let anyone look at the number of insolvencies in Montreal; at the daily account of bankruptcies in Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa and other places, sufficient to disturb and affect the honest traders who suffer from the insolvency of their neighbours by the sacrifices by assignees of insolvents' assets, in the same manner as so many are ruined by this country being made the slaughter market of the United States. In both instances the result is distress. In Montreal there were traders who had been, year after year, accumulating a competency by steady trade; when the panic came they found their shelves covered with goods which they could not sell at a reasonable price; they found their neighbours going into insolvency and sacrificing their goods at prices which precluded a profit to the honest trader; they found their goods thus rendered unsaleable at a profit, and, by degrees, were drawn into the vortex, and became ruined through the insolvencies of their neighbours. And the same result occurs, only in a larger degree, by this country being made a slaughter market of the United States. Not only is this country made a slaughter market by being overwhelmed by the sweepings of the United States, but it has sometimes been made a sacrifice market by ruinous proposals for the purpose of suppressing any given trade. We all remember what the salt manufacturers of the United States did when the salt manufacturers first opened work in Goderich. The salt manufacturers of Syracuse and Salena sent in their salt with instructions to undersell Canadian salt on the Canadian market, to crush this infant industry. The shoe trade was dealt with in the same way by the leather manufacturers of the United States. In a young country like this, manufacturers are obliged to depend a deal upon credit for the capital they have not themselves, so that when such a rush as this is made from the United States, the manufacturer in the particular branch attacked falls helplessly. He is unable to sell his wares to meet his banking engagements. He becomes insolvent, the manufactory is closed, the people are discharged, and they go off to the States. We see this view of our industry going on every year, because when confidence once goes, it is not easily restored. The American manufacturers have, in the first place, this great backing behind them. They have forty millions of people to supply. They have the control of that market, and, therefore, they are able by the usual modes of communication to form rings and associations to keep down, to a great extent, the manufacture to the limit required to supply the people, if they choose to do so, and they frequently do so. Every one of them has, some more, some less, at the end of the season, some of their manufactures which they cannot sell in that season. They will not allow them to be sold in their markets under the value, they will not sacrifice them there, but they all clear out their shops and send the refuse and the surplus over to Canada, and have their warehouses ready for next year's trade, and that is occurring in every town every day. It was grievous to see in Toronto last year, the employés of Messrs. Robert Hay & Co. working at half time, or quarter time, and many dismissed to fight the battle of life as best they could; those, of course, being the least competent, and, therefore, the least able to provide for themselves. You saw whole tons of goods marked to be sold for what they would fetch. The sweepings of the manufactories of Buffalo were sold in our markets to crush our people. It was a grievous thing to see, and that was not only one trade, but it applied to every trade in Canada. The resolution speaks not only of a reasonable readjustment of the tariff but of the encouragement and development of interprovincial trade. That is one of the great objects we should seek to attain. Formerly, we were a number of Provinces which had very little trade with each other, and very little connection, except a common allegiance to a common Sovereign, and it is of the greatest importance that we should be allied together. I believe that, by a fair readjustment of the tariff, we can increase the various industries which we can interchange one with another, and make this union a union in interest, a union in trade, and a union in feeling. We shall then grow up rapidly a good, steady and mature trade between the Provinces, rendering us independent of foreign trade, and not, as New Brunswick and Nova Scotia formerly did, look to the United States or to England for trade, but look to Ontario and Quebec,—sending their products west, and receiving the products of Quebec and Ontario in exchange. Thus the great policy, the National Policy, which we on this side are advocating, would be attained. Hon. gentlemen opposite laughed very much when they heard that part of the resolution relating to reciprocity of tariffs and reciprocity of trade; but I will tell them that, if there is one thing more than another in the minds of the people at the present time, it is this very subject. There is no mistake about it, for during the summer I had the opportunity of visiting all parts of the country, and have met many who profess themselves to be Reformers, Grits, or Liberals, upon whose minds the idea has been impressed. It has taken fast hold of the people of Ontario. Hon. gentlemen may depend upon it that the country will have it. The country will not have the present unjust policy. The country will have fair play, and will not allow our markets to be made use of by the manufacturers of a neighbouring country when they can find no better market elsewhere, and at the same time have no access to their markets. What is the consequence of this jug-handle policy? The slaughter is being made, and goods are being disposed of at a ruinous price. Our manufacturers are brought down, and next year, when the United States manufacturers may find a better market, there will be no manufacturers of our own to supply the gap, and then up go the prices. In one year a man purchases at slaughter prices, and the next year, when he is obliged to buy in his own market, having no foreign goods coming in, he will have the prices put up on him, and will find that, in the long run, he will lose, because then all our manufactories will be swept away. I find that the farmers of West Canada and East Canada could not understand there was anything in their barley, for instance, being obliged to pay a duty of 15 per cent. upon going into the United States, whereas the produce of the American farmers was allowed to be brought into this country free. It is said the consumer pays the duty and that the farmer does not suffer anything. That is the statement; but, when I put a simple case, which I have done frequently, I can get no answer. I put a case in the Eastern Townships of a man upon the imaginary line which was between this country and the United States. Suppose a man has 100 acres on the Canadian side of the line and 100 acres of land on the American side of the line. Suppose he grows 1,000 bushels of barley on each of his farms. He takes his 1,000 American bushels to the American market and gets one dollar a bushel for it. He takes his 1,000 bushels of Canadian barley to the American market and gets but 85c. per bushel, because he has to pay 15 per cent. duty for taking it across that imaginary line. How can it, in this case, be said that the consumer pays the duty? It comes out of the pockets of the Canadian farmers. We are told that it would be a great injustice to put a duty upon Indian corn, because we grow very little Indian corn, and we might as well leave our markets open. The Indian corn is brought for the most part into this country for distillation into whiskey. I do not know what my hon. friend from West Middlesex will say, but I say that, if we are to have rye in any form, it should come from our own corn. I will give you another illustration of the impolicy of the present system, by which we allow the agricultural products of other countries to be brought into this country free, while there is a duty placed upon our products going into the States. Take the case of a miller. It is at the present moment actually to the interest of the miller to build his mill in the United States. If the miller builds his mill, say at Windsor, he cannot send his flour into the States; but if he establishes his mill across the river, at Detroit, he has the whole market of forty millions of people, and he can supply Canada as well. Our people understand that; they say they do not believe in it. They believe that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and that you cannot have a reciprocity in trade without a reciprocity in tariff. There is no wrong in a reciprocity of tariff if it is to our interest, but I am confident that one great object in having something like a retaliatory policy will be that if you are to have reciprocity in trade you will only get it in that way. You have tried the policy of conciliation and humiliation long enough. The same policy is being carried out as before, and it is found to be of no good. We can get nothing by trying to induce them to alter their plans. They have laid down a rule and it will be carried out. They will not have anything like reciprocity of trade with us unless we show them that it will be to their advantage. Why should they give us reciprocity when they have our markets open to them now? They can send to our markets everything they produce agriculturally, at nominal prices, free of duty, and then manufacture at such a reduced rate as to make our system practically no protection whatever. As long as that exists, we cannot expect to have anything approaching reciprocity of trade or treaty. It is only by closing our doors, and by cutting them out of our markets, that they will open theirs to us. If they would take the same steps as England had done with France, and say: we will lower the duties on your wines if you will lower the duties on our cotton goods, for instance, something might be done. But it is only by closing the door that we can get anything. All the Browns in Canada sent to Washington will be of no avail unless we have something to give in return. The Americans have a very just idea of the value of our trade, and they are looking forward to get the trade of that magnificent North-West of ours, which will be peopled by millions at no distant date. They believe they can get control of that trade; but if they were now told "You cannot come in unless you give us reciprocity," that would be found with them a powerful argument. If you say, "We will cripple your trade, and shut you out, but at the same time we will give you every opportunity of fairly entering into a reciprocity of trade with us; if not we will keep our markets to ourselves," it would have a great effect. I had a very interesting extract from an article by Sir Rutherford Alcock upon the resources of Africa, which showed that England has given the nations of Europe the opportunity of carrying out the principles of Free-trade, and yet that the nations of Europe were more set against it than ever. Germany, Russia, France, Spain and Portugal, all alike, repudiated it, and the conclusion which Sir Rutherford Alcock came to is this: that the only market left to England is to be found in Africa, and that the only hope left to England in the future is to exchange her goods for ivory, palm oil, and cocoa-nuts. England, from its immense wealth, and its great position, may be able for some years, for a good many years more, to fight the battle of Free-trade, but eventually, unless the other nations come into an agreement with her in carrying out that policy, she must succumb, or change her policy. She must change her policy unless the whole of Europe becomes a Free-trade Europe, as much as England is a Free-trade England. I must apologize for keeping you so long, but the subject grew upon me, and I was led into paths which I had not expected to enter. I will now move the resolution, in the hope and belief that it will be accepted by the people of Canada as the enunciation of a fair and just policy, and we pledge ourselves to fight the battle à outrance at the polls and in the country.

Motion agreed to and Debate adjourned.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Before the House adjourns, I would like to ask the Premier if he is able to inform us whether the route for the Canadian Pacific Railway has yet been fixed.

MR. MACKENZIE: No. I am not yet in possession of the evidence that I require in order to come to that conclusion.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I thank the hon. gentleman for his answer; and I am emboldened to put another question, and ask whether he is able to inform us when the Bills to regulate the Departments and with respect to the Liquor Law will be brought down. It is a month to-day since we have been in Session.

MR. MACKENZIE: Of course, every Government day has been entirely taken up with discussion so far.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We have had Government Bills introduced.

MR. MACKENZIE: These Bills will both be brought down, I presume, by the end of the week. However, I have to say, in moving the adjournment of the House, that the hon. gentleman having moved this amendment, I hope that we will be able to close the debate to-morrow; but, if not, I will proceed with it on Monday as a motion of want of confidence.

House adjourned at Fifty-five minutes
After twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE QUEBEC PROVINCIAL CRISIS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. MITCHELL said that, before the Orders of the Day were called, he desired to make a personal explanation with reference to an article which had appeared in the Toronto Globe on Wednesday last, under the head of "Notes from the Capital." It read thus:—

"Hon. Peter Mitchell returned from Quebec to-day. He says that while doubts as to the constitutionality of the Lieutenant-Governor's action are held by the Conservatives who have been deprived of power, there can be no question as to the popularity of his conduct among the people. Mr. De Boucherville has, it is said, formulated an appeal to the Governor-General, setting forth his version of the circumstances which led to his removal from office. It is also said that he will come to Ottawa and present the memorial in person."

Now, he did not intend to open up a discussion on this question, but simply, in order to put himself right, he wished to say that he had never said anything that could warrant such an article being written. It was utterly untrue that he had ever expressed an opinion, as was here stated, that any doubt existed as to what the action of his Honour was. So far, indeed, as he had heard comments made by Conservatives, there never was any doubt on their part as to the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the Lieutenant-Governor's action. It would be premature now to raise any discussion on this matter, and he was not going then to express his opinions about it, but, when it came up, as doubtless would be the case later, he would do so in the most undoubted and clear terms. At present he would merely confine himself to a denial as to any truth at all existing in this paragraph as far as it concerned himself.

MR. SPEAKER: I did not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but my impression is that the explanation which he has just given is entirely out of place, as the statement which is made in this paper does not relate to anything he has said or spoken, or is said to have been said or done in this House.

MR. MITCHELL: Of course I always bow to the chair. Had Mr. Speaker informed me sooner that I was out of order I would have stopped. I hope that the public will take notice of it at all events.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming the adjourned debate on Mr. Cartwright's proposed motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply;" and Sir John A. Macdonald's motion in amendment thereto, read.

MR. DYMOND said he was sure they must all be gratified at finding that the somewhat discursive debate in which they had been engaged now for many days, at intervals, had been brought to something like a focus; that they were called upon to discuss what, as matter of courtesy, at all events, he would term a policy; and that they had an issue presented to them upon which they might take their stand in the House, and upon which they might ultimately, he thought, with some confidence, so far as his hon friends and himself were concerned, go before their constituents and the country. He was afraid, however, that, even now that the issue was narrowed down to the one presented by the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston, it would be impossible for him to perform the task which he had laid out for himself, without trespassing, at some little length, on the indulgence of the House. It was true that his

hon. friends on that side of the House might be willing to pardon him in this respect, and that his opponents would not be too captious, considering the noble precedents which they had set during the present Session, at all events, and, if he happened to weary, he hoped he would not needlessly offend. He desired to say nothing to-day that might in the slightest degree excite party feeling or engender any asperities, but to consider, as briefly as he might, what had been the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite in the past; what was the policy, so far as he could understand it, that they now presented for their acceptance; and what the effect of that policy would be, if it were carried into practice. In 1876, during one of the first debates that had taken place in the present Parliament on this question, he had ventured to make some remarks, in the course of which he alluded to the party aspect that this question had then assumed. Those remarks were almost certain to be open to misconstruction and misrepresentation—to misconstruction, as it was inevitable that some of his friends might feel that, in drawing the party lines, he had left them on the cold side of the fence; to misrepresentation, because it was almost certain that a great deal more importance would, for party purposes, be attributed to his remarks than either the speaker or his observations deserved. Now, what he stated on that occasion was but simply a fact; it was that, for the first time, we had this question presented as one upon which the two great parties might take issue. They had, on the part of the hon. the Finance Minister, a clear and distinct announcement that, so far as he and his colleagues were concerned, their financial policy was to take the form of the revenue tariff, while they had, on the part of the right hon. member for Kingston and his friends, the equally distinct announcement that, in some form or other, the policy upon which they were proposing to act would be one of Protection. But he took this opportunity of saying it had never been his intention to exclude for one moment from full party privileges any hon. gentleman a member of their party, with whom he (Mr.

Dymond) happened to differ and who had differed for the moment from his leaders. He rejoiced to know that circumstances and time had, to a large extent, brought them nearer together in that respect; and he rejoiced still more to know that neither in the press of the party to which he had the honour to belong, nor yet on the floor of that House, nor in any public utterance of opinion of the leading members of that party, had a single word been said which would cast reproach upon any hon. gentleman for exercising, under circumstances which he doubted not were more or less at times painful to themselves, the privilege that belonged to them and the right they were entitled to claim of holding their own views upon this particular question. Having said this much, he proposed to notice as he had said just now, what had been the policy of the party opposite in relation to this particular issue. When hon. gentlemen came before them and asked them to reinstate them in power, and when they claimed to be reinstated on certain grounds, it was obviously their duty to ask whether their past conduct, not simply their speeches, not simply their promises, and not simply their pledges, but whether their past acts and conduct entitled them to confidence at their hands; and he thought he should be able to show that, although there might be hon. gentlemen in the House who would have the right to claim their confidence as Protectionists, these hon. gentlemen were not to be found in the ranks of the present Opposition; that it was not to the leaders of that party, and that it was not to their most influential followers that they were to look for such a proof of their past career having been consistent with their present professions as would entitle them to place any confidence in them (the Opposition) even though they were reinstated, and though they did promise that a certain policy would be carried out. It was necessary, in reviewing what he would call the tariff history of the country during the past few years, to go back as far as the tariff of Sir Alexander Galt in the year 1859. He had no doubt that there were gentlemen within the sound of his voice who had a somewhat painful recollection, even at this day, of the state of the finances when Sir Alexander Galt assumed the position of Finance Minister. They would remember it was in a period of financial confusion, when deficits had taken the place of surpluses and when a crisis of terrible financial distress had occurred, that Sir Alexander Galt was called upon to assume the position to which he was appointed in order that a superior mind might bring something like order out of chaos; and, although it was quite true that Sir Alexander Galt's tariff was, in a certain sense, protective, it was not protective to the extent or in the sense that the tariff submitted to them by the right hon. gentleman, so far as they could understand it, would be a protective tariff. For instance, the Reciprocity Treaty then being in force, there were no duties upon the products of the farm, upon animals, or upon coal, or upon salt. On goods in the unenumerated list, forming a very large portion of our manufactured articles, the duty was fixed at 20 per cent. while the duty on the manufactures, of leather and cloth was 25 per cent.; and this was what was often spoken of as the protective tariff of 1859. But in 1866 it became necessary to revise that tariff, and then they had a new policy and an entire change of policy enunciated. In 1866, hon. gentlemen opposite, then being the party in power, reduced the tariff from 20 or 25 per cent. on the unenumerated list to 15 per cent., and on sole and upper leather, which had formerly come in under a 25 per cent. tariff, the duty was reduced to 10 per cent. They imposed other duties on farm produce—on wheat flour 50c. per barrel, on other meal 25c.; on Indian corn and other grains 10c. per bushel; and on meats 1c. a pound, while wheat and coal and salt were admitted free. It would be obvious, therefore, that, with this tariff, although small duties were imposed on some products of the farm, it was in no sense a Protectionist tariff, as compared with the tariff foreshadowed by the right hon. gentleman. He called the attention of the House also to the fact, in view of recent speeches from hon. gentlemen opposite, that, on that occasion, the duty on tea was raised from 9c. to 12½c. per pound. On animals, the duty was 15 per cent. ad valorem. It was also worthy of notice, as Sir Alexander Galt was so often referred to as a high financial authority, that, in reducing the tariff from 20 and 25 to 15 per cent., he laid great stress on the improvement that would take place in consequence in our relations with the Mother Country. At that time alarm was felt, anxiety was felt, and irritation was felt, at the course pursued by the American Government in putting an end to the Reciprocity Treaty; and then was the time, if the hon. gentlemen opposite had determined to inaugurate a National Policy, to have laid down such a policy and to have carried it out to the letter. Why, at that moment, Confederation was in contemplation, and was being rapidly carried into effect; and, if the policy that these hon. gentlemen defined to-day, and proposed to-day, was a policy that was to weld us into one great nation, then was the time to have laid down that policy. Then was the time to have warned our friends in the Maritime Provinces that the policy of putting a duty on all farm products, and a policy, on the other hand, of imposing a duty on coal was to be carried into effect. That was the very time when they ought to have taken the initiative in carrying out the policy which they foreshadowed to-day; but so far from that, as he had said, there was no duty imposed on coal, no duty on wheat and no duty on salt. He would only, in passing, just notice the tariff changes which took place under the auspices of Sir John Rose in 1867, the object at that time being to assimilate the tariff of Upper Canada to that of the Lower Provinces. When the duty on flour was imposed of 25c. per barrel—that being the amount, and not 50c., as had been stated by the hon. member for Cumberland a few evenings since, imposed by that hon. gentleman in Nova Scotia—that duty was bitterly opposed by the representatives of New Brunswick, who had always been hostile to such duties. The tariff of 1868 must be regarded as having been intended at the time definitely to settle what should be the policy of the Dominion. He was now taking a historical review of these events, as he had said, for the purpose of showing what had been the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in power, when they were entrusted with the supreme duty of carrying out a National Policy to its fullest extent, and when they had a large majority at their backs, ready, he would not say to do anything, but ready enough to do then almost anything demanded of them. The effect of the tariff of Sir John Rose in 1868 was to admit corn and breadstuffs free. A small duty was retained on meats of 1c. per pound; on horses a specific duty was levied of $15; on cattle, of $10; on swine, of $2; and on sheep, of $1; while salt was admitted free. The unenumerated list was retained at 15 per cent., and a small additional duty on spirits was levied in consequence of the abolition of the duty on corn. A debate took place at some considerable length on the tariff resolutions introduced on that occasion; and in the course of that debate the right hon. member for Kingston took part. He would first read to the House what he (Sir John A. Macdonald) said on that occasion. Mark, that then, as now, the American market was closed against the people of Canada. Mark, that then, just as now, there was an American duty upon coal, which prevented our coal from entering the United States, except by the payment of a heavy import. Mark, that then, just as now, except, perhaps, in respect to manufactures which, he admitted, stood, at that time, in a somewhat different position, the very same arguments might have been used for the imposition of retaliatory duties on breadstuffs, on minerals, and on all other matters, except, possibly, manufactures, that could be used to-day. And Sir John A. Macdonald then said:

“The flour tax had been imposed as an assertion of the independence of the country against American exclusive legislation. It had been maintained with this view, until it had been found to work oppressively—”

Mind, that was a duty of 25c. per barrel on American flour—

“On certain sections of the community, and so now they were repealed, as a step in the right direction.”

It was then “a step in the right direction,” at that time, to repeal these duties which “worked oppressively” with respect to large portions of the population, while the step to-day recommended was to reimpose these duties in order to weld us together in one people, that we might have no sectional differences and no sectional grievances as the offspring of class and sectional legislation. The right hon. gentleman had, in that debate, a warm supporter, a gentleman who afterwards became a member of the Government, and whom he (Mr. Dymond) then saw gazing upon him, the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope). And there was also present another hon. gentleman, the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs). The hon. member for South Ontario had always been consistent, he (Mr. Dymond) believed, with regard to these questions, and he did not at all, for one moment, doubt that he (Mr. Gibbs) in voting for a National Policy, as it was called, believed that he was carrying out just the same policy that he desired to maintain in 1863, but what did his hon. friend from Compton say in reply to Mr. Gibbs, who opposed the repeal of the duty on flour? Mr. Pope said:

“The hon. gentleman, while avowing broad principles, had spoken just like a sectional representative. His (Mr. Gibbs's) view was that which suited precisely the interests of Western Canada, while the people of the Eastern Townships, which he (Mr. Pope) represented, felt that on this question their interests were the same as those of Nova Scotia. Mr. Pope continued his speech maintaining the inadvisability of attempting to subserve party interests upon Protectionist principles, which were prejudicial to the general welfare.”

Now, his hon. friend (Mr. Pope) had, the preceding evening, seconded the motion which was to permit sectional interests to subvert the general welfare. Of course, he (Mr. Pope) did not see that he was inconsistent. No doubt the hon. gentleman believed that he was all right, and he would not really attempt to bring him into line. He must leave the hon. gentleman where he was, presenting his views in 1868 in contrast with the views which, by seconding this amendment, he presumed the hon. gentleman held in 1878.

MR. POPE: They are the same.

MR. DYMOND said then there passed two years, during which they had no national policy; but, in 1870, Sir Francis Hincks having then become Finance Minister, what was known as the National Policy was, for the first time, introduced. Sir Francis Hincks, in April, 1870, proposed to impose certain protective duties, avowedly in a protective sense, on flour of 25c. per barrel, on Indian and oatmeal 15c. per barrel, on wheat 4c. per bushel, on other grain 3c., on coal 50c. per ton, and on salt 5c. per bushel, excluding, however, British salt from duty, and ultimately the salt used in the sea and gulf fisheries. He should have occasion to point out, before he had done, how that very exclusion virtually counteracted what were supposed to be the beneficial effects of the National Policy, so far as the duty on salt was concerned. At the same time, an ad va'orem duty was levied of 10 per cent. on all animals. This policy was assailed throughout the country. He remembered that this was one of the first political sensations that occurred after he had the honour of becoming a Canadian citizen; and he ventured to say that there had been no act done by any Government during the last eight years of a legislative character that had excited so much animadversion as this so-called National Policy of Sir Francis Hincks. On the afternoon of the 26th day of April, 1870, Sir Francis Hincks came down to the House and announced that, so far as coal and wheat were concerned, which, after all, were the two great factors in this arrangement, he had decided to abandon the National Policy; and, on the morning of the following day, the Leader newspaper of Toronto, the proprietor of which was a devoted follower of the hon. gentlemen opposite, while he (Mr. Beatty) had a seat in that House, and who he (Mr. Dymond) presumed, from his years and his wisdom, might be regarded in some sense as the Nestor of his party not being cognizant of the event which had taken place at a later hour than six o'clock in the evening, thus wrote with regard to the alteration which had taken place in Sir Francis Hincks views:—

“We are glad to find that the Government have yielded to the numerous remonstrances against several of the tariff resolutions. The duties upon coal and wheat have been abandoned, and salt imported for the sea and gulf fisheries of the Dominion will be imported free.”

But it happened that the very same evening there was a transformation scene in that house; and the hon. gentleman who had come down at four o'clock in the afternoon to extinguish the National Policy, at eight o'clock in the evening revived the National Policy. On the following morning, in a melancholy mood, the same newspaper to which he had just referred, representing as it did the Conservative party in Western Canada, and, at that time, the only at all influential representative of that party in the city of Toronto, the capital of the Province of Ontario, wrote as follows:—

“We were led yesterday into announcing that the Government had decided upon abandoning the proposed duties on coal and wheat. The announcement was a mistake. Although it was stated before recess on Tuesday that those duties would be taken off, the Government changed their minds, and have determined on allowing them to remain. This change, of course, was made out of respect to the sympathy and desire of the majority of the House of Commons. We have nothing but regret that the Government felt themselves unable to carry out the policy which unquestionably commends itself to their better judgment.”

He had no doubt that the writer of this article and the proprietor of that paper knew perfectly well what the better judgment of the right hon. gentleman and his Government was. He (Mr. Beatty) probably knew also under what influences these hon. gentlemen had been forced to act in a manner contrary to their better judgment. The Leader closed its remarks as follows:—

“It is a pity they did not think of that in time. Vacillation tends to weakness. It is a thousand pities that the legislative majority is so stupidly wrong as it unquestionably is.”

MR. DYMOND.

This was the opinion of the representative organ of the hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the National Policy of 1870. The National Policy imposed duties as follows:—On coal and coke, 50c. a ton; on wheat and rye, 25c. a barrel; on other meal, 15c. a barrel; on wheat, 4c. a bushel; on other grains and on Indian corn, 3c. a bushel; on salt, 5c. a bushel, except on “salt imported into the country from any British possession, or for the use of the sea or gulf fisheries”; animals of all kinds continued at 10 per cent. ad valorem. He would just call the attention of the House to this fact: that, notwithstanding this duty was imposed primarily in the interests of the producers of coal in Nova Scotia, not one ton of coal, under the operation of that duty, ever found its way into Western Canada. There had been some imports of coal from Nova Scotia into Western Canada in 1869; and there were a few imports of coal in 1871; both as the result of private ventures on the part of Western merchants; but in the year of the National Policy, the year when that duty was imposed for the express purpose of forcing Nova Scotia coal upon the Western Canadian market, not one single ton found its way to Toronto, or, he believed, west of the Ottawa River. Two years ago, in the course of a somewhat conversational debate, he (Mr. Dymond) made reference to this fact and also stated that some Nova Scotia coal seen in Toronto at that period had been of an extremely inferior character. His words were at once taken hold of by the hon. member for Cumberland, and he observed also that they were frequently used afterwards in the Maritime Provinces in order to prove what were the opinions of a Western Canadian member with regard to the magnificent coal deposit of Nova Scotia. It was actually imputed to him (Mr. Dymond) that he had depreciated the magnificent coal deposits of Nova Scotia in consequence of a chance observation which he had made on the floor of that House. Now, the fact was that injury had more than once been done in this respect by the carelessness of some of the producers of Nova Scotia coal in their commercial relations. The coal seen at Toronto in 1870 was, he believed, simply the refuse of a small quantity which had arrived in Upper Canada during the previous year. In 1871, the National Policy was somewhat rudely challenged. On the motion to read the Customs Bill of that year a third time tomorrow, the Hon. Mr. Holton moved, seconded by Mr. Mills, an amendment repealing the duties on coal, coke, wheat and flour. Mr. Blanchet, seconded by Mr. Ryan (Montreal), then moved "that salt, peas, beans, barley and other cereals be added to the terms of the foregoing amendment." That was carried by 102 to 28; all the Ministers voted with the majority. He supposed no great fault could be found with those gentlemen; no great inconsistency charged against them for voting for an amendment to an amendment, which, if carried, might have defeated the object of the original amendment. It was a little piece of parliamentary strategy on their part, in the hope that by adding these articles to the former resolution, the whole would be voted down. That was perfectly true, and he desired to make the remark because it was quite possible he might again be misconstrued if he omitted to do so. On the same occasion, the hon. member for Ottawa moved a resolution entirely repealing the duty on pork. He would give another amusing illustration of the inconsistency of supporters of a National Policy. The amendment as thus amended—that was to say with Mr. Blanchet's amendment added to the original one—was carried by 83 to 55; 31 of the majority being supporters of the Government. Deducting the 31 Ministerialists from the majority and adding them to the minority, it would give the Government a majority of 34, a pretty convincing proof, he thought, that the National Policy, so far as the action of the House was concerned, was deliberately repealed, not by the members of the then Opposition, but by the Conservative party. All the Ministers who were present voted on that occasion with the minority. On the motion for the third reading of the Bill, the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. M. C. Cameron) having moved to restore salt to the dutiable list, Mr. Bowell, the hon. member for North Hastings, moved the following resolution:—

"That, in view of the negotiations now pending at Washington between the representatives on the part of the British Government and the United States, touching questions which may lead to a renewal of the reciprocity treaty, it is, in the opinion of this House, inexpedient to repeal the duties now imposed upon certain articles enumerated in section two of the Bill as amended; be it therefore resolved that the Bill be not read a third time, but that it be referred back to a Committee of the Whole for the purpose of expunging all the words between 'coke' and the words 'as herewith repealed,' in section two of the said Bill."

The effect of this would have been to repeal the duties on coal and coke, but to retain all the other duties as they were imposed in the year 1870. The House divided on Mr. Bowell's motion, which was lost; the yeas being 38, and the nays 110. In the majority were 57 Ministerial supporters and every member of the Government in the House. In other words, the final death-blow to the National Policy was given by a House in which, had party lines been observed and hon. gentlemen chosen to tax the allegiance of their followers, they might have sustained it by a majority of forty-two. That was the party which, at this moment, held a national policy to be necessary to our national existence. After some other motions, the Bill was read a third time and the National Policy finally extinguished. Coming back once more to high authority, he would quote what appeared in the Toronto Leader, on the 23rd of March, the day after the first blow had been struck at the National Policy. The Leader said:

"We must, therefore, express our unfeigned satisfaction that the sense of the House has been so unmistakably pronounced in favour of the abolition of duties, and that the exploded theory of protection receives such little favour in the High Court of Parliament."

Another paper, perhaps equally influential—the Montreal Gazette—did not give so much as a squeak or a groan over the decease of the National Policy. Now, it had been said on several occasions that the action of the House at that time was to embarrass the course of events at Washington or to prejudice the cause of the right hon. gentleman opposite and the British Commissioners—in fact to destroy those hopes of a new Reciprocity Treaty being carried out which had been previously indulged in. This, however, was not the fact. On the 6th of March, the British Commissioners proposed that the Reciprocity Treaty should be restored in principle. That was declined. The question of the fisheries was further discussed on the 7th, 20th, 22nd and 25th of March. In the course of these discussions, it was proposed or suggested by the American Commissioners that coal, salt and fish be reciprocally admitted free; also lumber, after the 1st July, 1874; and it was not till the 17th April, thirteen days after the unlamented demise of the National Policy, that the British Commissioners—the right hon. member for Kingston being one of them—rejected the offer as inadequate, and insisted on lumber being at once admitted free and the arrangement supplemented by a money payment. So, not only was the incipient treaty crushed and rejected at Washington thirteen days after the National Policy had been finally extinguished here, or something like a month after the first fatal stab had been given, but the right hon. member for Kingston was one of those who annihilated it. No more was heard about a national policy for some time. He supposed they might assume, without saying anything discourteous, that the advent of the general election of 1872 first recalled it to the mind of the right hon. member for Kingston. But, even on that occasion, the right hon. gentleman did not assert that what he now promised—a National Policy—was necessary in the interest of the country. In fact he spoke in a very different strain. He was at Peterborough in July, 1872, and the following was an extract from the speech he delivered on that occasion. The right hon. gentleman said:

“A very good friend of mine—a great personal friend—but one whose political principles differ from mine, who is what we might call a Grit—said to me the other day: ‘What fortunate fellows you are, Macdonald. Here you are with everything prosperous around you. The sun smiles upon you; our fields are teeming with prosperity, and everything is shining upon you, while in days of old, while our poor friends were in the Government, we had clouded skies, dried up fields, and no crops, and you appropriate all this to your own merits and the country will be foolish enough to give you credit for what is an act of the climate.’ ‘Sir,’ said I, ‘it should only show you that Providence is on our side, and if you are a wise man, if you are a prudent man, if you wish a continuance of the same skies, the same rain, and the same crops, you will keep us where we are. Be sure, my good friend, that the weevil will come in with the Grits.’”

That was the right hon. gentleman's opinion regarding the state of the agricultural community, after the repeal of the National Policy in 1871. He need hardly say that the speech, so far as it went, did not in the slightest degree indicate any intention to carry out the principle of Protection. The right hon. gentleman went on further and said subsequently:

“Although we have been without reciprocity from 1866 until now, although we have been virtually excluded from the markets of the United States, our farmers are richer than ever, and easily find a sale for their products in the markets of the world. They are increasing their farms, and improving the breed of their live stock. In every branch of the agricultural community you see they are rising superior to the temporary disadvantage caused by the loss of the United States markets.”

That was then the opinion of the right hon. gentleman, who, to-day, asserted that it was only by opening the markets of the United States of America, by a process to which he (Mr. Dymond) would refer by-and-bye, and which he ventured to think would not have the sympathy even of that House—certainly not of the country—that the great agricultural interests of Canada could be saved from extinction; that, in 1872, was the opinion pronounced by the right hon. gentleman who, to-day, assured them that our agriculturists, as a matter of simple justice, must have access to the United States market. The hon. gentleman subsequently went to Hamilton, and there he also made a speech. He said:

“One of the most important questions of the day was the commercial policy of the country.”

The right hon. gentleman had been amongst the farmers at Peterborough, and knew it would not be safe to announce a National Policy to them, because that would involve a course of proceeding which, though it might be of problematical benefit on the one hand, would certainly be injurious on the other. At Hamilton he had, for the first time, to compete with gentlemen, as opponents, who were prepared to take their stand upon Protectionist principles. There he was reported to have said :

“One of the most important questions of the day was the commercial policy of the country. He had no hesitation in saying he was in favour of incidental protection to home industry. It was absolutely necessary, in consequence of the great works now in progress, of the railways and local improvements that were contemplated, that the revenue of the country should be increased, and that would best be done by Customs duties on articles imported into the country. The policy of the Dominion Government was to give incidental protection to home industry, although he knew they would be bitterly opposed by members of the Opposition, who were heart and soul in favour of Free-trade. He appealed to the meeting not to elect one, who, while pretending to favour Protection, would vote for the installation of a Free-trade Government.”

Well, the right hon. gentleman was sustained in Hamilton. What he somewhat unjustly called a Free-trade Government was not at that time called into power, and he had the opportunity afforded him, in the Session of 1873, of making good what he had promised in his speeches, and showing by practical legislation how far he desired to carry out what he called a Protectionist policy. Nay, more, when Mr. Tilley delivered his Budget speech in 1873, that hon. gentleman did not deny that he might have to give effect to such a policy. Mr. Tilley said :

“I know it may be asked are the Government not prepared to make some readjustment of the tariff, and my answer is that the Government will not during the present Session propose to touch the tariff in any particular. There are, I admit, some few interests in the country in relation to which, if the tariff were opened at all, the Government would feel justified in asking, and would feel it their duty to ask, for some readjustment. But, under the peculiar circumstances in which we are placed, looking at the increased expenditure of the next year, and the fact that some readjustment must take place next Session, the Government have concluded to make no present change.”

There was a postponement of the evil day. The speeches delivered on the hustings in 1872 were disregarded, and Mr. Tilley, while admitting that there might be some cause for a readjustment, put it off to a more convenient season. He left it over for a day which, for him, never came. But it was important to apply one test after another to the sincerity of hon. gentlemen opposite to see what was taking place, not simply in Parliament, but in other places. That there was no serious intention at that period on the part of the Conservative leaders to introduce a protective tariff might be gathered from the action of their friends on the Dominion Board of Trade. In 1873, a member moved a resolution in favour of admitting free all articles of prime necessity and raw materials for manufactures, and increasing the duties on articles of luxury and those which entered into competition with our own manufactures, but that the imposts should not be larger than might be required for the public service. This was ruled out on a point of order. Another resolution, in a more decided Free-trade sense, was moved by Mr. Wilkes, and an amendment was proposed by Mr. Thomas White. In mentioning that gentleman's name he (Mr. Dymond) took the opportunity of saying that he referred to him solely as a representative man. He took that liberty with his name simply because the record of the proceedings of the Board of Trade were presented to hon. gentlemen officially when they came to Ottawa every year ; and he did not do it either for the purpose of impugning the opinions that gentleman might hold at the present time, with which he (Mr. Dymond) had nothing to do whatever, or suggesting any personal inconsistency on his part, for that was of little importance, so far as this House was concerned. He mentioned his name because he was an able man, and knew a great deal more than many persons of his political complexion who presumed to speak on the subject ; and because he (Mr. Dymond) had not the slightest doubt that Mr.

White was in the confidence of hon. gentlemen opposite, and knew pretty well that what he said and did would not be at all at variance with the general sentiments of his party leaders. This was what Mr. White moved :—

“ That, without offering any opinion upon some of the details of the present Customs tariff, or upon the anomalies which are inevitable in all tariffs, this Board is of opinion that no change should be made in it unless the public service demands larger revenues, and that in such case any increase to be made should be in accordance with the principle of the present Customs tariff, which, while not interfering with the commerce of the Dominion, affords incidental protection to its manufactures. That this Board is of opinion that permanence in the fiscal policy of the country is most important alike to its commerce and manufactures, and that no change should be made in the tariff not demanded by the absolute necessities of the revenue.”

A gentleman from Brantford moved an amendment favourable to the tariff of 1859, and Mr. White, while avowing himself a Protectionist to a certain extent, went on to say :

“ If we could have a 20 per cent. tariff and the assurance that it must be permanent, I would go in for it. But, to my view, if we got that 20 per cent. tariff, strong opposition would arise on the ground of high taxation.”

After a strong argument in favour of a 15 per cent. tariff, under which the country had prospered, Mr. White said :

“ That ought to be sufficient for any industry suited to the country, and as to others it would be unwise to attempt to sustain them by fiscal props. I warn my Protectionist friends against provoking the controversies to which a 20 per cent. tariff would give rise. The very discussion of it, the very attacks which it would provoke, would do more to unsettle manufacturing industry, and drive capital from being invested in it, than any good results that could flow from it.”

Ultimately, the amendment of the gentleman from Brantford was lost by 16 yeas to 33 nays, and Mr. White's motion was carried by 46 yeas to 9 nays. The House would observe there was no National Policy there; no allusion to the agricultural, mining, and manufacturing interests of the Dominion there; no reference whatever to the necessity of creating interprovincial trade. The country prospered so well under the 15 per cent. tariff that it was thought unwise to propose even a 20 per cent. tariff as a substitute; and the hon. gentleman, who, certainly, was gifted with the power of forecasting events as well as any of his party, did not seek to introduce a Protectionist policy, still less to propound what was now known as a National Policy. So, then, taking the speeches of the hon. member for Kingston at Peterborough, in 1872; taking the action of the right hon. gentleman's (Sir John A. Macdonald's) Government, as represented by Mr. Tilley, in 1873; and taking the expressions of an able and independent supporter out of the House at the time, the House would find that, up to 1873, up to the first Session of that historical year, there did not exist any honest, any deliberate intention on the part of the right hon. member for Kingston or his followers to inflict upon this country a National Policy. They all knew what happened in 1873. The right hon. gentleman and his friends having neglected their opportunity to bestow the inestimable blessing of a National Policy on the country; having, in fact, at that time no policy but one, namely, the retention of office, notwithstanding the strong feelings they had created against themselves in the country, were at last driven out of power, and left to do as well as they could in the cold shades of Opposition. But there was no reason why, having had Protectionist principles in their hearts, they should have forgotten those principles. He was inclined to think that, as a rule, when men went out of office they were much more likely to carry their principles with them than when they went into office. They had been embarrassed, perchance, more or less while in a responsible position, but, when emancipated from the shackles which office imposed, they were able to give an additional impetus to the movements which they felt to be in a right direction. In this case, having been turned out of office, the right hon. gentleman once more resorted to promises. He told the people of Kingston, during his election in January, 1874: “ We should have been forced to readjust the tariff to assist the industries of Canada, so as to enable them to compete in the home market; and the farmers must be protected also, so that they may not have to depend altogether on a good crop or a bad crop." But, unfortunately for him, he had done nothing when he had the opportunity; he was only renewing his pledges when he had gone into Opposition; when he was the leader of a defeated, demoralized, and disorganized party, not even so strong as it was at the present moment, weak as it yet might be. However, the opportunity was soon offered to him. The right hon. member for Kingston, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), and their party in the House, had the opportunity offered to them, if they had chosen to avail themselves of it, of bearing their testimony and endeavouring to force their views on the Government. They were sadly in need of a policy; of something to credit them with the people. In 1874, when they came back to that House, they should have done all in their power to prove to the country that, if they had the opportunity, they might have inaugurated their National Policy. But they did nothing of the kind. They all remembered that, on that occasion, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) became, to all intents and purposes, the leader and mouth-piece of the party in this House, so far as financial questions were concerned. The hon. member spoke as follows:—

"The only interest the Finance Minister pretended was suffering the slightest depression was the agricultural interest, and he (Mr. Tupper) would ask the great consuming population of this country whether they thought the great agricultural interest was suffering? He thought they would give a decided response, without any hesitation, that the agricultural interest at this moment was enjoying a condition of prosperity second to none in the world."

That was the utterance of an hon. gentleman who was now prepared to support an amendment which, in terms, suggested that it was necessary that certain remedial measures should be applied to aid the condition of the agricultural community in Canada, and save them from extinction at the hands of a foreign invader. More than that, the hon. gentleman was seized with a fit of alarm lest the Finance Minister should insidiously introduce, what he called, "the thin edge of the Protectionist wedge," and he went on to offer advice to the Finance Minister. "Let well enough alone," he said; "don't meddle with the tariff and disarrange the business of the country." Just compare that speech with the remarks of the right hon. member for Kingston on the hustings in 1872, the actions of Mr. Tilley in 1873, and the action of one of their supporters (Mr. White), outside, and the sincerity of their professions when they pretended that a National Policy was necessary in the interests of the country would be clearly demonstrated. More than that, the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Tupper) had descended to particulars. He had opposed the duties on manufactured articles used in ship-building, and exclaimed indignantly:

"Let the hon. Minister look at the neighbouring Republic, and he would find that the policy of that country had swept their flag off the seas and given to others the carrying trade of the world."

So that, with regard to one of the greatest interests of this country, the shipping interest, the hon. gentleman came out with language that would be worthy of Mr. David Wells himself. The policy hon. gentlemen opposite wished to adopt was, as he (Mr. Dymond) should show, an American policy; their tariff was an American tariff. The policy they intended to and would necessarily pursue with regard to shipping was the policy of the United States; the policy which the hon. member for Cumberland stated—should he say in a lucid interval—in 1874, "was sweeping the American mercantile shipping from the seas." It might be said the depression had not begun to be felt then. But the crisis in the United States had occurred many months before, and the fall of values in that country had considerably preceded the disasters which occurred in the fall of 1873. When the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) first moved for a Committee on manufacturing interests in 1874, and they had the manufacturers before them, the universal testimony was that this depression had been going on for not less than eighteen months; and if the hon. gentleman referred to the evidence of Mr. Hay, of Toronto, who was mentioned by the right hon. member for Kingston on the previous evening, he would there find this distinctly set forth by him as well as by other witnesses. Two years passed by, and there was another opportunity for gentlemen opposite to vindicate their allegiance to the great cause of Protection, or the National Policy. In 1875 they were dumb with regard to that question. There was not, from the hon. member for Cumberland or the right hon. member for Kingston, so far as he could find, a single speech or suggestion, or a single motion, at least, to show that they desired for a moment to advance the cause of Protection. There was then just the same reason for Protection with regard to our agricultural and our mining industries, and with regard to our manufactures; there was just the same reason for inaugurating a retaliatory policy against the United States, and the necessity for building up our national industries, which existed a year afterwards. The hon. gentleman, following the lead of his hon. friend the member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving), first tabled a resolution in favour of Protection in 1876. When the Committee was appointed in that year to consider the state of commercial depression, presided over by his hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, there was considerable discussion, and so far as the right hon. member for Kingston spoke at all it was in opposition to the proposal to appoint that Committee. He endeavoured rather to discourage that appointment, and he said not a word showing that he considered the enquiry was necessary, that any benefit would result from it, or that a new policy might be founded upon it. The hon. and learned member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving), he believed it was, who moved the first resolution in this House which was of a Protectionist character, and they would remember the treatment that motion received at the hands of the right hon. member for Kingston. There was no language that he dared employ which he did not employ, in order to cast disrepute on the mover of that resolution. But, because he chose to vote against that resolution, he had to formulate a resolution of his own, and this was the first resolution he presented to this House in favour of the National Policy he had now indicated, or rather of that Protection which he had promised to the electors of Hamilton no less than four years before. However necessary it was in the interests of the country in 1872, not one word was said by him of an authoritative and official character; not one word that would absolutely pledge him or his party to any action, until four years had elapsed, when he was forced to do something in order that it might not be said he had voted against a Protectionist resolution—or in order to justify himself for having voted against a Protectionist resolution introduced by an hon. member whom, in 1872, he maligned on the hustings, and warned the people not to send him, a Protectionist, to that House to support a Free-trade Government. The motion of the right hon. gentleman was as follows:—

“That this House regrets that His Excellency has not been advised to submit to Parliament a measure for the readjustment of the tariff, which would not only aid in alleviating the stagnation of business deplored in the gracious Speech from the Throne, but would also afford encouragement and protection to the struggling manufactures and industries, as well as to the agricultural products of the country.”

Of course, when the hon. gentleman had launched himself upon this career he was not exactly the man to turn back; he had got upon a sliding plane and rapidly began to assume the character of a Protectionist. But he was not very successful within that House in his Protectionist policy. During the last Session there were three motions submitted to the House upon the subject. That of the hon. the member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) was defeated by a majority of only 31, the motion of the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) by 39, and then one by the great leader of the Conservative party himself, which went to the wall with a majority of 49. So unsatisfactory was his policy, so uncertain, so indefinite was his resolution, that it was easier to get a large majority against the leader of the Conservative party himself, than it was to obtain it against one of his followers on the back benches. Now, they came to the resolution and amendment just submitted. He (Mr. Dymond) had traced the history of hon. gentlemen opposite in the capacity of Protectionists for eighteen years; he had shown that, up to that time, hon. gentlemen opposite had never done anything which should entitle them to confidence, as the authors of what they were pleased to call a National Policy. The House had seen that, at the period when, if ever, such a policy should have been carried out, they refused to adopt it, and when they had such a policy, in a mild and temporary form, they strangled it and expunged it from the Statute-book. The right hon. member for Kingston had stated last night that the policy of his party had been announced in no uncertain manner. With the permission of the House, he (Mr. Dymond) would look into the amendment, which would have to be interpreted by the utterances, here and elsewhere, of the right hon. gentleman and his friends. The first point stated in the amendment was that, "The welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, mining, manufacturing, and other interests of the Dominion." He believed there had never been a tariff which was not designed by its author to benefit the agricultural, mining, manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion. In framing a tariff, those interests were always considered, and nothing was contained in the amendment that indicated that the right hon. member for Kingston, if it were carried and he again obtained power, would be compelled to do anything more than the present Finance Minister had done in readjusting the tariff on past occasions. The amendment further stated:

"That such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow-countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active inter-provincial trade."

That might be very true, but it was only the opinion of the right hon. member for Kingston, a gentleman who, up to the present time, had never carried a Protectionist policy into practice. In that portion of the amendment which expressed what his policy would be, there was nothing to show that, if the right hon. gentleman went to the country and was returned in triumph, he would initiate a National Policy or afford one cent more protection than was given by the present tariff. The amendment went on to say:

"And, moving, as it ought to do, in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country eventually a reciprocity of trade."

That, again, was simply an opinion that some tariff which the right hon. gentleman might devise might possibly secure for the Dominion reciprocity of trade with the United States. But, before the people returned the right hon. member for Kingston to power, he should give them some intimation as to whether there was any new principle underlying his proposition, and whether he really would be a Protectionist in office—which he had never been before—as he professed to be a Protectionist in Opposition. The term "National Policy" was a mere phrase. It might mean a Free-trade policy, or a policy which abolished duties altogether; it might mean a highly protective policy similar to that of the United States, or it might refer to a revenue tariff. So far as the phrases employed went, there was nothing to guide them as to what this National Policy meant. But the right hon. member for Kingston had quoted not only his own views and opinions, but those which had been expressed at a meeting of Conservatives, recently held at Toronto. He (Mr. Dymond) had reason to believe that some strange things had been discussed at that meeting. Among other resolutions the meeting adopted, was the following declaration of their views on the question of a reciprocal tariff:—

"1. They are satisfied that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Financial Policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, mining, and manufacturing interests of the Dominion.

"2. That no such readjustment will be satisfactory to the interests affected or to the country, if adopted as a 'provisional means only to meet a temporary exigency or to supply a temporary deficit, nor unless it is made and carried out as a National Policy.

"3. That, until a reciprocity of trade is established with our neighbours, Canada should move in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs so far as her varied interests may demand.

"That it is the duty of the people of Canada to force upon the attention of the Government and Parliament of the Dominion the necessity of carrying out their views, and to withhold or withdraw their confidence from any Government which may fail, from want of will or want of ability, to enforce them by legislative enactment."

That, it was true, was almost as vague and indefinite as the present amendment; it might be anything or nothing. But they began to see a little light when they read the newspaper organs of the right hon. gentleman, and also some of his speeches. The Toronto Conference not only expressed confidence in the the hon. gentleman, but also in his organ, the Mail. Such faithful organs as the Belleville Intelligencer, the Montreal Gazette, the St. John Watchman, the Halifax Herald, the London Herald and the old Toronto Leader were not recognized; but the Mail was announced as the special exponent of the right hon. gentleman's policy. To learn what the right hon. member for Kingston had in his mind and what was understood by his party with respect to reciprocity of tariffs or reciprocity of trade, they had only to turn to the Mail and they would find that, for the first time, reciprocal trade with the United States was fiercely assailed and vehemently denounced. If, as the Mail declared, Protection would be a benefit to the country, and if we were to follow the example of the United States, which had built round itself fiscal barriers, and were thus to exclude the products, not only of Protectionist America, but also of Free-trade England, what did we want with reciprocity of trade? If we were to have "Canada for Canadians," and adopt a policy of retaining our own products in the country, of making wealth out of our own industry by accumulating it within our own limits, what did we want with reciprocity of trade? He believed the country desired reciprocity with the United States on fair and reasonable terms. He could imagine no sensible man, no man who had the real national interests at heart, who did not wish to see all fiscal barriers broken down, except those necessarily retained for revenue purposes, by two kindred nations lying alongside of each other as did the United States and Canada. If it were only in the interest of peace, to strengthen the feeling of amity and friendship which should exist between two great nations speaking the same language, united by their institutions, and, to a large extent, by their religious sympathies, and by everything that tended to make us feel as one people, a man could not have the heart or soul of a man who did not desire to have reciprocity of trade with the United States, if that could be obtained on fair and equal terms. The right hon. gentleman's organ, the Mail, declared that reciprocal trade would be impossible, and, if possible, would not be beneficial but mischievous; and it went on to furnish an argument which the Americans might use against Canada in negotiations for a reciprocity treaty, namely, that such a treaty would not only involve the admission of British goods to the injury of our own manufactures, but that the Dominion might become a vast smuggling field to their injury. He thought therefore, the House might come to the conclusion—and he would allude presently to some observations of the right hon. gentleman himself to sustain his argument—that the right hon. member for Kingston did not care for reciprocity of trade, but preferred the other alternative, reciprocity of tariffs. He thought, in justice to truth and to all the evidence before them, whatever might have been the right hon. gentleman's motive, whether it was the conviction of his own mind, or, like his utterances in 1872, merely put forward to influence the elections, it might be held that the present policy of the right hon. member for Kingston and his party was one of retaliatory tariffs, and that they were to be guided in their legislation, not by the views of what might be necessary for the interests of Canada, not by any conviction that our present tariff might need amendment from time to time, but by the policy adopted by the United States; and, when Americans imposed duties on our goods entering their country, we should levy like duties, not only on goods coming from the United States, but also on those imported from the Mother Country. The right hon. member for Kingston, in the course of his speech at Stanstead, during his Eastern Townships tour, said:

“Why, gentlemen, you know Canada, from east to west, lies nearly in the same degree of latitude, and we do not produce a great variety of crops. From the Atlantic to the Pacific the country is subject to the same climatic influences. But the United States, extending from the lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, forms a variety of climate. If wheat fails in the West, corn may succeed in the Middle States; and if both wheat and corn fail, rye and cotton may succeed in the South. In Canada, however, if, by an unfavourable season, the crops are scanty, we are without such resources, and then the farmers of the United States pour in their products upon us, and we are defenceless. You, the farmers, who, in an ungenial season, might get some recompense for scanty crops in the enhanced prices they would bring, find that hope gone from you. Even the little harvest the storms have left you find valueless when the produce of the Western States is poured into the markets of the Dominion. Shall we suffer in this way? Shall we not say, if we have a short crop, our people shall consume it, and pay us a fair price for it? If we have a large crop, let us not have our own markets and the markets of Europe only, but let us say to the United States:—‘We allow you to send the produce of your country into our markets, let us have the same privilege, and send ours to yours.’ That is the policy of the western portion; that is the policy which my friends are going to fight for to the death.”

That was the policy which the hon. member for Cumberland, in 1874, alluded to as an outrage on the great consuming population of the country. At the very time when our people were most distressed by want, when famine might be stalking through the land, when the price of bread might have risen to famine rates, the hon. member for Cumberland, who in 1874 was so deeply concerned lest anything said by the Finance Minister should indicate that the agriculturists required Protection, because it would affect the great consuming population, was prepared to assist in carrying this policy into effect. The right hon. member for Kingston further said:

“At the end of my long political career, the last effort I am going to make, the culminating struggle before I retire into private life, is to attempt to get Canada for the Canadians; to secure a national policy; a policy by which we will be able to get a fair day’s wages for a fair day’s work, by which we will not be trampled upon and ridden over as we have been in the past by the capitalists of a foreign country. We will say to the United States, ‘We are Free-traders, we took our cue from the Mother Country, we did not recognize the difference between the circumstances of an old country and a new one like ours; we will pay you the compliment of saying we were wrong and you were right, and we will do to you as you do to us.’”

Having regard to those declarations of the right hon. member for Kingston and his speech of last night, it was manifest that his policy, enveloped as it might be in a cloud of words, was one of retaliatory tariffs, and of exasperating fiscal regulations; a policy which would inaugurate a war to the knife against one of our largest customers and our nearest neighbour; a policy of which he (Mr. Dymond) hoped he never would see the beginning, but which, if entered upon, no one could pretend under any circumstances to predict the end. The right hon. gentleman having spoken in favour of Protection, pure and simple, in his speech; having repudiated entirely the declaration he once made in the House, “I am a Free-trader;” having done his best to prove, through his organ, and to persuade manufacturers that they would not be benefitted but be injured by a reciprocity treaty with the United States; having seen all that, they must hold the right hon. member to this exposition of his policy, impotent as it would be for good, and redolent of mischief. Having then got him face to face with that proposition, they found the right hon. member for Kingston asserting, on the one hand, that forty millions of people were to be coerced by four millions, and with the same breath, alleging that those forty millions were able to manufacture so cheaply or so successfully under the policy they had carried out, that they were able to sweep the markets of the world with their products, and even to invade Free-trade England herself. They were asked to suppose that, in order to obtain the Canadian market, those forty millions of people, who were able, according to the right hon. gentleman, to compete with the cotton lords of Manchester, the iron workers of Middlesborough; to fight, on their own ground, the producers in England and other nations, were to be coerced by four millions of people into altering their tariff, not in the interests of Canadians alone, but in the interest of the whole world; to come down on their knees before the right hon. member for Kingston, and pray him to admit their products into the Dominion. That was the proposition, and that was the policy that was foreshadowed. But the right hon. gentleman's speech was founded upon an entire fallacy. It was founded throughout upon the assumption, as far as what might be called the Free-trade argument was concerned, that Canada was a Free-trade country. It was all very well to talk of the effects of Free-trade in England—and he would have a word to say on that point presently—but when they talked of the effect of Free-trade in England they were not speaking of the effect of anything of which they had any knowledge. The Dominion to-day had a high protective tariff, one which would be a reproach to her if it were not for her contiguity to the United States, and one so high that, according to the most eminent authority on commercial matters in the House, the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald), the manufacturers of Canada had virtually a protection of 30 per cent. When he listened to that speech, and heard the calm and temperate manner in which it was delivered; when he knew the independent position that hon. gentlemen held in the House, he thought it should be printed in letters of gold, and handed to every dupe of the right hon. member for Kingston, who fancied, in the first place, the right hon. gentleman was about to give him Protection; and, in the second place, if he got Protection, he would derive one dollar of benefit therefrom. He would like to say a word or two about his old country.

MR. BOWELL: Where is that?

MR. DYMOND: I think the hon. gentlemen knows pretty well where it is.

MR. BOWELL: It is here, is it not?

MR. DYMOND said he confessed he could hardly speak with calmness when he heard such statements as were made by the right hon. member for Kingston, last night. It was a painful thing to anyone who knew what England was to hear of the distress prevailing at this moment. Those who, like himself, had been accustomed to mingle, in the old land, with all classes of people; those who had not moved only in aristocratic circles, but whose lot had been cast among many who lived by the labour of their hands, knew how much trouble a period of depression caused. There were hundreds of thousands of people who earned only just sufficient to satisfy the needs of life even in the best of times, so that a slight check to industry would send up a cry of anguish from one end of the land to the other, and a few months of depression, the stoppage of a few mills and factories, the failure of a few of the great leading manufacturers, was an event, to anyone who knew its consequences, which must be contemplated with feelings of the deepest sympathy. If he thought for a moment England must go back on her Free-trade record; if he thought many of those who at that moment were suffering—if the children who were crying for bread to fathers and mothers who had none to give them—could be relieved, or that, from this country, we could set an example that would even tend to alleviate that misery, he would surrender every Free-trade principle he had ever held, and let Protection take its course in order to save them from destitution. But it was not true that Free-trade had been a failure in England. It was not true that England had found the end of her prosperity. It was not true, as political charlatans might say, that England had no market except Central Africa for her products. On a return of prosperity, not to herself alone, but to the other nations by the trade of which England had grown rich and powerful, England would still sweep the seas with her ships, and still command the commerce of the world. Let him call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to a few facts with respect to England's fiscal policy. He did not, however, do it with the hope that it would have any great influence on that debate, because they were not discussing Free-trade, although they might be discussing Protection; but, as an Englishman, he could not allow his own land to be impugned by the citizens of his adopted country. The right hon. member for Kingston had told the House that, in consequence of England having commanded the trade of the world during the progress of the continental wars, her people had obtained an enormous degree of prosperity, and that, from that fact, they were able, comparatively, to do without Protection. As a matter of history, that statement would be found to be scarcely accurate. The only great result Great Britain derived from those wars, so far as his knowledge extended, was the addition of £800,000,000 sterling to the national debt, mainly taken out of the industries of her people, and spent, to a large extent, in subsidizing foreign armies. But, as a matter of fact, it was not the consequences of the war that gave Great Britain her commercial supremacy. In 1822, the whole amount of the exports of Great Britain was only £36,968,964 sterling. In 1842, under a Protectionist régime, her exports had increased only £11,000,000 sterling, or thereabouts. In 1853, when the country had enjoyed for ten years a system of partial Free-trade, such had been the effect of Free-trade during her first and partial experiment, her exports had doubled, and amounted in that year to what was thought at that time the large sum of £93,351,306 sterling. She had then entered on her career of Free-trade. It thus appeared that, under Protection, there was an increase of £11,000,000 in ten years, that under partial Free-trade, the exports had doubled in the next ten or eleven years; but that, after twenty years of Free-trade, in 1876, although that was a year of depression,—the exports of Great Britain amounted, not to £93,000,000, but to the enormous and almost incredible sum of £256,000,000 sterling. As to the world's markets being closed against her, and Great Britain being driven to Central Africa for a market, no doubt the time would come when Central Africa would yield a return for the enterprise and expenditure that had been incurred in years of exploration. We could no more judge of what that country would be in the future by what it was to-day, than of America by its condition 100 or 200 years ago; and, with Free-trade to sustain England in her venture, she would be able to point to a rich harvest and her merchants returning laden with the wealth of the products of that country. But England did not depend on Central Africa yet. In 1876, that terrible year of depression, England exported to British possessions £65,000,000 sterling worth of products, to Germany more than £20,000,000, to the United States close upon £17,000,000, to France £16,000,000 and to the Netherlands nearly £12,000,000. So, after all, the expression used by the right hon. member for Kingston was nothing more than a figure of speech, which he had not even in that sense any justification for using, when he spoke of Great Britain being forced to resort for her customers, not to the nations of the world around her, but to Central Africa. Here was another little indication of what Free-trade had done for England during the last few years. No man was more competent to speak on financial and commercial questions than Mr. Shaw Lefevre, formerly secretary of the Board of Trade, which, as hon. members were aware, was a Department of the Government in Great Britain. Mr. Lefevre spoke as follows in a lecture which he gave recently in England:—

“It appeared that the growth of those accumulations had been very rapid. The income tax returns showed that the gross income assessed in Great Britain increased from £115,000,000 at the beginning of the century to £130,000,000 in 1815, £251,000,000 in 1843, and £262,000,000 in 1853; and then in the United Kingdom, from £308,000,000 in 1855 to £396,000,000 in 1865, and £571,000,000 in 1875. If the capital of that portion of the income derived from capital had only progressed at the same rate, the annual increase of capital all through, and especially of recent years, must have been enormous. The increase in the income assessed between 1865 and 1875 amounted to £175,000,000, which was equal to forty-four per cent. of the income assessed in 1865. Leaving out altogether the capital not yielding income, a similar increase of capital, assuming the present amount to be what he had stated, would give us from 1865 a total capital of about £5,200,000,000, on which the increase at forty-four per cent. would be £2,228,000,000; or, in round figures, £230,000,000 per annum. The foreign investments, though they were very large in the years before 1875, were by no means the chief part of the national accumulations. Our main savings were at home. Before the nation could be said to be living on its capital, it must be shown that not only was capital being called in from abroad, but that more was so called in than was being simultaneously invested at home. He had not seen this point considered by any of those who had made suggestions that the nation was living on its capital."

An American writer commenting on this remarked:

"Here you have two proofs, out of many, of the enormous internal riches of England in mere money! Fifteen hundred millions of dollars in the public and private banks, drawing little and some of it no interest, and a recent annual accumulation of over $3,000,000,000."

That was the country supposed to have been ruined by Free-trade, and which, he ventured to assert, as he had asserted before, was only waiting for a revival of the trade of the world to begin once more to pursue her course of prosperity. But they must also glance for a moment at the statement made as to the cause of the depression in England, and the character, to some extent, that depression assumed. Free-trade had the effect in England of creating a result, to a certain extent, similar to that which arose under Protection in the United States, although from natural causes. Free-trade in England had the effect of making her so great a manufacturing community, that she was able to manufacture more cheaply than any other nation in the world. In consequence of that very cheapness her manufacturers became impressed with the idea—an idea very largely justified by the result—that they had a monopoly of the world's trade. The consequence was that they did not keep pace with the times, and that, in many articles, they were beaten by other nations; and, moreover, that their workmen and employes became convinced that they had a monopoly of labour also; and, as a result, they had seen in England from time to time not only the most ignorant opposition on the part of the employes of the great manufacturers to new inventions, sometimes amounting to refusal to adopt what were known as "Yankee notions," but they had seen also that from time to time thousands of men, whenever trade had been a little more brisk than usual, had turned out on strike, and, consequently, raised the price of the article, and, what was fatal to the prosperity of the country, had deprived the manufacturer of his profits, and induced him to find his profit in the depreciation of the quality of his goods. But the real cause of England's depression was the depression that existed elsewhere. There was no part of the world where the depression did not exist. But there was this remarkable feature in the case of England: the wave of depression struck her last of all. Such were her resources, such were the ramifications of her trade, such was the extent of her commerce, such was the number of her customers, that she was the very last to succumb to the influences of the depression. It was only when the whole commercial world was depressed and the great consuming markets had been affected by that depression, that Great Britain had to succumb and confess to the influence of that depression on herself. They heard a year or two ago of sugar being sent from the United States to England; it was no new thing that cottons were being sent by American manufacturers to Manchester, and he could remember as long ago as he could remember anything the feeling of alarm for the prosperity of England engendered by the arrival of American productions. It was no new thing for American goods to be forced on the British market, or American inventions to commend themselves to the British people. American kitcheners, American ovens, as well as American cheese and provisions, as well as many other productions had long been imported into England from the United States; but the result had been, as he believed, it would always be when Englishmen were brought into competition with foreigners—such were their resources, the means of their manufacturers, the enormous appliances at their disposal—that they soon recovered themselves, as they did in the shipping trade, which, at a time, seemed likely to be beaten by American clippers, and proved themselves after all to be the first in the race. Another reason of those goods being sold in England was that they were virtually bankrupt stocks. They knew the market of the United States was being overcrowded with sugar, and that there was a much larger production of the refined sugar than could find a sale in that country. They had only a comparatively limited market. Protection had prevented them becoming a great exporting community as England was, and so if there was a surplus of goods and they required funds, they had to do what every bankrupt was compelled to do—bring them to the hammer and get rid of them by a forced sale. That was the secret of a large portion of the importations of American goods into England at the present time. Assuming it was the result of protection, to what did it amount? It amounted to this: that, after seventeen years of inordinately high protective tariffs the United States, with all her natural resources at her command, with cotton, iron and coal at her doors, possessing everything that could make a nation a great manufacturing community, with every advantage England had and some she had not, was able now, in 1878, to do on a very small scale what England had been doing as a matter of course under a Free-trade system for the last 20 or 30 years. But there was another reason why he objected to the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. Let them believe that England was suffering to-day from the loss of her customers, and that it was

Free-trade that had brought her to the position she was described as occupying, where should she look for life? Where was the loud-mouthed loyalty; where were those who uttered denunciations at anybody who even suggested that the British flag at any time might be hauled down? Where was the party of loyalty? There was no party of loyalty in Great Britain; there was no question of that kind between the two parties there; no man there would pretend to be more loyal than his neighbour. They never prated there about their loyalty or talked about their allegiance, because no one doubted their allegiance. But the party that was for ever going into the streets and market places, and declaring it was not disloyal, that it did not desire to offend the Mother Country, that it did not desire to haul up any other flag, would to-day inflict a fatal stab upon that England which was said, by the leader of that party, to be driven to seek customers in Central Africa. Here, at least, England should find liberal customers; here, at least, she should find a people who were not so imbued with their own selfish interests as to join hand in hand with Russia, Germany, and other nations that had stood in arms against her from time to time, in building fiscal barriers around her, and adding to the misery, suffering, and depression that was asserted to exist. He would now leave hon. gentlemen opposite to carry out what he did not hesitate to stigmatize as a disloyal policy towards Great Britain. He would not, however, impugn the loyalty of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson), whose face beamed over with loyalty at all times. The hon. gentleman evidently did not know into what bad company he had fallen. If he only dared to assert his own position, it should be as the leader of a great independent and loyal party. He was sure the hon. member for Charlevoix, the follower of Sir George Cartier could not be disloyal, for Sir George was the most loyal of Canadians, although there was that little episode about which so much unnecessary conversation took place the other day. But that hon. gentleman should not be found in company with the right hon. member for Kingston or the hon. member for Cumberland, because they were resolved upon a policy which was, in its nature and effect, the most disloyal policy that could be carried out against the connection with Great Britain and the interests of the whole empire. But the right hon. member for Kingston condescended to particularize. He was good enough to suggest that we might have a duty on iron, woollen goods, boots and shoes, and on cottons. Those were the only direct propositions the right hon. gentleman made. The country was to have a retaliatory, national and disloyal policy; it was to take care of the manufacturing, agricultural and mining interests, but especially to take care of the iron, woollen and shoe manufactures, and of the cotton trade. They had some information the other day about the cotton trade, and if hon. gentlemen remembered what appeared in the papers a few days ago in regard to one of the large Canadian cotton manufactories, he thought they would concede that no necessity arose for any protection to that industry.

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario): How much dividend did they declare during the four years before that?

MR. DYMOND said the hon. member had suggested that they had only declared a small dividend for the four previous years. Why did not the hon. gentleman or his leader give them Protection four years ago? He did not remember any speech made by the hon. gentleman on Protection four years ago, although the hon. gentleman claimed to be a most consistent Protectionist.

MR. GIBBS (North Ontario) said that, when manufacturers were protected by a 15 per cent. tariff, they were much better off than now with 25 or 30 per cent.

MR. DYMOND said it was evident that industry did not want the protection which hon. gentlemen opposite proposed to give them. Under the old Government it had 15 per cent. protection, while under the present Administration it had 17½ per cent. It was, moreover, no longer an infantile industry, which was put forward at one time as a strong plea in favour of a Protective policy.

MR. DYMOND.

MR. COLBY asked if the hon. member for North York vouched for the accuracy of the statement that the dividend was paid, and that the earnings were made.

MR. DYMOND said the statements were published from the company's report; if that was false, let the company take the consequences.

MR. GIBBS (North Ontario): What is the name of the company?

MR. DYMOND said they might pass from that point, because he was about to add something by way of confirmation. They had had the privilege of having before a Committee of the House manufacturers of cotton goods, and, although it appeared they were suffering to a certain extent from the depression, no evidence was offered that they desired protection; no evidence was offered but this: that, like any other firm of manufacturers in the country, they were more or less suffering from the depression of trade, but that they felt no necessity, and had no desire to receive additional protection. When he said "desire," he meant they were not eager and anxious for it, and did not urge it. Almost every man would be glad to have protection, if given to him voluntarily. He remembered distinctly that, before the Depression Committee in 1876, either the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald) or Mr. Andrew Robertson had stated that from one of the cotton manufactories he had received a very fair dividend on his investment in the company. However, he had the satisfaction to know, from the evidence of his hon. friend the member for Centre Toronto, that these persons were protected, at present, to the extent of thirty per cent. The right hon. member for Kingston demanded that woollens should be protected. There were a great many woollen manufactories in Canada, and, from evidence given before Committees of this House, the only complaint in this connection was, not that American goods came into competition with our woollens, — for, as far as the ordinary goods were concerned, scarcely any American woollens entered the Canadian market, — but that British shoddy, as it was called, was largely imported. The cheap cloths of England were the only rivals of Canadian tweeds. He was not just then discussing the question whether it would be right or proper to interfere with the attire of the people, whether it would be well to enact sumptuary laws, but he would call hon. gentlemen's attention to the fact that, so far as the retaliatory policy which they advocated was concerned, there was no plea before the public, as evidence given before Committees of this House indicated, for an increased duty on American goods. With regard to the boot and shoe trade, a few days since one of the largest boot and shoe manufacturers in Montreal was in Ottawa and told him (Mr. Dymond) that he required no protection, that his goods were then selling in almost every part of the world; that goods, in his line, manufactured in Montreal, were being sold in England, in Australia, in New Zealand; that in every part of the globe they found a market, and did not need any protection. According to estimates of the production of boots and shoes in 1870-1, the whole production of Canada amounted to $16,000,000. Against that, there was an importation amounting to from $200,000 to $300,000, included in which was a large amount of goods that could not be manufactured in this country at all. Therefore, there was no competition from the United States worth naming in the manufacture of boots and shoes. In connection with this branch of business, he would draw attention to the fact that, prosperous as this trade seemed to be, with no foreign competition to depress it, there was none in which a larger number of failures occurred, which showed that it was less rather than more protection it needed, and that such protection as did exist had been the cause of over-production, with all the disastrous consequences which followed in its train. He did not know whether the right hon. member for Kingston alluded last year to the duty on coal, but he was inclined to think the right hon. gentleman had not had much to say on the subject, while travelling through Ontario during the past summer. He (Mr. Dymond) had taken occasion on a former evening, during a speech of the hon. member for Cumberland, to remind the latter that he was at fault on that subject. To-day, he again would remind the hon. member that, while, in his estimation, coal was to be the great factor in any arrangements having in view a National Policy, while he had spent weeks on a Committee during last Session endeavouring to show that a protective duty of 50c. to 75c. per ton was absolutely necessary for the revival of that branch of commerce, when he came face to face with the people of Ontario, and when he should have proved to them that they would derive benefit from a duty being imposed on coal, the hon. gentleman was dumb. There could not be found a single reference to coal throughout the hon. gentleman's Ontario speeches. Did he mean he was going to impose a duty on the people of Ontario against their will. Did he suppose that, if he forsook the Province of his former affection and tried to enter Parliament from an Ontario constituency, he could succeed without giving them the benefit of his views on that subject. What was the object of his summer campaign? He talked a great deal about various petty scandals, about the Globe newspaper, about almost everything that could be crowded into speeches hours in length, but not a single word about this great and prime factor in the interprovincial policy movement, the policy which all turned, in fact, upon imposing a duty on coal. To-day, the people of Ontario were left in utter darkness on this question, if the hon. gentleman's arguments were to give them light. There was a great deal of misunderstanding with regard to this question of a duty on coal. He (Mr. Dymond) believed that considerable injury had been inflicted on the people of Nova Scotia by the fact that they had been led to believe by their friends in the Opposition that they might obtain a duty on coal. He ventured to say that there did not live in this Dominion to-day any statesman who would dare, under any circumstances, to impose a duty on coal. And no one knew this better than the hon. member for Cumberland himself; no one could better understand the motives which might have prompted him to agitate the question of coal duty in Nova Scotia. It was true an enormous capital was invested in a coal mining industry in that Province, probably from twelve to fifteen million dollars, represented, perhaps, by from six to eight millions of actual value. But there was no concealing the fact that the coal producers of Nova Scotia had shown great lack of energy and want of judgment. It was quite certain that they had stood still and allowed themselves to be beaten in the race with very little effort to save themselves from the consequences of which they complained. The only means they had ever taken collectively, in order to obtain relief, as they had themselves admitted, was to combine together and ask Parliament to impose a duty of fifty to seventy-five cents per ton on coal. The whole quantity of coal used in this Dominion in the year, so far as he could estimate, was from 1,400,000 to 1,500,000 tons, of which 933,000 tons were imported in the year 1876-7, taken from the return in the Trade and Navigation Reports. Of this amount, a large portion, nearly half, was anthracite coal. In the Dominion there was no anthracite coal; bituminous coal was the only coal product, unless he might make an exception in favour of a very small amount of anthracite coal lately discovered, he believed, in Charlotte, New Brunswick. There was no anthracite coal industry in this country, and, therefore, when they were asked to put a duty on coal, they were asked to put a duty upon a product which, so far as the question of Protection was concerned, would have no influence and be simply a tax upon the taxpayer.

MR. MACDONNELL: What quantity of anthracite is imported, and what quantity of bituminous?

MR. DYMOND said the anthracite coal, which came entirely from the United States into this Dominion, in 1876-7 amounted to 420,000 tons; the bituminous coal was represented by the importation from Great Britain of 160,000 tons, and from the United States of 353,000 tons, making a total of 513,000 tons of bituminous and 420,000 tons of anthracite. So far as bituminous coal in Quebec was concerned, Nova Scotia had no competition to fear from the United States, as no bituminous coal was imported from the United States east of the Ottawa River. He believed, however, a small quantity of American bituminous coal came to Ottawa for gas-making purposes, it being found advantageous to mix it with Nova Scotia coal. Thus far, Nova Scotians had nothing to fear from the Americans in the way of competition, from Ottawa to Cape Breton. What they had to complain of was the importation of English coal, and the Government was therefore asked to establish a retaliatory tariff which, so far as the 160,000 tons of coal were concerned, would operate directly against Great Britain. And further, it was well known with gentlemen engaged in the shipping industry, that this coal was a most important consideration in connection with the shipping trade; the vessels which sailed from Quebec or Montreal with cargoes brought out coal as ballast, having bought it in England at prices very little above ballast rates. A tax on coal would, therefore, be a direct tax upon our shipping industry; that industry for which the hon. member for Cumberland, in 1874, expressed so much concern. A large quantity of American bituminous coal, as well as anthracite coal, was consumed in Ontario. There was not a single ton of Nova Scotia coal used in Ontario, unless it were occasionally a small lot as the result of some casual adventure. In Ontario, in 1876, were consumed 261,895 tons of anthracite coal, and 345,000 tons of bituminous American coal; while in Quebec, the same year, the consumption of anthracite was 117,000 tons. No bituminous coal of the United States was used in the Province of Quebec. The proposition, under a retaliatory system, was to impose a duty of 75c. per ton on the whole coal importations. He contended, in the first place, that this would not be efficacious in forcing the Nova Scotia coal upon the Western Canadian market. He had already shown that American coal did not enter into competition in the Quebec market; therefore a retaliatory policy could only have the effect of excluding British coal, and the exclusion of British coal was thus brought within the scope of the hon. gentleman's policy. Last year they had a very fair criterion, showing what the effect of a certain amount of duty on coal would be. The Grand Trunk Railway had, shortly before the meeting of the Coal Committee of last year, issued tenders for coal contracts, and those tenders were opened, he believed, while that Committee was sitting. The tenders accepted for Montreal were for Nova Scotia coal, $3.96 per long ton at the wharf, which with 27c. per ton for cartage, cost delivered in yard, $4.23; for Toronto, American coal was accepted at $3.40 per short ton, equal to $3.78 per long ton, a difference in price of 45c. in favour of United States coal at Toronto. If to this were added $1 per ton, the lowest rate at which coal could possibly be borne from Montreal to Toronto, the difference against Nova Scotia coal would be just $1.50 per ton. This was in the absence of any special arrangements for securing round trip freights by direct water communication. This evidence, arising out of a transaction which came directly under the notice of the Committee, proved that Nova Scotia coal, even under a protective duty of seventy-five cents per ton, would still be excluded from the Ontario market; a duty of at least $1.50 per ton, would be required to place it on an equality with American coal. What would this useless outlay of money mean? Something like a million tons of coal were, as he had shown, imported into Canada; at seventy-five cents per ton, the result would be that, not one ton more of Nova Scotia coal would be sold than before the imposition of the tariff, and the people of Ontario and Quebec would be saddled with a tax of $750,000 a year, as the result of what was called a national, but was really a purely sectional policy. This tax would be one which would fall every year to a greater and greater extent on the mass of consumers, and the consumption of coal was by no means confined to the cities, for, owing to the increasing scarcity of wood, it was rapidly extending back into the towns and villages and country. But hon. gentlemen opposite talked of establishing an interprovincial trade, and argued that, if a duty were placed on Nova Scotia coal, it would enable the people of the Lower Provinces to consume so much more of the breadstuffs and other products of Ontario. They spoke of a line of steamers being projected to carry the interprovincial trade, which would be thus established. But there were already several means of communication with those Provinces, and, if a line of steamers were running from Hamilton or Toronto to Cape Breton, what benefit would that be to the people of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, or the western portion of Nova Scotia? It would cost them less to buy their flour and carry it by other and more direct routes. So far as a domestic trade was concerned, any ingenious scheme of interprovincial trade would be utterly impracticable, and would only prove to be an interference with the ordinary course of commerce. If it were true that they could bring cargoes of coal up from Nova Scotia and carry back flour and wheat to Cape Breton, or elsewhere, for foreign shipment, then the problem was solved. If they could by that means deliver coal so cheaply in Western Canada that no duty was wanted, why impose a duty? If, in any of these ports, such as Sydney, they could obtain such an amount of foreign trade as would carry away all the produce of Western Canada which they could send down, and take back coal, then there was, according to the reasoning of the advocates of such a scheme, no necessity for imposing a duty at all.

ELECTION PETITION BILL.—[BILL No. 15.

(Mr. Haggart.)

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Order for second reading read.

MR. MACKENZIE: This Bill must stand.

MR. BOWELL: Is any objection made to it?

MR. MACKENZIE said he had informed the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) the other day that this Bill could not go as a Private Bill. If it were passed at all, it would be as an Act to amend the Controverted Elections Act. He had suggested to the hon. gentleman, privately, that he had better consult some legal gentleman and ascertain what he should do in the matter. He had understood that this was to have been done; but he had not seen the hon. gentleman since.

MR. BOWELL said he was not aware of such an arrangement. He had not so understood the hon. the First Minister when the hon. gentleman made objections to this Bill the other night. He had understood the hon. gentleman to say that some questions affecting the law had arisen, which required consideration on his part, and hence he had asked to let it stand. Of course he (Mr. Bowell) did not intend to press the matter. He was only doing a friendly act towards his hon. friend.

MR. LAFLAMME said that the Bill could not pass as it was, for this reason: the party complained that a certain amount of money was lodged in the Election Court. It appeared that he made application to the Court of Queen's Bench on account of the change in jurisdiction, which vested the jurisdiction of the Election Court in the Court of Queen's Bench. He made his application to recover the amount deposited in the Court of Queen's Bench, not in the Election Court, and he now asked this Parliament to pass a law ordering the Court of Queen's Bench to pay over this money, which was altogether irregular. In the first place, this party did not say he had made the requisite application in order to recover his money, which must be in the Election Court; it did not appear that he had ever made such application; and if that Court did not exist, the party who had this money had it in his individual capacity, and it was not shown that he had applied to that person in his private capacity for that money. As the Bill stood, it would amount to an interference with the administration of justice in a Court which was entirely under the jurisdiction of the Local Parliament. Under these circumstances, this measure could not pass in its present state, while there also existed the objection which had been raised by the hon. the First Minister.

MR. BOWELL said he understood the hon. the Minister of Justice to say that the proper course would be for the gentleman in question, Dr. Stewart, of Kingston, to take proceedings against the individual who held this money.

MR. LAFLAMME: Yes; or go before the Court in which the money is deposited.

MR. BOWELL: But there is no such Court.

MR. LAFLAMME: Yes; it must exist for the performance of the duties assigned to it.

MR. BOWELL: But that Court, as I understand it, had no existence at the time this money was deposited.

MR. LAFLAMME: Oh, yes, it had.

MR. BOWELL: Consequently, no application can be made to a Court having no existence, or which had no existence at the time.

MR. LAFLAMME said the Court had such existence. A petition, according to the gentleman's own statement, was presented in the Court of Queen's Bench, when it ought to have been presented in the Election Court.

MR. DYMOND said, as a matter of fact, he might state that he happened to be present when the application was made before the Election Court, but it held that this money was not deposited with that Court, and that it had no cognizance of it because it had no petition properly before it. In fact, that Court only existed, and still existed, to take action in the event of anything occurring under the provisions of the Act by which it was constituted. He supposed that it would terminate at the end of the present Parliament.

MR. MCCARTHY said he also happened to be present at the time, and he thought that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) was not exactly correct in his statement. The difficulty was this: a petition was filed in the Election Court, but it had no jurisdiction in elections arising out of the Act of 1874. An application was then made by the respondent to take the petition off the fyles of the Court, and this application was made absolute. The petition was taken off the fyles. Dr. Stewart was in this position: the petition was off the fyles, and the money was in Court, but not to the credit of the Clerk of the Court. It had been deposited on the order of the Court in a bank to the credit of the case; and what had to be done, it appeared, was to place the Court in the same position as if the petition was not formally off the fyles. He understood that the Government were going to bring down a Bill to amend the Election Law, and they might add a clause giving the Court the jurisdiction necessary to entertain the application on the part of whosoever was entitled to this money. There was also a difficulty, as some persons were probably aware, as to whether Dr. Stewart was entitled to this money or persons who had advanced it.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

DEBATE RESUMED.

Mr. DYMOND said that, when the House rose for recess, he was endeavouring, not exhaustively by any means, but in a general way, to point out what would be the effects of a policy which imposed a duty of 75c. per ton on coal in a retaliatory sense. The object of those who made this proposition was simply to thrust back the coal fields of America to a distance of 900 miles and to destroy those advantages which nature had placed at our command, advantages which were given to the central portion of the Dominion with respect to a foreign country and which were enjoyed at either extremity of the Dominion or on our own soil; nothing could be more unjust, nothing could be more fatal, in his estimation, to a true national policy than to attempt to deprive the great and populous central portions of the Dominion of those advantages which nature had bestowed upon them. Not only were the coal fields of the United States more favourably situated for the supply of our need, but the mode by which the coal was obtained was so economical as to overcome the expenses arising out of a land carriage varying from 150 to 300 miles; and this enabled us to obtain that coal at as cheap a rate as it could be possible to obtain it, even if our Nova Scotia mines were situated much nearer to us than they were. So far as the evidence before them went, it was impossible to deliver Nova Scotia coal at the pit's mouth for less than something like $1.50 a ton, whereas coal of equal quality might be obtained at the pit's mouth in the United States at prices varying from 80c. to $1 a ton; and the topographical features of the country where coal was found in the United States were such that it was delivered almost without handling on board the vessel that bore it across the lake to its destination; whereas, in the case of Nova Scotia, the coal had to be raised from a greater or less depth, the advantage, however, on the other hand, being that the mines were there situated so very near the water's edge that anything like land carriage might be said to be avoided. But there was one objection to the duty on coal—the same objection that applied to the duty on iron. He confessed he could not reconcile in his own mind the fact that an hon. gentleman like the hon. member for Cumberland—who was so excited and enthusiastic in favour of the shipping interests when it was proposed to place taxes or duties on articles used for shipbuilding purposes on the ground that they were the raw materials of a great industry,—should, on the other hand, propose to impose duties on an article which was the raw material of every industry in the country—and also on iron, which, next to coal, was our most important raw material. But the food of man might also be considered raw material, and the proposition of the hon. member was, that, having taxed the people of Western Canada and Québec to the amount of $750,000 per annum, in order to carry out a retaliatory policy against the United States, a dollar and a-quarter or a dollar and a-half should be charged upon every bushel of flour consumed in the Maritime Provinces. He did not mean to say that the hon. gentleman would dare to get up and propose a tax of a dollar and a-half or a dollar and a-quarter on flour. The largest amount the hon. gentleman had imposed in his own Province was 25c. and the largest amount imposed afterward by the Dominion, was 50c. At the commencement of his remarks he had stated that, if a retaliatory policy were adopted, we would have to impose upon our people just the amount of duty which the Americans impose on theirs. The duty on flour, consequently, would amount to something like the sum he had mentioned, assuming the price of flour to range from five to six dollars per barrel. Well, having taxed the people of the Maritime Provinces to the tune of from $1,000,000 to $1,200,000, assuming the consumption was at the rate of one dollar a head, the hon. gentleman also proposed to impose a duty on salt. Salt, if he (Mr. Dymond) was not mistaken, was mentioned in an incidental way by the right hon. the member for Kingston in his speech of the previous evening. Now, what was the case with regard to salt? As in the case of coal, salt was produced in a portion of the Dominion very distant from the point at which the largest quantity of salt was required. No one needed to be told of the quality of Canadian salt any more than they required to be told of the quality of Canadian coal. But, at the present time, we imported into Canada about 3,000,000 bushels of salt, and we exported to the United States something like 820,000 bushels. The fishermen of our Maritime Provinces required to obtain the raw material for their industry at the lowest possible rate, and the effect of a retaliatory policy would be that we should impose upon 3,000,000 bushels of salt a tax which would range from 8c. to 12½c. per hundred-weight. That would have the effect, perhaps, of excluding 100,000 bushels imported into Canada from the United States, against 820,000 bushels of salt exported from Canada to the United States. The Canadian salt producer, in fact, notwithstanding the heavy duty imposed by the Americans, had a very profitable market in the United States. The Americans, as one gentleman told the Committee in 1876, were compelled to take Canadian salt whether it was taxed or not. Our salt producers, moreover, commanded the whole of that portion of Ontario lying west of Toronto, or perhaps west of Port Hope. There was an importation of American salt between Port Hope and the Ottawa River which came into very close competition with our own; but at Montreal, where the seaboard was reached, or where ocean navigation commenced eastward to the sea, the largest portion of the salt consumed must necessarily be from Great Britain. The effect then of the policy suggested by hon. gentlemen might possibly be to compel these persons who used American salt in a limited portion of Ontario to buy their salt elsewhere or to pay a duty of from 8c. to 12½c. per bushel, and, at the same time, to impose upon the whole people of this Dominion a duty on the three million bushels imported in addition to the duty already charged on flour and coal. Salt was used as a raw material in the packing of pork, by farmers in dressing their lard, and by fishermen in curing their fish. More than two million bushels of the salt used in Canada was imported from Great Britain, coming out, like coal, at little more than ballast rates, and so sensible were hon. gentlemen opposite of this latter fact that, when in 1870 they imposed their National Policy on the country, they exempted from the operation of the duty salt coming from Great Britain and British possessions or salt used in the sea and gulf fisheries. In a word, they were compelled to confess that they could not carry their policy into effect by taxing the salt-consuming population of the Maritime Provinces. The conclusion was this: that the professions of Protection made by hon. gentlemen opposite deserved no confidence at the hands of the country; that, so far as their past career went, it had been hostile to and not in favour of a protective tariff, and that when there was the greatest justification for the imposition of protective duties, these protective duties were not imposed. He thought he had shown as far as he was able, with regard to what might be termed a National Policy, that it would have an injurious effect upon our relations with the neighbouring country; that it would really bring no advantages with it to the great body of our people, and further, that it would be thoroughly disloyal and obnoxious towards Great Britain. This late adoption of a retaliatory Protectionist policy, was nothing but the desperate act of desperate men. He believed it had been resorted to because other and more reprehensible means had failed. These hon. gentlemen had not the weapons to resort to now with which they appealed to the country in 1872. They had no longer Pacific Railway contractors to whom they could apply for "another $10,000;" they had no longer gentlemen who would hand $32,600 as a free gift to the Minister of Public Works, any kind of receipt being refused. They had no longer the control of the Intercolonial Railway, which one of their own number predicted would give them a ten years' lease of power. They could no longer resort to those expedients which consisted in opening hardware stores, in order to raise money for political purposes. They no longer possessed those arguments by which the Conservative party in Canada for the last thirty years had sought to attain power; and, being without those arguments, they were, what he might call, using the term in a strictly parliamentary sense, shiftless political vagabonds. Being driven to the last expedient, they swallowed their past policy and professions, and came down to ask the House for a National Policy, which should lay the foundations of our own Dominion by servilely borrowing a tariff from the Statute-book of the United States. That was the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite. But there was a policy which differed from that of hon. gentlemen opposite. There was a policy, for instance, which opened new territories to our rule, and which gave to those territories the markets of the world. In the terms of the Pacific Railway contract, it was provided that the north-western portion of the Dominion should be placed in immediate communication with the great commercial centres of the United States. What did the Pembina Branch Railway mean? Did it mean that barriers were to be raised between the North-West Provinces and the people of the United States. Did it mean that we wanted a Rocky Mountain range along our southern boundary, as in the most westerly portion of the Dominion, in order to introduce a Protection which would prevent that free interchange of commodities, those close and intimate commercial relations with the United States which the people of the North-West must need as well as those of the Maritime Provinces. The right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) actually spoke of a retaliatory tariff as being necessary, in order to prevent the Americans from having access to the North-West. Could anything be more suicidal? Could anything be more certain to impose a fatal check on the progress of that country? Could anything be done that would longer deprive us of all the advantages that might accrue from that great acquisition. But, forsooth, in order to put a little money into the pockets of a few manufacturers in Ontario, the progress of the people was to be handicapped, burdens were to be laid upon them in return for every bushel of flour and every pound of wheat they raised. The Province of British Columbia, which was so well represented in that House, was one which was likely to be most injuriously affected by this insane policy. Look at the resources of British Columbia, in its untold wealth of precious metals, in its timber, its iron and coal and limestone, all lying contiguous one to the other, with the additional advantage that the finest harbours in the world and one of the finest climates in the world must give to any people. Look, too, at its large capacities as an agricultural country. What they wanted there was men with capital to develop those resources and the many industries to which they would give rise, and to afford facilities for a free interchange of productions between British Columbia and any other part of the world. Because British Columbia was bounded on one side by the Rocky Mountain chain, to say that they intended to build another Rocky Mountain chain on our western shores was to suggest something which was opposed to all notions that were liberal or just, and he did not think hon. gentlemen in the Opposition, far gone as they were, could for a moment intend to carry such a proposition into effect. He had said that there was a national policy which was outside and beyond all those mean and paltry devices for producing certain results, injurious, as he believed them to be, to our national existence. There was, on the other hand, a policy to which effect had already been partially given,—the policy which was represented by our great public works and magnificent canals, by the Intercolonial Railway and by our attempt to span the continent with an interprovincial road; and this was a policy which laid no heavier burthen on the shoulders of the people than they could bear; which imposed no taxation not necessary to the purposes of the State. This was the true policy and the only policy which was worthy to be called national, and the only policy which the people of this country would for one moment accept. He believed there was a great future for this Dominion. He believed the time would come when they should be prouder than they were to-day to bear the name of Canadian. He believed the time was coming when the fisher on the Atlantic coast and the miner of Cariboo would feel that they belonged to one common nationality, as they belonged to one common race. But it was necessary, in order to obtain that end, great and noble as it was, that no economical barrier should be opposed to carrying it out to its fullest extent. He believed there was in these new Provinces of ours, if they were allowed their free development, a mine of wealth of which the country had, as yet, no conception. Dr. Johnson, on one occasion, having attended the sale of his friend's (Mr. Thrale's) great brewery, was asked to address the crowd, and he told the people in his grandiloquent fashion that the purchaser of the estate offered that day would command the potentiality of growing rich beyond the dreams of avarice. He believed that, if we did not interfere with those grand economic laws which emanated like truth itself from the mind of a beneficent Creator, we, or those who came after us, would possess in these Provinces, in time to come, not only the potentiality of growing rich beyond the dreams of avarice, but might and power and greatness far transcending the limits of our present ambition.

MR. MASSON said he wished to offer a few remarks on the political aspects of the question under discussion; but, before doing so, he should draw attention to what had fallen from the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) on the previous evening with reference to the Supreme Court. It was their duty to consider this question from a national and not from a sectional point of view; to consider the establishment of the Supreme Court in its relation to the whole country; but the hon. member for South Bruce had defended the establishment of that institution from a Quebec point of view, and to that phase of the subject, he (Mr. Masson) would therefore address himself. He knew too well the sentiments of justice of this House to fear that his opinions would be construed as being merely sectional, Quebec standing, in regard to this matter, in a different position to other Provinces. The people of that Province possessed certain important rights which they were anxious to maintain, and it was not to be expected, therefore, that they should have allowed this measure for establishing the Supreme Court to pass without some opposition. It was a question, as Mr. Cauchon, one of the leaders of the Liberal party had said, that the Province of Quebec could not easily yield upon. He hoped hon. gentlemen would not think he was acting in an improper sectional manner, by adopting this view of it. Mr. Cauchon said: "We from Lower Canada would see no inconvenience nor any danger in it if our laws and our institutions resembled those of all the other Provinces, but, unfortunately, it is not so. We have special institutions and laws apart from the other Provinces, which require special safeguards and protection." Hon. members could not be surprised, therefore, if the establishment of the Supreme Court was received with some disapprobation in the Province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) had said that he was prepared to support the establishment of this Court on the ground that, in taking appeals to England, they appealed to a tribunal not supposed to know the laws of Canada so well as would a tribunal of this country. He thought that, from a Quebec point of view, the hon. gentleman, in saying this, had given up the whole case. If, in going to the Privy Council in England, they were placed before a tribunal not supposed to know the laws of Canada, this country was not called upon to support that Court. But Quebec, appealing to the Supreme Court of the Dominion, in a similar manner appealed to a Court which did not—which could not—know their views, which could not be cognizant of their institutions; yet, notwithstanding this, they in the Province of Quebec were called upon to pay for that tribunal. This was the difference between the two cases. The hon. the Minister of Justice admitted the unfairness of this when he himself proposed that two members of that tribunal should be from the Quebec Bench; and why should the Province of Quebec have two Judges in that Court if all the judges of the land were able to judge according to the Quebec law? What had been the consequences to them in Lower Canada of the appointment of these Quebec Judges? It was this, that, when a cause was first heard in the Superior Court, it was tried by one Judge; when it was taken to the Court of Review, three Judges adjudicated upon it, and it might then be transferred in appeal to another Court, where four or five Judges would try the case. All these Judges were educated in the Quebec laws, and knew them thoroughly well. What was the fact when this same case was brought into the Supreme Court? It had been adjudicated upon by seven or eight of the best Judges in the land, and their judgment was subjected to reverse by a Court, two of whose Judges only were supposed to know anything of Quebec law. There was another inconvenience. When there was an appeal to England, there was an appeal to a tribunal that understood French. The Court there could read and understand the whole evidence put before it. He had no better authority for this than the hon. the Minister of Justice himself, who stated two years ago in a speech he made on the establishment of a Supreme Court (vide Hansard, page 1614) that the Judges in England understood the French language, and that the evidence was produced in French before them, and suitors paid for no translation. Here it was known that at least one-half of the Judges did not understand a word of French at all. In a case brought by the member for Charlevoix, the hon. member or the county was put to great expense in having the whole of the evidence translated to lay before the Judges. The appointment of Judges in a Court where two languages were admitted had become a question of great and general importance. They knew that, in the Province of Quebec, French was the predominating language. They had a right to speak French and to plead in French; consequently, it was the duty of the Government to place at the head of their judicial machinery such men as understood the French language. It was a derisive mockery to give the right to plead before a tribunal in French and not give a tribunal that understood the language. In Manitoba they had appointed a Judge, an able Judge, who did not understand a word of French, and he had to decide cases that were pleaded before him in the language he did not understand, or the suitors had to forego their rights sanctioned by law. This was an anomaly that ought not to exist. The Supreme Court was the introduction of the thin edge of the wedge to do away with their laws and institutions, their language and everything dear to them. They were at first supported in their opposition to this movement by the Hon. Mr. Cauchon, in a most able pamphlet on the question of Confederation. He (Mr. Masson) would go further, and call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice to the fact that no sooner was the Bill passed in this Legislature than this opinion spread through the country and was held by those who had different ideas and different interests to those in the Province of Quebec. He had, as an authority for this, an article which appeared shortly afterwards in the Globe newspaper, which stated that this was the beginning of a new era in which the Dominion would have uniformity of laws as of everything else. The article stated:

“In Quebec the existence of a peculiar system—the old civil law—has excited jealousy of the intervention of Canadian Judges not educated in that system; while, on the other hand, for reasons it is not necessary to discuss too closely, the practice of appealing from the Provincial Courts of Quebec to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has been of constant occurrence. But Ontario, no less than Quebec, will certainly gain by the existence of a Court that will guarantee, at least uniformity in the decisions of questions of law throughout the Dominion. If we are for political convenience separated by political landmarks, we are none the less citizens of one nation, and everything that tends to make us feel and think and act as one people, is in itself a national benefit.”

Now, he submitted to the hon. the Minister of Justice, was that his intention when he supported the Supreme Court Bill? If so, they had the right to complain. The Bill might be good for the other Provinces, but it certainly was not for the Province of Quebec. There were only two Judges appointed to that Court who knew the laws of Quebec, and it was not just that these two Judges should be called upon to quash the judgment arrived at by eight judges thoroughly acquainted with the laws and institutions of Quebec, and who should judge in last resort if the appeal to England was to be abolished.

MR. SPEAKER said he would call the hon. member's attention to the fact that at present the question before the House was an amendment to the motion that the Speaker leave the Chair and the House go into Committee of Supply. That amendment dealt with Protection and that only. It was not competent for the hon. gentleman to discuss anything but the question before the House.

MR. MASSON said he did not think he was out of order, but he would, of course, bow to the decision of the Speaker.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said the hon. member (Mr. Masson) stated, in the commencement of his speech, that some members spoke on the same question on the previous evening.

AN HON. MEMBER: That was before the amendment was moved.

MR. MASSON said he could defend his position if required. He had thought that he was right in the course taken by him. He believed that, upon a motion for going into Supply, the widest range was given to the whole debate, and that an amendment being moved did not narrow or curtail the limits of the debate; on the contrary, the debate on the amendment must necessarily partake of the nature of the main motion which regulated it. An hon. member could move an amendment for the purpose of answering or discussing the question. He thought he was right, but would bow to the decision given. The hon. the member for North York (Mr. Dymond) had delivered a speech which he must admit was very creditable to himself. He congratulated him upon it, but regretted that so excellent an address had been rather spoilt in his closing remarks, by bringing up old disputes that were quite beside the question. The hon. gentleman in one part of his speech had said that they could not affect the United States by anything done by this country. This was rather belittling us, and was not very happy in view of the statement made by the Finance Minister that probably some thing would have to be done with the malt duties, as the Americans were getting alarmed and restless on account of the duty imposed here on malt. In another portion of his speech the hon.

MR. MASSON.

gentlemen had endeavoured to strengthen the position he was defending, by stating that certain industries had been able to prosper, notwithstanding the great depression, and to pay a few dividends. This was an illustration taken from the private affairs of certain individuals with which it was difficult to deal. How were they to know how those dividends had been obtained. Was it not obtained by some kind of Protection? There were at times two kinds of Protection—the one given by a Government, and the other by a manufacturer's creditors. They knew there were commercial men who were apt to boast of their credit. They knew that men had boasted sometimes of their establishments being most flourishing—especially at election time—and, a few days after the elections were carried, they were discovered to be insolvent. There was one firm that, just before the last election in Quebec East, was said to have 800 men always employed, and did not want Protection; after the election, the firm broke down and became bankrupt, but their boast of prosperity had done its service. This showed how difficult it was to meet the argument of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DYMOND: Hear, hear.

Mr. MASSON said they could not discuss this unless they knew the reasons which had kept those prosperous persons above the general depression. The hon. gentleman had touched upon what he (Mr. Masson) considered would be a sore point to many of his friends from the province of Quebec. He had touched upon the question of loyalty to England, and reproached them with speaking of loyalty with disrespect. Following in the wake of the Toronto Globe, he had raised the cry of loyalty, and had said that the hon. member for Kingston wished to destroy the credit and the prosperity of England. It was most amusing to hear the hon. gentleman speaking so. The newspaper, for which the hon. gentleman would not be responsible in this House, had also thrown a general accusation against his right hon. friend the member for Kingston. It was, that he was in alliance with such

Ultramontane retrogrades as the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin), Mr. Chapleau, and himself (Mr. Masson), and they could not understand why the hon. member for Kingston should endanger his whole position by alliance with them, and went on to say that he was led by them into a policy detrimental to the interest of England. He would read the extract for the amusement of the House:—

“Nor would Sir John A. Macdonald's policy be less injurious to British connection than to Confederation. Protection to Canadian products means a direct blow to British trade, to British shipping, and to British commerce. It touches the British interest in his most vulnerable part—the pocket. It is thoroughly repugnant to his own view and opinions. To him it implies nothing but national selfishness of the lowest type. It is an ungrateful return for his own liberality. Sever the trade that unites British and Canadian interests, and the strongest cable that binds Canada to Great Britain would be broken. The sympathies that crowd around the connection would be broken. Not a few would regard the act as a first and most significant warning of Canada's determination to be independent. The most tangible evidence of benefit accruing to the Mother Country by alliance, would be destroyed.”

That was the first time they, in Lower Canada, had heard such a charge made against Lower Canadian Conservatives; but he might tell the hon. gentleman that the Conservatives of Lower Canada were as loyal to England as they always had been, but he would add the words of Lafontaine: “Mais avant tout soyons Canadiens”—(“But before all let us be Canadians”). This was Lafontaine's doctrine, and they followed it. The Imperial Government in its relations and connections with the colonies had never been exempt from those rather selfish motives, if such motives could be so called, by which the Mother Country wished to aggrandize herself at the expense of the colonies; the whole colonial system was based upon this principle that the Mother Country took these colonies so as to have from them raw material for her own manufactures. That was the object of every central Government in every country in the world with respect to their colonies, and, if England claimed a right at times to be selfish in its desires with regard to this colony, they would not go so far in that course, but defend the rights of Canada. The Imperial Government having given us the right of self-government, had also conferred upon us the right to regulate our fiscal duties as we wished. The Conservatives of Lower Canada did not wish to act against the interests of England, but they had the right, if they wished, to regulate the duties—irrespective of England, if it were Canada's interest to do so. That was what the Conservatives of Lower Canada wished. They never dreamt of Protection against England, and Free-trade with the United States, as their opponents of Lower Canada had, as he would prove shortly. They had the authority of Sir A. T. Galt when he repeated what he had written in 1862 about his tariff in 1859, when all the manufacturers of England grumbled—and every Englishman had a right to grumble when he propounded his view—he distinctly stated that we had the right to increase our tariff as we chose, that, having the right of self-government, the English people had no right to object. If that were the case he did not see why Canada should not regulate her trade; they must not be more loyal than the king. Sir A. T. Galt said:

“Respect to the Imperial Government must always dictate the desire to satisfy them that the policy of this country is neither hastily nor unwisely formed, and that due regard is had to the interests of the Mother Country as well as to the Province. But the Government of Canada, acting for its Legislature and people, cannot, through those feelings of deference which they owe to the Imperial authorities, in any manner waive or diminish the right of the people of Canada to decide for themselves both as to the mode and extent to which taxation will be imposed. Self-government would be utterly annihilated, if the views of the Imperial Government were to be preferred to those of the people of Canada. * * * The Imperial Government are not responsible for the debts and engagements of Canada; they do not maintain its judiciary, educational or civil service; they contribute nothing to the internal government of the country; and the Provincial Legislature, acting through a Ministry directly responsible to it, has to make provision for all these events; they must necessarily claim and exercise the evident latitude as to the nature and extent of the burdens to be placed upon the industry of the people.”

MR. MASSON.

In consequence of these views, what did Sir A. T. Galt do? He increased the duties on the tariff from 15 per cent. to 20 per cent. If Canada had exercised its right of increasing its tariff, upon what principle could the Imperial Government, or the manufacturers of England—by what right could they curtail their power of imposing a protective tariff. Now, it was very amusing to hear hon. gentlemen opposite speak of loyalty, especially when they were obliged to act in accord with their friends from Lower Canada upon the subject. Before adverting to the Parti National he would refer to what his hon. friend had said—that there was some difference between the “outs” and the “ins,” but that sometimes there was more difference between the “ins” and the “outs.” They had had an exemplification of that in Lower Canada, especially upon the very question of Protection. A great writer had said that there were two men most dissimilar to each other—one, a man who pretended that he would alter everything if he had the power, and the very same man in power; they were the most different men in the world; and an exemplification had been given by members from Lower Canada when in the Government and when out of it. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, he was obliged to say, though he did not wish to say anything offensive, was not as ingenuous as he had a right to expect him to be in dealing with this question of the relations of the Parti National to our fiscal policy. The hon. gentleman having this book in his hand (Lareau) stated that it contained the programme of the Parti National and that the word “Protection” was not even mentioned in the programme; and the hon. gentleman had led the House to believe that, in fact, Protection had not been advocated by that party, and was not a plank in their platform. But he (Mr. Masson) would now read from that book what was said upon this question:

“9.—Obtaining the absolute right of regulating ourselves our commercial relations with other countries so as to ensure the establishment of manufactures.”

He would like to ask any man who had taken up those ideas, what was the use of endeavouring to encourage our manufactures if we neglected the means that lay within our reach? What was the use of claiming the right and the power, if we did not make use of it when obtained? There was nothing in our connections with England to prevent us from establishing free trade; we had only to throw open our country to the world; the only difficulty was, that we could not establish protection against England and free trade with the United States; that was, discriminate against the Mother Country as hon. gentlemen wanted it. The Conservative party were now accused of being disloyal to the interests of England, because they were advocating rights which had been advocated to a far greater extent by the Parti National of 1872; and they had been accused of being recreant to their obligations to the Crown of England. He would ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while he referred to this question of great importance to the Province of Quebec. The cry of "Protection" had been raised all over the Province, and the approaching elections would, in a great measure, turn upon that question. Its ostensible opponents were restrained by the iron will of the hon. the Premier, and they now said they were never Protectionists. He took the opinions of Mr. Joly, the head of the Quebec Government, and, when he told the people he (Mr. Joly) would stand by them and that the policy of the Parti National had been Protection, the hon. gentlemen had said, using no unmeaning words, that it was not true. This denegation applied to Mr. Joly as well as to himself. In proof of his assertions he would begin with a quotation from Mr. Joly himself, who was the president of the association of the Parti National from its very formation. He said:

"It has been proposed to give to the party the name of Parti National (applause). I will tell you why this name was chosen. You must have seen in the discussions in the House, and in the papers, that to attract a considerable and beneficial immigration in the country we must encourage industry by all means possible. Everybody understands that our young men would not leave the country if they found here sufficient, not to indulge in luxury, but to provide for themselves at least bread and clothing. In order to put a stop to this piece-meal depopulation a party which will encourage industry in all its forms, a party, above all, national, which may immediately obtain for us not political independence but commercial independence; if we wish to bring back our fellow-countrymen to their homes, encourage immigration and open a market with other people (applause) instead of indulging in theories and utopias, I believe it is better to adopt one platform, as the English say, a national, commercial, and industrial platform."

He hoped the hon. the Minister of Finance would admit that this very able ally from Quebec, Mr. Joly, was at variance with him upon this question. Mr. Joly was distinct in saying with the Parti National that by legislation they could improve the industrial capacities of this country, and its wants could be provided for, and that by Protection. He would go further, and would name another gentleman who had become lately a member for the Government of the Province of Quebec, Mr. Langelier. He (Mr. Masson) would suppose they would admit that gentleman as being one of the leaders of their party, he would not say as moderate as Mr. Joly, but he was distinguished among the leaders of the Liberal party in Quebec; he said:

"Our country which offers so many advantages is nevertheless the most backward in America."

He (Mr. Masson) had always supposed that Canada was in advance of Mexico and the South American States, which did not fully enjoy the advantages of our free institutions. Mr. Langelier said, "This is due, it is useless to deny, to our political administration." He consequently believed that with a more progressive Government the manufacturing and industrial interests of the country could be advanced, and that Governments might interfere with the material prosperity of a country, either to advance or retard it. He said further:

"We do not wish a complete overthrow of the present state of things; it is not a radical opposition which is the principle of our programme; what we require is that the constitution should be amended in the sense of our programme. It is our commercial independence we require, and that we must have. * * * The Governor-General, at the great dinner given him at Quebec, declared that the country could assume an independent attitude if it wished. If our Ministers have turned a deaf ear, or have no remedy, we must take this task in hand. There are next to us forty millions of men with whom we cannot trade. That must be changed, and to obtain that change immediate action must be taken."

He thus began by saying that the Government could do something, and he finished by saying "We want protection against England but we want free-trade with the United States and the forty millions to the south of us." These were the most loyal gentlemen who had cast upon their opponents the charge of disloyalty. It never entered into the minds of the Conservatives, in claiming the full right of regulating their fiscal policy, to discriminate against the Mother Country and in favour of the United States; but, when the proper time came, the Conservative party would be ready to put on such duties on goods as they thought right in their interest, whether they came from the United States or from England. He supposed that hon. gentlemen opposite would admit these expressions of the leaders of their party as good proof of the policy of their party. He would now take the words of Mr. Pelletier. He plainly told them, when speaking of England, that we had enough Protection, and too much Protection when speaking of the United States. Mr. Pelletier further said, at the same meeting in 1872:

"Manufactures and the different branches of industry which we could develop to such advantage, do not receive the required protection. There is, however, we are told, a movement towards progress, the spirit of enterprise seems to revive; yes, gentlemen, hunger and misery force men sometimes to make superhuman efforts."

The Committee which had been appointed for the purpose of reporting to the House upon the condition of our manufactures in 1872, stated that they were not at that time, on the whole, in an unsatisfactory condition. Everybody admitted at the time that to be the fact, and that the pressure and crash had only come since then. Mr. Pelletier continued:

MR. MASSON.

"The terrible commercial crisis of to-day, while alarming those who were most confident in better times, imposes upon them supreme efforts to avoid complete ruin. Strenuous efforts are made since, sometimes it is true, a few enterprising capitalists try to establish manufactories, but have they succeeded in establishing confidence in their success? Have they been able to overcome this objection, so great, of the tariff which renders impossible the exportations of our produce? What surety have they got of investing their capital in manufactories, when they are continually exposed to changes in the tariff which paralyze everything? (Applause.) There is next to us a population of forty millions with whom we cannot trade. Our country offers immense advantages, and it is, nevertheless, the most backward (arriere) in America."

He presumed that, from the expressions of those gentlemen, and of a great number of leaders of that party, they would have a singular opinion as to the future of Canada, and especially the future of Lower Canada, in which those gentlemen had never had any confidence. It was clear enough, by the above extract, that we wanted more Protection against England and the world; but, when speaking of the United States, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pelletier) turned round and found that "we have too much protection," that it was a prohibitory tariff. "By our exaggerated Protectionist tariff," he said, "we have forced our neighbours to retaliation—and we are the first victims." That was not all. They had another gentleman occupying a high position in the Liberal party in Quebec, who had been rewarded by the Government and made a Senator. Mr. Fabre, of the National party, gave expression to his views, and he was, at least, frank in what he said; he was a man who thought a good deal, and his ideas were very much in advance of a great many in relation to the Mother Country. He wished to have annexation or independence, and he could not consent, as others did, to disguise his opinions. He said:

"Behind Confederation I have always seen the glimmer of independence; always believed that the interval between the formation and decline of Confederation would be smaller than that between the formation and fall of the Union; and last year it was only sufficient for me to raise the veil—

MR. MACKENZIE: That has been read twice over.

MR. MASSON: I never read those extracts before. I never heard them read anywhere else before. They are quite new and novel and interesting.

“To raise the veil to show that the logical deduction of my thought—annexation—was the last relay in our march, and the definitive situation of the country is annexation. (Applause.)”

It might be said these were only Mr. Fabre's personal opinions. He (Mr. Masson) believed they were still his opinions; but hon. gentlemen would be greatly mistaken if they believed that those opinions were not shared by a great many of his friends, and the applause which followed its utterance prove that they were. Mr. Fabre had said before:

“What we should demand is a sort of Washington Treaty between England and Canada acknowledging our right of protecting our industries and placing them out of the reach of a competition which we are unable to resist with our actual resources. . . . It is evident that public opinion is generally settled on the necessity of change in our commercial relations with England; that the idea of protection is fast making its way and must very soon impose itself on the country. The most far-sighted Conservative papers, who foresee the current which will carry with it, whether they wish it or not, any party, advise their leaders to place themselves at the head of the movement.”

Would hon. gentlemen now tell him they had not changed their views to-day? The hon. the Minister of Public Works would tell them, as in his speech at Ontario, that he had nothing to do with the abstract ideas of his followers; they might entertain the views they wished in regard to the future, provided they did not attempt to force them upon the members of the Government and give them substantial form. One of the gentlemen who formed the Parti National, and who stood as allies to those who accused the Conservative party with disloyalty, had declared that when the right hon. member for Kingston went to Washington as an Imperial Commissioner he had sacrificed himself; that he had taken a rôle inferior to his abilities; that he should not have accepted the commission, the decision being a foregone conclusion against us; that the Government should have commissioned him, on the contrary, to negotiate with the American Government for the transfer of Canada to the United States. He (Mr. Masson) hoped he would hear no more about the disloyalty of the Conservative party, since they only maintained, in a restricted degree, the principles which had guided, at one period, the Liberals of Lower Canada. The Conservatives maintained that Canada was to-day competent to regulate its own trade and commercial relations; provided it did not discriminate against herself, England had no right to find fault if the Canadians so regulated their tariff as to benefit their own country. The great majority of the Liberal party of Lower Canada were Protectionists. His hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue had been obliged to admit that a great many of its leaders had been Protectionists. In 1874, when the Government came into power, a paper was started at Montreal for the object of advocating Protection on a modified scale, and the principles of the new National Party, that party which had wished to repudiate such Liberals as Messrs. Dorion, Geoffrion and others. The chief promoters of this newspaper were no less men than the present member for Montreal East, (Mr. Jetté), Mr. Thibaudeau, whom the present Government had made a Senator; Mr. Rainville, who had been appointed a Judge; Mr. Beausoleil; Mr. L. O. David, who had been appointed to a position in a Public Department, and Mr. Drolet, who was being sent to represent this country in France, to show its capabilities and advantages as a manufacturing country. Those were among the principal supporters of the Bien Public. No one could accuse him of exaggeration when he stated that the leaders of the Liberal party in Lower Canada favoured protection, if he could establish that their organ favoured it. The Bien Public stated in 1874, when the Manufacturers' Convention took place at Toronto:

“The resolutions adopted at a large meeting of manufacturers that has lately taken place in Toronto, asked for the tariff to be raised to twenty per cent. on all goods coming from Great Britain, which can be manufactured in Canada, and that on all articles coming from the United States and other countries Canada should impose equal duties to those imposed upon Canadian products going into the United States and other foreign countries. We accept these resolutions, and do not hesitate to say that that should be the programme of every Government having at heart the prosperity of the country. It is this that everybody requires except certain political men who sacrifice practice to theory. Mr. Mackenzie has happily stated the tariff should be modified in the interests of Canada, and we are sure he will keep his word."

Too confident by half. He (Mr. Masson) thought he had sufficiently proved that the allies of the hon. gentlemen opposite were Protectionists, and that neither the hon. the Premier, nor any of his followers, had a right to taunt the right hon. member for Kingston with having in his ranks men who advocated a policy which might prove his or their disloyalty to the Crown of England. To prove that the majority of Quebec were in favour of Protection, he had only to quote the words of hon. gentlemen opposite. They all knew that the Conservative party in Lower Canada was a unit on this question. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had been obliged to admit, the other day, that he had himself been a Protectionist; only, he said, he did not want too much Protection, and Mr. Mackenzie had told them they had enough; and he also admitted that a great number of the leaders of the Liberal party in Quebec were Protectionists. In Lower Canada they did not examine the question from a sectional point of view; it would be unfair and unjust that Nova Scotia should be protected on her coal, Ontario in her agricultural products, and Quebec be left in the lurch without any compensation. The Opposition had been taunted by the hon. member for Quebec East, with having been moutonnière, with having been subservient followers of Sir George Etienne Cartier. This should not have been brought against them by the hon. member, for, on that same question, they had separated themselves from following the man whom they most respected after Lafontaine. The Lower Canadians did not want a sectional protection, but a general measure of protection. The Province of Quebec was an agricultural, mining, and industrial country. In agriculture it was not, perhaps, so advanced as the Province of Ontario, and agricultural protection would not, consequently, benefit it to the same extent as it would Ontario. Nor would the mining protection at present prove as advantageous to Quebec as to Nova Scotia. But in regard to manufacturing industries, the Province of Quebec was perhaps the best situated to prosper under a protective tariff. Although not so advanced in agriculture as Ontario, the hon. the Minister of Public Works knew, nevertheless, that Lower Canada was a fine agricultural country. The valley of the St. Lawrence could sustain double the present population, if a proper system of agriculture were adopted, and in the vast territories of the Saguenay there was a fine wheat-growing country, surpassed by few others. In the mining interests, Quebec was also not, perhaps, so advantageously situated as other Provinces, but this interest was far from completely wanting. There were the copper mines near Bagot, the Moisie mines, at St. Urbain, and at Three Rivers, iron mines, and further evidence had lately been shown of the existence of coal mines. The hon. members for St. John (Mr. Bourassa) and for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) had laid on the table of this House, the other day, a large lump of coal from St. Valentin, in the county of St. John. The hon. the Minister of Public Works laughed at this statement, but did he think his followers, the hon. members for St. John and Iberville were trying to mislead the House, when they stated they believed that coal would be found in the country, and brought forward this lump of coal as evidence of the truth of its existence? He (Mr. Masson) personally knew nothing about it; it was a question to be settled by the hon. the Premier with his friends. In the counties of Richmond and Wolfe were slate quarries which could be utilized. But this question of mining industry was not the most important one to the Province of Quebec. What that Province wanted was protection to her industrial pursuits. Quebec, in its enormous water power, had the means of becoming a great manufacturing country. Her people displayed a special aptitude and a liking for industrial pursuits scarcely equalled by any other people. One of the reasons for the exodus of French Canadians to the United States, a few years ago, when that country was at the height of prosperity, was their desire to work in the manufactories of the States. In Lower Canada they were prepared to take this question on a broad ground, not to take the position adopted by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue in the county when he was last defeated. He had said then that he (Mr. Masson) had spoken in favour of a tax on the bread of the poor man, in order to please the people of Ontario. The hon. Minister had so worked up the feelings of the people, in holding up himself and his friends as working exclusively for that Province that it took him (Mr. Masson) a quarter of an hour to explain the matter at one of the meetings at which it was uttered. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue could not deny having made that sectional statement; he (Mr. Masson) could corroborate his own statement by a speech which the hon. gentleman had made at Stanfold, and which had been reported in the National several days after it was delivered, in order to show what a fine speech Mr. Laurier had made, and how he had cornered the Conservatives. The hon. member for Iberville had put the question to the Ministry, asking if they intended to make any overtures towards obtaining reciprocity with the United States. But the hon. the Minister of Public Works could not have known what was going on in the Province of Quebec, when he gave to his friend the very discouraging answer of a few days ago. The Liberals throughout that Province endeavoured to justify the policy of the Government, this dégringolade of the Parti National, by saying that Protection was not what we needed, but reciprocity with the United States, and that the Government was working hard to obtain it. He would like to know if the reply of the hon. the Minister of Public Works was satisfactory to the hon. member for Iberville, and to all the hon. members from Lower Canada, which would benefit so much by a Reciprocity Treaty, and who had led the people to believe that the Government refused Protection on account of reciprocity? The hon. the Minister of Public Works declared he did not intend to make overtures, it was for the Americans to make them. Did the hon. Minister imagine they would begin? They had Protection on their side and Free-trade on ours, and, therefore, did not care about reciprocity. So long as they could send their goods and produce free into Canada they did not require reciprocity. When the Canadian Government avowed its intention to tax their goods, they would open their eyes to the benefits of a Reciprocity Treaty, but only then. As matters now stood, the Americans had all the benefit on their side, and the Canadians all the loss on theirs. It was humiliating to recall the overtures made by the Hon. George Brown, who turned round all at once, abandoned his first opinion, and went to Washington to offer a Reciprocity Treaty; not to draw forth from our neighbours what concessions they would be ready to make for one, but to offer to the United States that which he believed Canada should be prepared to give them, and expose himself to the statement of the President of the United States that he now knew what Canada was willing to offer, but believed Canada did not offer quite enough. Reciprocity had become a new tool in the hands of the hon. gentlemen from Lower Canada, but it was now broken by the declaration of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and they could use it no longer to excuse the Government's want of policy and their own inconsistency. The record of the Conservative party, on the other hand, was a glorious record with regard to the question of reciprocity; it was not their fault if this treaty was abrogated by the United States. The Conservatives at the time had done all they could, not only to renew the treaty, but they had also sought to obtain a delay in regard to the notice of intention to abrogate on the part of the United States, to which the Hon. George Brown objected, and on account of which he left the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE: On account of what?

MR. MASSON: The notice denouncing the treaty, and renewal thereof.

MR. MACKENZIE: That was not the reason.

MR. MASSON said he thought it was. The Hon. Mr. Brown had objected to Mr. Galt and Mr. Howland going to Washington to negotiate a new Reciprocity Treaty. The difficulty was this: they had not had time to frame a new treaty, pending the negotiations, and difficulties created by United States; and they desired going to Washington to obtain from the American Government delay, regarding the notice given. Mr. Brown opposed all negotiations, because the Americans should initiate them.

MR. MACKENZIE: No, no. It was an attempt, in fact, to subject our trade to a sort of legislative reciprocity treaty, and not to a treaty of reciprocity at all.

MR. MASSON said he begged the hon. gentleman's pardon, but the facts were as follows:—Those gentlemen were met by the American people with that objection. This objection had not been made on our part. The Conservatives had always favoured reciprocity, but the American Government met them with this statement, that, in consequence of the fact that their position and their institutions were peculiar to themselves, they did not like to bind their country by a treaty, but they were only willing to bind it by legislative enactments which could be broken when they chose. They desired the liberty of making a treaty and of abrogating it when they pleased.

MR. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

MR. MASSON said what had the Conservative Government then done? They could not then open negotiations in this respect, and in 1868 an Act was passed providing the precise legislation which the Americans had desired; that was to say, they put the Americans in such a position that they could not reproach the Canadian Government in this relation. A law was passed here declaring that the Government would allow certain produce to come into this country free as soon as the American Government was willing to accept the same policy; and, consequently, the Conservative Government thus granted everything which the American people wanted. The hon. the Minister of Finance had cast upon the late Government all the discredit attending the expatriation of the French Canadians, during the years preceding 1874; and took to himself all the credit of having at the present time secured the repatriation of these people. He completely joined issue with the hon. gentleman on this point. The late Government had far less to do with the expatriation of those French-Canadians than the hon. gentleman opposite had to do with the present depressed condition of our manufacturing industries. The cause of the expatriation of these French-Canadians was well known to the residents of Lower Canada. The French-Canadians were possessed of peculiar views, peculiar ideas, peculiar customs and habits. It was well known that the French-Canadians possessed in the highest degree the spirit of adventure; and, if this sentiment had not existed among them, not one-half of this Continent would have been discovered at as early a period as was the case. Canadians were to be seen in every quarter of the country; they were fond of emigration and of adventure; they were to be found at the foot of the Rocky Mountains, and at the mouth of the Mackenzie River, and in every portion of the Dominion. And, even to-day many French-Canadians desired to leave their homes for the pleasure of travelling and of seeing new lands, new countries, new vistas, and new scenes. This love of change was one of the chief reasons why they left this country. Another reason was that, after the American war, wages in the United States had advanced; the prosperity of that country had been in a measure checked; a great many of its people had been killed in the war; labour was greatly needed; high wages were given; in consequence of these facts a great number of our people left this country in order to obtain higher wages in the United States at the time; and, as he had previously stated, they went there to fill American manufactories because they were well suited and capable of working in these manufactories. There was another reason why they went away; they were deceived, he admitted, as to the resources of the United States. They thought that country was a real Eldorado of liberty, the finest country in the world, and such a country as could not be found and could not exist elsewhere on the face of the earth, where money could be made almost without labour. And how were they brought to believe these things? They had been induced to consider that this was true by the Liberal party of Lower Canada, which had done all they could, up to the time of Confederation, to imbue the minds of the people with the belief that we lived in a poor country. He had just read extracts which proved that these ideas still existed. The Liberals had told the people that this was a miserable country; that the United States was the place to enjoy the sweets of liberty; that every man who went there could succeed in life, and that in this poor and wretched region no one could prosper and make progress. The Liberals of the Province of Quebec had painted such a glowing picture regarding the resources and capabilities of the United States that the French-Canadians had flocked over to that country, even long after many of their advisers had themselves come to better ideas, believing that there they could secure riches without labour. These were the reasons why they had emigrated from this country. An hon. gentleman had said that the immigration which was at present taking place to Canada was proportionately greater than it had been. He had been unable to obtain the figures in this regard; but he was acquainted with one fact which was that, if a comparison was made between the number of emigrants who now came to this country from Europe, and the number of our people who left this country for the United States or returned to Europe, it would be seen that the proportion was more unfavourable to us than it was in 1872-3. The balance in this relation in 1873—he could not give the exact figures—in our favour, was some 15,000; but it came down in 1874 to something like 1,000; in 1875 to something like 2,000 against us, and in 1877 to 4,000 also against us. That was to say that at the present time more people left this country than came into it. And would the hon. the Minister of Finance pretend that those who came into the country settled in the old Provinces? No; they did not remain in these Provinces which were crushed down with the present depression. Why, indeed, should they do so? There was no labour for them here; and hence they went into the great territories which we possessed in the North-West, and in those new territories they became farmers; but this fact did not at all prove that a very serious commercial depression did not now exist in this country. The hon. gentleman had then turned round and taken great credit to his Government for having repatriated many of the French Canadian people who had gone to the United States. Had the hon. gentleman forgotten the scene which had taken place in the House when he (Mr. Masson) himself rose in his place and asked the hon. the First Minister to do for the French-Canadians in the United States what they were doing for the Mennonites who came from Russia, and who knew nothing of our institutions and nothing of our customs? These people made excellent settlers; but could they be compared for a moment with the French-Canadians who could be brought from the United States? He had then drawn the attention of the House to this fact, and what was the answer of the hon. gentleman? The answer which was made in the face of the Liberals of Lower Canada who had so long advocated repatriation, who sat dumb in their seats without uttering one word of protest, was that the desire and intention of the Government was not to induce immigration from the United States, but almost exclusively from Europe. They remembered, in times past, the adjurations of the Liberals from the Province of Quebec, who had then vehemently urged the repatriation of their compatriots in the United States. The hon. the Minister of Public Works, in face of all these facts, had turned round and said:

“The Government had considered carefully, and were still considering, whether anything could be done in that direction. It was evident, however, that, if we aided French-Canadians settled in the New England States—for it was there that the French-Canadians chiefly were—to go to Manitoba, and did not similarly aid those in the Province of Quebec and other Provinces, it would be easy for them to step over the line and obtain the aid which they received, because they were residents in the States.”

This was the answer which was given on that occasion by the hon. gentleman who had not, evidently, even considered the question. He (Mr. Masson) had then stated that it was very easy for the hon. gentleman to get over that difficulty; and that if the Government were afraid of Canadians going to the United States, in order to secure the benefits of being conveyed at the expense of the Government to Manitoba, they could require any person in the United States, who presented himself for such a purpose, to prove that he had been a bonâ fide resident there for the space of two or three years. The means of preventing what the hon. gentleman feared was very easy, but the hon. gentleman had not thought about the matter at all. He had done worse. Not content with this; not satisfied with telling the Liberals from the Province of Quebec that their ideas were wrong, he made them, moreover, understand that they should not have advocated the repatriation of the French-Canadians in the United States; and that Europe should be made the field of our immigration operations. He said, unchallenged by any of his friends from Quebec :

“The chief object that had hitherto been kept in view by the Government, in respect to immigration, was to make the different countries of Europe the great field from which to draw our immigrants. If the Government once adopted the system indicated by the hon. member for Terreboune, it would lead to serious difficulty, because there would be no good reason why we should aid people on one side of what was an imaginary line separating our territory from a foreign country, and not aid those who were on the other side.”

This was the only reason he had obtained from the non. gentleman in reply to his question. The French-Canadian population of Manitoba were not, however, discouraged. A year after it had been urged that something should be done, Rev. Father Lacombe had come here from Manitoba, and, as the Government could not be induced to do anything in the matter, the French-Canadians had themselves taken it in hand, and Rev. Father Lacombe had constituted himself an Immigration Agent, and gone near Worcester to act in that capacity. This Government, who were spending two and three hundred thousand dollars a year for immigration purposes, found no means to pay him his travelling expenses; and, in consequence of this fact, these had been paid by subscription. Perhaps he did wrong in telling it, but he himself had commenced these subscriptions, and he had obtained contributions from hon. gentlemen on his own side of the House, and also—which it was but fair to add—from hon. gentlemen opposite. Such were the means that had to be taken in order to send an immigration agent, with the object of securing the repatriation of French-Canadians living in the United States; and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) was bold enough to say that his party and his Government had induced this repatriation. He (Mr. Masson) could not refrain, however, from giving the Government some credit in this respect, because, during the last two years, Mr. Pelletier and the Hon. Mr. Letellier, who had been at the head of that Department, had done something in this connection. The Government, pushed forward by, and afraid of, public opinion, had yielded; and he could not but give them credit for having, though tardily, done their duty with regard to this subject. The hon. the Minister of Finance had stated that he could do nothing to relieve our suffering industries. He thought that if he could draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that there sat beside him in the Cabinet a gentleman who, within the past two years, had avowed himself as having been a Protectionist, and who was a Protectionist still, the hon. gentleman would admit that all the members of the Cabinet were not in accord with reference to this important question—that the Government could do nothing for the promotion and benefit of our native industries. What was the essence of Protection? It was that, by legislative enactments, Government could foster and aid the industrial pursuits and the manufacturing interests of the country. When the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, two years ago, in answer to himself (Mr. Masson), said he had always been a Protectionist, and was still a Protectionist, he (Mr. Laurier) admitted that he did not agree with the hon. the Prime Minister, who held that the Government could do nothing in aid of these industries. What was the use of being a Protectionist, if one did not take the means that were necessary to benefit our manufactures? And how could this be done if not by means of legislative enactment? The hon. gentleman had given a good reason for a policy of inaction: he said he would not disturb the trade of the country, and that it was too serious a thing to do so. He would tell the hon. gentleman that he believed he (Mr. Cartwright) dared not touch this great question; the hon. gentleman was afraid to do so, because, when an hon. gentleman, who occupied the high position which the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) did in this House, stated at public meetings, held in the city of Montreal, that the tariff was not what it should be; that it contained numerous anomalies, and that it was the duty of the Government to remove these anomalies, he would tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) that nothing else than fear of touching the tariff induced him to declare that he would not interfere with the present fiscal policy of the country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Holton) when he made these statements, had been labouring to secure the election of Mr. Workman, and he was sure that the hon. gentleman had then sincerely spoken his thoughts on this subject, and that he believed now what he believed then.

MR. MASSON said the hon. gentleman stated that this was true; that the tariff was not what it should be; that there were anomalies in the tariff, and that these anomalies should be remedied; and, nevertheless, he sat by the Government and voted that it was impossible by legislative enactment to do anything to promote the prosperity of our manufactures, to increase the material prosperity of the country. The hon. the Minister of Finance went further; the hon. gentleman would not touch the tariff. Oh, no. That was too difficult thing to do; but he would do this, if he could, said the hon. gentleman, he would impose the income tax; that was to say, that, if he had the means for collecting the income tax, and of imposing direct taxation, he would do it in order to relieve himself of existing difficulties. He was surprised to see how his hon. friends, the Liberal members for the Province of Quebec, submitted to this continual lashing to which they were at the present time subjected. The hon. the Prime Minister had laid the lash on the shoulders of these hon. gentlemen from the very first Session of the present Parliament up to the present moment; and at every Session the hon. gentleman had taken pleasure in plying the whip on the shoulders of those hon. gentlemen. As he (Mr. Masson) had once previously said, he would now repeat: he did not know which to admire most, the energy of the hon. the Premier or the patience and humility of the hon. members from the Province of Quebec who were members of the Liberal party. What had been the outcry in the Province of Quebec of late? It was that the Conservative Government there had wished to levy direct taxation upon the people, and that this was part of the policy of the Conservatives of Lower Canada; and, to-day, a great howl was being raised in the Province of Quebec, because the Government, as was said, had been imposing direct taxation upon the people. Why, he had always thought that direct taxation, the income tax in particular, was one of the panaceas of the Liberal party, both in England and Canada. The hon. gentleman had relieved him of the trouble of proving this by his statement that, if he had the power to do so, he would levy the income tax. What objections could the Liberals of the Province of Quebec then have to the policy of their Provincial Government, if, being possessed of such power, they made use of it? They all remembered that many of the most prominent Liberals in England, and especially one who was the model of the most advanced Liberals in this country, Mr. Bright, had, in 1859, he believed, proposed to do away with most of the existing taxation of England, and to replace it by an income tax on all properties valued at £100 sterling and upwards. Mr. Bright had proposed to remove part of the existing duties, thereby causing a loss to the Treasury of £26,000,000, and to replace it by imposing this direct tax on the people of England, pretending that this tax was the most favourable to the poor. He (Mr. Masson) would go further. He would tell the Liberals from the Province of Quebec, who had tried to hound down the Conservative Government of that Province, that if direct taxation was given to the Local Government as a principal means for obtaining revenue in the future, this had been due not so much to the Conservatives of that Province, and not so much to the late Sir George Cartier, the former member for Charlevoix, as to the Hon. George Brown, who had declared when the foundations of Confederation were being laid, that power had properly been given to the Local Governments to obtain revenue partly by means of direct taxation, and that though the sum of eighty cents per head had been granted by the Federal Government to aid the Local Governments to meet their expenditure, this had been done against his wish and desire; and, moreover, that he (Mr. Brown) hoped he was not committing any indiscretion in saying that at the convention many Liberals from all the Provinces were in favour of imposing on the Local Governments the obligation to meet their requirements for expenditure exclusively by means of direct taxation. Such were the utterances of Mr. Brown. He did not give them as the personal opinions of that gentleman; Mr. Brown was an honourable man, and he would not have said that this was the case if it had not been the truth. He would like to know with what grace could the Liberals of the Province of Quebec, under these circumstances, taunt the Conservatives of that Province with introducing the thin edge of the wedge of direct taxation, as they represented in that Province? They might rest assured that, if the hon. the Minister of Finance had the means of imposing it in this Parliament, he would do so. Local Governments would probably some day be obliged to provide means by direct taxation. Our position was a peculiar one, for an increase in the population of this country was a benefit to the Federal Government because it created revenue by the consumption of articles from which revenue was derivable. But the local Governments were obliged also by the increase of population to expend more money on education, on the administration of justice, on the protection of life and property and on charities for the poor and unfortunate. New Brunswick had in this respect been more fortunate than the other Provinces because it had been granted $150,000 a few years ago for what did not require more than $60,000. He thought, in making these remarks, he would have the sympathy of the hon. member for South Bruce, who had always complained of the advantages given to the smaller Provinces. He was glad to see from the Estimates of the hon. the Minister of Finance that he had increased the proposed expenditure on public works. That was a suggestion which, in his humble way, he had made last year to the House in view of the present depression. He said it was the duty of the Government to do so; first, because both money and labour could be obtained cheaper, and, secondly, because, by an energetic prosecution of the public works which had been decided upon, and the consequent expenditure, many would obtain labour of which they were now deprived. The hon. gentlemen opposite said the proposition was a ridiculous one, but it had nevertheless been adopted. But why did the hon. gentleman do it? Was it because he had changed his mind? Not in the slightest degree. He did so because the elections were coming on, and because it was now more convenient for themselves to go on with public works. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald) said that manufacturers wanted protection in order to enrich themselves. Well, that was just what was said whenever any new enterprise was begun. If a railway was proposed in the Province of Quebec or elsewhere, the Liberals would say, "It will ruin our country; it will only put money in the pockets of contractors." What earthly objection was there to men enriching themselves, provided that by doing so they were instrumental in bettering the condition of their fellow subjects. He maintained that the interests of the manufacturers were not in opposition to those of the people. On the contrary, the interests of the workingmen were identical with those of the manufacturers who provided for them employment. It was not the manufacturers who were clamouring most for protection, but the workingmen, whose ways of living were curtailed when the factories were closed. The workingman was naturally a Protectionist; he had been so in all countries. He liked to see the industry from which he derived his support protected. It had been said in the Province where he resided that they were trying to build a Chinese wall round our territory. The Americans were very clever men; they knew exactly what suited their purpose; they had surrounded themselves by a wall, which they contrived in such a way that wide open gates were reserved for all goods that went out, while there were merely little wickets for letting goods in. Hon. gentlemen might tell him that that was an exhaustive system; that, if a nation allowed its produce to go out and brought little in, it would speedily become exhausted. That might be true of an old thickly populated country like England or other European countries, which could not supply their own wants much less those of the world if they built Chinese walls round their boundaries. But the Americans knew their own soil and their own country. They knew that they could draw therefrom all that was required to supply the world, thereby adding to the labour of their people and the productiveness of their country. We were in exactly the same position as they. We could build a wall around us if we wished, because we knew that, in these large territories of ours, we could produce far more raw material than we required. If we built such a wall we could still, by our energy, renew our force and protective power, which had to a certain extent been exhausted. But hon. gentlemen said that there was depression in the United States as well as in Canada, and that with the Chinese wall, the United States consequently were in no better position than we were. He had always believed that the depression which existed in the United States was greatly due to over-production, and if that was the case somebody must have benefitted by it. The workingman had benefitted by it, there had at least been a good field of labour for the whole population, and wealth and comfort had consequently been accumulated also. We also were in a state of depression. But was that on account of over-production? No, it was caused by over-importation. Had that given labour and food to our working people, or increased the population of the country? No, it could merely enrich a few importers. The depression which now existed in the United States would pass away as elsewhere, and their manufactories there would soon be in full blast prepared to meet the whole world in competition. People would purchase American goods, and, a demand being created, a supply of labour would be necessitated. By the time depression, on the other hand, passed away, our manufacturing districts would be ruined and our trade depleted so that we should not be in a position to benefit by the increased prosperity which would ensue. The Government rested under a great responsibility. They had heard the people clamouring for Protection and bread, and they had given them a stone. They forgot that in 1858 a statesman was at the head of financial affairs. The condition of the country was as bad as it was to-day; our Treasury was depleted, our importations had gone down, and the nation was poor. That statesman did not fold his arms. He put his shoulder to the wheel, and increased the revenue on certain articles to 20 per cent. What was the result? Trade flourished again, the population was able to purchase the surplus of importation, and to purchase also what we produced ourselves. An hon. gentleman said a few days ago, "How can that be; if you import more goods how will the people be able to get rid of their manufactured articles." This was capable of easy explanation, for, of course, the spending power of a people was in proportion to what they earned. A labourer who gained a dollar a day was able to spend more than the labourer who only earned half a dollar, and would consume more, whether imported or manufactured goods. Mr. Joly said, a few years' ago, that it was not by reducing the price of everything that they benefitted the people; it was by the equilibrium established between the purchasing power of the people and the price of the articles purchased. He gave a good illustration of this. He said, ask a workingman which he prefers: flour at $1.50 and no labour, or flour at $6 and plenty of work? We had an exemplification of that in the Province of Quebec from which he hailed. The farmer there was obliged to sell his pork at $5 or $6 a cwt., and, of course, he could make no money. He was discouraged. Everything was sold for comparatively nothing. His oats brought no proper price, and the working people who might be supposed to reap the benefit by these low prices, told him: "What is the use of having cheap articles? We have nothing to buy them with." Well, as they would see, the cheapness of articles was not necessarily a source of prosperity. He must apologize to this House for having occupied its time at such length, but the subject was one of great interest to the country, especially to his own Province. He had, last year, examined the subject fairly and to the best of his ability, and he felt confident that the views he expressed were the views of a majority, even of the Liberals of the Province of Quebec. It would be seen at the next election that a great majority were in favour of Protection, under the circumstances, and that no Government would be supported which did not pledge itself to Protectionist principles. Men from Montreal, from Hamilton and other places would be coming before the public, as in the past, saying they were in favour of Protection, but he hoped that those of their constituents who were in favour of Canada being kept as much as possible for Canadians would require from those gentlemen more than fruitless good-will, as it was evident that so long as they sent to Parliament men who were not ready to enforce their views upon the Government, they would never receive a fair measure of Protection.

MR. CHARLTON said he must certainly characterize the resolution moved the previous evening by the right hon. member for Kingston as being a most remarkable document. It was a resolution which dealt with vague generalities, which made delusive promises, which took the absurd position that legislative action could be shaped so as to reconcile conflicting interests. When he heard the hon. gentleman read that resolution and his statement that, by a readjustment of the tariff, they could benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion, he was reminded of a story which he had once read. A candidate for Congress in the State of Kentucky—whose object was the same as that of the right hon. gentleman, namely, to get into office—in his address to his constituents promised that, if they would elect him to the position which he sought, he would abolish taxation, he would increase the revenue, he would marry all the widows in that district, become a father to all the orphans, and, if his constituents desired, he would provide a river of brandy, water and sugar. His promises would be as easily redeemed as the promises of the resolution. The right hon. gentleman, in the course of the speech with which he favoured the House, challenged any person present to point out any nation which had risen to greatness through the principles of Free-trade. He was not very familiar with the fiscal policies of the various nations of antiquity or the middle ages, but, if he was correctly informed, Protection, it would be found, was a theory of very recent growth. And, if Rome and Carthage were great commercial states, if Tyre was a great commercial city, if Assyria was a great commercial empire, those cities, those empires, those states, rose to greatness without the benefits of Protection, rose to greatness through the principles of Free-trade. Protection came into existence in the 17th century, and it was passing out of existence in the 19th century. It was not to the credit of Protection that it came into existence so late, and was passing out of existence so soon. It was an anomaly, and a sign of decrepitude. The right hon. gentleman had gone on to say that England once had a tariff which gave her the sole control of her home and colonial markets, and would never have attained her present position but for Protection; that, when her manufacturing interests were secured, she would consent to open her markets to the world, if other nations would open their markets to her. In 1820, the exports of England amounted to £36,000,000; in 1842, at the end of her protective period, her total exports were £47,000,000; but to-day, her exports exceeded $1,000,000,000. England's rapid advance to the position of a great commercial nation, dated from the period when she abandoned the principles of Protection, and adopted the principles of Free-trade. Since she abandoned Protection, during the brief thirty odd years that she had been a Free-trade nation, her imports and exports had so increased that she had risen to the rank of the greatest commercial power that now existed or that ever had existed, and she owed that proud position to the benefits and blessings of a just and proper trade policy. They had been told by the right hon. member for Kingston, (Sir John A. Macdonald) that a cry was now raised in England against the admission of American goods. Did any well informed commercial gentleman in this House suppose that the importation of American goods into the English market had been able to attract more than a passing notice from English manufacturers? He (Mr. Charlton) would venture to say that the importation of American goods into English markets would scarcely supply the stock-in-trade of half-a dozen good-sized wholesale houses. Were the English trembling for fear of being supplanted in their own market in consequence of that small proportion of the total exportation of but little more than $1,000,000 worth of iron, or of but little more than $300,000 worth of woollen goods, which went from the United States, abroad, yearly. The export trade of the United States to England was a mere bagatelle, and he ventured the assertion that the invoices of goods which had been sent to England had been sent there—in regard to cotton, woollen, and iron goods—by American exporters at a loss, for the purpose of producing political effect in the United States. The right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) had indulged in a prediction. He (Mr. Charlton) had no doubt that, if the hon. gentleman had lived in days gone by, he would have been found, like Saul, among the prophets, although he doubted whether he would have made a very creditable figure among the Old Testament worthies. However, he had indulged in the prediction that the Protection cry would carry in England; that many of them, now living, would survive to see the day when England would again adopt principles of Protection. He had made another asseveration, that no nation had risen to greatness with one industry alone. He (Mr. Charlton) was inclined to agree with the right hon. gentleman. It would be a very singular nation that had but one industry. He had never heard of such a nation; but, if such a nation existed, it was not likely to rise rapidly in the scale of national greatness. The right hon. gentleman had told them that Russia, a power enjoying the advantage of Protection, was underselling English goods in neutral markets where they met on equal terms. He was sorry that the right hon. gentleman in this case, as in the case of his resolution, was a little indefinite. It would have pleased him (Mr. Charlton) very much if the right hon. gentleman had designated the markets and the countries where Russian and English goods met on equal terms and the Russian goods were underselling the English goods. It was true that, in the markets of interior Asia, in the countries bordering on the Caspian Sea, where the peoples could only be reached through Russian territory, Russian goods sold simply because all other goods were excluded from those markets; and it was probably to those markets that the hon. gentleman alluded. But he (Mr. Charlton) denied that Russia met England in any neutral market and undersold English goods; and he challenged the right hon. gentleman, or any other member of this House, to show where Russian goods had undersold English goods, or crowded them from markets where they met upon equal terms. The hon. gentleman had promised that the readjustment which he proposed should not increase the volume of taxation. He (Mr. Charlton) presumed that any readjustment made upon a Protectionist basis could not increase the revenue—in fact it was certain to diminish it—and that was the great objection to the Protectionist policy, that it dried up the revenue, while it increased the burdens of the people; that it wrung extra taxes from them, not to defray the expenditure of the Government, but to increase the hoards and gains of monopolists. The hon. gentleman said that not only was this country made a sacrifice market for the sweepings of the American market, but also at times for the sweepings of the English market. It was always very easy to make a general and sweeping charge, but when they descended to particulars they sometimes found it difficult to establish those charges. With reference to this matter of making Canada a slaughter market, let them look for a moment at the productive capacity and production of our various manufacturing industries, and the importation in those various lines, and compare the volume of the one with the volume of the other. Let them take, for instance, production of cabinet furniture. The right hon. gentleman had drawn a very affecting picture of the distress which existed last summer at the establishment of Hay & Co., of Toronto. He (Mr. Charlton) found, that, in 1870-1, the production of cabinet furniture in the Dominion of Canada was $3,580,978. He presumed the amount had largely increased since. He presumed he would be safe in venturing

the assertion that the production of cabinet furniture in Canada last year exceeded $4,000,000. The importation last year from the United States was $276,383. The production per head, in round numbers, was $1.15; the importation, 7½c. He did not think that an industry so firmly established as this, with a production at least fifteen times as great as the importation, was liable to be swamped by slaughter sales to such a limited extent. Then, if they took carriages. In 1870-1 we manufactured $4,849,230 worth of carriages, and in 1876-7 we imported $91,770 worth. There was not much danger of that industry being swamped by slaughter sales. Then, if they took clothing, in 1870-1 we manufactured $9,345,875 worth of clothing. Undoubtedly, last year, the production must have been from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000 worth. We imported last year $162,958 worth of clothing. We manufactured clothing at the rate of $2.68 per head. We imported at the rate of 3¾c. per head. Was there any danger of that great industry being swamped by importations? Of spikes, nails and tacks, we produced in 1870-1, $1,147,380 worth, and the importation last year was $172,707 worth. Our boot and shoe manufactures last year amounted, in round numbers, to $20,000,000, while the importation was $265,458. We manufactured at the rate of $5 per head and imported at the rate of 5½c. per head. In fact, we imported nothing in the boot and shoe line that could be manufactured here, the importations consisting simply of some fine work for which there was very little demand. Of saddles and harness, we manufactured in 1870-1 $2,459,321 worth, and imported the large amount of $33,384 worth. We manufactured at the rate of 70c. per head, and imported at the rate of 1¼c. per head. Of leather goods, in 1870-1 we manufactured to the value of $9,134,932, and imported last year to the value of $249,998. We manufactured at the rate of $2.64 per head, and imported at the rate of 5¼c. per head. The production of woollen goods in 1870-1 was $5,507,540, and the importation last year amounted to $323,062. That was, the production amounted to

$1.58 per head, and the importation to 7½c. per head. In regard to machinery, the production in 1870-1 amounted to $7,325,000, and the importation last year was valued at $262,235. Of agricultural implements, the production in 1870-1 was $2,685,393, and the importation last year $198,825. Talk about slaughter sales, talk about swamping our manufactures by the importation of one dollar's worth of goods where we manufactured and sold $20 worth. He had in his hand a statement in regard to eighteen principal industries of Canada, the total production of which in 1870-1 reached the amount of $73,259,154, and of those industries the importations last year from the United States only amounted to $3,623,376. The figures required no comment. The cry about slaughtered goods was raised for a purpose; the grievance had no existence in reality. They had been told by the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) that reciprocity of trade or of tariffs was a cry which was more popular than any other which could be adopted by any political party. Just there the garment which concealed a purpose was sufficiently drawn aside to disclose the cloven foot. There was a revelation of the purposes which induced these gentlemen to adopt this cry—because, forsooth, it was the most popular cry with which they could go to the country. The right hon. gentleman had told them that he had been up and down Canada last summer, that he had been addressing picnic meetings, that he had felt the pulse of the people and knew how they felt on this matter. He (Mr. Charlton) had come in contact with the people to a more limited extent. He had come in contact with his own constituency, which, he believed, was a fair reflection of the people of Upper Canada. He had held twenty meetings in that constituency during the month of January last, and he had felt the pulse of that people pretty carefully, and he could tell the House that, if any of his friends had ever held any opinion as to the feasibility of this specious plan which the right hon. gentleman was urging, they were cured of that idea; and he could assure the right

hon. gentleman that, in his belief, when this matter came to be tried before the people, the people would lay its dexter finger upon the right side of its nose and would say to the right hon. gentleman "too thin." The right hon. gentleman had told them last night a great many things that were new to him (Mr. Charlton); among others, that very little corn was used by the farmers of Canada, and, therefore, their interests would not be affected by a duty on corn. Well, he (Mr. Charlton) lived in a corn-producing county, and even in that county he had known very large quantities of American corn to be imported and sold to farmers for consumption. This had been done on occasions when, in consequence of poor crops and of having sold too closely in the fall and winter, they found themselves short in the spring; and then large quantities were used for the purposes of feed and human food. He doubted whether those farmers, when compelled to buy corn, would have felt it a great boon if the Government had compelled them to pay higher for it by imposing duties. He declared that the assertion made by the right hon. gentleman that corn was not used to a considerable extent by farmers in Canada was incorrect; that the right hon. gentleman was not rightly informed; and that corn was used to a considerable extent. Why should it not be? Farmers were usually able with 1½lb of barley to buy 1½lb or 2lb of corn. A farmer availed himself of the advantage of selling his pease, barley and oats and of buying corn in their place to feed his stock at a price relatively much lower, and any interference with this business was an interference with his rights and privileges. The right hon. gentleman had assured them that the great advantage of a reciprocity of tariffs would be that it would secure for us a reciprocity of trade with the United States. If he (Mr. Charlton) could be convinced that a reciprocity of tariffs with the United States would secure reciprocity of trade with that country, he should certainly favour the measure; but he did not favour the measure because he believed it would have a diametrically opposite effect. He believed that the adoption of this principle of reciprocity of tariffs, while it would fail to confer upon us a single benefit, and, on the contrary, would injure us in every respect, would put into the indefinite distance in the future the realization of any desire to have a reciprocity of trade. It would create a feeling of bitterness and estrangement, and the result would be to postpone indefinitely the realization of our idea for reciprocity of trade. He should only allude to one more point in the hon. gentleman's speech. He had informed them, and the same information had been vouchsafed to them by another eminent authority on that side of the House (Mr. Tupper), that England was being crowded out of her markets by competition with the United States. The right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) had told them that, speedily, England would have no refuge, no resting-place in the markets of the world, that she would only have the markets of Africa, that the valleys of the Congo and Zambezi would be the scene of her future trade operations; that the Hottentots, the Mokololos, the Manyemas, and other barbarious African tribes would be her only future customers, and that her trade would be restricted to exchanges for ivory and palm-oil and cocoa-nuts. He had looked this matter up, and he found that England still had a little trade besides what she had with Africa. He found that her exports of cotton goods, last year, amounted to $211,000,000, woollens $79,000,000, iron and steel $92,000,000. Her exports of manufactured goods to the United States were $12,000,000 more than the total exports of the United States manufactures to all the world. While the United States exported goods to the amount of $72,000,000 last year to all countries, Great Britain exported to them $84,000,000. England's exports to Germany amounted to $100,000,000; to France $80,000,000; the Netherlands $58,000,000; Italy $33,000,000, and to Russia, that paradise of Protection, $30,000,000; South America, $52,000,000, and the United States, as he had before stated, $84,000,000. The total volume of her exports amounted to over $1,000,000,000, and yet, forsooth, although she exported $1,000,000,000 of manufactures, reaching to every town and hamlet on the globe, she was speedily to be driven to the interior recesses of Africa for a market for her manufactures. The House had been favoured since recess with some remarks from his friend the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) about the subject of Protection. The hon. member very kindly drew their attention to the fact that there were two kinds of protection, the one Protection afforded by the Government, and another kind of protection afforded by creditors. He might have pursued his investigations still further. He would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that there were two kinds of protection afforded by the Government; the first was that protection to life and property, that beneficent protection which the law afforded to its citizens; the second, that kind of Protection which the hon. gentleman was in favour of, that Protection which entrenched monopolies behind the protection of the law; that Protection which said to one man, we will take from your earnings and give to this man who has no right to them: that Protection which favoured one class to the detriment of another; that kind of Protection which the Southern planter enjoyed with reference to the labour of his slaves. There were two kinds of Protection: one true, one false; one which was really Protection, and one which was in reality a high-handed act of robbery, perpetrated for the benefit of small and favoured classes. The hon. gentleman also stated that everybody now admitted that the depression in Canada was most crushing. Well, he (Mr. Charlton) at the risk of appearing singular in the matter, must decline to admit this; and, later in the evening, he would take occasion to show why he did decline to admit this, and he would produce evidence to show that such general depression did not exist. One other remark made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Masson) towards the close of his speech also struck him. It was that, if Protection in the United States had produced over-production, somebody had benefitted by it,—that the workman had benefitted by it in being enabled to get cheap goods. He understood his hon. friend that they had not complained of over-production in the United States, in consequence of the accumulation of stock which must be sold at a sacrifice, and yet the hon. gentleman was so inconsistent as to object to the consignment of these goods into Canada so that the workingman here, in consequence of slaughter prices, would reap the same advantage as did his brother in the United States, and would be benefitted by being enabled to buy his goods, in consequence of over-production, for less than they were worth. If it were in order, he (Mr. Charlton) should allude to a statement made the previous evening by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy) in which the hon. gentleman sought to convey an impression that the importation of manufactured goods from the United States to Canada was $51,000,000 per annum. He (Mr. Charlton) challenged that statement at the time, and since that time he had obtained a return from the Customs Department, from which he found that the total imports were $51,000,000; but that the importation of manufactures for consumption was only $24,000,000. He must protest against the reckless use of assertions not founded upon fact, which were calculated to mislead the country.

Mr. McCARTHY said he thought it would be in the recollection of the House that, when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) put the question to him, he admitted that a mistake had been made.

Mr. CHARLTON said he did not understand the hon. gentleman to concede that he was mistaken, and he certainly left the impression upon the House that he was correct. The balance of this large importation, not comprised in this list of manufactured goods, consisted, among other things, of \$12,000,000 worth of grain and bread-stuffs, \$692,000 worth of wool for our manufacturers, \$980,000 worth of tobacco leaf for our manufacturers, also \$594,000 worth of raw cotton for our cotton mills, \$718,000 worth of settlers' effects belonging to immigrants coming into this country, \$1,124,000 worth of hides and pelts for the use of our tanneries, \$3,176,000 worth of coal and coke for the use of our manufacturers and as fuel for the citizens, \$298,000 worth of dye stuffs, \$210,000 worth of raw rubber, and \$376,000 worth of flax and hemp for our manufacturers, \$663,000 worth of timber, which our timber merchants had bought in the United States, and which was exported from here to foreign countries. It would be well at this stage of his remarks to have a definition of terms. They heard a great deal said about Protection and a great deal said about Free-trade, but they heard very little said of any non-protective theory or revenue tariff. The impression that the country would have from the drift of the arguments in this House, would be that it was a controversy on the principle of Protection versus Free-trade, while it was needless for him to state that such was not the issue. We had no such policy as Protection, pure and simple, in this country; neither had we Free-trade, nor was there any party proposing to adopt a Free-trade policy for Canada. We had a revenue tariff and what might properly be designated a non-protective system. What was Protection in its aims? Not to secure a revenue, but to impose duties so high as to dry up the sources of revenue; as to exclude our importation and create in the country a monopoly for the manufacturer of those goods which were excluded by those extreme duties. Protection practically aimed at doubling the burden of a non-protective system to the consumer without benefit to the Government, because it compelled the Government to supplement the sum formerly collected under a non-protective tariff by some other mode of raising the revenue. A purely revenue tariff was a schedule of duties imposed on articles in such a manner that every cent of increased cost went into the coffers of the Government; but, where it was necessary to have a large revenue and a great number of articles must be taxed, it was impossible to devise a revenue tariff which did not afford, to a greater or less extent, incidental Protection to home industries. They had a great number of articles now upon the 17½ per cent. list that could be manufactured and were to a large extent manufactured in Canada. They had in the present tariff a measure which afforded in ordinary years a sufficient amount of revenue, and which afforded at the same time an extensive degree of Protection; but, if they imposed too high a schedule of duties, they would be in danger of defeating the purpose they had in view of raising an adequate revenue, by affording too great Protection and unduly stimulating domestic industries to the exclusion of importations. Then, as he had before stated, in defining these terms, they had no issue between Protection and Free-trade. They had no such a thing as advocacy of Free-trade, no party with Free-trade principles; but they now had a party advocating the exchange of the present revenue tariff system for protective duties; a system which, while increasing the cost of goods to the people, would diminish the amount of revenue collected by the Government, and which would, as he believed he (Mr. Charlton) would be able to show conclusively, have in the end a bad effect upon the industries of the country. He would now refer to the charges of inconsistency against himself. He was charged with having been a Protectionist, and with now being a Free-trader. He had from a protective standpoint at no time advocated a higher rate of duty than $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; he had said nothing at any time upon the tariff question which might be characterized by the Opposition as a defence of a revenue tariff and of the present policy of the Government that advocated the reduction of the rate of duties from the point where they at present stood. Was there any inconsistency in that? Gentlemen might say he had talked of Protection, and that he had talked of Free-trade; he might justly claim, speaking from a Protectionist standpoint, that the present tariff was ample for the purpose of affording Protection to manufacturers in this country; he might, as a Non-Protectionist, properly and justly hold that it would be impolitic and unwise to change the present tariff, which afforded the Government the revenue they needed and did not press on the people. He had been unduly criticized; but he did not claim perfect consistency between his present and his former opinions in this matter—consistency of this kind could only exist where there was no progression. When a child was in the arms of his nurse he was, perhaps, taught to believe the moon was a huge cheese; when he became a young man he repudiated that theory; he was inconsistent in repudiating his former belief; but he had advanced from error towards the truth. And, when he became a young man, he formed opinions of life which he was very likely to change on the shady side of forty. In this he had again been inconsistent, and he had again advanced. A person who had received the same education as himself, who had been in early life a follower of the views of men like Horace Greeley and Henry C. Carey, was liable to form opinions which, when he had examined evidence on the other side, he would be inclined to modify, and he had no hesitation in saying, and was not ashamed to say, that he once entertained opinions which he had since very much modified. He did not believe that extreme Protection was a blessing to a country, but he had no hesitation in saying that Free-trade, as an abstract principle, was right. He would go further than this, he would say that, the nearer they realized in practice this abstract principle, the nearer they were to what was best in the interest of the country. The House had had many assertions made in reference to the condition of many of the manufacturing industries of this country. To the extent of the depression that now existed in Canada, he proposed to direct attention for a few moments, and he should preface his remarks by stating that in Canada, for the last four years, there had been less depression and less distress than there had been in the United States, where they enjoyed the benefits of efficient Protection. He asserted that at the present moment there was less depression in this country than in England—less depression and less distress than there was in that Utopia and paradise of Protection, Russia. He asserted that we were, in fact, singularly fortunate in this respect as compared with the neighbouring nation. He had entered into a correspondence with a number of manufacturers upon this subject without regard to their political proclivities, and, in many cases, he had received replies. He had received replies from twenty-one extensive manufacturers established in this Dominion, and in these letters he found very satisfactory evidence as to the condition of our manufacturing industries. Taking the first return contained in this correspondence, he found that an extensive cotton mill in the west, last year, earned ten per cent., which was applied to the purchase of additional machinery. Another letter, from a different source, relating to the affairs of the same company, stated that they declared no dividend last year, thus evidently intending to leave an impression upon his mind, that, as far as this firm was concerned, it had been a very bad year indeed, by suspiciously neglecting to state the fact that a dividend of 10 per cent., though not declared, was earned and applied to increase of capacity, because their orders were coming in faster than they could execute them. The next letter was from an extensive woollen manufactory, with a capital of \$180,000, whose gross profits during the last year were ten per cent.; they reported the prospects for the present year encouraging, and better than they were for the last. The next was from an extensive foundry, with a capital of \$180,000; those gentlemen reported that they made no profit on fixed capital last year, in consequence of having unfortunately made a large number of bad debts; they also reported that home competition was too keen; that the measure of Protection they had enjoyed had unduly stimulated that industry, and that, consequently, the business was overdone. The next letter was from an extensive woollen manufactory; they reported that the depression had affected their business unfavourably; they saw no prospect of an immediate improvement; profits on capital last year, six per cent. He (Mr. Charlton) had noticed as a remarkable fact that the affairs of manufacturers who had reported that they had made no higher rate than legal interest on capital were considered by them to be in a ruinous condition. The next letter was from a hosiery establishment in the West. The proprietor reported too much home competition; business overdone; believed a revenue tariff the true policy; profits last year, six per cent., very much cut down by bad debts; prospects for this year fair to good. Another letter from an extensive hosiery establishment reported that the trade last year was fairly good; did not anticipate a great increase this year; profits on capital last year, eight per cent. He had a letter from, perhaps, the most extensive sewing machine maker in the Dominion. It reported: "Small improvements so far in 1878; not running on full time; had to be satisfied last year with interest on investment; wants reciprocity." A gentleman extensively engaged in the manufacture of carriage goods reported: "Business fairly remunerative last year; wishes for a duty of twenty per cent." The next letter was from an extensive clothing concern in the West. They reported: "Profits hardly as great during the last year as might have been realized on capital by loaning it on mortgage and buying notes." An extensive agricultural implement maker in the West reported: "Making reapers, harvesters and various machines; past ten months the busiest ever known; exporting largely to Great Britain, Australia and Africa; export trade rapidly increasing."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: What African tribe takes reapers?

MR. CHARLTON: The Anglo-Saxons, north of Cape Town, who have, as the hon. gentleman is, perhaps, not aware, supplanted the natives to a great extent. The next was a letter from an extensive sewing machine manufacturer who reported: "Running on three-quarter time; last year's profits reduced as compared with former years; making efforts to extend the export trade; wants free trade in iron, steel, brass, coal, lumber and varnish." It so happened that those were the raw materials required in that gentleman's business. Another extensive agricultural implement manufacturer in the West reported: "Have done a larger and more profitable business last year than ever before; anticipate to increase it largely this year; profits satisfactory; want no more protection; present duties afford more protection than those in 1869, 1870, 1871, 1872." A proprietor of a large foundry in the west reported: "Business improving; profits last year twenty per cent.; too much home competition." Another agricultural implement maker said: "Building 1,500 reapers; business increasing; profits last year, twenty-three per cent.; more protection would damage his business." Another agricultural implement manufacturer sent a highly satisfactory letter. He said: "Business increasing rapidly; exporting 400 machines this year; profits last year, twenty per cent. on sales, forty per cent. on capital. Another gentleman in the same line reported: "Expects to do double the business done in 1877; wants no more protection; profits on capital last year not less than twenty per cent." Another implement maker stated: "Business last year was twenty per cent. greater than ever before, and rapidly increasing; profits satisfactory; exporting to Great Britain, Australia and the United States; wants no more protection." A manufacturer of knit goods reported: "Holding his own; others in the same line in about the same way." Another agricultural implement maker reported: "Profits much the same as in former years; been in business twenty years; seeking to extend trade in Lower Provinces; complains of difficulties in reaching them, and of American competition; has no faith in Tory promises of protection." He (Mr. Charlton) would read an extract on that point for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite. The writer said:

"In conclusion, the writer would further state that, he believes firmly when the proper time arrives the Reform party will carry out such measures as the manufacturers and the Canadian people desire; and he has no faith whatever in the Tory cry of Protection, unless it be used as a stepping-stone to another reign of misrule and corruption; and when many of our Reform manufacturing friends, who are so sore displeased with the present Government, will find out that they have been simply gulled by professions that were never intended to be fulfilled, if Protection would in any way interfere with their lease of office."

MR. CHARLTON.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Then there are many other manufacturers who are dissatisfied?

MR. CHARLTON said the writer did not say how many. He would take the liberty of reading a letter from a gentleman whose name he had permission to use, Mr. James Noxon, of Ingersoll. That gentleman reported that the last year's profits of the large establishment of which he was the president were twenty-eight per cent. He said:

"The profits of this Company for the last year, after making ample provision for bad and doubtful debts, were twenty-eight per cent. on the paid up capital stock. Our usual profits were over thirty per cent., but were slightly less last year, owing to a defect in some of our reapers that was not discovered until they had been sent out into all parts of the country, and which cost us a large amount of money to remedy. The prospects for the present year are good, and we expect to get our profits back to the old figures on this year's business. * * *

There never was a more absurd cry than that manufacturers are languishing for the want of protection, while the fact is the manufacturing industries, not including lumber, are to-day more prosperous than any other of the great industries of the country, with the possible exception of agriculture. It may safely be said, generally, that the manufacturers of Canada are as prosperous as are the manufacturers of any country in the world at the present time."

The result of the reports he had received from twenty establishments was, therefore, as follows:—Six had made profits of twenty per cent. or upwards on last year's business; two reported that their profits were satisfactory, and from what he knew of those, he felt justified in saying that they exceeded twenty per cent., thus making a total of eight out of twenty whose profits equalled 20 per cent. Two reported their profits at ten per cent.; six reported that their profits were from six to eight per cent. last year; one reported profits reduced, as compared with former years; and only two reported that they had made no dividends. He had at his hand a statement of the business of forty-eight of the principal manufacturing establishments in the New England States last year, and he was happy to say that the exhibit made by those Canadian firms to which he had called the attention of the House was a much more satisfactory one than that made by those New England firms, which included the chief manufacturing corporations of those States, representing a capital of $52,320,000. Of those forty-eight firms, sixteen reported, last year, no dividend—in Canada only two. Last year nine of these forty-eight American firms reported profits less than six per cent.; eight reported six per cent.; and seven only reported ten per cent. and upwards. Contrasting the position of those forty-eight establishments with the twenty-one Canadian establishments he had just referred to, it was evident that the condition of our manufacturing industries was highly prosperous compared with the industries of the New England States. He had, he thought, furnished ample proof of his assertion, that the degree of depression and distress existing among the manufactures of Canada, at the present time, was less than in the United States. He renewed the assertion that the condition of the manufacturing industries in Canada, at this time, and for the last four years, had been better than the condition of the manufactures of the United States, than the condition of the manufactures in New England, than the condition of the manufactures of Germany, than the condition of the manufactures of Russia.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I ask the hon. gentleman if he has read all the answers?

MR. CHARLTON: I have read all the answers, and I have withheld no information I received in answer to those letters.

MR. ROCHESTER: Read all the letters.

MR. CHARLTON said he could give the hon. gentleman the names of the firms, and he had already given the substance of the letters. Many of them contained information he was not at liberty to use, and, in some cases, he was not at liberty to give the names of the writers.

MR. ROCHESTER: We do not want the names, but simply the letters.

MR. CHARLTON said he did not propose to spend a couple of hours reading a pile of letters of which he had already given the substance.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Will the hon. member give the answer he received from Robinson & Company, of Preston and Galt?

MR. CHARLTON: I have no letter from Robinson & Company.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: They wrote you a letter, because I have a copy of it.

MR. CHARLTON said he might be mistaken, but he would look over the headings of the letters.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Wm. Robinson is one of the firm.

MR. YOUNG: Does he say he has been losing money?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I want to know the name of the firm.

MR. CHARLTON: I have a letter from Robinson, Howells & Co., of Preston.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will read that?

MR. DYMOND said the hon. member had already given the substance of the letter.

MR. CHARLTON said he had read such letters as he was authorized by the writers to use, and he would not read any of those he was not warranted in quoting. He had given to the House the information which they had furnished him, and the circular he had issued stated the fact that he wished to know, generally, the condition of business during the past year, and the prospect for this year, for the purpose of using the information in Parliament. Having made the assertion that the extent of the depression in Canada last year, was less than in most other commercial countries, he now made the assertion that whatever depression existed in this country had not been due to a lack of Protection. He made the assertion that the general depression that had existed throughout the world must, of necessity, have affected the commercial interests of the Dominion, and he thought it was almost unnecessary to go into any details in illustrating that matter. It was impossible that the manufacturing and commercial interests of this country should not have suffered from the depression existing in other commercial nations. Now, we had, in this National Policy propounded by the right hon. member for Kingston, a promise that prosperity would be conferred on Canada by protection being afforded to the various industrial interests. They had the promise that this panacea for all ills was to confer prosperity upon our agricultural, mining and manufacturing interests. Let them examine for a moment into the question as to the extent of prosperity efficient Protection would confer upon the manufacturing industries of this country. At the outset he asked permission to call attention to the fact that, in any country, even in highly protected countries such as the United States, where the various interests had benefitted from a large degree of Protection, there was an immense number of manufacturing enterprises belonging to that class commonly known as "natural manufactures." The gross production of the manufacturing industries in Canada, in 1870-1, was $221,000,000; deducting from that sum the cost of material, they had a net product of $96,709,000. Assuming as correct the principle laid down by Political Economists, that, in a country such as this, at least four-fifths of the manufactures belonged to the class commonly known as natural manufactures, such as bakers, stone-masons, shoe-makers, carpenters, etc., that must exist in every country, let them see how large a proportion of those industries, existing in 1870-1, were due to the Protection afforded by our revenue tariff. It would be found, calculating upon this basis, that the proportion of the net production due to protection would be $19,000,000. They would find that 187,942 persons were employed in those various industries, and that, at the outside, not more than 37,500 of that entire number were engaged in occupations that were benefitted in any degree by Protection. Then they might credit to the incidental Protection existing at the present time that 37,500 individuals who were in Canada in 1870. The next question was, to what extent would that number be increased by adopting the most efficient imaginable system of Protection? He had gone carefully through the list of imports into Canada for the last fiscal year, and had checked off the quantity and amount of every article that could by any possibility be produced in Canada, and the result of that classification was as follows: He found that we imported last year, of goods paying specific duties, and that might possibly be manufactured in Canada, $398,000 worth; we imported of goods paying seventeen and a half per cent., that might, with the most efficient system of Protection, be produced here, $35,209,000 worth; and on the ten per cent. list we imported goods to the value of $508,000 susceptible of manufacture here; on the five per cent. list, $3,333,000; and on the free list, $3,332,000—the total being $42,832,000 worth of goods imported into Canada during the last fiscal year, that an efficient system of Protection might cause in time to be mostly manufactured in this country. Well, what if we were to adopt that system and impose duty so high as to exclude these goods from coming into this country, and lead to their manufacture here, what would be the first sacrifice that we would make? The first sacrifice would be the duties which we had collected on these goods, for the Government would lose the revenue and the consumer would get them no cheaper. These duties last year amounted to $6,661,000. What would be the second sacrifice on the part of the country? The second sacrifice would be to increase the amount of duties that would be necessary to lead to the production of these very goods here. The duties would have to be increased, perhaps 10 per cent., perhaps 20 per cent. He had made a very moderate estimate in this respect. He assumed that the tariff would have to be increased to about 25 per cent., and that the enhanced cost of those goods in consequence of their increased duties would amount to a further sum of $5,140,000. This was the second item. Was there anything else? Yes. Many lines of goods which were already manufactured in Canada under the stimulus of a 17½ per cent. Protection, would be further enhanced in cost in consequence of the advanced duties ; and the enhanced cost of those goods which we now imported, he estimated—and the estimate was moderate—at $2,950,000. What then would be the total cost of excluding from Canada, by means of high protective duties, $42,832,000 worth of goods which were imported last year, assuming that we manufactured all these goods here ? The total cost would be $14,752,000 per annum to Canada. Well, there was the cost at an estimated rate probably ten per cent. lower than would be actually required. Now, what would be the advantage of such a course ? No man would deny that the manufacture of forty-two million dollars worth of goods in Canada and the creation of the various establishments necessary for that increased amount of business would be an advantage to Canada. It only remained for them to examine what that advantage would be, and to compare its value to the country with the cost, which he had shown would be not less than $14,752,000. What would that advantage be ? How many operatives would the production of $42,832,000 worth of goods add to the population of Canada ? In the year 1870, the production of goods in the United States, as shown by the census returns, exceeded $2,000 to each operative employed ; and, last year, he noticed that in the city of Cincinnati the production of goods by each hand employed exceeded $2,500. He would estimate, from this data, that each operative, under the system that would lead to the production of these goods in Canada, would produce $2,000 worth. How many operatives then would be added to the population of Canada, if we produced the additional amount of $42,000,000 worth of goods which we now imported. It would add to the population the total number of 22,000 operatives in round numbers. Part of these would be men ; some of them would be women ; some of them would be boys, and some of them would be girls ; and, for the purpose of adding 22,000 operatives to our population, and such further number as might be dependent on those who were heads of families among this number, they were called upon by this admirable policy, promulgated last night by the right hon. member for Kingston, to submit to a loss to this country of $14,752,000 per annum, and they were to pay an annual tax of $625 upon every operative that was brought into Canada, for the purpose of producing in this country the goods that we now imported, and that were susceptible of production here. Capitalizing this sum paid as an annual tax, it would be seen that it would amount to $12,500, at five per cent. interest, which would be the cost per head to Canada of the addition to its population of the number of people that would be necessary to produce the goods which we now imported. Was not this a magnificent theory ? The right hon. gentleman ought to receive a leather medal for having devised and promulgated such an astounding receipt for securing national prosperity as this. This was the policy which was to confer upon Canada, upon its manufacturing, its mining, its agricultural, and its other interests, prosperity. This was the policy which called upon the people of this country to contribute over fourteen millions a year in burdens direct and indirect, for the purpose of adding 22,000 operatives to our population. Brilliant beyond measure was this piece of statesmanship. Well, they were promised in a general way that other industries would be benefitted by this policy. What other industries would be so benefitted ? Did the hon. gentleman propose to benefit the lumber industry by Protection—one of the most important industries in Canada, an industry that found a market for its products almost exclusively abroad, and an industry that was injured by every additional advance in the cost of the supplies used ? The thing was an absurdity. Protection in any degree was an injury to that interest. Under no possible circumstances could a protective policy be devised that could confer one iota of benefit on that great and that important industry of Canada, the lumber interest. Did the hon. gentleman propose to confer any benefit upon the shipping industry of the country by imposing taxes upon the material which was to be used in the construction of vessels, by hampering the trade

o^t the country, and by drying up the sources of business that had made Canada the fourth maritime state in the world? The right hon. gentleman might propose to do so, but he could never realize it; he could propose no restriction upon trade in the line of duties that would not inflict injury upon the shipping industry of the country. Did the right hon. gentleman propose to benefit the fishing industry of the country by the imposition of protective duties—by imposing duties on salt, by imposing duties on coal, by imposing duties on cloth, and by imposing duties upon food? By no possibility could the hon. gentleman confer one iota of benefit upon that great interest by Protection, and he should proceed to show, in the course of his argument, that the right hon. gentleman could confer no permanent benefit on any industry, by the adoption of the principles of Protection.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Hear, hear. There is my hon. friend's speech of 1876.

MR. CHARLTON said that the right hon. gentleman had unfortunately come in rather late. He would not go back and refer to matters to which he had already referred, and in referring to which he had answered the remark which he (Sir John A. Macdonald) had just made. He had alluded, a few moments ago, to natural and artificial manufactures; and he had made the assertion that in any country, and especially in such countries as the United States and Canada, the great bulk of the manufactures belonged to that class known as natural manufactures, to that class of manufactures that would exist in any country, and to that class of manufactures which were injured by Protection. But even protected industries were in very few instances permanently benefited by Protection. He would take as a sample the iron interest. If a duty were imposed, as he ventured to say the right hon. gentleman would propose, on pig iron, what was the effect of this duty on the general iron interest? What proportion to the entire volume of the iron trade of the country did the value of the quantity of pig iron made use of bear? In the United States, in 1840, the total value of the iron product of the country was ten times the value of the product of pig iron; and, in 1870, the total value of the product of the entire iron trade was eight times the value of the pig iron. What was the effect of the duty on pig iron? It raised the cost of the raw material to nine-tenths of the value of the iron industry of the United States in 1860, and to seven-eighths of the value of the iron industry of the United States in 1870. That duty on pig iron was not a benefit, but it was a burden upon nine-tenths of the iron industry of that country. What was the effect of the duty upon bar iron? Every industry in that country which made use of bar iron as a raw material was injured by the imposition of the duty on bar iron. Then there was a duty levied on raw steel; and what was the effect of that? Why, any manufacturer of cutlery in the United States would tell you that, if the Government would take the duty off raw steel, that would be all the Protection they asked. The value of raw steel produced in the United States bore the proportion to the total value of the products of steel of 1 to 30; where, with the imposition of a duty on raw steel, one man was benefited, twenty-nine to whom steel was raw material were injured; and this was the effect of Protection there. What was the effect of duties upon dye-stuffs and upon wool, for, in the United States and in any other country where the protective system was adopted, all interests had to be protected. In the United States, when they protected woollen manufactures, the men who raised the wool demanded that a duty should be levied on wool, and a duty was given them; and in consequence of this fact, the benefits which had been derived by the manufacturer from the duties on cloth, were neutralized, and more than neutralized, by the duties levied on dye-stuffs and wool. What effect did the duty on coal have there, and what would be the effect of it here? It did and would increase the cost to the manufacturer of motive power. It would be an injury to him, and an injury to every manufacturer that used coal in the generation of steam, and to every man who used coal for fuel. A protective duty on coal would be a burden on every industry, except the industry which produced coal for sale. What would be the result of the duty on food? It would be a burden on every operative and on every labourer that bought food. It would only benefit the producer of food and it would injure all others. And this was characteristic of the system of protective duties. Once attempt thus to benefit any special industries, and they would commence to rob one to benefit another, and then to rob some one else to benefit some other; and so they would go the round of the whole circle of industries applying a system of robbery and spoliation, and they would leave off where they began. Under the system of Protection, the cost of the manufactured article was invariably enhanced; for, where the raw material of one industry was the manufactured product of another, and the manufactured product the raw material of another, as was continually the case, duties and profits had, in innumerable instances, to be advanced over and over again, and all this would inevitably, from the nature of commerce, add to the ultimate cost of the article. He wished to call the attention of the right hon. gentleman on the other side of the Chamber to one feature of this new phase of Canadian politics that, perhaps, the right hon. gentleman had not contemplated. He wished to call that right hon. gentleman's attention to the results that were likely to ensue from the making of Protection a political issue. The effect of this would be to introduce an element of uncertainty into the fiscal and tariff legislation of this country and an element of uncertainty that was complained of by American manufacturers as one of the most grievous ills they had to endure. In consequence of having made Protection a political issue in the United States, they had made tariff legislation changeable and uncertain in that country, as illustrated by the fact that there had been thirty-five different tariff Acts. The manufacturer never knew what to expect; he never knew at what moment the popular will would take a shift. If the people were to govern themselves intelligently, they must understand the questions which they were called upon to decide. But take the intricate and complicated questions of Protection and Free-trade, and the masses were scarcely competent to deal with them, or rather their opinions were ever shifting, and the result was that there had been a lack of stability in the commercial legislation of the country. These were the results of political legislation as regarded the tariff. It had proved in many cases a curse to the manufacturer and to every commercial interest in that country, and, that being so, what were we warranted in believing would be the result of the introduction into the politics of Canada of the question of Protection versus Non-Protection? Suppose they adopted the principle of Protection: what would be the effect of it here? Let them first direct their inquiry to the agricultural interest. What was the natural effect of Protection in all countries where that policy had been tried upon agriculture? First of all, it checked the export demand for agricultural products. The artisan abroad, who had formerly supplied his wares to that market and purchased there his supplies of food was, by the operation of protective duties, shut out from the market he had hitherto enjoyed for the sale of the products of his own industry, and, as a natural consequence, his ability to purchase was impaired and he ceased to be as good a customer as he had been. Hence, the first effect of Protection would be to check the export demand for the agricultural products of the country. The next effect of it was to check the creation of facilities for transportation. Once they checked the demand for exportation, they also checked the amount of products exported, and hence, as a necessary consequence, they must check the demand for the creation of facilities for transportation in the country. The next effect was to enhance to the agriculturist the cost of implements, the cost of clothing, the cost of furniture, and the cost of the various articles he purchased. The result, then, as regarded the agriculturist, was that the export demand was checked, and the prices were reduced of all he had to sell, and the prices were enhanced of all he had to buy. That was the result. And he defied any man on the floor of the House to point out that this result had not been attained in the United States, and to point out anything else than that result to the farmer as the result of Protection there. What was it that would remedy this matter and that would avert this result? One thing, and one thing only, namely, that Protection should create in that country a market for the agricultural surplus and lead to the necessity of the importation of more food than the country raised. If this could have been done, then Protection would have redeemed the promises of its advocates, would have furnished a home market to the agriculturist, and would have compensated him in a measure for the depletion and taxation which he was called upon to endure. Was it possible in this country that a protective policy made so efficient as to lead to the manufacture of everything that was susceptible of being manufactured in this country, but which we now imported—namely, goods to the extent of $42,000,000, with a protective policy that was to add to the population of the country 22,000 operatives and those who would be dependent upon them—was it possible that this policy would add to the population of Canada a sufficient number of people to consume its agricultural surplus? Why, an efficient protective system, the most efficient protective system that could be devised, and a system that would lead to the manufacture in this country of every dollar's worth of goods susceptible of being manufactured here, would not add to the population of the country a sufficient number of people to consume the surplus agricultural products of one county in the Province of Ontario. No, the thing was a perfect fallacy. Once they adopted Protection, the effect was to diminish the receipts of the agriculturist and to increase the cost of all he had to buy, and thus leave him a sufferer in every respect by this policy. So much for the interest of the agriculturist as regarded this policy of Protection; so much for the promise of the right hon. gentleman and his followers that they would so adjust the tariff as to benefit and foster agriculture among the other interests of this country. Well, if these were, so far as agriculture was concerned, the characteristics of Protection, what were the characteristics of Free-trade? The first characteristic of Free-trade was untrammelled supply and demand; wherever the agriculturist could find the best market for his products, there he could sell; and wherever the agriculturist could find the cheapest market for what he had to purchase, there he could buy. There were no exclusions, no restrictions and no impediments created by legislation, such as would, in any way, prevent him from realizing the most he could get for what he had to sell, or from securing the best bargains he could find. This was one characteristic of Free-trade. Another characteristic of Free-trade was that it led to maximum production at the minimum cost. Another characteristic was that it allowed men to obey natural laws in all their commercial transactions; it imposed no artificial restraints; it put upon the Statute-book no unnatural laws; it agreed with the principles of common sense; it gave to mankind abundance and leisure in place of that artificial scarcity and increased toil which resulted from Protection. The object and result, he would repeat, of Free-trade was to give abundance and leisure—while the result of Protection was to bring in scarcity and necessity for increased toil to supply the wants of the people. Why, had not God, in his unwritten law, pointed out to man the necessity of Free-trade? Why did the benevolent Creator of the heavens and of the earth give us different zones, different soils, different climates, different productions, different races, and different tastes? Was this accidental? Was not the design clearly that man should hold transactions with his fellow man, and was it not the result of commerce to confer upon one zone the riches and the blessings of all zones? Was not the result of commerce to bring man into contact with his fellow man throughout the length and breadth of the world; to intermingle and bring races together, so that they might mutually confer on each other the benefits of culture and learning, raising men by slow degrees from the condition of savages to that of civilized, intelligent men. Why did we make railways and construct telegraphs? Why did we build ships that made the Atlantic but an ocean ferry? Why did we push our commercial relations with remote countries? We did all these things in order that we might advance our comfort, our happiness and our learning. Whatever legislation, therefore, stepped in and said: "You must not do any of these things," thus isolating a nation from their fellow men, must necessarily injure, instead of benefitting the cause of progress. Commerce was a leveller; commerce was the great civilizer of the world, but commerce also was selfish. It was selfish in its aims, but beneficial in its results. A legislation, he repeated, which sought to impose restriction on commerce, was one at variance with the best interests of man. Let them inquire into some of the characteristics of Protection. Was it an advantage to diminish the purchasing power of labour? An anecdote was related in a work on political economy which he saw the other day that illustrated that point. A Frenchman planted a vine; he reared and nurtured it till he produced from it a tun of wine. In order to procure some necessary goods for his family, he set out with his wine, for which he was offered 15 parcels of stuff in his native land. Being, however, offered 20 parcels of similar stuff in Manchester, he resolved to agree to the proposal and take the British goods. But when he endeavoured to get his parcels from England, a custom-house officer said a tax would have to be imposed upon it. As the tax in question would reduce the net amount which he would receive to the value of only 15 parcels, he asked the Custom-house officer what he should do under these circumstances. "Take French goods," said the officer. "But," said the peasant, "why am I not allowed to exchange my wine with those from whom I can get most?" "Because," replied the Custom-house officer, "it is done to protect the interests of France. Why that is so I cannot tell you; such, however, is the decree of the legislature, and it must be right." That was the effect of Protection. Its effect was to diminish the purchasing power of labour, to create artificial scarcity and high prices. It was an attempt to create monopolies and rings that would plunder the people for their own selfish purposes; an attempt to take undue advantage of the masses by legislative action. The first effect of Protection, pure and simple, was the relaxation of morals. It gave rise to the smuggler, and introduced the false invoice and perjurer. The people were taught that Government was a respecter of persons; that it gave a favoured class the power to plunder the masses by the permission and arrangement of the law. The people would be led to believe that the property acquired by that favoured class was got by theft, and then, by going a step further, they would come to the conclusion that property itself was theft. Protection naturally led to Communism, to the opinion being held that, in the possession of property, there must be something wrong. He regretted that the right hon. member for Kingston was not present to hear his reply to the assertion made by him that England acquired her strength under a system of Protection. If we adopted Protection in Canada, what would be gained? What did the right hon. member for Kingston and his followers promise them? First of all, said they, we would have increased manufactures. But in reply to circulars sent out, letters had been received, not from one or two, but from a large number of gentlemen engaged in manufacture, pointing out that production was already over-done in this country in many lines. If foreign goods were excluded from Canada, the measure would, at first, be followed by great progress, great prosperity and high dividends for manufacturers. But the result would afterwards become very different. Too many persons would go into business, and one of two things must inevitably follow. Either the manufacturers, becoming aware that too many were in the field and that the production was too great, would combine to run short time and reduce production at the cost of the consumer, or great accumulations of surplus stock would result in depression, general panic and bankruptcy, accompanied by a weeding-out of the superfluous number of establishments. That would cause great commercial loss and injury, and would result in the entire ruin of many of the men for whose benefit the policy was inaugurated. The country would lose nearly $15,000,000 a year for the purpose of adding 22,000 operatives to the population without permanent benefit to those for whom this vast taxation was imposed. It would be a loss to the manufacturer and the operative alike—to the coal miner, the salt producer and the agriculturist. Let them examine particularly what would be the effect of that policy on the agriculturist of the country. Protection, or a protective policy, would raise the price of all goods he had to buy. But these gentlemen promised the agriculturist a certain boon in the shape of duties upon grain, but, if a tax was imposed on grain or breadstuffs, what benefit would he derive therefrom? In ordinary years, we exported a surplus of all grains except corn, but, in exceptional years, we might possibly be forced to buy or import from elsewhere, to a limited extent, for home consumption. The United States exported their surplus to England, so did we, and the prices received in England regulated the prices of the producer in the United States and Canada. There was one grain, and one only, which he was free to admit an import duty would raise the price of; this was Indian corn. He would like to be informed, in the event of their ever adjusting the tariff, what tax it was the intention of those who advocated this National Policy to impose on corn? Some years ago, 3c. a bushel was levied, but he presumed they would be in favour of a greater degree of Protection now, and he would suppose they would be in favour of a duty of 5c. The hon. gentlemen opposite might correct him if he was wrong. Assuming this to be correct, he would take the case of his own county for the purpose of showing how the corn belt of the Dominion, lying along the north shore of Lake Erie, would be affected. That county was one of the few in Canada where corn was produced. If a calculation was made in order to show clearly the probable result of the proposed policy to the county of Norfolk and the corn belt, it would be seen that no advantage would be conferred on the particular county or belt of country to which he alluded. According to the census returns of 1870-1 the whole amount of cultivated land in the county of Norfolk was 192,000 acres. This would be sufficient for 3,840 farms of 50 acres each. He would suppose that one-tenth of the cultivated area of the county was, each year, devoted to the growth of corn, and, as a practical farmer, he affirmed that this exceeded the actual proportion of cultivated land usually devoted to the growth of corn in the corn belt. This would give 19,200 acres as the breadth of land annually devoted to the growth of corn in the county of Norfolk; he would estimate that the average crop of shelled corn per acre was 30 bushels, and he believed that no practical farmer would say this was too low; this would give an annual crop for the county of Norfolk, of 486,000 bushels, and he ventured to say that a crop of half a million bushels was much in excess of the average corn yield of that county. No doubt the farmers of the county would require, on the average, to use at least one-half of the crop raised by them for the purpose of fattening pork, feeding teams, stock, etc., this would leave a surplus for sale of 243,000 bushels in that county. This estimate of surplus he would venture to say was too large. However, a duty of 5c. per bushel on corn, if it resulted, as he presumed it would, in increasing the price received for this surplus to the amount of the duty, would be 5c. per bushel on 243,000 bushels as the amount of benefit the county of Norfolk would derive from the National Policy, or $12,150—that, divided amongst the 3,840 farmers of the county, would give to each one of them the sum of three dollars and sixteen cents. That was to be to each one his share of the plunder to be obtained by this proposed scheme to violate the principles of sound commercial policy, if not of common honesty. Now, what were the farmers of Norfolk to be called upon to pay in exchange for this sum of $12,150 which was to be the share of profit that county would derive from this much vaunted National Policy? He had pointed out earlier in his speech that the cost to Canada of an efficient protective system, that would lead to the manufacture of $42,000,000 more goods here than at present, would exceed $14,000,000 a year. Grounding his calculation upon the basis of population, he estimated that Norfolk's share of this cost to the country of Protection would be $128,000 per annum. Were they likely to submit to being plundered every year to the extent of $128,000 that they might secure spoils to the amount of $12,150; did the hon. gentleman propose to convince them that it was to their interest to lose ten dollars in order to gain one? He could assure them that the intelligent farmers of the fruitful corn belt of Canada understood arithmetic too well to be duped by any such proposal after they had given the matter fair consideration. With regard to the corn question as affecting the interests of the Dominion at large, he found, by the returns of the last fiscal year, that, for that year, we imported corn to the amount of 8,260,000 bushels, costing 51c. per bushel; that we exported of this amount 4,083,000 bushels, receiving for it 63c. per bushel, which left us for home consumption 4,177,000 bushels at a net cost to the country of 40c. per bushel. Could it be shown that this was a trade detrimental to the interests of Canada. He thought not. We handled over four million bushels as factors, and made a profit upon it, giving employment to shipping, capital and labour; and we bought over four million bushels for home consumption at a low rate, and were enabled to sell an equivalent amount of barley, oats, pease and rye, which would otherwise have been consumed in the country, at a much higher rate than the cost of the corn, thereby effecting a great saving to the country at large. Suppose a duty was levied upon corn; could the four million bushels now imported for home consumption under the stimulus of a duty be raised in the corn belt of Canada? It could not. He did not believe that any rate of duty that might be imposed would increase the production of corn in Canada to the extent of 1,000,000 bushels; what then would be the practical result of a duty? It would be as follows: the farmers in the corn belt, under the stimulating effects of a duty, would increase the production, say 1,000,000 bushels; three-fourths of the amount now imported for home consumption must still be imported, and the duty collected upon it would not go into the pockets of the Canadian farmer, but in very many instances, would come out of his pocket; thus the country at large would be taxed upon four bushels of corn, three of which were imported, in order that the farmer in the corn belt might recover the tax upon one bushel. Such a policy was too wasteful and absurd to be entertained for a moment by intelligent men; and he thought he could safely assure the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House that their bait would not be swallowed, and, when farmers came to figure out the matter, it would be found that they would not want so small a small boon at such an enormous cost. He (Mr. Charlton) would refer for a moment to the barley question. It had been asserted by gentlemen on the opposite side of the House that the American duty upon Canadian barley diminished the price by the Canadian farmer to the exact amount of the American duty. He should not enter to-night into the discussion of this question, though it was his belief that the American duty was actually paid, in a great measure, at least, by the American consumer, and made very little difference, indeed, with the price received by the Canadian farmer. But he would ask the members of the Opposition how, even in the event of their assertions being true, were we to remedy the difficulty? We did not impose that duty. We would gladly take it off, but we had not the power. That power was vested in the Congress of the United States. Of what avail would it be for us to impose a duty upon barley? It was an article which we sold to a very large extent, and bought to a limited extent. It would not affect the price of what we sold one iota if we were to prohibit the importation of a single bushel. In 1876 we imported 34,099 bushels, and exported 10,000,000 bushels. What effect upon this vast export trade would a duty upon the small amount we imported have produced? In 1877 we exported 6,587,180 bushels, for which we received 69c. per bushel; and we imported 369,801 bushels, for which we paid 40½c. per bushel. In other words, we took a small amount of American barley at 40½c., and sold them our own barley, of a superior quality, in place of it, at 69c. Possibly the larger portion of the barley imported from the United States at 40½c. was mixed in small quantities with our own superior grades, and sold back to them at 69c., and duty added. Whether this was the case or not, what effect could a duty upon barley have produced in that year, when, for every bushel we imported, we exported eighteen bushels? Had a duty excluded the 369,801 bushels of American barley which we imported in 1877, at a cost of 40½c., we would simply have exported that much less of Canadian barley, which we sold at 69c., and the country would have lost the difference in price between 40½c. and 69c. per bushel, or 369,801 bushels. Fortunately for Canada, the United States would no longer be our only market for barley. A large trade had, within the past year sprung, up with Great Britain. Our barley had been received with great favour there, and Great Britain could easily absorb our entire surplus. This being the case, English and American buyers would hereafter become competitors for the purchase of our barley. Its price would be fixed, as the price of all our other cereals now most unquestionably were, in the open markets of the world, and then it would be a matter of the utmost indifference to our farmers whether the American Government did or did not impose a duty upon barley. What was the purpose, he would ask, which the Americans had in view, when, in 1864, they abrogated the treaty with Canada. It was that they might allure Canada into annexation with themselves. Had it that effect? On the contrary, it put
