“ MR. VALLÉE said that the second motion contained in its first part the item of wheat, on which he had previously voted. He maintained his first vote on that article, but he desired to express his dissent in reference to the other two items mentioned in the motion. That was the reason why he had voted against the motion of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton).

“ MR. TULLIER said he was in the same position as the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Vallée) in regard to this motion. He maintained his vote in reference to wheat; but, as he was obliged to vote on the motion of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), he had voted against it, in order to express his dissent in reference to the two items which were mentioned beside that of wheat.”

“ MR. CONNELL stated that he had received several telegrams and letters, stating that there was considerable dissatisfaction in the county he had the honour to represent, in consequence of steamers being unable to pass the Woodstock Railway Bridge, on account of insufficient draw, and the draw-bridge not being in the proper place. He again directed the attention of the Government to it, and trusted it would receive their earliest attention.”

THE DEBATES

OF THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS OF CANADA

IN THE

FIRST SESSION OF THE FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE DOMINION OF CANADA, APPOINTED TO MEET FOR THE DESPATCH OF BUSINESS 13 FEBRUARY, 1879, IN THE FORTY-SECOND YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

SECOND VOLUME OF THE SESSION.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 8th April, 1879.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SEPARATION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA FROM THE DOMINION.

PROPOSAL TO INTRODUCE A BILL.

MR. DECOSMOS: I move for leave to introduce a Bill, entitled an Act to provide for the peaceful separation of British Columbia, seconded by any gentleman opposite who thinks proper to second it.

MR. SPEAKER: Who seconds the motion?

MR. DECOSMOS: The hon. member for Sunbury?

MR. BURPEE (Sunbury): No.

The motion was not seconded.

MR. DECOSMOS said he was glad to find that certain hon. gentlemen who were condemning British Columbia from hour to hour on the floor of this House as an incubus, an excrescence; those who threw insolent epithets at the Province of British Columbia—

MR. MACKENZIE said there was nothing before the House.

MR. SPEAKER called the hon. gentleman to order.

MR. DECOSMOS said he thought he had as much right—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. DECOSMOS said he hoped the House, or the Speaker, would not ask him to take his seat, because, before the day was out, the occasion might arise when he would insist on that indulgence which was granted to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo) moved the adjournment of the House.

MR. DECOSMOS said he had heard from time to time, in this House, the grossest insults that had ever been offered to any people, cast on the people of British Columbia. That Province had been called an excrescence, an incubus, had been charged with endeavouring to gain something from this Dominion without any equivalent. He moved this resolution, and he asked those hon. gentlemen, who said they wished to get rid of the Province, to second the motion. Not a single hon. member, from the Premier, down even to the member for Sunbury, or the member for Charlotte, dared to second that motion.

MR. HOLTON said the hon. gentleman could not introduce a Bill, and claim a seconder on a motion to adjourn. It was utterly irregular.

MR. DECOSMOS said he merely wished to draw the attention of the House to the unfortunate position in which the Opposition stood; also, to the unfortunate position in which the Government stood. The people of British Columbia had as little faith in one side as they had in the other.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 74) Further to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act.—(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

Bill (No. 75) To amend an Act for the more speedy trial, in certain cases, of persons charged with felonies and misdemeanours, in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec.—(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

Bill (No. 76) Respecting the Andrew Mercer Ontario Reformatory for females.—(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

ENGINEERS' REPORTS ON PACIFIC RAILWAY TENDERS.

REMARKS.

MR. TUPPER said, before the Orders of the Day were called, he would, with MR. DECOSMOS.

the permission of the House, say a word in reference to the application made by the hon. the leader of the Opposition, for a report of the engineers on the tenders submitted to the House for the construction of the two sections of the Canadian Pacific Railway recently put under contract. The effect of making public those reports, which were, to a certain extent, confidential, would not be in the public interest; it would tend to prevent the Government receiving as full information as they otherwise would. It would render engineers more cautious in their statements, lest their reports might bring them into personal collision with men of prominent positions, such as contractors. He proposed to place these reports in the hands of the hon. the leader of the Opposition for his personal information, and he was sure the hon. gentleman would exercise a wise discretion in not making public reports of a character considered confidential by the parties who made them.

MR. HOLTON said he ventured to state, before his hon. friend replied, that it was not in his private or individual capacity he desired to be put in possession of these reports, but to be used on the floor of Parliament. He had the utmost confidence in his hon. friend, who was his chosen leader. There were matters passing between the front benches which might be considered confidential, but this was not one of those matters. It referred to an important administrative act of the Government, which must form a subject of discussion if it was to be communicated at all. Therefore, his hon. friend ought not to accept the reports on the terms offered. Every member had a right to this information if it was to be communicated at all, and it was for the Government to take the responsibility of withholding or supplying it.

MR. MACKENZIE said, when he asked for those papers, he ventured to draw a distinction between those parts which related to the standing, morally or otherwise, of the contractors, or anything of that kind, and those which bore upon the advisability of accepting one or other tender, apart from such considerations. He suggested, then, that the reports, so far as they were of an official technical character, ought to be placed before the House. It would be a very inconvenient practice for any hon. member to accept documents which he could not use in debate. Rather than accept them under that condition, it would be better for him to discuss the matter as it appeared on the surface, without the engineers' reports.

MR. TUPPER said he thought it was in the public interest that such reports should not be considered public property, because that would tend to restrict the expression of opinion of engineers in relation to the capacity of contractors to fulfil their contracts, which, becoming public, would be likely to bring into collision public officers holding very important positions and contractors who might subsequently be discharging the duties of contractors under them, and would thus prejudice the public service. He (Mr. Tupper) would have no objection to take the hon. member for Chateaugay into his confidence, as well as his leader. He would be quite willing, indeed, to place all the reports of the Engineers on those tenders in the hands of the leader of the Opposition, with the statement that, if, on their perusal, in consultation with so leading a member of the House as the hon. member for Chateaugay, he thought it would be wise to lay them before the House, he (Mr. Tupper) would accept his judgment and do so.

MR. HOLTON said he did not want to be understood as affirming that those papers ought to be brought down in all cases, or in this particular case. He did not know anything of the character of the report, whether it would be proper to bring it down or not; but he did say, that, when papers were demanded, Ministers must, on their own responsibility, decide as to the propriety of producing them. But his principal object, on the spur of the moment, was to protest against private communication of public papers being made, as was done in this case by an hon. Minister to an hon. member. It might be quite true that his hon. friend was the leader of one side of the House, but, after all, he was here simply as the member for Lambton. He had no priority of claim to the public records over the member for Chateaugay, or any others; and, therefore, he (Mr. Holton) had taken the earliest moment to protest, on principle, against the partial, secret, confidential communication to a member of the House of public measures. They would, perhaps, have occasion to debate the matters to which those reports referred, and ought not to have their hands tied in any way. Therefore, he desired simply to proclaim what he conceived to be the true doctrine with regard to the matter. Hon. gentlemen must decide on their own responsibility what papers they would bring down.

MR. TUPPER said he ought to have added that, in acting as he had done, he was only reciprocating a courtesy which he had on more than one occasion received from his predecessor in the Public Works Department. If his hon. friend from Chateaugay would throw his mind back to what took place a few evenings ago, he would remember that the leader of the Opposition stated, in reference to these papers, that he had on more than one occasion submitted to gentlemen opposite reports of a somewhat similar description, and information which he did not think it desirable to lay on the table of the House. He (Mr. Tupper) had only followed this precedent.

MR. MACDOUGALL said he thought that this matter was of too great importance to permit of its being disposed of by a conversation across the House between a Minister who made the proposition and the leader of the Opposition. He thought that, where millions were involved, and where, by the law of the land, this House was to pronounce upon the contracts entered into by the Department of Public Works, hon. members should, at least, have the opportunity of knowing what had been done; because, as he understood it, these contracts did not take effect until they and the reports of the Department were laid on the table of the House for a certain period. Therefore it seemed to him it was their right and their duty, as members of Parliament, as trustees for the people, to have all the information material to the formation of a judgment upon the propriety of the action of the Government placed in their hands. With regard to the engineers, he had had a little experience in the Department himself, and could not call to mind any case in which their reports were confidential. He thought that the duty of the engineers was rather to state, from a professional point of view, the nature of the works to be undertaken, the number and regularity of the tenders, with such recommendations as might be thought desirable for the guidance of the Minister. If necessary, the engineers should report on the character of the contractors, whether they were fit and proper persons to be entrusted with a public work, whether or not they had previously acted dishonestly, or caused delays and embarrassment to the Government. Such communications could be kept separate, and treated as confidential. But, with regard to any other matter, the action of those public officers should surely be submitted to the review of Parliament. He could understand that it would be very unfair to those officers to submit their private and confidential reports to Parliament without their having been previously informed that such a course was to be adopted. But, he thought the practice of receiving and acting upon these private reports unfortunate, as tending to excite suspicion in the public mind with regard to the bona fides of Ministers. They all remembered that it was the practice of the hon. leader of the Opposition, when Minister of Public Works, and when challenged before the House, or the people, with reference to matters of administration in his Department, to fall back on his engineers, and content himself with the statement that they had made this or that recommendation. In his capacity as a public man, he (Mr. McDougall) had felt justified in arraigning that hon. gentleman for not having exercised his own discretion and judgment, for not having acted upon his own responsibility in matters involving such important consequences to the people. His hon. friend the present Minister of Public Works, on more than one platform had agreed with him (Mr. McDougall) in his condemnation of that objectionable practice. Now, he believed, without expressing any doubt, or lack of confidence in the honesty, ability or integrity of the Minister of Public Works, and his colleagues, that it would be to the advantage of the Government and greatly to the comfort of their friends, since certain matters had been challenged in the public press—since statements had been made as to the commission of acts wearing an appearance of irregularity or of divergence from the ordinary course—if all those transactions were made plain, and all the facts put before the House and the country. He assumed there had been nothing wrong; but was afraid, if the reports of the engineers were suppressed, if information due to Parliament and the country was withheld, if private conferences were held between the present and the late Minister of Public Works on such subjects—in view of the charges against that hon. gentleman—it might be suspected by some, that he desired to cover up his own misdeeds, when in office, by approving of similar transactions on the part of his successor. That suspicion might arise, and he did hope, with regard to those reports, that, if there was anything in them of a confidential character—any personal reflections, on the part of the engineers—those passages would be eliminated, and that the House would be permitted to see the portions dealing with the material facts of the case, in order that hon. members and the whole country might judge as to the propriety of the final determinations of the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) was quite mistaken if he meant that he (Mr. Mackenzie) initiated any new practice when Minister of Public Works. He initiated no new practice whatever. But he could recollect some few reports in respect to particular persons, some confidential remarks as to the moral standing of tenderers for public work, which he did not think it desirable to make public. But he had no recollection of any engineers' reports or papers on public works, called for, having been refused. The hon. gentleman said he had arraigned him for desiring to shelter himself behind engineers' reports. He was mistaken, as he (Mr. Mackenzie) had always assumed the full responsibility of his transactions; but he had stated that his course in certain matters was sustained by the reports of the engineers, and that, if the engineer had approved of any transaction, it was prima facie evidence that it was a proper one. With regard to the other point the hon gentleman had referred to, namely, that all the documents ought to be before the House, he had already stated that everything that referred to the giving out of contracts—of a technical and public character—everything except the moral or personal reasons why any persons had been passed over—should be laid before the House. He thought it was fair that the Minister of Public Works should, on his own responsibility, leave out such portions as were strictly confidential, given to him as a Minister, and bring down the remainder. He recollected well, on certain disputed occasions, such as that of the award of the contract for Section 15 of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Georgian Bay contract, reports of the engineers were brought down, with the documents embodied in them, and published at once, the moment they were called for. There was no change of practice made while he (Mr. Mackenzie) was head of the Public Works Department. He had felt it essentially a part of his duty, as the political head of a Department, to see that the officers charged with the engineering and business responsibility of such contracts were in accord with the political head, and he in accord with them. He had no recollection of a single contract having been given out during his term, in which everything concerned in those contracts was not concurred in by the deputy head and engineers of the Department.

• MR. TUPPER said that the moment he should have adopted the course suggested by the leader of the Opposition, he would have exposed himself to the charge of garbling the reports of the engineers, and he did not intend to expose himself to any such suspicion. The hon. member for Halton said that suspicion existed with regard to his (Mr. Tupper's) course in this matter. He had never heard any hon. gentleman say so, and would be glad to have the grounds of any such suspicion stated to the House. He would not have it said that he had refused to show engineers' reports to hon. gentlemen opposite who were desirous of seeing them. He had stated already his reasons for treating such reports as private and confidential, and the hon. member for Halton, who had been a Minister himself, ought to have known that they were sufficient. He (Mr. Tupper) had stated that it was desirable that the Government of the day should have the full benefit of the knowledge and opinions of the engineers in relation to all parties tendering; that, if the question was simply one of amount, the Government, with all the figures before them, would not want the engineers' reports; but, if they had from them reports dealing with the professional character and capacity—not the moral character—of the tenderers, it would not be judicious to make them public. Such reports were private and personal, and the engineers would, if they knew they were to be published, be more cautious in their statements. But, after what had fallen from the hon. member for Halton on this case, he (Mr. Tupper) would lay all the papers on the table, and allow the hon. gentleman to see whether he, or any other hon. member, could find any grounds for the imputation, or suspicion, in relation to this matter, which he had, for the first time, mentioned. He would at once lay on the table all the reports in relation to the contracts recently submitted.

VICE-CHANCELLOR BLAKE.

REMARKS.

MR. COSTIGAN said, before the Orders of the Day were called, he would like to ask the Minister of Justice if his attention had been called to a certain serious complaint that had been made through the public journals against a very high official of the country. He alluded to certain expressions used by Vice-Chancellor Blake on certain occasions, which seemed to have given dissatisfaction in the country. His attention might already have been called to the fact that this hon. gentleman was charged with using language unwise and objectionable, holding the position he did. He (Mr. Costigan) did not pretend the hon. gentleman did use this language; but he was desirous of impressing the House with the importance of ascertaining whether he did really use the language attributed to him. Hon. gentlemen might, perhaps, be disposed to blame him for introducing this matter into the House, but he could point to a precedent from the English House of Commons. Sometime ago in England, a man named Johnson, holding office under the Imperial Government, made use on some public occasion of expressions which were calculated to give serious offence to a portion of the people of that country, and Mr. Sullivan, a member of the House of Commons, called the attention of the House to the fact that an official, in the pay of the Government, had abused his position, and asked the Government if any notice had been taken of it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said :

"As the House was aware, Mr. Johnston was a salaried official of the Crown, as a Commissioner of the Fishery Department, but Mr. Johnson had only recently been taken into the permanent Civil Service, and, perhaps, was not aware how objectionable it was for him to use the language attributed to him, holding the position he does. His right hon. friend the Chief Secretary had given Mr. Johnson a caution, which would probably be sufficient."

He thought hon. gentlemen would be satisfied that he was not out of place in rising on this occasion. The English Government had characterised Mr. Johnston's language as objectionable, and he thought the language of the hon. Judge he alluded to was still more objectionable. We had, in this country, all to look to our Judges with confidence, respect, and esteem. We wanted them to be above even the prejudices that sometimes influenced men belonging to different political parties, and we all wanted to feel that they were qualified and willing to dispense justice in an even-handed manner. When any Judge, no matter from what part of the country, gave evidence of what people believed to be a want of liberality in his public expressions, that was calculated to shake the confidence in such Judge of a portion of the people of this country who had to look for justice at his hands. He had no notion to make in reference to this matter. He felt confident, if the matter had not already been brought before the hon. the Minister of Justice, that that hon. gentleman would now deal with it in such manner as he should deem it his duty to do. He (Mr. Costigan) now left the matter entirely in his hands, having performed what he deemed his duty to the public. He would just quote the exact words which the hon. Judge was reported as using. Several charges had been made against him in the newspapers, but he would refer to only one, in which he was stated to have said, at a meeting in Toronto of the Episcopalian Synod :

"He sincerely trusted that former differences ceasing to exist, they should become the pattern Diocese, and shoulder to shoulder fight the battles of the Church, and, with other Protestant denominations, go strongly against Popery and infidelity."

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) : I have only one observation to make, in reply to the remarks made by the hon. member for Victoria, N.B., relating to a very high official in this country, Vice-Chancellor Blake. I have received a letter from a gentleman, calling my attention to some such observations, stated to have been made by that high dignitary, which I am ready to bring down, should any hon. member of the House require it. It was addressed to myself by, I think, a gentleman named Boyle. I have just another observation to make. I think my hon. friend will see that the high dignitary of whom he has just spoken, stands in a very different position from that of the official to whom he referred, Mr. Johnston. Vice-Chancellor Blake is a Judge of one of the Superior Courts of this country. He holds his position for life, or during good behaviour, and the Constitution provides that the only mode of impeaching or correcting the conduct of a Judge of the Superior Courts, is by an address of the two Houses of Parliament. It would be unbecoming and improper for me to say more.

WAYS AND MEANS.—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned debate on Mr. Tilley's proposed motion to agree to resolutions relative to duties of Customs and Excise, reported from Committee of Ways and Means (March 14th), and Mr. Mackenzie's motion in amendment thereto (April 4th).

MR. CARON said, after the protracted debate already had on the tariff, not too long, however, considering the importance of the subject under discussion, he felt more than ordinary hesitation in asking the attention of the House to the few remarks he deemed it his duty to make. He felt, moreover, especially unfortunate in following so many hon. gentlemen who had discussed this question with so much ability and eloquence. His excuse for taking up the time of the House now was that, owing to the gravity of the question under debate, he considered it the duty of every member to place upon record his views, so that his constituents might know if he had faithfully looked after the interests confided to him. At the outset, he must say, that this tariff should be framed, not upon the taking into consideration of the interests of one Province alone, but it should be framed on a consideration of the interests of the whole Dominion, and of all the political institutions of this country. Who ignored what a difficult task it had been for the statesmen of Canada to organise, under different political circumstances, this great Confederation of ours? It was a difficult task, because various interests had to be reconciled, and then, as to-day, it became necessary to consider the various interests of the several Provinces which were coming into the Confederation. If Confederation, so far, had been a success; if the statesmen of Canada, belonging to both sides of politics, had been able to organise and work successfully that great scheme, it was due, in a great measure, to the concessions which were mutually made by the different Provinces, concessions without which it would have been impossible to carry out Confederation. He hesitated not to say that the difficulties which Canadian statesmen had to meet to-day in preparing this tariff were very nearly as great, if not as great, as those just referred to. To-day, like twelve years ago, it was necessary to harmonise all the various interests of the several Provinces, and he believed that, if a proper spirit of concession were shown by the representatives of the various sections of the Dominion in discussing the tariff, it would have a great success in the country, taken as a whole. This trade question was agitated long before the hon. the Finance Minister brought down his Budget speech. After a fair trial of the late system of Free-trade, the people had decided to introduce the Protective system, and, at the same time, they condemned the policy of the late Government. That policy had not produced the effects expected from it, and it was only after having given it a fair trial for many years that at last the people of Canada determined upon introducing a new policy, and this policy had been approved by the greatest majority that any political party had ever obtained in this country. This brought him to refer to the financial system of the late Government. Gentlemen now occupying the Opposition side of the House, as far back as 1872, decided that Protection should be introduced into Canada, and that without Protection Canada could not prosper. He saw sitting opposite several of his hon. friends with whom he differed in politics—with whom he had fought more than one political battle; but with whom, nevertheless, he was happy to believe friendly sentiments existed outside of politics. He remembered when his hon. friend the late Minister of Inland Revenue was addressing a public meeting in the city of Quebec on political matters, when he explained, with his usual eloquence, the platform of the Parti National, which he and others were organising. On that occasion the hon. gentleman laid it down as one of the planks of his party that this country should adopt a Protective policy. He remembered well, on another occasion, when that hon. gentleman delivered one of his most eloquent speeches in the Quebec Parliament, it was in defence of the great principle of Protection. He (Mr. Caron) might be mistaken, but he believed one of the principal reasons those hon. gentlemen had lost the favour of the people was, that they had abandoned the Protection plank of their platform. It was to be remembered, however, that when those hon. gentlemen advocated that policy they were not in a position to carry it into effect. They were a small minority in the Province of Quebec. But if there was one thing more than another which shook the confidence of the people in them, it was the fact that, when they came to occupy the Treasury benches, instead of being true to their policy, instead of being true to the pledges they had made, they reverted to the policy of Free-trade. As a Conservative, he was proud to congratulate his party upon having been true to their principles, and carried out faithfully the promises which they had made to the people on the hustings. The Conservative party had been true to the pledges it had made to the people in the cold shades of Opposition, and he was sure that nothing was more calculated to popularise the Conservative party than this Protective policy. The Government, in framing this policy, had carefully considered the different interests which it affected, and the returns from the different Provinces showed that the policy was acceptable to them. Since the inauguration of this policy, several industries which had been closed for many years, had been again set in operation. A few days ago he received letters from Montreal, informing him that new factories were about to be opened, thanks to the new policy. Messrs. Redpaths' refinery had already been opened. So little importance did the late Minister of Finance attach to that industry, that he never attempted, by his policy, to give it any encouragement. Instead of giving it encouragement, he drove it from Canada and transferred it to the Americans, who were coming into Canada and carrying away money which, under a proper financial policy, should have been expended amongst our own people. Among the new industries which were being started, he might mention a rumour in the city of Quebec that a very important tweed factory was likely to be established. He knew his hon. friend the late Minister of Inland Revenue might have his doubts about this policy. But that hon. gentleman, when he was elected in Quebec East, told the people that he would do all he could to help the ship-building interest, but when he came up to Ottawa, shortly afterwards, no doubt the strong Free-trade views of the hon. the late Minister of Finance prevented him from carrying out those pledges.

MR. LAURIER asked if the ship-building interest would not be fostered by the opening of Free-trade with France.

MR. CARON.

MR. CARON said he did not propose to discuss that point, but that point could fully be carried by a change of tariff, with reference to French wines imported here. What he asked was what the hon. gentleman had done to foster that industry. He remembered very well the brilliant promises the hon. gentleman had made, but he did not remember that these promises were ever carried out.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH: Are they being carried out now?

MR. CARON said, in speaking of this subject, he believed that just on the eve of the election some letters passed between the hon. member for Lambton, and the French consul in Quebec.

MR. MACKENZIE: That was eight months before the election.

MR. CARON: That is not very long before the election.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is not on the eve of the election.

MR. CARON: If I remember aright, then, the letters may have been written eight months before the elections, but they were published almost immediately before the election in our papers. In fact, a few days before.

MR. MACKENZIE: They were published at the time.

MR. CARON: The hon. member for Lambton may have forgotten about the matter, as he generally does about every matter having reference to Quebec interests.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not forget much.

MR. CARON said he had no doubt the hon. gentleman might have forgotten the exact date at which he wrote those letters. He (Mr. Caron) believed that the object of Protection was to promote the interest of the different classes of the community. He did not consider that the agriculturists of the Dominion could complain of the tariff. Speaking more particularly in the interest of the farmers of the Province of Quebec, he found, looking over the imports and exports, that last year the Americans introduced into this country 1,697,700 bushels of oats, amounting in value to $610,491. These oats came from the United States, and the result was that the value of oats was considerably reduced, very much to the detriment of the farmers of the Province of Quebec. During the same period, we exported to England and other countries 2,970,284 bushels of oats, which showed we were producing more oats than we consumed. It was impossible for us to compete against this foreign produce which was coming into our markets without we had the same privilege of sending our surplus productions on the same conditions into the United States. It seemed to him that the present Government, in imposing this duty, had in view the agricultural interest of this country, and they could not be too highly eulogised for having protected this important branch of our national prosperity. As he viewed it, the result of the present tariff would be to increase the production of oats in Lower Canada, and the Province of Quebec was a Province in which oats could be produced on a very large scale. Last year we imported from the Americans very nearly 8,000,000 bushels of Indian corn, and, if he understood the question at all, he believed that this Indian corn was used to a very great extent for distilling purposes, and could be very well replaced by Canadian oats. The effect of the tariff would also be to induce our agriculturists to give more attention to the production of Indian corn. There was absolutely nothing to prevent us in Canada from producing Indian corn, except the policy which had so long prevailed in Canada. He considered that, under this tariff, not only the farmers of the Province of Quebec, but of the whole Dominion, would be stimulated to increase their agricultural productions, and more particularly the production of Indian corn. What he complained of was that, under the old tariff, the Americans had absolute control of our markets, without paying any duty. It was impossible to read the late Canadian tariff, and the United States tariff, without coming to the conclusion that the policy of the United States tended to make the Dominion a slaughter market for their goods, and to deprive Canada of a reciprocity of tariff with them. As an instance of the absence of reciprocity, he would state that, last year, we exported to the United States 6,243,033 bushels of barley, on which we paid a duty of 15c. a bushel. It seemed to him that, if the Americans could collect 15c. a bushel on barley, it could hardly be considered an advantage to Canada to allow American produce to come into Canada without imposing any duty whatever. No one could come to any other conclusion but that the American tariff was unjust as far as Canada was concerned; that our late tariff was simply ridiculous in admitting all these articles of commerce without any reciprocity of tariff. Not only was that the fact, but the late Administration, for a time, considered it was necessary to change the tariff which existed in this country. He remembered very well when the Hon. Mr. Brown went to the United States for the purpose of negotiating a reciprocity treaty. In his speech to the Senate (22nd February, 1875), after alluding to the way in which the American tariff would affect Canadian agricultural interests, he stated:

"And now let us place in contrast with this the great agricultural interest, with its half million of hardy workers—which has no Protection—which feeds the whole people, and contributes, besides, annually to the foreign exports of the Dominion, commodities to the value of thirty-four millions of dollars."

He thereby admitted that, under the system which the hon. gentleman considered should exist in Canada, their agricultural interests were ignored, and that it had become necessary to protect those interests against American competition; and, therefore, he and his political friends considered that the position of Canada was such that they had to look somewhere to improve the relations which existed between the United States and Canada, as far as the Dominion was concerned. He believed that the present Government, in adopting their present Protective policy, were carrying out these very views, which struck the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite when in power as proper, and which, to-day, had become an absolute necessity, if Canada wished to keep within this country those hard-working families, those young men, hard-working farmers, to whom the Hon. Mr. Brown referred, and who had been compelled, under the old system, to leave the country and settle in the neighbouring Republic, under whose financial system they found that protection which had been refused to them in Canada, for their products, and their skilled labour. He was free to admit that, if he looked to the interests of the Province of Quebec solely, he would certainly have preferred that a duty had not been imposed on flour and wheat; but he considered it would be a very narrow-minded policy for any Government to frame in a country like this, a financial policy, which would not be one of mutual concessions, of give and take, so far as the different Provinces were concerned; so that the present tariff ought to be one which would be acceptable to the whole Dominion. He considered that this Protection which had been accorded to agricultural products would have one very beneficial effect, as far as the Province of Quebec was concerned. They had, as hon. gentlemen knew, north of Quebec, the great valley of the Lake of St. John, than which—and he could state it without fear of contradiction—there was no better wheat-producing district in the Dominion of Canada. Last year, without any railway communication, without advantages possessed by other portions of the Province, some 10,000 bushels of the best wheat ever known in Canada was taken out of that valley, and, since the introduction of the new tariff, he knew that a number of people who had lived in the older parishes in the different counties round Quebec were going to settle in that valley.

Some HON. GENTLEMEN: Hear, hear.

MR. CARON said the hon. gentlemen might say "hear, hear;" but he knew some 40 or 50 families who had left their old homes in his county and elsewhere, and gone to the valley of the Lake of St. John. This district was considered of so much importance that some of the wealthier capitalists in the city of Quebec, aided by municipal subsidies, and also by one granted by the Local Government of Quebec, were now trying, and would succeed, to build a railway between that valley and St. John, a distance of 150 miles, which would open up to the Quebec market one of the richest wheat growing districts in the Dominion, and give Quebec a valuable back country. That was an advantage which hon. gentlemen from the Province of Quebec could not overlook, and which, certainly, must be taken into consideration. In favouring a policy like the present one, it was necessary to take the future into consideration, and construct a tariff which would foster every branch of industry, as far as was practicable, and give that Protection to commercial interests which would render this country hereafter rich and prosperous. The valley of the Lake of St. John, as was well known, was not only considered to be one of the richest agricultural districts in the Province, but it was destined to become the home of the half million of people who, for several years past, had been leaving the country and going to the United States. If this railway could be built, as he hoped it would, and he hoped the Government of the day would see their way clear to help the road, the district referred to would contribute its full share to the wealth and prosperity of the country. Besides this Protection, which he considered the policy of the hon. the Finance Minister would give to agriculturists, he was of opinion that Protection had also been extended to the different interests which they must take into consideration, and which certainly contributed so largely to the welfare of a people. If this tariff was destined, as he believed it was, to produce these happy results, was it not a policy which should be acceptable to the whole of the people of Canada? In Quebec they had a ship-building industry, and they had large and important factories: such as cabinet factories, carriage factories, rope-walks, which required to be fostered, which they certainly were not under the system which prevailed when the late Government were in power. Last year alone, they imported $399,794 worth of furniture; also, $85,634 worth of carriages. Whilst at the time they had in Quebec alone—of course, he spoke of the locality which he was most acquainted with—they had a large cabinet manufactory, in which had been invested a very large amount of Canadian capital, and which had been practically closed under the late fiscal policy. Some eight or ten years ago this factory gave employment to some two or three hundred people; but immediately after the late tariff was brought into operation, they had, in the newspapers of the day, published in Quebec, notices of auction sales of manufactured goods from the United States, actually underselling furniture that could be manufactured in Quebec by Canadian hands and with Canadian capital. He could very readily understand how it was possible for American goods to come into Canada, and undersell Canadian home-manufactured goods. It was easy to understand that the Americans, with a population of 40,000,000, producing more than sufficient for themselves, were able to send their surplus stocks into Canada, and undersell Canadians, thus keeping their factories going without reducing their working staff, and, in that way, controlling our markets as well as their own. The result would have been, if this system had continued, the closing of our factories; and, when once this had been achieved, then the Americans would sell Canada their goods at their own prices, and destroy for ever our industries. Considering this branch of industry alone, he believed this tariff would have a very good effect as far as the Province of Quebec was concerned. Under this tariff, he was confident they would prevent Americans from coming into this country, underselling our own manufactured goods, and closing our factories, and that it would result in keeping in the cities of this Dominion our labourers, mechanics, artisans, who, wherever they went, had always been considered the best workmen that could be found in any country. Would it be possible, if it were not for the fault of the fiscal system of the country, that these hardy sons of Canada would go out of Canada merely for the love of living under a different flag? No; the reason the sons of Canada left their native country and their homes was because it was impossible to obtain the labour necessary to enable them to bring up their families respectably. And, in this connection, it was an interesting fact to note that these emigrants immediately sought a country where a strong Protective tariff existed. There was another branch of industry upon which the new tariff would have a beneficial effect. He referred to the imposition of 20 per cent. on Roman cement. They had in Quebec a cement factory which for years had been struggling against very great difficulties for existence, but it had succeeded in holding its own, and had taken a first prize at the Philadelphia Exhibition. The duty imposed on this cement would enable this factory, within a reasonable time, to become prosperous, and he hoped the Government would show their Protective views in preventing imported cement from being used on their public works. It was all very well for hon. gentlemen opposite and the Liberal Press of the country to raise the cry that this tariff would increase taxation; but for years they had been rolling up deficit after deficit, and how would it be possible to make up for these deficits and prevent a recurrence in future, excepting by changing the fiscal policy under which these enormous deficits had accumulated, and adopting such a one as that now before them, which he had no doubt would give that stimulus to our industries, and would give us that prosperity which the country so much needed? Had the hon. gentlemen remained in power, they would have gone on for years imposing duties, without any predetermined system, to make up these deficits. They would no doubt have increased the duties on two or three articles, but they would not have established a complete system that the country could understand. The people of Canada now, at least, could under the system submitted by the present Government. The Liberal Press got up a cry about our people paying more than they did before for certain articles. Upon that point he would quote the utterance of an hon. gentleman who belonged to the opposite side in politics. He would quote an extract from the letter of Mr. Joly in reply to some questions which had been submitted to him by a Committee of this House upon this most important question. This extract read as follows:—

MR. CARON.

“ Q.—Is it in the interest of the Dominion that we should continue to admit American produce free, while Canadian produce exported over the border has so heavy a tax levied on it?

"A.—No; it is against the interest of Canada! I humbly think we should not admit anything free of duty, except the raw material required for our manufactures.

"Q.—What effect has free admission of Indian corn on price of coarse grains, in your section of the country?

"A.—We are not much affected in our part of the country, because, unfortunately, we do not produce much more than what is required to supply our own wants; but it appears to me that wherever the farmer produces more than he requires for his own use, and has a surplus for sale, he must suffer by the competition. It is true the purchasers, among whom the manufacturers and the workmen ought to count, for a very large proportion may buy a little cheaper than the farmer, but, as a natural consequence, they will have to sell their goods cheaper to the farmer, whose purchasing powers are diminished. It is not by cheapening everything we can hope to attain national wealth. The dearer we pay the better for us, provided our paying power keeps pace with the increase of price. Ask a workman which of the two he prefers, flour at $4.50 a barrel and no work, or flour at $6 and plenty of work. Farming and industry are a strong team when they are driven together. Divide them and you have a one-horse concern, or rather two that will not do anything like the work of a good strong double team.

"Q.—Does the free importation of American flour, without reciprocity, put you at a disadvantage, as compared with American competitors; and if so, state reasons?

"A.—I think those who have grain for sale must feel it seriously."

This indicated perfectly what the hon. gentlemen and their friends considered the true policy, which ought to be introduced, and which was similar to the one proposed by this Government. He must also refer to another important subject, the iron interest, which would be fostered under this tariff. It was impossible to deny that this country possessed mines of great wealth. We had, for instance, not far from Quebec, on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, the great iron mine of St. Aubain. Upon that mine an English company had expended one million of dollars already. The money for the time being was a complete loss, as it was impossible to compete against the imported iron from the States, and the mine was therefore closed. The iron obtained from it was admitted to be fully equal to the best Swedish iron. Under this tariff, this important industry would be developed, and with that development there was nothing to prevent us hereafter from building our own iron ships, making our rails, bridges, and every article of iron which was now imported. It was difficult to understand how this industry had been so long neglected, especially when it was seen that under the Protective tariff of the United States the Americans had been able to produce iron, not only to supply their own market, but to compete against English iron in the English market. There could be no doubt whatever that the same result would be obtained here under this policy. In 1873, the United States imported from England £4,897,208 sterling of iron, while, in 1878, they reduced their importations to £434,929, making a diminution of £4,000,000 in the period between 1873 and 1878, and, if hon. members referred to the Iron-monger, they would see that that well-informed paper state that, so far as could be judged from existing conditions, the loss to England on the American market for iron and steel seemed to be permanent. It appeared to him that a tariff which could foster that great industry in Canada, which could lead to establishing in our midst hereafter the building of our iron ships, the making of railway-rails, could not fail to be acceptable to the people, and to advance their interest. When they looked into this tariff more closely, as a question outside of any party struggle, or political feeling, but as a question affecting the dearest interests of the country, they must all arrive at the conclusion that it was a tariff which would do more benefit to Canada than any that had been introduced. He, for one, was not only ready to give it his entire approbation, but he believed in his section of the country the people would find it was one which did not sacrifice their interests, but which would, on the contrary, be of great advantage to them. He was quite ready to take the responsibility of that measure before the people who had elected him for the purpose of supplying a Protective tariff—this was the issue before the country at the last election—and to represent their interests in Parliament. He arrived at this conclusion, not so much through his own researches as by the researches of men whose experience and knowledge of the business, commerce and trade of the country gave weight to their opinion, and who were satisfied that the tariff was one which would work to the good of our country.

MR. KILVERT said it was not his intention to discuss general principles, because, at this stage of the debate, they had been fully discussed. He would be excused if he referred very briefly to the position which the constituency he had the honour to represent occupied in reference to this important question. They all knew that the city of Hamilton was a very important manufacturing centre, that the majority of its people belonged to the industrial class, and that for several years this question had been widely discussed in that locality. The gentlemen who represented this constituency in the last Parliament were advocates of the policy similar to the one now under consideration. They made speeches in this House, and elsewhere, advocating their principles; there were other gentlemen, also, belonging to the Reform party, who made speeches affirming the principles of Protection to our native industries. These gentlemen were skirmishers who sallied forth in advance of the great Reform party, and were instrumental in the way of moulding public opinion in regard to this question; but, when the stern interest of the party required that they should abandon those principles, they, at the very first sound of the bugle, were obliged to retire from these principles, and return to the ranks of the party to fight the battle of Free-trade. He supposed there were no people more astonished than the gentlemen on the Opposition benches, when they heard the disclosure made by the Finance Minister in his Budget speech. He could not help noticing the dismay which it caused in the ranks of that party. They came here prepared to condemn the Government for not carrying out their pledges, but now that they had to abandon that line of argument they made other objections, to some of which he intended to refer. The first one to which he would call the attention of the House, was the loyalty cry. They heard from gentlemen on the Opposition benches that this policy was disloyal to the interests of Great Britain. This must be a new discovery on their part, because they knew from the leaders of that party and their leading organs throughout the country, that they were clamouring for the introduction of that policy ever since the elections, and, if they now discovered it was disloyal, they did not so designate it before the Budget was brought down. He would refer to a few articles which would indicate the trade between Great Britain and Canada as compared with the trade between Canada and the United States, which would show the tendency of the policy of the late Government in favour of the United States:—

Furniture—In 1827-73, we imported from Great Britain to the value of $37,378; from the United States $104,221. In 1874-75, from Great Britain, $20,732; from the United States, $204,757. In 1878, from Great Britain, $12,201; from the United States, $387,270.

Coach and Harness Furniture—In 1872-73 we imported from Great Britain, $50,941 worth; from the United States, $89,365. In 1874-75, from Great Britain, $45,425; from the United States, $96,834. In 1878, from Great Britain, $20,532; from the United States, $96,029.

Stoves and Iron Castings—In 1874, we imported from Great Britain $376,926 worth; from the United States $360,717. In 1875, from Great Britain, $344,032; from the United States, $356,768. In 1876, from Great Britain, $71,173; from the United States, $318,560. In 1878, from Great Britain, $34,058; from the United States, $357,714.

Spikes, Nails and Brads—In 1872-73, we imported from Great Britain, $94,015 worth; from the United States, $55,693. In 1874-75, from Great Britain, $66,036; from the United States, $232,590. In 1878, from Great Britain, $24,562; from the United States, $154,679.

It indicated that, if this mode of business was to be carried on in the same ratio, the United States would have all the profit in connection with it. In reference to the loyalty of the people, he would not venture to say that gentlemen on either side were disloyal. They had several instances of the people showing their devotion to the Mother Country by coming forward in times of danger, and offering their assistance to the Empire. Therefore, it was unnecessary to go further into that question. Another objection to the tariff was the burden of taxation it would impose on the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, had ignored altogether the object and intention of the tariff. They assumed that all the goods on which the higher duties were placed would continue to be imported, and that, therefore, the people would be obliged to pay them. But the object of the tariff, if he understood it, was that a great portion of the goods on which the high duties were to be placed should be manufactured here, and their price kept in the country. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said, in reference to the stove business, that there was a combination to raise prices since the tariff came into force. He (Mr. Kilvert) had the best authority for denying that statement, and for asserting that stoves were cheaper to-day than five years ago, there being, in addition, 50 per cent. more work on them. In reference to the other item, carriages, referred to by that hon. gentleman, he said that there would not be any additional market for them in consequence of the high duty. The imports for 1878 showed that from the United States they brought in carriages to the value of $85,304, and from England $2,130. Now, if either of the amounts thus represented were made in this country, it would give much more employment to the people in this trade. It was not necessary for him to discuss the question of the increase of price to the consumer. They all knew—and he thought it had been established by the hon. member for Centre Huron (Mr. Cartwright) in his speech in reply to the Finance Minister—that one effect of the tariff would be to encourage many manufacturers to go into business, when prices would become so low that many would be ruined. That, he (Mr. Kilvert) thought, was a conclusive answer to the hon. member for South Wellington. Another objection made to this tariff was its immorality—that it was obtained through the bribery of individuals, classes, sections, and Provinces, into accepting that policy. He denied that statement. True, appeals were made to all classes of the community from the national standpoint, and the response was patriotic and general. He thought that it was the gentlemen on the Opposition benches who were guilty of endeavouring to array class against class in reference to this question. They had particularly relied upon and appealed to one class, the farmers, for their support; they pleaded that they were Free-traders, and that, from the position they held, they could be useful to the farmers. The late Government, believing that, as there was a majority of agricultural constituencies the majority would go in favour of Free-trade, adopted that course, relying upon that interest for support. With regard to another objection to the tariff, the people of this country were said to be ignorant in adopting it. He did not think that any greater insult could have been offered to the people than that found in the remarks of the member for Centre Huron, considering the general diffusion of education. He (Mr. Kilvert) ventured to say that, in future, if the same means were followed by hon. gentlemen opposite as in the past, it would be a long time before the Reform party would occupy the Treasury benches. He desired now to state briefly a few of his reasons for approving of the National Policy. They all knew that, for several years, this country had suffered very seriously from the slaughtering of goods in various industries in vogue. He would refer to an extract from a report of a Select Committee of the House in 1874, in order to show that such slaughtering practice did exist in this country:—

“1st. It appears that the competition with the United States, in those classes of manufacture which come under the influence of such competition, is seriously complained of, on the ground that it is an unequal competition fostered by the different fiscal systems of the two countries.

“The American manufacturers, having the exclusive control of their own market, find it convenient to relieve themselves of their surplus products in Canada, in many instances at prices less than the cost of production, thus making of Canada a slaughter market.

“It has been established before your Committee that Canadian manufacturers have seriously suffered from this cause, and that the effect of it must be, in some cases at least, to so hamper the Canadian industry as to seriously embarrass it, while the country itself would be injured by the withdrawal from it of large numbers of operatives who would be compelled to seek work in the United States.

“This disturbing element in the manufacturing industry of the Dominion arising out of our geographical position, and out of the trade policy of our neighbours, should induce even those who may regard Free-trade as a correct principle, in the abstract, to recognise the necessity for a modification of that principle as a measure of self-protection, and your Committee respectfully recommend the enactment of such laws as will regulate, if it cannot altogether prevent, the evil complained of.

"2nd. The almost uniform testimony before your Committee was to the effect that an increased Protection to manufactures will not necessarily increase the cost of the manufactured article to the consumer; and, in the opinion of your Committee, the witnesses have made out a very strong case in support of this view.

"It appears to be well established that the cost of manufacturing decreases as the quantity of goods manufactured increases. Thus a large manufacturing establishment can afford to sell its products at a lower rate than a smaller one. If, therefore, Canadian industry is relieved from the pressure of such undue competition as that referred to in the first paragraph of this report, the effect will be that the manufacturing establishments will be worked to their full capacity, and the cost of production, and the consequent cost to the consumer, will be proportionately reduced.

"Some instances in proof of the correctness of this principle are given by witnesses whose testimony accompanies this report."

He would also refer to a short extract from the London Fortnightly Review, bearing upon the same subject :

"It is difficult enough at any time to establish manufactures in a new country, but altogether impossible if the local manufacturers are unfairly handicapped. The foreign manufacturer has possession of the market, to begin with. Next, he is usually a man of large capital, while the local manufacturers, as a rule, are men of small means. Once in possession of the market, with unlimited command of capital, it is a very easy matter to maintain it. No sooner is he informed, through his agents, that a certain commodity which he has been supplying is being superseded by a local production, than the foreign manufacturer immediately forwards to that market an extra supply of the commodity in question. The market being thus supplied with more than is required, prices recede, and the local manufacturers, not having capital enough to enable them to hold out for a remunerative price, succumb to the pressure. The latter out of the way, the foreign manufacturer has the field all to himself again, and, from the high prices he can now obtain for his goods, he may easily recoup himself for his previous losses. This is a plain statement of what occurs every day in the colonies when any attempt is made to compete with old established industries."

That was a plain statement of what occurred every day. Now he believed that this tariff would materially help to do away with this slaughtering system. He believed also that a number of new industries would be started, and that the people would be more largely employed in industrial pursuits. The woollen trade would be stimulated, and the iron trade would receive a new impetus. He was informed that the hon. member for Lambton had made some startling remarks with regard to the clock factory in Hamilton. A gentleman interested in that industry, having read the report of those remarks in the Globe of that morning, had sent him the following telegram :

"F. E. KILVERT, M.P.—Mr. Mackenzie's statement is absolutely false; it is calculated to inflict the most serious injury upon our business, and ought to be contradicted. Ours was the usual experience of pioneers, and the first small batch of clocks made by us, three years ago, were spoiled by an incompetent foreman. The moment the mistake was discovered they were recalled. We have since sent out forty thousand clocks, which have given entire satisfaction, and are equal to any made anywhere.—Hamilton Clock Co., Geo. Lee, manager."

He (Mr. Kilvert) thought it was very uncalled for, in an hon. gentleman occupying the position of the hon. member for Lambton, to step out of his way to discredit a young industry like that. In addition to the new factories that would be started, many of which were now under way, many old ones, hitherto on short time, would resume full time, and have to increase their production. Those of J. M. Williams & Co., Meakins & Sons, the Forging Works, and others, in Hamilton, were now working overtime. He found, therefore, that all classes would be benefitted by this new policy of Protection. On referring to the census of 1871, he found that the agriculturists in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, numbered 479,512; the commercial class, 75,201; domestics, 60,104; industrial, 212,748; professional, 39,224; and not classified, 143,079; and for every 1,000 agriculturists there were 443 industrial. Those figures showed that there were other classes to be served as well as the agricultural, and that employment should be found for the large industrial classes. He understood the hon. member for Lambton to say that the only producers of wealth in the country were those who tilled the ground.

MR. MACKENZIE: I never said that; but that the men who performed actual labour, either in tilling the soil, producing lumber, or otherwise, were the real producers of wealth,—not the parties who were brokers between the producers and consumers.

MR. KILVERT said he accepted the explanation, and would read an extract from a high authority on those subjects, to show that industrial classes produced wealth more rapidly than the agricultural class. Walker, on the Science of Wealth, said :

“It is, without question, true, that in an equal manufacturing population will be found a greater accumulation of wealth. One important reason of this is, that a larger share of the population are engaged in production, and a larger amount of capital is required. Women and children, who could earn but little in agricultural labours, can earn much in manufacturing. This is one of the most striking results of a division of labour, as we have already shown. As we carry on agriculture, women and children do little, though in continental Europe they do much. Agriculture, too, can be performed only in certain portions of the year. Manufacturing need never stop, summer or winter, cold or hot, fair or foul. This makes a wonderful difference.”

Now, he maintained that the Government should favour the policy that would give employment to the industrial classes, and thought that this tariff would have that effect. Besides, this tariff was a most perfect vindication and fulfilment of the pledges made by the leader and members of the Conservative party, to the country, at the last elections. He held in his hand a letter from a gentleman largely engaged in manufacturing, and who was a constituent and supporter of the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain), in which he said :

“I may add that in the matter of the tariff or National Policy, or whatever name it goes by, the Government has relieved itself from the odium of obtaining power under false pretences, and I think that every leal-hearted Canadian should assist the Government as much as possible in carrying out fairly and squarely these great fiscal changes. I deprecate the abominable tactics of setting farmer against manufacturer, and Province against Province, it is a revival in another form of the sectarian feuds that kept Upper and Lower Canada in a fever for many years. As far as I am concerned, therefore, though opposing you at the last election, I now give you and your friends credit of good faith, and I will assist in every way I can to give the National Policy a fair trial.”

There were some features to which he would like to refer in reference to this tariff, and one was the drawback system.

MR. MACKENZIE.

They had, in Hamilton factories, been manufacturing goods for nearly every market in the world. Some of their sewing machine factories sent goods to Japan, Turkey, South America, and to different places in Europe. This tariff would enable them to compete with our neighbours on the other side of the line, in foreign markets still more successfully than at present. Another feature which should commend itself to this House was the new regulation to secure correct valuations. He thought this should have been adopted long ago. If it had been rigidly enforced, this system of slaughtering would have been materially lessened. If it had been enforced during the last year, he believed the Customs Department would have been in receipt of $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 more than they had received. He thought that, on the whole, the country was well satisfied with this policy. He believed that Canada, under this new order of things, would rise in the near future to a state of prosperity unprecedented in her history, and, instead of disunion resulting from this policy, as predicted by the Opposition, he believed it would strengthen the ties binding Canada to the Mother Country, and that Canada would continue to be, as she was to-day, the foremost colony of the Empire.

MR. BÉCHARD said that, when the hon. the Finance Minister laid his tariff resolutions before the House, he concluded his speech by appealing to the House to say whether or not he and his colleagues on the Treasury benches had redeemed their pledges to the country. He (Mr. Béchard) thought this might fairly be granted, so far, at least, as they had promised the people that, if returned to power, they would gratify the country with a Protective tariff. It seemed to him that the question they had now to consider was whether this tariff would operate as an efficient remedy to remove depression, and restore prosperity to all classes of our people. Let him say, at once, that he had no faith in the action of tariffs as distributing agents of wealth, and he considered any legislation attempting to regulate the conditions under which wealth should be acquired as an undue interference with the operation of the laws of nature, as well as with the legitimate results of work, and of the exertions of intelligence. In his humble judgment, such a policy could be of no avail to remove depression, and restore prosperity to a nation. Depression would come and go, at certain periods, in spite of any legislation, whatever it might be. What did they see to-day? Depression in Canada with a revenue tariff; depression in the United States with a Protective tariff; depression in England with a Free-trade tariff; depression the world over, despite all tariffs, either Free-trade, revenue or Protection. There was no doubt that, at some future day, though it might be far distant yet, depression would disappear, and we would see a return of prosperity. It would come, not as a necessary result of this tariff, but as a logical consequence, as the irresistible result of the natural course of things, notwithstanding any impediment or obstacle thrown in its way. This prosperity, which they all hoped for and expected, would not be confined to Canada because we should be enjoying a Protective tariff; it would shine as well upon other countries, and wherever the commercial crisis had been felt. It would be restored to Free-trade countries as well as to Protectionist countries,—to England as well as to the United States; but in England the restoration of prosperity would be accomplished without the interference of a Protective tariff, whilst in the United States it would be done, he ventured to say, in spite of Protection. So it would be in regard to Canada, where a return of prosperity would take place independently of this or any other tariff that might be imposed upon the country. Some of his hon. friends from the Province of Quebec had expressed great confidence in Protection, and no doubt they hoped sincerely that the application of this system would promote the interests of our country. He regretted sincerely to be compelled by his convictions to dissent from those hon. gentlemen. He had no faith in Protection, and the more he had considered this system, the more odious it had appeared to him. He looked upon it as unjustly increasing the burden of taxation upon the great mass of consumers for the benefit of a few manufacturers; and, in dealing with this question, he held that the interest of the consumer must be constantly kept in view, because that interest coincided and was in perfect harmony with the social or general interest. A Protective duty was a tax imposed upon the foreign produce imported into this country; but that tax, it should never be forgotten, unavoidably fell upon the national consumer, who was no one else than the taxpayer who contributed to the public revenue. To impose Protective duties was, in his humble opinion, the same as telling that taxpayer: It is true that you find the burden of taxation heavy, yet we will still increase the price of nearly everything you consume; it is true that the Government takes a portion of your revenue, yet we will still so readjust the tariff as to give another portion to monopolists. Anyone who had given serious attention to this matter understood very well that, whilst a Protective tariff threw some money into the Public Treasury, it had also the effect of taking larger sums from the pockets of the consumers, and of throwing them into those of the manufacturers. But he must not forget, here, that some hon. gentlemen opposite had expressed the opinion that the consumer did not pay the duty, but that, on the contrary, it was paid by the producer, and that the Finance Minister, by means of this tariff, would realise large sums of money from the Americans. His hon. friend from Quebec county (Mr Caron) had also given utterance to the same opinion, when he said that we paid 15c. duty to the Americans for every bushel of barley we sold them. He must confess this was a most admirable doctrine; but it was as unsound and absurd as it appeared admirable. If this doctrine was true, this tariff was insufficient, and we should have an average one of at least 50 or 60 per cent., so as to enable the Government to realise from foreign countries all the money they wanted to meet our public expenditure, and relieve entirely our people from any taxation; it would enable the Government to collect from foreign people all the money they wanted for the construction of the Pacific Railway, and of our other great public works, without their being obliged to borrow a single dollar; a stringent application of it would enable the Government to realise from foreign nations, within a few years, all the money necessary to pay our national debt; it was not desirable, as held by Protectionists, that the amount of our importations should be reduced; on the contrary, importations ought to be encouraged; in a word, if this doctrine was true, there could be no such thing as Protection, because Protective duties, in that case, would fail to effect the purposes for which they were established. Anyone who would take the trouble of considering the logical consequences of that doctrine, would see at once its unsoundness, because to show the absurd consequences of a principle was to demonstrate the fallacy of the principle itself. It had been said, in the course of this debate, that Protection did not increase the price of commodities. If such was the case, he could not see the utility of Protection. Manufacturers asked for Protection, in order to increase and keep up the price of foreign produce, and to be thereby enabled to sell theirs at advanced prices; but, if Protection did not increase prices, he failed to see the reason why there should be a single Protectionist in the country. The whole argument could be summed up in the following manner:—If they admitted that Protection increased the price of commodities, they must also admit that it was detrimental to the interests of the consumer. If, on the contrary, they denied that fact, then they must confess that Protection was useless; therefore, Protection was either injurious or useless, and could not be beneficial.

After Recess.

MR. BÉCHARD said that, when the the House rose, he had just concluded that part of his remarks wherein he was endeavouring to show that Protection could not be beneficial. He should now proceed to review another branch of this question. Hon. members in Opposition, particularly those from the Province of Quebec, had been taunted by hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial benches. They had been charged with being guilty of inconsistency with regard to this question, and, to prove that charge true, reference had been made to opinions expressed by some distinguished members of the National party, who, according to report, had pronounced themselves Protectionists in 1872. Particular reference had been made to his hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) who was quite able to defend himself, and also to Mr. Joly, Mr. David and others. Admitting, for the sake of argument, this to be true with regard to some of those gentlemen, did it follow that their opinions should bind every man in the ranks of the Liberal party? Had those declarations ever bound the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) for instance, who, for more than twenty years, had been acknowledged as one of the leaders of the party? Let him tell hon. gentlemen opposite that the opinion of no mortal man, however distinguished he might be in the ranks of the Liberal party, could ever bind him to any particular course, with regard to any new question of public policy. But, if he wanted to retort the charge, he would have only to turn his eyes to the opposite side of the House, where he could see many hon. gentlemen, who, during their whole lifetime, had advocated the principles of a revenue tariff, and who had thought fit to change their opinions only two or three years ago. He could refer, in particular, to a very distinguished statesman in the Conservative party, Sir A. T. Galt, who, a few years ago, wrote a letter, which was quoted during the last two Sessions of Parliament by hon. gentlemen on the present Opposition side of the House, as sustaining their position on this question. He could, also, refer to another letter, published a little later, by the same distinguished statesman, and which was, at the same time, quoted by hon. gentlemen on the present Government side of the House, as sustaining their position with regard to the same question; and he should not be surprised if, within two or three years after the results of this tariff had been felt throughout the country, the same distinguished statesman should publish a third letter in order to harmonise the two preceding ones. But why should he not allude, for further demonstration of his proposition, to another distinguished member of the Conservative party now holding a seat in this House ; a gentleman whose great abilities were acknowledged by every one, and whose opinions had generally great weight with his friends. Let him read a few lines from the proceedings of the Dominion Board of Trade at their Session in 1872—precisely the same year in which some gentlemen in the Liberal ranks were said to have advocated Protectionist principles. He read from these proceedings the following resolution, moved by Mr. T. White, of Montreal :

“That without offering any opinion upon some of the details of the present Customs tariff, or upon the anomalies which are inevitable in all tariffs, this Board is of opinion that no change should be made in it, unless the exigencies of the public service demand larger revenues ; and that in such case, any increase to be made should be in accordance with the principle of the present Customs tariff, which, while not interfering with the commerce of the Dominion, affords incidental Protection to its manufactures.

“That this Board is further of opinion, that permanence in the fiscal policy of the country is most important, alike to its commerce and manufactures, and that no changes should be made in the tariff not demanded by the absolute necessities of the revenue.”

This resolution, he thought, showed, conclusively, that the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) in 1872 upheld the principles of a revenue tariff. It was true that the able speech delivered yesterday by the hon. gentleman indicated that his opinions were completely modified, but was he to be blamed for this ? He (Mr. Béchard) thought not ; and this example only showed that even distinguished men would occasionally change their minds like ordinary mortals. But, if this spectacle could be seen on both sides of this House, he thought that hon. gentlemen opposite ought to refrain from throwing stones, seeing that they were living in glass houses. During the course of this debate, their attention had often been called to the United States ; and they had been invited by several hon. members, amongst whom he particularly noticed his hon. friend the member for Ottawa (Mr. Tassé) to behold the great prosperity prevailing in that country under the rule of Protection. His hon. friend was by no means an Annexationist, and, if anyone ever doubted his loyalty, that doubt might have been removed when he delivered his able speech. The hon. member seemed inclined to denounce not only annexation, but even those who, in years gone by, might have entertained annexation proclivities. He devoted a considerable part of his speech to the late L. A. Papineau, particularly deprecating the admiration of that celebrated tribune of the people for American institutions. However, as the delivery of the speech proceeded, he (Mr. Béchard) could soon infer that, after all, his hon. friend thought there was something pretty good in the United States. He spoke in glowing terms of the wonderful prosperity of that country, and, doubtless following the example of his hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Gigault), he was pleased to quote largely from Henry Clay, one of the United States' most gifted sons. It seemed, indeed, as if his hon. friend thought Henry Clay the only authority worth being quoted, and, as if he had entirely forgotten great British authorities, such as Sir Robert Peel, Richard Cobden, John Bright and other distinguished British statesmen, whose opinions, on economic matters, had, of late, thrown so much light upon the commercial world. But that pretended prosperity of the United States had not been demonstrated by hon. gentlemen opposite to be a reality, whilst his hon. friends from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) and from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had clearly shown, by referring to incontrovertible facts, that that prosperity, so much boasted of, was nothing but a sham, as compared with the prosperity of that country in former years. Who did not remember that, for years, four millions of individuals called tramps totally ceased to be producers, whilst remaining consumers, under the so-called benevolent rule of Protection ? Such a state of things was unknown to the United States before. Who did not remember that, during the summer of 1877, an immense row, extending from East to West, and provoked by a reduction of wages, took place in that country, and that, after having almost assumed the proportions of a rebellion, it could only be put down by the concentration of troops, after the destruction of eight or ten million dollars' worth of property ? Surely such facts as those were not indications of a very high state of prosperity.

However, if there was on this vast globe a country where Protection could show its beneficial results, that country was the United States, with a territory including all kinds of soil, from which could be raised nearly all kinds of produce, favoured by all varieties of climate, and enjoying an inter-State trade more than ten times greater than her foreign commerce. Notwithstanding all those natural advantages, Protection had failed to secure permanent prosperity to the United States, or to shield that country against the strokes of a commercial crisis, the most severe, perhaps, that it had ever felt. Some hon. members had stated that the Americans, under a Protective policy, had considerably reduced their national debt. He had always thought this had been accomplished by taxation, but he was quite willing to admit that Protection and taxation were synonymous terms, and, consequently, meant the same thing. Their attention had also been invited to Old France, as being a prosperous nation under Protection. It was true that France had on the whole been Protectionist, but her prosperity was due to the activity, the working energies, and particularly the saving habits of her people, rather than to Protection. If she had adopted, forty years ago, the more enlightened principles in commercial matters of her great neighbour, England, she would be to-day a still richer nation. Her marine would be the double or the treble of what it was to-day; her manufactures would have been still more perfected by foreign competition; the cost of living would have been cheapened, and her numerous working classes would have lived more satisfied, contented and happy; and, above all, she might have been saved from some of those political revolutions which seemed to have become as periodical in that country as commercial crises elsewhere. His hon. friend from Maskinongé (Mr. Houde) quoted Colbert as a Protectionist. It was very well to quote great men when they wanted to point out the good they might have accomplished; but, surely, their errors ought not to be transformed into models to be followed. The initiative taken by Colbert did not altogether turn to the advantage of France; it was followed, a little later, by a series of retaliatory measures between France and Holland, which were considered as one of the principal causes of the war of 1672, which terminated in 1678, by the peace of Nimègues. He might add that, when Colbert lived, the principles of political economy were not so well understood as to-day; at all events, they were not studied as a science. But no one could deny the considerable progress of Free-trade principles in France within a certain number of years, and he remembered having read somewhere the report of a fact which was illustrative of that progress. In 1842, the cloth manufacturers of Elbœuf petitioned the French Government against an introduction into France of Belgian cloths, whilst, at the same time, the cloth manufacturers of Verviers were petitioning their Government against an invasion in Belgium of French cloths. But a few years afterwards, in 1866, the Board of Trade of Verviers solemnly placed the bust of Cobden, that apostle of Free-trade, in the chamber of their deliberations, and, in the year following, during the Universal Exhibition held in Paris, in 1867, the bust of the same great man was seen, crowning a pyramid of the products of that great city's manufactures. They all remembered the violent recriminations which were raised against the treaty negotiated by Cobden with Napoleon III. According to those clamours, the English manufacturers would crush the French, yet nothing of the kind took place, and the treaty had proved to be equally advantageous to both parties. But, if they noticed to-day a certain current of opinion in France inclining towards Protection principles, they saw, on the other hand, that there were groups of educated and distinguished men, and even of manufacturers, who were strongly advocating the principles of Free-trade, and he had no doubt that, before long, France would join hands with England, and become her commercial as well as her political ally. They had also been referred to Germany and invited to contemplate Bismarck, as being in favour of Protection. It was a wonder to no one that, in a country where military despotism was the governing rule, where political liberty was crushed under the iron heel of a despot, commercial liberty should also be proscribed; the very name of liberty, under whatever form it might appear, was a permanent threat for the rulers of that country. His hon. friend from Maskinongé (Mr. Houde) attempted the other day to throw ridicule upon the assertion of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) who had said that Protection had a tendency to develop socialistic ideas. He (Mr. Béchard) thought the hon. member for Lambton was not wrong, for Protection was the first step towards acknowledging the doctrine of the right of work—a fundamental principle of socialism. One of the main reasons advanced in favour of Protection was that this system gave work to a certain number of people; consequently, that everyone in the community must be taxed, and, therefore, bound to sacrifice an indefinite portion of his labour, his income, his property, under whatever form it might be, for the benefit of others. He (Mr. Béchard) held that this was preaching, although unintentionally, the doctrine of the right to work, which was in direct antagonism with the right to property. Hon. members would remember that celebrated answer of M. Proudhon, an apostle of socialism, to M. Thiers: "Grant me the right to work," said he, "and I'll grant you the right to property." M. Proudhon understood very well that these two rights were incompatible. But he (Mr. Béchard) hastened to add that he had no fear of socialism being developed in this country, at least for a number of years, by the introduction of a Protective policy, because this country was abundantly provided with bread, space and liberty, three of the principal elements of satisfaction and happiness in the life of nations. Now, after having dwelt, perhaps at too great a length, on those generalities, he would approach, before concluding his remarks, a more practical branch of the subject. On the 17th of September last, the people of Canada rendered a verdict in favour of Protection, and they had sent to Parliament a large majority of members who were disposed to vote for it. Nothing could prevent, he presumed, the introduction of that system; and, since the people had pronounced for it, he felt pretty much inclined to say: let them have it and bear the consequences. But, since they were bound to have Protection, he wanted it to be just and equitable to all classes, and not favouring one class at the expense of another. He would undertake to say a few words in the interest of one class with which he was more particularly connected, as he had the honor to belong to it: he referred to the farming class of the country. He could easily see that, under this tariff, the farmer would have to pay higher prices for his cotton goods, his woollen goods, his shoes, for his sugar, all his agricultural implements, and many other articles which he was obliged to purchase, but he failed to see how he would receive compensation for the new sacrifices which were imposed upon him. There was no kind of produce from which the farmer would receive any benefit under the tariff by way of an increase of price. The duties levied by this tariff upon wheat and flour were, doubtless, intended to raise the price of that commodity; and, if such an increase would occur, it would be detrimental to the Province of Quebec, where wheat was not grown in sufficient quantity for the consumption of its people. But there was, in the Dominion, taken as a whole, a considerable surplus of wheat, for which we were bound to seek a foreign market, and according to the rule, which was perfectly rational, that whenever a country possessed a surplus of any kind of produce, the price of it at home was fixed by the price it was worth abroad, it followed that the price of wheat and flour could not be increased, at least in Ontario and Quebec, by the importation of any duty.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. BÉCHARD said he heard the cheers of some hon. members from the Province of Quebec, sitting on the Ministerial benches, on hearing his statement that the imposition of duties on imported wheat and flour would not increase the price of that product in their Province. But he supposed those hon. members would continue to cheer him when he told them that the price of wheat and flour being not increased by those duties, it necessarily followed that the wheat producers of Ontario or Quebec, would not be benefitted by them; and that, those duties being of no avail to anyone, they became absolutely useless. The same argument held good with regard to oats, of which we had a large surplus, which we were obliged to send to foreign markets. The same thing must be said of barley and peas, which we largely exported, and which we did not import. The same thing must also be said of horses, horned cattle, sheep, hay, butter, and cheese, which were products we exported, and did not import. But it was not the same thing with regard to corn, which was not grown in this country in sufficient quantity for our consumption; and the price of that produce would be advanced by 7½c. per bushel—the amount of the duty. Now, how many farmers in Canada would receive the benefit of that increase in the price of corn? There was one produce of the farm upon which the imposition of a duty would have been really beneficial to the Canadian farmer—he referred to pork; for, whilst we exported a small quantity of pork, we imported a much larger one for home consumption. It was true that this tariff increased the duty on pork by 15c. per barrel; but this increase was so trifling that the benefit resulting from it to the farmer, could not be appreciable. The hon. the Finance Minister, in his tariff, took good care to protect the woollen goods manufacturer; but he entirely forgot him who provided wool, which would continue to be admitted duty free; he took care to protect the shoe manufacturer, but seemed to forget him who provided hides, which were also admitted free. Now, he (Mr. Bechard) asked what benefit could result to the Canadian farmer from the imposition of duties upon produce which we did not export, or of which we had a large surplus that we were bound to send to foreign markets? He did not hesitate to say that, under this tariff, the Canadian farmer would receive no compensation for the higher prices which he would be obliged to pay in the purchase of a great many articles of which he was a consumer. In concluding his remarks, he called to this fact the special attention of his hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Gigault), who had been pleased to allude to him in his speech. The hon. member represented a constituency which was like his, essentially agricultural; and he had no doubt that, within two or three years, after the results of the tariff had been felt, his constituents would be in a position to tell him that, at least, one of the promises he made them during the electoral campaign, and which his leaders made to the country, had not been fulfilled.

THE CASE OF LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR LETELLIER.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, by the kind consent of the hon. member for Portneuf, who has the floor, I rise to speak for a moment on a matter personal to myself. There is an article on the front page of the Globe to-day, which arrived by wire, in anticipation of the post, and which was communicated to me. I will read the paragraph. It is in the Ottawa correspondence, and is as follows:—

“Further developments affecting the present political crisis are being hourly made. Those which have become public property to-day, in no wise reflect credit on the Premier. Indeed, in so discreditable a light does he appear, that the stigma of cowardice must be in future borne by him as a fitting compliment of a long list of political crime and ingratitude. There can be no doubt that he has sought to betray the confidence of the Governor-General, and make that illustrious personage a sacrifice to appease the wrath of the Government's Quebec followers. He was coward enough in doing this to take advantage of the Governor-General's position, which prevents him from replying to his slanderer. Such was the Premier's action when he informed the House he regretted the Governor-General had declined to follow his advice, and dismiss Mr. Letellier, but had referred the matter to England for consideration. It has been learned from a reliable source that the Governor-General did not personally propose that the matter should be referred to England, but such was done at the personal solicitation of the Premier, who afterwards, in the House of Commons, sought to direct the venom of his angry Quebec supporters towards the Governor-General. The Marquis of Lorne was so shocked on reading the falsehood told by the Premier in the House of Commons on Thursday last, as reported in the newspapers, that he wrote a letter to Sir John, sharply reprimanding him for his cowardly conduct. On Saturday morning the Premier was compelled to have an interview with His Excellency, and as a result of that interview, this afternoon, on the floor of the House of Commons, he contradicted his former statement, and stated that the reference of the matter to England by the Governor-General was not made without the advice of the Government. A more disgraceful procesure than this on the part of a constitutional adviser to a viceroy, or even a sovereign, has scarcely ever been recorded. The Governor-General, having his confidence in the personal integrity of the leader of the Government destroyed, has sent Captain Harvey, his A. D. C., to England as a special messenger, bearing despatches, and to make such other verbal explanations as may be necessary."

This is verbatim et literatim, as sent over the wires by a friend of mine, and communicated to me in advance of the mail. I showed it to His Excellency, and asked his permission to contradict it. I have His Excellency's permission to contradict this statement. When I asked him for this permission, he said: "Certainly, if you think it worth while to contradict such reports. There is no foundation whatever for the statements made."

WAYS AND MEANS.—THE TARIFF.

MR. VALLÉE said that at that advanced hour of the debate it was not his intention to again go into the merits or the details of the important question now submitted to the consideration of the House. However, as the representative of a manufacturing constituency, he thought it his duty to express the satisfaction that he felt at the Protection the Government had granted to the industries that existed in the county of Portneuf. In that county, the discussion upon the National Policy had been conducted as it should be. They had not been afraid to look upon the question as it was in its application and in its consequences. He did not consider the National Policy as merely a Protective policy in the strict sense of that word. He based it upon two principles. The first was that as far as possible everything should be produced in the country; the second, that it was necessary to have as many markets as possible in order to dispose of the products of the country. This reminded him of the interruption of the hon. member for Quebec East, who had observed to the popular member for the county of Quebec that the obtaining of the French markets for Canadian vessels was an act of Free-trade. As far as the construction of ships was concerned, Free-trade was, in this respect, Protection. He would now refer to the practical application of the policy now before the House. There was Protection for the manufacturer, for the workingman, for the farmer. The manufacturer found in the Protective tariff a security for his capital by being protected against foreign competition, such as he had been exposed to. For three or four years, Canadian markets had been flooded with products, particularly furniture, carriages and agricultural implements. Now, it was unquestionable that these industries might be fostered and developed by the home trade of Canada. That was how the manufacturer was protected. As to the workingman, there was no doubt but that Protection would be immediately profitable for him, for it was the opinion of the Liberal party itself, and of its press, that Protection would have for immediate result the creation of a large number of new manufactures. Certainly, if this was so, the workingman would have more work at better prices. As to the farmer, he had at home all that was required for food, clothing and shelter. Protection would teach him to practice more economy, and employ more art in cultivating, and would likewise develop agriculture. In the first place, the farmer could furnish his own food; it was an unquestionable fact that the soil of Canada produced everything that was required for food. He had at home all that was needed for clothing, and in his field, and in his wood, wherewithal to shelter himself. He, therefore, only required the luxuries of life, the delicate products of other climates. If the farmer had at home all that he needed, and if he could dispose of the surplus products of his farm, it would be easy for him to procure the luxuries of life. The manufacturer, being able to maintain his manufactures and open new ones, the workingman having more employment and higher wages, they would naturally require more farm produce, and would have more money to pay for it. Therefore, the farmer would be afforded an effective Protection, for he would have a market where the demand would be greater, where money would be more abundant, and where there would be no competition as at present. Mention had been made of protection given to wool. The hon. member for Iberville had seemed to reproach the Government for not having put a duty on foreign wool. This gentleman was, perhaps, not aware that this imported wool could not be produced in this country. It was a fine, delicate wool that Canadian sheep could not produce. Naturally, Canadian manufacturers who made use of this article required, for the best quality of goods, this foreign wool. By imposing a duty on this import, the Government would have denied the protection required by Canadian manufacturers of woollen goods. The farmer could take his wool to the manufacturer and bring back the cloth he needed for his clothing, and he could, moreover, sell his surplus wool for cash. He thought that as legislators it was their duty to teach the people how to live and clothe themselves at home rather than to flatter popular prejudices. The farmer was happier when he wore clothes made by his wife than he was to-day, wearing, as he did, clothes manufactured in England or the United States. Then he had gold and silver in his strong-box, but, to-day, having contracted the habit of purchasing these products abroad, he had neglected this former national and domestic industry. Did the farmer enjoy the Protection that the new tariff seemed destined to grant him? Were the advantages he obtained greater than the few sacrifices he was obliged to make as a citizen of the State? He thought so. The protection upon oats, rye and barley, would give him profits greater than the few duties he would have to pay on certain articles of luxury. It must be admitted that every one was obliged to contribute towards defraying the expenses of public administration. The Government could not be maintained without revenues; public improvements could not be made without money. The people who asked for these public improvements understood this. With regard to these taxes, it was astonishing to hear the Liberal party blame the Government for the present increase, for this party, whilst they were in power, had considerably increased taxation. If, to-day, the Government was placed in a rather awkward position, which required an increase of revenue, the cause of this might be laid at the door of the late Liberal Administration. But, without wishing to enter into recriminations against the late Administration, he thought that the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition was a proof that this increase was necessary, for in the first part he stated that, in order to maintain public credit, he was ready to admit an increase of taxation; what he condemned was that the present distribution of the duties did bear equally on all classes of society. With respect to this, the leader of the Opposition had, the previous evening, while speaking of Protection, endeavoured to show that it would not have the expected result, and speaking half seriously, he pointed to the case of several American workmen who had come to seek employment on the Welland Canal. This example did not prove that Protection was not advantageous to the United States, but it showed that the late Premier, in giving out contracts, favoured American rather than Canadian contractors. Another example was that at Hamilton a large asylum had been built, the contract had been given to Americans, who, naturally enough, had brought from the States all the material required, as well as the workmen. Well, if the hon. the leader of the Opposition had then been mindful of Canadian workmen, he would have granted them Protection by giving them this work. There was contradiction on the very face of the opposition brought against the new policy by the Liberal party. Some said that it would increase the burden of taxation; others, and these were the principal members of the Opposition, stated that the revenue was going to decrease. That was, evidently, paradoxical; there was a flat contradiction between these two statements, for revenue was taxation. If the revenue decreased, the people would, necessarily, have less taxes to pay. This contradiction showed what a difficulty hon. members who opposed the new tariff, without knowing exactly how to do so, were in. If they were logical, they ought all to maintain that the Protective policy meant an increase of taxation, and that the revenue was going to be considerably increased. But there was nothing surprising in contradiction even, from a party which did not seek for the interests of the country, but rather endeavoured to excite popular prejudices, in order to regain power. Another remark that had been heard, inside and outside of this House, was that Protection had not yet produced any result, that the country was just as poor to-day as on the 17th of September. This impatience seemed rather extraordinary, and those who made a profession of it were evidently not serious. For, after all, the tariff was not yet adopted. It was true that it had been in force for a few days, but it was hardly known all over the country. A year, or a year and a half would be required before the new system would be put to an ordinary trial. This impatience reminded him of the proverb which said that the fruit could not come before the flower. Complaints had been heard with regard to the sacrifices imposed by the new tariff upon the poor man. These complaints might be answered by saying that, if the people were taxed to-day, it was, in the first place, in order to cover up the deficits of the late Liberal Administration, and to continue the public improvements that had been undertaken. It had been said that the Conservative party were afraid to meet the electors since the tariff had been brought down. He was not of that opinion. In his county, the question had been placed squarely before the electors, and every time mention was made of the National Policy, his opponent took good care to draw the attention of the electors to the fact that Protection signified an increase of taxation. A familiar, and rather striking, illustration he made use of was to tell the electors that the hats they wore would be taxed to the extent of 15 or 18 sous, and that it would be the same with regard to all articles of general consumption. Then, the news that the people would have more taxes to pay than before would not surprise them. Moreover, he had answered this argument, as it should be answered now, by stating that the electors should not buy their hats from foreigners, but that they should buy them at home, and that it was better to pay a little dearer for them and keep the money in the country. He had to thank the hon. the Minister of Finance for having kindly paid attention to the remarks that he had made to him, with regard to protection of paper manufacturers. He had been pleased to grant his request in the name of the industries of the county that he (Mr. Vallée) represented. He trusted that the protection granted to the paper industries would infuse new life into the four large paper mills now at work in his county, and that others would be opened. There was also in his county a furniture manufacture that would be greatly helped by the new tariff. Mention had been made of deputations that had come to interview the hon. the Finance Minister since he had brought down his tariff. He had been present at some of these interviews, and he had heard the delegates approve of the tariff as a whole. It was true that some wanted a little more Protection, and that others, strangely enough, wanted less. He had thought that these few persons were actuated rather by selfish motives than by a desire to forward the general interests of the country. Some had gone so far as to say that the new tariff would create too much competition in the country; that a great number of capitalists would come and establish the same kind of manufactures as those they possessed. Naturally, public sentiment, the general interest, ought to predominate over private interests. It might be said in a general way that the new tariff would develop industry, favour agriculture, and cause the country to enter upon a new era that would lead to prosperity. The policy of the Government on this question ought to be approved of as a whole. He trusted that before long the country would feel the beneficial results that were hoped for, and the dark days and the hard times that the country had just gone through would give place to prosperity. He would conclude by applying to the arguments of the Liberal party an incident, of which he had been an eye-witness. Once an unfortunate man was blown up while blasting. He fell to the ground, bruised, his skin torn and his flesh mangled. A skilful doctor was called in. This had taken place in a small village, and all the gossips of the place gathered round to view the sad sight. When they saw the doctor cutting away a part of the skin and flesh, he heard them utter some very severe remarks against the man of science. They thought it hard to make the poor man suffer by cutting away his flesh and pieces of his skin. But, after a fortnight, the unfortunate man was restored to health, strong, happy and robust. Then the gossips admitted that the doctor knew better what he was doing than they did, and that by hurting the wounded man a little he had saved his life and restored him to health. That was what the Liberals would say before long, for the sick man was Canada and the doctor was the hon. the Finance Minister.

MR. ROCHESTER said he would not have troubled the House but for some assertions that had been made by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House; he alluded more particularly to those who had stated that the lumber trade would be greatly injured by the present tariff. Though he had heard a number of gentlemen say the lumber trade was going to be injured, he never heard one say in what way it was going to be injured. He had asked the hon. gentleman from South Wellington, the other day, if he could explain how the lumber interest was going to be injured by the present Government. He failed to see, if the present tariff was carried out, that it would add to the expense of the lumber trade. It had been stated that it would add 60c. on the cost of each thousand feet of manufactured lumber. He was sure it was not the extra duty on pork that would have that result. Then, what was it? Here, he would say, that he thought the Finance Minister should have put on a sufficient duty on pork to make it an inducement to the farmers of this country to raise pork, instead of depending, as they did, to a very large extent, on the United States. Looking at the woollen goods used in the lumber trade, he could not see that that was the cause of the alleged increase in the expense of the manufacture of lumber. He knew, from his own experience, that Canadian blankets and cloth had been used for years; but he regretted that, under the late tariff, a great many Canadian factories had been compelled to shut down, including the Cornwall factory, whose blankets were known to, and used by, nearly every lumbering firm in the country. He was glad, however, to be able to inform the House that this factory was going to resume work again. Under these circumstances, he could not see where the expense was to be increased. Certainly it could not be caused by the additional imposition of 10c. on the 200lb. of pork. Then take the article of saws, one of the principal articles used in the manufacture of lumber. Taking the saws made in the United States and those made in Canada, he would say, distinctly, as a practical man, that the saws made in this country were just as good as those made in the United States. He would not say that they were as inexpensive, for the reason that Canadian factories were not as large as those across the line. He had purchased saws from American factories, and from nearly every factory in Canada, and was practically acquainted with the merits and demerits of each. He had shown that this 60c. increase a thousand on lumber could not come from pork, wool, or saws, and certainly they were not going to get axes from the United States. They had a number of axe factories in Canada, and they knew how to make axes to suit the climate, which they could not do in the United States. They imported very little iron in connection with the lumber trade; steel was the principal material, and that came in free. It was true they used a large number of files. There was now, at least, one factory in the Dominion of Canada, and he was satisfied that, under the present tariff, there would be more in a very short time. The files got in this country were just as good and just as cheap as those purchased in the United States. He had asked some gentlemen, who had talked about the additional tax on lumber, what would cause it, but they could not point out where the extra expense would occur. Of course, if he had his own way, there would be additional expense, as he would put two cents a pound on pork coming from the United States, and thereby protect the farmers of this country. He represented an agricultural constituency and had promised his constituents to give them every protection practicable, and this article of pork was mentioned to him particularly by them. They desired a higher duty, so that they could raise pork advantageously, which they could not now with only a cent a pound duty. He hoped the Finance Minister would see his way clear to change the duty on pork from 1c. to 2c. per pound. What would become of Canada if the United States put a duty on lumber? This was simply absurd. It was true $2 a thousand feet was charged on all lumber entering the United States which was consumed there; but a very large portion of the lumber which went from this country to the United States went through in bond. He had any amount of figures and statistics with regard to this question, but he had been unable to obtain the exact amount of Canadian lumber that was consumed in the United States, from the fact that nearly all the lumber shipped from Canada to the United States went there in bond; the shippers in bond in the cities of New York, Boston and Portland had their bonded yards, into which all lumber went, and part of it was re-sold there, and part shipped to South America and the West Indies. On that account, he had not been able to get the amount of Canadian lumber actually consumed in the United States. He regretted that very much, as he would like to have had the figures as they stood, the statements in the Blue-books showing an immense amount of lumber shipped to the United States, but not the quantity consumed in the States out of that amount, and the quantity shipped to the West Indies and elsewhere. Why did this lumber go to the States? Simply because, a few years ago, we had sugar refineries in Canada, as the late Finance Minister expressed it, the privilege of washing our own sugar, while, under their policy, they had to shut down. Instead of lumber being shipped, as formerly, from Montreal, Quebec and the Lower Provinces, it was, to-day, and had been for the last five years, shipped from Portland, Boston and New York. All the sugar shooks that were manufactured here a few years ago, and shipped in in large quantities to the West India Islands, were shipped now from American ports, the reason being that our sugar refineries were standing still, and the trade transferred to Portland, Boston and New York. This tariff would not injure the lumber trade. What signified 5c. on 100lb. of pork, which would make 60c. difference on a thousand feet of lumber? The thing was too absurd. As to the Americans raising the duty on lumber, the thing was preposterous. There was no hon. gentleman opposite who would not give Brother Jonathan credit for being a practical business man, who would do nothing to injure himself. The United States had adopted a policy of Protection to better their interests, and had improved their position, notwithstanding the assertions and reports of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for North Norfolk treated this House, the other day, to a long array of figures, which he must have got from some musty almanac that had been lying on somebody's shelf for many years, so ridiculous did they appear in comparison with what he wished to make out. He stated the American factories were one mass of ruins, and that the working people were going about idle. No painter could paint on canvas anything more dark and gloomy than what the hon. gentleman depicted to be the position of the United States at present. Such assertions were simply ridiculous. He (Mr. Rochester) knew, personally, that the contrary was the case. For the last eight or nine months he had never met with an American, engaged in commerce, who had not distinctly stated that trade was reviving and money plenty. All their trouble, they said, had been want of confidence, and that was being now rapidly regained; factories were starting up, and they had no doubt that, within a few months, they would be doing a flourishing business. He knew that on the 1st February, 1879, all the cotton manufactories of the town of Manchester, New Hampshire, were running on double time, day and night, and up to that date had sold, in Europe, about three million dollars' worth of cotton; and yet, the hon. gentleman could tell them the factories in the United States were a mass of ruins. The hon. member for Bothwell said there was over a hundred million dollars' worth of machinery in the United States standing useless. He would just read one or two extracts, from a very good authority, which would show, better than anything else, what the position of the United States was to-day. The business notes in the New York Herald of March 24th, 1879, contained the following:—

"American trunks are in great demand in Ireland.

"The sales of New England cotton goods in China have increased to a very flattering extent during the past year.

"A general revival of business is reported in the Ohio iron regions, and manufacturers are overwhelmed with orders at advanced prices.

"Nashville, Tenn., shows signs of awakening prosperity. According to a local journal $250,000 will not cover the cost of the houses now in course of erection and to be erected during the year 1879.'

"The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company are building, at the Mount Clare shops, twenty-five engines of the 'Mogul' pattern, for use on the grades of the Alleghany Mountains, and 200 freight cars.

"A Newark (N. J.) paper says:—'Sash-weights are now manufactured so cheaply from scraps of tin—obtained from various manufactures—in this city, that no country can compete with them in cheapness.'

"The consumption of rubber by our manufacturers continues as large as ever, the imports amounting to about twelve thousand pounds per annum, chiefly from South America. The price ranges from twenty to fifty cents per pound.

"The Milwaukee (Wis.) Bee reports 'That the announcement of new buildings for the present season are coming in so fast that the papers do not get time enough to dwell upon the details before their attention is called to one next.'

"The Cincinnati Gazette has interviewed a number of the representative business men of that city with reference to the business outlook for the spring. It finds universal cheerfulness and a large increase of business over that of last year.

"Among the branches of business which will be affected by the new Canadian tariff is that of trunks. The Newark (N. J.) Journal says: 'The new Canadian tariff operates against the trunk manufacturers in this city, as to that country they have been accustomed to look for an important market.'

"Salem, Mass., sends encouraging news in regard to the shoe trade. The Post of that city, says: 'The spring trade has everywhere the fullest indications of being better than it has been for years, and all there is wanted now is for the people to fully realise the situation, and the wheels of business will "just hum."'

"A Lewistown (Me.) paper reports 'That business at the Lewistown Machine Company's works is now livelier than it has been in years. Every available space in the works is in use, and a very large force is employed. The foundry is crowded with work. A large quantity of cotton machinery is being turned out for the Cabot Company, Brunswick; for the Hallowell Mill, for the Pontiac, for the York, of Saco; for two mills in Lawrence, and for a mill in Atlanta, Ga. A very large order is being filled for a mill at Atlanta, chiefly looms and shafting.'

ing or making ready to resume work, and if the foreign market could be still more rapidly extended by intelligent legislation their prospects would improve at a much more speedy pace. But it is all certain to come right in time. Even real estate, which is the last to rally, feels the effect of the reviving trade impulses and improves its figures and pretensions together. We have reached a stage, in fact, at which further movement is possible in but one direction. Everything must now go forward. The country is evidently about to enter on a career of prosperity, whose splendours have hardly yet been imagined.'

"The business outlook on the State canals is excellent. In the opinion of the Buffalo Express, the prospect for the season's trade, looked at from all standpoints, is very encouraging both to vessel owners and the managers of propellor lines, and if reasonable carrying rates are established in accordance with the demand for room, there is no reason why shippers and owners should not all wear smiling faces. It is estimated that there are at present 20,000,000 bushels of grain in store at the upper lake ports; that the amount of lumber which has been cut during the past winter, and which now awaits shipment, is larger than ever before; that miners have been unusually active, and immense quantities of copper and iron ore and pig metal are ready to be transported. These are what constitute the down-freight."

These notes from the New York Herald proved sufficiently that the depression which hon. gentlemen opposite talked of did not exist in the United States. He knew that depression had existed in the United States. Would any hon. gentleman say it was any wonder that depression should have existed there during the last few years, after the great internal war they had passed through. They felt the depression, and were obliged to raise money to pay their war debt by a Protective policy. If it was good for forty millions of people to have a Protective policy, was it not also good for four millions? Should we, as Canadians, only four millions of people, not protect our agriculturists and our manufacturers against forty millions of people, who have built a wall around themselves that nothing can get through without paying a large duty? He said, without fear of contradiction, that the Americans could manufacture many articles 50 per cent. cheaper than they could be made in the Dominion. For that reason its people asked for and ought to have Protection. The fly-on-the-wheel policy of the last five years had left Canada in its present depressed condition. East, west, north and south, they would find railway cars laden with some of their best men, making for the far west. He was satisfied when they went to Manitoba, but did not like to see them settling in the Western States. A few days ago only, trains left Brockville with over 1,000. From his own part of the country, including county Carleton, a large number of families had recently gone, because they could not make a living here. The reason was obvious, having been explained by the member for Quebec, in regard to the absence of a market for Canadian coarse grains. Hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side had asked: Why was not 10c. or 20c. per bushel imposed on corn instead of 7½c.? He (Mr. Rochester) believed the duty should have been 10c., because this corn had done immense injury to the Canadian farmer. Twenty years ago they had in this country 85 distilleries, every one fed with the coarse grains raised in this country: rye, barley, oats and pease. But, for a number of years, they had but six distilleries, which made more whiskey than the 85 formerly. What was the consequence? All the whiskey was made from United States Indian corn, which had entered without paying a cent of duty, while the Canadian farmer had to shell out 15c. for every bushel of barley he sent to the United States. They had no wheatland in some sections of Canada, but cultivated oats and pease, having also any quantity of land fit to raise rye. He supposed hon. gentlemen opposite knew a good deal about rye, or, at least, the whiskey that came from it. It entered largely into the manufacture of whiskey twenty years ago, when the farmer got 60c. to $1 a bushel for it. The price, of late years, was about 40c. a bushel, not one bushel being raised now for every 1,000 formerly. Canadian coarse grains had been superseded by Indian corn from the United States, for which Canadians had been made hewers of wood and drawers of water. If the farmers were not attended to, and suffered, the mercantile, manufacturing and all other interests would suffer with them. Hon. gentlemen opposite had spoken of the tariff raising the prices of articles, but, as the member for Quebec had explained, a man earning good wages could better pay $6 for a barrel of flour than a man, poor and but partially employed, $4 for a barrel. He had found some appropriate remarks on this subject in the Farmer's Advocate, which he would read:

"We have examined part of the tariff now proposed, and consider it the best tariff we have yet seen for building up the agricultural interest of the country. We must draw a line between the inferior productions of the States and our products. Canada can and does produce better beef, mutton, pork, wheat, oats, peas, barley, potatoes, apples, butter, and cheese than the United States. The Americans have been purchasing our best products and selling them as their own. They have also palmed off their inferior products under the name of Canadian products. The duty charged on most articles must tend to increase the value of our productions, and to put our produce in its true light in foreign markets. We shall thus be able to obtain better prices, and this means an enhancement of the value of every acre of productive land in this Dominion."

He did not know whether this paper was Free-trade or Protectionist, but he found its remarks correct. Some of the hon. gentlemen opposite showed great inconsistency on the tariff question. For instance, the member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard), on the 9th of April last, proposed the following amendment to the motion of the then Finance Minister, Mr. Cartwright:

"That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved "That a large quantity of corn and oats having been imported into Canada during the last few years, this House is of opinion that the interests of Canadian farmers would be promoted by the imposition of a duty upon the importation of those products."

Last year he wanted Protection, but now he opposed it. The Finance Minister had brought forward a policy that would benefit every industry, and had he taken twelve months to mature it, instead of a few weeks, he would have deserved much credit for it. All should know that it was difficult to rearrange a tariff; it was not to be expected a Finance Minister should be thoroughly acquainted with every business in the country. He required the opinions of all trades, and also of the merchants. He had been told that the deputations to the Finance Minister had always left satisfied with their treatment, which, he understood, could not be said of those that had waited upon his predecessor. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had drawn a fearfully dark picture of the condition of business in the United States; but he did not say that he found the depression in Canada so great, and prices so low that he had transferred his large lumber business to Michigan and was there operating; he had said he could make money there, but not in Canada. This hon. gentleman was as inconsistent as the member for Iberville, who, last year, moved for Protection, and this year condemned it. The ex-Finance Minister and hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) had asked where was the change for the better in wages, stocks and other things since 17th September last? The member for South Brant, by his manner, reminded him (Mr. Rochester) of the action of a locomotive which he had seen trying to force its way through a snow-bank—snorting and plunging into the drift with great noise and violence. He understood that generals, in entering battle, cast about to see how, in case of need, they could retreat safely. Well, his hon. friend, as soon as he got aground, read from lists of the ayes and noes, for the past two or three Sessions, until he recuperated himself in the same manner as the man who was shovelling snow in front of the locomotive. He could not help thinking the hon. gentleman was like that locomotive, stuck hard in the snow drift, and that while he was reading the ayes and noes for the benefit of the House, he was recuperating for another dash. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron), in his speech, put him (Mr. Rochester) in mind of an incident which occurred to him, some years ago, when he was up the river examining a timber limit. He was on snow shoes, and had a very high hill to ascend, and he found it fearfully difficult work ascending that hill. His hon. friend appeared to be very much in the same condition, when he tried to make a speech against the tariff, for it was evident that the hon. gentleman was speaking against the convictions of his own conscience. The hon. leader of the Opposition, and the hon. ex-Finance Minister, had admitted that they did not believe the present administration would ever bring down a Protective policy. But he had to congratulate these hon.

gentlemen, and the country might congratulate themselves, that men of ability, men who were capable of grappling with the questions of the day, men who were capable of remodelling the tariff and putting it into a shape that would benefit the country, had been returned to power; and the people might congratulate themselves that they would derive a large amount of benefit from the revision of the tariff. But, there was one thing, he thought, the hon. gentleman had missed, and he would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to it, as he thought it was a matter of vital importance to the country. The present tariff before the House gave protection to the agriculturist and to the manufacturer, but there was nothing said about the mercantile community. He proposed, although it was not a pleasant thing to do, to perform a duty which devolved upon him—owing to the fact of there being vipers in the Dominion of Canada that had been for a number of years, and were now, preying on the vitals of the commercial community of the Dominion. The men he alluded to were a bane and a curse to this country to-day. He referred to the commercial agencies of New York and Boston that operated in the Dominion of Canada. He proposed to bring before the House a petition on the subject, signed by the principle merchants in different parts of the Dominion, asking the Government for protection against these vipers. He believed two-thirds of the bankruptcies of the country were brought about by these blackmailers. These men would rate a man according to what he paid them. All a man had to do if he wanted to start business, was to go to one of the reporters of these mercantile agencies, and if he could give $50, $80 or $100 for his book, he would get a rating accordingly. He would be prepared to lay before a Committee of this House, and he hoped the House would grant him a Committee, documents which would show that one concern alone paid these reporters, in a very short time, the sum of $800 for their rating, which was $500,000, and a few weeks afterwards they were in bankruptcy. He could also show that, in the four months of February, March, April and May of last year, men who were rated at from $2,000 to $750,000 failed for millions of dollars. He merely mentioned this now because they were on the subject of Protection, and because he considered that there was nothing in this country to-day that required action on the part of the Government more than these commercial agencies. A dishonest man, who could raise $25 or $50, could go to one of the commercial reporters he had referred to, and get a rating prior to starting business. He could then go to the wholesale merchant and buy goods, and refer him to the commercial agency. The merchant finds the man is rated at $2,000, and he believes the report and delivers the goods. But that man started business with a view of seeing how much he could rob the merchant of. He paid small amounts for a few months, and then failed, offering a composition of 10c., 20c., or 25c., for what he should pay 100c. And this was all the fault of the commercial agencies. He would not longer detain the House upon this subject, because he proposed to present a petition asking that a law might be framed to put these men in the same position as other companies; as for instance, fire and life insurance companies, that would require them to make a certain deposit with the Government, take out a license, and, at the same time, have a sign over their doors stating what their business is, and offer facilities to any man to examine their books. This would be some protection. It would not be too much to say that millions of dollars were carried out of the Dominion to the United States every year by these commercial agencies. He was told that in New York, and other places, their residences were perfect palaces, and that some of the dwelling houses of the managers cost a million of money. If this was the case, should not these agencies be checked? He hoped that when he brought the subject up, the Government would take the matter in hand. Now most of the gentlemen who had spoken upon this question of the tariff had given their experience about the late elections, and he had a very interesting tale he could tell about the last general elections, as far as he was individually concerned. The then Ministers of the Crown had made themselves very busy at his election, which, of course, they had a perfect right to do. He found no fault with that. He found fault with a Minister of the Crown trying to get all the employes of the Government who had votes in the county of Carleton to vote against him (Mr. Rochester). He did not expect that these gentlemen who had worked for years in order to get an election law that would do away with bribery and corruption would be the first to break them. But what occurred in his county? He had three opponents in his last contest, whom he would divide as two Conservatives and one Reformer. And there was one who styled himself as a Tory of the deepest water. The late Secretary of State got hold of that gentleman (Rev. J. May), and they all knew that hon. gentleman was a great manipulator. He manipulated this Tory of the deepest water until he pledged that, if he was elected for the county of Carleton, he would abandon Toryism and be a good Grit in the future, if the hon. gentleman would do certain things. Now he was told the hon. gentleman did do certain things, and these certain things were that he wanted money with which to pay his debts, and he wanted money with which to run the election. The hon. the Secretary of State told parties who called upon him that they had done this, and that they had given him money for these purposes. The Reform candidate, as honest a man as ever breathed, was Mr. John A. Grant. Mr. Grant came down here for the purpose of asking the Government to give him their support as the Government candidate. But the Secretary of State said: "No, Mr. Grant, we have taken hold of Rev. John May, and we cannot give up the Rev. John May." Mr. Grant said the Rev. John May was a Tory, to which the Secretary of State replied, "You know, Mr. Grant, the county of Carleton is not well enough educated to run a Grit candidate." He (Mr. Rochester) hoped it never would be educated so as to run a Grit candidate. After Mr. Grant and his friends left the office, the hon. gentleman sent after him and invited him back. He took Mr. Grant into his inside office and said, "Now, Mr. Grant, I want you to understand that everything that is said here is confidential. We must tell you then, that we cannot help you. We are bound to run the Rev. John May.

We cannot get rid of him ; and it is utterly impossible for you to gain the election against Rochester." But, while they could not give up the Rev. John May, they could do something else. The Secretary of State removed a newspaper from the table and displayed a pile of bills, and said, " Mr. Grant, we are willing to do anything we can." There was a nice pile of bills, but his unfortunate friend was too honest to take the bait. Under these circumstances, he was going to ask the Government for a Committee to inquire into this matter. He thought those men who had forfeited their positions as members of the Crown should be brought to book. One of the employés was sent out to the county of Carleton as deputy returning-officer. Who paid their salaries while they were out there? Who paid the salaries of the agents who were sent out to work for the Rev. John May, and against him (Mr. Rochester)? He thought this was something that ought to be brought to light, and for which any Government which would allow it should be brought to book. Then Mr. Jones, who took care of the Senate reading-room, was sent out as deputy returning-officer, and he did not know how many more. He knew that men from the Departments had been stationed at the doors of the different polling-booths, who pencilled down the name of every Civil Service employé who voted. Of course they could not tell how he voted, but they reported to headquarters those who had voted. Another gentleman, who occupied a position in one of the Departments, had two sons who worked very hard for the hon. the present President of the Council, and the late Secretary of State went to the Department to this gentleman, and told him that if he did not stop his sons working he would be dismissed from his office. Hon. gentlemen might talk about the United States, and to the victor belong the spoils ; but could anything be worse than what he had pointed out. It would be interesting to know where all the money came from that was used at that election. W. J. Wills, Emigrant Agent for the city of Ottawa, spent weeks in the county canvassing for the Rev. J. May, the Government candidate, and it was said that he held the position of treasurer for the party. Now, what he (Mr. Rochester) wanted to know, and what the country wanted to know, was, who paid this man, with all the other employés of the Government, that spent so much of their time in the county previous to, and during the late election? He was told if they examined the pay sheet, they would find that all those gentlemen were paid their full time. Now, of course, he (Mr. Rochester) had not spent any money. Hon. gentlemen opposite were sure to believe that. But seriously, he could solemnly say that he had no agents nor committee, and he spent no money. During that election a large number of buggies ran between these offices and the five different villages surrounding the city, to carry Civil Service employés to the polls. He would like to know who paid for these buggies. Anybody who knew his friend, the late Secretary of State, knew that he could not do anything of the kind. He would like also to know who paid the wages of the men who were sent out by Ministers of the Crown to canvass the county for days and weeks previous to the election? He would like to know whether the public of the Dominion of Canada were going to pay men to go around canvassing and working for a man who happened to be a supporter of the Administration for the time being? If that was going to be the case, it had better be known. He would not trespass any longer upon the time of the House. He had collected a large amount of statistics, more especially regarding the lumber trade, with considerable trouble, but there had been so much in the way of figures already submitted to the House, that he would not weary the House. He would only add that he was, on the whole, satisfied with the tariff. He had not attempted to enter into the details of the tariff, as he had no hesitation in saying that many of them he knew very little about. He had only taken up the lumber interest which he was practically acquainted with. The hon. gentlemen opposite talked about the following on his side of the House. He could say that the supporters of the Government were proud of their position. He for one was proud to be a follower of the present Administration, and he thought he only expressed the feeling of every member on his side of the House, when he said that they were proud of the men who occupied the Treasury benches; that the men who formed the present Government were competent to grapple with the great questions of the day. They had, to-day, no fly-on-the-wheel policy.

MR. METHOT said that, at this stage of the discussion, he had no intention of making a long speech; but he believed he owed it to himself, and to his constituency, to put before the House the attitude he wanted to assume in regard to this tariff. Having, for the ten years that he had been in public life, always fought strongly in favour of the principle of Protection, and having had the honour, during the last eighteen months, of being twice elected by overwhelming majorities over his opponents, who were strong Free-traders, he felt, whatsoever might be his feelings against some of the details of the present tariff, that he could not do otherwise than vote for the tariff en bloc, as it was now before Parliament. But, in the difficult circumstances in which they were now placed, he wanted it to be well understood that in casting this vote he did not desire it to be taken as a mark of confidence or non-confidence in the hon. gentlemen who now governed this country. He looked at this question from a stronger point of view. He thought it was one of those measures that they must deal with purely in the interest of the whole country, without considering who had brought it forward, or who was opposing it. He must, therefore, after having reserved his opinions, and mode of acting, until the details of this tariff came before the House, declare that he would support, with all his strength, the tariff as it was now before the House.

MR. ROGERS said the proposed tariff indicated a policy so completely at variance with his own views of sound political economy, so utterly inconsistent with the progressive tendencies of the world, and so prejudicial to all the vital interests of Canada, that it was not surprising that all who were not trammelled by election pledges or party alliances, should offer an earnest protest against the infliction. Although the injustice of the measure would apply to the whole Dominion, no Province would feel it more keenly than New Brunswick, and no county in the Province more than Albert, which he had the honour of representing. He need not, therefore, apologise for expressing his dissent from the opinions of the Finance Minister, whatever might be his personal regard for that gentleman. He felt that he would ill discharge his duty if he did not rise, and, at least, in a few words, express his firm protest against an imposition of taxation so fatal to every interest of his constituents. Those interests were very diversified. They included five different classes — farming, lumbering, mining, shipping, and, to some extent, fishing. These interests were variously intermixed, and all were more or less dependent on each other. The division of labour had not reached such a state of perfection there as in the older Provinces. While the farmers of his county were dependent on the soil for their subsistence in the raising of a variety of products, their surplus consisted mostly of cattle and dairy products, hay, oats and potatoes. There was no import of these articles to speak of, and even a prohibition of foreign farm products would not help their prices. Much of their products were sold in Boston, New York, and other American cities, thus giving employment to coasting vessels, which could only carry such cargoes at low rates with a prospect of return freights of cornmeal, flour, coal and other merchandise, and any restriction on this trade would at once injure the farming interest by the increased cost of importation, while the advance on all the necessaries of life which the farmer must buy would add greatly to their present depressed condition. Flour and meal, so far as required, would be higher at certain seasons, when the advantage of an overstocked New York market, combined with a nominal rate of freight, could be secured. They imported a large quantity of cornmeal, the duty on which must add to their taxation. By comparing the imports into New Brunswick, of last year, which were 65,919 bbls., it would be found the duty would be $26,367, while the duty on the corn imported would be $1,673, making in all $28,040. Sugar also, and even tea, would be found to cost the Dominion more when importers were restricted in their choice of markets. Furniture and agricultural implements, iron goods, boots and shoes, and clocks, were already sufficiently protected, and would be made dearer for the farmer as well as all the other classes of his constituents. The lumbermen, already borne down with a depressed market, would have to pay more for supplies, as had been clearly shown by hon. members on his side of the House who had preceded him, and which, notwithstanding other opinions expressed, still remained substantially uncontradicted, and higher freights on exports, if they continued business at all. The same would apply to mining, in which he might include the shipping of albertite coal, calcined plaster, gypsum, freestone, and the other products of that section of the Province. Under this tariff, labourers could not subsist on the wages heretofore paid them, their food and clothing being so heavily taxed, and, as before remarked, the small class of vessels which carried these exports to the United States markets must, of necessity, advance the freight rates or go at once out of employment. The tariff, as submitted by the hon. the Finance Minister, did not specify what was to be the system by which drawbacks were to be secured to shipbuilders. He hoped that the Finance Minister would so define it that the shipbuilder might be able to estimate the amount of the drawback before taking a contract. The article of cordage was made subject to a higher duty, and this was a burden that he thought should not have been imposed, as it not only affected the shipbuilder, but the sailing of vessels, from the largest ship to the smallest fishing boat that hugged their shores in search of a livelihood. And, though anchors, cables, oakum, foreign woods and salt were admitted free as before, he failed to find any compensating advantages for the greatly increased cost of living to the workmen employed. Those considerations in addition to the general restrictions of trade and commerce, clearly indicated, whether designedly or not, a blow at this staple industry, which had done so much to place "this Canada of ours" in a very proud position among the nations of the world. It was well known how a per-icious Protective system had, by adding to the cost of construction notwithstanding their many advantages, reduced the mercantile marine of the United States, so that to-day only about one quarter of the exports of the great Republic were carried under their own flag. Was it wise, was it patriotic that our onward march to supremacy on the seas should be checked and embarrassed by such an anomalous and partial method of raising the revenue? As had been correctly pointed out by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) and others, the fine articles of commerce, the ornaments and the luxuries of the rich were subject to less duty than the necessities of the poor and those in moderate circumstances. The chinaware and the broadcloths were admitted at a lower rate than the stoneware and the coarser tweeds and cloths. Then, again, the complicated nature of the tariff was a serious objection. They had ad valorem duties and specific—specific as to quantity, specific as to quality, specific as to size, and specific as to weight. All these would tend to embarrass and press unduly on the small importer, and must tend to concentrate the trade in the hands of the great mercantile houses, so that the competition essential to the good of the consumer would be checked. The tendency must be to centralise the importing business in the large cities, to the serious loss and detriment of the Maritime Provinces. As had been most truly said, the rich man would, by an Act of Parliament, be made richer still, and the poor man poorer still. The worst system of the United States system might arise. Lobbyists and rings of manufacturers, who could well afford to part with a percentage of their ill-gotten gains, would be enriched by successful political log-rolling, and would, in turn, protect and assist a Government which would continue to wrest for them the hard-earned savings of the poor. The hon. member for King's must have startled the House with the intelligence that the duty on tea was reduced two cents per pound, and he (Mr. Rogers) thought it would be interesting to his (Mr. Domville's) constituents, as well as the House, to know how such a desirable consummation was to be obtained under the present tariff. For, notwithstanding the desire of the members opposite to impress the country with the idea that they were going to give the country a free breakfast table, none of them had gone so far as the hon. member for King's. He (Mr. Donville) had also told the House it would not cost New Brunswick anything more for coal. He (Mr. Rogers) found by the trade returns that that Province imported 21,240 tons of anthracite coal from the United States, and 4,502 tons of bituminous coal. It was only fair to say that New Brunswick would have to pay duty upon coal to the amount of $12,000 to $15,000. He (Mr. Rogers) thought that the hon. member was equally unhappy in his reference to the shipbuilding industry of New Brunswick, when he spoke of it as "a little shipbuilding." Be that as it might, he (Mr. Rogers) thought shipbuilding was to the Maritime Provinces what the wheat-growing fields of the West were to them. He begged to dissent from this estimate. He found, on comparison with the United States, which had ten times our population, that the Dominion had about one-third of as much registered tonnage as they possessed. It was one of the links of the great carrying trade, which, with the railway and canal system, conveyed the products of Canada to a market in the Mother Country. That hon. gentleman had also attempted to show that in New Brunswick they paid less for certain articles now than they paid before the Union, and that their per capita tax had been lessened in that way. He had stated that in 1866 the price of flour was $10.50, while molasses and sugar were also higher than now. Had he taken the trouble to go a little further back, he would have found some very different facts. He (Mr. Rogers) would give some quotations from the prices as shown by the St. John Morning News of the 5th November, 1862. Flour was then quoted at from $5.75 to $6; molasses 26c. to 30c.; sugar 7½c. to 8½c.; deal freights to Liverpool, 75s. to 77s. 6d., and deals were quoted in Liverpool at £7 17s. 6d. per standard, while to-day freights were 55s. to 60s., and deals £5 10s. to £6 per standard. This went to show that Confederation had very little to do with the prices which were controlled by the larger markets of the world. The same member had also stated that this was not a cast-iron tariff, but would be tried for twelve months. He (Mr. Rogers) hoped it was not a cast-iron tariff, and that the Finance Minister would consent to its being modified in Committee so as to meet the requirements of the Maritime Provinces. He predicted, if it should remain as at present before the House, that, notwithstanding the many bands of Protection which its promoters had encircled it with, the very first time the electors of this country had a chance of pronouncing their views upon it, they would declare that it was not in accordance with their views.

MR. TROW said he had listened to the debate with a great deal of attention, and had failed to find any plausible or reasonable excuse given by the advocates of Protection, why any large proportion of the population should be taxed for the express benefit of a few. He considered it was the interest and duty of all Governments to legislate for the many and not for the few, to do the greatest possible good to the greatest possible number. Hon. gentlemen opposite were somewhat intolerant in their remarks, with reference to the elections of the 17th September last; some of them even asserting the doctrine that the people had decided the matter at the polls, and the House had no right to discuss the subject at all. He believed the elections were carried in many ridings by misrepresentation and deceit. In his section of Ontario the matter was not brought up in such a manner as represented here; but only a revision of the tariff was contemplated, not an increase of taxation upon every conceivable article used, from ten to fifteen per cent. higher than before. In looking over the returns of that "glorious victory," of which they had heard so much, he found that very little change in the electoral vote would have made a wonderful change; the party with whom he was identified would have remained in power. He could point to twenty-five hon. members, supporters of the Administration, the total of whose united majorities would not amount to one-half the majority of his hon. friend from North Oxford, and yet these gentlemen would boast that they represented the people. He found that the hon. member for Cornwall was returned by 38; the hon. member for Halton by 18 ; the hon. member for North Leeds and Grenville by 34 ; the hon. member for North Middlesex by 8 ; the hon. member for Niagara by 2 ; the hon. member for South Norfolk by 17 ; the hon. member for East Peterboro' by 26 ; the hon. member for Prescott by 4 ; the hon. member for Centre Wellington, the farmers' friend, by 6 ; the hon. member for North York by 10 ; the hon. member for Portneuf by 1. Others in Nova Scotia, Conservatives, were returned by very small majorities : the hon. member for Queen's with 18, and the hon. member for Annapolis by 9. Twenty-five Government supporters, with their united majorities, would only make 630 votes. It was evident that, if a change of a few votes in the whole Dominion had taken place, the members of the Government would be on the other side of the House. He might mention that it was by mere accident that the Finance Minister was here. His majority was 9, and under protest, and, if he appeared again before his constituents, those who knew the situation informed him that there would, in all probability, be 900 majority against him. The hon. member for Niagara condemned the policy of the late Government, in regard to the construction of the Pacific Railway, stating that they had commenced at both ends, leaving a gap unfinished in the centre, that the road was totally useless until the centre was completed. He should have considered the lay of the country, the engineering difficulties to encounter, and the impossibility of constructing that work, unless at both ends, making facilities as the work progressed to carry in necessary materials. The same hon. gentleman had condemned the late Government in their immigration policy, stating that they had been the means of driving emigrants into the United States. The hon. gentleman should consider that in 1872, while the hon. the present leader was in power, there passed through Canada into the United States 52,608 emigrants, and only 36,579 remained in these Provinces. In 1873, 49,059 passed through Canada into the United States, and those landed here 50,050. The following was the result of the next five years, during the administration of the late Government :—

	Passed into the United States.	Remained in Canada.
In 1874.....	40,649	39,373
1875.....	9,204	27,382
1876.....	10,916	25,632
1877.....	5,640	27,076
1878.....	11,226	29,807

Showing that during the years 1872 and 1873, while his leader, the right hon. member for Victoria, was in power, 24,022 more emigrants passed through Canada into the United States than in the next five years. What was the policy of this Government in reference to emigration ? He was informed that the Minister of Agriculture and Immigration had abandoned the scheme, and dismissed his emigration agents in Europe. If such were the case, he regretted it very much, because now was our opportunity to take advantage of the depression which existed in Great Britain among the tenant farmers of that country, and induce them to settle in this Dominion, where they could procure the fee simple town estate for the rental of a farm in Great Britain for one year. The hon. member for Cardwell seemed to think there was prosperity at present, even in the United States. He would wish it were so. Does the hon. gentleman know there were at present thousands out of employment ; that there were half a million clamouring for bread in Boston and other cities of the American Union ? Our commercial relations being so closely identified with that of the United States, it was natural to suppose that we should suffer in consequence of that great financial panic that swept over that great country. He (Mr. Trow) believed that it was beyond the power of any Government to bring about prosperity by any such policy as now proposed. Could the people be enriched by taxing the large majority for the benefit of the few ? If the taxes fell equally on all, it might be supposed that the Government was anxious to do what was fair and right. Would any one be uncandid enough to say that the farming interests had received any consideration, further than increasing their burdens ? What had been done to benefit them ? Had not his taxes been increased, by higher duties on every article he used ? The labouring man and lumberman, who, with the farmers, produced most of the wealth of the country, had also been entirely ignored. Depression occasionally afflicted all nations, and the United States had been more severely visited than Canada. They had had many years of prosperity, during which hon. gentlemen opposite should have husbanded the resources of the country, and have been less reckless in undertaking costly works of great magnitude; the public debt would not then have been increased so much nor the present troubles felt so keenly. They had prosperous times during and after the American war. All our surplus stock and produce was taken at good prices, labour was in great demand, followed by a railroad mania, which was encouraged by the Government. Many millions were thus spent, causing the people to imagine they were exceedingly wealthy, when their means largely consisted of borrowed money—in imaginary wealth. In Ontario alone about $20,000,000 was expended on new railways, the promoters obtaining bonuses and floating bonds extensively. The whole system of the country was rotten to the core. The country suffered from a partial failure of crops two or three seasons in succession, and the natural reaction took place. The Dominion and Provincial Governments having to meet the payment of interest on their borrowed loans, a reaction took place. The public feeling was anxious for a change, thousands foolishly entertaining the idea that the Government could grant them some measure of relief. To add to our misfortunes, the wholesale merchants imported enormous quantities of goods for years, amounting in four or five years to over $100,000,000 worth more than the legitimate wants of the country required. Irresponsible persons were allowed unlimited credit; merchants' agents were pushing sales all over the country; thousands of farmer's sons left the farm and entered into business without experience, the result being financial failure. Bankruptcy goods were sold by the official assignee at sacrifice prices, and others trying to carry on a legitimate business were dragged down, hundreds failing in consequence. At the elections last fall—in regard to which he never knew the people to be more deceived—ministers had been accused of deceiving the electors; at all events, different versions of the Protective policy were given in different parts of the country. The character of the speeches made depended very materially upon the geographical positions of the localities visited. It was wrong to accuse the late Government of a Free-trade policy; their tariff was 17½ per cent. for revenue, which gave enough protection and encouragement to any legitimate business. The manufacturers had come to Ottawa, however, from various parts of the Dominion, with selfish motives, and created a hue-and-cry about the slaughter of goods in Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite complained that goods were manufactured in the United States 50 per cent. cheaper than could be here. Why should Canadians be deprived of obtaining them so much cheaper than the home manufactured articles? Were not cheap goods a benefit to those who purchased? With regard to the complaints of their market being glutted with American goods, he thought that much of the goods exhibited in one part of the country as American, came from some other part of the country where there was over-production. A large quantity of furniture, manufactured in Guelph, had been sold in Toronto as American, because it had a good name. He had no faith in the policy of the present Administration, nor had he any faith that it would work well or prove beneficial. Ministers evidently had no faith in it themselves, as they were making changes in the tariff continually. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) had said that if it did not work well, not "he," but "we" would abandon it in a year. Some 30 or 40 changes had been already made since it was brought down. A deputation from Huron, representing the salt interests, were told they would be protected, but had discovered, after returning home, that 8c. a bushel did not suit their interests, they having expected that all foreign salt would be prohibited, and that they could supply our fishermen with 3,000,000, or 4,000,000 bushels which we now principally brought out in ballast and sold much cheaper than the Goderich salt could possibly be supplied. The deputation anticipated that the 30,000 or 40,000 fishermen of the Maritime Provinces would be compelled to buy from them. They imagined that vessels would bring coal to the West from Nova Scotia and return to it and New Brunswick with cargoes of salt. But they found themselves entirely mistaken, and that all the salt excluded by the present tariff was but 5,000 to 6,000 bushels that entered Ontario from the States. He understood, from a member of the deputation that the salt interest was seriously injured by the new tariff, at least 10c. per barrel, by the tax put upon coal. The coal tax was very objectionable, and would be severely felt by the poor in all the towns and cities in Ontario—a direct tax of $350,000 per annum, and it is doubtful if one ton more will be brought from Nova Scotia. The geographical position of Ontario prevented that, unless under a tariff of $1.50 per ton. The milling interest had also been injured. He had received a letter a few days ago from one of his constituents, a miller, who could manufacture 2,800 bushels of oats per day. During last year he purchased 550,000 bushels of oats, and shipped to Glasgow and Liverpool 52,000 barrels of oatmeal. All that he could purchase in the various little towns and districts adjacent during the year was 90,000 bushels of oats, and he was under the necessity of purchasing 460,000 bushels from the United States. This miller employed a certain number of men; the railways were also employed, and the shipping interests must have made a profit. Were they to do away with that business and carrying trade merely to gratify a few selfish individuals, who thought a change in the fiscal policy of the Government would be to their interest? He wrote him (Mr. Trow) that he had shut down his mill, as it was utterly impossible to purchase enough oats, within any reasonable distance, to keep his mill at work. He found that it would be better to remove his mill to the other side of the line, which he contemplated doing, as he could thence ship direct to Liverpool. It seemed to him (Mr. Trow) very unreasonable that hon. gentlemen opposite should strike thus at the carrying trade, after the country had spent millions to secure it, in improving the canal and river navigation. When these millions were expended, and the works almost ready to tap this western trade, a check was suddenly put upon the enterprise; for no one could pretend that we would now be able to compete with American lines for the carrying trade. Let hon. gentlemen remember that, in obstructing the prosperity of the Grand Trunk, Great Western and other public thoroughfares, and debarring them from the foreign carrying trade—and consequently our freight charges would be increased—they were also robbing the widows and orphans of Great Britain, who contributed towards their construction, thousands of whom had their capital invested in these great thoroughfares, and were depending upon their dividends for their means of support. It was not supposed, during the late contest, even by Conservatives, that the Government would undertake any radical change in the fiscal policy of this country. Some supposed there would be some change, but no one expected the sweeping changes the Government proposed. We had an illustration of the effects of Protection in the United States. It was well-known that manufacturing rings were formed in that country, which controlled legislation to their own ends and selfish purposes, and the result was that a false stimulus was given manufacturing industries, which tended to attract the inhabitants from other avocations into manufacturing enterprises. Hundreds and thousands of young men were attracted from the farms into towns and cities, the result of which was over-production, and wrought great ruin to the country. The tariff of the United States was pretty well-known. He would read from a speech made by Mr. S. S. Cox, in the United States Congress, which would give an idea of how the farmer in the United States enjoyed the benefit of Protection:—

per cent., and kneels to his God on a carpet taxed 250 per cent., sits down to take his humble meal from a plate taxed 40 per cent., with a knife and fork taxed 35 per cent.; drinks his cup of coffee with sugar taxed 70 per cent.; seasons his food with salt taxed 130 per cent.; pepper 297 per cent., and spice 397 per cent.; he looks around on his wife and children all taxed in the same way, takes a chew of tobacco taxed 100 per cent., and leans back in his chair and thanks his stars that he lives in the freest and best Government under heaven."

If taxation was a benefit, why not put on more? Why not put $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on corn, instead of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. If the Americans were going to pay these \$2,000,000 of increased revenue, why not make them pay \$4,000,000? Our object was, according to the hon. Finance Minister's statement, to make money. If they had made millions out of us, why not retaliate and endeavour to get a few millions out of them? His own impression was that the consumer under almost all, and every circumstance, would pay the duty under this tariff. For illustration, he would mention a gentleman in his Riding, a Conservative, engaged in the milling business, and who was in the habit of getting two car-loads of corn each week, amounting to 600 or 700 bushels. That gentleman was strongly in favour of Protection during the last election. He stated now that he had not the slightest conception, when the tariff was increased on corn, that he would have to pay the duty. He found now that it made a difference of from \$50 to \$60 per week on his transactions. He now condemned the policy of the Administration, and if he had another chance to vote, he would cheerfully vote for him (Mr. Trow). In the United States the result of the Protective policy had been wide-spread ruin, and tens of thousands of working-men were out of employment. Canada suffered from this state of things in the United States, in the great number of tramps that came over to this country. Some hon. gentlemen said the tramp nuisance was owing to the indiscretion of our emigration agents. It was nothing of the kind. During the last five years not a single emigrant had been induced to come out here who was not able and willing to work. He regretted exceedingly that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture had not seen his way to do something this year to promote immigration. That hon. gentleman had done much in years past in this direction, and the Mennonite settlement in Manitoba was a monument to his efforts in this respect. Thousands more of the same class were now anxious to come from Southern Russia, if the Government would do anything to encourage them. It was bad policy on the part of the Government to put any obstacle in the way of immigration. When he was urging upon the late Government to be more liberal in emigration matters, the hon. the Minister of Agriculture was the only one of the then Opposition that gave him any assistance in his efforts. Now was the proper time to "attract emigrants to our shores, in order to fill up our fertile western plains. Thousands of the best class of settlers were anxious to leave Russia now, on account of political troubles. Other nations were endeavouring to attract emigration to their shores. Australia had over a hundred emigration agents in the old country. The Australian Government gave emigrants \$100 per head, while our Government only gave them \$5. He had no doubt the tariff would stimulate manufacturing interests for a time, but its ultimate results would be the same here as in the United States. He believed the Finance Minister had been so pestered and troubled by the demands of the manufacturers, that he had finally become desperate, and forgot all about the great class of consumers in this country. We found, already, in this country that many branches of business were suffering from home competition, and the new tariff would only make matters worse. In reference to the furniture business it was hard on the poor man to make him pay 35 per cent. on his furniture, for the sake of benefitting a few individuals. Very little furniture was imported from the United States, and there was no kind of reason in putting on this duty.

MR. PLUMB: How much do we import, $200,000 worth?

MR. TROW asked the hon. gentleman if he knew. That hon. gentleman professed to be so well informed that he had earned for himself the title of "general purpose individual." He was a jack-in-the-box, who jumped up on all conceivable occasions, no matter what subject was under discussion. He (Mr. Trow) regretted to see that the hon. the Minister of Finance had been driven to such desperation by the manufacturers, that he had overlooked his own Province. Although that hon. gentleman had been honoured with high positions in that Province, he had apparently neglected its interest, and placed heavy burdens on its people, according to the testimony of nearly all the members from that Province. He (Mr. Trow) had intended to give some figures with reference to the imports and exports of the different cereals, but that subject had already been so well treated that he would defer that portion of his remarks for another occasion.

MR. COUGHLIN said he would not have spoken on this question were it not that an attack had been made upon his constituency, North Middlesex. The hon. member (Mr. Trow) who had just taken his seat, had referred to the small majority by which the last election was carried in that Riding. But when he (Mr. Coughlin) stated that he now represented a constituency that had been accustomed to give 800 majority to the Reform party, this House would understand the change that had taken place in that Riding in favour of Protection. This question had been fully discussed in the western part of Ontario, and the people understood what they were voting for. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House had tried to make it appear that this tariff meant Protection to the manufacturers, and heavier taxes to the farmers. As a farmer, representing an agricultural constituency, he felt it to be his duty to say that he believed this tariff would benefit the agriculturists more than it would the manufacturers. He (Mr. Coughlin) thought he had got figures before him, taken from last year's returns compiled under the late Mackenzie Administration, which would prove it, and would show the necessity that had existed for agricultural protection. For instance, we imported 302,147 bushels of barley, value $137,243—American duty, at the rate of 15c. per bushel, $45,322, was an advantage to the American farmers, on barley alone. According to the present proposed tariff the Canadian farmer would now enjoy the same protection. He found that we imported 2,162,229 bushels of oats of the value of $651,441—American duty at 10c. per bushel, $216,222; our farmers will now be protected to an equal extent. The amount of corn imported was $7,387,507 bushels, at a value of $3,535,619—American duty, $738,750; under the Mackenzie tariff the duty on this staple product of the soil was nil; while under the proposed tariff the duty of 7½c. per bushel would produce a revenue of $554,063, and would furnish so much additional protection and encouragement to the farmers of Canada. He would now call the attention of the House to the question of wheat, on which a good deal had been said. The impression on the other side of the House was that we had exported more wheat than we had imported. He wanted to tell the House and country that such was not the case, and he defied contradiction. We imported $5,635,411 bushels of wheat, at a value of $6,510,148—a 20 per cent. duty on that, which was the American duty, gave them $1,127,082; under the proposed tariff, with a duty of 15c. a bushel, the Canadian farmer will receive $45,311, by way of protection on wheat against his American rival. Then we imported 146,823 bushels of rye, at a value of $77,398—American duty at 15c. a bushel, $22,023; proposed duty at 10c. a bushel, $14,682. Pease and beans, imported, 9,589 bushels, at a value of $18,729—American duty, $958; under proposed tariff, $958. From this it will be seen that the total importation of grain was 15,643,706 bushels, of the value of $10,630,578. The American duty on that amount would be $2,150,367; under the proposed tariff a duty of $1,676,628 would be imposed on these grains, and our farmers would receive a protection to that amount against American grains, where the Mackenzie tariff left them at the mercy of the American farmers, who competed with them on equal terms in our own market, and, at the same time, enjoyed a high degree of protection at home. Turning to the article of flour, about which so much had been said, he (Mr. Coughlin) found that we had last year imported 314,520 barrels, valued at $1,866,101.

American duty, at 20 per cent., would amount on this article to $373,220; under our proposed tariff of 50c. per barrel, the duty would be $157,260. Of rye flour, we had imported 1,883 barrels, valued at $3,655—American duty of 10 per cent., $865; proposed duty, at 50c. per barrel, $941. Indian meal, imported, 226,850 barrels, of the value of $619,380, on which 10 per cent. to American duty would amount to $61,938, while the proposed duty of 40c. a barrel would amount to $90,742. Of oatmeal, we had imported 2,949 barrels, of the value of $22,226, on which the American duty amounted to $2,949; this would be the same under the new tariff. Of ground grains, flour, meal, etc., as would be seen from the foregoing figures, we imported 546,202 barrels, of the value of $2,516,362, on which, under the Mackenzie Government, there was no duty, though the American duty was $438,972; the proposed tariff would give us on ground grains, a protection of $251,892. And now, coming to meats, of which there is a large importation, we find that of pork alone we imported last year 10,248,020 pounds, at a value of $640,696—the American duty of 1c. per pound, amounted to $102,480; the increased duty, under this tariff was scarcely worth noting, except for the purpose of urging that it should be further increased. Of hams and bacon, we imported 2,825,169 pounds, valued at $220,945—the American duty, at 2c. a pound, would be $56,503, and our proposed duty the same; while the duty, under the Mackenzie Administration, was only half that amount. In regard to the article of beef, we had imported 513,782 pounds, valued at $31,792—American duty of 1c. a pound $5,137, and proposed duty the same. Lard, imported, 2,345,807 pounds, valued at $213,603—American duty of 2c. a pound, $46,916; proposed duty the same, but only half that amount under the late Government. We had imported mutton from the Americans to the extent of 5,473 pounds, of the value of $339—American duty, $54; proposed duty the same. The total amount of meats imported from the Americans was 15,938,251 pounds, valued at $1,107,375—American duty, $211,090; proposed Canadian duty, $211,090, and under the late Government, $159,380.

He (Mr. Coughlin) would now take up the stock importations. We imported 1,587 horses, valued at $60,458—American duty, at 20 per cent., $12,091; proposed Canadian duty, at the same rate, $12,091; Mackenzie duty, at 10 per cent., $6,045. Of cattle, we had imported 5,120 head, valued at $83,471—American duty, at 20 per cent., $16,691; new Canadian duty the same; under the Mackenzie Administration the duty, at 10 per cent., would be $8,347. Of sheep, we imported 10,506, of the value of $20,444—American duty of 20 per cent., $4,088; new Canadian tariff the same; but under the Mackenzie Government only half that amount. Of swine, we had imported 14,704 head, valued at $116,922—American duty, at 20 per cent., $23,384; under our proposed duty, $23,384; while under the late Government only half that amount was imposed. The total value of stock imported was $211,295—the American duty being $56,257; the proposed duty under the new tariff, $56,257; under the late Government the duty would be $28,128, or only half the amount now proposed. He (Mr. Coughlin) thought that the farmers had reason to congratulate themselves on the change of Government, and on the realisation of the promises made to them by the Conservative leaders during the late political campaign. He found that the total value of the grain, flour, meal, pork, beef, animals, etc., imported from the Americans during the preceding year, to compete in our home market with our Canadian farmers, amounted to $14,835,610, upon which, before entering the American market, the Canadian farmers would have to pay duty to the amount of $2,856,686. Under the new tariff our farmers would be protected to the extent of $2,195,867, where, under the late Administration, they only had a protection of $187,508, while the late Government gave the farmers a protection of a fraction over one per cent. The proposed duty would, on the foregoing farm products, give about 15 per cent. protection, the American protection on the same amounting to about 18 per cent. The farmers were now protected by the present tariff about twelve times more than they were under that of the late Administration. Manufacturers had twice the protection they had under the late Administration, and yet gentlemen opposite said, "this was a Protection in the interests of the manufacturers only." He (Mr. Coughlin) thought the subject had been pretty well discussed, both before and since the elections. As far as the western part of Ontario was concerned, he was happy to say that they were pretty well satisfied with this tariff. There were several items he would like to see changed. He would like to see the duty on pork increased to two cents a pound. That was the wish of his constituents, and it was his wish. He would also like to see a duty on wool. There was a large amount of wool imported into this country. He would also like to draw the attention of the Minister of Customs to the value of stock imported into this country, and the value of stock exported. He found that, in regard to horses, that the average value per head imported was $38, and that the average value per head exported was $90; and cattle imported, valued at $16 per head, while our exported cattle were valued at an average of $38 per head. Knowing practically something of the value of the stock imported, he (Mr. Coughlin) believed that they were entered for Customs duty at less than one-half their actual value, and he was of opinion that the same scale of valuation had been practised upon many of our other imports. He thought there was something wrong here, and he begged to again call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Customs to the fact. Taking the tariff as a whole, he (Mr. Coughlin) felt that the people of the country, especially the practical farmers, had reason to congratulate themselves on the change of Government. While desirous that increased duties should have been imposed on pork and wool, to which he had just referred, he (Mr. Coughlin) intended to support the tariff as a whole, in the hope that the Finance Minister would see his way, next year, to give further encouragement to the farmers in this respect, and felt that he was discharging his duty to the intelligent electors who had honoured him with their confidence, by endorsing the National Policy.

MR. GUNN said the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) had alluded to the

MR. COUGHLIN.

China trade, and congratulated the House on the service that cry had rendered gentlemen opposite. He regretted that he could not congratulate the merchants in that trade, as they suffered heavy losses. Tea costing 40c. and 50c. had to be sold at 25c. and 30c., leaving losses of 40 per cent. It was an unfair cry raised against the late Government that the differential duty of 10 per cent. against tea imported from the United States would have protected direct importations from loss. Not only in Canada but in England and the United States immense losses were made. The largest and oldest firms there, as well as in the East, in the China trade, had to succumb during the last four years. It was well known that the losses had been enormous. Wealthy bankers and merchants of long standing had lost all they possessed in the trade. The only people who could be congratulated upon the results of the China trade were the consumers of this country; they had been benefitted by getting cheap tea. Canada's proportion of the whole tea trade was not more than about 4 per cent.—a very small fraction indeed. London headed the list, and New York came second. These markets very largely supplied the tea used in this country, and often at a less rate even than it could be purchased in China. His hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. White) had said he received a letter from a gentleman in New York, who had gone there because the late Government had cancelled the ten per cent. differential duty. He (Mr. Gunn) could tell that hon. gentleman that the 10 per cent. duty was not the cause of his correspondent's leaving for New York, but it was because he imported too largely, and brought disaster upon himself, and was forced to seek new fields for his labour. If that fact was not known to the hon. gentleman, it ought to have been known to him before he came to this House with such information as he gave. He (Mr. Gunn) maintained that no Government could have averted the distress that had overtaken the commercial world, as that was impossible, and he very much feared that the policy of the present Administration would have very bad effects. The taxation that the people had already to bear was as heavy as they could stand, and yet the hon. the Finance Minister had thought proper to impose additional taxation almost equal to a war tax.

AN HON. GENTLEMAN: It is a war tax.

MR. GUNN said it was equal to a war tax on the people beyond any doubt. Sugar, one of the most important articles in our trade, was proposed to be subjected to a most enormous Protective duty. During fifteen years prior to Confederation, we had no less than nine different tariffs, a tariff for nearly every year and a half. They all knew how distressing it was to everybody to have these continual changes in the tariff. During the last eleven years they had a permanent tariff, as far as sugar was concerned, with the exception of 1875, when a quarter of a cent a pound was deducted off refining grades, and one quarter of a cent was a large protection to the refiners. Taking into account the then consumption, it was equal to $250,000. Surely that was sufficient protection for any industry. Prior to 1868, the refiners had a monopoly of this trade, and it had given great dissatisfaction throughout the country. That dissatisfaction became so great that, when the House met in 1868, it was considered of sufficient importance to receive the serious attention of the Government, and he believed prominent men engaged in the trade were called upon by the then Administration, and consulted. He (Mr. Gunn) was not in the country at the time, but understood the question was considered with a good deal of care and thought; they found the existing tariff too one-sided, it was all in favour of the refiner, and against the consumer, and against the importers. After a good deal of discussion, an arrangement of the tariff was effected, which was supposed to be satisfactory to the refiners and to the importers. It was considered the fairest settlement that could be arrived at. The tariff, as then readjusted, lasted seven years, and gave satisfaction to everybody, as far as he could understand. In 1875, the refiners insisted on getting more protection, and the result was the imposition of the additional one-quarter of a cent per pound he had already mentioned. The trade in 1868 was only

57,000,000 pounds of sugar, with 9,000,000 pounds cane juice, on which a duty of \$1,280,000 was paid; but last year it rose to 109,000,000 pounds, with a duty of \$2,600,000, which showed that the trade had nearly doubled in eleven years, under a permanent tariff. He believed that the tariff under the late Government, with all its faults, if left alone, would yield sufficient means for the requirements of the country. He thought it was a most serious thing to interfere with a tariff that had doubled the sugar trade in eleven years. The effect of that tariff had been, not only to double the quantity of sugar brought into the country, but to double the revenue besides, and the people had been supplied with cheaper and purer sugar than ever before. Any head of a family, or any housekeeper in the country, could tell the House that they never had cheaper or better sugar than when the late tariff was in operation. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) said that less sugar was used than was consumed during that year the refinery closed. It was in 1876 when 114,000,000 pounds were entered, with a duty of \$2,250,000. The difference was owing to the lower grade that came that year, with a lower duty, against the higher grades that came last year, as the 109,000,000 pounds of 1878 was equivalent in saccharine to more weight than the 114,000,000 pounds of 1876, and paid \$320,000 more duty. So far he had given figures in round numbers, but he would now state actual figures taken from the Trade and Navigation tables for the two years: 1876, quantity 114,051,176, duty, \$2,217,878; 1878, quantity, 108,951,920, duty 2,567,803. This showed that the higher grades paid more duty than the lower grades. The hon. member for Cardwell told the House, by reading an extract from Wells, and he (Mr. Gunn) believed he was correct, that it would cost a cent per pound to refine sugar; and on that cent the duty had to be paid on the refined article coming into the country. This duty, under the late tariff, averaged 45 per cent., equal to 45c. per 100 pounds. There was surely alone protection enough, amounting to, on last year's importations, \$199,500, at the rate under the late tariff. How many business men in the country would be glad to get one-tenth of that protection? Why should any one firm try to get so much protection on an item of so much necessity to the people? Sugar was indispensable, and must be had by every family, rich or poor. The right hon. leader of the Government said he was in favour of free sugar, and he (Mr. Gunn) had always hoped to see it free, but it could not come in free so long as it was necessary to assist in raising revenue from it; but if sugar had to be taxed it should be taxed equitably, so as to draw, if possible, every cent of the duty into the Treasury; it should not be taxed to divert that tax, or any part of it, into the hands of a few refiners at a loss to the taxpayers. It really required very few men to refine the whole quantity required. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) had given statistics from all parts of the world in reference to the refining of sugar, and has shown that 269 men, with new and improved machinery, would be sufficient to refine a full supply for this Dominion. The highest estimate he had before was 500 men. There was no time lost in producing the refined from the raw. It could be brought in to-day and within another day or two it was ready for market. It did not lock up capital like other industries that employed so many more men. Take the tanner, waiting six months before he could get returns from his hides, and then a long credit on his leather. He had no objection to a small protection—if they must protect the refiner, say $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.—and many firms doing a large business would be satisfied with that. As the tariff was proposed on sugar now, it appeared difficult to tell what protection was given; but, taking the estimate of the hon. the Finance Minister at 120,000,000lb. on low grade sugars for the coming year's consumption, and he did not think it would be any less, that quantity, at the present, free on board, value of raw, would pay only \$1,560,000 duty. This tariff appeared to be framed so as to give the whole benefit to the refiners, and a loss of over \$1,000,000 to the revenue, compared with the yield from the old tariff, at a lower rate of duty, and estimating by the new tariff only 105,000,000lb. of high grade sugar at current prices of white and bright yellow, the duty would amount to

\$2,693,250, while, as already stated, 120,000,000lb. of raw would yield a less revenue by \$1,133,250. He had the figures to prove these statements to any person who desired to look into this matter. While the raw paid duty on this basis of 40 per cent, refined paid a duty of 57 per cent. This certainly showed too much protection on an article like that. The duty on raw was for ad valorem 30 per cent., but, after deducting the charges and packages, it became reduced to 25 per cent., with $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound on No. 9, which made it equal to 40 per cent. Then the tariff of 1863 was continued under the financial administration of Sir John Rose, then of Sir Francis Hincks, of Mr. Tulley, the present Finance Minister, and Mr. Cartwright, the late Finance Minister. If there had been a good reason for changing that tariff, they would have done so. Why was it changed now? The Government should take information from whom they could get it. They could get the best information from records in Washington, London, and cities on the continent of Europe. The British Government were not afraid to take advice. They were so annoyed and perplexed by refiners' statements about sugar, that to put themselves right they decided to test the question by chartering a refinery away from the country altogether, worked this refinery, and practised in it until they found out what they were doing. Why should not our Government make enquiry before they arrived at conclusions that must lead to disastrous results to our revenue and our taxpaying people. The whole cry seemed to be about tea and sugar, to the neglect of the more extensive portion of our commerce. Ninety-two per cent. of our commerce, import and export, was with Great Britain and the United States, and our tariff was to be arranged largely against those countries. What would be the result if they turned round and said: "Here, you are discriminating against us"? What would the hon. member for Frontenac say, and hon. members from adjoining counties round the Bay of Quinté say to their constituents, if anything happened to their barley trade with the United States? This trade, with them, was one of great importance. They had, from this item alone, received, every fall, large sums of money. and it has been a near by, and by far their best market. He would not detain the House longer, but would simply reiterate his protest against the adoption of the injurious policy proposed by the Government.

MR. DREW moved the adjournment of the debate.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he hoped that to-morrow night they would be able to go into Committee of Ways and Means. Opportunity had been given, and properly given, to hon. members to express their views, but this was the sixth or seventh day of the debate, and, to prevent an absolute obstruction of the Government business, and prevent the Session going into the summer, they must draw the debate to a close.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

MR. TILLEY moved that the said debate be the first Order of the Day, immediately after routine business, at the next sitting of the House.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned debate on Mr. Tilley's proposed motion to agree to resolutions relative to duties of Customs and Excise, reported from Committee of Ways and Means (March 14th), and Mr. Mackenzie's proposed motion in amendment thereto (April 4th.)

MR. DREW said that at this late stage of the debate, he rose simply to put on record his reasons for supporting the tariff before the House. He had always been a Protectionist. This question had been for many years before the country, and he had always been on the side of those who advocated a National or Protective policy. Holding such views, he was astonished when he heard it stated in the House that the electors did not understand this question, when called upon to vote on the 17th September last. He thought that if there ever was a question which the people understood perfectly, it was the present. He was willing to give credit to the gentlemen on the Opposition benches for not having attempted to sail under false colours, so far as this question was concerned; they had taken the side of Free-trade clearly and distinctly, as the Conservatives did that of Protection. Holding, as he did, that the real question before the country at the last election was that of Free-trade or Protection, and that the people by their votes, demanded Protection, all that they had to do in this House was to consider whether this tariff was the carrying out of the pledge given the people when their votes were being solicited. He believed it was a complete fulfilment of that promise, and that he could go back to his constituents and test their opinion of it, safely, although the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain), pointing to the Ministerial side, had asked what gentleman from Ontario could go to his constituents and support the tariff. He could reply that gentlemen on his side were perfectly prepared to support this Protective policy before their constituents, and he thought they could throw out this challenge to the hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side. In the course of a very short time there would be an appeal to the electors of Ontario, and he would like those gentlemen to make the question for the electors, Free-trade or Protection. But they would hear, on that occasion, no doubt, from hon. gentlemen opposite, that those were not the questions to submit—that Ontario had nothing to do with the trade policy of the country. The member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) had told them, in a very decided tone, and with violent gesticulation, that this was not the tariff policy the country had been led to expect, and in support of that statement he read a letter from a carriage manufacturer in Guelph (Mr. Chase). But it was strange that from that city where, for its population, there were more manufactories and, as he supposed, as much wealth engaged in manufacturing, as in any other city or town in Canada, that he could produce but one letter from that city in that sense. In answer to his hon. friend he would read the opinions of some parties in Guelph, showing that the people were perfectly satisfied with the tariff; and if he should misrepresent their views, that hon. gentleman, now in Guelph, could correct him on his return. As it was in a county from which he (Mr. Drew) hailed himself, he thought that he had a right to refer to the names of the gentlemen in question. He would just refer to Mr. J. B. Armstrong, President of the Guelph Carriage Goods Company, whose manufactory turns out over $100,000 worth of steel and iron carriage hardware per year. That gentleman said:

“That the effect of the new tariff on the labour market was somewhat prospective. In his opinion, the tariff would raise up more manufacturing establishments, and, therefore, more labour would have to be employed. If there was an increased demand for the goods of the manufactures now in existence in Canada, wages would undoubtedly rise. But he was inclined to think that the real effect of the tariff would not be felt for two or three years, and then it would undoubtedly result in fostering Canadian industries. He believed that considerable dissatisfaction existed in some branches of trade, but he was confident that, as soon as the novelty wore off, that that would, to a certain extent, cease. With respect to their own business, he said they were now making goods heretofore manufactured exclusively in the United States, and he had no doubt that this would continue, and that these goods would hereafter be made in Canada by themselves or some one else. Since the tariff had been brought down, they had been running night and day, and had about fifty hands constantly employed. Their present prospects for immediate trade would keep up this satisfactory condition of affairs for at least three months. And, in the ordinary course of business, the demand might continue at this rate for the entire year. With respect to the price paid by consumers of their goods, his impression was that the goods would not in three years be more costly than they are at present. He was satisfied that Mr. Tilley had striven to do his duty to every interest.”

This certainly did not show that dissatisfaction existed in Guelph. Again, he would read what Mr. Wm. Bell, who had excellent facilities for turning out 1,200 to 1,500 organs yearly, said. It was that:

“Although some of the raw material used in their manufactures was affected somewhat by the new tariff, they were in a much better condition now to compete with any American manufacturer than they were during the continuance of the 17½ per cent. tariff. The new tariff would prevent the slaughtering they had felt for years, and, in fact, their increased foreign trade was pushing them very much in fulfilling home orders. The tariff was certainly in the right direction, and as far as a man could be expected to do, Mr. Tilley had dealt as fairly as was possible with respect to all the industries of the country. He was particularly well pleased that the Government had given Canadian manufacturers a drawback on foreign orders, equal to the amount of duty paid on raw material used in their goods. He was of opinion that the tariff would bring general prosperity, and that all men in Canada were infinitely better off than under the reign of the one-sided Free-trade tariff of the Mackenzie-Cartwright Administration. He believed that the new tariff would bring in its wake abundant labour. Instead of men working only eight and a-half hours per day, they would be enabled to work profitably for ten hours each day. So far as he could ascertain, there was a more confident feeling in business circles.”

Then came Mr. John Anderson, of Messrs. McCrae & Co., woollen manufacturers, who were strong Reformers. Their objection was this: they anticipated they would get an increased market in time, but thought that the tariff would raise up so many woollen manufactories as to create unfair competition, and cut down prices below a living profit; that the building up of manufactures at home would create such a competition as to keep down prices was one of the things promised the people as the result of Protection. Then, Mr. Andrew Tolton, of the firm of Tolton Bros., who, last year, manufactured harvesters ploughs, etc., to the extent of from $12,000 to $15,000, said:

"That eventually the new tariff would affect them in the fostering of their industry. He believed, too, that it would result in a general encouragement of Canadian manufactures, and put a stop to the importation of Yankee-made machines and ploughs. They would not raise the price to farmers, as they would have an increased home market, and, consequently could afford to sell as low, if not lower, than present prices. He was strongly of opinion that wages would rise, and that more labour would be employed. As far as his firm was concerned they had already added plough-making to their manufactures, and anticipated going into other new branches of agricultural implement making."

Mr. Stewart, a manufacturer of sashes, doors, blinds, etc., found fault with the tariff, as he kept a number of horses, and complained that it would raise the price of oats, but hon. gentlemen opposite held a theory in opposition to this, and contended that the price of oats would not be advanced, and that farmers would receive no benefit. He (Mr. Drew) then referred to Mr. George Sleeman, Reeve of Guelph, and proprietor of the Silver Creek Brewery, who believed the changes would be favourable to his business. Mr. Sleeman was of the opinion that the rise which had already taken place in grain, was due to the protection afforded cereals by the tariff, and was thoroughly satisfied with it. Mr. Wilkie, of Wilkie & Osborne, sewing machine manufacturers, said:

"We believe that the tariff will be very beneficial to us in our business—directly and indirectly. The extra duty on raw materials will make very little difference in the cost, and as the greater part of the value of the finished machine is in labour, the extra duty will be perceptible. The larger home market, without the unfair competition with foreign manufacturers, will enable us to do a larger and more legitimate business, consequently more profitable, on account of which we anticipate being able to sell at least at as low prices, and pay as good wages, as we have ever hitherto done. We will be benefitted under the new tariff arrangement in our export trade, as under the old tariff we had to pay duty on raw materials, put labour on them here, and got no drawback when exporting the finished articles. Now we will, under the drawback system, have raw materials for the export trade duty free, consequently putting us in a better position to compete in foreign markets."

Messrs. Burr & Skinner, furniture manufacturers, spoke highly of the changes, and stated that workingmen would now get a steady year's work, whereas, under the old tariff they only got about eight months' work out of the twelve. He quoted the opinion of Mr. James Wiley, of Worsfold & Wiley, furniture dealers, who was also favorable to the new tariff, and said that he recognised a more confident feeling in business circles than that which prevailed before the Budget speech was made. Mr. McConnell, of McConnell & Thornton, carriage-builders, said:

"The tariff will assist us in building up a larger home market. They had already increased their export trade, and this week shipped to Australia. He was confident that wages would in due time rise; there could be no question about it. He considered the tariff would benefit every man in Canada, as confidence had been restored in business. Prices to the consumer would not raise perceptibly."

The hon. member for South Wellington had quoted the opinion of Mr. Chase, but this was contradicted by the opinions of Mr. Armstrong and Mr. McConnell, the two largest carriage-manufacturers in Guelph. Then came Mr. John Hogg, of the firm of John Hogg & Son. Mr. Hogg was a member of the Guelph Lumber Co., of which also the member for South Wellington was a member. That hon. gentleman, speaking on this question, lately, wished to know what advantage was given the lumbermen in return for the alleged higher taxes on him, though aware that, after the tariff was announced, the firm of which he was president had received an order to ship 6,000,000 feet of lumber to Manitoba, which Province formerly procured it from the Western States. Mr. Hogg said:

"The new tariff would be of general benefit for at least six years, but after that he thought the increase of manufacturers would result in over-production. The bringing down of this new tariff had resulted in increased public confidence, and, however it turned out in the end, it could not be worse than the condition of business before the tariff was brought down. He had a stock in store worth $95,000, which he would sell at the old prices, and by the time this and other merchants' stocks required replenishing, our own manufacturers would be able to supply us. He was of opinion that people would be wise if they did not push forward in manufacturing at too great a rate."

It would take too much time to read the published opinion of all the Guelph business men, and he would simply state that the following gentlemen expressed themselves as satisfied with the tariff: Messrs. E. Radford, of J. D. Williamson & Co.; Thomas A. Hefferman, of Hefferman & Co.; John A. Wood; J. Hallett, of Jackson & Hallett; J. E. McElderry; Hugh Walker; John Horsman; J. M. Bond; James A. Thorp; A. B. Petrie; J. H. Moore, of Herod & Co.; W. H. Marcon, and George Lees. These were the names of leading business men of the flourishing city of Guelph, some of whom were still Reformers; but, notwithstanding their politics, they were in favour of the tariff. He merely mentioned their names in reply to the remarks of the hon. member for South Wellington, who would be in his place to notice them if he desired, before the tariff was disposed of. From all the information that he (Mr. Drew) had received from his Riding, and the surrounding section, he believed that this tariff was acceptable to the people, and was all that the inhabitants of of the other sections looked for, which left him no other course than to support it. The next question to consider was was the tariff framed in the way to give the farmers the Protection they expected? He represented a farming constituency, and believed the tariff afforded ample protection to the farmers, as well as the manufacturers. At all events, both classes, and the members representing them, in his (Mr. Drew's) section had expressed themselves satisfied with it, as he also was, with the figures as they stood. But there was one thing he was not so well satisfied with, and he wished to call attention to it. If the tariff, as it stood, was carried out, and the farmers got the protection they were led to expect, it would be an advantage to them. There was a duty of 15c. a bushel on wheat, but this cereal would be allowed, as he understood, to enter Canada from the States in bond, in the interest of the miller, who might thus bring in 10,000 or 20,000 bushels, on giving his bond that he would pay the duty, unless he showed to the satisfaction of the Customs Department, that he had shipped out of the country flour or wheat corresponding with that quantity. If the flour that he shipped out of the country was the product of that wheat, or the wheat he shipped was the identical grain, then the farmers would have the protection they expected. But if the millers were allowed to bring in 20,000, 50,000, or 100,000 bushels of wheat, grind and use it in the country, and send out Canadian wheat or flour made from Canadian wheat, then he maintained the tariff would not protect the Canadian farmer. Representing, as he did, a farming constituency, and advocating Protection as he had done, he must put on record his views in reference to this binding system. In answer, it might be said they could not shackle the millers; that if they did, a certain number must close up their establishments. All he could say was this: If it was necessary to close up some of the mills in order to give the farmers the protection promised them, let them close them. It was better a few should be closed than the farmers injured. He then came to the 5th resolution, which empowered the Government to admit into the country, duty free, from the United States, articles now paying duty, on being satisfied the same articles were admitted free into the States from Canada. He had no objection to that resolution; but he wished to mention that, if the Americans threw the duty off corn, from Canada, an article we did not export, the Government might have to say, under the tariff, at present, that they would admit corn free from the United States, which would give the Americans all the advantage. But he believed that the Canadian Government would exercise careful watch over this matter, and would see that, in admitting articles into Canada free, there was a corresponding advantage to the Canadian farmer and producer. Having thus given his reasons for supporting the tariff, and stated wherein he feared difficulties would arise, he would no longer occupy the time of the House.

When the tariff came to be considered in detail, he might have some further remarks to make. He would, in conclusion, again urge upon the Government the necessity of giving their serious attention to the bonding system, as he was satisfied it was one which very deeply interested the farming community.

MR. ARKELL said he did not intend to make any lengthy remarks on the tariff question, as he was satisfied the members of the House were all anxious to see the debate closed, and the business of the Session expedited. The supporters of the financial policy of the Government were, moreover, anxious to return to their constituencies to receive the ovations awaiting them, on their return home. He believed the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition would prefer to remain here two or three months longer, until the excitement on this great question had settled down in the minds of the people. He regretted the hon. member from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) was not now in his seat, as he took a particular interest in that gentleman who represented the other half of his county. In a speech made the other day, he made use of this expression :

"It was rather unfortunate for everybody concerned that the late Government should have come into office in the face of the financial storm, which was long foreseen."

Now, he must say that he agreed with the hon. gentleman. It was a very unfortunate day for the country when they came into power. Our Canada Pacific Railway would, to-day, have been in a fair way of progress had it not been for those gentlemen who were now in Opposition. He was inclined to think his hon. friend from West Elgin had become a Protectionist, as he observed that he stated in his speech that the farmers were not protected under this tariff. He (Mr. Arkell) might say that he believed the farmers had not got sufficient Protection. He would like to have seen a duty on corn of 10c. a bushel, and $4 duty on every barrel of pork brought into this country, because he was satisfied we could raise all the corn and pork we required, and a large quantity for export. His hon. friend from West Elgin said that he was afraid that, under this tariff, we should raise up a shoddy aristocracy in this country. He (Mr. Arkell) would only say that, under this tariff, we should keep out one kind of shoddy at any rate, which had been imported into this country from England in the past—that is the shoddy cloth. If, as the hon. gentleman had stated, no one else in this country would make money under this tariff but the manufacturers, it would not be an unmixed evil, for he was satisfied that the more monied aristocracy we had in the country the better, provided they made a proper use of their money. The hon. gentleman had said that the farmers were not protected; the promises made to them had not been fulfilled. He (Mr. Arkell) believed, however, that, under this tariff, their interests had been pretty well looked after; that they were very well satisfied with it. He was receiving, daily, letters from the farmers in both Ridings of Elgin, who, with scarcely an exception, expressed themselves perfectly satisfied. The hon. gentleman from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) speaking of the duty on malt, said the Government had reduced it to 1c. per pound, instead of 2c. If there was anything in the legislation of the late Government he condemned, it was raising the duty on malt to 2c. per pound. One bushel of barley would make 36 lbs. of malt. In his part of the country they used to get 70c. to 75c. per bushel for barley, but when the Government raised the duty on malt to 2c., they collected 72c. duty on every bushel of barley the farmer raised, and the farmer was only getting from 45c. to 50c. per bushel for his barley, before being malted. That was the kind of protection the late Government gave to the farmers of this country. He would rather see the malt duty abolished and the American plan adopted of placing the duty on beer, as it could be much more easily collected than when placed on malt. He knew the brewers of this country were subject to a great deal of inconvenience from the action of the excise officers. In the town where he resided, there were two breweries, and the brewers were constantly complaining of the inconvenience to which they were put by the rules of the excise officers. The hon. member (Mr. Casey) said that the oatmeal mills were not considered, but he believed they were in as good a condition now as before. Under the bonding system they would be allowed to import all the oats they required. They were given, he believed, a period of four months, during which they would not have to pay one dollar into the revenue. All that they would have to do was to give a bond for all the oats they imported into the Dominion of Canada, and if the oatmeal was exported within four months the bond would be cancelled. It was the same with wheat. In reference to corn, he would like to have seen the duty raised to 10c. They had a territory in his section of thousands of acres, where just as good corn could be raised as in the United States. A few days ago he received a letter from a gentleman in East Elgin, stating that the farmers under Protection were going to plant a large quantity of corn this spring, as they were satisfied it would be remunerative. There was no duty on wool. He would like the Finance Minister to put a small duty on wool, but at the same time he must say that the duty on coarse wool would not interfere with the wool we raised in this country. The only wools we imported were fine wools, which we could not raise. He was curious to see the hon. gentleman from West Elgin record his vote on this question, because if he voted in favor of this tariff he would then represent the other half of the county, which he (Mr. Arkell) represented, but if he voted against it, he would not represent the views of the electors of West Elgin. The hon. gentleman complained that professional men were not protected. He had no doubt but they required Protection. He supposed medical men were a necessary evil in this country, and as to the legal profession, he thought that if the lawyers would take Horace Greely's advice and go west, it would be all the better for the interests of this country. (The hon. gentleman from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) said the farmers were promised a duty to raise the prices of their products. He did not think any member of this House, in addressing his constituents, ever dwelt much on that point, although they may have been told that Protection would secure to them the home market.

The hon. member for South Brant asked if we would dare to go to the country with this tariff, or with this "thing," as he called it, holding it up. He thought that if the hon. member for South Brant went to his constituents, the chances were that he would not come back here for five years. He (Mr. Arkell) was satisfied we should not go back to our constituents, and that the people of this country had perfect confidence in the present Government. Hon. gentlemen opposite had told us that this tariff would cause an alienation between us and the Mother Country. He hoped this was not true, as there was something more than dollars and cents binding Canada to Great Britain. He believed that if this country progressed, as he expected it would under this tariff, increasing in population and wealth, the volume of trade with the Mother Country would increase in proportion. It had also been stated that this tariff would produce bad feelings with the United States. But the United States had been prospering for years under a similar tariff, and he was satisfied that the intelligent part of the American community would admit that in following their example we had acted wisely. It had been advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite that our manufacturers would ruin each other by competition; others advanced that, under the new tariff, consumers would have to pay higher prices for manufactured goods. He could not see how those hon. gentlemen could reconcile these opposite statements. He was afraid they did not take very good care to have their speeches correspond with each other. Our farmers were fully entitled to the home market. Under this tariff this market would be secured to them, and they would still have a surplus for exportation to other countries. He was satisfied our manufacturers would produce nearly everything we needed, and anything they could not manufacture it should be the policy of the Government to admit under as low a duty as possible. It would also increase the population of the country. For the last ten years the population had not increased much, and most of the people who came here from other countries very soon went to the Western States. But under the new policy the mechanics, the artisans and the labouring classes would find employment in this country, and remain here. Another advantage would be the building up of an intercolonial trade between Eastern and Western Provinces, and thus tend to promote a feeling of unity. It was stated by the hon. member for North Norfolk that the balance of trade being in favour of the nation, was an evidence of distress, and that when the balance was against the nation, it was an evidence of prosperity. Now, they had had a balance of trade against them for years, ever since the late Government came into power. He would like to ask the hon. gentleman how he could reconcile that statement? We had no prosperity in this country. For the last five years everything had been in a depressed condition. The farmers had been complaining of the disadvantages under which they laboured, and, he maintained, the fact that they had a balance of trade against them was an evidence of poverty. It was an evidence they were labouring under great disadvantages. It was all very well for hon. gentlemen to talk about Great Britain. He supposed she was the only country in the world that understood Free-trade, and he believed, from the reaction which had taken place there within the last few years, that they would probably see a Protective policy established yet in that country. The hon. member had spoken of him as a Protectionist. He might say that he had been a Protectionist for years, and, in conversation with the people of his Riding, and with people wherever he had met them, he had heard this National Policy brought forward, and, on all occasions, the farmers complained of the injustice done to them. The manufacturers also complained of the injustice that was done to them. On the 17th September a verdict upon the subject was given by the people. It had been stated that the right hon. the leader of the Government had started this question for political purposes. He was willing to concede that the right hon. gentleman did advance this as part of the platform, because the people of this country had made up their minds that a change must take place, and that change was in favour of a Protective policy. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow), the night previously, made a non-Protective speech, in which he wound up by referring to emigration. He gave the hon. gentleman credit for taking a very active interest in furthering the scheme. He believed he had been chairman of the Emigration Committee. He (Mr Arkell) maintained that if there was one single act of the late Government which should be condemned, it was its emigration policy. He found that nearly $1,200,000 had been taken out of the revenues of the country - for what? He would ask the hon. member for South Perth to say for what that money was paid out. That money was expended at a time when we were labouring under a depression. We had been labouring under a depression for the past five years, and that $1,200,000, he maintained, had been paid out for the purpose of bringing more poverty into the country—for the purpose of bringing people from all parts of the world, when there was no employment for them. They had thousands of people in this country looking for employment, and obliged to go to the other side of the line in order to obtain it. Especially in the winter season of the year we had an overplus of population completely out of employment. Notwithstanding this, the late Government, during the past five years, had expended $1,200,000 for emigration purposes. It would have been far better if this money had been employed in helping the people who were already in the country, instead of sending it to England to bring out emigrants when we had nothing for them to do. He wished to call the attention of the Government of the day to the fact that, five years ago, the hon. the leader of the late Government was elected by an overwhelming majority in 1874. On the strength of that majority he supposed he could carry the country with him, but he found that, on the 17th of September, the people of this country could think for themselves. They were not satisfied with the legislation they had had, and in consequence, they were condemned to the cold shades of Opposition, and he thought they would remain there for a long time to come. He would impress upon the Government of the day that they were elected on this National Policy; they were elected by a majority of about the same as his hon.

friend the leader of the Opposition had been five years ago, and if the hon. gentleman controlling the affairs of the country did not give the people proper legislation, the people would turn them out of office as readily as they had turned out the leader of the Opposition. The Government should exercise, in every Department, economy, and he believed that if they did exercise that proper economy, and if they gave to the country good legislation—and this tariff he was satisfied was the right kind of legislation—he was certain the Government would have the country at their back. But after that was carried, there were other measures to come before the country, which would demand from the Government wise administration. He hoped the hon. the Minister of Finance would not be led away by any taunts that might be thrown at him from hon. gentlemen opposite. He hoped that when the details of this tariff were being considered, that if he discovered any class of the community were labouring under any injustice, that he would make any alteration he might deem necessary, notwithstanding the taunts of hon. gentlemen opposite. They were not legislating for gentlemen on the other side of the House. They were legislating for the people of this country, and they did not care a fig for any remarks they might make. He hoped that the Minister of Finance would exercise his own judgment, and he, for one, was quite willing to leave the matter in his hands. He would give him his support as far as he could, because he had every confidence in his ability, and he believed the country at large had confidence in his ability. The hon. leader of the Opposition had brought forward the name of Richard Cobden. He (Mr. Arkell) could only say that Richard Cobden was a very good man in his day. There was no doubt he left a very good reputation behind him, but he was satisfied that had Mr. Cobden lived at the present day that his views would not have met with the approbation of the people of Great Britain. And if the hon. member leading the Opposition constituted himself the Richard Cobden of Canada, which he thought he did from the remarks he made the other night, he was satisfied that that gentleman's reputation, in days to follow, would not be equal to that of the Richard Cobden of England. He could only say, in conclusion, that he was elected to come to this House purely on the National Policy.

MR. CARTWRIGHT : Right or wrong.

MR. ARKILL said he was satisfied this tariff was going to build up this country. He was satisfied it was going to increase the population of the country, and he was satisfied it was going to make Canada the place for Canadians to live in, and that under this tariff we should prosper.

MR. MASSUE said that, at this stage of the discussion, he desired to offer only a few remarks, in order to make known the grounds upon which he intended to base the vote he was going to give, and in order to do justice to his constituents, who had placed their interests in his hands, and expressed the desire of seeing a change brought about in the fiscal policy of the country. He had observed, with pleasure, that the hon. the Finance Minister was resolved to earnestly adopt the Protective system; he had found the true means of responding to the wants of the hour by giving to the country that which had been promised during the elections. The system now proposed was nearly the same as that to which the Americans had had recourse in 1824 and in 1828. At that time their commercial situation was on a level with the present situation in Canada—the Protective system had saved the Americans. In 1871 France was obliged to pay her war debt, and was thrown ten years behind England by this same war. By the Protective system she had been able to retrieve her commercial position, and, to-day, she was competing seriously with England. Germany, tired with struggling against the surrounding nations, had declared, by the mouth of Bismarck, that she was going to have recourse to Protection, and Bismarck, in making this declaration, had added that Germany was for the Germans, and that the Germans were for Germany. That, indeed, was the aim of all Protective systems which they had never failed to attain. Like causes produced like effects, when the circumstances were identical. A glance at the situation of Canada would show that commerce was ruined, that no capital was to be found, that confidence was gone, that individual and public credit had fallen; home products, the fruit of hard labour, undergoing competition that was calculated to dishearten the producer, and prevent the growth of the mining, manufacturing and agricultural industries of the country. The ports of Canada were open to all, whilst the ports of all countries were closed against Canada. For a young country like Canada, whose capital was far from considerable, if its policy were to remain in a passive state, it would have to follow the good or the bad fortune of the nation that made a slaughter market of it. Speaking in a general way, it might be truthfully said, if like causes produce like effects when the circumstances are the same, that the position of Canada was identical with that of other countries that had been commercially ruined, and that what had saved the latter could not reasonably be supposed to ruin Canada. The facts that he stated were a matter of history, and, for proof of what he said, he would merely refer the House to the history of the countries of which he had spoken. The Canadian people, by a majority of their representatives, had accepted this system after having heard it discussed. Members had not the right to shirk from fulfilling the conditions upon which they had been elected, and, as a representative of one of the agricultural counties of his Province, he was happy to say that he was satisfied with the present tariff. It was true that, looked upon from a sectional point of view, it seemed contrary to certain local interests; but, when mutual concessions established an equilibrium between the sacrifices and the profits of each part of the Dominion, it would be unreasonable to ask for more. This was why he supported the Government in this reform, and why he would vote for the tariff.

Mr. RICHEY said he had noticed in the course of this debate, amid the discordance of sentiment by which it had been characterised, that there was one point on which all were in perfect harmony, namely, the commanding importance of the question itself; and it was encouraging to feel that they did not approach it without due preparation, both of their own thoughts and of the public mind. The members of this House were fresh from their constituencies—from those on behalf of whom they are deputed to speak and act, and in reference to the great principle at issue, a verdict had already been rendered by the country. There was no argument that could now be advanced; no objection that could be urged upon which the country had not already pronounced. He spoke, of course, of the general principle of the measure, not of its details, which were open to be canvassed, as to how far they were, or were not, subservient to the general principle. But this much might be said, both as regarded the principle of the measure and its details, the public expectation was fully prepared; there had been evinced a common desire that some measure, having in view the object of the one before the House, should be presented and adopted. What were those objects? First, sufficiency of revenue, and, secondly, adequacy of Protection. In reference to the first of these, he presumed there could be no question whatever that it was indispensable. The hon. gentleman here dwelt upon the deficits of the past five years, and the fact that we were now face to face with the necessity of restoring the equilibrium between revenue and expenditure. With regard to the second object, there could exist no doubt that it was desirable to lighten the burden of taxation by strengthening the shoulders that were to bear it, and necessary to import a fresh impulse to the development of our resources, which were magnificent, and the revival of our industries and trade, which were in a languishing condition. They were told, however, that the depression under which we laboured was above the power, and beyond the province, of legislation; that it was common to all nations. He did not deny the interdependence of the great commercial countries, and that there came at times grave crises which overshadowed them all. His contention was, that, under wiser fiscal regulations, Canada might, even in a time of extremity for older nations, have possessed a better opportunity. They were told that the United States had suffered. But the United States had been disorganised by civil war; their commerce crippled, their currency disordered, their shipping largely swept away. If Germany was cited, they knew that Germany, from military ambition, had become a military camp. If they were pointed to France, they remembered that she had felt the force of foreign war, the tramp of hostile armies; that her resources were drained to indemnify her invaders. If they looked at England, it was true he had no similar explanation to make; but England was a Free-trade country, and he would leave the explanation of her depression to hon. gentlemen opposite. Why was it, he might ask, that young and vigorous Canada, unharmed by war, unvisited by pestilence, must take up the dirge of those old nations, merely consoling herself with the reflection that she suffered in common with them? But let it be conceded that the depression was common to all nations. There was then no argument against Protection that did not equally affect Free-trade. There was no argument whatever to be drawn from the effect of a depression, which compassed all nations alike, whether following a policy of Free-trade or a policy of Protection. But it was just here that the hon. gentlemen on the Opposition benches refused to be consistent. They never tired of alleging that Protection ruined, and that Free-trade built up. "You are assuming a policy," exclaimed the hon., the leader of the Opposition, "that has ruined other nations, and rejecting a policy which has made the Mother Country great, glorious and prosperous, beyond all precedent"—though the hon. member for Centre Huron (Mr. Cartwright) had just invited them to "consider the unfortunate position of England." Now, he might be allowed to ask, in connection with this assertion of the hon. the leader of the Opposition, how could they be accused of rejecting that which had never been proffered to them? How could they be said to have rejected the principles of Free-trade, when, according to his own showing, they had never been asked to adopt them? He found, on referring back a year, in the columns of the Globe, which he presumed might be relied on for an accurate report of the utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite, that "Mr. MACKENZIE, in a brief but vigorous speech, pointed out that Canada was neither a Free-trade nor a Protection country. Personally he was a Free-trader, but he was convinced that the circumstances of the country were such that it was impossible to give practical effect to Free-trade doctrines. The Administration had, on all occasions, sought to promote the best interests of the Dominion, and they had adopted a revenue tariff which afforded a large measure of Protection to everyone engaged in manufacturing pursuits."

When the hon. gentleman, the other night, introduced the amendment which was now before the House, he (Mr. Richey) noticed that the hon. gentleman reiterated the remark, to the effect that he had always contended that the adoption of Free-trade doctrines in the circumstances of the country was impossible. He (Mr. Richey) found such language as this: "The incidental Protection afforded by the present tariff is very great; so it is absurd and untruthful to assume that the fiscal policies of Canada and England are identical, or that the Liberal party here makes no distinction between the condition of things in this country, and the condition of things in the Mother Country." Again, he found the same paper, in July last, rebuking the organ of the Conservative party for stating that the then Government regarded a home market for agricultural produce as "a positive calamity," in the following terms:—

"This is on a par with the assertion that a Government which levies a higher duty on imported manufactures than any colonial administration save one in the British Dominions, and a higher tariff than Great Britain herself possessed before she inaugurated her present fiscal policy, is bent on the establishment of absolute Free-trade in Canada."

But he would ask: Could both propositions be true? If England, France, Germany and the United States were all suffering under a common depression, arising from a common cause, could it be said that the United States were being ruined by Protection, and that Great Britain was "prosperous beyond all precedent" through Free-trade? With regard to the second of these propositions, he would venture to assert it was not true. That England, during the last five-and-thirty years, under Free-trade, had taken rapid strides, and had achieved unprecedented success, he rejoiced to believe; but France and the United States, both protected countries, had accompanied her with equal steps. Circumstances had arisen, at the same time, which gave a wonderful impetus to mercantile and industrial pursuits all over the world. They had discovered gold in California and Australia, and that led to a great increase of inter-communication. They had the opening up of trade with China; India had been more fully brought under British domination. The barriers to intercourse with Japan had been taken down. They had an immense increase of carrying power in the perfected application of steam conveyance on sea and land. They had the wonderfully augmented facilities for communication afforded by the electric telegraph, and they had the introduction of those international exhibitions, which had given a vast impulse to industrial enterprise. All these in themselves were calculated to produce effects which could not be lost in a single generation. As he had said before, the United States and France had accompanied England in this race, and had not lagged behind. An hon. gentleman opposite, he thought it was the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), had given figures respecting England, which covered the period from 1842 to 1872; but, in presenting figures in regard to the United States, he had contrasted separate series of years. Had he taken figures for the same period from the United States and France, he would have seen that the development of trade and industry in those countries was not so inferior to that of Great Britain. He was pleased to be able to refer as frequently as he did to a paper which spoke on behalf of the Opposition of this House, and he would now read the following sentences, which he had taken from an editorial article in that paper:—

"France," it said, "before the revolution, had a starving peasantry, an impoverished soil, and an intolerable aristocracy. Since that time, amidst all the commotions arising from civil disturbances and external wars, she has always gone forward, her people have become more comfortable, and her soil is always more and more skillfully cultivated. * * * Within the last twenty-five years the annual value of French agricultural produce has increased to the extent of £100,000,000. In England farms are now seeking tenants."

Now, during the last week, it had been suggested in the House of Lords that enquiry had been made in regard to the depression of commerce and agriculture in England. Lord Beaconsfield stated that the depression was unprecedented, and that the public wealth had decreased £80,000,000. He (Mr. Riehey) did not think that went to confirm the proposition laid down by his hon. friend opposite that Free-trade induced prosperity, and that Protection destroyed it. He need not repeat what had been so often said, that even the abolition of the Corn Laws might be looked upon rather as a measure of Protection to manufacturers, while withdrawing it from agriculture, because the result of the abolition of the Corn Laws was to cheapen labour, in order that the manufacturing enterprises of that country might be profited; and it was in order to seek the development of the manufacturing enterprises of this country and furnish variety of occupation, that they had to resort to the principle of Protection in the present circumstances of this country. So he felt that, whether Free-trade and Protection were alike indifferent in their operation, or Protection as a policy was superior to Free-trade, or Free-trade, as a principle was to be preferred to Protection; with Canada, Protection was the duty of the hour. There was nothing in our circumstances or the relations of this country to show that a Protective policy in the present stage of our development would not be beneficial to us, while there was much to show that the kind of freedom in trade which we had permitted was injurious. He would ask the House to contemplate, for a moment, the magnificence of this country, vast in its extent, rich in its resources, free in its institutions; peopled with races full of vigour, both of body and mind. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), it was true, had decried this country as "the worst half of the continent." If it were so, it furnished a greater reason why we should bring judgment and energy to bear in such a way as to enable us the more successfully to compete with our more favoured rivals

But that country was not inevitably best which had the fairest clime ; where the earth yielded her fruits most readily, and the conditions of life demanded the least of toil. Better might be the country and longer her prosperity, where nature yielded her treasures only after conflict ; where the spirit of her sons was stimulated by the somewhat of difficulty with which they had to contend. Turkey might not have been so poor to-day had she been less fair, and Britain might not have had her present towering influence had she exacted less at the hands of her inhabitants. Let us not repine if such a country was ours ; one in which the conditions of prosperity lay in the labour of the hands, and the labour of the brains of its people, the one to devise and the other to carry into execution the means which gave success. It was a country large enough and fair enough to become the peer of the proudest nation of the globe ; long enough, and broad enough, and deep enough—with its depths of soil traversed by valuable mineral deposits, and with its depths of water, swarming with the treasures of the sea, and river, and lake. And yet, with all its capabilities, with all its inherent vigour, this country, which started so successfully twelve years ago, and grew rapidly in prosperity, had, for the last five years, become more and more depressed. The reason was largely to be found in the different policies pursued by the bordering country, and by ourselves. We had been shut out from our natural market whilst we had given the free run of our country to those who chose to take it. If he might resort to a figure, he would say that we had foolishly supposed we could run a race with a stronger competitor, leaving him unweighted on the course, with every muscle free and well trained by art, whilst we, with muscular energy, it was true, but all untrained and undeveloped, were borne down by the conditions which he imposed. It was for us now to say whether we should have a fair field and grant no favour. If he carried with him, as he knew he did, the sense of this House in the views which he espoused, regarding the necessity for a readjustment of the tariff in the direction of rendering the revenue more adequate to the demands upon it, and of fostering and promoting our native industries in place of crippling and repressing them, the main question to consider was whether the tariff now submitted would meet the demands of our position. He thought it would ; he saw displayed in this tariff great sagacity in the application of a two-fold principle. He might think, as an individual, that, in some cases, that principle might have been carried further, and in others had been carried too far ; that in some cases the methods were cumbrous and inconvenient. He might seek, perhaps, unless convinced of the contrary by the explanations of the Finance Minister when they came to discuss the items, for some amendments or modifications in some particulars ; but it was an able measure as a whole, and it was impossible to say otherwise than that the Minister of Finance had nobly redeemed the promises made to the people, and had nobly repelled, by practical performance, the assertions made before and since the elections by hon. gentlemen opposite. Those hon. gentlemen seemed to have been unable to conceive of a tariff which could give sufficient revenue and confer Protection, or furnish the necessary amount of Protection, and yet afford a revenue. Here was a measure, expanded in its fair proportions before them, in which our mining, agricultural, manufacturing and shipping interests were all carefully guarded. He might enter into a review of many of the particulars in which the Finance Minister had so well succeeded, but so many had gone before him in this direction that it was unnecessary to do so. He would refer to the fact that, in the adjustment of duties on teas, he had pursued a course which, he thought, ought to have received the thanks of the hon. member for North Norfolk upon the principle he had himself laid down. If it were true that duties were cumulative to the consumer, according to the number of intervening parties through whose hands they must pass until they reached the consumer, then the Finance Minister was entitled to their thanks that he so levied these duties as to induce direct trade with the countries of growth. The same principle was applied to sugar, thus aiding to develop our West Indian trade and yet producing the requisite revenue, the duties being imposed so as to encourage the importation of the raw rather than the refined article. With respect to coal, the Finance Minister expected to derive revenue from the coal imported, and yet to aid in the development of our mines to the extent of three or four hundred thousand tons beyond the present output. Whilst he hoped this object would be attained, he believed it would be much better attained by a still higher duty. He was yet unable to see why 75c. a ton should not have been imposed upon all foreign coal imported into this country, when he considered that that was the precise amount levied on our coal by the United States; that, by the tariff, duties were imposed on every article which entered into the use of coal-miners, and that no drawback was granted, as was wisely done in the case of shipping and other industries; and that the tariff was accompanied by a resolution in the direction of reciprocity. The hon. member for Lambton, it was true, assailed this duty as cruel in the extreme, because it was imposed on a necessary of life. It was a fallacy to assert that coal was a necessary of life. Air and food and fuel might be necessities of life, but it was a fallacy to say of any particular article that it was an absolute necessity. It was a fallacy bordering upon an absurdity to say of coal that it was a necessary of life, and to treat tea as not being so, in a country teeming with forests, where there were hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, who never used a pound of coal, while not one of them would be content without his pound of tea, on which hon. gentlemen opposite had replaced the duty which their predecessors had removed. He did not profess to be able to satisfy himself entirely, regarding the application of the principle of ad valorem and specific duties in regard to cotton and woollen goods, but this could be fully discussed when they entered on these questions in detail. He did not wonder, when he considered the general approval which attended this tariff, at the dismay which had spread among the members of the Opposition. He desired for a few minutes to devote himself to the task of examining some of the objections which these hon. gentlemen had presented to this House. He would first ask where were the objections from the masses throughout the country, against this tariff? If all these hon. gentlemen said was true, the table should have groaned under the weight of petitions presented from the different constituencies against it. But what were the objections with which they had to cope, and whence did they come? They came from gentlemen who last year expressed themselves as eager to hear the voice of the country on this matter, and had heard it but seemed to heed it not. Last Session the hon. member for Centre Huron (Mr. Cartwright) had said: "It will be for the country to decide what particular fiscal policy it may please to adopt, and it will be for the House or for their successors to decide how that particular policy will be enforced." It would now appear that the last word should have read "obstructed," and not "enforced." But to turn to the arguments. The hon. member for Lambton said it was a humiliating spectacle which this country presented in taking up the cast-off clothes of older nations. There were worse things for the young country of to-day to do than to take up the cast-off clothes of its parent, it adapted to its particular period of growth. It were better to give this exhibition of thrift than to attempt to begin where the parent left off. But beginning our national life, we were not in a position to act like the Mother Country, with accumulated capital and resources. Everyone in the country ought to be, in some sense, among the producing class; few could be counted solely among the consumers, for whom alone, the hon. gentlemen opposite had any consideration. It was asked how could a country become great by simply imposing taxes upon the people. He thought the late Government, while in power five years, had given a very complete answer to that question. They had shown that a country could not become richer by merely raising the amount of taxation to meet the increased expenditure. This tariff was framed on the combined principle of raising sufficient revenue and giving Protection to develop our resources and enable us to meet better the difficulties which were imposed. They were referred to the contrast of the depression in the United States with the condition of England, and were pointed to the communistic movements in the United States, to the riots at Pittsburg, as if there had been none at Blackburn, as if the English papers were not filled with accounts of riots and distress among thousands of workmen. They were asked again if, at a time when labour and money were scarce, it was not the best policy to make everything as cheap as possible. It was not necessary, the depression would take care of that. Our great object should be to make money and labour more plentiful. But he might be able to show that, while pursuing the policy of Protection with the higher object of promoting and benefitting industry, the effect might be at the same time to cheapen the price of many commodities. The hon. member for Lambton was solicitous for the poor man because of the "cruel tax" upon coal. Let him mark how that great statesman, Daniel Webster, treated this subject thirty years ago, and what he then said upon it. When it was desired to do away with the highly Protective tariff then in existence in the United States, and to introduce one which would impose a general ad valorem charge of 20 per cent., he vehemently opposed that measure in the interest of his country and the coal-miners. It was then deemed necessary, in order to compete successfully with Nova Scotia coal, to have the American tariff on coal $1.75 per ton; but they had been able to reduce it to $1.25, and, since, to 75c., its present figure. The Americans had gone on developing their mining industries until they were able to meet foreign competition. Webster said: "The increase of the product of the Schuylkill region, under the Compromise Act, from 1837 to 1842, was only 32,000 tons. In the succeeding three years, that is to say, from 1842 to 1845, that increase amounted to no less than 560,000. The price of labour, of course, became greatly advanced; but the price of coal fell from $5.50 per ton, to $3.27. A pretty good proof, this, that prices may fall in consequence of Protection." That showed that, if the object of the Government was to make things cheap, there was a better way of doing it than by leaving the industries of the country in a depressed condition. Then they had the hon. member for Centre Huron reiterating his argument, with which the country had grown familiar, in favour of a do-nothing policy, according to which the Government was to fold its hands and admonish the industrial population to get rich through frugality and hard work. But he was, as member for Halifax, particularly concerned with the fact that the member for Centre Huron (Mr. Cartwright) had had one kindly thought, one word of cordial commendation and well-feigned congratulation for the Finance Minister, while frankly owning that he had lacked courage himself to discharge the duties of his office with fidelity to his country; for he confessed that he was forced to become responsible for an expenditure of $125,000, to his ineffable disgust, by men who had a political hold upon him. If the hon. member for Centre Huron thought that his congratulations to the Minister of Finance for having omitted from the Estimates the grants formerly made to the Allan steamers and the George Shallock were timely, they might take leave to extend to him (Mr. Cartwright) their condolences, first, for his want of ability to be true to his own convictions, and, secondly, for his weakness for want of information in supposing that, in granting the usual subsidies to the steamers plying to Halifax, he was guilty of wrong. He (Mr. Richey) suspected that the satisfaction of the hon. gentleman arose, not so much from his admiration of the Finance Minister, as from the thought that in this very omission would be found a ground for charging the Government with inconsistency, and another apology for that wild cry of disloyalty and discrimination against England, of which they had heard so much from the Opposition. That hon. gentleman felt, no doubt, that, whilst it might be said, with some degree of consistency, by a Finance Minister coming down with a deficit, and no provision to meet it, that there was no money for a certain service, it could not be alleged quite so well by one who presented a policy that should provide a revenue to meet every demand upon it; and, whilst it might be perfectly conformable to the policy of an Administration which seemed to be throwing their trade more and more towards the United States, and taking it more and more from England to withdraw those subsidies, it could hardly be contended to be equally in agreement with a policy which pointed rather to the encouragement of Canadian trade with the Mother Country, that one of the first acts under it should be to imperil the connection by steam, that had for 40 years existed between Great Britain and her nearest North American port. The member for Centre Huron might have been actuated to some extent by some such feeling, and he feared that there were in the offices filled last year by that hon. gentleman, and the member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) certain traditions that had been accepted by their successors without sufficient scrutiny. He hoped that the present Minister of Finance and his colleagues would feel that they were not yielding up their own convictions, or surrendering themselves to such influences the member for Centre Huron depicted, but that, under a conviction of the actual necessity and propriety of those grants, they would yet be introduced into the Supplementary Estimates. The Halifax fortnightly mail service was very important, when they considered not only the inconvenience that must result to a large portion of the inhabitants of all those Maritime Provinces from its discontinuance, but that Halifax was, at least, as near as Rimouski, and reflected that England garrisoned Halifax with her troops and made it the headquarters of her fleet on the North American station, and that it was a point of connection for travel and traffic for a great part of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Bermuda, and portions of the West Indies, and, by the George Shattuck, with St. Pierre. From all those considerations, he felt they had a case in which they could appeal, not simply to such consideration as was spoken of by the member for Centre Huron, but, upon the ground of consistency with their own policy, to the Government, for the continuance of that service. The member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) had denounced the tariff at first as prohibitory; then he said it was an attenuated, shrivelled copy of the American tariff. He (Mr. Richey) was unable to reconcile those statements. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr.

Charlton) had called it a servile copy, and other members a half-and-half measure, and then asked them why they were not bold enough to take the American tariff, pure and simple. Then, taking up the Hansard of last year, and going over the votes given on the principle of Protection, they had one division after another presented for the two-fold purpose, no doubt, of charging hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side with inconsistency, and convincing the House how evil would be the effects of the acceptance of that tariff. Well, there was nothing inconsistent in members who were able to vote for one general all-comprehensive measure not voting for certain separate details. Those able to vote for this measure might not feel themselves at liberty to vote simply for a duty on coal, for Nova Scotia, or on grain for Ontario. He was sorry to see such arguments introduced, as they led simply and solely to sectionalism. He believed that the voice of sectionalism should be hushed in the presence of a great national question, such as they were now engaged on, in regard to which it had been thought to silence them by quotations from political economists, whose writing served sometimes to perplex rather than illuminate the way of their too rigid devotees. Much as we were indebted to them, he thought they had not yet reached the position entitling their dicta to be accepted unquestioningly by those engaged in the practical work of legislation and administration. They might be very good servants, but bad masters to those on whom devolved the responsibility of moulding the destinies of the country, and deftly adapting their processes to the necessities of the times. They had listened to two arguments, by which they were to be completely overwhelmed, one being that Tupperisms had been introduced into that debate. He had no doubt that those home-thrusts, those arrows shot by the forceful arm of an hon. gentleman on the Ministerial side, and barbed by facts, had pierced the armour of hon. gentlemen opposite, who would find there was no shield that could be constructed on that side, that would be fitted to repel those arrows. But the irresistible argument against adopting the tariff was the alleged change of views of the hon. member for Lincoln, many years ago, of whom the hon. member for South Brant was told that another member had heard that it was understood that he had attended the caucus of one party in the forenoon, and that of the other in the afternoon, and the inference was that, therefore, this tariff ought not to be accepted. He (Mr. Richey) was glad that that hon. gentleman (Mr. Rykert) had triumphantly exonerated himself from that imputation, and that the tariff, whose fate seemed trembling in the balance, might now be considered safe. The hon. members for South and Centre Huron appeared in conflict on this question, for, by the former the Finance Minister was told that he knew he might have provided the additional two millions wanted, without grinding the toiling masses, by reducing salaries and cutting down the general expenditure. Well, doubtless, the hon. gentlemen opposite, who had been in office five years, had tried that experiment in a time of deep depression, and, after finding it impossible, then, could very clearly see how that process might be adopted now. But they had on record the language of the member for Centre Huron, who, when bringing down his Budget last year, said that "any further reductions of expenditure would be undesirable and inexpedient, unless they were prepared for a very radical change in their constitution." There was another hon. gentleman on the opposite side, whose speeches had furnished him with sufficient arguments in favour of Protection. Now, he did not refer to speeches delivered two or three years ago, but to speeches delivered during the last Session, or delivered in addressing the people last year by the hon. member for North Norfolk. He would not follow that hon. gentleman through his remarks upon the balance of trade; he acknowledged the validity of a great many of the arguments he used. It might be perfectly true that, where the balance of trade was against the country having a large accumulated capital, and receiving a large amount of interest, especially a country drawing wealth from the sea, and prosecuting a great carrying trade, it did not indicate so bad a state of things as where these conditions were absent. One

hon. gentleman referred to the fact of parties going on a whaling voyage and bringing in the products of their industry and increasing the wealth of the country. That only showed that it was necessary, at times, to take many things into consideration in order to come to a sound conclusion, but all these things put together did not prove that it was in itself a better state of things for a country to have the balance of trade against her than in her favour. The hon. gentleman undertook to detail to them the evils which would result from the operation of this tariff, and he must confess that he could not help thinking of the time when George Stephenson was pushing his railway scheme, which had since proved so successful. The hon. gentleman from North Norfolk enumerated the evils which would follow from the introduction of this tariff; in the first place, he said, it would rob the farmers; in the second place, it would rob the lumbermen; in the third place, it would rob the fishermen; in the fourth place, it would rob the labourer; in the fifth place, it would rob the shipbuilder; in the sixth place, it would rob every man who received a salary; in the seventh place, it would enable the manufacturers to rob all classes, and, for diversion, to prey upon each other; here were seven tremendous evils which were to result from this tariff. When George Stephenson was battling the railway question in England, what kind of opposition did he have to encounter? It was said, in the first place, that horses would become useless and unsaleable; in the second place, there would be no market for oats; in the third place, the hounds would cease running; in the fourth place, the hens would cease laying; in the fifth place, the stacks of hay would be burned up by cinders from the locomotive; in the sixth place, the boiler would burst and blow everything to atoms, and, in the seventh place, it was impossible to conceive of anything going at such a rate, and the wheels would only revolve on their axles, and the cars would stand stock still; and yet the railway system had been a great success, and he held that similar results would attend the predictions of the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk. Coming now to the Maritime Provinces, it had been argued that this tariff was a violation of the compact entered into at Confederation; that this question had never been in issue before the people of those Provinces; that their fishermen were not protected; and that their lumbermen were ignored. The hon. member for Richmond, (Mr. Flynn) had made these complaints. As he listened to the speech of that hon. gentleman, he marked the elegance of his diction, but it fell upon his ears like the song of the dying swan, because it seemed to him as the expiring note of anti-Confederation prejudice. It was asserted that this tariff was a violation of the compact. They had been so long accustomed to hear, in Nova Scotia, that connection with Canada was the result of conquest, and not a compact, that he was glad at last to have the concession that it was based upon agreement. They were told that the violation of the compact consisted in raising the tariff above what it was at the time of Confederation, which was 15 per cent. When did the violation take place? It took place when that tariff was raised to 17½ per cent., and, if the hon. gentleman was in this House and voted for that tariff, he condoned the violation. Every hon. gentleman on the Opposition benches who voted for that tariff condoned it, as did every constituency which returned one of those gentlemen. But they had all returned to this House on the understanding that this tariff was to be readjusted, and increased, and, therefore, by this very act, they disposed of the question of a violation of the compact. But they were told that the question was not in issue before the people. That had been well disposed of by the hon. member for Cardwell the other day, when he read, from a speech of the ex-Finance Minister, that the reason why he would not bring down any provision to meet the deficiency, was that the question was to go before the country. This question came also before the country, in the resolution moved on the floor of the House by the present Premier, every line of which was receiving its justification in the tariff now produced. Moreover, the press of those Provinces took good care that issue should be squarely placed before the people. One might take up the papers of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, supporting the Government of that day, for weeks before the elections, and find, in large capital letters, the question placed before the people, in a manner to intimidate them, by the idea that they were to be subjected to extreme taxation. If, as his hon. friend said, the people of the country did not vote upon this issue, it was because they had no confidence in the newspapers representing the party of which he (Mr. Flynn) was a member. He might quote from the Freeman, of St. John. The editor of that paper told the people that a readjustment of the tariff, such as the Conservatives contemplated, meant a tax upon wheat and flour, a tax upon corn and meal, a tax upon coal, upon live animals and meat, upon agricultural implements, and so on, going through the list, and thus presented to the people of that Province, in the most exaggerated terms, the very issue which it was now denied was placed before them. The very evening before the election, one of the papers printed in the city from which he came, published a card with the heading "REMEMBER!" in which it was declared that those who voted for any of the "taxationist" candidates voted in direct approval of, among other things, a duty on cotton yarn of from 46 to 60 per cent.; woollen goods, 70 per cent.; flannels and blankets, 85 per cent.; alpaca goods, 85 per cent.; carpets, 84 per cent.; light cottons, 70 per cent.; and the lowest duty was 35 per cent. This allegation corresponded to the telegram that was sent to Sir John A. Macdonald, inquiring whether it was true that the duties were to be raised to 35 per cent. And yet they were told that the question of increased taxation was not in issue. It had been said that the tariff would be destructive to the shipbuilding interest, as though the very fact that they were encouraging direct trade with foreign countries, and the conveyance of those articles of raw material which were of greater bulk than the manufactured, would not tend rather in the direction of increasing and promoting the shipping of our country, than of destroying it, as the hon. gentlemen would have them believe. And it would result, not only in this, but in the employment that was given to many classes. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) he thought laid down the proposition that 263 men would be all that would be benefitted by the encouragement given to the sugar industries. The hon. gentleman might have put two noughts to that, and he would come short of the number it would directly profit. Then they were told the tariff was inimical to immigration, and this came from the gentlemen whose policy had produced but little benefit to immigration—except to the emigration agents. It was a policy in which hundreds of thousands of dollars had been taken out of the Treasury of this country, and expended upon pets. They found that last year—according to the report of the Globe—the hon. the Minister of Agriculture declared that of 7,742 immigrants by the St. Lawrence route, only 420 settled in Canada, and that all the remainder went to the United States. They were next told this tariff was disloyal to Great Britain. He would ask, from whom did this charge come? He would not go back and search into the history of the country, or the history of the several Provinces, to enquire among what classes, or what parties, there had been any exhibitions of disloyalty in the past—whether the party they represented, containing within it a large portion of the Liberal party throughout the country, in union with the old Conservative party, whether this party had ever been chargeable with disloyalty to the British Crown. But he would ask when an intimation in the direction of the severance of the relations of these colonies with the British Empire was made, whence did it come? Did it not come from those whose political and commercial principles hon. gentlemen opposite were in full accord with? Was it not the Cobden and Bright school, whose utterances had ever pointed in that direction? No; they were introducing a policy which would bring increased prosperity and wealth to this country, and which must tend to perpetuate our relations with the Mother Country. As the hour for the recess was approaching, he would not deal with the question of our policy being unsatisfactory to the United States. It ill became the dignity of the House that such an argument as this should be adduced. In the next place, they were told that the lumbermen were to have no protection, and that the labourer was to receive no advantage. As though the very fact of helping the manufacturers, opening up the mines, developing the agricultural resources of the country, stimulating the shipping interest, and affording variety of occupation in every respect, would not conduce to the improvement of the condition of the labourer and an increased prosperity to the industrial pursuits of the country. He would again refer to that wise statesman, whose words he had quoted a short time previously, in order to show the benefits which accrued from a diversity of occupations, and how they were affected by the application of wise legislation. He said:

“The interest of every labouring community requires diversity of occupations and objects of industry. The more that diversity is multiplied or extended, the better. To diversify employment is to increase employment, and to enhance wages. And, Sir, take this great truth, place it on the title page of every book of political economy intended for the use of the United States; put it in every farmers’ almanac; let it be the heading of every column in every mechanics’ magazine; proclaim it everywhere, and make it a proverb, that where there is work for the hands of men there will be work for their teeth. Where there is employment there will be bread. It is a great blessing to the poor to have cheap food, but greater than that, prior to that, and of still higher value, is the blessing of being able to buy food by honest and respectable employment. Employment feeds, and clothes, and instructs. Employment gives health, sobriety, and morals. Constant employment and well paid labour produce, in a country like ours, general prosperity, content, and cheerfulness. Thus happy have we seen the country. Thus happy may we long continue to see it.”

These words were used by that great statesman in a retrospect of the past, when speaking of a Protective tariff. He (Mr. Richey) used them as a prediction of the future in connection with the measure before the House. It was because he believed this tariff had been framed in the true interests of this country, that it would meet the views and expectations of the people of this country; that it had been framed with a sagacity that had enabled the hon. the Minister of Finance to bring within the scope of his vision, and properly estimate the varied requirements of this wide Dominion, from Vancouver to Cape Breton; that there was now placed before the people of the country, its capitalists, and its energetic business men, a fair field for their several legitimate enterprises; because he saw opening before the merchant, so lately poring despondingly over his ledger, the mechanic so lately sitting idly at his bench, the labourer so lately labouring laboriously, but in vain, to procure some labour; because he thought he could see for these an opening out once more into the sunshine of prosperity, and believed that we should hear resounding, more cheerily than ever, the ring of the woodman's axe, the stroke of the mechanic's hammer, the hum and rattle of busy machinery, and see the workman receiving the due reward of his toil; because he believed that every word contained in the amendment submitted to the House might be safely reversed, that he would record his vote, with satisfaction and with hope, in favour of the resolutions.

WAYS AND MEANS.—THE TARIFF.

DEBATE RESUMED.

House resumed the adjourned debate on resolutions relative to duties of Customs and Excise, and Mr. Mackenzie's motion in amendment thereto.

MR. RICHEY.

MR. PLUMB said this debate had now taken a new aspect. To that aspect he proposed to address himself, in the remarks which he would have the honour to make to-night. After a long and extensive discussion on both sides of the House, the leader of the Opposition, representing the opinion, not only of the hon. gentlemen who followed him in this House, but of the great party of which he was the leader, of whose principles he was the exponent, had introduced a resolution which, without doubt, embodied fully, though concisely, the principles of the Opposition upon this floor, and the principles of the great party which that Opposition represented, for, although beaten at the polls, although represented here by a very small minority, they could not but accord to that great party a power in the country which it were useless to ignore, which it were rash in any way to reflect upon, and which must always be treated in any discussion in this House, or elsewhere, as a power in the Dominion of Canada. The resolution introduced by the hon. the leader of the Opposition was a resolution which, as he had said before, embodied briefly what might be considered the gist of the argument against the policy of the Government. He (Mr. Plumb) would read it, as the commencement of his remarks. It read as follows:—

"That, while this House is prepared to make ample provision for the requirements of the public service, and the maintenance of the public credit, it regards the scheme now under consideration as calculated to distribute unequally, and, therefore, unjustly, the burdens of taxation; to divert capital from its natural and most profitable employment; to benefit special classes at the expense of the whole community; tends towards rendering futile the costly and persistent efforts of the country to secure a share of the immense and growing carrying trade of this continent; and to create an antagonism between the commercial policy of the Empire and that of Canada that might lead to consequences deeply to be deplored."

He might say that he would not want any better text upon which to speak, on this occasion, than that short, comprehensive resolution. He had said to his hon. friend who had brought in the tariff resolutions that the speech with which that resolution was accompanied was the very best commentary upon the propositions which he had submitted to the House, and the very best evidence that those propositions were acceptable to the country. But, before commencing to address himself specially to that resolution, he hoped he might be permitted to review briefly, as briefly as the case would admit, the circumstances in which we were placed by the condition of the country, which had conduced very largely to the adoption of the policy now brought forward by his hon. friend the Finance Minister. He (Mr. Plumb) became a member of Parliament at the time of the great political revolution which removed from this body a large number of the gentlemen who had before led its legislation in this House. He came here a stranger to the usages of the House, comparatively a stranger to the grave questions then under discussion; and almost the first important debate in the House, in that Session, was upon the fiscal condition of the country, opened by the Budget speech of the gentleman who succeeded his hon. friend the present Finance Minister, and had been succeeded by him. Those of them who then, for the first time, were brought face to face here with the arrogant representatives of the triumphant party, which had swept the country as by a deluge from Prince Edward Island to Manitoba, were somewhat astounded at the propositions and arguments of the hon. gentleman who then held the purse-strings. They had supposed, in their ignorance and innocence, perhaps, that the country had been, for many years, under Conservative rule, in a state of great prosperity; that the gentlemen who formed the Confederation of the Provinces, who had laid broad and deep its foundations, who had made it one of the powers of the earth, and one of the principal appanages of the great Crown upon which we were proud to be dependent, had done something towards advancing the interests of the country; but they learned, from the hon. member for Centre Huron, that they had been recreant to all the best interests of Canada, had squandered her resources, had made reckless bargains with the different Provinces in order to sustain their waning popularity, that they had heaped burdens upon Canada which she never could sustain; they were told all this by one who was lauded by the party then in power as a great financial authority, and who spoke as the mouthpiece of that party. They were told constantly at every great meeting held for the purpose of influencing electors, as well as upon the floor of this House, that their friends, when in power, increased the public expenditure from $13,500,000 in 1867, to $23,316,316 in 1873-74. They were told that this was something so reprehensible, that those who were responsible for it should be for ever thereafter shut out from the management of public affairs; that they deserved to be ostracised because they had met the necessities of the growing Dominion with a statesmanlike and generous liberality. Increasing in population, wealth, and commerce with unparalleled rapidity, demanding outlays for perfecting the machinery of the new Confederation, for legislation, for the militia, for the collection of revenue, for the protection of the shipping trade, for the opening and peaceful occupation of the North-West, for public buildings adapted to the needs and the dignity of the Dominion, for the administration of justice, with ample and constantly augmenting revenues to meet such demands, the Conservative leaders would have been recreant to the trust confided to them, if they had adopted a niggardly or short-sighted method in dealing with the public expenditure. No one who sat on the Opposition benches in those days—and many of those gentlemen were here now before him in the same position—had opposed that policy to which he had just referred. The general principle upon which the expenditure was based was fully conceded on all sides; but little discussion arose upon the Budget during successive years from 1867 until 1873. Sir John Rose, during his financial Administration, finding the expenditure growing more rapidly than the revenue seemed to warrant, set a memorable example to those who came after him by cutting down his Estimates to meet the necessity. His able successors in the administration of the finances, prior to 1874, found no such need. They might be well assured that they would have met it had it occurred in a way to preserve the public credit from the damaging effect of yearly increasing deficits. The Opposition of the day contented themselves with a few unimportant criticisms of the Estimates, and, in almost in every instance, heartily congratulated the Finance Minister upon his statements. The estimated receipts were in every instance, from 1868 to 1874, inclusive, exceeded by the actual revenue. There was ample justification for the expenditure, and he (Mr. Plumb) would venture to say that, from all he had seen of the course of the late Finance Minister and his colleagues, if they had had surplus revenues to deal with, instead of deficits, their financial record would have been very different from that of their predecessors. He (Mr. Plumb) would now justify his defence of the Government of 1867-1873, by referring to the increase of expenditure, item by item, in order that the House might see how far the late Finance Minister and his colleagues, and backers, and the public press that sustained them, were justified in their virulent criticism. Under the heading of ordinary expenditure, the increases, comparing 1867-68 with 1873-74, were as follows:—

These aggregated, summed up as follows: Increase in ordinary expenditure, in accounts open in 1867-68, $3,414,353. In accounts not opened until after that date, $1,250,132. In charges on Revenue, $2,870,039. Interest on Public Debt (less decrease on Charges of Management and premium, discount, and exchange), $1,128,365. In Sinking Fund, $158,654. In Subsidies, $998,791. All these formed a sum total of increases from 1867-68 to 1873-74, when the hon. member for Lambton and his friends took the management of affairs, of $9,820,322. The supporters of the Government claimed, however, that in the increased expenditure of 1873-44, there were items amounting to nearly one million dollars, which had been often pointed out, that were improperly added by the late Finance Minister to the accounts of that year, and properly belonged to the succeeding year. This contention, he thought, his hon. friend before him (Mr. Tilley) was prepared to justify. They had insisted upon it in his defence while he was absent from the House, and while he held a position which prevented him from entering into the discussion and vindicating, as he had now vindicated, his position. It might be safely asserted, that in, round numbers, at least $950,000, improperly added by his successors to the expenditure of 1873-74, should be deducted from the total increase before stated, bringing it down to $8,870,322, from the total expenditure of 1873-74, reducing it to $22,466,316, and added to the expenditure of 1874-75, making the total of that fiscal year, the first clear year of Reform rule, $24,663,071. The correctness of this statement was virtually proved by comparing the figures with those of the second fiscal year of the rule of their economical friends, the loud-mouthed advocates of retrenchment. That year, 1875-76, presented the startling aggregate of $24,488,372, and that of the two succeeding years, which completed their record, was only kept down by a device which could not rebound to their credit. While other items of administrative expenditure were increasing in a startling ratio, although the revenue was constantly shrinking, by the expenditure of 1876-77, when the great depression was fairly upon us, paralysing trade and carrying disaster into every branch of industry, the reckless policy of the late Government entailed upon the country an outlay, chargeable upon revenue, of $23,519,301, which was only kept down to those frightful figures by striking out $428,079 from the Militia items, and $682,128 from that of Public Works chargeable to revenue. As compared with the outlay in those Departments the year previous, a reduction of $1,110,207 was thus obtained, but for which the total for 1876-77 would have been $24,629,508. The same plan was adopted in 1877-78. The Militia item was $360,404 less, and the Public Works item $950,347 less than in 1875-76. The total expenditure of the year, notwithstanding these abnormal reductions, was $23,503,158, and, but for them, would have reached $24,813,909. There could be no merit in bringing about a reduction by the contrivances now exposed. If Public Works, chargeable to revenue, had been completed, as they had been led to believe they would be, the expenditure, of course, would cease. As to the Militia, they knew who presided over that Department, and his antecedents would lead them to believe that he would not resist any reduction of our power to defend the flag. In every case, it would be found that the expenditure of the Liberal-Conservative Government, upon which such fierce denunciations had been poured out by hon. gentlemen opposite, especially by the late Premier and the late Finance Minister, had been exceeded under their Administration. It would be an easy task to justify, item by item, every figure for which his hon. friend (Mr. Tilley) and his old colleagues and predecessors were in any way responsible. In the spring Session of 1873, the late Finance Minister, who had been virulently opposed by the Globe and its party at his election, in August, 1872, made his prophetic speech which he had often quoted, but of which, unfortunately, no extended record remained in the public archives. He claimed, however, on the strength of that vaticination, credit for foreseeing the commercial crisis which was impending, and which burst upon the country like a tornado, in the autumn of 1873. It had already spread panic and dismay over the United States, when the hon. gentleman and his colleagues took the seals of office, and it had extended to Great Britain and the Continent before the hon. gentlemen met Parliament, at the end of March, 1874. He (Mr. Plumb), in common with many others who heard the Budget speech of 1874, was not aware of the mental peculiarities of the hon. gentleman who uttered it—they did not know the depth of the immedicable wound which had been inflicted upon his ambition, and his self-love, nor the bitterness and persistency of his hatred. His speech was violent beyond any precedent, and it might have been considered unfair, and, perhaps, not over courageous or chivalrous, to attack a man who could not stand up here and defend himself and his policy, as he had shown himself fully able to do, since the country has welcomed him back to these halls. Every utterance of the late Finance Minister betrayed the anguish of his wound, and the rage into which it threw him. They were charged with a venom, however, which fortunately had only had the effect of politically destroying himself. Upon that memorable occasion, the Finance Minister bitterly attacked the former Government for the terms it had given to Prince Edward Island, and no one of the representatives of that Island, all of whom, for reasons which he should not characterise, had crossed over to the support of the then incoming Administration, ventured to rebuke him for his covert insinuations as to sharp bargains. But his voice rose into a scream of denunciation when he said that his predecessors had done quickly what they had to do, namely, to wreck the public credit, and that they had left upon him "A sum total of what I call liabilities capable of being ascertained, amounting to one hundred and thirty-one millions three hundred thousand dollars in addition to our debt. Now the House will see the magnitude of the task imposed on us, by observing that this sum is, as nearly as possible, equal to the total indebtedness of the Dominion." In various pic-nic speeches during the past two or three years, this statement had been made with even more directness and force of assertion. Now, this, if it meant anything, meant that one hundred and thirty-one millions of dollars of liabilities, either immediate or prospective, in addition to the existing debt of a like amount, had been imposed upon the Dominion by reckless and improvident legislation prior to 1874. This was a truly alarming statement; one well calculated to startle the people of Canada, and to shake its credit with the capitalists of the world. Let them examine it, and endeavour, by it, to test the accuracy and fairness of the hon. gentleman's arguments. At the Aylmer pic-nic in 1877, they were told, according to the Globe report of the late Finance Minister's speech:

"That he must prepare to borrow within three, six or seven years, not less than $120,000,000 of money; that was the extent of the engagements and commitments which the late Government had left us as their dying legacy. It is hard to realise what this means. For us, $120,000,000 is a tremendous sum. It equals our net existing national debt. It is more for us than 2,000 millions for the United States, or 2,500 millions for Great Britain."

Fancy the wonder of the crowd at hearing these sums glibly stated, honest Grits fumbling in their pockets, instinctively, under the idea that a hat would be passed round at the close of the performance, and that they would be called upon to contribute their share of the trifling amount in order to recoup the Treasury, which had been depleted by the rascally extravagance of the Tories. The Budget speech of 1878, told them.

"We had other liabilities definitely fixed—mark, definitely fixed, amounting to 131 millions, namely:

For Canals.....	$ 43,800,000
Intercolonial Railway.....	10,000,000
Pacific Railway.....	30,000,000

St. Lawrence Improvements below Montreal.....	2,500,000
Certain advances then contemplated.....	1,000,000
Total.....	$131,300,000"

The nature of this shocking bug-bear, which, exhibited by so responsible an authority as the Finance Minister of Canada, was well calculated to cause a capitalist in England to button his pockets, might be inferred. The fairness of these statements might be inferred from the actual fact that, out of the amount of \$131,300,000, \$30,000,000 was the sum intended as a subsidy to the Pacific Railway, under a charter which had been abandoned, and an Act which had been instantly repealed by the hon. gentleman and his majority. \$35,000,000 were for removal of debt, which was considerably increased, nominally, by negotiating a four per cent. loan at a discount. But who ever heard before that such renewals could be fairly counted, or counted at all, among items which were to double the amount of the existing debt of which they formed a part? Such, however, was the inference that was adroitly suggested. When it suited the Finance Minister to do so, as on a recent occasion, he made light of the task of borrowing money in England for renewal of debt, even in the face of difficulties brought about by his own laches, and at a crisis of unparalleled severity in the money market of Lombard street. They must strike off the \$35,000,000 under this head. Thus they relieved him very easily of one half of his load. \$30,000,000 for the Pacific Railway and \$35,000,000 for renewal—\$65,000,000 in all. They had not cost him many sleepless nights. Then there were in his list, \$43,800,000 for the enlargement and construction of Canals, and among these the Baie Verte figured for \$8,500,000. The other items were nearly as illusory and misleading. The whole presentation was more than unfair. Except the repeal of the Pacific Railway Act, no legislation that he (Mr. Plumb) could remember had relieved the country of any liability; and the fidelity of the atrabilious statements of the late Finance Minister might be tested by ascertaining what amounts he stated in his last Budget speech would be required to complete the works in hand except the Pacific Railway, for all the expenditure on which, except \$1,391,618, incurred prior to 1874, the late Government must be held wholly and rigidly responsible. These amounts, estimated as of the 1st. July, 1878, were: For completion of Weland and Lachine Canals, \$5,500,000; Miscellaneous Works, \$5,000,000, or ten millions and a half altogether; and it might be said, in passing, that with much of this sum the late Government should also be charged. The net increase of debt from July 1st, 1873, to July 1st, 1878, was \$40,513,607. From this amount must be deducted discount on renewals, \$3,901,444, and amount expended on Pacific Railway, \$8,812,233, leaving the increase for all expenditure on capital account for every other purpose, \$27,799,930. Add to this the ten millions and a half still required for the completion of the canals, and the frightful \$131,300,000 shrank to \$38,300,000—a decrease of a mere trifle of ninety-three millions, or 71 per cent., which might gauge, with tolerable accuracy, the allowance that must be made for the Finance Minister's calculations. But it was by no means to be admitted that the hon. gentleman's predecessors were responsible for the \$38,300,000. He (Mr. Plumb) ventured to assert that his hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Tilley) and his colleagues would have curtailed expenditure in every possible way, having proper regard to the public interest, if they had continued in power. Their Estimates were based upon a condition of things which was totally changed when Parliament met in 1874. The late Government, with a vast majority at its back, had full power to reverse the policy of its predecessors. Whatever, in their judgment, had been improperly or unwisely done, should have been promptly undone. It was their duty to apply the knife and to cut down outlay whenever the knife was needed. They had command of the ship. It was their duty, when they saw a financial storm lowering in the horizon, to shorten sail and economise. Could it be supposed for a moment that his hon. friend who sat in front of him (Mr. Tilley) would not have had sufficient intelligence, honesty, and courage to meet the exigencies of the time, if he found there was a decreasing revenue? The late Finance Minister and his friends made the enormously exaggerated statement which he (Mr. Plumb) had dissected, in order to bewilder the public, in order to show that his own enormous expenditure was no falsification of the promises his colleagues had made when in Opposition. They sought to cover up their tracks. The most efficient way to do that was for the Finance Minister to largely overestimate the burdens thrown upon him. And how had the inherited obligations been discharged, and how had the new ones undertaken been fulfilled, on July 1st, 1878? The Pacific Railway construction had swallowed up \$8,812,833, and there were enormous sums since paid, and yet due. They had a glimpse, and as yet a glimpse only, of the reckless haste, and waste, and jobbery which had characterised that work. Not a section of the line from Fort William to Red River could be brought into use for at least three years, because the connecting link between English River and Keewatin had been left untouched, and a large annual charge of interest would be totally lost, until the road could be made available for traffic. In regard to the Welland Canal, \$7,846,145 had been expended up to July 1st, 1878, on the enlargement, at each end, which is nearly completed; the middle section and the aqueduct over the River Welland were only put under contract a few months ago, and could not be completed in less than three years. Until then, the new work was utterly useless, and was falling frightfully out of repair, and an interest account was heavily accumulating on the outlay. In such a state of things, it would be natural that they should feel great alarm for the public credit, strained, as it had been, to the utmost by the prodigality and incapacity of those to whom it was entrusted. He (Mr. Plumb) and his friends had been accused, time after time, of having taken a gloomy view of the position of Canada in their public utterances, but if ever any gentleman on the present Government side had taken so gloomy a view as that taken by the late Finance Minister in his Budget speech of 1874, and in many subsequent speeches, he (Mr. Plumb) could only say he had never heard of it. It was notorious that the Finance Minister, on that occasion, struck a heavy blow at the credit of Canada. But Canada, he trusted, would survive that, as she had already survived five years of the misrule of the gentlemen now in Opposition. In 1873, as he Mr. Plumb had before remarked, about the time that the so-called Reform party came into power, it happened that there was a great revulsion throughout the commercial world; it happened that the constantly increasing revenues of Canada began to diminish; it happened that, in September, 1873, the crash which had been so long foreseen in the United States, and which the late Finance Minister especially claimed to have foreseen, fell upon that country. Canada did not feel it at first; but it was the duty of the men who were at the helm, to look out for the storm, alter the course of the ship, if necessary, take in sail, and prepare for the worst. Up to that time they had been going on with constantly increasing revenues, but his hon. friend (Mr. Tilley) had indicated to the House in the first Session of 1873 that he intended to deal with the fiscal policy of the country, in the direction of an increase in the taxation. He had predicted that, owing to the legislation of 1873, there would be a necessity for a further increase of revenue, and he indicated clearly that he would deal with the necessities of the case in the direction of Protection, he would so gauge his revenue tariff as to foster the various industries of the country. It must be borne in mind that up to that time there had been no necessity for any Protective tariff in this country; that the condition of things with our neighbours was such that they could sell Canada nothing, whilst we could sell them, at fair prices, everything we produced. The 15 per cent. tariff, then in force, was all that was then required for the protection of our industries. There had been a constant increase of revenue, and a constant surplus—a surplus acknowledged by the late Finance Minister to have been expended upon the public works of the country, and in the redemption of debt, not including the sinking fund payments of £700,000 sterling—of no less than \$11,849,000. This statement was emblazoned on the silver side of that double-faced shield, of which the people of Ontario saw the brass, when the late Finance Minister appeared at their Reform picnics. He (Mr. Plumb) repeated that Canada did not require an increased tariff up to 1874, the industries of this country were protected by the condition of things in the United States, which created inflation prices there. As far as England was concerned, he was well aware, and every gentleman in this House, who was candid enough, would admit, that there was never any disposition on the part of Conservatives to discriminate against the Mother Country, to which they all owned the truest allegiance. Therefore, up to 1873 or 1874, whenever it was found necessary to deal with questions of revenue, it was not necessary to do so with Protective views, because the industries of the Dominion were not affected by competition on the other side of the border. A sudden change took place—so sudden, that very few in this country were prepared to acknowledge its far-reaching consequences. During the first year of its progress elsewhere, it was scarcely felt here, but in the second year it was felt in the increased imports to Canada, from the United States, in the decreased exports from Canada to that country, until the balance of trade against us reached the alarming sum of twenty-five million dollars. That was the balance of trade against Canada in 1877, and it was almost the same sum in 1878. The hon. gentlemen opposite seemed powerless to deal with this question. They would probably begin by laying down the proposition that a balance of trade is not a balance of trade, for that was the convenient way in which they always cleared away the difficulty. The late Minister of the Interior had advanced views on that subject which, if held and acted upon by an individual, would soon send him to the Insolvent Court, if that Court had not in the meantime been abolished. And it would almost appear, from the manner in which they quoted authorities in the United States, in order to justify their position, that they were rather in league with and supporting those financial authorities than attempting to assert themselves and their own position. He did not say that that was the case, or that that was always and absolutely the line taken by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, although it was quite the fashion for them, in those days, to impute disloyalty to the members on the Ministerial side, to the men who had stood by the British flag from the time they were first able to take upon themselves the responsibilities of manhood. Well, because it was necessary for the late Government to deal with the question of the expenditure, there had been no increase by his (Mr. Plumb's) friends, or through their policy, which was not justifiable under the circumstances, and requisite to meet the legitimate wants of the country. It was usual for hon. gentlemen on the opposite side to assert that their extravagant expenditure was made necessary by the action of their predecessors. Why were those gentlemen put in power? To reverse the action of their predecessors, if it appeared to them to be unwise; they were not bound by the legislation of their predecessors. They were bound to take the other tack. They had denounced their predecessors on every platform from British Columbia to the shores of Prince Edward Island. Everywhere they had declared that they had superseded a reckless and improvident Administration, but they excused themselves, when charged with extravagance, by saying that they had only spent a little more than had been spent by that reckless and improvident Administration. He could not remember a single instance in which they had fulfilled their promise to put a stop to the golden flow from the public Treasury, and bring about a state of things which should accord with the diminishing revenues and the declining business of the country. He ventured to say that if his hon. friend (Mr. Tilley) had been Finance Minister during the last five years—and he (Mr. Plumb) deeply regretted the political overthrow which left him unable to finish his financial policy—they would not have had to witness such a state of things as the present. What was it? Why, the ex-Finance Minister, in order to meet what he was pleased to call the burdens which were thrown on him by his predecessors, proposed to do so by adding to the tariff an increase of the taxes that would produce \$3,000,000. How did he proceed? After labouring from the 12th November, 1873, when the late Government came into power, until the 13th or 14th of April, 1874, that hon. gentleman brought in the tariff, with his Budget speech, the principal changes in which imposed $1\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. additional duty on the 15 per cent. list, from which he said he expected to receive \$3,000,000. In some other directions, also, he attempted to deal with the great financial interests of the country. But he so befogged and bemuddled the whole question, that he brought down upon himself the indignation of the whole business community. He had disturbed every industry of the country. He was forced to recede, and content himself with simply adding $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to the 15 per cent. list, making what our neighbours of the United States called a mechanical or horizontal instead of a scientific tariff; and now the hon. gentleman said that the $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. was a sacred thing, and that if any rash man touched it, he would sever the golden chain of our connection with Britain forever. He (Mr. Plumb) would like to know why those cabalistic figures were so sacred, or so much better than any other number. The number nine had peculiar properties in multiplication, addition and division, and many persons explained prophecy by the elastic use of the number seven, but he was not aware that even Zadkiel, who was quite as good a soothsayer as the late Finance Minister, had ever adopted seventeen-and-a-half as a term to conjure with. He could not discover that there was anything in the old tariff that could not be altered or meddled with without meeting the denunciations of hon. gentlemen opposite; but yet they seemed to think that there must be something almost holy in the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. evolved by the ex-Finance Minister out of the depths of his own rather confused—consciousness, should it be called? The previous figures, however, $1\frac{2}{3}$ per cent., he had desired to adopt for no apparent reason but that it made the calculation of duties easy. What did the tariff of the hon. member for Centre Huron (Mr. Cartwright) effect? In the fond belief that it would produce \$3,000,000, he said that he could not be expected to reduce the expenditures of his friend, the then Minister of Public Works. There were too many contractors in the purlieus of the capital waiting for their wages. The financial storm was then raging, but there was no retrenchment. He (Mr. Plumb) remembered perfectly well the language of the member for Centre Huron in 1874, when, turning to the First Minister (Mr. Mackenzie), he said that they must go on with the expenditure for the works which were under his charge. From whom did the House and the country expect economy? From whom had they a right to expect it? From a life-long Reformer; from a man whose instincts were supposed to be in the direction of close management of the expenditure in the Department over which he presided especially, who was supposed to possess a peculiar fitness, from personal training and experience, for that Department? The late Government could not cut down the Estimates, because there were certain powers behind the Grit throne greater than the Grit throne itself, that had to be placated after the elections. He (Mr. Plumb) believed that he should be borne out in that assertion. The tariff proved a failure, and a deficit arose the next year, as well as each of the two following years, with which the Government of the day confessed themselves utterly powerless to deal. They acknowledged that they were utterly powerless to propose a policy suitable for meeting the crying needs of the hour. They declared that a Government had no power to deal with questions affecting the vital interests of the country. They, on the Conservative side, however, held the contrary. They always had said that if they should be entrusted with the solution of those questions, they would not sit with their hands folded, but would try, at least, to do something for the country, and he thought that the people had taken the late Government at their word, and the Conservatives at their word; and it was not far to seek, or difficult to know, why the great revolution had occurred, which placed hon. gentlemen opposite in even a smaller minority than the Conservatives appeared in 1874. Deficits, to the amount of nearly seven millions of dollars, had accrued since hon. gentlemen opposite assumed charge of public affairs. His hon. friend the present Finance Minister, on returning to power, had to deal with that grave condition of the finances, and, after this cursory review of events, leading up to the present situation, it was somewhat refreshing to refer back to the patriotic resolutions put upon the table of the House by the present able Finance Minister, and to compare their breadth and fullness with the lifeless and meagre amendment with which the leader of the Opposition proposed to supersede them. He declared, "That, while we are willing to do anything to sustain the public credit, to meet the necessities of the hour, we cannot consent to any legislation which shall disturb the present condition of the country," as if that condition was so very satisfactory that it ought not to be disturbed. He held that they ought to disturb it—that they were here exactly for that purpose, and he, for one, would lift up his voice in every way which might be calculated to disturb it. Whatever the leader of the Opposition might think of the necessity of his amendment, he (Mr. Plumb) differed with him, totò cœlo, in the proposition he had made. What the hon. gentleman proposed, he had had ample opportunity to carry out during the last three years. He had failed to submit any proposition to that effect, or make any move in the direction in which he said he was bound to go, in the event of a deficit occurring. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had said, on the floor of the House, that a decrease of revenue should be met by reduced expenditure. But Sir John Rose had said the same thing, and acted accordingly, and it had been laid down as an axiom, by sound practical statesmen—not political prigs—that it would be suicidal, for a Government like that of Canada, to allow increasing deficits to accrue. It was all very well to talk, as the late Finance Minister talked at Fergus, in July, 1877, of deficits of 20 years ago, under the old Provincial system, and cite them in the stale tu quoque argument as a justification of the course of the late Government. Hon. gentlemen understood perfectly, that it was necessary, if they wished to maintain the credit of the country when there was, unfortunately, as sometimes there would be, a disturbance of the equilibrium between revenue and expenditure, so to increase the one, or decrease the other, as to maintain the public credit uninjured, and he charged hon. gentlemen on the opposite side with having neglected that which was one of the very first, one of the most fundamental principles of public economy and political science. Look at the amendment before the House, which affirmed that they “were prepared to make ample provision for the requirements of the public service and the maintenance of the public credit.” He had sat there for the last ten days, listening to the outpourings of hon. gentlemen opposite, and had failed to hear from them the slightest indication of any policy suited to the present exigencies of the country. He had heard them travelling over the record, arguing upon every possible subject—he had heard, from one bench to the other, the echoes of the same stale old stories, but he had never heard a single scintilla, or seen a glimpse of anything like a financial policy to substitute for the policy brought down by his hon. friend the Finance Minister. Until hon. gentlemen opposite could offer a proper substitute for it, he (Mr. Plumb) thought that they might fairly say they would stand by the scheme of his hon. friend. He would like to have from the Opposition a kernel of common sense, instead of the worthless chaff which they had been winnowing out by the cartload, while fancying they were discussing the question in hand. He was astounded when the late First Minister, on bringing down his amendment, made the accompanying speech, introducing it. He (Mr. Plumb) saw nothing in it which was not probably within the legitimate right of the leader of an Opposition, although it fell very far short of what might have been expected from him. It exhibited only a policy of grumbling and fault-finding; but there was good reason why that party should grumble and find fault, for he thought they had received a castigation which made them feel a little sore towards gentlemen on the Ministerial side. But they, on his side, did not intend to aggravate the discomforts of their position; they were willing to leave gentlemen in Opposition to accept for themselves a solution which they were intelligent enough to understand, or find out. Hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side had to deal with the question of the credit of this country, which the ex-Finance Minister, he (Mr. Plumb) had almost said, had culpably neglected. His hon. friend, the present Finance Minister, came into office at a critical moment—when Parliament must be called together within a very few months—when the depression which had kept the country down had lasted nearly five years—when they were constantly accumulating deficits, and when he had to infuse life into the dead body of the public credit. He entered office when, for a large amount of the public debt falling due in England on the 1st January, 1879, arrangements had instantly to be made, and when, at the same time, it was necessary to inaugurate a fiscal policy, the details of which demanded all his time and attention. The late Finance Minister had neglected to provide for the renewal of the debt at the proper time. It demanded his personal attention in London, immediately upon the accession of the present Finance Minister to office. That hon. gentleman was compelled to go to England at a moment the most disastrous in the history of English commerce for the last 25 or 30 years; upon the failure of one of the great banks, upon the shareholders of which a call of £2,250 had just been made for every £100 share. The unprecedented and utterly ruinous magnitude of the call would mark the extent of the disaster, a calamity that had been followed by the failure of another important bank, on the very day the Finance Minister had advertised for tenders. The hon. gentleman had been forced to take action at that time, by the neglect of the ex-Finance Minister. It had been constantly stated, after the late election, that there would be no redemption of the pledges of the Conservative party. The great organ of the Reform party in Ontario, which was inspired by him who was called by the hon. member for Lambton the Grand Old Reformer—who dictated the policy of the Reform party, and without whom the leaders on the opposite benches could have no following in Ontario, at least—of whom it could be said, in regard to the public men of that Province, who were almost his puppets: "A breath unmakes them, as a breath hath made"—it seemed good to that great party leader and dictator to assure the readers of his newspaper that the Conservatives had no intention of fulfilling their promises. The hon. member for Lambton, in fact, who was Mr. Brown's henchman, had stated that Sir John A. Macdonald would as soon establish a Republic as a Protective policy. The Globe and its echoes were filled daily after the election with editorial articles so childish and contradictory that it did not seem possible that they could affect the minds even of the most benighted and bigoted Grits. After the overthrow of the party, which was largely due to that gentleman's want of political instinct, and to the utter incapacity to understand the direction of public opinion exhibited by the late Finance Minister and his colleagues throughout their short ascendancy, the Globe threw upon the Conservative party the responsibility of the decline in the price of wheat, which had fallen in consequence of a close of the European war, and the unprecedented large harvest in the United States. The stentorian voice of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) echoed the same strain, in thundering forth a long row of figures in respect to the decline in prices of bank stocks since the elections. He held the present Government responsible for the bear movements in Montreal, and the effect of the great bank failure in Scotland and Wales upon the minds of sensitive shareholders. They were quite as responsible for the fall, if any had occurred, in the prices of confectionery and cigars. The Globe also demanded an immediate exposition of the National Policy. It could not even wait until the funeral of its departing friends in Ottawa had taken place. A few extracts would illustrate the manner in which the great organ of the defeated party dealt with the question after the battle. On the 9th of October they read in the leading columns:

"Some one has said, 'Blessed are they who expect nothing, for they shall not be disappointed,' and, evidently, the friends of the National Policy, as well as its advocates are preparing and being prepared for receiving another illustration of this time-hallowed maxim. For it is not yet a year since Sir John assured the faithful that what might be adequate protection for one industry would not be sufficient for another, and that, consequently, it would be desirable for those engaged in each, to meet and consider what they might need, so that all wishes should be met by the rulers, who were to be, and who will speedily be, installed. It was intimated distinctly that those engaged in the different industries were the best able to say what Customs dues they needed, in order to be adequately protected, and what they said should certainly be done. * * * Now, there is a strong desire to hark back upon what was said and what was promised.

"What is there to wait for? Does not Sir John know what to do? * * * Why wait over Christmas? Why lose January? * * * There is some shuffling here—some design to postpone, indefinitely, this boon of Protection. We shall not, it seems, get the first instalment of the things we want, but we shall have the first instalment of a treacherous betrayal of our trust instead."

They were next told, on the 10th of October, the new Government having not yet formed:

"Conservatives are, with one accord, attempting to back down from their unpleasant position on the Protection question. Having secured a lease of power, they are already proposing to throw over everybody and everything they made use of in the contest. * * * That utterance [Gazette's], was probably a feeler, put out to break the news gently to the Canadian manufacturers, that they had been swindled into making themselves ridiculous, in order that Sir John might get his truly clean hands into the public chest again. * * *

We have long ago given up expecting consistency from any Conservative as to this National Policy. It is a disgraceful thing that the hard times still hang on, when Sir John Macdonald expressly promised that they should be banished as soon as the Conservatives gained a majority."

On the 21st October they found this precious morceau :

"It is too bad that the leaders should be squabbling while the people are starving, capital idle, manufactures perishing, and workmen on half time."

Again on the 28th :

"In many parts of Canada the crop is, thus far, not so good as was expected. The weather was against its being well harvested. In many cases it is damp and sprung. The price is low and falling. In the face of such things, is this a time to palter and delay?"

On the 1st November, they read :

"Our farmers, with a falling market, and no prospect of immediate revival, have time to meditate over the vanity of human wishes, and the unsubstantial character of National Policy promises."

They were further assured that the right hon. leader of the Government and his friends were trying to get rid of the National Policy :

"We must congratulate our Tory friends upon the multitude and ingenuity of their attempts to drop off the Protectionist platform, without exciting an unpleasant amount of attention from their dupes.

"The Finance Minister, when he attempts to frame his new tariff, will have a lively time of it.

"There are delays in forming a National Policy Government; there is an evident desire to delay the advent of the National Policy itself; excuses are being offered; time is demanded; there is a shuffling attempt to induce others than the half-fledged Administration to assume a share in the responsibility of incubating the National Policy. We can see no reason for delay; no need for excuses, if all is fair and honest; no justification for, but much to reprehend in, shuffling."

The Finance Minister was, at this time, endeavouring to repair his predecessor's shuffling, as to which there was no justification, but much to reprehend. It would be instructive to follow the Globe through brake and through brier, on its will-o'-the-wisp wanderings since the election. At one moment it assured them that we were to consume all we produced, and produce all we consumed; at another, we were to erect the Chinese wall along our borders; at another, we were to make no change whatever. Its veracious correspondent in Ottawa, who had attained a first magnitude in the practice which made Mendez Pinto proverbial, reported that a general scale of thirty-five per cent. and upwards had been agreed upon between Mr. Tilley and those cormorant manufacturers who had made such bloated fortunes during the past five years. A few days afterwards, in the leading article of the paper, the truth of this wildly absurd, and maliciously false report was gravely assumed, and an argument was based upon it, intended, as it seemed, to create discontent in England against a loyal dependency, and in the United States against peaceful neighbours, who claimed simply the right to attend to their own business. The whole chorus yelped to the same tune, and they demanded, almost the day after the election, that the National Policy should be brought down. They said it required no ingenuity, that it could be brought down by any clerk in public offices; and they demanded that his hon. friend, before he was sworn, and before he had time to assume the duties of his office, should bring down his Budget. They all cried out that the Government and their supporters were insincere. Well, he thought the fact of the opposition made to the resolutions of his hon. friend showed, at least, that he had fulfilled his side of the bargain. He might say that every criticism that he had heard from the other side, had only tended, in his judgment, to strengthen the public confidence in the resolutions of his hon. friend. This showed that they were willing to take the responsibility of a policy which gentlemen in Opposition said they never intended to undertake. There had been a great deal said about the promises made by his hon. friend the leader of the Government, and he should not notice some of the criticisms, were it not that the late First Minister had condescended, in his last address to the House upon this matter, to allude to the poor, the played-out, exploded canard circulated in New Brunswick before the election, that Sir John promised a 35 per cent. tariff. It was first stated that he said so at Parkhill, in North Middlesex, when he rendered the signal service which resulted in the overthrow of the Reform ascendancy in that Riding and the election of Mr. Coughlin in the place of Mr. Scatcherd. If his hon. friend from Centre Huron were here, he would comfort him by telling him it was a majority of 800 on the one side, which was reversed by a considerable majority on the other, as an answer to his argument about the majorities by which gentlemen on the right had been returned to this House. Sir John never said anything of the kind at Parkhill. He (Mr. Plumb) was present and heard every word he said. Then he was charged with having said, at Strathroy, the same thing. He (Mr. Plumb) was present there, and no such statement was made. The real foundation of the rumour was a casual conversation at an informal meeting in London, where some eavesdropper heard and reported to that veracious paper, the London Advertiser, a statement of Sir John's, partly true and partly intentionally misrepresented. What Sir John said on that occasion was this :

"In noticing the argument advanced, that the United States would be offended if Canada raised her tariff, he pointed out that Mr Fernando Wood's proposal to increase the United States tariff on certain articles to 35 per cent. as a maximum, was regretted on the ground that it was a Free-trade tariff, and he (Sir John) argued that Canada could not therefore offend the United States, even if the tariff here was raised to 35 per cent., because the Americans had pronounced that rate to belong to a Free-trade tariff."

That was exactly what he said, and nothing more ; and he knew, and every hon. gentleman knew, that if any man holding the responsible position of Sir John Macdonald, understanding and valuing, as he did, the obligations that rested upon him as the leader of a great party and as the more than probable Premier who would hold office after the 17th of September, should indicate any particulars of the tariff, he would be doing an injustice to himself as a statesman, and betraying the trust of his party, and the interests of his country. But, said the Globe, "If Sir John did not suggest 35 per cent., what did he suggest?" That was the answer, and that was the whole case. Now, he (Mr. Plumb) wished to say that he thought, in every respect, the tariff which had been brought down by his hon. friend had fulfilled the expectation of the country. He had not found anything in it which could, in the slightest degree, be considered as disloyal to the great country of which we were a part, and of which, he trusted, we were a part that could not be separated. He failed to see anything in it which, as was said by an hon. gentleman on the other side, could sever the golden link which bound us to the Mother Country. He failed to see anything in it except an attempt—it might be successful and might be unsuccessful—to check the constant encroachments from the opposite side of the border upon the trade that legitimately belonged to England, and to Canada itself. He had looked over the items in the tariff. He knew that, in two or three particulars, the tariff would enhance the imposts levied upon British imports ; these, together, were estimated by the Finance Minister to amount to about $550,000 out of the whole $2,700,000. There would be reductions also, leaving him $2,150,000, as net increase. It had been said that, in respect to the woollen trade under the new tariff, there would be an additional burden laid upon English imports. The Finance Minister thought it was necessary, in dealing with the tariff, to provide that coarse woollens should be protected for the benefit of the woollen manufacturers of this country. Also, we had in Canada a very large supply of a kind of wool which we ought rather to use in this country than to be compelled to sell to the Americans, and to pay them upon it 10c. per pound duty, and an ad valorem duty also, which amounted to three cents more. We should encourage that manufacture here, and it was proper that, in discriminating, we should discriminate in favour of the finer kinds of cloth which were especially manufactured in England. If there had been any partiality shown in adjusting the tariff, it had been with the especial intention of giving advantage to England, and the burden would fall where it belonged. When we used those cloths, finer woollen fabrics, which could only be furnished by England, it would be found that we had not increased the tariff on them, because it would not benefit our home production, and it was perfectly right to adopt this policy. We had heard so much about loyalty, so much that this legislation would be received unfavourably in England, that one would almost be led to suppose that the only bond between this country and England was the bond of pounds, shillings, and pence; that the only bond between the two countries was one that existed between our consumers and the manufacturing interest of England. He did not say that the English manufacturing interest was not a great one, and that it should not be considered by Colonial legislation, but he did not at all agree with his hon. friend from Lambton, in the statement he made the other night, that we were retrograding, while the other Colonies were going on hand-in-hand in accord with the English system which was inaugurated by Cobden, Bright, Mill, and gentlemen of that school. There was already a Protective tariff to a certain extent, in certain particulars, in almost every one of the Colonies of Great Britain. In the Australian Colonies, in regard to their farming interests, there was a Protective tariff. That policy had been adopted deliberately, it had been much discussed, and there had been changes of Government in those Colonies upon that very policy. He was disposed to think that there were strong reasons for the adoption of a Protective policy, ultimately, in England. He could see marked evidences that her present policy would be changed. He could not see how the iron interests in England, for instance, could otherwise sustain themselves. He ventured to say that the English ironmasters, and their workmen, who were out of employment, would not look with favour upon the fact that Belgium could send to England iron girders and other heavy kinds of work in competition with her own iron manufactures of the same class. Even locomotives of Belgian manufacture had undersold those of England for her own railways. He ventured to say that the discontented population in England would, by-and-bye, ask the reason why, and call for protection from that kind of competition, and from the philosophers who had made it possible. He believed that common sense would prevail against the theories of Mill, Cobden, Bright, Bastiat or any other man whose nostrums had been forced upon us ad nauseam during the late five years. A grain of common sense was worth more than a pound of theory. He saw indications everywhere that it was coming to be considered to be the first duty of every country to take care of itself. He saw indications everywhere that it would, ere long, be recognised as an axiom that the business of a country belonged to the people who paid the taxes, who sustained the Government, who employed the labor, and who formed the basis of the wealth of the country. He could only say this: that, if we did not desire to be handed over, bound hand and foot, to the people on the other side of the line, we must acknowledge that Canada belonged to the Canadians, however much that statement might be denied by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Why, where was the loyalty, where was the super-loyalty of that Grand Old Reformer who absolutely controlled that party in Ontario, when, in 1874, he constituted himself an ambassador to the United States to procure a renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty? What would have been the result of the proposition he made to the United States in 1874? He (Mr. Plumb) had made a calculation upon the bases of the revenue in 1874 as to what we would have lost if that treaty had gone into operation. Mr. Brown proposed to receive largely the manufactures of the United States, and every manufacturer in Canada rose up with the remonstrance that that treaty, if it went into operation, would absolutely crush out our infant manufactures, and leave us nothing in the world, except agriculture, upon which to sustain ourselves. Under that treaty, all our skilled labour would have gone to the United States; and, not only that, but finding, in the first place, that the United States would not accept an exchange of natural products, he enlarged the bases of his negotiations. He added Schedules B and C. Schedule B consisted of all kinds of agricultural implements; Schedule C, of manufactures of cotton, cabinet ware, boots and shoes, machinery, leather manufactures, iron of all kinds, and other items. These were to come in duty free. Taking into consideration duties previously collected on these articles, which he agreed to receive from the United States on the free list, it would have reduced our revenue that very year $2,300,000. And what did he provide instead of that? Nothing whatever. They were constantly asked what they would do for revenue, if they brought in this Protection tariff proposed by his hon. friend. What did Mr. Brown propose, in order to make up the deficits in the revenue, when he made this proposition in the face of the greatest depression that had ever fallen upon this country? He proposed to reduce the revenue, by one stroke, $2,300,000, according to the imports received that year; while his friends in the Ministry here were trying, with an assiduity worthy of a better cause, to deplete the failing Treasury, and the jobbers were intruding into the very fastnesses of the House of Commons itself. Mr. Brown offered, also, to enlarge our main canals within a period which would have made it necessary largely to increase our expenditure. He agreed to build the Caughnawaga Canal, with fourteen feet of water on the mitre sills of its locks, for the accommodation of vessels which were to go to New York without transshipment; but he never secured the corresponding enlargement of the Charplain Canal, leading from Lake Champlain to the Hudson River, a canal which was not five feet in depth, and not navigable for boats of more than forty-five tons burden. Nor did he stipulate that the channel of the Hudson, between Albany and New Baltimore, should be deepened—where an immense outlay, and forty years of effort, has failed to obtain more than five feet of water at low tide,—and which would have had to be deepened to 14 feet for the passage of vessels from the St. Lawrence. He was going into a reckless expenditure of ten or twelve million dollars for the purpose of buying from the United States that which they were unwilling to sell. And, after he had made proposition after proposition, when we were to give them everything except ourselves and our nationality, they received the propositions and coolly put them aside in a pigeon-hole, saying: We don't intend to grant reciprocity just now, but we will think of it some day, and then we will have your offer before us. What was the policy of the Hon.

Mr. Brown then? Was that not striking at the connection between England and Canada? Was that not an attempt at severing the golden link, of which they heard so much? Well, he had heard the argument upon the floor of this House, and he had heard arguments in other quarters, but they did not prove to him that there was an enormously sensitive loyalty on the part of gentlemen on the other side of the House. He could not see that there was so great a contrast between the loyalty of those gentlemen and that of the gentlemen who sat to the right of the Speaker, in favour of the former. He remembered hearing, year after year, from the late Finance Minister, the late Minister of the Interior, and occasionally from the late First Minister himself, quotations from an eminent fiscal authority, a great American publicist, Mr. David A. Wells. That gentleman had been brought forward here and elsewhere, upon all occasions, as an authority for the policy which the hon. gentlemen, who then sat on the Treasury benches, wished to persuade them should be adopted by Canada. Well, Mr. Wells was an advanced Free-trader; he was one of the few gentlemen in the United States who advocated that doctrine. He was prominent at every Board of Trade meeting and every general meeting where fiscal affairs were discussed; he was, without doubt, a very intelligent, very eloquent, very able writer upon his side of the question. They might not agree with him, but they all acknowledged that he was in earnest; but this gentleman had only a forlorn hope in the United States. The people in the United States understood these questions thoroughly, and, if they found that Protection was injurious to their interests, they had the remedy in their own hands in universal suffrage. Every two years they voted for members of Congress, and, certainly, if they desired to change their trade policy, it was very easy for them to do so. His hon. friend the late First Minister made a very eloquent appeal to the workingmen of Canada, at the Rink in Toronto, in the furtherance of the interests of his party—as he had a perfect right to do. He lamented the sufferings of the workingmen under the Pharaohs, at the time of building the pyramids, and he compared the sufferings of workmen, under Tory rule, as he was pleased to call it, to the poor fellows who were forced, under their Egyptian taskmasters, to make bricks without straw. He alluded to the policy of the United States, to the ruin that it had already brought upon that country, and said they were committing financial suicide, as rapidly as possible, by adhering to it. He told them that a certain exception was made in respect to trade with Venezuela. He (Mr. Plumb) noticed that, because it was a little out of the way, and he wondered what had made him take the case of Venezuela as an illustration. The puzzle was finally solved by a pamphlet published by Mr. David A. Wells, the authority constantly quoted by the hon. gentleman and his colleagues. He (Mr. Plumb) found at the end of that pamphlet the very quotation, or something very near it, that had been made by the First Minister. He did not undertake to say the First Minister endorsed the views of Mr. Wells, but he (Mr. Mackenzie) introduced him to the people of Canada as an authority, and quoted from his writings. The pamphlet which the late First Minister quoted from, and which he must have read, contained the following paragraph, which would show what Mr. Wells intended by the policy which these gentlemen were so anxious we should adopt, and which he was so desirous to press upon the people of the United States. In a pamphlet published by Mr. Wells, entitled, "Why we trade, and how we trade," they found the following significant paragraphs, on pages 23, 24, 25, 26, and 27 :

"It is desired to annex the British North American Provinces, and make them a part of the American Union. We have, as a nation, for long years past, in our dealings with Canada, been playing the part of the wind, in the contest between the wind and the sun in the fable, to see which could make the traveller soonest take off his coat. Suppose, as a nation, we now, for a while, put aside the rôle of the wind, and assume the part of the sun. With the balance of advantage in any amicable contest between the two countries for industrial and commercial betterment so transcendently on the side of the richer, most populous, and most powerful nation, it must be a very low order of statesmanship on the part of the United States which could not devise and carry out a policy that, in less than a decade of years, would make the British Provinces applicants of their own accord for incorporation as States in the American Union, or would enable the United States, if it was deemed expedient, to force them to become such, by the threat, not of armed compulsion, but of simply clouding the sun.

"Thus, to illustrate, let us imagine what might be. North of Lakes Erie and Ontario, and the River St. Lawrence, east of Lake Huron, south of the forty-fifth parallel, and included mainly within the present Dominion Province of Ontario, there is as fair a country as exists on the North American continent; nearly as large in area as New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio combined, and equal, if not superior, as a whole, to these States in its agricultural capacity. It is the natural habitat on this continent of the combing-wool sheep, without a full, cheap and reliable supply of the wool of which species the great worsted manufacturing interests of the country cannot prosper, or, we should rather say, exist. It is the land where grows the finest barley, which the brewing interest of the United States must have if it ever expects to rival Great Britain in its present annual export of over eleven million of dollars' worth of malt products. It raises and grazes the finest of cattle, with qualities especially desirable to make good the deterioration of stock in other sections; and its climatic conditions, created by an almost encirclement of the great lakes, especially fit it to grow men.

"Such a country is one of the greatest gifts of Providence to the human race, better than bonanzas of silver, or rivers whose sands contain gold."

Between the late Finance Minister and Mr. Wells and the Chicago Tribune, a trio of enthusiastic Free-traders, a mutual admiration society existed. Mr. Wells quoted Mr. Cartwright, and Mr. Cartwright quoted Mr. Wells, and the Chicago Tribune quoted both, and patted them lovingly on the back. Under the paragraphs just quoted, from the pamphlet of Mr. Wells, in a foot note, he said :

"The extent to which Canada is necessarily dependent upon the United States for prosperity, is well illustrated by the following extract from the Budget speech of the Minister of Finance, the Hon. Richard Cartwright, before the Canadian House of Commons, February, 1875."

Then followed a sample of the late Finance Minister's eloquence, with which they were all tolerably familiar. And the late Finance Minister addressed a great Reform demonstration in Norfolk, held at Simcoe, on the 21st of September, 1877. Speeches, they were told, were also made there by Mr. Charlton, Mr. Mackenzie,

Mr. Mowat, Mr. Huntington and Mr. Rymal. Mr. Oliver, Mr. Irving, Mr. Thompson, of Haldimand, Col. Skinner, Mr. Clark, and Dr. Baxter were there; but as far as could be learned, those eloquent expounders of Reform principles were speechless on that occasion. The Finance Minister was reported to have said, vide Globe, October 16—he was speaking of the ruin of the United States, of course :

“The lessons which have been taught cannot have been wholly lost on the American people. They are setting about in real earnest to find, as David Wells puts it, the way to regain true national prosperity, on a true and stable basis. Mr. David Wells, one of the ablest and most scientific thinkers in the United States, we find proving to his countrymen most conclusively that, had they had Free-trade with the people of Canada, it is more than probable their trade with Canada alone would have excelled their whole volume of foreign exports at present. And, proceeding to point out to them the extreme folly they had committed, and bearing also high testimony to the great natural resources we possess—a testimony which it would be well for every Canadian to bear in mind—even at the risk of tiring some of you, I cannot refrain from reading his remarks on the condition of the Province of Ontario.”

The hon. gentleman then read or recited part of the foregoing extract from Mr. Wells, beginning carefully at “North of Lakes Erie and Ontario,” and ending with, “Such a country is one of the greatest gifts of Providence to the human race, better than bonanzas of silver, or rivers whose sands contain gold.” At Teeswater, where the late President of the Council, vice Cauchon promoted, uttered his swan song, the late Finance Minister also improved the occasion, and said, if the Globe's report of November 5th could be depended upon :

“I cannot resist the temptation of reading to you a few words written by an American economist, who was once a Protectionist, but who has been converted, and is now known as a very earnest Free-trader. You will not think any the worse of him, when I say that his name is Wells, and Mr. Wells, referring to the Province of Ontario, speaks as follows.”

Then followed the same extract, with the same cunning and careful avoidance of the beginning and the end of the argument. This, then, was the high authority whose policy had been persistently recommended by the gentlemen on the other side of the House, and it came with bad grace from them now to charge his hon. friends with doing anything that would be likely to sever the golden bond that existed between us and England. He (Mr. Plumb) thought that very extract showed what the ulterior motive of American Free-traders was. They wished to force Canada into a position which would enable them to take possession of this country. He believed that every man in the House who had studied the question was satisfied that the union which existed between Canada and England could not be severed without violence. He had never heard of England parting voluntarily with but one of her colonies, and that was one she held as a quasi-trust—the Ionian Islands. He believed that we had a right to self-government under the responsible system, and he believed that England wished to concede to us the largest liberty consistent with that system and principle. He did not believe any estrangement between England and Canada would result from this proposition of his hon. friend in the direction of bringing Canada out of the slough of despond in which she had been plunged by the incompetency of the gentlemen who preceded the present Ministry. Anything that increased our prosperity increased our ability to purchase from England. The trade followed the flag, and, therefore, the paltry addition of \$550,000 to tariff items, which might possibly fall upon English manufactures, for the benefit of Canada, could not be denounced as anything disloyal. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House never should have made that charge, and it never should have been reiterated in the newspapers. He (Mr. Plumb) hurled the charge back with indignation and scorn on those who had been pleased to bring it forward as a political argument. This tariff had been made for the purpose of preventing \$25,000,000 or \$26,000,000 of gold going from us to the United States yearly. Our imports from the United States were \$23,510,846 worth of dutiable, and \$27,801,823 worth of free articles, for the fiscal year 1877, and \$23,438,053 worth of dutiable, and \$25,163,686 worth of free articles for the year 1878. Nearly two-thirds of the free goods came into direct competition with our agricultural products. Goods valued at some fourteen and a quarter millions of dollars came in each year under the $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. list. Many of the articles we could and ought to manufacture here in Canada; nearly all of them represented skilled labour and capital profitably employed. In return, the United States took from us products valued at twenty-five millions, one half of which was farm product, and a fifth was the product of the forest. It all represented the least remunerative form of labour, and the smallest return for capital. For the privilege of paying for half of our annual imports in this costly way, we paid an average duty on the American frontier of at least twenty-five per cent., and the resulting balance of twenty-three millions or more, we must pay in hard cash. It was estimated that on the articles imported from the United States, paying $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and over ad valorem, the invoices and valuations actually reduced the duty to 10 per cent. or less; but most of the kind of products we sent across the border could not be so undervalued. The great shrinkage in values also, on the general list of manufactures, rendered it certain that, in quantity, our imports from the United States had constantly and largely increased to an extent far beyond the figures in our annual returns. Now, from Great Britain, our free imports had declined from \$5,287,217, in 1874, to \$5,291,397 in 1878, while the $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. list had fallen from \$39,572,596, in 1874, to the startling figure of \$24,245,295 in 1878; and upon this list, except in two or three leading articles, our neighbours across the line had been steadily supplanting their trade under the policy so vehemently persisted in by the hon. gentlemen opposite. If they questioned this state of things, forsooth, the loyalty cry was raised among gentlemen, many of whom subscribed to a certain party platform in Quebec, a few years ago, having annexation as one of the planks; gentlemen who did not hesitate to place in a most responsible position in the Ministry one who had threatened to tear down the British flag from the citadel of Halifax, and who instilled into the ears of the people of Canada everywhere the insidious teachings of David A. Wells and his school, the tendency of which had been clearly shown, and was frankly and openly acknowledged by those earnest Free-traders. He (Mr. Plumb) was not speaking in hostility to those gentlemen, or to the people of the United States generally. They were shrewd enough to know the advantages of their legislation. He had no idea that this tariff would be received as hostile. It was unworthy of our statesmen to say they were afraid that our legislation might be met with opposition by our American neighbours. There were gentlemen in the House who were too blind to see the benefits that accrued from Protection. There were others who did see it, but wilfully hoodwinked themselves.

"They know the right, and they approve it too;

They see the wrong, and yet the wrong pursue."

Hon. gentlemen, by the course they pursued last Session, sealed their death-warrants. They disregarded the plainly-expressed wishes of the people, and the result was shown on the 17th of September. It was not by false promises, as hon. gentlemen had been pleased to assert, that the present Government had succeeded at the late elections. The people had had experience of the value of the promises of hon. gentlemen opposite, and they measured them on September 17th at their true value. Hon. gentlemen need not lay the flattering unction to their souls that there was likely to be any reaction in their favour, or that the National Policy was unpopular with the masses. They need not try to believe, for a moment, that what they said about the pending ruin to the manufacturer and the labourer, and the other interests, was going to be accepted by the people. The people had declared that they would sustain this policy. The argument had been exhausted during the campaign. The issue was a direct one. The people fully understood what this policy meant. It meant that they were not only to have cheap food, but something to buy it with; not only cheap clothing, but the wherewith to procure it. The legislation here to-day was for the poor man, and not for the rich man. The idea of the Grit party, that his hon. friends were blind to their interest, and that they were legislating for privileged classes, was absurd. Hon. gentlemen opposite knew very well the policy the Government had adopted was the policy the country would endorse. They knew perfectly well that they had taken the downward track, not, perhaps, with deliberation; but they blindly followed a blind leader, lacking political prescience, and who never could comprehend anything beyond his own prejudiced opinion that the whole people of this country could be hoodwinked day after day by the publications in the press of his party. The agriculturists had been forced to raise nothing, by the policy of that dictator, but cereals. They were prevented from having a profitable rotation of crops. The dictator, who had sometimes been called the wrecker, and his followers, professed to have the farming interests under their especial charge. How did they foster them? By placing a tax of 72c. a bushel on malt. That killed the barley crop. On our wheat a duty of 20c. per bushel was levied on the other side of the line; no duty was put on American wheat, and we were compelled to export ours when we had no surplus. Oats were interfered with by the vast production of the Western States, and he knew a case where two vessels, from Michigan or Wisconsin, came into the harbour of Sarnia, where the late First Minister resided, and, placing a large quantity of oats on the market, lowered the price five or six cents a bushel on market day, to the great disappointment and loss of the farmers who had oats for sale there. The late Finance Minister often said that he desired that our people should return to agricultural pursuits. He vehemently denounced the gathering together of communities in cities and towns. Agriculture, he (Mr. Plumb) acknowledged, was the basis of our wealth, but everybody knew that it paid a lower return for the capital and for the manual labour employed, than any other pursuit. Every man could not, or might not, wish to be a farmer, and no country was prosperous that did not possess a diversity of interests. The Government proposed that Canada should have all the benefits which the most favoured countries enjoyed. They did not believe that the Americans, as the Globe asserted, monop-olised all the ingenuity, and perseverance, and inventive genius on this continent, but that Canada could successfully challenge them to friendly competition in all these respects. It was the duty of every Government to endeavour to give diversified employment to its people, to keep its intelligent, active young men at home by giving them plenty of work, and he believed that the policy that his hon. friend proposed would have this effect. Mr. Steinway, the manufacturer of pianos, on being told that this tariff would shut out his pianos from Canada, said he would set 400 men at work here, and thus try to keep possession of our market in a way that we desired. The people who wanted our market must come here and manufacture for it, pay their portion of our taxes, support our Government, employ our labour, and buy our farmers' produce. It mattered very little to the farmers whether there was a duty more or less on the articles which they consumed, provided they could have a home market. If manufacturing centres were built up in their midst, the rise in the value of their lands and their crops would more than compensate for any trifling tax that might be put on them, and, after all, the only alternative to this tariff was to resort to direct taxation, as the late Finance Minister shadowed forth when he said that if there was any convenient way of levying an income tax after the manner of England, he would feel inclined to resort to it. Any man would have been recreant, as a member of the Government, representing the Liberal Conservative party, if, in making that scheme of taxation, he had not special regard to the struggling industries of Canada. The hon. gentlemen opposite had made their tomb. They stated there might be a reaction in their favour, but they caught at a very little gleam of hope. He could tell them, in the words of the hackneyed quotation:

"Facilis decensus Averni, Sed revocare gradum, superasque evadere ad
auras,
Hic labor, hoc opus est."

Which he would venture to translate very freely:

"The engine may rush its down grade to Avernus;
The steam may give out when it tries to return us."

And he prayed, in the best interests of Canada, that it might be many a long year before the hon. gentlemen opposite got back to the upper world from the political Avernus into which they had descended.

MR. KILLAM said he deemed it his duty to enter his protest, as a member of this House, against the policy of the Government, a policy which seemed to him to have been conceived without due intelligence of the subject, and to have been brought forth without a proper disinterested regard for the wants of the country. There was no reason why, while the members of the Opposition did not think of being able to defeat this policy on the next division, they should not criticise that policy, at least in a moderate degree, and suggest amendments or improvements which might commend themselves to hon. gentlemen opposite in such a way as to lead to modifications of that portion which might be found most injurious to the country. In was in that view that he rose the other evening to ask a few questions of the hon. the Finance Minister, and he thought the hon. the Finance Minister was not altogether fair when he spoke of his acting rather from a spirit of factious opposition than a desire to gain information. He had risen on that occasion purely to gain information on points on which the people of this country, more especially those of the constituency he had the honour to represent, were greatly interested, and concerning which his hon. friend must, he was sure, have been approached from time to time by very powerful delegations. He would refer to those points later on, but must say that, in referring to them, he was actuated by no desire to offer any factious opposition to the hon. gentleman. He had listened with great attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Richey) that evening. Having known of the hon. gentleman for many years, he was quite prepared to hear from him a brilliant oratorical display. His speech, as a display of rhetoric, was something to be proud of, and reflected credit on his Province. His acquaintance with the works of Daniel Webster brought forth great applause, but still, though proud of the hon. gentleman's oratory, he felt bound to say, with regard to his speech, that, instead of dealing with the practical question, it was full of the most crude generalities, and showed too little practical acquaintance with the subject for a gentleman representing a constituency such as his. The hon. gentleman could not resist the temptation of telling the House a little about his election. He wanted to call their attention to some remarks which appeared in some local paper on the opposite side of politics, and the only reason he gave for referring to them, was that some newspaper stated, the night before the election, that electors had better not vote for the Conservative candidate, because if the Conservative Government got into power, they would impose duties varying from 55 to 100 per cent. on certain articles. That paper was right, but the people that deserved reprobation were those who said that no such duties would be imposed. When the telegram was sent by the hon. the leader of the Government, stating that there would be no increase of taxation, but simply a readjustment of the tariff, who was right on that occasion, the newspaper that condemned him, or the hon. gentleman who said this additional taxation would not be imposed? He would like to refer to some matters of practical import, which, he thought would be useful. He had always been a strong advocate of improving our channels of inter-communication, and he looked with the deepest regret upon the policy which tended to prevent traffic and throw obstacles in the way of trade. He was surprised when the hon. the Finance Minister proposed a duty of 15c. on wheat, for which not a single reason was advanced. It would prove an injury to the millers, many of whom had informed him that this tax would ruin their business. It would put an obstruction on the carrying trade. He would like to know what spite the Government had against Kingston, Montreal and Toronto, that it should take away from them their trade with the west? The Government obstructed the traffic in wheat, and put a duty on coal, so that our railways, steamboats and canals would be as little used as possible. This was one of the most important questions in relation to this tariff that could be raised, and he hoped, before the matter was finally settled, that hon. gentlemen might yet take it upon themselves to make some alteration in this respect. The shipowners of Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick could stand it, if the carrying trade were taken away from Canada. If the grains of the west were not to be permitted to be shipped from Montreal and Quebec, no doubt they would find other outlets. Other countries would ship their products, and the Canadian shipping would be engaged in carrying them; still it seemed wrong that we should be prevented from carrying these goods from our own country directly. He was amused at the deep sympathy expressed by the Finance Minister with shipowners, which consisted in doubling their taxes, and then taking off a quarter of them. He proposed, with a self-satisfied look, to build a Chinese wall around this country, to say we should not buy from anybody except ourselves; and if we did not buy from others, we could not sell to them. He was going to adopt a policy which, if it were carried out in every country, would entirely do away with the necessity of ships. What was the trade between China, with 350 millions of inhabitants, and Japan, with 40 millions? To-day there was no international trade between these countries. The hon. gentleman would build up such a wall between us and the United States, that the one would not buy from the other, and, that consequently, neither ships nor other communication would be required between them. The hon. member for Niagara, who, in his long speeches, seldom said anything that was remembered, said, to-day: "Protect us against American commerce." That had been the tone of the tariff from beginning to end. He would give one instance of the effect of this tariff on the trade of the Maritime Provinces. The hon. the Minister of Finance proposed to impose a duty on corn and flour. The absurdity of this proposition—if he might be permitted to use the word, and, of course, he used it from his own point of view—could not be better shown than by the following instance: A vessel left Prince Edward Island in the fall, with a cargo of potatoes for New York; the vessel sold her potatoes at a remunerative price, and the owner wanted to get freight back. Last fall, he could have had, for return freight, 1,000 barrels of meal, by which he would gain, perhaps, $150—a small matter, perhaps, when compared with the millions spoken of in this tariff—but, according to this tariff, he would not be able to make even that small amount of profit. He had either to come away from New York in ballast, or else pay the duty on the corn. In the one case, if he brought back 1,000 barrels of cornmeal, he paid $400 duty; and on the other, he lost $150 freight. In the case of coal and plaster, carried to the United States: supposing a vessel went from Windsor to an American port with plaster, the captain wanted a return cargo of anthracite coal; but now he could not bring it without paying a duty that, with the freight, would render the coal unsaleable, on account of the price which would have to be demanded for it. The tariff system about being inaugurated was most destructive in every particular, and could not be defended on any reasonable grounds. Then, what was said in favour of the fishermen? A large number of fishermen, owning their own vessels, took their fish to American ports to sell, and brought back flour and different articles used by them, which they desired to purchase where cheapest made; but now they would lose the benefit they had previously of buying in a cheap market, as, with the new duties, they could not have these return cargoes, without, in the end, paying as much, if not more, for these articles than if they bought them in the West, and paid a heavy freight to get them home. That was a benefit that would not be appreciated by the fishermen. The same thing occurred in the West India trade. Vessels went from Nova Scotia to the West Indies with cargoes of fish and lumber, bulky cargoes; and, if unable to get return cargoes, tried to obtain freight to the United States, if possible, and then they looked for return cargoes to Nova Scotia; but under this policy, they would be compelled to return empty from the United States. It would interfere with every branch of trade. A duty had been put upon coal coming from the United States, which would be very detrimental to the manufacturers of this country.

They had in the Maritime Provinces a number of factories which used anthracite coal, and now, of course, they would have to pay more than heretofore for it. They would have to pay more for their iron also. He was amused, the other night, at reading in the Toronto Mail an account of interviews with gentlemen belonging to firms doing business in the West in the manufacturing of iron goods. Mr. Gurney, Toronto, said :

"Present indications point to a full year's trade, as the new tariff will give us the outlying markets, such as Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Manitoba, which had heretofore been largely supplied from Baltimore and Massachusetts."

Messrs. Gurney, Hamilton, said :

"That, after paying the increased duty on imported iron, and other materials used in the manufacture of stoves, they would be benefited to the extent of a net protection of nearly 5 per cent. over that afforded by the old tariff. This advantage will be the means of increasing trade with the Maritime Provinces, which is now nearly controlled by Boston manufacturers."

That was something entirely new to him, and if those gentlemen were fair specimens of the manufacturers of Ontario, and if they based their hopes of profits on so small grounds, they would be very sorry they ever talked to hon. gentlemen about Protection. He found that, during the fiscal year ending the 31st June last, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia imported $108,000 worth of stoves and iron castings from the United States, while the iron-founders of those two Provinces had produced $1,500,000 more. And these hon. gentlemen were flattering the manufacturers of Toronto and Hamilton with the idea that they were going to make their fortunes, owing to the increased number of stoves they would manufacture, to supply the demand from the Maritime Provinces; increasing their number of hands, and extending their business, and all this to secure the $108,000 trade of those Provinces, over $70,000 of which, for that year, was due to the increased trade brought by the St. John fire. The hon. gentleman had been called upon by almost every industry in the country, but he (Mr. Killam) ventured to say that very few of them had asked him to reduce the duties. He was of opinion there should be no duty on iron; but he supposed that, before the tariff had gone through the House, modifications would be made in it. In his (Mr. Killam's) county an enterprisè had been started for the purpose of manufacturing artificial stone, which was useful for a great many things, for inside and outside work in buildings, for pavements, etc.; but all they got from this tariff was a double duty on cement, their raw material. He was sure the parties were very much obliged to the Government for their kind consideration. Then there was another article which was produced down there, namely, oil-cloth. In his county, and other counties in Nova Scotia, orders were given to certain families, in the fall of the year, to manufacture oil-cloth for the fishermen. There were large manufactories of them in the United States, but they had got into the way of making them in his Province. These were protected by taxing the cotton, thread, buttons, and linseed-oil used in the manufacture. Probably if a delegation came up, the Finance Minister would put a higher duty on oil-cloths from the United States. These were comparatively small matters, but they represented a principle which could be applied to larger transactions. While there had been so much sympathy of all sorts expressed for the manufacturing and producing interests, he had heard very little said about the fishermen. What had been done for them, but to tax them? The hon. gentleman said that these fishermen were quite as willing to be taxed as any other class of the community. So they were, but they were not willing to be taxed out of proportion to other classes. They were taxed for everything that they used. Did hon. gentlemen think that this tariff was going to produce larger markets? They said that there was a balance of trade constantly against Canada; but it was not so much the balance of trade between this country and others, as the balance of trade which existed in this demand, which was caused by compelling them to buy so extensively from Canadians when they could sell nothing in return. They could not help that, however, and had to settle down to this state of affairs; but, when they were becoming reconciled to the condition of things, hon. gentlemen stepped in and taxed the fishermen in every possible way, and did not help them in the least. The Finance Minister told them that the recompense they got for all this was free salt, which they never had to pay any duty upon. There was nothing about salt duties, except the inconvenience and injury to the shipping trade, by preventing shipowners from bringing salt occasionally in place of ballast, that was the only thing he saw in the salt duties. He was prepared to state that the duties imposed by this tariff, on materials used in ships, would be greater than ever, and with the increase, cost of labour, and materials, which it was impossible to bring in and put in bond, the shipbuilding interest would be very much damaged.

MR. TILLEY: How did they do it in old Canada? They gave the drawback and had no trouble.

MR. KILLAM said he was going to show that there would be a great deal of difficulty. If the builder was obliged to import the costly articles he wanted, and was not allowed to get a drawback on any more than he used in the particular ship for which they were imported, he must be a larger capitalist than at present, to lend the Government so much money, or lay out of it a certain time, to his injury. What was to be done? A foundry man brought, for example, iron from Philadelphia, some from Glasgow, and some from the Londonderry Steel Works, and made a ship's stove. Was there to be a drawback in this case? They were told by those makers that they were to have higher prices for their materials. All those things went to make up the cost of the ship. Well, it was impossible, under the hon. gentleman's system, to get the drawback. A premium was actually given under the system to importers, as against the manufacturers of articles for ship's use in our own country. There was no provision for a drawback to counterbalance the increased cost of many articles wanted, partly home-made and partly foreign. The cost of materials would very much more than counterbalance the proposed drawback. Instead of gaining the sympathy of the shipbuilding interests, he has achieved quite the contrary. They might see occasionally, in some of the newspaper telegrams, such as these:

Effect of the National Policy; ships going to be launched in four months; 60 men to be employed in finishing, &c.; but he fancied, when the shipbuilders came to find out the amount of drawback they were going to get, they would not be so loud in praise of the hon. the Finance Minister. He desired to say, before sitting down, that he believed the tariff was not calculated to serve the interests of the country. While it might be necessary to place the amount of the present taxes on the people, instead of practising economy, this particular tariff was not suited to their interests, because it pressed too heavily on particular localities, interferred with trade and commerce, and would prove injurious to the mass of the people, while benefiting only a few not entitled to that consideration.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.) said he did not wish to make a speech, but he had a little intelligence to announce to the leader of the Opposition and his friends, who had endeavoured to convince the House and the country that the people of the Maritime Provinces would be injured, and the Province of Prince Edward Island destroyed, by the tariff. The local elections in that Island had just been held, the National Policy being, of course, the greatest question discussed. It was said the country was to be ruined, on account of the heavy taxes imposed by the Conservative Government at Ottawa; however, he was happy to say that the Local Conservative Government, who supported the National Policy, was returned by 25 against 5.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was the first time he ever heard a Cabinet Minister make such an announcement. If the hon. gentleman had no more sense of the dignity of his own position, he might, at least, have some respect for the Cabinet of which he was a member.

MR. BOWELL said he rose to a point of order. The hon member for Lambton rose and commenced addressing the House, while the hon. the Minister of Marine was speaking, and he only yielded the floor in courtesy to that hon. gentleman.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.) said that he did not think there was anything more pertinent to the question before the House than the announcement just made, nor did he think it derogatory to his position as a Minister or to the Government. The tariff was the prominent question in the Island.

MR. TILLEY : It had been referred to by the hon. gentleman who spoke last.

MR. POPE said yes, and he had been spoken of in the House as formerly the champion Free-trader. He still entertained those opinions, but he wanted real Free-trade, and not a trade permitting the free entry into Canada of almost all the natural productions of a country that taxed everything exported to it from the Dominion. The whole trade of the Dominion amounted to about $96,000,000, of which about $51,000,000 was with the United States. Out of that $27,000,000 worth entered Canada free, the whole of the free goods from all other countries being only about $6,000,000. He did not call that Free-trade of a kind useful to this country. The people in Prince Edward Island felt that as long as they gave the Americans nearly the whole of their trade, allowing their products to come here free, while they taxed the Canadian, they should never get reciprocity, and it was reciprocal Free-trade they wanted, and not so much Protection. They wanted the United States market for their oats, barley and other products, and believed that the only possible way of obtaining that natural market, was to let the Americans see that it was their interest to reciprocate with Canadians. So long as they gave the Americans everything and got nothing in return, so long would matters remain as at present. This tariff provided that, so soon as the Americans reciprocated in the exchange of natural productions, so soon would their products be admitted into Canada free. Unless they could get reciprocal Free-trade on fair and honest terms, he was prepared to go for a hostile tariff on American goods, in the hope that they should obtain reciprocity. He had put the matter fairly before his constituents, and stated, with a view to bring about reciprocity, that they were quite prepared to put a duty on flour, corn meal, and other farm products from the States, so that if they did not get reciprocity, they would probably get some revenue out of a tariff like this one. He did not want retaliation upon the Americans, but only fair play. The attack made on him by the hon. member for Lambton, for his announcement of the result of the Island elections, was uncalled for. He thought his statement entirely in place, being also the strongest evidence that the policy of the Government, of which he was a member, was endorsed by the people of whom he had the honour to represent.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had observed that the conduct of the hon. gentleman, as a member of the Cabinet, in getting up during a solemn discussion on the tariff and announcing in a formal way as a Minister, the result of a local political contest in his own Province, was an event unprecedented in that House. Nothing could be more improper than his attempting to bring into that House his local petty politics. That hon. gentleman said that he had alluded to him and to the Island politics. He (Mr Mackenzie) had made no allusion to them ; but the course pursued by the hon. gentleman and some others towards himself, as the advocate of a revenue tariff, and, as far as possible, to Free-trade on the Island, he had alluded simply to the hon. gentleman in that capacity, but never made the slightest allusion to the domestic politics of that Province or any other. But the hon. gentleman said he was not threatening the United States. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was delighted to hear it, and was sure it would be a great relief to the United States to know that he did not intend to threaten them. They must have felt appalled by the tariff introduced for the purpose of crushing them. No doubt the 45,000,000 in the United States had been trembling in their boots for fear of the consequences of the tariff of this formidable Government. It might be well if the hon. gentleman could assure the people of Great Britain that there was no harm intended them. Why did he quiet the apprehensions of the United States, and not those of Great Britain also, which admitted all Canadian goods free, although there was an amount levied against her exceeding that of any foreign nation, regardless of all considerations of fair play and gratitude? The hon. gentleman, looking down from his exalted position on the nations of the earth scattered around his feet, ought surely to have a kind word for that great country to which Canada belonged. Was that the course to be pursued by this wonderful and powerful Government? The hon. gentleman who introduced his Budget did not appear, from the discussion, to understand it himself. No speech that had been made on the opposite side but consisted, as to nine-tenths of it, of abuse of the previous Government. The hon. gentleman who spoke before the hon. member for Yarmouth spent two hours in the most violent and absurd declamation that ever was heard; and that was the method in which the arguments used on the Opposition were to be met by hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side. If such arguments and such statements as these were the means by which they expected to create and maintain public opinion, they had a most contemptible estimate of the intelligence of the country.

Mr. BRECKEN said he had listened with surprise to the hon. the leader of the Opposition, and thought it was exceedingly improper and unbecoming in that hon. member, that he should have spoken in the contemptuous language in which he had just indulged towards the representatives and people of Prince Edward Island. He had respect for that hon. member, who, by his ability, had attained the leadership of his party. He regretted that the first time he (Mr. Brecken) rose, and in discharge of his duty in that House, had to submit to a taunt from the ex-Premier, because he alluded, in his speech, to the valuable services of the First Minister in the matter of the Washington Treaty and the Fishery Award. He was told by Mr. Mackenzie that he had come from a little island in the East, where they were an ignorant lot. Such conduct on the part of the leader of the Opposition, reminded him of a certain definition of political gratitude; it was defined as "an utter oblivion of political favours received, and a lively anticipation of favours to come." He remembered the time, not a decade ago, when the hon. member owed his official position as Prime Minister of the Dominion to the vote of the representatives of the Province of Prince Edward Island—that he now speaks so sneeringly of. Whether his hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was regular in making the announcement of the result of the elections in Prince Edward Island or not, it was not for him to say; but he (Mr. Brecken) was not a Minister of the Cabinet, like his hon. colleague, and was not trammelled with red tape. While, at the same time, he had the most profound respect for the hon. the Speaker and the House, he must again repeat that when he heard the hon. Mr. Mackenzie indulge in the language to which the House had just listened, he thought that the great leader of the Liberal party in this House, the people's representative and friend, would have found, in the echo of the public voice of the people of Prince Edward Island, pronouncing on a great public question, a sound that would be sweet music to his ear. The hon. the leader of the Opposition and the ex-Finance Minister, had the opportunity of making speeches on the National Policy; they had criticised the policy of the Finance Minister, and had, as he (Mr. Brecken) believed, laboured hard to misrepresent it; yet the very free and independent electors of the Island he came from, and who had made him Premier of Canada, had recorded their votes in favour of the Government policy, against the sophistries of the Opposition. The hon. the leader of the Opposition had styled the announcement made by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, of the result of the recent elections in the Island, as outrageous and offensive. The leader of the Opposition reminded him of what was said about Beau Brummel. He was once asked if he liked vegetables, and he said, "No, he had once eaten a pea, and it disagreed with him." The Hon. Mr. Mackenzie was almost as fastidious. If the Island verdict had been for the policy of the Opposition, the people would have been spoken of as an intelligent and independent people. They had been deluded for a time, but had seized the first opportunity to shake off the shackles of Criticism. They had repented, and had publicly read their recantation, and now that the leader of the Opposition had lost their support forsooth, he said, "that the announcement just made was an insult to the House." The electors of Prince Edward Island were as free and intelligent a community as there was to be found from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The leader of the Opposition was terribly disconcerted at this alleged outrage, he was a syberite and it disturbed his rosy bed. It was a shame for the hon. member who called himself a Liberal and the leader of a Liberal party, to stand up in Parliament among the free representatives of a free people, and say that the voice of a free and intelligent community was an insult to his ears and the ears of the House.

MR. ANGLIN said he merely wished to say a few words in regard to the announcement made by the Minister of Marine, for the purpose of removing a wrong impression, but he doubted not that that hon. gentleman believed what he said to be true. He (Mr. Anglin) thought he knew as much of the politics of Prince Edward Island as anybody not a resident. He had watched, with a great deal of interest, the political proceedings in that Province, and knew a great deal of the secret history of those elections. He must, therefore, assure the House that, although the National Policy might have been discussed before some audiences, and, although the present Opposition might have attempted by means of that policy to redeem their desperate case, this was not the influencing motive in the late elections, nor had it any considerable influence on their result. The late Government, headed by Mr. Davis, chose to raise what was essentially a "No Popery" cry, and introduced a School Bill of the most oppressive character—grossly unjust to the Catholics, who formed nearly one-half of the population. The Minister of Marine sympathised with the Catholics in this matter, and he believed honestly strove to prevent the passing of that measure; but a great many of his friends took a different course. In addition to that iniquitous School Act, and because of it, it became necessary to pass a Bill levying a large amount of money on the property of the Island by direct taxation. That Act gave great offence, even in districts where the School Law was in favour, and created an intense feeling against the Davis Government, and the Conservatives, although they had at one time a majority in the Government, contrived, very skillfully, to direct the whole public feeling, and the public dislike of the School Act on the one hand, and the land tax on the other, against Mr. Davis and the Liberal party. This accounted for the fall of the Davis Government, as well as for the return of the hon. the Minister of Marine and four supporters, at the last Dominion election. Even in that case, it was not so much a question of Dominion politics as of hostility to the School Act. In the late contest the Opposition chose to raise the school cry again, and ask the people to give them a majority, not because of the National Policy, but because the school system was in danger, and would be sacrificed if they were defeated. They thus forced the opponents of the school system to continue their opposition to them, and the decision to-day was a condemnation of the policy that introduced that school system into the Island, and imposed on it, besides, a heavy land tax. That was essentially the result of that day's election, and in that result he (Mr. Anglin) rejoiced most heartily.

MR. McLENNAN said that he desired to say a few words on the amendment before the close of the debate. He had issued during the election campaign, last summer, a small fly-sheet to his electors, in which he tried to indicate the effect or result to the Canadian farmer of the sale of his produce to the United States. An important item of the exports was barley, and, among other things, he had stated the amount of the import upon the aggregate export of barley to the United States, before it reached a market there, because he conceived that, under the circumstances, that duty went to reduce the amount that the Canadian producer received for his barley, in comparison with the producer in the Republic. That statement had been referred to in this House two or three times, and, like almost every other subject that had been handled by gentlemen on the Opposition side, had been perverted in the discussion of the actual facts of the case. They had been entertained with a dissertation upon the abstract question, as to whether the producer or consumer paid the duty. He did not believe there was any such question involved, or any law on that subject, any more than upon a great number of questions that had arisen in the course of this whole debate. He believed that the Canadian farmer, producing a very considerable quantity of barley, of a description of which a similar kind was produced in the United States, and finding only there a market for that barley, received, from the circumstances of the case, 15c. a bushel less than the American growers. That was the whole question, a practical one, in which the circumstances created the result that the producer lost the difference of the duty, whoever paid it. A similar thing had happened with their lumber. The producer in the Ottawa Valley, some years ago, had the markets of the United States for a very large production, subject to a duty of $2 per thousand feet; and whilst the people of the United States were very much engaged in other pursuits this Canadian industry was allowed a very full development. But a change had taken place; men were free to labour in the woods, and Michigan was now a competitor with the Ottawa Valley; and the result was, that the producer of lumber in the Ottawa Valley was reduced at present to starvation by that competition which had robbed him of the only market to which he had access. He wished to forestall an objection that might be made by the imposition that might be made. It might be asked—were Canadians to correct that evil by the imposition of duties on their side? He did not think that they could; but he believed that the virtue of the National Policy would have a much wider range than that. It was said by a great English statesman (Mr. Canning), in the beginning of this century, that he had called the New World into existence to redress the balance of the Old. He (Mr. McLennan) believed that this Parliament could call new industries into existence, and sustain and give them life, in order to redress that balance that operated so seriously against them. He had listened with a great deal of interest and pleasure to the speech of the hon. member for Lambton, in introducing his amendment, and had admired the gallant manner in which he entered the breach, in the forlorn hope in which he was fighting; and when he compared himself, as he (Mr. McLennan) understood, to two great English statesmen—Peel and Gladstone—at a long interval, he presumed—he thought the hon. gentleman hardly bore out the comparison, because those statesmen gave way to the influence of public opinion. They changed with the times. The member for Lambton professed himself still a Free-trader, and gloried in making no change. He (Mr. McLennan) maintained that circumstances governed the whole case; it was the simple fact that “circumstances alter cases,” that gave vitality to every theory propounded on this subject. He was not going to indulge in a budget of figures at this late hour, because he did not think that a great mass of figures was always convincing. It was said that figures did not lie; perhaps not, but everybody in this House, accustomed to use figures, was well aware that they might be very misleading. Hon. gentlemen could use the same set of figures, and the same mass of statistics to prove the advantage of Protection and the advantage of Free-trade. This use of figures was very much like the use of an instrument with which children were amused, the kaleidoscope, which was turned about, and by the shifting of little bits of glass all the colours of the rainbow were produced, yet they were the same bits of glass. The other night an attempt had been made to show that they on that side of the House did not represent any considerable majority, and he did not know but an effort was made to prove that they represented a minority. Recollecting the circumstances in his own county, he considered it rather a marvel that he represented any majority. It was not a large majority, only 61; but when hon. gentlemen remembered that he represented a constituency that was held on the other political side for a period of thirty-seven years, and for the greater part of that time, by one family, and a people in whom fidelity to a leader was an instinct of their being, he thought they would agree that there were was, in that case, at least, some change. The hon. member for Lambton seemed to have a great affection for people who were on the weaker side. He had told us, among other things, that there was a "general revulsion of feeling in the United States people, believing their system to be a departure from a sound system of finance." He believed it was much the same there as here—if there was any such belief, it was the belief of the weaker party. He recollected that, two years ago, some resolutions were introduced into Congress, and an effort was made to secure a reduction of duties. The effort, if it had been successful, would not have been anything to boast of, for it would have been a very high tariff still, much higher than the one we had just introduced, but it was beaten by an overwhelming majority. The hon. gentleman seemed to have a great horror of capitalists, and whilst he had indulged in a fine panegyric upon a class of landlords and capitalists in Great Britain, where their position was hallowed by the growth of years, he seemed to have a great fear lest a similar class of people should arise in this country. He had told us that men should take to agriculture, that the man who made grass and grain to grow, and who produced lumber from the forest, was a creator of wealth. Most gentlemen in this House, however, believed there was a greater power that made the grass and grain to grow, and they believed, at the same time, that men who performed a much humbler act of creation were those who would develop the wealth of the country by turning the productions of nature to account by their ingenuity and their labour. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) told them the other evening, in the course of his strictures upon the tariff, that it was rather singular that a duty was not imposed upon labour or upon immigrants. He did not know whether the hon. gentleman meant it for a joke or not, because the sort of entertainment they had been accustomed to in the House, lately, was of that peculiar kind that a joke almost required to be labelled. That great doctor (Stuart Mill) who had been so frequently quoted by that hon. gentleman, had written learned chapters to prove that the principle element of the production of wealth was labour. Then another question came up. It used to be a theory with the old political economists that true wealth was money. He believed it had always been held that the importation of money into a country was something that was rather to its advantage. Money had usually been understood to mean coin, bullion, gold. His hon. friend from South Norfolk might controvert this theory, and say that gold was not a good thing—he might rather advocate the importation of paper. But all intelligent writers had agreed that labour constituted the chief wealth of all countries; and then, in imposing a tax upon labour, we should simply be shutting the door in our own faces. The hon. member for Lambton told a story, the other night, of certain manufacturers who came down from Hamilton. He stated that those people wished to obtain a high Protection, in order to be able to continue inflicting upon the public a "wretched article"—those were the terms he used. The House would also remember the story about the mica, but it was wound up by a statement that the hon. gentleman did not know whether it was true or not. Well, the essence of a story he believed was the truth. He would illustrate that. Two or three years ago, when his hon. friend the member for Cardwell was running an election in Montreal, he took the opportunity of mentioning a story one evening that he had heard. It was something about steel rails. A telegram came very promptly and stated that the story was a falsehood. His hon. friend from Cardwell was not a man to be shut up by a telegram, and he followed up the story. If there had been no more of it, it would, doubtless, have been as harmless as the story about the mica. But his hon. friend thought possibly there might be some truth in the story—perhaps he had good reason to believe there was some truth in it. He followed up the story, and all would admit that it had had some effect in placing the hon. member for Lambton where he was to-day—not because it was a good story, but because it had a strong element of truth in it. We had been told repeatedly that the Government had not kept faith with the country, because taxation was going to be increased; he was glad to find that in this amendment, proposed by the hon. member for Lambton, that point was abandoned. This amendment conceded that this House was prepared to make ample provision for the requirements of the public service and the maintenance of the public credit—which must be taken to mean that such was the hon. gentleman's belief and desire. He never supposed that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House would venture, seriously, to go on year after year rolling up deficits. His hon. friend the Minister of Finance had referred to the tax on wheat. We might have some difference of opinion as to the tax on wheat. Last night, an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House described the serious injury which a party would suffer who had imported from Chicago 460,000 bushels of oats, and who had converted it into an equivalent number of barrels of oatmeal for shipment to Great Britain, and the deplorable fact was laid before us that this industry was to be stopped. We were told that the policy of the Government tended towards rendering futile the costly and persistent efforts of the country, to secure a share of the immense and growing carrying trade of this Dominion. He was in a position to state that the Government proposed to give the greatest possible facilities in the bonding system for that trade to go on. He had been assured, by the hon. the Minister of Finance, that the bonding system would put no impediment in the way of that industry. There was a sentence in the amendment to the effect that there was "danger of creating an antagonism between the commercial policy of the Empire and that of Canada, that might lead to consequences deeply to be deplored." Gentlemen would remember the time, perhaps a dozen years ago, when some political philosophers on the other side of the Atlantic were constantly holding up the theory that the Colonies were simply an incumbrance to the parent State, and the sooner they cut their apron strings and stood upon their own bottom, the better. During the existence of that vexed question about the Alabama claims that were a source, a constant source of irritation between the empire and the United States—when there was some fears of friction between us and the Mother Country—when men like the then Chancellor of the Exchequer,

Mr. Lowe, and Mr. Bright and Mr. Cardwell, were telling us, from day to day, that we were an incumbrance to the Empire, there was, then, some danger of this kind. But, from all we could learn of the feeling in England to-day, we had no reason to apprehend that the Mother Country was desirous of getting rid of her Colonies. We had reason to believe that the people of that country were perfecting their education, as we were in this; and he looked for the time, not far distant, when the financial system of Great Britain would be similar to the system we had adopted in this country, and when it would be the financial system of the whole Empire. The great danger to which we had been subjected, and which he believed this policy would protect us from in the future, was the danger arising from bad finance. Now, we had been treated to a great many examples, figures of speech, and apothegms by the hon. members on the other side of the House, illustrating the beauties of Free-trade. We had been told by the hon. member for Lambton, that the true interest of all mankind was that trade should be free. But then it must be admitted that "circumstances alter cases." A gentleman from the Province of Quebec had made some happy allusions, in his own tongue, this evening, to the condition of the country, from which he and his fellow-men in that Province were descended, and to the comparative condition of France and Germany. A writer in one of the late reviews had compressed into a few lines the result of his observations on this question. He would just read them to the House, and, after that, he would not detain them any longer:

"The ravages of war are rapidly retrieved, but nothing can remedy the ruin induced by bad Government, especially if a Government takes the line which bad Governments almost invariably do take, that of bad finance."

MR. BOULTBEE said he did not know that he ought to detain the House at this late hour, but some remarks had fallen from a few gentlemen on the Opposition side which he thought worthy of some notice. The hon. member for Gloucester, in alluding to the elections recently held in Prince Edward Island, ascribed the result solely to a religious cry which was raised there. As he understood it, this was not the case.

MR. ANGLIN : I say yes.

MR. BOULTBEE said this was not the issue at all in the present election, and he thought, if the information of the hon. gentleman was correct, he knew that as well as he (Mr. Boulton) did. If his information was incorrect, he had better set himself right. There was no one in the House respected more than he (Mr. Boulton) did the well-known talents of the hon. member for Gloucester, but the more talents a man had the more reason there was that he should not prostitute them. He maintained that it was improper for the hon. member for Gloucester, on an occasion like this, to attempt, as he had done more than once before, to throw a fire-brand into the House. It was not good for these cries to be raised. The hon. member for Gloucester was too much one of those men who liked to have a grievance. There was no harm in having a grievance if it was not a grievance that awakened feelings of the character he was alluding to. It was an evil thing to raise a religious cry. It had done a great deal of harm already, and surely there was no reason for it. Nothing could be gained thereby. If the hon. gentleman enquired what the true feeling in the Island of Prince Edward was, he would find that no such feeling influenced the last election, but that the sympathy of the whole people was in favour of the present Government, in their endeavour to inaugurate the policy now before the House.

MR. ANGLIN : Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to inform us where he got his information from ?

MR. BOULTBEE said he was not as old a member of Parliament as the hon. member for Gloucester, but he had apprehended that he had no right to put such questions. If he was allowed to ask the hon. member, when he delivered his orations, where he got his information, he (Mr. Anglin) would speak less than he did. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), in his remarks, stated that it was expedient that the members of this House—if he understood him correctly—that it would be well, if the members on this side of the House, would justify themselves to the Mother Country for their attitude in regard to the late action in favour of Protection, and, as well, for their action towards the United States. He (Mr. Boulton) did not know that members on this side of the House, or on the other, need justify themselves for any attitude they had assumed towards one country or the other. They were not called upon to justify themselves to the Mother Country. They adopted such policy as they pleased in the interest of the country. They were only doing their honest level best to extricate it from the dilemma in which hon. gentlemen had placed them, and what the States think is of little consequence. Instead of saying that their utterances were idiotic, would it not become hon. gentlemen better to propound to them some theory, to suggest some way in which they themselves intended to meet these constant deficits ? How were they going to do this ? If they were going to do it at all, they were going to do it as the Government were going to do it—by increased taxation. The present Government had only done that, and they had exercised their best wisdom, and consulted the leading business men of the country, so as to best protect the many interests they had to consider. Had hon. gentlemen shown them in what way this was wrong ? He maintained that they had not. They had propounded no scheme that would relieve the country of the incubus with which they had loaded it during the past five years. It was not the proper way to criticise a measure like this, to charge them with speaking stupidly, or bringing in an iniquitous tariff. They should show the Government how they would have filled up the gap and supplied the deficiency. He did not mean to say the late Government had caused this want of prosperity, from which the country suffered. But, the late Government was chargeable for the country going from bad to worse. They made no effort to raise it from the slough of despond in which it was sunk, but sat with their hands tied behind them. The hon. member for Lambton and the hon. member for Gloucester, every time they spoke, made some allusion to their loyalty. He did not know that hon. gentlemen opposite had any right to claim a greater measure of loyalty than members on this side of the House. He did not mean to charge the party to which they belonged with being more disloyal than the Conservative party. But, he did mean to say that if there was in Canada an expatriated American, or a man with American proclivities, or a strong desire for annexation, they found him belonging to the Grit party. If there was a man discontented with our institutions and wanted to alter them, always pining, always wishing for annexation with the United States, they found he belonged to the party of hon. gentlemen opposite. He did not think it lay within their province to charge them on that side of the House with disloyalty. Their constant lip service in this direction was very like carrying round the hat at a meeting, but putting nothing in it.

MR. YEO said the hon. member who had just sat down pretended that he understood all about the politics of the Province from which he (Mr. Yeo) came. The hon. gentleman asserted that the late election had turned upon the tariff now before the House. He could tell the House that the tariff had no more to do with carrying the election of Prince Edward Island than it had to do with the political affairs of Russia. The elections were run upon questions that were purely local. The discontent of one party with the School Law and another with the Assessment Act, had caused the defeat of the late Government. It was his opinion that, if the elections had taken place three months ago, so great was the discontent, the Government would not have been able to procure the return of a single supporter, except, perhaps, upon personal grounds. At the Dominion elections, last summer, the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and his colleagues were the great champions of Free-trade. They advocated a 15 per cent. tariff, and condemned the increase made by the late Government to 17½ per cent. They spoke of the hardship of forcing the poor man to pay as high a duty upon his cottons, woollens and other necessaries, as the rich man paid upon his silks, satins and broadcloth. They complained bitterly of the duty on tea, and promised that, if the Conservatives were returned to power, it should be free. They also promised that the duties on all that was used by the poor man should be lowered, while the taxes on the rich man's luxuries would be increased. He (Mr. Yeo) now saw by the tariff that the very reverse of this was the case; the poor man was, by it, more heavily taxed, while the rich man's burdens were not by any means proportionately increased. For his part, he told the people, when he was elected, that he would not support any party that would not try to keep down taxation for the whole Dominion. The present tariff not only discriminated against the Americans, but it discriminated against England. Now the greater part of the trade of Prince Edward Island was with England. Its merchants sent their ships home laden with grain and lumber, and took as return cargoes everything they required. That trade was now severely injured by the high duties on import under the present tariff. The mechanics, the fishermen and the labourers of Prince Edward Island would be nothing better than serfs. They were, under the former tariff, taxed as much as they could bear, and this additional burden would be unbearable. He asked hon. gentlemen to point out a single benefit this tariff would bestow upon the people of the Island. He must, therefore, protest against the National Policy as strongly as he was able. Of course, he could not expect to do anything more than raise his voice against it, as the supporters of the Government seemed bound to vote for it, right or wrong. He did not know how gentlemen opposite could be so delighted with the tariff as they appeared to be. It was surprising they did not open their eyes to the benefit of a high Protective tariff before they left power in 1873. This tariff was framed with a view to building up a few wealthy manufactures in Ontario, while it loaded down the Maritime Provinces with taxation. It had always been his opinion, since Confederation, that the smaller Provinces would be imposed upon by the larger Provinces. This the Government, by forcing upon them an oppressive Protective system, was doing; and if it were continued the sooner the people left the Island the better it would be for them. He had brought up another matter in the House some time ago, which was not then satisfactorily received, namely, the disposition of the Fishery Award. He had asked that $1,000,000 should be handed over to Prince Edward Island. This was their money, and they were justly entitled to it. The papers he had asked for had not been brought down, and it appeared to him that the Government wanted to smother enquiry, and that they had no intention of expending the money for the benefit of the people of Prince Edward Island. If this money were appropriated as he desired, it would prove a great benefit to all classes of the people of his Province. He hoped the Government would take this matter into their serious consideration, and he trusted that this money, which was justly due to the people of Prince Edward Island, would be handed over to the Local Government for their benefit. He did not care whether it was given to a Liberal or Conservative Government, so long as the people got it.

MR. MACDOUGALL said the statement had been made, and often repeated, that the people, at the late election, had pronounced on the measure which the hon. the Finance Minister had submitted for their consideration. He could not, from his point of view, concur in the accuracy of that statement as to details; but this much he would venture to say, that the principle which lay at the foundation of the hon. gentleman's propositions, was clearly, distinctly, and definitively pronounced upon by the electorate of the Dominion, on the 17th September last. He was surprised to hear the contrary asserted, during this debate, by the leader of the Opposition, and by other hon. gentlemen well informed as to the state of public feeling in the country at and prior to the elections, who, by the discussions which they themselves excited, knew that the real determining influence, with the great body of the electors, was the belief that, at the hands of the late Ministry, it was vain to expect any material change in the financial policy of the country. The electors felt a strong conviction that a change was required in the interests of the country, and they were patriotic enough, and honest enough, to vote for the candidates who professed themselves ready to support a policy identical in principle with that which had been proposed by the Finance Minister. The issue was squarely put, the question was fairly discussed, and it had been examined and considered by the electors with great care and deliberation. In fact, he had never known, during a long political career, an election in which the issue presented to the electors had attracted so much attention, was discussed and examined so thoroughly on all sides, not in the heat of party or political excitement, but with an anxious desire on the part of the great majority of the people to arrive at the truth and to ascertain the policy which, in the exigencies of the country, would be most likely to relieve it from depression and improve the industrial condition of the people. Party issues were, to a large extent, forgotten in the contest. As to his own position, he would take that opportunity to say that he had not been in the past, and, perhaps, was not at present, entirely in accord with the political ideas of the leader of this Government. He had been associated with him as a public man for nearly fifteen years. They had agreed, in 1864, to sink political differences, and to labour for changes in the Constitution and laws of the country, which he believed had, in most cases, proved to be reforms, but was not a "follower" of the hon. gentleman. He had been his ally in great affairs of State, and willingly confessed that he felt a great admiration for his ability and patriotism. He believed, even while differing from him on certain questions, that the hon. gentleman was honestly endeavouring to work out a policy, which would, in his opinion, advance the interests of his country. And, therefore, although his (Mr. Macdougall's) political antecedents might, at a certain crisis, have opened out to him the prospect of another, and, personally, a more profitable career, yet he felt, upon the whole, that duty to his country demanded further risks and sacrifices. He felt a strong conviction that the new policy which began with Confederation was not safe in the hands of his (Mr. Macdougall's) former political friends; that, while we were yet in the gristle, it was not desirable to weaken the political influence of the right hon. gentleman and his supporters in the country. On more occasions than one he (Mr. Macdougall) had found that he could place very little reliance upon hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to that policy which, in 1864, both political parties had agreed should be the basis and the object of our new Constitution. The time came at last when this fiscal question had to be dealt with. It was foreseen, at the establishment of Confederation, that necessity would soon compel us to inaugurate a new fiscal policy for the new Dominion. Our relations with the Mother Country and with our neighbours were different from those which had previously existed, and it was evident to every thoughtful man that these new conditions involved new methods and new measures. The circumstances themselves pointed out the necessity for a National Policy. What that National Policy should be, circumstances had also very clearly indicated. It had been argued, in the course of this discussion, that they ought to adhere to the theory and practice of Free-trade. It had been pointed out to them that great calamities had befallen other nations for not adhering to that principle, and the leader of the Opposition had quoted, for their edification, certain passages from the writings of Lord Macaulay, as evidence of the failure of Protection in the Mother Country at a particular period. Very great efforts had been made to frighten them, by proving that the adoption of the system of Protection by our neighbours across the line had produced poverty and distress in that country. For his part, he had no hesitation in saying that in theory he was a Free-trader. The logic of Free-trade, to his mind, was invincible, but Free-trade in Canada, under the circumstances in which we were placed, was impossible. How could we bargain or trade with our American neighbours if they would not bargain or trade with us? It was impossible to carry on Free-trade with any country unless that country reciprocated. He had hoped, for the last fourteen years, that our American neighbours would, with respect to the natural productions of the soil, at all events, reciprocate with us, and thus return to the principle of Free-trade, which had proved so advantageous to both nations in the past. Deputations from both political parties in this House had gone to Washington; Boards of Trade in both countries had passed resolutions, communication had taken place between the merchants and traders of the great cities; year after year we waited, and hoped that this agitation on both sides would ultimately result in a more liberal spirit, and a more equitable arrangement between us and our neighbours; but at last it became evident, from the action of Congress upon the resolution brought in by Fernando Wood, that neither the one political party nor the other in that country was in favour of the system of Free-trade, which hon. gentlemen held up as a policy that ought to be adopted by all mankind. Was there any justification, therefore, in the presence of these facts, for all this talk about Free-trade with our American neighbours, which, so long as we had no equivalents to offer them, was neither probable nor possible? He had come deliberately to the conclusion that we must strike out a course for ourselves; we must consider Canada as separated commercially from the United States, and so regulate our fiscal policy as to promote the interests of our own people. With regard to the Mother Country, it was said we would expose ourselves to the charge of disloyalty if we increased the duties on English goods. Was there any difference that could be weighed or measured, politically, between the loyalty of 17½ per cent., and the disloyalty of 20 per cent.? If it was a proof of disloyalty to make our own people pay 20 per cent. into the Canadian Exchequer, upon their importations from England, he thought it would be difficult to prove ourselves loyal so long as we exacted 17½. He was not disposed to yield to that argument. We had, at last, succeeded in impressing on the minds, even of the manufactures of Sheffield, Birmingham, and other manufacturing centres in England, that Canada possessed a Government of its own; that she had been endowed with power at the hands of the Imperial Parliament to regulate her own commercial policy, her navigation and shipping, her revenues and expenditures; in fact to exercise all the functions and powers of an independent country, except the power of making war or declaring peace, or entering into treaties with foreign nations, and a few matters of that kind. They already recognised that fact, and they must recognise the further fact that we were the judges—of first instance, as well as in appeal—that we know best our own position, and the policy most likely to promote our own interests. They must understand that they, as representatives of the people, deliberated with the fact present to their minds that it was not only their right, but their imperative duty, to adopt the policy or course, which, upon the whole, would promote the interests of Canada, without reference to the opinions or interests, in matters of trade, of our fellow subjects of Great Britain. We were an important part of the Empire in respect to territory and resources, and, in view of what had recently happened, he believed the public men of the Mother Country, of all parties, were now convinced that our position, influence and assistance in times of difficulty or danger, was an element of considerable national importance, and, in case of war, would be appreciated even by the trading classes of Great Britain. Having visited England on two or three public occasions, and having come in contact with public men there, on both sides of politics, he had opportunities of ascertaining their views and feelings on what were called colonial questions, which he was not slow to take advantage of, and he found that, except among a narrow trading class, no one was disposed to refuse to us the right to regulate our own internal affairs in our own way, and to base our fiscal economy on those principles which we might deem best suited to our wants and circumstances. He apprehended no irritation among the intelligent people of the Mother Country with respect to this policy. What he had seen in the English press already, and what had taken place in the Imperial Parliament, ought to satisfy us with respect to that point. His hon. friends opposite would not very much disturb the minds of people in this country by holding up the prospect of a possible collision between England and ourselves, on the question of increasing our revenue to enable us to pay our debts. He had listened with great attention, the other night, to the speech of the hon. the leader of the Opposition, for whose ability, energy, and perseverance, he had a very high respect. He had expected that, in attempting to lead that party, through their representatives in this House, to support a resolution in opposition to the policy of the Government, he would have given his friends some logical basis for their arguments, some intelligible policy as an alternative to that of the Government. The hon. gentleman had controlled public affairs for the last five years. He knew the financial difficulty into which the country had fallen under his Administration; no one knew better the obligations of the country on account of the great public works which had been undertaken, and which he did not assume the responsibility of giving up; he knew that a large additional revenue must be raised to meet the annual expenditure; he must have discovered that the country would not tolerate a standing deficit of two millions a year, involving the necessity of borrowing money abroad to pay the ordinary expense of administration; he must have felt the consequences of his financial policy, for it had an important influence against the late Government at the polls, that they had not made provision for restoring the balance between revenue and expenditure; yet, with all these facts staring him in the face, he could stand up in opposition to a policy like this, and talk about the wickedness of taxation. He could denounce the Government, and endeavour to excite the minds of the people against them, because they were going to increase the taxes. What else could be done if we were not to repudiate, to stop our public works, to issue paper-money, which we might never be able to pay? We must either do something of that kind, or compel the people to bear the burden. The honest course was to lay on the taxes when they voted the supply. The Finance Minister had no alternative, he must raise this additional sum; and yet the hon. leader of the Opposition did not tell them how he proposed to do it. His (Mr. Mackenzie's) supporters in the country did not know by what means he intended to increase the revenue, until it should meet the expenditure. It was unfair of hon. gentlemen opposite; it was not logical, or honest, to hold out to the country the idea that they could provide means for the public service without additional taxation. This resolution of the hon. the leader of the Opposition said that they were prepared—those who voted for it—“to make ample provision for the requirements of the public service and the maintenance of the public credit.” How did they propose to make this ample provision, if not by increasing taxation; and what difference could it make to the taxpayers of the country, whether the increase of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. was levied under Mr. Cartwright or Mr. Tilley? But it did concern the interests and the trade of the country that these taxes should be laid on in such a manner as would, at the same time, enable the people who were to pay them to get work and earn wages. If they could create wealth in the country, and excite the industrial classes to renewed activity by a readjustment of the duties on imports, it was clearly their right, as well as their duty, to readjust them. Political economists and theorists might dispute as to the relations of cause and effect in such a case. But they had more than one example in modern times of the fallacy of the abstract theories of political economists. The example of our neighbours—a great, a practical, an intelligent people—was forced upon our attention, and what did we see? A people reduced to a condition of great depression through the operations and burdens of a gigantic and disastrous war, rising like the phoenix from her ashes, under a policy which gentlemen opposite persisted in telling them ought to have ruined them by this time. He thought, when he recalled the history of the last few years, and saw how the people of the United States had disappointed the economists, how they were competing to-day with old and wealthy countries like England in their own markets, that we had a most satisfactory precedent for the inauguration of the tariff system proposed by the hon. the Finance Minister. No doubt there was distress in the large cities across the border, particular classes of people out of employment, and embarrassing changes in values, but, looking at the country as a whole, and having studied its history and progress with a good deal of attention, he must say that the theory of hon. gentlemen opposite, with respect to the injurious results of Protection, were not entirely borne out by the United States. Looking critically at this tariff, which the hon. the Minister of Finance and his colleagues had revised, and now proposed to pass into law, he might, perhaps, admit that there were some incongruities and inequalities in it. He could point out some items that might be advantageously modified in Committee, and he hoped his hon. friend would not refuse to consider them. But with such a multitude of items, it was absurd to discuss them out of Committee, and it was impossible to adjust them according to individual opinions. It was to be expected that some provisions of this tariff would not quite meet the personal views and interests of certain classes of people, but, looking at the tariff as a whole, knowing, as he did, the great care, attention and kindness with which the hon. gentleman in charge of these matters had received depositions, had listened to suggestions from persons of experience, from all parts of the Dominion—by letter and telegraph, as well as personal interview—and seeing the anxiety that he and his colleagues had manifested to redeem those pledges which they and their friends had made prior to the general election, he thought that even the Opposition must admit that the hon. gentleman had succeeded in preparing and bringing to this House a measure which commended itself to the judgment, and would receive the approval of the great majority of the people. He heard hon. gentlemen dissent; but, if this tariff had excited so much hostility in the public mind as hon. gentlemen contended, how was it that no evidence of such hostility had reached this House? One would have expected to have seen numerous petitions against it presented by hon. gentlemen. He had received a few letters—and he was happy to say he had friends in the ranks of both political parties—and, without exception, the writers approved of the tariff as a whole, though there might be some particular items, touching their own business, which they would desire to see modified. All, without exception, approved of the conduct of the Government in carrying out the pledges which they had made to the country.

He did not think much of that, however, because it should not be a rare thing to find public men, when in power, carrying out the pledges made in Opposition. It might be that the people, having had recent examples of the reverse, had become distrustful, and thought it a political phenomenon when they found a Government prepared to carry out the pledges upon which they secured their return to office. In this case the Government had attempted to redeem their pledges; if successful, they had done no more than their duty. He was sure the people of the constituency he represented would be satisfied, and he could tell hon. gentlemen opposite that he would not be in the House if he had not obtained the votes of a good many sound Reformers. He felt he would be carrying out their wishes as well as those of his Conservative supporters, and justifying the confidence of both, by voting for this measure, which he would do with a great deal of pleasure. He had heard, during this discussion, a great deal said by gentlemen on the other side of the House with respect to consistency, and it occurred to him that a very brief review of the political history of Canada would illustrate the ideas of those hon. gentlemen with regard to consistency in matters of this kind. He remembered very well that, in 1866, when they were engaged with the scheme of Confederation, he and others, who had belonged to the Reform party previously, had the misfortune to find that the then leader of that party felt it to be his duty, he (Mr. Macdougall) presumed, to detach himself from the coalition that had been formed to carry that great measure. It became necessary, for fiscal and other reasons, to make some changes and reductions in the Canadian tariff, and Mr. Galt, the Finance Minister, proposed to the House very material modifications. A Protective tariff had been adopted in 1859, but, in 1866, in view of the complete revolution in prices and values, caused by the American war, and in view of the difficulty likely to be encountered in the Maritime Provinces, in respect to the tariff, it was regarded as a matter of very great importance to reduce our high Customs duties, in order to adjust them as nearly as possible to the circumstances and condition of the whole of the Provinces. It was believed that the revenue produced by a lower tariff would be sufficient, and, therefore, it was proposed, as a matter of great political as well as fiscal importance, to reduce the tariff from 20 per cent. to 15 per cent. But what happened? One would have supposed that the motion would have been hailed with delight by Free-traders, as a step in the right direction, as approximating to the system which they believed the best in the interests of the country. Where did they find the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), and the Hon. Mr. Brown, the leader of the great Reform Free-trade party? Why, they actually opposed the reduction of the tariff from 20 to 15 per cent. He (Mr. Macdougall) had the curiosity to turn up the debates on that occasion, and he found that the hon. member for Lambton, in speaking to Mr. McGivern's anti-Free-trade motion, for which he voted, had used these words:

"With regard to the merits of the question before the House, he did not believe in building up manufactures by a Protective system. But, at the same time, if the United States had adopted a policy whereby we lose them as a market, we were bound to adopt such means as would make a market for ourselves. Under the policy of the Finance Minister, manufactures had grown up in the country, and it would be unjust to those who had embarked their capital in them that the protection should now be withdrawn without a moment's warning."

MR. MACKENZIE: I said the same thing two nights ago.

MR. MACDOUGALL said why did not the hon. gentleman say the same thing about this tariff? The United States had closed their markets to Canada more effectually now than then. They had erected a Chinese wall which they showed no disposition to remove, and, if the argument was good then, it was applicable now. But the hon. gentleman went on:

"He admitted that the policy of the Government had not been in harmony with the tendency of public men towards Free-trade. But large interests had grown up, under our system of incidental Protection, which, he considered, should not be destroyed."

The hon. gentleman was arguing for the maintenance of the 20 per cent. tariff, which the then Finance Minister told the House was not necessary for the purposes of revenue. Then,

"In reply to a question, he said he was in favour of the Protective system which had been the policy of the country for some years, and under which interests had been created which the House should respect."

The motion to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) was then speaking, was a Protectionist motion, moved by Mr. McGivern, a Protectionist, supported by Protectionists, and the hon. gentleman and his leader did everything in their power to persuade their Reform supporters to vote against this proposal in the direction of Free-trade. Well, the Government carried their measure, and by carrying it, they opened up the way very materially to the accession of the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to the Union. They got on very well with this 15 per cent. tariff, the revenue was sufficient and continued so for a number of years after Confederation, until at last it was found necessary, by the gentlemen opposite, to increase it from 15 to 17½ per cent. He did not blame them for the increase, as he believed it was necessary at the time. But he thought it would have been more satisfactory to the great mass of the people, and more advantageous to the country, if, instead of adding to the taxation of the people, by a general increase of the tariff, they had considered the circumstances of the country, and the industrial interests of the country, and had, at that time, adjusted the tariff in such a way as to have fostered those interests. Now, one or two words with reference to another aspect of the question, which had been referred to in the course of the debate. It had been stated in the House, and elsewhere, that his (Mr. Macdougall's) advice was not required; but, perhaps, hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial benches, in view of the many years he had served in Parliament, would not object to a few observations, by way of advice or suggestion. He thought that, in addition to this tariff, and the encouragement it would afford to the industries of the country, it was absolutely necessary, in the interests of the whole people, that the Government and this House should introduce, as far as possible, in every branch of the public service, another policy—a national policy of economy and retrenchment. He thought, further, that this House should discourage—that the Government should set their faces against—those constant applications for additional expenditure, in all parts of the Dominion, for new, and in many cases useless, public works. They had, he feared, sunk many millions of dollars in unprofitable works, and it was time they should carefully consider their position, and endeavour to stop further expenditure in that direction. Moreover, he thought there was another suggestion which would not be out of place in connection with this subject—that was, to take immediate steps to increase the trade of Canada with other countries. They had made an attempt in 1855-56 to open up new avenues of commercial intercourse with countries, with which they could profitably exchange articles of Canadian production for the products of those countries; but changes of Government and of financial policy had interfered for a time with those measures which were absolutely necessary to promote this increase of trade. He thought that, in the present circumstances of Canada, it was desirable to open up further trade with the West Indies, South America, Brazil, and the Australian colonies. He believed that was one of the objects of the hon. the Finance Minister in the arrangement made with respect to the sugar duties. It was expected that these changes would have the effect of inducing a direct trade with those countries. It appeared to him desirable that they should take another step. The Government of this Dominion should claim, by communication with the Imperial Government, and by such means as might be proper, the right to participate in all new commercial treaties between Great Britain and foreign countries. Heretofore we had not been allowed that privilege. It had been the policy of England, for ages, to secure, as far as possible, the trade of her colonial possessions for her own traders and merchants. Looking into the history of England and her colonies, he could not say that it was not a proper and even a patriotic policy for the Mother Country to strengthen her own position by retaining the trade of her own colonies in her own hands. It did not retard the progress of the colonies during their minority. But, now, when some of them had reached maturity, when they enjoyed self-government, and had been given the uncontrolled management of their local affairs, they ought to be allowed commercial independence as well as local political independence. They ought to be permitted to make arrangements, through their own Legislature, with any country that would make arrangements with them for the interchange of commodities upon favourable terms. In looking over the tariff, regulating trade between England and France, he found that we had no share in the advantages which England had secured from that country. While our fellow-subjects in the British Islands might send their commodities into France at a moderate rate of duty, many of ours were actually prohibited, and others charged 500 or 600 per cent. more than the same goods would pay if exported from England instead of Canada. He thought it might be possible to rectify this, and, under the new treaty about to be negotiated with France, to obtain favourable terms for the productions of Canada. He might say that he had a little personal experience of the policy of England, in reference to this question of trade. He had the honour, a few years ago, to act as a Commissioner on behalf of Canada, to make favourable terms with the West Indies and Brazil. He then discovered that it was still the policy of the Colonial Office, under the direction of the Lords of the Privy Council for trade, to prevent the colonies from making reciprocal arrangements in respect to their dealings with each other. He believed that difficulty could be got rid of, as regarded the West Indies, by a full and frank explanation of the whole case to the Imperial Government, and a move in the direction of that commercial independence which Canada's position entitled her to enjoy. He had very little doubt, from his observation of public opinion, that, if the Government of Canada presented our case strongly and clearly, we would either be permitted to join in the commercial treaties of the Mother Country with foreign nations, or to make reciprocal arrangements with them and our sister colonies on our own account. We must, if possible, find markets abroad. The predictions of hon gentlemen opposite as to the effect of this tariff upon the industrial operations of the country might prove true. They said that in a short time competition would be so great that our manufacturers would be ruined, and the capital invested lost. He admitted there was a tendency in that direction. Indeed, he trusted the competition in all branches of industry would bring down the prices of commodities to a fair and reasonable amount. If he did not believe that competition would keep down prices, his confidence in the new tariff would be greatly weakened. A portion of the people would, no doubt, be drawn away from agricultural pursuits, and, therefore, it would be the duty of the Government to see that no stone was left unturned, no opportunity permitted to pass, which would enable them to secure outlets for the surplus products of the factories, as well as the forest and the farm, wherever they could be found. Believing that it would not only be the duty, but the pleasure of the present Government, to finish the policy they had inaugurated, by making efforts in that direction, he would leave the question in their hands, expressing the hope that they would make all reasonable endeavours to accomplish that object. He believed they were carrying out fairly and honestly, the "well understood wishes of the people," which, according to the resolutions of 1841, were declared to be the rule of Government in Canada, before Confederation, and which, by the Imperial Act of 1867, were declared to be the rule of Government in this country for the future. He believed that the rule applied, not only to this case, but to another question under consideration of the Imperial Government at this moment. The well understood wishes of the people must be the rule of government in this country, in all matters of local administration as well as alterations and amendments of the law. The intelligence they had just received from Prince Edward Island would seem to prove that, in the manner in which we are dealing with the fiscal question, we are carrying out the well-understood wish of the people in that Province. The local elections there had just been decided in such a manner as to justify him in assuming that the people of that Province were not opposed to the policy of the general Government in regard to the tariff. He believed a large majority of the people of the whole Dominion were in favour of the speedy adoption of the law which would make this tariff the policy of the country for several years to come, for it was a policy which he hoped and believed would promote the happiness, the prosperity, and the progress of the country.

MR. CASGRAIN said he did not intend, at this late hour, to say much on the tariff question, but he felt it to be his duty to say a word in behalf of his own Province, and particularly of his own county. He had decided objection both to the tariff as a whole, and to many of its details. The hon. gentleman the Finance Minister stated the other day that this tariff was the result of a compromise. It was, in fact, a compromise. It was a compromise between the Upper Provinces and the Lower Provinces; the Province of Quebec stood between the two, that is to say, she stood under a cross fire between the tax on coal at one pole, and the tax on wheat at the other. He would say that his Province was not ready to accept this tariff. It had been stated that this policy would greatly encourage the shipping interests of the country, and the workmen in the city of Quebec, as elsewhere, had been promised employment in shipbuilding. He could assert, as a fact, that at this moment the largest shipbuilders in the Dominion, the Messrs. Ross of Quebec, who had not five ships on the stocks, had recently been obliged to suspend work. He believed that many of the promises made to other industries in this country would be no better fulfilled than the one made to this shipping interest. He would say, further, that, if this policy should prove as successful as was anticipated, if it should realise the benefits which hon. gentlemen expected, but which he did not expect, he would be the first to admit that he had been mistaken, and they had been right. He did not believe, however, it would succeed. There were certain great economic laws which were as unyielding as any other laws of nature, and it was as easy to predict scientifically the result of given economic data as it was to predict an eclipse of the sun or of the moon. Popular opinion regarded crises as an evil; he denied they were an evil, they were the result of anterior events, and the natural cure for a disordered commerce, and for a state of things which frequently arose in most countries. Here we were only four millions of people, and some of us wanted to make all our own manufactures without trading with our neighbours. If we should adopt this policy, in a few years our markets would be glutted. The true beginning of this policy was pointed out by the hon. member for Halton, which was to open up markets abroad with France, Spain, Belgium, etc. But, at the same time, he denied that we would be able to compete with other nations, any more than England was able to compete with other nations. The theory of supplying work, and of fixing and maintaining the rate of wages, was a false theory. The only way of creating manufactures was to reduce the price of the article itself, and not by imposing duties on the raw material that came from abroad. They knew very well that wages in France were lower than in England, and lower in Germany than in France, and lower in Belgium than in France. He might give an instance of the importance of cheap labour in the case of the penknife that he held in his hand, the very same kind of penknife for which $4 a piece was paid by a notorious Tory Government, as was well remembered. The German trader was able to bring knives of that description to Sheffield and Birmingham and undersell the English in their own market. Under German competition the price had been reduced to 6s. 6d. sterling a dozen, or 14c. a piece, whilst we continued to pay for that same article here from $1.75 to $2. Supposing we should desire to manufacture articles of this kind, people would still be able to buy them cheaper in England, and cheaper still in Germany.

MR. TILLEY: The duty on cutlery is only 20 per cent.

MR. CASGRAIN said the knife cost him less to-day in England than the duty he would have to pay on the former imported article. Therefore, he said that, if we wanted to manufacture articles, the first condition of success was to manufacture them cheaply, and afterwards, when we had got the products, to find a market for them. He could give instances of old English commercial houses who still marked on their price list the original price at which the article was sold. This proved to him that a great many articles of common use could be sold a great deal cheaper than the prices now paid for them. The present commercial crisis could not last for ever; trade would inevitably return. If it returned during the maintenance in power of the hon. gentlemen opposite, they would say that it was due to their tariff. It would not be due to that tariff, but rather in spite of it. The hon. member for Halton had spoken of retrenchment, and, certainly, we needed to practice it now more than ever. We had been in Confederation now for twelve years, and our debts had been growing at a tremendous rate. There was a farce called the militia system, which had cost a good deal of money to the country. If the citizens of this country would do as they did in other countries, Switzerland, for instance, and instead of paying others to play soldier, they were to play soldier themselves, he thought it would cost far less for parade, and the plan would be more likely to give us an efficient service, which, he was sorry to say, we had not at the present moment, because the cost of our militia system did not pay for the whistle. He would also practice retrenchment throughout our Dominion and Local Administrations. There must be some means of lessening the enormous expenses of government in this country. This House was composed of 206 members, and he thought a much smaller number would do just as well. We did not need to concentrate so much wisdom. We were living beyond our means, and going on from one extravagance to another. Suppose the country should finally build and pay for the Pacific Railway. He would ask hon. gentlemen opposite whether they thought the resources of the country were sufficient to build it, and whether the country would be able to work that road for three years without running head over heels into debt? It was well-known that the mere working of that road would cost, at the very least, $15,000,000 a year. Where would we go to get that $15,000,000 a year? Suppose we had built the Grand Trunk Railway, would we, to-day, be able to support the expenses that were incurred in running it? No, it was perfectly impossible. We ought to stop, at once, this excessive expenditure incurred by the unwise schemes some years ago of the hon. gentlemen now on the Treasury benches. The Conservative party boasted of having held the reins of power in this Dominion for over 25 years, they ought then, to be held responsible for what had occurred in the meantime. Very little had been undertaken, involving expenditure, by the Administration of the hon. gentleman from Lambton, but the financial depression had caused deficits. What was the cause of these deficits? The Government expended no more money than Parliament had voted for it. They expended the ordinary sum of $22,000,000, but the revenue of the country fell short of that sum by somewhat over $2,000,000, and now the hon. the Minister of Finance wanted to raise $2,500,000 more on a tariff which had hitherto produced, on an average, $24,000,000, for a population of only 4,000,000. This would prove a very heavy burden.

MR. TILLEY: We only ask for $14,000,000 from Customs.

MR. CASGRAIN said the Government wanted to raise, from all sources, $24,000,000 a year. The Government expected to get $24,400,000 by this tariff; that was $6 per head upon every man, woman and child in the Dominion. He was very much mistaken if this were not so, and, if he was mistaken, perhaps the hon. the Finance Minister would enlighten him upon the subject. Consequently, a man who had eight children would be taxed in proportion. He (Mr. Casgrain) was burdened with a debt of $1,000 a year by the Federal Government, irrespective of the local and municipal taxations. Therefore, he thought he had a right to speak on the subject. There was another point he desired to call attention to, and that was that, if the hon. gentleman only wanted to raise $2,500,000 additional, he would only have had to increase the tariff by one and one-tenth per cent. Instead, however, he had increased the tariff, on an average from 10 to 12 per cent. He had no doubt, and he gave the hon. gentleman credit for it, that he had decided upon adopting the Yankee system of forcing the people to make true entries in regard to the value of the goods. He thought his hon. friend the late Finance Minister must have lost large sums of money on account of goods being entered below their actual value. He gave the hon. the Finance Minister credit for doing this, but he did not give him credit for having put the tariff at so high a rate. He had received numerous letters from his constituents, and one that very day, in which they said this tariff was not acceptable to them. He had also received a letter in which it was stated that they intended to protest, in every town and parish, against this tariff. They had a perfect right to do this, and they were also going to protest in the county of Montmagny. In conclusion, he observed that the motion of the member for Bagot looked very much as though they had a vote of non-confidence before the House. He would leave that motion, however, with the Ministry, in order that they might do what they thought best in the matter. For his part, he was not interested much in whatever way it went; but, certainly, before the House went into Committee, there was a motion of want of confidence in the Ministry in the paper which ought to be disposed of.

MR. LAURIER said it was not his intention to travel over the whole of the ground comprised in this question. He desired simply to repel some of the imputations of inconsistency and disloyalty which had been brought by some hon. gentlemen against the Liberal party of Quebec, to which he belonged. To the first charge of inconsistency he did not attach much importance. A French writer had observed, "The absurd man is he who never alters;" and, if the converse of the proposition was true, some hon. gentlemen opposite, in consideration of their wanderings, were entitled to claim a high order of intelligence, indeed. The charge of disloyalty was one he was surprised to hear uttered by hon. gentlemen opposite, but since it had been uttered, it was nothing but right and fair that it should rest on the proper shoulders. The main charge brought against them was, that they had abandoned their principles—that at one time the Liberal party of Quebec held principles similar to those advocated by the Government of to-day, which they, the Liberal party of Quebec, had abandoned. His hon. friend from Maskinongé (Mr. Houde) had asserted that they who claimed to be followers of Mr. Papineau had abandoned the principles advocated by Mr. Papineau. When this statement was made it was cheered, and, if he was to understand anything from this accusation, it meant that the Conservative party of Quebec had at last adopted the policy once advocated by Mr. Papineau. He could rejoice that the name of Mr. Papineau could now be pronounced by Opposition members of the House, without, at the same time, coupling with it some injurious expression. He could rejoice that at last some measure of justice was to be meted to that man, who, whatever might be said of him in other directions, had been the greatest man Lower Canada had ever produced. The charge showed that hon. gentlemen were not like the stumps in the field—immovable; it showed that they could retract if they could not advance, because they adopted a principle propounded years ago, and after the issues it had in view had been settled. If it was considered inconsistent to abandon a principle after the issues had been settled and determined, they were certainly inconsistent. If otherwise, then the charge fell on hon. gentlemen opposite. He would give the floor to any gentleman who would say what was the policy of Mr. Papineau, that they were accused of having abandoned. If no one would tell the House, he himself would do so. They knew, as well as he did, that the policy Mr. Papineau once advocated, was one calculated to sever the alliance which then bound, and still bound us to England. That was the policy of the Liberal party at that day, and what occasioned the adoption of that policy? The French Liberal party had long struggled against England for responsible government and constitutional liberty. Unfortunately, at that time, the policy of England towards her colonies was not her policy of to-day—the policy which had made her so dear to her Canadian subjects. They had been petitioning and agitating for the concession of a free and responsible government. Deputation after deputation was sent to England, and petition after petition was laid upon the table of the Imperial Parliament. The supplies were repeatedly suppressed, and all the means of agitation which the limited Constitution of that day afforded them was resorted to. And all in vain. England always turned a deaf ear to their prayers. Then Mr. Papineau proposed that policy of their party, that they should shut their ports to all English merchandise, that they should cease their commercial relations with England. His calculation was that either England would be forced to give us the liberty for which we were struggling, or that the commercial relations with England would be destroyed, and that, as soon as commercial relations were destroyed, as a necessity, the political relations would be destroyed as well. Such, at that time, was the policy of the party to which he at present belonged. But he was bound to say that, as soon as this liberty for which they were struggling was given them, this policy was abandoned. And he would defy any gentleman on the other side of the House to cite a single word of Mr. Papineau, Mr. Morin, or any other leader of the Liberal party of Quebec, that advocated, after they had obtained responsible government, the policy to which he (Mr. Laurier) had referred. And that policy remained abandoned until it was restored by the leader of the Conservative party of Canada. Now, he was free to say that, had he lived in those days, he would have been one to advocate that policy. He would have been willing to risk his life in order that the country might be free. But he was not living in the year 1837. He was living in the year 1879, and he would be remiss to his duty if he were to forget the flag which waved over this country, and which waved over a free people. Mr. Papineau never told the people that they were to expect an economical benefit from this policy, but always told them that it was a sacrifice, in order that they might obtain liberty. He, at the same time, told them to make the sacrifice, because no sacrifice was too great for the precious boon of liberty. At this day they would not be worthy of the example of that great man, if they were now, when the country was free, to again try to impose the same sacrifice upon the people. They were accused of being inconsistent. He would ask the House to judge of the sincerity of hon. gentlemen in throwing that reproach across the floor. He did not know what might be the object of hon. gentlemen opposite when they tried to fasten on them the charge that they, the Liberals of this day, were not true to their antecedents, unless it was to make use of the name of Mr. Papineau, and say, was not the example given them by this great man. The policy of Mr. Papineau was one of a most revolutionary character, and nothing could have justified it but the aim which he had in view, which was the concession of free government to us by the British nation. He would just give the House an idea of the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite reproached them with having abandoned. In the year 1837, the year of the Canadian rebellion, on the 15th of May, a meeting was held at the parish of St. Laurent. The meeting was addressed by Mr. Papineau, and a series of resolutions were adopted, which set forth the grievances of Lower Canada against England, and were concluded by the following resolutions:—

“Resolved, That, under existing circumstances, it is urgent to adopt, in the first place, some means of paralysing the attacks directed against our rights and liberties, and that this can be done by draining the sources of the revenues, which the measures of the Ministry aim to rob us of.

“Resolved, That a large share of the Provincial revenue is derived from a duty of 2½ per cent., collected upon all goods manufactured in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, upon their entry in the ports of this Province, and that a large proportion of those goods, especially woollens, linens, and cottons can be manufactured in this country, or had from the United States. That we invite and recommend to our fellow-countrymen to make use of the latter, in preference, especially when we are aware that such articles have been manufactured in this country, or smuggled into it from the United States: that we will especially encourage the establishment of manufactures in this Province, and that we will consider as well-deserving of their country, those who will establish or encourage such manufactures. That we do not adopt this course through any hatred of the English people, whom we respect, and whom we thank for their sympathy towards their oppressed Canadian brethren; but that we adopt this course from hatred towards the injustices which we have suffered at the hands of the aristocracy, both Whig and Tory, and to invite the English people to crush the iron rod of their and our oppressors."

Such was the policy which the Conservative party of to-day reproached the Liberal party of Lower Canada with having abandoned. They had abandoned it because the aim which was sought to be obtained by this policy had been obtained. They had nothing in view but to have a free government, and as soon as they had a free government, they became as loyal, if not more so, than hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House. But hon. gentlemen talked of inconsistency. He desired to go a little further in that respect, and survey the course of his hon. friends opposite. At that meeting there was a young man who was destined to play a certain part in the history of this country. He was a young, ardent spirit, one of the most ardent spirits present on that occasion, and such was his ardour that, not only did he approve of the policy then propounded, but, at a later period, he rebelled in arms, and a price was set upon his head. But as soon as he obtained the price he required, as soon as the country was set free, at least politically, Mr. Cartier became a loyal subject, and the head of the Conservative party. At a somewhat later period, when Sir George E. Cartier was at the zenith of his power, he held up to the country what was his fiscal policy. At a dinner given to him, in 1871, he said:

"Manufacturers often ask for Protective duties. This is absurd; the same may be said of extreme Free-trade notions. If you do not pay duties to the Government upon manufactured goods, you must have recourse to direct taxation to make up for the loss out of the abolition of duties. With exaggerated Protection, you kill your foreign trade, as the Americans have done, and you must have recourse to direct taxation. We shall not make such a folly. We have adopted the policy of a Revenue tariff, and not a Protective tariff."

Such was the policy of the leader of the Conservative party in 1871. Which of the two parties could be taxed with inconsistency? He could point to the day, the hour, and the minute, when gentlemen opposite ceased to hold the doctrine of Cartier, and became Protectionists. It was in the Session of 1876, when the hon. member for Centre Huron announced he would not increase the taxation of the country. Up to that time they had always held to the doctrine of Cartier, that we should not have Protective duties, and it was not later than 1874, when the Minister of Public Works accused the late Government of having inserted the thin end of the wedge of Protection into our system. But, at that time, 1876, the depression was great, and, by-and-bye, the manufacturers of Montreal commenced to agitate for Protection. The Conservative party meanwhile, assumed neutrality, as a party. They did not pronounce at once for Protection, Free-trade, or the tariff, but sat on the fence ready to assail the Government with the whip of Protection or the bludgeon of Free-trade. Had the late Finance Minister said it was his intention to increase the tariff, they could imagine with what a roar of indignation hon. gentlemen opposite would have told the people that all their woes were to be ascribed to his policy of taxation, as they ascribed them now to his policy of not taxing the people. Another reproach made against them was that, in 1872, when the Liberal party was re-organised in Quebec, it adopted, as a part of its platform, the policy of Protection. He was not surprised at this. The Conservatives followed the fashion of King James the Second, who, according to Macaulay, who, when any proposition he affirmed was objected to, kept re-affirming in a louder tone, each time objection was made, until his voice drowned that of the one who objected. This statement that the Liberal party adopted a Protective policy in 1872 had been proven untrue time and again, but, notwithstanding that, it was still repeated, each time with more vehemence than before. He did not deny that, after the policy of Papineau had been propounded, there lingered in the hearts of many Liberals this idea of Protection. After a storm, the waters did not at once become calm, but continued their agitation; so it was with the Liberal party. But he denied most emphatically that either in 1872, or at any period since 1841, the Liberal party had held this Protective policy as a party. He had their programme adopted in 1872, in which he defied any gentleman opposite to find a single section referring to Protection. The only reference made to a commercial policy at all was these words: "The obtaining of the absolute right to regulate our commercial relations with foreign countries, so as to ensure the establishment of manufactures in Canada." Of course, the Liberals wanted to establish manufactures as much as did the Conservatives; but the way the former wanted to do this was to establish a market for our manufactures, but the latter wanted to protect the market, to make the people pay for them. The charge of being Annexationists had been brought against his party by the last man from whom he had expected it, his hon. friend from Ottawa. There had been, at one time, Annexationists in the ranks of the Liberal party, but there had been as many in the Tory party. If anyone would give him the manifesto of 1849, he could show for every Liberal on it two Conservatives. There was this difference between the two parties: The Liberal Annexationists became Annexationists from honest conviction, while the Tory Annexationists became so out of spite and disappointed ambition. When the Governor-General would not yield to their wishes, they commenced abusing him just as the Conservatives now did the Marquis of Lorne. They were ever the same. They belonged to that race which Napoleon characterised at one time as forgetting nothing, and learning nothing. They were the same in 1879 as in 1849. The leader of the Government, yesterday, called the attention of the House to a Liberal paper which reflected on him. Let him turn to the leading Conservative organ in Quebec, and contrast the two. The Minerve used the following language with reference to the action of the Governor-General in the Letellier matter:—

"We have now two outrages instead of one; and the young man who represents the Queen at Ottawa is no better than the brigand who represents the Queen in Quebec."

As he had said, the Tory Annexationists in Lower Canada became so when, on a certain occasion, the Governor-General would not yield to their demands, and, after having insulted him in every possible way, they burned the Parliament buildings, and signed the Annexationist manifesto. The hon. member for Ottawa had also referred to a speech which he (Mr. Laurier) had made six or seven years ago, in which he said he advocated the doctrine of Protection. He defied the hon. gentleman to find the word Protection in it.

AN HON. MEMBER: But the thing is.

MR. LAURIER said the thing was not. It was a political speech, not a speech on political economy. It was a speech in which he invited his fellow-countrymen of French origin to turn their attention to industrial pursuits, rather than literary pursuits; and, if he had again to speak on that subject, he would again use the same language, and would say to his fellow-countrymen in Lower Canada, that their education was far too literary, and not sufficiently practical; they should give their attention more to industrial pursuits, and less to the arts. He did not want to discuss the policy of Protection; it had been exhausted. This much he would say: that he would not be averse to a moderate system of Protection to those industries which we had the ability to create, but which required, at the outset, assistance against foreign competition. He knew these views were not held by those who surrounded him, but they were his views, and he advocated them honestly, and would give any proposition of this kind his vote, but he did not believe in this system of universal taxation which was brought down under the name of Protection, and in which the Government themselves had no faith, as was apparent from the course they had adopted. The Finance Minister excused himself to the House for bringing down this tariff before making another effort to obtain reciprocity from the Government at Washington. His excuse was that the Washington Government had been approached twice on this subject, and it would have been lowering the dignity of this country to make further advances. But, at the same time, he hinted that this Government would be ready to give Free-trade to the United States as soon as the United States would give us Free-trade. Not only did he hint it, but there was actually a provision in the tariff to that effect; that, as soon as the United States would choose to take off the Customs duty against Canadian producers, the Canadian Government would take off the Customs duties against American producers. There could not be a more candid, frank and fair avowal that Free-trade was more suited than Protection to this country, and, if this were true, what became of the long and sonorous oration they had heard from gentlemen opposite? If it was admitted that Free-trade was superior to Protection, and that this country was ready to give Free-trade to the Americans as soon as they would give us Free-trade, was it not a most eloquent denunciation of the Protection theories they had heard from the other side of the House? They had been told that the most magnificent results would accrue from a Protective policy; but, suppose the Americans gave us Free-trade to-morrow; suppose we had Free-trade with France as well, and Free-trade everywhere, what would not be the fate of this country if the theories held by hon. gentlemen opposite were true? The concession that this Government was ready to give Free-trade to the Americans, was the best condemnation of the increase of duty and of the present tariff. What was the idea at the bottom of this increase of duty? It was, as explained by gentlemen opposite, that Americans could now come here and undersell our manufacturers, though they had a duty against them of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. If that were true, was it common sense to suppose that we could compete against them with no tariff at all? This concession that Free-trade was the best thing for the country justified the policy of the Parti National, in 1877, which had been spoken of by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) this evening. We did not want a contracted market, such as we would have under Protection, but a more expanded market, and he hoped the day would soon come when we would adopt the policy of the National party in 1872, and take the right to regulate our trade relations with foreign countries. There was something peculiar about this tariff. There was a provision in it that we were ready to give Free-trade to the Americans as soon as they would give us Free-trade.

MR. McCALLUM: In breadstuffs and animals only.

MR. LAURIER: In everything.

MR. PLUMB: There is no such proposition.

Mr. LAURIER said they were ready to give the Americans Free-trade, and France also, to some extent, but there was one country which had given us Free-trade, and which was denied the benefit, and that country was England. He was not so loud in his professions of loyalty as gentlemen opposite. He did not impugn the loyalty of anybody, but there was not one man, even on the other side of the House, who did not feel that this policy was injurious, and, not only injurious in itself, but unworthy of a Canadian people towards the English people. There was, also, another reason why he was against this tariff. It was a universal increase of taxation, disguised under the name of Protection. He did not understand Protection in this way. The inducement held out to the people for adopting this policy was that, though there would be an increase of taxation all round, there would be, also, an increase of labour all round. This was a fallacy in itself. He did not deny that, under this tariff, when put in operation, they might create more labour somewhere, but it would be at the expense of so much labour destroyed elsewhere. Of course, every nation had a certain power of consumption, and no more. No Act of Parliament and no amount of legislation could increase the ability to consume of a people. It stood by itself, and depended on altogether different circumstances from legislation, and was, therefore, above the control of legislation. The theory of the tariff was this: We imported so many millions every year. It was calculated that the barrier placed in the face of importations would decrease them, and the people would be compelled to manufacture in the country the amounts which would be lessened by the decrease of importations. Either this tariff would have an effect, or it would not; either it would decrease the importations, or it would not. If it did not decrease the importations, the consequence would be that everything would be made dearer to the consumer, but there might not be a day's more labour in the country. If, on the other hand, the importations were decreased, he quite admitted that, though the article would be dearer to the consumer, there would be more labour in the country; but there would be labour destroyed, and that would be in connection with the shipping industry. There was not a more true proposition in history, than that no Protection country every had a merchant navy. Take the example of France and of the United States. He need not dwell upon them, because they had already been referred to, but, as sure as they diminished importation, they destroyed the labour of the sailor, the pilot, the stevedore, and all those who, in every maritime city, lived upon the shipping of the country. He spoke of this because he had the honour to represent one of the largest maritime cities of the Dominion, and one which had a large population living exclusively upon the shipping of the country. In the city of Quebec there was a large population of pilots, sailors, stevedores, ship-labourers and so on, whose only labour depended upon the trade of the country, upon the importations made every year, and when they stopped the importations altogether they would have completely destroyed the labour of these people. That would be the Protection given to them. He did not deny they would be giving labour, perhaps, to others, but what would they do with this large population which would be thrown out of employment. His hon. friend from the county of Quebec (Mr. Caron) had referred to his (Mr. Laurier's) election in Quebec East, and had stated he had not carried out the promises which he then made. What he promised was, that the Government of Mr. Mackenzie would endeavour to get from the French Government the same concession which was given to the English Government as to ships—that they would allow the registration of Canadian ships in France at the same rate of duty as English ships, and that, at the same time, we should admit, as a compensation, their wines at the same rate as they were admitted in England. These were promises which he then made with the authorisation of his leader. He made no other promises, and these they had carried out to their full extent. They had endeavoured to obtain from the French Government this concession. The British Ambassador in Paris was charged to present their petition to the French Government. It was said by hon. gentlemen opposite that they had not carried out their promises. But what more could they have done than open negotiations with France through the British Ambassador? When that Government refused the Canadian Government's propositions, what was left for them to do? His hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Caron), who belonged to the militia, might think that they should have compelled France to buy Canadian ships at the same rate as English, on pain of bombarding their ports. But that might have been dangerous. They might have applied to Bismarck to assist them in compelling France to meet Canadian views; but they were the Liberal party, and, as Bismarck was a Tory, and an out-and-out Protectionist, they would not invoke his aid. The only thing they could do was done. They opened a correspondence with the French Government, showing the people that they had performed their promise. There was another reason why he could not support the tariff—because it introduced the abominable system of taxing all the necessaries of the poor. Hon. gentlemen opposite cried, "Hear, hear;" but it could not be denied that the tea, sugar, bread and clothing of the people would be taxed. So far as his own Province of Quebec was concerned, the idea of taxing wheat flour and coal appeared full of cruelty. That Province did not produce enough flour for her own consumption, while, as to coal, the people had six months of winter. Before six months expired, he predicted that every mother in every Quebec cottage would curse the day this tariff was introduced, which was to add so much to the anxieties and cares of her domestic life.

MR. CIMON said that he had not intended to speak upon this important question, but the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) had been so strange, that he could not allow the debate to be closed without refuting it. He, therefore, begged of the House to pardon him for continuing the debate a few moments.

He was really surprised to see so much loyalty professed by the hon. member for Quebec East this evening; at all events, it should be a cause of rejoicing for all to see him so firmly attached to the British Crown. No doubt but that this declaration was quite sincere. The hon. member had stated that the idea of a Protective policy had originated in the days of the late Mr. L. J. Papineau, and that the bad treatment that Canadians were then receiving at the hands of England had so irritated them, that Mr. L. J. Papineau had placed himself at the head of his fellow-citizens, in order to be revenged, and had inscribed on his flag, that "Canadians should purchase nothing from England." That, according to the hon. member, had been the origin of Protection, and this policy had been framed with the intention of bringing about the separation of Canada from England. The hon. member for Quebec East excused this disloyal policy of that period, on the ground that Canadians were then unjustly treated by England, but, he had added, times were changed. England had repaired her injustice, she had removed all cause of discontent, she treated Canada well; and Canadians could now only be grateful towards her. That was why they should not put in practice this disloyal policy of Protection inaugurated by Mr. Papineau, and it was in order to remain loyal to England that the Liberal party had long ago abandoned this idea of a Protective policy. But, curious to relate, in 1871, the hon. gentleman was a member of the Local House, and there, what had been said by this loyal subject of Her Majesty, as he now styled himself? Well, he had stood up in the Local Legislature and had endeavoured to arouse throughout the country, against England, the same feelings of hostility to which the eloquence of Papineau had given birth in 1837. The hon. member reminded the House of the days of Papineau, saying that Papineau's policy imposed itself upon the whole people then, as in 1837. Yet, in 1871, Canada was as well treated by the Mother Country as she was to-day. Long previous to 1871, England had been acting justly towards Canada, and the extreme policy of Papineau had been abandoned. Why, then, had the hon. member, this loyal subject, who, this evening, would on no account do anything to displease England, made use, before the Local Legislature in 1871, of the following language:

"Sir, it is many years since the great patriot that we have just lost, the Hon. L. J. Papineau, seeking for a remedy against the evils of his day, summed up his policy on this subject in the following simple precept: 'We should purchase nothing from the metropolis.' I am of opinion that this policy imposes itself upon us to-day with as much force as at the time it was first enunciated."

Therefore, in 1871, this loyal subject of Her Majesty wanted the country to adopt the policy advocated by Papineau in 1837, and as this policy, according to the hon. member, was calculated to bring about the separation of Canada from the Mother Country, it must be admitted that, in 1871, the hon. member was a disloyal subject, or else that he was not sincere in what he said this evening.

MR. LAURIER asked the hon. member to continue reading his (Mr. Laurier's) speech.

MR. CIMON said he would do so. Not only had the hon. member wished, in 1871, to arouse, throughout the country, with his eloquence, the same storms as Papineau had brought upon Canada, in 1837, but he had, moreover, wished to set one race against another. The hon. member had made a strong appeal to French-Canadians, to induce them to adopt the Protective system of Mr. Papineau, which was summed up in this simple precept, that "nothing should be purchased from the Mother Country," saying that it imposed itself upon the country more strongly in 1871 than ever. The hon. member had asked him to go on reading his speech. Well, he found, in this same speech that he delivered in 1871, the following words:—"It is a duty for us, especially for us, Canadians of French origin, to create a national industry." Where, then, was the loyalty of the hon. member in 1871? Therefore, he was not sincere in what he had said this evening. He was curious to know what motives had inspired the speech that the hon. member had just delivered. He maintained that the House was not disloyal in inaugurating a Pro-protective policy in this country. This Protective system had not the same aim as that of Mr. Papineau. This tariff was not unfavourable to England. It was framed as a set-off against the policy of the United States. The hon. member had charged the Conservative party with disloyalty. He would ask him what party had uttered, in this country, words in favour of independence or annexation, if it was not the Liberal party? Every time a man proclaimed himself an Annexationist, it was certain that he belonged to the Liberal party. Had not the members for Chateaugay and Shefford, who sat beside the hon. member, signed the Annexationist manifesto? The hon. member could not mention a single man of the Conservative party who had manifested a desire to bring about the separation of Canada from England. On the contrary, it was well known that, every time such a desire had been manifested, it came from a Liberal. The hon. member, still speaking of loyalty, had quoted an unfortunate expression that had escaped a Conservative journalist, in speaking of His Excellency, and he had endeavoured to make the whole Conservative party responsible for it. There was not a member in this House who did not regret this article. But since the hon. member for Quebec East wished to enter upon this subject, he would recall what the hon. member for Shefford, who now sat beside him, and who had, for a long time, been his colleague, had said in 1873, of Lord Dufferin, who was the Governor-General of Canada. He compared him to Nero. The hon. member for Shefford had said this:—

“He (Mr. Huntington) wished to speak of the attributes of the Crown, but he did not wish to refer to the time when Nero played the fiddle and recited verses, whilst Rome, set on fire by his own hand, lay burning at his feet. There were epochs when events were so important that the cause of truth must be placed above any man, however exalted might be his position.”

He would now take the organ of the Liberal party of Quebec, in 1873, L'Evenement, a paper that was supposed to express more particularly the opinions of the hon. member for Quebec East. L'Evenement, in its issue of the 14th of August, 1873, made use of the following language, in speaking of Lord Dufferin:—

“The coup d'état, of which Ottawa was yesterday the scene, takes us back to the darkest days of our history, and Lord Dufferin, heretofore so popular, has just inscribed his name below those of the most execrated of our former Governors. * * * * *

“Well, since he wills it, since he prefers, to the respect of a free people, the embraces of men who abandon all defence of their outraged honour, since he abdicates the rôle of an impartial arbitrator, listening only to the voice of Parliament, in order to become the obedient servant of prevaricating Ministers; since he is naught but a footman, wearing the Imperial livery; therefore, let him receive his share of public contempt, and let him fall to the level of those he shields against popular justice.”

He could quote articles from the Globe, written in a similar strain. Here was what the Globe had said in August, 1873, of Lord Dufferin:—

“We regret to say that the Governor-General (Lord Dufferin) has placed himself in a false position, and the sooner he prepares for his departure from the Dominion, which he will find too hot for him, after his most unpardonable attack on the privileges of the House of Commons, the better.

“Words fail to express the heinousness of the outrage committed by Earl Dufferin. Who should blame the poor outraged people if they should, en masse, proceed to the capital and make guilty criminals flee for their lives. Her Majesty should be petitioned to recall Lord Dufferin, whose name will, henceforth, be held in utter execration by every honest man in Canada.”

There were so many samples of the loyalty of the Liberal party in this country. Hon. members on the other side would do well to keep silent on this subject. The hon. member had spoken but little of the tariff, but he had said enough to let the House see the manner in which he was endeavouring to arouse public opinion in Lower Canada upon this question of the tariff. He had spoken of the duties to be imposed upon agricultural products. He had referred to flour and wheat, saying that the Customs duties imposed upon these articles was an unjust and crushing tax, an enormous tax, that would weigh heavily above all on the poorer classes. But the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) had said, last night, that the duty upon wheat and flour was a delusion, and that it would in no way raise the price of Upper Canadian flour. It was easy to see that the hon. members on the other side had not come to an understanding as to the line of attack. The hon. member for Quebec East said quite the contrary to what the hon. leader of the Opposition maintained, and vice versa. What confidence was to be placed in such a party, and how could people believe that they were sincere? But, rather, they had come to an understanding in order to forward their political interests by setting one Province against another. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) told the Province of Ontario that her wheat and flour was not protected, that this tariff would not raise the price of those articles, whilst the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) said to the Province of Quebec: "Look at those wicked Conservatives; they tax your wheat and your flour, in order to enrich the farmers of Ontario." What conclusion was to be drawn from all that, if not that the hon. member and his friends were endeavouring to regain power by appealing to the prejudices of the people? They failed to show that they were either sincere or patriotic. The hon. member had, moreover, told the House that the Government were adding $2,000,000 to the taxes of the country. But could the hon. member for Quebec East, who had been a member of the late Administration, complain with good grace of this increase? Was it for him to blame the present Government for imposing duties in order to make sure of sufficient revenue to defray the extravagant expenditure incurred by the hon. member and his colleagues of the late Administration? Was it for him to come and endeavour to embarrass the Government in the efforts they were making to raise the credit of the Dominion that they had lowered? The country was obliged to pay the debts of the late Administration. As soon as these debts were met, the Liberal party might be certain that the Conservatives, faithful to their pledges and to their Government, would lighten the burdens of the people. There were several other arguments made use of by the hon. member that he would like to refute, but he did not wish to trespass longer on the patience of the House. He had only risen to answer that part of the speech of the hon. member in which he had accused the Conservatives of disloyalty. By speaking longer he would be worthy of the censure of the House, for it was not right to continue the discussion at three o'clock in the morning, especially when the debate had been going on for a fortnight. He would beg leave, however, to say that he found very strange the other argument of the hon. member for Quebec East, which consisted in saying that the present tariff, by raising the duties on foreign products, would enrich a few manufacturers, to the detriment of the farmers. There could be nothing more erroneous, for it was the farmer who was the most interested in having these duties raised. For what would occur? Capitalists, seeing that this Protective system offered them a good chance of increasing their capital, would invest a greater amount of money in manufactures. The result would be that competition would spring up among manufacturers in this country; this competition would increase the demand for raw material required for these manufactures, the demand for agricultural produce, etc., and these articles being in greater demand, their price would necessarily increase. On the other hand, manufactured goods, becoming more numerous, would be sold cheaper. Thus the farmer would sell dearer and buy cheaper, for competition would oblige the manufacturer to sell his goods cheaper and pay higher prices for what he needed.

Mr. ANGLIN said that, under the circumstances, he thought it would be well to adjourn the debate for at least one day more. He asked if the House would consent to the adjournment of the debate.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. TILLEY: It is very important to close the debate this morning. There is a general anxiety that we should do so.

Mr. ANGLIN said there might be an anxiety to do so, but many more desired to speak on this subject. Hon. gentlemen on the other side had occupied the whole of this day, and some had spoken twice. He thought it was only fair that, on a matter like this, all should have an opportunity of speaking.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Question.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he protested against the action of the Ministerial party, who seemed to think that, because they were in the majority, they should control the course and duration of the debate, and force a division when it suited them. He did not think it reasonable, at that hour of the morning, to compel a member to speak. The House should adjourn, leaving the debate to be resumed.

MR. ANGLIN said that the question before the House was a very large one, and exceedingly difficult to deal with properly at that hour, when it was hardly to be expected that hon. gentlemen opposite would listen attentively to arguments against a measure they were compelled to support. They were invited, at the opening of the debate, to consider a whole series of questions, including the present condition of this Dominion, the causes that led to the depression, and the character of the revolutionary remedies proposed by the hon. the Finance Minister. Strange to say, there was a wide difference of opinion, even with regard to the condition of the country. The Finance Minister commenced his Budget speech by drawing a contrast between the state of this country at the time he made his former Budget speech, in 1873, and its present condition, making statements not consistent with the facts. He spoke of its condition in 1873 as bright, cheerful, promising; the future was described as being full of hope and encouragement. But those who then heard that speech saw that even then the shadow of the gloom impending over this country was cast upon the hon. gentleman, for he informed the House that, although, by means of the surpluses that had accrued in previous years, he would be able to meet the liabilities then existing, he anticipated that he would find it necessary the year after to ask for increased taxation. So all was not then so bright and cheerful as he would now have them suppose. They were told that, before 1873, this country enjoyed a degree of prosperity unexampled and unparalleled; that the Government of that day, owing to their great ability and wonderful patriotism, and extraordinary powers, contrived to roll up surpluses with one hand, while, with the other, they swept away taxation. But it was important to remark that during the years before 1873, the hon. gentlemen opposite found it necessary to increase the taxation two or three different times, and so hard set were they that at one time they introduced a system of taxing all the packages in which goods were imported, adding some 5 per cent. on the total amount of taxes collected. Now, it was unquestionable that even to-day, some six months after their return to power, this country was suffering from very serious depression, which they were asked to admit was caused by the late Administration. They were told by the Minister of Public Works, too, that the magnificent fabric, the stately and beautiful and solid fabric reared by their predecessors, was ruthlessly destroyed by the bungling want of patriotism and want of ability of the Liberal Administration. That, again, was a statement entirely contrary to the facts. What was the cause of the extraordinary increase of revenue for which the gentlemen on the other side so boldly demanded credit? At the close of the American war, the whole commercial world was disturbed, and no part of it so much as Canada. The people of the United States, finding their farms without stock, and their ships and stores almost empty, bought in Canada vast numbers of horses, horned cattle, sheep, pigs, turkeys, and other fowl, at extravagant prices, and created in this country an extraordinary degree of temporary prosperity. About that time, also, there was an extraordinary amount of speculation in railway building. Ontario, from her large accumulated surpluses, had begun to assist different railways, which, with bonuses from municipalities, and the sale of bonds, led to the expenditure of some $15,000 to $30,000 a mile on several hundred miles of new railroads—all this contributing to swell the expenditure of the country, and increase its apparent prosperity. But, more, there was the notorious fact that the prices of merchandise, for some extraordinary reason, advanced in an unusual degree, so that the revenue of this country increased enormously for three or four years, without any effort on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. For this they were not entitled to the slightest credit. Nor, if they had fair pretensions to the character of statesmen, would they make any claim to credit for an increase entirely independent of anything they did, or could do. They knew that the prices of cotton goods, woollen goods, and more particularly all articles of iron, advanced remarkably in price. In that way, as their imports increased—not in quantities so much as in value—the revenue increased to an unprecedented extent. Those hon. gentlemen made extraordinary efforts to overtake that increase of revenue. Each year they framed their estimates so as to cover the increase of the previous year. With a zeal, perhaps commendable, certainly very noteworthy, they kept up this chase to the last moment. The last time the present Finance Minister appeared in the same capacity, he introduced a Budget in which he proposed to expend the extraordinary sum of $23,500,000. The Finance Minister told them in New Brunswick, before they came into Confederation, that they would never spend more than $11,500,000 a year in their time—that $11,500,000 would cover all expenses for all purposes that could be imagined, even including the expenditure of $1,000,000 for Militia expenses. But his Nemesis followed him, too, and after Confederation, in the very first year in which he became Finance Minister, he introduced an estimate for almost double the amount which he said would be sufficient. Well, they knew how this increase went on. They knew how the revenue rolled up. Great credit was taken by the men now in power for striking off taxes. They took the tax off tea and coffee the last year they were in power, because the idea of a free breakfast table had taken possession of the people of the United States, and it would have been perfect folly for a Canadian Government to attempt to collect the duty on tea and coffee under the circumstances, and, therefore, they took the duty off those articles, with a magnanimity for which they had never ceased to take credit, particularly the hon. the Minister of Public Works. And they asked the people to contrast their magnificent administration and the wonderful benefits they conferred upon the country, by their patriotism and ability, with the failure, as they alleged, of those who succeeded them in power. The hon. the Minister of Public Works had alleged, in his usually loud tones, and strong language, that the late Administration destroyed the fabric which their predecessors had raised, and that they were responsible for the large expenditure and the deficits which had since occurred. Not only had they succeeded in persuading the constituencies throughout the country, if they were to judge by the electors, but there were many hon. members of the House who seemed really to believe that such was the fact, that the expenditures had grown up to their present extraordinary dimensions because of the maladministration of the late Government, and that the necessity for imposing these new taxes had been occasioned by something or other done by the late Administration, or something they neglected to do. They had heard this statement over and over again during the debate; but he (Mr. Anglin) always looked with surprise at every hon. gentleman so speaking, and scanned his features in order to ascertain if he made the statement seriously, and believed, himself, what he alleged, and he (Mr. Anglin) was forced to believe that, in most cases, the hon. members who made those statements, were really convinced of the truth of what they said. But who was it that increased the expenditure? It was increased from $12,000,000 or $14,000,000 during the first years of Confederation to $23,000,000 or $24,000,000 in 1873-74. This fact appeared clear and unquestionable to any one examining the Public Accounts and the Estimates: that that extraordinary expenditure was first fastened on the country by hon. gentlemen opposite. There was the increase of the subsidies to the Provinces. There was the adjustment of the debt between Ontario and Quebec. When put altogether, their Estimates for the last year they were in power were some $23,500,000 or $24,000,000. Why, then, should the late Administration be held responsible for the increase? Where, when, or how, he would ask, were the late Government responsible for that increase? Where, when, or how did they make the addition which had been made to the permanent liabilities of the country? What was the reason that it was necessary, to-day, to increase the taxation of the country? They were told there was a deficit of $2,000,000, and that it would be necessary to raise $2,400,000. They were told that the amount of the fishery award was to be absorbed in meeting existing Canadian liabilities. He agreed to a great extent with the hon. member from Prince Edward Island, who maintained that that money belonged by right to the people of the Maritime Provinces, and more especially to the men who were engaged in the fisheries, from whom, in fact, all was taken for which that money was the equivalent. However, that money had been taken to meet liabilities. He thought he understood, from the late Finance Minister, that he contemplated using that money for a similar purpose, whether permanently or not he did not say; and he alleged, as a justification, the condition of the finances of the country. He (Mr. Anglin) did not know that anything the late Government had done had rendered it necessary now to increase taxation, and that proposition was emphatically denied on his side of the House. They denied that they had in the slightest degree increased the permanent liabilities of the country, except to an extent that was unavoidable. They were compelled, in order to meet the liabilities incurred by their predecessors, and the obligations they had imposed on the Government, to borrow a large amount of money. The interest must be paid on that money, and a sinking fund provided. To that extent the Government were compelled to increase the pecuniary liabilities of the country. Then there was the establishment of the Mounted Police in the North-West, that he believed the previous Government themselves were prepared to establish. The expense caused by this was enormous, but he thought it was regarded as a salutary measure. But, if any one of the hon. gentlemen now forming the majority of this House imagined that that expense could be dispensed with, he would have an opportunity, when they came to the Estimates, of moving that the provision for the Mounted Police be struck out. In doing so, he would show his sincerity. It was also found necessary to make treaties with the Indians of the North-West. This was manifestly and obviously necessary for the purpose of maintaining peace out there, and for the purpose of avoiding expenditures, such as the United States had long had to bear, in consequence of their ill-treatment of Indians on their reserves. Treaties had to be made that would satisfy the Indians, at least for a time, and prevent any danger of an outbreak. The establishment of the Supreme Court was one of the expenditures for which the country was indebted to the late Administration. He (Mr. Anglin) confessed that he himself never saw any necessity for the immediate establishment of that Court, but all the lawyers, he believed, on both sides of the House were very anxious for its establishment. The present right hon. Minister of the Interior, when Minister of Justice, more than once introduced a measure for the purpose of establishing that Court. The hon. gentleman failed to introduce a Bill that would satisfy the House, or satisfy himself. He had to withdraw two Bills, because they did not meet with the approval of the House, and that was the reason this Court was not established in his time. But it was established by the late Administration, and had become one of the permanent burdens of the Dominion. The Post Office establishment was reconstructed, and the postage of letters to the United States and Great Britain was very materially reduced. A free delivery was established in several of the large cities, and very great additions were made to the number of post-offices in the Dominion, and to the number of miles to be travelled over by conveyances carrying the mails. All this entailed very large additional expense. He had seen it stated in a speech made in another place, that 20,000,000 more letters and packages were now conveyed through the post-offices every year, than were conveyed before the change was made. Now, he presumed no gentleman would move that they go back to the state of things which formerly existed, in regard to the post-office. No doubt that improvement could have been deferred for a time, and it would have been imprudent to have incurred the additional expense if the Government had been regarded as a bankrupt concern. The people of this country, when this matter was fairly and fully stated to them, would say that it was an expenditure fully justified, and that they would not, on any account, return to the old state of things. When the late Finance Minister made his Budget speech, in 1874, he anticipated a deficit, but he could not have anticipated that there would be so sudden a decline in the prices of merchandise of all kinds. He was charged with not having had the courage to come down with a proposition which would enable him to meet fairly the wants of the country, by imposing additional taxation. They all knew that, in 1874, he informed the House that there would be a deficit, and did ask for increased taxation, which, but for the decline in the prices of goods imported, would have yielded an additional revenue of three million dollars; but, as the prices continued to go down year after year, he found that the revenue, notwithstanding the additional taxation, barely kept up to the former standard. Had the Government exceeded its estimates of expenditure year after year, or had it wasted money in any way, the charge made so often by hon. gentlemen would be a tangible one. But such was not the case; the deficit was caused solely by the decline in the revenue, for which the Government could not be held responsible. They were told that this country was in a worse condition than any part of the civilised world, and they were asked to contrast its condition with that of the United States, which the hon. the Minister of Public Works held up as an example of all that was great and prosperous. But Canada was successful beyond all comparison. If they considered that the population of the United States was eleven times greater than that of Canada, it would be found that we imported fifty per cent. more than they did; and if great exportations were a proof of prosperity, we were vastly more prosperous than the people of the United States. The hon. gentleman also pointed out that the imports of the United States were small, and assumed that the reason for this was that the manufactures of the country had grown to such an extent as to supply the wants of the people. If the decline in imports was a proof of prosperity, then, instead of holding the late Government responsible for the distress of this country, he should admit that, if they influenced the amount of imports in any way, they rendered great service, by reducing it so materially. What in truth was the state of affairs in the United States? Nearly two-thirds of the factories there had been idle for a long time past. An hon. gentleman had stated that some were now working at double time. That might be; but, nevertheless, for some years past, a number of factories had been working at half time, and had paid very small wages, and very many had been closed altogether. They had all heard of the riots among the foundry operatives in Troy, a year or two ago, and of riots in Pittsburg, and a great many other cities, where crowds filled the streets, demanding employment, and using threats, and sometimes violence, so that it was necessary to call out the troops to quell the tumults. They had heard of the extraordinary suffering among miners in the coal regions, of the immense number of 31,000 people out of employment in the manufacturing State of Massachusetts last year. The value of real estate, in the principal cities in the United States declined year after year, not merely in proportion to the change in the relative value of paper and gold, but absolutely, so that it had fallen far below the gold value, as it was before the Civil War. Another assertion frequently made by gentlemen opposite was that, owing to the misgovernment of the last five years, the people of Canada flocked in thousands to the United States; but the truth was that, while the Conservatives were in power, no less than 500,000 native-born Canadians emigrated to the United States; but about the time the late Government got into power that emigration almost absolutely ceased; so that, where thousands went in previous years, hardly ten went now. And not only was that a fact, but large numbers of the expatriated Canadians had returned to settle again in this country. The hon. the Minister of Public Works told them of the unexampled prosperity of the United States, and contrasted the condition of that country, as described by himself, with the condition of Free-trade England. But they all knew that, some two years ago, large numbers of the mechanics and operatives of New York and other large cities in the United States, who had emigrated from Europe, returned to poor Free-trade England, because they could not find employment in the Protectionist United States. This that hon. gentleman seemed to have forgotten; but they all knew that he did not always recollect those facts which told against his side of a case, while he was very fond of exaggerating those which were favourable. It was a well-known fact that those people returned in tens of thousands to Great Britain. They knew that emigration to the United States, more especially from Ireland, England and Germany, had almost entirely ceased for some years past, because emigrants did not hope to find employment at fair wages in that highly protected country which the Minister of Public Works alleged so loudly was so very prosperous. He found in the Boston Pilot, a paper devoted to the interests of the working classes, a protest against a proposal to pass a law, making vagrancy a criminal offence in some of the United States, while there were so many thousands of honest workmen tramping in search of employment there. He found also that there had been in Rouen, one of the towns in France, a protected country, a meeting of some 20,000 workmen who were unable to get work. That was a condition of things that was very much to be deplored. There was, no doubt, a great deal of distress prevailing throughout the cities and towns of the Dominion. No one could walk through the streets of Ottawa and see the number of stores closed up on the principal streets, and deny that a great deal of depression existed in the country. The late Government had been charged by their successors with not having done anything to retrieve the depression. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) had repeated the charge frequently in his speech this evening, and had called upon members of the Opposition, not merely to find fault with this tariff, but to propound some counter proposition for relieving the distress of the country. But the late Government had expended millions of dollars upon public works which went directly to the relief of the workman, and had, by judicious economy, kept down the ordinary expenditure, so that, notwithstanding the great increase of interest, and the large expenditure in the North-West, and the post-office improvements, the total expenditure exceeded the Estimates submitted by the present Finance Minister in 1873 only by two or three hundred thousand dollars. It would have been necessary to propose the imposition of heavier taxes, but he could not see that the people of the country would be assisted or relieved in any way by the imposition of additional taxation. The present Government proposed to tax the people. The late Minister of Finance thought it better to run a little into debt, and allow one or two small deficits to grow, than to impose additional taxation at a time when the people were least able to bear it, when the people were already suffering from depression of business and want of employment, and he (Mr. Anglin) thought the policy pursued by that gentleman (Mr. Cartwright), was the correct and proper policy. With regard to the cause of the depression, he did not think it had been shown, as was alleged, that the late Government was in the slightest degree responsible for the decline in the revenue. The distress that existed in this country never equalled the distress existing to-day in England and other countries. Of the 4,000 or 5,000 bricklayers, carpenters, labourers, and others, who came to St. John after the great fire, he believed nearly two-thirds came from the United States—because that was a better place than their own country for workmen, and because wages were better. If they wanted any additional proof of the actual state of things in the United States, the hon. member for Niagara had furnished it in that statement of a gentleman from Albany, which he had read to the House, to the effect that railroads had gone into bankruptcy whose capital amounted to no less than seven hundred million dollars. It was absurd to suppose that no manufactures would have sprung up in the United States if there had been no Protection. We, in this country, manufactured, in proportion to our population, more than the people of the United States. Was it to be supposed that a people of 45,000,000 living in a country like that, with such variety of climate, unlimited water power, with the raw material lying at their doors, would not have become manufacturers without Protection? They had succeeded, not because of Protection, but because of the intelligence and ingenuity of the people, and their marvellous ability in inventing machinery, and the superiority of their shelf hardware, and various little knick-knacks. It had been well said by an hon. gentleman that, of all the classes in this country, none had suffered less, by reason of the business depression, than the manufacturers. Of those who had become bankrupt in this country, no class had furnished so few as the manufacturing class. Go to any of our towns and cities, visit any of their suburbs, and look at the palatial residences, and three out of four of those residences would be found to belong to manufacturers. All honour and all credit to them for their success, but their success should satisfy them that they, at all events, were not entitled to receive larger profits from their business, at the expense of the working masses of this country. France had always been held up as a country which was greatly prosperous, because it had a high Protectionist tariff. France had been more prosperous commercially since the Cobden treaty than ever before, and from that day down to this she had had special treaties with her manufacturing neighbours, and had received a large amount of the manufactures of Great Britain, Belgium and Holland, and Germany, at very low rates of duties, as low as 10 per cent. in many cases. These were the countries from which she had to fear competition. She had not much to protect. She had iron and coal on the German frontier, and some coarse cotton, but, as regarded the finer classes of manufactures, the finer furniture, silk goods, ribbons, glass, china, and articles de Paris, besides her extraordinary products of brandy and wines, it would be found that, no matter what her tariff was, her exports were large, because her people peculiarly excelled in their production. Add to these circumstances the frugality and thrifty habits of her people, and the effects of the division of the landed property throughout the country, and they had the secret of the success of the French people, and of the extraordinary recuperative powers she had displayed since her disastrous war. If they contrasted the condition of Canada with the condition of our neighbours in the United States, people for people, city for city, farm-house for farm-house, labourer for labourer, mechanic for mechanic, we would find that the people of Canada, to-day, were a more prosperous, more happy, and more comfortable people in every respect than the people of the great United States. True, there was more amassed wealth in that country, and the fact that the people had invested so many million dollars in their bonded debt was pointed out as proof of their prosperity. But this really did prove that the business of the country was not in a condition to afford safe employment for its capital. The capital of the United States, compared with the wants of the people, might be said to be very small, even to-day, and yet they found millions seeking investment in United States bonds at a low rate of interest, and that, instead of being a proof of prosperity, was a proof that the business of the country was not in a paying condition. He would now make some remarks on the present tariff. He had stated that the hon. the Minister of Finance had assured the people of New Brunswick, before they came into Confederation, that $11,500,000 annually would cover all the expenditure of the four old Provinces for many years to come, and that the taxation of Canada would not exceed $2.75 per head for, at all events, twenty-five years, and on that the hon. gentleman staked his reputation as a financier. He had heard the hon. gentleman make that statement frequently. He (Mr. Anglin) contradicted it, and they brought the question out before the people. Himself and those who were then associated with him carried the country by an overwhelming majority, and never was any question more fairly and thoroughly discussed before any people than was that question at that election. Some attempts were made to introduce personalities, and he thought the hon. the Minister of Finance would give him credit for having carefully avoided anything approaching personality. They fought the question out before the people, and he would do the hon. gentleman the credit to say that in that fight he endeavoured with fair argument to persuade the people that it was to their advantage to accept the Quebec scheme. By an overwhelming majority, the people of New Brunswick declared that they did not like the scheme, and would not have it. What followed he need not dilate upon. Somebody had stated that Confederation never would have been carried in New Brunswick without the help of the Fenians, and this was true. A band of Fenians came upon their borders just about the time that the Lieutenant-Governor, having tried in vain to induce the Government, led by Sir A. J. Smith, to unite with him in carrying the scheme of Confederation, was prepared to spring the mine laid with the help of the Finance Minister, and some others, and drive that Government from power. Sixty or seventy men calling themselves Fenians exhibited themselves in the neighbourhood of Eastport, and immediately the alarm spread. Troops and volunteers were sent to defend the frontier. A force of regulars was called from Halifax, and the fleet was summoned from the West Indies. Reports spread that the enemy was several thousand strong, and the whole Province was in a state of alarm. The whole thing was so skilfully managed that the people were led to believe that the Fenians had come down to help the anti-Confederates, and that these were responsible for their coming. In that way Confederation was carried. Where the anti-Confederates had had a majority of 700 or 800 at the first election, they found themselves, at the next, in a minority almost as great. The promise then made was that the taxation should not exceed $2.75 per head. He (Mr. Anglin) could not understand how the affairs of the country could be managed at that rate of taxation. The hon. member for Halton said that, about that time, in order to coax the Maritime Provinces into this bargain, the taxation of old Canada was reduced from 20 per cent. to 15 per cent., and they were promised, very distinctly indeed, that 15 per cent. was to be the rate thenceforth; that they who were Free-traders need not feel the slightest hesitation, as they would never be forced into Protection; and that, if any attempts were made to force Protection upon them, they would have the power to prevent it in their own hands. They were told that the interests of Quebec were precisely similar to the interests of New Brunswick, and that the people of Quebec would stand beside them if the necessity arose. Well, to-day, how did they stand—the members from New Brunswick? There were 16 of them, and 12 of the 16, at least, were elected to oppose the imposition of Protection in their Province. There they were, on this occasion, protesting in vain against it. The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Thompson) chose to taunt them because some of their people eat cornmeal; and many hon. gentlemen joined in the sneers and taunts at the people of New Brunswick. On the medal struck at the time of Confederation, among the figures emblematic of the four Provinces, New Brunswick was placed upon her knees before the other three. On her knees she appeared now asking in vain for fair play, and demanding that the promises given her might be carried out—that she might be protected from this system of Protection against which she protested. Helpless and powerless, the majority of her representatives stood, scarcely permitted to raise their voices in her behalf. But hon. gentlemen told them that, in the introduction of this tariff, they fulfilled the promises made to the country. If he (Mr. Anglin) believed that, he would not make a long speech. He would simply content himself with protesting against the measure in a very few words. He could not, for the life of him, see wherein this was the fulfilment of any promises made to the country. It might be said to be the fulfilment of the desires of a few, and of the apprehensions of a great many. When was it promised that there should be a tax of 35 per cent. on furniture and 40c. per barrel on Indian meal, or that coarse woollens should be taxed by the pound and the yard to the extent of 50, 60, 80 or 90 per cent.? When was it promised that coarse cottons should be taxed 1c. a yard and 15 per cent. ad valorem? Such promises were never made by the hon. the Finance Minister. If that hon. gentleman had gone before the people of New Brunswick last September with that tariff in his hands, instead of being here with a questionable majority of seven or eight, he would have received a decided minority of the votes of the electors. He had heard a great many gentlemen declare in this House, he had heard the hon. the Minister of Public Works declare, in a most emphatic manner, that they had no idea of increasing the taxation; that what the men now in power contemplated was at most a readjustment of the system of taxation. Hon. gentlemen went through the country, in one place talking about the Protection the farmer ought to have, and the hardship from which he suffered; in another about the slaughtering of American manufactures in the furniture market, and, if anyone attempted to fit their statements together, and form an accurate opinion of the tariff, he found this impossible. He (Mr. Anglin) listened with a great deal of attention to the statement of the hon. the Minister of Finance when he made his first speech of the campaign in St. John, and he found his utterances as sybilline and ambiguous as he could have anticipated. The hon. gentleman told them in New Brunswick that, if he had been in the House when the duty on flour was imposed, he would have voted against it. He (Mr. Anglin) believed a good many who heard the hon. gentleman make that statement believed the hon. gentleman was opposed to a duty on flour. He had also said, in regard to the unenumerated list, that he would have voted against the increase of duty from 15 to 17½ per cent., and he said that it was a very simple thing indeed to take out of this list some of the articles which were manufactured in the country, the manufacture of which could be very materially assisted by a slight increase of duties. As far as New Brunswick was concerned, four-fifths of the whole of the articles in that unenumerated list were now taken out, and subjected to greatly increased taxation. The right hon. the Premier telegraphed to Mr. John Boyd, of St. John, denying that the tariff was to be increased to 35 per cent., and now they were told by the Minister of Justice, that what he meant was that the unenumerated list should not be so increased. He (Mr. Anglin) thought, if they estimated fairly the effects of the whole tariff, they would find that it was a tariff of 35 per cent.

MR. TILLEY: The American tariff is only 27 per cent., and this is 16 per cent.

MR. ANGLIN said that reminded him of another statement the hon. gentleman had made. The hon. gentleman, in his last speech, compared the British importations with the American, and he included in the American importations the price of all cereals that merely passed through this country on the way to Europe. Thirteen or fourteen millions, so included in his calculation, ought to be struck out. Striking out this sum, and the duty upon other things exported again, he thought they would find the present tariff was very little short of 35 per cent. upon all we consumed. In all the public declarations of hon. gentlemen, they had no statement that would lead the people to conclude that any such tariff as this was to be imposed.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Question.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: This noise is simply intolerable. I have never seen in my life, such utterly disgraceful conduct. Hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side must be assured that they will get no division to-night if they do not behave themselves.

MR. ANGLIN said that there was a gentleman opposite calling "question," who occupied ten times as much of the time of this Session as he did. He had endeavoured to treat every hon. gentleman with courtesy, and did not deserve those interruptions. If his remarks hurt hon. gentlemen opposite, he could not help that. With regard to this tariff, he did not know whether its friends had clear ideas of what its effects would be. If all he heard were true, the Finance Minister had little more to do with framing it than the supervision of the work. They had heard of a gentleman from Washington, and of one who might be styled a secretary of the Manufacturers' Association, and of others employed in the Finance Department, who, it was said, had had much to do with framing this tariff. He did not grudge the hon. gentleman all the assistance requisite to render it as perfect as possible, but it might be doubted whether the Finance Minister himself had a very clear idea when he began to frame this tariff of what it would be when his work was done. Hon. gentlemen opposite taunted the Liberals with not having stated their policy, although they had exhibited it sufficiently during the last four or five years. He remembered how hon. gentlemen opposite had refused to expound their Protection policy while they were in Opposition. They had heard of deputations and delegations crowding to Ottawa, to see the Finance Minister, and of a secret meeting of manufacturers in St. John and elsewhere, and rumours as to what the result had been—that they were in secret correspondence with the Central Association of Toronto, and other associations. All that class of people were strongly agitated for months before this tariff saw the light, and they had heard that, among those who were very active in suggestions to the Finance Minister, as to the duties he should impose, were a great many wealthy manufacturers who had worked their way up from humble positions, and who now wanted to control the destinies and the commercial policy of this country. He had heard that a large number of them were Americans, and, if so, it was no wonder that the tariff bore an American character. If, as was reported, manufacturers, formerly American citizens, had had a large share in the framing of the tariff, it was no wonder that it appeared to be such a revolutionary measure, and one threatening to affect this country most disastrously. It gave furniture a protection of 35 per cent.; woollens 40 to 70 per cent., and a few cotton manufacturers in the country a very large protection on coarse cottons. There was a pretence of protecting almost everybody. Coal miners got 50c. a ton, which would enable them to put very little additional coal in the Canadian market, while hurting the poor of the cities by compelling them to pay higher prices. He saw, by a letter lately published, that parties professing to be representatives of the iron works of Londonderry, complained that the taxation on coal more than destroyed the advantage of the duty on pig iron, and that the public need not look for an increase in the number of the blast furnaces in that place. What classes were really protected, except those few manufacturers who had been able to exercise so large an influence during the elections, and since—which, he was satisfied, the people never wished, or expected they would possess? They were told that this tariff was to build up the depressed industries, and afford a vast amount of employment to the people, and that the very moment that the country decided in favour of the party now in power, there would be an end of the distress which prevailed so widely. That party had now been seven or eight months in office without any great improvement in the state of the country. How was the improvement to be wrought? How many additional people would be employed in manufacturing all the goods now imported, that could be produced under this tariff? It was absurd to assume that the purchasing power of the people would be at once increased by the tariff, as hon. gentlemen opposite had from the first imagined. Had the boot and shoe manufacturer suffered for want of this tariff? He doubted if even one per cent. of the quantity consumed was imported, and, yet, thousands of people were idle in Montreal and elsewhere. The boot and shoe makers were thrown idle because the rest of the people could not buy as much as before. Then as to furniture—he thought the importations last year reached $300,000; was it to be supposed that the dullness in that trade was caused by the importation of that amount? Was it larger than the imports of previous years? The facts did not sustain that assertion. A very large proportion of the furniture imported, perhaps, could not be profitably manufactured in this country, while, even if it could, the people would not have the means to buy it, unless there were a great change in the condition of the people generally. Some parties also imported a cheap washy kind of furniture, that was sold at any price that could be got, and never did seriously compete with our home-made furniture. He thought that the member for Centre Huron stated that at most all those manufactures, fostered by the tariff, would employ only 5,000 people. He (Mr. Anglin) thought, however, that that was an under-estimate. The usual estimate was that the net product of any particular manufactory would be $1,000 a year for each person employed. Thus, a very few thousand additional people could be employed, supposing all those articles of coarse woollens, cottons, furniture, and one per cent. additional boots and shoes, nuts, bolts, etc., now imported, were manufactured in Canada. He did not believe it would add to the population of the whole country a number equal to the population of one of our larger towns, and yet that was all the price to be paid the country for the heavy additional burdens thrown upon it by the present tariff. If we could not give the farmers a large market for their products, what else did this tariff do for them? It imposed a duty on wheat and flour, barley and oats, and made an imperceptible increase in the duty on pork. The duty on flour would add to its price in the Lower Provinces. Whenever the crop of wheat in this country, to which we would, in future, for domestic purposes, be strictly confined, proved too small for the consumption of the country, the large dealers would buy it up, fill their granaries, and raise the prices all over the country; and, even when we had a full supply, or a surplus, it would be possible, by the formation of rings, to raise the price of flour. Our surplus to-day had to seek a market in Great Britain. It would be the simplest thing in the world for operators in grain to slightly accelerate the shipping of this surplus, and then have the consumers in their power. In New Brunswick, last year, 56,000 barrels of flour were imported from the United States, being one-sixth of the whole importation. That 56,000 barrels was to be shut out next year, thus destroying a large carrying trade, as the most of it was brought in our vessels as return freight, when otherwise they would have to return in ballast. It would also render it necessary for parties living along the coasts to go back into the country to railway stations for their supplies, at an additional cost of freight, and delay of time. With respect to cornmeal, there was no pretence that Ontario could supply them for years. New Brunswick, last year, consumed 60,000 barrels, on which quantity she would have, in future, to pay a duty of 40c. per barrel. Nobody could argue that a duty of 15c. per bushel on barley would be of the slightest value to the farmers of Ontario, as very little barley was imported. On the contrary, we exported several millions more than we imported. Pork could be protected, but it was not, because protection on it would make the burdens of the lumberman absolutely intolerable. Wool was not protected. That the imposition of a duty on coarse woollen goods would lead to the use of our wool, farmers would be slow to believe. They now sold their wool to the United States, getting for it there double the price at which the short staple wool used in Canadian manufactures could be purchased. The Finance Minister had been extolled over and over again as an old Free-trader who had been converted by the exigencies of the moment to the principles of Protection. Those who spoke so did not know his history. He began public life as a Protectionist of the deepest dye. The first he (Mr. Anglin) heard of him was at a meeting, held in Carleton, St. John, at which he earnestly advocated Protection. They had tried Protection in New Brunswick, and went so far as to impose a duty on hides, which, under this tariff, were not protected. All the Protection offered to the farmer by this tariff was merely nominal, merely a myth, and, unless the farmer was more stupid than he (Mr. Anglin) believed him to be, as stolid indeed as hon. gentlemen opposite must think he was, he would find out that in this wonderful tariff there was no Protection for him. Everything he used, his spade, his shovel, his scythe, his threshing-machine, his ploughs, the clothes he wore, every article of goods he purchased, was taxed from 20 to 60 per cent., to add to the revenue of the poor, distressed manufacturers, who were starving on half a million dollars apiece. Next to the farming, came the lumbering industry. The hon. member for North Renfrew undertook to prove that this was a declining industry, by showing a falling-off in the export return of lumber to the United States, and the hon. the Finance Minister was reported to have so spoken of it; but it was still, and it would for many years continue to be, one of the great industries of Canada, and, when times improved in the United States, as he hoped they soon would, and the people of that country could afford to use more of our lumber, and afford to pay a better price for it, that great industry, now so depressed, would revive. What did this tariff do for the lumber trade? It did not because it could not, afford it the slightest Protection. Nothing that this Parliament could do would increase the price of lumber in the foreign market a single cent, but it did impose grievous burdens on that industry. The hon. member for Queen's, N.B., who was well acquainted with the business, calculated that the burdens so imposed were equal to 60c. per thousand superficial feet, and that in New Brunswick alone it would amount to $300,000. This enormous sum could not be taken out of the profits of the trade, which were already exceedingly small, and it must come out of the pockets of the unfortunate workmen employed in the woods, in the streams, in the mills, and in loading the vessels in the ports, although their wages were now lower than they had been for many many years. What did the fishermen get under this tariff? They were a most deserving and industrious class, and added a great deal to the wealth of the country. But they found that they had received no consideration whatever. On every article they used they would have to pay greatly increased duties, except their canvas and lines and twines, on which, thanks to the exertions of some hon. gentlemen who represented fishermen, the increase at one time proposed would not be imposed, and molasses, the duty on which was to be reduced some 2c. a gallon. What had been done for the ship-owners, and those engaged in the important shipping industry of the country? There was to be a drawback on articles used in ship-building, but an hon. gentleman who tried to find out what the drawback meant, was met by the vague promise that some arrangement would be made by-and-bye, for returning a portion of those duties. On articles used in the construction of ships no drawback, as far as he (Mr. Anglin) could see, would be paid, unless these articles were imported. On articles manufactured in the country, no drawback would be allowed, and so the cost of construction would be very greatly increased. The cost of production of agricultural implements, of sewing machines, and other articles which we now exported, would also be greatly increased, and it would be difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain the amount of drawback to be paid. He doubted very much if the hon. the Minister of Finance would be troubled very much about drawbacks upon these articles, because the cost of production would be increased so much that it would be perfectly impossible for the manufacturers of Canada to compete with those of other countries. In fact, in all probability the increased cost of production would prevent exportation altogether. The whole system of drawbacks propounded by the Minister of Finance must have the effect of encouraging imports, and discouraging the manufactures of this country. A drawback, if it could be given at all, would only be given on the articles imported. No benefit whatever was conferred on the shipowners, and the effect of this tariff would be very detrimental to the carrying trade of the country. He believed the tariff proposed would bear most oppressively and unjustly on all the great interests of this country—on the farmers, on the lumbermen, on the shipowners, on the fishermen, on the mechanics, and on all workmen who would not get so much additional employment as would compensate them for the additional burdens. It would cripple all industries, and force capital into less productive channels than it would seek if left to pursue its natural course, and he thought it would prove absolutely disastrous to the country as a whole. It would stop the expansion of our manufactures, and render impossible such an arrangement as that suggested by the hon. member for Halton. He opposed it because he believed it would be particularly unjust to the people of the Province one of the constituencies of which he had the honour to represent in this House. As a whole, it meant and promised nothing but additional taxation. He intended to say a word about sugar, merely to point out that the statement made by the hon. member for Bothwell was more than corroborated by the hon. member for Kingston, who was one of the first authorities on that question in the Dominion. That gentleman spoke as an importer, and he told them that the effect of this tariff would be to compel the people to pay on their sugar $1,116,000 more than would go into the Treasury, for the benefit of a few refiners who would employ some 500 men in the work of refining. It would be better for this House to give those men a pension of $1,000 a year each, than to find them employment in the sugar refineries at such a price. This was but one of the many burdens imposed by this tariff, not for the general welfare of the people, but for the advantage of a few individuals, making the rich richer and the poor poorer. For all these reasons, he should, vainly, perhaps, but most earnestly, oppose this tariff.

SIR A. J. SMITH moved the adjournment of the debate.

Question put on the motion to agree to the resolutions (Mr. Tilley).

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the House do not agree to the resolution, but that it resolve itself into a Committee of Ways and Means.

MR. ANGLIN asked if the hon. the Premier proposed to really carry the amendments at this sitting, or was his motion merely pro forma.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: They had better be carried and reported; then they will be discussed.

MR. MACKENZIE said that some of the most distinguished members of the House had been refused a hearing to-night, and he thought all should be allowed to speak upon the measure.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I was proposing that we should pass these resolutions pro forma. Let them be reported, and they can be read this afternoon, as reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, and then the discussion can go on as well as now.

MR. MACKENZIE: I have taken this course in order to vindicate the rights of the minority in this House. The hon. gentleman would have done the same thing under the provocation we have sustained to-night. We intend to vindicate our rights, and we know how to do it.

House resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means to further consider the said resolutions.

(In the Committee.)

Resolutions agreed to and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolutions reported, as follows:—

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the value of all bottles, flasks, jars, demi-johns, carboys, casks, hogsheads, pipes, barrels, and all other vessels or packages, manufactured of tin, iron, lead, zinc, glass, or any other material, and capable of holding liquids; crates, barrels, and other packages containing glass, china, crockery, or earthenware, and all packages in which goods are commonly placed for home consumption, including cases in which bottled spirits, wines or malt liquors are contained, and every package, being the first receptacle or covering enclosing goods for purpose of sale, shall in all cases not otherwise provided for, in which they contain goods subject to an ad valorem duty, be taken and held to be a part of the fair market value of such goods for duty, and when they contain goods subject to specific duty only, such packages shall be charged with a duty of Customs of twenty per cent. ad valorem, to be computed upon their original cost or value; and all or any of the above packages described as capable of holding liquids, when containing goods exempt from duty under this Act, shall be charged with a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem; but all packages not hereinbefore specified, and not specially charged with duty by any unrepealed enactment, and being the usual and ordinary packages in which goods are packed for exportation only, according to the general usage and custom of trade, shall be free of duty.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that on all goods imported into Canada, subject under this Act or any other Act to ad valorem duty, upon which a drawback of duties has been allowed by the Government of the country where the same were manufactured, the amount of such drawback shall in all cases be taken and considered to be a part of the fair market value of such goods, and duty shall be collected thereon; and in cases where the amount of such drawback shall have been deducted from the value of such goods upon the face of the invoice under which entry is to be made, the Collector of Customs or proper officer shall add the amount of such deduction, and collect and cause to be paid the lawful duty thereupon, and the fair market value of all goods, wares, and merchandise imported into Canada shall be understood to be the ordinary wholesale price at which the same are sold for home consumption in the country where they are purchased or manufactured without deduction of any kind because of any drawback paid or to be paid thereon, or because of any special arrangement between the seller and purchaser, having reference to the exportation of such goods, or the exclusive right to territorial limits for the sale thereof, or because of any royalty payable upon patent rights, but not payable when goods are purchased for exportation, or on account of any other consideration by which a special reduction in price might or could be obtained: Provided that nothing herein shall be understood to apply to general fluctuations of market values.

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that any or all of the following articles, that is to say:—Animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots) plants, trees and shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, peas and beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat, and all other grain, flour of wheat, and flour of rye, Indian meal and oatmeal, and flour or meal of any other grain, butter, cheese, fish (salted or smoked), lard, tallow, meats (fresh, salted, or smoked), and lumber may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this Act, upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such proclamation, when imported into Canada.

4. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that if at any time any greater duty of Customs should be payable in the United States of America on tea or coffee imported from Canada than on tea or coffee imported from any other country, then the Governor in Council may impose on tea or coffee imported into Canada from the said United States, an additional duty of Customs equal to the duty payable in the United States on tea or coffee imported from Canada: Provided that tea or coffee imported into Canada from any country, other than the said United States, but passing in bond through the United States, shall be taken and rated as a direct importation from the country wherever the tea or coffee was purchased.

5. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that an allowance may be made for deterioration by natural decay or breakage upon all perishable and brittle goods imported into Canada, such as green fruits and vegetables, crockery, china, glass and glassware, provided such damage is found to exceed twenty-five per cent. of the value thereof, upon an examination to be made by an appraiser or proper officer of Customs, at the first landing, or within three days of such landing; but such allowance shall be only for the amount of loss in excess of twenty-five per cent. of the whole quantity of such goods contained, or included in any one invoice; and provided the duty has been paid on the full value thereof, a refund of such duty may be allowed and paid in the proportion and on fulfilment of the conditions above specified, but not otherwise, on application to the Minister of Customs.

6. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that, in determining the dutiable value of merchandise, except when imported from Great Britain, there shall be added to the cost or the actual wholesale price, or fair market value, at the time of exportation, in the principal markets of the country from whence the same has been imported into Canada, the cost of inland transportation, shipment and transshipment, with all the expenses included, from the place of growth, production or manufacture, whether by land or water, to the vessel in which shipment is made, either in transitu or direct to Canada.

7. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council shall, from time to time, establish such regulations, not inconsistent with law, as may be required to secure a just, faithful and impartial appraisal of all goods, wares and merchandise imported into Canada, and just and proper entries of the actual or fair market value thereof, and of the weights, measures, or other quantities thereof, as each case may require, and such regulations, whether general or special, so made by the Governor in Council, shall have the full force and authority of law, and it shall be the duty of the appraisers of Canada and every of them, and every person who shall act as such appraiser, or of the Collector of Customs, as the case may be, by all reasonable ways and means in his or their power to ascertain, estimate and appraise the true and fair market value and wholesale price, any invoice or affidavit thereto to the contrary notwithstanding, of the merchandise at the time of exportation and in the principal markets of the country whence the same has been imported into Canada, and the proper weights, measures or other quantities, and the fair market value or wholesale price of every of them as the case may require.

8. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that no refund of duty paid shall be allowed because of any alleged inferiority or deficiency in quantity of goods imported and entered, and which have passed into the custody of the importer under permit of the Collector of Customs, nor because of the omission in the invoice of any trade discount, or other matter or thing, which might have the effect of reducing the value of such goods for duty, unless the same shall have been reported to the Collector of Customs within ten days of the date of entry, and the said goods shall have been examined by the said Collector, or by an appraiser or other proper officer of Customs, and the proper rate or amount of reduction certified by him after such examination, and if such Collector or proper officer reports that the goods in question cannot be identified as those named in the invoice and entry in question, then and in such case no refund of the duty or any part thereof shall in any case be allowed, and all applications for refund of duty in such cases shall be submitted with the evidence and all particulars for decision of the Minister of Customs, who may then order payment on finding the evidence to be sufficient and satisfactory.

9. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide, that the whole or part of the duty of thirty per centum ad valorem imposed by this Act upon wines imported into Canada, may be dispensed with upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that the Governments of France and Spain, or either of them, have made changes in their tariffs of duties imposed upon articles imported from Canada in reduction or repeal of the duties now in force in said countries.

15. Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal all Acts, and parts, or Schedules of Acts, and all Orders in Council imposing any duties or Customs upon goods, wares, and merchandise, or providing for the exemption of goods, wares, and merchandise from Customs duty, when imported into Canada, and to make the following provisions in lieu thereof.

WAYS AND MEANS.—THE TARIFF.

MR. TILLEY moved the second reading of the resolutions relative to duties of Customs and Excise, reported from Committee of Ways and Means (April 9th).

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH said the question under consideration was admitted to be one of very great importance. It seemed to him, although much time had been consumed in its discussion, that he would fail in his duty if he did not make some observations before it reached its finality. This question revived the memory of events of very considerable consequence and importance in the Province of New Brunswick. It reproduced, naturally, from the attitude of the hon. the Finance Minister, the recollection of events which took place in the early stages of this Confederation, and it was natural that his colleagues from New Brunswick should have adverted to the attitude of the Finance Minister in connection with the agitation incidental to the accomplishment of Confederation, which took place at the time in his Province. In 1864, the Finance Minister, being then a member of the Government, was appointed with one or two others, by the Government, delegates to the Quebec Conference, which had relation to the final Confederation of these Provinces. Having been Secretary of the Province, and having had charge of its financial affairs, it naturally fell to him to look after the financial interests of New Brunswick at that Conference. The Conference met and passed a variety of resolutions which formed the basis of Confederation, so far as New Brunswick to have 80c. per head of the population of 1861, which amounted to about $201,000, and in addition, $63,000 per year for ten years. The Conference closed; the Finance Minister returned to New Brunswick, and, with the view of preparing the people for the dissolution which was shortly to take place, he called public meetings in St. John, as well as in other parts of New Brunswick. He (Sir A. J. Smith) was one of those who opposed Confederation, as propounded at the Quebec Conference. The Finance Minister, at all these public meetings, strongly advised the people to accept the terms of the Conference. He told them he had obtained the most liberal terms for New Brunswick, and, had the people endorsed his action, and adopted his advice, all that the Province would have had in this Confederation would have been $201,000, and $63,000 for ten years.

MR. TILLEY: Where are the $50,000 for the Government?

SIR A. J. SMITH said that was a supplementary allowance; there was nothing said about it at the Conference, or in the resolutions. All that the Finance Minister had to offer the people, and which he strongly urged them to accept, were the 80c. per head according to the census of 1861, which amounted to $201,000. and the $63,000 per year for ten years, and these amounts were to be in full satisfaction of any claim New Brunswick was to have on this Dominion with reference to its financial matters. Had the people accepted the advice of the Finance Minister, what would be the condition of New Brunswick now? Since then, New Brunswick has received, in addition to those terms, $50,000 a year, 80c. per head of the population, until it reached 400,000, which, according to the last census, did give a considerable amount, $150,000 compensation for the abolition of export duties—and had now a revenue of nearly half a million dollars derivable from the Dominion Treasury. He asked the Finance Minister where New Brunswick would have been had she accepted his proposition in 1864? She would have been in the lowest depths of financial despair. All she could do at present was barely to meet requirements of her Civil Government. It had been said, across the floor of this House, that he (Sir A. J. Smith) had changed his politics, and, from a Tory, had become a Liberal. He and the Finance Minister had been associated together for many years in the same Government; they were in perfect accord and sympathy, and were members of the first Liberal Government, in 1854, ever formed in New Brunswick, and, if there had been a change, it was the Finance Minister who had changed, who, for many years, had been a Liberal, and was now a Tory. What did the Finance

MR. KIRKPATRICK.

Minister himself say in 1864, about the manner in which New Brunswick would be financially affected by joining Confederation? At this time, the tax per head in New Brunswick, Customs duties, for there were no Excise duties, was $3.20. He told the people that, if they joined Confederation, their taxes would be diminished, and, instead of $3.30, they would pay only $2.75 per head for the next quarter of a century. His views were not adopted by the people, and he was defeated by an overwhelming majority, despite every means legitimate and illegitimate, which were used against the anti-Confederate party. The following year a dissolution was forced, and the Confederate party won the election. He would not repeat the causes of this change, because his hon. friend from Gloucester had put plainly before the House the agencies which had been resorted to to bring about the result. He (Sir A. Smith) alluded to those utterances of the Finance Minister to show that his judgment was not to be relied upon, that, when he assumed the rôle of prophet, his prophecies should be received with considerable allowance, that he had not a great prevision and forecast for the future, and it was impossible for him to explain why he told the people of New Brunswick that for the next twenty-five years all they would be called on to pay would be $2.75 per head. He had not been five years in power before he submitted a scheme of taxation which would involve at least six dollars a head on the people, after promising it should not exceed $2.75. How were they to enforce this agreement? There was no doubt this was a compact, because it was repeated on the second election. The Minister of Justice ought to be consulted, to see by what means this agreement could be enforced, and an indemnity be given to the people of New Brunswick for the pledge the Finance Minister had given, that they would only pay $2.75 per head. It had been stated here, over and over again, that the question referred to the people at the polls on the 17th September, was whether a revenue tariff, as a policy of Protection, should be adopted. Well, he admitted in many portions of the Dominion, that was the fair issue at the polls, but he denied that in the Province of New Brunswick it was the real issue. The hon. the Finance Minister endeavoured to make the people believe the policy of the then Opposition was simply a re-adjustment of the tariff. He would like to ask him whether he believed he would have been elected had it not been for the telegram sent by Sir John A. Macdonald to Mr. John Boyd? Did the present tariff come within the meaning of the communication made by the leader of the Government to Mr. Boyd, that the tariff was simply to be re-adjusted, and no increase of taxation? Had the Finance Minister gone to the people of St. John's with his present tariff, he would not have been elected. He went to his election under peculiarly auspicious circumstances. He had occupied the first position in that Province for five years. He (Sir A. J. Smith) did not wish particularly to refer to the way in which his hon. friend got that appointment, but he thought the circumstances which led to it were to be regretted. He was amused to see the Finance Minister, the other day, refer to the First Minister as to the circumstances connected with the passing of the Order in Council on the 22nd October. He invoked the testimony of the First Minister as to whether he knew that the Order in Council had been passed. It was never pretended that he knew. He was in England at the time. On the 5th November, in his place in the House, he made a speech, in which he exhibited himself in the most chivalrous manner, and said he would sink with the ship, and fall with his colleagues. At that hour there was an Order in Council, dated 22nd October, appointing him Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick, and he occupied the position for five years after by Order in Council, and by virtue of that order. It then had vitality on the 5th November as no other Order of Council appointing him Governor ever passed; and yet he told us that, after his return from England, he told the Governor he did not think he would accept the appointment. Was it understood between him and the leader that this order was to remain in abeyance until they saw the result of the vote of want of confidence then pending? The Order in Council was never changed, and his acceptance of the Governorship had relation back to the 22nd of October, when that Order in Council was passed. He said he thought that the Finance Minister had entered upon his office of Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick rather ingloriously. He did not say it with any kind of bad feeling. The hon. gentleman had referred to a conversation he had had at the time with Mr. Burpee and himself (Sir A. J. Smith.) He recollected having a conversation with the Finance Minister, and believed he had said to him then that he was pleased of his appointment, and would have been glad to have suggested himself the nomination. But on this occasion there was nothing said about an Order in Council. He had not seen the Order in Council, and it was not spoken of at that time. The Finance Minister, more fortunate than his colleagues, who went out of power without office, rose to a higher position. Well, he was prepared to admit that he made a very good Governor. He discharged his duty well within the limits of the Constitution. There was no friction, everything went on smoothly, and he discharged his duty satisfactorily; but the hon. gentleman, while he was unfortunate in his entrance to that high position, was equally unfortunate in his exit from it. This House would be astonished to hear that the hon. the Finance Minister, while he was yet Governor, attended a public political meeting in St. John, and accepted the nomination for the city. He made, also, a violent speech on that occasion, in which he condemned the Government, of which he was but an officer, and criticised Mr. Cartwright in his policy and measures.

MR. TILLEY: I made no speech at all.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: Then the papers misrepresented you.

MR. TILLEY: No; they did not.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: You went to St. John for the purpose of accepting the nomination.

MR. TILLEY: No; I did not go there for that purpose. I knew nothing about it.

SIR A. J. SMITH: The hon gentleman was in St. John receiving a requisition. The papers published the next morning that the Governor had accepted the nomination and made a speech. Whether he did or not, he (Sir A. J. Smith) did not know personally. The meeting was not an open one, but was attended by a large number of strong political partisans, and the hon. gentleman held office as Governor several weeks after. This was an unprecedented proceeding, because the Governor was supposed to be, for the time being, at all events, without any party politics. The hon. the Finance Minister appeared before the people of St. John under very favourable circumstances. He had all the prestige and moral influence which the occupation of that high position could give him; he had no political sins for five years to answer for; he had many political and personal friends who would stand by him under all circumstances. The people of St. John were anxious and interested about the question of Protection, and, from his utterances, were not induced to believe that the scheme now submitted to this House was the scheme and policy then contemplated. If it was, why did he seek to remove from the minds of the people then that his policy was one of Protection? Why did he communicate with the First Minister? The telegram of the First Minister implied that there was no such thing as Protection contemplated, but simply a readjustment of the tariff. Was this a readjustment of the tariff? It was admittedly a policy of extreme Protection. Without this telegram he could not have been elected, and with all these influences and powerful agencies, personal, official, and moral influence, he was only elected by a majority of nine. That illustrated very strongly that the sentiments of the people was not in favour of Protection, and the Finance Minister must have received letters innumerable from St. John and other parts of New Brunswick, complaining that this policy was most oppressive. He (Sir A. J. Smith) did not believe he had received letters in which it was recommended, but must have received letters in which it was almost universally condemned. The Finance Minister was elected by a majority of nine, and he thought more, that on that occasion, in addition to all the other agencies used by that hon.

gentleman, he told the people of St. John that he had the virtue to resist a proffered bribe of $45,000. He (Sir A. J. Smith) thought the Minister of Finance was not justified in resorting to such means during that election. He was not aware that any such offer was made to him (Mr. Tilley). He (Sir A. J. Smith) had some correspondence with him, and he had no hesitation in saying that he did not care whether it was made private or public. The Finance Minister told the people of St. John that he was so anxious to serve his country, so anxious to obtain the position of Finance Minister, that he was unable to accept the offer of $45,000 made to him. After the election, the hon. the Finance Minister was kind enough to pay his (Sir A. J. Smith's) county a visit, accompanied by the Minister of Public Works, the Hon. Mr. Mitchell, and the hon. member for King's (Mr. Donville). He (Sir A. J. Smith) thought he was in Ottawa at the time; but he saw an account of the affair, and there was a torch-light procession, and all that kind of thing, in the town of Moncton, where those gentlemen had come to attend a meeting. The hon. the Finance Minister, he thought, was rather moderate on that occasion. Mr. Mitchell was very lavish in his abuse, and was only excelled by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, who had the kindness to speak of him (Sir A. J. Smith) in terms of considerable severity. The Minister of Public Works, he was told, stated to the people on that occasion, as he had on previous occasions, that he (Sir A. J. Smith) was an office-seeker, that he had knocked at the doors of his (Mr. Tupper's) Government, for office, and was refused. He had been rather surprised that the hon. the Finance Minister should stand by, and by his silence acquiesce in the statement. The Minister of Finance knew him; they had personal and political relations for many years, and he (Sir A. J. Smith) thought he could appeal to that hon. gentleman, though an opponent, as testimony in refutation of the charge thus made by the Minister of Public Works. He would ask him if he ever had been an office seeker? He had been in the same Government with him (Mr. Tilley) for seven years, and had no office. During the fifteen years that he had sat as a representative in the New Brunswick Legislature, he had held office for only some two years, that was as Attorney-General, and he thought he was treated undeservedly by the hon. the Minister of Finance, when he allowed his colleague to charge him before his (Sir A. J. Smith's) constituents with being an office-seeker, and having knocked at the door of their Government for office. He (Mr. Tilley) knew it was not true, and the Minister of Public Works had no warrant for making any such statement. He recollected that, in 1872, when the present Prime Minister occupied the same position as he did now, they had offered him (Sir A. J. Smith) the Lieutenant-Governorship of New Brunswick. He had thanked the Government at the time, but had declined the offer. The hon. the Minister of Public Works, would recollect, too, the proposition made to him (Sir A. J. Smith) at St. John in 1873. It was not a confidential matter, as he (Mr. Tupper) had mentioned it to several persons. He (Mr. Tupper) had proposed that he (Sir A. J. Smith) should take the Governorship of Nova Scotia, and that he (Mr. Tupper) should take the Governorship of New Brunswick. He had told him (Mr. Tupper) on that occasion, that he did not care for any position, and that he was content to remain an independent member for the county of Westmoreland. The hon. gentleman knew too, that, in 1873, a member of his Government was commissioned by the First Minister to offer him a seat in the Cabinet. That was not a secret. The hon. gentleman also knew that, when he (Sir A. J. Smith) came to Ottawa in 1873, in October, that he was not here an hour, when he was waited upon by the Minister of Public Works and pressed to accept a portfolio in the then Government. Here were two offers of Governorships, and two seats in the Cabinet, the whole of which he had declined, and he would ask the hon. the Minister of Public Works whether, in view of these facts, he had any authority or warrant for saying that he (Sir A. J. Smith) was an office-seeker, and that he had knocked at the door of their Government for office? He did not think it was fair or just to make such an accusation against a public man when there was not the slightest foundation for any such charge. He never was an office-seeker. Did not the hon. the Minister of Finance know that when he (Sir A. J. Smith) first came here, in 1867, they had been associated together for many years? The Confederation discussion had made a divergence between them, but it had not terminated the kindly feeling that had existed between them. He (Mr. Tilley) knew very well that he was not an office-seeker, but that he had been offered office day after day, and had refused it. It was most unfair for the hon. member (Mr. Tupper) to make that charge against him, and he felt it his duty, before the House and the country, to refute those charges, and to show that they had no foundation in fact whatever. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) had read an extract from a speech, reported to have been made by him (Sir A. J. Smith) in 1872. That speech was incorrectly reported. In 1867, having fought the battle of Confederation, and having been beaten, he had laid down his arms, and admitted he was conquered, and he believed it was his duty, as a public man, to exert all influence towards making Confederation a success, and the country prosperous. In 1867 he appealed as an Independent candidate to his constituents, who had always returned him to the New Brunswick Parliament, from 1852, without any interruption, and he was returned by a majority of more than nineteen hundred. Though his antecedents were Liberal, as were those of the hon. the Minister of Finance, who had always been a Liberal, and they had voted side by side for years, he (Sir A. J. Smith) had come to Ottawa as an Independent member of the House. He supported the Government when they were right, and opposed them when they were wrong. As every hon. gentleman knew, he had always exercised his own judgment in regard to matters submitted for the consideration of this House. When he had first come here, he had no political affinities with either party; in fact, he knew hardly any of the then public men of Canada, except by reputation. Confederation, the only question, perhaps, upon which he held opinions adverse to those of the majority of the House, had been disposed of, and accepted by both sides, and, therefore, he was entirely independent of any party. Whenever he had any doubt, he always gave the Government the benefit of the doubt, because he did not desire a change of Government at all. Then, having occupied that position for five years in this House, he returned to his constituents in 1872, and what did he say to them? He told them that he again offered himself, that he was pledged to neither one side or the other; that, during the five years he had been in Ottawa, he had been prepared to give the Government credit for everything they did; that he had found the then Government willing to do justice to his Province, and that he had supported them when they were right, and opposed them when they were wrong. He had gone further, and told them that the interests of the Lower Provinces were as safe in the hands of the Government as they would be in the hands of the Opposition. He declared himself entirely independent of both sides on that occasion, and was again elected by acclamation. He felt it necessary to make this explanation, because he did not know that he would ever have another occasion of explaining the matter, and because there seemed to be some misapprehension with regard to the attitude which he held towards the Government of the day in 1872. The hon. the Minister of Finance knew that from 1867 to 1872, and from 1872 until the time the Government fell, he (Sir A. J. Smith) had never asked for office, and that he had declined the four propositions which were made to him. Having made this explanation, which he thought was necessary, in order to inform the House and the country the true position he occupied in reference to these matters, he thought it was necessary, in dealing with the question now before the House, to find out, if they could, when it was that this Protective policy had its origin in this country and was born. By reference to the utterances of hon. members on the Government side of the House in 1873 and 1874, he found that there was no indication at all that this was the policy of the men who were in power in 1873, and afterwards in Opposition. It was said that the Protection of 1871 was in the sense of a National Policy; but that Protection lived but a few months and then died. He would see what were the reasons given by the First Minister, and he would then call attention to the reasons given by the Finance Minister, and see how far they agreed upon this question, what was called the National Policy of 1871. They arrived at the same conclusion, but their premises were entirely different. Here was what the Minister of Finance said :

"It is true, that, in the National Policy introduced in 1871, a tax was placed on flour and coal. But you must consider the circumstances under which the tax was imposed. We were going into the Treaty of Washington, intending to make an effort to secure reciprocity, so that we would have free market for our lumber, fish, cattle and agricultural products. We could not ask for all these advantages without offering something in return. We must have something to offer for a renewal of the treaty, as we had made few changes in our tariff since it was abrogated, and the United States continued to enjoy all the privileges they possessed under it. We felt we must have something to offer as the price of its renewal, and the duties were imposed accordingly. It is supposed that these bore unequally on the Maritime Provinces, the fact being that the Maritime Provinces paid on flour, grain, coal and coke, but 5 per cent. more than Ontario and Quebec, in proportion to the population. I would have voted against the coal and flour resolutions last Session, but I would re-impose these duties in circumstances similar to those attending the Washington Treaty negotiations, and would take something off sugar and other articles largely consumed by the masses."

Now in that the Finance Minister said that, in order to secure reciprocity, it was necessary, in the interests of the country, in 1871, to impose duties. Here was what the First Minister said on the same subject, in 1872 :

"The feeling in 1865 was, however, very strong in favour of doing everything in our power in order to induce the Americans to renew the treaty. The Government did everything it could, and, while its members were exerting themselves in that direction, it would have been a suicidal course—it would have been threatening the very purpose in view—if they had increased the taxes at that time, even to inaugurate a National Policy. Because the Americans could have said, 'How can we give you a reciprocity treaty when you are increasing the duties on our goods?' Therefore, from year to year, so long as there was any hope of a renewal of the treaty, Canada declined to raise a larger revenue than was absolutely necessary to carry on the Government."

This was the utterance of the First Minister, diametrically opposite to that of the Finance Minister. One said put on the duty, and the other said take it off. In 1871, when a duty was put on flour and coal, this Government never contemplated establishing a National Policy. The fiscal policy of the United States was the same now as it was then ; and if it was necessary now, and the country called loudly, thinking its prosperity was imperilled, for some such system as obtained in the United States, why did not those hon. gentlemen propound this National Policy in 1871? The circumstances were precisely the same. He would call attention to some of the utterances of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, in 1874, also of the First Minister in 1872, in this question, and it could not be denied that the fiscal policy of the United States had remained unchanged since then. It was said then that this country was in a most prosperous condition, and that they did not want even reciprocity ; that they were going on successfully and prosperously. The First Minister said, in 1872 :

"Although we have been without reciprocity from 1866 until now ; although we have been virtually excluded from the markets of the United States, our farmers are richer than ever, and easily find a sale for their products in the markets of the world. They are increasing their farms, and improving the breed of their live stock. In every branch of the agricultural community you see they are rising superior to the temporary disadvantage caused by the loss of the United States markets."

That was the declaration of the First Minister in 1872. How had things changed since then ?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD :
A change of Ministry.

SIR A. J. SMITH said that recalled to his mind that this National Policy never was thought of until it became a necessity of the Conservative party. The hon. the Minister of Public Works, after the change of Government in 1873, believed, because he stated it to many of his friends, that the other Government would not remain in power six months. He seemed to have the conviction that the Government would not even be able to administer the public affairs of this country,

The Government did live six months and longer, and the hon. gentlemen on the other side found that the Mackenzie Government could administer the affairs of the country, and not only that, but they had done so well and honestly. They found that, in order to succeed to power, it was necessary to resort to some other agency than usual. They found discontent, depression and hard times existing in the country, and they felt that, by working upon the prejudices of the people, they could create a public opinion in favour of a National Policy. Those gentlemen knew that this statement had been proved correct. He would now see what the Minister of Public Works said in 1874, after the late Government had been in power some months :

"The only interest the Finance Minister pretended was suffering the slightest depression, was the agricultural interest, and he (Mr. Tupper) would ask the great consuming population of the country whether they thought the great agricultural interest was suffering? He thought they would give a decided response, without any hesitation, that the agricultural interest, at this moment, was enjoying a condition of prosperity second to none in the world."

That was after the change of Government; he presumed after the six months within which the hon. gentleman had predicted that the Government would be overthrown. The late Government challenged full enquiry, to see if they had not conducted public affairs to the entire satisfaction of the people. He repeated that, in the Session of 1874, the hon. gentlemen now in power never contemplated a policy of Protection. They declared the country to be in a most prosperous condition; that the country, notwithstanding the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty, was becoming rich; that they could find markets for their agricultural produce in every part of the world, and that they were not dependent upon the United States. He had now occasion to refer to the position taken by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White). He was a gentleman who represented very advanced thoughts and ideas; he had studied the public affairs of this country, if not in this House, outside of it, and if he was not here long ago it was not his fault, because he tried often enough, and his utterances were entitled to considerable consideration. While that gentleman said now that he was a Protectionist, in 1873 he was entirely opposed to Protection, as shown by the resolution which he moved in the Dominion Board of Trade, at the annual meeting :

"That, without forming any opinion upon some of the details of the present Customs tariff, and the anomalies, which are inevitable in all tariffs, this Board is of opinion that no changes should be made in it, unless the exigencies of the public service demand larger revenues; and that in such case any increase to be made should be in accordance with the principle of the present Customs tariff, which, while not interfering with the commerce of the Dominion, affords incidental Protection to its manufactures."

He did not say that Free-trade was practicable in this country. He said they must have incidental Protection, must have a revenue tariff, having a proper regard for the industries of the country. The resolution concluded as follows :—

"That this Board is further of opinion that permanence in the fiscal policy of the country is most important alike to its commerce and its manufactures, and that no changes should be made in the tariff not demanded by the absolute necessities of the revenue."

How was it that the hon. gentleman changed his mind since then? He (Sir Albert J. Smith) did not believe that he had changed his honest conviction, but that he was really of the same opinion still, because it was based upon sound reason—that they could not stimulate, encourage and foster industries that required artificial means to sustain them. He (Sir A. J. Smith) thought he had shown that the National Policy was the outcome of political necessities of the gentlemen on the other side, and that it was not the result of conviction, because he found that, up to 1874, they never uttered a word in favour of the National Policy. It was said that Protection had accomplished wonders for the United States, and Mr. Wells had been quoted in connection with that assertion. He would quote from a lecture that was delivered, in 1878, before a Science Congress in Cincinnati, to show the effect of Protection on the industries of that country as compared with effect of Free-trade as it existed in England. It was as follows :—

"The great commerce of England has been built upon invention, and by a policy of ocean postal service, which enables her to reach every seaport by steam on the face of the earth. Her merchants are in every land; her marine on every sea. How our foreign commerce fails before that of England—less than one-third—yet you may put the United Kingdom into Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, and have 15,000,000 acres to spare. Last year we mined 42,000,000 tons of coal; England, 133,000,000. She built 687 sailing vessels, and 300 steamers, last year; we, six steamers, seven ships, four brigs! Last year she produced $124,000,000 of wool, clothed her people, and exported $115,000,000; we purchased $7,000,000, and exported $317,000 worth. England paid us $191,000,000 for our cotton, and exported $358,000,000 of cotton goods, while we, raising the cotton, exported $13,000,000 worth. England manufactured 6,000,000,000 yards of cotton goods, sending 1,155,000,000 to India; 279,000,000 to Turkey; 100,000,000 to Egypt; 54,000,000 to the United States—more to this country than we to all the world—178,000,000 to Brazil; we, 5,000,000 yards. She sent to all South Africa, 354,000,000; we, 53,000,000. China, in 1860, took from us 5,300,000 yards; from England, 150,000 yards. Last year we sent 11,000,000 yards to that land; England, 408,000,000. Such has been the development of trade with that country."

Now, that was a country where cotton was produced, and its manufacture was favoured by a high Protective policy. What had it done as compared with Free-trade England? Quotations without number might be found to show the injurious effects of Protection in the United States. Refutations of that policy came from many in the Republic, and he would read from an authority in St. Louis:

"Things here are dull, as usual, no signs of improvement visible to my naked eye in the business line. Land and property generally has fallen, on the average, 50 per cent. in the last four years, at the lowest calculation. The iron furnaces are closed, and other manufactures are in various stages of collapse, or non-prosperity. Not one in ten is making money. Protection, for some years, has piled up the filthy lucre in their pockets, but too many rushed in, and they are now in a most calamitous state. The manufacturers have not prospered under Protection, while the people here have been fleeced right and left, and have, in the last fifteen years, paid enough in the difference between a revenue and Protection tariff to have built all the mills in the country more than once."

Now, that gentleman's experience urged him to condemn Protection as most disastrous, ruinous, to the country. The hon. the Finance Minister had taken abundant credit for Protection to what he called the shipping interest. Had he considered that question thoroughly, and did he know the effect his tariff would have on it as compared with that of the old tariff? He could not think it possible. It might be that, with the multiplicity of his duties, he had been unable to give that attention to the subject which it deserved. That interest, however, was one of the most valuable in the country, and required every reasonable encouragement and protection. But still it was not more depressed than others, and did not ask special provision. In 1874, it was called upon to pay certain duties by the tariff of that year, but he had heard no complaint of them. They were only a trifle; but the Finance Minister proposed to abolish them or impose higher duties, giving the shipbuilder, at the same time, what he called a drawback. He (Sir A. J. Smith), however, had seen no provision for a drawback in the tariff resolutions. The shipping interest was, no doubt, in a depressed condition, but considering its development in the Lower Provinces, and its circumstances as compared with other industries, he believed there was no other so prosperous. New Brunswick built, last year, 270,000 tons of shipping, and Nova Scotia 550,000 tons, which was equivalent to about $3,000,000 thus invested. Each of those Provinces had more than a ton for every man, woman and child of its population, it being wonderful how the shipping interest in the two Provinces had kept pace, as to tonnage, with the increase of the population. The shipping had a light duty so far, but he was sure the proposed burden would strike a serious and deadly blow at it, instead of benefitting it, as the Finance Minister declared he intended. It seemed to be natural for the people of the Maritime Provinces to build ships and invest their money in enterprises connected with shipping. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam), who was thoroughly acquainted with shipbuilding, stated the old duty on this trade was comparatively nothing. For a practical illustration of the effects of the new duties, let them consider the case of a vessel of 1,530 tons, classing A 1 at Lloyd's; in nine years the duties paid on her materials, under the old tariff, would reach $470.99, equal to about 31c. per ton, which was a mere trifle. The total cost of dutiable goods entering into her construction would be $7,939, under the old tariff; the non-dutiable added, gave a total of $23,208. The dutiable amounted to about $5 a ton, and the non-dutiable to $10. The cost of the vessel would be about $88,000. Now, the old tax of 31c. a ton no shipbuilder complained of, all being willing to pay necessary taxation. But, in increasing it, the Finance Minister put 10 per cent. on cordage, upon which he understood there was to be no drawback.

MR. TILLEY : None.

SIR A. J. SMITH said the old duty was but 5 per cent., or $100 for such a vessel, but the new would be $200, and no drawback. The hon. member for Yarmouth, who knew all about shipbuilding, had condemned the drawback as anomalous, and stated it would be practically impossible to carry out that principle. The only way it could be done would be by giving a bounty of so much per ton in ships built.

In answer to Mr. DOMVILLE,

SIR A. J. SMITH said the duty on the imported goods required for a vessel of 1,500 tons would now be $3,000, under the new tariff. Suppose he wanted iron knees, and got them from the hon. member for King's, who imported the iron and made the knees for vessels—who would get the drawback, the shipbuilder, or the person who sold him the articles?

MR. TILLEY : That depends on the arrangement between them. The shipbuilder obtains the benefit—gets the article at the lower price.

SIR A. J. SMITH said the matter was not provided for. A builder could buy iron in various places. He might buy from the hon. member for King's, for example. How was he to know? If the iron came from the Londonderry, N. S., works, would the drawback be allowed?

MR. TILLEY : No.

SIR A. J. SMITH asked was that a fair policy to the iron manufacturer at
SIR A. J. SMITH.

Londonderry, to refuse a drawback on his iron, while allowing it on imported iron? They would thus discriminate in favour of the iron-makers of foreign countries. Suppose a man could import iron, duty paid, for about the price of it at the Londonderry mines, and get a drawback of 10 per cent. on the imported, was not that an inducement to import the foreign article?

MR. TILLEY : Yes.

SIR A. J. SMITH asked was not that anomalous and a discrimination against the interests of the country in favour of the foreigner? He dared say the Finance Minister had overlooked that result, which he could hardly have intended. He would appeal to the hon. gentleman, representing, as he did, a Province deeply interested in shipbuilding, to repeal altogether that clause which would impose $3,000 of duties on a 1,500-ton vessel. He had as much right to be heard on that question as a member of any of the manufacturers' rings they had seen at Ottawa, and who had moulded the tariff policy to suit their own interests. The increased duties would embarrass seriously the shipbuilding interest. Did the hon. gentleman say that, when the ship had gone to sea, the builder would be refunded the duties on the materials? But much time might elapse before that, so as to make the loss of interest equal the refund. And yet the hon. gentleman claimed great credit for benefitting the shipbuilders. Did it require any argument to show that this was false, or that he was striking a serious blow at the best interest of the Maritime Provinces? Let him repeal that resolution, if he wanted to get anything out of ships without injuring the trade. Why embarrass himself with this drawback clause which must inevitably lead to fraud and inconvenience, and be found absolutely impracticable? The Finance Minister ought to have consulted men like his hon. friend from Yarmouth before making such a change, and formulated the mode of returning the drawback. He had evidently no adviser he could rely on.

MR. TILLEY asked how the hon. gentleman made it out that the shipbuilder, on a 1,500-ton vessel, would have to pay $3,000.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he had not then the details, but would furnish them. In preparing his tariff, the hon. gentleman had listened to the manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec, but had not consulted the interests of the great body of the people, the labouring men and farmers. Rings of manufacturers had been in Ottawa of late, and the changes they had secured in the tariff since its submission were perfectly marvellous and magical. He knew a gentleman interested in pulp, on which the Finance Minister put ten per cent.; but it did not require his attendance in Ottawa more than half an hour to secure a change to 20 per cent. That was an example of the pressure brought to bear on the hon. gentleman, and its effect. He said that, in September last, the people had pronounced in favour of this tariff. He (Sir A. J. Smith) would like to know how, or what tariff, since a great many changes had been made in it. He had excused himself for delay at first by stating he was receiving all the deputations before presenting his Budget; but he thought the hon. gentleman had had as many since as before he submitted it. Fifty changes or more had been made, and it must have been through some magical hidden power. With regard to the elections of September last, the tariff, doubtless, formed the issue in Ontario, but it did not in New Brunswick. If it was the issue there, how did he stand here without the confidence of the people of his own Province? He had only three or four of its representatives supporting him. The Finance Minister would not like to return now to St. John for re-election. He would advise him, should this tariff pass, to try and find a constituency in Ontario. The hon. gentleman had just said something about his (Mr. Smith) having to spend $20,000 for re-election. Was he prepared to back up that statement? It was said there were enormous sums spent in St. John to secure the Finance Minister's election, and that otherwise he would not have been returned—that there had been a marvellous change, by which 45 votes against him were changed to 20 for him, in one night in one ward, and that money accounted for the phenomenon. He had made the sugar trade one of the issues in St. John, asserting that the policy of the late Government had destroyed the refining interest. He (Sir A. J. Smith) maintained it did not. What did that interest amount to? To the refining of about 100,000,000lb. per year, which employed about 266 hands, at the expense of $1,000,000 to the people, for the benefit of a few wealthy refiners. They knew that Redpath, of Montreal, amassed a colossal fortune in this business; that they had now resumed refining, after having discontinued it, the papers saying they were going to employ 300 men. He would read an extract from a work, to show how comparatively unimportant an industry this was. He was amazed to hear hon. gentlemen make the statement they did—it was evident they did not understand the question—that sugar refining was going to encourage a very large trade with the West Indies. Why, any man, almost, in Montreal, knew that they could not do a large direct trade with the West Indies, on account of physical difficulties and natural obstacles, the St. Lawrence being closed five months in the year. The West Indian crop came in January and February. But if the whole quantity used in Canada were brought hither in Canadian vessels, it would only employ 40 of 1,000 tons each, the consumption being 55,000 tons. Vessels of 1,000 tons could carry 1,500 tons dead weight.

MR. DOMVILLE: Why does the hon. gentleman not take into account the molasses?

SIR A. J. SMITH said he was speaking of the refining only.

MR. DOMVILLE: That is not a fair calculation. The hon. gentleman knows they do not employ vessels of that kind in the trade.

SIR A. J. SMITH said, suppose they included molasses, and admitted that 80 vessels of 1,000 tons each would be employed—what did that amount to? They could not conceive that the carrying of 40,000 tons of merchandise would prove of great consequence to Canadian trade. Some supposed that if a sugar refinery were established in Montreal, the sugar would be carried thither in English bottoms, whereas none of the vessels would come by the St. Lawrence, as the sugar crop was carried to Canada in winter. Their Canadian vessels went out for it in November and December. Nothing was clearer than that the sugar used at Redpath's refinery in Montreal, would come in by Portland, being carried to that port by, perhaps, Canadian, or as likely by Danish or other foreign vessels, as there was no monopoly. A large portion of the sugar imported now was carried by Canadian vessels to New York and Boston.

"Recent English trade tables show that the entire amount of sugar refined in the three kingdoms, in 1875, was 1,821,647,632 lbs., giving employment to 5,174 persons. In Canada, we consume 94,000,000 lbs. annually, and, if this whole amount was refined in the Dominion, it would give employment to 266 persons; computing according to the ratio of labour to production, as shown by the English returns."

Now, the facts set forth in that extract, as to the smallness of the number of those employed in refining all the sugar Canada needed could easily be verified by the Minister of Finance. Three hundred were all that would be necessary. Was it worth while—would it help the labouring classes to take $1,000,000 out of their pockets for the purpose of employing but 300 persons, and increasing the already enormous fortunes of the few sugar refiners? The whole Dominion was not interested in that small industry. The people wanted cheap sugar, which the hon. gentlemen seemed determined they should not have. The drawback paid the American refiners on sugar exported to Canada must inure to the benefit of its people. But the Finance Minister would not allow that to continue; he said, practically, we want to swell the fortunes of the Montreal refiners at the expense of the people of Canada. The hon. gentleman from Cardwell had read several extracts from speeches made by leading statesmen in England, to show that the bounties given by France on sugar were injurious to the interests of England, or would prove injurious ultimately; but they all admitted that the effect was to make sugar cheaper in England. It was said here that sugar would not be cheaper under this system than it would be under this new tariff, but all the speeches quoted were to the effect that the bounty system made sugar cheaper. His hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), as well as his hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Gunn), had dealt most effectively with this subject. They seemed to understand what they were talking about, and, therefore, he would not go further into the matter. It was now said they must import their tea direct from China. He (Sir A. J. Smith) would assert that this was impossible. We could not shut our eyes to the fact that the United States lay to the south of us. We had only two ports—St. John and Halifax—open in the winter, every other port of the Dominion being closed during that season. How, then, could we trade with these distant countries? His hon. friend from King's (Mr. Domville) knew well that they could not navigate the St. Lawrence during the winter months, and that they could not do direct trade from the St. Lawrence ports with these distant countries. The voyage of a vessel would vary from 30 to 60 days, and, when she arrived at the mouth of the St. Lawrence in winter, she had to seek some other open port. We should mould our policy with due regard to the conditions of our country. The United States had the advantage of us in that respect. Every port there was open in the winter months, and why was it in the interests of the people of this country that two or three men in Montreal, or other cities, should have a monopoly of the tea trade? Was it not desirable to buy tea where we could get it the cheapest? When he looked at the condition of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, he saw that a great and serious injury would be inflicted by the passage of this resolution, which imposed a duty of 10 per cent. on tea imported from the United States. They sent vessels from the western coasts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, laden with the products of the country, potatoes, apples and fish, even fresh fish, to the United States, and they had tea brought back. The small trader in Nova Scotia would send apples or potatoes, and would get a return cargo of sugar, tea, or other things required for a country store. Were they going to prevent his doing his legitimate business, by saying he must buy from Montreal, which had monopolised the tea business? It was said that an importer could buy in England, and get tea in bond through the United States, and bring it to Montreal in bond, and pay the duty in this country. Would they allow this rich man, this wholesale dealer, who was doing a large business, to import his tea through the United States, in bond, and then tell the poorer people and small traders that they should not buy anywhere else? Why had not the trader, who went to Boston, or New York, a right to buy in bond, and take his tea home, if it would advance the interests of his business? It seemed to him that this provision was entirely in the interest of two or three men, who wanted a complete monopoly of the tea trade of the country. No Canadian would bring his tea direct from China. He would bring it into the United States and pass it through that country in bond, and that man would have 10 per cent. advantage over another who bought his tea in the United States, or anywhere else. He trusted the Finance Minister would give this matter his consideration, in order to see if he could not change it. It was no reason, because the suggestion came from the Opposition, that it should not be considered, as the provision was detrimental to the interests of the country. Now he came to the consideration of the lumber interest. This was confessedly one of the most important interests in this country, next to the farming interest. He would ask the Finance Minister where there was any Protection for the lumbermen. The lumbering interest was as much depressed as any interest in this country, and probably more. Unless some change took place, lumbermen must break down, and fail. Unless freights were low, it would be impossible to ship lumber at all, but the manufacturers of lumber did not get more than enough to pay for the labour, and the lumber itself was practically given away. They were giving a drawback to the shipping interest, which was as prosperous as the lumber interest, because ships went to every part of the world wherever they heard of prosperity. A ship was not confined to any country. She went abroad, and her flag floated on every sea. It was very different with the lumber interest. While the hon. gentleman was desirous of protecting the shipping interest—although he (Sir A. J. Smith) did not think any change was required; it ought not to complain, and the duty now was very trifling—they should not discriminate against and destroy the lumber interests. The latter gave employment to more men than the shipping interest did, and should have some protection. What protection had it? His hon. friend from Queen's county (Mr. King), than whom no one was more competent to make a calculation, had reckoned the very serious additional tax which this tariff would place on lumber. He (Sir A. J. Smith) could see no compensating advantages for this additional duty, which was struck at this important duty. There was nothing in the tariff which did not strike at the lumber interest. Lumbermen would have to cease their operations in consequence of this tariff, in which there were elements of destruction and decay of that industry which could not possibly be avoided. He had already stated that the Finance Minister had turned his back upon his own Province. His predictions had certainly been falsified. He had stated that a taxation of $2.75 per head was all that would be required for twenty-five years. His hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Burpee) had prepared with great skill a statement showing the effect of this tariff on the commerce of this country, showing that, if the importations were the same as those of last year, this tariff would increase the burdens of the people to the extent of $7,000,000 a year. He (Sir A. J. Smith) had not heard that statement challenged. He thought, therefore, it was fair to assume it was true; if not, he thought the Finance Minister would have challenged it before this.

MR. TILLEY: We will challenge it. There is plenty of time.

SIR A. J. SMITH: You are slow about it.

MR. TILLEY: I am not as slow as you. I have spoken twice, and this is your first speech.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he had been in hopes of getting light from the hon. gentleman ; but his first speech, instead of throwing light, seemed to throw darkness. The hon. gentleman had not thrown a great deal of light on the subject. He had not told the House, as he ought to have told them, how much money this tariff would realise.

MR. TILLEY : Yes.

SIR A. J. SMITH : How much ?

MR. TILLEY : $2,100,000.

SIR A. J. SMITH said that was what was estimated to get into the revenue ; but the hon. gentleman had not told the House how much it would take out of the people. The statements of his hon. friend from St. John had remained unchallenged, that the burdens on the people would amount to $7,000,000. They would accept the statement of the Finance Minister, that the operation of this tariff would put into the Treasury $2,100,000. That, then, would leave a balance of $4,900,000 to go into the hands of manufacturers. That would be the logical conclusion. He now desired to show the effect which this tariff would have on New Brunswick, because, though he owned they ought not to be governed by sectional feeling—

MR. TILLEY : Hear, hear.

SIR A. J. SMITH said, still, he would ask, did the Finance Minister want him, as a representative of New Brunswick, to consent to a tariff which discriminated against her own people. It was the duty of the representatives from the Province to endeavour to protect the interests of the Province. This tariff did operate injuriously to New Brunswick, and discriminated against that Province. The Finance Minister seemed to have shut his eyes to the true interests of New Brunswick. The amount of Customs duties collected in New Brunswick, last year, amounted to $1,448,000, which was equal to about $5 per head.

MR. TILLEY : Was it not more than that last year ? There was $400,000, or $500,000 from the St. John fire.

SIR A. J. SMITH said that no doubt the fire had made the amount rather abnormal, but the normal condition, under the late tariff, would be about $1,448,000.

SIR A. J. SMITH.

MR. TILLEY : No.

SIR A. J. SMITH said this would be equal to about $5 per head. Then the amount received from excise was $261,000, and from stamps $14,000, or about $1 per head, making a total of about $6 per head of the population. That was about the same amount as existed when the Finance Minister left office in 1873. He had admitted that the late Finance Minister was correct in his calculations as to the shrinkage in values.

MR. TILLEY : The average of Custom and Excise for 1876-77, was $1,321,464.

SIR A. J. SMITH : What was it last year ?

MR. TILLEY : Last year was the year of the fire.

SIR A. J. SMITH : But the hon. member said the whole amount of taxation would be only $2.75 per capita.

MR. TILLEY : Yes, I remember that.

SIR A. J. SMITH said the hon. gentleman had exceeded that in any case. The least increased cost under the present tariff, exclusive of the tax on coal and flour, would be $806,000. He would like to know if the Finance Minister was prepared to controvert these figures ? Suppose the price of coal and flour was not augmented, there would still be an additional cost to the Province of New Brunswick. The population of New Brunswick being about 300,000, this would amount to upwards of $3 per head under the new tariff.

MR. TILLEY : Hear, hear.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he would like the Finance Minister to controvert that if he could. If the importations were the same as those of last year, the increase would be $3 per head, making the total taxation from $8 to $9 per head on the population of New Brunswick. That was a matter which deserved the most careful consideration of the Government. He (Sir A. J. Smith) felt it his duty to protest, on behalf of the people of New Brunswick, against this tariff, as specially injurious to them. He believed it would be an incubus on the whole Dominion. He believed it would be inimical to the interests of the Dominion. Hon. gentlemen deprecated sectionalism, though, he thought, they ought to regard the interests of the different Provinces in preparing a tariff. They were not to prepare a tariff for the interests of Ontario, if they were inimical to those of New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. He considered they must have regard to the interests of the whole Dominion, because there were great diversities of climate, soil and resources. There were great geographical differences, which made it necessary to consider the interests of various portions of the Dominion. He believed this tariff would have the effect of disturbing the domestic harmony which existed between the different Provinces, and which it was most desirable to promote as far as possible. If they created a bad feeling in one Province, it must injuriously affect the interests of the whole Dominion. More than that, though the idea seemed to be scoffed at by the other side, he believed the tendency of the tariff would be to alienate and estrange, commercially and politically, this country from the Mother Country. They knew what the policy of the Empire was. They saw from the tone of the papers, the various indications in the press of England, that much dissatisfaction was felt towards this Government and the people, by the recent imposition of this policy. These resolutions provided that the United States, whenever they showed a disposition to reciprocate, on certain articles mentioned in the free list—and he might remark that he thought the article of free-stone should be included in that list—might do so. They had not made any provision in regard to England. England now received these goods free, but no consideration had been shown for England. It was true we had a right to regulate our own fiscal affairs, and it did not seem to be disputed in England, that we had a right to adopt such a course as would best protect our interests. But it seemed to him only fair that, as an integral part of the Empire, we should have some regard for, and consult, as far as was consistent with our own interests, the policy of the Empire. They knew that the feeling of England was against this tariff. Why should we discriminate against England? Would the Finance Minister say that this tariff did not discriminate against England?

MR. TILLEY: Yes, I do.

SIR A. J. SMITH said the statistics showed that, while this tariff averaged 7 per cent. on our whole imports from the United States, it averaged 10 $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. on English goods. The hon. gentleman included in his estimate \$14,000,000 of grains and flour exported, which simply passed through Canada in transitu. His impression was, in conclusion, that the effect of the tariff would tend to bring about ultimately a separation between the two countries.

MR. TILLEY said he found, by the arrangement made, that the House was to adjourn at six o'clock, but he could not allow this matter to pass without making some remarks before adjournment. His hon. friend referred to the fact that he expected him (Mr. Tilley) to refute some statements as to the operation of the tariff, especially in the Province of New Brunswick. He purposed doing that on the next opportunity, but he could not allow this to pass without promptly, and at once, meeting some of the statements made by his hon. friend which were of a personal character. And first, with reference to his appointment as Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick. That appointment, the hon. gentleman said, was of a questionable character, and one of which he could not approve. A year ago, or more, statements were made by members of this House relative to that appointment, which put the matter unfairly and unjustly before the country with reference to his (Mr. Tilley's) position; and he had applied to the then Governor-General to relieve him of his oath of office, so far as it related to that matter, so that he might, at the first fitting opportunity, meet the accusations made. That consent he had obtained, and he was here to state exactly what took place. On his arrival in Halifax in 1873 from England, where he had been to negotiate a loan, he received a telegram from the leader of the Government, urging him to come to Ottawa at once without delay, and by express, if necessary. There were circumstances of a domestic character which detained him. A daughter of his was to be married, at St. Andrew's, on the Tuesday, and he said he would go to St. Andrew's on the Tuesday evening, would then take express, and be at Ottawa as soon as possible. On the Thursday afternoon, on his arrival at Ottawa, he found that Parliament had assembled, and had adjourned until the Monday following. He proceeded at once to the Privy Council Chamber, and there found his colleagues in session; and, after congratulations on his return, and reference to the negotiations which he had concluded, the leader of the Government said: "We were very near making you Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick in your absence." Before his departure for England, the leader of the Government, Mr. Mitchell and himself had talked about a gentleman who was to be nominated to the Lieutenant-Governorship of New Brunswick, as likely to be acceptable. He (Mr. Tilley) was not the person nominated, and was not referred to at all in the matter, and the leader of the Government said: "The appointment will not be made till you return, and can stand until then." The morning after his return he waited on the Governor-General, and, after giving him a report of the result of his mission, he (Mr. Tilley) referred to the fact that, in his absence, his colleagues had recommended his appointment as Lieutenant-Governor, and added: "Your Excellency, the circumstances which led to the recommendation no longer existing, I have no intention whatever of accepting that position." That was the language used by him, distinctly and unreservedly.

SIR A. J. SMITH: Did that destroy the Order in Council?

MR. TILLEY said he hoped the hon. gentleman would preserve his soul in patience. He (Sir A. J. Smith) had said that he (Mr. Tilley) had made a speech in the House on the 5th of November, when he said he would go down with the Government. He did not make the speech on that day. That was the day on which the leader of the Government announced that the Ministry had resigned. A few days before, however, he did make such a speech, and when the proposition came up in Council before that, in reference to the appointment of a Lieutenant-Governor, he (Mr. Tilley), with a majority of the Council, took ground against that appointment being made, and, when he made the speech, he had no expectation—nothing to justify him in expecting that he would be appointed if the Government were defeated. He made that speech, believing he would go down with them.

SIR A. J. SMITH: There is no other Order in Council.

MR. TILLEY said never mind about the Order in Council; that was made on the 22nd of October, when he was not here. On the morning of the 6th November, the leader of the Government came into the Council and said he had been in communication with the Governor-General, in reference to the appointment of Lieutenant-Governors, and that His Excellency had said that it was customary in England, on the retirement of a Ministry, to make appointments to fill vacancies, and he was prepared to take the Premier's recommendation in reference to the Lieutenant-Governors. And then, for the first time, it was proposed by Sir John A. Macdonald, in his presence, that he (Mr. Tilley) should be appointed, and for reasons stated, and he was amazed. His family were amazed at the offer being made, as no such appointment had been anticipated. Was it likely that, if he had anticipated anything of the kind, he would have brought his family here a week after the appointment was said to have been made? His hon. friend from Westmoreland had suggested to him that he would like him to take the position. He (Mr. Tilley) suggested to him that he should take the Governorship, but the hon. gentleman (Sir A. J. Smith) had advised him to take it, and had said that his appointment would be most acceptable to the people of the Province of New Brunswick.

SIR A. J. SMITH: I stated that I was very glad to see the Finance Minister Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick and that, had he not been appointed, I would have felt pleasure in recommending the appointment.

MR. TILLEY: Yes; and, in the city of St. John, at a public dinner, tendered by his old constituents, he congratulated him (Mr. Tilley), and said he only regretted he had not the privilege of nominating him. If he (Mr. Tilley) had been guilty of any dishonourable act, would his hon. friend have expressed regret that he had not had the honour of appointing him? He (Mr. Tilley) said here, as a man having some reputation for veracity, that he was not aware of the matter until the morning of the 6th November, when it was proposed by his right hon. friend that, on account of his long services to his Province and the Dominion, the Government should confer on him this mark of recognition, feeling satisfied the appointment would be acceptable to the country and the Province of New Brunswick. The proposition was made to the Governor-General, who expressed his willingness to make the appointment. He would appeal to his hon. friend to say whether this statement was true or not. Notwithstanding that, the hon. member for Charlotte, when speaking of flattery being dumped by cartloads on him (Mr. Tilley) as Finance Minister, repeated the charge, but it did not affect him any more than did the false assertions made against him during the past thirty years, as a public man, and which had fallen harmless at his feet, because they had no foundation in truth. What did he find here? Even the home organ of the leader of the Opposition, the Sarnia Observer, stated, a few days since, and the statements were copied in the Free Press, of this city:

"So it appears that Mr. Tilley, the immaculate, not only sat and voted in Parliament after he had been appointed Lieutenant-Governor, but drew pay for both services; that is, he drew his salary and indemnity as a Minister of the Crown and a member of Parliament up to the 5th November, and he drew salary as Lieutenant-Governor, at $50 per day, from the date of his appointment, 22nd October. It was only fourteen days, of course, but it netted the snug little sum of $700. We fear there is a good deal of the 'Heathen Chinese' about Mr. Tilley's child-like innocence."

Here was an assertion that he gave a vote after accepting the position, which he utterly denied, and received payment in a double capacity. The appointment was offered to him the morning of the 6th. He took time to consider it. He did not dream of the appointment. In 1872, the leader of the Government offered him the Governorship of British Columbia, when he (Mr. Tilley) explained the difficulties in the way, and said he had no ambition in that direction. It was after the leader of the Government had been in communication with His Excellency the Governor-General, on the morning of the 6th November, that he made this offer, which he (Mr. Tilley) accepted, and he thanked his hon. friend for saying that, in his capacity as Lieutenant-Governor, he had discharged his duties satisfactorily, and that everything went on smoothly. He (Sir A. J. Smith) said the way in which he (Mr. Tilley) entered the Government House was unfortunate, and the way in which he left it was equally unfortunate; that he had attended a public meeting while he was Lieutenant-Governor, and made a violent party speech.

SIR A. J. SMITH: The papers said so.

MR. TILLEY said the statement was not true. He had occasion to visit St. John on business frequently, as he had been entrusted with the Mayor of the city and the President of the Chamber of Commerce, with the distribution of the money contributed by Liverpool and London, and other cities, to alleviate the distress in St. John after the fire. At the ferry floats on the west side of the city, he met two gentlemen on one of those visits, who said they were a deputation appointed to wait on him with a requisition to accept a nomination as candidate for the city. They asked him where he would meet them, and he invited them to accompany him to the hotel where he was going at the time. When they came there, they said that several of the gentlemen who had signed that requisition wished to be present, that his room in the hotel was hardly large enough, and proposed that they should go to a room in Prince William-street. They there read the requisition, and he replied that, while he had no desire to re-enter public life, still, when a requisition—signed by over a thousand of the electors of St. John, many of them his old supporters, but some of them who had been his opponents for a lifetime—was made him, he did not feel himself at liberty to decline; but, he said to them: You see the position in which I am placed, that I am still Lieutenant-Governor; you cannot expect me to make any remarks, and, until I shall have communicated with the Governor-General, I must refrain from offering any remarks. He then withdrew from the meeting, without having said a single word with reference to the late Administration, or upon any public question whatever. He then communicated with the Governor-General. Some little delay took place owing to the Governor-General being down the Saguenay, but, on his return to Quebec, he immediately wrote him accepting his resignation. It was all important that he (Mr. Tilley) should have then entered the contest, but he held himself perfectly aloof until he had the acceptance of his resignation from the Governor-General. Then he did enter into the contest. Never had he been in a contest in any election he had ever run which was more consistent with the laws of the land than that election, and, in obtaining nine of a majority, it was in spite of all the influences of the Government that could be brought to bear to defeat him. Even the leader of the Opposition and the late Minister of Finance came down to accomplish the work, but failed.

MR. MACKENZIE: You do not object to that?

MR. TILLEY said the hon. gentleman had referred to the speech which he made in the Mechanics' Institute, when he (Mr. Tilley) referred to the fact that he might have remained in Government House, and received the $45,000 for the five years, but he declined to do that, and accepted the nomination. Now, the hon. gentleman said that he (Mr. Tilley) had no justification for making that statement.

SIR A. J. SMITH: I do not know of any myself.

MR. TILLEY said all he could say, in the first place, was that a gentleman, a Senator, a friend of the Government, in intimate accord with them, and a brother-in-law of a member of the Government, came to him and stated most distinctly and emphatically, that it was only necessary, and he gave him to understand that he had authority for saying so, for him (Mr. Tilley) to say he would accept the position for another term, and it would be formally offered him for another five years. He need not refer, because it would only destroy, perhaps, the effect of what he was going to say, to the various rumours spread by members of the House of Representatives for the Province, that he was to be offered another term, and Mr. King was to be offered a judgeship, and, by getting them out of the way, New Brunswick would be safe to the Government. He (Mr. Tilley) stated to the gentleman who made this proposal, that he admitted the position he occupied was a great relief to him from the cares and anxieties of public life, after a quarter of a century's anxious turmoil and labour, he believed in the interests of the country, though there were times when the country was against him; but, as it had been then, so it would be now. Those who opposed this tariff now would twelve months hence be in favour of it, as they had been opposed to Confederation in 1864, but afterwards agreed to it. If they went to the election in another twelve months, they would find that, with all the interests benefitted, the country would rise up and declare for this policy, and instead of there being five New Brunswick supporters of the Government, he doubted whether there would be five altogether in opposition to it. He said to the gentleman referred to, that he had enjoyed this position very much, that he was now sixty years of age, and had no desire to re-enter public life, but there were these difficulties. Were he in perfect accord with the Government, did he believe in their policy, he could not be charged with accepting the position for the purpose of closing his mouth. More than that, he wanted to be free. His policy had been arraigned by his successor throughout the length and breadth of the land, his position as a Lieutenant-Governor had been misrepresented, and, though he did not desire to enter Parliament, he wished to be a free man that he might go over his Province and instruct the people in what he considered to be their interest. He wanted to be free to defend the true policy and interest of the country. He was surprised at the statement made by the hon.

MR. TILLEY.

member for Westmoreland at a picnic meeting held at Salisbury, in reference to the Governorship, that he (Mr. Tilley) had betrayed confidence in giving publicity to a private communication in the statement he had made. He made no reference to that communication whatever, and, the hon. member having referred to a part of that letter, if he would take off the seal of secrecy on the balance of it, he (Mr. Tilley) could more clearly put his position before the country to-day.

SIR A. J. SMITH: I am satisfied to take it off. Let us see the letters.

MR. TILLEY said he had not the letters, but the hon. gentleman would not deny the statement he was going to make. The hon. member wrote him (Mr. Tilley) that he was anxious to see him, and intended calling at Fredericton, had he not been detained at the Fishery Commission in Halifax, and that he wished to know his views.

SIR A. J. SMITH: Had you not better wait and get the letter?

MR. TILLEY: The hon. member wanted to know, in that letter, what were my views in reference to a second term. He said he believed that my appointment would be acceptable to the people generally.

SIR A. J. SMITH: I did.

MR. TILLEY said the hon. gentleman, after referring to some domestic matters on this subject, said "Do not answer me unless you desire to do so, but it is important before Christmas that I should know what your views are on the subject. Write me before that time, if you write at all. He did not write an answer until the gentleman to whom he previously referred came to him at his house a few days before Christmas. He told him that he had made up his mind he could not accept the position. He then sat down, and in almost the same language which he used at the meeting,—perhaps that was the reason the hon. gentleman supposed he had referred to his communication,—he wrote to the hon. gentleman, declining the offer. But the hon. gentleman went further in his letter. He spoke about the chances of the election, that Quebec would certainly be carried in favour of the then Administration. He then pointed out how anxious he would be to have him (Mr. Tilley) as a colleague and a supporter; that it would not be long before he (Mr. Tilley) would be in the Ministry, because the Liberal party would be sustained. Further than that, Mr. James Dunn, as respectable a man as lived in this Dominion, asked him for an interview, which he (Mr. Tilley) gave him. He said he had been in communication with the Ministers of Customs and Marine and Fisheries, when recently at Ottawa, and told him, as a friend, that he was anxious he should remain where he was, that there would be a hard fight, and money spent against him, and that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Hon. Mr. Burpee had authorised him to come to him (Mr. Tilley), and say that, if he would accept a second term, they would be glad to give it to him. He called the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact after he had made the picnic speech, and, in his letters in answer, he said that he had had some communication with Mr. Dunn, but that it was confidential.

SIR A. J. SMITH: Read the letter.

MR. TILLEY said, with all these statements, he declined to accept the position, and gave both gentlemen his answer. He thought he was sufficiently justified, under these circumstances, in saying that, if he had desired to remain in that position for another five years, he could have done so. It was said by the hon. member for Northumberland that this was said to be his (Mr. Tilley's) last effort. Did he understand him to say it was the last Parliamentary effort he should make. If it was, he felt confident that not only would it retain the support of the present Parliament, but of the country throughout. His hon. friend said no doubt he had letters from his constituency against his policy. He had not received three letters against it. He found, from one end of the Dominion to the other, an uprising of the people in its favour and a restoration of confidence. They might take up the public press, on both sides, and they would find that everywhere new industries were growing up, and new energy, life and vitality being manifested. If it should be his last act, he felt the people would sustain him and say it was worthy of a life-long devotion to this country, because it produced the most beneficial results. He proposed going on to show why he believed that, to show why the fears that had been entertained here with reference to his own Province, and the effect of this tariff, were groundless, and that the statements in reference to the effect of the Union of his Province with this Confederation, had no foundation; though he might be open to the same imputation as in 1872, when there were men who said "That is the man you want to have as a representative of New Brunswick, who tells the people the Province has more than justice, and thus deprives himself of demanding further amounts from the Dominion." When he undertook to vindicate his character, no doubt the same line of argument would be adopted now as was adopted then; but he would risk it, because his colleagues would not deny to New Brunswick a single thing that she was honestly entitled to.

SIR A. J. SMITH: Mr. Speaker—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Adjourn.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Six o'clock.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Motion for the adjournment of the House (Sir John A. Macdonald), with leave of the House, withdrawn.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he had removed the seal of secrecy from the letter which he had written to the hon. the Minister of Finance, on the condition that the hon. gentleman should produce the letter, but the hon. gentleman, instead of consenting to that proposition, went on to give his own version of it. This was all he (Sir A. J. Smith) wanted to say on that point. He had not consented to the hon. gentleman giving his own version of the letter, and it was only fair and reasonable that the letter should be produced. Mr. Dunn, who had been referred to by the hon. the Minister of Finance, was a very respectable resident of St. John, whom he recollected having been in his office. He believed that Mr. Burpee was also present. Mr. Dunn was, and had always been, a strong personal friend of the hon. the Finance Minister, and had himself introduced the subject. He seemed extremely anxious that the hon. the Finance Minister should be re-appointed to the position of Lieutenant-Governor, and took a great interest in the matter, but certainly he had never been authorised to state to the hon. gentleman that he could have the re-appointment. They could not distribute patronage in this way. Mr. Dunn might have inferred, he did not deny, from the conversation which then passed between them, that, if Mr. Tilley expressed a wish to be re-appointed, the Government might consider it, and might do so favourably. This was his recollection of the matter. Mr. Dunn had broached the subject, and had expressed a great deal of interest in seeing Mr. Tilley continue in the position he occupied at the time, as he administered the affairs of the Province to the entire satisfaction of the people. That was his recollection of the conversation, and he thought Mr. Dunn would confirm what he (Sir A. J. Smith) said in regard to it. He had no authority for making any such communication, and the House would see that it could not be done. They could not distribute patronage in such a way. Such a communication could only come through the First Minister, and not otherwise. This was the whole of the conversation, according to his recollection.

MR. TILLEY said he did not understand that the hon. gentleman had made any condition. He recollected that the hon. gentleman (Sir A. J. Smith) had asked him, in the letter referred to, to destroy the correspondence, but he did not think he had done so. He would search for the correspondence, and, if he found it, would be very happy to submit it. It was true that Mr. Dunn was a personal friend, but he was opposed to him politically during the late election. Mr. Dunn had come to him, and the proposition was unsought on his (Mr. Tilley's) part. Some time after he had written his answer to the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith), Mr. Dunn came to him, speaking as if he had been deputed with authority, and everything of that kind. There was no hesitation or reservation whatever, in reference to the authority he had; but the matter did not depend on that point. He would search among his correspondence, and he thought that he might find the letter, which, if found, he would be very happy to submit.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he thought that he had made in the letter a statement which would not be denied by the Finance Minister as to the contents of the letter. He had stated that he had no authority from Mr. Mackenzie or any other person to write it.

MR. TILLEY: You said so with respect to Mr. Mackenzie.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he thought he had stated distinctly that nobody knew what he had written.

MR. TILLEY: No.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he thought he stated also that he desired to aid Mr. Tilley in reference to a domestic matter, which it was not necessary to refer to. He stated also that, unless he (Mr. Tilley) signified it was his desire to have a second term, he should treat the matter as never having been written.

MR. TILLEY: That is it.

SIR A. J. SMITH said it was written under the strictest injunctions to secrecy and confidence on these two points. He thought he had a copy of the correspondence at home. He had no authority whatever to write, but wrote on his own responsibility. He made no offer to him (Mr. Tilley) whatever. He only desired to know what his wishes were in regard to the second appointment, and, if he did not desire the second appointment, he was to destroy the correspondence. He thought he stated that the hon. gentleman was on the wrong side of politics.

MR. TILLEY: That is quite true.

MR. TILLEY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

House adjourned at Tea minutes after Eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 15th April, 1879.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CENSUS AND STATISTICS BILL.

[BILL 67.]

(Mr. Pope, Compton.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

Resolutions on the subject of Census and Statistics, reported from Committee of the Whole (March 27th), read the second time and agreed to, and referred to Committee of the Whole on Bill 67.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the Bill (No. 67).

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked in what respect this Bill differed from the Bill of 1869-70.

MR. POPE (Compton) said that no alterations had been made in regard to the taking of the census. The Bill had been extended by the addition of several clauses relating to the collection of vital and other statistics.

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked why the Government asked for power to proceed with this work two years in advance.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, ten years ago, when the last measure was passed, Mr. Dunkin was Minister of Justice. They found that, between the time that Act was passed and the opening of 1871, when it was put in operation, it was a very hurried and complicated matter making the necessary preparations. Then, everything having to be done in a hurry, it was found it entailed additional expense. It was supposed that the Department of Agriculture, with the experience they had had, by taking plenty of time, with the assistance of two or three additional clerks, would be able to prepare the schedules and forms so as to have them all ready to start next spring. This measure would not entail much additional expense, because, if the hon. gentleman would look at the Estimates, he would find that they only asked for $5,000.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he would suggest that the details of the measure should be submitted to the House next spring, because some hon. members might be able to make some very valuable suggestions in regard to it.

MR. POPE (Compton), said that that was their intention, as they desired to have the most complete census that could be obtained. There was a difference between taking the census in this country and England; there they had a trained statistical staff composed of permanent officers. The Registrar-General had charge of it. There were 672 superintendents, and 2,197 permanent officers. These people understood their business, and were looking continually at the statistical branch. We had nothing of the kind here, almost every officer we appointed had to be educated to his work, and it was for the purpose of educating the staff for this work that the Bill had been introduced this Session.

MR. MILLS said, from the statement of the First Minister, it appeared that legislation was not absolutely necessary this Session, and that the Minister of Agriculture would be prepared to submit a better measure, if he took more time to consider what should be done. There was no necessary connection between the measure now before the House, and the objects aimed at as stated by the hon. the First Minister.

Section agreed to.

On section 29,

MR. ANGLIN said this clause authorised the Government to establish a new system for the collection of vital, criminal and other statistics. Such a measure had often been proposed in previous years, but the House had always refused to adopt it. He understood this clause to authorise the Government to establish a permanent system of collecting vital, criminal and other statistics at all times. He desired that the House should be put in possession of fuller information as to the scope of this clause, and the probable cost it would involve.

MR. MILLS said this measure was an entirely different thing from the ordinary provisions for taking the census. He desired to know more particularly what the Government aimed at, what kind of machinery they intended to employ, the duties of the officers, and the probable cost. The House ought not to abdicate its functions altogether in this matter, and transfer them to the Minister of Agriculture.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. member for Gloucester was scarcely correct in stating that this House had refused to deal with this question on former occasions. The subject had been discussed from time to time, but there had never been a vote upon it. There had always been a common accord that it was very desirable to have some improvement in our collection of statistics. The Union Act relegated this subject to the Dominion Parliament, and difficulties had arisen in the consideration of this subject, from the fact that in some Provinces organisations, more or less perfect, existed, having the same object in view. Clause 28 of this Bill provided for utilising any such organisation or system as far as might be by co-operation between the two Governments. This was but a tentative measure. It was not proposed to put it at once into operation; but it provided for the means of taking up the question and maturing it. No action could be taken until a vote of money was made for the purpose. No new powers were conferred on the Department of Agriculture. But, inasmuch as they were obliged to have an elaborate scheme for taking the ordinary census, it was thought desirable to engraft upon it whatever other means might exist, in order to enlarge the amount of information in connection with the country's statistics.

MR. ANGLIN said he found, by this clause, that they were providing for the establishment of a permanent bureau of statistics, with all the necessary officers, and that without knowing what was likely to be the extent of the machinery or the cost. It had always been urged against a measure of this kind that it would cost a great deal more than the statistics would be worth. The attempt to establish this bureau should not be made by attaching a few clauses to a Bill of an entirely different character. He observed that subsequent clauses provided for the appointment of officers for this extra work. This was a matter of such importance that the House ought to pause before passing this Bill. The House should not be asked to pass a measure of this kind, and in such a way, without such ample information as it was possible for the Minister to procure as to the probable extent of the work, and its cost.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was generally agreed that it was very desirable to have some statistical information on many subjects oftener than once in ten years. As a full set of officers and machinery would have to be provided for taking the census of 1881, the Government thought it was a proper time to utilise the same officers in collecting vital, criminal, and other statistics for that year. The same machinery would do at a less expense than by any separate and distinct procedure in the way of collecting this kind of statistics; the same body of men would be available at very little additional cost. The body of statistics in 1881 would form the basis of a complete census. They would start from that point, and then Parliament, year after year, would grant such sums of money as might be necessary, in order to continue the collection of those statistics. Statistics, to be of any real value, should be collected annually. This matter would be completely under the control of the House hereafter.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he agreed that it was very desirable to obtain such statistics as had been referred to; but he saw, on examining the latter clauses of the Bill, that it virtually created a bureau of statistics, which should collect information every year, and certainly clauses 25, 26 and 31 gave full power, apparently, and made it the duty of the Minister to establish a bureau of statistics. All they wanted to know was the probable extent and cost of that service. No one could deny its importance, which he had never heard anybody gainsay. But, heretofore, they had always experienced the conviction that apart from certain constitutional difficulties in the way of this work, it would involve an additional expenditure of, perhaps, $200,000 or $300,000. Now, it was not desirable they should obtain statistics unless they were reasonably accurate. He would like to know from the hon. the Minister of Agriculture if he had calculated, not what the expense would be in the first instance, but what it might be annually.

MR. POPE (Compton) said he had, at one time, gone into the subject fully, and considered the cost of those statistics. But the Bill before the House enabled the Government to enter into an arrangement with Provinces, individuals, or corporations, for the obtainment of such information.

AN HON. MEMBER: It goes beyond that.

MR. POPE said he did not expect this Bill to prove a final and satisfactory measure. But he did think it important that, in taking the census, they should have power to utilize those agencies, if thought best. They might receive power to collect statistics, Ministers having to come down to the House for a vote, when all information could be given as to the object and probable expense. He hoped the work would be done for much less than some supposed. The importance of correct information, with regard to the resources and important interests of the country, could not be over-estimated. This was nothing more or less than national stock-taking, and giving information that every man in and out of the country ought to have, with respect to the public health, and every matter affecting the public interest. He now, however, only asked power, should it be thought advisable, after the House was prorogued, to make such arrangements with corporations and Provinces as was contemplated. This measure was intended as the commencement of a system of correct statistics.

MR. HOLTON said it was quite obvious that this subject was before the House for the first time, and, considering its importance, he thought it would be a mistake to pass those clauses through the Committee of the Whole that day. He thought they had better have a little time to consider those clauses in a full House, after they had received some attention. It was proposed to create a new Department.

MR. ANGLIN said that it was proposed to take power to make regulations, appoint officers, and confer the amplest powers on them for the objects in view. They really did not know how much power they should be conferring, which fact was a strong objection to a measure of that kind. He was very much opposed to clothing the Governor in Council with power of legislation in the extraordinary way now proposed. They had had too much of that already. They ought to define and limit such powers strictly and clearly in all cases. This Bill being new, they should have time to give it the consideration to which it was entitled. They were asked to pass a Bill, that, in a few clauses, would enable the Governor in Council, to create a system with regard to which the House had the very vaguest idea. If the hon. the Minister of Agriculture had but a few simple objects in view, let him express them in the simplest language, and hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side would meet him in a frank and liberal spirit.

MR. CARTWRIGHT called attention to clause 33, prescribing a penalty of $200 for a breach of the Act. There was scarcely any conceivable subject of investigation, which would not come under the head of some special statistical investigation, and, although he did not think the powers of the Bill would be much abused, still such circumstance was possible. The Government knew that to ask for information respecting certain businesses and trades of private importance would affect the liberty of the subject; and, under this Bill, all manner of investigations could be ordered, and heavy penalties inflicted, simply by Order of the Governor in Council, in any case of disobedience. That power, although granted under special cases, was one about which Parliament ought to be very jealous. He hoped the Government would consider carefully the danger of its abuse in certain cases. The Finance Minister might want information as to certain facts which Parliament might not be willing to grant him till he had fully explained his designs.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. member for Gloucester might have been right in objecting to extensive powers being given to the Governor in Council. Unfortunately, for the last five years, from his being Speaker, he had had no opportunity of raising the objection; for he would find, in almost every Statute passed by the late Administration, those powers taken to a greater degree than by any Government for ten years before. He thought that his hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) could not well ask for the postponement of business, because he had not read the Bill, which came from the Senate. Anybody could see from its title that it went further than an ordinary census measure. With regard to clause 33, he did not think there was any danger of information being asked, or of parties being punished unjustly. If they did not think the information asked came fairly within the line of ordinary statistics, they need not answer; but punishment was contemplated for false information. If a party chose to give any, he should speak correctly and truthfully. The penalty, however, might be reduced and those clauses be allowed to go through Committee with the right of discussion afterwards.

MR. MILLS said that the Government were not in possession of information to justify the legislation proposed. It seemed really that the probable expense would exceed any benefit desirable from that scheme. The Bill proposed more than the House had any legal or constitutional authority to accomplish. They ought not to authorise the creation of a machinery to deal directly with that particular subject as might be done under that Bill. If the hon. gentleman in charge of it were to confine its operation to a single year, his proposition would be more reasonable; but he proposed, without giving the House sufficient notice, to establish a permanent system.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 31.]

(Mr. Baby.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. ANGLIN asked if, where the note was drawn on stamped paper which was not of sufficient value, the defect could be cured by the use of an additional stamp.

MR. BABY said that objection was met with in the way mentioned. He proposed making an amendment in the 5th line, 3rd page, by striking out after the words "any cheque," the words "upon any chartered bank." In St. John, Halifax, and different parts of Upper Canada, private bankers were in the habit of using cheques, and, therefore, it was advisable to remove the restrictive words.

On section 8,

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) said he would like to amend this clause by inserting the words "promissory note." The exception made in favour of bills of exchange should be extended to promissory notes drawn out of Canada, and payable out of Canada. It frequently happened that large promissory notes were made in New York, payable, for instance, at Detroit, and these notes finding their way to banks in Canada, were negotiated and passed on for collection. That was precisely the case of a bill of exchange, and notes should be exempted equally with bills of exchange, or else the clause should be struck out altogether.

MR. PLUMB asked how the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockburn) would deal with bills of exchange made outside the country by persons who had no stamps, and could not procure them.

MR. COCKBURN said bills were not collectable here at all. A bill drawn on New York, and payable, for instance, at Detroit, might come into the hands of a customer in Ottawa, and, if negotiated at a bank here, the bill was exempt from this tax. He thought promissory notes should stand on the same footing.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said a bill of exchange, drawn in the United States and payable there, might be accepted in Canada, and, therefore, it might be traded, and, in that case, it would be governed according to the laws of the country in which acceptance took place. It would be different with a promissory note. A promissory note made in the United States and paid there, although it might be assumed here, would be dealt with according to the law of the country in which it was made payable.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said the hon. member for West Northumberland referred to a note made payable in Canada, although drawn out of Canada; this was provided for in section 14. If it was drawn out of Canada, and made payable out of Canada, he did not see what we had to do with it, but, if it was generally made payable, then it might be sued for in this country. For instance, he might be going through this country, and then he might be sued on it while passing.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) said his amendment had reference to notes drawn out of Canada and paid out of Canada, whereas section 14 had reference to double duties, where, in the first instance, the note had not been properly stamped. The case of a promissory note very frequently occurred here, and the banks were at a loss to know whether the same rule was to apply to promissory notes as to bills of exchange? Why make a difference? If the hon. gentleman wished a bill of exchange payable out of Canada to be exempted from duty, surely the same law should apply to a promissory note.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said a promissory note was only an inland bill of exchange. He could not advise the acceptance of the amendment, for the reason that it would conflict with another clause of the Act. The maker of a promissory note stood exactly in law in the same position as the maker of a bill of exchange. The relations of the two were identical. In fact the acceptor was the first promissor on the obligation. Under section 4, a bill of exchange made in New York, made payable there and accepted in Canada, was liable to stamps. The only way our laws could affect a promissory note made in the United States, was this: If the maker in the United States protested the Bill, and was in Canada where it became due, the note might be enforced in our Courts. He need not say that in such a case the absence of a stamp would not invalidate the contract.

MR. MILLS said a case happened some years ago in England, in a suit brought upon a note made in Dublin, when the English law did not extend to Ireland. A note made in Ireland, upon which there was no stamp, was sued in Westminster. The objection taken to it was that it was not stamped as required by the law, but it was held that, since this note was made abroad, was payable abroad, and since all the parties had come within the jurisdiction of the Court, the note might be properly collected in England, and stamps were not necessary. He thought that rule should be followed here, or else this section 8 ought to be entirely expunged from the Bill altogether.

[BILL 58.]

(Mr. Tupper.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. TUPPER said that a Bill had been passed for the purpose of transferring the Pictou Branch of the Government Railway to certain parties, in order to its extension eastward. Under the power given by the Act to the Government, an arrangement was made with a railway company to have the railroad prolonged as far east as the Gut of Canso, and for a ferry across that stream. The work was carried on under a contract made between the Government of Nova Scotia and a company called, he thought, the Cape Breton Railway Company. A difficulty arose between the Government of Nova Scotia and the contractors, in consequence of some alleged informality or illegality in the position of the company, in relation to their not having complied with the terms of incorporation. Although the matter was in controversy, a very serious difficulty presented itself in carrying out the arrangement between the Government of Nova Scotia and the railway company. The result was that negotiations took place between them and the Government at Ottawa for the purpose of adjusting that difference. One of the difficulties was that the Government of Nova Scotia claimed that the company had no legal status, and that, if they made them payments under the agreement made with their predecessors, they would not be able to exact the conditions of those payments. It was, therefore, proposed that an Act should pass the Legislature of Nova Scotia, for the purpose of removing all doubt as to the legality of the company's position, and of giving greater security than otherwise could be obtained; it was proposed an Act should pass here amending the Act under which the Pictou Branch was transferred to the Company constructing the Eastern Extension Railway. The result was this Bill was founded upon a tripartite agreement between the Company, the Government of Nova Scotia and the Dominion Government. The effect of the Bill passed in the Legislature of Nova Scotia, and which was in conformity with the agreement entered into between the three parties, and which the present Bill proposed to carry out, was this: all the legal and technical difficulties were removed, so far as the legality of the position of the Eastern Extension Railway Company was concerned, and greater security was given the public, because it substituted this Act for that under which the transfer of the Pictou Branch to the Government of Nova Scotia took place. There was no provision for the continued operation of the road under the Bill as it stood, or under the agreement, and this Bill provided that in case of the Company's failure to operate the road, it should revert to the Government of Nova Scotia; and in case of their failure to operate the road, the whole property of the Eastern Extension as well as the Pictou Branch, should revert to the Dominion Government. The Bill substantially gave effect to the Act which passed the House on a previous occasion, and to the contracts the Government made under that agreement.

MR. MACKENZIE said he would ask the hon. gentleman not to proceed with the Bill in Committee to-night. He thought it was unfortunate that in the 9th section there was practically an admission of some claim for compensation, because of the deterioration of the road since the Act was passed. That clause ought not to be there. It said, no doubt, that that should not be held to admit or waive the claim. The Company could not possibly claim anything under the previous Act, which provided that they were to obtain possession after the performance of certain conditions, when they had not been performed. They ought not, in this negative manner, to admit the possibility of any claim. He had declined absolutely to give them possession of the road till the terms were complied with, the railway stock provided, and security given, that the road would be kept open. He thought it would be far better that that clause should be struck out, for it enabled them to say that the Government and the House must have had it in contemplation to consider some sort of claim on that ground. Then he did not like the provision that, under certain circumstances, the road should revert to the Nova Scotia Government, and under certain others, from the Nova Scotia Government to the Dominion Government. He was afraid, with that provision, it was tolerably certain that a road would be put into the hands of the Dominion Government that had never paid, and was not likely to pay till a distant day. One object of the late Government in the Act passed was this: it was considered that it was not desirable that the Government should retain any but the great trunk road leading to Halifax—that all the branch roads should be in the possession of independent companies, or some other authority. He regretted very much that any provision should be left in the Bill which rendered it probable they should again obtain possession of a property which could be better managed otherwise, and a property which could be of no earthly use to them, except as a means, perhaps, to enable the Government of the day to dispense certain patronage. He thought it exceedingly desirable to be, beyond all doubt, quit of it for ever. There should be nothing in the Act which would lead to, or allow any room for, an application by which it might be returned to the Government. There were some other matters in the Bill, to which he would like to refer, but he would ask the hon. the Minister of Public Works not to proceed with it to-night.

MR. TUPPER said he was very sorry the hon. gentleman was not prepared to have him (Mr. Tupper) go on with the measure to-night. It had been a very long time on the Order paper; had been printed and been in the hands of hon. members a considerable length of time. Under these circumstances, he thought the hon. gentleman was not in a position to ask a postponement of the Bill. The Session had advanced to a considerable length, and it was very desirable, he thought every hon. member on both sides would admit, that progress should be made with public business as fast as possible. It was extremely inconvenient for the Government not to be able to proceed with measures at a time like the present, when they were prepared to do so. He did not think there could be any difficulty about it, because, if the House went into Committee, and passed through, the hon. gentleman could raise any question, or move any amendment he thought advisable, on the third reading, after he (Mr. Mackenzie) had had time to consider the measure. He would just say in regard to the point raised by the hon. gentleman, that this Bill, in his judgment, instead of conceding any right the Government had, was more favourable to the interests of the Government than the previous measure, because it provided for the continuous operation of the road. Anybody who knew anything of the trade and business of the country, knew that a greater disaster could scarcely occur in connection with any of the public works, than the cessation of the running of such railways. No person ever supposed that this Government was going to give away property, which cost the country very large sums of public money, unconditionally. It was very desirable, in the interest of the promotion of trade and business, that the road should continue to be operated; therefore the Government had no intention of parting with it, without a guarantee that the road should continue to be operated. He did not, however, think there was any danger, because the road was in the hands of a company who were expending their own money in constructing 80 miles of road beyond, and, of course, they would have to see that communication was kept open. In reference to the point raised by the hon. gentleman, he would admit that no claim existed, and the hon. gentleman would find in another clause of the Bill that the terms had been modified as to the railway itself. The Pictou Branch, as described in the Act which was passed by the late Government, was held to include that which was constructed under the Act providing for the construction of the branch railway to Pictou; but it so happened that, owing to a want of information, the term Pictou Branch in the Act embraced a part of the Intercolonial Railway itself. The Intercolonial Railway had been constructed since the construction of the Pictou Branch. The Intercolonial railway left the road from Halifax to Pictou after it had passed the point where the Pictou Branch commenced. He had made provision in this Bill for certain amendments in relation to that, so as to leave the parties operating the road no possible claim to any part of what might be called the Intercolonial Railway. He was sure that the hon. gentleman would see that the Bill had been prepared with the greatest possible care, so as to prevent any claim being founded on it, and at the same time to protect, as far as possible, the public interests. The Government found that the legislation of the late Government was being frustrated, and an agreement, of which this Bill was the result, had been made with the Government of Nova Scotia, the railway company engaged in constructing the railway from New Glasgow to the Gut of Canso, some 80 miles, and the Government of the Dominion. He hoped the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) would not object to the Bill being put through Committee.

MR. MACKENZIE said, in reference to the statement of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, about the previous Bill conceding part of the Intercolonial Railway as being part of the Pictou and Truro Branch, that it was the first time he had heard anything of the kind. After he had prepared roughly the provisions of the Bill, it was sent to the law clerk with instructions to have the Bill so worded that it could not be interpreted as conveying anything more than the Pictou and Truro Branch Railway. It was not his (Mr. Mackenzie's) intention to give any statutory right to the company to come into the station; but their property was to remain ours to the extreme end of the switches, although the arrangement could be made to allow them accommodation in the yard, but only as a privilege. Now, this Bill conceded the statutory right of entrance to the station itself, the use of the sidings, and all the conveniences of the yard besides. He thought it would be much better that that should not be the case.

This Bill also provided that, in case of any dispute between the Governments of Canada and Nova Scotia, or the company, as to what property or rights were intended to be included in the description of the Pictou Branch, the matter should be submitted to arbitration. He thought that, to be explicit, a provision should be made, whereby the very point that the hon. the Minister of Public Works raised should be submitted to arbitration. As it was a fortnight since he had read the Bill, he admitted that he was unable to speak as explicitly in regard to it than he otherwise would. He did not expect the Bill to come up so soon. Therefore, he would have been prepared if the Bill had not been brought up before the House to-night. If it was important that the Bill should pass through Committee, he would not object to it, as he had no desire to impede business in the least, and hon. gentlemen opposite would admit that he never had any desire to impede public business. On the other hand, if the Bill was referred to Committee now, it would involve after-discussion, which would probably result in the reference of the Bill back to Committee again. On the understanding that, when the Bill was up for its third reading, he would have an opportunity of discussing any points of it if he so desired, he was willing it should be referred to Committee at once.

MR. TUPPER said that he did not wish to cast any reflection upon the administration of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) in reference to the point to which he had drawn the attention of the House. He was as much surprised as the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) when the point had been raised about the Pictou Branch. It was only when this agreement had come up for consideration that the Government found it necessary to deal with that question. As far as conceding the rights of the use of the station sidings, etc., was concerned, the hon. the leader of the Opposition would find that it was entirely under the control of the Intercolonial Railway Department, and only such privileges as were in the interest of the Government could be granted. On the understanding that the hon. gentleman would have an opportunity of dealing with any point of this Bill he (Mr. Mackenzie) might think necessary, he would move that the Bill be referred to Committee of the Whole, reserving the third reading until another time.

OF PUBLIC WORKS BILL.—[BILL 66.]

(Mr. Tupper.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On section 4,

MR. MACKENZIE asked what were the other works referred to? If the railways and canals were taken up, there would not be much left.

MR. TUPPER said there were a great many other public works which required the supervision of the Government. There were the harbour improvements at different ports, the Harbour Commissioners at Quebec and Montreal, the Commissioners of the graving dock at Quebec, public buildings in the different Provinces, the dredging service, slides and booms on the Saguenay and Ottawa rivers and tributaries, the Military College at Kingston, the construction of lighthouses, the fortifications at Quebec and elsewhere, and many other works, which demanded a great deal of time and attention.

MR. HOLTON said this division was decidedly a step in the wrong direction. The whole responsibility should be borne by the Minister of Public Works, with subordinate bureaus forming part of the one great Department. This Bill would introduce one more secondary Minister into our system of Departmental Government.

MR. TUPPER said quite the reverse of the hon. gentleman's proposition was true. Were he charged with having neglected his duty in connection with this enormous service, under the present system, his answer would be precisely the same answer as his predecessor would have made, that he was so overweighted with the work that it was impossible to attend to it thoroughly. Whereas, by placing the railways and canals under his supervision, and the various other services under another Minister, each would be held equally responsible in his Department, able to answer all questions authoritatively, from personal supervision, and the work more satisfactorily attended to. If the hon. gentleman would visit him (Mr. Tupper) at his office, he would find his ante-rooms filled with persons from all parts of the Dominion, on public business connected with piers and harbours, and other works extending over our enormous territory, which precluded him from giving the necessary attention to the more important questions of railways and canals. The hon. member for Lambton would confirm what he (Mr. Tupper) said with respect to the work of the Department.

MR. HOLTON said he had always believed that responsibility was best preserved by concentration. His hon friend had discovered that the way to hold Ministers responsible, was by multiplying them, thus, if the thirteen were made twenty-six, there would be a much greater responsibility in Parliament than at present. He held that the very highest kind of responsibility lay in having very few Ministers at the head of the great Departments and the subordinate Departments held by heads of bureaus and not by Ministers at all.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD :
Why not have one Minister only ?

MR. HOLTON said that would be carrying the thing to the extreme. There was no analogy, for instance, between the Law Department and the Board of Works Department,—between the Finance Department and the Post-Office Department ; but there was no reason why we should have a Minister of Customs when we had a Minister of Finance. There was no reason whatever why a head of a bureau should not execute the work of both, nor why we should have a Minister of Inland Revenue. He had never heard his hon. friend the member for Lambton complain of the excessive work of the Department of Public Works, and in addition he performed the duties of First Minister. While he might have his own opinion as to the expediency of uniting the political leadership with so laborious an office as the Public Works, his hon. friend had acquitted himself, as they all knew, well ; yet he never complained of an excess of work in his Department. He never hinted at a division of the duties of that Department ; therefore, so far as his experience went, so far as his authority could be invoked, it might safely be assumed he would not have advised, had he continued in that office, a division of its duties. He had no desire to prolong the debate. He merely desired to emphasise his conviction on this occasion, as he did thirteen years ago, when the various Departments were constituted, that the fewer Ministers we had within certain limits—having Ministers at the head of each of the natural and separate Departments of State—the better our affairs would be administered. They would be administered not only more economically—for he regarded the salaries of four or five men as of little account—but more efficiently, and with a greater regard to the concentration of responsibility. He believed that, if this country were governed by seven Ministers, it would be more efficiently governed than by thirteen. He believed that his hon. friend, whose administrative ability and great assiduity they fully appreciated, could administer the Board of Works more satisfactorily, and with a deeper sense of responsibility with the Department united as it was, than divided as was proposed.

MR. MASSON : What about the division of the Department of the Minister of Justice last year ?

MR. MACKENZIE said the reasons for that were given last year, and were patent to everyone. There was nothing that had been more felt than the want of assistance in preparing the legislation for the House. The Department of Justice practically supervised and examined the whole legislation of the whole Dominion, including the North-West, and the other territories which might be established. The work of the Department was very great, and he had no reason to believe that it was any less now, and, while one of the ablest men they had (Mr. Blake) was in the Department, it was well known no one was so hard worked as he was in the entire Government. The hon. gentleman seemed to treat the matter as a joke.

MR. MASSON: I was speaking of the question of responsibility the hon. gentleman referred to.

MR. MACKENZIE said that responsibility would still devolve upon the Minister of Justice. Then, with regard to the division of the Public Works Department, the hon. mover said that the Bill stated that one Minister was to be charged with railways and canals,—that was, he presumed, after the construction of railways and canals was completed—with the working of the railways and canals. It was proposed by himself at one time that the collection of the revenues of all our public works should be in the hands of the Inland Revenue Department, as a natural corollary to the duties imposed on that Department. It could not be said, if the Department were to be presided over by another Minister, that he would have work enough to do in merely appointing and supervising the staffs. The Intercolonial was now constructed. The main portion of our canal system was constructed, or would be this season. Four or five years ago the Intercolonial was but half finished. The surveys of the Pacific Railway were but practically commenced, and questions arising in connection with the route had to be determined. This imposed a large amount of work on those at the head of that Department. These canals were finished. The Intercolonial Railway was finished. The construction of the Pacific Railway was in progress; how fast it would be proceeded with depended, no doubt, upon the financial condition of the country. There was no reason why the work for the next five years should approach what had been done during the last five years. It could not be that it should be so, because the principal points were already determined—unless some new and unheard-of policy was to be developed by the present Administration. He did not, therefore, think the Minister would find it difficult to superintend the entire work of the Public Works Department. He concluded, long ago, as they announced last year to Parliament, that it was of much more importance to divide the office of Minister of Justice than any other Department in the service. There was no doubt what the hon. gentleman said was correct, that there was a vast amount of work to be done, vast amount of papers to be read; but still, when the Minister devoted his whole time to one Department, a good deal of work could be overcome. The technical work of the Public Works Department must, after all, be left to engineers. No ordinary Minister could venture to undertake to supervise the technical work of the Department, that must be done, in any case, by engineers responsible to the political head. He could conceive that, if the head of the Department was also an engineer, and so technically responsible for technical errors, it would make a great difference. But that was not the case, and there was a good deal in what the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) said, that it was exceedingly desirable that every Department should embrace all branches of that particular Department, under one responsible head. It was always his opinion that it was a mistake to have a Receiver-General; it was always his opinion it was a mistake to have a Secretary of State, and a Secretary of State for the Provinces. The latter terms were unmeaning, and did not convey any clear idea what the duties were. The hon. gentleman at the head of the Government came to the same conclusion after a brief experience. They came to the same conclusion about a year and a-half ago about the Receiver-General's Department, viz: that there was no kind of necessity for maintaining a Minister in that branch of the Finance Department; therefore, they determined to re-unite them with the Finance Department proper. He was glad that the Government in power had followed their steps in that regard. He thought it would have been better if they had left the Public Works Department under the management of the hon. gentleman opposite, including all its branches. He did not suppose it was the intention or desire of any member to retain the Government railways if they could be otherwise managed. The hon. gentleman, in regard to the Pacific Railway, invited tenders for its construction and working, for the purpose of endeavouring to get rid of that undertaking. He (Mr. Mackenzie) regretted so little success had attended their efforts in that direction. He did not think the Government should undertake the conduct of commercial or mercantile enterprises. But the division of labour here pre-supposed the intention of the Government to manage the great railways which, by the aid of the State, or wholly by the State, had been constructed, or were to be constructed. He thought that was a mistake, and, similarly, with regard to our canal system, which would soon be completed so far as to carry the trade of the country to the ocean. On that subject, of course, he had views of his own, which he would develop at the proper time; but, in the meantime, the two great canals, the Welland and Lachine, were approaching completion, and there would be no serious work to be encountered there of any account in the future. The only thing that could possibly arise was that there might be some difficulty in the settlement of the contractors' claims. But that was a legal matter, with which the Department of Public Works had comparatively little to do. He thought, as the hon. member for Chateauguay had said, that it was useless for them to discuss this matter with a view of successfully opposing the Bill. The Government had determined to do it, and that was the end of the matter, as far as the House was concerned; but he felt it right to give his own views on the subject, because he believed the view they took last year was right, though, at the same time, he conceived it would be desirable to make some extensive alterations. He remembered he proposed himself, when the hon. gentlemen in 1873 readjusted the salaries of public officers, of Judges, civil servants and others, that it would be better to have a number of principal Ministers like the English

MR. MACKENZIE.

Secretaries of State, and that the other Departments should be managed by inferior Ministers, that was by Ministers holding a rather inferior position to the others, such as the President of the Board of Trade of England, and the Postmaster-General of England—that they should have a smaller salary, and, in a corresponding degree, less responsibility. In other words, that we should follow the example set by England in regard to the distribution of Cabinet offices. He was still of opinion it would be the best course to pursue, and that the concentration of power and responsibility to Parliament and the country would be obtained in a greater degree in that way than by maintaining thirteen Ministers of equal position in the House. That was his view of the entire position; but, as he said, it was of no use attempting to enforce their opinions in the House, because their views were only sustained by a comparative small minority. He could only express the hope that hon. gentlemen would find that the views he had expressed that evening would be, at the end of a few years, the right views on which to construct the departmental offices of the Government.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was not unlikely that the prophecy of his hon. friend who had just spoken would come to pass. Some years hence, no doubt, there would be another distribution of offices, just as the readjustment of offices was being considered now. It was not unlikely that in the rapid development of this country other changes might be called for. Continual changes had taken place in the organisation of the Departments in the old and well established Government of England, and, therefore, they might expect changes occasionally in the varying wants, and increasing size and importance of this country. At present, it seemed to him to be absolutely necessary that the Department under consideration should be relieved of its superabundant work by a division of labour. They were all agreed as to the abolition of the Receiver-Generalship. It was no new thing, with himself, and the gentlemen who acted with him on that occasion, the division of the Department of Public Works. The idea of dividing this office was entertained in 1873. Hon. gentlemen then in Parliament would remember the readjustment of the Departments was shadowed in the Speech from the Throne. It was then their intention, had they continued in power, to take this step of dividing the Department of Public Works. The hon. gentlemen who sat together opposite—the hon. member for Chateaugay and the hon. member for Lambton—had differed in opinion as to the comparative importance of the two branches which were to form two separate Departments, although closely allied in their nature. His hon. friend from Chateaugay said that the only office that was worth having was in the Department of Railways and Canals, while the hon. member for Lambton said that that Minister would have but very little to do; that it was otherwise when the Intercolonial was unfinished, and the Pacific Railway surveys just commenced; that then it was an important Department, and that now the Minister would have nothing to do except look after the maintenance and revenue of these railways and canals. His own opinion was that, whether for good or for evil, for a long time the railways and canals which were Government property would remain Government property. It would be a very considerable period before they could, no matter how desirable it would be, get rid of these public works and put them into private hands or corporations. He believed the Government would not be able to allow enormous sacrifices of public property in order to transfer them and get rid of the responsibility; because they had not only to get rid of the labour and cost of management, but they had to see that the parties in whose names these works were transferred gave substantial guarantees to the country that they would be worked for the advantage of the country and not for the advantage of the corporation, and that they should always maintain their position as great public highways and great arteries of commerce. He thought it would be a considerable time before they could get companies with the requisite capital and solvency to give the required guarantee that these works should continue to be the great public highways for which they were constructed. He thought, for a long time to come, that could only be secured by their being under the management of a responsible Department of the Government. Then, as regarded the other office of Minister of Public Works as distinguished from Railways and Canals. It was true there was not a single work of the miscellaneous public works, which was of the same importance or the same public value as any given railway or any given canal. But that was not the question. There was a multiplicity of public works of all kinds which would require an active, earnest and able man to manage. Without making any remark disrespectful of his hon. friend's predecessor, who had a great power for work, one could not help seeing, during the last three years of the last Parliament, that the hon. gentleman was overworked, and that he again and again had to throw himself on the indulgence of the House, and said that, owing to the multiplicity of the duties thrown upon him, politically as well as departmentally, he could not be expected at all times, and on all occasions, to be fully up to his work. If any man could do it, he believed, from all he had heard of the hon. gentleman, that he could do it. But he believed it was not for the advantage of the public that one single man, however able, should be overcharged and overworked, as the hon. gentleman certainly was. They had become so accustomed to look at large figures and large works, that they began to despise the day of small things, and to consider that all the rest of the public works were comparatively of little importance. Why, he remembered the time, when Upper and Lower Canada were united under Lord Sydenham, they had only the Welland Canal, and not much progress made in the Beauharnois Canal; but these works were considered of so much importance that they had two Ministers of Public Works, which were continued for a long time. His hon. friend from Chateaugay would remember that the Board of Works was then governed by a Commissioner and an Assistant, but they were a joint board, and both members of Parliament, and of the Cabinet.

MR. MACKENZIE: The assistant was not required to be even a member of Parliament.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman was mistaken, they were both required to be members of Parliament, and both members of the Cabinet. The first Minister of Public Works was the Hon. Hamilton H. Killy, who was a member of the Cabinet, and the Hon. William B. Robinson was Assistant Commissioner for a time, and was also in Parliament. Afterwards that was altered, and the Board of Works was under one Commissioner, with an Assistant Commissioner, who had not a seat in Parliament. The public works now were so numerous as fully to occupy two responsible Ministers. The hon. gentleman said he would like to see but certain Ministers. That would be surcharging a responsible Minister with more than he could do. He would have to throw himself, as the hon. member for Lambton remarked, upon his engineers. He must be really the mouthpiece of his engineers without any real responsibility, because he could not give the necessary time and labour to manage the subdivisions of these bureaux properly. The bureau system in the United States had proved a thorough failure. Many of the complaints that had been made against, not only the good management, but the honest management of public affairs in different Departments in that country had arisen from there being too few responsible Ministers. In England, the Public Works Department was subdivided into many sub-departments. The Admiralty had charge of ships, the Secretary of War looked after everything like military fortifications and defences, and the Commissioners of Woods and Forests attended to all public buildings except those under the Commissioners of Trade and the Post Office Department. In almost every one of these Departments they had got separate officers. Besides that, they had got Junior Lords of the Treasury, and the Junior Lord of Trade, to assist Members of Parliament and Members of the Government, and although not in the Cabinet, they were responsible to Parliament, and each one was able to answer for his own Department. Every Minister knew what he was talking about, and was not obliged to be posted and crammed by the head of his bureau below. In order to have real substantial responsibility, the responsible man must know all about his own Department, and be able to speak from personal knowledge. The fact of having these two Ministers in this House would be of great assistance to the House, and he was quite clear that it was for the advantage of the public service that this sub-division should take place. In the last Parliament he took the liberty of opposing the sub-division of the Department of the Minister of Justice. He would not go over that matter again, as he had good and sufficient reasons for opposing the proposed change. He believed it was important that the Minister of Justice should always be the Attorney-General, who should advise the several Departments, and be the responsible administrator of the criminal law of the land, according to the laws of the Dominion, so far as they came within a scope of his duties. His opinion was that the one Minister could well perform all that work. In the debate of last Parliament, he suggested that there might be a subordinate officer to look after the exchequer, and to contest the litigated business of the Crown. He thought that, by funding the fees collected from these cases, that subordinate officer might well be paid, and would not become an additional burden upon the country. He was strongly in favour of having the public service thoroughly performed, and believed this change would conduce to that end, and the health of the Minister of Railways and Public Works would be greatly improved by the sub-division of the Department.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)

(Mr. Pope, Compton.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

On section 2,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said this clause was not in the old Act, and was inserted to provide what the duties of owners of cattle should be. The moment a stock-owner was aware of a disease breaking out among his herd, he must give notice to the proper department in order that the disease might be at once stamped out. It was highly reprehensible and worthy of punishment for a stock-owner to try to conceal diseases in his herd for fear he might be called upon to kill them, or might not be able to dispose of them. In all such cases the slaughter of diseased animals was for the general benefit. If animals were ordered to be slaughtered for the public good, compensation should be given the owners; and, therefore, as compensation was provided in the case of the compulsory slaughter of infected cattle, it would be the greater offence to fraudulently conceal the existence of disease. This clause was adopted from the English statute, in order to give the authorities every means for stamping out the disease.

MR. MILLS said the clause was open to very serious objection. In the first place it exceeded their powers of legislation. He did not see how the Government could proceed, unless they intended to make the retention of diseased animals a crime. Such matters came within the domain of civil rights, with which it was competent for Local Legislatures to deal. But, if this Parliament had the power, he did not see that the clause in question would be efficacious. It would give an immense amount of work to the Minister of Agriculture, were every case of a diseased animal, such as a horse with a sore throat, reported to him. If the epizootic were to appear among horses, as four or five years ago, there would be as many communications sent to that Minister as there were horses in the country, and he would require a double staff to read his correspondence.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, as to the Constitutional question, he thought the power claimed was in the purview of Parliament, and that the Local Legislatures could pass no Act of that kind. Under the general powers given Parliament for the peace and good government of the country, those clauses were, in every way, within its power, and it would be an unfortunate thing were they not—that, in case of cattle disease breaking out, they should have to apply to the separate Local Legislatures for a remedy. It would be equivalent to saying that this Parliament could not stamp out such disease. It would be almost impossible to have a cordon or interior line surrounding every one of the separate Provinces. The Act must be read reasonably, as meaning the reporting of every infectious, or contagious disease, not every common disease. They used the same language as was used in the English Act to check the same evil. He did not think they could exaggerate the growing importance of their live cattle trade with England, which they ought to take more than ordinary care to encourage, and especially, by the stringency of their legislation, to show the British Government that they were really taking steps, by legislation and administration, to prevent disease in Canada. They had secured the keeping of Canada out of the diseased schedule, into which they were near being put by England some time ago. It was by the strongest and promptest exertions of the Canadian Government, and friends of the country in England, that Canada was prevented from being classed like the United States.

MR. PLUMB said he was extremely surprised at the argument of the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) — that there would be no right to prevent the farmer, for instance, from sowing grain that might spread disease among his neighbours' crops.

MR. MILLS: I did not say that, but that the right did not lie in this Parliament.

MR. PLUMB said that the hon. gentleman must know perfectly well that, if contagious diseases of any kind broke out, it was the duty of the authorities to prevent their spread. If a man brought diseased wheat into the country, it was the duty of the proper authorities to punish him. The hon. Premier stated that the power lay with the Dominion Government, and that, where cattle had to be carried over all the railways of the Dominion, the subject of the prevention of disease must be under the purview of its Government, because it was impossible to create local surveillance of such matters or make it effectual. He thought that every gentleman in the House should feel it his first duty to so legislate as to retain, if possible, to Canada her cattle trade with England, by taking every precaution to prevent any suspicion in England as to the state of Canadian herds. He thought that any legislation in that direction, although it might seem severe, or involve a few letters to the Agriculture Department, should not be questioned in a captious spirit, but that they should do everything possible to retain and extend a trade so profitable by endeavouring to shut out contagion, which was spreading over the United States, and had created such alarm in England as almost to induce the authorities there to shut out importation of stock from the Republic.

MR. MILLS said that he had not raised any captious objections, but he had endeavoured to show the inoperative character of the first clause. He repeated, that this House had no power to deal with this question, but only the Local Legislatures. The First Minister had overlooked the special provisions of the Act giving Parliament power to legislate for the peace, order, and good government of the country, under which might be embraced, according to his view, every subject of legislation, whether vested here or elsewhere. It was a well settled rule of interpretation that they could not interpret general provisions in such a way as to render nugatory the express provisions of the same Statute. Local Governments were authorised to legislate on subjects of property and civil rights. Was it not perfectly clear that this clause touched private property? So long as articles were not articles of commerce, but held as private property, legislation affecting them devolved elsewhere. There was no disease to which an animal might be subject, contagious or otherwise, but which it would be necessary, under the Bill, to report to the Minister of Agriculture.

Section agreed to.

MR. PLUMB.

On section 2,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the word "depasture" was struck out in favour of the word "graze," and an amendment was introduced into the third line in favour of still greater stringency and protection. The penalty would apply to persons who had exposed animals knowingly to contagion, for which it was raised from $100 to $200. The old clause was unreasonably severe. Anyone that depastured any such animal, should be liable to a penalty—but not unless he had known it to be infected, or to have been exposed to infection.

MR. RYMAL said that he thought the clause was rather harsh, as it would prevent a man from turning out his colts, for example, if distempered, when that was the thing most beneficial for them, the penalty for so doing being $200.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said this clause tended to relieve the stringency of the old Act. It was a new clause, and provided that if any cattle were diseased, young or old, they should not be allowed to run on the roadside or in an unenclosed forest, wood, plain or country. They must be kept on their owner's property, and herded there.

Section agreed to.

On Section 4,

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said, if, after a vessel had cleared one of our ports, say Quebec, any of the cattle were found diseased and slaughtered, it would be found impossible to dispose of the carcasses.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the carcass could be stowed away until the vessel got ten miles out, and then be thrown overboard.

MR. WHITE said in the meantime the carcass might communicate the disease.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said no difficulty would be felt on that score.

Section agreed to.

On Section 19,

MR. BERGIN said he would like to know whether the inspectors were to be regularly qualified veterinary surgeons, as unlearned persons would be apt to pronounce diseases dangerous, which were not so at all.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the matter was left to the option of the Minister, who would see that competent persons were appointed, though not necessarily all veterinary surgeons. A farmer who had been herding cattle all his lifetime, or an experienced cattle dealer, would be practically as good judges as veterinary surgeons.

MR. BERGIN said he was obliged to differ from the right hon. gentleman. Those people were not competent to decide whether a disease was contagious or not.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 16th April, 1879.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DISMISSAL OF D. H. WATERLEY, OF ST. JOHN.

QUESTION.

MR. DOMVILLE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to pay Mr. D. H. Waterley, late clerk in the post-office in St. John, the damages awarded him by a St. John jury for improper dismissal and defamation of character.

MR. McDONALD (Picton): In that case, it was an action brought by Mr. Waterley against Mr. Dewy, the Inspector of post-offices, for an alleged improper discharge from the public service. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for $4,000 or $5,000, I think it was; the counsel for the Crown obtained a rule nisi to set aside that verdict, which rule nisi is still pending.

DREDGING OF CHETICAMP HARBOUR.

QUESTION.

MR. MACDONNELL enquired, Whether the Government intends to perform any further dredging of the harbour of Cheticamp, in the county of Inverness, during the coming season.

MR. TUPPER: It is not the intention of the Government to provide for dredging this season in the harbour of Cheticamp.

PIER AT McNAIR'S COVE.

QUESTION.

MR. McISAAC enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates to repair the pier at McNair's Cove, Antigonish County.

MR. TUPPER: It is not the intention to place any sum in the Supplementary Estimates for repairs to McNair's Cove.

STEAMSHIP LINE BETWEEN HALIFAX AND BRAZIL.

QUESTION.

MR. GILLMOR enquired, Whether the Government have, or intend to enter into any arrangement with any parties with respect to subsidising a line of steamers to ply between Halifax and Brazil, by which it is hoped to develop a direct trade with that country.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Government have entered into negotiations with a view to the establishment of a monthly line of steamers to carry the mails between Canada and Brazil, and, if possible, to extend the service to the River Platte.

FISH-BREEDING ESTABLISHMENT ON THE ST. JOHN RIVER.

QUESTION.

MR. KING enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make provision for a fish-breeding establishment on the St. John River or any of its tributaries this year.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): The subject is under the consideration of the Government.

DREDGING OF THE WASHADEMOAK RIVER.

QUESTION.

MR. KING enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to complete the work of dredging the Washademoak River this year.

MR. TUPPER: The subject is under the consideration of the Government.

REMOVAL OF MAIL CONTRACT FROM VICTOR LECLERC.

QUESTION.

MR. RINFRET enquired, Whether the Government has taken away the contract for conveying the mails between the North Shore Railway and the St. Basile post-office from Victor Leclerc, and, if so, why.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Victor Leclerc had not the contract for conveying the mails. When it was necessary to change the service, and connect St. Basile post-office with the North Shore Railway, another arrangement had to be made.

COMPLAINTS AGAINST ULRIC DUVAL.

QUESTION.

MR. OLIVIER enquired, Whether the Government have received any complaints against Ulric Duval, postmaster of St. Nicholas, county of Lévis; and, if so, by whom such complaints were made.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Complaints have been received against this postmaster, which are now under investigation. Complaint was made by the curé of St. Nicholas.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

POST OFFICE AT BRODIE'S, COUNTY MEGANTIC.

QUESTION.

MR. OLIVIER enquired, Whether the Government have received the Report of W. Sheppard, Post-Office Inspector, as to the advisability of establishing a post-office at Brodie's, in Inverness, county of Megantic; and whether it is the intention of the Government to establish a post-office in that place.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That report has been received, and is now under consideration.

CANAL ON THE EAST COAST OF VAN-COUVER ISLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. BUNSTER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates for the construction of a canal (some three hundred feet in length) in rear of the property of John Langholt, in order that the settlers on the east coast of Vancouver Island, B.C., may reach Nanaimo city with their produce, and purchase supplies.

MR. TUPPER: It is not the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates for that purpose.

MONUMENT TO SIR GEORGE CARTIER.

QUESTION.

MR. DESJARDINS, in the absence of Mr. TASSÉ, enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to carry out (so soon as the state of the public finances shall permit) the resolution adopted by the House of Commons on the 23rd May, 1873, setting forth that, in consideration of the great services rendered to the country by the lamented Sir George E. Cartier, a monument shall be erected to the memory of that excellent statesman.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is the intention of the Government to carry out that resolution so soon as the state of the public finances shall permit.

THE TARIFF DIVISION.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. DOULL said he rose to a question of privilege. In a late issue of the Toronto Globe, as well as in other papers on the same political side, he had seen a statement to the effect that he had shirked the vote on the tariff, in consequence of the vote of the Pictou Board of Trade being adverse to it. That was not correct. He was absent on that occasion from indisposition, and, had he been in his place, would certainly have voted for the tariff. The statement that he was in his place a few minutes before the vote was taken was also untrue. With regard to the vote of the Pictou Board of Trade, he had a telegram stating that there were only seven members of that Board present.

MR. MACKENZIE: That statement does not belong to a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman may make personal explanations, but cannot go into other explanations.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That statement about the Board of Trade is a part of the explanation. The hon. gentleman has been charged with shirking a vote in consequence of a resolution of the Board of Trade, and he must speak about it in order to vindicate himself from an unjust attack.

MR. HOLTON: Clearly not.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: You want to prevent the hon. gentleman from making the explanation he desires.

MR. HOLTON: I want to preserve the regularity of our proceedings. For a gentleman to claim the right to open a debate on a question of privilege is quite absurd; but he has a perfect right to vindicate himself. The hon. gentleman's statement that, if he had been in the House he would have voted for the tariff, concludes the explanation he can properly make as to a question of privilege.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman must surely be heard out. He should not be muzzled. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not know what the hon. gentleman is going to say.

MR. HOLTON: We do not care.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We do care. It is due to his own honour that he should be heard out. I am quite surprised at the action of hon. gentlemen opposite in striving to prevent this explanation.

MR. HOLTON: The hon. Premier need not get so excited. I say it is no question of privilege to refer to the proceedings of the Pictou Board of Trade. I desire the ruling of the Speaker on the subject.

MR. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Doull) is following the general practice in rectifying an incorrect statement as to his shirking the vote in question. He is not exactly confining his remarks to what we call a question of privilege; but he has a right to explain why he was not in the House when the division was taken.

MR. DOULL said that the reason given by the papers mentioned, for his absence, was the vote of the Pictou Board of Trade, which it was stated had influenced him to absent himself from his place. He wanted to show that what took place at that Board of Trade was in the absence of a quorum, there being only seven members present, six of whom were Grits. The only Conservative present was in the chair, and the meeting, of course, carried the vote.

MR. HOLTON: I should like to know whether the hon. Premier regards that explanation as privileged?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I can quite understand, after that explanation, why my hon. friend the member for Chateauguay did not wish the hon. member to make it.

THE CHINESE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MOTION.

MR. DECOSMOS said, with reference to his notice of motion for the consideration of the petition of Noah Shakespeare and others respecting Chinese labour, in Committee of the Whole, that, with a view to arrive, in all probability, at a more practical conclusion than might be obtained in Committee, he would ask the House to allow him to substitute for the resolution, of which notice had been given, the following resolution, and by that means, refer the petition to a Special Committee:—

"That the petition of Noah Shakespeare and others, of the Province of British Columbia, praying for the passing of an Act to restrict further immigration of Chinamen; also, that in the construction of the Inter-Colonial Railway, the employment of Chinese labour may be prohibited; and that the Act of the Provincial Government of British Columbia in placing the local rate upon the Chinese in the country, may be confirmed, be referred to a Select Committee, to report on the same, and generally on Chinese labour and immigration affecting the Dominion, with power to send for persons and papers; said Committee to consist of Messrs. DeCosmos, Williams, Charlton, Bunster, Bannerman, Trow, Brooks, Thompson (Cariboo) and Connell."

The petition of Noah Shakespeare and some 1,500 of the labouring classes and people of British Columbia drew the attention of Parliament, for the first time, to one of the most important questions affecting the labourer of the Pacific coast that had ever been brought under consideration. The petition stated that the petitioners, experiencing the injurious effects of the competition of Chinese labour so largely prevailing in British Columbia, to the detriment of the general welfare, respectfully asked Parliament, with a view to affording the needed relief, to pass a measure similar to that of Queensland, placing restrictions upon the further immigration of Chinese. It was noticed, as far as that point was concerned, that the Queensland Act had not received the final sanction of Her Majesty; and further, they asked that, in the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway, Chinese labour should not be employed, and that the Act of British Columbia, imposing a heavy tax on Chinese, should be passed. He would leave that matter in the hands of the Minister of Justice. There was also an appendix to this measure, setting forth a number of facts and reasons, for the granting of the prayer of the subscribers. Those papers contained a full and reliable statement of their case. Since their composition, however, the same Working Men's Society had sent a petition to the Provincial Legislature, effectively describing the character of their grievance, with the reasons for its removal. He would now direct the attention of this House to a few statements, based upon a population of six thousand Chinese, as a comparison of their value to the Dominion, contrasted with that of an equal number of Canadians. 6,000 Chinese, male adults, earning $300 each a year, gave an aggregate income of $1,800,000, less their cost of living, $60 per year, $360,000, leaving a net saving of $1,440,000, which amount was sent to China. 6,000 Canadians, earning $400 per year each, gave an amount of $2,400,000, the entire amount of which was kept in the country. He would say, further, that nearly the entire earnings of the Chinese left the country, for the reason that they lived on rice almost completely, and imported their rice, sugar and clothes from China, thus leaving a very small modicum to be expended in our territory. With regard to the population, the total Chinese were taken as 6,000 male adults. Supposing they all had families, each numbering five persons, that would give 30,000 people as a substitute for the 6,000 Chinamen in British Columbia. The profit and loss of this transaction would stand, therefore, as follows:—The loss by Chinese in population—the 6,000 Chinamen having taken the place which would otherwise be occupied by 6,000 Canadians, with families averaging five each—was 24,000; the annual loss of earnings, by keeping out these 6,000 Canadian labourers, whose earnings would be expended in the country, $2,400,000, and, if were added to this loss, the increase of wealth which would accrue from the population of 30,000 Canadians, which would amount to at least another $2,400,000, the total amount lost to the country, through the residence of the Chinese, would be $5,000,000. He had stated the case so far as British Columbia was concerned; but to show the wide range this question had taken, he would draw the attention of the House to a recent extract from one of the leading journals in San Francisco, showing that the white population in all the country washed by the Pacific Ocean, which was the country where the Chinese immigration had principally set in, were opposed to their admission. This paper stated that:

"In Australia, the anti-Chinese agitation gains in strength every day. The Parliament of Queensland has passed various Bills to restrict the immigration, but, as they conflicted with the treaty between Great Britain and China, they have been practically disallowed by the home Government, although, subsequently, the latter stretched a point so far as to assent to a measure which is prohibitory to A certain extent. The feeling of opposition has extended to all the colonies in the group. In Victoria, the Government now inserts in all contracts for public works, a clause against the employment of the Chinese. In South Australia there is talk of restricting, by law, the income of Chinamen into the southern portion of the colony, though their services are gladly welcomed in the tropical climate of the northern territory. The influx of the Chinese to the Sandwich Islands is so great that much alarm is felt lest the Mongolians secure such a foothold that it would be difficult to control them. This alarm is felt also by King Kalakua, who asserts that the policy of the Hawaiian Government at present is to discourage any general immigration of the Chinese or Coolie element."

When they added to that the fact that the States of California, Oregon, Nevada, Washington Territory, and contiguous territories, were entirely, as was British Columbia, in favour of excluding all the Chinese from their respective territories, it would be seen that nearly the entire English-speaking population bordering on the Pacific Ocean, were opposed to Chinese immigration. But, in order to make a step further, he would inform the House of the statement made by Baron Schouvaloff, at the Berlin Congress. He asked that Congress to make a provision against permitting Chinese and other Asiatic nations from obtaining, by purchase, modern and improved implements of warfare. Now, the complaint had been made, not merely at the Berlin Congress, but by the colonies of Great Britain, who asked for some repressive measure to be introduced against Chinese immigration. The States of California, Oregon, and other territories contiguous, had asked the Congress of the United States to make provision against Chinese immigration. British Columbia had also acted in this direction, particularly by enacting a law which was sent over here last year. Now, the Dominion Parliament was asked by this petition to take some action in the matter. It had become really a world's question. It might be asked why were the English-speaking population of the Pacific coast opposed to Chinese immigration. In the first place, they were opposed to it because their labour was brought into competition with Mongolian labour, and because the latter lived at such a low rate that he could work for wages on which it was impossible for the former to support himself and family. There were other reasons as important, if not more important, than the immediate question of labour. There was the difference of race. The Chinese were a race who did not assimilate, and could never assimilate with the white race. Then there was the question of religion, the Chinese being probably the greatest pagans on the earth, and could by no other possibility than a miracle be induced to accept a more enlightened religion like that of Christianity. A few here and there might be brought under missionary influence for a time, but their associations were such that, in a very brief period, they relapsed into their old habits, and became worse than they previously were. In order that he might draw the attention of this House, and, through it, the country, to the character of these people, and the importance of this Government taking action to prevent Chinese immigration, he would ask the indulgence of the House while he quoted a few extracts from the report made by the Special Committee of the Senate of California, two years ago, upon which the moral character and bearing of the Chinese upon white labour, and the danger to the free institutions of this continent through their presence, were fully and fairly set forth:—

"To the investigation with which we were charged—quasi judicial in its character, and in the unsettled state of the country of the highest importance—we addressed ourselves, having but one object in view, the ascertainment of truth.

"In the State of California there are over 100,000 subjects of the Empire of China. Of this number, all but about 3,000 are male adults, and that 3,000 are females held in slavery by their own people for the basest purposes."

The next extract to which he would call attention was this:

"The Chinese came without any special invitation. They came before we had time to consider the propriety of their admission. If anyone had ever hoped that they would assimilate with our people, that hope has long since been dispelled. They have now lived among us in considerable numbers for a quarter of a century, and yet they remain separate, distinct from and antagonistic to our people in thinking, mode of life, tastes and principles, and are as far from assimilation as when they first arrived. They fail to comprehend our system of Government; they perform no duties of citizenship; they are not available as jurymen; they cannot be called upon as a posse comitatus to preserve order, nor be relied upon as soldiers. They bring no children with them, and there is, therefore, no possibility of influencing them by our ordinary educational appliances. There is, indeed, no point of contact between the Chinese and our people through which we can Americanise them. The rigidity which characterises these people forbids the hope of any essential change in their relations to our own people or our Government. We respectfully submit the admitted proposition that no nation, much less a Republic, can safely permit the presence of a large and increasing element among its people which cannot be assimilated or made to comprehend the responsibilities of citizenship."

What was said of the Chinese in California might be said also of them in our country.

"The great mass of the Chinese residents in California are not amenable to our laws. It is almost impossible to procure the conviction of Chinese criminals, and we are never sure that a conviction, even when obtained, is in accordance with justice."

He would beg to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to this point.

"This difficulty arises out of our ignorance of the Chinese language, and the fact that their moral ideas are wholly distinct from our own. They do not recognise the sanctity of an oath, and utterly fail to comprehend the crime of perjury. Bribery, intimidation, and other methods of baffling justice, are considered by them as perfectly legitimate. It is an established fact that the administration of justice among the Chinese is almost impossible, and we are, therefore, unable to protect them against the persecutions of their own countrymen, or punish them for offences against our own people. This anomalous condition, in which the authority of law is so generally vacated, imperils the existence of our Republican institutions to a degree hitherto unknown among us. This race of aliens are not only not amenable to law, but they are governed by secret tribunals, unrecognised and unauthorised by law. The records of these tribunals have been discovered, and are found to be antagonistic to our legal system. These tribunals are formed by the several Chinese companies or guilds, and are recognised as legitimate authorities by the Chinese population. They levy taxes, command masses of men, intimidate interpreters and witnesses, enforce perjury, regulate trade, punish the refractory, remove witnesses beyond the reach of our Courts, control liberty of action, and prevent the return of Chinese to their homes in China without their consent. In short, they exercise a despotic sway over one-seventh of the population of the State of California. They invoke the process of law only to punish the independent action of their subjects, and it is claimed that they execute the death penalty upon those who refuse obedience to their decrees."

The government of these seven companies constituted a foreign government within the boundaries of California. They were represented on Canadian territory, and in the Province of British Columbia might exercise, and did exercise, as he (Mr. DeCosmos) had evidence last year, their influence in controlling their own people. He would draw attention to another point also in the direction of justice. Dr. J. Murphy, District Attorney of the city and county of San Francisco, one of the most able and experienced lawyers on the Pacific coast, reported as follows:—

"I have looked on my docket for two years, and I find that of seven hundred cases that I examined before the Grand Jury, one hundred and twenty were Chinese, principally burglaries, grand larcenies, and murders. They are very adroit and expert thieves. I have not had time to examine, for the last two and a-half years, but the proportion has largely increased during that time."

That was evidence which, he dared say, had never been brought under the notice of the Canadian Parliament, or the people of the eastern section, who were remote from the Chinese, and had not been disturbed by the question hitherto. Here was a statement given to the Committee referred to, by Mr. Karcher, Chief of Police, at Sacramento, in reply to the question: "Do you know anything about their putting up offers of reward upon walls and street corners, written in Chinese, for the murder or assassination of given Chinamen?"

"Yes. Of course, I could not read Chinese, but I secured some of these posters, and had an interpreter from San Francisco come up here and interpret them. There were rewards for the murder of some Chinamen who did something contrary to their laws. They have their own tribunals, where they try Chinamen, and their own laws to govern them. In this way the administration of justice is often defeated entirely, or, at least, to a very great extent. I know this, because I was present at a meeting of one of their tribunals about seven years ago. There were some thirty or forty Chinamen there, one appearing to act as Judge. Finally the fellow on trial was convicted, and had to pay so much money as a fine for the commission of the offence with which he was charged. Generally, their punishments are in the nature of fines, but sometimes they sentence the defendant to death. In cases in the Police Court we have often found it difficult to make interpreters act. They would tell us that they would be killed if they spoke the truth; that their tribunals would sentence them to death, and pay assassins to dispatch them. About two years and a half or three years ago, Ah Quong was killed. During the trial, at which he was interpreter, there were a great many Chinamen. I stationed officers at the doors, and then caused each one to be searched as he came out of the room, the interpreter having told me that he feared they would murder him. Upon these Chinamen I found all sorts of weapons—hatchets, pistols, bowie-knives, Chinese swords, and many others. There were forty-five weapons in all, I think, concealed about their persons in all kinds of ways. The interpreter testified in that case, and half an hour after leaving the Court-room he was brought back, shot, and cut with hatchets. He was terribly mutilated, and lived only a few moments after being brought to the station-house. The murderers were arrested, but attempted to prove an alibi, and had a host of Chinese witnesses present for that purpose. Although there were some hundreds of Chinese present at the time of the murder, the prosecution was forced to rely upon the evidence of a few white men, who chanced to see the deed committed. We were opposed at every turn by the Chinamen, and the Chinese companies. As a general thing it is utterly impossible to enforce the laws with any certainty against those people, while they will themselves use our laws to persecute innocent men who have gained their enmity. They seem to have no ideas concerning the moral obligation of an oath, and care not for our form of swearing."

That was one illustration of the manner in which the Secret Tribunal of the Chinese was managed in California. Then another point :

"The Chinese have, through certain guilds or companies, established a peculiar, but revolting, kind of slavery upon the Pacific coast. Hundreds of Chinese women are bought and sold at prices ranging from three to eight hundred dollars. These women are compelled to live as prostitutes, for the pecuniary profit of their owners; they are under constant and unceasing surveillance; they are cruelly beaten if they fail to make money for their owners; and they are left to starve and die uncared for when they become sick or unprofitable. The great majority of these slaves do not know that they have rights, though they would be glad to escape if they could. Sometimes they wish to marry, and escape with their chosen husband, but they are speedily kidnapped and returned to their owners."

The Rev. Mr. Otis Gibson, a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal Church, testified as follows:—

"The women, as a general thing, are held as slaves. They are bought or stolen in China, and brought here. They have a sort of agreement to cover up the slavery business, but it is all a sham. That paper makes the girl say that she owes you four hundred dollars or so passage money, and outfit from China, and has nothing to pay."

That was the way in which female slavery existed in British Columbia, in Dominion territory, as well as in the United States. Here was testimony on another point:—

"The Pacific coast has become a Botany Bay, to which the criminal classes of China are brought in large numbers, and the people of this coast are compelled to endure this affliction. We do not claim that all the Chinese belong to the criminal classes, for many well-behaved people are among them. There are various grades of character among these people: The merchants and business-men, who are often worthy of high esteem; the cooks and house servants, who are often bright and trustworthy; a class of labourers who are diligent; a class of labourers who are extremely dishonest, and a large number of professional thieves and fighters. We are confident that the criminal class outnumber the others in the proportion of seven to one."

The following extract, from the evidence of Mr. F. F. Low, a distinguished citizen who had held many positions of honour and trust under the State and Federal Government, among which had been that of Governor of California, Representative in Congress, and Minister to China, showed the character of the Chinese:—

"That the immigration comes, with but slight exceptions, from the single Province of Canton, and that it is of the lowest class."

The following description of the Chinese character was from a very eminent authority, whose name was a household word—Bayard Taylor, who said of them, in his work entitled, "India, China, and Japan:—

"It is my deliberate opinion that the Chinese are, morally, the most debased people on the face of the earth. Forms of vice, which in other countries are barely named, are, in China, so common that they excite no comment among the natives. They constitute the surface level, and below them are deeps and deeps of depravity so shocking and horrible that their character cannot be hinted. There are some dark shadows in human nature which we naturally shrink from penetrating, and I made no attempt to collect information of this kind; but there was enough in the things which I could not avoid seeing and hearing—which are brought almost daily to the notice of every foreign resident—to inspire me with a powerful aversion to the Chinese race. Their touch is pollution, and, harsh as the opinion may seem, justice to our own race demands that they should not be allowed to settle on our soil. Science may have lost something, but mankind has gained by the exclusive policy which has governed China during the past centuries."

The Chinese paid a very small share of the taxation, and if the policy of this country turned out to be in favour of encouraging Chinese immigration, free white labour would be ousted, and, at the same time, the Chinese who would replace them would not pay their regular proportion of taxation per capita. Here was what the report stated on that point:—

"The Chinese population, amounting to at least one-sixth of the whole population, pays less than one four-hundredth part of the revenue required to support the State Government."

Then, with regard to the personal expenses of this class:

"It will be seen that the net cost to the State for each prisoner is about thirty cents per day; and this without taking into consideration the cost of the prison buildings. The net cost to the State of keeping 198 Chinese prisoners in the State Prison is not less than $21,600 per annum, a sum $12,000 in excess of the whole amount of the property tax collected from the Chinese population of the State."

At the present time, British Columbia had a Chinese population of about 6,000. The city of Winnipeg, in Manitoba, already had its Chinese laundry, so had Toronto and Montreal. A few years ago he (Mr. DeCosmos) noticed that in Texas, all along the Pacific Railway, they could be seen. The Chinese were on the move; if they were not stopped in their march, they were bound to settle everywhere, and they would reduce labour to so low a rate that the youth of both sexes would have no opportunity of getting employment. At least, here was the evidence of Mr. Duffy on that point:

"Q. Why can they (the Chinese) afford to do work cheaper than white men?"

A. They can work cheaper than the white men because they have no families to support, and, therefore, live much cheaper. Their living does not cost them over 15c. per day. Take a labouring man here who has a wife and two children dependent upon him, and his expenses, at the very least, are $2.50 a day, and he must live very economically to make that amount do. Where a labouring man has no family, his necessary expenses will be from $1.75 to $2 a day. He can board for $20 a month, and his washing, clothing, etc., will make up the balance. Most of the Chinese here wear clothes of Chinese manufacture, consume goods imported from China, and all their dealings are against the American interests. Where they do not board themselves, they can be accommodated—boarded and lodged—at houses in Chinatown for $1.50 a week, and less."

They found that, in the Province of British Columbia, the employment of Chinese labourers and servants was operating most unfavourably against the youth of that Province. Mr. Karcher, ex-Chief of Police, gave evidence as follows in regard to the effect of Chinese labour in California:

"Q. In San Francisco, at an early day, and in Sacramento, there were few boys 14, 15 and 16 years of age in the country?"

A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And the places occupied by boys in other countries were filled by the Chinese?"

A. Yes, Sir.

Q. So that the result was that, when boys came along in the natural growth of the country, there was no work for them to do?"

A. That is correct?"

Then, again, the following evidence was given on this point:—

"The State of California has a population variously estimated at from 700,000 to 800,000, of which 125,000 are Chinese. The additions to this class have been very rapid since the organisation of the State, but have been caused almost entirely by immigration, and scarcely at all by natural increase."

Here was another extract to which he wished to draw the attention of the House as to this competition between Chinese and white labour:—

"The male element of this population, where not criminal, comes into a painful competition with the most needy and most deserving of our people—those who are engaged, or entitled to be engaged, in industrial pursuits in our midst. The common labourer, the farm hand, the shoemaker, the cigarmaker, the domestic male and female, and workmen of all descriptions, find their various occupations monopolised by Chinese labour, employed at a compensation upon which white labour cannot possibly exist."

He (Mr. DeCosmos) had read all the extracts he proposed to give in respect to the Chinese character, and the effect of the competition between the two races, from the report of the Committee referred to. He held in his hands a volume printed by the United States Congress, being a report of the Joint Special Committee of both Houses of Congress on this Chinese immigration. He would call the attention of the House to a few extracts from that report. It said :

"Among the testimony will be found that of some 20 operatives, numbering nearly as many trades, in which details are given in relation to different industrial pursuits which are either monopolised by the Chinese or are fast becoming so. This evidence shows that the Chinese have reduced wages to what would be starvation prices for white men and women, and engrossed so much of the labour in the various callings, that there is a lack of employment for whites; and young men are growing up in idleness, while young women, willing to work, are compelled to resort to doubtful means of support. The hardships resulting from these causes bear with especial weight upon women."

He had another brief extract from the report of the same Committee which was as follows :—

"The presence of the Chinese discourages and retards white emigration to the Pacific States. This clearly appeared in evidence, and probably arises from their monopoly of farm and mechanical work through the low price of their labour, making subsistence difficult to procure by the poorer class of emigrants."

From these two sources, as well as from the two petitions he had read, they might discover the opinion that prevailed both in British Columbia and California, and by the Joint Committee of the House of Congress in respect to the Chinese. The Australian Provinces were also opposed to them, and he had showed conclusively that the experience everywhere among the English-speaking race was that the Chinese were not a people that it was desirable to encourage in coming to this country. As this was quite a new question in this country, at least in this part of the Dominion, he would simply draw the attention of the House mainly to China. China fronted the Dominion on the east, and she had a frontage of some 3,000 miles and a population of over 425,000,000. Now, with that population, they might very readily spare a very small percentage of it, and by that means they might not only overrun our territory, but also the adjacent territory of the United States. After they once obtained a strong foothold in the United States, they might naturally expect that they would not stop there, but come to Canada. There had been a great deal said about the admission of the British into China, and that, the British being admitted into China, the British ought to admit the Chinese everywhere within the British Empire. It would astonish anyone who would take the trouble to look into the fact to discover that there were scarcely any foreigners at all in China. He would draw attention to the Statesman's Year Book for 1878, and he would read the figures giving the number of resident foreigners in China :

"According to a return of the Imperial Customs authorities, the total number of foreigners resident in China at the end of 1872 was 3,661; among them were 1,771 natives of Great Britain and Ireland, 541 of the United States, 481 of Germany, 239 of France—all other nationalities being represented by a very few members. More than one-half of the total number of foreigners, viz.: 2,047, resided at Shanghai, and 308 at Canton, the remainder being scattered in small numbers over the ports open to foreign commerce."

That was in China proper; but there was an English colony adjacent to China, known as Hong Kong. That colony, also, had a very small European population. The total number of the resident population of the colony in 1871 was 1,381 men, 468 women, 407 boys, and 264 girls. This showed that the entire foreign population of European origin in China proper, as well as in Hong Kong, did not in the aggregate equal the total Chinese population, as alleged in the appendix to the petition, now living in British Columbia. It appeared to him there must be a great degree of unwisdom in allowing a people like the Chinese to flow into our country in those numbers, without giving us a corresponding return. He would next enquire, from whence do these Chinese come? It might be imagined they came from China direct to Canada, or direct from China to the Australian Colonies, or direct from China to the United States. But such was not the case. The Chinese went directly from China to the British port of Hong Kong, and there they took ship, and moved to the various countries around the Pacific Ocean. Sometimes they were taken to the port of Havana, or to some of the sugar-growing countries in South America. Occasionally, some Chinese passengers came direct from Hong Kong to British Columbia; but they generally came to British Columbia via San Francisco. They had, therefore, these facts before them, that they were suffering from the immigration of Chinese that reached them from the United States, and from Hong Kong. He took it that they required some repressive measure to keep out the Chinese, as they were a low class of the population, whose immigration they did not desire to encourage. They desired to encourage the immigration of first-class men and women. He would read to the House the kind of repressive measures they required, and the suggestions of the Committee of the Senate of California, which were as follows :—

“The duty devolves upon us to suggest a remedy for the suppression of this immigration. The Chinese now here are protected by our treaty obligations and laws, and that they will continue to receive that protection the people and Government of this State will be responsible. If further immigration is prevented they will gradually return to their own country, and the occupations in which they are now engaged will be supplied with labourers and immigrants of our own race. The temper of the people of California is such, that the employment of Chinese will be, as it has, to a considerable extent, already been, discouraged, and this will effectually compel their departure. As to future immigration, neither a total, nor partial, abrogation of the Burlingame Treaty will afford relief. The mass of, indeed the entire, immigration comes from the port of Hong Kong, a British colony. No alteration in our treaty stipulations with China could have the slightest effect upon the passenger trade of that port. The British Colonies of Australia have, like us, suffered under the incubus, and have recently endeavoured, by hostile legislation, and, in some instances, by force, to effect the exclusion, and obstruct the further ingress, of Chinese. Those agitations, coupled with the earnest and uniform policy of Great Britain, of suppressing any traffic resembling the slave trade, convince us that an appeal to that country would lead to the desired result. Indeed, we may well assume, in view of the amicable relations existing between the English Cabinet and people and the United States, that, in the absence of any urgent reasons, addressing themselves peculiarly to Her Majesty's Government, it would, upon proper diplomatic representation, cordially co-operate with our own Government in arriving at a satisfactory remedy.”

They concluded in this way :

“We would, therefore, most respectfully suggest as the means of a final solution of this grave and ever-increasing difficulty :

“First.—An appeal to the Government of Great Britain to co-operate with our own Government in the absolute prohibition of this trade in men and women ; and in the abrogation of all treaties between the three nations, permitting the emigration of Chinese to the United States.

“Second.—The joint and friendly action of the two countries with the Empire of China,

“And, in the meantime, we earnestly recommend legislation by Congress, limiting the number of Chinese allowed to be landed from any vessel entering the ports of the United States, to, say, not more than ten.

“This policy would, in a great degree, tend to a redress of the grievances that now sorely afflict our State, and threaten to overshadow her prosperity.”

He would next read for the information of the House—and he prayed its indulgence for taking up so much of its time, but this was the paramount question in the Pacific Province, he would only urge that as his excuse—from another report ; that was, the report of the Joint Special Committee of the United States Congress. They said :

“This problem is too important to be treated with indifference. Congress should solve it, having due regard to any rights already accrued under existing treaties, and to humanity. But it must be solved in the judgment of the Committee, unless our Pacific possessions are to be ultimately given over to a race alien in all its tendencies, which will make of it, practically, Provinces of China rather than States of the Union. The Committee recommend that measures be taken by the Executive, looking toward a modification of the existing treaty with China, confining it to strictly commercial purposes ; and that Congress legislate to restrain the great influx of Asiatics into this country. It is not believed that either of these measures would be looked upon with disfavour by the Chinese Government. Whether this is so or not, a duty is owing to the Pacific States and Territories which are suffering under this terrible scourge, but are patiently waiting for relief from Congress.”

He might add that the concluding portion of this report, which said that the States of the Pacific were suffering from this terrible scourge, applied also to British Columbia as much as it did to California or Oregon. He came now to what he regarded as something a little more practical, namely, what could Canada do if she were willing? He was glad to know that Canada, in his judgment, could do something. And, as the hon. the Minister of Public Works was in his seat, and proposed to construct a railway across this continent—a gigantic undertaking—which would employ a large number of men for many years, the petitioners, whose petition was before the House, asked that no Chinese should be employed upon the public works. This was strictly within their own jurisdiction, and under their own control. They would not be violating any treaty. They might simply exercise their own undoubted right, and say whether they would employ Canadian born, or alien, or Asiatic labour. If the Government would pass a resolution or import provisions of this character into the contracts, respecting the Pacific Railway, or any other public work of the Dominion, either on the Pacific coast or elsewhere, it would act as a repressive measure. It would be the means of preventing Chinese labour taking the place of the white man's labour. It would be the means of inducing the white man to come with his family and settle down in the country. It would result in introducing five persons into the country, of our own race, where only one was introduced before. If the Government were willing to do this, the Government would act as benefactors of the country. There was another point wherein the Government might put a stop to the Chinese obtaining a foothold in this country. The Government had vast territories; this territory included Keewatin, the unsold portion of Manitoba, and the North-West Territory, and within a very short time millions of acres of land in British Columbia would be passed over to the Dominion, on account of the construction of the Pacific Railway. Now, he took it that the Government might, by the amendment of the Lands Act, make such a provision that no Mongolian should be allowed to purchase land, that no Chinaman should be allowed to lease land belonging to the Dominion, and the tenure might be so fixed that even those who bought land would be prohibited from selling or leasing their lands to Chinamen. By this means they might introduce a repressive measure that would operate against such a low class of immigrants as he had shown by extracts read to-day. To prevent the Chinese immigrating to this country, we ought to amend our Naturalisation Law, so that they could not be naturalised. In the United States they were prohibited from exercising the rights of American citizens, according to recent renderings of the Courts. In Canada, also, they should not be allowed to be naturalised, and, if any such were already naturalised, they should be dis-

franchised. Another point was that our Shipping Acts should be so amended that no Chinamen should be allowed to act on board our ships or our steamers within our waters as sailor, as stoker, as cook, or as waiter. They should be entirely excluded from any opportunity whatever to gain employment in a Canadian bottom. He had been on board American ships on the Pacific coast, where out of a complement of 100 persons there were only 15 English, and the rest were Chinese, with whom it was impossible to communicate except by a few words. Another point was that our Immigration Acts should be amended in such a manner as to restrict the importation of Chinese, and more particularly in regard to those detained in quarantine on account of diseases, because it was a notorious fact that they brought the leprosy with them, not only moral, but physical. All these repressive measures Canada could adopt without the consent of England or any other country; but when it came to the question of keeping the Chinese out of our territory, we should have to amend the treaty between Great Britain and China. The British Government might make an arrangement by which the Custom-house at Hong Kong might prohibit ships from taking Chinese passengers to this country. The Chinese might then, and no doubt would object, that, as they allowed us to go any where through their territory, they should have the right to pass through our territory, and they would urge that such an attempt would be a violation of the treaty. If we made an arrangement with the United States, asking them to prohibit any of their vessels from taking Chinese passengers to our ports, they would then call up the Burlingame Treaty, which said:

"The United States of America, and the Emperor of China cordially recognise the inherent and insalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects, respectively, from the one country to the other, for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents. Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, or exemptions in respect to travel or residence, as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favoured nations. And reciprocally, Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States, shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions, in respect to travel or residence, as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favoured nations. But nothing herein contained shall be held to confer naturalisation upon citizens of the United States in China, nor upon the subjects of China in the United States."

Hence, the only means he could see by which we might stop this immigration of Chinese to Canada was by the United States Government acting in concert with the Government of Great Britain, to modify their treaties with China, and to confine them simply to commercial transactions, instead of allowing them to move their people into our country, to remain here, and to engage in any industry. Thanking the House for its indulgence, he moved the adoption of the substantive motion, hoping that the Committee would be able to arrive at some practical conclusion, which would assist the Government in doing something to relieve the Western Province from the terrible scourge from which it was now suffering in the way of Chinese immigration.

MR. MACKENZIE said he would like to know what course the Government proposed to take in reference to this matter. The hon. gentleman had indicated what he desired, which was the expulsion of a certain class of people from the continent, and the prevention of that class from coming to the continent in future, in any capacity whatever, whether as servants or on board vessels. He (Mr. Mackenzie) would like to know what course the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government proposed to take before he said anything on the subject.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he could see no objection to the appointment of a Select Committee to enquire into this subject. The Committee should be very impartial, in order to look at all phases of the question. This was a matter that interested not only Canada, but the whole of this continent. As his hon. friend had shown very carefully, it also interested our sister colonies in Australia. It was well that this whole subject should be carefully studied before the overwhelming Chinese population came upon us, and, we ought, as early as possible, to enquire into the whole matter. He knew no better mode of doing this than by having a very carefully-selected Committee examine all the evidence, and study the case as it had been presented in California, and along the Pacific coast, and also in the various colonies of Australia. There could be no better course than by taking it up at once, and having it fully studied for the future action of Parliament. He presumed, if a Committee were granted in a matter of such importance, all they could do would be to collect evidence, and to ask leave, as was the custom in England, to report at a future Session.

MR. ANGLIN said he observed power was asked to send for persons and papers; if persons came all the way from British Columbia as witnesses, it would cost a great deal of money.

MR. DECOSMOS said there was no intention to send to British Columbia for persons or papers. If there was any necessity to examine witnesses in British Columbia, the Government would, doubtless, appoint a Commission to do so.

MR. BUNSTER said he had this motion as a duty he owed to the Province from which he came; and he did so with pleasure, since he believed it to be in the interest of the whole Dominion. It afforded him great gratification to witness the kindly spirit in which the House had received the motion. When, a year ago, he brought a similar motion before the House, the members did not seem to know as much of the Chinese question as they did to-day. He thought the present House had given more attention to this great and growing evil, which was gradually working its way eastward from the Pacific coast. The people on the Pacific coast were better judges than gentlemen in the Eastern Provinces of what the results of this great evil was likely to be upon the human family. If he could use language to describe how injurious was the importation of the Chinese to our country, it would make every hon. gentleman's blood in this House run cold, and particularly every hon. gentleman who had the responsibility on his shoulders of raising a family in any part of this Dominion, when he considered the evil influence which was likely to befall any member of that family. For his part he would say that he never would have made British Columbia his home, had he thought that country was to be visited by such an intolerable nuisance and curse. It was the bounden duty of every public man in the Dominion to consider carefully how we could protect a race that had prospered so well, and had been so much admired by the rest of the world as the Canadian people. And he would tell them that, if Canadians did not set their face firmly against the importation of the Chinese, they would regret it once and for ever. In years to come they would regret that they did not give more attention to the subject. This matter was one of interest to the whole English-speaking race; it had attracted great attention in Australia, and in all British colonies, who, with the people of British Columbia, viewed with great suspicion and alarm the danger which threatened us from the incursion of a surplus population of 400,000,000 of people in China. We saw them coming here in little bands, but they were sent as agents to report on what they saw and experienced, and how much money they could make by keeping laundries and other industries, to the prejudice of our own people. This Chinese immigration had proved, as he had said, a great curse to his Province, because, instead of having 30,000 or 40,000 white people in that Province, the Chinese had come and taken the place of the European immigrants that would have come in as miners, or as agriculturists. He knew that International treaties stood in the way of the removal of this obnoxious race, but he could not help thinking that Great Britain would consent to alter or amend those treaties, and that she would send a commissioner to China, who would say to the Government of that country that our people and theirs could not agree, and that there was likely to be bloodshed between them, unless immigration was stopped. These treaties must be annulled, and it was better to annul it with British gold than with British blood. He did not think the proposed Committee would be expensive, because, as had been well said by the hon. mover of the resolution, they did not intend to send to British Columbia for any more evidence than they already had. When the report came down to this House, he was satisfied it would meet with the consideration it deserved.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said that, after the lucid manner in which this question had been presented to the House by the hon. mover of the resolution, and after the exhaustive details he had brought forward, it would not be necessary for him to say anything further than that he entirely concurred in the motion. He believed, when this Committee collected evidence and submitted it to the House and to the people of Canada, they would agree that Chinese immigration to the Pacific coast was a curse to the Dominion and to the world at large. That immigration to the Pacific coast meant the settlement of the Chinese not there alone, but everywhere from the plains of the North-West to Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. If this evil was allowed to go on unchecked, in time it would subvert the whole white race on this continent. When they should have thousands and millions of barbarians pouring forth from their empire in the East in hordes that would overrun Canadian territories, they might expect to see them supplant western civilization, as the northern hordes overturned that of the Roman Empire. They would fill our country with their descendants and impose on it their manners, morality, or rather immorality, and religion. Everyone who had come in contact with that race must know its blighting influence on civilization, and that its presence on a large scale was an evil which it was necessary to crush out, if they wished to see their country flourish and progress. He thought that this matter could be dealt with in no better manner than by the appointing of such a Committee as that now proposed. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) had correctly described the feeling on the Pacific coast. He (Mr. Thompson) knew that in every part of it, from British Columbia to Arizona, every white man felt that Chinese were a nuisance and a curse, and that getting rid of them, by any means, was an end that must be accomplished. If they did not get rid of the Chinese, the Chinese would get rid of them. They did not bring their families to America, but sent everything they could save to China, and even their bones. It was part of the bargain with the companies who hired them that their bones should be sent back, after death, to China. They had their secret societies, as described, wherein even their own countrymen were murdered on disobeying their rules. The proceedings of those societies were undiscoverable. Was it right that such a race should be encouraged to come among us and be allowed all the privileges of whites—that the corrupting and blighting influence of the Chinese should be allowed to overwhelm the land, and every good and glorious thing it possessed? The jails on the Pacific coast were filled with them; they were capable of every iniquity under the sun; they could not be believed on oath, and their interpreters often contradicted each other in Court. How was it possible for anybody to get any information as to the secrets or doings of such men? As to the statement that British Columbia was doing a large business with China, he might state that during the last six months of 1878, they exported to foreign countries goods to the amount of $1,878,803, of which amount only $34,720, or one and four-fifths per cent., went to China. All that they exported to China was occasionally a cargo of lumber. He trusted that the House would see the wisdom of taking this serious subject into consideration, and, if possible, of devising some means by which that great evil which threatened to overwhelm their country, namely, the unlimited immigration, might be averted.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that to avow the principle that some classes of the human family were not fit to be residents in this Dominion would be dangerous and contrary to the law of nations and the policy which controlled Canada. They usually spoke of all British countries as being a home for all who came to them, and it was at present perfectly well known that Canadians were not competent to exclude the Chinese. He quite sympathised with a good deal that the hon. gentlemen from British Columbia had said about the unpleasantness of the neighbourhood of a great mass of Chinese. But what remedy was proposed? If it was a mere question of how the Chinese were to be governed in Canada, the Government might take the matter up; but the whole aim of the British Columbians was to devise the speediest means of excluding them from the country. That was a measure he could not, on principle, accede to, as he believed the principle would be surely abused in the worst possible manner, were such power committed to any officials. He believed that it would be contrary to the principle on which their community was based. While the Chinese had bad, they had, no doubt, also good qualities. The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Thompson) had stated that there were many criminals among the Chinese, including perjurers; he might get equally bad cases in Canada without going to the Chinese. His impression was, from all he had heard, that the mass of the Chinese in California were better behaved as regarded the observance of the law of the land than the same number of whites. He feared that the same was the case in British Columbia; and, however unpleasant the neighbourhood of the Chinese might be, he did not see how it was possible to accede to the proposition to expel them without at once giving up all they held sacred as to the rights of man in their own as in other countries.

Mr. MILLS said he thought the motion was very objectionable, and that the mover's observations were not consistent with each other. He said that the Chinese scattered on this continent nearly all came from one Province; that they did not make America their home, but desired to return to China, to which they sent their earnings, and that they in no wise dissociated themselves from their native land. That was true; then what became of all the hon. gentleman had said for the last hour? He told them that the Chinese ought not to acquire property or rights here; that they should take special care that the Chinese did not supplant the white population. Where was the danger if they belonged, and intended to return, to China? Where was the necessity of taking the proposed action against people who sent their earnings to China, with the intention of, some day, returning thither? The hon. mover proposed to deal with these people as their Christian ancestors, to their dishonour, did with the Jews. It was only necessary to give those people a bad name, to represent their peculiarities as crimes. They recognised the particular practices and customs of the Indians, and did not experience any inconvenience from them. The Indians were Tartars, or members of the same Mongolian race, against whom might be said all that had been alleged against the Chinese. The proposition now advocated was not creditable to this age or country—that they should propose to attach odium to a nation with whom their Mother Country carried on trade, and had treaty relations. They should not give the Chinese a bad name, and then hunt them down like rabid dogs.

MR. SCRIVER said that, while he sympathised with some of the views of the hon. gentleman who just sat down, and of the leader of the Opposition, he thought the House should not shut its eyes to the importance of that subject, nor to the importance it had assumed in the neighbouring country. They were all aware of what had taken place in the American Congress, where they had passed a law embodying substantially the principle for which the members for British Columbia had contended; and, although the law was vetoed by the President, it came near being passed over his veto. That was in consequence of the agitation on the Western Pacific slope. The people of California, he thought, were almost unanimous in the belief that the evils which had already come to them in consequence of the Chinese emigration were insufferable. He did not attach very great importance to the economic aspect of the question, but the moral aspect was one which they must not ignore. For his own part he was quite willing—while not prepared to go as far as the mover—to see a Committee appointed to investigate the question so far as the interests of the Dominion were, or were likely to be, concerned.

MR. HUNTINGTON said that he thought the difficulty in California was not altogether on the moral aspect of the question. They were living in an age which witnessed a great embarrassment among the workmen as regarded the making of a living. The severity of the competition had entered into the discussion of the question in that country; the course pursued in which should not surprise them, as it was largely given over to the doctrines of Protection to everything but labour. The Government of the States were called upon to protect the native labour as they had hitherto protected the native manufactures, which was a phase of the question that Canadians ought not to lose sight of. When the senior member for Victoria (Sir John A. Macdonald) had no opinions to express at present, he (Mr. Huntington) would be inclined to wait until he heard from him. Still he thought it well they should understand this was what the Minister of Public Works would call inserting the thin edge of Protection in reference to the labour question, and the time was not so far distant when the Chinese would not be the only people who would be regarded as standing in the sunlight of the great labour interest of this country. When the hon. gentlemen had studied the moral aspect of the question, they must extend their view and take the economic aspect into consideration. He did not undertake to say that the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Decosmos) was at all influenced by other than the high moral consideration he had mentioned. The hon. gentleman would agree with him that the labour question in British Columbia was intimately connected with the apprehension that the great danger was hanging like a cloud over the country. They knew that was the case in the United States. He would simply remark that they were hearing the first murmurs, but the system they were adopting was likely to multiply them as time went on.

MR. DECOSMOS said he could not help feeling amused at the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite. They appeared to be something like anglers, throwing out a fly with the expectation of catching a trout. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) said he did not wish to say anything against this motion, and was disposed to wait. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was disposed to indulge in a little logic of very poor quality. And as to the leader of the Opposition, he was the personification of the old-fashioned notion that the moment a slave touched British soil he was free; that Britain, to-day, was an asylum where everyone could at once gain a foothold, and be recognised as living under the protection of the British flag. A country with such vast territory as Canada possessed to-day, must take larger views than obtained a few years ago, when it was but a few scattered isolated Provinces, and had not grown up into a vast nationality. It was the duty of a statesman to meet this question, not merely in a narrow spirit, with a view to find fault with the Government of the hour, but to take a patriotic stand, and endeavour to probe the subject to the bottom, and discover whether there were any real grounds for an enquiry into the question of Chinese labour and immigration. But to stifle its discussion at the outset was unfair, injudicious, and not following the ordinarily deliberate course that obtained in the Imperial Parliament. He would merely refer to some of the remarks of the hon. member for Shefford. He stated this was entering the thin end of the wedge of Protection with reference to labour. It had no connection with Protection, except that due protection we all ought to give, irrespective of politics, to our race in our own country against an Asiatic and pagan horde that would overrun and crush us whenever opportunity was afforded. If hon. gentlemen opposite studied the various aspects of the Chinese question, whether it were on the Russian border, in the neighbourhood of Afghanistan, or on the Pacific coast; if they would take up the Consular reports of the United States, read the letters of correspondents, look into the volume of trade, study the ambitious projects of the Chinese, they might discover that we were standing to-day in peril as to our future from a country with 400 millions of inhabitants, within forty days' sail by sailing vessels, that was buying steamers, and driving the flag of the United States from the waters of China, that could reach the shores of British Columbia, and gain a foothold in California, within 25 or 28 days by steamship. If it were to acquire a thorough knowledge of the use of modern implements of warfare and skill in the management of ships, and they had one built on the European model, and to send their fleets to the Pacific, our wives might yet hush their children to sleep by whispering to them: "The Chinese are coming." Just as sure as the sun shone to-day, there would be a conflict between the Mongolian race and our own. They were on the move as in times past, when Tamerlane and Ganges Khan moved with their horrid masses from the banks of the Amoor and its tributaries until they landed in European Turkey. What had occurred in the past would occur again. History repeated itself, and he warned hon. gentlemen that they should not ride this hobby of theirs to death. When a great people like the people of California, when a great Congress like the Congress of the United States, took up this question, and dealt with it as they had, when a Schouvaloff rose at the World's Congress and warned European nationalities, it would become hon. gentlemen opposite to look more seriously into this question, and not in any carping way. They should place this question above party interests, and consider it in the interests of common humanity, in the interests of that race which gave the best religion and laws to mankind.

MR. MACDONNELL said he quite sympathised with the hon. gentleman who had just spoken. It would, however, be a very unprecedented act on the part of the Dominion, and at variance with the policy of other nations, to pass a law to prevent the immigration of people from any portion of the world. If some people came into this country, bringing with them practices or habits of immorality, or any other peculiarities which we could not tolerate, we should rather suppress such peculiarities by legislation than legislate for the exclusion of such people. It might be the duty of this Dominion, as it had been of other countries, to send missionaries into other countries in order to ameliorate the condition of the morals of inhabitants, and, if we passed a law to exclude the Chinese, if we closed our ports to any people of any portions of the world, such countries could retaliate, and close their ports against us. He could not agree to any proposition which would have for effect the exclusion from this wide Dominion of any nationality whatsoever. It was well known that people were improved by intermixture, and the greater variety of nationalities we had in this country, the more vigorous and intelligent would our population become.

Motion agreed to on a division.

DISMISSAL OF POSTMASTER AT ST. SIMON.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. FISET moved for a statement showing all complaints, if any, made against J. D. Bouchard, station master at St. Simon Station, on the Intercolonial Railway, and the reason for which he was discharged from his office.

MR. TUPPER: I presume my hon. friend will give some reason to the House for making this motion.

MR. FISET said he believed Mr. Bouchard had been discharged without reason, and wished to ascertain the facts.

MR. TUPPER said, when an hon. member asked for a return for papers, he should show some cause for complaint. He was prepared to give the fullest information, but the time of the House should not be uselessly occupied and expense created, in preparing papers such as those asked for, unless the hon. member who moved for them was prepared to advance some reason for making the motion.

MR. MACKENZIE said he differed from the hon. the Minister of Public Works. Any hon. member was entitled to the information he asked for in a matter of this kind, without stating further reason than that he believed the officer had been unjustly dismissed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the invariable rule, and it could be found in May's Parliamentary Practice, was that every hon. member moving for papers, and putting the country to the expense of getting up a return, was bound to give his reasons. It would be a clog on the administration of affairs if every act of the Administration could be made a matter of legislative discussion at the simple request of any hon. member, not backed by reasons of any kind.

MR. FISET enquired whether, in his capacity of member for the county of Rimouski, he had not the right of asking for the reasons which had rendered necessary the dismissal of Mr. Bouchard, as well as the dismissal of all those concerning whom he had asked for papers. He would say more, and that was that, in the county of Rimouski, that he had the honour of representing, dismissals were the order of the day. It was sufficient that such and such an employé had supported him (Mr. Fiset) during the late election, in order to institute an enquiry into his conduct and dismiss him. He could well understand why hon. members on the other side were opposed to his motion, for if it carried the public would know that these men had been dismissed unjustly and without any other reason than that they had voted for him. At all events, he would enter his protest against the line of conduct pursued with regard to officials in the county of Rimouski, who had supported the Liberal party during the late election.

MR. TUPPER said the House could not have a better illustration of the impropriety of making such motions than in the case of the motion of the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Fiset). He was not at all surprised that the mover of the motion did not venture to offer to the House any complaint in reference to the matter under consideration. The hon. the leader of the Opposition said that every member of the House had the right to ask for any papers he chose, or to ask for an investigation.

MR. MACKENZIE: I did not say investigation.

MR. TUPPER said he understood the hon. gentleman to say that any member could ask for anything he chose. He (Mr. Tupper) would not say that a Minister, or the Ministry, should be the judge, but that the House should be the judge as to whether a prima facie case had been made for the production of correspondence, or the bringing down of returns. He had brought down this Session, most voluminous returns upon the most frivolous motions—returns which had taken up the time of officers, who otherwise would have been employed at important work, and which eventually found their way into some waste-paper basket. He did not think that was in the interest of the House or country. He thought that, where there was reason to believe that the slightest injustice had been done by the Government to the humblest public servant, then any hon. member was fairly entitled to demand the production of any papers on the subject, after he had made a statement of the facts to the House, and, although the grounds given might be regarded as insufficient, he (Mr. Tupper) did not think the House would be disposed to arrive at a conclusion in the case without having the papers before them. What he complained of was that the hon. member had not uttered a single word to show that there had been any injustice in this case, but simply left it to be publicly recorded that such a return had been asked for, and, if the motion was allowed to pass, it would lead the country to think that the House assumed that some injustice had been done. The hon. gentleman knew that the services of the party mentioned in the motion had been dispensed with, along with those of a great many other parties, in order to reduce the public expenditure. The hon. gentleman must know that a reduction of $40,000 could not be made in the expenditure of the Intercolonial Railway, in salaries of officials alone, and the parties whose services were not necessary be retained. The fact that he (Mr. Tupper), though it was a painful duty on his part, had to dispense with the services of a great many officers of the highest character and standing, who had discharged their duties faithfully, ought to be sufficient reason for the discharging of the party referred to in this motion. He might add that a large number of the persons whose services had been dispensed with had been life long political friends and supporters of his. He would say further in reference to this particular case that, even if the services of this party had not been dispensed with on account of the reorganisation of the Intercolonial Railway, he would have been discharged on account of its having been proved by evidence brought out in another investigation that this official had gone into a railway car and insulted passengers. Not only was that the case, but he had refused to perform work which it was his duty to perform. He thought that, under these circumstances, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Fiset) would have consulted the interest of the party concerned if he had left this motion in abeyance.

MR. HOLTON said it appeared to him that the hon. the Minister of Public Works had given every good reason why these papers should be brought down. He (Mr. Tupper) told the House that this party had acted improperly, and a statement of that kind would be most injurious to the party referred to, and the hon. gentlemen should not withhold the papers.

MR. TUPPER said he was not going to refuse the papers. He merely wished to show the impropriety of making motions of this kind, without a statement of facts being made, or some grounds given for granting the papers.

Motion agreed to.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee and reported:—

Bill (No. 50) Respecting La Banque Jacques Cartier.—(Mr. Cockburn, West Northumberland.)

Bill (No. 28) To amend an Act, intitled: "An Act respecting the Intercolonial Railway," passed in the 39th year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria.—(Mr. Girouard Jacques Cartier.)

CIVIL SERVICE BILL.—(BILL 8.)

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order for second reading read.

MR. CASEY said this Bill related to a subject which he had been agitating more or less for about four Sessions.

and no doubt his persistent agitation of this matter called down upon him a certain amount of ridicule from those who did not think the subject was of sufficient importance to require an investigation, or that the evils which had been discovered were of sufficient consequence to demand a remedy. He felt, however, that the more this matter was discussed the more it would be seen there was reason for investigation and reform. He was emboldened in this proceeding by the fact that the press of the country had very largely agreed with the views he had taken in this matter. They seemed to agree that something was wrong in the Civil Service, that some remedy was required, though there was not a universal agreement on the remedy he proposed. He was happy to see that it received approval from those who had so much to do in influencing public opinion. If it were not that there were so many new members in the House who were not acquainted with the past history of this agitation, he would not enter again into any lengthened discussion of the subject, but he felt bound to do so to a certain extent, on account of that fact. It began by his having a discussion in the House four years ago. Two years ago he followed up the matter by moving the appointment of a Committee composed of gentlemen from both sides of the House, to investigate the present state of the Civil Service, and to suggest a remedy. After examining the heads of all the Departments, he thought—he did not know that they missed one—and several officers under those gentlemen, the Committee unanimously, after considering the scheme laid before them, the system at present in force in England and some of the other colonies—Victoria, for instance—agreed on a report, pointing out a great number of evils they found to exist in the Civil Service, and the remedy which they would recommend. He would, in passing, refer to a few clauses of the report which they then presented. They found, in the first place, that there did exist an Act which purported to regulate the officers of the Civil Service, and which had been on the Statute-book since 1857; but they found that that Act was practically a dead letter. There was no check to the appointments, except the check which existed in the conscientiousness of the member recommending the candidate, or of the Government which received the recommendation. The Committee found, in effect, that the present law provided only a means of excluding the totally ignorant, and, that even this means was not put in operation. He thought, speaking from memory, that, within the six or seven years preceding the sitting of this Committee, only ten examinations had been held, and they found by looking at the papers, that the examination for admission into the high schools of Ontario was more rigid than that to which Civil Service candidates were submitted. And, even then, they found the examination had been the exception rather than the rule. The deputy head of the Post Office Department told them that the average class of men which they obtained in the post-office was not as good as that obtained by banks and insurance companies, or other similar private institutions. This evidence was confirmed by most of those who were examined before the Committee. He thought there was only one deputy head who told them he was perfectly satisfied with the material supplied to him. It seemed to him (Mr. Casey) that this was a very anomalous and improper state of things. He did not think it was too much to ask the Government that this country should be served by young men, who were not only equal to those obtained by private institutions, but superior. He thought it was reasonable to say that the Government required better servants than any private institutions, and he thought it was reasonable to suppose that the Government could obtain better servants than those private institutions. They paid higher salaries to their clerks upon entering, and it was consequently natural to suppose that they could get the best men. Yet, according to the heads of the Departments, the Government did not get as good men as commercial institutions which paid smaller salaries. He desired to know what could be the reason of this. Without going any further, he might as well take the evidence of those gentlemen who were examined before the Committee. They said the cause of his inferiority was the manner in which the appointments were made. It arose from the system of appointment by political patronage instead of selection in some way for merit. If a private institution wished to select an employé, they did not ask some of their personal friends to recommend a young man and then take him on trust. They wished to be satisfied that the young man was capable of discharging the duties which would be imposed upon him, and that he was honest and had the physical ability to withstand the strain of the work he had to do. But the Government did nothing of the kind. When an officer was required, or a vacancy occurred, the most influential friend of the Government who had a friend to nominate for the vacancy was sure of having his friend appointed without any scrutiny whatever in regard to his antecedents or qualifications. He hoped hon. gentlemen would not think he referred entirely to the present Government. He was quite aware that the system of patronage had gone on without any efficient checks under all the Governments that had existed in Canada. He did not blame any particular Government, but he condemned the system under which these appointments were made. The argument in favour of the present system was that we had a responsible government, and that somebody must be responsible for the appointments, and that the gentleman who recommended and the Minister who made the appointments were responsible. He thought there could be nothing more hollow than this sham of responsibility. Had they ever heard of an instance in this House of a member being called upon to give the reason for an appointment which he had recommended? They had sometimes found a Minister called upon to make an explanation in such an exigency, but the man who had actually made the nomination was never called upon. There was no direct responsibility of a member. If he was responsible to anybody it must be to his constituents; but his constituents were not always especially well qualified to judge of the fitness of an appointment. They might judge of its popularity or unpopularity, and this would lead the member to appoint the man who was most popular, and not the man whom he knew to be most fitted for the position. He desired to glance at a member's qualifications for making a selection, supposing him to be a conscientious man. What did the member know of those who applied to him for office? It was perfectly preposterous to expect every member to know the antecedents, private character, education and qualifications of one-tenth of those who applied to him for appointments. Now the only argument in favour of political patronage, was that somebody was responsible; but he thought it appeared, as a matter of fact, that no one was really responsible. And, if any one was even nominally responsible, it was not one who was qualified to make a proper selection of officers for the public service. Passing from the mere question of appointments, he would consider the effects of these appointments upon the service. In the first place, the influence which made the appointment did not cease there. It regulated the promotion and discipline of the service. It was a matter of notoriety that it was impossible to enforce discipline upon those who had a powerful protector in the House or in the Ministry, and it was impossible to dismiss an officer who had a friend in the Government, no matter how inefficient that official might be. Then, it was impossible for young men to obtain the promotion they would obtain in any other branch of life in which they used their talents. It was a matter of fact also that this insecurity of obtaining promotion injured the service and discouraged the ambitious. Indolent men, who hung on long enough, obtained their promotion without deserving it. He could cite instances in which good men had been discouraged, and the head of the Post Office Department told them that this was the reason he obtained such poor men in his Department. One of his deputies gave them an instance of a gentleman who, at present, held a seat on the floor of this House, and who was once in the Post Office Department (the hon. member for Essex). He was ambitious to make his work tell for himself, but, finding that his work did not tell very well in the Post Office Department, he resigned, studied, and entered his profession, and he now sat in this House, though still a young man. There was no doubt that other instances occurred, though perhaps not so striking as this ; but, so long as this system continued, young ambitious men would drop out of the service, in which hard work and application went for nothing. He would next consider how political appointments worked when they came to the higher grades of the service. They all knew there were a great many employes in the public service who were in confidential positions, and who knew a great deal of what was going on. Many of them had knowledge of Government secrets. Supposing these gentlemen to have been appointed by political patronage ; supposing they were ardent friends of the Government under which they were appointed ; supposing one of them was a relative of a Minister, and that they remained in office after that Minister went out ; and supposing these gentlemen generally to be in confidential positions under the incoming Government, he thought it placed both the officials and the Government in false positions. The knowledge that they were appointed for political reasons, could not fail to give rise to a coldness and a want of confidence in them. This lack of confidence did not stop there ; it extended over the whole service. A Minister was impeded at every step by employes who had no sympathy with his politics, or who, perhaps, disliked him. It impeded, also, the business of the country. He thought still further that the system of political appointments had a most damaging effect upon the self-respect of the service generally, and upon persons who wished to obtain positions in that service. If the service were an honorable profession such as law, medicine, or any other occupation in which gentlemen engaged, it would be an inducement for gentlemen of ability to seek entrance into the service. But under the present circumstances, it would never become anything better than a refuge for those friends of the Ministry, or of the Ministry's friends who had no other career open to them. Of course he did not intend these remarks to apply to the higher grades of the service, because it was obvious there must be a large number of clever men in these grades. These gentlemen had to make up by extra exertions for the very poor quality of assistance given to them by the Government. It was demoralising not only to those who received or expected the patronage, but to those who exercised it. Gentlemen now on the Opposition side of the House had had their turn, and now the gentlemen on the Ministerial side were having their turn, and, if the latter hon. gentlemen did not feel, as many of them who supported the late Government did, that the exercise of patronage was very unpleasant in the sense he had indicated, his (Mr. Casey's) ideas were greatly mistaken. It was unnecessary to point out that such a system offered means to the Government of the day of influencing or gaining supporters by the distribution of offices ; but it was not, perhaps, unworthy of notice that it was a real danger at the present time. That brought him, however illogically, to another branch of his attack in the present system. He should have stated before coming to this point that the present system led inevitably to what was called the American system, but which might, in a few years, be designated as the Canadian system. It was very reasonable to contend that a man who owed his appointment solely to political reasons, should go out with the party he supported. It was quite natural for the incoming Administration to feel that they had friends of their own as well qualified to discharge their duties as those that were employed. It always seemed to him (Mr. Casey) that a system of political appointments must, sooner or later, lead to political dismissals. It was not a very long time since the United States system was the same as that of Canada. One Government after another coming into power gradually fell into the present system, until the time of Andrew Jackson, when a clean sweep was made. He contended some years ago that the same result was inevitable here, and late events showed that it was coming pretty near. If the present Government had not distinctly initiated the American system of dismissing their political opponents, they had at least dismissed a great many—an unusually large proportion of them. He was not in a position to speak positively on that point, because the report moved for a long time ago had not yet come down ; but he was inclined to think the number of dismissals must have been very great, since the clerks of the Departments had not yet been able to foot them all up. But even more significant than the mere number was the fact that members of this House had been found, for the first time, prepared to stand up here and demand the introduction of the American system—demand the dismissal of all those who were opposed to them at the late elections, and the substitution of their political friends. When the House had reached that point, and when Ministers could hear such language without rebuking it, he thought the time had come when they might look for the introduction of the American system as something in the near future. If the present Ministers did not carry it out in all its entirety, who knew but that their successors might? Who knew but that the ill feeling engendered by these wrangles might lead to some exasperated Ministry determining on a clean sweep on coming into power? It was simply a question of time; when party feeling had become sufficiently excited and public opinion sufficiently debauched, some Ministry or other would make a clean sweep of all the appointments made by their predecessors, and substitute their own friends. Nothing could be more detrimental to the public service than the relations between Ministers and their followers, which the American system induced. They knew that office-holders on the other side of the line were not only an organised band of workers in defence of the Government which appointed them, but they were taxed to provide an election fund for the support of the party to which they belonged; and a newspaper in Canada had even gone so far as to suggest that such a thing was proper here. They had seen, lately, what a storm was evoked in this House, by the fact that here and there some country postmaster, a lighthouse-keeper, or something of that sort, who had been appointed by the late Premier, had had the audacity to support his friends at the election then pending. These complaints were just; these men should not have been so pronounced in their political feelings. But, if they looked upon these casual interferences with disapproval, what must they expect when the whole Civil Service of the country should have become an organised institution for the purpose of supporting those who had the power in their hands for the time being?

Not only would the Civil Service be an organised party for the purpose of maintaining themselves in position, but those who desired to obtain their places would be organised to put them out, and so the country would more than ever be divided into the "ins and outs," fighting for the possession of the spoils. Was this a prospect which those who had clamoured for the introduction of the American system would like to face. He would now refer to what appeared to him to be an efficient remedy for these evils. The remedy he proposed was not a theoretical one originated by himself, but it was a system which had been for many years in operation, among one of the most practical people in the world—he referred to the English system. The principle of the Bill was the same as the principle prevailing in the English Civil Service, but the details had been changed to suit our circumstances. The system was first tried in the Indian Service, and, being found to work satisfactorily there, it was extended step by step to the different Departments, and at present the appointments were made in accordance with it, to nearly all the Departments. The principle on which the English Civil Service was worked was what he might designate as the business principle. Men were not chosen at all for their political sympathies, but for their fitness for the position, ascertained as far as this could be done without actual experiment. The power of nominating to offices under the Government had been almost entirely taken away from members of Parliament, and was entrusted to a Civil Service Board, composed of a number of gentlemen not connected with politics, but distinguished from their scientific or other attainments. Applicants for position in the Civil Service were subjected to a primary examination, which showed their general fitness for the positions, and proved their possession of an ordinary English education. All who passed this were supposed to be fit for employment in the service; but the problem remained how to choose some amongst this number for the vacancies which existed. The Civil Service Commissioners made this choice by means of a subsequent competitive examination, which was much more severe than the first one, comprising a great variety of subjects. Those who passed the competitive examination were graded in the order of their standing, and the vacant positions were distributed among them in the same order. The idea was simply the abolition of political patronage, and the substitution of merit. He did not pretend that this system had worked perfectly in England; but he did maintain, from the report of the Commissioners he had seen, that it worked much better than the old scheme. Moreover, no Government had ever attempted any relaxation of this plan, though both parties in the country had made it stricter and more abiding. A system which had thus stood the trial of many years' experience among such a practical people, which had stood the scrutiny of the press, and overcome the opposition of the privileged classes, had certainly proved its utility and excellence. There were errors in it, no doubt. No examination, however carefully conducted, could be an accurate test of a man's fitness to fill an important position. It could only be proved that he had the requisites necessary for all positions. A special fitness for a practical situation could only be ascertained by actual experiment. This had been made a ground of objection against the system. It had been said you cannot choose a proper Civil Service officer by an examination any more than you can choose a distinguished officer for the army. A friend of his told him the other day that the fact of a distinguished commander in the Zulu war having been almost plucked in the examination was a point against this system. He did not think it was by any means; he did not think the fact that an uneducated man occasionally made a very good officer was an argument against the position that educated men generally made the best officers, either in the Civil Service or the army. The Civil Service Commissioners maintained it had been found by experience that those who were the best educated generally made the best officials. He did not limit that to England; he found that point had been decided to a small extent among ourselves. The Department of Inland Revenue had been for some years an exception to the rule that examination was not enforced upon public officers in Canada. They had in that Department instituted something like a competitive examination on a small scale. He would quote from the evidence of Mr. Miall, Assistant Commissioner of Inland Revenue, to show that examination had there been found not only a good test of efficiency for the service, but a good means for testing a man's fitness for promotion:—

“ Mr. Miall detailed the experience of the Department, and stated that those who passed the best examinations proved to be the best officers on actual trial, while those who failed were altogether useless.”

The House would take for granted that the best educated men would make the best public servants, other things being equal. He was sure that men chosen by competitive examination would be better in other respects, including character, than uneducated men of the same age. A thorough education implied an amount of steadiness and application, and a proper use of time, with which less educated persons could not be credited. In his scheme something more than that presumption was afforded, because here, as in England, no young man would be admitted to examination until he had obtained the best certificates as to moral character, physical condition, and fitness of age. The system of choice by competitive examination would secure primarily the best educated young men, and presumably, therefore, men of as good character as any others. The Bill was founded almost entirely on the English system, and, on report of a Committee of 13 or 14, chosen from both sides, unanimously agreed to. The Bill, in the first place defined the Civil Service, which included all those occupying positions in the public employ, whose whole time was required, at salaries of not less than $360 a year, and the occupants of such others as might be added thereto. The system was not to apply to country postmasters or employes at small salaries, whose whole time was not required. He proposed also to establish a Board of five persons, not members of the service, to administer all existing legislation in regard to it—to enforce discipline, and make such new rules and regulations as might be necessary—appointed by the Governor in Council, and holding office on the same terms as Judges. The administration of the service would be safer in the hands of such a Board than in those of any political Committee whatever, and the Board would have a much better opportunity for ascertaining the qualifications of applicants than now existed. All the regulations and executive actions of the Board would be immediately announced in the Canada Gazette. Executive acts should only be annulled by Order in Council approved by Parliament; the Ministry of the day not to interfere with its management, except for grave cause; the Board to be, in some degree, responsible to the Ministry, who should have some power to oversee and direct their work in serious cases. The Ministry could overrule their acts only by an Order in Council, which would be brought down to the House and defended there. He had taken a leaf out of the book of Professor Lyon Playfair, Chairman of the Civil Service Committee in England, in dividing the Civil Service into two classes; the first consisting of permanent employes of different grades, and the second of temporary clerks and others employed during a press of work only. The lower division of temporary clerks were classified in the same way as the higher, getting their places by competitive examinations, the Government not being bound to employ them but when and for what periods it chose. After a certain date, all appointments were to be made as the Bill provided. There should be an examination to decide the attainments of applicants, nobody to be admitted without producing satisfactory certificates; competitors to be graded according to attainments. The Board should decide as to the subjects of examination. He had only provided that the qualifying examinations should be a test of ordinary education in English or French. The competitive examinations should afford a wide choice of subjects. The examination should produce educated, trained men, to obtain whom they should enlarge the scope of the examination, so that no mere smattering should count for anything. A candidate showing a thorough acquaintance with any subject, should receive a bonus of marks over another who got the same number of marks by knowing a little of several subjects. Had they the class of young men fit for office under that system? Considering the number of professional men, school teachers included, annually trained in their public schools, there would be an abundance of raw material. About 1,000 school teachers were annually turned out in Ontario alone; Dr. Hodgins having stated that the second-class men would be superior in education to the ordinary class of civil servants, and that three or four hundred civil servants might well be obtained from among these school teachers yearly. He (Mr. Casey) had provided that certificates should only entitle the holder to be taken on trial for a year, when, should they have failed to obtain a certificate from their Departmental superior, they would be immediately discharged; if successful, they would be permanently appointed, their time to count from the beginning of their trial. It had been stated by the deputy heads of the Departments, that selection by examination, combined with trial, was the best system of appointment. Scientific subjects should be kept separate from general, special papers being prepared for them. Only engineers who had gone through a special preparation required should be appointed. Mr. Sandford Fleming had stated in evidence that the old engineers' service had been very bad, and that he had frequent reason to protest against appointments forced upon him. Indeed, in the building of the Intercolonial Railway, serious loss had resulted from the appointment of engineers, without consulting him. In justice to his political friends, he (Mr. Casey) must observe that Mr. Fleming had informed him that the late Government had adopted many of his suggestions, and, among others, that a certain curriculum should be passed before any engineer should be appointed, and that for the last few years nobody had been appointed of whom he did not approve. What he provided in regard to promotion was this:

"Vacancies shall be filled by promoting the next qualified officer in order of seniority, unless the head of the Department makes a special report to the Board, giving reasons satisfactory to the Board for the promotion of some other qualified officer."

On this point, a great deal of indecision existed in his mind, before he made this arrangement, and he was still in doubt as to whether this clause was the best means of meeting the difficulty. He felt undecided between the opposing claims of seniority and merit ; but he thought, on the whole, this clause met the difficulty. He would next notice section 15 :

“ The Governor in Council shall specify certain higher officers, to the number of not more than fifteen in each Department, who shall constitute the staff of such Department. All appointments of staff officers shall be made by the Governor in Council, on recommendation of the Minister for the Department in which they are made, and such staff officers shall be exempt from the regulations as to promotion and discipline contained in this Act.”

He inserted this clause in order that a Minister might surround himself with men, in whom he could have confidence in every way. He thought that the Ministers were entitled to a free choice in this respect. There were a number of minor details into which it was unnecessary to enter. This Bill was not a production of his own, but rather a condensation of all the best suggestions which could be obtained from authorities on this question, and if the Government allowed this Bill to pass its second reading, they would thereby assert only that they disapproved of the general tendency and effect of unlimited political patronage in making appointments to the Civil Service, and were in favour of allowing certain restrictions to be imposed on the present system, which would tend to securing, in general, a more highly intelligent class of men. The service would become, by this measure, a most honourable profession, into which young men of ambition and industry would seek admission, in which they would have the same chance of earning the reward their abilities entitled them to as they would in any other profession or business, and as more efficient servants would be obtained, a less number would be required than at present to do the work. The salaries, owing to a smaller number of men being required, could be raised in proportion. He left the matter in the hands of the House, reserving the right to reply to any objections that might be made.

MR. TILLEY said the subject was certainly a very important one, and he felt the force of a great many of the statements of the hon. member. He differed with him with reference to some of his propositions, though he agreed with him with reference to others. For instance, the hon. member suggested that it would be desirable for a Minister to surround himself, in the most important offices, with persons in whom he had entire confidence. Were those men to be removed when a change of Administration occurred? That would be a violation of the principle his hon. friend contended for.

MR. CASEY : What I intended to say was that a Minister should have liberty, if he found it absolutely necessary, to place in these positions men in whom he had entire confidence. I do not refer to importations from outside the service so much as to promote people to these positions out of the ordinary course of seniority. It is not advisable that these gentlemen should be changed at every change of Government, but circumstances might arise in which it would be absolutely necessary to make some changes of the kind. This provision, also, is from the English system.

MR. TILLEY said still the objection remained, that for political reasons—because it was clearly indicated it would be for political reasons—a member of a second or third class might be placed in first class because his politics were in sympathy with those of the head of the Department. The subject had engaged the attention of the Government, and they proposed, during recess, to take up this whole subject, and, at the next Session, they purposed amending the present system in a manner which would meet some of the propositions contained in the Bill of his hon. friend, and meet also others to which he had not referred. He trusted, therefore, the hon. member would withdraw this Bill.

MR. CASEY said he felt gratified at the statement of his hon. friend, and deemed it his duty, under the circumstances, to withdraw the Bill.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS ENQUIRY ACT AMENDMENT

(Mr. Ives.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. IVES said that, according to the Act in the Statute-book, the House could grant permission for an enquiry into corrupt practices in any constituency in the Dominion in either of two cases. The first case was where a Judge had reported to the House that, in his opinion, corrupt practices had prevailed to a considerable extent in the constituency. Secondly, where twenty-five electors presented a petition to the House, setting forth that, in their opinion, corrupt practices had prevailed, and asking permission of the House to investigate the matter. The object of the amendment, which he now moved the second reading of, was to require that, when a Commission was asked for by twenty-five electors, the petitioners should deposit with the Accountant of the House the same sum of money which was deposited with an election petition; that this sum should be retained to defray the expenses of the investigation in case the Commissioner appointed by the House reported that there was no ground for issuing a Commission, and that it should be returned to the petitioners in case the Commissioner reported that there was ground for issuing a Commission. He did not propose by this amendment to require that a sum be deposited in the case where a Judge had recommended the issuing of a Commission or further investigation. It was only in the case where a Commission was asked for on the petition of twenty-five electors. He did not believe the House would listen to any proposition to alter or lessen the stringency of the present Election Law; but it seemed to him that this Act did not form an essential part of the Election Law, as administered in this Dominion. He thought that the machinery of the law was quite perfect enough without it. It appeared to him also that the possibility of this Commission being applied for and granted to a considerable extent, without any risk on the part of the petitioners, but throwing the whole expense on the country, was a danger which it would be well to provide against. The extent to which this provision of the law could be abused could be easily imagined. Parties who knew of no corrupt practices having taken place, and were unwilling to risk their own money in an election contest, might be found very willing to give the opposite candidate and the constituency annoyance, particularly if they could do it at the expense of the country at large. And they could also easily imagine that a majority in the House could be found sometimes willing to grant this Commission for the purpose of giving annoyance to political opponents. It appeared to him that this Act was, as it were, objectless, also. He could not see, from the present law, that a sitting member could be affected, even after a Commission had said that corrupt practices did prevail. He could not see any advantage to be derived from this particular law, while it remained as it now did on the Statute-book. He did not understand either that the House could exercise any reasonable or sound discretion in the matter. The present Act said in general terms that the petition was to be presented by twenty-five electors. There was no provision that any evidence had to be produced before Parliament, as to the advisability or otherwise of granting the Commission. It was evident that the House must grant this Commission as a matter of course. Therefore, it seemed to him that it would be no serious blow to the stringency of this Election Law to adopt this amendment.

Mr. CAMERON (South Huron) said the hon. gentleman who had just moved the second reading of this Bill, might just as well, perhaps better, have moved for the repeal of the Statute he proposed to amend, because it was quite evident that, if this Bill passed, the Act passed in 1876 upon this subject would be practically repealed, and no attempt would be made to enforce it, if the enforcement of this Bill was to be conditioned on the payment of a certain sum of money. His hon. friend proposed by his Bill to amend the Statute by providing that clause No. 3 should be amended in such a way as to prevent parties from petitioning Parliament, unless they had, prior to presenting the petition, deposited the sum of $1,000 as security, assuming that the petitioners acted in perfect good faith, and honestly intended to proceed with their petition. But after all, if it should turn out, after a petition had been presented, and a commission granted, that no corrupt practices, in fact, prevailed, then the parties who presented the petition and deposited the $1,000, should forfeit that sum, or so much of it as was necessary to cover the expenses of the Commission. This appeared to him a hardship not contemplated when the Act was passed, and if enacted it would make the Act a dead letter—no one would proceed under its provisions. The hon. gentleman's Bill provided that, when corrupt practices were established, the $1,000 was, in that case, and in that only, to be refunded to the petitioners. It appeared to him that that would be practically a repeal of the Statute proposed to be amended. A man who was returned as member for a constituency, would in no way be affected by the result of this inquiry, and, therefore, there was no inducement for any person to go to the expense or trouble to run the risk of depositing this large sum of money. The hon. gentleman's Bill, he (Mr. Cameron) apprehended, had relation to the third alternative under which this power of Parliament could be invoked. There were three clauses under which a commission could be granted. The first was where the Judge, who tried an election petition, reported that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed in the constituency; then upon that report being presented to Parliament, a resolution might be moved and carried, directing the issue of a Commission to make further enquiry, and a Commission might thereupon issue for such further enquiry as to the correctness of the report. The second was where a Judge reported that in his opinion further enquiry was necessary, because the first enquiry was rendered incomplete by reason of the action of parties interested in the election petition. The third clause, as he understood it, was intended to provide that, where 25 electors of a constituency presented a petition, duly verified, to Parliament, alleging that corrupt practices extensively prevailed, or that there was reason to believe that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed, then, upon an address of Parliament, a Commission might issue to make this enquiry, provided for in the third section of the old Act. His hon. friend proposed that no petition should be presented to Parliament under the third alternative of this section unless this deposit had been made. He (Mr. Cameron) could not see any reason why twenty-five electors should have the power on their own mere motion of invoking by petition this extraordinary power of Parliament. The House knew how easy it was to get up a petition to Parliament for this or any other purpose. The Bill which this Bill proposed to amend allowed the presenting of a petition to Parliament by twenty-five electors who had thus the power of invoking this extraordinary jurisdiction, and sending abroad over a constituency a sort of roaming commission, with a species of inquisitorial powers to examine everybody, put the country to an immense expense, and when that was accomplished there did not appear to be any provision in the Statute by which effect could be given to the report of the Commission. In this respect the old Act was defective, and this Bill did not propose to cure defect. No doubt, if Parliament were satisfied that corrupt practices did extensively prevail in any constituency, Parliament had the right to disfranchise such a constituency, and that in one sense might effect the sitting member, but even then only indirectly. But that would be an extreme measure not likely to be resorted to; especially as, under the present Election Law, where it was alleged that corrupt practices prevailed, the parties interested in presenting a petition to the Courts could have a proper investigation, when the facts could be submitted to the Courts and the proper remedy applied. He thought the hon. gentleman's idea that, if a verified petition, signed by twenty-five electors, were presented to Parliament under this third alternative, the House had no discretion in the matter, but was bound to grant the Commission asked for, was a mistaken one. He (Mr. Cameron) did not understand that to be the law, although he must admit that the Statute in this respect was exceedingly vague. He thought it was discretionary with the House to say whether or not a Commission should be granted, even if the provisions of that clause with respect to the preliminary proceedings were complied with. If the view of the hon. gentleman, in this respect, was correct, it appeared to him that there was a serious defect in that portion of the Statute, as, in that view of it, on the presentation of a petition, signed by 25 electors, to Parliament, a Commission must issue, as a matter of course. He (Mr. Cameron) did not so read the law. Upon looking into the practice that prevailed in England under a Statute, not exactly the same as this, but similar in many of its provisions, it would be found that there Parliament was not bound to act, and, in many cases, refused to act, unless upon evidence being adduced to justify the interference of Parliament in this extraordinary way. They found that, in several cases, that course had been taken. The Canadian Statute was, to some extent, a transcript of the Imperial Act, from which many of its laws were borrowed. He did not think that the clause he was discussing, the third alternative, was to be found in any of the English Acts. The first two clauses, upon which a Commission might issue upon an Address of Parliament, were practically taken from the English Act. The first English Statute upon that subject, passed in 1840, provided that, if an Election Committee recommended further enquiry into alleged corrupt practices in any constituency, it became the duty of the House, or the Speaker, to set the machinery of the law in motion, for the purpose of punishing that constituency for the corrupt practices that prevailed. He was not aware that any case arose under that Statute. The next Statute was passed in 1850. It provided that, upon the report of an Election Committee that corrupt practices did prevail in any constituency, a Commission issued, as a matter of course. That Statute was superseded by one passed in 1851, which provided that, if a Committee reported that corrupt practices prevailed, then, upon a joint Address of both Houses of Parliament, a Commission might issue. But, even in that case, where a Committee, charged with the investigation of alleged corrupt practices, in so far as a candidate was concerned, reported that corrupt practices did extensively prevail, or that it had good reason to believe that corrupt practices prevailed, Parliament did not issue a Commission as a matter of course. There was the Canterbury case, where the House hesitated a long time whether a Commission of that kind should be issued, and in the Clitheroe case the House refused to issue a commission, because the House was not satisfied that the facts were sufficient to justify the issuing of a Commission, giving such extraordinary powers as were granted by the English Statute, and as were given by the Statute in Canada, so that he thought his hon. friend was wrong on that point. He (Mr. Cameron) thought that, if the only object of the Bill of the member for Richmond (Mr. Ives) was to provide that the machinery of the law should not be set in motion upon the mere presentation of a petition, the arguments of the hon. gentleman did not hold good; because, though a petition might be presented, Parliament still had the right to enquire whether or not there was sufficient ground for the issuing of the Commission asked for. It was with that view of the law that the Grenville case had been referred to the Committee on Elections and Privileges, so that proper enquiry might be made with a view of ascertaining if there was any reasonable ground for the issue of a Commission. He supposed that Committee would make the necessary enquiries, and ascertain whether there was sufficient evidence or not to justify the issuing of a Commission, and putting the country to a very large expense. He might say he would be very glad if his hon. friend had introduced a Bill to repeal that portion of the Statute that enabled twenty-five electors of their own mere motion to petition Parliament for an investigation into corrupt practices, and thereupon ask Parliament for such a Commission. He thought it was an extraordinary power, and he was not a little surprised that that clause should have been allowed to pass through Parliament, with hardly any comment on it. Upon referring to the debate which occurred when that Bill was before Parliament, he found that it was agreed to almost unanimously. The only hon. gentleman who expressed any dissent was the right hon. member for Victoria (Sir John A. Macdonald), who seemed to have serious doubts as to whether that portion of the Bill was not putting an extraordinary power into the hands of twenty-five electors. He hoped the right hon. gentleman was of the same opinion still. He could see no reason for the repeal of the whole of the Act, but he was in favour of the repeal of the third alternative in section 3 of the Act. He apprehended that the other provisions of the Act would very seldom be invoked, because, under the other sections of the Act, the House would only be asked to act on a report of Judges appointed to try these controverted elections. He thought they could with safety rely on these Judges. They would not make a report that corrupt practices extensively prevailed in a constituency unless they had prevailed. If they had extensively prevailed it would then be advisable that an enquiry of the kind contemplated by the Act should be made, and that enquiry would be based on the report of the Judges. But as to the other alternative of leaving it in the power of any 25 men who saw fit to get up a petition of this kind, perhaps from spite, political animosity, or any other cause, and thus invoke the power of Parliament to issue a Commission and set the machinery of the law in motion at an enormous expense to the country, it appeared to him that such a power should not exist, and he was entirely opposed to it. The objection he had to his hon. friend's Bill was that it practically repealed the objectionable clause he had been discussing, and he thought it would be far better to do so in so many plain words than put it in the way his hon. friend had put it. He thought his purpose would be served by the repeal of the third alternative in Section 3, and if that was the hon. gentleman's object, he was prepared to give him every assistance.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he agreed with very much that had been said by his hon. friend who had just spoken with respect to this particular portion of the Bill of 1876. He then thought, and he thought still, that it was an unusual and rather dangerous power, because it meant the power of annoyance to every sitting member by twenty-five men rightly or wrongly guided, by making a statement that they believed that corrupt practices prevailed in a given constituency. The sitting member's seat, under such circumstances, would be morally affected. He did not see how the member, although he was not petitioned against individually, although his seat might be fully protected, he did not see how he could keep his seat before Parliament and the public, if there was a solemn decision that extensive corrupt practices had obtained in his constituency, and that such practices had operated in his favour. He thought it would place the sitting member in a position in which he could not keep his place; therefore, he thought, it was a dangerous power, and that they might well keep within the lines of English legislation on the same subject. However, now they had the measure, he thought it would not be well to repeal it just now. He thought that, inasmuch as it was once on the Statute-book, they ought to pay sufficient respect to the Parliament who passed it to give it a fair opportunity of being worked. If it were a dead letter, as his hon. friend said it was, it would do no harm. It would be time enough to repeal it when it was proved to work oppressively. He did not agree with his hon. friend from South Huron, in regard to the repeal of the clause respecting the power of petitioning. He thought that, if 25 men were guided by patriotic or party motives, to make a petition to deprive the constituency, in which they lived, of their franchise or representative, their feelings of patriotism would enable them to raise this sum of money. It acted as a very considerable check, and, in that sense, he would prefer the Bill of his hon. friend to the suggestion of the hon. member for South Huron. He had no objection that the Bill should go to its second reading, but he would ask his hon. friend to postpone going into Committee till another day, as he would like the House to be fuller, and he would like to see some of his friends on the matter.

MR. GUTHRIE said that, when the Bill of 1876 was before the House, it was pointed out by the right hon. gentleman that they ought to have some guarantee of the bonâ fide character of the petition. The Grenville case had in a practical way called their attention to the fact that the Act of 1876 did apparently put it in the power of twenty-five men to demand a general investigation at the expense of the country, when, perhaps, the petitioners had not sufficient confidence in their own case to file an ordinary election petition.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Act does not do so.

MR. GUTHRIE said he thought, therefore, that some such measure as was introduced by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe should be adopted. He did not think they should strike out that provision enabling twenty-five electors to call for an investigation, but should add a condition to it. It might be that the electors who petitioned this House had not the information in time to file an ordinary petition. Where twenty-five electors certified that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed, and where they showed their honesty in that belief by a bonâ fide deposit of a considerable sum of money, thereby risking the loss of that money, he thought that ought to be sufficient, and that they would be justified in retaining the measure on the Statute-book. It had been observed by the right hon. gentleman that, although it did not affect the member's seat directly, it certainly did indirectly, because if a Commission appointed at the instance of the House were to find corrupt practices extensively prevailed, the whole election would be vitiated. The only object of this intervention appeared to be either to disfranchise or punish the constituency, or to punish the electors and others who had been found to be guilty of corrupt practices. He hoped the Bill would be read the second time, and that the question would be seriously considered as to whether they should leave the amount as proposed by the hon. member for Richmond at $1,000, or put it at $500, or some lower sum. He believed that, with the addition of some guarantee, such as the deposit of a large amount of money, the Act of 1876 should be retained.

MR. GUTHRIE.

MR. IVES said he did not mean the House to understand, as his hon. friend from South Huron appeared to have understood, that, in his opinion, the House had no discretion as to the issuing of this Commission. What he meant to say was that they had no proof before them, except the fact of the petition, and that they must either make a rule to grant all such applications or to refuse them, or to do as they saw fit about it, or as their feelings might induce them to act. If they took the latter course, they could easily understand that the majority would issue a Commission or would refuse it, as the parties likely to be affected were political friends or opponents. The Bill made no provision whatever for the House or any Committee to make an enquête as to whether the petition was well founded or not before issuing the Commission. If they were to do so, why issue any Commission at all? Why not leave the whole matter to Parliament or to a Committee of Parliament? As he understood the South Grenville case, it was referred to the Committee of Privileges and Elections simply to report whether the petition was in the form required by the Act. If they reported that it was, then this House certainly would have discretion to grant the Commission or not, but they would have to act in the the dark more or less, and would have to decide whether to refuse or grant it without any proof to go upon.

Bill read the second time.

MARINE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS ACT REPEAL BILL.—[BILL 44.]

(Mr. McCarthy.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. MCCARTHY said that, in moving the second reading of this Bill, it was proper to give some of the reasons which induced him to bring in this measure. The Act was passed in 1875, with the apparent object of striking at the vested rights, or the rights the Anglo-American Company considered they had under the charter obtained from the Government of Newfoundland. The Bill, however, had not been a success; it had not in any way carried out the intention of the Government that introduced it. It had not in any way affected the rights so far of the Anglo-American Company; but, instead of that, it was found to be a hindrance to other companies, and particularly to the Direct Cable Company, which was the only other company which now had a cable across the Atlantic. The Bill was particularly objectionable in the 14th, 15th and 16th clauses. By the 14th clause it was directly enacted that no company not incorporated under the Act should have the right of communicating with the Dominion of Canada, or should have the right in any way to use any telegraph wire or a cable connecting either the Dominion or two or more Provinces of the Dominion. It was true there was a proviso to this section, and by this proviso the Anglo-American Company were permitted, in fact, to continue transacting their business until an Order in Council was passed determining that some other cable company, or companies, had been established able to transact the business required in this Dominion. Now that appeared to him to be a very unfair and unjust provision. Its only effect was this: so long as we required to use the Anglo-American Company's cable, we should permit the Anglo-American Company to do the business which had been hitherto done between this country and the old country, but as soon as we could dispense with the service of that Company, then Council might pass an Order, and their vested rights and property might be totally and completely destroyed.

MR. MACKENZIE: Their vested rights?

MR. MCCARTHY said his hon. friend sneered at his statements that they had vested rights, but any company who had expended such enormous sums as the Anglo-American Company did in laying their cable across the Atlantic had some rights that ought to be respected. As a matter of law he understood they obtained rights from the Newfoundland and London Telegraph Company, but that was an exclusive right to land upon the shores of Newfoundland for a period of fifty years, and an exclusive right to communicate between Newfoundland and this Dominion for a like period.

That was what he called a vested right. It had been argued, he believed, that, by the transfer from the Newfoundland Company to the Anglo-American Company, without the consent of the Legislature of Newfoundland, the right of the former company was lost—their vested right was lost. If that was so, then there was no necessity for this Act at all. If they had no vested rights, if they had no right at Newfoundland, then this Act was not necessary, because that it was wholly directed against that company was beyond all question. Then there was another provision which, to his mind, was extremely objectionable. Clause 16 enacted that "Any company which may be incorporated under the provisions of this Act, or may become incorporated by general Act of Parliament, shall not be at liberty to enter into, or to making any arrangement with the Anglo-American Company;" it should not be permitted to make any tariff arrangements or to make any such arrangements as might be needful for the proper working of these different cable companies. What was the result? The result, as the facts at present showed, was this: There were but two companies, the Anglo-American and the Direct United States Companies, and the most important thing for the directors of either of these Companies to provide for was that, in case of the breakage of either cable, their business would be carried on by the other line. According to this clause of the Act, that was rendered illegal and impossible. The object of that must have been to affect in some way or another the Anglo-American Company. Now, he did not see the necessity for it at all; he did not see why this Act was passed originally, and, having been passed, he did not see why it should not be repealed. It could not be injurious to the public interest that as many cable companies should be established as possible. It was a direct benefit to the public to break down any monopoly, if monopoly existed; to reduce the charges that these companies were making, if those charges were more than proper, and to that end that more companies and more cables might be established and laid. In order to do that, he thought it was plain that every facility should be afforded to establish them. This was a disability, not merely to the Anglo-American Company, but it was a disability affecting every other company to enact that it should not be lawful for it to enter into an agreement with the Anglo-American Company. If these views did not commend themselves to hon. gentlemen then, he would say this: The Statute was practically a dead-letter. There was now—as was perfectly well known to everyone—an agreement between the Direct Cable Company of the Anglo-American Company, by which they had agreed as to the tariff rates, and by which they had arranged to do one another's business in case of breakage, and that in direct violation of this Act of Parliament, and yet they were powerless to prevent it. It was impossible to prevent it, so that the Act had failed to secure the object that was intended. In his judgment that object was not a good one; in his humble opinion the Act was an unjust one and had a tendency to fetter and to prevent the establishment of other cables between here and the old countries, and in that way was a direct and positive injury to the public. Then Section 15 was, in his opinion, also a mistake. It provided that any company established by Act of Parliament of Great Britain, or otherwise incorporated in Great Britain, might obtain a charter here. Now, what was the effect of that when you put it into practical operation? The effect was, that you had two companies. A company which owned a cable, and had been incorporated in Great Britain, applied here and got a charter, but that made another company here, and the only difference was, that there was one company owning a cable and having the means, and there was another company without the cable and without means. There were two separate and distinct corporations running in parallel lines. That, of course, was not the intention. The intention was to have given an English company, incorporated in Great Britain, rights which the Parliament of Great Britain was powerless to give, that is, to work a cable from this end. For these reasons, he thought this Act should be repealed; first, because it was unjust, and struck at a company to whom we all owed so much—that is, the Anglo-American Company. It was interfering, to some extent, with their vested rights, or it purported to do so. It was, moreover, an unnecessary fettering and interference with the rights of English companies that might be hereafter established. They should be left perfectly free to make such arrangements and to enter into such terms and agreements as, to these different companies, might seem right. The more companies there were the less the charges would be. He believed the intention of the hon. gentleman opposite, who introduced the Bill, was to do away with what he called the monopoly of the Anglo-American Company. What was that monopoly? The only pretence to a monopoly was the right to land upon Newfoundland—the exclusive right to land there for fifty years. But the Direct Cable Company did not land at Newfoundland, it passed by and came here to the Dominion.

MR. MACKENZIE: It was not allowed to land.

MR. MCCARTHY asked what difference it made whether it landed there or not. This was an instance of a company which could be worked without landing there. Then it was contended that the Anglo-American Company had no right to land upon Newfoundland any more than any other company. In fact, the right which the New York, Newfoundland and London Telegraph Company obtained had been lost. If so, there were no vested rights to be interfered with and there was no necessity for the law. So, from whatever point we looked at it, it appeared that the Act was misconceived, that it was mischievous and ought to be removed from the Statute-book. He, therefore, moved, seconded by the hon. member for Cardwell, that it be repealed.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was a little singular that the movement for the repeal of the Act was coincident with the arrival in this town and country of the agent of the Anglo-American Company. When the Bill was passed in 1875, the Anglo-American Company was seeking to absorb the entire telegraph business. It had obtained a monopoly of the use of Newfoundland, which colony was, so to speak, the great telegraph post in the middle of the Atlantic. It was seeking to absorb the entire trade of the continent, and to retain the absolute use of this privilege. The Direct Company was established with the express purpose and with the express condition of maintaining an independent position, apart from that of any other company established. The Act which the Canadian Parliament passed enabled that company to defend its position. Now, it was a little singular that this agent, this gentleman who is here for the purpose of stimulating the repeal of that Act, affected to be the agent of the Direct Cable Company, instead of the Anglo-American Company. It was well known, however, that Mr. Pender and his associates, nearly two years ago, purchased into the Direct Company enough shares to control its action, and it was at this moment practically under the control of the other company. That company was also under the control of the Globe Company, the whole forming one of the most gigantic monopolies that was ever known in the world, and which sought to control not merely the telegraphic business of this continent through the Atlantic Ocean, but also the marine telegraphy of every part of the world. Now, if ever there was a just Bill passed by Parliament, it was the Bill of 1875, which established proper relations as regarded the two companies, and proper regulations which all companies would have to observe doing business in Canada. He felt himself at that time obliged, as head of the Government, to warn Mr. Pender, through Sir John Rose, the day before the meeting at which this transaction was consummated, by which he and his associates obtained control of that company. The United States Government, coincident with this movement, also sent a similar warning, and the business of the corporation had since been carried on by sufferance, the Government of the Dominion having it in its power at any time to adopt regulations under this Act which would effectually squelch the whole attempted monopoly and maintain an independent telegraph system for Canada. The hon. gentleman said all this was mischievous, and he proposed to repeal the Act in order to repair the mischief of preventing this giant monopoly from absorbing the business of the country and the continent. The hon. gentleman proposed to repeal this enactment, in order to place Canada at the feet of this giant monopoly, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) was amazed that the Government should have allowed the Bill to proceed to its second reading without even expressing any opinion as to the course they thought best to take in reference to this Bill. He was very sorry to be obliged—as he was obliged as a public man—to refer to individuals in connection with this movement, but he had enquired what was the exact truth, and he was stating the exact truth in declaring that the movement was promoted and stimulated by an agent of Mr. Pender and his monopoly, in order to obtain control of the telegraphic business of this continent. He trusted that the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government would, in the public interest, prevent this mischievous movement of the hon. gentleman from North Simcoe from proceeding any further.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) said if the object of this Act passed in 1875 had been, as was stated by the hon. member for Lambton, to do away with a gigantic monopoly, it was quite clear that object had not been realised, according to his present statement, seeing that to-day we had this "gigantic monopoly" in spite of this Act. He (Mr. White) believed that a moment's consideration would show that the Act, instead of doing away with monopolies, must prove exceedingly injurious in relation to the ordinary telegraphic system of Canada. Under the 14th clause of the Act sought to be repealed, no telegraphic land system uniting any Provinces in the Dominion, or, as he thought, any land system in the Dominion itself, could unite with any telegraphic cable system having relations with the Anglo-American Company. Now what was the position in which they stood to-day? The Direct Cable Company had, by the admission of the hon. member for Lambton, relations with the Anglo-American Company.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman misunderstood him. What he had said was that Mr. Pender and his associates had bought into the Direct Cable Company enough stock to control its operations, and though nominally a separate company, it was under the control of the other company.

MR. WHITE: Precisely; the Direct Cable Company was under the control of the Anglo-American. But such a relation of those two companies was forbidden, and if this law were enforced in Canada the Direct Company could have no relation with the Anglo-American Company, because it was the latter which was sought to be destroyed by this Statute.

MR. MILLS: Not destroyed.

MR. WHITE said it was sought to be practically destroyed, so far as the relations of the Direct Cable Company with it was concerned. The object, as stated by the hon. member for Lambton, was to destroy the monopoly which the Anglo-American enjoyed in the island of Newfoundland, by rendering illegal, so long as it was maintained, any connection with it of any cable landing on the Canadian shores. Supposing that that this Act had any effect whatever, what would be the result? That as those two companies were practically one to-day—as the Direct Cable Company had really violated this law, by practical union with the Anglo-American Company, they could have no connection by any land telegraph company with either of those cables. What was the position in which they stood? It was well known that the connection with the Anglo-American Company was, although nominally through the Western Union, or with a Nova Scotia Company controlled by the Western Union, in reality with the Montréal Telegraph Company. But as the 14th clause of the Act forbade any such connection, it could at any moment be stopped, and the most serious embarrassment to the telegraph system must result. Again, at this moment, as he was informed, and had no doubt correctly informed, an arrangement had been made or was about being made by the Dominion Telegraph Company with a direct cable company, but such an arrangement must also be illegal, because of the union between the Direct and the Anglo-American cables in violation of this Act. Was it to the interest of this country that they should have an Act on the Statute book which produced such results, while, as had been admitted by the hon. member for Lambton, it had not, in the slightest degree, operated as it was intended, to prevent that amalgamation and the monopoly resulting from it.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had made no such admission.

MR. WHITE said that if the hon. gentleman had not admitted it, he had an extraordinary way of expressing himself. He had opened his remarks by an attack on a gentleman who could not answer him on the floor of the House, by suggesting that there was in the city, nominally, an agent of the Direct Cable Company, but, in reality, the agent of the Anglo-American, the controlling interest in the former having been purchased by the latter; and yet, now, he wished the House to understand that he never suggested there was any connection between them. If the statement of that hon. gentleman was correct, the amalgamation was one of the most practical kind, and the result was, that in consequence of that Act, the Dominion and Montréal Telegraph Companies could legally have no connection with the cable companies; that is, assuming that the Act was to be enforced. Was an Act like that to remain on the Statute-book? Clearly, by the statement of the late Premier himself, who never sought to enforce the terms of the Act against the companies, it was a dead letter, its only effect being to force companies to do illegally, or by some roundabout process, what they ought to be permitted to do in the interest of the country, as well as of themselves, as an open business arrangement. The statement of the hon. member for Lambton was, in reality, the strongest reason for the repeal of that Act, and he sincerely hoped that the present Bill would pass.

MR. McCUAIG said he assumed that the country required cable connection with Great Britain, and that they needed some protection against monopoly, which meant, of course, heavy prices. This Act did not control the prices, that might be changed after a monopoly was secured. If any previous Act limited prices, he should be quite willing to have this Act repealed, because the public were entitled to some protection against extravagant charges by the monopoly before they repealed this Act.

MR. MILLS said he did not think that the hon. gentleman who had moved the repeal of the Act, or the hon. gentleman who had supported him had made out a case against the law. One hon. gentleman had said that there was now a practical monopoly. Well, if the stock of two independent companies happened to be in the hands of the same stockholders, a monopoly might be temporarily established; but that was quite different from consolidating or amalgamating them and permitting them to become one company. The stock in the hands of Mr. Pender to-day might be in the hands of some one else to-morrow, and the man who controlled both companies to-day might be able to control but one to-morrow. The existing evil, if let alone, would cure itself. What was now practically proposed was the establishment of a monopoly by doing away with any possibility of rivalry, and making those two companies one for all time to come. If there was established the principle of freetrade and inter-oceanic competition, so that any company might be established without Government interference, legislation of this sort might not be so necessary; companies might be left free to consolidate or not. At present, parties had to come to Parliament for powers of telegraphic communication. The proposition of the hon. mover was not in the public interest, but in that of certain parties who had for the moment a controlling influence in the two companies.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, when the Bill was before the House of Commons, last Parliament, he had opposed it both in the House and Committee, but it was carried. He opposed it on several grounds, but chiefly because it was improper by legislation to prevent companies which had invested their means in great works of that kind from making arrangements by amalgamation, or otherwise to render their enterprise more profitable. Any attempts by legislation to stop monopolies in the present day were absurd and useless. It was prophesied that they would be ineffectual, which it was admitted they had been. The only way to check a monopoly was by the use of capital to fight it; and then so soon as it was shown that this united company—for it might be called a united company—had got a good thing, to use a common expression, or a profitable successful investment, capitalists would construct other lines across the Atlantic. The success of the Direct Cable had shown that it was not necessary to have a resting place in Newfoundland. There might be an infinity of lines between Europe and America almost anywhere to the north. He thought it was unjust and an interference in a vested right—a right established by the expenditure of a very large sum in regard to renewing the great risk that the first cable company ran—an immortalised risk—in the laying of the first cable. It was a vested right taken with the universal consent and by the expenditure which was under-acclaim of two continents, and the use of which by them met with their glad and ready acceptance. It was therefore infringing the ordinary rights of the company to prevent an amalgamation. The intention was a good one, but, as it had failed altogether, and as the two Companies were one, why should they keep that Act on the Statute-book and declare that to be illegal which, if they wanted the use of cable connection with England, must be carried out? As his hon. friends the mover and seconder had shown, the Montreal and Dominion Telegraph Companies were both acting illegally at this moment by acting in combination with either of those lines.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the Statute had the effect of preventing them. It was illegal in them to have any combination with companies which had acted in combination against the terms of the Statute. They knew perfectly well it was understood that the Montreal and Dominion Companies had now formed connections with the two lines. Those land lines, running from one end of the continent to the other, through Canada, and in which so many Canadians were interested, were placed in a disadvantageous position so long as this Act remained on the Statute-book. His hon. friend from Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig) had said truly that they should attempt to limit the charges or rates as much as possible. If they found, hereafter, undue or oppressive rates, they could, as in 1875, legislate against them. Meanwhile, he thought it was not for the interest of their own land companies, and their free and full use of the telegraph cables, that that Act should not be repealed.

MR. MACKENZIE said that of course he had none but the public interest in view in maintaining that Act. He was surprised that the hon. gentleman should be so ready to give a legal opinion on the subject. Had he considered it more carefully he would not have stated that the Bill prevented the Dominion or Montreal companies from making arrangements with the companies landing their cables in Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman in the Committee which considered the former Bill, had made a struggle to maintain that the Anglo-American company had vested rights. Cyrus W. Field was here then, and imagined he could control the Legislature of Canada, as he did some others, and the leader of the present Government presented his views to the Committee. He would remember, that when it was represented, as similarly represented to-night, that the Anglo-American Company had vested rights—and it would puzzle him to state what they were—the Committee of legal gentlemen, who were appointed to draft a clause to protect any possible interests existing, drew up the clause in the Act as it stood. He (Mr. Mackenzie) put it to any member of the House, to the whole House and people of Canada—was there ever any provision more just than that, if they had any vested interest or rights infringed by that Act. But the hon. the Premier knew that they had no such rights; and the gentlemen here, representing the Anglo-American Company, had never, from that time to this, attempted to establish any such rights; and it was in the power of the hon. gentleman opposite now, by taking the Act existing to prevent the amalgamation. As the head of the Government, it was in his power to prevent the amalgamation, practical or otherwise, which these two companies were striving to effect at the present time. He might say, in reply to the taunt that he took no action under this, he did take action. He warned the parties in due time that the Government would not permit the proceedings they were entering upon to be carried to completion, and these parties were in communication with the late Government. The secretary of the company called about a year ago—during the last Session—to arrange for an interview, to endeavour to come to some understanding. It was then arranged between that gentleman and himself (Mr. Mackenzie), that Mr. Pender, if possible, or, if not, another director, should come to Canada in May or June. That gentleman only arrived late in September, and another event which happened in that month induced him (Mr. Mackenzie) to come to the conclusion that he should not enter into any negotiations in a matter of so much importance, during the last days of the existence of his Administration. But for that it would have been attended to last season. It was the duty of hon. gentlemen opposite to undertake that work, instead of passing a Bill of this kind to take it out of their power to do what was right. It was their duty to see that right was done to their country, and an independent telegraphic communication across the Atlantic maintained. He deeply regretted, apart from all other considerations, that the Government should advocate a telegraphic combination such as that formed by Mr. Cyrus Field.

Bill read the second time.

MR. MCCARTHY moved that the Bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole.

MR. MACKENZIE said the Bill should go before the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, as it provided for many contingencies connected with telegraph work, and the Committee would have to consider whether the repeal would be an absolute one or only a repeal of certain provisions of the Act.

SIR JOHN A MACDONALD said no public Bill need go to the Railway Committee, which was for the purpose of discussing Railway and Telegraphic Bills, Acts of incorporation and things of that kind, unless the mover of the Bill chose to send it to that Committee. But the mover did not ask this to be done; therefore, the rule did not apply.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) said the rule was to deal with a public Bill in the House, unless on motion it was referred to one of the Standing Committees.

MR. SPEAKER: There is no doubt, whatever, that a public Bill should be considered in Committee of the Whole House, unless the mover asked the House to refer it to a Select Committee for some particular purpose.

Bill referred to Committee of the Whole:

STATUTORY HOLIDAYS BILL.—[BILL 5.]

(Mr. Domville.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. DOMVILLE said the Bill proposed to give four holidays to the banking community. Bank officials had very few holidays, and they asked to have certain Mondays set aside in order that they might have a little relaxation from the strain imposed upon them by the present uninterrupted labour they were subject to. By granting this request they would be enabled to go away on Saturday to a distance, for a short time. In addition to that, bank managers and clerks could now get no time to attend to any private business, and they desired to have some relief in that direction. Since the Bill had been printed those gentlemen of the banking world, who asked for the passage of this Bill, stated that for some reasons it would be better to have the holidays occur on the second Monday in June, July and August. Of course that could be arranged in Committee.

MR. MCCUAIG said this Bill was sent down by the County Council of Prince Edward county. It appeared that the Scott Act repealed the Duncan Act, except in cases where by-laws were in force. The Act was in force in the county of Prince Edward, but it appeared it could not take effect until the month of March, after the voting took place. The voting had taken place in that county on the 13th of March last, and the repeal was carried by a large majority. They had had the Dunkin Act in force in that county for two years, and during that period never before had there been so much drinking done. They were now asking to have a doubt removed, as to whether they could grant licenses or not. The law stated expressly that licenses could not be granted until the following March, after the voting took place, and this Bill was to enable them to grant licenses immediately after the voting took place.

DOMINION DAY HOLIDAY BILL.

(Mr. Cockburn, West Northumberland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) said this Bill had come from the Senate and had received the support of that body. He recollected that some years ago a similar Bill was introduced, but failed to receive the approval of the House. Since then, he believed, some desire had been expressed in different quarters that the 1st of July should be treated as a holiday in the Dominion, and, fortunately, the Senate had thought so too. He did know that the demand was very ardent for it. Still, it seemed to him it was a proper thing to do, to name the day of the birth of the Dominion as a public holiday.

MR. MACKENZIE said he would suggest to the hon. the mover of the Bill to refer it to the same Committee as that to which the Bill of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) had been referred, as it would be perfectly absurd to have two Bills upon the Statute-books this year respecting holidays. If it was intended to legislate in this direction, the statutory holidays would have to be made in the same Bill.

MR. McCUAIG.

MR. DOMVILLE said that the Bill before the House did not go as far as his did.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said it appeared to him there was a wide difference between the two Bills. In the first place, the Bill came from the Senate, and in the second place, it was for the purpose of establishing a national holiday. If he understood the Bill of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) it was merely in reference to holidays for the convenience of the banking community; therefore, he hoped the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Cockburn) would not assent to the proposition of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie.)

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) said he hoped the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) would not press the question. This being a Bill from the Senate, it could not but be concurred in. It would be discourteous to the other Chamber to refer this Bill along with other Bills to a Standing Committee. This Bill proposed to create a national holiday, and certainly had nothing whatever to do with bank holidays.

MR. HOLTON: Supposing this House did not concur in the Bill, would that be any affront to the Senate?

MR. COCKBURN said of course the House had the right of assenting or not. But did the hon. member recollect any case where a Bill from the Senate had been sent to a Standing Committee to be considered along with other Bills?

MR. HOLTON said that, as the hon. gentleman had appealed to him, he would say that Bills from the Senate were treated precisely like Bills originating in this House. They went through the same stages, and were also subject to rejection very frequently. There could be no objection, therefore, in point of form. He thought there was a great deal of force in the suggestion of the hon. the Minister of Justice, that this proposal rested on an entirely different footing from the proposal of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville).

MR. MILLS said he did not exactly see what was intended to be accomplished by this Bill. As he understood the Bill of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville), it dealt with matters which came within the jurisdiction of the House. He did not think this House had the right to say to a man in the employment of another man that he was discharged from any obligation to work on a particular day. Dominion Day was, he believed, universally kept as a holiday, at least, it was in Western Canada, but it was not kept under the authority of any Act of Parliament. He did not suppose that the passage of an Act of Parliament would, in any degree, render it a holiday in the sense in which the Bill of the hon. member for King's, N.B. made holidays for a certain purpose in reference to institutions under the control of Parliament. They could not establish a legal holiday of this kind.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): What is a legal holiday?

MR. MILLS said it was any day set apart which the people were at liberty to observe, and that was what the hon. gentleman could not do with regard to this Bill.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he would read the words of the Act itself—words which he hoped the hon. gentleman would not attempt to question as to what was the meaning of the Bill:

"Whereas it was on the first day of July that the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick became one Dominion, under the name of Canada; and whereas Rupert's Land and the North-Western Territory, and the Province of British Columbia became part of the Dominion in the month of July, and Prince Edward Island became part of the Dominion on the first day of July; and whereas it is expedient that such important events should be commemorated; therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

"1. Throughout the Dominion of Canada, in each and every year, the first day of July, not being a Sunday, shall be a legal holiday, and shall be kept and observed as such, under the name of Dominion Day."

Then the fourth clause said:

"4. Whenever the day which would otherwise be the day for the payment or the last day of grace for the payment of any bill of exchange or promissory note, payable at any place in the Dominion of Canada is Dominion Day, such bill or note shall be payable, and the days of grace thereon shall expire on the day next thereafter, not being a legal holiday or non-judicial day, and not before."

He did not think this Bill should be classed with any other Bill, or sent to a Standing Committee, for mere legal purposes. He was quite sure that the public opinion of the country would justify the passing of the Bill sent down from the Senate.

TONNAGE DUES IN CANADIAN PORTS BILL.

(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P. E. I.)

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain proposed resolution respecting tonnage dues.

(In the Committee.)

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.) said, under the Merchant's Shipping Act of 1876, ships carrying deckloads were charged not only tonnage dues on the registered tonnage of the ship, but also for dues on the space occupied by the cargo on deck. Under that Act that space had to be measured and included in the tonnage. This caused great delay, inconvenience, and expense. Last year a Bill was passed repealing the 23rd clause, but was refused assent at home, on the ground that this Parliament had no right to repeal an Imperial Statute. To remedy this, this resolution was introduced. In the despatch received, it was pointed out that whilst the measurement of the tonnage was an Imperial matter, local taxation was a colonial matter. Therefore, there could be no objection to this Bill. It would meet the case, and relieve the shipowners of the expense incurred.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he had doubts last Session as to whether the Act then passed would be allowed; but it was considered advisable to test the question. It was entirely wrong for the Imperial Parliament at all to interfere with the local taxation of this country; and the Bill last year was introduced for the purpose of exempting vessels in Canadian waters from the taxation imposed by an Imperial Statute. He did not see any practical distinction between the Bill now proposed and the Bill passed last Session, as both repealed, to a certain extent, the Imperial Statute. He should be glad to assist his successor, however, in any effort to relieve the shipping interest from the tax imposed by the Imperial Statute.

ADDITIONAL JUDGES FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA.

NOTICE OF RESOLUTION.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) moved that the House, to-morrow, resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to consider the following resolutions:—

"1. That, whereas, by an Act passed by the Legislative Assembly of the Province of British Columbia, in the year 1878, and known as 'The better Administration of Justice Act, 1878,' provision is made for the appointment of two Judges of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, in addition to the number of Judges new authorised to be appointed to that Court, it is expedient to make provision for the salaries of such additional Judges;

"2. That the salaries of each of the said two additional Judges of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, shall be $4,000 per annum, and shall be payable out of any moneys forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada."

MR. MACKENZIE said he desired to know if the Government considered this demand of the Legislature of British Columbia a reasonable one. At present the administration of justice there cost an amount immensely in excess of any other Province, according to population. In Nova Scotia, with a population of 400,000, the expenditure was slightly over $50,000; in New Brunswick, with a population of 300,000, it was slightly over $37,000; in Prince Edward Island, whose population was 100,000, it slightly exceeded $15,000; in Manitoba, with a population three times that of British Columbia, the expenditure was not quite $15,000; while, in British Columbia itself, the expenditure at present was over $32,000, and this proposed an addition of over $8,000, besides travelling expenses. There were in that Province, at present, three Judges in the Superior or Supreme Court, and six County Judges; and surely this array of judicial ability was sufficient for the wants of its small population. He did not think that because the Local Governments had the power to create courts, that we had nothing to do but fill these courts as soon as created. The Nova Scotia Government passed an Act establishing County Courts in that Province, which was brought to this House and passed by this House, and he did not think the Act was an unreasonable one, but it created great divergence of opinion, and the Bill was ultimately defeated in the Upper House, though it subsequently became law. This House should not agree to a proposition of this sort, merely because the Local Government of British Columbia thought it necessary to have two more Judges appointed to act in that Province. Some grounds should be given on which this House could exercise its wise discretion, and he looked to the Minister of Justice for further information.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said this argument was taken before, when this question arose, shortly after Confederation. Mr. Blake, he believed, then took the ground that it was not a matter of necessity that the Dominion Parliament should sanction the legislation of every Province with respect to the increase of Judges, and the consequent expense to the Administration of Justice. That was assented to as a general principle, but it was argued, and he had argued so himself, that when the whole responsibility of the Administration of Justice rested on the Local Governments and Legislatures, it would be a very grave responsibility for the Dominion Government to take to oppose a solemn Act of the Local Legislatures, declaring that additional Judges were required. Unless it were clearly proved that any Local Government making this demand had unjustly exercised its power, and would throw needless expense on the Dominion Government, we ought, as a general rule, to accept the solemn provision of a Local Legislature that it required additional Judges, as being correct. This principle was acted on in the establishment of additional Judges in Ontario and the new Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal was remodelled and three new Judges were appointed in the time of the late Government.

MR. MACKENZIE : The Bill passed in 1873.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Judges were appointed and salaries granted by the late Government. He had been and was still of opinion that the old Court was more efficient than the new one and less expensive. Still when the Act was solemnly adopted by the Local Legislature and the demand made here for the additional appointments and grant, these salaries were passed and the judges appointed, true to the principle that we should make a clear case against any Province before objecting to its claim in this respect. True, the population of British Columbia was small, and if the Chinese were kept out, it was not going to increase rapidly, still it was a territory of immense extent, and whether the population was sparse or numerous, the law had to be enforced in all its bounds, and, under the peculiar circumstances, additional Judges might be required. Under the present system, all the Judges living in Vancouver Island, the travelling expenses were enormous. This measure, by providing that the Judges be settled individually, like county Judges, in their respective districts, would cause the additional salaries to be saved by the decrease in travelling expenses.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said as this question would be discussed at a further stage, he would not go into it at length at present. The Bill provided that the two Judges should reside on the mainland, specifying their districts ; also that they shall discharge the functions of the present County Court Judges, who were appointed when the Province was admitted into the Union, and who were not lawyers, and who administered justice perhaps roughly and cheaply. In the opinion of the Legislature, the Province had reached a condition when the administration of justice was not as satisfactory as could be desired. The increase of expense, from the report of the Attorney-General, and the Governor of the Province, would be very little, if any, in excess of previous expenditure, under this Bill. The persons who would retire would receive a much less remuneration than they did now, and, in addition, the enormous amount now paid for travelling expenses would be greatly curtailed. Irrespective of increase of expense, the Local Legislature gave very strong grounds on the point of necessity, showing that parties charged with crimes had to undergo, often, twelve months' imprisonment before they could be tried, and, in many cases, then proven innocent of the charges.

MR. ANGLIN said he thought if the doctrine laid down by the right hon. gentleman was accepted, they might look for a very large increase of the Judiciary. If the Legislatures of the Provinces were to have the absolute right of creating any number of new Judgeships they chose, or thought necessary, and throw the burden on the Dominion Treasury, such an increase would certainly be made. He was not at all disposed to accept that doctrine, and he contended that before they consented to provide the salaries, they should be satisfied of the necessity that existed for the additional Judgeships. He did not think that they ought to be satisfied merely with the statement made by the local authorities, or make the provision because the Local Legislature created the office. The travelling expenses of Judges in British Columbia amounted, he believed, to nearly as much as their salaries. The question arose whether anything would be saved by Judges being compelled to reside in particular districts, as they must go occasionally to Victoria, perhaps, to sit in banco, the travelling expenses would, perhaps, still be as great as before. He thought they should have had as full information on this matter as could be furnished by the hon. gentleman when the Bill was introduced.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he should certainly give all the possible information, but the information would come from the source to which the hon. gentleman had access, the official authorities of the Province.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said the hon. member for Gloucester had stated the travelling expenses amounted to as much as their salaries. If the hon. gentleman would look at the Public Accounts he would find that that was not the case.

MR. MILLS said he did not see how there was to be any great saving in regard to travelling expenses, if the Judges were to sit in banco in Victoria. Would not the expense be the same going from a district in which they were located, to Victoria, as going from Victoria to the district? It seemed only to be a difference of starting point.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman would see there would be a great difference in the matter of travelling expenses by the Judges living in their various localities. They performed the duties of County Court Judges, as well as Superior Court Judges, and they would attend to the business of the Courts in their sections. They might go to Victoria, perhaps twice a year, he did not know how often. There was a difference between living in the district and going to Victoria twice a year, and living in Victoria and going into the districts when necessary.

MR. ANGLIN.

MR. MILLS: That is just the point.

ONTARIO AND PACIFIC JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY INCORPORATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL 27.]

(Mr. Hooper.)

SENATE AMENDMENTS AGREED TO.

MR. HOPER moved that the amendments made by the Senate to the Bill be concurred in.

MR. MACKENZIE said one of the amendments was a most important one, and was against the decision of the Railway Committee of this House, which decided that the broad gauge should be adopted. That also passed through the House, and he understood the contention was that they would not now be able to build the road with that gauge, and that if they were to obtain the right, they might be permitted to take the narrow gauge. While he personally regretted this should be necessary, he did not think the House would be justified in refusing to assent to the amendment if what they said was correct.

MR. TUPPER said he quite agreed with what had fallen from the hon. the leader of the Opposition. He thought it was very unfortunate the Senate had been obliged to make the amendment; but on representations being made to them, that the forcing of the broad gauge was tantamount to refusing sanction to the Bill, they had made the amendment. Although he thought it was a matter to be regretted, he was glad the hon. gentleman opposite did not feel inclined to press the views of the Railway Committee.

Amendments read the second time and agreed to.

OFFICIAL ARBITRATORS BILL.

(Mr. Cockburn, West Northumberland.)

FIRST READING.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) introduced a Bill (No. 81) Respecting the official arbitrators. He said that the purport of the Bill had been communicated briefly by him to the Minister of Justice, and without that gentleman being committed in any way he proposed to introduce the Bill simply to remedy cases of arbitration that took place under the Board of Works Act, which were without any appeal whatever. The most valuable properties and interests of private persons might be taken away or totally destroyed by proceedings taken under the Public Works Department. References were made, under the Act, to the official arbitrators, who were to sit and determine the compensation which was to be allowed for property taken or damages sustained. There was no appeal from their decisions; and this, he believed, was the only country in the world where such an arbitrary power was permitted. The men into whose hands these references were committed were Government appointés—salaried officers of the Government of the day—and it was their interest to faithfully serve their masters. They had large private rights of property-holders, as well as claims of damages through public works done in connection or near to those properties; they had all these rights placed at the disposal of the official arbitrators. The object of the Bill was to do away with that anomaly of the law.

SIR A. J. SMITH: What do you propose?

MR. COCKBURN said he proposed, with the concurrence of the House, to make the Exchequer Court the Court of Appeal. Hon. gentlemen would have an opportunity of judging as to the propriety of the Bill, after it was printed and distributed. In the days of old Canada, when one of these cases arose, it was referred to a jury, which was called upon to assess damages. A change was made after Confederation, and this more arbitrary proceeding was established. It had been the law of the Dominion ever since, and he thought the time had now arrived for its amendment.

MR. MACKENZIE said he must object to the introduction of this Bill, which, if it were brought in at all, should be brought in by the Government. It was far too late in the Session to bring down a Bill which was to change so completely the system under which the greater amount of our disputed claims, in regard to public works, and for lands taken, had been settled, and settled, he was bound to say on the whole, and so far as his experience allowed him to pronounce an opinion, most satisfactorily. He knew something could be said in the way of argument against the present system. The hon. gentleman had striven to do so for a few moments on that occasion; but, on the other hand, they were to look at the public interest also. They had to see how the public could be best protected. There was a tendency even with arbitrators, as with Courts and Judges, perhaps, and certainly with juries, to amerce the Government with the heaviest possible damages. He had no doubt, however, from his knowledge of the present arbitration system, that claimants of all sorts had received full justice from that system. While the argument might be presented as the hon. gentleman had presented it, he thought it was a very serious matter indeed to interfere with the existing state of things, especially in the last days of the Session. He felt bound to oppose the Bill by every means in his power, and therefore he must object to its introduction.

MR. COCKBURN said he thought it would be a rather discourteous act to oppose it at this stage. If upon the second reading, after its contents were known, he were asked to postpone it, he would have no objection to yield.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he went very far with the hon. member for Lambton in his remarks. In the first place it was rather late in the Session to introduce the Bill, and a measure involving such great changes, he thought, should be introduced by the Government; but as there had been some discussion on the measure, and as the opportunity was insisted upon, he hoped the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) would not press the point, because it would only postpone it a day or two.

MR. MACKENZIE said, as the Premier had intimated his intention of opposing the Bill, he would have to yield.

Bill read the first time.

STARVING INDIANS AT LA CHAPELLE,
N. W. T.

QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. MILLS,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD stated that information had been received to the effect that some 400 Indians in all, men, women and children, had gone to the Hudson Bay Station, at La Chapelle, on the Plains, in a state of semi-starvation, and compelled the officers of the company to give them food. The action was compulsory.

TRADE MARKS AND INDUSTRIAL DESIGNS BILL.

(Mr. Pope, Compton.)

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain resolutions respecting the fees to be paid on application for registering of trade marks or industrial designs.

(In the Committee.)

MR. POPE (Compton) said that the amounts paid, under the old law, were not sufficient to cover the expense of the work done. Besides, in the United States they charged a fee of $30, and Americans registered as much in Canada as Canadians themselves. He did not see why foreigners should not pay as much in Canada as Canadians had to pay abroad. Moreover, they enjoyed the benefit of Canadian laws, and should contribute something towards their maintenance. Those trade marks were valuable, as they covered everything. The Canadian charge would only be $25, the old fee being $5.

MR. ANGLIN said that, as it seemed to be the policy of the Government to make all they could out of the Americans, he did not see there was any objection to this change. If they were to frame all their laws to compel the people of the United States to sustain Canadian government, and pay the interest on its debt, the policy would be admitted to be a new one. But many Canadians registered trade marks, and if they found $5 difficult to pay would certainly be embarrassed by $25.

MR. POPE said that the rate was not very high when they considered the duration of the privilege—that the trade mark would last 25 years, during which the owner would receive the protection of Canadian laws. The law would affect the people of France and other foreign countries. Frenchmen now registered largely, and should do so here as they did under the English law.

MR. ANGLIN said he thought the Minister of Agriculture should furnish all the information the House was entitled to on such subjects, without having to be asked. He now began to see the reason for this radical change, Frenchmen would register trade marks more on account of the increased duties on wines.

MR. JONES said he thought the increase was enormous, and that the payments would be principally by its own people, and not by foreigners.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) asked was this law intended to apply to timber.

MR. POPE said it was not.

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked was the expense connected in registering trade marks, under the old system, greater than the receipts.

MR. POPE: Yes.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said of course it would be quite proper that an adequate sum should be paid for this privilege, but the interest of the Canadian producer should be specially guarded.

MR. POPE said that, considering the protection afforded by their Courts, a dollar a year was not too much to pay.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that as regards the Americans, a market of 44,000,000 would allow of a great many more trade marks than the Canadian markets, and might constitute a reason for the difference in cost. If the hon. gentleman was quite convinced that the change in the fee was not going to prevent the registration of trade marks, he did not know there was much to be said against it. It would be a misfortune to interfere seriously with that registration.

Mr. SNOWBALL asked if registration in Canada was binding in England.

Mr. POPE said that registration in England would only answer for that country. Englishmen doing business in Canada would have to register here.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I suppose the Finance Minister will be able to register his trade mark under this Bill. I am sure no civilised nation will attempt to forge it.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. POPE (Compton) said that, at the time this Bill was introduced, he was not aware that a Bill introduced by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had been passed, in 1875, that did away with the necessity for the 7th clause of this Bill.

Mr. CHARLTON said that, at the time the Bill referred to by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) was passed, the arrangement in the United States with regard to the transport of cattle was, that cattle should not be allowed to be closed up in a railway car for more than twenty-eight hours without being watered and fed. In introducing that Bill, he (Mr. Charlton) thought it would be unfair to Canadian transport companies to impose greater restrictions on them than existed in the United States in this respect. Since then, the American law had been modified, and the number of hours reduced to twenty-four. He would suggest the propriety of this clause being changed so that cattle would not be carried for a greater length of time than twenty-four hours, the Canadian railway companies would then be on the same footing as the American companies. He thought the Bill before the House was a step in the right direction, and in the interest of humanity. But if it passed as it now stood, it would place Canadian roads at a disadvantage in the respect he had pointed out.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

SPEEDY TRIALS ACT AMENDMENT
BILL.—[BILL 75.]

(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said the Bill was to amend chap. 35, Statutes of 1869. The Bill was submitted by one of the County Court Judges of Ontario, in order to secure greater facilities in the direction mentioned in the title of the Bill. It appeared to him that the Act was a desirable one, and likely to produce the object the learned Judge had in view.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said he would like to know whether the hon. gentleman had really considered the question at all or not.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he had carefully looked over and compared the original Act and the proposed amended Act, and he saw nothing that he thought was not very desirable. The hon. gentleman, of course, was more familiar with the practices of the Ontario Courts, and it might occur to him that some of the amendments were not desirable. If so, he (Mr. McDonald) was quite sure the House and the Government would be willing to adopt any reasonable suggestions he might make on the subject.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said that all the provisions of the Bill, with the exception of the fifth section, appeared to him to be unnecessary, and that section was undesirable and unreasonable. No doubt some doubt was expressed as to the power given the County Court Judges, under the Sandfield Macdonald Act, to try for a different offence to that in which a prisoner was committed for trial, and to convict of a different offence to that charged in the indictment; but the Judges of the County Courts in Ontario had universally held that, although committed on one offence, yet, being in custody, they had a perfect right to try him on any other charge, and to convict a prisoner of any other offence than that charged, to the same extent as a jury could, if tried by a jury. He was aware that was the way in which several of the County Judges had rendered the law, and, in that case, sections three and four were wholly unnecessary. As regarded section five, the Judges had universally held that, when a prisoner elected to be tried summarily, the Judge who presided at the trial had no power to bail the prisoner. He was afraid the provision in this section was not a step in the right direction at all. The whole aim of the present Statute was, that prisoners should be tried with the least possible delay. As the law now stood, if a prisoner elected to be tried by jury, he had a perfect right to get bail, either by order at the trial, or by order in chambers.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) read the clauses of the old Act bearing on the point raised.

MR. CAMERON said he had read the Statute fifty times, and knew all about its provisions. The Judges had decided over and over again, that while a prisoner was in custody upon one charge, he could be tried under another charge. He did not think there was any doubt about that. As to section seven, it frequently happened that Judges adjourned the trial from day to day, as circumstances might require, and no doubt they had a perfect right to do so. These were all the provisions of his hon. friend's Bill that required any comment. Three of the sections were unnecessary, and the others appeared to him to be injudicious, and exceedingly objectionable. He would like to draw his hon. friend's attention to another matter. He noticed that in the Local Legislature of Ontario, the leader of the Opposition there drew the attention of the Local Government to the necessity of asking the Dominion Government to make an amendment in one of the Canadian Statutes in so far as Ontario and Quebec are concerned, and that was the one that had relation to appeals from summary convictions by Justices of the Peace. The Attorney-General of Ontario expressed his acquiescence in the request of the leader of the Opposition that the Dominion Government should be invited to amend the Statute 32-33 Vict., chap. 31, section 66. His hon. friend was aware that this section enabled the complainant or defendant, in a case of

summary trial before a Justice of the Peace, to appeal to the General Sessions of the Peace. This section also provided that in any case appealed to the Sessions no evidence should be adduced that was not adduced before the Justice of the Peace. The Ontario Legislature appeared to be of the opinion that that was an unwise provision. For instance, the Justice might, improperly and illegally, reject the testimony of a witness tendered for either side, but when the case was appealed to the Court of Quarter Sessions such witnesses could not be examined, and there was no remedy for the improper ruling of the Justice of the Peace, and thus gross injustice might be done to the litigants. It was suggested that this clause in the Act referred to should be struck out, so as to enable the appellant or respondent, when the trial was appealed before the Court of Quarter Sessions, to call other evidence than that which was called before the Justice of the Peace. So strong was the opinion upon that point in Ontario, that a law was passed some years ago, amending the old law in the sense he just indicated, so that in cases of offences against the laws passed by the Local Legislature or within the jurisdiction of the Local Parliament, and where there was an appeal from a conviction by a Justice of the Peace, respecting offences against local laws, either party might call any new testimony that may turn up in the meantime. What Ontario wanted now was a similar provision in respect to laws passed by this Parliament, when cases were appealed to the Sessions. He would also like the hon. gentleman to go a step further while he was amending the Criminal Law. Last Session an Act was passed allowing any party prosecuted for assault to testify in his own behalf, and also to adduce the evidence of his wife. He would like the hon. gentleman to consider whether the provisions of that law could not be amended, so as to extend the provisions of that Act to all criminal cases. He would like to see the law in such a shape that the accused in every case should be allowed to give evidence in his own behalf, and also to adduce the testimony of his wife. It might be too late this Session to deal with so important and large a question, but he trusted his hon. friend would consider the question during the recess, and deal with it at the next Session of Parliament. As the right of an accused to be examined in his own behalf was now the law of the land in assault cases, there was no reason why it should not be extended to every case of misdemeanor at least, if not to all criminal cases. He would ask the hon. gentleman if his attention had not been drawn to the point he mentioned previously by the Attorney-General of Ontario. At all events, he desired the Minister of Justice to give that point his consideration, and incorporate it with his present Bill.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said, with reference to the suggestion of the hon. member for South Huron, his attention had not been called to it, but before the Bill passed through Committee, he would take occasion to look at the Act referred to, and if the amendment seemed desirable, he dared say the additional clause could be inserted. He could easily fancy the arguments which might be adduced against the amendment suggested by the hon. member. If that amendment should prevail, the practical result would be that no trial would take place before a Magistrate, because a party accused would simply stay away and make no defence. He would enter his appeal, and all that class of cases which it was intended by the Act should be tried in a summary manner would practically be tried before a higher Court. So it appeared to him it would be almost as well to take away the inferior jurisdiction and impose upon higher jurisdiction the burden of discharging the duties required by the Act. However, he would look into it and see what could be done. In reference to the suggestion as to extension of the law of evidence, of course that could not be entertained now. Nor was he sure, with his present views on the matter, that he should deal with it in a manner agreeable to his hon. friend. He had very serious doubts indeed, whether we had not already, both in civil and criminal jurisprudence, gone too far in that direction. He had very serious doubts as to the moral effect produced upon the people of the country by affording litigants the right of giving evidence in their own behalf.

However, they did not need to discuss that now. He did not think the criticisms of his hon. friend had in any way affected the Bill, and he thought the clauses might be allowed to pass as they stood.

ANDREW MERCER ONTARIO REFORMATORY FOR FEMALES BILL.—[BILL 76.]

(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

THIRD READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said this was one of the Bills introduced at the request of the Attorney-General of Ontario. Under a Statute of Ontario a reformatory for females was established, called the Mercer Reformatory, and this Bill was for the purpose of enabling females convicted of crime in criminal Courts, to be transferred to this reformatory and to obtain the benefit of that institution.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed.

MANITOBA DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 72.]

(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said this Bill was brought in for the purpose of defining who were members of a family in its relation to the Act respecting the appropriation of Dominion lands in Manitoba. It extended to cases where the husband or the wife were half-breeds, so that in case of the decease of the head of the family, or of the wife, every member of the family should have his share of the division of the family property.

MR. MACKENZIE said he understood there were very serious objections to the passage of this Bill. If he understood the Bill aright, it would interfere with the law of succession, which prevailed in the Province of Manitoba, and would declare certain parties entitled to lands who were not entitled to them under the Provincial law. If that was the drift of the Bill it belonged to a very extraordinary system of legislation. The matter was up before the late Government for discussion, and he was sorry his hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was not in the House at the moment, as he could give very full information in regard to the matter. If he understood the Bill, it would expropriate lands for parties who had no title to them under the law of the Province, and in the Provinces and Territories. He hoped, if the hon. gentleman proceeded with it now, he would, at all events, say whether these facts had come under his observation or not.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman was mistaken in supposing this altered the law of succession. The law of succession out there had nothing to do with it. It was an amendment to an Act of this Dominion, dealing with the settlement of lands of the half-breeds.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the first clause of the Act of which this Bill was an amendment, provided that each half-breed head of a family resident in the Province on a certain day, should receive a certain grant of land. The second clause provided that, for the purpose of that Act, the term "half-breed heads of families" should be held to include mothers as well as fathers, as it was known that, in most Indian tribes, the descent was on the side of the mother and not on the side of the father. It also provided that, in the event of the death of any half-breed father or mother, or both, between the 15th July, 1870, and the granting of the land, or the issue of the scrip, the land, or scrip, to which such half-breed head of the family was entitled, should be granted or distributed to such members of the family, on such conditions as the Governor in Council might, from time to time, determine. As there was doubt as to the meaning of the term "members of the family," this Act provided that the words shall be constituted as having been intended to include the husband or wife of the half-breed head and the children of the deceased. It simply defined the words "members of the family," which was a new phrase, never before used in any Act he was aware of.

MR. MILLS said he supposed the definition of what was meant by a family, might be derived from the decisions of the Courts at various times in England and in this country. Of course, whoever these parties might be, whatever rights were created by the Statute which this Bill proposed to amend, if they were at all vested, were already personal rights; and, if a definition were now given not in strict consonance with the decisions heretofore arrived at by the Courts, certain parties might be divested of rights which they had already been vested with by the operation of the former Statute. With regard to what was to be done with the property of those who had died without leaving behind them any persons embraced in the term family, if the right was a vested right in the ordinary sense of the term, it had passed from our jurisdiction, and came under the law relating to property and civil rights of that Province in which it was situated. The view he had taken of the whole subject was this: that the rights created by this Statute were not vested rights in the sense in which that term was used, and that, where the family was extinct before the property which each was to receive was specifically marked out by the Crown, it, in fact, lapsed or escheated to the Crown. It was declared that certain parties should have certain grants of lands. These parties, or their families, might, at any time, ask for their grants under this provision; but, if none of the persons named in the Statute as beneficially entitled remained; if the family was extinct before the land was vested in them, their heirs or descendants could not claim it, and it reverted to the Crown. The right he regarded as an inchoate and limited right, limited strictly to the persons named in the Statute, and, until there was a specific grant, there were no heirs recognisable. It was a right confined to the family, and, in its immaturity, perished with them. That being the case, he did not see why we should provide for the passing of the property to any other persons.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he agreed that no right which was at all vested under the Act of 1874 should be affected by this law, and in the fifth clause it was stated that all vested rights under the previous Acts should be observed. He agreed with the hon. gentleman, also, that the right obtained by the half-breeds, as a whole, was an inchoate right. It was quite clear that an Act of the Dominion Parliament could only be effectually amended or repealed by the Dominion Parliament. The first clause of this Bill defined what the meaning of "members of the family" was. In the original Act the meaning was very indefinite; there was no definition as to who the members of a family might be. The meaning in England, where there was no tribal system, could be scarcely applicable to the system in the North-West. The question was simply whether it was reasonable that the husband, head of the family, in case the wife were the head of the family, under the Act, or the wife, in case the husband were the head, should be included among the members of the family, and share in the estate. This question had been pressed on the Department, and, therefore, must have arisen in the Law Courts of Manitoba. It was greatly on the side of justice that this provision should be made.

On section 3,

MR. MILLS said he thought hon. gentlemen could not consistently receive this clause.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he recognised the point of the hon. gentleman's contention, and he would not proceed further until he had conferred with his colleagues.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT
BILL.—[BILL 51.]

(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said the first clause merely amended section 4, sub-section 44 of 38 Victoria, chap. 44, and merely enabled the Warden to exercise his discretion in giving a gratuity to a discharged convict, provided he was not going to return to the place at which he received his sentence. The second clause was the principal one. It provided that :

“The Governor in Council may appoint a fit and proper person to be the Accountant of Penitentiaries, who shall be an officer of the Department of Justice, and who shall receive such salary as may be voted by Parliament. He shall be charged generally with the direction, inspection, and audit of the books, accounts, money transactions, and financial affairs of the Penitentiaries, and with such other powers and duties with which the Inspector is now charged as may be assigned to him by order of the Governor in Council; and from and after the appointment of such Accountant, the powers and duties of the Inspector in respect of the matters with which the Accountant may be charged shall cease.”

Under the law, the Governor in Council appointed an accountant or clerk to each Penitentiary, and the only supervision now exercised over these several accountants was that which the inspector might be able to make during his annual visits, or whenever he happened to visit the Penitentiary. It was thought desirable, however, to have an officer whose especial duty would be the supervision and inspection of the books and accounts of Penitentiaries, without any material increased cost in regard to the administration of Penitentiaries. It was manifest that this provision should be made in order that this work might be efficiently performed.

MR. MACKENZIE said that this Bill, though practically a matter of no importance in the first part, provided in the second section for the appointment of another Penitentiary Inspector. It was the duty of the present inspector to inspect the accounts of the Penitentiaries precisely the same as the Inspector of the Ontario Government. That gentleman had to inspect the accounts as well as the discipline of the gaols of Ontario, of all the reformatories under the charge of the Government, of the Penitentiary at Toronto—for the Central Prison was, practically, a Penitentiary;—then he had all the lunatic asylums to attend to; whereas the Dominion Penitentiary Inspector had only the Penitentiaries of Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): And of the Provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia.

MR. MACKENZIE said the present Government had thought it desirable to send Mr. Moylan to these remote places, but the local inspectors had previously done that work. The hon. gentleman had given no reason why this additional appointment should be made. Mr. Moylan ought to be competent to do the work, and if he was not competent some one could be easily obtained who was. The public ought not to be asked to appoint another inspector after he (Mr. Mackenzie) had shown clearly that the work of the Dominion inspector was not a tithe of the work done by the Inspecting Officer of Ontario.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought the hon. gentleman was rather mistaken in regard to Mr. Langmuir's duties. The accounts of the county prisons were audited by the county officers of the county and municipality. The Inspector of Prisons in Ontario had nothing to do with the accounts, except to see that any grants made by the Government of Ontario had been properly expended.

MR. MACKENZIE: That only relates to the jails. That is not half the work.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there were only one or two Asylums and the Central Prison in addition, besides one or two charitable institutions that were assisted by the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE: There is a Blind Asylum and a Deaf and Dumb Asylum.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes, those are two of the charitable institutions, but I take it there is no auditing done there by Mr. Langmuir.

MR. MACKENZIE : Yes.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was sure no man could do all that work. The Bill under consideration provided for the auditing and careful examination by an accountant of all the accounts of the Penitentiaries. It was a work that could be done, perhaps, by the Finance Department or the Auditor-General's Department, but some officer should be detailed other than the inspector, whose business was to attend to the discipline and see that the whole machinery was in order.

MR. MACKENZIE said that if the hon. gentleman would look at the report of Mr. Langmuir for one year, he would find out what he had done ; and by looking at the report of the Minister of Justice he would observe the work done by Mr. Moylan. Mr. Langmuir had to visit five lunatic asylums, containing about 2,000 patients. The accounts of these institutions were wholly under the control of Mr. Langmuir. Then there was the Provincial Penitentiary at Toronto, managed by Mr. Langmuir. Then there were the charitable institutions, to which the Government paid a certain proportion, according to the number of inmates—such as orphan asylums and institutions of a cognate character. Then there were the general hospitals which received a proportion of the Provincial revenue. The accounts of all these institutions had to be inspected by this officer. There was in every county, or union of counties, a jail, and in some counties more than one, and these had to be inspected by the Provincial inspector, and no one could say that the amount of work this officer discharged was not largely in excess of that done by the present Inspector of Penitentiaries. He must enter his solemn protest against the creation of this office when there was not work enough for the officer who had charge of this business.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said it was highly desirable that there should be an accountant to examine the books of the various Penitentiaries where they had large factories and workshops, and where stock was to be purchased, wages paid, and where there were all the intricacies of a large and extensive business.

He was under the impression that a large amount of money had been lost to the country, owing to the want of this supervision, while the additional expense to the administration of Penitentiaries would be but small.

MR. CARTWRIGHT : What salary would you propose to pay this accountant?

MR. McDONALD : From $1,200 to $1,400 a year.

MR. OUIMET said he thought the reasons given by the hon. the Minister of Justice with regard to having a proper officer to examine the accounts of these institutions, was quite correct. As he understood the present Act, this was the duty of the Inspector of the Penitentiaries. In the Bill before the House, it was provided for the appointment of a new officer, who was not controlled by the Inspector of Penitentiaries, and he did not belong to that office. He thought it was dividing a responsibility which heretofore rested on the Inspector of Penitentiaries, and he did not think it was advisable to divide that responsibility, and create a new machinery in that office which was complete enough at present. For those reasons, he would suggest to the Minister of Justice that he should provide that this office, which belongs to the office of the Inspector, the holder to be responsible to him, and through him, to the Minister of Justice, so as to have the whole machinery working together. He thought that that would be enough, unless it were deemed better to acquire an officer outside the Department to look after the matter, more financial than administrative. But any accountant appointed ought to belong to the Inspector's office.

MR. MACKENZIE said what was to prevent the travelling financial inspector, who inspected the accounts of the Intercolonial Railway, from inspecting the accountant's books in the Penitentiary. There was a good deal of force in the remarks of the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet), as to dividing the responsibility. He was now charged with duties which the hon. gentleman was taking a vote to appoint another person to do. They were told he was unable to discharge them. But if it was essential to appoint another individual, he ought to be responsible to the inspector, and through him report to the Government. But he (Mr. Mackenzie) could not believe—and no evidence had been offered by the Government to show—that the inspector was so hardly worked as to be unable to look over the books of the accountants of the various Penitentiaries. Unless that was shown the hon. gentleman should not ask the House to appoint another official.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he had not stated the inspector was not competent for his functions, but, that in his opinion, the appointment of another officer and the subdivision of the labour proposed, was for the public interest. It was his belief, and the opinion of the Department, that a very much larger sum would be saved by the appointment of an officer charged with the sole duty of making a proper inspection, regularly investigating the vouchers, and seeing that the books were regularly kept, and that all the financial affairs of the institutions were correctly looked after by the clerks, whose salaries were limited to $600 or $700 a year.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that the hon. gentleman was in error; the accountants in Kingston and St. Vincent de Paul had $1,000.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said that that sum would not command the services of a first-class accountant. He had considered the suggestion of the hon. member for Laval before, and did not think it well to accede to it, for the reasons he (Mr. McDonald) had given, it would be better that this accountant should be directly under the control of the Minister having charge of the Department. He wished again to say that his desiring the passing of those resolutions did not indicate any doubt of the competence of the present Inspector to discharge the duties of the office; but he thought, owing to the amount of his work, that this work would be better done by the appointment he asked. The suggestion of the member for Lambton, with regard to the travelling Inspector, would be considered.

MR. OUMET asked for explanations as to the extraordinary powers that might be assigned by order of the Governor in Council.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said the Governor in Council was to have power to redistribute the duties and responsibilities of the inspector and those accountants. He took it for granted that this duty would be exercised only in case of necessity—the Statute pointed out the duties of the inspector, and he took it for granted that he could not be interfered with, unless there should be some pressing reason for it. The duty of the inspector would be to keep such supervision over the statements, and the financial concerns of every Penitentiary within the jurisdiction of a Department, as would secure the due and proper keeping of the Penitentiary accounts.

MR. OUMET said that, when the Bill was passed by the late Government, there were three Inspectors of Penitentiaries. He thought it would be better to come back to the old system, and create two offices instead of one of Inspectors of Penitentiaries.

WAYS AND MEANS.—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Tilley, for the second reading of resolutions relative to duties of Customs and Excise, reported from Committee of Ways and Means (April 9th).

MR. TILLEY: I purpose calling the attention of the House, for a short time, to the remarks that were made, especially by the hon. members in Opposition from New Brunswick, because in answering their arguments I think I will be able to answer the arguments that have been presented by hon. members on the other side of the House, from all parts of the Dominion. In the first place, I think it was observed during last Session by hon. members, that, when any attack was made on the Administration, it was responded to by a declaration that when the Opposition were in power they did precisely the same thing.

AN HON. MEMBER : Or worse.

MR. TILLEY : Judging from the course taken during this debate, I have arrived at the conclusion that that line of argument has been taken on the present occasion and during this Session. It is not entirely an answer to the arguments presented on this side of the House ; but the hon. member from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) said the other night in justification of a remark he made, that I asked an hon. member whether there was anything inconsistent in the political conduct of gentlemen on this side of the House. This question was put with a view to meeting arguments of members on this side. I think my hon. friends opposite have endeavoured to meet the arguments in favour of this tariff by striving to find some inconsistency in my conduct as a representative of New Brunswick, in order to strengthen their arguments or make good their opposition to the tariff. We had speeches from the member for Queen's (Mr. King), and I must say that, from his standpoint—though I entirely differ with him—he put his points very clearly, and made a very creditable maiden speech ; but I entirely dissent from the grounds on which he based his arguments, as well as from the arguments themselves. We have had statements made by the member for Northumberland (Mr. Snowball), as to the unfair bearing of these propositions upon New Brunswick and the lumber trade. We have had a speech from the late Minister of Customs (Mr. Burpee) and his colleague from the city and county of St. John (Mr. Weldon) in the same direction, and speeches from several members whose seats are contested, like my own ; and, of course, I can quite understand that those gentlemen were anxious to make speeches that would help them, if possible, in the approaching elections. There are several others in this condition, however—and I am not at all alarmed, in that case, as to the result of the enquiry ; or, if we had to go to the people, I would be prepared, as in days passed, to present my case to my constituents, and I am certain I could present one that would merit and receive their approval and endorsement. Now, Sir, in the first place, it has been said that I was inconsistent. Though this array of talent from the Province of New Brunswick presented their case so strongly here, even the late Minister of Customs, the hon. member for Westmoreland, the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the member for Gloucester, with all his ability, with all the arguments they could bring to bear, were not considered sufficient, but they must have my hon. friend, who sits there reading now, who had to point out that I had occupied a somewhat distinguished position in the Province of New Brunswick, and that my name was dishonoured, execrated, because I had introduced a measure to Parliament that was going to crush the people of New Brunswick. That champion had to stand up here, when I know his constituents have declared in favour of the proposition submitted to Parliament, and argue to show that my name was desecrated in that Province. It is said that I am entirely inconsistent. And my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, too, said that my course was inconsistent, inasmuch as I declared one thing on the hustings at St. John, and that I presented a different proposition here ; that my position was not honest, and was not tenable. I recollect very well that the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall), the other night, quoted a speech of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), to show that that gentleman was inconsistent. I have never been in Scotland and made a Free-trade speech in one city, and a Protection speech in another. I have never held two different opinions with reference to this question, Sir. Now, let me see the position I take. My hon. friend said that, in the city of St. John, I said that, if I had been in power in 1875, I would increase the duties. I said that then, and I say it now, because at that time we wanted a little more money than was required in 1873 from Customs. What was the fact in reference to that matter ? In my place in Parliament, in 1873, I stated that the Government did not contemplate proposing any additional taxation to Parliament, but, in view of the increased liabilities, it would be necessary to come down next Session for a change of tariff. In 1874, if there had been need for some additional revenue from Customs, we would have raised it upon articles that were not manufactured in the country, and at the same time afforded indirect Protection to the industries of the country. That is what we would have done. Then hon. members say that I stated in the speeches I made that I was opposed to an increase of taxation, that we did not want any increase of taxation, that what we wanted was a readjustment of the tariff. If I erred at all in the line I took in the discussion; if I erred in any of the conclusions at which I arrived, it was because I had placed too much confidence in the calculations of my predecessor, with reference to the amount of revenue we would receive from Customs. He assumed $13,750,000 as the receipts from Customs, and I do not hesitate to say to-day that, if it had been shown by the receipts up to the present time, or for the first six months in the current year, that we were to receive $13,750,000 from Customs, instead of asking an increase from 17½ to 20 per cent., we would have been able to leave it at 17½, if not reduce it, because we would not have required over that sum. And, therefore, I stated that it would not be necessary to increase the taxation. But we wanted a readjustment of the tariff. It was argued that the proposition of the Opposition was to impose a United States tariff on the Dominion of Canada, and, when we did that, to show clearly and distinctly that such a proposition would give us double the Customs revenue we receive at the present moment. That never could be contemplated by a Government, or by an Opposition, but what we said was simply that what we required was from $13,500,000 to $14,000,000 from Customs, and from $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 from Excise, and the tariff would be imposed to raise that sum of money. That being done, all that was necessary was to give at the same time Protection to the industries of the country. There was nothing inconsistent in that at all. That was our line of argument, and I say here that I went on to point out the necessity of giving Protection to our manufactures and industries. Did I not, over and over again, point out—as a member said in his place the other day, that I stated to a deputation in the lumber interests that this was a waning interest—did I not point out to a meeting in New Brunswick that our lumber trade must be steadily decreasing from year to year, and it was absolutely necessary for us to find some other industry to which our people should turn their attention, and not have their whole energies directed to that trade, although, at the present time, producing more than England and the United States would take from us? Did I not point out it was necessary to construct manufactories, and give employment to our people upon those water powers that are now used in the manufacture of lumber? Did I not point out in other addresses that it was absolutely necessary, if this Dominion was to become what under Providence I believed it was destined to be, that we should find some other employment for our people, so as to retain them in the country, instead of having them go off by hundreds and thousands to the United States? There was nothing inconsistent then in the line of conduct I took with the proposition that has been submitted to the House. The hon. gentlemen have looked up my speeches since 1864. Why did not they, if they could, put their hand on a single argument that I used inconsistent with this? Why did they not show the inconsistency? But it has not been done, and cannot be done. Hon. members laugh, but can they put their hand upon it? In addition to that, let me say there is an attempt made to renew the old feeling, the old anti-Confederate feeling. My hon. friend from the city and county of St. John, who has always been an anti-Confederate, spoke in that strain, and I was not at all surprised to hear him, with lamentation and mourning, speak of the present condition of the country. He had prophesied that before, and other hon. gentlemen did the same thing. It was asserted that, because I, at the close of my first Budget speech, indicated that there was a great future before this Dominion, the House was told that no dependence could be placed on any prophecy of mine, that my prophecies with reference to Confederation had not been realised, and therefore my prophecies with reference to this tariff, and the future of the country would not be realised either. My hon. friend from Queen's stated, and he was followed by several other hon. members, as a proof of the fallacy of my calculations, that in 1864 I asserted, and asserted boldly, they said, that $2.75 per head, and subsequently $3 per head, as taxation of the population of the Dominion, would be all that was necessary for a quarter of a century to come. I did say that, Mr. Speaker; I did say that. But let us look at the circumstances and the position of matters then and now. What was the fact? The hon. member for Westmoreland the other day said that, under the first proposition that was agreed to at Quebec — and that statement was made before the alterations were made afterwards in London — the whole policy of the deputation, at that time, was to draw as lightly as possible from the Dominion when organised, and to leave the separate Provinces to manage as economically as possible, and make the charge on general revenue as light as possible. Now, what was the fact? The fact was that, notwithstanding that arrangement was altered before Confederation took place, in the first three years of Confederation, though we had given an additional sum to all the Provinces, and made additional charges on the revenue of the Dominion, it may be seen by the Customs and Excise returns that the taxation was but a fraction over $3 per head during the first three years of Confederation. If I erred at all, it was with reference to the wonderful prosperity that has attended Confederation. Let me point out the fact that, subsequently, we came down to Parliament and assumed the debts of all the Provinces, amounting to something like $10,000,000 or $11,000,000 from Ontario and Quebec. We then gave additional subsidies to some of the Provinces, increasing these charges on the general revenue. What is the state of the case to-day? The late Minister of Customs stated — or, at all events, some of the hon. members did — that now the taxes of New Brunswick averaged $7 per head paid into the Dominion Treasury, and that, under the operation of this tariff, it would amount to $9.50 or $10 per head. Now this was a very unfair way of stating the case. The only way we can arrive at a fair test of the taxation of the Province, is not on the general receipts; it is not upon the sums paid for the maintenance of railways, post-offices and public works generally. We must look at what we are assessed in the shape of Customs and Excise, because we have obtained receipts in return for the expense of maintaining railways, so they should not be taken into account. To make up this sum of $7 per head, we have to add $464,000, which was very exceptional in its character that year, on account of the great fire in St. John, which destroyed all the stocks of goods in the city. That fire required, during the last year, an additional taxation of between $400,000 and $500,000. That was held up to-day by hon. gentlemen to make the people of New Brunswick, and this House, believe that this is the average sum New Brunswick pays per head. But take out of that the sums paid from which we obtained a return, and you will find that the average for the years 1875, 1876 and 1877, was $1,391,464, as receipts from Customs and Excise in New Brunswick. This sum includes receipts from the Sick and Disabled Seamen's Fund, and Weights and Measures, amounting to $14,000. That is the average for the two years preceding the last year, which is an exceptional one. Now, what is the fact with reference to this matter? I had a letter from a friend in St. John the other day, and he tells us what the matter is. He says there are as many copies of the Globe circulated through the county of St. John to-day as if we were on the eve of a general election. Our hon. friends opposite, especially the one from St. John, must be anticipating an election, for these papers are sent to the electors without money and without price.

MR. MACKENZIE: Still it will do good.

MR. TILLEY: That remains to be seen. I doubt it myself. But, in view of the statement that had been made, I claim a little time in order to show what the position of New Brunswick is. The average was $1,391,464, and under the arrangement for New Brunswick, she has a loan of $63,000, which was given her for ten years, she receives direct in the payment of the interest upon her debt, and a subsidy of $128,475, which is equal, within a few cents per head, of the whole sum she contributes, making no reference whatever to the expenditure for Civil Service, or for Intercolonial Railway, or harbours, or rivers, or breakwaters, or on the Pacific Railway. Now it is said that New Brunswick pays a duty upon articles that are brought from Ontario and Quebec. But we must remember that St. John has the trade of a part of Nova Scotia, and a large portion of the revenue credited to New Brunswick is really paid by the people of Nova Scotia, and amply makes up for whatever she may contribute in the shape of duties directly to Montreal or Quebec. We know perfectly well that, as far as New Brunswick is concerned, if she buys any goods at all from Ontario and Quebec, they are goods in Excise or in bond, and they pay Excise duty in the Province of New Brunswick. So much for reference to our financial condition. I know the time was, and I have been threatened with it again, that I would be execrated, and be so unpopular in New Brunswick that I could not carry a constituency. In 1864, after we had agreed upon this Quebec scheme, I went back to New Brunswick with the propositions contained in these resolutions passed at Quebec. We dissolved the Legislature of New Brunswick and had a general election, and, as the hon. member for Gloucester stated the other day, we were defeated in the contest. So great was the feeling at the time against me, that I could not obtain a hearing on a husting before that election. The hon. member for Gloucester recollects that perfectly well. I had always a posse of friends to see me home from public meetings ; my life was not considered safe.

MR. ANGLIN : I contradict that positively and at once. The hon. member was never interfered with in a public meeting.

MR. TILLEY : No, never interfered with ; but it was a humiliating position when the hon. member for Gloucester had to stand upon the platform of the city of St. John and ask the people who were preventing me from speaking, to give me a hearing.

MR. TILLEY.

MR. ANGLIN : I never did anything of the kind ; I will have a thousand witnesses to that fact in the city of St. John.

MR. TILLEY : I have advocated a cause that was unpopular at the time, but it became popular, and if I am unpopular with reference to this position, it will become popular also. I know well that I was never personally interfered with, but excitement ran high, and my friends did go home with me from the meetings. We were defeated. We discussed this question though we had a short time to do it in—two or three months to reach the length and breadth of the Province of New Brunswick. And then it was a cry of taxation—the same cry that we hear to-day—that the people of New Brunswick were to be subjected by this Confederation to enormous and increased taxation. Well, we were defeated. We had but eleven out of a House of forty-one ; all the representatives of the city and county of St. John were defeated. But in six months after that, being perfectly at leisure, I visited eleven out of sixteen counties in the Province. We held meetings, and the result was that the year after, when people had time to reflect upon this question, when they had thought the matter over, they reversed the verdict. It was not because the Fenians came on to our frontier. The hon. member for Gloucester made a very singular admission the other night. He said the Fenians were brought in at Eastport to frighten the people into Confederation. I saw some three hundred of them. They visited one of the islands, and destroyed some buildings there, tore down the British flag, and made various demonstrations. And then the hon. member said he was in the Government.

MR. ANGLIN : I was not in the Government at that time.

MR. TILLEY : But you spoke of your connection with the Government, as having had a tendency towards that direction. The hon. gentleman being a member of the Government, I certainly thought he meant he was in some way connected with it—that his connection with the Government, and the cry with reference to the Fenians had produced this feeling of alarm into the Province. It was stated on the hustings of St. John that Tilley had really brought these Fenians there; and I recollect that Colonel Gray said at the time that Tilley must be a wonderful man if he could induce all the poor servant girls in the United States to contribute money out of their earnings towards this Fenian movement. But it was not the Fenian movement that wrought this change; it was the sober second thought of the people, and, when they came to the polls again, out of forty-one members there were only eight returned in opposition to Confederation. Then we went on year after year. I recollect, six or nine months after Confederation, there was a good deal of feeling in New Brunswick, with reference to the assimilation of regulations in the Customs Department. I recollect a friend saying to me: "Mr. Tilley, do you not feel uncomfortable with the feeling that is manifested here against the Confederation by some of your old friends?" No, I said, I did not; I did feel it to a certain extent, but I have such an abiding faith that at the expiration of five years the people will be perfectly satisfied that I am content to wait five years for the vindication of my course. Well, I waited five years. At the close of five years, in 1872, when we returned to New Brunswick, though we had been in the Government here five years, carrying on the business of Confederation in a most successful manner, I was able to go back to the constituency of St. John, and there receive a support such as I had seldom received, after this union had been in existence for five years. I found that there was scarcely a man who came to the hustings, but was prepared to support the Administration and to declare that Confederation had worked more favourably than they expected. They had been told, in 1866, that Canadian labour would go down in the Province of New Brunswick, and that they would have French labour for 1s. per day. I pointed out to them that all their misgivings were baseless, and I said to them: Are you not receiving better wages than before? and they said yes, and I received a hearty hearing, without any interruption whatever, and the very large support of my own constituency, and throughout the length and breadth of New Brunswick. That was the result of the five years' experience of Confederation. With reference to this matter, the hon. member for Westmoreland, among the rest, declared on the hustings, in 1872, that he came here with his sympathies in favour of the Opposition, because he had been an anti-Confederate. After sitting here for five years, he made up his mind that the present Administration in 1872 were the best men, because they were more liberal to the Maritime Provinces than the Opposition. That was the general impression that prevailed with reference to this policy, but it only required a change of Government in 1873 to make it universally acceptable. Men who had been opposed to Confederation accepted the position after the hon. gentlemen opposite came into power. Of course, they had their fair share in the Administration of the Government, because the party then in power was very largely composed of anti-Confederates, and in 1874 I had the satisfaction of hearing universal peace proclaimed, and Confederation accepted. Now things are changed. These gentlemen have passed to the opposite side of the House, and, when a proposition is submitted which, under the changed circumstances of the country, in the judgment of the Government, is absolutely necessary, which will give Protection to our manufacturing, agricultural and mining interests, we find those gentlemen who were formerly opposed to, and some who were in favour of, Confederation, rising up and declaring these propositions are going to ruin the country, and are one of the results which some of them had predicted of Confederation. Now, I desire to consider the effect which this proposal is likely to have, in my judgment, upon New Brunswick, and, when I say New Brunswick, it will have the same effect upon every other part of the Dominion, but I say so because the arguments of my hon. friends have been presented especially in regard to New Brunswick. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Snowball) and the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. King) both spoke of the effect this tariff would have on the lumber interest, but, before I touch that, let me state the effect I believe it is calculated to have on the manufacturing industries of New Brunswick. According to a statement made by Mr. Everett, the president of the Manufacturers' Association of the city and county of St. John, of the manufacturing industries of the city and county of St. John in 1874, as compared with 1878, giving the amount of capital invested, the number of males and females employed, and the annual wages paid, it appears that in 1874 there were 8,428 males, 1,769 females employed in these manufacturing industries, and that in 1878, the number employed was reduced to 5,031 males, and 1,821 females; that the capital invested in 1874, was $7,966,000, against $5,730,300 in 1878; and that the labour paid in 1874 was $3,605,720, against $1,825,645 in 1878. This return gave the results of the different industries. Take for instance, the boot and shoe manufacturers. In 1874, 1,071 persons were employed in this industry against 695 in 1878. I mention this industry alone to show the falling off since 1874, down to 1878, and Mr. Everett, in his letter to me last January or February, accompanying the statement, states that then the number of persons employed in the different industries was still further reduced.

MR. ANGLIN: What is the cause?

MR. TILLEY: There are two causes, one owing to the depression of trade, the other to the unfair competition from manufacturers in the United States.

Several HON. MEMBERS: No.

MR. TILLEY: Suppose we deal with New Brunswick alone. I believe that within twelve months this former prosperity will be largely restored. I do not expect that our business will come up to what it was in 1874, but that a decided improvement will result. In 1875 when I pointed to the exhibition that took place in St. John, an exhibition that would have been creditable to any of the Provinces, I called attention to the fact that in the census returns of 1861, the value of manufactures, not including ships and lumber, was $3,150,000, and in 1871 their value was over $8,000,000; and that Mr. Everett, a gentleman connected with this association, declared the increase from 1871 to 1875 was greater in proportion than the increase from 1861 to 1871. In 1873 we had as much Protection nearly as we will have under the propositions now before the House, against the United States. Under our 15 per cent. tariff then, which with the high rates of labour in the United States formed practical Protection, our industries could compete successfully with those of the United States, and did not require the legislative shield to be thrown around them that is now required and is given by these resolutions. The depressed condition of trade, and the sharp competition from the manufacturers of the United States, who made our country a slaughter market for their surplus goods, however, caused our industries to decline, and necessitated the introduction of a Protective tariff. Since the 14th of last month, many of those manufactories which had closed down have been re-opened. An Act was passed in the Legislature, a few days ago, to incorporate a company for a sugar refinery; application has been made to extend a cotton manufactory, and increase the capital of the company; the glass works are again in operation. We have been told here that these propositions will not benefit the agricultural interests at all. If we can give new life and impetus to the manufacturing industries of the Dominion, increase the number of men and women employed, give them remunerative wages and plenty of employment, though we did not give one cent directly to the agricultural interests, the revival of these industries and consequent employment of these people would create a home market for the agriculturist, where he could, as in 1873, get profitable returns for what he had to sell. If we do nothing else but give vitality and life to these industries, we shall have accomplished a great deal. But we do more. The hon. member for Northumberland, and the hon. member for Queen's calculated that it would cost the manufacturer of lumber, under this tariff, 60c. a thousand feet to get out their lumber. Why, if that were the case, the lumbermen would have to pay the whole of the additional sum required from New Brunswick. But that is not correct. They will have to pay something more for their oats than before, and the agriculturist will benefit by that additional price. I said I had two or three letters of complaint with reference to this tariff. What are the natures of these complaints? One letter contains the complaint that we have an ad valorem and specific duty on cotton and woollen goods, which makes it difficult to pass the entries. The other two complained that a duty was placed on corn and cornmeal, but I have two in my hand in which the writers complain that the duty on corn and cornmeal was not higher in the agricultural interest. That is the extent of the complaints that have reached me. As far as the agricultural interests in the Lower Provinces are concerned, they will be benefitted by getting an increased home market for their productions, and increased prices for some of their articles. The hon. member for Northumberland said: "See how much Miramichi will suffer." Well, I admit that, perhaps, Miramichi will suffer a little in the future, not by the change in the tariff, but, perhaps, by the change of Government. Some of the manufacturing industries may not be able to sell deal ends at a dollar and a half a cord more than firewood could be laid down for at the railway. Some of those industries, one in particular, may suffer in that direction, but, with reference to the tariff, the sufferings will be very light. Let us look at it. I am not a lumberman, but know something about the supplies sent into the woods. We will take, for instance, the article of pork. How much additional will the lumberman have to pay on that? 10c. a barrel. On tea he will pay less, and on molasses a slight increase. Then, as to the tobacco, under our propositions, by using the commoner kinds of tobacco instead of Canadian twist at 10c. a pound, he will pay but 4c. per pound. Most of those persons take their own supplies and horses. They used the blankets they manufactured themselves, and if they bought their blankets, they could now get them as cheap as under the old tariff. He made statements before me that those persons engaged in the woollen manufactures had not increased the prices of their goods. The competition will be so great that there will be no practical increase under the operation of this tariff, and a better article will be produced, not an article heavily weighted with ingredients, as many of those imported were, to give it a substantial appearance, but Canadian blankets made out of Canadian wool. As regards flour, if the statements of the leader of the Opposition and other hon. gentlemen be true, the duty on wheat and flour will not increase the price to the consumer.

MR. ANGLIN: Is it true?

MR. TILLEY: In the northern part of New Brunswick, it will not increase the price of flour one cent; but, on the southern side, it is possible, from the fact that sometimes vessels bring in flour at a freight of 8c. to 10c. a barrel, the price may increase, but I do not think the average increase on the price of flour will be over 10c. per barrel, taking the whole Province. The molasses is less, the tea less, the pork and flour 10c. a barrel more, and the oats a little higher. As far as the practical effect is concerned, in increasing the prices of articles used by the lumbermen, it will scarcely be felt at all, and with reference to the various other industries, they must be materially benefitted. Something was said the other night with reference to our manufactures in the different parts of the Dominion. I am not, I think, over sanguine when I say the day is not far distant when the population in the western country will be greater than it is in Canada, and when the Maritime Provinces, with their coal, iron and water power, will be the manufacturing centres for this vast Dominion. Now, of course, our manufacturing industries are centered in Hamilton, Montreal and Toronto, but, for the population of the city and county of St. John, compared with the population of other districts, the manufactures there are in excess of those of any other district. There are water privileges on the St. Croix that, in value and importance, are not exceeded in any part of the Dominion. It is only necessary to obtain authority for the construction of cotton and woollen mills with one end in the Dominion, and the other in the United States, and you can have your manufactures supplying this whole continent. It holds out advantages such as can be found in no other part of the Dominion, and I predict, under a tariff such as this, the results in that part of the country alone will be of inestimable value. The lumber in that section of the country is fast passing away, and the power which exists there must be brought into use for some other manufacturing interest than the lumber industry, which is a failing industry. It is a failing industry in that part of the country especially, and something else must be established for it, so that the power will not cease to be as valuable as it is at the present moment. You may go into various parts of New Brunswick, and you will find that persons with a small amount of capital will be starting new industries, and be giving employment to the people now idle. Unless some such industries are introduced, the country will remain in a condition none of us would like to see it in. It is my conviction, in reference to the Province of New Brunswick, that the manufacturing equally with the agricultural and lumber interest, will be fostered and encouraged by the present tariff. Now we come to the ship-building interest, which is a very important interest indeed. You would suppose from the statements that have been made generally, that we are imposing increased taxation on that industry, instead of relieving it. The question has been asked: "How could you arrange this drawback?" We know that before Confederation took, we had an arrangement by which a drawback was given on certain articles entering into these vessels. It is impossible to make a like arrangement now—an arrangement by which the duty will be returned on articles used in ship-building, on which duty has been paid. It cannot but be a benefit to these industries. The hon. member for South Wellington said the other day, with reference to the drawback, if the consumer paid the duty, why give the drawback?

MR. GUTHRIE: I said if the consumer did not pay the duty.

MR. TILLEY: Well, it makes no difference. It does not affect the case in the least. Drawbacks are given to enable manufacturers in this country to compete with manufacturers in other countries. I recollect, in regard to the manufacture of sewing machines, a deputation waited upon me, at the head of which was a constituent of the hon. member. I said one of the propositions of the Government is to give a drawback on articles on which you pay duty, used in the manufacture of sewing machines, and which are exported from the country. This gentleman rose and said: "That is just what I want; I tried to get the late Government to do that, but they would not. When I export my sewing machines, I want to export a certain number of needles with them; without these needles the sewing machines are not saleable. These needles are not manufactured in Canada. I made an application for a drawback, but they would not give it. This drawback will put me in a better position to compete with other countries." That gentleman's name is Raymond. He was emphatic in his approval of this proposal with regard to the drawback on the duty paid upon the material that enters into their manufacture.

MR. GUTHRIE: They would rather have the whole tariff without a drawback.

MR. TILLEY: I doubt that very much.

MR. GUTHRIE: Oh, yes; I know it.

MR. TILLEY: The drawback is for the purpose of encouraging those industries, and enable them to compete successfully with manufacturers in other countries. I am satisfied that this system can be carried out successfully, but some regulations may be necessary in regard to it. It will, doubtless, entail a great deal of trouble in the Departments, but still there can be no difficulty in practically working out a system. The hon. member stated, the other day, that, under this tariff, we could not grind corn in this country. Since that speech was delivered, I have heard from Eastport, the place the hon. member said I would be so popular in—why I cannot say—as popular as the hon. member himself was, when the paper in Calais advocated his appointment as Governor of New Brunswick, perhaps, from the fact that he was supporting the patronage of the United States. There was a corn mill there, and, since this tariff had been announced, arrangements have been made to establish a corn mill on this side of the river, for the purpose of grinding corn instead of driving the trade away. Now, then, Mr. Speaker, with regard to sugar, although it is not used extensively by lumbermen, there will be a decrease in the price of it. This has been questioned, but I have not the least doubt that, under the operation of this tariff, there will be a decrease in the price of that article also. The practical effect of these resolutions, if made applicable solely to the Province of New Brunswick, I am satisfied will be found to be most beneficial indeed; I have no doubt of it.

MR. MACKENZIE: It must be awfully unjust to the other Provinces, then.

MR. TILLEY: No, it is not unjust to the other Provinces. I say this, and I referred to it the other day, that, while, from the statements that have been made here, and from the opinions that efforts have been made to inculcate, throughout the length and breadth of New Brunswick, that this is to be a most oppressive tariff, as far as New Brunswick is concerned, I am satisfied that within a year, or two years at the outside—and I may say, at this moment, I am receiving letters every day, stating that this tariff is growing more acceptable there every day—it will have proved to be of decided benefit to New Brunswick. Now, Sir, that is the information I have received from New Brunswick. And I can only say, with regard to other portions of the Dominion, no matter from whence I receive communications, whether it be in Hamilton, Toronto, Montreal, or any of the large centres, where there has been universal depression for the last two or three years, I find there is now a feeling of confidence restored, the result of which has been the starting of new industries, the restoration of old ones, and the placing on full time, and more than full time, men who have been out of work or only partially employed. It is not to be expected that propositions of this kind should work revolutions in a month; but I doubt if any propositions ever submitted to this or any other Parliament have done as much by way of giving as much increased employment, and restoring shaken confidence, as these propositions have done everywhere. I am satisfied, with reference to this matter, that we are not over sanguine, but the results we have already seen justify us with reference to the conclusions at which we have arrived. Some hon. gentlemen have risen here and said, when it proved a success we will be satisfied with it. All I can say is, I am confident it will prove a success. I hope in twelve months we will have our friends opposite not only sustaining us in these propositions, but, when they find the resolutions do not afford sufficient Protection, they will be here to encourage us in increasing that Protection. If the result proves that the Protection we have given has not raised the price materially to the consumer, but has given additional employment to our people, increased their wages, increased the compensation for their labour, if this is shown, I believe these resolutions will be most acceptable throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion. I desired to say a few words with regard to New Brunswick and the effect these propositions will have upon her. Having done so, I will now leave the subject, because I presume our friends will move amendments with reference to certain propositions, and it will be necessary to justify and defend them at that time. Before I sit down, I desire to call the attention of the House to a personal matter for a few moments. In the somewhat warm and animated discussion that took place here the other day, reference was made by me to a communication which the hon. member for Westmoreland had alluded to at a picnic. I referred to the matter, saying that, as he had alluded to part of it, if I were free to refer to the whole correspondence it would put me in a better position. When the hon. member asked me for the correspondence, I did not have it; nor did I know where it was then, but I immediately set about to ascertain where it was. I telegraphed on Thursday night to a friend at St. Andrews to send me on a trunk with some of my correspondence in. That telegram did not reach him till two hours after the train had left on Friday morning, but he sent it on Monday by express. I thought it would have been here yesterday, but it did not arrive until this afternoon, and I hold now the correspondence which took place between the hon. gentleman and myself, which at his request I purpose reading. This letter, marked "confidential," is dated the 1st of December, 1877. The first part of it refers to the death of a member of my family, then the hon. gentleman proceeds to say:—

"Before leaving for Ottawa, which I shall do on Monday next, I propose to carry out a purpose which I have had in contemplation for some time, but which I would prefer to have done (if opportunity had offered) by personal communication instead of by letter. I hope you will regard it as strictly confidential and not consider it out of place. It is this. What are your personal wishes as regards the future? Do you desire to return to active political life, or would you prefer to continue in the position you now occupy? I need not say how successful you have been as Governor. All parties unite in bestowing the highest encomiums on your administration as such, and your re-appointment would, I am quite sure, meet with universal approbation. If you and I could sail in the same political boat, I do not hesitate to say that I shall be heartily glad to have you resume political life, but I suppose this is too much to hope for. You feel yourself, I presume, allied to the other side, although I cannot but feel that your normal position is with us. You will pardon me for speaking thus freely and receive, I hope, what I have said in the friendly spirit in which I intended. Old friendship, too, must plead in my behalf. If you do not wish to answer these questions, say so without hesitation. I shall receive it well from you, and we will consider the correspondence as absolutely obliterated, leaving no trace behind. I may add that Mackenzie has no knowledge of my writing this letter, and if you answer, address me at Ottawa. I shall be there till Christmas.

"Sincerely yours,
"A. J. SMITH."

This was my reply:

"FREDERICTON, Dec. 21, 1877.

"Hon. A. J. Smith:

"MY DEAR SMITH,—In your note of the 1st inst., you ask if I desire to return to active political life, or would I prefer to continue in the position I now occupy. I have to say in reply, that I have no particular desire to return to active political life, but I have to add that I see objections to my acceptance of a second term. I thank you for the frankness of your note, and I will be equally frank in return. My re-appointment would secure to me, should my life be spared, five years more of rest and quiet and freedom from political strife—matters of some consideration I admit to a man in his sixtieth year. But consider—ing the readiness shown in certain quarters, to charge me wrongfully with being influenced by selfish motives for standing by my old colleagues to the last, I am the more careful not to lay myself open to the charge that I have placed myself beyond the reach of my old political friends in St. John, from personal considerations. I am sensitive on this point—possibly too sensitive—but let the consequences be what they may to me personally, I cannot take a step that my judgment has failed to approve. Personally it would afford me pleasure to "sail in the same political boat with you," but as your Minister of Finance, in his addresses to the electors of Ontario, makes, as some of his chief charges against the Administration of which I was Finance Minister, the terms on which Prince Edward Island was admitted into the Union, the redistribution of the debts of the Provinces, and the payment of the $150,000 a year to New Brunswick in lieu of export duty, and other Acts for which I claim personally some credit for having aided their passage through Parliament, you will see that, were there no other points of difference, I could not be expected to approve the policy of your Government. I feel that I ought to be free to defend my personal acts from erroneous statements and inferences, and to justify my financial policy. This I cannot well do, as long as I hold my present non-political position. I thank you very much for your kind reference to the manner in which I have discharged my duties as Lieutenant-Governor. It is most satisfactory to be assured that my re-appointment would meet with universal approbation. I assure you I could desire no higher compliment. Thanking you for the friendly character of your note,

"I remain, my dear Smith,

"Yours sincerely

"P. S.—I see by the papers that you are to spend Christmas at Dorchester. I will send this note there, instead of Ottawa, as I previously intended.

In answer to that I received the following:—

"DORCHESTER, Dec. 27, 1877.

"MY DEAR TILLEY,—Your note of the 21st inst., is received. I am sorry you could not have seen things in a different light, either to have accepted the Governorship or taken sides with us in the approaching contest. And allow me to say that I think you are too sensitive with regard to the references to the past. These are only in answer to charges made. If we should win, I take it for granted you would take a seat in the Cabinet if you could have seen your way to have run with us; and that we will succeed at the next election is my firm conviction, whatever may be the result in New Brunswick. Sir John calculates without his host, when he talks of gaining fifty-five seats in Quebec. The current in that Province is setting strongly in our favour, and the opinion of many well-informed persons is that we shall have a majority. There are several causes for it, one of which is, that the Local Government is in a state of decadence, and becoming more and more unpopular every day. However, all this is matter of opinion, and I may be quite astray. To me personally, as you are aware, it is not of much consequence. I care very little for being in a Government. That is my honest view of the situation. To conclude, we will consider the correspondence as obliterated.

"Believe me to be,

"Yours very sincerely,
"A. J. SMITH."

I have omitted some references to the fishery matter. I leave the balance of my remarks on the tariff question until we come to the items, when I will be prepared to give explanations.

SIR A. J. SMITH: I do not intend to discuss the question of the tariff. I spoke at considerable length on that subject the other day; but I think the speech the hon. gentleman has made to-night was made up of sophistry. I do not think he has answered the arguments even of the members from New Brunswick. I rise now, however, to refer to the personal matter which has arisen between the Finance Minister and myself. I think I have reason to complain of the way in which I was treated on Thursday night by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman referred to that letter, and insinuated that something extremely damaging to me existed. I had a general recollection of the contents of that letter. I knew there was nothing in that letter of which I need be ashamed, and that it was written under the injunction of the extreme confidence, and, I may say, friendship. When the hon. gentleman spoke of it across the floor, I said I would remove the seal of secrecy if he would produce the letter; but he gave his own version of it, and when I rose to check that, I was met by shouts led on by the First Minister. In the hon. gentleman's version, he suppressed, as the letter proves, many very material facts. I rose because it is customary in this House for hon. gentlemen to do so when they have anything to say in regard to matters stated by hon. members on the other side; and how was I treated? A statement, appeared in the daily Sun, of St. John, which, I think, is the special organ of the Finance Minister, and is said to be under his control and inspiration. Whether that is so or not, I do not know, but it is a vile and infamous sheet. It is issued day by day laden with slander, calumny and falsehood; but it is said that paper is edited by an officer of this Government, that he is the Immigrant Agent in St. John, and that he is receiving the pay incident to that position. If I am in error, I ask the Finance Minister to correct me.

MR. TILLEY: He only holds it temporarily; it is only a temporary employment.

SIR A. J. SMITH: He has been in the Reporters' Gallery and in the corridors of this House. He is an officer of this Government, and he is paid to abuse and villify me in the most abominable manner. It turns out that this man who edits that paper is actually in the pay of this Government, and he is villifying me and other members, and lauding to the skies the hon. the Finance Minister.

MR. DOMVILLE: He is only telling the truth.

SIR A. J. SMITH: I ask if there is anything against me in that letter which has been read? I had a lingering feeling of friendship for the Finance Minister. We were associated for many years, and were politically and personally in the most intimate relations. The discussions as to Confederation created a divergence between us, but when I came here after that as an independent member for Westmoreland, I did not desire to show any antagonism to him, and I gave the Government a reasonable support. When I said in that letter that I believed the hon. gentleman's normal position was with us—the Liberal party, and not with the Tory party—he knows that his antecedents were all Liberals, that he and I were in the first Liberal Government formed in New Brunswick, and that we fought the battle side by side against the Tories of that Province, and I am not ashamed of that. Although I may have found fault with the way in which the hon. gentleman got his appointment as Governor, I did not think it was a serious offence, but that it was a matter to be regretted that he obtained it in the manner in which he did. I said he ought to be with us, and if so, no doubt he would have a situation in the Cabinet.

MR. DOMVILLE: What would you do with Burpee?

SIR A. J. SMITH: I did not want a situation in the Government myself, and I felt that in the future there would be a seat in the Cabinet for the hon. gentleman. Further, I expressed myself to the effect that he made a most efficient Governor in New Brunswick, that his appointment was popular there, and that he conducted himself in a way to please the people of New Brunswick. I think I was treated badly by the gentlemen on the other side, and not fairly by the hon. gentleman himself, when I gave a qualified assent to his producing the letter, and he gave his own version, and concealed many facts in it. The hon. gentleman and I are, to a certain extent, at issue on this point. He referred to a Mr. Dunn, and a conversation he had with me upon a subject of a second term of the Governorship. I recollected distinctly that Mr. Dunn was in my office, and that Mr. Burpee was present. Mr. Dunn, Mr. Burpee and myself had a friendly conversation in regard to Mr. Tilley. Mr. Dunn had evidently feeling as to Mr. Tilley, and was anxious that a second term should be given him, and discussed the matter as to whether Mr. Tilley could get the second term. I was cautious, and said, of course, in regard to these matters of patronage, members of the Government could not talk very freely, but that Mr. Tilley had made a good Governor, and I have no doubt I said I have no objection to his getting a second term. But the conversation was entirely and strictly confidential, and I think it is degrading that such letters as have been read to-night should be read here.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): Hear, hear.

SIR A. J. SMITH: When the hon. gentleman made the statement the other day, that Mr. Dunn had authority from me and Mr. Burpee, I communicated with Mr. Dunn by telegraph. This was my telegram to him:

"JAS. L. DUNN, St. John.

"Did you say to Tilley you were authorised by me to offer him a second term of governor-ship, or anything to that effect? Please answer."

SIR A. J. SMITH.

Here is the reply:

"Your despatch just received. In reply beg to say neither you nor Mr. Burpee authorised me to offer to Hon. S. L. Tilley second term of Governorship. My action in this matter was non-political, and was so regarded and admitted by you, Mr. Burpee, and Mr. Tilley, on the ground of friendship, and of the need of having a competent Governor. I did intimate to Mr. Tilley he could get a second term if he chose to accept it, and if he would allow his friends to induce him to do so, and I believe what I represented to Mr. Tilley could have been accomplished. As it was strictly private, and admitted to be so, think I ought to protest to a reference to it in Parliament.

"JAS. L. DUNN."

MR. DOMVILLE: What is the date of that telegram?

SIR A. J. SMITH: The 14th of April. I say that I wrote without any authority from Mr. Mackenzie, but I was going to Ottawa, and would desire to know what his wishes were as to a second term. If he expressed a wish, I do not hesitate to say that my own feelings would have been to appoint him for a second term. Mr. Dunn, no doubt, regarded this as strictly confidential. He approached the Finance Minister, I have no doubt, in the same spirit, and he enters his protest here against having it referred to in Parliament. There is another point in controversy, in regard to the meeting held in St. John, at which the requisition was presented to the hon. gentleman, asking him to accept the nomination as the candidate in opposition to the Government. I recollect reading an account of that meeting in the newspapers. I thought it was a public meeting, but I was checked by the hon. gentleman, who said that it was of a private character, and I understood him to say that he told the people upon that occasion, that being Governor, he could not accept the nomination, but that he would communicate with the Governor-General, and would afterwards come to St. John and expound his views. The charge I made against the hon. gentleman the other day, and I think that it was well grounded, was that while he was Governor of New Brunswick he had no right to enter into any political contest, to accept any nomination or become the candidate for St. John. He says he did not become the candidate while he was Governor.

MR. TILLEY : You said I had made a violent speech against the Government. I said I had made no speech.

SIR A. J. SMITH : No ; I did not say that. I said I could not affirm that, but that you were the Opposition candidate, and I want to show that the nomination was accepted by the hon. gentleman. The following is from the Daily Telegraph of St. John, of the 27th June last :—

“About eighty gentlemen representing various classes and interests, met last evening in a hall in Nickerson's building, Prince William street, for the purpose of presenting a requisition to Hon. S. L. Tilley, asking him to become a candidate for the representation of the city of St. John, at the forthcoming elections for the Dominion Parliament. At 8.15 Governor Tilley, attended by several friends, entered the room, and was heartily cheered. After a few moments had been spent by him in shaking hands with his acquaintances, a motion that C. H. Fairweather, Esquire, take the chair, was put and carried, and that gentleman took the chair accordingly. The requisition having been placed in his hands, Mr. Fairweather rising and addressing Governor Tilley said that he had the agreeable duty to perform of presenting him with a requisition from his former constituents in the city of St. John, asking him again to be their representative. This requisition contained upwards of 1,000 names, the procuring of which had been a most light and agreeable duty, and there were many who did not feel themselves free to sign it, who had expressed the warmest sympathy with its object and the greatest desire to aid in the election of the Hon. Mr. Tilley.

“Governor Tilley, in reply, said that he had been waited on by a deputation of gentlemen last evening on his arrival in the city, who asked him if he would be willing to receive the requisition. He had expressed his acquiescence and had taken the opportunity of reading over the names it contained during the day. He found there the names of some who had supported him when he first entered public life twenty-eight years ago, the names of some who until now had not been his supporters, and the names of the sons of many of his old friends now dead. Six months ago, he had said that he intended to hold himself free as a public man to serve this constituency or some other constituency in Parliament. He felt that it would not be right for him to withdraw himself entirely from public life, if his fellow-citizens demanded his services. The citizens of St. John had first elected him to represent them in 1850, and, with the exception of two years, they had continued to favour him with their confidence and support up to the year 1873, when he became Governor. Through them he had, before Confederation, held the highest position in the Government of his native Province for a series of years ; he had held the highest office, but one, in the Dominion Government, and he had held the highest office to which a New Brunswicker could aspire here in the Governorship of this Province. After that, his ambition might well be satisfied, and it was satisfied. He would have been content to retire to some humble abode, and to spend the remainder of his days quietly. But he felt that he had duties to fulfil to the citizens of St. John, who had so favoured him, and, when they demanded his services, he could not refuse them. He, therefore, accepted the requisition so handsomely tendered to him, and would comply with the request which it contained. He would place his resignation in the hands of the Dominion Government at an early day, and, when it was accepted, and his hands were free, he would call a meeting of the citizens of St. John, and explain fully to them his political views. He believed that these views would be endorsed by the majority of the people of St. John. Governor Tilley was frequently and heartily applauded in the course of his speech, especially when he announced his determination to comply with the requisition.

Now I think that the hon. gentleman has forgotten that ; he certainly stated it was so.

MR. TILLEY : Oh, no.

SIR A. J. SMITH : Will the hon. gentleman see the position in which he puts himself, as regards his acceptance of the nomination for St. John, as a candidate in opposition to the Government ?

MR. TILLEY : I never said a word in opposition to it.

SIR A. J. SMITH : Why, it was notorious. Does the hon. gentleman mean to evade the thing in that way ?

MR. TILLEY : No.

SIR A. J. SMITH : Did he not know his nomination was in opposition to the Government ?

MR. TILLEY : Yes.

SIR A. J. SMITH : Of course. He accepted the nomination. He accepted the nomination for St. John while continuing the office of Lieutenant-Governor, which he filled for some time afterwards. He could select either horn of the dilemma. Will the Finance Minister approve of that—a Lieutenant-Governor accepting a nomination and continuing to hold office? And yet the hon. gentleman now professes to have come here as the saviour of his country.

MR. TILLEY: Hear, hear.

SIR A. J. SMITH: He thinks it was indispensably necessary for him to take office in this Government to arrest the flood of depression overspreading the country. See what he says in his letter to me? Does he rise to a height of patriotism when he says that his reason is to vindicate his own position, which was assailed by Mr. Cartwright when he was Finance Minister? That was the only reason given in those letters. My object in these explanations was to resent the way I have been treated by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and to get fair play. I made this personal explanation without any feeling, either one way or the other. I am glad that these letters are produced, and hope they will be published. I felt it necessary to make this statement in order to vindicate my position.

MR. TILLEY: I cannot complain of the spirit which my hon. friend opposite has manifested in this discussion, but I must take exception in the first place to his remarks about the statement in the public meeting. I think it will be remembered that the hon. gentleman charged me with having, while Lieutenant-Governor, attended a public meeting in St. John, and made a violent speech against the Administration. I said that that was not the case; that I was waited upon by two gentlemen, on my arrival in the city, who stated that they had a requisition to present; that they accompanied me to the hotel, where they left the requisition for my consideration, and called two hours afterwards to say that the room at the hotel would not be large enough, and asked if I had any objection to meet them on Prince William Street.

SIR A. J. SMITH: It was not a public meeting.

MR. TILLEY: The reporters were there, and an account of the proceedings were published afterwards. A member of the press made that statement. A member of this House, present on that occasion, knows perfectly well that I accepted that report as correct, and stated that while I was there to receive that requisition and accepted it. I offered no expression, pro or con, with regard to the conduct of the Government, neither condemning or approving it. But I said, under the circumstances, that I could not but accept the proposition, but that I could not be expected to speak on politics till I had tendered my resignation and it had been accepted, when, my hands being free, I would state my views on public matters. With reference to Mr. Dunn, I would call the attention of the House carefully to that telegram, which, if not an affirmation of my statement, I do not know what it is. I might say more, but will refer to this, as he had communication with me, and had no doubt as to his representation to me, which was that, if I had only expressed my willingness, I should have been appointed. How could that gentleman understand that, if he had not learned it in his communication with the member for Westmoreland and the late Minister of Customs (Sir A. J. Smith and Mr. Burpee)? How could he, to this day, otherwise express that opinion. While here in Ottawa in connection with the meeting of the Dominion Board of Trade, he said that he had asked those gentlemen this question: Am I in a position to say to Tilley, if he will accept this position, he can have it? And the answer was—yes. The answer that Mr. Dunn gives fully bears me out, in a general correspondence as well as the nature of that interview. But the hon. member for Westmoreland referred to the mention of this correspondence as a breach of confidence. Why was it necessary for me to refer to it here? Because it has been stated, over and over again, and repeated in the House by that hon. gentleman himself, the other day, that I had no authority for saying I could have remained Lieutenant-Governor for five years longer. The member for Sunbury (Mr. Burpee) referred to it because I made a statement to that effect in the Mechanic's Institute. He said at that picnic speech I had betrayed confidence by speaking of the communication he had sent. That was the position I was placed in. I do not suppose that hon. member will rise to repeat that statement again, but under the circumstances was

I not justified in vindicating my position and stating what had taken place. I did not state all that took place with the gentleman who had two or three communications with me. My statements were made with respect to the interview with Mr. Dunn, not with reference to the private communications of the hon. gentleman. I have no doubt that the gentleman had authority to say what he did—namely, if you only say you will accept another term, it will be offered to you. When the hon. gentleman said I had no justification for my course, I had to refer to the communication. When he referred to it the other day, I said if he would take away the seal of secrecy in regard to this matter, he would put me in a better position. The hon. gentleman then said he would remove the seal; he imposed no conditions.

SIR A. J. SMITH: Yes, I did.

MR. TILLEY: I said I had not the letter, as he says himself he was ready for its production. I know, when he says he rose to insist upon it, it could not then be produced. I heard no such condition as he mentions.

SIR A. J. SMITH: Well, the House heard it.

MR. TILLEY: If the hon. gentleman had said, I do not take off that seal, I should not have produced this letter; but he did not say so.

SIR A. J. SMITH: I said at once, produce the letter.

MR. TILLEY: I never would have referred to the matter; never dreamt of the hon. member bringing it up here. He said the other night that communications of that kind should come from the leader of the Government. What did I do with regard to that hon. gentleman himself? When, after conferring with Mr. Mitchell, we agreed that the hon. member for Westmoreland would be most acceptable for the Lieutenant-Governorship, I submitted the proposition to him and he took time to consider it.

SIR A. J. SMITH: The Premier himself wrote me an official letter, offering me the Lieutenant-Governorship.

MR. TILLEY: Of course, he did afterwards. I stated to him that there was no question about the character of the affair after Mr. Mitchell and myself had considered the matter, and made the proposition in question. The hon. gentleman said he would have grave duties to discharge, and gave other reasons why he did not think he could accept it. After some time had elapsed the offer was made formally by the Premier. Under these circumstances, I think that the House and country will feel that I had a right to say—by the statements of the gentlemen referred to, and by the communication read, the interviews with Mr. Dunn, and his statements so clearly, decidedly, emphatically made—that I might have remained in the Government House for another five years had I chosen. It was notorious at the time. It was stated by the friends of the Government that the offer had been made, and that they thought I would accept. Hundreds of persons in St. John were anxious I should accept.

SIR A. J. SMITH: Your friends were anxious.

MR. TILLEY: Some were and some were not, but I made this reference for nothing else than to vindicate my position.

SIR A. J. SMITH: I would like to ask whether, there having been no formal official offer made, the hon. the Finance Minister was justified—whether it was dignified for him, on the hustings at St. John, to say that the Grit Government had attempted to bribe him with $45,000?

MR. TILLEY: Hear, hear.

MR. SNOWBALL said that, when the hon. the Finance Minister had risen to answer, as he said, the members from New Brunswick, and with them those from the whole Dominion, he had hoped he would have heard some answer to the arguments of members of the Opposition. But crimination and recrimination had been indulged in, and he had not replied to those arguments.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Question.

MR. MACKENZIE: Should this noise continue—if the hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side are to disturb every speaker on the Opposition side, they must understand how the House was to be managed.

MR. SNOWBALL said he was particularly sorry to hear a personal discussion between the two hon. members from New Brunswick whom he had regarded as his friends. He would have been very glad to see the Finance Minister appointed Lieutenant-Governor a second time. But he regarded reference to a private letter, in this case, as a violation of honour. There was a time when gentlemen possessed such a sense of honour as would have induced them to spurn any reference to documents of this kind—when, if a request or an offer conveyed in a letter had not been complied with, it would have been considered as obliterated, as requested by the writer. What could the member for Westmoreland do but say—produce the letter; he had carried out his portion of the bargain. He (Mr. Snowball) had a very different opinion about the conduct of the Finance Minister. He had made particular reference to him and his transactions with the late Government, the reference to him being about as bad as the matter affecting the member for Westmoreland. In answer to an hon. gentleman, papers had been laid on the table respecting certain transactions in lumber, between him and the late Government. The hon. member arose here and passed judgment on a matter now before the Public Accounts Committee. Was that justifiable? Were these transactions to be condemned without any investigation? His transactions with the late Government were not individual. He was manager of a branch railway between which and the Government they took place; he was conversant with them of course. But the hon. the Finance Minister prejudging the whole case, cast a slur upon him. He (the Finance Minister) had admitted that he did state in 1864, that the amount of taxes to be paid by New Brunswick would not exceed $2.75 to $3 per head, but went on to observe that he (Mr. Snowball) had stated that the amount was up to $6.14. He (Mr. Snowball) had given the figures for his conclusion. Did the hon. gentleman give any for his? He (Mr. Snowball) had distinctly stated that he had taken the actual revenue returns for Customs, Excise, and Bill Stamps only in making the calculation of $6.14 per head, as the tax of the people of New Brunswick, which had not been disproved. Was not that increase made under the rule of hon. gentlemen opposite? The hon. gentlemen had staked his honour on the smaller amount mentioned, which he had violated, as he had admitted, within three years of the time after making that pledge. He (Mr. Snowball) did not know how the money went, but he had made a statement, and proved it out of the hon. gentleman's own mouth—that the taxes were only to be $2.75 per head, instead of which they had been raised to $6.14. He had dwelt on the subject of the lumber trade and the mining industries in New Brunswick, saying much of their depression. He admitted that they were in a depressed state, but that was the case with all other interests. How much worse was the lumber trade to-day than other industries? The prices of everything had gone down. If lumber had fallen so had other things. A few years since flour was $9 a barrel, now it could be bought for $4.50; pork was formerly $20, but had come down to $9. The exports of timber from New Brunswick had increased annually for a number of years past up to the year 1877, and those of 1878 were nearly as great. The lumber trade was just suffering like other branches of trade, and yet the hon. gentleman proposed to bring prosperity back by a tariff tending to make the prices of all kinds of supplies required to carry on that business still higher. The hon. gentleman stated that it had been affirmed by an hon. member in Opposition that the additional cost of producing 1,000 ft. of lumber under the new tariff would be 60c. That statement was made by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. King); he (Mr. Snowball) had looked it over and found it to be correct. Let the Finance Minister disprove it if he could. The Finance Minister had ridiculed the statement of the member for Queen's and said if it were correct it would realise a sum greater than the whole revenue of New Brunswick. This was about on a par with many of his other statements. Taking the amount of lumber produced in New Brunswick at 400,000,000, at 60c. per thousand, would amount to $240,000. How would the Finance Minister make this compare with their present revenue of over $1,700,000? The hon. gentleman also stated the advance on cotton goods was only going to be 2½ per cent. He (Mr. Snowball) brought forward facts to show that the advance in duty on cotton goods would be 95 per cent.; and the hon. gentleman had not contradicted it. This statement had been ridiculed, but they had not attempted to disprove it. The hon. gentleman insinuated that he (Mr. Snowball) had had a transaction with the Dominion Government which he had found very profitable. He could say that he never had anything to do with the transaction, excepting as a member of a joint stock company, and that he never received a dollar of money from it. It was a debt of the Chatham Branch Railway before he had anything to do with it as manager, and the whole thing went to pay the debts of the company. He thought his hon. friend had descended to small things in order to cast a slur upon a member sitting on the other side of the House.

MR. ANGLIN said he thought that all who had heard the statements made by the hon. the Finance Minister, with regard to the contents of the letter written by the hon. member for Westmoreland, must be satisfied that it was most desirable, in the cause of justice and fair play, that that letter should have been produced. The statement made by the hon. the Finance Minister, he (Mr. Anglin) must confess, had made a strong impression on his own mind at the time, because he believed that the letter must have been, at all events, of a character to justify, to some extent, the very strong charges against the hon. member for Westmoreland, and to justify the threats the Finance Minister uttered, of what he could do, and would do, if the seal of secrecy were only removed from that letter. Now that it was produced, they found it was only such a letter as the hon. member for Westmoreland—were he a private member—might fairly have written, to one for whom he still retained a feeling of friendship and personal regard. He distinctly stated in that letter, he had no authority to make any offer to the Minister of Finance. He (Mr. Anglin) heard the Finance Minister say in St. John, that he had refused a bribe of $45,000, which he could get if he would keep out of the election contest. He stated distinctly that the renewal of the Lieutenant-Governorship was offered to him. He (Mr. Anglin) admitted frankly that the hon. gentleman would have a right to say that overtures had been made to him with regard to the Lieutenant-Governorship, but he was not justified in saying that he was offered that office as a bribe, and that he rejected it. With regard to another extraordinary statement made this evening by the Minister of Finance, he had felt it his duty, at the moment, even at the risk of a violation of order, to give that statement a most emphatic and direct contradiction. The hon. gentleman stated that, during the excitement of the Confederation agitation in St. John, he was unable to obtain a hearing at the hustings. The hon. gentleman must strangely have mixed things, or have forgotten what took place at that election. He (Mr. Anglin) never knew of an instance when the hon. the Minister of Finance was speaking at the hustings at St. John, and was interrupted in the slightest degree, and when he was not treated with the greatest respect by those who were strongly opposed to him. He had, on several occasions, had the honour of opposing that hon. gentleman on the hustings at St. John, but in no instance was it necessary for him to interfere, in order to obtain a hearing for the hon. gentleman. The statement that he felt it necessary, from time to time during that conflict to go home, accompanied by bands of friends to protect him from personal violence, was a statement which he never heard before, and which, he was sure, would astonish all parties in the city of St. John. This statement cast a slur of the worst description on the fair fame of the city, whose people, whatever might be their faults, always showed a willingness to give the utmost fair play, and an impartial hearing to all parties engaged in political strife. Occasionally some few in a crowd of 5,000 or 6,000 people might be troublesome, and ask questions at a time when it was an impertinence to do so. It was the policy of himself and of his

hon. friends during the whole election to avoid the introduction of personalities, and to ask the people to look at the question on its own merits, and to judge of it as presented to them. Now, he understood that the hon. the Minister of Finance, was, on this evening, entirely to demolish the statements made by the hon. member for the county of St. John, the late Minister of Customs. He listened with a good deal of interest to the hon. gentleman, expecting that he would at least make the attempt; but the whole speech proved to be of such a character that, if the hon. member for the county of St. John had had a chance of replying, he could have found very little indeed to reply to. It was one of the emptiest and most pointless attempts at argument he had ever heard. The hon. member told them of the wonderful increase of prosperity in the city of St. John for a certain number of years. There was an increase. This was a growing country. Every part of America was advancing more or less rapidly, notwithstanding temporary and occasional depressions in particular localities. St. John did advance rapidly during those years. He was not aware that any new industry was established in those years, except a cotton factory; but the others did grow during that period, and they had since declined. The depression which prevailed all over the world had reached St. John. The hon. gentleman was very unfortunate in giving, as an illustration of the evils of American competition in St. John, the case of the boot and shoe factories. This business was, for some years, in a most prosperous and thriving condition, and, if it had since declined, it was not owing, in the slightest degree, to the importation of boots and shoes from the United States. If the hon. gentleman would compare the importations of 1876, 1877 and 1878, the years during which this depression had been increasing, with the importation of American boots and shoes during the prosperous period to which he referred, he would probably find that the importations during the prosperous period exceeded those of the last three years, and that, therefore, the decline in the amount of employment afforded was not, to any extent, due to the importation of goods from the United States or from other parts of the world. He would find that, during the year 1876, the importations of boots and shoes, of all kinds, and from all countries, including English fancy goods and French fancy goods, and including childrens' boots and shoes, which were not manufactured in this country, the whole importations into New Brunswick were something over $60,000, or about 20c. a-piece for the whole population. There was no slaughter of American boots and shoes in that market. There was no interference, to any serious extent, with the trade on the part of the boot and shoe manufacturers in the United States. The real competition came not from the United States, but from Montreal. It was the competition of Montreal manufacturers that led to the decline of the manufactures in New Brunswick. The Montreal manufacturers were determined to force their wares on that market. They sent their runners all through the country, into every village and town; and in the city of St. John itself, close beside their factories, shops were opened in which goods manufactured in Montreal were largely sold; and it was in that way that the prosperity of their boot and shoe manufacturers was materially diminished. There was also another cause, and that was the decline of the purchasing power which had been felt all through this country. The same might be said of other articles where there had been a decline. The main causes had been the diminution in the purchasing power of the people caused by the diminution in the value of our exports, the general depression in trade, and then the extraordinary competition with the manufacturers of the Upper Provinces, where there was more capital, where labour was cheaper, and where there was a larger home market. The manufacturers of the Upper Provinces also used their markets below occasionally as slaughter-markets. Then the hon. Minister asserted that the amount of goods that was imported from the Upper Provinces into New Brunswick, was comparatively trifling, that it was more than compensated for by the amount St. John shipped to the western part of Nova Scotia. The hon. member must be strangely astray as to the facts. The returns in the time of the old Provinces of New Brunswick would show pretty accurately what the amount of exports to Nova Scotia were in those years, and they had not changed much since, because in those days they had a system of drawbacks, and the amount of their annual exportations were made to appear smaller than they really were. The hon. member from the county of St. John had made a very careful calculation as to the amount of merchandise imported into New Brunswick from the Upper Provinces, and he (Mr. Anglin) was astonished to learn that they amounted one year to the enormous sum of $5,000,000. Although a very large part of this sum was the price of flour—some 250,000 barrels or thereabouts—even deducting the price of flour, there would still remain an amount or over three millions of dollars on which the people of New Brunswick paid duties at Montreal and other ports of the Upper Provinces. Any one who knew how the whole Province was overrun by salesmen from the Upper Provinces must have at least some vague idea of the magnitude of that trade. He could not close without once more referring to the extraordinary statements affecting the city of St. John. He denied the truth of those statements. He remembered, indeed, one occasion when the hon. Minister of Finance was refused a hearing. It was at a meeting called by the anti-Confederates of St. John, which was not, in the proper sense, an election meeting at all, or a public meeting. The meeting was held in the Mechanics' Institute, and was addressed by the hon. member for Westmoreland and other gentlemen who had been invited to attend. After they had spoken, the hon. the Finance Minister, who was among the audience, sprang upon the platform and attempted to make a speech. The hour was late and the crowd, who knew that the hon. gentleman could speak for two or three hours, when he chose, and that a reply would be impossible, refused to give him a hearing, but no insults were offered to him or violence attempted. The same people who were then present, numbering 1,000 or 1,200, frequently listened to him after with all possible attention and respect. The hon. gentleman had no right to make this unfounded charge against the people of St. John, to whom he owed so much, and who never, in any instance, had shown him even the slightest discourtesy.

MR. DOMVILLE said he was surprised that the hon. member for Gloucester should try to make this House believe that the hon. the Finance Minister was not speaking the truth when he made his statements. The hon. gentleman should remember that, only a few days ago, he stated in this House, that if the hon. members who had been returned from New Brunswick had dared tell the people they were in favour of Protection, not one of them would have been returned. In the article in his own paper in which that statement was made, the theory of Protection was scouted as absurd, and the intelligence was said to be greatly shocked at the extreme Protectionist views of Mr. Domville. The question was asked, if Protection could secure a home market, why the people of the United States sent so many hundred millions of dollars' worth of produce to Europe for sale, and it was claimed that the effect of Protection on the flour and produce of Ontario would be absolutely imperceptible. Could they desire a more complete admission than that contained in his own paper from the hon. gentleman, that the Conservative party went in for Protection? Then the hon. gentleman said they were going to tax the poor man, while in this article he contended that Protection would not raise the prices. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. King) said this tariff would increase the cost of producing lumber. How could that be, if farm produce was not going to cost any more? The people of St. John had confidence in the Finance Minister, who had so long and ably represented them. Money influence and every influence possible were brought to bear against him in his election. The hon. the late Minister of Customs canvassed Mr. Levi H. Young, and stated to him, if he would support him, the Mackenzie Government, if returned, intended to go in for manufactures.

MR. BURPEE: I never said that to any living man.

MR. DOMVILLE said he expected a denial. He would go further, and say that the superintendent of the railroad went to Levi H. Young's shop, and gave him an order for trucks for the Intercolonial, and never made a bargain for the price. And yet these gentlemen said they ran a pure election, and tried to prove that the Minister of Finance made assertions that were derogatory to him and the country. He (Mr. Domville) was at the meeting when the requisition was given to the Finance Minister. He said he could not do what he should like to do in his position as Governor, and would have to resign his position before he could give an answer at all. Mr. Tilley never made the statement that he was offered a bribe of $45,000.

MR. ANGLIN : I heard him making the statement.

MR. DOMVILLE said he heard him making this statement—he said that, if he accepted such a position at the hands of his political opponents, it would look as if he had taken a bribe of $45,000. The hon. member for Gloucester was able to distort statements as well as anybody else. The hon. member for Northumberland, who spoke of the hon. the Finance Minister as being his friend, went all over Northumberland villifying him from poll to poll.

MR. SNOWBALL : I deny that.

MR. DOMVILLE said they had so many denials from hon. gentlemen opposite lately that it was hardly worth while taking any notice of them. But the hon. member, perhaps, would also deny that he went down in the train to St. John and tried to get the Conservative party to adopt him.

MR. SNOWBALL : I do deny that emphatically.

MR. DOMVILLE said he would not challenge his denial, because it would be unparliamentary. But he was telegraphed to look out for the hon. gentleman, and that he had gone down to tell Mr. Tilley he would give him no factious opposition, provided he (Mr. Snowball) was given the patronage of the country. There was then the hon. member for Queen's, who sent a gentleman to him (Mr. Domville) to buy off the protest against him (Mr. King) in the county of Queen's.

MR. KING : I deny that.

MR. DOMVILLE.

MR. DOMVILLE said he was bound as a member of Parliament, if challenged to give his authority, to give it. His authority was the Hon. Thomas R. Jones, of St. John, N.B. That hon. gentleman came to him and said: Mr. King is a very nice gentleman, and it is a pity to have him opposed, and I am authorised to be responsible as far as $2,000, if you will get the suit withdrawn.

MR. KING : Authorised by me ?

MR. DOMVILLE said the hon. gentleman should know whether he authorised him or not.

MR. KING : I contradict what the hon. member for King's has said.

MR. DOMVILLE said he was sorry he had trod on the hon. member's corns. The hon. member should not get so excited, if what was said against him was not true. It was not customary with those against whom false charges were made to become so excited. One hon. member, the other evening, talked of his representing New Brunswick, and having New Brunswick in charge. Such a statement was preposterous. Were a poll taken in St. John to-morrow to test the popularity of the Minister of Finance against that of any other hon. gentleman from New Brunswick, the poll would give the Finance Minister 1,000 majority. If politics were dropped, and the decision given on the merits of the Finance Minister, as a man of integrity and honour, there was no man in New Brunswick could stand against him. As regarded this offer of the Governorship, where there was smoke there must have been fire. He supposed they would be asked to admit that these letters were never written, that Mr. Dunn never went to Mr. Tilley, and that no Governorship was ever offered, but he might go further back and recount the particulars of a ride he took on a special locomotive one evening with the Hon. Mr. Mitchell to a certain hon. gentleman's house, and, after a discussion about the Governorships and all sorts of things had got through, that hon. gentleman stated enough to convince him (Mr. Domville) that his professions as to his being opposed to their party were not sincere. In order to make it parliamentary, and not betray confidence, he would say the hon. gentleman was not in his seat, but if he was, he (Mr. Domville) would say that he heard the hon. gentleman state that on the Pacific Scandal he had committed himself by his expressions, but after that vote was disposed of, he would stand by them, and that he believed in them. But he would not proceed further.

SIR A. J. SMITH: Go on, I am quite prepared for it.

MR. DOMVILLE said there were other hon. gentlemen who had dealt for crowns, as well as his hon. friend, and the least said on the subject the better. The hon. gentleman had referred to the Sun as a vile sheet, and had said that the editor was employed by the Government. The editor knew well enough how to defend himself, and could sling ink as well as other people could sling words. There was no doubt that he was an officer of the Government; he had been appointed temporarily because there was no other man who, from his ability and knowledge of the country, could fill the vacancy so well. In a previous debate Mr Anglin had said that the present postmaster of St. John had denied that he was interested in the Globe newspaper there.

MR. ANGLIN: The denial is that he ever wrote the editorials.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He only paid for them.

MR. DOMVILLE said it was only colourable information to say he was not a member of the firm. He (Mr. Domville) knew him to be, and why did they blame his side of the House for a system they had inaugurated themselves. As regarded Mr. Dunn, he had openly spoken on the streets that Mr. Tilley would accept the Governorship for a second term. With regard to the city of St. John, he was prepared to show that it would not suffer in consequence of the imposition of the present tariff, as the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House had tried to prove. Upon the completion of the Megantic Railroad, the post of St. John would be some 300 miles nearer Montreal than Halifax. The tariff would give them a home market for sweets, and was calculated to foster the West Indian trade, and St. John would naturally become the chief port for the West Indian trade of the Dominion. This would undoubtedly prove a great commercial advantage to St. John, and, in addition, it would become the refining point of the Maritime Provinces. The West Indian trade would employ a class of small vessels of from 150 tons to 300 tons, which would take their lumber to the West Indies and return with sugars and molasses. He was assured that the present tariff would, in every way, work advantageously to New Brunswick.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I do not intend or desire to renew the very long and protracted discussion that has taken place on the principle involved by this tariff. In fact, I agree with the hon. the Minister of Finance so far that I think our time would be best employed in examining the very complicated and intricate details he has submitted in the resolutions now in your hands; and I trust he will be able to explain more fully than he has yet done, the causes which have induced him to impose some of these very heavy taxes, and the results he expects to derive from them, not only as regards the number of people whom he expects to employ thereby, but as to the losses sustained by the revenue in each particular direction. I do not, at present, as I said, intend to dwell on the principles of Protection or Free-trade, but I will call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that several objections have been levelled at these propositions wholly irrespective of the principle which underlies them. These objections he has not answered, as I hoped he would have done to-night. These objections are of very grave moment. In the discussion of this tariff we have objected mainly to these five things: First of all, we say the imposition of the taxes they propose would inflict a very great and grievous injustice on the poorest class of the community, a thing which, under all circumstances, must be regarded by all statesmen as calling for the most serious condemnation of the people's representatives. We say also, Sir, and to this point the hon. gentleman did in part allude, we say also that it is inevitable, partly in consequence of the geographical position of the country, that the tariff the hon. gentleman now proposes must work a very great injustice to particular Provinces—not to his own Province only, but to the Province of Prince Edward Island and a great part of Nova Scotia, as well as New Brunswick, and most particularly to the Provinces in the North-West. We contend, in the third place, that this tariff is so framed as to bring us into direct conflict with Imperial policy, and to grievously hamper, to a very great extent, the trade of Great Britain with her North American possessions, of which the hon. gentleman by this time must have received ample proof from the Imperial Government itself, if I am not misinformed. The universal condemnation with which men of all kinds of politics in England have visited this tariff is well known. Then, over and above all this, a point to which the hon. gentleman ought certainly to have directed some attention to-night, we contend that the leading sin of this tariff, in an economical point of view, is that he is taking an enormous sum of money out of the pockets of the people of Canada, over and above the sum which he is putting into the Treasury. Now, my hon. friend behind me, in a speech evidencing the most profound research—and from a five years' knowledge of that hon. gentleman I can say I do not believe there is in this House, or in Canada, a gentleman who is better able to arrive at a correct conclusion on that somewhat intricate difficult subject than the hon. member for the county of St. John—that hon. gentleman had stated, in great detail, that the application of the existing tariff to the importations of last year would involve an additional taxation on the people of over $7,000,000. Now, I am not prepared to say whether or not, in spite of all the minute details which my hon. friend went into, it is possible for him or for any man to arrive at a perfectly accurate computation. But I believe this may be stated with perfect safety, that, if you take into account the enormous addition to the taxation which will be caused by the number of middlemen who would have to exact a profit on their advances, the sums actually paid by the people of Canada will be largely in excess of $7,000,000. Then we again take objection to this tariff, on the hon. gentleman's own confession—at least, he hardly took the trouble to deny it—that it will, of necessity, work a very grievous injustice on several most important interests all over the country, particularly the lumber interest, the fisheries of the Dominion, and the transportation interest. These three interests are of enormous importance, as every man who has the least acquaintance with the trade and commerce of this country knows. Now, Sir, I repeat that, be Protection right or wrong, if it be true that these or any of these objections can be established, it would, in itself, be a very serious condemnation of the tariff resolutions the hon. gentleman has brought down. This discussion to-night has taken so exclusively a New Brunswick turn, that I do not feel disposed to dwell at any length on the statements made by the hon. gentleman, as they affect his own Province, more particularly as that question has been discussed at great length. But I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to this: I believe he is going to make a leap in the dark, of the nature of which neither he nor any of his advisers have any conception whatever. I do not think he has at all considered, or that the three or four gentlemen whom we have been informed have been constructing this tariff at the rate of $30 a day, how, in the attempt—possibly an honest and well-meaning attempt—to aid this or that particular industry, they were going to hamper other industries of far greater importance to the people of this country than the particular industry they specially desired to assist. And I am assured that gentlemen on both sides of the House cannot pass their time more advantageously to the country than in calling attention, as far as their information enable them to do it, to the mode in which almost every one of these increases, which I see made in these resolutions, would affect other industries apart from the special ones they are supposed to foster. Now, Sir, I do not condemn the hon. gentleman too severely because, at the time of Confederation, he, in common with others, supposed it might be possible to keep our expenditure within very much narrower limits than it actually proved possible. But, at the same time, the knowledge that the hon. gentleman did pledge his reputation that the total annual expenditure for 25 years should not exceed $12,000,000, ought to make him exceedingly cautious in making any prophecies regarding the future trade of the country, or the future expenditure that may become necessary in the existing condition of things here. In 1873, the hon. gentleman based his whole financial policy on the assumption that there would be a steady increase of our importations over and above the $128,000,000 we obtained that year. That was the language of the hon. gentleman. It was impossible for anybody to have put it in stronger terms; and I ask the hon. the Finance Minister to look at the course of trade since, and see if we were not justified in doubting somewhat the accuracy of the very elaborate calculation he now submits as to the course of what he rightly called a complete and total revolution in the whole trade and business of the country. Now the hon. gentleman said it would have been an easy thing to have got twice the revenue by doubling the tariff, and appealed to the case of the United States to show that there they derived a double revenue from a doubled tariff. If we look to the Customs imports of the United States, we shall find that their enormous tariff, which is certainly more than double our old tariff, so far from giving them a double revenue, hardly gives them as much per head as we received from our comparatively moderate tariff. It is impossible to say how far the hon. gentleman may or may not have been correct in stating that the number of persons employed in certain industries in St. John had decreased from 8,000 to 5,000 hands, or thereabouts. The source from which he quoted is not above suspicion. But, be that as it may, is it at all likely that we shall regain those 2,000 or 3,000 men under his policy? He ought to remember that the same number of persons are now able, by improved machinery and improved scientific appliances, to produce a vastly greater quantity per head than before. That of itself would allow for a considerable reduction in the number employed. Besides, 1874 was the culminating year of a number of years of extraordinary inflation, and therefore no proper comparison could be drawn between the state of things then and at present. When he called attention to the great decline in the boot and shoe trade of St. John, was he aware that the total imports of boots and shoes into the whole Province of New Brunswick, from the United States, would, at the ordinary rate of production per head, have employed just 45 hands? The census statement shows that New Brunswick produced $967,000 worth of boots and shoes in 1871, wholly apart from her imports from the Upper Provinces, and it is scarcely possible that 5 or 6 per cent. of imports from the United States was likely to seriously injure the trade of St. John, as the hon. gentleman appeared to think. He said that Canada, in future, would very likely grow to the West, the great West we have acquired; and he now proposes to build up that country by making it almost impossible for the future settlers to obtain their goods, animals, implements, and furniture, at such prices as prevailed under the old tariff. Those taxes on animals and implements will press with most exceptional severity on the inhabitants of Manitoba, and the North-West, to which a large part of the animals imported into the Dominion are imported; and the way he is going to encourage those settlers is to compel them to pay enormously enhanced prices for their coarse woollens, cottons, and every article of primary necessity to the pioneer settling on the prairies.

MR. TILLEY: Last year the most of the animals imported were pigs.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: No; sheep were most numerous brought into Manitoba, and oxen into British Columbia. The hon. gentleman told us that, in the case of New Brunswick, he expects the greatest possible revival from the wonderful encouragement of manufactures under the benign influence of Protection, and he specially quoted the case of the St. Croix, where a man could erect a factory, having one end on Canadian and another on American territory. I would like to know why, if the value of this water power is so great, our enterprising and acute friends on the other side of the border have so long neglected it? In concluding, he made a most touching appeal to us to encourage him, as he desired to protect the unfortunate people of this country. He says more Protection is needed, and I have not the slightest doubt that before he has held office twelve months he will discover that more is wanted; that those daughters of the horse-leech are creatures that no Protection can satisfy. If he supposes that we, in Opposition, knowing what we do, feeling that the country has entered on a downward path, contrary to all sound doctrine, and the experience of all civilised nations, are going to encourage him in his course, great is his faith. Were it the last moment that any of us should sit here, we should not hesitate to protest in every possible shape and way against the ill-omened path in which he is now attempting to lead the people of this country. I will request, when these matters are under discussion, that each item of the tariff shall be read separately. We do not desire to delay, or factiously oppose these resolution, but simply to know on what data the hon. gentleman founded his propositions. What special industries does he propose to encourage, and what it would cost the revenue up to the present, although I admit it has been a difficult point for the hon. gentleman to answer. He has given not even a vague idea of the extent to which he supposes these various changes will affect trade and business; and I think it is very desirable that both sides should be put as fully as possible in possession of the information on which those various important changes are proposed to be made.

MR. HOLTON said that the resolutions before the House should be put seriatim; he thought it was understood that the items should be read and passed if not challenged.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That will do very well.

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 2,

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked for explanations as to the object and extent of the resolution.

MR. TILLEY: The object of this very important resolution is to meet the difficulties which we now experience in regard to some of our industries, including that of sugar. During some twelve months or more nearly one dollar per 100lb. of drawback was paid by the Government of the United States over and above the amount paid by the refiner into the Treasury. That has been reduced from 75c. to 25c., some say to 65c. It varies very much on the character of the sugar that the refiners use; but we may safely take for granted that, under the law of the United States, which enables the refiner to introduce sugar below number seven, on which $2 to $2.15 per 100lb. is paid, a very superior class of sugar imported from the West Indies, with a saccharine percentage of 96 to 98 almost, pays but $2.15, which is converted into white sugar, making the drawback very large, and leaving a considerable surplus of profit to the refiner. It is under the operation of this system that we have entirely lost our sugar refining, which it would be impossible to restore, unless such a proposition as this is affirmed by Parliament. Because it will be understood how difficult it would be if power was given to the Government simply to say we will charge, in addition to the duty levied, the amount of bounty or bonus given, which would form a question of dispute between the authorities of the States and the Canadian Government. They would assert it would only be 25c. per 100lb., while it might, on the other hand, be asserted it was 65c. The present arrangement is designed to meet this case as well as others where there is a specific and fixed duty.

MR. HOLTON said a point on which he desired information was whether the effect of this resolution would be to prevent the purchase of raw sugar in bond in the United States for consumption in this country. He knew the trade had a very deep interest in understanding clearly whether it was the intention of this resolution to prohibit absolutely, as the imposition of the double duty would prohibit absolutely, the purchase in the United States and the importation into this country of raw sugar in bond for consumption in this country.

MR. TILLEY : What kind of sugar ?

MR. HOLTON said those grades of sugar which were imported largely for consumption without undergoing any process of refining here, or having undergone any in the United States. He was told a circumstance of this kind when in Montreal the other day, and a good deal of discontent existed in consequence of the construction put upon this resolution by the Customs authorities. Parties there had ordered considerable quantities of raw sugar from the United States, in the belief that it could be entered here less the duty in the United States, or, in other words, that it could be bonded there and brought to this country.

MR. TILLEY : That was an entire mistake about the raw sugar.

MR. HOLTON said he thought the hon. gentleman had no power to do that under the resolution as now worded. The former part, of course, applied to sugar brought in for refining purposes, and then it went on to say : " and the fair market value of all goods, wares and merchandise imported into Canada shall be understood to be the ordinary wholesale price at which the same are sold for home consumption in the country where they are purchased or manufactured." Clearly, therefore, the price of sugar bought in New York at a fair market price for home consumption would be the price, duty paid, and could only be introduced into this country as it was now, or had hitherto been largely introduced, on payment of the American duty in the first place, and the Canadian duty in the second place, and the Canadian duty to be levied on the whole price, including the American duty. He desired to know whether the hon. gentleman meant that, and whether his officers had construed the resolution in Montreal under instruction from Ottawa.

MR. TILLEY : I may state that I do not think it was under instruction from Ottawa. I had a communication on the subject, and I stated that if such was understood, it was a mistake. For instance, as for the purchasing of raw sugar in bond, as there is no drawback given, it is to meet the case of the refiner.

MR. HOLTON said that it did not relate to drawback at all. The phraseology was very plain, and justified the construction that had been put upon it.

MR. TILLEY : I am not aware of any question having arisen. A man purchases a hundred or a thousand hogsheads of sugar in the United States ; if it is raw sugar, there is no drawback on it.

MR. HOLTON : It is true, without deduction of any kind out of the price for which it is sold for consumption in the country. The purchase is made in New York ; it may only be sold for consumption after the duty is paid.

MR. TILLEY : It is sold in bond.

MR. HOLTON : But that will not be the price if sold in bond.

MR. TILLEY : That is not contemplated at all. There is only one port where the question has arisen at all.

MR. GUTHRIE said it might be well to add some words so as to remove any misapprehension.

MR. MILLS said it was perfectly clear that the construction put upon the words by the hon. member for Chateauguay was correct, and they would bear no other construction. When goods were purchased in bond in the United States, that was the market value for consumption. The market value in New York for consumption was the price that those goods would bring after the American duty was added. Now, if these sugars were refined in bond, how would the hon. gentleman do in that case? Would he do exactly as he did in the case of raw sugar ?

MR. TILLEY : There is no sugar refined in bond.

MR. BUNTING said the hon. member was in error in saying that sugars were refined in bond in the United States. The duty was paid on all raw sugar before the refinery got possession of it. The resolution before the House would be very readily understood by those engaged in the sugar trade, who would comprehend distinctly what was meant by a drawback. It was the abatement of the duty which had been paid by the refiner on the raw material when he had the refined material ready for export to a foreign country. The hon. member for Bothwell should know that, as a matter of fact, the drawback allowed to the foreign buyer of American refined sugar, for some years past, had been out of all proportion to the duty paid on the raw material. Not many years ago the drawback allowed on white refined sugar was $3.75 per hundred. Notwithstanding the fact that no increase was made in the duty on raw sugar, this drawback was reduced to $3.60, and subsequently to $3.15, so that it would seem the American Government concluded from time to time that the drawback was in excess of the duty paid. It was the opinion of men engaged in the sugar trade, as well as the United States Government, that for some years past, the bounty on refined sugar exported from the United States had varied from 25c. to 75c. per cwt. The amount of the drawback had consequently been reduced. He thought his hon. friend the Minister of Finance was justified in putting this resolution on the Statute-book, because it was the only way by which he could defend Canadian refiners against the unfair competition of the American refiners, and also the expedients which had been heretofore resorted to by the American Government, in granting to their refiners privileges which no other refiners enjoyed. There was a good deal more in this matter of drawbacks than many members were aware of. There was a very large amount of foreign matter exported from the United States as sugar which never paid any duty to the American Government at all. He knew that in the city of Buffalo there was an establishment which consumed from 4,000 to 5,000 bushels of Indian corn every day. From this corn, common starch, glucose and syrup were produced. This glucose was sent in large quantities to New York, and other sugar refining centres, and there sold to the refiners. It was added to the sugar, and the drawback on American refined sugar was not calculated on the quantity of raw sugar which had been used in producing the refined, but on the weight of the material exported; so that the glucose produced in the Buffalo factory and sent to New York was there mixed with sugar, and that sugar carried with it a drawback. Now, it was quite impossible to ascertain the quantity of glucose that was added to the sugar, therefore it was quite impossible to guard against it. The only way, in his judgment, by which justice could be done to Canadian refiners was to ignore the drawback altogether, and to calculate the duty on the actual duty-paid value of refined sugar in New York, as it was sold to the American consumer. To-day, in New York, white sugar was worth about 8c. a pound, and as the drawback was $3.15 per cwt., the price for export would be $4.85 per cwt. Heretofore, the ad valorem duty of 25 per cent. had been calculable on $4.85, and it was proposed by this resolution to make the new duty of 35 per cent. calculable on 8c. It was but just that it should be so, until such time as the American Government adopted some measures whereby their refiners should not be permitted to impose upon our refiners. This resolution would be understood by the trade. It was well understood by the Custom-house officers throughout the country that it applied only to refined sugar.

MR. HOLTON: How can my hon. friend say that in face of these words: "all goods, wares and merchandises"?

MR. BUNTING said because it was made to apply not only to sugar, but to cut nails and other articles that were entitled to a drawback. Articles made in the United States from foreign material, on which a duty had been imposed, were entitled to a drawback on being exported, and it was contemplated by this resolution not to recognise the drawback, but to have the duty calculated on the actual out-of-bond price of those goods in the United States.

MR. MACKENZIE said the point upon which the hon. member for Chateauguay had called the attention of the House had no reference to a drawback at all, nor to refined sugar. The hon. the Minister of Finance had admitted that the construction put upon the clause by the officers in Montreal was wrong.

MR. BUNTING said that was only in regard to raw sugar, but it was well understood by the Customs officials what was meant by a drawback. The term drawback did not apply to raw sugar at all. Raw sugar coming to New York remained in bond; the portion sold to Canada was exported and the duty applicable to the quantity exported was remitted. But the refined sugar must have paid a duty before the refiner got possession of it for refining purposes, and after it had been refined the drawback was allowed. But in the matter of raw sugar there was no drawback at all: it was exported without paying any duty to the Customs of the United States, and therefore, there could be no fraud and no collusion.

MR. MACKENZIE said no one was speaking about a drawback, what they wanted to know was if the resolution covered sugars purchased in bond, not refined sugars, but the ordinary raw sugars; they wanted to know if these sugars should only pay a duty upon prices paid in bond.

MR. CARTWRIGHT suggested that the hon. the Minister of Finance should insert such words as would prevent misunderstanding of the clause.

MR. TILLEY said there had been but one officer in the whole Dominion who had taken that view of the case—the Collector of Montreal—who had written to him on the subject.

MR. HOLTON said undoubtedly the Collector read the resolution correctly. It stated that all goods, wares, merchandises of any description whatever, purchased in a foreign country—which meant the United States—should be subjected to duty at the fair market value, which was to be established by the wholesale prices for consumption in the markets of that country. Clearly, therefore, the wholesale market price for consumption was the price of duty-paid-sugar. And then, when it came to our frontier, it was subject to duty at that fair market price, including American duty, and subject to our duty at that price. And, therefore, the importer in this country from the United States had to pay double duty. This was a practical prohibition and would be felt very severely along our whole frontier, and more perhaps in Ontario where there was more of that sort of sugar imported, and more bought in New York than in Montreal. It was an absolute prohibition as regarded Ontario, without any reference to drawbacks or the protection of our sugar refineries.

MR. TILLEY said the duty would be reckoned by the market price at the place at which the sugar was purchased.

MR. JONES said that in the United States every possible means was taken to protect their labour. It had been said that sugar was refined and exported in bond. He knew well that iron was imported in bond, manufactured in bond, and then exported. In this way the labour was secured to that country. The United States drawback system worked against us also in foreign countries, and as we had had no drawback system since Confederation, we were placed in a very wrong position as regarded the United States.

MR. GUNN said the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Bunting) had alluded to glucose. Now, it was a well-known fact that no respectable refiner exported sugar with glucose.

MR. BUNTING: I did not say they were respectable.

MR. GUNN said that, under the proposed resolutions, raw sugars would pay 40 per cent., and refined 57 per cent. He was in hopes the hon. the Minister of Finance would have looked into this matter, and he hoped the hon. gentleman, before the resolutions were adopted, would see his way clear to look into the matter.

MR. CASEY said the sugar duty clearly discriminated unfavourably against England, as compared to the United States. Provision had been made for reciprocity in regard to the United States in reference to certain articles; but there was no similar provision with regard to Great Britain in relation to the same articles. With regard to coal, we might make a reciprocal arrangement with the United States; but there was no similar provision with regard to Great Britain, while England at present admitted our coal free.

MR. TILLEY said that in 1854 the Imperial Government gave their assent to reciprocity on these very articles between the United States and Canada, and they gave their assent to a similar proposition made by Mr. Brown, that extended not only to these, but other articles of manufacture. Therefore, he did not think there could be any objection to this proposition. No concession would be made to the United States that did not put England in the same position.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman proposed in these resolutions to admit American coal free, as soon as they admitted Canadian coal free. If the same principle were applied to England, we should now admit British coal free, because England admitted our coal free.

MR. GALBRAITH said that the result of these resolutions would be that, as soon as the United States admitted certain of our agricultural products free, this Government would be in a position to issue a proclamation, allowing similar articles to come into Canada free of duty. During his canvass last summer, he found great complaint among people with regard to the action of the Mackenzie Government in not putting a heavy duty on American pork, and it was one of the reasons given why it should be defeated that it had not put a proper duty on that article of farm produce. He found that pork was carrying a reciprocal duty, a cent a pound, and no change had been made. He wanted to know if the Government, upon the Government of the United States reducing the duty on any article enumerated in this resolution, would find it obligatory on them to make a similar reduction in case of anything coming into Canada. Last year, Ontario alone imported, of pork, $308,044 worth, while they sent into the States $1,065 worth. Their importation of Indian corn from the United States was $2,972,301, and their export thereto was, from Ontario, $49. They imported $5,117,282 worth of wheat, and sent to the United States $1,125,808 worth. Oats imported, $620,628 worth, and exported to the Republic $128 worth. If the Americans were the astute and selfish people that hon. gentlemen supporting the Government gave them credit for being, they would at once reduce the duties on all those articles, and allow the small exports from Canada to reach their markets free, in order to secure hers. So far as his own impression was concerned, he believed the duties on agricultural products were not going to benefit the farmers. The true policy with regard to the farming community was to let them severely alone, and allow them to purchase those articles that they did not produce themselves at the most reasonable rate at which they could be obtained. When they considered the very large volume of agricultural products of the United States, it was computed that last year wheat reached 300,000,000 bushels, and Indian corn 1,300,000,000, they would see that if they sent into that country every dollar's worth of the Canadian surplus of agricultural products, it would not have the least appreciable effect on its markets. It would not reduce prices though increasing somewhat the carrying trade of that country. Now, in regard to a great number of articles of agricultural produce sent into the United States last year, and for which we received a cash return, very little of the same commodities, except wool, was sent from them to Canada. The Ontario exports amounted to nearly $8,000,000, and it was not likely the American Government would make any reduction on the duties chargeable on those articles, because it was in their interest to maintain them, seeing that it would not be very beneficial to their people to send similar articles to Canada. If it would be obligatory on the Canadian Government to make certain reductions on articles named in this resolution, in case of similar reductions being made by the United States, the farming community of Canada might expect very little protection under this Bill.

MR. HESSON said he was glad to see that the Government had reserved the right of making certain reductions in import duties on corresponding reductions being made by the United States. He felt that they should abide by the judgment of the hon. gentlemen in charge of the matter, and particularly that the country credited them with an honest intention of carrying out the propositions so ably brought before the House by the Finance Minister. He (Mr. Hesson) was not at all anxious about the matter.

MR. TILLEY.

He told that the Finance Minister and the Governor in Council would regulate wisely in future, and that, if they did not get much revenue from those items, they would, at all events, be none worse than before.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said he took it for granted the object of that was to induce the Americans to lower their duties on the articles mentioned, going into their country, and that the only object in imposing duties on those articles was reciprocity. If so, why was it that the same duties were not levied on the American articles which were carried by the same Canadian articles entering the States—why not charge 20c. a bushel on wheat as they did? Was not the position of the Finance Minister weakened by this difference. While Canadians charged only 50c. a barrel on flour, their charge was $1. They said they would not lower their duty on coal, and Canada was to impose only 50c. a ton as against their 75c. If they wished to coerce the Americans into reciprocity, why enact lower duties against them than theirs against Canadians?

Resolution read the second time and agreed to.

Resolution 3 read the second time and agreed to.

On Resolution 4,

MR. MACKENZIE said that he had supposed the hon. the Finance Minister would be willing to consider suggestions of a change in the wording of the resolutions, when it was only desired thereby to give effect to his own views. But so far he had declined to make a single alteration of any kind, and there was no use in wasting time in discussion if he was bound to carry them through unchanged.

MR. TILLEY said he would like to know any suggestions hon. gentlemen on the opposite side had to make. These resolutions had been prepared, to a great extent, by the Commissioner of Customs, who had had 12 years' experience in these matters. It was after consultation with him and the Minister of Customs that he (Mr. Tilley) had adopted the propositions made here, and he felt great delicacy in altering the work of such an experienced officer, without some clear and undoubted reason therefor. With regard to the point made by the member for Chateauguay, he did not see that anything could be done. The object of that provision was to ascertain correctly the duty on the value of the article, and the place where it was purchased. This resolution was, word for word, the one accepted in 1871. But it was entirely in the hands of the Government to say that, if any propositions were made, they would accept or reject. They certainly would not on corn and the other articles referred to, and it was not likely they would on barley. It was intended, as a whole, as a policy that would bear upon the whole of these articles, and, if the United States were to say they would reduce their duties below what they were at present, the Government would then have the authority to reduce the duty on articles coming in here. The imposition of these duties now was because these goods had come in free from the United States for twelve years, while the United States imposed their duties on our goods. The Government now imposed duties on articles of the United States sent in here, in the hope that it might lead them, as indicated in the New York Herald, to open their markets to us if we agreed to abrogate those duties.

MR. JONES said that, while in the city of Toronto, a large importer there brought under his notice the fact that, under the sixth resolution, goods brought by rail from Pittsburg to Toronto would not be charged duty on the freight to the border, whereas, if they were brought by rail to Cleveland and shipped from Cleveland to Toronto, a duty would be collected on the freight from Pittsburg to Cleveland.

MR. TILLEY said this proposition was first introduced, he thought, by Sir Francis Hincks, and to a certain extent had been in operation to the present time. It was originally passed with a view to levying duty equally on the value of goods at the shipping. For instance, when wine was purchased in the interior of the country at a very low figure, the ad valorem duty on the cost would be much lower than on the same article at its cost when bought at the port from which it was shipped, the freight in the latter case being added to the price. It was thought desirable to retain this provision, with the exception of adding the words, "except when imported from Great Britain."

MR. CASEY said he thought the difficulty suggested by the hon. member for South Leeds had not been met, and the clause required amendment.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said the words, "the cost of inland transportation," he thought met the case. He thought the meaning was clear, and there never yet had arisen any difficulty through misconstruction.

MR. TILLEY: I entirely agree with the construction put on it by the Minister of Justice.

MR. MACKENZIE asked how it would be if a train of iron were shipped from Pittsburg and crossed the line at Buffalo? Would the duty be charged on the cost at Pittsburg, with the freight to the bridge added, or would it be charged on the price at Pittsburg, or on the price when it arrived at Toronto?

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said the sentence might be rather involved, but, as a matter of construction, he had little doubt on the subject.

MR CASEY asked what the intentions of the Finance Minister were in relation to this matter? Did he intend to collect duty on freight that came by land as well as by water?

MR. TILLEY said the hon. member had offered some remarks a few minutes ago, which he thought were not called for, to the effect that this was the work of some subordinate, such as the Commissioner of Customs. It was a fortunate thing, in connection with our Government, that we had officials who remained in office, and were not removed in consequence of a change of parties; who, in fact, had the confidence of both parties. The deputy heads, he considered, would do credit to any country, and he did not hesitate to say that he looked upon the deputy head of that Department as one of the most efficient men of the public service; and he had not hesitated to leave this matter largely in his hands. He (Mr. Tilley) had been happy to take the advice and counsel of that gentleman in regard to it, taking into consideration his great experience. From him he had understood that the resolutions, as they existed, did not touch the American trade at all.

MR. MILLS said no doubt the Commissioner of Customs was a very intelligent officer in that particular service, but he did not think his opinion ought to govern this House. It was for the House to say whether the wording of the resolution was such as to give effect to the views of the Minister of Finance. He (Mr. Mills) thought that upon the construction of the resolution the view of the Commissioner of Customs was of no value, though his opinion as to the practice might be very important.

MR. BURPEE (St. John) said this was a new resolution entirely. When first it was introduced, it was to include British and other goods, but that had been changed, and Great Britain had been struck out.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell) said this resolution had created a great deal of interest in the city of Montreal. He believed the contention of the ex-Minister of Customs was sustained by the Collector at Montreal, who stated that he had followed the practice indicated by this resolution all the time. He (Mr. White) knew that inland charges had been made. So far as continental shippers were concerned, it was quite clear that the practice had been to charge the cost of inland transportation, in order to arrive at the dutiable value of the goods. The point raised by the late Minister of Customs had created a good deal of feeling among persons engaged in transportation in the city of Montreal, namely, as to whether, in the case of goods purchased in Paris, taken to the frontier, placed on a vessel, taken to Liverpool, and then shipped to Canada, the inland charges to be added would be charges from Paris to Liverpool, or simply from Paris to Rouen, or to whatever port they might be shipped from. It seemed clear, from the reading of this resolution, that it would only be charges to Rouen. The point raised by the hon. member for South Leeds, as to the effect which this would have upon goods coming from the United States, part by rail and part by water, or all by rail, was a very pertinent one. There seemed to him (Mr. White) to be a strong point in that, because, if goods came from any point in the United States to a lake port, and were then shipped to Canada, the transportation of the vessel in this case would have to be added to the cost of the goods; whereas, if they came altogether by rail, there would be no such charges. It was quite clear that, in the construction of this clause, American ports in the United States had never been thought of at all. The point was one of sufficient importance to merit a careful study before it passed.

MR. JONES said this clause had been a deadletter, both in regard to Great Britain and the United States. But it should not certainly have been a deadletter as regarded the United States, considering the action they had taken against us, and we should, in every instance, cause the duty to be levied upon the freight.

MR. BOWELL said there had been a misconception as to whether this clause had to be really the law of the land or not. It was a fact, as stated by the hon. member for Cardwell, that the interpretation given to the repealing clause of the tariff of 1876 did not apply to this clause, and the best evidence of that was that the city of Montreal had been in the habit of having these charges added to their invoices, and it had been the universal custom in the Maritime Provinces. If it had been understood otherwise, it must have been from the neglect of duty on the part of the Customs Department in the past. There should be uniformity in all entries and all invoices. On making enquiry as to the enforcement of this provision, he found it never had been made to apply to any goods purchased in the United States and sent to this country. The practice of the Department, in certain cases, had been to enforce the provisions of this Act, but that was provided for by a Departmental Order, and consequently, it had never been enforced in regard to the transit of goods purchased in Great Britain.

MR. BURPEE said the law of 1868 was repealed in 1874, and the whole Act was consolidated in 1877, but this clause was left out of both those Acts, and whatever carried with it certain packages and certain charges, was provided for in the Act of 1875. The general merchandises of all countries does not carry transportation charges, except on certain articles provided for in the Act.

MR. MACDOUGALL said it seemed doubtful whether this law had been enforced recently, at all events. If this resolution meant to re-enact that law, he was in favour of it. In view of the policy proposed, it was desirable to add to the cost of goods at any point in the United States the cost of transportation to our frontier. That was one of the elements of Protection to our own manufactures. If the word "Canada" was placed in the resolution before the word "vessel," it would cover the difficulty, so as to make it clear that, on goods coming by vessel from any part on the lakes or by the bridge, the cost of transportation to either of those points should be added in estimating the amount of duty to be charged.

* On Resolution 7,

MR. ANGLIN asked how many appraisers it would be necessary to appoint, and what the expense would probably be.

MR. TILLEY said the system had not been thoroughly matured yet. The object was not so much to appoint appraisers in different ports as it was to have a more efficient arrangement here at Ottawa. All the invoices were to be submitted to officers here to see that they were uniform in the value of goods. It would be their duty to ascertain the value of an article manufactured in the United States for the home market. The Estimates would probably cover the expenses of three or four experts. He could not name the amount, but it would not be large.

MR. ANGLIN asked if the experts were to visit places of export, and ascertain the prices of articles; how could they ascertain the prices obtained?

MR. TILLEY said he could not enter into an explanation here, but it would be the duty of these men to ascertain the value of these goods, and then, by addressing circulars to all the collectors, to have uniformity of action.

MR. HOLTON said he regarded with favour the idea of having appraisers here to establish uniformity of valuation in all the ports of the country. This was a point we had long aimed at, and now, as we were getting a more complicated tariff than we ever had before, some process of that kind would be more than ever necessary.

MR. SNOWBALL said it was a dangerous proceeding to appoint appraisers to value goods. He did not think there could be uniformity of value placed upon goods in Ottawa or anywhere else. All we needed was persons to examine the goods and see that they were the classes specified in the invoices. The tariff was bad enough, if they were going to get the full benefit of it, but, if they were going to put on an enormous staff of officials, the poor were going to get very little benefit out of it.

WAYS AND MEANS.—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned debate on Mr. Tilley's proposed motion to agree to Resolution 11, relative to duties of Customs and Excise, reported from Committee of Way and Means (April 9th).

MR. ANGLIN.

MR. HOLTON said that, before the House entered upon a consideration of the items of the tariff, he would like to go back for a moment to the resolutions passed last night. They had been passed somewhat hurriedly, and he had intended to call attention to circumstances connected with one of them, namely, the resolution relating to the tea trade, which was as follows:—

“That it is expedient to provide that, if, at any time, any greater duty of Customs should be payable in the United States of America, on tea or coffee imported from Canada, than on tea or coffee imported from any other country, then the Governor in Council may impose on tea or coffee imported into Canada from the said United States, an additional duty of Customs equal to the duty payable in the United States on tea or coffee imported from Canada: Provided that tea or coffee imported into Canada from any country other than the said United States, but passing in bond through the United States, shall be taken and rated as a direct importation from the country wherever the tea or coffee was purchased.”

He did not propose to raise any discussion on the principle involved in this resolution; he did not think it would be fair to the House to do so, but he desired to enquire as to the practice under this resolution, as to whether the Government had caused an Order in Council, such as was here contemplated, to be issued, and as to the date when the differential duty was to become operative. Considerable confusion of ideas prevailed outside in respect to this question. It might be doubted, he thought, whether it was in the contemplation of anybody that this Order in Council should be issued before the Bill became law. He believed an Order in Council had been issued, presumably under the authority of a resolution in Committee, and he doubted whether that would be a correct procedure. He believed it had been issued, though he had not verified the statement by a reference to the Official Gazette. Then, as to the date at which it was to become operative, he believed it became operative under instructions from the Customs Department to its officers in the various ports on a day anterior to the day at which the Order in Council was issued. He desired to ascertain the precise position of this matter. First, had the Government the right to issue an Order in Council before the final passage of the Act? He thought this power was to flow from the authority of an Act of Parliament, not from the authority of a resolution passed in Committee. And, secondly, if the Government were right in issuing this Order in Council, had they the right to make a differential duty operative at a date anterior to the issuance of the Order in Council ?

MR. TILLEY said that the Order in Council in question was not based upon the resolutions passed by the House recently, but upon an Act of Parliament which had not been repealed. The Order in Council was repealed, but they held that that Act remained unrepealed, and that the Government had authority, under that Act, to pass that Order in Council. Of course, the question would arise, and he had no doubt there was something in what his hon. friend had said in regard to the duties collected before the passage of that Order—whether they would have to be refunded or not.

MR. HOLTON said he thought that was a very questionable position, but he was not disposed to contest it. It had been a question, during the last four or five years, whether that Act was repealed by the Tariff Act of his hon. friend from Centre Huron or not. He thought that the better opinion was that it was repealed. This proceeding, however, produced a great deal of confusion. The general opinion was that the differential duties would only come into force upon the proclamation founded on this Act; that, until such proclamation was made, parties were at liberty to import tea and coffee in accordance with that view.

MR. TILLEY said that that matter would receive the attention of the Government, as he thought there was a good deal in that point.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he wanted to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the last clause: "Provided that tea or coffee imported into Canada from any country other than the said United States, but passing in bond through the United States shall be taken and rated as a direct importation from the country wherever the tea or coffee was purchased." Now, he would like to know, and it was a question of great interest to the trade, what construction the hon.

gentleman put on the Order in regard to goods passing in bond through the United States. If there were any delay of the goods in transitu, and they were obliged to be warehoused, would that prevent this from applying. He supposed the effect of it would be that, if a man purchased a cargo of tea in China or Japan, and wanted to dispose of a portion of it in New York, he would be forbidden to do so. It would be a matter of serious inconvenience if a reasonable time were not allowed, in New York or the port at which the cargo was discharged, for the remainder to be brought on to Canada.

MR. BOWELL said that the instructions which would be sent out immediately required that there must be a direct transportation and no delay.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was important to know if any specified time would be allowed for warehousing at the port where the goods were discharged.

MR. BOWELL said that the instructions did not name any specified time, but it might be advisable for the Government to give that matter their consideration.

MR. HOLTON said he thought it was necessary that they should arrive at a perfectly clear understanding upon this point. Supposing a Canadian merchant imported tea from China and Japan, coming to New York and being entered in bond there. If a portion thereof should be sold in New York, what effect would it have on the remainder coming to Canada? Would it have to pay a differential duty ?

MR. TILLEY said there could be no question about that. If a cargo of tea was imported, and one-half of it was sold in New York and the other sent on here, it was not contemplated or intended, and it would be unwise to deprive our importers of the rights they would enjoy under the circumstances. It must, however, be a direct importation, but the sale of one-half would not vitiate the balance.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he wanted to repeat what he said the other day, that this discriminated against the people of his own Province, and against Nova Scotia. If a man sent a cargo of potatoes or fish to the United States, and wanted to buy twenty or forty chests of tea at Boston and New York, he was not allowed to do so without paying a 10 per cent. differential duty. The Government were placing this trade in the hands of a few monopolists. It discriminated against the people of the Maritime Provinces, whose business was largely with the United States. It would prohibit many in those Provinces from taking goods from that country in bond, and make them pay 10 per cent. more duty than if they had purchased in Montreal. Therefore, he protested against it.

MR. TILLEY said that discussion on the general policy was really out of order at this time. He thought that they should proceed with the regular business.

On Resolution 11, item—Muriatic and nitric acid, 20 per cent., ad valorem,

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Is that for revenue purposes?

MR. TILLEY: Yes.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: What is it expected to produce?

MR. TILLEY: I cannot tell at this moment. It is hardly desirable to estimate the product of each item, even were it possible with accuracy. This item was free before. Perhaps the duty will encourage the manufacture of this article in Canada, though the importation is not large.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said it was not the desire of the Opposition to protract the discussion, but they wished for information on those items which the Finance Minister should be able to give—such as whether the duty would bring $5,000, $10,000 or $20,000. It was not very difficult to get an approximate estimate of the quantity of this article imported. A good many of those acids were the bases of certain manufactures, and it was desirable they should know what other manufactures might be affected by the duty on them.

MR. MILLS said that the Finance Minister must have calculated the amounts to be produced by the several items which he expected to make up the aggregate of $2,100,000 he wanted. It was very important that they should know, as nearly as possible, the amounts expected from the various additional duties. The hon. gentleman had not yet given the House the information on this subject which he promised.

MR. TILLEY said it was impossible to know, exactly, what revenue could be obtained from this description of acid. The value of the acids imported last year was $31,832, but no line was drawn between the different acids. All except sulphuric acid, and a few others, were free under the old tariff.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he did not expect minute accuracy in forming estimates of the probable revenue, but he did expect that the hon. gentleman would have made some enquiry as to the quantities imported, so as to enable the House to arrive at some safe conclusion with regard to the likely result of those duties.

MR. TILLEY said he had no means of ascertaining the size and proportion of those different acids, and the trade could not have told him.

Item agreed to.

On item—Agricultural implements, 25 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Is this additional tax imposed for revenue or Protection purposes?

MR. TILLEY: I may say for both, though I do not expect much revenue, as the enhanced duty will increase the manufacture.

MR. MACKENZIE: It cannot increase the manufacture very much, seeing that only $20,000 worth were imported last year.

MR. TILLEY: Then it does not affect it very much.

MR. MACKENZIE: The tariff is practically prohibitory.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that importations of those articles would be practically prohibited. The manufacture of agricultural implements covered several million dollars' worth every year, the 17½ per cent. having excluded all but $17,120 worth of certain implements, $20,000 worth of mowing and reaping machines. The tax would of necessity fall with very great weight on the settler of the North-West. Of the total importations, barely 58,000, Manitoba paid a tax on $8,800 of agricultural implements of the ordinary class, and $14,123 on mowers and reapers. In that country, above all others, it was a matter of extreme desirability,—of necessity, even—that the people should be allowed to obtain those labour-saving agricultural implements at a reasonable rate. Yet here a tax of 25 per cent. was imposed, from which the hon. gentleman said he did not expect to receive a cent of revenue. This seemed a very impolitic tax. He would be very glad to hear of any grounds for it. Had the manufacturers petitioned for more Protection? He believed that it had been shown that this interest was particularly prosperous.

MR. TILLEY said there was a deficit of $2,500,000 this year, and it was necessary to propose some duties to produce that amount. Iron was one of the articles on which they would get a large sum, and when it was to be additionally taxed, it was right that this industry should receive increased Protection to put it in the same position it occupied before its raw material was taxed. They knew that agricultural implement-makers were, perhaps, as well satisfied as any other manufacturers, but many other articles were manufactured under patents with which no one could interfere.

MR. MILLS said the position of the Finance Minister was rather extraordinary. His hon. friend had told the people that Protection would not increase prices, but now he stated that, in consequence of the tax on iron, the prices on agricultural implements might be increased, and, in order to secure the manufacturers against loss, they must have more Protection. Apart from Manitoba, agricultural implements were not purchased in the United States by Canadian farmers, but by the manufacturers of such articles in the various parts of the Dominion, with the object of adopting any improvements made in the States. This tax, therefore, which was to aid the manufacturers, and compensate them for the tax on iron, would be a burden on them and a discouragement.

MR. GUTHRIE said that this duty illustrated, very forcibly, the character of the tariff. It was acknowledged by the Finance Minister that it would increase the cost of coal and iron—of production. The trade and navigation returns showed that there was no market in Canada unoccupied by their agricultural implements. Therefore, the makers could not increase their sales. If this increased the cost of production, the manufacturer must charge a higher price to a farmer, or take it off the workingman's wages. That was the clear intention of this duty. To put on 25 per cent. was one instance where the tariff was purely ornamental. The full tariff would press severely upon manufacturers, or, if it did not, it would on the workingman on the one hand, and the purchasers, the farmers, on the other.

MR. SCRIVER said he agreed fully with his hon. friend. The tariff would have the effect of so increasing the cost of the articles which the makers of agricultural implements employed, as to place them at a decided disadvantage, unless they could increase the price of their implements proportionately. This they could not do, because they produced more than were required for the consumption of the Province. There was a very successful manufactory of agricultural implements in the constituency he had the honour to represent, and it was represented to him by the proprietor of the manufactory, a gentleman of great experience in the business, that this tariff, instead of affording him, and those engaged in that industry, any Protection, would prove an injury. He had often stated previously that he had asked for no increased protection, nor did he desire any.

MR. SKINNER said the people had been told by the gentlemen now occupying the Treasury benches that, if they were again entrusted with the reins of Government, they would introduce a policy which would protect every industry in the Dominion. There was a very important industry in his constituency—an industry intimately connected with the great agricultural interest—he referred to the manufacture of agricultural implements, and what effect had this wonderful National Policy had on this industry? The manufacturer was handicapped with a duty on his raw material, his iron, his coal, his screws, his nuts; in fact almost everything which entered into the finishing articles, had to pay an additional tax, and, as he could not get the additional price for his manufactures, not on account of foreign competition, but because the home trade already supplied the demands, he was forced to reduce the wages of the mechanics and labourers engaged in the trade. Many of the mechanics and labouring men, he was sorry to say, had had faith in the National Policy, and many of them, in consequence, voted for his opponent in the late contest. He regretted, on this account, that they had been the victims of misplaced confidence. They asked for bread and they had got a stone. In corroboration of what he stated, he read an extract from a letter received from one of his constituents as follows:—

“Our business suffers from domestic, not from foreign competition, so that the new tariff gives us no Protection, but, on the contrary, taxes our business to the extent of about $707,000 a year, for which we receive no earthly equivalent to protect ourselves against the insane policy of the Government. We have been compelled to reduce the wages of our workmen ten to twelve per cent., and the prospects are a fresh reduction will have to be made when the trade has begun to feel the full force of the tariff.”

This letter was from Mr. James Noxon, the Managing Director of the Noxon Manufacturing Company. The firm was a joint stock one, composed of Tories and Reformers; at any rate, he knew that partners in the concern voted for his opponent and worked hard against him.

Mr. ELLIOTT said he desired to express his approval of the new tariff which he said was calculated to promote the prosperity of the country in the highest degree. It was a measure which, he felt sure, would also meet the approval of the people of the Dominion generally, for it would be conducive to the welfare and the best interests of the country at large in all branches of its industries. In the year 1870, when a member of the Council of the county which he had now the honour to represent in Parliament, he had favoured a resolution asking his colleagues to memorialise the Government in order to obtain a duty upon all farm produce then imported from the United States, and until the recent tariff passed the House, free of duty, for the unfairness of the then prevailing rule was evident to himself. He had exposed, to the best of his ability, the falsity of the one-sided Customs tariff that then prevailed, and had shown to his associates in the County Council that the tariff was weighted by its unfairness—Canada admitting farm produce free while ours was taxed on entry to the United States—and must be in time radically changed. Although his propositions were not at the moment received with favour, he was happy in being able to state to-day, that the correctness of his views had been generally accepted, and the soundness of his principles universally attested at the recent general elections, and he was also deeply gratified by the knowledge that the Government of which he was a supporter had, to the letter, complied with the wishes and commercial needs of the people at large. The populace, especially those engaged in commerce, knew well enough their own needs, they were a reading and an intelligent people, and he was astonished that the hon. gentlemen now in Opposition, should, to suit the exigencies of their party strife, insult and cast contumely upon the yeomen of the country by stigmatising them as “ignorant,” simply because they had raised their voices against the policy which had been productive of so much evil to the country. The result of the election was in no degree, he thought, matter for wonder, for it was very clear to all that the moment in our national career had arrived when either our industries had to be protected or else to perish altogether. And it should also be remembered that the protection of our manufactures would consequently benefit our farmers, even if the latter did not receive direct protection; for it must be obvious to the most superficial observer that the more villages that sprung up, and the more manufactures that were carried on in their midst, produced in exactly an equal ratio the sale of farm produce. Much had been said as to the need of agricultural protection, but he would not enter into the subject at any length, as it was very certain that the farming community, under the present system of duplex protection, would not fail to benefit to a most satisfactory extent. It had, indeed, been alleged, and he had been told as much by an hon. member, that the farmers did not benefit by the juxtaposition of prosperous towns and villages; and it was also asserted that Toronto did not in any way benefit the farmers in the neighbourhood and adjoining counties. This was a most fallacious statement, as it was based upon the assumption that grain was the sole product of the farm. This was not the case. The farmer had to look to a great many more items of his produce for profit; and it was perfectly clear to anyone thoughtfully considering the case, that all those items were of a class which found a ready market in any prosperous town or village. He believed that Toronto and Hamilton would increase in population very rapidly in consequence of the new tariff, and that, in consequence, the sale of the domestic produce of the farmers would increase in like proportion. The arguments brought forward for the purpose of supporting the theory that the tariff was not popular in the country, were, he thought, equally fallacious. He could fearlessly assert that, in his own county, the scheme was approved by both parties. He held in his possession letters from various manufacturers, some of the largest in Western Canada, and all expressed their high and eulogistic approval of the action of the Government in connection with the tariff, which they regarded as most ably framed, and calculated to produce satisfactory results. One of these gentlemen, who was not a supporter of the Government, said:

"In my opinion, the new tariff redeems the promises the Government made, that the change of policy should bear a distinct national character. * * * As far as the effect of the new tariff in the country is concerned, I feel satisfied that the change, in time, will be a benefit. Mr. Haggart is satisfied, with the exception of a small matter on raw material. * * * The Messrs. Barber are satisfied, and I understand they have arranged to run their mills full time. This is a change from half time and a decrease of wages. Among the farmers, there is a good deal of speculation as to the benefits, but I think the majority are satisfied, and will cheerfully wait the result of the great change. * * * As a miller, I am satisfied with a duty of 50c. on flour and 10c. on wheat. * * * This is, as far as I know, satisfactory to our trade. * * * You could briefly call the attention of the House to the impetus the new tariff has given to the manufacturing, milling and agricultural interests in this county."

He had also another letter from a supporter of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who was a farmer. He said:

"That it would not be six months before we shall see the return of our former prosperity; and I can see it already in the stir there was in our town last week, and the pleasant faces of any of the farmers that have any of the coarser grains to dispose of. Oats and pease have gone up 10c. per bushel since last Saturday, and it will help a great number of my fellow farmers this hard year. Nearly every person looks happy. The only thing I have heard the farmers complain of, is that the duties on corn are rather low. They think it should have been 10c., but they do not complain."

He had also a letter from a large manufacturer of mowers and reapers, and farm implements of all kinds, who was also a friend of hon. gentlemen opposite. This writer said:

"With the exception of those whose minds were made up to oppose any and everything your Government would enact, very general satisfaction prevails among manufacturers in our line, both Whig and Tory. I would say, go on and do what you consider right and just from a Canadian standpoint, and you will find all of the threats now being made by certain Opposition papers will recoil on themselves. We, along with all other implement makers, have not, nor do we intend to advance one cent on our prices, believing that the increased market will fully compensate large makers. It may be found that an additional 5 per cent. may be necessary for Manitoba and Eastern Provinces, to secure their trade from the United States making a slaughter market of the surplus or inferior wares, but I have no doubt you will receive reliable information on this point from others who have done more in those markets."

He had only cited these letters, gratifying as they were so far as proof of the success of the tariff was concerned, in order to show by direct evidence that hon. gentlemen, when they opposed the tariff, did not represent the views held by the country generally; and this was amply proved by the free testimony he had produced from members of the party of gentlemen opposite, in proof of the success of the yet young tariff. The tariff, he thought, would necessitate to some extent, a change in the system of farming, as it would be made more profitable. Greater attention would have to be given to stock raising and to the rotation of crops, for, in the older countries, there could be little doubt, farmers could hardly compete with the producers of cereals in younger and virgin soils as were found in the West. The growth of manufactures would bring in its train a greater demand for beef, mutton and pork, as grown by the farmers. The leader of the Opposition had not long since stated that the new tariff would be ruinous to manufactures, as it would create over-competition, but this statement was on the face of it fallacious. Under the present tariff the reverse would, of necessity, be the case, as it was only external competition that was a source of danger to any manufacturing community.

Mr. McINNES said that, in British Columbia, agricultural implements could not be manufactured, because they had no wood there suitable for the purpose. Their agricultural implements had to be imported from the United States or from Canada, and this very heavy duty would inflict great hardships on them. When British Columbia entered the Dominion, one of the principle clauses in the terms of the Union was that it was optional with the Legislature of British Columbia to retain her own tariff, or adopt the Canadian one, until such time as the Pacific Railway would be built; but having due confidence in the Canadian Government to build the railway, she abandoned her own tariff, and adopted that of Canada. In view of these facts, he hoped the Government would see clear to make exception in favour of British Columbia until the railway was built.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex) said he feared the Finance Minister scarcely apprehended the immense burden which this increased duty on agricultural implements was likely to impose on the farming community. According to the Census, there were about twenty millions of acres of improved lands in the Dominion, representing 200,000 farms of 100 acres each. It was scarcely the average to assert that each farm required $200 worth of agricultural implements. As this tariff was imposed entirely for protective purposes, it necessarily followed that, by its imposition, the cost of agricultural implements would be increased. Assuming a small average of increased cost, 5 per cent., the farming community all over the country would pay $2,000,000 on these articles more than under the old tariff. If we brought this down to our own individual counties, its effect would be localised and more marked. In his own county there was, at the very lowest calculation, about half a million dollars, worth of agricultural implements used there, an increase of five per cent. on which represented $25,000, without any corresponding advantage being given, as far as he could see, to those engaged in the trade, in return for the duty imposed. If it were true that the trade fully supplied the Canadian market, there was no possibility of their improving their business.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings) said it was a good thing for this country that the farmers had got so many to take their part in this House. Hon. gentlemen opposite were very anxious to make the people believe that they were not getting proper protection under this tariff. In West Hastings a gentleman who was doing a large business in the manufacture of agricultural implements, was manufacturing to-day reaping machines which he could sell at $90, which last year were sold at $110. He (Mr. White) knew a little about this matter, having served his time in the business. When iron cost $30 per ton, the articles were sold as cheap as they were now, with iron at $18 per ton. The manufacturers could afford to sell their implements as cheap, even if they had to pay a little extra duty. The difficulty our manufacturers had to contend against was the competition from the United States, and the loss through agents selling to irresponsible parties. The cry was raised that the poor man was going to suffer. Give the poor man an honest day's pay and he would give an honest day's work in return. It had been said that he (Mr. Ross) lived by farming. Not a bit of it,—the Ontario Government had made provision for him, and he knew nothing about farming. He never ploughed a furrow in his lifetime. He would not know how to put a reaping machine together, and he (Mr. White) doubted if he knew how to harness a horse. When he cried out about the farmers, he was talking of something he knew very little about.

Item agreed to.

On item—Ale, beer and porter, when imported in bottles, 18c. per Imperial gallon,

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he observed there were some alterations in these articles. Suppose we imported the same quantities we did before, there would be rather a loss than a gain in revenue of $2,000 or $3,000. He would like to know why the hon. gentleman had made these alterations.

MR. TILLEY said he did not think we should lose any revenue. With respect to bottled ale, it remained the same, that is, 18c. per gallon. Ale in bulk was 12c. before, and it was now reduced to 10c. That change was made on account of the reduction in the malt duty, and in order to give encouragement to importers of ale in bulk. It would give employment to a large number of persons in making the bottles and bottling the ale.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said there would then be a loss of about $3,000. We got last year $18,000 revenue on 152,000 gallons of ale imported in casks. Under this tariff we would only get $15,000.

Item agreed to.

On item—Animals, living, of all kinds, not otherwise specified, 20 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. MACKENZIE said the wording of this item meant the same as all other specified animals.

MR. TILLEY said certain animals were declared free. A discussion had occurred in the Customs Department as to whether leeches were animals or not. Other instances might arise of uncertainty, if certain animals were not otherwise specified. Animals imported for the improvement of stock were specified and made free.

MR. GUTHRIE asked what revenue the Minister of Finance expected to obtain from this additional tax.

MR. TILLEY answered about $25,000. The hon. member for Centre Huron said last night that this tax would all fall upon Manitoba, but that Province imported but a very small fraction of the whole number of animals brought into this country.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he had stated that it would fall largely upon Manitoba, but not exclusively, as it would also be heavy upon British Columbia. During the last two or three years those Provinces had imported a very much larger percentage of horses, cattle and sheep than the other Provinces. This tax would consequently fall very heavily upon the North-West settlers, and was a very impolitic one.

Item agreed to.

On item—Artificial flowers, 30 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. CARTWRIGHT remarked that the hon. the Finance Minister made a difference between artificial flowers and feathers. He would like to know the reason for doing that.

MR. TILLEY said that as 30 per cent. was imposed upon silks and satins, and as we required a revenue, artificial flowers could pay it as well as anything else. Those who will wear artificial flowers must pay for them as well as those who wear silks and satins.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the tax was fair enough, but, if the object was revenue, this tax would be likely to defeat that object by being too high. The chances were that we would have an inferior article of artificial flowers manufactured in this country.

Item agreed to.

On item—Babbit metal, 10 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked if this article was taken from the free list.

MR. TILLEY replied that babbit metal was formerly 17½ per cent., and tube metal free. It was found to be exceedingly difficult to draw a distinction, the two were so much alike. Both were placed on the 10 per cent. list so that there could be no difficulty in future on that score.

Item agreed to.

On item—Books, printed, periodicals and pamphlets, bound or in sheets, not being foreign reprints of British copyright works, nor blank account books, nor copy books, nor books to be written or drawn upon, nor bibles, prayer books, psalm and hymn books, 6c. per pound,

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Will the hon. gentleman tell us what additional revenue, if any, he expects to derive from this, and then the basis on which he makes the alterations?

MR. TILLEY said when he made his second statement, he stated that it had been decided to adopt this specific duty, and a duty that would yield an equivalent, and something in excess of the duty that was levied on paper. Under the old law, books, as a manufactured article, paid 5 per cent., but paper paid 17½. Therefore, it was considered very unfair to Canadian publishers that the raw material should be subjected to a duty of 17½ per cent., and the manufactured article to 5. In addition to that the question arose as to how it should be levied, whether ad valorem, or, as proposed here, by weight, and, after careful consideration, it was found that whichever course was adopted there were difficulties in the way, and of two evils the Government selected that which they considered the least. If we made it an ad valorem duty, a valuable English work, valuable on account of the talent displayed in it, as well as in the material on which it was printed, would pay a high rate of duty, while an inferior book would pay a lower rate of duty. Now, the same difficulty arose, but not to the same extent, in the application of the specific duty. Heretofore that duty varied from 7 per cent. to 22 per cent., and they estimated that the duty would produce an average revenue of about 12 per cent. The duty collected last year was $44,000, and a large number of bibles and prayer books, etc.,

still remained at 5 per cent., and it was estimated that the proposed duty would yield probably an increased revenue of $30,000. If, for instance, the whole were imported and not manufactured, it would, perhaps, give a revenue of $40,000. But there was no doubt, whatever, that it would lead to the printing of a large number of books that were formerly imported. It would aid the paper manufacturer in the country, and give employment to a large number of people, besides yielding an estimated revenue of $30,000.

MR. MILLS said he objected strongly to putting a tax upon books. If the hon. gentleman would consider the case, he would see that second-hand books would almost be prohibited under this tariff. It was almost impossible to make up a good library because of the difficulty of getting books that might be just going out of print. All books printed before 1852 were now imported into the United States free of duty; if the hon. gentleman had made a proposition of that sort it would have been very much more reasonable. This tax would, in fact, be more than the original price of such books purchased in New York or London. Then again the mode of imposing the duty was a very objectionable one. The importer would be obliged to have his books opened at the Customhouse. The boxes would have to be broken open, and the books, if not well bound, would be injured. But, if the importer was only required to produce his invoice for the tax to be imposed on the value of the books, there would be no difficulty. Under the provisions of this tariff, every box must be opened and the books must be all examined. Then he found that stationers were subjected to different rates of taxation. He was told that a small parcel worth $30 or $40 had been received by an Ottawa bookseller, which was opened and assorted. The paper cutters, made out of ivory, were subjected to one tax, and those made of gutta percha to another. Inkstands, made of glass, were subjected to one tax, and those of metal to another. And so the articles had to be assorted and classified, and a great amount of time wasted, in order to determine the amount of tax to be imposed upon them. Coming to pencils, it was impossible to say how they should be taxed, whether as manufactured goods, as plumbago, or as India rubber. This was one of the practical difficulties of the tariff. If we were to impose an ad valorem tax upon books, there would be no difficulty, and books that were going out of print would only pay a tax according to their value.

MR. ANGLIN said the objections made by the hon. member for Bothwell were very serious in their character, inasmuch as importers must be subjected to a great many annoyances arising from the conflicting character of the tariff. The chief objection to this impost was that it would tend to prohibit, or, at all events, greatly to diminish, the circulation among our people of those cheap English reprints of the most valuable works of the English language. It was a very bad policy to tax the production of the intellect, but we had in our language a large number of the very best works which were produced by English publishers, at a low price, for circulation amongst the masses of the people. This was one of the most civilising influences that could be employed in any country, and we were now about to prohibit or diminish the effect of that influence in this country. He thought he saw it stated in a letter from St. John, N.B., that this class of books recently imported had to pay something like twenty-five per cent. duty. He objected to this tax, because it would seriously interfere with the circulation of books through the country.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said, that in the course of previous remarks, he had referred to the effect of this tariff on Sunday School literature. His hon. friend (Mr. Tilley) knew that all Sunday School library books had to be imported largely from the United States, and he thought it was somewhat inconvenient to be obliged to pay increased prices for those books. He thought his hon. friend would agree with him, that Sunday School library books were almost as important, in one sense, as bibles, hymn-books, etc., and by increasing the duty on them it would be a serious injury. There was another objection. Certain denominational works, particularly those used by the Lutheran denomination, and which were published only in Germany, had to be imported. It would not pay a publisher to reproduce those books in Canada. The discrimination in that case was due more to the language spoken by these people than to the tariff. But a discrimination of that kind which bore so heavily upon their German fellow-citizens was one that was exceedingly objectionable, and it appeared to him it might be obviated. He hoped the matter would receive the further attention of the Government.

MR. TILLEY said this matter of religious publications had received the careful consideration of the Government, and at one time it was thought they might be put in the same class with bibles, prayer books, etc., at 5 per cent. duty. But when they came to work the matter out they found that a special class for religious books could not be made, because religious books could not be clearly specified or defined; and the Government was compelled, under the circumstances, to abandon the proposition. He thought that with a population of 4,000,000 the time had arrived when they should print and publish their own Sabbath School books; and he believed it would not be long before that would be done. It was because of the difficulty they found, after consultation with the Customs Department and the members of the Government, of giving any clear definition of this description of books, that they had not been put in the 5 per cent. class. •

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. the Minister of Finance was mistaken if he thought that a population of 4,000,000 could sustain the publication of the kind of cheap Sunday School periodicals which were published in the United States and Great Britain, because it was only an enormous circulation that would enable a publisher to publish them, except at a loss to himself. These books were published to a large extent by benevolent societies, which had an income over and above what they got from the sale of their periodicals. He believed a very large majority of such publications were delivered at the present time to the Sunday Schools for less than half the price for which they could be produced in Canada, no matter if they had a complete system of protection. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had had some of these periodicals sent him, that were published in the United States, and used by the Episcopal Methodists in Canada. This denomination was the largest religious body in the United States; whilst they were comparatively small in numbers in Canada as compared with the Wesleyan Methodists, and they, very naturally obtained their supply of cheap church periodical literature from the great depôts in the United States. He would send over a few of these periodicals to the hon. gentleman to look at. They would at least bring him back to the days of his childhood. But seriously, he thought it was a great injury to Canadian Sabbath Schools. The hon. gentleman would, no doubt, to some extent, promote the publication of certain classes of papers. He hoped the Government would yet consider this matter, and allow this class of Sunday literature to be brought into the country. He had letters from parties engaged in the business, but he would not take up the time of the House by reading them. He appealed to the Government earnestly to reconsider the decision come to in the matter. He admitted there would be a difficulty about the definition of religious literature in the shape of books, and while he thought the system of imposing the duty was not a correct one, still, the class of books that were taken into the ordinary Sunday School libraries could not be properly classed as religious books, although they were more or less of a religious character, or had that tendency. But the periodicals to which he referred were clearly and wholly of that stamp, and could not be published anywhere for the sake of profit. They were almost always published by benevolent enterprise, or by publishers who were enabled, on account of the vast circulation in Great Britain and the United States, to sell them profitably.

MR. TROW said he agreed in the remark of the hon member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), in reference to the hardships imposed on the German population of this Dominion. At present the German Conference of the Lutheran Church was in session in Berlin, and were discussing this same subject. All their tracts, Sabbath-school books and periodicals were printed in the United States, either in Cleveland or Cincinnati. He had spoken with three ministers of that Church recently on that subject, and they seemed to think that something should be done; and he was aware that a very largely signed petition would be forwarded to the Minister of Finance immediately, on the subject, and he trusted that some measure of relief would be afforded the German body, which formed a very large and important element of the population of Western Canada.

MR. KEELER said it was very desirable that this class of literature should come into the country at a cheaper rate than under this tariff. He had received from a number of his constituents who took a great interest in the subject, letters condemning the tariff on this point, though the writers were warm political partisans of the Government. He hoped that some means would be provided, by which this class of literature might be brought in under a special arrangement at a lower duty than that proposed. He did not believe that these books could be printed and sold in Canada at as cheap a rate as they were supplied heretofore.

MR. TILLEY said his hon. friend opposite (Mr. Mackenzie) thought he (Mr. Tilley) supposed to influence him by appealing to the days of his youth. He might say, for the information of the hon. the leader of the Opposition, that those periodicals came in free through the post-office as newspapers.

MR. MACKENZIE said they were sent in packages, and in that case the postage would be greater than the duty.

MR. MILLS said it was absurd to suppose that periodicals could be printed in Canada and sold as cheaply as they could be obtained in the United States. The people would purchase them where ever they could be obtained cheapest, and that was from the large depôts in the United States. Supposing a sufficient inducement was offered to publishers to undertake the publishing of these books here, they could not be sold for less than double the price now charged. It would be utterly impossible for small denominations, if they had to pay this taxation, to obtain Sunday School books at all. This proposition was a premium on ignorance. The effect of the tariff would be such as to exclude the importation of magazines into the country at all. The people would have very limited means of obtaining information in order to enable the publisher of some periodical to obtain greater profit. This provision in the tariff was one unworthy of the House, and one, which he trusted, the House would not support.

MR. CASEY said he did not agree with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that this proposition was unworthy of the Government, inasmuch as it was perfectly consistent with all the other provisions of the tariff, which bore so heavily on the people. There were in his (Mr. Casey's) county a large number of German Lutherans, the headquarters of which body were on the other side of the line. It in fact discriminated against these two denominations. It also placed a special tax on the Highland Baptists, who had their headquarters in New York. He hoped the arguments which had been submitted to the hon. gentleman would have weight with him.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell) said he thought the hon. gentleman who had just sat down was not likely to increase his influence in the House if he adopted the tone he did when he cast his sneers at gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches. They at least might be presumed to have as much interest in the welfare of the country as the hon. gentleman, and he thought his position in the House entitled him to adopt a different tone to that which he affected. The point raised by the hon. member for Bothwell was, of course, the broad question as to whether there would be any duty on books at all; and there was a great deal to be said on both sides of it. In the United States, where they must admit that a deep interest was taken in education, a higher tariff was imposed on books than was proposed in these resolutions. The tariff of the United States was twenty-five per cent., whilst that under consideration would not be more than ten and one-half per cent., or twelve per cent., therefore the charge of a determination to prevent, except at a high price, the introduction of literature from abroad, applied with greater force to the United States. The hon. member for Bothwell, in his first speech, advanced an argument which he (Mr. White) thought instead of making for him rather made against him. He referred to second-hand books, whose value on account of their scarcity, was far beyond their intrinsic value. These books, if charged, even at a low ad valorem rate, would have to pay a much higher duty than at so much per pound. That argument, therefore, was very much in favour of this arrangement of the tariff. The contention that considerable difficulty would be experienced by the Custom-house authorities, he did not consider was well taken. There might be a little difficulty with regard to the first importations, but it would disappear at the second importations as soon as the Customs authorities became accustomed to the work, and the system of invoicing was improved. The only argument which undoubtedly excited some interest, and which, in a good many quarters outside, was felt to be a serious one, was that in reference to the religious publications such as the hon. member for Lambton had referred to. The question involved in this matter was rather a wide one, and he must confess he was astonished to find gentlemen, whose opinions were strong against any union of State and Church, or legislation in the interest of religious bodies, or special exemptions in favour of religious bodies, urge this argument. His impression was that that class of literature could be supplied in Canada just about as well as it could be in the United States. The production of them in Canada involved the sending of the plates from the place of publication to this country, instead of the printed papers, and the labour required in the production of them would be performed in Canada. In regard to magazines, he thought, by the arrangement of the tariff, substantial justice would be done. It was a remarkable fact that since this scale of duties had been commenced, the Messrs. Rose, of Toronto, had already issued a paper similar to the Franklin Square edition of novels, at an actually cheaper cost than the Franklin Square edition. This was one of the early results of a tariff, which he was satisfied the people would discover was a fair and equitable one.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he rose to deprecate the tone in which the hon. gentleman had criticised the conduct of an hon. member of the House. If there was any member in the House who did not deserve such a thrust, it was the hon. gentleman referred to. He was intelligent, amiable, highly cultivated, and assiduous in attention to his duties, and he would tell the hon. member for Cardwell, without any discourtesy, that the reputation with which he had come to this House would not last long, if he exhibited the partisan spirit his opening remarks had just displayed.

MR. BOULTBEE said that no charge had been made that the young gentleman in question did not possess the qualities attributed to him. It was only charged that he had forgot what was due to a man of culture and attainment, in speaking as he had done.

MR. SCRIVER said he hardly thought the hon. member for Cardwell was justified in his personal allusion to the hon. member for West Elgin. He rose, however, to express his regret that the hon. the Minister of Finance did not listen to the representations that were made to him from an influential source, in reference to the particular class of literature, in regard to which so much had been said. He desired, however, to call attention to the British Workman paper, which had exerted so wide an influence in training the minds of the young in regard to the question of temperance. For this reason, both the Finance Minister and himself were specially impressed with doing every everything in their power to promote the general circulation of this paper throughout the community. He regretted that the ingenuity of himself and colleagues was not equal to the prevention of the imposition of an almost prohibitory duty upon this and similar publications, including some of an artistic character, of which he could not speak in too high terms; 25 per cent. was too much to impose.

MR. OUMET said that Latin and Greek books, translations and dictionaries, though much used in their educational institutions, had to be imported from Europe and elsewhere. They could not be printed in Canada with a profit, and might very properly be put on the same footing as bibles, prayer books, and other works paying 5 per cent. The duty of 6c. per pound on the larger books would be nearly 50 per cent. on cost.

MR. KRANTZ said that the member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) had referred to the German Lutherans as being very much oppressed by this tariff. To quiet his mind and conscience, he might state that they had Lutheran literature printed in this country, of fully as high a standard as that printed in the United States, German school books being printed in Canada as many as twenty-five years ago.

MR. TILLEY said that the question of that class of books was connected with an ad valorem duty, and would, if he recollected right, pay more than an ordinary specific duty. Classical dictionaries would pay according to weight.

Item agreed to.

On item—British copyright works, reprints of, 6c. per pound, and the addition of 12½ per cent. ad valorem,

MR. CARTWRIGHT said if that duty was intended to apply to the British quarterlies, reprinted in New York, which belonged to a valuable class of works which he thought would not be reprinted here, the duty would be very heavy on them.

MR. TILLEY said they paid 12½ per cent., which went to the author; the 6c. would be collected on the weight.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that he did not think that the reprints of the quarterlies ever paid 12½ per cent.

MR. TILLEY: They came through the post-office, but other works did pay that amount.

MR. BOWELL said that publishers in New York might secure the copyright and send works in without that charge. The duty was to apply exclusively to copyright books. Under the old tariff, the duty was evaded by Canadian printers establishing printing offices on the line and sending works in in sheets. The duty did not apply to the quarterlies.

Item agreed to.

On item—Books, periodicals and pamphlets, imported through the post-office, for every two ounces in weight, or fraction thereof, 1c.,

MR. TILLEY said the duty would make 8c. a pound, as against 6c., and this was considered the most convenient way of collecting the duty. Previously, many books imported through the post-office, paid no duty. In other cases the postmasters were particular and forwarded books to the post-office for collection of the duties. But for the purpose of simplifying this matter, it was proposed that the postmaster should weigh the books and collect the duty for the Customs Department. On a pound 8c. would be paid, and on two ounces 1c.

MR. SCRIVER asked if it was proposed to compensate the postmasters for the discharge of this additional duty.

MR. TILLEY : Yes, a certain percentage.

MR. CASEY said that the duty would discriminate against the importation of any book by post, and in favour of importation through distributing houses in Canada which could evade it.

MR. TILLEY said one object was to facilitate the collection of the duty. The tariff made a difference of only 2c. per pound, and he thought that their own people should have the benefit of some slight discrimination.

MR. MILLS said this would be a very serious tax upon people in the rural districts. The bookseller purchased at 33 per cent. below the publisher's price, and the man in the rural districts paid that whether he purchased from one or the other ; and now an additional tax was proposed should he take his periodical through the post-office, when that might be his only way.

MR. SNOWBALL wished to know what check would be put on the postmasters in reference to the collection of that duty.

Item agreed to.

On item — Blank books, bound or in sheet, 25 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. TILLEY said those books had been admitted at a lower rate, with bills, advertising pamphlets, etc., most of which had been sent through the country without contributing anything to the revenue.

MR. MACKENZIE : They paid 17½ per cent.

MR. TILLEY said that a great many small pamphlets, with regard to patent medicines and insurance companies bill-heads, showbills, and everything of that kind, had been brought into the country, depriving Canadians of a certain amount of employment. He thought it proper, therefore, to propose a 30 per cent. duty.

Item agreed to.

On item—Bookbinders' tools and materials, including cloth, 15 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said he thought that this would bear heavily on the trade ; 15 per cent. on cloth would increase the cost on school books, the binding of which constituted a large percentage of all the bookbinding in Ontario, where one or two million books per year were used up by the half million of school children.

MR. TILLEY said that the articles in the list referred to had been admitted free, but this industry had more protection now than before, and it was necessary to obtain a certain revenue. Under this duty there would be more employment for the bookbinder, many of whose tools could be made in the country. It was imposed merely for the sake of revenue, and it left a sufficient margin of profit to this industry.

MR. ANGLIN said that the bookbinders had been treated with peculiar hardship. The duty would have been a mere trifle on the better description of articles to be used. They taxed not only the binders' materials, but even their working tools.

Item agreed to.

On item—Billiard tables, without pockets, 4 ft. 6 in. by 9 ft., a specific duty of $22.50,

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked what was the average cost of those articles; and what did the duty represent ad valorem?

MR. TILLEY: According to the different kinds, and prices, and billiard tables; the duty varied from 21¼ to 23½ per cent. The prices ranged from $200, $225, $250 and $300.

Item agreed to.

MR. KILLAM said he understood the hon. gentleman to say there was to be a drawback on some manufactures used in the construction of ships. Brass bushings were imported to be used in the manufacture of blocks. Were the manufacturers of the blocks or the shipbuilders to receive the drawback of the value of these bushings?

MR. TILLEY said either the shipbuilder or the blockmaker would get the drawback, as agreed between them. The blockmaker could sell the article at a reduced price and get the drawback, or the shipbuilder could pay the full price and receive the drawback.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILL.

THIRD READING.

The following Bill was read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 50) Respecting La Banque Jacques Cartier.—(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

WAYS AND MEANS.—THE TARIFF.

DEBATE RESUMED.

House resumed the consideration of Resolution 11.

On item—Brass, old and scrap; in bars, bolts and sheets; in wire, round or flat; on seamless drawn tubing, and on plain and fancy tubing, 10 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. CARTWRIGHT said it was very unlikely, indeed, that these articles would yield any revenue under this tariff. He supposed the hon. gentleman believed that the imposition of 30 per cent. ad valorem would cause these articles to be manufactured in Canada but he (Mr. Cartwright) thought the hon. the Finance Minister would lose both the revenue and the manufacture.

Item agreed to.

On item—Barley, 15c. per bushel,

MR. CHARLTON enquired, Whether the hon. gentleman anticipated that the imposition of 15c. would materially advance the price of grain to the farmers of Canada in our own market, and afford an increase to the revenue.

MR. TILLEY said he found the imports of barley last year were 302,147 bushels, valued at $137,243. The exports were 1,040,000 bushels, valued at $697,454. He did not expect to obtain any revenue from this, except, perhaps, a few thousand dollars; because 15c. a bushel would practically exclude American barley. A few thousand bushels, however, would probably be imported into British Columbia. As to the expected benefit to the farmers he would answer that question twelve months hence. He did not think it necessary for him to state here how much it would increase the cost of the article to the people. The great object was to give them the home market.

MR. BUNSTER said he would inform the hon. the Finance Minister that if he expected to get any revenue on barley imported into British Columbia, he would be mistaken, as they would raise it themselves.

MR. MILLS said the hon. gentleman spoke about giving the farmer the home market for his barley. There never was a period when we had not a larger market than the hon. gentleman could give us. The hon. gentleman would see by the returns that it was only during the last two or three years that American barley was finding its way through Canadian channels to the European market. During the whole period since Confederation, less than 2,000,000 bushels of American barley had found their way into Canada, and the whole of this had been re-shipped to Europe. If the hon. gentleman excluded that barley, he would simply exclude it from being carried to Europe. The hon. gentleman dared not say that the proposition would give the farmers better prices. He knew right well that he would neither put money in the pockets of the farmers, nor into the Treasury. Then what was the tax imposed for? It was for the purpose of keeping up this sham. The farmers were to pay a higher tax on the article they purchased for clothing or for food, but they were not to get any more for the articles they sold. The hon. gentleman ought to be frank with the House, and state what he imposed this tax for. He knew that American barley did not come into competition with Canadian barley in our market. The importation of American barley, on its way to Europe, was a thing of the last few years; and yet the hon. gentleman proposed to put on a tax that, if it meant anything, would prevent those few hundred thousand bushels being sent through Canadian channels to the European market.

MR. TILLEY: There is nothing in the world to prevent the transmission of American barley through Canada under this resolution.

MR. MILLS: What is this tax for?

MR. TILLEY said that was another thing. But there was nothing to prevent barley going through the country by the Great Western or the Southern road, and being shipped to Montreal. Nothing would prevent its being passed through in bond; on the contrary, every facility would be given for it.

MR. GUTHRIE said the hon. the Finance Minister had not answered the question as to whether he expected this duty would raise the price of barley to the Canadian farmer, but he did say it would give the home market to the Canadian farmer. He (Mr. Guthrie) asked him whether he meant by home market a better price?

MR. TILLEY: It may be so.

MR. GUTHRIE said there was another question: why had the duty on barley been put at fifteen cents? It had not been put for purposes either of revenue or Protection. Was it put there because that was the amount Americans put on barley under their tariff?

MR. TILLEY: Because the Government considered it the right thing to do.

Item agreed to.

On item—Indian corn, 7½c. per bushel.

MR. TILLEY said last year we imported 7,789,507 bushels of Indian corn, valued at $3,535,619; we exported 3,987,600 bushels, valued at $2,678,000. There was a surplus of imports over exports of 3,400,000 bushels. Now they estimated that, under the new tariff, instead of there being 3,400,000 bushels imported in excess of exports, the amount would be reduced to 2,000,000 bushels. We must take into account that there would be consumed, in Canada, 150,000 bushels of meal, a portion of which would be manufactured from corn, which would increase the quantity of corn imported, and diminish the quantity of meal. But the practical effect would be that the revenue from corn, or cornmeal, would be about $210,000.

MR. FLEMING asked if the Government intended to give the Canadian farmer a drawback upon American corn. The manufacture of beef was just as much a manufacture as the manufacture of sewing machines, and Canadian farmers were as much entitled to a drawback when they purchased American cattle, and fed them with American corn, and sold the product to European markets. They were just as much entitled to the drawback as the Canadian manufacturer. He defied the hon. gentleman to show why the Canadian manufacturer was entitled to a drawback and the Canadian farmer was not entitled to one.

MR. TILLEY said that was a proposition he was not quite prepared for. It had not entered into his calculations. He could imagine a great deal of difficulty in dealing with an interest of that kind, for the reason that a large portion of the corn that would be consumed would be used in the distilleries, and we knew that the distilleries would have the benefit of it, inasmuch as there was a small addition to the Custom's duty, owing to the fact of their having to pay so much on the corn.

MR. CHARLTON said he would like to know if the hon. the Finance Minister anticipated that, in consequence of the imposition of duty on corn, that the production of corn in this country would be fostered to such an extent that hereafter the production would amount to 1,500,000 bushels more than at present.

MR. TILLEY said that he would leave his hon. friend to arrive at his own conclusion on that subject. His (Mr. Tilley's) conclusion was that it would increase the quantity of corn grown in Canada; that it would substitute for corn, to the extent of 1,500,000 bushels, oats, pease and other products of the Dominion of Canada, instead of importing corn.

MR. CHARLTON said that the advantage to the farmers of Ontario, during the last three or four years, in buying corn and selling in place of that corn, pease, cats, barley, etc., had been a gain of 18c. upon every bushel, and, in many instances, more. The imposition of a duty of 7½c. per bushel did not compensate the farmer of Ontario for the deprivation of the advantage derived from selling coarse grains. He did not think it was possible, under any circumstances, to increase the growth 1,000,000 bushels in that Province. This duty upon corn was the only advantage that was offered the agricultural corn-growing belt for all the onerous burdens imposed upon them, and that duty was a delusion and a snare. But his (Mr. Charlton's) constituents could not be deluded. Their choice of representative showed they would not be deluded. He submitted to the hon. the Minister of Finance the propriety of dealing honestly with this question.

MR. CHRISTIE said he was fully convinced that the imposition of a duty upon corn would be very injurious and oppressive to many of his constituents, who did not grow corn very largely. So far as he knew, we did not export a single bushel; but, on the contrary, imported a large quantity annually for feeding purposes. Many of our farmers found it profitable to sell their barley, pease and potatoes and buy corn. It was well known that corn was better for feeding purposes than barley, and money was made by the exchange. If we were to participate in the English cattle trade, which was assuming such large dimensions (last year we exported from the Dominion to the English market 50,000 or 60,000 sheep and 18,000 cattle), cheap cattle feed was necessary. When hay was a short crop, cheap corn became invaluable; besides, it was used to some extent as a substitute for flour, and was a cheap, healthy and nutritious article of diet. Now, the imposition of a duty of 7½c. per bushel, or 40c. per bag, on cornmeal, was simply filching that amount out of the pockets of those farmers who required to buy, and whose soil was not adapted for its profitable cultivation. It would be a loss of two or three thousand dollars annually to his constituents.

MR. MILLS said if the hon. the Minister of Finance had not considered the effect of the imposition of this duty on corn, if he would ascertain the large quantities of pease, etc., sent out of the country and the quantity of corn that was imported instead, at a much lower price than that received for the products exported, and that this trade was increasing every year, he would have some idea of the injurious effects of this duty. About two and a-half million bushels of corn was imported last year, by farmers, for feeding purposes. The quantity of corn imported was increasing every year, because it was found that the production of other grains was more profitable to the farmers. The whole tendency for the past six years had been to import large quantities of American corn for feeding purposes. He thought that the proposition of the hon. gentleman, instead of helping the farmers, would hurt them very seriously.

MR. HUNTINGTON said the people of his county were opposed to the tax on corn, as were also the people of the Eastern Townships, as the whole corn was bought in his county for feeding purposes. The farmers there generally, including the supporters of the hon. gentleman opposite, considered that the Government had made a vast mistake with regard to the duty on corn.

MR. SPROULE, as a representative of an agricultural constituency, said that large quantities of corn was imported into his section, to take the place of beans, oats and pease and other coarse grains. It had not paid farmers to raise oats at 25c. and peas at 50c. a bushel, which was the prices received until recently. Since the tariff, coarse grains had increased in price. Last year oats realised 31c. per bushel, but now from 45c. to 48c. Peas, which sold last year for 60c. now fetched from 65c. to 70c. No argument was required to convince the farmers that they received substantial advantage from the new tariff, and this fact had been admitted by rabid Grits in his county.

MR. GUTHRIE said he noticed that a duty of 15c. was put on barley, and 10c. on pease, the same as the American tariff. But on corn the duty was put at 7½c. less than the American tariff. Now, if it was a good argument, as was alleged, for putting this duty on corn—that it would increase the price received by the farmer who grows the corn, why had the Government shrunk from imposing the full American duty on that article. If a 7½c. duty would be beneficial in that direction, a 10c. duty would be more so. Another reason given for the imposition of this duty, was that it would induce Americans to grant Canada reciprocity, if the Government put on retaliatory duties. Why did the Finance Minister shrink in the case of grain? Was he afraid that this policy of retaliation would fail—that it would amount to the Canadian people being taxed, whilst it would not succeed in inducing the Americans to grant reciprocity? Those were points he thought needed some explanation.

MR. HOOPER said Canadian distillers would not buy Canadian rye whilst they could purchase corn from the United States without paying any duty, and he thought that the result of this tariff would be a valuable protection to the farmer.

MR. GILLMOR said this was one of the most objectionable features of the tariff to the county which he had the honour of representing, and he would desire a change if it were possible to have one. He thought the advance which would take place in the price of oats, would be overbalanced by the increase of the price of corn, which farmers would have to purchase for food for themselves and for feed for their cattle.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said that corn was the only article of agricultural produce, the price of which could have been enhanced by the imposition of a duty, yet the Government had only seen fit to tax it to the extent of 97c. per bushel. This duty would make a difference of $750 in the price of the corn raised in his county, and this, divided amongst 3,000 farmers, would give them 25c. per family per year. If the Government intended to give the farmer any substantial protection in this matter, they should have given them a greater amount of protection than 7½c. a bushel.

MR. BAIN said that the moment hon. gentlemen opposite had an opportunity of putting their hands into the American farmers' pocket, in the same way that the Americans did into the Canadian farmers' pocket, that they were extraordinarily lenient to our American cousins. Whilst the Americans demanded 15c. per bushel on our barley, the Western farmer could send in his corn by paying only 7½c. a bushel. That he thought was the best illustration of who paid the duty, a subject on which they had heard so much, both inside and outside the House.

MR. ALLISON said the variety of arguments used by hon. gentlemen opposite, in regard to the imposition of a duty on corn, showed that they had no clearly defined policy. The member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), had stated that instead of this National Policy having the beneficial effects that were predicted, prices had been tumbling since its announcement. If so, they would not ruin the poor consumer. The leader of the Opposition had said that the consumer would have to pay higher for all the articles he used—a statement which contradicted that of the hon. member for South Brant, that the prices of farm produce had been falling.

MR. BORDEN said that it would have been more satisfactory if the hon. member for Hants had stated his own views on the question before the House, instead of criticising those of members of the Opposition. As the representative of one of the largest agricultural constituencies in Nova Scotia, he had no hesitation in giving his opinion, and saying that the proposed duties on corn, cornmeal and wheat flour, were exceedingly unjust to every portion of Nova Scotia, and particularly the farming community, who were weighted down by taxes on agricultural implements, clothing and everything that they could not raise themselves, including bread and cornmeal for feeding. Those taxes on breadstuffs would have to be paid by the people of the Maritime Provinces, while they would not have the effect of forcing them to buy the products of the Upper Provinces. The natural market of Nova Scotia was the United States, and the proposition of inter-provincial trade, as far as Western Nova Scotia was concerned, was absurd. They had to sell their products to the Americans, and purchase from them such articles as cornmeal and flour, which they did to a large extent. The extra duties that Nova Scotia would pay under this tariff, upon breadstuffs alone, would reach nearly $100,000. Though the duties would not materially advantage the Ontario farmer, they would disadvantage Nova Scotians by causing higher prices. He hoped the hon. member for Hants would give the House and country a satisfactory explanation of his position in the matter.

MR. ALLISON said it gave him great pleasure to take up the gauntlet of the hon. member for King's, N.S., (Mr. Borden). He was prepared to take the tariff as a whole, though he would have been pleased if corn and flour had been allowed to come in free. He infinitely preferred the tariff, as a whole, to the old one; and was not afraid to go back to his constituents for an endorsement of his course. The only pledge his constituents asked of him was opposition to the late Government. He deprecated the spirit of selfishness, sectionalism and jealousy engendered on the Opposition. As they were now one people, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, with a common interest and a common destiny, let them have a community of sentiment. He believed that every man in Nova Scotia would, before many months, be in a better position to pay the slight increase on corn, flour and meal than he was at present. In reply to the hon. gentleman from King's, who asked how, he would state that it would be by the improved condition of the coal and iron industries of that Province, through the operation of the tariff, which would also revive sugar-refining. The people would thus obtain more employment and better wages.

MR. BORDEN said that the hon. gentleman from Hants (Mr. Allison) had just deprecated sectionalism, finding it very convenient to get on stilts and become a full-fledged statesman, because he dare not come down to the consideration of the individual parts of the tariff itself. In the very same breath he said he approved of it as a whole and objected to particular parts. It was very convenient for him to shelter himself under a deprecation of sectionalism, but the people of Nova Scotia would appreciate a little more patriotism and a little less pretence of statesmanship. The misfortune of Nova Scotia was to be represented by hon. gentlemen claiming statesmanship of that kind. The hon. gentleman had stated that the people of Nova Scotia would not object to pay higher prices, the certainty of that evil being thus admitted. He expected a great deal from the working of their coal and iron mines, which reminded him (Mr. Borden) of the prediction before Confederation that Nova Scotia would become the workshop of the Dominion; her industries had made less progress since then than before Confederation. The letter recently written by Mr. Lithgow, the champion of the coal interest, the Phipps of Nova Scotia, condemned the probable effect of the tariff on the coal mining interest.

MR. TROW said his constituency was not a corn-growing country, but a stock-raising country, and he did not see why the farmers there who raised stock should be called on to pay this additional tax.

MR. ALLISON.

He would like to hear what the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, who was endeavouring to promote our cattle trade with Great Britain, and had recently introduced a Bill for the prevention of disease among cattle, had to say on this point. This was a trade which ought certainly to be encouraged. In the year 1878, we exported to Great Britain 1,878 head of cattle, and 62,461 sheep and 1,798 horses. The Americans in the Western States had the advantage over us in the feeding of stock. Our stock, owing to the long winter, had to undergo a partial starvation through exhaustion of feed and length of confinement. Corn was an essential in the feeding of stock, and it was a matter of great importance, if we wished to have the advantage of placing them on the European markets, that no tax should be placed on any produce used in feeding them. Last year we imported seven and a quarter millions of bushels of corn, of which 2,400,000 bushels were used in the feeding of stock. He was not a stock-raiser himself, but there were quite a number of gentlemen in his locality who were engaged in that business, and used a large portion of corn. His neighbour paid weekly $62 extra already on account of this rate, and he had used his influence against him (Mr. Trow) in the last election, because he was under the impression that the Americans would pay the duty.

MR. HESSON said he was here with the distinct understanding that he would support such a tariff as the one introduced, and that if such a tariff were not brought down by the Minister of Finance he was not bound to support the Government in this matter. He held that this tariff was in the interests of the farmers of Canada. He only regretted the duty had not been made 10c., instead of 7½c. He spoke from a knowledge of the wants of the people, and he represented a county equal in every respect to that of the hon. member for South Perth. This tariff was a question not for any particular Province, but for the whole Dominion. It was also a question of revenue. Hon. gentlemen opposite had not proposed any way in which the requisite revenue to meet our engagements could be raised. We ought to approach this question as statesmen desirous to place the country on a sound commercial footing, and he knew of no better way to attain this result than to tax foreign products, and protect, by that means, our own. His Riding was represented by a Reformer in the Local Parliament, but he was elected on the National Policy to represent it here, and he was prepared to support that policy in all its details.

MR. RYMAL said he had repeated time and again, that he looked upon an attempt to afford protection to our farmers by taxing cereals as a snare and a delusion, and a fraud. There was not a single article of our cereals grown in Ontario, with the exception of corn, of which we did not produce a surplus, and exported millions, more or less, yearly, to foreign countries. He was sorry that a duty was placed on corn. True, it was said this was a tariff of compensation; that, while the farmer was taxed in a great many directions, he was to be benefitted in certain other directions. The only way in which, by any possibility, the price of farm produce could be raised, was by putting a duty on corn. To the corn-grower of Western Ontario, in the corn-growing belt, that would be a slight advantage, but even in the most highly favoured portions of Ontario, where they grew corn, there were three men who bought to the one who sold. In a portion of his Riding a good deal of corn was grown. He sold all his grain in the city of Hamilton, and he never yet saw a load of corn grown in Canada exposed for sale. When he canvassed his Riding he appealed to the farmers to know whether any of them had ever seen a load of Canadian corn exposed for sale in Hamilton, and they had to answer in the negative. If he went west from his residence, he could come upon a light, warm soil, and find, occasionally, from two to ten-acre fields of corn; but if he went eastward, he would travel over a heavy clay track, and might travel thirty-five miles before he could get altogether, enough corn to make a five-acre field. The soil that might produce an extra good crop of barley, might be entirely unsuited for the growth of corn; but he had never seen any soil that was calculated to grow a good crop of corn, where you could not raise a good crop of barley. They sold their barley at an average of 80c., and bought corn in Hamilton at 50c. It was to their advantage to sell barley and buy corn for feeding purposes. Some of his neighbours, who were dairymen and cattle feeders, told him it would be almost impossible for them to compete with the American farmers, who had cheap corn. Instead of our buying their corn and feeding our cattle with it, they would come and buy our cattle and feed them on their own corn, and, instead of our getting the profits on the animal in the English market, the American farmers would drive this trade and get the profits. He believed the farmers had only one desire, and that was to be let severely alone. The Government did nothing, nor could they do anything, for him. He was, on the contrary, taxed for the benefit of purse-proud manufacturers, who went through our country to-day clothed in purple and fine linen. He knew of manufacturers in Hamilton, millionaires to-day, who, twenty-five years ago, were as poor as he was now. He did not begrudge them a fair share of prosperity, but this tariff could not be held as favourable to any class except the manufacturers. He was amused at the remarks of his hon. friend opposite, who said that oats, in the county of Grey, had gone up 10c. a bushel, and pease 10c. to 15c. a bushel, since the new tariff came in force, and he wondered how people could think of introducing American corn for the purpose of aiding the farmer in the way of feeding stock. He had passed through the hon. gentleman's constituency and had seen crops of oats and pease, but no corn; and surely the hon. gentleman would not say it was possible to feed cattle as cheaply on oats and pease as if he sold his oats and pease and bought corn to feed them on. It seemed strange to him that, in the back markets, the villages of the East Riding of Grey, the price of oats and pease should be higher than in the metropolitan market of the city of Toronto. The two things did not hang together, and the hon. gentleman's clumsy attempt at fastening them, showed he was not a master-hand at tying a knot.

Item agreed to.

On item—Wheat, 15c. per bushel,

MR. RYAN.

MR. HOUDE moved in amendment:

"That the said item be not concurred in, but that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of adopting the following resolution:—Provided always that any time when the Governor-General in Council has reason to believe that the supply of wheat, produced in Canada, will not be equal to the demand for its consumption, then it shall be lawful for the Governor-General, by Order in Council, to reduce or take off the duty on imported wheat, for such period as may be appointed and declared in such Order in Council."

He said he made this motion to meet an emergency not likely to present itself, but which was, nevertheless, possible. We produced already more wheat than we consumed, and we had a fair surplus. It was also probable that, in the future, at least, for many years to come, we should have a still greater excess of production over consumption, in respect to this cereal. However, we could not regulate the quantity of agricultural products, as we could those of manufactures, and we should, therefore, proceed very cautiously in placing duties on that prime necessary of life, and see that we gave protection to the producer without causing the consumer to suffer. An unfavourable season might greatly injure the crops in any year, and it was to meet such an emergency that he made this motion. He thought it was a very reasonable and prudent one, and trusted the Government would accept it. It was entirely in accord with the principle upon which we had advocated the present tariff. We had all along contended that the object of this tariff was not to make the consumer pay more, but to give the producers in every branch a larger market wherein to sell his articles more easily and in greater quantities. We wanted to give, as far as possible, the Canadian market to the Canadian producer. But if it happened at any time that there was a great deficiency in the production, then the import duties would cease having the same reason of existing, and in order to protect the consumers in such a case from being obliged to pay more than a reasonable price for wheat, he made his present motion. It might be objected that the motion tended to deprive the producer of high prices, when crops were short. This was true in a sense, but we must not lose sight of the fact that, he who had wheat to sell, although in a reduced measure, was still in a better position than he who had to buy a prime necessary of life. He trusted the Government and the House would see the justice of this motion, and that it would be adopted.

MR. FISET moved in amendment to the amendment:—

“That all the words after ‘that’ in the said motion, be left out, and the following words substituted instead thereof: ‘the article under Breadstuffs, viz.: Wheat fifteen cents per bushel, be struck off, and transferred to the free list of imported goods.’”

He said that he believed he could show that Canada now imported more wheat than she exported, that was to say as far as the two Provinces of Ontario and Quebec were concerned. We imported, at the present time, 5,625,000 bushels, whilst we exported only 4,341,887, which left a balance of 1,284,000 bushels. These figures were the best answer that could be given to the amendment of the hon. member for Maskinongé. He would, moreover, say that, on account of the peculiar position in which were placed his electors, as well as those of the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure, and even of New Brunswick, he believed it his duty to strongly oppose the proposed duty on wheat. In the county of Rimouski there was, to-day, a population of upwards of 33,000 souls, and out of this number there were hardly 300 or 400 who produced enough wheat for the maintenance of their families. This duty was the most onerous that could be imposed, and it would bear especially on the working class, and on the fishermen, without giving any compensation to the agricultural class.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it would be exceedingly inconvenient, at this stage of the proceedings and at this stage of the Session, to go back into Committee of the Whole, and, therefore, he hoped the mover of the amendment (Mr. Houde) would not press it. If he understood it, it was that the Governor-General in Council might deal with the subject. That was reasonable in itself, and would be given effect to.

MR. HOUDE said he was glad to hear the declaration just made by the right hon. the Prime Minister that the principle of his motion was accepted by the Government, who, when occasion would occur, if it did, would see to realize his suggestion. He was satisfied of that important declaration, and would, therefore, withdraw his motion, so much more that he remarked his seconder had voted for another motion to amend it.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that, before the motion was withdrawn, he desired to congratulate the First Minister on his return to those humanitarian principles which he believed the right hon. gentleman had at the bottom of his heart. But these were not the principles on which the hon. gentleman conducted the late contest, when he was endeavouring to gain the votes of the farmers of Ontario. He held in his hand a report from the hon. gentleman's own organ, of a speech delivered by him in the Eastern Townships, in which he dealt with the very contingency of a scarcity or a failure of crops and the unfortunate consequences falling upon the unfortunate inhabitants of those parts of the country that could not raise grain enough for their own consumption, and this was what the hon. gentleman said :

"In Canada, however, if, by an unfavourable season, the crops are scanty, we are without such resources, and then the farmers of the United States pour in their produce upon us, and we are defenceless. You (the farmers), who, in an ungenial season, might get some recompense for scanty crops in the enhanced prices they would bring, find that hope gone from you. Even the little harvest the storms have left you, you find valueless when the products of the Western States are poured into the markets of the Dominion. Shall we suffer in this way? Shall we not say, Canada is for the Canadians, and protect our markets for ourselves? Shall we not say, If we have a short crop, our own people shall consume it, and pay us a fair price for it; and, if we have a large crop, let us not only have our own markets, but the distant markets of Europe? Let us say to the United States, We allow you to send the products of your country into our market; let us have the same privilege, and send ours to your own."

He congratulated the hon. gentleman that, now he was in power and responsible for the well-being of the people of this country, the humanitarian instincts which he really believed were in the bottom of his heart had so far prevailed that, when there was an ungenial season, when the people were starving, and when, by any possibility, this 15c. could be of the least use to the farmer of Ontario, the hon. gentleman would be willing to repeal it. His consistency was not very great, but as it was in the great cause of humanity, he (Mr. Cartwright) could not find fault with him.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he accepted the congratulations of the hon. gentleman as to his humanitarian instincts, in the same spirit in which he had given them. He had no doubt that the hon. gentleman was gratified to see that he was not utterly lost and so hardened in heart as to allow the people to starve if he could help it. One of the planks in the Conservative platform was that the Government could do something to help the people. That was one of the objects with which they went to the country. They did not say it was out of the power of a Government, or out of the power of a Parliament, to help any industries. They did not say that the Government were merely "flies on the wheel," and that just as the fly was powerless to turn the wheel, so the Government was powerless to help the people.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: You are leeches.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman had sucked the life-blood of the country. The hon. gentleman and his associates with him had depleted the body politic. The pale and languid cheeks of the body politic, the uncertain step of the people of this country, as well as the depressed and dejected spirit shown by the leeches on the other side, in bleeding the country—all this testified to what a state the country was reduced. The Government hoped, by generous treatment, and by generous diet, to restore vigour to a country that had been weakened, depleted and driven almost to a state of despair by the hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman said the Government were humanitarians. Yes, they were humanitarians; and what was the principle of his hon. friend's motion? It was simply this: that, after every farmer in Canada had sold his wheat at a good price, and there was no more wheat left in the country, then they would allow the Americans to come in. That was the principle. Every bushel of wheat would be protected to the extent of 15c. per bushel, until the last Canadian bushel was taken out of the last Canadian granary, and after all the Canadian wheat had been made into Canadian flour, and consumed by the Canadian people, then, if there were a deficiency, the Government would come to the rescue. They would not be "flies on the wheel," they would not view with indifference the suffering people; they would do in Canada as England had done in India, when she had come to the rescue of a people who were deprived of ordinary food by any unfortunate contingency or adverse climatic influences. That was the principle of his hon. friend's motion; that was the principle which common sense, humanity and good government demanded. His hon. friend would find that the farmers of this country would understand it so, that they were protected to the extent of 15c. per bushel so long as they had wheat to sell, and when they had sold their last bushel, then they could not object that the American should send down his first bushel.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had often had occasion to admire the ingenuity with which the hon. gentleman could get himself out of a scrape, but the hon. gentleman had not got out of this scrape yet. The hon. gentleman said now that he only proposed in that speech that, when we had eaten up all the wheat in the country, he would then take care that we should get it without paying duty. But what the hon. gentleman proposed in that speech was this: That he would take advantage of a scarce harvest, by preventing other wheat being brought in; that is, to raise the prices for those who had not enough to eat. That was the point. If the hon. gentleman's explanation now of what he meant then was true, what benefit would it be to any person in the country engaged in wheat raising, if, in a time of bad harvest, foreign wheat was allowed to come in to take the place of that which he had not to sell? There would be no rise of prices under such circumstances, and it was a rise in prices that the hon. gentleman wanted and promised. He wanted to make wheat, the staff of life, dear in time of scarcity. His speech would bear no other interpretation. He (Mr. Mackenzie) granted the hon. gentleman was safe in taking the ground that he was not in earnest, that he was simply making one of his famous political speeches to serve the purpose of the hour, and was now willing to turn his back upon himself to serve another purpose at this hour. It was amusing to witness the political tergiversations of the hon. gentleman from one day to another. The farmers would understand perfectly well that in the Eastern Townships' speech he promised that the farmer should obtain high prices in time of scarcity, and now he would find that he could not carry his own followers from Lower Canada with him for the principle contained in that speech. They would perfectly understand that he was willing to abandon the position he took in the Eastern Townships, and if he had gone back on the position now, it was in order to meet the political exigencies which had arisen in the House to-night.

MR. ORTON said that, having taken some interest in the question of agriculture, he desired to express, to-night, his thorough accord with the sentiments uttered by the Premier. The principle for which the Premier had always contended for, was to give to our farmers the first choice of their own market, but not to starve those in our country who consumed the products of agricultural labour. He believed there was not a farmer in the country who desired that Government should, in a period of extreme scarcity, insist upon having that duty still imposed. When that question was raised in his county, he had stated that he believed such would be the policy of the Government, as he knew the Premier was in sympathy with the people, and that the Government would, in time of scarcity, give a rebate of duty in order to relieve the consumers. He congratulated the Premier upon the noble sentiments he had uttered here to-night.

MR. ANGLIN said the speech of the hon. Premier was amusing in many respects. On that (the Opposition) side of the House they enjoyed it immensely; on the other side of the House, though it had provoked the laughter of hon. members, when they came to reflect upon its meaning, and on what the hon. gentleman from Centre Huron had read, the feeling must become painful. Although it was intensely amusing in its way, it seemed to him a most painful spectacle to see the Premier of this country make such an exhibition as this in the House of Commons of Canada. If he had squarely retreated from the position taken in that speech he made in the Eastern Townships, it would have been creditable to him, personally, whatever charge of inconsistency might otherwise be made against him. Nevertheless, the hon. gentleman would have felt that, in taking that course, he had taken the only proper course for a Prime Minister of this country to adopt. But, after stating that the Government would be prepared to give effect to the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Maskinongé, finding what the effect of that declaration was upon his own side of the House, he seemed to have lost—he (Mr. Anglin) would not call it the cunning—but the skill which had distinguished him on so many occasions, and he then proceeded to make the very extraordinary statement, which must have astonished even his warmest admirers—a statement that the proclamation reducing or removing the duty on wheat would not be issued until the farmers of Canada had sold all the grain they had to sell, at the very highest prices that could be obtained. In this way they would have all the advantages of famine prices, and the consuming public must suffer in the meantime, nay, almost starve, until all the wheat in the country was consumed, and then, forsooth, wheat would be admitted from foreign countries duty free. Was ever so monstrous, so shocking a statement made by any man holding a responsible position? And yet there were found hon. gentlemen in this House ready to applaud and endorse this declaration of their leader, which the hon. gentleman who spoke last declared to be so creditable to the head and heart of the Premier. With regard to the proposition itself, it was exceedingly objectionable in its essence—objectionable because it would place in the hands of the Government of this country a power that no Government should be permitted to wield. They knew that when corn laws existed in England, and a sliding scale was introduced, by which the rate of duty was made to correspond with the price of corn, so that as the price advanced the duty was lowered; and when prices reached a certain figure, the duty was extinguished—not by the will of the Government, but by force of the Statute itself. In any scheme of that kind in our country, a similar sliding scale would be preferable to conferring arbitrary power upon the Government, which, it was fair to assume, some Government might possibly abuse under particular circumstances.

MR. CASEY said that, when he remarked in the general debate on the tariff that the promises of the Government of protection to the farmers were illusive, he had no anticipation that his words would receive such speedy proof at the hands of the Premier himself. Everybody in Ontario was perfectly well aware that the proposition made to the farmers was, that when there was a scarcity, the price of wheat would be raised by the operation of the duty, thus recouping the farmer for short crops, and that was the proposition they had voted for; and now the hon. the Premier declared that, at the very moment that protection began to operate in favour of the farmer, that protection was to be taken away by Order in Council. The only proof of scarcity would be an increase in price. The proposition now made was, therefore, that as soon as the price of wheat began to rise, protection was to be knocked off, and the price of wheat left to be regulated by competition, as it was before. This was the very reverse of the proposition made to the farmers of Ontario, and showed that the promises of the Government were, as the Opposition anticipated, merely illusory.

MR. MACMILLAN said that the statement of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) regarding the promises made by the Government, was without foundation in fact. The Government had appealed to the people of Ontario on the grounds of Protection, and as far as it had been promised to the people of this country, he thought that every hon. member opposite would agree with him, that the hon. Premier and his colleagues had carried out their promises to the very letter. With regard to his own constituency and other constituencies adjoining, though it might not apply to every constituency in the Dominion, he would remark that there were times when it was announced in the newspapers that a certain price could be obtained for grain, and farmers came into the market towns expecting to realize the prices they had seen quoted in the papers. But, in the meantime, operators in grain discovered that, by sending to Chicago, grain could be got, say, 5c. a bushel cheaper, and they immediately brought on a train-load or so; and by the time the farmers got to town with their grain, they found the market broken down by grain brought in from foreign markets. What was the result? Simply that the farmer had to take four or five cents a bushel less than he expected, or else return home with his grain. In either case they were injured very materially by this competition. He believed that the duty proposed would be very beneficial to the farmer in this respect, that it would prevent these operators from breaking down the markets at any time they saw fit. The hon. member for Gloucester seemed delighted and astonished at the various turns that this debate had taken. He (Mr. Macmillan) was extremely astounded at that hon. gentleman being astonished at anything, after occupying the questionable position he did in this House upon occasions not very long gone by. The hon. gentleman should not forget that, not many years ago, he occupied a position in this House after the House had declared upon the evidence of the then Premier, and of the then Minister of Justice, that he had no right to that position. He contended that the promises made by the present Administration had been carried out to the letter, as was evidenced by the satisfaction with which these resolutions had been received in all parts of the country.

MR. MILLS said he supposed that this was a part of that paternal system of Government that Canada was to have in the future. A few days ago they had an Act relating to contagious diseases amongst cattle, and he presumed this resolution to be an Act for the prevention of famine throughout the country. As yet there was no indication that the country was going to be made prosperous by Act of Parliament. Hon. gentlemen would find that when wheat got scarce, the farmers would not be disposed to sell, and a system of compulsion would be necessary. The Government would also find it necessary to impose a fine on those farmers who would not report to them the quantity of grain they had on hand, in order that they might know what the resources of the country were, and what the country had to depend upon. They would find it necessary to go a step further and become themselves the purchasers, and establish Government depôts, in which the wheat might be stored, in order that the Government might know whether there would be a surplus or not. This would be necessary to enable them to fix the price at what they, and the farmers, too, considered a good figure; otherwise they would be unable to determine whether the reduction in the tax should be made by Order in Council or not. It was perfectly clear that this paternal system, once begun, would entail an enormous amount of administrative labour. The proposition of the hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Houde) was a very extraordinary one. Seriously, how was the Government to determine whether or not there was a scarcity or superabundance of wheat in the country? How was it to decide how much reduction should be made? If

hon. gentlemen would look at British legislation during the period when the sliding scale was in force in England, they would find that the Administration had the power to make a reduction just in proportion as the price of wheat increased. It was by the market price of the article that the Administration had to be guided in their action. This proposition would give the Government the power of repealing this tax. It was an arbitrary discretion, which, if sanctioned, placed the power of taxation in the hands of the advisers of the Crown. In the case of a failure of crops in certain districts, the Government of the day could utilise this power to induce the people there or elsewhere to support them. This was a power which he (Mr. Mills) was not disposed to leave in the hands of any Government. He thought the proper function of this House was to restrain this tendency to legislate by Order in Council.

Amendment (Mr. Houde), with leave of the House, withdrawn.

Item agreed to.

On item—Wheat flour, 50c. per barrel,

MR. CARTWRIGHT said this was an item that would require some explanation. The apparent result of this duty of 50c. a barrel on flour, and 15 per cent. a bushel on wheat, would be to throw the grinding of these articles into American hands, which was clearly contrary to the hon. gentleman's apparent intentions. It appeared to him that this duty was against the manufacturers of wheat flour.

MR. TILLEY said he found that during the last year, there were 314,520 barrels of wheat flour imported, against 479,245 exported, and a duty of 50c. per barrel had been imposed on it. The estimated revenue from that and from wheat altogether, was about $30,000. It was very probable that, under the operation of the present tariff, there might be some periods, under peculiar circumstances, when it was just possible in some portions of the Dominion,—for instance British Columbia and the Maritime Provinces,—flour would be imported from the United States, but the opinion entertained by the Government on this point was that there would be little or no flour imported from the United States under this duty. But, from the fact that we had a surplus of both wheat and flour, the estimate of the Government was that that duty would secure, beyond doubt, the market of the Dominion for the products of the Dominion, as far as wheat and flour were concerned. Therefore, it was supposed $30,000 would be the outside revenue received from it. It was not expected to materially increase the value, although it might do so to the extent of 10c. a bushel, or so.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that, in the event of there being a scarcity of wheat in the Dominion, this tariff would discriminate against the Canadian miller. In making a law of this kind, the hon. gentleman ought to provide for such a contingency.

MR. TILLEY said the hon. gentleman knew well that there had been but one year, during a long period, in which there had been a deficiency in Canada. This was not likely to occur again, when they looked at the increasing population of the North-West. He was satisfied there was no probability of a deficiency under any circumstances whatever. Of course, facilities would be given for the manufacture of wheat for export, as was done in 1871, so that foreign wheat could be brought in and manufactured in bond, and shipped from the country in bond. They desired to have the market of the Dominion for the wheat-growers and for the manufacturers.

MR. CARTWRIGHT : That is what you do not do by putting 15c. a bushel on wheat and 50c. a barrel on flour. You give the preference clearly and distinctly to the American manufacturer.

MR. TILLEY : It certainly secures a market for the producers of the Dominion.

MR. CARTWRIGHT : That is certainly what it does not do.

MR. GUTHRIE said that, in years of scarcity, flour would be imported, not wheat. He would like to ask the Finance Minister whether any promise had been made to reduce or alter the duties on wheat and flour. He had heard it stated that, in answer to the millers, the hon. the Finance Minister had said he would reduce the duty on wheat after the Ontario elections were over.

MR. TILLEY : I decline to answer any such question. I could do so most emphatically.

MR. GUTHRIE : If my hon. friend could do it, I should think he would.

MR. TILLEY : I can deny it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : It is a most insulting question, and does not, on account of its nature, demand an answer.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had characterised the question as an insulting one, and yet he had avowed his purpose of altering these duties by Order in Council. His hon. friend asked if a certain promise had been made, which had formed the ground of a rumour all over the country. One thing was certain, a number of millers came here grumbling and went away satisfied. How could the question of his hon. friend be insulting, when the hon. the First Minister had said it was their deliberate intention to reduce these duties by an Order in Council.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman had asked whether a specific promise had been made to millers, other than the proposition submitted to Parliament. The Government was responsible for the proposition made to Parliament, and that answer ought to be accepted as an answer to any such remarks. The question of the hon. gentleman, therefore, was : " Did you make a promise to act at variance, in some way or other, to the proposition you make in Parliament ? "

MR. MACKENZIE : Did not the hon. gentleman claim, a few moments ago that he had the right to do this without an Act of Parliament ?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : The hon. gentleman knows the clause of the Customs Act I referred to. He passed it and is responsible for it.

MR. GUTHRIE said he merely wished to obtain a denial of the rumour from the hon. the Finance Minister.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Hon. gentlemen opposite, in the first place, get up a rumour and then ask if it is correct.

MR. GUTHRIE : That I may characterise as entirely incorrect. It was one of the right hon. gentleman's own political friends that first gave the information.

Several HON. GENTLEMEN : Name.

MR. GUTHRIE : I have no authority to give his name. I, however, am prepared to give his name privately to the right hon. the leader of the Government.

MR. CHRISTIE said he felt it his duty not to allow the tariff, and especially the specific duty upon breadstuffs, to pass with a silent vote, without saying a few words to record his protest against the injustice which was done to the agricultural and working classes in the Province of Quebec ; for he was fully convinced that the adoption of this policy would be disastrous to the interests of the whole Dominion, and doubly so to the Province of Quebec, and the county which he had the honour to represent. It would impose additional burdens upon them without any compensating advantages. It would cause them to pay more for every article they required, while the protection offered them on breadstuffs and live stock was only a delusion and a sham. His constituents depended in a great measure upon stock and dairy farming. They found it more profitable to make butter and cheese, and raise cattle, sheep, and horses, and grow coarse grains, than to grow wheat and corn. They did not grow enough of these grains for their own consumption. They required to import upwards of a million of bushels of wheat, and an equal quantity of corn annually ; and in his county they imported upwards of ten thousand barrels of flour, and a large quantity of corn. Now, to impose a duty of 15c. per bushel upon wheat, and 50c. per barrel upon flour, and 7½c. upon corn, was the most unwise and suicidal policy which could be adopted. It meant a tax of six or eight thousand dollars annually to his constituents on these articles alone, and that under the guise and pretext of Protection to the farmer. That was the boon which was held out to them as an equivalent for the increased duties imposed by the tariff, and the increased prices which would inevitably have to be paid for cottons, woollens, groceries and hardware. It was like lighting a candle at both ends—taxing, on the one hand, all manufactured goods ; and, to balance that, taxing, on the other hand, wheat and flour, which most of the people had to buy. It was quite evident that the interests of the farmers and working classes in the Province of Quebec had been sacrificed. They would be heavily taxed ; millions of dollars would be filched from their pockets, not for the purposes of revenue—of that he would not complain—but for the purpose of bolstering up other industries from which they would derive very little benefit. He desired to record his protest against the great injustice done his constituents by the imposition of these enormous duties under the new tariff.

MR. CAMERON said the duty on flour ought either to be raised to 67c. a barrel, or the duty on wheat ought to be reduced to 10c. a bushel. He could not see how the two proposed duties could be reconciled.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said that, under this tariff, the duty on wheat would be inoperative. It took 4½ bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : No ; four bushels and five pounds.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said that would be 62½c., or a discrimination of 12½c. against the miller. He maintained that this duty would not increase the price of wheat, except in a year of scarcity, and it was a knowledge of this fact that satisfied the millers. This tariff, however, necessitated a bonding system, and that would enhance the rates of transportation, which must come out of the farmers' pocket, and if over-production was to lower prices, the farmer and the manufacturer would have to take lower prices than the present. There was only one way of protecting the farmer, that was by giving him a direct bonus or a drawback on his products. Why should not the farmer receive that protection, if they desired to benefit him? He should have a drawback on the Indian corn used for feeding his cattle for the English market, and on his agricultural implements, on the same principle as the shipbuilder received a drawback on vessels sold abroad. Over-production would bring down prices, and Protection produced that, according to the logic of hon. gentlemen opposite.

MR. HILLIARD said that, as he was a miller himself, he approved of the duty of 15c. on wheat, which was quite consistent with the duty of 50c. per barrel on flour. The duty on wheat would keep out of the Canadian market lower grades of American wheat, which displaced so much of the better qualities of the Canadian wheat. This country had been overstocked with inferior grades of American flour. They (the Americans) made three grades of flour, the high grade, suitable only to their own market, and out of which they did a profitable business. The lower grades could then be sold in Canada. If they made no profit on the lower the profit on the higher maintained the business. They had not stood, therefore, on a fair footing with the Americans. The 15c. duty on wheat would keep their second quality out of Canada and secure its markets for its own farmers. It was Protection to the farmer to prevent Canadians from being driven to a foreign market, a fluctuating market, with their wheat, a market up to-day and down to-morrow, being open to wheat from the whole world. The American duty, 20 per cent. on flour, gave the American miller an advantage over the Canadian miller, the Canadian millers having no market of their own for the extra class of flour, owing to the shutting of the American market against them. There was no inducement to procure an extra good quality of machinery. The Canadian miller was obliged to confine himself to the grade of flour this market demanded. The Government would be wise in adopting a 15c. duty on wheat. It was said it took four and a-half bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour. With fair wheat and fair machinery their mills could make a barrel of flour from every four bushels and five pounds; and having the offal free of duty, he considered 15c. a bushel on American wheat quite consistent, and equal to 50c. a barrel on flour.

MR. VALLÉE moved in amendment:

"That it is not expedient, in the public interest, to impose a tax of 50c. a barrel upon wheat flour, imported into this country, and that that article should be placed upon the list of commodities imported into Canada free of duty."

He said that in moving this motion he was fulfilling a promise made to his electors, and he believed that he was acting in the interest of the county he represented and of the district to which he belonged. The importation of flour into the Province of Quebec was very considerable. It was not only an article of local consumption, but it likewise constituted an important export trade. The National Policy should not suppress everything at one stroke. In certain respects, this policy should be applied by degrees during the period required for the establishment of new industries; regard must be had for certain classes. In his county, little wheat was produced, and there was a class of persons who earned their livelihood by navigation. A duty on flour would bear very heavily on his constituents. The men engaged in navigation would be deprived of a part of their transport trade without any equivalent compensation. He would be answered that it was necessary to make sacrifices in the general interest. He was ready to admit the principle if it were logically and impartially applied. Quebec's share of sacrifices in favour of the Dominion was a little larger than it was necessary it should be. If the concession he asked for in favour of his Province, and his county were granted, he would be able to show that it would be but a simple act of justice to Quebec, and that the interests of the other Provinces would not suffer in the least. But he would leave to hon. members the appreciation of his motion, and of their duty towards their electors. He did not wish to make any appeal nor claim any sympathy for the vast interests he was defending. The question had been exhaustively examined by all the members of the House, and every one had, no doubt, long since made up his mind.

MR. CASGRAIN said that he opposed this duty of 50c. per barrel on flour in the name of his county in particular, and in the name of the Province of Quebec in general. It was well known that in the Province of Quebec the yield of wheat had been very small for a number of years, and that in consequence thereof the importation of wheat and flour into that Province had become an absolute necessity, and this duty would bear especially on the poor man's family. That was why he opposed this duty with all his strength, being certain of the support of all the French-Canadians in the Province of Quebec. The putting on of a duty on flour, and thereby on bread, was certainly going to take away from the poor man a part of his sustenance, and his ordinary food; that was to say, that he would have to give to the State his tenth or twelfth loaf, according to the price of flour. In stating this, he but echoed public sentiment from one end to the other of the Province of Quebec, that repudiates this unjust taxation. He said that his voice would find an echo from the sources of the Ottawa to the shores of Gaspé, and in the humble thatched-roofed cottage as well as on board the fisherman's boat in the Gulf. He made this statement, and time would tell that he was right. It had been said that this duty of 50c. would not increase the price of flour. He had satisfied himself, a few days ago, that the merchants in the county of L'Islet had raised the price of flour 50c. per barrel. The Province of Quebec had to support, without any equivalent, the duty on wheat and flour in favour of the Upper Province, and the duty on coal in favour of the Lower Provinces. That was what was called Protection.

MR. LARUE said that he was not surprised to see the hon. member for Portneuf take such a determined stand with regard to this question, nor was he astonished at the support that was given him by several of his friends, who, like the hon. member for Portneuf, had been elected by the Conservative party in order to favour the establishment in this country of a Protective tariff. The stand taken by the hon. member for Portneuf clearly demonstrated that it would be difficult for the Conservative party of the other Provinces to agree with the same party in the Province of Quebec. As had been justly said by the hon. member for L'Islet, this was a vital question for the Province of Quebec, and all the French-Canadian members knew to what an extent this question interested their constituents. He well understood why the hon. member for Portneuf felt himself obliged to separate from the hon. leader of the Government on this question of a duty on flour. It had already been remarked that the partisans of Protection had been, even during the late general elections, unfaithful to the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. He was inclined to believe that the hon. member for Portneuf had made the same promises to his constituents as the candidate who opposed him (Mr. LaRue) had made in the county that he had the honour of representing. That was to say that, while he proclaimed himself the champion of Protection, he solemnly bound himself, in every parish of the county, to resist any attempt to raise the duty on flour. He thought it his duty, in his own interest, and in the interest of the Liberal party, to which he belonged, to state that the amendment that had just been presented by the hon. member for Portneuf, had been taken from the Liberal party, he would even venture to say, with the permission of his hon. friend, that it had been. For the hon. member for L'Islet, had already risen to propose a similar amendment, which he had the honour of seconding, but he had not been able to move it because another member had got the floor before he had. It was, therefore, only by accident that the hon. member for Portneuf had taken the initiative in this matter. But it must not be supposed that the Liberals were vexed at seeing the friends of the hon. the Premier take the lead, and move motions of want of confidence in the Government. That was a formal proof of the justice of the Liberal cause, and the confirmation of the words and acts of the Liberal party during the late election. Upon the details of the tariff, as well as upon the tariff as a whole, he took pleasure in voting against the Government, so much the more so as all these questions had been thoroughly discussed before the electors of the county of Bellechasse, that he had the honour of representing, and he had been elected by a majority opposed to the protection that was now being given to the country. Let not the hon. the Prime Minister be astonished at the desertion of his soldiers of the Province of Quebec; he would have several other opportunities of seeing them vote against his policy, for it was unfavourable to the interests of the Province of Quebec. He did not wish to take up any longer the time of this House, and he would conclude by warning the hon. the leader of the Conservative party that there still existed independent men in the Province of Quebec, and that these men would ever be ready to protest and rise up against his measures as often as they were opposed to the dearest interests of their Province.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he could sympathise with his friends who had just spoken in French, and with the member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain), who had spoken for his party. He was sorry that the action of the Government should make Quebec suffer so much; the people were going to be taxed on their flour and bread, the staff of life. But if the hon. gentlemen opposite had consulted their leader, the hon. member for Lambton, he would have told them that, no matter what the duty on wheat or flour, it would not increase the price. It was evident that those gentlemen did not coincide with their political or financial leader (Mr. Cartwright), but had struck out a new course of their own. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) could give them some little consolation, and a remedy for all the great evil they feared—that was, to use no American flour, paying 50c. a barrel, but eat Canadian flour, on which there was no tax.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. the Premier had promised the millers and farmers protection, and the Ministers of Public Works and Finance, in their respective Provinces, stated that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had proved conclusively, and, therefore, to their satisfaction, that the duty on flour would not increase its price to the non-producers. Notwithstanding that those hon. gentlemen and their leader now wanted the people of the West—who were interested in the manufacture of flour—that the price would be increased for them by the duty put on foreign flour. Either they believed it or did not. If they believed it, then they were honest in putting the duty on to increase the price of flour for those who produced it, and if it did so it must increase the price for those who consumed it. His opinion had nothing to do in the matter. He still held the opinion he formerly expressed, but he said also that, while that was the case on the general line of travel and freight, through the country, it would increase the prices more where the markets required to be supplied from other sources—that was chiefly on the eastern coasts of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. He was glad to hear the hon. the Finance Minister was compelled to advance his views two nights ago, although he had passed, to-night, another item which would compel the people on those same coasts to purchase tea at Montreal, that they were now allowed to purchase in Boston or New York. His hon. friends from Quebec—where the people were obliged to purchase their flour, not growing enough wheat—believed the duty would raise the prices, as did also the millers. The Government, in submitting the tariff must, if honest, have acted on their own convictions and belief, and not those of anybody else, and the duties must express their real convictions.

MR. GIGAULT said he did not want to go back to his constituents without having fulfilled the promise he made them in regard to Protection, and, to do so, a general system of Protection must be adopted. He wanted to be practical, and if such amendments were made by the members from one section, those from others would demand amendments agreeable to them, and so, at last, they would have nothing of that Protective tariff for which they had fought. The opponents of the tariff did not agree among themselves as to the nature and effects of the duties. He believed that the greater part, if not the whole, of the duty on flour would be paid by the American producer, and not by the Canadian consumer. They argued that part of the duty on wheat would not be paid by the American producer, being thus in contradiction with their own principles when they sent the Hon. George Brown to Washington to secure a Reciprocity Treaty. If the duty on Canadian grain going to the States was not injurious to the Canadian producer, why did they try to obtain its removal? This tariff aimed at securing the home market for Canadian farm produce. If members from Quebec opposed the duty on wheat, members from Ontario might resist those on corn, barley and coal, to the defeat of the Protective party voted for in September last. The amount of duties taken off breadstuffs would have to be placed on other articles, such as tea, molasses, and other goods we did not produce, duties that we pay at a pure loss without drawing any advantage therefrom, while duties for foreign articles that we can produce or manufacture here, give the double advantage of giving a revenue to the country, and the choice to the Canadian producer of selling his products with more facility, or at more remunerative prices.

MR. HOUDE said that, since the hon. members for Portneuf, L'Islet and Bellechasse had seen fit to speak in the name of the Province of Quebec, and to declare that all the representatives of that Province who were devoted to its interests should vote for the motion of the hon. member for Portneuf, he thought it his duty, seeing that he was going to vote against this motion, to briefly explain his reasons for so doing. He trusted that his friends would believe that he was as sincere as they were in the different course he proposed to take. For his part, he did not question their sincerity, although he did not hold the same opinions as they did on this point. The hon. member for Portneuf, in giving the grounds for his motion, had stated that the Province of Quebec was obliged to purchase large quantities of wheat and flour because there was not enough of these articles produced for local consumption. That was true; but the Province of Ontario, together with the rest of the Dominion, produced a great deal more than the whole country could consume, and, in reality, there would be no duty on wheat and flour. And, if he had well understood the second part of the argument made use of by his hon. friend, he had said that the Province of Quebec exported considerable quantities of flour and wheat that were brought into the country from the Western States of the neighbouring Republic, and that, if the proposed duty was put on, this export trade would be stopped. The hon. member seemed not to have read, or to have forgotten, that clause of the new tariff which clearly left to traders the same liberty as they had heretofore enjoyed of importing wheat in bond without paying one cent of duty, and of exporting it either as it had been brought in or turned into flour. It was quite true that, in the Province of Quebec, there was not enough wheat grown for local consumption; but it was not true, as the hon. member for Lambton had stated, that there was none grown there at all. On the contrary, especially within the last few years since the disappearance of the weevil, which for a long time had done much harm to the whole crop, there were considerable quantities of wheat grown in the Province of Quebec. There were even a great many farmers who grew more than they required for home consumption, and who sold more or less of this grain. It was to be hoped that this progress would not stay there. But whilst he would admit that the Province of Quebec did not yet grow wheat in sufficient quantity, it must be borne in mind that it did not cost any more to bring the wheat and flour that was needed from the Province of Ontario than it did to import it from Michigan or Minnesota. He saw by the returns of commerce and navigation for the last fiscal year, that Canada had sold to other countries 2,967,432 bushels of wheat, and 170,725 barrels of flour, which was equivalent to 3,693,013 bushels more than was bought. With such a production, equal to a surplus of six bushels for each family throughout the Dominion, was an import duty of 50c. a barrel on American wheat going necessarily to make the Canadian people pay dearer for their bread? Evidently not. Hon. members of the left had said, ironically, "hear! hear!" when his hon. friend the member for Rouville had maintained that, in certain cases, it was the foreign producer who paid the Customs duties. If they had taken the pains of reflecting a moment, and of studying the laws that really govern trade, they would have known that it was not always the consumer who paid the import duties established by the Government of the country in which he lived. Import duties were paid by the consumer when the foreign article upon which a duty was laid was not produced in the country. But when there was a surplus of the article in the home market, the foreign exporter who wished to come there and sell the same article, was obliged to submit to the prices established by home competition, and, in that case, it was he and not the consumer who paid the Customs duties. When the difference between the offer and the demand—between the stock and the requirements—varied, it might happen that the producer and the consumer would both have to pay a part of the Customs duties. But with regard to the import duty on foreign wheat and flour, he maintained that it would not raise the price of bread in this country as long as there was a considerable surplus of this grain in Canada, as there was at the present time, and as there probably would be in the future; and he was happy to be able to agree, at least on this point, with the hon. the leader of the Opposition. As the hon. member for Rouville had remarked, hon. members should judge of the merits of this new tariff as a whole, and not endeavour to pick it to pieces in detail, under pretext of protecting local interests. For instance, if hon. members from Ontario refused protection on oats, would anything be gained by that? Most assuredly not. The country at large would lose as much by impoverishing the Province of Quebec as it would lose by impoverishing the Province of Ontario. The Province of Quebec, instead of buying her flour from the United States, would buy it from the Province of Ontario, who, in turn, would purchase from the Province of Quebec the oats that she had hitherto imported from the United States; these neither would pay any duty, as there was a surplus in Canada of these two articles, as well as all other agricultural produce, except Indian corn. Already this advantageous exchange had begun. For instance, he read in the Daily Evening Review, of Peterborough, Ontario, of the 15th inst. :

"In consequence of the National Policy, Cluxton has already brought two loads of oats from Lower Canada to Peterborough, and Mr. Dundas is doing the same thing at Lindsay. Since the duty has been imposed, oats can be laid down in Peterborough cheaper from Quebec than from Chicago, thus enhancing the value of Ontario oats, increasing the demand for Quebec oats, and providing return freight, a very important thing for our railways."

The hon. members for Portneuf, L'Islet, and Bellechasse had said that it was against the interests of the country to vote for an impost duty on wheat and flour, because the consumer would have to pay for these necessaries of life dearer. The price of these articles might rise, but it would be on account of their scarcity on the foreign markets, especially the Liverpool market, and not on account of the adoption of this tariff, for wheat and flour would be subject to the same fluctuations if this tariff was not adopted. The new tariff had been in force for more than a month, and the price of wheat, which, as everyone knew, determined the price of flour and bread, was, to-day, lower at Montreal and at Toronto than at New York and at Boston. This would show that his friends, of whom he had just spoken, had grounded their assertions upon a theory that was neither supported nor justified by facts. He held in his hand this morning's issue of a paper that published, in its commercial review, the prices of wheat at New York and Toronto, and he found that the same quality of ordinary spring wheat was selling, the day previous, 8c. per bushel cheaper at Toronto than at New York. That was far from showing that the new tariff would cause a rise of 15c. per bushel in wheat, as well as a rise in flour and bread, for the reason already given, that the production of these articles greatly exceeded the wants of the country. These facts were the best answer that could be given to the theory maintained by the hon. members for Portneuf, L'Islet and Bellechasse. But, even supposing that a part of the population of Lower Canada had to pay a little more for their wheat and flour, on account of the new tariff, they would not complain, for they would find a compensation in the protection given to the industries of the country, and to the other agricultural products, such as animals, butter, cheese, oats, barley, pease, etc. He could understand the action taken by the hon. members for L'Islet and Belle-chasse, because their aim was to destroy the Protective tariff if they could; but he had more difficulty in understanding the action of the hon. member for Portneuf, who, like all the other hon. members of the right, was elected on a Protectionist platform, and who now refused to grant protection to one of the main products of Canada. What would happen if the Conservative members of each section of the country adopted the same line of conduct, and refused protection to articles that were not produced in their respective localities, but were produced in other parts of the country? They would be destroying their own work; they would not be carrying out the policy with which they had gone before the people, and with which they had won the general elections on the 17th September last. For those reasons he could not approve of the proposition made by his hon. friend from Pontneuf, which motion, although it might seem, at first sight, to favour the interests of the people, had, in reality, a tendency to strike at the foundations of the National Policy, which was destined to give bread to many families who were, to-day, in need, by giving them the means of earning the price of it more easily.

MR. PLUMB said he fully endorsed the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Rouville, who had effectively replied to those gentlemen on the opposite side who insisted that the producer paid the duty. That hon. gentlemen asked why the great chief of the party now in Opposition wrote to Washington to obtain a renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty in 1874, and why he offered to make such sacrifices to obtain reciprocity in agricultural products. It was the avowed object of all the negotiations which took place at Washington, from the time of Lord Elgin until the last futile attempt was made by the gentleman who was the dictator of the party, was to procure the admission of our natural products into the United States free of duty. The Hon. Mr. Brown, who had denounced the sending of commissioners by the previous Government, on the same errand, either was appointed, or appointed himself, sole plenipotentiary, and hurried to Washington in the autumn of 1874. There had been no indications on the part of the people of Canada that this mission was in accordance with their wishes. On the contrary, he, himself, had very violently objected to the initiative being taken by Canada in any attempt at renewing the lapsed treaty. What did that gentleman do? In the first place, he proposed reciprocity in agricultural products. Not being able to secure that, he made one concession after another, until the loss of revenue to this country in the articles he proposed to receive free of duty would have reached $2,300,000 for the year 1874, and these articles would have come into direct and probably crushing competition with our manufactures of cotton, of edge tools, and of agricultural machinery and implements. Basing the calculations on the exports for that year, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, he also offered to expend, immediately, large sums in building and enlarging our canals, to give up the fishery claim, and to concede the free navigation of our rivers and canals. For what did he make these reckless offers? Was it not to relieve our farmers, who he took under his special care, from the heavy duties levied by the United States upon the products which we exported to that country? Now, if, as gentlemen opposite constantly assert, the consumer always pays the duty, why did Mr. Brown offer to make such enormous, such humiliating concessions for the purpose of obtaining access to a market which, according to the Free-trade dogma, we have already at the cost of the consumer? The member for Bothwell constantly repeats that the consumer pays the 15c. a bushel on barley, the 20c. a bushel on wheat, the 15c. a bushel on potatoes, the 10c. a bushel on oats, the 20 per cent. ad valorem on horses, that must be paid upon crossing the frontier to seek our neighbour's market. He (Mr. Plumb) would not like to be placed in the position in which the friends of that great Reformer, who had offered to the United States everything except our nationality to secure reciprocity, had placed him. He was surprised to find what little confidence hon. gentlemen opposite had in the intelligence of the people, and how much less confidence the people had in them. For the last twenty-five years the Globe, the chief organ of those gentlemen, had almost the sole circulation among the agricultural population of Ontario. He fancied the agricultural population had found out the Globe newspaper at last. It could not control public opinion. The people had supported, and would support, the party that promised little and performed much, rather than the self-styled Reformers, who promised everything and did nothing.

Mr. VALIN said that he had resolved not to take any part in this discussion on the duty upon flour, but he could not refrain from alluding to the fact, that the conduct of the hon. member for Portneuf was in contradiction with the opinion expressed by his journal, Le Courrier du Canada. He must state that a great many persons in the Province of Quebec were not in favour of this duty on flour. He would be opposed to it himself if there were no compensation. But the farmers in the agricultural counties had a compensation in the duty on other grains, such as peas, buckwheat, barley, etc. All that he wanted was to give the working classes the means of buying bread. He was one of those who endeavoured to give the people the means of paying for their bread. He was one of those who tried to give the people work, not only in his own county, but throughout the whole Province. He had their interests at heart, and he deplored their present destitute condition. For the workingman it was no trifle to pay a duty of 50c. per barrel on flour when he had already to buy his flour from five to six dollars a barrel. For the mechanic without work, two dollars were too much; means of earning his bread must, therefore, be given him. He would now quote what the Courrier du Canada, of the 14th inst., had said on the subject:

"Since the adoption of the tariff a new era has been commenced for Canada. In the Province of Ontario the effect has been instantaneous; many new industries have sprung up as by enchantment. The same may be said of the district of Montreal. At Quebec the progress is slower. Too much attention is paid to blue and red, and not enough to serious matters. Now is the time to profit by the advantages that the National Policy offers instead of wasting our time discussing two or three items of the tariff that are less favorable to us than others.

"We hope that our farmers, who are now protected against American competition, will improve their land in order to grow wheat.

MR. PLUMB.

We have rye, barley and oats in abundance; we do not harvest quite enough wheat. However, in this respect, there has been a great improvement within the last few years, and we would not be surprised to see by the next Census that the Province of Quebec grows more wheat than is required for local consumption. It is important that our agricultural classes should neglect nothing, in order to increase their own wealth and the general prosperity of the country.

"With a little good will, intelligent labour, and wise, prudent economy, the farmer can increase his harvest and procure at home all the necessaries of life. Let him buy less from the merchant, the shopkeeper, and let him apply to the production on his own farm of all that he requires, and he will soon be on the road to comfort, competency, and sometimes to fortune."

If, on the 14th, which was not so very far off, it was well to protect the farmer by putting a duty on wheat and flour, he could not see why it should be otherwise to-day. It was true that the hon. member for Portneuf had voted against the duty on wheat, but a moment afterwards he had voted against placing wheat on the free list. Le Courrier went on to say:

"The workingman is going to see the employment and the good wages of former times come back. Let us hope that the destitution that has been enduring, will have taught him to economise during the years of plenty, in order not to be in need during the years of want.

"Those we believe are useful observations that everyone may put to account. Let the people go earnestly to work, and let everyone, without wasting his time criticising at random a policy destined to bring about a revolution in the economy of the country, turn this policy to the best advantage he can.

"Commerce itself is organising on a new basis. The repeal of the present Insolvency Act will put an end to unhealthy speculation, protect the honest merchant, and indirectly favour the purchaser. Business will be conducted with more prudence and economy; a solid, lasting, and prosperous state of things will result therefrom.

"Thus equilibrium will be restored everywhere, and the disastrous effects of the crises that we have been undergoing will rapidly disappear.

"We have a rich country, if we only know how to profit by the advantages it offers us.

"It is for all of us, farmers, workingmen, merchants, manufacturers, etc., to take wise and energetic resolutions, to go to work and to practise economy and, in a few years, the face of the country will be changed. Instead of an impoverished population, as we have to-day, the people of Canada will then be rich and prosperous."

He would ask what was dearth if it was not the want of bread! For the workingman, need was the want of work, for when he had no work he was always in need. It was therefore necessary to give the workingman employment, and this could be done by protecting the industries of the country. How could the Government procure employment for the workingman if they had no revenue? This revenue could not be obtained without laying duties upon all products that came from abroad, including wheat and flour. Quebec would be very glad to see the works that the Government intended carrying out in the harbour begin, but how could the Government carry on these works without money? If the workingmen have employment, that will be their compensation for the proposed duty on wheat and flour, and, instead of complaining, they would rejoice.

MR. LANDRY said that it was impossible for him to give a silent vote upon the motion now before the Chair. The House had witnessed the great joy that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. LaRue) had not been able to contain. What had been the cause of this sudden and almost noisy manifestation? The hon. member made no secret of it; it was, he said, the spectacle offered to him by several members belonging to the Conservative party, who were deserting their flag and betraying their leader. He protested against this appreciation of the conduct of these members and of the motives that actuated them. They were not betraying either their party or their leaders, and that was what he would endeavour to show. What had been heard a few moments previous? The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) had told the House that, in voting against the amendment of the hon. member for Portneuf, and in favour of the proposed duty on flour, he was only doing his duty and fulfilling the promises that he had made to the electors of his county. This frank statement had brought down the applause of the House. He would not for a moment doubt but that the same approbation would be given him when he would tell the House that, in voting for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Portneuf, he was only doing his duty and fulfilling the promises he had publicly given to the electors of his county. When he had presented himself as a candidate in the county of Montmagny at the late general elections, when he had discussed before the people this great National Policy of Protection, the question of putting a duty on wheat and flour had naturally presented itself for a solution. He would not seek to hide the statements he had then made. He had promised, before public meetings, that if ever he was asked to place a duty on wheat and flour, he would vote against the putting on of such a duty. He had not taken this determined stand with the intention of striking at the foundation of the National Policy, for which he had fought, and which he was still defending. Such had never been his intention, nor that of his friends; to make use of an expression employed by the hon. member for Maskinongé, they were not such sappers as that. But what was the stand they had taken? They had advocated Protection during the election, and their opponents had answered them by saying that by Protection the Conservatives meant an increased duty on the necessaries of life, on the flour, the wheat, the bread of the people. And in support of this statement, they referred to the motion made on the 2nd of April, last year, by Mr. Brown, and the position taken by the leader of the Conservative party, who, on the 9th of April, supported the views of Mr. Brown, and voted for this motion, which aimed at nothing less than the putting on of a duty on wheat and flour. He would quote:

"Mr. Brown moved in amendment, That all the words after 'that,' to the end of the motion be struck out and replaced by the following:—That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved, That, seeing that a large quantity of wheat and flour has been imported into Canada within the last five years, this House is of opinion that the placing of a duty on these articles would be beneficial to the farmers of Canada."

The answer that he and his friends had given was easy. They had pointed out to the people, in the journals of the House, what had been the position taken on this question by the representatives of the Province of Quebec, by the leaders of the Conservative party, inside and outside of the House. These votes were still there. Only twenty-eight members had asked for this duty. One hundred and forty-eight had rejected it. Among the twenty-eight who had asked for this duty, there could not be found a single representative of the Province of Quebec, and only two of the hon. members now occupying the Treasury benches. All the representatives of the Province of Quebec, without distinction of party, and what was more, those who were then and now the leaders of the Conservative party, had publicly, by a unanimous vote, declared in the most formal and solemn manner, that they were opposed to placing any duty on wheat and flour. What, he would ask, had they (Mr. Landry, and his friends) done? They had followed in the footsteps of those who had gone before them. Having before their eyes the action taken by their leaders, they had not thought it impossible to promise to their electors that they would follow the course pursued by these friends of the people, and imprudently, perhaps, but at all events, in the best of good faith, they had sincerely given their word to vote against the duty that they were now asked to place upon flour. Should they now keep their word and fulfil the promises freely made to the electors of their counties? For his part there was no possibility of a doubt, and whatever might be the regret that he experienced in separating from his friends he considered that under the circumstances, he was in honour bound to do so. He would, therefore, vote for the amendment and against the placing of a duty on flour, as he had voted a few moments before against the placing of a duty on wheat. He remarked that two of the friends of those who were opposed to this duty had taken upon themselves to shoot harmless arrows at their (Mr. Landry and his friends' heads. If they (Mr. Landry and his friends) had not been wounded, they should not, at least, overlook the fact that their assailants had been actuated with the best of intentions. The hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Houde) had called the motion they were supporting a "hollow theory," and a "measure that struck at the very foundation of the great National Policy." In the mouth of the hon. member these words were somewhat astonishing. Within the space of a few hours only, his conduct and his words presented the spectacle of the most complete disagreement. Who had been the first in the House to move an amendment to the policy of the Government? Who had been the first in the House to move an amendment to the policy of the Government since the details of this policy were under consideration? Why, it was the hon. member for Maskinongé himself. Was not his amendment, if not a "hollow theory," at least a "measure that struck at the very foundations of the great National Policy?" He asked for fair play, and, since the member for Maskinongé had seen fit to attack the policy of the Government, by the amendment that he had moved, he ought to allow others to fulfil in the House the promises they had made to their electors, and he ought also to remember that those who live in glass houses should not throw stones. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Valin) had also endeavoured to find the hon. member for Portneuf at fault. By what means? He had merely read a few extracts from the Courrier du Canada. That was the stone he had thrown, and it was needless to say that it had not wounded anybody. The hon. member for Montmorency had forgotten two things: first, to prove that the hon. member for Portneuf was the author of the articles in question; and, in the second place, that these same articles could in no way be applied to the question now before the House. As a matter of fact, these articles mentioned only wheat. That question was settled, and they said nothing of flour, a question yet to be settled. A little more attention would certainly have prevented the hon. member for Montmorency from shooting such harmless arrows at his friends. Such proceedings were not calculated to convince hon. members that they should trample their promises under foot. He would vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Portneuf and against the placing of a duty on flour.

MR. DUGAS said the National Policy operated in a manner which tended not only to increase the revenue of the country, but also to foster our manufacturing, mining and agricultural interests. It was the duty of a wise Government, when the country was on the verge of ruin and starvation, to legislate so as to alleviate the sufferings of the people, and relieve the distress under which the country laboured. This fact was pointed out to the ex-Minister of Finance by the Prime Minister of the day, but his opinion was that, as the general elections were soon to take place, it should be left to the people to decide whether the adoption of a Protective policy would be favourable to the interests of the country. How was it that these gentlemen, after having left the question to the decision of the people, should make factious opposition to the Government, which, in their wisdom, had taken means to relieve the condition of the country. As the hon. the ex-Prime Minister stated the other day, he was speaking of the country, which he wanted to render averse to the adoption of this policy. It was well known that those hon. gentlemen who now opposed this tariff, had, on many occasions previously, declared themselves in favour of Protection. The hon. the ex-Prime Minister had, on a certain occasion, expressed himself in public in favour of Protection. The ex-Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Laurier), in a speech in the Legislative Assembly of Quebec, of which he was then a member, declared himself in favour of Protection, and stated it was the only remedy for the distress which prevailed throughout the country; and how was it when that gentleman had been chosen a leader of the country, he did not apply that remedy? The great nations of Europe, such as France, England and Germany, owed their riches and prosperity to the adoption of this system of Protection; and why should we, a young country that needed protection, as a child in the cradle needed the protection of its mother, not adopt this new fiscal policy which had made other countries so prosperous? We had a precedent in our own country. In 1859, the tariff was raised from 15 to 25 per cent. What was the result? Notwithstanding the prediction of the Liberal party, who pretended that the revenue of the country would decrease in proportion to the increase of the tariff, the increase of the revenue was over one and a half million dollars. He was sorry that certain hon. members from Quebec, belonging to the Conservative party, had, through a spirit of egotism, thought fit to submit amendments to the tariff so ably framed by the Minister of Finance. The hon. members of this House had not been elected to protect only the rights of the Province of Quebec, but the rights of the whole Dominion. The hon. the Minister of Finance, in framing this new tariff, had protected the rights and interests of every Province, and mutual concession must be made in order to adopt this policy. He declared himself in favour of this policy which, he believed, commended itself to the approbation of hon. members of this House and of the majority of the people.

MR. FORTIN said he could not give a silent vote on this amendment. If the price of flour would be increased by the National Policy, the county of Gaspé would be one of the greatest sufferers of any county in the Dominion, but he did not believe it would have this effect. He would not go over the arguments that had been so ably brought forward by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault). Why, asked that hon. gentleman, did the Liberal party send an ambassador to the United States to offer the greatest concessions that could be given, including not only the right to American fishermen to fish in our waters, but the fishery award as well, amounting to five and a-half million dollars, in order to induce the United States Government to abolish, among other duties on Canadian produce, the duty on wheat and grain from Canada? If our farmers suffered so much by that duty, then the American farmers would lose by this new tariff on the grain and flour they sent to Canada. The duty would fall upon them, and the price of wheat or flour would not be raised in Canada on account of that duty. He (Mr. Fortin) adopted the National Policy in its entirety. He had always been in favour of Protection, for not only one industry, but for every industry. For the last five years, under the policy of the late Government, they had seen poverty everywhere, in the country and in the towns. Formerly, the fishermen of Gaspé and Bonaventure, and the other parts of the Province of Quebec, could find a ready market in Quebec; from 50 to 100 vessels came up annually with fish and oil, which they readily sold in Quebec and in Montreal, and brought back goods and provisions for the winter, while, last year, but a dozen or so of vessels came, because they knew they had no longer a market there for their fish and oil, as there was no work or industries carried on, and money was consequently scarce. The people of Quebec and Montreal were poverty-stricken, and the result was that the people along the Maritime coast suffered equally. He (Mr. Fortin) would vote against the amendment, and he had voted before in the same way. He was in favour of Protection to the fishermen and mariners. He had asked from the Government Protection for these two important classes, and could not, consequently, refuse Protection to the operative, manufacturing, and agricultural classes. He would give his vote in a spirit of justice and equity. He would vote in favour of the tariff that would give justice, and help every class of society. If the policy of the late Government when they sent an ambassador to the United States, had been successful, what would have been the result? We would have been short of five and a-half million dollars, the amount of the fishery award, the loss of which would fall principally upon our fishermen, as he expected the Government would apply this amount, or at least the interest, to repair the damage and injury caused by the use of our fisheries by the Americans. The maritime population would not blame him for supporting a policy which would protect their interests and give them a market. Everybody knew the fishermen of the Province of Quebec had two markets, the foreign and the home market. The products of the spring and summer fishing were sold to foreign countries, while those of the fall fishery were sold in this country, principally at Quebec and Montreal. He was proud to say that the fish produce of Canada, especially the fish of the coast of Gaspé, was sent all over the world, nearly—to Italy, Spain, Portugal, Brazil, the West Indies, etc., and the products of those countries brought back in return. In speaking to these fishermen he (Mr. Fortin) asked them how they could expect to get good markets for their fish in Canada, if the other industries were allowed to run down as they had during the last few years. The answer he received to this appeal to the electors of Gaspé, last year, was his election by a majority of 800. This showed that they approved of his way of thinking and acting on these matters. In shaping a policy for this country, they ought to follow the examples given them by the most enlightened nations on the globe in commercial and monetary matters. They should follow the example of England, France, Germany and many other nations. The policy of England was Free-trade for the last twenty or thirty years, because it was, under these circumstances, the greatest measure of Protection they could have for their manufactures. Previous to that, England had adopted a Protective policy for centuries, and under it had been enabled to accumulate more wealth than any other country in the world, and large amounts of money found investment at two and three per cent. interest. They became the manufacturers for the whole world. Then it was that England had adopted Free-trade, and it was one of the greatest measures of Protection that her statesmen could have invented for her. During the last few years other nations, through the international exhibitions, had found out that they could manufacture as well as England, and had closed their markets against her. What was the result of Protection in the United States? None but a prejudiced person would say that there was any other nation in the world that had enriched itself so rapidly as the United States, during the last five or six years, under a system of Protection. He would have great pleasure in voting for the policy of the Government, because it was one which he believed would make the country rich and prosperous.

MR. COSTIGAN pointed out that it was necessary to keep the tariff intact if the advantages of Protection were not to be lost altogether. In that belief he would support the duty as proposed.

CORRECTION.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he desired to correct an error in the report of some observations made by him on the 20th March, which appeared in the official report of the debates at page 602, and to which his attention had only been called this morning by a letter from Mr. Carmichael, to whom the report referred. The report read: "In 1874 he was approached by Mr. Carmichael, and was told that if he would vote for him he would retain his office." What he (Mr. McDonald) said was, that he was approached by a political friend or agent of Mr. Carmichael.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURT ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Keeler.)

FIRST READING.

MR. KEELER introduced a Bill (No. 84) To repeal the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act and the Acts amending the same. He said he introduced this Bill on the score of economy. He thought we were governed a great deal too much in Canada, and that we could do very well without this Supreme Court. He considered it was established, in the first place, without proper reasons. He did not believe that the country required or wished for any such Court. He thought it was throwing away $50,000 a year of the people's money; and having come here, pledged to his constituents to vote for economy and retrenchment, he had, with that view, introduced that Bill. It might be a bold thing for a member of his standing to introduce such a measure, but he thought he was justified, and that the people of Canada had the same view, that this Court was entirely unnecessary and useless. He believed we had better Courts in each of our Provinces, carrying more weight in their decisions than the Supreme Court which had been established in Ottawa. He saw by the Public Accounts that last year the Supreme Court cost $57,332, and that in that Court there were two Judges from Ontario, two from the Maritime Provinces, and two from the Province of Quebec. It was his opinion, from what he had heard, that the decisions given there were simply the decisions of two Judges in every case. In Quebec there were four or five Judges in the Court of Appeal, and in Ontario they had a Court of Error and Appeal, composed of one Chief Justice and three Judges. He believed the decisions of those Judges were much more reliable than those of the Judges who really ruled the Supreme Court here. He was not well acquainted with the state of things in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, but he presumed the same thing applied there. He would not like to go so far as to say that this Court was established to make a refuge for political friends of hon. gentlemen, but he thought the salaries of the Judges were very excessive. There was a Chief Justice at $8,000, and five Judges at $7,000 a year each, which he believed corresponded with the salaries of the Ministers of the Dominion. It seemed to him that these gentlemen had very little to do for their money, and that the money of the people was being wasted. He hoped the gentlemen of the long robe in the House would not oppose this measure on the ground of class interests. The country people believed that we were lawyer-ridden. He did not say that we were, but it appeared to his constituents, who were agricultural people generally, that they were multiplying the Courts to too great an extent, and that because they had a large proportion of the gentlemen in this House who belonged to the profession of the law, he could not bring himself to believe that hon. members who belonged to that profession, would, on that account, forget their duty to the people. He hoped they would look upon this as members representing the interests of the country, and would see that this Court was an excrescence which might be very well cut off.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he took it for granted that his hon. friends behind him were amusing themselves by the proposition laid before the House;

therefore, he would not take it seriously, and he would scarcely be treating the House with justice, if he supposed that it would treat this question with seriousness. He hoped the Bill would be withdrawn.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was glad it was a supporter of the Minister of Justice who had taken this method to play practical jokes upon the House. The hon. member had said the Court was wholly unnecessary.

MR. KEELER said the people of Ontario and Quebec believed that the Act was introduced in order to provide comfortable places for the friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends.

MR. MACKENZIE said there were six Judges, and only one was a friend of his.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there were friends of the hon. gentleman's friends there. The greatest reasons must be given before this tribunal could be abolished. He had been a party, as the hon. gentlemen opposite knew, to pressing the consideration of a Supreme Court Act for several Sessions.

MR. MACKENZIE : Six times.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said they had not, however, been so strong, perhaps, as his hon. friend was afterwards. The Court was now established and was a recognised tribunal, and being so it must be sustained until it was proved decidedly that it was against the interests of the country that it should be continued. Although there might be some objections to the Court as being premature and expensive, yet it was one of the recognised tribunals of the country, and a good deal of the legislation in the Provinces had been passed on the supposition that there was such a Court. They must, therefore, support it, and give it all the countenance that Parliament could give it, until it was shown by the experience of a good many years that it was not for the interests of the country that it should not be maintained. However, his hon. friend's Bill would be duly considered.

MR. McDONALD.

MR. MACKENZIE said he thought that not only was the Court a necessity in a general sense, but it was a necessary complement to our system of self-government in this country. He believed it was necessary for the Government of the country, and if it were only for the settlement of the disputes on the Intercolonial Railway, and other similar disputes, making, as it did, an independent tribunal, before which the Government and their contractors, and claimants could appear, it had rendered enough service to justify its establishment; while he was quite willing that all our legal cases should go to the Privy Council, he thought it desirable that there should be a Canadian tribunal of the highest character, to which our people would appeal, and he had no doubt it had rendered great service. He was not so capable of speaking about it as legal gentlemen, or, perhaps, the mover of this Bill, who spoke with a tone of authority, as if he had studied everything connected with the matter. It might as well be proposed to bring in a Bill to repeal the Act of Union, or something of that kind. One would be quite as unreasonable as the other. They had measures before Parliament which made use of the Supreme Court, and it was unreasonable to introduce this measure in this thoughtless and absurd fashion.

MR. HAGGART said that the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill, only spoke the feelings of a great portion of the people of Ontario in explaining it. There was a strong feeling in the community against the multiplying of the Courts, and it was being expressed in almost every portion of the country. The Supreme Court was regarded as entirely useless, while at the same time a great cost to Canada. Although he rose only to defend the conduct of the hon. gentleman in introducing that measure, he was against the abolition of a Court, when once established, in the manner proposed. This Court had been established, and the Judges had been appointed, and he knew of no way in which they could be got rid of, unless by giving them pensions for life, to the full extent of their salaries. But it was only giving voice to the strong feeling of the people to say that the multiplying of Courts was proceeding to an extent that the people would not submit to, and especially believing, as they did, that the Supreme Court was established when there was no necessity for it.

Mr. MILLS said it seemed to him that the hon. the First Minister should have sustained the position taken by the Minister of Justice, who regarded the proposition as a joke. He (Mr. Mills) could see no difference between a proposition to abolish this Parliament and one to do away with the Supreme Court charged with the final interpretation of its laws. Without that Court what would be done in the case of conflicts between the other Courts? The Courts of Ontario might construe a Statute of Canada in one way, and the Courts of any of the other Provinces in a different way. With a tribunal like the Supreme Court at Ottawa they had provisions for securing uniformity. It decided finally as to the proper construction of the laws of Canada. It would be very unfortunate to have different interpretations of the Statutes and of the authority of the Dominion in the different Provinces, without any means of a final decision. Besides, litigants would be obliged to have recourse to the Privy Council, which they would find five times as expensive as proceedings before the Supreme Court; that Council knew but little of the practical working of the Constitution. He thought that this Court was highly necessary, and that the first Minister ought not to have encouraged this Bill or sanctioned the first step.

Mr. DESJARDINS said he believed it his duty to say a word with regard to the assertion made by the hon. member for Lambton, who had stated that the population throughout the whole country was satisfied with the working of the Supreme Court. He was not aware what was the feeling on this subject in the Province of Ontario, but he knew perfectly well that there existed in the Province of Quebec, and not without cause, a strong dislike to this tribunal, and more particularly to its jurisdiction as a Court of Appeal from the judgments rendered by the the Civil Courts. It would be easy for the House to understand the cause of this dislike when it was borne in mind that whilst no one could sit as a Judge in the Superior Court, or in the Court of Queen's Bench in the Province of Quebec, without having first followed a course of law, and practised as a lawyer during at least ten years for this tribunal of last resort, and which was called upon to confirm or reverse the decisions of Quebec Judges, four out of the six Judges were chosen from the other Provinces, without being previously obliged to study the Civil Laws of the Province of Quebec. He would not deny that the hon. leader of the Opposition was right in stating that this Court had been useful to the Government on certain occasions, but this had in no way contributed to enhance the prestige of the Court in the minds of the people. Public opinion in the Province of Quebec was far from being disposed to accept the establishment of this tribunal, which had been prematurely forced upon the country. Under these circumstances, and on account of the complaints that were also made in other Provinces, he believed that the Bill now introduced should be read a first time, and that every facility should be given for a frank and free expression of opinion when this Bill would come up for the third reading.

Bill read the first time.

Mr. KEELER moved that the Bill be read the second time to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved in amendment, that the Bill be read the second time this day three months. He said that gentlemen who voted in favour of the second reading, and against the proposal to postpone it for three months, would be declaring that the Court ought to be abolished, and if the hon. the Premier accepted the logic of the vote for the second reading, he would give facilities for the passing of the Bill of the member for East Northumberland this Session.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. HOLTON said no doubt the hon. gentlemen on his side, who had joined with some hon. gentlemen opposite—including the Minister of Justice and the First Minister—in this vote, had done so because they were sincerely desirous to see the Supreme Court abolished. That was the logic of their vote, and of the vote of hon. gentlemen opposite. It was perceptible to everybody that, if the motion for the second reading had gone on the Order-paper, it would never have been reached this year. It was infinitely more honest to declare at once, either that this Bill was to prevail, or that the Court was to be maintained and that the Bill should not stand upon the Order-paper. Nothing could be more calculated to demoralise that Court than that this Bill should be placed on the Order-paper for a second reading with the assent of the leader of the Government, with an overwhelming vote in this House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. member for Lambton had challenged his logic; he thought it was better than his rhetoric. The hon. gentlemen opposite had received a just punishment for their want of courtesy to the hon. member who had introduced this Bill. His request that the measure should be laid before Parliament, and discussed, might have been granted to an old member of Parliament. The House having given permission to lay the Bill before it, the next proceeding was a mere matter of course—that it might be set down for a second reading on a future day, when its principle could be discussed. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) was very much amused at seeing that the hon. member for Lambton, like many another engineer, had been hoisted by his own petard. They saw the galleon of the commander of the Opposition floating in to fight that of the member for East Northumberland—to crush his Bill out—the Opposition torpedoes exploding behind them—but the consequence was that that hon. gentleman had got the largest vote of the Session. The concession of little courtesies did no harm. Every hon. gentleman was a representative of the people, possessing certain rights, such as was claimed by this hon. gentleman. He had been allowed, by vote of the House, to introduce his Bill, but had it accepted the invitation of the hon. member for Lambton, would not have permitted its discussion. The principle of a Bill being discussed on its second reading, it was clearly a matter of course to allow it to reach that stage. The Opposition to that appeared factious. The hon. gentleman said his course was a very honest one—much more honest than that of the Government. Their course was simply an act of courtesy, while that of hon. gentlemen opposite was an act of discourtesy to an old and respected member.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that he did not admit that the hon. Premier was right. The hon. gentleman who had introduced the Bill had had an opportunity of discussing and explaining it, which he did. The hon. Minister of Justice then rose and declared he looked on the matter as a joke, and his leader declared that it would be improper to destroy a great established institution of the country until the gravest reasons for its abolition were given. He (Mr. Mackenzie) believed that the very mootng of the matter would be an injury to the Court, and that the second reading of such a Bill was calculated seriously to damage it. There was no party interest to gain by proposing the amendment, which was intended to prevent what he considered a mischievous proceeding. The hon. Premier believed that also, but in spite of his own declaration and that of the Minister of Justice, he and all his supporters voted deliberately on the principle of the Bill that the Supreme Court should be abolished. The hon. gentleman knew that Bills were not always allowed to go to a second reading. He thought he could find cases of the Premier's preventing such progress himself. Probably he (Mr. Mackenzie) would be able to show that he was in that, as he was in many other cases, rather inaccurate in many of his statements.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I acknowledge I am not, like my hon. friend, infallible.

MR. MACKENZIE said of course not, but the hon. gentleman would be practically infallible if they were to accept his declaration always. He stated that second readings were never prevented, but he knew they were occasionally. When a Bill like the present, which, it was felt, ought not to pass to a second reading, or to be entertained, and could not be amended, so as to dispose of any part of its object, it was frequently disposed of at once; acting upon that well-known principle, he had moved the three months' hoist. The hon. gentleman opposite had accepted the responsibility of defending the principle of the Bill, and of the intention to proceed with it by the vote given.

MR. TUPPER said he only rose to protest against the doctrine laid down by the leader of the Opposition—that to give any member the opportunity of having his Bill discussed, was tantamount to the adoption of its principle. He thought that its acceptance would place a great many hon. gentlemen in a very false position. The practice of the House was uniformly to deal with the principle of the Bills in the second reading. He did not believe that any member on the Ministerial side was in the slightest degree committed to the principle of the Bill, by either voting for its first reading or for its subsequent consideration. He should be very much surprised if the hon. leader of the Opposition adduced a single instance, wherein it was decided that the voting for a first reading of a Bill prevented a member opposing its second reading. The friends of the Supreme Court had no ground of complaint against any member for this afternoon's proceedings but the hon. gentleman from Lambton. The only blow struck at that Court had been by the motion of the hon. gentleman. Why? Because every hon. gentleman knew that every hon. member who had voted against the three months' hoist—against an open, palpable act of discourtesy, such as was rarely witnessed—had simply voted that the member for East Northumberland should receive the same courtesy as was extended to every hon. gentleman opposite, who wished to introduce any measure. The only indications of hostility to this Court, except those, no doubt, honestly manifested by the mover of this Bill, had been evoked by the discourtesy shown him by the leader of the Opposition. The hon. gentlemen who had opposed the amendment had been compelled by that unnecessary and unusual motion, either to express their own opinions, or vote as they had done in relation to it; and if that Court, and the House had any reason to complain of the position in which it stood to-day, it was due to the unusual course and tactics of the leader of the Opposition, which, designed to embarrass hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side, had but embarrassed himself and his own party.

MR. MILLS said he did not subscribe to the doctrine of the Minister of Public Works, because he (Mr. Mills) held that the House had a right to express its opinion on every measure, and at every stage of a measure. He would like to know how they could have avoided voting on the proposition that the Bill be read a second time on Tuesday next. If no vote had been taken the unanimous consent of the House must have been assumed; that was a well settled rule. He was opposed to the Bill, and did not admit that it could be amended in any way that would make it acceptable to him. Therefore, it was his right to vote against it. That view was supported by May. How had hon. gentlemen in Opposition exhibited discourtesy to the mover of the Bill? Was it by voting against a measure that they believed was wholly bad? By voting in favour of the motion of the member for East Northumberland, hon. gentlemen opposite had favoured the abolition of the Supreme Court, which was a great political institution, and a necessary part of our system of civil government; and the hon. gentlemen, in supporting a Bill for its abolition, which had but this object, and aimed at nothing else, had declared their hostility to the Court. It was established three years ago with the consent of hon. gentlemen opposite. They took no exception to it. It was true there were hon. gentlemen from the Province of Quebec who were opposed to the constitution of this Court, but the hon. the First Minister and his supporters from Ontario and the Maritime Provinces were in favour of it, and deemed it a necessary tribunal for the purpose of giving a uniform construction to the laws of Canada. No more offensive, no more mischievous measure could have been introduced. No more damaging vote could have been given against the Supreme Court than the one just recorded. The hon. gentlemen opposite, in doing what they called an act of courtesy to one of their supporters, had done an act of great discourtesy to a very important institution in this country.

MR. MCCARTHY said he was not astonished at the warmth which the hon. gentlemen opposite displayed on this question. The establishment of this Court was one of those acts upon which they were wont to plume themselves as an evidence of the reforming tendencies of the late Administration. The hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill, had done nothing more than express, in its introduction, the feeling which was entertained, not merely in the Province of Ontario, but still more largely in the Province of Quebec, with respect to the necessity for its abolition. It was absurd for anyone to say that an hon. member of this House had not a right to bring a motion to introduce a Bill of this character, and have it discussed in the ordinary way. Unfortunately for the hon. gentleman opposite, he had only shown how unpopular his Court was, which had been established during his time. This was evident from the fact that, while many hon. gentlemen on this side voted, not on the principle of the Bill, but simply that it should go to a second reading in the ordinary way, many hon. gentlemen opposite voted against the motion of their leader, because they dared not vote otherwise, and go back to their constituents. It was plain the Court had not answered the purpose for which it was intended. It cost this country a very large amount. The only reason given by the hon. member for Bothwell for its existence was, that the law, by its means, might be expounded similarly in Nova Scotia as it was in Ontario or New Brunswick. We were paying dearly for the uniformity which suited the philosophical mind of the hon. member. No constitutional question had ever yet been settled in this Court, and he believed that if it was question now of establishing a Supreme Court, we would hesitate in voting for its establishment, after the experience we had of the working of that Court. In saying that he did not wish it to be understood he was going to vote for the abolition of that Court; it was impossible to do that, but not to have the matter discussed on the second reading, and the objections against it duly considered.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) said he utterly repudiated the idea that this, or any question from the Chair, was to be treated as a question of personal courtesy to a member of the House. Every question put from the Chair, was one that should be answered honestly and truly by those by whom that question ought to be answered. It was quite true, as a general rule, when any motion was made to introduce a Bill, the motion passed without question; but if any hon. member thought proper to rise and put the question, that the Bill should not then be entertained, that it should be read a second time at some future date, that question, like every other, must be answered by the House in the ordinary way, by a vote, yea or nay. He believed that this Bill should not pass, and he opposed it at this first stage; and he denied that a question of personal courtesy entered into his vote. The Supreme Court was, in a great measure, interwoven with the administration of justice throughout the Dominion. His hon. friend who had just spoken (Mr. McCarthy) introduced his Election Bill the other day, and throughout that Bill, in all its clauses, there was reference to the Supreme Court. That Court was now the Appellate Court to try all the elections of members of this House, and to say that they were to entertain a Bill to repeal the Act constituting that Court, upon the motion of a private member, and when they had the honest expression of the Minister of Justice that the Bill was treated by him in a jocular sense, was taking an extreme view. He had voted in accordance with his conviction that it was wrong to entertain a motion, at this early period, to abolish a Court which had performed efficient service to the State. His hon. friend had stated that no constitutional question had been determined by the Court. There was not a sitting of that Court in which grave constitutional questions had not been discussed and disposed of for good; and its efficiency should not have been attacked in this way through a motion brought in apparently without the sanction or assent of the Government, and certainly without the assent or support of hon. members who were members of the legal profession. It was wrong to say this question should be treated in any other way than upon its own merits, or that the plea of courtesy to a member should shield it from an honest answer by the House.

MR. KEELER said it was his opinion that if the hon. member for West Northumberland (Mr. Cockburn) were to ask the people who sent him here, whether they wished to see the Supreme Court continue to exist, they would reply emphatically, no; and that hon. gentleman would hear of that when he went back to his constituents. He believed that all those hon. gentlemen who represented the true feeling of the people, were in favour of the abolition of this Court. The people in his (Mr. Keeler's) constituency were very much disgusted with this Court. They considered that the Court of Queen's Bench in Ontario was a better Court, and its decisions were far more respected than those of the Supreme Court. He had heard of a case from Quebec, a short time ago, in which an hon. gentleman, who sat in this House, had brought a case before the Superior Court of Quebec, where it was decided by four Judges; and, on appealing to the Supreme Court, the two Judges in that Court reversed the decision of the four Judges at Quebec. That was enough to show the utter uselessness of the Supreme Court.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he regretted extremely the character of the discussion that had arisen on the first reading of this Bill. The hon. the leader of the Opposition, with his hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Cockburn), argued that it was desirable to reject the first reading, because the acceptance of the Bill for the first reading might reflect upon the Court. In the first place, he did not think that was the case. He did not at all retract the opinion he had expressed when the Bill was offered to the House by his hon. friend from East Northumberland (Mr. Keeler), an opinion which indicated that it was a pity it was introduced, and that at this period of the Session it certainly could not hope to become law. So far as he was individually concerned, he would endeavour to resist its becoming law, because he could not entertain the opinion, with reference to the Supreme Court, which he had heard during this discussion. Considering the period during which it had existed, the character of the work done and the character of the men who composed it, he believed it was gradually, and surely, working its way into public confidence, and he still further believed it was essential to the interests of the country, and must be sustained; still, he was quite well aware, and regretted to have become aware, during this discussion, that that was not the opinion universally entertained. He knew, for the first time, that there appeared to be a contrary feeling in some sections of the country, but that feeling which apparently prevailed was one reason why this Bill should be read a first time, so as to give an opportunity to members of this House to give expression to their views on this subject. It was far better for the Court and for the public interest, that latent feelings of dissatisfaction, which appeared to exist, should find expression, and that remedies, if any were required, should be applied, than that the dissatisfaction should be allowed to prevail. He was, therefore, pleased that the Bill had been read the first time, and that, on its second reading, an opportunity would be given to members to express their opinions with reference to the constitution of the Court, its character and position in the country, and enable the Government to apply a remedy, if one were found necessary.

MR. HUNTINGTON said everyone would be delighted with the remarks of the Minister of Justice, so far as he had been kind enough to express the opinion that the Supreme Court was a respectable body. He was sorry, however, the hon. gentleman did not go further and express his regret that there was an appearance of partisanship in the attacks made at different times on the Supreme Court. If the principle was to be laid down, while we were trying to govern this country by two parties, that a Court which had been created while the one party administered affairs must be attacked by the other when they succeeded to power, that there was nothing sacred against these attacks, then they must adopt the principle that was suggested in a previous debate, indicating that, when a new party was in power, they must have new Courts. The attacks made upon the Supreme Court here and outside had apparently been made on account of political leanings. This was not the first time the Supreme Court had been attacked, but never before had anything so coarse or offensive been uttered against it as had fallen from the lips of the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Keeler), who denounced the Supreme Court as an inferior tribunal, and cast insinuations upon the Judges. Meanwhile, the Premier sat quietly listening to it all, and, in fact, encouraged the hon. member for East Northumberland in his attack.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: In what way?

MR. HUNTINGTON: By declaring that the hon. member who attacked that Court in the manner he did should have courtesy extended to him, that a great element in the Constitution of this country should not be so much considered as the courtesy to a partisan, when he outstepped the bounds of propriety to such an extent that it was necessary for the Speaker to rule him out of order, and, while the hon. the Premier was encouraging the hon. gentleman, the Speaker was compelled to interfere to stop the discourteous remarks of the hon. gentleman who promoted the Bill. If this Parliament was to be worthy of the position it occupied, if this Government was to be worthy of the position it occupied, then such a Court as this should be treated with respect in this House, and the Minister of Justice, the Prime Minister, or any other member of this House, could not, consistently with their dignity and sense of duty, allow the Supreme Court to be attacked as it had been by the hon. member for East Northumberland. There should be some regard for decency.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Hear, hear.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he was delighted if he had made an impression on the right hon. gentleman. There should be some subject so sacred in this country that the Prime Minister, even for the purpose of pleasing his partisans, would not hear it unjustly denounced. The Supreme Court was not the only institution which the right hon. gentleman had thus allowed, this Session, for partisan purposes, to be treated in this way. The attack which had been made on this Court was disgraceful.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not know that he had allowed the Supreme Court to be insulted. At the time the hon. gentleman from East Northumberland moved the introduction of the Bill, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) did not hear any remarks by that hon. gentleman disrespectful to the Supreme Court. As to the mode of procedure it was well understood that when Parliament gave an hon. member the right to introduce a Bill, and called it the first reading, he should have an opportunity of explaining it to the House on the second reading, although it might be considered an obsolete privilege. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Huntington) said some things were so sacred that they should not be attacked. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) did not know that his hand would be withered if he laid it on the Arc of the Covenant of the Supreme Court. That institution had been created by Parliament and amended by Parliament. Parliament might declare it to be inefficient, but that would not be blasphemy. He declared himself plainly and strongly when the matter came up on the first reading, his opinion that the Court ought to be sustained after having been established, unless there was a strong and clear case made out for its abolition. He was not going to deprive his hon. friend from East Northumberland of the opportunity of saying that he had made out a case for the abolition of the Court, or for its amendment. The discussion could do no harm. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Huntington) said the Court had been insulted. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) happened to be out during a portion of the debate, but he he was sure the hon gentleman from East Northumberland would not willingly insult any individual or any institution; if he had made any remark against the Supreme Court that Court was of no more sacred quality than any other institution. The hon. member for Shefford stated that he (Sir John A. Macdonald) arose to protect a partisan. Now that was not a Parliamentary expression. If the hon. gentleman had been a Minister, he would have resented such language applied to a supporter of his. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) desired simply to extend toward one of his own friends a courtesy he was willing to extend to hon. gentlemen opposite, and he was not aware that the hon. gentleman opposite had a right to sneer at a member of the majority as being partisan. We were all partisans. He did not think it could be expected of him, as leader of the House, to extend less courtesy to his own friends than he was ready to extend to those opposed to him.

MR. RYKERT said that in voting against the motion of the member for Lambton, he desired to repudiate the charge of partisanship. Every time the member for Shefford arose in this House, he had to attack members of the Ministerial side for partisanship or indecency. No other member was less qualified to lecture them on manners than that hon. gentleman, in view of his past record. He (Mr. Rykert) failed to hear any observations of the hon. gentleman for East Northumberland casting reflections on the Supreme Court, but had he gone that far, he would not have gone further than public opinion would have justified. No other Court was so unpopular to-day, particularly in Ontario. They had a perfect right to discuss this question in Parliament. The hon. member for Chateauguay thought we had no right to discuss this question on a motion of this kind, but no one knew better than that hon. gentleman that the question of principle was not involved in this motion. On a former occasion, when a motion was made to give the three months' hoist to the Orange Bill on its first reading, a great deal of feeling was aroused, and, since then, the first reading had generally been accepted as a matter of course. It was contrary to all parliamentary practice to compel a member to explain the principle of a Bill on the first reading. This view was taken by May, and that was the practice in England and in this country, except on a few occasions. He defied the hon. member for Lambton to quote one precedent in favour of the singular position he advocated. He (Mr. Rykert) had been in Parliament many years, and knew of no occasion when a motion was made against a Bill being placed on the orders after the first reading. It was quite competent for a member to object to the first reading, but it was not the Parliamentary practice. He did not think he should, under the circumstances, vote for the second reading, although he could justify such a course on several grounds. It could not be denied that a strong feeling existed against this Court in Ontario, and it was well that public attention had been drawn not only to the constitution of the Court, but also to the expenses connected therewith.

MR. BOULTBEE said representatives of the people were here to give expression to their wishes on public questions, rather than to guard any particular institution that the people were not satisfied with. The leader of the Opposition said the members of the Government would have to answer for the vote going in the way it did; they would be able to stand that, but they would not have been able to stand a charge of having assisted to crush out that Bill without allowing it to be debated. Whether rightly or wrongly, a strong feeling existed in Ontario that the Supreme Court was a heavy burden on the country, and, in his opinion, any constitutional question, which this Court was supposed to specially deal with, might be disposed of, in a less expensive manner, before another power. Further than this, the people of this country thought it would be a good thing if not only that the Supreme Court were done away with, but the Court of Appeal in Ontario were also abolished, believing they would get sufficient justice from the Judges in the Assize, with a review, if necessary, by the full Court. He did not say he should vote for the abolition of the Court, but he thought the House had a perfect right to discuss the expediency of doing so. Some time, if not at present, the people might instruct their representatives to abolish that Court, and, in that possibility, there was no disrespect to that Court in discussing the question at present. He had heard nothing derogatory to that Court in this debate, except in the remarks that fell from the hon. member for Shefford. He it was who first started the idea in the House on the present occasion, that this Court, established by one party, was to be attacked by another. No such feeling existed in this House, and it would be a shameful thing if it did. Doubtless, the hon. gentleman from Shefford desired to stand well with that Court. Members supporting the Government merely voted with their leaders on the principle that the Bill ought, in courtesy, to be read a second time, but a large number of the Opposition, in spite of the appeals of their leaders, virtually voted for doing away with the Court.

MR. ORTON said he must challenge a remark which, he understood, was made by the hon. gentleman from West Northumberland, who charged the hon. gentleman from East Northumberland with being guilty of discourtesy and impropriety in introducing this Bill without consulting with legal members of this House.

MR. COCKBURN: I made no such charge.

MR. MACKENZIE: He said without consultation with the Government.

MR. ORTON said, as far as he knew, the people were opposed to the multiplication of Courts, and there was a strong feeling in the country that lawyers, as a class, were not the most disinterested and unselfish people in this country. He was not prepared to say that the hon. gentleman from West Northumberland was not an honorable man, and that his conduct was not inspired by the best of motives, but he did say there was a strong feeling in the country that the lawyers in this House had interfered too much in the legislation of the country.

MR. CASGRAIN said he entirely concurred in the remarks made by the hon gentleman from East Northumberland. He (Mr. Casgrain) could not understand why the hon. the Minister of Justice, who had a Bill before the House for continuing this Court, could allow the present Bill to be brought forward, unless he meant to oppose it. He thought the hon. the Prime Minister ought, in common parlance, to take the bull by the horns and vote down the present proposition at once. The mere fact of this discussion was no credit either to this House or to the Supreme Court.

MR. WELDON said that the hon. gentleman from Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) had chosen to attack the legal gentlemen, but it must be allowed those gentlemen possessed the public confidence in a large degree, judging from their numbers in this House. The Supreme Court was of greater advantage to the Maritime Provinces than to Ontario and Quebec, as the latter Provinces possessed Courts of Appeals. He thought the Government had shirked the responsibility which devolved upon them in this matter. If the Supreme Court was not adapted to the wants of the people, the Government should have brought in a Bill for its abolition, instead of leaving that step to be taken by a private member. Or, if the Government thought that Court was inefficient, they should bring in a Bill for its amendment. So far as he understood the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Justice, he supported the Court, and said that, so far, it had done good work. So far as the Lower Provinces were concerned, he was surprised to find so many members from the Lower Provinces vote, as he believed, for the abolition of this Court, because they knew that the ordinary Courts were not infallible. Until this Court was established they were obliged to be content with the decision of one Court or go to England before the Privy Council. He was satisfied that this Court would be a great saving to the country, and be the means of establishing a uniformity of law from the Provinces on the Pacific to the Provinces on the Atlantic.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) said he thought the discussion of this question, at the present time, was inopportune, and he regretted very much the tone that had pervaded it. It had been made, apparently, a question of party politics, rather than one of the highest character, which, he thought it was; because when they came to deal with the very existence of the highest and paramount Court in the Dominion, it was a subject upon which they ought to rise beyond party considerations, and look at it from a more extensive and impartial point of view. He thought, also, that it was much to be regretted that they should have dropped into this discussion on this merely formal motion for the first reading of the Bill. It was for that reason that he voted against the motion of the hon. member for Lambton, because he desired that they should have an opportunity of discussing the Bill on its second reading. He was not, by any means, prepared to accede to the view that the Supreme Court ought to be abolished, nor was he prepared to say he was satisfied with its present constitution. He wished to say nothing of the personnel of the learned Judges of the Court, but he was bound to say that, among the public and the profession of Ontario, there had been a good deal of dissatisfaction in regard to the constitution of the Court, and the manner in which cases from Ontario had occasionally been decided. For instance, a judgment was given the other day as a purely equitable question. The judgment of one of the learned Judges of the Supreme Court, who certainly stands second to none in his knowledge of equity law, was in accord with the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and of the Fall Court of Chancery of Ontario, but his judgment was reversed by the decision of four learned Judges of the Supreme Court, whose knowledge of that branch of law could not have been considered as equal to those whose judgment they over-ruled. These anomalies had created a feeling of dissatisfaction to a certain extent on what he might term the constitution of the Court. That it was desirable and proper they should have an ultimate Court of Appeal for the whole Dominion, he was prepared, for one, to acknowledge, but if the Court could be reorganised so as to be more acceptable to litigants and the public, he thought it would be desirable. If some such arrangement could be made, the intermediate Courts of Appeal in the Provinces should be abolished. But it was absolutely necessary that the constitution of the Court should be altered, and greater strength, in fact, given to it. When he said greater strength, he did not wish to reflect on the Judges composing the Court. He thought it should be composed so as to be a tribunal in which every Province would have confidence, and be satisfied that those peculiar questions arising in the different Provinces would be determined by a Court of a sufficient number of Judges, skilled in those special questions, and such as to justify the public expectation of justice being done to the litigants. He would not have spoken at all on this subject, at the present time, were it not that in all probability another opportunity might not arise during the present Session, and after what had been said on it, he thought it might be considered right that members of the legal profession who had had some experience in the Court, should occupy the time of the House for a few minutes, and express their views upon it.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said he thought it would have been better if the suggestion of the Minister of Justice had been followed by the House. When the hon. member for East Northumberland introduced his Bill, and explained its objects, the hon. the Minister of Justice rose in his place and said he regarded the proposition of the hon. member for East Northumberland as a huge practical joke, and he trusted the House would so consider it. If the advice of the hon. the Minister of Justice had been followed, and the Bill treated as a huge practical joke, they would not have had what appeared to be an extremely unseemly discussion as to the utility of this Court. If the hon. the Minister of Justice was right in treating the matter as a huge practical joke, was it not absurd to ask Parliament not only to keep on its records this huge practical joke, but to give it a place in the Statute-book of the Dominion? The logical sequence, from the position of the Minister of Justice, was, that hon. gentlemen ought to have voted down the motion of the hon. member for East Northumberland, though he was a supporter of their own. Then they had the First Minister himself tell them that this was not a Bill which he could allow to go upon the Statute-book; that it was not a wise nor judicious Bill, and that he could not sanction or support a Bill for the repeal of the Supreme Court, and that, in fact, that Court was now interwoven with our legislation and judicial system, and could not be interfered with. It appeared to him very extraordinary that the First Minister, after expressing the views he had expressed, should have allowed this course to be pursued in regard to this matter. He should not have permitted the Bill to go to a second reading. He (Mr. Cameron) regretted this discussion, because he thought observations had been made by members of the legal profession, respecting this Court, calculated to seriously prejudice the Court in the public mind. Notably so as to the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) whose words, as a prominent member of the Bar of Ontario, and as a prominent member of the House, carried more weight than those of an unprofessional man. The hon. member's statements, together with those of other hon. gentlemen, appeared to him to be exceedingly unwise, injudicious, and calculated to do very serious injury to this Court. The hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill said that the Court was unpopular throughout the country, and throughout the Province of Ontario. He (Mr. Cameron) denied that, and he defied the hon. the First Minister, the hon. the Minister of Justice, and the hon. member for North Simcoe, or any one else, to say that the Court was unpopular. In his judgment, there never was an Appeal Court in the Dominion that had served a better purpose, and given more general satisfaction. His hon. friend had referred to the differences of opinion that existed between the Judges of this Court, in cases that came before them, on legal points; that was to be expected. Every Judge would not take the same view of the law, or, if they did, there would be no necessity for any Court of Appeal. Everyone knew that the same thing existed with regard to the decisions of Parliament, the decisions in our Superior Courts and in our Courts of Appeal, but he was not aware that such differences of opinion was ever urged as a reason for abolishing these Courts. It had been urged that the Court was expensive. True, it was. Every Court they had in the Dominion was more or less expensive. Was that any ground on which the mover of this Bill could properly argue that this Court had not served a wise purpose, and why Parliament should be called on to abolish it? The hon. member for North Simcoe said the Court had never served a good purpose. He (Mr. Cameron) held that if ever a Court created in this Dominion served a good purpose, it was the Supreme Court. They could not expect that, in a year or two, the utility and value of this Court would be apparent to everyone, professional and unprofessional, in the Dominion. That the Court would serve a good purpose was beyond peradventure. But, apart from that, the whole argument that had been adopted in Parliament that day by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House was calculated to materially weaken the influence of the Court in the public mind—to weaken the hold it was gradually obtaining in the public confidence—and to destroy, to a large extent, the utility of the Court. It had been stated that every attack that had been made on that Court had come from the Opposition side of the House. He (Mr. Cameron) denied that statement. Not one gentleman from that side of the House had, during the discussion, said anything offensive as to the personnel or constitution of the Supreme Court, or as to its usefulness and utility in the Dominion. But from the other side of the House they had had statements that afternoon reflecting on the Supreme Court—reflecting on its usefulness—and insinuating, if not more than insinuating, that the public had no confidence in its judgments, that, in fact, it was useless, expensive, and served no good purpose. He maintained that, considering the length of time the Court had been in existence, and that, in some sense, it was an experiment, the Court had served a good, wise, and useful purpose, and that it would be extremely prejudicial to the usefulness of the Court to suggest even that the Court should not continue its existence, and the Minister of Justice, as the guardian of the judiciary of the Dominion, should have strenuously resisted this Bill. He regretted exceedingly the observations that had been made that day, because it would only spread abroad the idea that the Court was unpopular, and so increase its unpopularity; that it was unnecessarily expensive, and so create a popular prejudice against its existence; that it had served no good purpose in the past, and so lead the public mind to the conclusion that it could serve no good purpose in the future. If these opinions should hereafter prevail in the country, and the Court should become unpopular, hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches would be responsible—solely responsible for the result—a result that the House and the country would ultimately deplore.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had defied him (Mr. Rykert) to quote an authority, and he desired to do so at this point, with the permission of the House. In the first place May says, page 492, 1873 edition :

“There is no restriction in regard to the time at which motions for rejecting Bills may be made; but, if the House think fit, such rejection may be voted on the first, second or third readings, or on any other stage of the Bill.”

Then he desired to refer to a particular case in 1861, when Mr. Gladstone was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and when Mr. Sheridan introduced a Bill for the purpose of arbitrarily reducing a certain duty. This was opposed by the Government at the initial stage, and Mr. Gladstone said, “The hon. member who last sat down appeared to think that it was a matter of courtesy to allow the introduction of the hon. gentleman’s Bill. I respectfully dissent from that proposition. If it were a matter of courtesy and nothing else, I am quite sure I am speaking for my colleagues as well as myself, when I say that we should be most happy to accord to the hon. gentleman that courtesy. But when the nature of a Bill does not, in any degree, turn upon its structure or form of expression; when the whole effect and purport of the measure is distinctly avowed in the title, which appears upon the notice paper, and in the speech of the hon. member who asks leave to introduce it, it is the ingenuous and straightforward course for the Government to adopt, to state, at the earliest moment, its opinion upon the measure." Accordingly, the Government of the day, to use the hon. gentleman's own words, were as discourteous as themselves (the Opposition), and would not allow it to be proceeded with, and it was set aside by a vote of 49 to 138. Now, if he (Mr. Mackenzie) had not proved his case, he would be prepared to prove it still further.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman had not proved his case, he had simply stated that it was competent for the House of Commons to oppose a Bill on its first reading, as well as its second reading and third reading. Mr. Gladstone had simply stated that if a Bill was foreign in principle to the feelings of the House, the most straightforward way would be to vote it down on its first reading. If a Bill was introduced, which was, evidently, by a distinct majority, against the moral sense and feeling of the House, the most straightforward way was to vote against it at its first reading. But when the House actually voted to give the member leave to introduce the Bill, and not only that, but when the Bill had received its first reading, it was a discourtesy to the member who had received the previous courtesy of being allowed to introduce his Bill and have it read a first time. It was a discourtesy also to the majority that voted in favour of the first reading, not to be allowed an opportunity of voting again, on a future day, on the second reading. The authority read by his hon. friend opposite (Mr. Mackenzie) had no reference to this point. Why? His hon. friend (Mr. Keeler) moved for leave to introduce the Bill; that leave was granted. He then moved that the Bill be read a first time, and it was read the first time. He then asked, in the ordinary course of practice, that a day be appointed upon which to discuss it.

MR. HOLTON said that, according to May, it was very clear that there was no restriction in regard to the time at which motions for the rejection of Bills should be made. But if the House thought fit, such rejection might be voted on the first, second or third readings, or any other stages of the Bill.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: This is not the first stage of the Bill.

MR. HOLTON said it could be done at any stage of the Bill. The motion was to appoint a day for the second reading of the Bill. It was an amendable motion, and his hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) proposed to amend it. Nothing could be more regular. The title of this Bill told the House all about it: It was a Bill to abolish the Supreme Court. Well, if the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) wanted to abolish the Supreme Court, the House need not go any further, and if the hon. gentleman wished to appoint Wednesday next, or any ulterior day, he might do so. But the amendment was equivalent to a rejection of the Bill. There was no act of discourtesy in making that amendment. There was no greater discourtesy in rejecting a Bill at any stage than there was in a member desiring to introduce a Bill without previously taking the proper precautions, and using those courtesies that were usual when an attack was made on one of the great institutions of the country, as this unquestionably was. He asked the right hon. the leader of the Government, whether he had been consulted about the introduction of this Bill? Whether it would not have been a simple act of courtesy, on the part of one of his supporters, to have consulted him before introducing a Bill to abolish this Court, one of the highest tribunals of the country? There was no question of courtesy. The hon. gentleman was right in introducing the Bill, and the House was right in making any disposition of the Bill they chose. If it were a complex Bill, a Bill that proposed to deal with some matter of ordinary legislation that could be amended, and a clause struck out here and another inserted there, the hon. gentleman might receive the courtesy of having his proposal considered. But he proposed to abolish the Supreme Court, and the very title of the Bill fully informed the House of its provisions. Unless they were prepared to consider that subject, there was no fitness or propriety in going any further with the Bill.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not state there was any irregularity in the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) moving the three months' hoist. If it had been out of order, Mr. Speaker would not have allowed it to be put. He admitted that at any stage of the Bill, in every case where the House was asked by the Speaker to say aye or nay, the House might say aye or nay if they pleased. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) was pointing out, as a matter of practice that, after the House had allowed a member to introduce a Bill, and after it had been read the first time, it was a most unusual and unheard-of thing not to allow the introducer to have an opportunity of moving the second reading of his Bill. The hon. gentleman said it was very wrong to attack a tribunal of this kind, and spoke about the sanctity of that tribunal. Why, the hon. gentleman was an extreme Liberal, yet if he had lived in the time of Charles I, or Charles II, and been in the Parliament of England, and, if there had been a motion to abolish the Star Chamber, he would, if he had been in the same mind as he was during the last five minutes, have risen in his place and said that this tribunal was well known in England, that it was the highest tribunal in England, the highest Court of Appeal for all civil, criminal and ecclesiastical causes, and he would have upheld the Star Chamber. There was no institution sacred against the—

MR. HOLTON : I did not say sacred ; I said important.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said of course it was of considerable importance that when one Parliament had taken such a grave step as they had, in regard to the Supreme Court, that a new Parliament should not invade it. He thought the hon. gentleman (Mr. Holton) had had experience with him for many years,—though he was not always looking at the same side of the House—he was generally looking across the House at him—and he knew that he (Sir John A. Macdonald) was of rather Conservative tendencies.

AN HON. GENTLEMAN : Erratic.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Practically. He thought the hon. gentleman would believe that, practically, he was rather of a Conservative tendency, and the Supreme Court was just as safe in the hands of his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) friends, as in the hands of the hon. the leader of the Opposition.

MR. BUNSTER said it seemed to him that when there was a legal question before the House, the lawyers felt themselves called upon to occupy as much of the time of the House as possible, to the exclusion of business men. The last two hours and a half had been wasted in this matter, but if the Pacific Railway had been under discussion there would not have been half the consideration given it. No matter what question came up before the House, the lawyers occupied the whole time of the House, but if a business man got up, he could hardly get a hearing. This Bill had been voted as a Bill of the House, and he did not see there was any occasion for any more useless discussion.

MR. ANGLIN said that the right hon. the Premier was a Conservative in name, but with revolutionary tendencies. He (Mr. Anglin) had heard him of late years propound most extraordinary revolutionary doctrines. It was rather unfortunate that the right hon. gentleman had chosen to compare the Supreme Court of Canada to the Star Chamber. He wished to speak to the question of courtesy. That the hon. member for Lambton was perfectly in his right in moving his amendment, was now generally admitted. It was not discourteous for any hon. member to take such action as the leader of the Opposition had taken, particularly where the Bill was such a Bill as described by the Right Hon. Mr. Gladstone, in the speech quoted as being a Bill, the title of which so clearly defined its scope and object that the House could at once determine whether or not they should take such a measure into consideration. When the mover of the Bill asked leave to introduce his measure, the hon. the leader of the House, in a few short words, expressed his disapproval of it, and the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) did right in waiting for the hon. the Premier to propose the rejection of the Bill at the first stage. He (Mr. Anglin) expected that the right hon. gentleman would himself have moved that the Bill should not be introduced. He did not do that, and then the hon. member for Lambton, on the very next opportunity, moved that the Bill be given the three months' hoist. He (Mr. Anglin) thought it was the only course which the hon. gentleman could do under the circumstances. He did not consider there was any discourtesy to the mover of the Bill. He believed it was a Bill that should not have been introduced.

MR. COURSOL said he did not rise to discuss the question raised by the hon. member for Chateauguy (Mr. Holton) as to whether the Government was right or wrong in allowing the motion to fix the second reading of this Bill, because he was sure that the hon. the leader of the Government was perfectly competent to defend his own course. His object was to protest against the allusion made by the hon. member for Chateauguy to the course taken by some hon. gentlemen on this question, who thought proper to abandon the leader of the Opposition side of the House. He (Mr. Holton) said he would give them all the benefit of the consciousness of their position. The hon. gentleman meant to say that gentlemen on the Government side of the House were not conscientious in their desire. He (Mr. Coursol) was not prepared to say, at this stage of the Bill, after hearing the arguments that had been brought forward, whether the Supreme Court should be abolished or not. It was a question that might be reserved, and could be better discussed when the principle of the Bill came before the House at its second reading. He would tell the hon. member for Chateauguy that many of his (Mr. Holton's) friends, who voted against the amendment of the hon. the member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), would not vote against the abolition of that Court. He would be very much surprised if they did, because it would be the first time within the last five years that they voted against the desires of their leaders. As far as he (Mr. Coursol) was concerned, not being very familiar with the rules of the House, he thought the second reading of a Bill meant the stage at which its merits could be discussed. He thought that the Parliament which had created the Supreme Court had the right to discuss whether or not that Court should be abolished. Hon. gentlemen had been charged with not having prevented the Bill being presented to the House. How could the Government or the Minister of Justice prevent any individual member bringing in a Bill to abolish the Court? He had no desire to say a word against the Judges of the Supreme Court. It would be a want of decency, it would be a want of decency to which the hon. member for Chateauguy (Mr. Holton) had so often alluded to; but, at the same time, it was a matter of opinion whether this country ought to bear the expense of such a Court. It was a question for the Province of Quebec, of which he was one of the representatives, whether that Court was not too expensive for the country at large. It was a question to be considered on its merits, and not as a partisanship measure. There was one member of that Court to whom allusion had probably been made. His knowledge and ability, in the exercise of his duty, had been conceded. He had been recognised by Sir Louis Lafontaine, as one of the cleverest and ablest jurists in the Province of Quebec. But his presence on the Supreme Court bench could not materially alter the case. They had, as Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals of Quebec, Sir A. A. Dorion, who was assisted by other able Judges, and the people of that Province were perfectly satisfied with the judgments rendered by that Court, without going to the Supreme Court. Personally, if he had anything to risk, or his advice were asked, he would be satisfied to accept the opinion of that Court. He wanted his opinion to be recorded that he had voted for the motion fixing the second reading of the Bill, in order that when the Bill would be read the second time there might be a fair discussion on it, and if it turned out that it was advisable to abolish the Court, he would vote for its abolition.

MR. MILLS said he wished to call the attention of the First Minister to what he thought was a serious—

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order; the hon. gentleman has already spoken.

MR. MILLS: I spoke before the vote was taken.

MR. McCARTHY: The hon. gentleman has spoken since the vote was taken, and I replied to him.

MR. MILLS: I rise to a point of order. The hon. the leader of the Government was—

MR. RYKERT: I rise to a point of order.

MR. MILLS: It is to a point of order I rise.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) has risen to a point of order.

MR. MILLS: Before I discuss the point of of order—

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman has risen to a point of order, and he must state it.

MR. MILLS: I will speak to the point of order, and to other matters as well. I stand by my right.

Some HON. MEMBERS: The hon. gentleman has spoken four times on this question.

MR. MILLS: No, I have not. The hon. gentleman replied to the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), then he again replied to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin).

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the House should settle the point of practice. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) had risen to a point of order, or he had not. If he had risen to a point of order, he should state that point of order. Then, afterwards, the House could settle the question of the hon. gentleman speaking again.

MR. MILLS said that he had a right to proceed with the discussion apart from the point of order—he had the floor.

MR. SPEAKER said that so many members had spoken on this question that he did not remember whether the hon. member for Bothwell had spoken on the main question or not.

MR. MILLS said that the First Minister stated that the instance cited by the hon. member for Lambton was not in point; now the rule laid down by Mr.

Gladstone was this: that where the title disclosed the nature of the Bill, and it was in its whole scope and object objectionable, one was bound at every stage to vote against it. What was the title of this Bill? A Bill to abolish the Supreme Court. Any gentleman not prepared to abolish that Court had no right to support any reading of the Bill, and had committed himself improperly in so doing. The Minister of Justice had a Bill before Parliament to amend the Supreme Court Act. He could not take the first step with it until that vote had been rescinded by a rejection of the second reading. It was a rule laid down by May that, where the House had committed itself in favour of a proposition, it could not entertain another measure the very opposite, until that proposition was rejected.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: So, if a member votes for the introduction of a Bill, he cannot change his mind or vote against it afterwards.

MR. MILLS said that his voting for it committed him to the Bill, but not to every stage. He was at liberty to change his mind, but it must be on the same Bill. Supposing when the motion for the second reading of the Supreme Court Acts Amendment Bill was submitted, objection was taken that the House had already expressed itself in favour of the abolition of that Court, they could not, in his opinion, proceed further—they could not reach a vote, otherwise they might carry two inconsistent measures. The rules of the House, when invoked, would prevent such a proceeding.

MR. MACMILLAN said as one of the members who had voted against the Supreme Court Bill, he was very glad to see the Bill of the member for East Northumberland introduced. He did not desire to do away with that Court absolutely, but to take advantage of that motion with a view to the introduction of any amendments they might think necessary, and the placing of his views properly before the country. Speaking more particularly of Ontario, as had been stated by many of the lay members, they had too many Courts. Some few years ago they had three Courts of concurrent jurisdiction, the Courts of Chancery, Common Pleas, and Queen's Bench, the nine Judges of which formed the Court of Error and Appeal. A new Court was formed, the Court of Appeal, by the Minister of Justice in the House at that time, which consisted of a Chief Justice and three Puisne Judges. There is now an appeal from either of the three Courts of original jurisdiction. The Court of Chancery, the Court of Common Pleas, and the Court of Queen's Bench to the Court of Appeal. From that, there was an appeal to the Supreme Court. It had been remarked that decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench had been systematically reversed by the Court of Appeals, and, as if the Supreme Court was desirous of showing their authority, they in turn, reversed its judgments. Consequently, they were in just as bad a position—and in a much more doubtful position than they occupied when before the old Court of Error and Appeal. His desire was that the Court of Appeal in Ontario should be done away with as soon as possible. If they were to have a Court of Appeal, let it be formed as before, the Judges of the three Courts sitting conjointly—three of whom were Equity Judges, the other six, Common Law. If they were to have an appeal from them, let it be to the Supreme Court. At this moment, he had considerable doubt whether they got judgments in that Court even equal to those given in the Court of Error and Appeal, in the Province of Ontario—for this reason: there were four English-speaking Judges on its bench, and two French-speaking, and instead of having a judgment of nine Judges as before, they had the judgment of the four or two, respectively, as the cases concerned Ontario or Quebec. It was made a condition precedent of the formation of the Supreme Court that two of the Judges should be from Quebec, the consequence being that all the other Provinces had the benefit of the judgment of but four of those Judges, and Quebec that of but its two representative Judges. He would very much rather have the judgment of the three Courts—of even that of the Court of Appeal in Ontario, than that of the Supreme Court. He was saying nothing against the Judges of the Supreme Court, who might be men of as exalted ability as those of any Court; but the old principle, upon which they acted from Confederation up to 1876, should have been continued for a considerable time longer. It was not absolutely necessary to establish a Supreme Court which cost about $70,000 a year; it could have been done without for some years longer. He would not have made those remarks had not the amendment been proposed; but he would have gone more fully into this question had he had the slightest expectation of their being compelled to express their opinions on this occasion. He thought the Bill would go to a second reading, and at that stage he would express his opinions much more strongly, and with the view of decreasing the expenditure of that Court.

MR. KEELER rose to address the House.

MR. RYKERT said he rose to a point of order. The hon. member had spoken twice. On several occasions Mr. Speaker had decided that no member could speak two or three times on the same subject. He wished the rule laid down.

MR. SPEAKER said it was very well understood that no member could speak twice, except on very special occasions. The hon. member for East Northumberland had moved the second reading of the Bill, and spoken on it, as he had a right to do; but he had no further right to speak. He knew that although it was the rule members should not speak more than once, their disregard of it was frequently overlooked. The hon. member was entitled to make personal explanations.

MR. RYKERT said Mr. Speaker had ruled differently the other day, and the next time he raised the question he would appeal to the House for its decision.

MR. KEELER said that the member for Centre Huron had commented upon his motion as that of a member who desired to play a practical joke. He had no such intention, feeling that he was not sent to Parliament for that purpose. He should be ashamed of himself, or of appearing before his constituents if guilty of any such practice. He intended to follow this matter through to the end, and to ascertain whether there was a majority in the House willing to perpetuate such a system of extravagance and waste of public money as the Supreme Court involved. So far as the charge of his having been made a cat's-paw of by the leader of the Government, he repeated that no hon. gentleman inside the House had had a word with him on the subject. He was very proud to know that he had been enabled to elicit the largest vote taken this Session in support of his motion. As to the question of courtesy, he could well afford to excuse the leader of the Opposition for what he had said, after the defeat he had suffered. He thought he would survive all the discourtesy the hon. member could show him.

After Recess.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

In answer to Mr. BUNSTER,

Mr. TUPPER said that the moment the tariff was disposed of, or there was a suitable opportunity, the Government would be prepared to lay before the House their propositions with regard to the prosecution of the Canada Pacific Railway.

NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 64.]

(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. CAMERON (North Victoria) said he felt it to be his duty to protest against the legislation of the character which was sought to be enacted by the Bill now before the House. He protested against it on the ground that it was a violation of the compact between the parties concerned in this matter, which compact had been sanctioned by a vote of this House and by an Act passed by the Parliament of Canada. The object of this Bill was to set aside an arrangement which was made by the Act of 1877, under which it was provided that the shareholders who now asked to have three directors, should have one director. That Act was passed as the result of an arrangement made between the bondholders and the stockholders at that time. The shareholders then were not in a position even to elect one director, except by the consent of the bondholders, because the previous legislation having provided that bondholders and shareholders should vote pari passu, the result was that, as the bonds so far exceeded the shares in amount, the stockholders had no power to elect even one director. They remonstrated against that in 1877, and, as a matter of compromise between the parties, the bondholders consented that the shareholders should have the right to elect one director from amongst themselves, that, in fact, the shareholders should vote separately from the bondholders, so that the bondholders should elect a certain number of directors, and the shareholders one. That arrangement was embodied in an Act of Parliament passed in 1877. On the strength of that Act, capitalists in England advanced very large sums of money, and the good faith of Canada was pledged to the maintenance of that arrangement. A large issue of bonds took place, the money was applied to the payment of the Government claim, the Government lien was wiped out, the bonds were sold upon the faith of that Act, and now it was sought to set the Act aside, and Parliament was asked to commit what the people in England, who had advanced the money, would look upon as a gross breach of faith towards them, and utterly contrary to the arrangement on the strength of which they advanced the money. In proof of this, he would refer to the petition which had been laid before the House, and which was signed by the bondholders of the company in England, representing £337,000 sterling they had advanced on the strength of the legislation. The first petitioner was the Right Hon. W. H. Smith, First Lord of the Admiralty, and the mere fact of his name being attached to the petition ought to convince the House that they should give the petition some consideration. The next petitioner was Sir Henry Jackson, a member of the British House of Commons, one of the leading lawyers at the Equity Bar, and a man of immense influence in England, and the other signatures were those of men of high standing in the commercial world of England. If they felt so strongly as they had expressed themselves in this petition, that this particular Bill was an infraction of their rights and a violation of the good faith of the Parliament of Canada, on the strength of which they had advanced their money, he thought this House should pause before it sanctioned, by even allowing it to go to a second reading, legislation of that character, which had met with such strong disapprobation from these gentlemen. The object of this attempted legislation was to take the control of the affairs of the Northern Railway of Canada out of the hands of the bondholders, and to hand it over to the stockholders. He would ask the House to consider for a moment, whether that would be right. The shareholders represented, altogether, £85,000 sterling worth of stock, apart from the municipal stock, and that need not be considered, because the two municipalities which had stock in this railroad, the municipality of Toronto and the municipality of the county of Simcoe, were each entitled to a director; while the bond debt of the company only amounted to £1,233,000 sterling, so that £85,000 worth of stock sought to get the control of £1,200,000 sterling. The affairs of the company were managed by a Canadian directorate. It was true there were certain English directors, but, as they lived in England, they had no control over the management of affairs. This Canadian Board was elected by the English bondholders, to the extent of all, except the two municipal directors, and the one director elected by the shareholders. It was proposed to give the shareholders three directors, which with the two municipal directors who had the same interest as they, would give them complete control of the management of the affairs of the company. These bondholders had advanced them money since 1859 on the strength of this legislation, which gave them the right to vote in proportion to the amount of their bonds; and to pass this Act would be an utter and gross violation of the good faith of the Parliament of Canada towards those parties. It would be introducing a very dangerous and suicidal principle into our legislation; it would be equivalent to telling the people in England that they should not have confidence in our Acts of Parliament, that when we passed an Act which gave them certain rights, they might expect that, in a year or two afterwards, all those rights would be taken away at the instigation of local and personal interests, because this Bill was promoted by local and personal interests in the Province of Ontario. He had examined the petition in favour of this Bill presented to the House, and he found that the petitioners, who were thirteen in number, represented altogether £2,600 of stock, if we struck out of the number the signature of one gentleman who did not own a dollar's worth of stock of his own, but was simply the representative of some American stockholders. Under these circumstances, the House should be very careful before assenting to legislation of this kind, which was calculated to have the most prejudicial effect on Canadian securities, and which was sought for by an insignificant minority of the parties interested in the company. He had at first intended to oppose the Bill in toto on its second reading, on the ground that, as a matter of principle, it was wrong, and, therefore, should then be opposed. He had since had reason to doubt whether, according to the practice which of late years had prevailed in Parliament in reference to Bills of this character, the fact of a Bill going to the Railway Committee was any recognition of its principle. If he suspected for a moment that the House, by allowing it to pass the second reading and to go to the Railway Committee, would sanction its principle, he would feel it his duty to move the rejection of the second reading. As of late years, however, it was considered that Bills of this character might be allowed to pass the second reading without that being any recognition of their principle, he felt he had done his duty as a representative in this House in condemning, in the most emphatic terms, legislation of this character, by saying that, while he did not now move the rejection for three months of the second reading of the Bill, it was only right that the House, when asked to assent to the second reading, should express by its voice, if not by its vote, its condemnation of the principle upon which the Bill rested. And while he had perfect confidence that the Railway Committee, as well as the House, when the matter was investigated on its merits, would be prepared to say that no legislation of this kind ought to be passed, he did not think it necessary at present to move the total rejection of the Bill at the second reading. If the Railway Committee were not as large as it was, one which fully expressed the sense of the House, he would feel it his duty to move the rejection in toto of the second reading of the Bill; but as the matter stood, he felt he had sufficiently done his duty by calling the attention of the House to the violation of principle and the impropriety of the legislation now asked for.

MR. ROBINSON said he must take advantage of this opportunity, on behalf of the private shareholders, many of whom he knew personally, and also on behalf of the shareholders, who were represented by two municipalities—two of the largest municipalities, perhaps, in Ontario, the one the city of Toronto and the other the county of Simcoe—to take, in the first instance, direct issue with his hon. friend in some of his statements. The hon. gentleman described the introduction of this Bill to a desire to violate a distinct compact. He (Mr. Robinson) defied his hon. friend to show, to prove the slightest violation of any compact made at any time, in the request now before the House. If there was, why did not the hon. gentleman take up the Statute under which the company was constituted, and to which he referred. He did not do so, because he knew quite well that he could find no violation of any compact whatever through it. On the contrary, there had been no desire on the part of the shareholders to act with the slightest injustice towards the bondholders of the Northern Railway. If there was such a desire, they never had a better opportunity than they had under this Act, which his hon. friend could have quoted had he thought himself justified in so doing. The hon. gentleman had said that this Act empowered the bondholders to raise a certain sum of money for certain purposes, on behalf of the Northern Railroad. They could not have raised the funds for those purposes to which his hon. friend had alluded, the improvement and the paying of the debts of the railroad, unless the shareholders had given them that privilege; and when the shareholders gave them that privilege, it did not lie in the mouth of the hon. member for North Victoria to charge the shareholders with the slightest desire to do any injustice to the bondholders. Therefore, instead of throwing the slightest impediment under the operation of this Act, as far as the interest of any man on the Northern Railroad was concerned, were he shareholder or bondholder, the shareholders, with a desire to do justice to every right represented on that road, gave their unanimous consent to these bondholders to issue their £150,000 sterling for the benefit of that road. Without that consent, the bondholders could not have taken a step in advance with the road in any way whatever. When the shareholders had done that, he (Mr. Robinson) did not think it was right in his hon. friend to stigmatise them as a miserable minority of shareholders; and, to make them appear more miserable, he compared them to one or two agents who represented the bondholders in the Old Country. They were both men of distinction, but had no right to complain of any injustice done them, as far as the working of the railway was concerned. They had, from the very time they invested their money, certainly for the last eighteen years, got their six per cent. interest, and had purchased those bonds at 65c. on the dollar. While the shareholders had never got a single dividend of any sort on the money they had invested, these bonds, purchased at 65c. on the dollar, had given an interest of six per cent. on their face value, or ten per cent. on the investment. Those were the very gentlemen represented by his hon. friend from North Victoria, whom we must laud in this House, while, at the same time, he belittled those who represented the people of this country, those who had given one million dollars, the private shareholders, and those represented by the municipalities. The "miserable minority," spoken of by his hon. friend, was represented here the other day by the Mayor of the City of Toronto, containing some 75,000 people. He believed there were not more than five or seven bondholders in England, though these might be some of the heaviest men in the country. Again, his hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) had stated that the shareholders, be they municipal or be they private, would have received at the hands of this House no justice whatever last Session; in other words, they would have had no director without the consent of the bondholders. That was only another instance of what little acquaintance his hon. friend had of the actual facts. He (Mr. Robinson) was in the House at the time, and they got one director, though they applied for two, in spite of the opposition of the bondholders. There was no consent on their part, and there was no desire, even then, to do the slightest injustice to the bondholders, but they thought the time had come when the House should give them two directors. They obtained only one director, but that one did not hesitate to state that he wanted to inform the Railway Committee that he could not, as the sole representative of the shareholders of the Northern Railway, do that justice which any man in his position, and with the responsibility which he had, would feel himself bound to do. Therefore, a great number of shareholders, backed by the city of Toronto, and by the constituency the hon. gentleman from North Victoria represented, desired to have three directors, but if the Railway Committee thought three was too many, then they asked it to give them two; but let those who represented a million dollars, who had never got any interest, let some justice be done to them when they brought to the attention of the House a Bill such as this. One other reason why the shareholders were entitled to some justice was, because they supplied the iron on the Northern Railroad from Toronto to Barrie—the $400,000 of Toronto and Simcoe alone put the iron on the road from Toronto to Barrie. When the stockholders put on this iron and steel they took stock in payment, but this stock was so overloaded by the bonds which the bondholders themselves had, Act by Act, got from this House, that the stock was not of the value which it would otherwise have been. He would say that there was no desire on the part of the shareholders to injure any interest which the bondholders might have. He represented the good-will of the shareholders towards the bondholders, and if the bondholders, represented by his hon. friend, received no greater injury from the shareholders of this road than they had already done, they would never receive any in the world. He believed the Bill had been introduced with the best intentions, not only to serve the interests of the bondholders, but to secure to the shareholders an opportunity of defending their interests. They only desired an opportunity to approach the Railway Committee. It was not an extraordinary request to make, it was made every day by persons of every interest. If they could not substantiate these assertions which they had authorised him to make on their behalf, then, of course, their case fell to the ground, and they could get no increased representation. But, if they were able to show that they could not get justice at the hands of the representatives of the bondholders, then they would only pursue that course which every other person would pursue; but they only asked, as an act of simple justice at the hands of this House, a ruling upon the truth of their representation to the Committee, which they would take the first opportunity, if they were permitted to do so, to make to the Committee upon Railways.

MR. ANGLIN asked if the hon. gentleman would state what was the amount of capital stock paid by individual stockholders, what by municipalities, and what was the amount of the bonded indebtedness.

MR. ROBINSON said he had already stated that the municipalities represented an interest of $400,000—that was to say, the municipality of Simcoe, some twenty years ago, took $200,000 of stock, upon which they had never received one dollar in interest; Toronto, at the same time, took another $200,000, upon which they had not received one dollar in interest—the private shareholders had taken $450,000 worth of stock. He believed he might say that they had $450,000 worth of paid-up stock, dollar for dollar, when the bondholders only paid 65c. on the dollar for the bonds they held to-day, and they, the shareholders, had never got any interest upon it since. The amount, therefore, of the shareholders, altogether, was something like $850,000. With the interest added, there would be quite as large a value as represented by the bondholders.

MR. ANGLIN asked what was the representation now on the Board of Directors.

MR. ROBINSON answered that there were twelve directors, of whom the shareholders had three; that was to say, nine in this country and three in England. Out of the twelve, the shareholders had three.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) said the municipal stock had nothing whatever to do with the matter, inasmuch as the city of Toronto had its own director and the county of Simcoe had its own director, so that the municipality he was concerned with was out of consideration altogether. There was one shareholder director, one city of Toronto director, and one Simcoe director; the rest of the Board were elected by the shareholders' vote, and it so happened that every director the bondholders had elected, had been a shareholder, and first qualified as a private shareholder and not as a bondholder, so that the bondholders themselves had elected five directors.

MR. MACKENZIE said when this Bill was introduced, he called the attention of the Government, and particularly of the First Minister, to its extraordinary character. Would the hon. the Minister of Public Works, as the Premier was not in his place, state what course the Government proposed, to pursue towards it?

MR. TUPPER said that his right hon. friend the Premier, proposed to allow the Bill to go to a Committee, as it was one in which testimony was proposed to be offered.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was not aware that any testimony was to be taken; would the hon. gentleman state what testimony was to be taken?

MR. TUPPER said that objections were raised, and petitions were presented, and questions were raised that could only be conveniently discussed before a Committee. His right hon. friend the leader of the Government did not assume that the second reading of the Bill was to express at all the concurrence of the House in relation to it. In relation to Railway Bills, the House had, in many cases, allowed them to go to the Railway Committee without in the least committing itself to the principle of the Bills. It was proposed to take the same course in relation to this Bill, and allow it to go to a Committee, and there to hear the promoters of the Bill, as well as the objections raised against it.

MR. MACKENZIE said, as a member of the late Administration, he felt himself responsible for the legislation had during their period. He believed the introduction of this Bill, and its second reading, with the assent of the Government, under any condition, was a thing deeply to be regretted. Whether the proportion of directors, relatively to the stock, was enough or not, a solemn engagement was entered into by which the bondholders bound themselves to raise another million of dollars, in order to complete the undertaking, upon the faith that the arrangement entered into by the Government at that time, and the Bill which was passed respecting the Company itself, should not be disturbed. Now, he was sure the hon. the Minister of Public Works must see how undesirable it was to give any colour to the impression which must prevail in England, that we were wantonly trifling with the rights of parties under the legislation of the past few years. The hon. gentleman from West Toronto was, at the present moment, extremely solicitous to have the stockholders properly represented on the Board, and he made almost a pitiable appeal to the House to grant what he considered proper representation. Now, that hon. gentleman was, for a long time, President of this Company; at that time, the stockholders had less representation on the Board than they had now, and it was only when he ceased to be President that he discovered the representation was inadequate. By the changes made since the hon. gentleman left the Board, they had an additional director, the representation was, therefore, largely in excess of what it was when that hon. gentleman was President; but, even if it had been less, when the moral sanction of the Legislature of Canada was given to the arrangement, when the bondholders undertook to raise another very large amount of money to complete the undertaking, he (Mr. Mackenzie) thought it was the duty of every public man—and he simply spoke as a public man—to resist this Bill. In his capacity as a Minister of the late Administration, he felt himself responsible for the legislation had during that period, and it was only in that character that he raised a solemn protest against the Government promoting such a measure as this, or allowing it to pass even to a second reading. It was essential to the interest of the country that faith be kept with those who had advanced money for our railway enterprises; whether the bonds were issued at par or at a certain discount was another matter. He believed there was no transaction where the bondholders had done more for an enterprise than they had in this. It was well known that he had no sympathy with the manner in which the enterprise was managed as a railway; it was well known that he expressed his views respecting that management, and they had not been changed. He spoke solely as a public man respecting the influence which such legislation as this must have upon the public mind in England. We knew that four or five of the most prominent financial men in London were bondholders in this concern, one of them holding there a high official position in the Government, and others being members of Parliament or members of the Stock Exchange. This measure would be disastrous to the national interests and to every interest where we sought the aid of English capital; it would be disastrous to such interests if the Government of this country permitted such legislation as this to be carried on. He could not see, even if the Bill were passed, what benefit it would give, except that another director would be obtained, and another call would be made next year. These gentlemen wished to obtain control of the Board, where they had very little money. In addition to what the hon. member for North Victoria had said, they might state that many of these stockholders bought the stock they held at one cent on the dollar. That was perfectly well known, and it was considered utterly valueless, and if it had any value at all, it was owing to the forbearance of the Canadian Parliament, in accepting $1,000,000 in lieu of the payment of the entire debt. If the stock had any value, it was in consequence of the sacrifice of public interest that was made in order that the railway should not be finally closed. There was, therefore, no ground whatever for seeking the legislation that was now sought, and he must really appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite to take such action with respect to this matter as would vindicate the fair fame of the country, and tell the English money-lenders that when money was advanced on the faith of Canadian legislation, that legislation should be held sacred against every influence that was exerted to upset it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not think the hon. gentleman who had just spoken had advanced the opposition to this Bill by the line of argument he had taken. He had stated that the bondholders consisted of some of the chief men in England; that one man was a member of Parliament, and that they should be very guarded. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) was of opinion that they should carry on their legislation whether the bondholders were kings, princes, governors, or millionaires on change. He admitted that they ought to be guarded in their legislation, but legislation did not depend upon the first or second reading of a Bill. It depended upon the deliberate decision of Parliament, and he was quite sure that when this House, as one branch of Parliament, when they came to finally decide on this measure, would see that the public faith would be kept, and they would see further, that every corporation should observe due faith in every pledge made, and every obligation entered into. He did not see why the House should be troubled with these debates. It had been an understood arrangement since 1867, that every railway matter should be sent to the Railway Committee. This ought to have been done in this instance, although his present impression was with the hon. member for Lambton and against the shareholders. He wished to give them every chance to be heard, and they could be heard before the Railway Committee. If it was to be understood, with regard to banking, insurance, canal, and railway Bills, that they were to have a long discussion in the House on the principle involved, before they went to their respective Committees, those Committees would lose their chief value. He thought this Bill, in common with others of a like character, should go to the Committee.

Bill read the second time.

CAMPBELL'S COVE BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

QUESTION:

MR. MUTTART enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates for the completion of Campbell's Cove Breakwater, in the Province of Prince Edward Island.

MR. TUPPER: I fear it will not be in the power of the Government to provide in the Estimates for the surveys this year. But a survey will be ordered and a report made in order to enable the Government to arrive at a proper judgment in regard to the matter for another Session.

ORDNANCE LANDS IN KINGSTON.

QUESTION.

MR. SKINNER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to dispose of, by sale or otherwise, any portion of the Ordnance Lands in the city of Kingston.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There are sundry lands belonging to the Ordnance Department which are for sale. The only exception, I believe, is in regard to those lands reserved for military purposes.

EXCISE DUTY ON BEET-ROOT SUGAR.

QUESTION.

MR. SKINNER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place an Excise duty on sugar made in the Dominion from beet-root.

MR. TILLEY: The Government have no intention of interfering with the legislation passed by the House of Commons in 1873.

CLEARING OF KOOTENAY RIVER, B.C.

QUESTION.

MR. BUNSTER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates for the clearing out of the sward part of Kootenay River, in Comox, B.C.

MR. TUPPER: Although I believe this question was asked a year or two ago, I cannot find any report in the Department in reference to the matter.

The local engineer will be directed to make a survey in order that the Government may have the necessary information to enable them to take the matter into consideration at a future Session.

DISMISSAL OF STE. FLAVIE ENGINE-HOUSE SUPERINTENDENT.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. Fiset moved for copies of correspondence between the Government and any person whatsoever, respecting the dismissal of Joseph Bourdeau, Superintendent of the engine-house at Ste. Flavie, together with a statement of the reasons for that dismissal. He said that some years previous, at the death of Mr. Fary, Mr. J. Bourdeau had been appointed Superintendent of the engine-house at St. Flavie. His capacity and his honesty had been his only recommendation. He (Mr. Fiset) thought that, since then, Mr. Bourdeau had fulfilled the duties of his employment to the entire satisfaction of those who had appointed him. Lately, however, he had undergone a first enquiry, and as it seemed nothing could be proved against him, Mr. Bourdeau had been maintained in his position. But that was not what those who desired to be revenged of Mr. Bourdeau wanted. A second enquiry was established, and this time Mr. Bourdeau was dismissed. He would not repeat what he had already said respecting the dismissal of public officials who might have taken part in an election. It was well known what tyranny was exercised in the county of Rimouski against those who had been favourable to him (Mr. Fiset). All he wished was to raise in public esteem those whose characters might suffer from these dismissals, made for political reasons, and he would consider himself recreant to his duty if he did not do so. This House was well aware that to dismiss an official was, generally, to injure his professional character, and, often, to turn him and his family out of doors by preventing him from finding employment elsewhere. He, therefore, ventured to hope that the Government would not oppose the motion.

Mr. TUPPER said he thought he would ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw this motion, as, he believed, he could satisfy the House that all reasonable ground for making that application had been removed. He drew the attention of the House, a short time ago, to the inconvenience of having matters of this kind brought under the notice of the House in this very formal way. The ground on which he asked the hon. gentleman to withdraw this motion was, that it was already covered by a motion and a return granted to this House. The return included all the information contained in Mr. Schrieber's report, showing the cause of any changes. He was informed that, although charges of a very grave nature were brought against this man, such as habits of intemperance, as to entirely unfit him for the position he held, and they had been proven and sustained on examination—notwithstanding that, he was allowed to retire under the reorganisation. Mr. Schrieber's report, which would be submitted to the House, covered this case as well as others. In view of these charges, which had been sustained, this man would have been formally dismissed, even if he had not been allowed to retire under the reorganization.

MR. Fiset said that the hon. the Minister of Public Works having stated that all the papers concerning the dismissal of Mr. J. Bourdeau would be produced in the report of Mr. Schrieber, asked for at the beginning of the Session, he had no objection to withdraw his motion. But, at the same time, he must protest energetically against the insinuation that had been made, to wit: that Mr. J. Bourdeau was intemperate. He emphatically denied that assertion.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

REMOVAL OF ST. FABIEN POSTMASTER.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. Fiset moved for copies of correspondence between the Government and the postmaster of the parish of St. Fabien, Mr. Vidal Roy, and any other person, respecting the change in the post-office of that parish, together with a statement of the reasons for which Mr. Vidal Roy was replaced by another person as postmaster of that place. He said that the reasons for which he asked for the correspondence relating to the removal of the post-office and the postmaster in the parish of St. Fabien, were the following:—Mr. Vidal Roy, a respectable citizen of this parish, had been postmaster there for more than twenty-two years. That was the best proof that he had fulfilled the duties of his office to the satisfaction of the Government, and of the persons interested. He had always kept his office at the same place, that was to say, at a distance of five or six acres from the church, without there being any complaint made by the persons of the locality. This year, the Post Office Department had seen fit to order Mr. Roy to transport his office near the church. He could only conjecture at the reason for this action; but, what he knew better was, that the great majority of the parish of St. Fabien, which was favourable to him (Mr. Fiset), not to say the almost totality, had not asked for this change, and it was to please a few partisans that the Government might still retain in that locality, that this change had been made. The Ministry was certainly to blame for having acted thus. By obliging Mr. Roy to change his office, the Government, in reality, dismissed him, for the Department knew right well that it was not for $30 or $40 per annum, that this office might give, that Mr. Roy would consent to rent, outside of his own house, another office, where he would have been obliged to be continually present. At the same time the Government were depriving themselves of the services of an old and tried official, who was well known, and who had faithfully fulfilled his duties, in order to accept the services of another person who might be respectable, but who was completely unknown to the Department. Those were the reasons that had caused him to move the present motion.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there could be no objection to these papers being brought down, and they would be brought down. He held in his hand a memorandum from the Post Office Department, to which, in the absence of the Postmaster-General, he would call the attention of the House. It appeared that the post-office was so inconveniently situated for the people who were served by it, that on the 14th December, 1878, the Post Office Inspector at Quebec was instructed to call upon the postmaster at St. Fabien, to remove the post-office to a more central position for the accommodation of the people who were served by that post-office. On the 20th December, the Post Office Inspector reported that the postmaster would remove, but asked until January to do so. On the 24th January, 1879, the postmaster asked for further delay to remove the post-office to a more convenient place. On the 24th February, the postmaster, who had promised to remove on the 1st January, stated he could not remove without considerable expense, and added, that if the matter was pressed, he must resign. Well, on the 10th March following, a new postmaster was appointed, because the late postmaster would not remove, and had stated that if asked to remove he must resign.

MR. Fiset said he desired to know if a petition had not been sent by the inhabitants of that place to have the post-office near the church.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was unable to inform the hon. gentleman on that point. He did not know anything more about it than he (Mr. Fiset) did. He had no doubt that the matter was brought before the Postmaster-General by some application or petition from the parish of St. Fabien.

Motion agreed to.

NEW BRUNSWICK'S CLAIMS AGAINST THE DOMINION.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. BURPEE (Sunbury) moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government of New Brunswick and the Government of the Dominion, relating to certain claims preferred by the former against the latter Government; also, all Orders in Council relating to the same, since the first day of April, 1878. He said he had, during the last Session of Parliament, moved for all correspondence between the Government of New Brunswick and the Dominion, with regard to the Provincial claims. It being then late in the Session, the Government had consented that the rather voluminous papers should be examined by him, and a selection made from them, such as might be thought necessary, without waiting the formality of bringing them down. He had attended to that duty. During the present Session he had addressed an enquiry to the Government, on the subject of a certain piece of road built by the Government of New Brunswick, and now part of the Intercolonial Railway, and had been told by the Finance Minister that the matter had been before the late Government, and they had not settled it, and it had also been before the present Government and they had not done so either. The inference might be that because the late Government had not attended to this matter the present Government need not do so. He did not think this was the intention of the Government, although the answer of the Finance Minister might bear that construction. He (Mr. Burpee) did not mean to stigmatise the action of either Government in the matter. Under the late Government negotiations had been entered into on the part of the Government of New Brunswick in respect of a sum claimed on account of the construction of what was known there as Eastern Extension, which now formed part of the Intercolonial. In this work the Province had expended $400,000 on the district, understanding that when the Intercolonial was built under the Imperial guarantee it should form a part. The road was taken as a part of the Intercolonial, when hon. gentleman opposite were in power in 1869, but for some reasons, which he need not now enter into, only $250,000 was allowed in lieu of the $400,000 the Local Government had spent on the work. The Local Government claimed, and the people of New Brunswick thought, they were justly entitled to receive the remaining $150,000. Since the last Session of Parliament when a deputation from the New Brunswick Government were at Ottawa, the matter had excited a good deal of interest among the people of the Province. The deputation when here had interviewed the members of the Government, and had called a meeting of the representatives of the Province, placed the case fully before them, and asked them to urge it as strongly as possible on the attention of the Government. In the pressure of Parliamentary work it was difficult to get time for the full consideration of so large a question, but some progress was made. In regard to the claim on account of the Penitentiary, it was proposed by members from New Brunswick, and assented to by members of the Government, that, as there was a constitutional point involved, the matter might be left for the decision of the Supreme Court. The contention of the Local Government was that, under the British North America Act, this Parliament had not power to pass an Act which excluded them from sending prisoners for a shorter term than two years to the Penitentiary, as they had formerly the right to do, thus entailing upon them the cost of maintaining these short-term prisoners, in violation of the original contract between the Province and the city and county of St. John. He (Mr. Burpee) had hoped this matter might have gone to our Supreme Court for a decision, and had himself spoken with the Attorney-General of New Brunswick on the subject, who had quite agreed with this view. Since that time he believed there had been a report made by the Deputy Minister of Justice, who had decided against the claim without leaving the matter to the Court. He thought the claim of the Province on account of the Lazaretto at Tracadie had been very strongly stated by the hon. member for Gloucester, and he would not go into it, but hoped that the hon. gentleman in whose county the unfortunate class for whom the Lazaretto was kept were located, would again discuss it. These claims had been put forward in 1874, and had been discussed from time to time since that date. They had been twice referred to by the Lieutenant-Governor in his Speech from the Throne, in opening the Provincial Legislature, and had again been referred to by the Attorney-General during the Session of this year. That gentleman had stated that it was not creditable to the present Government of the Dominion, nor to the late Government, that the matter had not been settled, nor did it add to the dignity of the Local Government that they should have this, year after year, to ask for what was their undoubted right. It had been referred to by the late Lieutenant-Governor, now the Finance Minister of Canada, in his speech from the Throne, last year, in the following terms :—

"I have caused renewed representations to be made to the Government at Ottawa concerning the claim of the Province to the sum of $150,000, in respect of the Eastern Extension Railway. This matter was brought under the consideration of the Dominion Government, in the month of December, 1874, and no conclusion having been reached, I deemed it advisable to send members of my Government to Ottawa, early in the present Session of Parliament, to endeavour to obtain, through the co-operation of the Senators and members of the House of Commons, respecting the Province, a settlement of this and other matters. I am glad to be able to say that, with few exceptions, the members representing the Province, cordially co-operated with the members of my Government. The Provincial investment in the Eastern Extension Railway was made for a work undertaken by the Province in 1865, as part of the Inter-colonial Railway, and in view of a previous assurance of the Imperial Government that New Brunswick should not be prejudiced by commencing that portion of the work in anticipation of a final arrangement for the construction of the whole line, and that the Imperial guarantee, when given (as it subsequently was given by the Imperial Government and accepted by Canada), should cover this portion of the road. The road was subsequently adopted by the Dominion Government as part of the Intercolonial Railway, but the Province has, this far, received from Canada only $250,000 out of the $400,000 put into the road by the Province. There can be no doubt of the right of the Province to receive the sum of $150,000 on this account with interest."

It was true these were the sentiments of the Local Government, put into the mouth of the present Finance Minister, then the Lieutenant-Governor, but he had no doubt adopted them, and this he (Mr. Burpee) thought afforded a favourable omen for their future success. The President of the Executive Council, who was a member of the Legislative Council, in a speech before that body, had warned the representatives of that Province in the Commons, that the people would hold them responsible for the payment of these claims. That was just before the late elections. The people did hold them responsible, and it was particularly referred to during the campaign. He was aware of the difficulties that were in the way, and he thought the late Government may have been tardy in the matter. He did not blame the present Government yet, but he thought the claim should be settled. He agreed with the Attorney-General of New Brunswick, that it was not creditable that these matters should be so long pending. The people of New Brunswick were not asking for better terms, they were asking for justice and nothing more.

MR. TILLEY enquired, Whether it was all the correspondence from the first, or only since last year, that was asked for.

MR. BURPEE said only the papers and correspondence since last year was what he asked for. The case submitted last year by the delegates of the Provincial Government only embraced the Eastern Extension, the Lazaretto and the Penitentiary. The papers referring to those claims had been selected and brought down up to that date. But he found that the Provincial Secretary of New Brunswick, in his Budget Speech, had preferred three additional claims, namely, one share of the Fishery Award, the $10,000 claimed as due on account of immigration and colonisation, and the continuation of the $63,000 subsidy which had expired. He presumed there must have been correspondence between the two Governments with reference to these claims, and further correspondence with reference to the old claim which was what he required.

MR. TILLEY said he had no objection to the correspondence coming down. The only communication he remembered was with reference to their share of the Fishery Award.

MR. ANGLIN said the hon. member for Sunbury had appealed to him to say a word in behalf of the claim that the Lazaretto should be taken in charge by the Government of the Dominion. He had the honour, several years ago, to bring that matter under the consideration of the House of Commons. At the time when Dr. Taché, one of the officers of the Department of Agriculture was sent to Gloucester by the Canadian Government, at the instance, he believed, of the Imperial Government, to make an enquiry into the origin, character, and extent of that dreadful disease, known then to exist in that part of the Dominion, he (Mr. Anglin) had the honour to obtain an Order of the House that the report of Dr. Taché, which he supposed would have been submitted very soon after the rising of Parliament, should be printed during the recess. He thought that if that report were in the hands of members, he would have very little difficulty indeed in persuading a large majority that the Dominion should do something towards the relief of the unfortunate victims of that dreadful disease, and its extinction, if possible, in that part of the country, so as to relieve the Dominion from the evil effects that must necessarily arise from the knowledge that such a disease exists in it. He had then felt it his duty to state something of its nature, and of the suffering of those afflicted with it, and to describe the character of the building and of the relief afforded. He was sorry to say that, from that day to this, the character of the building had been very little improved, possibly because during the whole time the Government of New Brunswick felt that the Government of the Dominion ought to relieve them from the obligation of taking care of the lepers. The disease was peculiar in its character, and while it was true that under Confederation the Governments of the several Provinces were obliged to provide for local charities of all kinds, it was also true that this was a peculiar and special disease such as existed in no other part of the Dominion, and he trusted never would. It seemed, therefore, to be unfair that New Brunswick should be burdened with the charge of the victims of that disease, and that it was the duty of the Government of the Dominion to assist at least in dealing with that disease. The sufferers, who were found only in a small part of Gloucester, were Acadian French. So far as he could learn, the disease first existed in Chatham, on the Miramichi River, the original victims not being French; but since it had broken out in some families of Tracadie, and to that district it was now confined. It was at first believed that the disease could be stamped out by strict regulations; the report of medical commissioners on this subject were to be found in the journals of the New Brunwick Assembly. An asylum or lazaretto was built on Shattuck Island, at the mouth of the Miramichi. This was destroyed by fire, and, as the greater number of the afflicted were found in the vicinity of Tracadie, the second lazaretto was built there, being a mere temporary wooden building with none of the conveniences necessary for such an establishment, none of the pleasant surroundings that ought to be provided for the poor people immured in it. For very many years they were shut up in this building, as if in prison, nay, rather a charnel house or a tomb, to live a living death, and to rot away piecemeal. They were surrounded by an enormous fence to prevent their escape, which precautions were necessary; for so horrible was the condition of things, that the most wretched inmates would be glad to fly anywhere, even though without a prospect of shelter or food, to escape from it. He remembered seeing those poor people when in that condition; many of them appeared a mass of rags and filth, and vermin, with no one to give them the attention they so much required. Those in a less advanced stage of the disease did attend, as best they could, to the more helpless. The stench was perfectly frightful; the appearance of the whole place was most revolting, that of the poor sufferers being such as to require a very great effort of humanity and kindly charity, to enable anyone to look on them, even for a moment. It was perfectly frightful to look at them, as they lay or sat up, in that establishment, with their extremities rotting away, and in many cases their faces swollen, distorted out of all resemblance to the human face divine; the cartilage of the nose rotted away, the eyes gone, the voice hollow, piping, and apparently coming from a cavern; the extremities swathed in enormous masses of bandages, saturated with fetid matter exuding from their decaying limbs. In some cases the patients were mere boys and girls from ten to twelve years of age, and some of them looked remarkably beautiful, because of the action of the disease and the fever upon them, in its early stages, giving a peculiar lustre to the eye and bloom to the cheek. On the other hand, there were some, even at this early age, whose faces were sadly disfigured, and he had seen some who, if their countenances only were seen, would be set down as being eighty years old. Some years later, a colony of ladies of the Hospital of Montreal were induced to go down and devote their lives to the care of those unfortunate patients. A miserable house, which cost ten or twelve hundred dollars to the Province, was put up for their use and attached to this barn in which the patients were kept, and they at once wrought a wonderful transformation. They were able to get the place thoroughly cleaned and whitewashed, the old beds destroyed, iron bedsteads put in, and other improvements made; so that, from that time, there had been an entire change in the whole aspect of affairs. The old building still continued there, a tumble-down, miserable structure, scarcely sufficient to shelter them from the weather in the winter season, and insufficient to afford the accommodation which ought to be provided. Those ladies served there without fee or reward, and only for the love of God. Their food was of the cheapest kind, as was usual in religious communities; their clothing was of the cheapest possible description. They cost the Province very little more than was formerly paid to the one or two women who remained about the place to do a little washing. They every day washed and dressed the dreadful sores of the poor lepers carefully, kept everything clean and neat, and were untiring in their efforts to cure the disease with all the medical assistance and skill they had been able to command; but so far their efforts had proved ineffectual. The number of inmates, however, was not so large as some years ago, and Dr. Taché was of opinion that there were symptoms of a decline of the disease, and that this was the cause of the decline in the number of patients. At one time there were almost as many as, perhaps, thirty inmates, but latterly the number was as small as seventeen; still, outside the hospital, there was quite a considerable number of persons whom it would be desirable to have within the asylum, if proper accommodation were provided for them. Some ten or twenty years ago, this place was almost out of reach. It had very little communication with the rest of the world, unless by a few small coasting vessels that traded up and down the Gulf; but latterly, since the opening of the railroad, a spirit of activity had manifested itself throughout the whole country, and, as communication between the different parts was opened up, a desire for change had reached even those liable to leprosy. A short time ago, one of those lepers, it was said, was found in Prince Edward Island, and, a year or two ago, one was found in the United States in a very deplorable condition, and sent back to Tracadie. The Dominion Government ought, he believed, to take the entire charge of the institution, because it was so peculiarly exceptional in its character that it injured the reputation of this country as a place for settlement if this disease was known to exist in it. It would be important, in that view alone, that the Dominion Government should provide for, if possible, the extinction of this terrible disease, and relieve the Government of New Brunswick of a very serious charge. Although the institution was so wretchedly insufficient, yet the support of that institution entailed a heavy burden on the Province of something in the neighbourhood of $3,000 to $4,000 per year. From the time when first he introduced this matter to the attention of the House, he had continued to press it on the members of the various Governments, and last year, through his very earnest representations and constant efforts, he succeeded in obtaining from the late Government a grant of $1,500 to be employed by the ladies in charge of the hospital to promote the welfare of the inmates, and provide those comforts or absolute necessities, which, under the present state of things, were not otherwise provided. Even with that grant the lepers were in a state which was not creditable to the Dominion. Although the Act of Confederation did not impose on the Dominion Government the duty of providing asylums and hospitals for ordinary diseases, it nevertheless imposed on it the duty of providing for quarantine, of guarding against the spread of disease under certain circumstances. He had hoped Dr. Taché would have been able to discover the origin of this disease, but he was afraid he had entirely failed. There was nothing in the climate, soil, condition of the people of that part of the country, or in the quality of their food, that could account for the existence of the disease. This disease had existed there now for some forty years or more, but for many years past had been confined to comparatively few families. Naturally enough, people of sound health would not intermarry into families in which there was any trace of the disease, and this, probably, was the reason why it had not extended more widely. But while Dr. Taché was at first of opinion that this disease was not contagious, he had since changed that opinion materially. Only one who saw lepers in the last stage of the disease, would ever imagine how great is the responsibility which rests upon those whose duty it is to do whatever can be done to extirpate that frightful disease, or to prevent its spread, if it cannot be extirpated.

MR. BUNSTER said that the danger of leprosy would exist in British Columbia so long as the Chinese were permitted to enter that Province. He fully sympathised with the hon. gentleman in his remarks on this loathsome disease, and the necessity for stamping it out by the most stringent measures, and he desired to call the attention of the Government to the fact that unless the Chinese were excluded the disease would extend in British Columbia.

LIGHTHOUSE-KEEPER AT CAPE BEALE, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. BUNSTER moved for copies of all papers and reports in relation to the appointment of Mr. Cox, keeper of the lighthouse at Cape Beale, and of all complaints against said lighthouse-keeper. He said it was his painful duty to protest against the injustice done his district, through the appointment of an incompetent man to take charge of the lighthouse at Cape Beale. The charges against that individual had been many and serious, but, strange to say, had been condoned by the late Government, and therefore, the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries did not like to interfere. It was not creditable, to either the late or present Government, that neither had taken active steps to remove this incompetent person. The man whom he, as representative of the district, had recommended, unfortunately, had a great sin against him, that he was a Catholic. He could scarcely believe this at first, but became pretty well convinced so; hence the late Government appointed a person who was not at all capable of doing the duty, as the papers would prove. The light had been left for days without being lighted. When he named a competent man to the late Government, they said: "Bunster is not a supporter of ours," and referred it to a person who was in Victoria; and he appointed a man totally incapable of taking care of the light. This would be established by the papers when brought down, and if the distance did not preclude it, he would have witnesses brought here who would astonish this House, with the way in which they could prove that lighthouse was managed. The very first person whom he recommended was recommended by all the representatives from British Columbia to act as one of the Indian Commissioners in British Columbia. For a year the Government had it under consideration; but the Hon. Mr. Blake came into the House, and he had a friend whom he recommended, and his influence being greater than that of the whole British Columbia delegation, he got his friend appointed. There was strong feeling about this appointment, and he hoped, in common fairness and justice, the Government would bring down the papers, and show what charges had been unfairly condoned by the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

SIR A. J. SMITH said Cox was appointed to the lighthouse at Herron's Island. He held that position as lighthouse-keeper until he (Sir A. J. Smith) left the Department. Some time in the previous spring a complaint was made against Cox, a copy of which he directed should be sent to Cox himself. He had no recollection of having received any answer from the lighthouse-keeper, but, at all events, he did not condone any offence of this man at all. He sent the charge to him, and required an explanation which he had not received, but his successor might know something about it.

If this light was not lighted for weeks at a time he knew nothing about it. The complaint was made in June last.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said there could be no objection to bringing down the papers, which could speak for themselves. His hon. friend was entirely mistaken in saying that this matter did not come before him. One of the charges preferred against this man was that he was in the habit of getting intoxicated and neglecting his duty. Another charge was that the revolving light was a fixed light during the whole of one night. When asked about it, he made the statement that the agent had told him that it would be better to allow it to remain as a fixed light. The agent entirely denied this, but Cox repeated his statement. During the hon. gentleman's (Sir A. J. Smith's) time he condoned this offence, and sent out a caution to this man, telling him in future to be more particular, and see that his light was properly kept. Other charges had been made against this man, but, his former offences having been condoned by the late Minister, he did not go into them again.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he thought the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was quite mistaken. There would not have been time for some of these complaints, at least, to reach him (Sir A. J. Smith) before he left the Department. It might be that the deputy at the head of the Department had written to this man, and cautioned him.

MR. BUNSTER said he was satisfied the ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries had been made acquainted with charges against this man. It was quite natural for him to deny the charge of drunkenness. He (Mr. Bunster) could bring before this House evidence to substantiate his charges. Furthermore, he was informed that the late Minister did condone the offence, and that the papers would show it.

WRECKING AND COASTING IN CANADIAN WATERS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. BUNTING, in the absence of Mr. STEPHENSON, moved for copies of all correspondence in possession of the Government, received from all sources, since 1874, relating to wrecking and coasting in Canadian waters; reciprocity with the United States in these matters, together with the report of Mr. John Lewis, to the Minister of Customs, which he was authorised to make, with respect to wrecking and towing, etc., in Canadian waters.

FRENCH COPIES OF THE TARIFF.

REMARKS.

MR. CASGRAIN said that he had placed on the Orders of the Day a notice of motion, in order to procure for himself, as well as for the other Quebec members, copies of the tariff in French, for distribution in the different counties, whilst the tariff was being discussed. This request which he had made at the beginning of the debate on this question, had been partly complied with, inasmuch as French-speaking members had since obtained a certain number of copies. But he could not allow this motion to pass in silence, and without remarking that it was by special request, and thanks to the kindness of Mr. Speaker, that he had been able, at the time, to procure ten copies of this tariff. No doubt it had been thought that members could dispense with French copies, just as the House could dispense with French Ministers, seeing that at this moment there was not one of them present. Under these circumstances, he would not insist upon his motion, since the object he had had in view had been partially attained. He would, therefore, consent to withdraw the motion. If he had made this request, it was in order to satisfy his constituents, whom he desired to consult, and he could state, as a matter of fact, that this tariff had been discussed in a great measure, without members having copies thereof to communicate to their electors. Now that the hon. the Prime Minister had promised that copies would be obtainable as soon as the tariff was reprinted, he desired to reiterate his request, that there should be copies in French. He would like to know whether the hon. the Prime Minister would give an answer to that question.

SIR JOHN A MACDONALD said he knew that orders were given that the tariff should be printed in a separate form, to a considerable extent, and that it should be printed in French as well as English. Whether the exact number of 650 was ordered, he could not say, but he believed there was a large edition of the tariff printed in both languages.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. MCINNIS moved for copies: 1. Of all papers and documents, including specifications, relating to the construction of the British Columbia Penitentiary, from November, 1874, to September, 1878; 2. The minutes made by the Inspector of Penitentiaries on his visit of inspection, in September last; 3. The amount paid Mr. John Kirckland, late inspector of the building, for taking care of Penitentiary from December 1st, 1876, to September 27th, 1878; 4. A detailed statement of prices paid Mr. James Cunningham, of New Westminster, B.C., for stoves, etc., from completion of building in November, 1876, to 1st January, 1879; 5. The leasing of water frontage of Penitentiary grounds to Messrs. Cunningham and Holbrook, for fish-curing purposes, for a term of ten years. He said he moved for these papers for the purpose of bringing to the notice of the House, what he believed to be one of the worst pieces of jobbery that had taken place in this country for many a day, and which he sincerely trusted never would be repeated. In the summer of 1874 tenders were called for the construction of British Columbia's Penitentiary. In the fall of the said year the contract was awarded to Messrs. Kinsman and Styles, of Victoria, B.C., for the sum of $149,000. The building was completed the last of November, 1876, according to the terms of the contract. The local engineer, Mr. Pierce, in selecting the site he did—disregarded the instructions he received from the Dominion Architect. The plans, specifications, and a sketch of the ground were sent to the local engineer, with the instructions that the building should be placed on the summit of the hill, or table land, some fifty yards further back from the river than where it now stands. Instead of carrying out the instructions of the Chief Engineer, the local engineer took it upon himself to select a site some fifty yards further down on the side of a steep hill. The hill was so steep that fifteen feet of dirt had to be removed from the upper side before the first stone could be laid for the foundation. Owing to the large amount of surface water, especially during the rainy season, rushing down the steep hill, and the defective drains, the foundation was fast giving away, and now he was informed that the local engineer recommended a retaining wall to be built of from four to six feet thick, all around the Penitentiary up to the windows of the first story, in order to save the building from collapsing. Every drain in connection with the building was defective. They are, or rather were, intended to be what was called blind drains, and he assured the House they have succeeded admirably well—at least, as far as the name was concerned, for they are thus blind—choked up, and scarcely a drop of water can percolate through them. The outer walls of the building were constructed of a very superior quality of native free stone, with which he had no fault to find; but he regretted to say he could not say the same of the inner walls, which were built of what the contractors, the inspector of the building and local engineer were pleased to call brick, and for the want of a better name he supposed he would have to call them brick, too. They were little, if any, better than sun-dried clay. They were so soft that a person with an ordinary pocket knife could cut out half a dozen in almost as many minutes. They were fast crumbling away and the plaster falling off. Owing to the lower story being more under ground than otherwise, the plaster on the first two flats, especially in the lower story, was quite wet and dead. It had never dried, and he believed never would dry, and there was nothing left but to replaster the walls. He was credibly informed by some of the most reliable mechanics employed in the construction of the building, that there was great danger of a complete collapse of the building, on account of the inferior quality of the material used. The wood work was on a par with the brick work. He was informed that the lumber used in the building was growing in the forests of British Columbia six months before it was used. At all events, the lumber was unseasoned and ought never to have been used in the raw, green condition in which it was. Every board on the floors was from a quarter to half an inch from its fellows, and it was impossible to scrub the floors without the water running through and ruining the plaster of the ceilings beneath. A number of the mantel-pieces and frame-work round the chimneys in the officers' quarters, fell down before the building was occupied two months. The local engineer recommended that either the present floors be taken up, or that the new ones be laid over those already existing. The only means of heating the convict portion of the Penitentiary was by one small stove. There were three other stoves there, but they could not be used, as there was only one chimney, the flue of which was only nine inches square, and into which the local engineer directed that four stovepipes—leading from as many stoves—were to be inserted. As a natural consequence, the whole building was filled with smoke, and the fires had to be discontinued in all the stoves but one. The three unused stoves still remain in their places—as so many monuments of the wonderful ingenuity of our engineers in endeavouring to pervert the immutable laws of nature. There were two very necessary closets in the building, which, from a sanitary point of view, could not be too strongly condemned; suffice it to say they were unprovided with valves, and disinfectants had to be used continuously in order to prevent an outbreak of typhoid fever. In the basement, and many other portions of the building to which prisoners had access, the windows were unprovided with bars necessary to prevent escapes. To show that he had not coloured his statement in the least, he would read a few clauses from the report of the Inspector of Penitentiaries for the past year. It was as follows:—

"This Penitentiary has been built on precisely the same plan as the one in Manitoba.

"A sad mistake was made in selecting the site. The building should have been placed on the table-land, instead of on the side of the hill, where it serves as a dam to oppose the progress of the water, which, in the rainy season, percolates the gravelly soil in volume. The consequence is, the walls in the foundation and in the several apartments in the basement, including a range of cells, are so saturated with moisture that the plaster has become dead and must be replaced.

"The defects noticed in the Manitoba Penitentiary are still worse in this institution.

"Here, likewise, an engine or furnace room is likely to be a useless appendage for some time to come, as there are no appliances leading from it for heating. All the stovepipes from the prison proper and the drying room lead into one narrow chimney, the only one provided for all the stoves required to heat the corridors surrounding the cells, the basement, dormitory, and the drying room. The solitary chimney not being of sufficient capacity, there remains the alternative of discomfort from blinding smoke or piercing cold.

"The brick work in the interior is of the worst description, not having been properly burned, if burned at all, for it is said they were baked in the sun, the bricks are mouldering already.

"The flooring, doors, surbases and wood work, generally, are of unseasoned timber. The shrinkage is so great that it will be necessary to either replace the flooring to a large extent, or take it up and relay it anew. The tongue has so far parted from the groove as to render the use of soap and water for scrubbing purposes a process not to be attempted, unless to the irreparable damage of the ceilings beneath.

"A large number of windows in parts of the building to which convicts have access have been left unprovided with iron bars to prevent escape. Those windows that have been protected are very insecure, because the bars have been inserted in wood."

He had next to call attention to the fact that the entire water frontage of the Penitentiary grounds were leased some years ago to Messrs. Cunningham and Holbrook, of New Westminster, B.C. He found, on reference to the Penitentiary Act of 1875, the following. In section 16, it provided that:

"Every Penitentiary now established, and every Penitentiary hereafter to be established by virtue of this Act, shall be held to include all carriages, waggons, sleighs, or other vehicles for land carriage, and all boats, scows or other vessels for water carriage, being property belonging to such Penitentiary, or employed by hire or otherwise in its service; and likewise any wharf at or near the said Penitentiary, although not within the limits mentioned in the proclamation establishing the same, but used for the accommodation of such craft, when so employed in or about any work or labour connected with such Penitentiary."

And in section 6 of the same Act, it provided that :

"No raft, boat, vessel or craft of any kind, shall moor or anchor within 300 feet of the shore or wharf bounding the lands of any Penitentiary towards any lake, arm of the sea, bay or river, without the permission of the Warden thereof being first had or obtained; and any person violating the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction thereof before a Justice of the Peace, be subject to a penalty of twenty dollars, to be levied in the usual manner upon such raft, boat, vessel or craft, in whomsoever the property thereof may be, as well as on the offender's own goods and chattels; and in default of payment of the same with the costs of suit, he shall be imprisoned at hard labour for a period not exceeding two months."

This water frontage was leased at a nominal sum for some few years, and to no other than Mr. James Cunningham, who was then a member of this House, and an unconditional supporter of the late Administration. Thus, the law could be violated with impunity, in order to confer a favour on a political friend. This wharf and entire water frontage being in the hands of Cunningham and Holbrook, consequently, if any coal or supplies were landed there for the Penitentiary, it was landed subject to the will or whim of Messrs. Cunningham and Holbrook. There was just another point he desired to call the attention of the House to. This building was completed in November, 1876. It remained unoccupied to the 27th of last September, a period of 22 months. From November, 1876, to September, 1878, not one dollar was expended in putting the building or grounds into a condition fit for occupation. During all that time the Government was paying 75c. a day for every prisoner in the jails of British Columbia, who were qualified, and ought to have been in the Penitentiary. He regretted to say that the jails were crowded all the time, but he was happy, in another sense, to say that only one-fourth of the prisoners were white men, one-fourth were Indians, and the remaining half were the miserable Chinese. They heard a little about those physical and moral lepers the other day—but half was not told. He would take the liberty of saying then, that the Chinese were a curse to British Columbia, and to every country in which they gained a permanent foothold. When it was taken into consideration that more than one-half of the prisoners in British Columbia were Chinese, and that only one-fifth of the population were Chinese, exclusive of Indians, it would give the House a pretty good idea of the peculiar traits of the Chinese character. He thought it would be wise, if for no other or higher purpose, to check the immigration of this undesirable people, and thereby save the cost of their maintenance in the jails and penitentiaries of the Province. In the twenty-two months he had referred to, the Dominion Government had paid to the British Columbia Government, at the rate of 75c. per head, $14,075. To the late inspector of works, who was appointed to take care of the building during the same period, at the rate of $3.50 per day, amounting to $2,345. This he considered was a great injustice to the prisoners and his district. In view of the facts he had given, and the imperfect manner in which the Penitentiary was built, in the first place by the local engineer disregarding the instruction of the chief engineer, the building was not erected according to the plans and specifications, and material was used contrary to what was laid down in the contract. He claimed it was the bounden duty of the Government to dismiss such an officer. He contended that it was in the interest of the Government, and the Province of British Columbia, that that course should be adopted. He (Mr. McInnes) had come to the conclusion that either Mr. Pierce was incompetent to fill the position he occupied, or was on extraordinary good terms with the contractors. He thought the papers, when they were brought down, would corroborate the whole of the statements he had made.

MR. TUPPER said he did not intend to follow the speech made by the gentleman, further than to say that the attention of the Government was called to the defective character of this work, and there was reason to believe, in fact the Department had no reason to doubt, that there was very good evidence of the defective state of the work. He had directed that measures should be taken to ascertain exactly where the fault lay, and to have a thorough examination of the whole matter, in order that the parties who were to blame might be properly dealt with. The works were, of course, constructed at a very remote distance from the chief architect, who was primarily responsible, and, of course, it was extremely difficult, in the meantime, to ascertain what was going on. The Government had no reason to doubt that the work was of a defective character, and that there had been a very great want of care on the part of those directly responsible for the due performance of the work.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was never more surprised than to hear the statement made by the hon. gentleman, because he (Mr. Mackenzie) never had any reason to doubt, from all he could learn from the papers coming from Mr. Pierce, that that gentleman was competent and honest. That seemed to be the general character which he had. For his own part, he never had the slightest doubt of Mr. Pierce's competency and honesty. If the hon. gentleman's statement was correct, some of the parties concerned were liable to prosecution. It was inconceivable that such a statement could be correct, without implying criminal neglect on the part of some one. He did not know what the hon. the Minister of Public Works proposed to do, but if there was nothing more important to detain the chief architect, he (Mr. Mackenzie) would suggest that he be sent there. It was difficult to know what to do, unless an experienced officer were sent to the spot. It would be far better to do that than run the risk of not having the matter properly looked into.

MR. TUPPER said he had directed the chief architect to proceed to British Columbia to investigate this matter personally, at the first moment he could be spared from his duties here.

MR. MCINNES said, in reply to the hon. the leader of the Opposition, that he was not speaking from hearsay or from rumour. He was speaking from actual knowledge of the facts. From the time the very first stone was laid in the foundation until the building was completed, there was not a week passed during which he had not been on the ground, and everything he had stated was strictly correct. He wanted to have the matter thoroughly investigated, and, if it were not proven that he had stated the bare facts, he would admit that he had been guilty of committing an outrage on this House and on the public.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am very sorry the hon. gentleman did not mention that a year ago.

MR. MCINNES said he was comparatively a new member, and had only been in the House some twenty-seven days last spring. He had mentioned the matter last Session, though he did not know that he had gone over the whole ground. He remembered mentioning the subject about twelve o'clock one night. He had stated that it was then some eighteen or nineteen months since the completion of the Penitentiary, and urged that the building should be occupied, and he had called the attention of the then Minister of Public Works to the fact that there had not been a dollar of money expended on the building during that time. He (Mr. Mackenzie) replied that the building would be occupied just as soon as it was completed, and that there had been a large sum of money expended on the building the year previous. He (Mr. McInnes) called attention to the fact that the money was not expended during the year previous, but that the expenditure had been made two years previous, and he had stated also that it ought never to have been carried into the year 1877-78. He would also say that the hon. member for Lambton would doubtless remember that he (Mr. McInnes) asked, last Session, when the Penitentiary would be occupied, and at the same time gave notice that he would move for all papers relating to the construction of the British Columbia Penitentiary, but the House was prorogued before the notice was reached. It will, therefore, be seen that he had done all he could to bring the matter before the notice of the House last Session.

MR. ANGLIN said he remembered very well the hon. member calling attention to the fact that the building was not occupied; but he could not recollect that the hon. gentleman spoke of the character of the masonry.

MR. MCINNES said he never mentioned the character of the masonry.

MR. BUNSTER said he rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the hon. the Minister of Public Works to the character of the masonry work that had been executed under the superintendence of the Dominion officials in British Columbia. He knew, from personal observation, that the remarks of the hon. member for New Westminster, so far as the Penitentiary was concerned, were perfectly correct. The masonry in the Government buildings in that Province was perfectly discreditable, and a great injustice was done the Province of British Columbia and the Dominion, in such work being allowed to be executed. The post-office at Victoria was built of such miserable stone that the walls were crumbling to pieces, and it was a disgrace to that city. This result was owing to the want of brains and capacity on the part of the local officer in charge. The whole of the buildings erected in that Province by the Dominion Government were of very poor construction.

Motion agreed to.

NEWFOUNDLAND CUSTOMS DUTIES.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. FORTIN moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government of Newfoundland and the Government of Canada, and between the Government of Canada and any person whatsoever, on the subject of the Customs duties which the Government of Newfoundland levies on salt, barrels, etc., used in the fisheries on board Canadian vessels resorting to the coast of Newfoundland, or that portion of the Labrador coast which is within the jurisdiction of Newfoundland, and in relation to the light dues levied from our fishing vessels resorting to the said coasts. He said it had been stated, inside and outside of the House, that Canada had been rather unfortunate in her commercial relations with foreign countries. As it was now, they could not trade with France, Spain, the foreign West Indies, Brazil, and other foreign countries; but it seemed to him that at least they should be able to have satisfactory commercial relations with the neighbouring colonies. It was a fact, however, that Canada's trading relations with the other colonies were not at all satisfactory, and had been so for a good many years. He brought in this motion not only in his own name, but in the name of many sufferers in the Province of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. When he explained his reasons, he had no doubt but that the Government and this House would be convinced that measures should be taken in order to have the grievance redressed. He was going to speak to only one part of the motion, that relating to the lighthouse dues levied on Canadian vessels in Newfoundland. The lighthouses built on each side of the Strait of Belle Isle, on the coast of Newfoundland, and on the coast of Labrador, which is under the jurisdiction of that colony, belonged to the Dominion, and cost nearly a quarter of a million to build them, and their maintenance may reach the sum of $20,000 yearly. There were five lighthouses, one each at Belle Isle, Forteau, Crane Island, Cape Norman, and Point Rich. Besides, Canada contributed to the maintenance of Cape Race and Cape Bay lighthouses. Canadian vessels, in going to or from Newfoundland, were compelled to pay light dues there, whilst Newfoundland vessels were allowed to enter Canadian waters without paying any light dues. One would expect that as these lighthouses were maintained by the Canadian Government, that Canadian vessels would be admitted free. But it was not the case. They were charged 25c. per ton. If any person doubted this, he would read a receipt from one of the collectors on that Island. It was as follows:—

"NEWFOUNDLAND.

"Received of Antoine Joncas, Master of the Schooner Maria, from Montreal, (burden, per register, 89 tons) twenty-one dollars and fifty cents, on account of light dues.

(Signed), "WM. P. TAYLOR,
"Sub-Collector.

"Custom House, Flowers Cove,
"21st June, 1878."

This was a vessel from Montreal which happened to go for shelter, in order to save the vessel and crew, and the moment the collector saw her, he compelled the master to pay $21.50. It was not fair play that Canadian vessels should be compelled to pay those dues when the Dominion Government maintained those lighthouses. The trade relations of Canada with Newfoundland were not at all satisfactory. That was not the National Policy nor Protection. The case referred to was that of a vessel of 89 tons. Supposing a Montreal trader of about 800 tons happened to be caught in a gale in the Straits of Belle Isle, and was obliged to make for a port in Newfoundland, she would have to pay $200 for light dues. He did not intend to speak just now on that part of his motion relating to Customs dues charged on Canadian fishing vessels that touched on any part of Labrador, which was under the jurisdiction of Newfoundland, as he expected to receive papers which would illustrate the matter. Whilst Newfoundland injured Canadian trade in that way, what had the Dominion done? Canada had admitted Newfoundland fish free of inspection, whilst the law compelled fishermen of this country to get their fish inspected before selling or exporting it. The Newfoundland fisherman, by paying 2c. per barrel, could get his fish branded by our Fish Inspectors, without its being inspected, while our fishermen had to pay from 30c. to 60c. to get theirs inspected. What was the consequence? That their fish sold as well as ours, and only paid 2c., while ours paid 30c., and sometimes more. He did not call that reciprocity or fair play. He hoped that the remarks he had made on the subject would direct the notice of the Government to it, and that they would see that the grievances of our mariners were redressed.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) said that this was a question of considerable importance to Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Gaspé had referred to one case of the charge of excessive light dues. They, in the Lower Provinces, believed that when the Canadian Government contributed so large a share of the cost of lighting the French shore of Newfoundland, that its Government had no right to charge Canadian shipping light dues. The hon. member for Gaspé was slightly inaccurate as to the charge on the Dominion for the lights on the coast of Newfoundland. He (Mr. Robertson) found that the annual amount paid by the Government of the Dominion towards the support of those lights, and the expenses in connection with the fog whistles on that coast, amounted last year to nearly $8,000. He could not believe it was ever contemplated by this Government that those lights should become a source of revenue to the Government of Newfoundland. Not only would it be right for this Government to ask that in future those duties be not charged, but, also, that the duties paid should be refunded. He had been credibly informed by a house engaged in the Newfoundland trade, that last year was the first instance in which its Government charged light dues to Canadian vessels entering ports on the west coast of that island, and it was a portion of the country, the ownership of which was even in dispute, between Newfoundland and the French Government. He trusted that the remarks of the hon. member for Gaspé would be considered by the Government, and that at a very early day our people interested in this trade would receive some redress.

Mr. TILLEY said that in submitting the resolution, the other night, relative to Newfoundland, he was acting after some communications with the Attorney-General of that Province, and it was distinctly understood that the arrangement which was the subject of the negotiations between the Governments of Newfoundland and the Dominion, relative to charges of this kind should be submitted to our next meeting of Parliament, and to that of the Legislature of the Island. The statements made by the mover of this resolution and the hon. member opposite (Messrs. Fortin and Roberston) would certainly engage the attention of the Government in discussions during the recess, as would also the remarks respecting the port charges and light dues.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that the lighthouse at the south end of the island was practically maintained by Canada, Newfoundland itself paying nothing. A small tax was levied on ships to pay expenses, but this Government assumed it, relieving even foreign vessels from the charge.

Mr. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said he was bringing down the correspondence on the subject. He quite agreed with the hon. gentleman as to the great wrong done the people of Canada by the Government of Newfoundland, in charging excessive light dues on vessels belonging to the Dominion, for many of those lights were maintained at its expense.

MR. MACKENZIE: Only one.

MR. POPE said that, as to the Cape Race light, they had to collect for the British Government; they did not pay the amount, some five or six hundred pounds; it was charged against vessels clearing out of the Dominion. But several lights on the coast were maintained at the expense of the Dominion Government, and yet dues on their shipping was charged by the Government of Newfoundland.

MR. FORTIN said that, on the north and west coasts of Newfoundland, all the lighthouses were built and maintained by the Government of Canada, and on the coast of Labrador, the greater part of which was under the jurisdiction of Newfoundland, lighthouses had been built by Canada. Newfoundland did not contribute one cent; that was a place where they charged 25c. on our vessels.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): I think the Dominion Government supports and pays the expenses connected with two or three fog-whistles.

REMARKS.

MR. SPEAKER presented a memorial addressed to the House of Commons of Canada by the Reciprocity and Free-trade Association of England, signed by John Saxton, President, by order of the Association. He suggested that it should be laid on the table.

MR. ANGLIN said it was an innovation to allow a foreign body to address this House of Commons.

MR. SPEAKER: Last year the House declined to receive a petition because it was signed by American citizens, but this is signed by British subjects.

MR. ANGLIN said it was introducing an extraordinary practice, which might be followed by extraordinary consequences. If people might address us on the subject of trade, they might address us on any other subject. We did not permit even our own people to address us except by petition.

MR. SPEAKER: I do not know any procedure that regulates such a matter. I leave it to the House to decide what to do with it.

MR. HOLTON said he thought Mr. Speaker was quite right in submitting it to the House. This document was a mere letter, and, as a matter of Parliamentary propriety, he did not see how the House could receive letters unless they closed with a prayer.

MR. TUPPER: I think it would be well to let it lie on the table.

INSOLVENT ACTS REPEAL BILL.

(Mr. Colby.)

FIRST READING.

MR. COLBY introduced a Bill (No. 85) To repeal the Insolvent Act of 1875, and the Acts amending it, and to make provision for the liquidation of the estates of insolvent debtors.

Bill read the first time.

WAYS AND MEANS.—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned debate on Mr. Tilley's proposed motion for concurrence in item—Wheat flour, 50c. per barrel, of Resolution 11, relative to duties of Customs and Excise, reported from

Committee of Ways and Means, (April 9th); and the motion of Mr. Vallée in amendment thereto, (April 21st.)

MR. BERGERON said he had not intended to speak on the tariff, having confidence in the Government that introduced it; but after hearing the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman from Portneuf, putting wheat and flour on the free list, he felt it his duty to explain why he intended to vote against that amendment. They were here to represent the interests of their electors, and if he asked the hon. the Premier how it was that he was surrounded by such an immense majority, the answer would be that he had earned that majority in advocating the National Policy. He might say, as many other hon. members had said of themselves in years past, that he was the youngest member in the House, but the county he had the honour to represent was one of the principal and oldest counties of the Dominion of Canada. In his election there was no question of Protection or Free-trade, because the people were so fond of Protection that a Liberal dared not put his foot in the county, and his regretted friend, the late Mr. Cayley, had been elected by a majority of 800 in favour of Protection. He would give the reasons why he intended to vote in favour of the National Policy. During the last five years a Liberal Administration had been working for a Free-trade policy, but the people of the country, although not very well educated, as had been said by an hon. member on the other side of the House, were still intelligent, and understood what was best for their interests, and came to the decision that the Liberal Administration was no longer worthy to conduct the affairs of the country. Under the late Administration they had seen trade languishing, bankruptcies numerous, many of our industries nearly extinguished, and many of our workmen obliged to go to the States to earn a livelihood. And so the people on the 17th of September, defeated the late Government, and returned to this House the immense majority of 80 members pledged to Protection. If we were in favour of Protection, we must give it a hearty support, and not a partial support, as the hon. member for Portneuf seemed inclined to give by his amendment. We must support the National Policy all through, or go against it all through. The hon. member for Portneuf was opposed to the duty on wheat and flour, in the supposed interest of the Province of Quebec, but what if the members of the Maritime Provinces should get up and say they would not vote for a tax on wheat and flour, and those from Ontario say they would not vote for a tax on coal, and those from Manitoba should say they would not vote for anything else but a tax on wheat, where would we be then, and where would the hon. the Finance Minister be with his policy? We must not look at this great question solely from the point of view of our respective Provinces, but from that of the entire Dominion. Doubtless this amendment made by the hon. member for Portneuf, and supported by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe, would afford a fine pretext for those gentlemen to go before the people and say: We voted against the taxation on wheat and flour. He heard his hon. friend from Quebec East say "hear! hear!" It was easy to say "hear, hear," in this House, but the hon. gentleman would not feel so confident if he was before his constituency, when he, himself, in the House of Quebec in 1871, advocated Protection, that is to say, a tax on foreign wheat and flour, or what we were advocating now. We must be true in this House to the National Policy and not desert it at this hour. If those hon. gentlemen replied that they were advocating cheap food for the poor, he would say that they were not consistent with their principles. If they objected to the duty on wheat and flour, why were they not also opposed to the tax on barley, on oats, tools and agricultural implements? They should not tax anything. They should go squarely against the tariff, just like the hon. member for Quebec East, who would not tax anything. He was afraid that some of his Conservative friends who were sitting on the Opposition side of the House, had imbibed some of the principles of the Liberal party, and were becoming as inconsistent as the members of that party. The hon. gentleman from Quebec East was a great Protectionist once. In 1871, in some of his eloquent speeches, he advocated Protection for his native country; but since, he had lost those fine principles by associating with the Free-trade members on the other side of the House, it seemed also as if some of the hon. gentlemen elected as Protectionists on the 17th of September, had imbibed some of the Free-trade principles since they had been sitting on the other side of the House. He had heard it said by the opponents of the tariff that it was a selfish policy, that it was contrary to the interests of Great Britain, and that it was devised in the interest of a class merely. He was surprised to hear hon. gentlemen speak like that. He would refer those hon. gentlemen who spoke in favour of those great Free-trade principles, which they stated had made England so great and prosperous, to the speech of an English statesman, on the 11th November, 1877, in the London Times, whose remarks he thought would have some weight. The following was the language used by Lord Bateman:

"We cannot close our eyes to the universal stagnation of trade, whether in the mining, maritime, or agricultural industries. From one end of the country to the other there is a cry of depression. * * * Salaries must go down, and work must cease under our Free-trade policy, which has resulted in strikes, the closing of manufactories, and general distress. * * * We have tried Free-trade, and it has proved ruinous to us. Why should we persist in it?"

These were only a few quotations of a long speech against the Free-trade policy of England. This authority said it was time that England should abandon her Free-trade principles. He said: "Look at France, Germany, the United States; they all indulged in Protection." When Free-trade was thus denounced in England, it was high time that Canada, after the disastrous experience of the past five years, should adopt a Protective policy. If there was any one man who must be glad to be in Opposition, it must certainly be the ex-Finance Minister, when he looked back at the record of the past five years, and saw the state into which he had brought the country. He (Mr. Bergeron) had the greatest confidence in the present Finance Minister, and felt he must congratulate him in having successfully accomplished the immense work of condensing in one great National Policy all the wants of the different Provinces of the Dominion.

MR. BERGERON.

The farmers and the merchants in the county of Beauharnois were delighted with the tariff. The price of oats had gone up five cents a bushel there. There were in that county large manufactories, a large cotton manufactory, a paper mill, which was probably the largest on the whole continent, and cloth mills. Today the wages of the men employed in those manufactories had been raised. What did it signify to men if they had to pay more for bread, if they had plenty of money to pay for it? He had been talking but a few moments ago to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier). He was just like the rest of them. They were all proud to see the National Policy. Of course, they had to vote against it on party grounds, but in their inmost hearts they were satisfied with it. The tax on wheat, he might say, he was opposed to at first to some extent, but the tax on flour he fully agreed to. If the Minister of Finance thought it wise to impose a duty on wheat because he had imposed a duty on something else in the other Provinces, which was in their favour in the Province of Quebec, they were bound to stand by him. An hon. member from Manitoba had told him that all the taxes were against them, except that on wheat, still he supported the National Policy. Those hon. gentlemen who supported the amendment said they had promised their electors not to vote for a tax on flour and wheat. Well, they had been imprudent and unwise in making such promises. He hoped these hon. gentlemen would come to better sentiments and vote for the National Policy. He was sure when he went back to his electors, they would approve of his course, because they had asked Protection on the 17th September, by 806 votes of a majority, and that was the same with the great mass of the people of Canada.

MR. PICKARD said the question had already been discussed by old politicians and young politicians, by lawyers and doctors, and professional politicians. When he first heard of the term National Policy, he thought it sounded very well, and had hoped that the Finance Minister would not forget one Province, but he had forgotten New Brunswick, and the policy, instead of being a national, was a sectional one. The chief interests in New Brunswick were the lumber interest and the shipping interest, at which this tariff struck a serious blow. The lumber interest was most important, and, though depressed, it still made the great staple of the exports of St. John to the markets of the world. The Finance Minister had told them it was a waning industry, but no one should know its value better than he. The city of St. John, which he represented, would never have grown to its present position on the rock but for the lumber and shipping interest. That hon. gentleman had told the people the tariff would be so re-adjusted that all interests would be protected. He (Mr. Pickard) would ask in what way the lumbering and shipping interests were protected? He agreed with the opinion of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. King), on its evil effect, as far as the lumber interest was concerned. The figures of that hon. gentleman had not been answered by any hon. member. There was not a lumberman in New Brunswick, or in the Ottawa Valley, but must know that this tariff would increase the burdens on that industry. He asked them to look across the river here at those piles of lumber, which had been lying there for the past four years, and to consider whether, by increasing the burden of taxation on lumber, they would stand a better chance of being removed. He entered his protest against the imposition of duties on flour, as well as all the articles which entered into consumption in the lumber trade, as well as our various other industries.

On item—Brooms and brushes, 25 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. TILLEY said the duty was formerly 17½ per cent. The duty collected last year was $8,360. It was not anticipated that any additional revenue would result from that increase; but it would increase the manufacture of those articles.

Item agreed to.

On item—Butter, 4c. per lb.,

MR. CHARLTON said he desired to enquire whether this duty was imposed for protective or revenue purposes?

MR. TILLEY: It stands just as it was before. It was for revenue and protective purposes both.

MR. CHARLTON said he wished to observe that there was no better illustration of the absurdity of imposing a duty on any article of which a surplus was exported, than this duty on butter. As the hon. the Finance Minister stated, this duty was the same as before, he would like to know whether, in consequence of this duty being enforced, he supposed that butter would sell for one farthing per pound more than without any duty? Canada exported last year 13,006,626 lb., and imported 111,557 lb., mostly into Manitoba and British Columbia. The price of butter was regulated last year, as it was this year, by the price of the market where the surplus butter was sold. Consequently, the imposition of 4c. per lb. had no effect whatever upon the price of butter in Canada. Neither would the imposition of such duties have any effect on the price of wheat, oats, barley, peas, rye, nor upon the price of any other agricultural product, of which this country had a surplus for exportation. This showed the utter fallacy of the agricultural protection afforded by the hon. gentlemen opposite.

MR. MILLS said he had some letters from his constituents calling his attention to the fact that the price of butter had ranged as low as eight cents a pound during the last twelve months, also to the fact that the present price of pork was not at a paying figure; that the Government had promised the farmers better prices; and that the present Administration said that they were not flies on the wheel, but that they were prepared to legislate in such a way as to give good prices where there were poor prices before, and that they were going to make all classes of people prosperous by Act of Parliament. The farmers were now specially anxious that the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches—those great medicine men who were going to work such a beneficial revolution in the industrial condition of the country—should provide a remedy for the present condition of things. They said they wanted not simply a protective duty that would result in nothing, but such legislation as would give them higher prices for their butter and pork—those two depressed industries of the country. The latter industry, he would, no doubt, have an opportunity of speaking about by-and-bye. The hon. gentlemen on the Government side, occupied their seats for the express purpose of usefully affecting the markets, by causing good prices to prevail where now the prices were low. The people wanted this remedy submitted. Hon. gentlemen should now bring forward those magic measures which were to produce such magnificent results.

MR. ANGLIN said that the farmers of King's County, and other counties in the Province of New Brunswick, long obtained high prices for their butter in the market of the city of St. John, but, of late years, enormous quantities of butter, some of inferior quality, had been brought down from the Upper Provinces, and prices had been reduced to such a degree that the farmers scarcely cared to make any more butter in those counties. They were dissatisfied with the prices they obtained, and they wished to be protected against the competition of the Upper Provinces.

MR. FLEMING said he would like to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Finance to the fact that he and his colleagues promised to attend to every depressed industry in the country. No industry had suffered more during the last two years than the butter industry. There had been millions of dollars lost to the country on account of this depression. Instead of additional protection to aid that industry, additional burdens had been put upon it; for example, the duty put on seed corn used for growing green fodder for feeding purposes, and also by the duty on English dairy salt. We had been competing with the Americans in the English market, and had been defeated in the contest. He asked if it was fair to make Canadian dairymen compete with the people of the United States, and, at the same time, impose these additional burdens upon them? It was a most unfair and unjust course.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he desired to call the attention of the Finance Minister to a complaint which was made on the part of certain parties now engaged in the establishment of creameries for the manufacture of butter. He was told that there were a great many persons engaged in this industry on both sides of the line, and adjacent to it, and those people desired it to be made known to the Minister of Finance the great injury it would be to them if milk were not allowed to be brought in free to the creameries on both sides of the line for the manufacture of butter. He merely mentioned the matter for the consideration of the Government. It was very desirable to give every encouragement to the manufacture of butter, which promised to be a valuable article of export. He thought that the Customs regulations could be so arranged as to allow the article of milk to come in free for the purpose of being manufactured into butter on each side of the boundary line.

MR. SCRIVER said that he had received similar representations from two or three creameries established in his county, under circumstances referred to, whose proprietors deserved to have it so arranged that milk, for the manufacture of butter, could be brought in from the American side of the line, free of duty.

MR. TILLEY said the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) and other hon. members had called the attention of the Government to the matter, and it was under the consideration of the Minister of Customs, who would make such arrangements by which these matters could be conducted without any violation of the law. Some of these parties were interested in property lying on both sides of the line, and held farms half in the United States and half in the Dominion of Canada. No doubt means would be adopted to arrange this matter as satisfactorily as possible.

Item agreed to.

On item—Candles, paraffine wax, 5c. per lb.,

MR. TILLEY said this proposed to increase the duty on paraffine wax to 25 per cent. Formerly it paid 17½ per cent., and yielded a duty of $81,546. As it was very probable that a large portion of the candles formerly imported would be manufactured from Canadian paraffine wax, he did not count upon any increased duties.

MR. MACKENZIE: What do you consider the duty on paraffine,—the per cent.

MR. TILLEY said it was 5c. a pound, which was about 30 per cent.

MR. MACKENZIE: The same on tallow.

MR. TILLEY: 1c. per lb. That was 30 per cent. also.

Item agreed to.

On item—Carriages, waggons, railway cars and carriages, sleighs, wheelbarrows, and other like articles, 30 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked what was the total quantities, if the hon. gentleman could estimate them, of all these articles. They knew what was brought in under the head of carriages, etc., but there were a good many which came in under the name of the unenumerated list.

MR. TILLEY said he did not think many came in under the unenumerated list. The duties collected last year on these articles, as near as could be estimated, was $14,952.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: That referred to carriages alone.

MR. TILLEY said there were very few other articles that came under that class. The duty was increased from 17½ to 30 per cent., and the Government did not estimate any increase of revenue from that source. It was expected that the increased manufacture of these articles of the Dominion would leave the duty at probably $16,000 or $17,000, an increase not worth making any reference to.

MR. MACKENZIE asked what arrangements had been arrived at with respect to railway stock, upon such roads as the Great Western, Grand Trunk, and Canada Southern, starting from Chicago and going on to New York. Were they to be made liable to a duty if built in a foreign country? As the hon. gentleman was aware, there was a matter in dispute some time ago as to the manner of levying this duty, as the railway companies claimed that it was impossible for them to continue business unless there was some mutual concession on both sides of the line.

MR. TILLEY said there had been no new arrangement that he knew of. As early as 1859, when railway communication was established with the United States, it became apparent that some arrangement should be made by which locomotives and cars connected with them should pass from Canada into the United States, and vice versa. Accordingly, an Order in Council to that effect was passed, and had continued up to the present time. There was no new arrangement necessary in that respect. He did not think that was what the hon. gentleman referred to. If he referred to a company on this side sending into the United States to have locomotives manufactured there, for the use of the company in the Dominion, those locomotives would be subject to duty.

MR. MACKENZIE said that frequently carriages were hitched on to a train at Detroit, taken over the bridge, through to New York and left there. Now half of those carriages might have been built in the United States and half in Canada, and he knew the question had arisen whether all carriages used by the Great Western Company, upon the road of the Company, if built in the States, were subject to be seized for duty; whether, in other words, the officers were supposed to follow each carriage and ascertain where it had been built, and whether it was doing work in Canadian territory only, or occasionally passing through.

MR. TILLEY said there had been no change in the tariff in that respect.

MR. OLIVER said he would draw the attention of the hon. the Finance Minister to the statement he had heard within the last day or two that American agents on the border had been pointing out to settlers going into Manitoba that all articles used for agricultural purposes were much lower on the American side than in Manitoba; and it had been stated that settlers, when they went into that Province, found out that the statement made by American agents was correct. It was stated that a set of agricultural implements cost from $100 to $150 more than they did on the American side, and that, in consequence of that difference, parties who had gone in there with the intention of settling had left that Province and settled in Dakota and Minnesota. The bonus of settlement, equality of soil and regulations with respect to settlement were the same on the American side as upon the Canadian side, and the difference in cost of agricultural implements had induced numbers of people to settle on the American side.

MR. TILLEY said the information had not reached him; but he doubted, supposing such were the case, that it would prevent emigrants from going into the country. They found that thousands were passing through that section of the country, and going to the North-West. As regarded their obtaining lands on precisely the same terms, he thought he had seen in the Toronto Globe a standing advertisement stating that land could be got in the United States for from $2 to $5 per acre, whereas it could be obtained in the North-West upon very different terms indeed. Therefore, under the circumstances, and notwithstanding the great advantages which those persons experienced, according to the information the Government had, tens of thousands would probably go into that country this year, glad to get a home under such favourable prospects.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell) said he was quite sure that a great many people would be reassured by the statement of the member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver). They had heard, for a long time, of the enormous taxation that this tariff was to bring on the people of this country, and now they heard the complaint that, notwithstanding the American tariff on agricultural implements and all the materials entering into their manufacture, was much higher than the Canadian, the American article was sold much cheaper, and that that was to become a factor in determining the direction of emigration.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. gentleman who had just spoken had forgotten that emigrants had to freight their agricultural implements from Ontario, nearly 2,000 miles, the cost of which had a great deal more to do with the purchases in the States than any other circumstance.

MR. OLIVER said he did not wish to complain of the arrangement in Manitoba, but to call the attention of the Finance Minister to a statement made to him by a gentleman from that Province, who saw, himself, a large number of emigrants return from Winnipeg, to settle in Dakota and Minnesota. He understood the arrangement with regard to settlement was the same as that on the Canadian side; the soil and climate, also, were much the same. If his information was correct, any arrangement that could be made by the Finance Minister to retain emigrants in Manitoba would be worthy of consideration.

MR. CASEY said he would like to know whether a duty would be levied on locomotives owned in Canada, repaired in the States, and brought here again for use. He asked this question on account of a rumour that the Canada Southern Railway, which had its headquarters in St. Thomas, intended, in future, to have their locomotives repaired in Buffalo. If those repairs were made subject to duty, it would retain the work here.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said that the hon. member for Cardwell, instead of drawing the deduction he had, might learn a useful lesson from the duty on agricultural implements. They were very much higher in the United States than in Canada, and when people would deliberately settle there, because they could buy certain articles cheaper than under our tariff, it would be seen how onerous it was.

MR. BOWELL said that the arrangements in reference to this matter would be precisely the same as during the last five years, with this difference: it was the determination of the Government, instead of allowing the Canada Southern and other railways, which had their boats and cars in transit, repaired in the United States, and all such work done there without charging a duty, to endeavour to collect one hereafter. At present, if an American vessel received $10 worth of repairs in Canada, she was charged a duty on it the moment she touched the American shore. It was the intention of the Canadian Government to carry out the same principle in return. It would be the same with cars and engines repaired in the States for use in Canada. There were flat cars and passenger cars of American build, in regard to which the practice had been to allow them to pass through Canada. That would still be permitted; but those brought into Canada exclusively for use, would be subjected to duty as would also their repairs.

MR. CASEY said it was rumoured that, as the Canada Southern and New York Central roads were under the same control, it was intended to have the engines of the Canadian roads re-marked as New York Central engines.

MR. BOWELL said that for years past engines passing from the one country to the other, also passenger, freight and flat cars used for carrying freight, had not paid duty in either country; that was a mutual arrangement. But it was the intention to collect in future not only duty on repairs, but to make the roads that had the advantage of them for the last five years pay what they owed.

MR. ANGLIN said that, on Canadian roads connected with United States lines, cars and locomotives came and went continually. Was there any means of ascertaining that one of these coming into this country was to be used permanently? What was meant by the provision respecting cars built in this country, when they ran to the frontier and connected with railroads beyond the frontier?

MR. TILLEY said there was no difficulty in the matter. For instance, with regard to the European and North American Railroad connecting New Brunswick with the United States, any cars belonging to it coming into New Brunswick would not be meddled with; but if the Western Extension Company were to import cars and locomotives from Portland, they would be subject to the duty. Rolling stock belonging to New Brunswick, and of the line owned by English capitalists, passing backwards and forwards, would not be affected by the duty. They knew very well the rolling stock owned by a company, and it could easily be marked.

MR. MILLS said would it not be possible for one company to use the mark of another company? In this way American cars might be used in Canada to an indefinite extent. They had no means of determining the ownership. The cars of any one company ran all over the continent, and United States cars were used to a very much larger extent in Canada than those of Canadian companies. He did not see how the hon. gentleman was going to enforce the payment of this tax, in which he saw no propriety.

MR. McCALLUM said he saw no difficulty in enforcing this tax, which had always been enforced before. The same law that was applicable to a locomotive was applicable to a steamboat. If a boat from the United States, in any foreign port, met with an accident, she would have to pay no duty on the repairs effected to enable her to get back to that country; but if she went abroad for the purpose of repairs, she would pay $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the cost. It was the same thing with locomotives or cars repaired abroad, to enable them to return home. He did not consider this Government would charge duty on such repairs. But they should charge that rate on repairs made under other circumstances, the same as the Americans charged in our case.

Item agreed to.

On item—Cement, raw, or in stone from the quarry, $1 per ton of 13 cubic feet,

MR. MACKENZIE said there must be some mistake in the duties; there was no such thing as raw cement, and to charge \$1 per ton on stone that made the cement, was absurd. There was 128ft. in a cord of stone, and the duty would be \$10 per cord on it, which was simply prohibitory, as it was three times its price. If they were to have any mills on the frontier grinding cement, they ought to have the raw material, the stone, brought in at a very small rate. In one place 40c. per barrel was charged. Now the barrel held nearly 300 pounds. That would make $22\frac{1}{2}$ c. in one place and 40c. in the other.

MR. TILLEY said that these rates were for the purpose of the practical exclusion of the foreign article. The Americans on our frontier had been manufacturing cement, and bringing it in in an unground condition; it was brought in to be ground here. They had plenty of stone in different parts of the Dominion for this cement, and several establishments for grinding the burnt and unground article. The American establishments competed with ours. The 40c. per barrel included the barrel also, and the cement, Portland or Roman, which was imported altogether, and not manufactured here, was used for the construction of buildings and left on the 20 per cent. list. The whole duty collected on cement was \$10,000 last year. He did not expect the duty would much increase the revenue, but it would transfer the manufacture of cement, burnt and unground, from the United States to the Dominion. The only increase in revenue they expected was from the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the Portland or Roman cement imported.

Item agreed to.

On item—Cheese, 3c. per lb.,

MR. CHARLTON said this item afforded another illustration of the efficiency of the agricultural protection, or rather of the miserable humbug palmed on the agricultural community of Ontario during the late election. This duty on cheese, like that on butter, had never produced any effect as regards raising the value of cheese in the Canadian market, for the simple reason that, as in the case of butter, the country had always a large surplus to export. Last year the export of cheese reached 38,054,000lb., and the imports 88,434lb., more than half of which was used in Manitoba and British Columbia. They would find the price of cheese manufactured in Western Ontario, and the price of that made in the States, were, within a fraction, the same. The prices which governed these articles for the two countries was the price in England. We were continually exporting cheese to England, and in consequence of that, the English price governed the price in Canada. These two articles, butter and cheese, demonstrated satisfactorily the utter absurdity of proposing to benefit the agricultural classes of the Dominion, by the imposition of any duty, upon any article that was exported in excess of the imports. In the light of these facts gentlemen on the Government benches stood convicted of the fact of having used arguments that were fallacious in the last general election.

MR. WALLACE (South Norfolk) said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) knew well that before the duty was imposed on cheese, we imported it nearly all from the United States, and that the imposition of this duty created the cheese manufacture. As to the price of cheese in this country being regulated by the price in England, he denied it. The price in the English market was regulated by the production of cheese in the countries of the world where cheese was made. Competition between the sellers of cheese was what governed the price of that commodity. It was just as absurd to say the English market regulated the price of wheat, or cheese, or any other article, as to say the barometer regulated the weather. The Englishman having to buy these articles looked around through the countries of the world where they were produced, and purchased where they could get them the cheapest.

MR. JONES said the duty was first placed upon cheese in 1865. At that time we imported from the United States nearly all the cheese used in Canada. In every corner grocery you could see cheese which had been imported from the United States. After a duty of 4c. per lb. was put on cheese, then commenced the manufacture in this country. He remembered well that a Mr. George Morton, in his county, was almost the first man in the country to start that business. Mr. Morton wrote to him in 1865, asking him to endeavour to put a duty on cheese, so that its manufacture might be started in this country. And what was the result of the duty then imposed? Now, instead of importing a large amount from the United States, we exported last year a surplus of 30,000,000 pounds of our own manufacture. We imported for our own use some 88,000 pounds of cheese, from England principally. He thought the farmers understood this question pretty well. All they wanted was our own market, since we could manufacture all the butter and cheese we wanted at home. The Opposition said it was a humbug to put a duty on these farm products, but the farmers of this country knew that it was not a humbug, and they stated so clearly at the last election, by turning out the Mackenzie-Cartwright Free-trade Administration.

MR. OLIVER said he wished to draw the attention of the hon. the Finance Minister to a subject which had been discussed by the dairymen of his county. Before doing so he would like to state that whether the price in England regulated the price here or not, was a matter which had been decided long before this. The hon. the Finance Minister would admit that the price in England, where the surplus was consumed, regulated the price in the country of production. He (Mr. Tilley) had acknowledged that, and surely he was a higher authority than either the member for South Norfolk or himself.

MR. TILLEY : I said in England or the United States.

MR. OLIVER said every writer on political economy had decided the question in the same way. The hon. gentleman from South Leeds stated that the voters decided that question on the 17th September. If they understood in the hon. gentleman's county that there was no duty on butter and cheese, he had not been doing his duty toward them. The duty on butter and cheese had not been changed under the new tariff, it was the same as before. He (Mr. Oliver) had been in a good many counties and he had not found a single farmer who did not understand that there was a duty on butter and cheese. We already had a protection of three cents on the one and four cents on the other. Did that increase the price of butter to the farmers? If it did not where was the benefit of Protection? Where was the benefit of protecting this butter if it did not go into the farmers' pockets. Look at the other side of the line where wheat and oats were protected, one by ten cents a bushel and the other by 20c. Did Protection increase the price of those articles to the American farmer? If it did not, and if Protection on wheat and butter did not put more money into the pockets of the farmers, what was the use of Protection at all? It was all a fallacy. If we raised more than we consumed, the surplus must regulate the price of the whole. This principle was acknowledged by the Finance Minister himself, and, notwithstanding he was the promoter of this tariff, he (Mr. Oliver) was willing to take his opinion before that of a great many on the other side of the House. He wished to draw the attention of the Finance Minister to the fact that while he was giving Protection to the cheese manufacturer, he was increasing the cost of the cotton bands for cheese. During the last year or two the profit had been small enough without making it smaller. The duty on bands had been increased to 65 per cent. Nearly a million yards of cotton were used in the manufacture of cheese as bands; that cotton laid down in Canada cost two cents per yard, and the one cent per yard duty upon it, and the 15 per cent. ad valorem, raised the price of cotton by 65 per cent. Then the price of salt was also increased. The question he wished to ask the hon. the Finance Minister was this: As the cheese industry was a young and struggling industry, would not the hon. the Finance Minister allow the farmers a drawback on these two articles?

MR. TILLEY : Certainly, any cotton wrapped on the cheese exported will be a drawback.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings) said he could not see why the hon. gentlemen from North Oxford and North Norfolk held a different view now than they did last year, as there had been a duty on these articles for several years past. He was manufacturing cheese in two factories; last year they bought cotton for 2,400 cheese at 5½c. per yard. This year, a week or two ago, an agent came and offered him the same article for 4¾c. Consequently, the duty had not hurt the cheese makers. The different factories used from 12 to 15 barrels of salt per year, which were bought last year for a dollar per barrel, and which they had bought at the same price this year. A great many parties that manufacture butter do not take sufficient pains to make a first class article. Take the creameries, where they manufacture a first class article, and they got a good price for it. As for the article of salt, it was as cheap as it was last year, and they could purchase cotton cheaper.

MR. OLIVER said the cotton the hon. gentleman spoke of, was not the cotton he (Mr. Oliver) meant at all. The cotton he meant was that for cheese bandages, which cost from 2c. to 2½c. per yard, and not 4c. or 5c.

MR. HESSON said the cotton spoken of by the hon. gentleman from North Oxford cost three half-pence per yard in England, and could not be obtained in this country for 2c. per yard. Hon. gentlemen who now objected to the 5 per cent. duty on cheese, were quite willing to accept that duty five years ago, when the tariff was revised. That industry has, however, gone on steadily increasing; in fact, there was no industry in the country so marked in its progress as the cheese manufacture. He believed protection of all our Canadian industries would have a similar effect.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman from East Hastings had stated that cotton had been offered him for 4½c. per yard; if he got it for that price, with the additional duty of 1 per cent., he either got it for a cent less than it was worth, or the man who sold it to him must have been selling it for less than its cost. The fact was not disputed that the duty was higher, and that was what was complained of. The price might vary from year to year. It might this year be lower, even with the additional duty, but still a duty was imposed on that particular article, and the cheese-makers had some reason to complain. It was no matter what price he purchased it at, it was a cent dearer than it would otherwise have been in consequence of this duty.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings) said in the United States they manufactured what was known as skimmed-milk cheese, but in this country they did not do so. Years ago this cheese came in to compete with our cheese, and had hurt the market in this country. As far as the bandage cloth was concerned, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof," if we could buy it cheaper this year than last, we had no right to complain.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said the point made by certain hon. gentlemen on this (the Opposition) side of the House was this: They were told that this tariff was the fulfilment of promises made to the people, and that it was to give encouragement to depressed industries. Now, hon. gentlemen supporting the Government knew quite well that the cheese industry was in a more depressed condition now than it had been at any previous time. The reason given by those hon. gentlemen to the farmers was that it was because Mr. Mackenzie and others were in power. Those hon. gentlemen were here to-day, not one of them rising in his place and demanding increased protection for this struggling industry, but every one of them were voting extra duty upon articles used in its manufacture. The hon. member for South Leeds said that the farmers of this country understood the question on the 17th September; he could tell that hon. gentleman that they knew a great deal more about this question now than they did last September; they would know also that on one of the articles on which it was at all possible to give protection, this Government had failed to do it. When the hon. member for Stanstead made his very able speech on the wool question, he pointed out that the wool growing industry would be utterly ruined, unless there was a duty on wool. Hon. gentlemen cheered that sentiment, and they also cheered the sentiment this Session, that there would be no duty on wool. They had attained power through these promises, and had a right to do what they said they would do, and give protection to the cheese industry and raise the price of that article. It was no use for them to say they could not raise the price of cheese. They could do it, and that without adopting a principle more iniquitous than the one they had adopted already. They could raise the price of cheese by buying up all there was in this country, and holding it at a higher price. That proposition was not one iota more ridiculous than the whole ground on which they were proceeding, in reference to this tariff. He agreed with the hon. member for North Norfolk, (Mr. Oliver) that there were no two items which showed the utter fallacy of putting taxes on barley, oats, wheat, rye, and other articles more than the duty which for years had been imposed on butter and cheese. That duty was utterly impotent to raise the price of these articles one iota, because we had a surplus which we exported, and the prices obtained for which regulated the prices here, irrespective of the duty.

MR. TILLEY said, if hon. gentlemen on his side of the House wished for any evidence beyond what they already had, as to the justice and the wisdom of the proposition now before the House, and of the tariff generally, they would have it in the feeling manifested by hon. gentlemen opposite. Had the Government submitted a proposition which could not be sustained, instead of indulging in angry declamation, those hon. gentlemen would have beamed with delight, but it was because it was so equitable and just that they were so terribly annoyed and excited. What was the fact? This was one of the articles, which, in examining the list, the Government thought was amply and sufficiently protected. One would suppose, from the speech of the hon. gentleman who had just taken his seat, and others that this duty was a perfect outrage. If such was the case, why was it allowed to remain on the Statute-book for five years, during the term they were in office? If it did not increase the price of the article, why was the duty allowed to remain there? His hon. friend from Brant censured the Government because they had not increased the duty on butter from four cents, and on cheese from three cents upwards. To-day those duties averaged something like forty per cent. on the value. Was not that sufficient?

MR. PATERSON: No.

MR. TILLEY: There was something like eighty per cent. on paraffine oil, and 200 per cent. on crude oil. Those the Government did not disturb. While these hon. gentlemen said forty per cent. was not sufficient, they wanted to create a feeling in a portion of the country that their interests were being neglected. These duties, when compared with those on other agricultural articles, would be found equal to, if not above the great proportion of duty imposed on other articles. Last year $4,462 was collected from butter, notwithstanding the low price, and $2,653 was collected on cheese, notwithstanding its low price. The disappointment felt by hon. gentlemen opposite was due to their consciousness that the proposition was a just one.

MR. MILLS said the Opposition did not complain that a higher tax was not imposed on butter or cheese, but simply pointed out the fact that the representations of the Finance Minister were not likely to be verified. Those two articles were put forward as an evidence that the tax on an article of which we produced a surplus could not in any way protect the producers. The hon. gentleman knew that the price of butter and cheese would depend on the market in which our surplus production was sold. There was a larger tax imposed in the United States, and yet the prices there ranged as low as, or lower than here; so that legislation of this sort would not increase the prices. Why did the hon. gentleman not make an honest attempt to fulfil his promises? He did not say he was going to impose further restrictions on articles which came into competition with those we produced, but that he was going to adopt such a legislative policy as would secure good prices and a home market. This proposition was not a fulfilment of that pledge. Hon. gentlemen opposite had told the farmers that the reason they did not get higher prices for their butter and cheese was because the necessary legislation was not had. Was the hon. the Minister of Customs the fly on the wheel in this matter? He called on the hon. Minister to propound a policy which would give the farming population better prices for their butter and cheese. This was simply a re-enactment of the old tariff.

MR. BOWELL said, so far as his section of the country was concerned, these two articles were given as an illustration of what a Protective duty had accomplished in the interest of the farmer. In every instance it was pointed out that, since a duty of three cents per pound had been imposed on cheese, its production in this country had marvellously increased. In 1860 when cheese was admitted free, we exported but $3,000 worth, and in 1867, after the duty was imposed, we exported to the value of $193,544, of which, however, $8,144 was the value of American cheese shipped in bond. The exportation of Canadian cheese last year, amounted in value to no less than $3,997,000, showing that the increase in the production had been marvellous since the imposition of the duty. The argument used against the late Government, in discussing these items, was that had the same policy been pursued upon all other articles as had been followed in reference to cheese, the production of those other articles would have increased in like ratio, and the stagnation of trade in the country have been averted to a very great degree.

MR. FLEMING said he rose to correct a statement made by the Finance Minister that he (Mr. Fleming) was in favour of higher duties on butter and cheese. No; that would do no good.

He would prefer that the duties were taken off, they served no purpose, unless to furnish manufacturers with a plea for increased Protection for themselves. Protection to the farmer was nothing but a bait held out with the view of placing him in a position where he could not consistently oppose the manufacturer's demand. This was the case in the United States; the American farmers had been fooled into this kind of Protection. What benefits did they get from the duty put on Canadian wheat? While these were his own sentiments, he (Mr. Fleming) had a perfect right to ask hon. gentlemen opposite to be consistent with their own professions. They professed to be able by increased Protection to give assistance to the depressed industries of the country. The butter and cheese industries were depressed industries, but there was no increased Protection for them. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) claimed that the increased duty put upon cheese a few years ago caused the erection of the cheese factories in the country. What was wanted now in the butter trade was the erection of butter factories. If the hon. gentleman's argument was good, he ought to advocate an increased duty on butter. That industry now was in the same condition the cheese industry was in a few years ago. Unless great improvement were made in the manufacture of Canadian butter, it would be swept out of the English market as an article of table use. The only remedy was the creamery system, as in the United States. Instead of the present policy being favourable to that system, it placed obstacles in the way. The agriculturists of the country were beginning to open their eyes to the false promises made to them, by means of which hon. gentlemen opposite had got into power. The farmer was beginning to see that he had been simply used as a cat's-paw to pull the nuts out of the fire.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he wanted to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Customs to a fact in accordance with his own argument. When there was no duty on butter, butter was 20c. a pound. Now the average price of butter was 10c. a pound. It was necessary, therefore, in accordance with the hon. gentleman's argument, that they should go back to the old times, in order to make butter worth 20c. a pound. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Jones) had said there were no manufacturers of cheese in the country in times gone by. He (Mr. Cartwright) appealed to every hon. gentleman if every farmers' wife in the country was not engaged more or less in the manufacture of cheese. The introduction of the factory system of making cheese into the United States undoubtedly preceded the introduction of the system into Canada a short time. For a short time there was an importation of factory cheese into Canada, but the moment the Canadians woke up and understood what the Americans were about, they commenced making factory cheese for themselves. They afterwards became competitors with the Americans in English markets, as they would have done whether there had been a duty of 3c. or $3 on cheese. They wanted the application of the same principle of drawbacks which was so liberally extended to other manufacturers, applied to the manufacture of cheese. They required a drawback on the bandages, the increased cost of the manufacturing implements, and other things which entered into the manufacture of cheese. It was only by granting this that hon. gentlemen could really promote the interests of the farmers of Canada.

MR. BOWELL: Will the hon. gentleman inform me what articles are imported that are used in the manufacture of cheese?

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the bandages were imported, and the cost of manufacture was increased by the increased cost of the various articles used in the manufacture of it.

MR. ALLISON said he had an extract from a speech of the hon. member for Centre Huron, which he would read to the House. Speaking, no doubt, with an eye to the approaching Ontario elections, he said:

"The working man above all will feel the heavy duties. The price of farm produce will rise, and he must pay the increase. His loaf will be all the dearer, and his pockets so much the lighter."

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Where did you find that? The hon. gentleman has put in my mouth words I did not use. It is a dishonest and disingenuous trick.

MR. ALLISON said he thought he would be able to remind the hon. gentleman of the occasion on which he made the statement.

MR. TILLEY said, with reference to the article that appeared in the London Times, referred to by the hon. member for Centre Huron, he had no doubt it was inserted by some emissary or friend of the hon. gentleman. When he submitted a proposition for the consideration of Parliament, it was not a question with him as to what they would say in England in reference to it, but what the people of Canada would say in reference to it.

Item agreed to.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

On item—Clocks, and parts thereof, 35 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. CARTWRIGHT said this, he presumed, was a prohibitory duty. He could not, however, see any sort of use in imposing this tariff for the sake of one or two paltry manufactories.

MR. TILLEY said the amount of duty received last year on clocks was $12,263, and it was estimated that this duty would give an increase of $5,000. There were some manufactories in the country, the principal one being at Hamilton. This tariff would, no doubt, increase the production of that establishment, and probably might lead to the establishment of others.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: That is, the public will be charged $12,000, and the additional revenue will be $5,000.

MR. TILLEY said the price would not be increased. He had a statement in his hand which said that Canada-made clocks were sold wholesale at New York prices. Mr. George Lee said: "We have made no advance in price since the duty went on, and we do not intend to."

MR. ALLISON.

Hon. gentlemen would see that it was not intended to increase the price.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Where will you get your additional revenue?

MR. TILLEY: From the importation.

MR. MACKENZIE: That will not continue.

Item agreed to.

On item—Coal, anthracite and bituminous, 50c. per ton of 2,000lb.,

MR. TILLEY said, as he had stated before, the amount of anthracite coal imported last year was 406,971 tons, bituminous 487,827, making a total of 894,798. It was estimated there would be imported, on which duty would be paid, next year—this was an approximate estimate, and the actual importation might be over or under—350,000 tons of anthracite coal, producing $175,000; and 200,000 tons of bituminous, producing $100,000, making a total revenue of $275,000. Then he estimated that the output of our own mines would amount to 340,000 tons or 345,000 tons.

MR. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman tell us where this output is to go to?

MR. TILLEY said it would go to the different parts of the Dominion. He could not tell exactly where it would be placed.

MR. MACKENZIE: Then it is a mere guess?

MR. TILLEY said it was an approximate estimate, but he was satisfied it would not be very much out of the way notwithstanding. Under this proposition, Nova Scotia coal would be brought to the western part of the Dominion.

MR. MACKENZIE: How far west?

MR. TILLEY said he had no doubt a large portion of Nova Scotia coal would reach Toronto. There was no doubt, whatever, that it would be supplied to all the small towns this side of Belleville, certainly to Montreal, and Montreal would be enabled to supply a portion as far as Toronto. Perhaps there might be a certain portion of English coal which would come to Nova Scotia. He thought last year there was about 120,000 tons, and, no doubt, a portion of that would still come out, but not more than half.

MR. MACKENZIE said that British coal was brought chiefly as ballast, on ships unable to find a cargo of general goods, and everything which took away cargoes from vessels coming to Canadian ports raised the price of freights going from those ports. And, depressed as the lumber trade was, it would be still more depressed, as the price of freights would have to be raised to compensate for the tax on vessels coming to Canada. One hundred and twenty thousand tons of coal would furnish ballast for at least 150 vessels, probably 200, and, if this tax were carried out, it would injure the trade of the country precisely to that extent. One of the greatest difficulties shipowners had to contend with was in getting return freight. Vessels going to New York necessarily had a much better port than vessels coming to Montreal.

AN HON. MEMBER: They do not bring any coal back.

MR. MACKENZIE said they brought a great deal of general goods. They had a vast population at the end of their route—which this country had not—with a city containing, with its suburbs, nearly a million and a-half of people, with a large and populous country to the west, and they brought a vast amount of various classes of goods that Canadian vessels could not bring. There would be a very much larger amount of freight outward-bound if it were possible to obtain freight for Canadian vessels returning home. They would be obliged to carry gravel and other ballast which cost a great deal of labour in loading and unloading, having to go to out-of-the-way places to unload. The Government was deliberately imposing a tax upon vessels which brought coal, in order, apparently, to make freights dearer on outward-bound vessels than they were now. That was one of the evil effects of the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite. He would not take up the time of the House in denouncing, as he might denounce, the tax imposed as an unjust one, as one which discriminated against one part of the country, apparently for the benefit of another—although he denied that it would materially benefit any part. It was simply an enormous tax raised from articles of prime necessity, and would to that extent increase the burdens of all those who had to use coal, and that was pretty much every one in the western cities of Canada, at least. He had only to enter his protest against the duty altogether, as one that was unjustifiable, and, as far as British coal was concerned, one that was not only unjustifiable, but mischievous, and more far-extending in its results than even the tax on that which came to Ontario.

MR. TUPPER said an ounce of fact was worth a pound of theory. He would read, for the information of the hon. gentleman who had just taken his seat, what he hoped would satisfy that hon. gentleman that the fears expressed by him that this duty would not possibly promote the great coal mining industry of this country were without foundation, and that the Government had every reason to believe that beneficial results would flow from this tariff. Mr. Dobson, a member of the Board of Trade of Cape Breton, who had been interesting himself in this question, and who had furnished a very large amount of information in a compact form for the Government and the country, had just sent the following telegram to his hon. friend the member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDonald). The telegram was dated the 22nd April, 1879, from Montreal:

"We are competing with Americans for supplying gas coal at Port Hope, Belleville, Toronto and Hamilton, but by quotations received by Adams, this morning, afraid Americans will take the markets unless Government makes rebate of canal tolls. Prompt action necessary."

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) knew what a slight sacrifice it would be on the part of the Government to rebate the canal tolls which, otherwise, would be collected.

"Gas companies making contracts for the season. Tell Doull fifty thousand tons contracted for here from Pictou, against twenty-five thousand this time last year. We have contracts for twenty thousand from Cape Breton, against fifteen last year. Expect ten thousand more, and, with rebate of tolls, may get twenty-five more. Much depends on prompt action. I want to leave town this afternoon, but will wait your reply. Do your best, it is a dead struggle at Western points, Americans are coming down in prices."

The hon. gentleman would, therefore, see, not as a matter of theory or opinion, what had been the effect upon the contracts actually made with the mine owners in Cape Breton and Pictou. He was quite certain that the hon. gentleman, with that patriotic desire which all hon. members of this House ought to feel for everything that promoted a great national industry—for coal mining was a great industry—would feel that the Government had every reason to be very much encouraged by the evidence afforded by this telegram of the beneficial effect of the imposition of this comparatively small duty. He knew that it was the opinion of a very large number of members of this House, especially a large number representing the Province of Ontario, that the Government would have attained their object completely and effectually by the imposition of a duty of 75c. a ton. The evidence of the largest coal importers in the city of Toronto went to show that 75c. a ton would not only tend to develop the whole of the coal mines of Nova Scotia, by giving them, to a large extent, the markets of Ontario, but that it would be further accomplished by the competition that would be induced between those mines and the American mines. The hon. gentleman knew that, owing to the condition of the labour market in the United States, American coal had been selling at very low prices for the last two or three years. The hon. gentleman knew that, if the prices of coal were to return to the point at which they were a few years ago—as there was reason to believe, from the improved condition of trade and business and the industries of the United States, that they would—the moment there was a return to the prices that existed a few years ago, the coal of Nova Scotia, with a slight Protection, would be able to compete successfully in the markets of Ontario with American coal. That was a result that every hon. gentleman in the House ought to view with the greatest possible satisfaction. He (Mr. Tupper) believed that the small Protection afforded in this direction would be a thousand times repaid to all parties who would in the least degree suffer by it, if the prices of coal were slightly increased in consequence of that duty; but he believed that would not be the case. He believed that the duty of 75c. per ton, imposed by the American Government, on coals going in there, and by which the coal mining industry of Nova Scotia had been paralysed, by being shut out of that market, would be removed, in consequence of the imposition of the Canadian duty. Every hon. gentleman knew that that duty of 75c. a ton on Canadian coal going into the markets of the United States was imposed for the purpose of protecting American coal owners against the competition of Canadian coal, and the moment that the coal mine owners of Pennsylvania found Canada adopting similar measures, which they would find were going to stimulate Canadian industry, and to displace the products of their mines in Canada, it would become their interest to remove their duty of 75 per cent., and the duty on the Canadian Statute-book would be a declaration that, the moment they reduced their duty upon the coals of the Dominion, the moment they returned to the natural and rational principle that prevailed before the imposition of that duty, they knew that Canada would take off this duty on American coal coming into Ontario, and the Americans would then have the liberty of supplying this country to the extent of 700,000 tons, the quantity that was used per annum during the last two or three years. The Americans knew that the effect of this duty would, to a slight extent, increase the cost of coal to a certain portion of the Dominion, but that Canada would have the benefit of the quantity of American coal displaced by our own, and that it would be of immense benefit to the trade and business of the country, increase the revenue, and stimulate Canadian industry. They knew, also, that the country would have the benefit of the $3,000,000 in gold that was sent out of this country, but which, under this tariff, would remain in Canada for the purpose of promoting wealth and carrying on the business of the country. The fact that the most influential men in this country, interested in the purchase of coal, and the great body of the coal consumers, upon whom this tax would fall, if it was paid in the form of revenue—the fact that those parties were prepared to sustain and adopt a policy imposing this slight duty to protect this great industry was the best evidence that the fears of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) as to the bad results of this duty, were not well founded. He (Mr. Tupper) believed that the effect of this policy would be to give free coal to both the United States and Canada at a very early date. The whole object of the imposition of the duty on the part of the United States would fall to the ground the moment Canada adopted a policy similar to theirs. Then the natural result would follow that the coal mines of Nova Scotia would supply the Atlantic States, and the coal mines of the United States would supply coals to Toronto and the western portions of Canada. The result would be, also, that the industry which had been paralysed by the imposition of this duty on the part of our American neighbours, would be again revived and brought into a prosperous condition. The coal mines of Nova Scotia, in which there was something like $12,000,000 of British and Canadian capital, must soon be destroyed, unless some means were adopted by which this great Canadian industry was to have such fair consideration at the hands of the Parliament of this country as every great industry was entitled to, and it was the desire of this Government to give it such consideration. He did not believe that there was any feature of the policy of the Government, in relation to the Protection of Canadian industries, which, when properly understood, would be more thoroughly sustained by the people, than their policy in reference to this matter. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) had spoken about the effect on the importation of coal from Great Britain. He (Mr. Tupper) would say, without hesitation, if they had to choose between fostering Canadian and British industries, that they should foster Canadian industries. The hon. gentleman ought to know that, during the year that a duty of 50c. a ton was imposed on coal coming into Canada, so far from the people of Montreal and of the whole of the Province of Quebec, having to pay an increased price, coal was sold cheaper than at any previous time. He believed that the effect of this duty would be to get free coal. But even if it did not affect the markets to any considerable extent, it would so increase the carrying trade between the Maritime Provinces and the Upper Provinces that it would provide cheap goods in both directions. Another point in relation to this industry was that over $12,000,000 in capital had been already invested in developing the coal mines in Nova Scotia. It was well known to persons acquainted with the matter that, just in proportion as the coal mine was enabled to work up to its capacity, the cost of putting coal at the pit's mouth was lessened. The people of New Brunswick, for instance, were told that they would have to pay an increased price for coal. He denied it. Coal would be purchased more cheaply in New Brunswick with a duty of fifty cents, than if there were no duty. The miners would be able to put out their coal cheaper when they were encouraged to enlarge their operations. Suppose a coal mine had a capacity of putting out 100,000 tons per annum, whereas it now only put out 30,000 tons. The cost of management would be nearly as much for the latter as for the former quantity, but the aggregate profit on the larger quantity would enable the miners to dispose of it at a less price. The cost of producing the article itself would be considerably decreased when the miners were enabled to extend their operations. He believed that, taken in connection with the reduced cost of transporting freight both ways between Nova Scotia and Upper Provinces, would give a great stimulus to this industry. The cost of carriage, in consequence of providing for freight in both directions, would also be reduced, so that there would scarcely be any increase in the cost of coal to the consumers. He might add that the largest, the most energetic and ablest merchants in Toronto had had their attention drawn to this subject, and they had practically tested the question whether this could not be made a fair and legitimate industry between the two Provinces. The Minister of Justice had just handed him a copy of the Toronto Mail, of Friday last, which contained the following gratifying statement:—

"NOVA SCOTIA COAL.—Messrs. W. H. Howland & Co. have received several sample car loads of coal from their mines at Springhill, Nova Scotia. The burning qualities of the coal were fully tested in the Mail office yesterday, the engineer giving it as his opinion that the grade was equal, if not superior, to the best imported from America. Messrs. Howland & Co. state that they can lay this coal down in Toronto at the same price as that paid for the American article, the return cars carrying back to the Maritime Provinces shipments of flour. For house purposes this coal is on a par with that mined in Pennsylvania. Some doubt having been expressed that cars bringing coal from the Maritime Provinces could not be cleaned sufficient to ensure storing flour for the return trip, this was found, on examination, to be unfounded, not a vestige of coal dust being observable. Messrs. J. & G. Keith, of the Toronto Fuel Association, have undertaken to place the coal upon the market, and, so far, have met with gratifying success."

One of the most prominent coal dealers in Toronto bore testimony before a Committee of this House, two years ago, that he himself had imported several cargoes from Nova Scotia, and he found he could obtain 50c. a ton more for Nova Scotia coal than for the best coal he could obtain from the United States. So we should not only have the benefit of the imposition of a small duty, but we would have the advantage of using an article superior—certainly equal—to anything that could come into competition with it from abroad. He believed the House would have been better satisfied if this duty had been placed at 75c. a ton, and he was afraid they had made a mistake in not having adopted that duty. Able and extensive coal dealers in Toronto, who had gone carefully into the calculation were satisfied that a duty of 75c. would undoubtedly produce a keen competition in the markets of Ontario between the Nova Scotia and the best American coal, and he had every reason to believe that, in that competition, the Nova Scotia coal would not come out second best. He would say again that the obvious effect of this policy upon that great industry would be such as that this House could congratulate itself upon the success of the experiment.

MR. BROWN said that as he was in that business himself, he would make a few remarks. It was an experiment they were about to try, and it would be tried at the expense of Ontario. They might put the duty at $1.50 a ton, but the people of Ontario would still have to import American coal. He had tried the Nova Scotia coal and found it at least 25 or 30 per cent. inferior to the American coal. As to shipment of coal to Toronto, experience heretofore had not been favourable. He did not think they could bring coal from Nova Scotia in large quantities unless by water. It would not do to return flour and wheat in coal vessels, and they would have to find some other kind of freight for the return trip. The only coal they could use in all branches of manufacture where the smelting of iron was going on was the anthracite coal from Pennsylvania. It was also used in bakeries on account of its not smoking. That kind of coal could not be introduced from any other place except from Pennsylvania, and that coal ought to be exempted from a duty. If they taxed anthracite coal, it was compelling the consumer to pay that amount more than was necessary without benefitting the people of Nova Scotia one iota. He recollected when the Americans shut down on us in coal some time ago, they had a great deal of difficulty in Ontario to procure the right quality of coal for the use of their factories and smelting works. They had to bring it from Nova Scotia and Wales, and from England. As soon as that restriction was taken off, American coal again flowed freely and cheaply into the country. The Government proposed to put not only a duty on coal, but likewise on other articles used in the manufacture of iron, which would amount altogether to a heavy tax, and he did not see where the people of Nova Scotia were going to derive the benefit from it. He sincerely hoped that in the interest of the manufacturers of Ontario, anthracite coal would be allowed to come in free; if not, they would only have to pay that much more for it.

MR. DOULL said that, as a shipowner, he would like to say, in answer to the hon. member for Lambton, that, instead of a duty on imported coal injuring the shipping, he was of opinion it was going to benefit the shipping. Large quantities of coal were now carried out to ports in Quebec by vessels coming out for cargoes, and they took it as ballast. The cost of its transportation in this way was consequently very little, still they had a margin of profit. But when they put 50c. on coal he thought that would destroy the margin of profit, and vessels coming out would take ordinary ballast instead of coal ballast. If the 50c. would give us an increased market in the Dominion of Canada instead of injuring the shipping, it would benefit them for this reason: If a vessel of 300 tons took a ballast of 300 tons of coal at 50c. a ton, it would only be $150. They would now, instead of taking a ballast of coal, take ordinary ballast, and take coal at the port of Sydney at from $1.50 to $1.75, to Quebec and Montreal. A vessel of 800 tons would carry at least 1,200 tons of coal; that would give her $1,800 for freight, instead of $150. Therefore, he contended that, instead of its being an injury to the shipping, it would be a very material benefit. He regretted exceedingly that the Government had not given them a duty on imported coal that would secure for them the whole market of the Dominion. He believed that fifty cents would give them the larger part of Quebec, but if they had seventy-five cents duty they would obtain the market of the whole Dominion, without increasing the price of coal to the consumers either of Quebec or of Ontario.

MR. MACKENZIE: It has increased already.

MR. DOULL said it might have increased, but in a short time, when they had obtained the market, the price would go down gradually, and ultimately the price to the consumers in Ontario and Quebec would be no more than it was at the present time.

AN HON. MEMBER: How could that be?

MR. DOULL said, as he said before, if they put out more coal they could afford to sell it for less than at present. Besides that, if they had a guarantee of obtaining the markets of Ontario they would put on a class of vessels that would carry the coal directly from the mines to the ports on the lakes at a less rate of freight than they carried it at now. The hon. member for West Hastings said that the coal of Nova Scotia was 25 per cent. inferior to the coal of the United States. He (Mr. Doull) denied that, and he would refer him for proof to the report of a Special Committee appointed by the late House to inquire into that matter. That report stated that the Nova Scotia coal was equal to any of the bituminous coal that came from the United States, except that which came from one or two mines. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Brown) was opposed to a duty on coal, but he was willing to have a duty on flour and wheat. This was a kind of one-sided Protection that he did not believe in. If we were going to protect only one industry in the country, then we were not going to have the Protection which the country desired. He always understood that the policy of the party in power was to protect all the industries in the country. That hon. gentleman had also stated that coal could not be carried in grain vessels. He had had a little experience in that matter, and had carried both coal, and flour, and grain in the same vessel. That was done now by all the vessels in the trade, between coal ports and grain ports.

MR. JONES said it was not a question whether the coal of Nova Scotia was equal to the coal of the United States. The hon. gentleman from West Hastings complained of the quality of Nova Scotia coal. A few years ago that gentleman voted for the placing of a duty on coal, but, being a manufacturer, and using anthracite coal, he had changed his views, and now desired that it should come into Canada duty free. In the South Riding of Leeds they were mostly an agricultural people, but they had a few manufacturers, and in Gananoque, where he resided, they imported about 3,000 tons of anthracite coal a year. He, himself, used from 300 to 400 tons a year; he had before paid a duty of 50c. a ton on coal and did not feel it, and his constituents were ready to pay that duty again, feeling that this give-and-take policy would build up the industries of this country, give work to the mechanic and labourer, make a good market for our farm products, and tend to cement this Confederation from the Atlantic to the Pacific. His constituents were perfectly willing to accept this tariff, which was not really a Protective, but more a revenue tariff, affording incidental Protection. For the best interests of this country, he fully supported it. As to the duty of 50c. a ton on coal, it was justified by the American duty of 75c. charged on Canadian coal. This policy was needed to produce the requisite revenue to make up the deficits we had had for the last four years. This proposed Canadian tariff would probably average a duty of 20 per cent. all round; it could not be called a Protective tariff, when compared with the United States tariff, which would average at least 45 per cent. Therefore, he held that the proposed Canadian tariff was a revenue tariff, but so adjusted as to assist all our industries. It was in the direction of Protection, and the duties on goods manufactured in this country would not be lessened; but upon the necessaries of life, such as tea, sugar, coffee, tobacco, etc., the duties would be lessened should we raise more revenue than was required. He felt that this policy was for the best interests of the country, and would, therefore, cheerfully support it.

MR. FLEMING said that the hon. the Minister of Public Works had stated that in 1870, when the duty was 50c. a ton on coal, its price was not increased to the people of Quebec. A return brought down to the House of Commons showed that the quantity of coal and coke carried to Quebec, from the 7th April to the 30th December, 1870, was 180,641 tons, the duty paid on which was $93,820. Now, if that duty was paid, how did it come that the price was not raised?

MR. CASGRAIN said that coal came to Quebec in ballast in large quantities, ships that carried it coming there for timber. Therefore they bought their coal very cheap. Mr. Speaker would remember that, when the duty of 50c. a ton was imposed on coal a few years ago, it affected the trade of Quebec by compelling every passenger from that city to Montreal and back to pay an additional tax of one dollar or 50c. more on the fare each way. He did not see why they should protect so much the interest of the Lower Provinces to the detriment of Quebec. That city and Province was placed between two fires by this tariff—the coal fire burning over their heads and the duty on flour threatening to starve them to death. That was the kind of Protection they got. He desired to enter his protest against the duty on coal as he did against that on flour, believing the people of Quebec and the shipping interest of Quebec were with him.

MR. CHARLTON said he found by looking at the Trade and Navigation Returns, that the total importation of coal into Canada last year was 863,061 tons, of which 406,971 were anthracite, and 456,090 bituminous coal. Of that quantity there was imported into Ontario 266,432 tons of anthracite and 321,980 tons of bituminous coal, or a total of 588,412 against 277,749 for the rest of the Dominion. The Minister of Public Works read them a telegram a few minutes ago stating that the sale of Nova Scotia coal in Montreal this year was to exceed that of last year by 10,000 tons, and that with the remission of canal tolls, and other favourable circumstances, had some hopes of selling 20,000 tons more further west. For the purpose then of conferring that degree of benefit on the Nova Scotia mine owners, they were to have 266,432 tons of anthracite coal imported into Ontario, which could not be replaced by any other, and a great part of the 321,000 tons of bituminous coal brought into that Province taxed 50c. a ton. This sacrifice was to be inflicted in order to sell not more than 50,000 tons more of Nova Scotia coal. Any policy more absurd could scarcely be conceived. The Great Western Railway of Ontario consumed 60,000 tons annually, which must come from the United States, and this duty would increase its working expenses $30,000 per annum; that loss would be made up, not by adding to the through freights, for it was engaged in a keen competition with American lines, and was obliged to accept the now prevailing rates, but by an additional assessment on the local freight, to be paid by the people living along the line. The same was the case with the Canada Southern, which would have to pay about $20,000 additional for coal, which would have to be assessed on its local business; and the same with the Western division of the Grand Trunk, between Buffalo, Detroit and Goderich. Their transportation lines would be similarly affected. The Beatty Line of steamers running between Collingwood and Thunder Bay and Duluth, would have to pay $350 to $400 a week in addition to the present cost of fuel, in consequence of this duty. They were competing with American lines, and would be hampered and injured by this policy in that competition. The tariff was a two-edged sword which cut in every direction to the detriment of Canadian interests. He saw no reason for anticipating a rise in the price of coal in the United States, but rather a decrease. In fact there had been a heavy decrease during the last four or five months, and this duty stepped in to deprive the Canadian consumer of all benefit he would otherwise have derived from that decrease. Of all the absurd features of this tariff, the imposition of the duty on coal, and especially on anthracite, was the most absurd.

MR. HESSON said he represented a Riding very far west, that must have a deep interest in this matter. He was sure that, if the coal tax fell heavily on any place, it would on his constituency. He had no idea that Nova Scotia coal would reach the county of Perth for a long time to come, unless the production and competition would be so great as to enable producers and shippers to forward it to them at a cheaper rate than was now possible. He should feel considerable anxiety about that duty, although he represented a town and county largely interested in the consumption of coal. He, himself, being a director of a gas company which consumed about 700 tons in the year, apart from the large quantity used at the Grand Trunk establishment; he, if anybody, should have felt some hesitation in voting for a tax on coal. But he could face that responsibility with a great deal of confidence, for the reason that the Finance Minister had come down with a smaller duty than he (Mr. Hesson) had expected; and he had told his electors that he expected to be called on to vote for 75c. a ton. He felt he was entirely justified in supporting this duty, and he would go further and say that, for the sake of consolidating the great interests of both East and West, it should be carried. The question was not whether Nova Scotia, but whether the entire Dominion should be benefitted. This was a question of give and take, and, if the Lower Provinces should pay a duty on wheat and flour, the West in turn should reasonably be expected to reciprocate by a duty on coal. If his hon. friend opposite proposed an amendment hostile to the duty, he (Mr. Hesson) would stand by it, and defy him to go into his Riding and say he was not justified in voting for it. It was discussed everywhere in that Riding, and he had stated that, in order to get the Eastern Provinces to join the Western in this great scheme of Protection, they would be called on to support a duty of 75c. on coal, to which they had responded by sending him here. He thought their friends from Nova Scotia were reasonable in their demands, and felt perfectly justified in supporting this duty.

MR. VALIN said, as a shipbuilder, he was interested in obtaining coal at as cheap a rate as possible, but in many cases they took cargoes of coal in Sydney, and took them to Quebec with a better freight than from Liverpool, owing to the Atlantic passage, and thus far they were able to take a larger cargo to the port at Quebec and Montreal, and he believed that this duty, by giving an impetus to coal mining in Nova Scotia, would create a serious competition with the coal from England and the States, which would tend to materially reduce the price. As far as the interests of the agricultural population of Quebec were concerned, it would be an advantage to them that the energies of the people of Nova Scotia should be directed in the channel of the mining industries, and thus open a market for the oats and other produce of Quebec. Only yesterday he went to the office of the gas company here, and asked the President the rate of freight on coal from Sydney to Montreal, and his reply was that it was brought through, all rail, from Sydney to Toronto for $2 per ton. He (Mr. Valin) had been offered English coal at a cheaper rate than Lower Province coal could be laid down here.

MR. MCCALLUM said he felt it his duty to make a remark in reply to the hon. member for North Norfolk. The hon. gentleman stated that the local freights in the Province of Ontario would be charged with the extra price which the coal would cost to the railway. Would no portion of that coal be expended on the through traffic at all; was it all going to be charged to the local freights? He could tell the hon. member that this duty would help the farmers. There was a good deal of wood in Ontario, and the farmers there, in many cases, had been selling their wood for little or nothing; but this duty would enable them to get a higher price than they could before. Although he was a consumer of coal, he was perfectly satisfied with this duty, and was sure it would meet with the approbation of the people of Ontario.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said, with reference to the prediction of the Minister of Public Works, the Opposition would rejoice if the effect of this duty would be to develop, in any degree, the coal interests of Nova Scotia. But what he rose to point out was, with reference to the duties on flour and coal, which were set the one against the other, that there was nothing to prevent the people of the Maritime Provinces from developing the flour industry in those Provinces; but it was impossible to develop the coal industry in Ontario, no matter what duty might be imposed. A coal mine could not be developed where none existed. Apart from that, a great injustice done was the imposition of a duty on anthracite coal, which could not be produced in Nova Scotia, and was therefore a direct tax, the injurious effect of which would be felt in almost every branch of commerce in Ontario. 404,000 tons of anthracite coal were imported from the United States last year, and 404,000 tons would have to be imported this year, so that the people of Ontario, to a large extent, and the people of Quebec to a limited extent, would be taxed $202,000 on this article alone. It could not be called a revenue tax, for it was a local, sectional tax, and must arouse animosity in the minds of the people who had to pay it. If even coal and flour were set one against the other, the Finance Minister was not justified in including anthracite with his bituminous coal. A great point was made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) against even the tax on bituminous coal; that it would advance the rates of freight on our railways. That advance meant an increase of freight on the products of this country and a consequent diminution of the profits to the producer. He would not assume that the Finance Minister was so insensible to any argument from the Opposition side of the House that he would not see the injustice of this tax, particularly with reference to anthracite coal.

MR. ROBINSON said, as he had voted for the resolution last year to impose a tax of 75c. on coal, and as he had been unfairly attacked during the late campaign on account of that vote, and as he was perfectly willing now to vote a 75c. duty on coal, he would make a few remarks on the question. When his vote had been cast up against him, he cited the evidence that was offered to the Coal Committee two years ago, and proved to his constituents the justice of the vote. The evidence taken before that Committee, and given by experts, by respectable men in the coal business in the city of Toronto, proved that the Nova Scotia coal was superior, generally speaking, to that imported from Ohio and Pennsylvania. A few cargoes of Nova Scotia coal had been imported to Toronto, the result of which proved that consumers in Toronto would willingly pay 50c. to $1 higher for Nova Scotia coal than for Ohio or Pennsylvania coal. This duty would encourage trade between the Lower Provinces and Ontario. According to the speeches of Sir Alex. Galt and Sir Francis Hincks, at the time of Confederation, it was evident that these Provinces were not confederated for the purpose of looking at each other. It was intended that business should be transacted between them. Taking the year in which the largest quantity of coal was turned out in Nova Scotia (1873), the output was something over 1,000,000, and 3,672 vessels, including 468 steamers, were engaged in carrying that coal. These vessels were manned by some 22,000 seamen. These figures proved the immense importance of encouraging this industry. The capital actually employed in working the mines to this extent would probably be $15,000,000 or $20,000,000, but the money employed in current expenditure, in the shipping and general business of the people engaged in the transfer of this 1,000,000 tons, would be about $5,000,000. This was according to the testimony of skilled men, who had given this subject their serious consideration. He was willing that a duty should be imposed which would revive this industry so that it would equal the operations of 1873.

MR. MACKENZIE: Is the hon. gentleman interested in any coal mines?

MR. ROBINSON said he was slightly interested, and so was his hon. friend interested in business in Ontario. His hon. friend had been engaged in the petroleum and coal-oil business. But this question of personal interest had nothing to do with the argument as to the dimensions of the trade. It might be stated that the coal had to be carried too great a distance, the distance between Toronto and Pictou, to become profitable. Was it not true that Great Britain supplied Cuba with coal, although she could obtain a supply nearer home from the States? Great Britain also supplied, to a very great extent, as the hon. gentleman himself had pointed out, San Francisco. Did these facts militate against, or in favour of this 75c. duty on coal, and the encouragement of a business such as this? It was a matter of fact, that the Kingston Gas Works had taken a third of their supply from Newcastle during the past three years. He had heard it stated here that 4,500 tons of coal was consumed in Ottawa last year, from Sydney or Pictou, and 4,500 from the United States. These facts proved that there was a great chance of improving this business. Another fact which had been mentioned by his hon. friend was that, in order to engage in this business at a greater profit, a line of ships would have to be established for that purpose. Only two or three years ago a line of steamships had been established, running from Philadelphia to Baltimore, Portland and New York, in the coast trade. These ships carried a ton of coal 800 miles at 56c. a ton. If they could carry coal at that rate, why should we not show the same enterprise, and compete successfully with the coal from the United States?

MR. MACKENZIE said his reason for asking the hon member for West Toronto the question he did was that he was at that moment taking credit for disinterested and patriotic action as an Ontario member. He was willing to have Ontario taxed in order that some benefit might be reaped by the coal owners. It was this assumption of patriotism that induced him to ask the hon. gentleman if he was not a coal owner himself. He (Mr. Mackenzie) knew he was from his own former statements. He (Mr. Mackenzie) did not think the hon. gentleman was quite the man, upon these statements, to talk about the patriotic feelings of the Ontario people, and he was not quite sure that, if the matter was put to a vote, the hon. gentleman would have a right to vote on it at all. There was another point he desired to call the attention of the House to, and it was this: He would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether, when he was before the electors, he did not say that there was no intention of taxing anthracite coal.

MR. ROBINSON said he was very glad to have an opportunity of answering his hon. friend, although he thought the hon. gentleman had departed entirely from parliamentary usage in asking him what he was or what he was not engaged in. If he turned round to his Nova Scotia friends, and asked them if they were engaged in the coal business, of course they would say "yes." Did the hon. gentleman mean to say that they could not properly discuss such a question as this because they were interested in these enterprises in their own country? The hon. gentleman took it for granted that, because he had argued in favour of a tax of 75c., therefore it was going to make coal dearer. Did the duty of $7 a ton on pig iron make it dearer to the people of the United States? The hon. gentleman wanted to know whether he would vote for a duty on anthracite coal. He (Mr. Robinson), in return, would give the hon. gentleman some little information. Out of 600,000 tons of coal used in Cleveland, only 8,000 tons was bituminous. Then, again, the large furnaces which were in operation in Detroit and Chicago were being fed by bituminous coal. As to what he had promised his constituents, he would say that the hon. gentleman went to Toronto to dispute the chances of his election, and he (Mr. Robinson) thought the hon. gentleman went away pretty well satisfied that his principles of Free-trade would not be accepted by the 75,000 people of Toronto.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had spoken a long time, but had not answered his question. He (Mr. Mackenzie) would, therefore, tell the House that the hon. gentleman did say to the electors of Toronto that it was not the intention to put a duty on anthracite coal. He was sure, when the electors of Toronto looked at the hon. gentleman's political speeches, and at his political actions, they would be very much surprised. The hon. the Minister of Public Works also spoke for Ontario. He lived in that Province, and seemed to think he was calculated to speak for it. He said that this tax would produce benefits to Ontario a thousandfold greater than the amount of the tax upon coal. The duty on coal in Ontario would result in a tax of $300,000, and, if Ontario was to be benefitted a thousand times more, she was to obtain $300,000,000 in some manner. He could hardly vote against the duty himself, after such a statement as that. He desired, however, to especially call the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. member for West Toronto not only said a tax would not be levied on anthracite coal, but he was pledged to vote against it. It was also understood generally, in the House, that anthracite coal was not to be taxed.

MR. TILLEY : That would be legislation against England.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was that all through. Hon. gentlemen had an intense hatred for England. Hon. gentlemen, by their policy, had declared themselves enemies of England. The whole tariff was against England, and hon. gentlemen seemed peculiarly gratified at being enabled to show the animus they had against the Mother Country. Hon. gentlemen had not better taunt anyone with being against England, when this tariff discriminated so greatly against England. But, to return to the point. Anthracite coal was dearer than bituminous coal, and the effect of this tariff would be to increase the consumption of anthracite coal, and diminish the consumption of bituminous coal, because the duty, if it were applied to the value of the coal, would be much less on the dearer coal than on the cheaper coal. The effect would be, instead of stimulating the consumption of the kind of coal obtained in Nova Scotia, it would limit the consumption of that particular class of coal. He conceived this tax to be chiefly a tax upon our railroads, and upon the poor people in the large cities and towns; also upon our manufactures. Many of them, no doubt, were obtaining advantages enough under the tariff. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Jones), himself a large manufacturer, honestly told them that he expected to be recouped in other ways. Therefore, he was quite as patriotic as the hon. member for West Toronto.

MR. JONES : I did not say I expected to be recouped. I said it was not a Protective tariff at all.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was surprised the hon. gentleman should have made that statement. The hon. the Minister of Finance had avowed over and over again that this was a Protective tariff. Everyone that had spoken on that side of the House had claimed that the hon. gentleman had redeemed his pledges to give the country a Protective tariff, and, so far as those pledges were made in Ontario, they had been redeemed. It was utter madness to deny that the tariff was a Protective one. Where was the member from Centre Toronto? Where was the member for Montreal Centre? Where was the member for Montreal West? Would any of them deny that this was a Protective tariff?

MR. GAULT said he could tell the hon. gentleman that coal would be laid down cheaper in Montreal this summer than ever before. The International Coal Company stated that they would be able to lay down coal in Montreal at $3.75 a ton, and they would have anthracite coal delivered at $4.50 a ton,

$1.50 a ton cheaper than they had ever had it before.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was delighted at his efforts being so successful in trotting out the manufacturers on that side of the House. If a duty of 50c. had resulted in cheapening coal in Montreal to such an extent, a duty of $1 ought to be imposed. No doubt, the hon. member for West Montreal would favour further protection of coal.

MR. GAULT said he would be quite willing to vote for a duty of 75c. a ton on coal.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had no doubt the hon gentleman would vote for anything that was proposed by his hon. friends, but that would not justify him to his constituents at the conclusion of the term for which he was elected.

MR. BRECKEN said it had been stated that this duty on anthracite coal was a sectional tax, and was very objectionable on that ground. He denied that it was a sectional tax. Anthracite coal was largely used in the Maritime Provinces. It was, he believed, used in New Brunswick in a greater proportion to its population than in any other Province in the Dominion. Then, anthracite coal was largely used in all the Maritime Provinces for domestic purposes. This was merely a tentative measure, and he thought it was well worth while giving it a trial, and seeing if it would not prove a benefit to the country, and his not being a sectionalist was one reason why he would be happy to vote in favour of this tax. He agreed with what was said by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, that if the imposition of a duty of 50c. on American coal would open up the Canadian market to the Nova Scotia and Cape Breton coal owners, it would, he (Mr. Brecken) believed, have the effect of cheapening the price of coal, for already the greater part of the expense of working the mines had been incurred, such as sinking the shafts and providing the necessary machinery. The only additional expenses would be cutting the coal in the mines. He supposed it now cost nearly as much to place 50,000 tons at the pit's mouth as it would double that quantity; if that were the case, the greater the demand for the article, the lower in all probability would be the price, bearing in mind that there was coal enough in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton to supply the whole of America.

Item agreed to.

On item — Copper rivets and burrs, and all manufactures of copper not elsewhere specified, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said there were two or three lightning rod manufactories in the country, and in speaking to one of the largest manufacturers, he ascertained that that gentleman seemed to be in doubt as to the duty levied on the copper used in the manufacture of lightning rods. He did not know whether a duty of 10 per cent or 30 per cent. would be imposed. That gentleman assured him that a manufactory would never be established in Canada that would manufacture the copper needed in the manufacture of lightning rods. He also stated that a duty of 30 per cent. would seriously cripple, if not entirely destroy, the existing industry of lightning rod manufactures.

MR. TILLEY said his attention had not been called to the matter. He did not know what kind of copper was used in the manufacture of lightning rods. Copper, seamless tubing, however, would only be subject to a duty of 10 per cent. If the copper required was in a manufactured form, the duty would be 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

On item—Grey or unbleached and bleached cottons, sheetings, drills, ducks, cotton or Canton flannels, not stained, painted or printed, one cent per square yard and 15 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked what was the total amount of imports expected under this tariff. The terms in the first proposition differed from the terms in the Trade and Navigation Returns.

MR. TILLEY said the whole imports of cotton last year amounted to $7,100,000, which might be classed as follows: Bleached and unbleached cottons, from Great Britain, $430,337; and from the United States, $536,337; printed, painted and coloured, from Great Britain, $1,984,044; from the United States, $896,000. Of the former, there were 179 American grades, and the average duty proposed on them was about 28½ per cent. Of the printed and coloured prints from Great Britain and the United States, $400,000 worth would come under the highest rate of duty, from 28½ to 28½ per cent., the balance coming under 20 per cent., instead of 17½ per cent., as formerly. On gingham and plaids, of which there was imported last year from Great Britain $28,384 worth, and from the United States $4,363 worth, the average duty would be 28½ per cent. On denims, of which there was imported last year from Great Britain and the United States $138,165 worth, the average duty would be 28 7-10 per cent. Of all others, there was imported from Great Britain $1,761,293 worth, and from the United States, $725,366. Of that a small portion, perhaps $400,000 worth, would come under the highest rate of duty. Of the whole of the imports from Great Britain and the United States, $7,100,000, a little under $2,000,000 would pay the higher duty, and the balance would come under the 20 per cent. rate. As a portion of this was cotton cloth, which was formerly subject to a duty of 17½ per cent., but now 30 per cent., it was supposed it would give an increased revenue of $100,000. It was also expected that, under the operation of this tariff, there would probably be $1,000,000 worth of cottons manufactured in the Dominion.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he quite understood that the people of Canada were not going to get any more revenue out of this tax. They would have the privilege of paying to sundry persons connected with manufactures an average tax of 28 per cent., not one cent of which would go into the Dominion Treasury. He quite understood that those manufacturers who were to be allowed to plunder the people to the extent of 28 per cent. would, no doubt, feel greatly obliged to the hon. the Minister of Finance. But he (Mr. Cartwright) wished to get some detailed information which did not appear in the Trade and Navigation Returns.

MR. TILLEY said, if there was any person to blame with regard to these returns, it was his hon. friend (Mr. Cartwright) who had had charge of this matter for five years past, and ought to have seen that the returns were made in such a way as to give those details.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he noticed that cotton or Canton flannels appeared under two heads, one 1c. per square yard, and the other 2c. per square yard. What was the reason of it being repeated twice?

MR. TILLEY said the hon. gentleman would observe that in one case it was not stained, painted or printed, and in the other it was dyed or coloured.

MR. ANGLIN said the hon. the Minister of Finance must be very much more credulous than he (Mr. Anglin) had supposed him to be, if he imagined that a manufacturer of cotton goods, or of any other goods manufactured in this country, would get any larger or smaller prices for his wares than could be got in the public market. One of the factories last year had declared a dividend of 27 per cent., and now they were going to get, on the average, 11½ per cent. more protection. On the cheaper description of cotton there was to be a protection of from 45 to 60 per cent., and that was precisely the class of cottons most largely used by the people who could afford least to pay the enormous taxation now to be imposed on the country.

MR. PLUMB: Will the hon. gentleman explain how the duty reaches up to that enormous figure?

MR. ANGLIN said the duty was easily calculated. The specific duty was one cent. per square yard, and where cotton was worth but 3c. or 4c. per yard, which was the price of a very large quantity imported, they could see it could run up to a high rate of percentage, and to this should be added the 15 per cent. ad valorem. He received, some weeks ago, letters from a gentleman largely engaged in the importations of cottons, who alleged that the system of charging by the square yard would cause a great amount of trouble to importers. In the same bale would be cottons of a great variety of widths, it being impossible to bring from Great Britain all of the same widths in each bale; and the grades were very numerous, running from 25 to 60 or 70 inches in width. Not merely was the tax to be enormously increased, but the importer to be put to great inconvenience and trouble. Providing additional cash to pay the duties would also be a serious matter. He did not believe that anything he could say would change the intention of the Finance Minister, but he might remark that it was reported that there had been great differences of opinion among the importers themselves, who had advised the hon. gentleman with regard to this question.

MR. BURPEE (St. John) said the Finance Minister, in referring to the classification of cotton goods, blamed the late Government for not having more details in the returns to make out the tariff in the manner they wished. The trade returns, as they existed five years ago, could not be used in any way for tariff purposes. The manner of compiling them was changed two or three times during the time of the late Government. Until then all cotton goods were entered under one class only in the trade returns; but they had been extended so as to make a different classification under different heads. The late Government could not be blamed for the returns not being more explicit to meet the wishes of the Finance Minister in making his present tariff; because under them there had been five or six different classes set down, where there was only one five years ago, when the hon. the Finance Minister would find the average tax on imported cottons much larger than he had led the House to believe. Importers throughout the country had found the duties on the cheaper cottons, and woollen goods had averaged from 30 to 50 per cent. A merchant in Toronto wrote him a few days ago that the cheaper classes of cottons and woollen goods would carry an average of 60 per cent.

Item agreed to.

On item—A cotton jeans, denims, bed-tickings, gingham, plaids, cottons or canton flannels, ducks and drills, dyed or coloured, checked and striped shirtings, cottonades, pantaloons stuff, and goods of like description, 2c. per square yard, and 15 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he had information which led him to believe that the tax on these cottons, particularly on the cheaper qualities, would be enormously in excess of what the Finance Minister supposed—would average from 45 to 60 per cent., falling, no doubt, to 22 or 25 per cent. on the more expensive; and here, again, the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester, as to the inconvenience of entering and examining those goods, deserved considerable weight. It was quite true that a considerable quantity imported were goods of a rather valuable kind, but there was also a large quantity which must average probably not more than 7c. or 8c. per yard, on which the minimum duty would be 40 per cent.

MR. MACKENZIE: What is the average value of those articles?

MR. TILLEY said he had a memorandum, which he would read:

MR. ANGLIN: These are all American prices.

MR. TILLEY said they were the prices of United States manufacturers, but those were the articles made specific and ad valorem, and with which our own manufacturers came into competition. With reference to printed cottons, it was different; none were made here, and the duty was 20 per cent.

MR. ANGLIN: A large quantity are imported from Great Britain.

MR. TILLEY: Yes; but we make those cheaper descriptions here.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) said he would like to know what the oilcloth used by sailors—an industry in which his constituents were largely interested—would pay. It was charged 17 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. before.

MR. TILLEY said all cotton clothing would pay 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

On items—Earthenware and stoneware, brown or coloured, and Rockingham ware, 25 per cent. ad valorem, Earthenware, white, granite or iron-stone ware, and "C. C.," or cream-coloured ware, 30 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. MACKENZIE said he would like to know how many manufacturers of these goods there were in Canada.

MR. TILLEY said he did not know; but there were many manufacturers of earthen and brown stoneware, which was made extensively in New Brunswick. There was a large establishment for earthenware at St. John's, Que., and another at Montreal. The imports of these articles reached $80,000. They did not anticipate any increase of revenue from the new duties, being satisfied that a large portion of the importations would be replaced by the home-made article.

MR. MACKENZIE: The object is purely Protection?

MR. TILLEY: Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE asked what was the percentage of Protection, adding the cost of transportation, duty, and allowance for breakage and exchange, on this cream-coloured and granite ware? He had seen a statement that the Protection afforded this interest would be 66 per cent.

MR. TILLEY said he had made no calculation on the subject, but, if he had, would not have counted the exchange, because they were dealing with currency, and converting sterling into currency was a most extraordinary way of forming a calculation as to the charges on the importation of goods. They would take, for instance, the coarse ware manufactured in the Province of New Brunswick and St. John. He supposed that the shipment to Montreal from St. John would cost as much as from Liverpool to St. John. Those goods, going from one part of the Dominion to another, had to be packed in crates, like similar articles coming from Great Britain. So the item of shipping and delivery, from one place to another in the Dominion, had to be considered in comparing the protection as regarded the goods from the different places.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the factory in St. John was in as convenient a position for delivery as the wholesale dealer in Montreal. He would pay precisely the same freight from St. John to Montreal, as a wholesale merchant would for carriage from Montreal to Toronto or Quebec. When the freight was paid from Great Britain to Montreal, that amount must be added to the value at Montreal, which was, in common with St. John, a distributing point. Therefore, everything that added to the cost of bringing goods to Montreal, must be added to the percentage of protection to the other party who made goods at St. John. The rate of exchange was not much, but all the other items must be added. According to the invoice sent him (Mr. Mackenzie) the Finance Minister might see that the protection to the home maker, apart from the exchange altogether, amounted to over 50 per cent. This was an unnecessary and extraordinary tax to impose on the Dominion for the benefit of two small manufactories, one of which at St. John's, Quebec, had a capital of not more than $50,000 to $80,000. He was told, besides, that none of the goods manufactured in Canada equalled the imported in quality. It might be good enough for the very poor classes, who could not afford high prices, but even then was inferior to the imported article; and it was hardly fair to the vast body of the consumers that such an excessive duty should be levied and excessive protection given. He desired to ascertain specifically from the hon. gentleman whether he had calculated, or had any person calculated for him, the amount of Protection which this was going to afford, because he had himself avowed that it was imposed for the purpose of Protection. They (the Opposition) said there should not be such an inordinate rate imposed under any circumstances.

MR. GAULT said he was informed that the goods manufactured in St. John to-day were equal to anything manufactured in England.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he had the pleasure of examining the best that establishment could produce at Philadelphia Exhibition, and he found it very far inferior to those produced in England.

MR. MACKENZIE said this was an item of immense importance, and he did think that they ought to have some more satisfaction than the hon. the Finance Minister had given them. If the duty was imposed for Protection purposes, he must have calculated how much that Protection would be.

MR. TILLEY said his remarks in reference to the manufactory at St. John would apply to others outside of Montreal, as far as supplying goods to the Montreal market was concerned. But a supply simply for Montreal, or its vicinity, was not all that was desired for a manufactory of that kind; the object was to supply the whole Dominion. It so happened that the manufactory of those articles was situated in the geographical centre of the Dominion. Suppose the goods were shipped to the western part of Ontario or to the Lower Provinces; he had explained that in their transportation there would be nearly the amount of breakage as in the case of similar articles imported from England. The ocean freight was also very small, those articles coming out almost as ballast, and, therefore, there was no more difference in cost, as far as the expense was concerned of packing, shipping, and transmitting these goods from England to Montreal, than if sent from Montreal to the extreme west or to the Lower Provinces. It would be something probably in favour of the manufacturer here, and, therefore, it was considered desirable that an infant industry of this kind should be encouraged. The policy of the Government had been that, where an article was made in the country, where we had raw material in abundance here, it was considered desirable to give those industries not only such encouragement and protection as to keep up those already in existence, but to encourage the establishment of others. The policy was to extend these operations, and he believed the result would, through competition, give us the articles at as cheap or cheaper a rate than before.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman knew that, in the meantime, these factories were incapable of turning out more than one-tenth of the goods wanted in the Dominion, and it was therefore imposing an enormous tax on the people of the Dominion. It was impossible to find an article made in Canada that could take the place of those imported. Even the clay would have to be brought from England to produce certain kinds of crockery. An invoice had been placed in his hands which amounted to £274 16s.; the amount charged for packages was £28 17s.; the duty on the packages, £8 10s. 7d.; freight to Montreal, £30 12s. 4d.; charges, including inland freight, £17 7s. 3d.; duty on the goods at 30 per cent., £69 9s. 10d.; on a certain portion of the goods at 20 per cent., £12 18s. 11d.; adding five per cent. for breakage, £13 10s. 1d., making a total of duty and charges of £181 6s. upon an invoice of £274 16s. Now, the goods arriving at Montreal or Quebec—these were the distributing points—were on a par in that respect with the factory at St. John's; both had to lose breakage in sending to the retail dealers; both had to suffer whatever might be imposed in the way of inland freight; and therefore, the duty and charges on this invoice represented the amount of Protection that what the hon. gentleman called a native industry would obtain under this tariff. This was a monstrous charge; it was the most outrageous thing in the tariff, and one that was wholly unjustifiable by the circumstances which the hon. gentleman himself had detailed. Rockingham ware might be made here, but cream coloured and granite ware could not be made of a quality equal to the English, because we had not the material here. When the hon. gentleman said that it was made here equal to anything in England, he (Mr. Mackenzie) could only say that, if any dealer, or any one who understood the business, would say so, he might accept the statement, but all whom he had spoken to on the subject had told him the very reverse.

MR. RYAN (Montreal Centre): Is it not Mr. Darling, of Montreal, who says that?

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes; Mr. Adam Darling.

MR. RYAN said he was aware that Mr. Darling had been making every effort to make the tariff unpopular. He was known as a very great partisan.

MR. MACKENZIE said it seemed, then, that, if a man was a partisan, he was not to be believed; that was the inference. He had no reason to doubt the respectability of Mr. Darling, and believed him to be, at least, quite as respectable as the hon. gentleman who sneered at him. He had both Mr. Darling's statement and the original invoice in support of the position he had taken.

MR. GAULT: It is well known that Mr. Adam Darling is one of the largest importers of crockery in Montreal, and, therefore, he is opposed to taxes of this kind.

MR. MACKENZIE: That cannot affect the statements of fact he presents.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said the protection afforded to this article was something enormous in its nature. He held in his hand a letter from a gentleman who had been connected with potteries in England and with the earthenware trade in this country for thirty years, and that gentleman bore out every statement made by the hon. gentleman from Lambton. How could the invoice be disputed? The gentleman he referred to said he had a conversation with the manufacturer in St. John, who told him that the clay necessary for the manufacture of this article, laid down on the wharf of St. John, would only cost one shilling more per ton than the Staffordshire manufacturer had to pay. Yet the Government proposed to give him a protection of 40 or 50 per cent., and even more. And, over and above that, they had the anomaly, or the contradiction, of the hon. gentlemen themselves, with reference to their statement that this tariff would bear on the rich man more than on the poor man. Hon. gentlemen might say that the higher class of goods could not be produced in this country. He had the authority of this gentleman, for thirty years connected with this trade, for stating that china could be manufactured with as much facility in this country as could the common earthenware, and even with greater facility. And yet, in face of that, they found the 20 per cent. duty levied on the one, and 30 per cent. on the other—20 per cent. on the rich man's goods, and 30 per cent. on the poor man's goods. Hon. gentlemen opposite derisively cheered; he liked to hear them derisively cheer their own sentiments and their own utterances. But they could not prevent these things being pointed out, and, while they (the Opposition) failed in accomplishing anything in this House, the constituents of the hon. gentlemen were taking cognisance of their sneers and their inconsistencies.

MR. SNOWBALL said he had every opportunity of knowing about this matter, but he had never heard of these factories except on one occasion. He was then shown some of these goods, which were certainly of the rudest description he had ever seen of the class, and utterly unable to compete with other goods. He had imported a large quantity of such goods from England, and he knew that the protection on the packages alone was equivalent to 25 per cent. The goods manufactured in this country, to be sent to the different parts of the Dominion, he presumed would be merely packed in straw in the cars, the system adopted in England, thus saving the crate and expensive packing to the manufacturer, making the difference of 25 per cent. These goods were not made in New Brunswick to such an extent as would justify the policy pursued with regard to them.

Item agreed to.

On item—Fruits, green,

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked what did the hon. gentleman compute the increased duty on fruits to be.

MR. TILLEY said he estimated it at $20,000. Last year the amount collected was $50,000.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said these fruits were imported from the United States where they ripened earlier than in our country, and did not compete with our fruits. It was inexpedient to tax articles of this kind, which were a cheap and wholesome luxury in the early part of the summer.

MR. TILLEY said those fruits were bought, not by people in straitened circumstances, but by people of ample means, who could afford to pay the increased cost.

MR. ANGLIN said this duty would fall on all classes in New Brunswick, as those fruits, with a couple of exceptions, were not grown there.

Item agreed to.

On item—Furniture, house, cabinet, or office, including hair and spring mattresses, show-cases, caskets and coffins of any material, 35 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that no revenue could be expected from this tax, except in the matter of coffins. There were many millions of dollars' worth of furniture manufactured in Canada, and the total importations were $400,000 worth. To get the votes of one or two manufacturers this tax was imposed.

MR. PLUMB said the low prices of the imported furniture, though but $400,000 worth, affected the prices of the millions of dollars' worth made here. If, for the sake of getting the votes of one or two wealthy manufacturers, the Government taxed the people, then they must suffer the consequences; but he denied that statement.

MR. GUTHRIE asked why protection was given, in some cases, 35 per cent., and in others, 30 per cent.

MR. TILLEY said, as he had already pointed out, the additional duty was imposed on these articles because the marble and other material which entered into their manufacture were taxed. It was pointed out that these increases added to the burdens of the people; but, in framing this tariff, the Government had to look to see that two millions of dollars were raised.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he did not admit the statement that two and a-half millions of dollars additional would be required. But, assuming that to be true, for the sake of argument, the Finance Minister was taking, at least, seven millions out of the pockets of the people for the sake of getting two. It was one of the simplest axioms of political economy that, if the raw material, which went through half a dozen men's hands before it reached the consumer, were taxed $1, the consumer had to pay $2 or $3. The hon. Minister did not say whether he expected any revenue from this. The total amount of importations was between $300,000 and $400,000. A great portion of that would not be imported, and consequently they had a hundred per cent. added to the existing tax, with the strong probability that it would not bring any increase of revenue, if it did not cause a loss.

MR. CASEY said the hon. Minister had given as a reason for not taxing walnut and other fine woods, that they were raw materials for furniture, but he had also given as a reason for the tax on furniture, that the raw material was taxed. He (Mr. Casey) did not think that it was taxed more highly than the raw material which entered into the manufacture of several other articles, of agricultural implements for instance, and other articles made largely of iron. One of the most important articles used in the manufacture, black walnut, an article produced in his section, and which had to compete against the same wood from the United States, was admitted free. By putting a tax on this article, the Finance Minister would benefit the farmers of Western Ontario. Either this should be done, or the tax on furniture should be reduced.

MR. ANGLIN said it was amusing to find the Finance Minister at one time alleging that the duty would increase the price, and, at other times, that it would not. When it was necessary to look for an excuse for giving a protection of 35 per cent. to furniture, it was suddenly discovered that the duty on the small quantity of iron used, and the brass and other articles used in its manufacture, justified his imposition of this enormous tax, and, thereby, gratifying a few large manufacturers. The locks were to be manufactured in this country; if there was any truth in the promises of the Finance Minister, the brass was to be worked up here, so that, taking the duty on all these, and on the marbles in any set of furniture worth, say $400 to $500, the whole additional cost, because of the duty on marble, brass and iron, would not exceed $10—would, perhaps, not be $5.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said the hon. the Minister of Finance had urged, as one of his reasons for this high duty on furniture, that the new material required in the manufacture was heavily taxed. He would call the hon. gentleman's attention to one raw material which he found on the free list, and which was manufactured, to a considerable extent in his county. If it was necessary to impose a duty of 35 per cent. on furniture, because the raw material was heavily taxed, why admit veneers free?

MR. HESSON said the opposition of hon. gentlemen to this item was an attempt to defend the rich man at the expense of the poor man this time, as common furniture, such as was used by the poor man, was not imported from the United States. It was only expensive fashionable upholstery that was imported from across the line, and that was the class of goods they wished to keep out, with a heavy duty; as a more substantial and useful article could be made in this country, giving employment to our own mechanics.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was a very strange thing that, while common lumber was taxed 20 per cent., the fine woods that were used in cabinet-making were admitted free. There were parts of the Dominion where large quantities of ordinary pine lumber were imported, and of course they would have to pay a duty of 20 per cent. upon it. He ventured, with the greatest possible diffidence, to differ from the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) when he said there was no kind of cheap furniture imported, and defied contradiction. He was able to contradict the hon. gentleman in that statement, because he knew there was. There was a very large quantity of cheap furniture among the total $400,000 worth imported from the United States. New Brunswick, notably, was a large importer of this kind of furniture. Canada possessed an advantage in manufacturing the dearer classes of furniture. The damasks and other cloths used were cheaper in this country than in the United States, as there the cloths were nearly all brought from Europe. The hon. member for Montreal shook his head. The hon. gentleman knew better than he (Mr. Mackenzie), but that was his impression. He did not know what kind of furniture had been exported from Canada, perhaps the Finance Minister did. It was a well-known fact that great manufactories were enabled to turn out goods at a price considerably less than they could be produced for in smaller concerns, and those Provinces that did not have any extensive manufactories of their own had to purchase from those that had. In procuring furniture for the public buildings in Manitoba, they were obliged either to purchase it at Toronto or St. Paul, and they found that, in the exceedingly dry climate of the far West, the furniture made in Toronto did not stand so well as if it had been made in the place where it was to be used. A very large portion of the furniture that had been brought into the country, he had no doubt, went into the North-West, and into British Columbia. In these special taxes, they were imposing upon those Western Provinces, which could not for a long time to come have manufactories for producing the articles they required. The expense of transporting the goods West was very great, and the result of these duties would be that the articles would be made much dearer than what they could be obtained for in St. Paul, and other parts of the United States.

MR. TILLEY said that, with regard to cedar and other woods, they entered largely into other manufactures besides that of furniture. Coach-builders for instance, and others, required those woods which were not in the country. He denied emphatically the assertion of the hon. member for Centre Huron that this tariff would give rise to an increased taxation of $5,600,000 or $6,000,000. He (Mr. Tilley) said that it was unbecoming of the hon. gentleman, considering the high position he held in the country, to use the language he had applied to them on that side of the House. The humblest men, either on the hustings or in the House, had not used, with reference to their opponents and those who differed with them, the language which had been applied by the hon. member for Centre Huron to the men now carrying on the Government of the country. He had spoken of them as robbers and scoundrels, and he (Mr. Tilley) held that such language was derogatory to the character of the House, and derogatory to the character of a gentleman who had held so high a position in the country.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he was delighted to find that hon. gentlemen understood thoroughly the light in which they stood before all honourable men who comprehended what this particular mode of plundering the people meant. Whatever might be his faults, he was not likely to conceal his views on any policy which appeared to him likely to wrest a power confided to this House for the benefit of the people, but which was used to the gross injury of the people. So long as he saw men coming to Parliament who, under the guise of aiding and assisting the poorest class of his fellow countrymen, burdened them with the heaviest burdens, under the name of Protection, he would define it as a system of legalised robbery, by which a few rich men were being enabled to dip their hands into the pockets of the poorest class of the community; and to add to fortunes, already excessive, large additional fortunes, as dishonestly got as it was possible for men to obtain them.

So long as that was the policy of hon. gentlemen, just so long would he continue to describe it as he had described it, whether there were fifty or five gentlemen behind him; so long as he held a seat in that Parliament, so long would hon. gentlemen hear their deeds spoken of as they deserved. The infamy was not in describing these deeds, but in doing them. He found that, out of the total importation into this country, of $390,000 worth of furniture, Province of New Brunswick. It would $167,000 worth was imported by the be seen, therefore, that the hon. gentleman had certainly a right to say that he had not spared his own Province.

Item agreed to.

On item—Cannon and musket powder, in kegs and barrels, 4c. per lb.,

In reply to MR. MACKENZIE,

MR. TILLEY said that these duties last year brought in $23,021, and it was estimated the increase of revenue from the present duties would be $7,000 to $10,000. The duties on cannon, and musket, and blasting, and mining powders, would be from 20 to 22 per cent.; on giant powder and nitro-glycerine, 20 to 30 per cent. Some establishments on the other side were proposing to remove to Canada for the manufacture of glycerine. If they did, they might not collect the amount mentioned; but he expected about that sum.

Item agreed to.

On item—India rubber, viz: Boots and shoes, and other manufactures of, 25 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. MACKENZIE enquired if the Finance Minister had letters from manufacturers of those goods, stating that they were now selling at the same prices as before the new tariff.

MR. TILLEY said he had not, but he thought such was the case.

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked if the hon. gentleman meant that 25 per cent. as a Protective or revenue duty.

MR. TILLEY said they did not estimate from it any additional revenue, but about the same as before. The increased duty would only about make up for the decreased importation.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that, as the matter stood, the rubber shoes manufactured in Canada were not too good. This increased duty was simply putting them at the mercy of manufacturers, who, he was sorry to say, had not availed themselves of the opportunities to turn out a particularly good article.

MR. TILLEY said that his experience had shown that the inferior rubber goods were imported from the United States. Their low priced articles competed with the better class in Canada. If Canadians were manufacturing an inferior article, they were forced to it by American competition and undervaluation.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said his experience was different to that of the hon. gentleman.

MR. ANGLIN said that one of the dealers in those goods in Montreal had made great complaint about being compelled, by competition in the United States, to change and manufacture more popular patterns, as the American article met with the approval of the people.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had not heard anything about ordinary overshoes, but he had heard millers who used gutta percha belting, say that they were obliged to go for the better article to the United States, the importation of which, last year, was about $25,500; and he was also informed that the belting used for agricultural implements had to be brought from the United States. He would much rather not have made such remarks, but, when an exorbitant duty was put on such articles, it had a direct tendency to make the manufacturer in Canada careless, as he would be independent of competition. Undue Protection would only produce an inferior article, instead of stimulating the manufacturer to produce a better.

MR. ROCHESTER said they had just as good rubber belting made in Canada as in the States, with the exception, perhaps, of the Boston Rubber Factory, large belting 24 to 30 inches. As to the ex-Finance Minister's remarks about the inferior shoes, perhaps he bought a cheap pair, and might have been fully satisfied had he bought a dearer article.

Item agreed to.

On item—Pig iron, $2 per ton,

MR. BOURASSA moved in amendment, to abolish all duty of Customs on pig iron, and to reduce the duty on bar iron from $17\frac{1}{2}$ to 10 per cent.; and that the duty on the following articles, viz.:—Tinned, glazed, or enamelled hollow-ware of cast or wrought iron; hardware, viz.: builders', carriage makers', and saddlers' iron work: bolts, washers, rivets, tacks, brads, sprigs, Hungarian and clout nails, horse-shoes and horse-shoe nails, iron wire nails, called "Pointes de Paris," iron and steel screws, commonly called wood screws; scales, balances and weighing beams; nails and spikes, wrought or pressed, whether galvanised or not; cut nails and spikes; shovels, spades, and hay, manure and potato forks; rakes and rake teeth; carpenters', coopers', and joiners' tools, and all other mechanics' tools; edge tools of all kinds, including axes, scythes, files and saws of every description, and steel skates, be reduced to 20 per cent.

MR. LANDRY said that the hon. gentleman from St. John's, because he had no manufactures in his county, seemed to have no regard for those in other parts of the Dominion. If this motion was adopted, it would strike a fatal blow at our iron industries. The hon. gentleman had fallen into the error which was very common among supporters of the Liberal party—that of viewing every great question from a narrow and sectional point of view. In order to make a little political capital among their constituents, they were seeking to overturn this great National Policy, knowing very well, however, that their efforts in this direction would be entirely futile.

MR. CASGRAIN said the hon. member for St. John's was one of the oldest members in this House, and was one of the most popular men in the Province of Quebec, having been frequently returned by his constituents by acclamation. In moving this amendment, he (Mr. Bourassa) had done so in all seriousness and he did not deserve the unjust criticisms of the hon. gentleman from Montmagny. He (Mr. Casgrain) supposed the amendment would not be carried by this Parliament, but it might be carried by another Parliament.

Question put and amendment (Mr. Bourassa) negatived on a division.

MR. CHARLTON said he wished to call the attention of the hon. the Finance Minister to the fact that he was here imposing a very objectionable duty on raw material. Only one manufacturer was engaged in smelting pig iron, where at least thirty were engaged in using this iron as a raw material in other manufactures. He had no idea that the imposition of this duty of $2 a ton, would lead to the production of anything like the amount of pig iron used in the Dominion. The experience of the United States in reference to the duty on pig iron might be of service to us. It appeared from the census return of 1870, that the production of pig iron in the United States was in round numbers 2,000,000 tons; the duty that year was $9 per ton. The prices current showed that the price of pig iron in the United States was within a small fraction of $9 per ton higher than it would have been had the pig iron been imported from England. There were employed that year, in the production of pig iron, 27,000 labourers, and there was invested in that production $56,000,000. The United States paid $17,000,000 more for that iron than if it had been imported. That $17,000,000 would have paid the wages of every one of these 27,000 labourers engaged in that business; it would also have paid the interest, at 7 per cent., upon the capital invested, and, after doing this, the country would have been the gainer by $700,000. In addition to this, the country would have had 4,000,000 tons of iron and $18,000,000 worth of coke, charcoal and other materials. This fact showed the absurdity of placing a Protective duty on pig iron. The duty imposed by the hon. the Finance Minister on this item would have the same effect here as a similar duty had in the United States. He ventured to say that the loss to Canada by the imposition of this duty would be greater than if the country were to pay every man that would be engaged in the production of pig iron his wages and allow him to remain idle.

MR. PLUMB said there was a time when the hon. member for North Norfolk did not hold exactly the same views in regard to pig iron that he held now, and he expressed those former views in this House with all the energy and strength of argument for which he was distinguished. He (Mr. Plumb) happened, by chance, to have in his possession a speech made by that hon. gentleman in this House in 1876, in which he used the following language respecting the duty on iron :—

“The price of iron was brought down, by a Protective duty, several dollars a ton, and it is now cheaper than the English iron was ever offered in the American market.”

The hon. gentleman then made one of the ablest Protection speeches ever heard on the floor of this House, but the difficulty was that, after he had made this speech, he voted to keep in a Free-trade Government. He had convinced the House that he could discuss either side of the question with equal ability, and, he (Mr. Plumb) would add, with equal sincerity.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said many papers in the United States were recently ringing the changes on the unpatriotic action of Mr. Vanderbilt, in importing 12,000 tons of British steel rails, although American steel rails were protected by an enormous duty, thereby showing that the attempt to bolster up by Protective duties the iron manufactures in the United States, had proved to be a conspicuous and total failure. And yet this industry had been one of the “infant industries” of the United States for scores of years. The experience in the United States, with reference to pig iron, showed the full force of the objections against imposing a duty on a material that must, of a necessity, pass through many hands, for every dollar of duty placed on such an article, must of necessity, disproportionately increase its cost to the consumer in the end. Whether this duty would bring in a heavy revenue in our own case, or whether it would promote the manufacture of iron, he was not prepared to say. If he understood the hon. the Finance Minister aright, he expected it would promote the manufacture of pig iron.

MR. DOMVILLE said his hon. friend seemed to desire that nothing whatever should be made in the Dominion; he was opposed to any branch of industry being carried on amongst us. His hon. friend had told this House that the manufacturers here were a set of bankrupts. They were able to make iron in the Lower Provinces, and, if a duty were put on of $2 per ton, if any people could find fault with it, it would be the people of New Brunswick, as they would be in favour of a higher duty being imposed, provided it gave employment to the people. What signified that duty in the price of a stove which weighed 200lb. or 300lb.? The extra cost, if any, would be a mere bagatelle. Under the Free-trade policy in the United States, iron was far dearer than under their Protective policy. He was surprised at the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance talking of steel. He thought the hon. member had had sufficient experience in that business, not to care to have anything further to say about steel rails. The duty on iron was not too high, and this, he believed, was the opinion of all the manufacturers of iron. They were afraid that duty would not keep out the foreign iron.

MR. TUPPER said that Canada possessed an immense amount of iron ore in close proximity to large coal deposits. The Londonderry iron mine produced ore capable of being manufactured into the highest class of iron that could be produced in any part of the world. It was situated some thirty or forty miles from the coal fields of Spring Hill, the coal from which, Sir Wm. Logan stated, was second only to the first-class Newcastle coal. If iron could be manufactured in any part of the world successfully, it was there. When it was known that iron ore could be carried to Pittsburg from Canada, manufactured there, and then sold in Canada, it was high time we should endeavour to manufacture for ourselves. After the iron mines at Londonderry were established, and when they were being developed, the ironmasters of the United States, becoming aware that they were losing their customers in Canada on that account, sent round circulars throughout Canada stating they were prepared to sell their iron at 10 per cent. below the prices of the iron from the Londonderry mine, thus crushing out this industry. Under these circumstances, we should endeavour to foster this industry, and enable it to compete with the similar industries of the United States.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: What are the qualities of iron produced at these iron works?

MR. DOMVILLE: After running off the ore, they make Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, pig iron. Only a certain percentage of each of these can be run off from the furnaces at one time. Their chief manufacture is pig iron, but they have their rolling mills alongside, where they make bar iron, plates, etc. The increased duty on iron would not add anything to the cost of ships, which is one of our greatest industries, because the shipbuilder got a drawback on the iron used in the construction; consequently, the people of New Brunswick have nothing to complain of in the iron duties.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that, all through Canada, the English iron offset the American iron, so that there was very little danger of the Americans putting up the prices. The greatest percentage of pig iron and bar iron was brought from Great Britain, so that the competition from which the Londonderry people had suffered was more the competition of the British than the American manufacturers. There were reasons which would render it difficult for any iron manufacturer who was obliged to transport his coal so short a distance as even thirty miles to compete on equal terms with manufacturers of Great Britain and the United States, who had the coal and iron close together. In certain parts of Scotland, both were found in the same mines, and the advantages of transport were so great, that the cost of freight to this country on all classes of goods like iron was reduced to a very small figure. He had heard it complained that it was absolutely cheaper to bring iron from Liverpool to Montreal, than from Londonderry to Montreal.

MR. DOMVILLE: Because it comes out as ballast.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he spoke of these things simply in answer to the interrogation of the hon. gentleman. In his judgment it would be less objectionable to give a bounty than to tax the whole community for the support of this industry, because where they gave a bounty they knew the cost, but when they gave a tax like this, they did not know what it was ultimately going to lead to.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the hon. the Minister of Public Works was mistaken in the statement he had made upon this subject. It was well known that different mines produced different kinds of iron. It did not matter what duty was placed on certain kinds of iron; they must have those classes for special purposes.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said that he was sure every member in the House must rejoice to know that they had such a quality of iron in the country as that produced at Londonderry. In making a change in the tariff upon this kind of iron, great care should be taken, for, while they might benefit one industry, another might be injured.

MR. BROWN said that he used the Londonderry iron and found it equal to the Scotch iron, and it was laid down cheaper than the Scotch iron. The bar iron was quite as good as any he had seen from the old country. They made experiments with No. 1, 2 and 3 qualities and found that No. 1 was too soft to use for stoves, and that it would carry a large amount of scrap iron. No. 2 was better adapted for machinery, and Nos. 1 and 3 ought to be mixed together. They had used a good deal of iron from the United States, but it could not compete with the Nova Scotia iron or the old country iron. The American iron was laid down at $24 a ton, and the Nova Scotia iron at $18 a ton. They had tried the experiment of charcoal manufacture, and they had demonstrated that by this process iron could not be manufactured for less than $24 a ton.

MR. ROBINSON read two letters to the House, which, he said, showed that the results of this duty would be very satisfactory. Take the United States, as far as blast furnaces and mills were concerned. In that country there were 700 furnaces, in a population of 40,000,000, and, proportionately, Canada should have 70 furnaces; whilst there was only one—the Londonderry Mills. It was gratifying to know that, under this tariff, at any rate, they were likely to have more.

Item agreed to.

On item—Tin plates, 10 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. HADDOW asked if it was fair to the struggling fishing industries to increase the duty from 5 to 10 per cent. on tin plates; block tin, formerly free, now charged 10 per cent.; muriatic acid, formerly free, now charged 20 per cent., and rope increased to 20 per cent. They had heard to-night of the protection afforded to the furniture manufacturer, the iron producer, and the manufacturer of cottons and woollens; but, while the Americans are allowed to send in their canned goods duty free, they were obliged to pay at the rate of 1½c. per lb. or 18c. per doz. cans, for any goods sent in there.

MR. TILLEY said that the increase of duty would not make the least difference in the world.

MR. HADDOW said they had to sell their canned salmon in this country. They would want a drawback if they exported it.

MR. DOMVILLE: How much is sold in the country?

MR. HADDOW said all the salmon canned in the Lower Provinces was sold in the country.

MR. DOMVILLE: No. Canned salmon were shipped to England from Gloucester County last year.

MR. ANGLIN said that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haddow) knew more about this particular trade than the hon. gentleman (Mr. Domville) did altogether.

MR. DOMVILLE said there were other hon. gentlemen in the House that knew something about it too, and it was well known that all the salmon canned in Canada was not all consumed in this country. A large part of it was exported to Europe. The hon. gentleman should not try to raise sympathy by saying that the people of this country consumed all the canned salmon produced in it. The hon. gentleman was trying to gain cheap popularity in his county. He (Mr. Haddow) knew very well that nearly all the salmon canned in the Dominion was exported from New Brunswick.

MR. HADDOW said he would like to know if the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) could say if any canned salmon had been exported from the county of Gloucester within the last two or three years?

MR. DOMVILLE: Carried.

MR. ANGLIN said that the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Haddow) was himself interested in the business of canning, and knew what he was talking about, and should not be interrupted in that way by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville).

MR. DOMVILLE said the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) tried to impress the country at large that he (Mr. Domville) interrupted every hon. member for New Brunswick. But he was not afraid of his (Mr. Anglin's) statements. With regard to the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Haddow), that gentleman before he came into this House said he was not a John A. man, but he was a friend of Tilley's; now he was going against the Hon. Mr. Tilley. The hon. member (Mr. Haddow) took the course he did to-night, because he thought it would give him influence in the county of Restigouche, and get him a little cheap popularity.

MR. TILLEY said that, whether the salmon exported from the Lower Provinces paid a large or small per cent. tariff, it did not in any way interfere with that industry, for the simple reason that the parties canning salmon would not be placed in any worse or better position, because, under the old tariff, every cannery, both of British Columbia and the Maritime Provinces, when they asked for a drawback upon the tin that went into the manufacture of the cans in which the salmon was exported, received a drawback. He could not see upon what grounds the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haddow) could argue that the imposition of a higher duty upon tin, or upon anything used in the making of tin cans would injure the trade.

MR. HADDOW said he found he had made a mistake with regard to the exportation of canned salmon from the Lower Provinces. He had reference to Great Britain. He thought it would be found that there was no canned salmon exported to that country from the Maritime Provinces.

AN HON. MEMBER: There is a little.

MR. HADDOW said it did not pay to send them to Britain, as they were driven out of that market by the salmon from British Columbia. In answer to what had been said by the hon. the Minister of Finance, he maintained he was in a worse position, for all the salmon he canned was sold in Canada. Last year he sold nearly 2,000 boxes of four dozen each, which had to be sold in Canada, and, if he had to pay a duty of ten per cent. where he had only paid five, he must be in a worse position.

MR. DOMVILLE: It is very hard on you.

MR. HADDOW said he could not understand the conduct of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) With regard to the statement of that gentleman, that he (Mr. Haddow) had once been a Tilley man, and now was opposed to the hon. the Finance Minister, he would say that he thought he had been a supporter a longer time than the hon. member for King's, for he had never in his life given him an adverse vote.

MR. DOMVILLE: I stood to him better.

MR. HADDOW said, if he (Mr. Domville) had always been a Conservative, as he professed to be, he could not always have supported the Finance Minister. He (Mr. Tilley) had not always practised the same as he did to-day. He had not always been a Conservative. The hon.

the Finance Minister was always a Liberal, and he (Mr. Haddow) was always a Liberal.

. Several HON. MEMBERS: Carried.

MR. MACKENZIE said the interruptions to the hon. gentleman were most scandalous, and if hon. gentlemen opposite persisted in pursuing that course, they would make little progress.

MR. HADDOW said that in former days he had voted for the Finance Minister, and never against him. When they were fighting the battles of Confederation, he had stood by him and opposed those who predicted from Confederation the present result. Could it have been foreseen, that Province would never have entered the Union. He had given no reason for that hon. gentleman's attack on him. He had come here on both occasions pledged to his constituents to oppose Protection, and he was going to stand by his record. He told his constituents last nomination, if they wanted some one to support a Protective tariff, not to send him.

MR. KING said it appeared as if the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) had taken charge of New Brunswick. That hon. gentleman had thought proper to incriminate a gentleman holding a high social position, by charging him with having attempted to bribe him (Mr. Domville) to secure the settlement of an election protest. He (Mr. King) felt compelled to speak.

AN HON. MEMBER raised a point of order.

MR. SPEAKER said he did not suppose that the point of order was as to the hon. gentleman having spoken before; because the debate was proceeding as if the House were in Committee. The point was that the hon. gentleman did not confine his remarks to the point before the House. Well, hon. members on both sides were liable, to some extent, to the charge of the same irregularity.

MR. KING said that, at the risk of the interruption of the hon. member for King's, and the Finance Minister's applauding him, he would not have referred to that matter to-night, if it was as well understood in the county that

hon. gentleman represented as it was here, that his remarks on elections and other matters did not possess great weight. When he charged him with having sent Thos. R. Jones to him (Mr. Domville), with an offer of $2,000 to retire—

MR. SPEAKER: These remarks are going a little too far.

MR. CARTWRIGHT moved that the House do now adjourn.

MR. KING said, with regard to the charge of his having offered $2,000 to the member for King's to compromise a protest against him in the Courts of New Brunswick, at the time he had taken the liberty of denying, most emphatically, the charge; and he had immediately telegraphed to Mr. Jones on the subject. He would read the telegram:

"April 17, 1879.

"To THOMAS R. JONES,

"St. John, N. B.

"Domville stated to-night that you told him you were authorised to arrange protest against me if it did not cost more than $2,000. Answer by telegraph; also, fully by mail.

"G. G. KING."

To this Mr. Jones replied:

"Must be some misapprehension; will write fully by mail.

(Signed) "T. R. JONES."

He had also received the following letter:—

"ST. JOHN, NEW BRUNSWICK,

"April 18, 1879.

"G. G. KING, Esq., M. P.,

"Ottawa.

"DEAR SIR,—Your telegram received, and answer forwarded: 'must be some misapprehension; will write fully by mail. (Signed), T. R. JONES' Any conversation or matter in connection with Mr. Domville and yourself, in which I was a party, arose in this way: You met me at my door after the election, and after some trivial conversation of no moment as regards the election, you stated that you thought it unfair, after the contest was over, that you should be subjected to persecution on the part of the now existing Government and their friends; that Wiggins had filed a protest against you; that he had no chance of succeeding, and could only put you to trouble and annoyance.

"I said, so far as I knew, that there was no disposition on the part of your political opponents to put you to any trouble in the city of St. John.

"You said that Wiggins had no money to carry on the protest, and that he had got small notes from his friends in Queen's

County (that is, you had heard so), and that they were being negotiated at some of the banks here.

"I said that I had never heard so, and did not believe that any one, after the large majority the present Government had, would have any interest in the matter but Wiggins himself.

"You said that the notes could not be got through without some party here interesting themselves, and mentioned Mr. Domville's name as the party.

"I doubted it, as Mr. Domville was out of business, and had no connection with a bank, at that time, as President or Director; but I, as a friend, on your behalf, volunteered to see Mr. Domville, which I did. He stated that he had nothing to do with Wiggins in any way, as regards the protest. I then said that although you were elected against the present Government, I thought you would be prepared to give the Government fair play in their measures, and not factious opposition; this last were my own views of the case, and it was very little difference whether you or Wiggins held the seat, and asked him if he would see Wiggins, as a friend of mine, and advise him to withdraw his opposition. He (Domville) said he would see Wiggins.

"A few days after I saw Domville, and he stated to me he could do nothing with Wiggins (between you and him). I think I stated this to you a few days after.

"This is all I remember of the transaction. You can make what use of this letter you please.

"Yours very truly,

"THOS. R. JONES."

This letter being very full, ought to have satisfied the hon. gentlemen opposite, because it came from a supporter of the Finance Minister, and, he believed, of the hon member for King's. The writer was a gentleman for whom he (Mr. King) entertained the highest respect. Feeling that that might not be satisfactory, he had telegraphed again, to-day, to Mr. Jones, as follows:—

"April 22nd, 1879.

"THOMAS R. JONES,

"St. John:

"Domville says you stated you were authorized to pay two thousand dollars to have protest against me settled. Is it true.

"G. G. KING."

He thought it useless to comment on these facts, or to take up the time of the House longer on these subjects.

MR. DOMVILLE said, as this was a personal matter, he only wished to say a few words on the subject at this late hour. He had made the assertion in the House that Mr. T. R. Jones authorised him to meet S. Wiggins, and go so far as $2,000 to haul him off. He (Mr. Domville) regretted the hon. member should have brought the matter up at that late hour, in the manner observed. He had no objection to giving his papers to the House, if allowed, and, to-morrow, would produce Mr. Wiggins' letter, in which he stated the overtures made, and that Mr. Ferris, the late member, said that perhaps it would cost $4,000 to take him off. The hon. gentleman's letter to-night corroborated his (Mr. Domville's) letter. Mr. Jones was telegraphed to, and while the hon. member for King's was getting his letter, he (Mr. Domville) had received a telegram from Mr. Jones, saying: "I have sent King an evasive answer." At the same time that this letter said, in terms of evasion, that he was not authorised to make the offer, it admitted that overtures were made which proved his (Mr. Domville's) story. He insisted that the letter should be laid on the table of the House for reference.

MR. ANGLIN: I know Mr. T. R. Jones, who is a blunt, outspoken man, and not likely to give an evasive answer to anybody.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Rykert.)

FIRST READING.

MR. RYKERT introduced a Bill (No. 86) To amend the Act further securing the independence of Parliament. He said the object of the Bill was to prevent persons occupying seats in this House and, at the same time, offices of emolument under the Ontario Government. There should be no connection between the Ontario Government and this one.

Bill read the first time.

IRREGULAR MEMORIALS.

SPEAKER'S RULING.

MR. ORTON said he desired to call the attention of the House, before the Orders of the Day were called, to a very extraordinary memorial, which had been sent in yesterday, and which was, he believed, irregularly laid on the table of the House. His reason for calling attention to it was that it bore very remarkably upon the policy inaugurated by the present Government. It purported to come from the Reciprocity Free-trade Association of England.

MR. SPEAKER: In reference to the paper laid informally on the table yesterday, I have to say, on further consideration of the matter, that no documents can be regularly presented to the House, unless sent down by Message from the Governor-General, or in answer to an Order or Address of the House, or in pursuance of a Statute requiring their production. Individuals outside of Parliament must approach either House by petition, and it has been frequently decided that no letter or declaration, nor address, nor remonstrance without a proper form of prayer, can be received. In the case of a petition, it must be presented by a member in his place. He is responsible that it does not contain any flagrant violation of the rules of the House. It has never been the practice for the Speaker to present even a petition regularly framed. When a petition was sent to Mr. Speaker Addington, that he might present it, as a member, he declined doing so, on the ground that it was clearly irregular. The paper in question is not a petition, but a communication containing a declaration with respect to the Canadian tariff, now before the House of Commons; in fact, a document which could not be regularly presented by a member in his place, for it bears on the face of it all the evidences of its irregularity. In 1841, Mr. Milner Gibson wished to present a declaration of a similar character, from the people of Manchester, stating their feelings with respect to the corn laws; but the Speaker would not allow him to proceed. This paper, then, not coming before the House as a petition in a regular way, and not having been brought down in response to an order of the House, cannot be taken notice of.

THE QUEEN'S, N.B., ELECTION PROTEST.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

MR. KING called on the hon. member for Kings, N.B., (Mr. Domville) to produce the telegram he stated he had received from Mr. Jones, in which that gentleman stated he had sent him (Mr. King) an evasive answer.

MR. DOMVILLE said he would have done so, and taken any step he could to substantiate his statement, but the hon. gentleman had precluded him from knowing what this letter was which he had received from St. John. He (Mr. Domville) had written the hon. gentleman for it this morning, but the hon. gentleman had refused to give him this letter until he (Mr. Domville) produced the telegram from Mr. Thomas R. Jones. He (Mr. Domville) must insist on obtaining that letter, after which he would give the hon. member any information he required.

MR. KING said he had no objection that it should be laid before the House. He simply claimed in justice to the gentleman from the city of St. John, that the hon. member should produce the telegram he referred to. When he did so, he would lay the correspondence on the table.

MR. SPEAKER.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that as the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. King) had already read his letter to the House, it was in the possession of the House, and should be produced.

MR. HOLTON stated the letter was in the official reports of the House, and in reply to it the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) stated he had received a telegram of a certain purport. The telegram should therefore be produced. He (Mr. Domville) furthermore made the statement that he was aware of the tactics of the hon. gentleman, and that he had received a telegram saying that the Hon. Thos. R. Jones had sent him (Mr. King) an evasive answer. He would leave this to the Hansard for substantiation. He had only to ask the hon. gentleman to lay before him (Mr. Domville) the letter he had received in regard to the assertions made by himself in the House.

MR. KING said that the hon. member for King's having failed to produce the telegram, he now, on behalf of Mr. Jones, would take the liberty of reading a telegram he received from him that morning.

"By telegraph from St. John, N.B.,

"To G. G. KING:

"Domville must be in error. You never authorised me to offer $2,000 for withdrawal of protest, and, if you had, I would not have been a party to it. My letter explains all that took place.

"T. R. JONES."

He did not propose to say anything further in regard to this matter, beyond expressing his utter abhorrence of the manner in which this controversy had been conducted by the hon. gentleman.

MR. DOMVILLE said the criticisms of the hon. gentleman fell very harmless upon him. As the hon. gentleman would not produce his letter, he (Mr. Domville) had a letter from a gentleman who would corroborate his (Mr. Domville's) statement. It was as follows:—

"MY DEAR SIR,—

"I see Mr. King, M.P. for Queen's, denies the fact that any overtures were made to me after last election, and, therefore, I beg to inform you that John Ferris, Esq., ex-M. P., informed a friend of mine, in January last, and who informed me—that they had offered me the sum of $2,000 if I would have the protest against Mr. King withdrawn, but that I had refused, and that he feared they would be obliged to increase that sum to $4,000. You are at liberty to use this in any way you deem proper, as there can be no doubt that you stated to me—and to which I am ready to testify on oath—that the sum of $2,000 would be paid me if I would give no further opposition in the matter, I may further add that when you informed me that Mr. Jones had authorised you to ascertain what I would accept for my trouble and drop further opposition, you will remember I promptly spurned the offer, with the remark that I would never sell my friends.

"Yours truly,

"E. STONE WIGGINS."

This was his statement, and Mr. Wiggins was in Ottawa, prepared to justify his (Mr. Domville's) statement on oath.

MR. KING : I call——

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I think we ought to have Mr. Jones's letter. The hon. gentleman is precluded from speaking until he lays that letter upon the table.

MR. KING : I have no objection to lay the letter upon the table, and I now call upon the hon. member for King's for the telegram from Mr. Jones.

MR. DOMVILLE said that that letter which the hon. gentleman had laid upon the table, and which he had in his hands, formed a part of his (Mr. Domville's) answer. Mr. Jones had been applied to by his hon. friend for a denial of certain allegations made by him (Mr. Domville) and he sent in reply the letter which had been read last night. That proved his case. He stated that he had made overtures to Mr. Wiggins, on behalf of Mr. King, through Mr. Jones. Here was Mr. Jones's letter, and also Mr. Wiggins's, who said he was prepared to testify on oath that the amount was offered to him, and he refused to take it. He (Mr. Domville) made no assertion in the House that he received a telegram from the Hon. Thos. R. Jones. He noticed, at the time, some hon. gentlemen smile, and he (Mr. Domville) smiled to think they had taken a view that might please them. But it was incorrect, as far as he was concerned. He stated that he had received a telegram saying Mr. Jones had sent him (Mr. King) an evasive answer. He would read the telegram which, however, was not from Mr. Jones; he did not say that it was.

MR. CARTWRIGHT : I distinctly heard him make the statement last night.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) : I was present when Mr. Domville made the statement, and I distinctly understood him to use these words: "I received a telegram from St. John, saying Mr. Jones had returned an evasive answer to Mr. King."

Several HON. GENTLEMEN : No, no.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) : I do not know who says "no, no;" nor do I care. I am quite satisfied he used those words.

MR. ANGLIN said he understood the hon. gentleman to say that he had received a telegram from Mr. Jones saying he had sent an evasive answer to Mr. King.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell) said he listened attentively to the remarks of the hon. gentleman on the night previously, and he understood him to say that he had received a telegram from St. John, saying the Hon. Thomas R. Jones had sent an evasive answer to Mr. King.

MR. DOMVILLE said the telegram he received was as follows:—

"Forewarned, forearmed. King has asked Jones for a denial of your statement, and Jones has written him what he calls an evasive manner. Jones says you are mistaken. He did not talk of a money compromise.

"S. J. KING."

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the charge made by the hon. gentleman was that his hon. friend behind him had sent a gentleman to him authorised to pay to Mr. Wiggins $2,000 if he would withdraw the protest.

MR. DOMVILLE said he had made that charge. He did not deny it, and he had Mr. Wiggins here to prove it on oath.

MR. ANGLIN said the hon. gentleman had not read the telegrams which were laid on the table with the letters of Mr. Jones.

MR. DOMVILLE: I did not see them. Send them here, and I will read them.

MR. BOWELL said that, with reference to the remarks of his hon. friend, on the night previously, his recollection was decidedly the same as that of the hon. the Minister of Justice, and the hon. member for Cardwell. What impressed it more particularly on his mind was the circumstance, that immediately after the statement was made by the hon. member for King's, he turned round to the hon. gentleman and said: "Domville, they understood you to say that you received this telegram from Mr. Jones." "Well," said he, "I do not care whether they do or do not think so." He (Mr. Bowell) was quite satisfied that the hon. gentleman was correct as to what he said.

MR. COCKBURN (Muskoka) said he thought he could throw a little light upon the subject. When the hon. gentleman said he had received a telegram from the Hon. T.R. Jones, stating that he had sent an evasive reply to Mr. King, the hon. member for Gloucester said Mr. Jones was not the man to send an evasive reply.

MR. DOMVILLE: Yes, we heard him say so.

MR. KING read the report in the Montreal Gazette of what took place. He would next read the telegrams which he claimed the hon. member for King's would not read. He (Mr. King), upon hearing that the hon. member for King's had a communication from Mr. Jones, telegraphed as follows to the latter gentleman:

"April 22, 1879.

"To THOMAS R. JONES,
St. John, N. B.

"Domville says you telegraphed him to-day that you had sent me an evasive answer. Is it so?"

"G. G. KING."

In reply, Mr. Jones said:

"April 23, 1879.

"By telegraph from St. John. N. B.,

"To G. G. KING,
Ottawa,

"Domville has no telegram or letter from me on the subject matter whatever; if he has, let him produce it. Get Insolvency Amendment postponed for a few days. Somebody will be up to explain. Will work bad here as it is.

"T. R. JONES."

Now he called upon the hon. member for King's to produce the telegram.

MR. DOMVILLE: What is the use of the hon. gentleman calling on me for a telegram I never had, or claimed to have had?

THE CONFEDERATION CAMPAIGN IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. TILLEY said he rose to a question of privilege. He desired to call the attention of the House to a statement he made, and which was positively contradicted by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin). When he (Mr. Tilley), speaking with reference to the feeling that existed in the Province of New Brunswick during the first Confederation election, for the purpose of showing how public feeling changed, said that the feeling was so strong that he could not obtain a hearing until the hon. member stepped forward and obtained a hearing for him. He had said he never would forget the humiliation to which he was subjected at that time—that he was dependent on that hon. member (Mr. Anglin) for a hearing in his own constituency. Every hon. member would recollect how emphatically, and distinctly, he denied that statement, saying that he had never interfered, because he (Mr. Tilley) was never refused a hearing except on one occasion, in the Mechanics' Institute. He was authorised to make this statement:

"The undersigned were present on nomination day, February 27th, 1865, for the first Confederation election, when Mr. Tilley was prevented from receiving a hearing until Mr. Anglin pushed his way to the front of the hustling, and asked the crowd to give Mr. Tilley a hearing, which was then done. Signed: C. H. Fairweather, George Robertson, C. M. Boswick, J. H. Allan, William Fleming, Luke Stewart, John A. Chesley, Wm A. Turnbull, Geo. S. DeForest, John Bell, E. E. Kenney, J. D. Turner, J. E. Paddington, S. J. King."

He had received several telegrams to the same effect since. But, if anything more was necessary to establish a statement, he had extracts from the editorials of the St. John News, of March 1st, and the Morning Telegraph, February 28th, 1865, as follows:—

“Mr. Anglin undertook to speak against time yesterday, consuming nearly one-half of the whole time at the disposal of the candidates. His efforts were seconded by the lungs and rowdiness of a lot of ‘plug-uglies,’ who kept interrupting each of the Union Speakers, obliging them to shorten their addresses, and finally closing the performance by creating such a disturbance as prevented Mr. Tilley from replying to Mr. Anglin’s sophistries and misstatements. That the gang was organised, but by whom, or by whom paid, or under whose leadership, is yet unknown, although shrewd suspicions are entertained. That Mr. Anglin was at least their patron is undoubted.

“Matters have come to a pretty pass in this city, when public speakers can address public assemblages in this loyal city, only by Mr. Anglin’s permission; Mr. Anglin, whose past career is yet redolent of treason. Let all friends of Confederation treasure up the disgraceful sights of yesterday. Let them be ever before their eyes until this important contest is over. Let them spare neither time, nor care, nor physical labour until, by the election of the Confederate candidates, they assure New Brunswick that St. John is not to be ruled by Mr. Anglin and his gang of rowdies. The enemy has at last unmasked their batteries. Intellect is no longer of any service to them; passion, prejudice, falsehoods and mob law are now their weapons.”—(St. John Telegraph, Feb. 28th, 1865.)

“The course pursued by the Anti-Confederates in front of the Court House on Monday last, has defeated the object intended by the promoters and abettors of the disturbance. Many men who were halting between two opinions, and who had deferred making up their minds until they heard the friends and opponents of Confederation face to face on the hustings, have decided to throw, not only their votes, but all their influence in opposition to the party that sought to stifle the right of free speech, which is the proud boast of every Briton; and many others, who were luke-warm friends of Confederation, have been prompted to give the good cause their warm and hearty support. All reasonable and fair men looked forward to nomination day as the one on which intelligence and truth would triumph. The result of the day’s proceedings has, however, been provocative of nothing but dissatisfaction. They expected that when the opponents of the scheme were heard for hours without interruption, a short time would have been allowed its friends to combat the arguments advanced, and establish the correctness of their own position. This privilege was denied them. Indeed, it was with difficulty that any of the friends of Confederation obtained even a partial hearing. Why was this so? Simply because the men who declined to face the friends of the scheme, whenever and wherever challenged, feared to have their specious sophistry and their flimsy arguments exposed and refuted. Had a different course been pursued, Mr. Anglin’s fine spun theories, Mr. Cudlip’s fallacious declarations, and Mr. Witmore’s windy declamation would have been as completely annihilated as Mr. Wilmot’s untenable position was thoroughly exposed in the few minutes afforded for review. But this could not be. At the behest of Anglin alone would the noisy crowd, who occupied the centre of the vast throng, become quiet. The battle was, therefore, not one of reason, but a test between the lung power of the speaker, and the turbulence of a band of ruthless, ignorant and deluded men; and in such a scene of strife, it is no wonder that the latter gained a temporary triumph. Among the whole band of reckless men there were probably not more than half a dozen votes. Matters have come to a pretty pass when conduct so disgraceful is suffered to prevail in a city of the size and importance of St. John. It is high time that the people should know whether their public men are to be brow-beaten in this manner, and whether they are to be permitted to declare their views only under the patronage of a man who has endeavoured, on every occasion, to clog the wheels of progress in this ‘fine and favoured’ Province. It must be apparent to every right-thinking man, that the cause which requires mob violence in its aid is bad, and we trust that votes recorded on Friday and Saturday next will show that this is properly understood and appreciated.”—(St. John News, March 1st, 1865.)

Now, he thought, with that testimony, he was justified in stating that, on that occasion, he obtained a hearing only at the solicitation of the hon. gentleman opposite.

MR. ANGLIN said he thought that, as the House had listened to those extracts read by the Finance Minister, they would be able to form a very correct estimate of the value of the statements of those newspapers. Anything more violently partisan than those articles could scarcely be written. At that particular time there was a determination on the part of the hon. the Finance Minister to create the impression against the anti-Confederates, that they were endeavouring to resist Confederation by just such means as were described in those articles, and the knowledge of that intention rendered the anti-Confederates particularly scrupulous and careful to restrain the slightest show of improper interference with any speakers on the opposite side. He recollected what took place on that particular day. They stood on the stoop of the Court-house in St. John, the vast assembly before them remaining in the snow from a little before twelve o'clock in the day, till long after the lamps were lit in the evening; the fact of their remaining so long would be of itself evidence that there was none of that violence and rowdyism described in those articles, and no attempt to interrupt the speakers on the Confederate side. Notwithstanding the show of evidence produced by the hon. gentleman, he (Mr. Anglin) repeated, positively and emphatically, that there was no interruption beyond possibly two or three or half-a-dozen voices sometimes contradicting some of his statements. He (Mr. Anglin) did not interfere at any time to procure him a hearing, nor was there any occasion for his doing so. He did not say that the writers of those articles deliberately misstated the facts, nor that the Finance Minister knowingly misrepresented them; but owing to the lapse of time, their memory had deceived them. Though the newspaper articles said there were interruptions, they did not say the Finance Minister was interrupted. What did occur was this: Mr. Charles Skinner was, he thought, a candidate on that occasion. While he was addressing the meeting, some person interrupted or contradicted him, when a controversy arose, in which five or six persons engaged. Some noise ensued, and he (Mr. Anglin) was foolish or good-natured enough to say: If any of his friends were making a noise, he hoped they would submit to anything rather than to interrupt Mr. Skinner. That gentleman immediately took most unfair and improper advantage of his interference, exclaiming that things had come to a pretty pass if he, in the capital of his native Province, was to be indebted to him (Mr. Anglin) for a hearing. Everybody present felt how very unfair that remark was, and a great many of his (Mr. Anglin's) friends reproved him for being foolish enough to interfere. Nothing would have been more pleasing to the Finance Minister and his friends, than a serious attempt to prevent his being heard at that time, for nothing would have helped them more. There was no turmoil, excitement, or interruption, beyond the little episode he had mentioned, which was not worth noticing or mentioning; but it was seized upon and exaggerated by the writers of those newspaper articles, to turn against them the public opinion then running in their favour. Those papers were at that time most violent partisans of the hon. the Finance Minister, and very violent and unscrupulous advocates of Confederation.

MR. TILLEY said the circumstances of that day would not soon be forgotten by himself, and the thousands then present. There were twelve candidates, eight for the county and four for the city of St. John, and as a late member for the city, and of the Cabinet, it was decided that he (Mr. Tilley) should speak first. The member for Gloucester had occupied nearly half of the time devoted to the twelve speakers, and after the county candidates had spoken, he (Mr. Tilley) stepped to the front, but could not get a hearing. He recollected it well, for he never felt so humiliated before in his own constituency, which had elected him six or seven times. Mr. Anglin, who stood beside him, pressed forward, and asked the crowd to give him an opportunity of making his statements; and, though the interruption lasted some time, he afterwards obtained a hearing, but not one altogether satisfactory. The hon. gentleman said that those writers, and others, did not recollect the matter correctly; but those statements of the Telegraph and News appeared the very next morning from the editors describing as tersely and clearly as possible all that happened—that he had obtained a hearing only by the intervention of the member for Gloucester. He was surprised that the hon. gentleman should be at fault in this matter, knowing well that his memory generally was remarkably good. He (Mr. Tilley) had felt it due to himself to make these explanations, thinking it best to set this matter at rest.

MR. ANGLIN said that the hon. gentleman was not named in those articles as having been interrupted in any way.

MR. TILLEY: I think so.

MR. TUPPER said that, if he correctly understood the hon. member for Gloucester, he had asserted that the two leading papers of St. John, supporting

hon. gentlemen opposite, were such violent and unscrupulous partisans that one could not believe a word they said.

MR. ANGLIN said he did not quite say that. In those days they were violently partisan in character, and greatly exaggerated the little episode mentioned for the partisan purpose of creating ill-will and ill-feeling against the anti-Confederate party—of creating the impression that they were playing the part of bullies and rowdies, although they had been particularly scrupulous to treat the Finance Minister with the greatest possible respect. He defied the hon. gentleman to say that, during that excited time, he (Mr. Anglin) had ever uttered the slightest word in reference to him, his purposes or motives, that he or any reasonable man could take exception to.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said, of course the St. John News and Telegraph lied when supporting the Finance Minister, but both supported the member for Gloucester now, and had atoned for all sins, and whitewashed all those falsehoods against hon. gentlemen opposite; they had recovered their honesty, and were now to be believed, though they were not then.

MR. WELDON said he had a file of the St. John News containing an account of the proceedings of that meeting, the same paper from which the Finance Minister had read. The report stated that, while Mr. Skinner had been interrupted, when Mr. Tilley came forward he was received with loud applause. Then followed two columns of his speech, and then, when Mr. Wilmot, now Speaker of the Senate, but then one of the candidates opposed to Confederation and to the Finance Minister, attempted to reply, he was met by such a storm of yells that he retired with the observation: "Well, if you do not want to hear the explanation, I am sure I do not want to give it."

WAYS AND MEANS.—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned debate on Resolution 11, reported from Committee of Ways and Means (April 9th).

On item—Iron and steel screws, commonly called "wood screws," 35 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. ANGLIN asked why this duty had been increased.

MR. TILLEY said that the machinery for making the screws was very expensive, there was a large outlay for skilled machinists, and a considerable portion of the iron used was, to a certain extent, used in the manufacture of screws. Under these circumstances, builders' hardware, and everything of that kind was entitled to further consideration.

MR. MACKENZIE said it would be satisfactory if the hon. gentleman would inform the House of the expense of that machinery and the capital involved. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was under the impression there was very little expense compared with other manufactures. There was another matter that seemed very extraordinary. In one of the items passed he found this: "On rolled, round wire rods, in coils under half an inch in diameter, 10 per cent. ad valorem." This sort of iron, used in screws, was allowed in at 10 per cent, but if the same sizes of iron were brought in by a blacksmith, he would have to pay 17½ per cent., simply because it was straight rods in bundles. He knew that blacksmiths, particularly for carriage purposes, used a very large quantity of quarter-inch five-sixteenths, three-eighths and half-inch, which came, generally, in straight bundles of 100lb. each. If brought in in coils, it only paid 10 per cent. This amounted to a protection of 42½ per cent., which would render the making of screws a monopoly, while it was alleged that the best screws were those brought in from England and the United States, especially those from England. He thought there was only one manufactory of screws in the country. The percentage of 35 per cent. was really a prohibitory duty, without counting the difference of 7½ per cent. on iron in their favour, and prohibitory in a wrong direction, as those English and American screws were universally used to a greater or less extent.

MR. TILLEY said the proposition had been amended since it was first introduced, because, at the time he made the proposition, he supposed, from information he had, that the wire was all manufactured in the country, but, on further consideration, it was found desirable to allow this description of iron to come in at 10 per cent. Of this description of iron, which was used in the manufacture of nuts, etc., a considerable portion was lost in the manufacturing of these articles. It was thought worthy of consideration to give as much protection as possible to the one establishment which had been manufacturing screws in the Dominion. It was quite true that the competition had been very sharp, and he believed that establishment had been closed for some time.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. the Minister of Finance was mistaken about the factory referred to having been closed for want of a market for their articles. He (Mr. Mackenzie) knew that men in the trade had sent orders to that establishment which they were unwilling to fill, but the company were, in fact, in a position to take advantage of the markets, so soon as it would be regulated by the Minister of Finance, who, no doubt, had communicated with them, as he (Mr. Tilley) said he had with all industries, and arranged the tariff to suit that particular trade. They were given a protection of 35 per cent., and $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the iron they used, which made really, as he had said, a protection of $42\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. The articles manufactured by that company were said to be inferior to the English article, or were made in a different way.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) said that he was in a position to state, notwithstanding the insinuation thrown out by the hon. member for Lambton, as to the quality of the screws manufactured by the Canada Screw Company, at Dundas, that they were of the most unexceptionable quality. They were, in every respect, equal to those manufactured in England and the United States—and he (Mr. Robertson) must protest against the extraordinary statements made by the ex-Premier in his place in this House, in reference to the quality of the manufactures of this country. The hon. gentleman, judging from the course he had pursued, since the debate had been proceeding, was animated by a desire to destroy in some way or other the effects of the National Policy. Being powerless to prevent the adoption of the patriotic measure now under discussion, and no doubt being conscious that the result would be antagonistic to the prognostications of himself and his party, he sought, by a means most unfair and unworthy of a statesman, to detract from the quality of the goods produced in the country. And, when this was being done day after day by a member of this House, who occupied the prominent position of leader of the Opposition, there could be no doubt that an incalculable injury would be done to those industries which he had chosen to single out as the object of his attack. A short time ago the hon. member thought proper to make a most unwarrantable statement in reference to the clocks manufactured by the Hamilton Clock Company. That statement, no doubt, had done its work, and he (Mr. Robertson) was aware that it was just as devoid of merit as the unjust remarks made to-night in reference to the quality of the wood screws. The clocks made by the Hamilton Company were in every respect equal to any of the same class made in the United States. And he (Mr. Robertson) considered it unworthy of any man, much less of a member of Parliament, who had lately been the Premier of Canada, to condemn the industries referred to, for political reasons, and in the interests of persons who were importers, and whose great object always was and always would be, to keep down native manufactures. The hon. gentleman, he (Mr. Robertson) believed, really knew nothing about the quality of the goods he had been decrying, and he thought it was high time for some one to protest against such unwarrantable statements.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for Hamilton might as well reserve his lectures, for he should pay no attention to them. He should do what he conceived to be his duty altogether irrespective of the hon. gentleman's opinion. He did not object to the hon. gentleman giving his opinion, and, when a manufacturer came here asking the taxpayers of the country, through this House, to impose a Protective duty of 35 per cent., he would fail in his duty if he did not discuss everything relative to such manufacturer. He should do so, and he cared nothing about the hon. gentleman's opinion of his conduct; he was not responsible to him; he was not to be frightened by the hon. gentleman or any of his constituents. He stated nothing against the character of any party. He stated what he had been informed, that this manufactory to which he had alluded was receiving 35 per cent. protection, and had been issuing an inferior article. He had letters from gentlemen informing him that that was true, and the hon. gentleman had just now admitted it, although he claimed they were making a good article now. He was glad to hear it, but he had many letters in his possession throwing doubt on the quality of the article. With respect to the item under discussion, it was well known that, in the United States and England, a great deal of opposition was engendered to the manufactories existing there. When the duty was placed even at the low rate of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., a company in the United States deemed it proper to establish a branch in Canada. It was not a Canadian industry, it was only transplanted from Rhode Island to this country. It was one that they thought they could make profitable, and did make profitable at $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; and, because it was profitable at $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the hon. the Finance Minister put on $17\frac{1}{2}$ more, and gave them material at $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. less than the other industries. They were unduly protected, and it was most unjust to the consumers. He doubted exceedingly if the hon. member for Hamilton was so good a judge of screws as he represented.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) said he had no desire to take up the time of the House a second time on this question; but, since the hon. member had chosen to characterise his (Mr. Robertson's) remarks, as a "lecture," all he (Mr. Robertson) had to say in reply was that he did not wish it to be understood that he presumed to lecture any person, and he wished it, at the same time, to be known, that he did not propose to be lectured by the hon. member for Lambton. It was true that he (Mr. Robertson) was but a young member, but he wished the hon. member to understand that he (Mr. Robertson) quite understood his position in the House; he was an independent member of Parliament, representing a constituency of infinitely greater importance in this Dominion than that represented by the hon. member for Lambton, and as often as that hon. member chose to make statements derogatory to the honour and wellbeing of his (Mr. Robertson's) constituency, he would not fail to resent it. As to the clocks referred to, he (Mr. Robertson) could speak as one who had authority, for the simple reason that he knew all about it. There was no doubt that some of the cases of a lot of clocks made at Hamilton two or three years ago had been improperly finished, and they consequently did not take the eye of the commercial world, and a great loss was sustained by the company; but these clocks had all been recalled, and the company was now, as it always had been, able to turn out clocks equal in every respect to those of the same class made in the United States. He (Mr. Robertson) was aware of these facts, in consequence of having had a brief at the trial of a case in which the quality of these clocks came up; and, as to the screws, he was quite sure he knew more about them than the hon. member for Lambton, as he (Mr. Robertson) had repeatedly watched the process of manufacture at the factory at Dundas.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said, without entering on this ticklish controversy as to the merits of the screws, it did appear tolerably clear that it was an absolutely prohibitive duty. No revenue could come from it because it was certain none of these articles were now going to be imported. The result of that was that the people of Canada, whether they consumed $10,000 worth or $50,000 worth of these screws, would have to pay 35 per cent. higher for them. Now it was perfectly well known that there was a sharp competition between the iron manufacturers of England and those of the United States, which would effectually dispose of that part of the hon. gentleman's argument that there was risk of an increase in price. The certain result would be that we would get less from this article than before, and all for the benefit of a manufacture of which he believed there was only one in the country, and from what had been stated there was not much likelihood of having many more of them established. Therefore, they would simply be creating an absolute monopoly, and this 35 per cent. would go largely into the pockets of the manufacturers instead of into the revenue.

MR. BURPEE (St. John) said he would like to call attention to the item of horse-shoe nails, which paid a duty of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. more than the iron entering into them. These were much used and of great consumption; there was a factory now in St. John making these nails. They were compelled to pay $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the iron, and they were getting 5 per cent. less Protection than wood screws. One article was consumed in the country as largely as the other, and iron entered more largely into this industry than wooden screws.

MR. TILLEY said he would like to know from the hon. gentlemen whether the late Government had, by Order in Council, ever taken the duty off iron that was made in the horse-shoe nails, and also, whether they did not take the duty off wire that was used in the manufacture of screws.

MR. BURPEE: Yes.

MR. TILLEY said the hon. gentleman now, because there was a horse-shoe nail factory in St. John, endeavoured to draw a contrast between the action of the late Government and the protection now given to screws.

MR. BURPEE: The duty on iron was 5 per cent.; the drawback was only on those exported.

MR. TILLEY said he understood it was on all the iron used in that manufacture, and he believed that was the case. Now, when they imposed 10 per cent. on the raw material and gave them protection, there was a howl from the other side, as if they were building up a monopoly.

MR. BURPEE said what he desired to point out was the difference in those two industries. Why should one not be protected as well as the other?

MR. TILLEY: Then I just ask the hon. member why he allowed one industry to be free, while on the other industry in St. John he imposed a duty? We have a little electioneering capital being made here, and we may just as well settle it as we go along.

MR. MACKENZIE: Supposing that to be the case, does the hon. gentleman allege that it was wrong?

MR. TILLEY: No.

MR. MACKENZIE: Has the horse-shoe nail maker not to pay the same rate of duty as the screw maker?

MR. TILLEY said he had not, on the ground that, in the first place, he did not require the same expensive machinery.

MR. MACKENZIE: What is the cost of the machinery? What is the amount of capital invested in it?

MR. TILLEY: I do not know exactly.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman states, as a reason, that they have large capital invested, and that the machinery is expensive; of course, he must have had some information.

MR. BOWELL: In the factory at Dundas there are over 300 machines, costing on the average $500 each.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Can the hon. gentleman tell us what is the value of the raw material in the finished product, because this whole legislation largely depends upon that? Has he any idea of the proportion between the value of the raw material and the value of the finished product?

MR. JONES said that, in the manufacture of horse-shoe nails, the loss was nothing whatever, and the machinery required was not so expensive as that required in the manufacture of screws, which was the most expensive machinery that was imported into this country.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Can the hon. the Minister of Finance answer that question?

MR. TILLEY: If the hon. gentleman should ask me how many grains of wheat there were in a bushel, I could not answer him.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said this was an admirable illustration of the value of the information the hon. gentleman had got, and the care bestowed in framing this tariff. The whole question depended on what proportion that tax of 10 per cent. on the raw material bore to the value of the product. If the manufactured screw was worth two or three times as much as the iron cost that entered into its manufacture, then the tax of 10 per cent. was a trifling matter. If, on the other hand, the raw iron was a large constituent in the value of the screw, then there was something in the hon. gentleman's argument.

MR. TILLEY said he thought he might appeal to this House whether, since the commencement of the discussion on the details of the tariff, he had not endeavoured, and been able, to give all the information on these questions that it was possible to submit. The hon. gentleman had, on many occasions, proposed questions to him which it was quite clear to this House were for the purpose of embarrassment, and such questions as would not be put under ordinary circumstances. He had patiently endeavoured to answer these questions, but, when the hon. gentleman asked such a question as that, as to the relative values in this case, it was impossible to estimate the percentage exactly. A screw was not like a piece of machinery that had a small quantity of iron in it, and that iron might have an increased duty of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. or $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., which would not materially affect the price. But in this case the whole product was iron, it was like a cooking stove, it was composed entirely of an article which paid a duty.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had not exhibited what he called great patience in answering questions. It would have been very easy for him, instead of sending an insulting answer to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright), to say that he was not able to answer the question, or did not possess the precise information. It would not have been a difficult matter to obtain the relative values of the raw material and the finished product in the matter of screws. If the hon. gentleman could not answer the questions put to him, it might be expected that at all events he could explain his reasons for not being able to give the information asked.

MR. HAY said that the firm to which he belonged made use of more wood screws than any house in the Dominion. The difficulty they had with the Screw Company, at the commencement, was that they could not make all the numbers that they required in their business, but at present they could supply all demands. This establishment was not an American institution at first, but a Canadian institution; recently it became partly an American one. When the Dundas concern was started, the manufacturers of England and the United States lowered their prices 25 to 30 per cent., which was a strong argument in favour of encouraging our industries. There was no danger of monopolies, because other manufacturers in the same line would shortly be started, if the business was profitable.

MR. HESSON said hon. gentlemen opposite were trifling with the time of the House. The hon. member for Lambton had spoken four or five times on this one item. The ex-Finance Minister was also very anxious to elicit from the Finance Minister his view as to the exact amount likely to be raised from each item; he wanted to know the number of threads in a yard of cotton. It was not so long ago that the late Minister of Finance brought in estimates which were not realised, but which had resulted in large deficits. This trifling with the time of the House was not creditable. It was quite enough to expect from the Finance Minister that he should prepare an estimate of the amount to be realised on the whole policy, without entering into such minute particulars.

MR. COCKBURN said it was the duty of hon. members to examine carefully into all these propositions, and to call on the Finance Minister to explain his reasons for any particular duty imposed. The remarks of the hon. gentleman were utterly uncalled for and unwarranted by the facts of the case.

MR. MILLS said that the position taken by the hon. the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Centre Huron was not an unreasonable one. This tariff was an entirely novel one, and this House had been promised that the principles upon which the Minister of Finance acted in each particular case would be explained when the tariff was discussed in detail. They were now discussing it in detail, and they asked for information with regard to the difference in the tax on nails and screws. The hon. Minister had given a reason that was simply a fallacy. He said there was a great waste in the manufacture of screws which did not occur in the manufacture of nails. In what way did that justify the imposition of a larger tax upon screws? There was no advantage in respect to waste possessed by foreign manufacturers of screws. There was the same diminution of material in both cases. The hon. the leader of the Government knew that certain parties had come from Providence, R. I., to establish a manufactory of screws in the Province of Ontario. They did this under a Protective tariff of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and must have regarded the undertaking as a profitable one, or they would never have invested their money in it. If that $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Protection were sufficient, and the duty was now raised to 35 per cent., every man who purchased \$65 worth of screws under Free-trade, would, under this tariff, have to pay \$100. If the object was to obtain a revenue from this article, the tax should have been a reasonable one, because there were few who would purchase goods for importation when the tax amounted to 35 per cent. in addition to freight, rate of exchange, etc. When these goods would be sold, there would be a profit charged upon the 35 per cent. as well as upon the original price; so that before these screws passed into the hands of the consumer, at least 40 per cent. addition would be made to the full price. This tax was imposed in the interest of parties who would practically enjoy a monopoly of the trade. True, other manufactories could be started, but that would require a large capital, which was not easily acquired for so small a market. What was the history of manufacturing industries started in this way and under such circumstances? In most cases, where there was a large premium in the form of a Protective duty, workmen, with little or no means, undertook to start other establishments to compete with those already in operation which were run by men of capital, and, in a few months, the former would have to succumb; so that the parties who, in the first instance, started with considerable capital enjoyed in so limited a market a monopoly. Wherever a system of Protection was adopted, that protection was a premium in favour of continuing the manufacture with the sort of machinery that was originally employed. In England, until Huskisson proposed to remove the Protective duty on silk, they continued to manufacture that article with the same description of looms and appliances as had been used by Huguenots. There was no improvement until the system of Protection was done away with. In the United States, until the outbreak of the Civil War, when labour became scarce, they used the old style of agricultural implements, but had then to improve machinery so as to make up for the lack of labour, and agricultural machinery was improved during the five years of the Civil War more than during the fifty previous years. By affording exclusive Protection such as this, these manufacturers would go on with their existing appliances as long as possible, until, by means of superior appliances, outside manufacturers would be enabled to overcome this duty and compete with our manufacturers in our markets. Our manufacturers, for instance, had formerly no difficulty in selling any sort of stoves to our people, but since they were compelled to compete with the Americans they were obliged to make a better article. Under this system, instead of the industry being encouraged, an inferior article would be produced, and all motive for improvement, all necessity for making labour efficient, would be taken away.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he congratulated the House and the country on the appearance of the hon. member for Bothwell in the character of a thorough-paced Protectionist. His speech was an answer to all he had said during the campaign. He said that this establishment at Dundas, having the advantage of priority in its establishment, and having invested capital, it had, under this duty, practically a monopoly, and that there was no use in younger manufacturers or workmen going in to establish similar enterprises, because of the practical monopoly which the previous employment of capital gave to this establishment at Dundas. What was the argument the Conservatives had used all through the country? It was that priority in the establishment of an enterprise gave a great advantage to it, and that in such cases protection was allowed. The hon. gentleman was afraid that this establishment was going to be such a monopoly that it would crush all the others, and, in the interest of labour, he would crush this monopoly. It was not likely that the employment of $120,000 or $240,000 in any industry would prevent other enterprises of the same kind being started. The fact of this institution being profitable would induce, in the natural course of competition, the establishment of others of a similar nature. The hon. gentleman would admit that, if we were to have manufactures, all other things being equal, it was as well to have them in our own country as to get them from foreign countries.

MR. MILLS: Without Protection, otherwise there is no real profit at all.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman stated that our manufactures could not get on because there were previous establishments in the United States, protected establishments, with large capital, which crushed down our infant manufactures. He referred to one establishment at Dundas, which killed, he stated, other enterprises of the same kind. The hon. gentleman was of the same opinion as the Government, that our infant industries were being crushed by the protected institutions in the United States. But the hon. gentleman, going back to his Free-trade theories, said that in consequence of a protective duty the old patterns would be kept up. How did it happen that the Americans were enabled to manufacture a superior description of goods, as the hon. gentleman had stated, in the manufacture of stoves? He had a high opinion of the hon. gentleman's opinions, and was glad to find that he entertained the same opinions as did the Government on this subject. Then the hon. gentleman said that, in consequence of this duty, they would have to pay $100, where they only paid $50 before. They were not going to pay the $100 because they were going to make the screws in Canada. The statement of the hon. member for Centre Toronto showed that the price had not been increased since the imposition of the present tariff.

MR. CURRIER said that the argument of the hon. member for Bothwell was not a very sound one. That hon. gentleman said that so much protection was given to the manufacture of screws that it would be throwing all into the hands of the one establishment now existing, and therefore they would continue to use the bungling machinery they now used, and would consequently make an inferior article. He (Mr. Currier) believed that, if they continued to make an inferior article, other manufacturers would come forward who would use the most improved machinery, and take the business from them.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. the First Minister had sheltered himself under the authority of John Stuart Mill. He thought, if the hon. gentleman refreshed his memory, he would find that Mr. Mill had said that, incidentally, Protection might be useful under certain rules which he laid down. Hon. gentlemen opposite had argued that manufacturers had no sort of advantage under the late tariff. He (Mr. Cartwright) asserted that that tariff, which was an average tariff of 17½ per cent., gave an enormous incidental protection to all kinds of manufactures in the country. This tax upon screws, instead of benefiting the revenue, would benefit the capitalist engaged in the business. By-and-by there would, probably, be three or four manufacturers, and then they would divide the plunder. He maintained that nothing but the absurd fiscal policy of the United States had kept it from being the most formidable competitor of England in the commerce of the world. If hon. gentlemen wanted an illustration as to the working of the Protection system, they might find it in this, that, in spite of the high tax levied on steel rails, the chief manager of one of the principal railroads in the United States had sent to England for 12,000 tons of steel rails, in the face of a duty which he was informed was now nearly 100 per cent. They had had twenty years of the highest prohibitory tariff in the world, and they were not able to manufacture steel rails to be compared with the steel rails of England.

MR. JONES said that the hon. member for Centre Huron only spoke theoretically; he (Mr. Jones) after 20 years' experience could speak practically. With regard to steel, and almost all classes of iron, they had been able to import a very large portion of their supply from the United States, that highly protected country. In his own business, he had been able to import bar steel cheaper from the United States than from England. He denied that there were the great advantages which the hon. member for Bothwell had attached to the priority of manufacture. He admitted that there was a certain advantage in being first in starting a manufacture in a country, but the manufacturer would have to undersell those who had command of the market in order to obtain a market. Then the American and the English manufacturers would reduce their prices in order to crush out the new manufacturer. He maintained that the result of this tariff was that the people of Canada were getting those goods cheaper than ever. A malleable iron firm in Troy, N. Y., had written to parties in the village where he had lived, stating that the market price of malleable iron castings was 7c., or 7½c., and offering to send them in at 6¾c., laid down at their own doors, freight and duty paid. While the tariff before the House gave incidental protection, he did not regard it as a Protective tariff, but as a revenue tariff. He hoped it would be a lasting tariff, and he was satisfied it would result in the protection of Canadian labour. If it were found that the revenue derived from it was larger than anticipated, the duty on the necessaries of life might be removed.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said he agreed that enough, or more than enough, competition in the home market would reduce the price of an article, and there were certain industries in Canada in which there was so much competition that the prices could not be raised greatly to the disadvantage of the purchaser, except by a combination, which could not, perhaps, be permanently maintained. In regard to screws, there was only one factory in the Dominion. The total importation of screws last year amounted to $18,633, which was not sufficient to call another manufactory into existence. The inevitable result, therefore, of one man having control of the market, with the advantage of a tariff of from 25 to 40 per cent., would be to send up the price of screws. It was human nature to take advantage of an opportunity like this, and, when the manufacturer could increase the price legitimately, and when that increase was legalised by the tariff, it would undoubtedly be done.

MR. PLUMB said it would not be surprising if his hon. friend the Finance Minister did occasionally manifest a little restiveness in the position in which he was placed by hon. gentlemen opposite. He must say, with all parliamentary deference, that the late Finance Minister exceeded all others who occupied the Opposition benches, in the insolence with which he propounded his questions. It was not surprising that hon. gentleman should feel sore in respect to the tariff which had been brought forward. It was not surprising, after he had been washed overboard by the wave that swept over the country, that he should be struggling amidst the breakers, and anything that came from him must be received with a grain of allowance on account of the desperate position that he was in. But there was dissension in the Opposition camp, most unfortunate dissension, which still further weakened and embarrassed them, their tactics were not in harmony. They did not present an unbroken front to the enemy, there were grave differences among them. For instance, the position taken by the Minister of the Interior, when he rose, was one of utter antagonism to the leader of his party in the Dominion, the grand old Reformist himself, the gentleman who went, cap in hand, with bended knee, to the United States Government, and offered all we had for the purpose of getting reciprocity in the exchange of farm products. Did he want only to get farm products into Canada, to compete with ours? They were already admitted duty free. The late Minister of the Interior said the consumer paid the duty. Therefore, everything the leader of his party did was in the direction of an absolute sacrifice, a sacrifice which would have amounted to $2,300,000 of duties upon American goods, which he offered to put on the free list, taking the imports of 1874 as a basis of calculation. He also offered to expend a large sum in enlarging and constructing canals, at a time when the revenue was declining, and would have also given up the Fishery Award, and conceded the free navigation of our rivers, lakes, and canals—and all for what? For the purpose of inducing the American people to receive our produce, upon which, according to the late Minister of the Interior, they paid the duty, and we lost nothing by their heavy tariff. Well, that was one of the inconsistencies of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Another was uttered by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who stated in this House that the tariff in the United States reduced the price of pig iron so far, that, under a heavy Protective duty, it was sold cheaper than ever before, either in that country or in England. He was not at one with the late Finance Minister, who had stated that a Protective duty increased prices by that duty, and, perhaps, created a monopoly which enhanced them still more. The hon. gentleman from South Brant (Mr. Paterson), now a Free-trade Boanerges, in the most patriotic tones, in 1873, prayed that the hon. the Premier would give Protection. He said he had hoped that the Finance Minister would have brought in a Protective tariff. It was an urgent need of the country. That was the hon. gentleman's supplication in 1873, and the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver), who had just addressed the House, had also petitioned for the adoption of a Protective tariff and a National Policy, but now he had no language with which he could sufficiently denounce it. The late Premier and Minister of the Interior had never introduced the Free-trade principle so far as petroleum was concerned. They always kept a heavy duty on that article. It was a product of their respective constituencies, and they knew, to use a figurative expression, the origin of where the milk in that cocoanut came from. It would be impossible for any man, even if he were gifted with the proverbial patience of the old patriarch, to sit here, hour after hour, with perfect equanimity, constantly answering the most inconsequential and trivial questions put forth on the Opposite side; to hear, hour after hour, on every item, the renewal of the whole Protection and Free-trade discussions without manifesting some impatience. The late Minister of the Interior had argued and quoted John Stuart Mill, to prove that Protective duties were ruinous, that all tariff charges were a direct tax, to their full amount, and much more, upon the consumer. How did the holders of those views account for the fact that, in one of the most highly protected countries in Europe—Belgium,—when the iron and coal trades were stagnant in England, when every manufacturing industry in England was paralysed, the British Secretary of Legation in Belgium could report a very different state of things there? If that report had been made with regard to the United States, they would have been told that those results were owing to the enormous Protection. They had been told last night by the member for North Brant (Mr. Fleming) that the people of the United States were fools for keeping up a Protective system. Well, he (Mr. Pumb) thought that we might as well mind our own business, and leave the Americans to befooled themselves if they liked. They had befooled themselves to some purpose. They learned from the speech of the member for North Norfolk—which contained his first opinions: they did not know what the last were—that the internal commerce of the United States amounted to twelve thousand millions a year; that, although they might have lost foreign commerce, their internal trade had sprung up to such an enormous extent as to compensate them for it. That was exactly what they asked for Canada, through the system which the hon. the Finance Minister had proposed, and which was fought with such determination, such abusive bitterness on the floor of this House, as well as in the late contest, the result of which had been an overwhelming declaration of public opinion in its favour. There was nothing truer than the rough cartoon displayed in a comic paper of last Saturday, which represented the Government party in the House in unbroken front, and all the leading gentlemen on the other side astride their hobbies—every man nearly coming to grief, or, if not, tilting violently against his neighbour. They on his side could afford to let them quarrel amongst themselves; but he did protest against the opening of the whole Free-trade question upon every petty item in this schedule. They were anxious to go on with the business of the Session, but had not been disposed to prevent free discussion. On the other side, the discussion had been carried on with such a lack of courtesy, and with such bitterness, as had rarely been witnessed. The member for Centre Huron, last night, quoted the example of Bright and Cobden to justify him in language which was far beyond parliamentary rule, and, if it were not unparliamentary to say so, was such as he (Mr. Plumb) could style utterly disgraceful. The Finance Minister had shown a desire to give the House full information; but he could not be expected to furnish d tails with respect to every item in such an enormously cumbersome list as that of a full tariff. Nobody knew this better than the late Finance Minister, who had displayed his utter ignorance of his duties when he brought down the tariff for 1874, with its 16½ per cent. rate, a tariff which attacked and bungled and muddled and disturbed every business interest in Canada. He had to withdraw that tariff and content himself with making a horizontal tariff of 17½ per cent., a rate which he now considered so sacred that he thought no man should touch. That was the sacred number, and 2½ per cent. more appeared to be thought robbery, sacrilege, pillage, that would destroy their industries and ruin the country. Away with such trash and nonsense—let their opponents bring a little practical common sense to the discussion, and they would be able to dispose of it and pass to other business which must be done before the Session closed. If it was delayed, the Opposition must bear the responsibility of keeping them here, and he

MR. PLUMB.

(Mr. Plumb) would do his part towards having it understood by the members of both Houses, who were kept from their homes and their business interests, and the people who paid for their attendance, where the responsibility belonged.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that, if the hon. the Finance Minister was desirous of getting on with that discussion, and conducting it in a reasonable and proper tone, he would advise him not to set up the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) to use the scandalous language he had just employed. He had never heard anything more utterly disgraceful than that hon. gentleman's language in speaking of hon. members on the Opposition side of the House. He seemed to think that he was licensed to say anything, however coarse and severe. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was not aware of any bitterness or impropriety having been shown on his side of the House as that hon. member asserted. It was their duty as an Opposition to scan the Government's propositions for taxation zealously, and they would not be deterred from doing it by any ill language the hon. member for Niagara might be put up to use. There was no intention to show any factious opposition to the Government, who had based their existence on this tariff, and who had a large majority. The Opposition had expressed their opinion of it in a general way, and must do so also in regard to the details. They had criticised very few of the details indeed, and at least half of the time of the discussion had been occupied by the Ministerial side; they would endeavour in every fair and right way to aid the Government to get their measures through Parliament; but, on the other hand, they must discharge their duty of criticising freely and independently the Government's policy. The hon. member for Centre Huron, who was the late Finance Minister, had a right to attend to the details of this measure, and it was necessary that he should speak frequently and pointedly on matters connected with the subject under discussion. The hon. the Finance Minister would do much better for himself and the Government by preventing such interruptions of such a calm, temperate and fair discussion as had been carried on from the Opposition side of the House, as had just been witnessed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he had listened with a great deal of care to the speech of the hon. member for Niagara, and had failed to hear one single unparliamentary remark.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman spoke of the insolence of the member for Centre Huron.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman only said that, if it had been parliamentary, he would have gone far enough to use that word.

MR. MACKENZIE: No; it was the word disgraceful he used in that connection.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the hon. member for Niagara was quoting the language used by the member for Centre Huron last night, when he spoke about the robbery, pillage, iniquity, etc., perpetrated in connection with this tariff, employing every epithet from Billingsgate vocabulary that could be heaped upon it, and all who supported it. If this measure was robbery, the members who countenanced it were robbers. He had heard the member for Niagara but quote the language of the member for Centre Huron, and he was sure that, if he had used unparliamentary expressions, Mr. Speaker would have called him to order. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) was sure that, to use a phrase of the member for Lambton, he was not the man to administer a lecture on parliamentary propriety. He thought he had heard that hon. gentleman using such language towards the member for Niagara as that he had made an idiotic tirade of about two hours' length.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had told the member for Niagara, the following day, that he was not aware that he used that expression; that he regretted it, and had asked the official reporter not to leave it in his speech.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was sure the hon. member for Niagara was not aware, either, that he had used any such word as insolent, and would ask the reporter not to put it in the Hansard. With regard to the last Parliament, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) did not think the hon. gentleman was exceedingly careful in his language; and, to-day, he had used a very improper expression, reflecting upon the independence of members of Parliament, in observing that he would advise the Finance Minister not to put up the member for Niagara, as they had just heard. What right had the member for Lambton to say that his hon. friend had put up any independent member to make a speech, or that any would allow himself to be put up for such a purpose? The hon. member for Niagara had the very same privilege and right as the member for Lambton to express his opinions, and his remarks were of a general character, but not more general than the member for Bothwell on the general principles of political economy. The member for Lambton observed that half the useless speeches that were made on this subject came from the Ministerial side. Considering their numbers, they should be surprised that his hon. friends only took up half the time. He ventured to say that, if they took up the Hansard, and counted every line and word uttered in this debate, that it would be found the active, energetic, able minority had taken up more than half the time.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he might observe for himself that it was a matter of profound indifference to him what the member for Niagara thought or said as to himself. Consequently he did not care a single straw whether the hon. member's words were parliamentary or unparliamentary. He had never called him to order, and never should, let him say what he liked. As for his own (Mr. Cartwright's language last night, if unparliamentary, he would withdraw it, or put it into parliamentary form. But he would repeat that his position with regard to the whole tariff system was that the people of Canada were being robbed. That was the opinion and belief of the Opposition. It did not necessarily follow, however, as the First Minister had said, that they thereby accused hon. gentlemen opposite of being robbers. That would not be parliamentary, and they did not say so. But they did declare that, from first to last, the whole tariff was a scheme of spoliation, to which the consent of a very small numerical majority of the people had been obtained under false pretences; and he asserted that, in stating that here or elsewhere, they were using no unparliamentary language. As they honestly believed that, they had a perfect right to use that language in describing what they believed to be a gross outrage and crime upon the people of this country. They did not apply that language to persons, at any rate in that House; for what they said outside they would be prepared to answer. Here they were prepared to recognise the rules of debate. Should the Speaker think that he (Mr. Cartwright) had, in the heat of debate, exceeded the legitimate limit of Parliament, by language which had a pretty wide range, he should not only withdraw that language, but take care as far as he could to guard against its repetition. But he denied in toto that the language used in describing this tariff was unparliamentary. There were abundant examples in the Parliamentary debates of the Mother Country, of language to the full as strong, and stronger, than any he had ever used in his place.

PRIVATE BILL.

THIRD READING.

The following Bill was considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time, and passed:—

Bill (No. 26) To authorise the Trustees of the Toronto Savings Bank to sell and convey to the Home Savings and Loan Company, Limited.—(Mr. Cameron, North Victoria.)

WAYS AND MEANS.—THE TARIFF.

DEBATE RESUMED.

House resumed consideration of Resolution 11, reported from Committee of Ways and Means.

On item—Oil cloth, stamped, painted or printed, 30 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT asked what amount of revenue it was expected would be collected on this article; it looked to him like a prohibitive duty.

Mr. TILLEY said they did not expect it would be a prohibitive duty. The imports last year amounted to $131,722, yielding a revenue of $23,000. It was expected that the duty imposed would increase the quantity manufactured in the country, but that the quantity that would still be imported would yield $3,000 or $4,000 revenue more than that of last year.

Item agreed to.

On item—Opium, prepared for smoking, $5 per lb.,

Mr. ANGLIN said he thought for many reasons this was an objectionable proposition. Temperance men generally contended that the licensing of the sale of wines and strong liquors was the legalisation of that traffic, and how hon. gentlemen who held that opinion could in silence permit an item like this to pass was beyond his comprehension. It was an admission that opium might be used with propriety in this country for smoking purposes. He supposed it was intended to bear upon the Chinese in our western country, many of whom were stated to be addicted to this habit. But whether it would not be well to meet that case in some other way than by imposing a duty on opium for smoking he thought might fairly be taken into consideration. When he saw the item first, it startled him, but it occurred to him afterwards that it was introduced thoughtlessly. Whether the duty on opium for all purposes might not be largely increased, or whether we might not have one duty imposed in the original packages, and another duty on opium in any other shape, might well receive consideration. He felt a strong objection to seeing an item of this kind in our tariff.

Mr. TILLEY said the hon. gentleman had suggested that this should be dealt with in some other way, but he had not suggested any other way. They could only deal with it in two ways: one was to admit it and charge as high a duty as possible, in order to discourage its use:

and the other was to prohibit it, which, he concluded, was the other way the hon. member wished to deal with it. Now, he recollected the speeches made by that hon. gentleman in New Brunswick, on the subject of prohibition, and he recollected reading a speech made by him in this House last Session, when he felt it his bounden duty, though Speaker, to get up and declaim against the principle of prohibition as being outrageous. He (Mr. Tilley) was rejoiced and delighted to find that the hon. gentleman was a convert in favour of prohibition against the introduction of opium for the Chinese.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: But it all ends in smoke, you see.

MR. TILLEY said there had been a great advance in public opinion, in certain directions, in the last eight or ten years, and he must say that, of all the conversions he had heard of in favour of prohibition in the Dominion of Canada, within the last ten years, none was more satisfactory than that of the hon. member for Gloucester.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Or so sudden.

MR. TILLEY said that in British Columbia last year the duty paid on 14,470 lb., at $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., was \$11,642. He agreed with the hon. gentleman that the use of that drug, as the Chinese used it, was a misfortune. There were only two ways of dealing with it—either prohibit it, or make the duty so high as that it would diminish the quantity consumed. Therefore, it was proposed that, upon this article, which cost \$11 or \$12 per pound, \$5 per pound should be imposed as a duty. If they consumed even two-thirds of what they consumed last year, the duty would give an additional revenue of \$25,000. They would pay about the same percentage as the people in this country paid on wine, about 50 per cent of the value.

MR. ANGLIN said the hon. the Finance Minister had made a good point against himself individually, although it did not amount to a great deal. Though he was opposed to drunkenness, he did not believe that any set of men ought to prescribe to another set of men whether they should or should not use alcoholic beverages. Those beverages were often beneficial, as was also opium, and he would not have it prohibited if used in a proper way. Opium smoking was one of the most destructive and ruinous vices to which any people could be addicted. So bad was it that even in China an attempt had been made to prohibit the introduction of opium. Evidently the hon. the Finance Minister contemplated the introduction of opium in different shapes. He proposed to tax the smoking preparation heavily; why not, then, as it generally came in the form of cakes, tax it in cake or in the crude state, at one rate, and in all other preparations whatever, at another rate? He, however, would be happy to see its improper use prohibited, whatever charge of inconsistency it might expose him to.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said hon. gentlemen opposite had frequently attacked this tariff as being opposed to England and the Imperial policy, and they had raised the cry of disloyalty because it was proposed to tax certain things without reference to the Imperial policy. The Imperial policy of England was now to encourage opium smoking. A considerable portion of the revenue in India was derived from the opium raised there and sold in China. As the hon. gentleman knew, they attempted to put it down in China, but it was in this way: The Chinese Government became Protectionists, and said they could raise as good opium in China as was raised in India, and therefore they put an additional duty on the foreign article, in order to raise opium in those provinces of China where the poppy would grow. The hon. gentleman must remember that one of the ablest State papers on that subject was drawn by the Duke of Argyll, when he was Secretary of State for India. That paper had ever since been an authority, and it was stated that the smoking of opium by the Chinese was not injurious, that it was a mere opiate to soothe the irritation produced by the stimulating property of tea. That paper was a complete vindication of the British Government.

MR. ANGLIN said the right hon. gentleman was mistaken in one or two particulars. In the first place, a great many years ago an effort was made to exclude opium altogether from China, and that led to the first Chinese war. The importation was then prohibited, not with any view of encouraging the growth of the poppy in China, but it was an honest attempt on the part of the Chinese Government to put an end to the practice which they found to be so injurious. They knew that England went to war with China to compel them to receive the opium, and that they succeeded. In later years the Chinese Government, finding it impossible to keep opium out of the country, had adopted the Protective system, and allowed the growth of opium in the country.

On item—Organs, cabinet, viz:—On reed organs having not more than two sets of reeds, a specific duty of ten dollars; having over two and not over four sets of reeds, fifteen dollars; having over four and not over six sets of reeds, twenty dollars; having over six sets of reeds, thirty dollars; and in addition thereto, ten per cent. ad valorem on the fair market value thereof,

Mr. CARTWRIGHT asked if the hon. gentleman would tell what this item represented in the way of an ad valorem duty, and what the value of this class of organ was.

Mr. TILLEY said on reed organs, a duty of $10 and 10 per cent. was imposed, and they had the following prices varying from $46 to $149. He had prepared the following table:—

Mr. ANGLIN.

On item—Paintings, drawings, engravings, and prints, 20 per cent. ad valorem,

Mr. McLENNAN said he could not allow this item to pass, without drawing the attention of the House to the prohibitory rate of duty that we appeared to be putting upon every description of art. He had no doubt that, upon further consideration, and before the tariff came to be dealt with at another Session, this question of duty upon art would be re-considered. This subject might have been overlooked heretofore, but it was one of the greatest importance for the future. In the United States, where high tariffs had prevailed, the rate of duty on works of art was 10 per cent., whilst those for associations for the promotion of art, and works of native artists resident abroad, were admitted free. In our own tariff, printing, drawings, engravings, and prints were put down at 20 per cent.; manufactured and finished marble was put down at 25 per cent., and he supposed this included statuary. The great improvement that had been made of late in England, in the production of illustrated works created another element in the art education of the country. He found that the progress that had been made in that respect had brought into public service in England a very high class of art. There was no home production of these works of art to be protected, and the revenue derived from them would be very small, because the importation was very small, and he trusted the Finance Minister would consider this matter during recess, and be prepared to place them on the free list, or the 5 per cent. list.

Mr. MACKENZIE said there was an item in the free list, of paintings by artists of well known merit, and copies of the old masters. No doubt the Custom-house clerks and deputies would be able, quite as well as the Minister of Finance, to distinguish those works of art from others.

Mr. TILLEY said that models for the use of schools of design, as well as paintings in oil by artists of well known merit, or copies of the old masters by such artists, were admitted free. Paintings, drawings, engravings and prints, 20 per cent. ad valorem. These were to be found only in the houses of the wealthy, who could afford to pay the duty. Had they been put on the 5 per cent. list, hon. gentlemen opposite would have exclaimed against the Government for imposing such a light duty, when tea and sugar were charged heavy duties.

MR. MILLS said it was a mistake to tax heavily works of sculpture and paintings. Whatever might be the general standard of intelligence in a new country, it must, with respect to æsthetical culture, be behind an old country, and not only was it necessary to provide the necessary appliances for the advantage of artists, but, in order that the product of their art should find a market, it was necessary that a taste for art should be cultivated in the country, and a powerful means of doing this was by encouraging the diffusion of works of art as much as possible. He knew of some instances where parties had countermanded orders for paintings from Europe since this tariff was introduced. It seemed to him that these articles should have been put on the free list or on the 5 per cent. list.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there would be no difficulty in discriminating between the works of eminent artists and those of inferior artists. The real works of art which would educate the people were allowed in free. This duty would apply to an immense mass of rubbish which came into this country and degraded art.

MR. McLENNAN said in Europe there were a host of copyists of the paintings of the old masters, and the best copies were never sold for any price worthy the dignity of the art, while the humblest painter producing an original picture got a better price than he could have got for any copy of a picture in the art galleries. Some limit should be placed on the valuation for the duty, as it was extremely difficult to fix the commercial value of those works. In the matter of engravings, there was the widest possible range in the value, from the humblest that appeared in our magazines to the finest steel engravings.

MR. STRANGE said, from the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell

(Mr. Mills) and the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), the public would be led to infer that there were no native artists of any merit in Canada. In justice to the Ontario Society of Arts, he protested against this assumption. That society held an annual exhibition, in which several paintings of great merit were exhibited. In justice to them, this tax should be levied, and thus protect the native product of art.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: What revenue will be derived from the increased duty on paper-hanging?

MR. TILLEY said the importation last year was $189,142, on which $33,102 revenue was collected. Under this tariff it was estimated $69,000 additional revenue would be produced, after making allowance for the increase in the article manufactured in this Dominion.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: It is proposed simply for revenue?

MR. TILLEY: For both revenue and Protection.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he was afraid the increase would largely diminish the importation, and would have the effect of producing an inferior article, as it was not likely an article equal to the imported one could be made here. There was no object in taxing an article like this except for revenue purposes.

MR. TILLEY said he did not think the tariff would diminish the importation of the better class of wall papers. The manufacture of the common description of wall paper which was used in the Dominion would, no doubt, be increased, but not sufficiently to diminish the revenue.

Item agreed to.

On item—Paper calendered, 22½ per cent. ad valorem,

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked what was calendered paper.

MR. TILLEY said it was a distinction recommended by the trade between the paper used for printing purposes and glazed paper, such as writing paper. They did not expect to derive any increase of revenue from the change made in the duty upon paper.

MR. ANGLIN enquired whether, under this duty, it was calculated that, within a reasonably short time, factories would be established in which writing paper would be manufactured for general use in this country.

MR. TILLEY said, after giving the matter the fullest enquiry, and obtaining information from all quarters, the Government had decided that an addition of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on calendered paper would lead to the manufacture, within a few years, of a large portion of this description of paper. It was manufactured at present, but not extensively.

Item agreed to.

On item—Plants, viz: Fruit, shade, lawn and ornamental trees, shrubs and plants, 20 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. CHARLTON said that he was informed by those engaged in this trade, that orders for fruit trees were generally given a long time in advance of the time for delivery, and that a large number of orders were given before there was any talk of the imposition of a duty upon plants. He would enquire whether, in such a case, any remission of duty would be allowed upon the fulfilment of the orders.

MR. CASEY said he had one or two applications from his neighbourhood, asking for a remission of duties in these cases. Such a remission of duties, he believed, was not altogether without a precedent, since he understood that, in the case of the Credit Valley Railroad, which had ordered some steel rails before the tariff came into force, an arrangement had been made for the remission of the duty on those articles.

MR. TILLEY said an application had been made for a remission of duty on the road in question, but the answer that had been given was that the case could not be taken into consideration, because all that would be necessary in cases where parties desired to take advantage of the increased duties would be to submit a written agreement showing that the goods were ordered before the imposition. He thought it would be quite apparent to hon. gentlemen that no such agreement could be recognised.

Item agreed to.

On item—Plaster of Paris, calcined or manufactured, 15c. per 100lb., or 45c. per barrel of not over 300lb.,

MR. CHARLTON said that plaster of Paris was considered a fertiliser, and he asked whether the hon gentleman could, with propriety, impose a duty upon it.

MR. TILLEY said that this article was a fertiliser, but the fact that they had an abundance of raw material in the country and the men and mills to grind it had induced them to impose the duty. They did not see why they should send the raw material to the United States to be ground and brought back again.

MR. MACKENZIE: Where was that done?

MR. TILLEY: It was done in New Brunswick.

MR. MILLS: It must have been advantageous, or it would not have been done.

MR. CHARLTON said this tariff would act injuriously to the agricultural interest, and on that ground he regarded it as objectionable.

MR. ANGLIN said he thought that many years must have elapsed since any of their plaster was sent to the United States to be manufactured. For many years past they had manufactured it in their own country.

Item agreed to.

On item—Printing presses of all kinds, 15 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. ANGLIN said he had received letters with regard to printing presses from persons who understood the matter, and who regarded this as a grievous burden, and one that should not be imposed. There was a great variety of printing presses, and it was simply impossible that this duty could serve any purpose of Protection, because no factory could exist in Canada that made them. The printers felt they were hardly dealt with.

They were given little or no Protection under the tariff, while their burdens were greatly increased.

MR. TILLEY said that there might be some objection taken to this duty, because it was only 15 per cent., whilst other manufacturers were paying 20 and 25 per cent. He maintained that printers had a great advantage under this tariff, especially book and job printers, and that the job printing which used to be brought into the country by travelling companies was now being done in Canada. An instance of this had occurred lately in Ottawa. He found that the value of the portable hand-presses which paid duty was $1,859, while those that were admitted free were valued at $99,298. The proposed duty of 15 per cent. would perhaps result in a revenue of from $10,000 to $15,000. He could not see, if the necessaries of life were taxed at from 15 per cent. to 20 per cent., why this class of machinery should be exempted.

MR. CARWRIGHT said he did not see what earthly right the cotton or worsted manufacturer had to get his machinery in free, because it could not be made in the country, while the printer and manufacturer of paper was obliged to pay duty on his machinery, which was not made in this country. That was distinctly an injustice to this particular class of manufacturers, and in favour of others much more largely protected.

MR. TILLEY said that up to 1873 the tariff was so arranged that, by Order in Council, machinery not made in this country was admitted free. Subsequently, by Order in Council, a duty of 10 per cent. was imposed. It was found, and he was satisfied, that hon. gentlemen opposite would bear testimony to the accuracy of his statement, that previously to and after 1873, machinery represented not to be manufactured in the country, was manufactured in the country. It was utterly or practically impossible for the Treasury Board or the Government to definitely settle the matter, though they might have a certificate from particular sections of the country, that that article was not produced in it. It might be found that the machinery was afterwards made with great dissatisfaction as to the result. In some cases, prices were taken and had not been collected. It was then decided that, if any machinery was to be admitted free, it should not be by Order in Council, but under the tariff itself. With the exception of cotton machinery, it was found that there was very little that would be required on our industries that could not be made here. Machinery for the cotton or worsted industries, when established here, must be imported. The machinery from the United States manufactories was of the most perfect character at present, giving manufacturers in those trades advantage over every other part of the world. It was considered better to come to the House and ask that an arrangement of this kind should be made by it, leaving nothing to be done by the Governor in Council.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said there was not the faintest likelihood that printing presses of the best kind would be made in this country for many a day; so the hon. gentleman's whole argument tended to show that the best description of those presses should be put on the free list.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said that a great many petitions protesting against taxing printing presses had come from printers in all parts of the country. Valuable printing presses were not made here. The Finance Minister said this duty was collected to encourage the book publishing business; but the presses required for all the finer kinds of book work were not made in Canada, but only the ordinary presses. The large presses, such as the Globe and Mail were printed on, would come to $2,000 or $3,000. This was an important item, and must interfere with the printing business. It would throw a serious obstacle in the way of the book publishing business. Any newspaper man or book publisher that wished to furnish an office with the finer kinds of book-work, would be utterly unable to do so with the Canadian kind of type, which was an inferior article. For ordinary newspaper work, the Montreal type material had been found to be of very inferior quality. A good article had to be imported. He thought that the Finance Minister should not have imposed those duties on printers' material.

MR. ANGLIN said that the argument for advantages to machinery used in the making of cotton and woollen goods applied to the better kinds of printing presses with greater force, as they could not be made in this country. As presses for the large newspapers, and the finer kinds of work, must be imported, a protective duty was uncalled for, and would be unavailing, as there was no probability that manufactories of that kind could be established and maintained in Canada.

MR. BOWELL said it was unfortunate that, in case of almost every item affecting our industries, they should find some hon. gentleman depreciating the value of the articles manufactured in this country. The member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) stated that the type manufactured in Montreal was of an inferior quality, and unfit for book-work, while the fact was, it would do for both it and newspaper work. He had no doubt that our type-founders would produce an article suited for all kinds of work done in this country. The Scotch metal, brought here at a small duty, would enable Montreal men, with skilled mechanics, to close the Canadian market against United States type. He knew the sources of the petitions against these duties, including an importer of Scotch type in Toronto. It was quite true that the larger presses were not manufactured in Canada; but it was equally true that, a very few years ago, there were no power presses, either treadle or steam, made here. But, for some years past, an Oshawa company had turned out a very good class of press, called jobbers, which were of the very best kind used; and they also produced an excellent power press, known as the Taylor. When they could do this, he had no doubt that, with this protection, such firms would be able to enter largely into the manufacture of the presses used for all kinds of work. Though the eight-cylinder press might not be made here at present, it was no reason why they should not pay their proportion of the revenue as well as other articles. The ordinary platen or hand-press used to do all the book work of the country, but now, with the power presses, having proper registering apparatus, books could be well printed here. He was assured by practical men that, under this tariff, ninety-nine hundredths of the class of work heretofore done in the United States for Canada would now be done by Canadian printers.

MR. ANGLIN said that, from his knowledge of the business, though it was somewhat theoretical, there was no compensatory advantage given to the great mass of those engaged in the newspaper business, under this tariff, for the many burdens imposed upon them.

Item agreed to.

On item—Quinine, sulphate of, 20 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he desired to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Finance to the desirability of making this article duty free. Quinine was universally used, and it was one of those things which it was desirable to have in the Free list, especially as the amount of duty derived from it could not be considerable. It was hardly an article from which revenue should be obtained.

MR. TILLEY asked on what grounds it should be free.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Medicines ought to be free.

MR. TILLEY said he could not understand why this particular article should be admitted free.

Item agreed to.

On item—Salt (except salt imported from the United Kingdom, or imported for the use of the sea or gulf fisheries, which shall be free of duty) in bulk, 8c. per 100lb.; in bags, barrels, or other packages, 12c. per 100lb.,

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said perhaps the hon. the Finance Minister would allow that item to stand over, as he (Mr. Cameron) knew that the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Farrow) intended to speak on the subject. As the hon. the Minister of Finance was aware, that gentleman took a lively interest in the matter, but, through illness, he was unable to attend the House.

MR. TILLEY said the hon. gentleman could move an amendment on the second reading.

MR. CAMERON said he regretted the hon. the Finance Minister had not dealt with this industry in the same generous spirit with which he had dealt with the other industries of the country. He would like to know why this important industry had been left out in the cold. There was no industry in the country, from the little clock factory in the city of Hamilton, to the largest and most important industry in the Dominion, that the hon. gentleman had not undertaken to protect. Our salt interest alone had received no encouragement, no assistance, and no consideration at the hands of the Finance Minister, and he would like the hon. gentleman to explain to the House and the country why this important industry, one of the most important in the country, had not been considered by him in the same spirit in which he had dealt with other industries. The only protection the salt manufacturers of the western section of the country received under this tariff, was from salt coming into the Province of Ontario from the United States. By referring to the trade returns, it would be found that there were only some 33,000 bushels of salt imported from the United States last year.

Some Hon. MEMBERS : 183,000 bushels.

MR. CAMERON said that was the total quantity brought into the whole Dominion from the United States. The hon. the Minister of Finance knew that, owing to the high freights, the salt manufacturers of the western section never could send their salt to the Lower Provinces, especially to the Provinces of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. The only sections of the Dominion to which they could at all hope to send this product of the Canadian mines was the Province of Ontario and the Province of Quebec. This duty would only have the effect of excluding 33,000 bushels of salt from the markets of Ontario. That quantity was a mere bagatelle, and could be produced in the smaller wells engaged in the manufacture of salt in Ontario in ten days. And, yet, the hon. gentleman had undertaken to impose this duty upon salt, to try to make the people of the western section believe that the Government was conferring a boon upon them. This duty would do no good whatever to the salt industry of Canada. He (Mr. Cameron) would have been better satisfied if the Government had left salt alone. There were seven millions of dollars invested in this industry in the counties of Huron and Bruce alone, and, as a matter of fact, since the establishment of salt factories in Ontario, there had been a saving to the people of the country of between $5,000,000 and $7,500,000, owing to the very large reduction in the price of salt, after salt was discovered in Canada. While the hon. the Finance Minister was dealing with every Canadian industry, and undertaking to protect it, the salt manufacturers of the West fully expected to be treated in the same spirit as other Canadian industries. And the Finance Minister might rest satisfied that the salt manufacturers would not thank him for the ungenerous and illiberal spirit in which they had been treated. The tariff was said to be a tariff of encouragement and Protection—to the salt manufactures it was a tariff of paralysis and death. They received no Protection. The price of every article used in the manufacture was largely increased. If the hon. gentleman would take the trouble of looking minutely into what he had done for the salt industry by his tariff, he would find that the effect of the tariff would be to very seriously cripple, if not utterly destroy, the whole industry. The duty on everything that was used in the business had been very largely increased. The duty on boilers and engines had been increased from 17½ to 25 per cent. ; on tools used in boring, from 17½ to 30 per cent. ; on tubing, which everybody engaged in the trade knew was necessary for the purpose of getting the brine from the bowels of the earth, the duty had been increased from 17½ to 25 per cent. A large quantity of this tubing was used—one well alone requiring from $500 to $1,000 worth. This tubing was not manufactured in Canada, and could not be obtained here. Canadian tubing had been tried over and over again, but it had been proved a total failure. Boiler plates used in constructing evaporating pans had been increased from 5 to 12½ per cent. Rivets had been increased from 5 to 30 per cent., and nails and spikes from 17 to 35 per cent., over one hundred per cent. Bricks, used in the construction of furnaces and smoke stacks, had to pay a duty of 20 per cent. Cotton, for packages, had been increased from 17½ to 50 per cent. To cap the climax of the hon. gentleman's so-called liberal treatment of the salt manufacturer, a duty of 50c. a ton was put on coal. His hon. friend (Mr. Tilley) must have known very well, from representations made to him by deputations from Goderich, that the imposition of 50c. a ton on coal, and the increases on the cost of the articles used in the manufacture of salt, would increase the cost of manufacturing the article enormously. Now, if the hon. gentleman would take the trouble, or get one of his employés to figure up what the extra expense under this tariff was going to be in manufacturing a barrel of salt in Ontario, he would find it to amount to 12c. a barrel. As an equivalent for this additional taxation, the hon. gentleman gave these manufacturers in the West the privilege of excluding from the Canadian market about 6,000 barrels of salt a year. Why he should deal with this particular industry in the way he had done passed his comprehension. Every argument used in favour of putting a duty on coal or on any manufactured article, could be used in favour of a duty on all salt imported into Canada, and coming in competition with the Canadian manufactured article. And yet the hon. gentleman left this one article at the mercy of the foreign importers, while protecting every other industry in the West. The hon. gentleman knew that a large amount of coal was used in the manufacture of salt. He desired to ask the hon. gentleman if it was intended that there should be a drawback on that coal, when used in the manufacture of salt. The hon. gentleman knew that all the salt manufactured in Goderich and Kincardine was manufactured, not for the local market, but for the foreign market. In the manufacture of that salt they used a ton of coal for four or six barrels of salt. Did the hon. gentleman intend that there should be a drawback on coal used in the manufacture of salt for export to a foreign country? If not, the damage done to the salt manufacturer would be greater than he (Mr. Cameron) estimated it at.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. the Finance Minister had not answered the question of his hon. friend from South Huron—was he going to give any drawback on the export of salt?

MR. CAMERON said the Finance Minister shook his head when he asked him the question. No doubt the hon. gentleman intimated from that that the Government would allow no drawback in such a case.

MR. TILLEY: That we will consider.

Item agreed to.

On item—Wines of all kinds, except sparkling wines, including ginger, orange, lemon, strawberry, raspberry, elder and currant wines, containing 26 per cent. or less of spirits of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, imported in wood or bottles (six quart and twelve pint bottles to be held to contain a Imperial gallon), 25c. per Imperial gallon, and for each degree of strength in excess of 26 per cent. of spirits, as aforesaid, an additional duty of 3c. per Imperial gallon, until the strength reaches 40 per cent. of proof spirits, and, in addition thereto, 30 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. ANGLIN said the Government had reduced the duty upon malt, and the reason assigned by the hon. the Finance Minister—though that gentleman did not himself quite express his concurrence in it—was that, if people would drink alcoholic beverages, it was desirable to encourage them to drink ale and porter instead of the stronger liquors. It was to be regretted that light ale and porters were not sold more generally in this country, and at a lower price, and it was for the same reason desirable that the use of light wines should be encouraged. That had been the policy of this country for some time. They were now about to entirely depart from that policy. They were about to put a duty on champagne.

which would be almost prohibitory, and it would encourage the manufacture of spurious liquors under that name. He would like to know whether any progress had been made in those negotiations with the French Government, of which they had heard so much. Since the hon. the Finance Minister had felt at liberty to tell them something about those negotiations, several weeks had elapsed, and he thought it was of some interest to the country to know whether any progress had since been made towards entering into that arrangement with France, which would enable us to send our ships there for sale at a low rate of duty while we should receive in return the light wines of that country.

MR. TILLEY said he had intended to lay on the table of the House some correspondence with the French Government, but an address was passed in another branch of Parliament asking for similar returns, including various despatches not embraced in that correspondence, but the papers would very soon be laid before this House also. The hon. member had referred to the reduction of the duty on malt, and the desirability of encouraging the consumption of malt liquor instead of spirits. He (Mr. Tilley) entirely concurred in that view. The proposition of the Government was now that it was desirable to increase the duty on spirits and to reduce it on malt. He knew it was urged by certain hon. gentlemen that it was not consistent, and they had been charged with diminishing the cost of the poor man's beer and increasing the cost of the poor man's flour. But they would argue this question out upon its merits at another time. He was satisfied, however, that the feeling of this country, whether among practical teetotallers or not, was that it was very desirable, if stimulants were to be used, that they should be in the shape of malt liquor rather than in the shape of spirits, and it was in accordance with that sentiment that the Government asked for a reduction of the duty on malt and its increase on spirits. The hon. gentleman said they were increasing by their proposition the duty on light wines. Now this was not the case. This particular proposition supposed no arrangement made with France whatever. This proposition supposed they should make no arrangement with France by which the 30 per cent. ad valorem duty would be taken off cheap French wines that had an alcoholic strength of 26 degrees proof. If imported to-morrow, the cheapest description of French wine would be 36c. per gallon, with 30 per cent. added. The duty now levied on wine was 36c. per gallon, no matter what its strength. If it cost under 48c. per gallon, the duty now was 36c.; if it cost 50c., the duty was 72c. The result was that there were cases before the Customs Department showing that the whole effort of the importers was to bring wine, no matter what its strength might be, but worth under 48c. a gallon. Under the proposition before the House at the present time, after they passed the 26 degree proof spirit, then for every degree of strength it was 3c. more. Under this proposition the duty that would be collected on wine would be in proportion to its value. Under these circumstances it would be fair and equitable, and the arrangement could also apply to Spain, in case anything was done in a similar direction before the next meeting of Parliament. If they disregarded the strength of alcohol, then they might have it imported in the shape of wine, and paying a less duty than if imported in brandy, gin, or any other liquor. Under the original arrangement, it was 15c. for every five degrees of strength, and it was thought it might simplify the matter, because the Department would be able to tell, after the process of distillation, what the strength was as between 5 degrees. Then it was a jump of 15 per cent. One degree of strength would carry up 15c. per gallon, and it was thought better to make it 3c. for every degree. In answer to a question of the hon. gentleman, he would state that no further progress had been made in negotiations with the French Government.

MR. ANGLIN said the impression left on his mind by the hon. gentleman's Budget speech with regard to the imposition of duty on wines was, that the Government was about to increase the charges on French wines, and we would have something more to give in exchange for the right of entering our vessels in the French market than under the old tariff. That was the reason he assumed that these duties on the cheaper wines were now higher than formerly. He hoped progress would be made very soon in the negotiations with the French Government so that the expectations of the shipbuilders, especially those of Quebec, might not be grievously disappointed, as they had been on a former occasion.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he recollected statements made by parties concerning the wine trade, to the effect that this tariff would be certain to exclude large quantities of wines of Spain and Portugal, at present brought into this country. If he understood the hon. gentleman correctly, the maximum duty that could be attained under this tariff on the strong wines of Spain and Portugal would run as high as 65c. per Imperial gallon, plus 30 per cent. ad valorem. That would be an absolutely prohibitory tariff on those, although it would, undoubtedly, admit the wines of France, as contradistinguished from those of Spain and Portugal, at one time, at any rate, largely imported.

MR. TILLEY said the duty would depend altogether on the cost and the alcoholic strength. On French wine, under 26 degrees, say, which cost 25c. to 30c. a gallon, the average duty would be 34c. a gallon, whereas now it was 36c.; on wine costing 60c., 31 degrees, the duty would be 59c. per gallon; on wine costing $1.20, of which about 120,000 gallons were imported last year, at that average price, of 33 degrees proof, the duty would be 82c. per gallon.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that from Spain about 71,000 gallons were imported, roughly valued at about 40c. per gallon; all that would be excluded, under this tariff, because it was strong wine, ranging considerably above 26 degrees. He thought that the rates there would range as 34c. or 35c. All that class and the trade in it would probably be destroyed, because it was not likely that a wine, of an average value of 40c., could afford to pay 75c. or 80c. per gallon. There was a good deal to be said for the taking of the alcoholic standard. All he wanted to know was whether the hon. gentleman had representations made to him as to the prices and effect of these duties. The wines of France would have a very considerable advantage, but we imported nearly 120,000 gallons from Spain and Italy, which, being of tolerably considerable alcoholic strength, would cease to be imported.

MR. TILLEY said that was exactly the view taken by the Government. He could not see why a certain degree of alcohol, in any shape, if it entered any wine, should pay a lower duty, as it did under the old tariff, than if it went into gin, whiskey or brandy.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he had pointed out that French wines, up to 26 degrees, were only charged 34c., or, roughly, 1 $\frac{1}{4}$ c. for each degree of alcoholic strength. The moment they went beyond the imaginary limit of 26 degrees, the duty was very much higher. There might be good reasons for introducing cheap French wines, but there was no proportion between the tax placed up to 26 degrees, and the tax from 26 degrees to 36 degrees. It would be difficult to get our people to take much of the light French wines, and, therefore, the revenue might be considerably less than was expected. Another consideration was the difficulty of getting wines free from adulteration, which difficulty would be greatly increased under this tariff. In the case of champagne and sparkling wines, the duty would average \$10 to \$12 per dozen. That would not be paid. Either the wine would not be imported, or a cheap wine might be imported and doctored in this country into the semblance of champagne.

MR. VALIN said there was no reason why we should not place a heavy duty on French wines, as the French Government imposed taxes on our ships, our lumber, and everything that we sold them. This tax would also enable us to claim from them the free admission of our ships in return for its abolition.

MR. TILLEY said the rate proposed on champagne was a little over the rate collected on sugar and tea last year, and he did not see why those who could afford to drink champagne should not pay as heavy a duty as those imposed upon the necessities of life.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he did not object to the tax, but questioned whether any revenue could be derived from it. We only used about 9,000 dozen of sparkling wines. That was imported at an average price of $10 per dozen, so the duty now proposed would be equivalent to 60 per cent., and in the case of the better grades it would be higher. His point was that the chances were decidedly against our getting much revenue from this tax.

Item agreed to.

On item—Shovels, spades, hoes; hay, manure and potato forks; rakes and rake teeth; carpenters', coopers', cabinet makers', and all other mechanics' tools; edge tools of every description, including axes, scythes, files and saws of all kinds, and on steel skates, 30 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. CHARLTON said that was another burden on the lumbering industry. This scheme could not be called a Protectionist measure, because it was ruinous to the most important manufacturing interest in the Dominion. The lumber interest was sufficiently depressed without having these burdens laid upon it. The exports of lumber to the United States, in the year 1873, were $12,507,535, and they had fallen off to such an extent, that in 1878 the amount was only $4,481,000, or barely one-third more than the amount in 1873. This great interest was entitled to consideration at the hands of the Finance Minister, and he held that the feature of the tariff, if it possessed no other objectionable feature, was sufficient to warrant them in condemning it as a measure calculated to prove detrimental to the interests of this Dominion.

MR. ROCHESTER said he would like the hon. gentleman to explain in what way the lumber interest was injuriously affected; if it was by the tax on axes, it was something strange. The other night, the 10c. per barrel on pork was the great bugbear, now it was the tax on axes. He knew from practical experience that better axes were made in Canada than in the United States. Axes better suited to the climate, which would stand the pine lumber during the hard frost in the winter. Those axes we could not get from the United States. We could manufacture our own axes and saws cheaper, and of a better quality than could be obtained in the United States. He had got them from the different factories in the States, and from all the factories in Canada, and he had got as good saws out of the factory in Canada as out of any factory in the States. He would ask again what portion of this tariff militated against the lumber interest.

MR. CHARLTON said there was scarcely an article that entered into the production of lumber that was not taxed. The climate of Northern Michigan, and the pineries of Wisconsin and Minnesota, was almost the same as our climate, and the axes made for the lumber trade of the United States were better and cheaper than those made in Canada. It was unnecessary to recount a list of the articles that were taxed by this tariff, and which entered into the production of lumber. Woollens, blankets, oats and corn, would cost more than they had done heretofore. This tariff would act in a hundred ways against the lumber interest, and he was astonished that party lines could be drawn so closely that the hon. gentleman would get up and advocate a measure that gave his interest a slap in the face, and affected it so injuriously.

MR. ROCHESTER said the hon. gentleman had named axes, but he had not said a word about saws or files, which could be manufactured as well in this country as in the United States. As regarded woollen goods, the tariff would be a decided benefit. Under the late tariff, the Cornwall factory had been compelled to close, and the market had been supplied by English shoddy. Now he understood this mill was starting up again, and they would have the same kind of blankets as before. He thought the hon. gentleman should not make such broad assertions, but particularise more.

MR. SNOWBALL said that, if he could get Canadian axes for nothing, he would not send them into the woods. He could say the same with regard to Canadian-made saws and files, which came in the same category. They also had to send to the United States for their emery grinders. On pork they had to pay more than 10c. additional, and they expected an increase on flour and cornmeal. In fact, under this tariff, for everything the lumbermen eat, drank or wore, they expected to have to pay extra. According to the statement of his hon. friend, they would have to pay more wages, more for their materials, while they did not expect to get any additional price for their lumber.

MR. WALLACE (South Norfolk) said that hon. gentlemen interested in the lumber trade thrust themselves forward and asked for Protection for a great manufacturing industry. He maintained that they were not manufacturers, but merely converters of the wealth of the country into another form of wealth. The labour they employed was paid the least wages of any class of men in the country. They called this a great industry, while they were almost robbing the country of its wealth and enriching themselves. They were converting the tree, as it stood, into saw-logs, square timber, deals, etc. How much of a manufacturing industry was there in that? The gentlemen had been enriching themselves at almost the expense of the country—diverting the wealth of the country into their own pockets, as it were. And they were now employing labour at such a rate that it did not afford the labourers a living. These men, if they had not been employed in lumbering, would, perhaps, have been cultivating the soil, and thereby have been fulfilling a duty much more useful and beneficial to the country. The best protection they could give to lumbermen would be a protection that would prevent them from manufacturing lumber, because they were taking away the wealth of the country that centuries had produced, and which would be produced for centuries more.

MR. ROCHESTER said it was very true that they were taking away the wealth of the country, and they were receiving very little for it. What had been stated with regard to the men's wages was true, at the present time, and as regarded the past year or two. Formerly there was no labouring work that was more remunerative. The machinists, mill-wrights, and engineers used to receive $3.50, $4, and $4.50 a day, all the year round, and common men used to receive from $8 to $10 and $12 a week. The lumber interest was the second interest in the country, and he believed that, if lumbermen were to cease operations for a year or two, it would be a benefit to the country. The distress in the whole Ottawa Valley, consequent upon the depressed condition of the lumber trade, showed that it was an important interest, employing thousands of men.

MR. BOURBEAU said he desired to reply to the hon. member for North Norfolk, who had declared that the saws manufactured in Canada were of no value. In his own county there were large manufacturers of lumber, and the saws used in the mills were all of Canadian manufacture, and gave very great satisfaction. As to the axes, he could also say they were used in his own county, exclusively of Canadian manufacture, and they could be purchased at $1 a dozen cheaper than they could have been bought a year ago; and such was the case, also, with respect to other instruments and tools manufactured in this country. This he stated in order to do justice to the carriage manufacturers, having, himself, a perfect knowledge of the quality of the articles manufactured by them.

MR. COCKBURN (Muskoka) said that, as regarded the effect of the tariff on the lumber trade, it was a matter in which he was not personally interested, but he desired to direct the attention of the House to one article, namely, bacon, which was largely used by lumbermen, and the duties on which, under the new tariff, would cost double. Some of the western lumbermen used nothing else in the way of meat, and when the settlers' stock of oats along the Georgian Bay were exhausted, they had, frequently, to import oats from the United States, upon which a duty of 10c. was charged, without benefitting farmers. The lumber interest was one of the greatest manufacturing interests they had in the country. The hon. member for Carleton had said that the price of blankets had not risen under the new tariff. He (Mr. Cockburn) desired to ask if this was a likely season for an advance to take place on heavy woollen goods. Next year, however, they would have an opportunity of seeing how the tariff had affected the price of blankets, etc. He thought it should be patent to every gentleman in the House that this tariff imposed great burdens on the lumbermen, and attacked them from every quarter.

Item agreed to.

On item—Rough freestone, sandstone, and all other building stone, except marble, $1 per ton of 13 cubic feet,

MR. MACKENZIE asked if this duty was intended to operate as a prohibitory tariff also.

MR. TILLEY said he did not know. The tariff on stone, as a whole, would very likely be prohibitory, but there might be some brought in rough.

MR. MACKENZIE said he referred to ordinary building stone.

MR. TILLEY said he thought that, if they took it from Windsor over to Detroit they paid $1.50.

MR. MACKENZIE said if they charged $2.00 a ton, we wanted to do our best for our own people. This duty would be prohibitory of the purchase of stone on the other side. Stone could not be carried a long distance in Canada; so the Finance Minister was only inflicting a hardship on those wishing United States stone for building.

MR. TILLEY said, if the hon. gentleman would state where they would be under the necessity of importing that stone from the United States, and show that there could not be found as good in the Dominion, he might help them. At present they knew of no such case; practically the duty of $1 per ton would shut out the ordinary stone imported. They had plenty as good in the country, and there was no necessity for importing it.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was no freestone to be had anywhere here.

MR. TILLEY said that he held a sample of Ontario freestone which had taken the prize at the Paris Exhibition. The certificate stated that it was superior to the Ohio or any other found in the United States. It was found in Ontario.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was freestone up the Ottawa, in the neighbourhood of Pembroke, but the hon. gentleman could not expect it could be profitably carried to Western Ontario. It would be cheaper for the people in the West to pay $10 a ton for stone from Ohio than to take this stone West. There was no stone in Ontario fit for fine dressings; so they had to take Ohio. They had common limestones in the Western Peninsula, but nowhere a good freestone.

MR. TILLEY said he heard there was, north of Toronto.

MR. BOWELL said they got from the Grand River a freestone.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is not a freestone.

MR. OLIVER: That stone from the Grand River is obtained some thirty or forty miles from Ottawa. †

MR. SPROULE: There is a freestone quarry in my constituency, specimens of which have been sent to Toronto, and pronounced as good as any got. Another in the North Riding of Simcoe has been worked for years.

MR. MACKENZIE said that no stone had been taken to Toronto for fine buildings, or dressings, except the Ohio; the sort of bastard sandstone found in Ontario served a very good purpose in ordinary dressings, but was not fit for fine work like the Ohio. He knew of no single place in the western peninsula where there was a kind of rock that could at all approach the Cleveland stone, and it would have to be got, or the people must stop using such materials. This item would put a heavy tax on everyone using this stone in building, and it was shaking the business all over the country. In these matters the Finance Minister showed an obstinacy perfectly incredible. Any one interested in the building interests would bear out his statements.

MR. MACMILLAN said that competent judges of stone had told him that this Ontario was infinitely superior to the Ohio stone. It was a little harder, but very much better, and did not rot like the Ohio stone. It was got at Dundas, and was considered so desirable that the whole cathedral in Hamilton was being built with it, and a higher price paid for it than the Ohio. All along the Great Western Railway it was being used for window-sills, and it was made a condition by the contractors that it should be used in the Molson's Bank building in London, and not the Ohio stone. They believed there were 3,000,000 feet of that stone at the quarry, and it could be found all along the section from Dundas to Hamilton.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had admitted his point in saying the Ohio stone was easier in working. Ease in working was absolutely necessary for fine work, or fine fronts of important buildings. The Dundas stone was excellent for ordinary straight walling, but not fit for the purposes for which Ohio had been preferred, in all parts of the country. There was a rough freestone behind Kingston, and elsewhere; but the Canadian Government were compelled to go to Ohio for stone for the Parliament Buildings. This duty would make it impossible to import it hereafter, except at a great additional charge.

MR. MACMILLAN said that a large portion of the Ohio stone in the London Post-office had rotted where the water came in; but the Dundas stone, under water, had not rotted. He had been told by competent workmen that it withstood the water better than the Ohio.

MR. McCALLUM said that there was a quarry of freestone on the Grand River, in Haldimand, which was soft, and could be worked easily, but became hard when exposed to water. Millions of tons of this stone could be got easily within three miles of the river, and would answer the purposes of the Ohio.

MR. HESSON said that he had, and others had, been obliged to select Georgetown sandstone in preference to Ohio, for corbels, window-tops, and window-sills, in a school building that was to cost $20,000, and for similar work in a church at Stratford, costing over $20,000.

MR. MACMILLAN.

That stone was suitable, and there was plenty of it of a most desirable quality. It was their duty to develop the interests of this country in the matter of their quarries, as well as in other respects.

MR. TUPPER said he congratulated the Finance Minister on having accomplished this, if no other good, by the imposition of this duty—excited a discussion that had led to the discovery of a large amount of freestone in Ontario. The dissemination of this information, with respect to this product of the country, would be of great value to the people. An hour ago it appeared from hon. gentleman opposite that there was no freestone in Ontario, and now it was discovered that freestone was found in the neighbourhood of Ottawa, that had been able to carry off the second prize at the Paris Exhibition, and had been pronounced unsurpassed on this continent. It was not a small tribute to the value of the tariff that it had led to the bringing out of this fact that the hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to be entirely ignorant of when the discussion commenced. It was humiliating that they had been obliged to import so much ornamental stone from the United States, when they had in the neighbourhood of Ottawa such excellent freestone. Then the excellent qualities of the limestone of the country were demonstrated by the magnificent public and private buildings of Montreal, that had delighted and astonished every foreign visitor.

MR. MACKENZIE said the finest buildings in Montreal were of freestone, brought from the United States.

MR. TUPPER said that the limestone buildings in Montreal might be a source of pride to any city. He was glad the time had come when the Finance Minister had said to our American neighbours that if they shut out the products of our country, we would shut out theirs in the same way. We had had a large and valuable trade with the United States in freestone, till it was killed by their tariff; and, if there was no other reason why we should adopt this proposition, that exclusive policy of the Americans would be sufficient. He believed that the result of this duty would be to sweep away the American tariff against our industries, which had had the effect of paralysing them, and to produce a free interchange of commodities as between both countries.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was no stone in all eastern or western Ontario to at all compare with the Ohio stone for certain purposes. It was a great inconvenience to the people to have this tax imposed upon building material. They should be at liberty to obtain such material wherever it could be obtained cheapest. As the hon. the Finance Minister was determined to adhere to the tariff as it was, he (Mr. Mackenzie) must content himself with entering his protest against this absurd part of the tariff.

MR. DESJARDINS wished to inform the hon. the leader of the Opposition that in the county of Hochelaga were to be found the best limestone quarries in the Dominion. Many of the owners of these quarries were supporters of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), and he (Mr. Desjardins) had received letters from them complaining that the tariff was not high enough to protect them from the competition with stone brought into Montreal. He denied the accuracy of the statement of the hon. the leader of the Opposition, that the best and finest buildings in Montreal were constructed of Ohio stone. For instance, the post-office, the city hall, and most of the fine buildings erected lately were constructed of limestone. The friends of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) in his (Mr. Desjardins') constituency, would be dis- trary views to them.

MR. MACKENZIE said his hon. friend was mistaken. There was no doubt that the Montreal banks, and other public edifices built of the native limestone were wonderfully beautiful, but, for all that, it cost a great deal more to build a very fine limestone front than a freestone front. He quite agreed in the remarks in reference to the fine appearance of Montreal. It was seen to marvellous advantage. The Kingston limestone, and limestone obtained in the vicinity of the Welland Canal, were good building materials. What he wanted to point out was that it was impossible to do with the Canadian stone the class of work that could be done with the Ohio freestone, which would be shut out of the market by this tariff.

MR. SNOWBALL said that, in the county of Northumberland, N.B., they had as fine freestone as could be produced. It was particularly adapted for grindstones, and, in face of the duty of $1.50, the Americans, for many years, had purchased largely of these goods. They had different grades, suitable for any kind of grinding, and manufactured them from five to ten feet in diameter. They were shipped as far west as Oshawa. It had become a valuable industry, and, no doubt, would continue to prosper.

Item agreed to.

On item—Sugars, syrups and molasses,

MR. CARTWRIGHT said there had been a great deal of discussion about the precise loss which would result from the taxation imposed on the people of Canada by the proposed alteration of the sugar duties. There was no possibility of deciding accurately the exact value of the sugar that might be purchased from time to time. But, by applying this taxation to the quantities and qualities of sugar which was imported last year, and then by comparing it with what was received last year, the House could ascertain at any rate what would be the effect, supposing that was the fair average value of the quantities and qualities of sugar consumed by the people of this country. The sugar imported last year was chiefly of two grades, those above and those below No. 13, Dutch standard. Of the former, there was imported 93,490,879 lb., of a total value of $5,419,715, for which was received $2,289,840. Under this proposed tariff the specific duty on this would be $934,908, while the 35 per cent. ad valorem would amount to $1,896,880. In other words, under this tariff, supposing the same quantity and quality of sugar imported into the country last year were consumed this year, the revenue would be $2,831,788, whilst, under the old tariff, the duty was only $2,289,840. Consequently, in that grade alone—the grade above, No. 13, their would be an additional duty under this tariff of $541,948. Then, of the grade below No. 13, there was 10,624,336lb. imported last year, which was valued at a little over $517,000, upon which $209,066 in duties was received. Applying this tariff, the duty to be collected this year would be $235,041. Therefore, it followed that, if the country continued to import the same quantity and quality of sugar, the duty, under this tariff, for the next year, would be $3,066,829. The hon. the Finance Minister stated that it required 120,000,000lb. of sugar to produce the 105,000,000lb. which were consumed in the Dominion last year. He (Mr. Cartwright) did not believe that statement was literally correct. He was inclined to think that quantity was largely in excess of what would be required. But he would assume, for argument's sake, that it was correct. Suppose there were 120,000,000lb. introduced, less charges on packages brought from the country of growth or production, and less the charges and expenses prior to shipment. Under these circumstances, he was informed by gentlemen of high standing, that the duty would have to be collected on the average value of three cents per pound, or three dollars per cwt. Of course, that might be a matter of opinion, although these gentlemen were speaking from actual experience. If that were correct, he thought, bearing in mind the very large percentage the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tilley) had allowed, that it would follow that, if they manufactured in this country, as they probably would, under this prohibitory tariff, during the next year, all the sugar consumed in the Dominion during that period, they would receive in all the sum of $1,980,000, as against a revenue which ought to be collected under this tariff of $3,066,829. In other words, the people of Canada would lose, for the purpose of promoting the refining interest, some $1,086,829 per annum. That was the position of the case applying the existing tariff to the late importations. Even on the showing of the hon. the Minister of Finance, who only expected to get $2,250,000 revenue, there would be a loss of $800,000 to the people of Canada for the benefit of the refiners. He (Mr. Cartwright) was not going to reopen the discussion further than to point out in all probability what was the actual cost to the people of Canada. What he wanted to call attention to was the fact—as clearly established as any fact could be—that, if the present tariff were applied to the importations of last year, a revenue of $3,066,829 would be collected. According to the hon. gentleman's own statement, he did not expect to receive more than $2,250,000 in round numbers. So there would be, according to the Minister of Finance's own showing, an annual loss of $800,000. According to the best information he (Mr. Cartwright) was able to receive, there would, however, be an annual loss of $1,086,829. Therefore, he was not able to understand the resolution submitted to the House. He did not intend to delay the House further than to call attention to the fact that the people of Canada would be compelled to pay very considerably more for their sugar for the express purpose of benefitting the refiners.

MR. TILLEY said he did not know upon what basis the hon. gentleman calculated there should be a revenue of over three million dollars derived from sugar; but he could say that his (Mr. Tilley's) calculations were based upon the proposition that sugar imported direct from the West Indies would pay no more duty on the packages which brought it than before, and that the 35 per cent. ad valorem would not have to be imposed, because we would refine our own sugar. His calculations were based upon the importation of raw sugar, and refining it in Canada. If half of it were brought in refined the Government would lose $250,000, unless they lost more by the reduction in the price of sugar, as the ad valorem duty would not produce so much if a much lower price prevailed. As to the reduction in the price of sugar, he could state as a fact that the price of sugar had gone down half a cent a pound in Montreal since these resolutions were submitted to the House.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said about two weeks ago he had bought from a firm in Montreal, with whom he had been in the habit of dealing, some refined sugar, and he found that the price had increased $\frac{3}{4}$ c. per lb. He had asked the firm when the increase had taken place, and was informed it had occurred since the 15th March last.

MR. TILLEY said he had his information from undoubted authority.

MR. CAMERON said he would tell the hon. gentleman the name of the firm if he wished.

MR. DESJARDINS said the Redpath refinery was now selling refined sugar at $8\frac{1}{4}$ c. per lb., whilst, before this tariff was proposed, they sold the same sugar at $8\frac{3}{4}$ c. per lb.

MR. ANGLIN said the impression the Finance Minister sought to produce was that the increase in the duty did not add to the cost of sugar. It was not to be supposed that the hon. gentleman would go so far as to allege directly and plainly that the imposition of a duty caused a decrease in the price of sugars. He was not surprised to hear statements of that kind made with regard to sugar and other articles by some hon. members. on the other side of the House, but he was surprised to hear the hon. the Finance Minister, who had a reputation at stake, make such a statement in the way he had made it, for he created the impression that the imposition of a higher duty did not necessarily increase the cost of the article to the consumer. It was obvious, however, that the additional duty must increase the cost of the article. It was a simple question in addition. Fifty causes might lead to a temporary reduction in the price of the article, but it would be absurd for that reason to allege that such a reduction could possibly be caused by the imposition of a higher duty. He believed that he had seen it stated in the Montreal papers that Redpath's sugar was selling at one-half or one-quarter of a cent per pound less than the American sugar. No doubt they would hereafter offer it at a shade lower than the price of American sugar, with no higher duty added, because if they did not, they would not have the market exclusively to themselves. But to say that hereafter sugars would be any cheaper because of the imposition of the duty, was to assert what no one who looked carefully into the question could believe possible. He had heard it stated that the importation of sugar for some weeks before this tariff went into effect was so enormous that a number of persons holding sugars to-day were compelled to effect a sale. But, as soon as these temporary causes ceased to produce their temporary effects, there could be no doubt whatever in the mind of any one competent to understand a sum in addition that the price of sugar would be enhanced by the imposition of higher duties.

MR. TILLEY said that within the last eight hours a gentleman from Montreal, whose testimony could not be doubted, had informed him that sugar was selling to-day, in Montreal, at a half cent per pound less than in the middle of last year. This was due to the refinery being established and manufacturing sugar out of the raw article. The hon. gentleman from Gloucester asked if it was possible that the Finance Minister should stand up here and say the imposition of duty could possibly cheapen the article to the consumer. Why, they knew it was argued here, last night, that the imposition of a 50c. duty on coal if it led to the output of 300,000 tons of coal more in Nova Scotia, would result in coal being supplied cheaper to the people of the other Provinces than it was to-day. If they looked at the experience of the United States they would find, beyond a question, that the imposition of high duties had decreased the price of the article to the consumer in that country. He believed that, when he was privileged to meet Parliament again, he would be able to tell a similar story in regard to numerous articles. He had statements before him now showing that, in reference to cotton, the imposition of an additional duty had not increased the price of the article, but that it was selling to-day at the same price as before the imposition of the duty. There might be some cases where, if a duty was imposed on a raw material, and parties manufactured from the raw material, the price would necessarily, to some extent, be increased. But in the case of certain articles, of which all the materials existed, in this country, the price was reduced by 20 or 30 per cent. to the consumer.

MR. MACKENZIE: Which are they?

MR. TILLEY said there were several of them. Take the duty on wood screws for instance—close up that industry to-morrow, and the price of them would rise to a great deal more than it was at present, because when that industry was established the price was immediately reduced 20 or 30 per cent. They alleged that this was a correct principle; it would not apply to every industry, but to a large portion.

MR. MILLS: Apply the principle to the salt of the fishermen.

MR. TILLEY: Yes, and what is the position with reference to the fishermen? They are on the sea coast.

MR. MILLS: So is the coal.

MR. TILLEY said the circumstances were entirely different. With reference to the salt there were certain circumstances under which it would increase the price, but he was not without faith that we could make arrangements by which we could carry by water our coal from Nova Scotia to the West, and take back salt and put it down as cheaply as we could get it from England. A gentleman from St. John had telegraphed him that salt was forty cents a bag there. The salt of Ontario was a very suitable salt for curing fish, and he held the day was not far distant when that salt could be put down in the Maritime Provinces as cheap as the English salt. But to assert that the imposition of a duty necessarily increased the cost of the article to the consumer, when it could be abundantly made in the country, was a proposition that was not tenable, and he asserted that a Protective duty might be imposed on an article manufactured in the country and not increase the cost of it to the consumer.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that might be true, in case the Protective duty was utterly useless and unnecessary. If the hon. gentleman believed the statement he had just made, let him take off his duty on wood screws; and if, after a year or two, it turned out as he had stated, they would be willing to put dependence on his other statements. The hon. gentleman stated that, in the matter of cotton, the price had not gone up. He (Mr. Cartwright) was informed, by gentlemen acquainted with the trade, that the last move of the manufacturers of cotton goods was to issue a circular to say that the prices of several leading lines must go up, and they had gone up.

MR. VALIN said he believed no member in this House had dealt more largely in sugar than himself. He had imported in his ships from the West Indies, about 70,000,000lb., and he had just telegraphed for two other cargoes. Since the introduction of the tariff he found that sugar could be bought to-day for about $76 per ton. Including the freight and the duty, he found it would cost him about 6c. per pound. The duty in the States was 4c. He believed the present duty would not have the effect of raising the price, and that it would keep as low as it was in the States.

MR. ANGLIN said the Messrs. Redpath, to-day, had no other permanent competition in this Dominion, except that which came from the introduction of the sugars called raw groceries from the West Indies, and such competition as they would have to encounter from British and foreign refineries. They could easily calculate the price of refined sugar from the United States or England, and add to that the amount of duty to be imposed under this tariff, and so ascertain exactly the price at which that sugar could be landed in Montreal, or in any other city of this Dominion. If it should happen, in the course of time, that refineries should spring up in various parts of this Dominion, and competition should arise between them, instead of their working together in rings, as they probably would, then they could understand that the prices would be kept down to a figure that would afford a reasonable profit, and, perhaps, in some cases, to a figure that would afford no profit. But, when there was only one refinery in the Dominion, and that refinery capable of producing only two-thirds of the sugar required for use in this country, then there was no competition, and it was absurd to argue that they were to have cheaper sugar because of this tariff. The contrary would be the inevitable result. Some hon. gentlemen expected some advantage from the greater use of raw groceries. The taste for sugar of that kind did not exist in this country. The people chose to use refined sugar, and it was much to be doubted whether the admission of these raw groceries from the West Indies would interfere materially with the monopoly now possessed by the refiners of Montreal.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he wanted to ask the hon. the Finance Minister what construction was to be placed on this important clause with respect to the ad valorem duty levied on goods imported from the place of production. Suppose a merchant purchased a cargo of sugar in Cuba, or any other port, and that it was brought from New York to a Canadian city, would that man be allowed the benefit of this clause?

MR. TILLEY said they had been discussing the objections to the former state of things, which interfered with the direct trade between the Dominion and the West Indies. The propositions of the hon. member opposite had really driven the direct trade from the Dominion of Canada to the American ports, to the great loss and disadvantage of the shippers of lumber and fish.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Would the hon. gentleman inform the House what change I ever made in the sugar duties?

MR. TILLEY said the change he made was that he had not done as the present Government had done. They had made little change except to provide that the American refiners were not to send any sugar here with the drawback over and above what they obtained, and that had changed the whole aspect of the trade. Inasmuch as the Government purposed to restore the direct trade to Canada, and to use the St. Lawrence for the conveyance of products from the West Indies here, sugar coming from Cuba to New York, and being discharged there, would have to pay a duty on packages.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said, if a man established a refinery in Toronto or any other point in Ontario, he would have to compete at an enormous disadvantage with refiners in Montreal, St. John, or Halifax, who got the advantage of this important clause. It was equal, at least, to a reduction of 5 per cent., according to the statement of the hon. gentleman. If, on the other hand, men in Ontario desired to establish a sugar refinery, they must do it at enormous disadvantage, seeing that they would have to import from New York. That was a matter of extraordinary importance, which a good many of his friends in Ontario would understand and appreciate. He had one other question to put. What did the hon. gentleman think was the value, for duty purposes, of the 120,000,000lb. which he calculated would have to be imported to produce 105,000,000 refined sugar?

MR. TILLEY said that would depend entirely upon the prices of sugar, as they ranged during the year. To show how difficult it was for the hon. gentleman to make a calculation, he valued the sugar below No. 9 Dutch standard, for duty purposes, at three cents, instead of four cents. It was very difficult, taking the different grades under No. 7, and between 7 and 9, and 7, 14, and 9, the prices these various grades of sugar would cost, and the rate of duty, to estimate the amount, but under the operation of the tariff $2,250,000 would be collected. He had stated distinctly in the memorandum he submitted the other day the proportion of the sugar, and the average cost of each grade, from No. 14 below to No. 9, and from No. 9 to No. 7, and from No. 7 below that.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that might be because this large deduction had to be made from it. In any case, the value was very nearly 4c., on which the hon. gentleman based his calculation. His hon. friend who sat next him had just handed him a telegram from Barbadoes, stating that refining sugar was offered there at $2.90, so that the calculation he had made would have been well within the mark, as far as regarded the products that might have been expected from it.

MR. BAIN said his reason for addressing the House on this question was that it happened to be the only item upon which the hon. gentleman who represented the National Policy in his Riding and himself were at variance, and which caused danger of a rupture in their otherwise pleasant personal relations. That gentleman took the ground that the National Policy would include a removal of duties from all these articles that were not the natural production of Canada, and the placing of duties on articles we could produce or manufacture. He (Mr. Bain) used to quote from the Finance Minister's speech delivered at St. John, with respect to the efforts he would make, if placed in power, to build up the refining industry as well as the West India trade. He (Mr. Bain) considered it then in order to enquire how gentlemen proposed to reconcile the Finance Minister's statement with his exposition as the supporter of the policy of the Premier as laid down to workingmen at Toronto? He (Mr. Bain) had been told that he had backbone enough to stand up and defend the principles he advocated, that he would be the exponent of the principle that we should have sugar free of any duty whatever. This was a fair sample of the way in which that verdict of the 17th September was carried, and on this specific matter it seemed to him that with the competition we should always have between the English and American refiners, there was no danger that either one party or the other would have the monopoly of our market. The only change the late Government made in the sugar duties was to relax them on refining grades in favour of the refiners. When hon. gentlemen opposite administered affairs, previous to the time of the late Government, they displayed no interest whatever in the welfare of this specific industry of sugar refining. The statement made by the Finance Minister himself in his Budget speech convinced him (Mr. Bain) that the new arrangement of the sugar duties was not in the interest of the Dominion at large. It was directly adverse to the interests of Ontario and for the benefit of a few parties in Montreal and Halifax. If the National Policy, as expounded in the West, meant anything, it meant that articles such as sugar, which could never become an article of Canadian production, would not be taxed, but that the duties were to be removed from such articles, and placed on those we could produce, for the purpose of stimulating those industries. When the hon.

the Finance Minister stated that, notwithstanding the increased duties on refined sugar, he expected to suffer a loss of revenue, he emphatically proved that this tax was not in the interest of this country. No increased employment given to our population would compensate for the amount of money deliberately taken out of the pockets of the people, for the benefit of two or three refiners, by this tax on an article of universal consumption. It was to be regretted that, for the purpose of putting money into the pockets of a few wealthy corporations, the whole country was to suffer, and he therefore felt it to be his duty to protest against this tax.

MR. GUNN said that these sugars, which the refiners in Canada professed to sell at 8½c., could be obtained now, if the old tariff were in force, at 7½ to 7¼c., as the market price had fallen in New York since this tariff was introduced. There was a heavy tax on the people which they would appreciate.

MR. TUPPER said the late Finance Minister, who took such great exception to this proposed effort to establish refineries, must have changed his views very much since he introduced his tariff in 1874, when he deliberately formulated to this House a means by which that great industry could be established in Canada. Before the hon. gentleman got through with his tariff, he changed that, as he did many others of the propositions which he had then submitted, through outside pressure or some other cause. A year or two after he again brought forward a proposition to aid this industry, which was that the tax on the raw sugar to be used for refining purposes be reduced. Thus, on two occasions, he propounded measures to enable the raw sugar to be refined in Canada. It was difficult, therefore, to account for the hon. gentleman's denunciation of this effort of the Finance Minister to carry out, in an effective manner, the policy which the hon. gentleman had himself declared on two occasions to be a wise one. It was an entire fallacy for the hon. gentleman to state that the tariff which he was then dealing with was the tariff of the previous Government. It was entirely modified in its character by the action of the Legislature of the United States. In dealing with a question of this kind, one must regard the legislation which took place outside the country, and, since that legislation had changed the tariff, as he found it was no longer the same in its character and effect as the same tariff under the previous Government, before the legislation in the States had been altered, the result of the hon. gentleman's policy was that the only refinery in the country had to close, and the moment it shut down the price of sugar became higher. The result was the addition of a cent per pound to the cost of every pound consumed in Canada, or a tax of a million dollars a year paid by the Canadian consumers into the coffers of other countries—into the coffers of men who had the policy of so fostering their own industry as to enable them to undersell our refiners. The market had fallen just as they said it would fall. As soon as it was found that the Finance Minister was determined to protect the industry of the Canadian sugar refiner, the market, as a consequence, declined. He was satisfied that under this tariff they would be considering Canadian interests, and the interests of the vast body of consumers, who would, themselves, gain by it directly as well as indirectly.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that, when the hon. gentleman recalled what passed in 1874, he might as well have recalled to the recollection of the House that, when it was proposed by himself (Mr. Cartwright) to make an addition to the duty, not all along the line, but on certain grades of sugar, the man who most loudly denounced him for proposing it was the present Minister of Public Works; and so powerful were his arguments, so well were they put, such was the eloquence of the hon. gentleman, that he made such a great impression on his (Mr. Cartwright's) mind, that he reconsidered the question, and he found that there was weight in what the hon. gentleman said. Having got all the information on the subject, and seeing that there was danger to the revenue, he did, after full consideration and examination, withdraw the propositions, although they did not affect all grades of sugar, but only special grades. Afterwards, in their anxiety to please the hon.

gentleman, finding that the American Government had added considerably to their bounty, they reduced certain grades of sugar in a small degree, as the hon. gentleman had suggested. This was subsequently justified by the discovery that the American drawback then, although not now, was really a bounty in disguise. At the present moment he did not believe the drawback was a bounty in disguise. He did not think the American refiner got any unjust advantage at all. The hon. gentleman stated that the price of sugar rose upon that occasion. He (Mr. Cartwright) examined the matter at the time, and he must take issue with the hon. gentleman in a most positive manner. The prices of sugars for several grades, ranged as follows:—1875, 7½c., against 6½c. in 1876; 6½c. in 1877; and 5½c. in 1878, and so on all through. There was one argument brought forward by the hon. gentleman which did credit to his audacity. He had the highest opinion of the hon. gentleman's courage, and he did require the highest moral courage to rise in his place and declare that the price of sugar in New York, one of the largest sugar markets in the whole world, was affected by the imposition of a duty in Canada. About 3,000,000 tons of sugar were usually consumed by Great Britain and the United States, and one or two of the European countries, and the price in New York was regulated by the cost of this crop of 3,000,000 tons. Canada consumed 50,000 or 60,000 tons, yet the Minister of Public Works told them that the price of the 3,000,000 was regulated by the Canadian Minister of Finance's impositions on one-sixteenth part of the sugar used in the world.

MR. TUPPER said that the policy which, in 1874 and in 1875, he urged upon the then Finance Minister was a policy which would enable sugar to be refined in Canada. He, personally, pressed on the hon. gentleman the means subsequently adopted in relation to the matter. His hon. friend the Minister of Finance hoped, by these duties, to bring back the West Indian trade, which, under the administration of the hon. gentleman, was destroyed, which would not only contribute to the revenue, but the prosperity of the country. If there was any feature of his hon. friend's policy that ought to commend it, regardless of any sectional point of view to the favourable consideration of every member of the House, it was that not only did it secure for Canada the refining of the sugar consumed in the country instead of driving that labour into a foreign country, but it secured a renewal of the West Indian trade, which was so important a factor in the commercial prosperity of the country.

MR. CASGRAIN said that nothing was more stubborn than facts, and the experience of the last eleven years went to show that sugar refining was no advantage to us. We had had sugar at a much cheaper rate than we could have under the system of Protection which was to be imposed on the country. It was all very well to talk about Protection, but the common sense view of the question was, should we have sugar at a cheaper rate than before, or were we to pay more for it? He had a statement in his hand of the price of sugar in the most important cities in the Dominion for the last past eleven years, which showed that during the three years, from 1872 to 1874, inclusive, the price of sugar fell 2½c., and from 1875 to 1878, it had fallen another half cent. So that, according to the statement of the Finance Minister, that we consumed in Canada 120,000,000lb. of sugar, we would save, by not washing our sugar ourselves, the sum of six hundred thousand and some odd dollars. He (Mr. Casgrain) would rather this sum was not paid to Mr. Redpath or any gentleman in the same line of business in the city of Halifax. Notwithstanding the eloquence of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, the country would be the loser to the extent of $600,000 by this tariff, on the article of sugar alone.

MR. BUNTING said he would have addressed the House at an earlier hour this evening had it not been that he desired first to hear what gentlemen on the Opposition benches had to say regarding the sugar duties. He had been engaged for about fifteen years in the business of importing sugar from the West Indies and Great Britain, and during that time, he had, on more than one occasion, visited this city with a view to making representations to the Government on the subject of the duties. In 1868 he was here as one of a deputation from the Toronto Board of Trade, and he had the pleasure of meeting the present Finance Minister, making representations to him to adopt the tariff of one cent specific and 25 per cent. ad valorem. That tariff had remained in operation until within the last few weeks, with some trifling alterations. Under that tariff, our refiners continued to prosecute their business profitably until the introduction of the American drawback system, when they were obliged to close their establishments. He had expected to hear another address from the hon. member for Bothwell on this subject, but, when that gentleman, in discussing the drawback system, deliberately stated that sugars were refined in bond in the United States—thus showing that he did not know even the alphabet of the business—he (Mr. Bunting) gave up all hope of getting any information on the subject from the Opposition side of the House.

MR. MILLS: I did not say sugars were refined in bond. I said they could be refined in bond.

MR. BUNTING said he certainly understood the hon. gentleman to say that sugars were refined in bond in the United States, and he corrected him; and when he corrected him he did not deny that he said it. Now, the hon. member for Centre Huron (Mr. Cartwright) had said that the new scale of duties would result in a loss to the revenue of $800,000 a year. All he (Mr. Bunting) could say about that was that, if the present tariff would result in a loss of $800,000 a year to the revenue, the tariff which the hon. gentleman sought to put on the Statute-book in 1874, would have led to the loss of $1,600,000 to the revenue, because it was nearly three times more protective to the refiners than the present tariff. He (Mr. Bunting) held in his hand the Budget speech of the hon. gentleman, delivered that year, got up in pamphlet form, and it had, no doubt, been revised by the hon. gentleman himself. Having spoken for some considerable time, and having announced some changes he contemplated in the tariff, he (Mr. Cartwright) came to the subject of sugar. He said: "There is one duty which I must apologise to the House for not having mentioned. We do not expect to obtain any considerable revenue from that source, and I am perfectly aware that it is one of the most difficult subjects in the whole sphere of taxation. Mr. Lowe and Mr. Gladstone, in the British Parliament, have both of them admitted the same thing. The Committee will observe that, up to the present time, we treat all sugars above No. 9 as being of the same value." For the information of the House, he (Mr. Bunting) might say that all sugars below No. 12 were refining grades, grades that must undergo the process of refining before the sugar was fit for the consumer. "We now propose to create two additional classes." The House would remember that there was only one additional class established under the new tariff up to No. 14, and the greater the number of classes established, with a higher rate of duty as they proceeded upwards, the more protective the tariff became, because a high rate of duty was thereby levied on the high grades of sugar, thus preventing importers from bringing in refined sugar from abroad. The Ex-Finance Minister then proceeded: "We now propose to create two additional classes, one class equal to No. 13, and not over No. 16, upon which we propose to impose a duty of 1½c. in addition to the ad valorem duty. The other class we propose to create is all above No. 16, upon which we propose to impose an additional specific duty of 1½c., being an increase of ¼ and ½ per cent. per pound, respectively, over present rates." He (Mr. Bunting) would explain to the House the measure of protection which the hon. gentleman sought then to impose. Under the present tariff, the difference between refining grades and grocery grades was simply 5 per cent. Now the hon. gentleman stated this evening that the cost of raw sugar was 3c. per pound, and 5 per cent. on this was 15c. per hundred. The hon. gentleman proposed to levy 25c. additional on all sugars between Nos. 13 and 16, and to levy an additional duty of 50c. on all over 16. So that if the measure of protection under the present tariff was 15c. a hundred, the average measure of protection, under the tariff proposed by the hon. gentleman opposite, would be about 37½c. per hundred. The House would, therefore, see that the protection which the hon. member for Centre Huron then sought to impose was very much greater than that which the hon. the Finance Minister intended to grant to the refiners under this tariff. The late Finance Minister further said:—"According to the best opinions I could obtain, and according, also, to the opinions of the Customs authorities, the present duty is unfair in this respect, that the raw material is at present taxed at 50 per cent. ad valorem, while there is on refined sugars only a duty of 40 to 47 per cent." The hon. gentleman certainly could not have made the calculation correctly, for it could easily have been ascertained at that time—and could be ascertained now from the Trade and Navigation Returns—that the refiners, as a matter of fact, introduced the raw material at 2½ per cent. less than the grocers. So he was astray 10 or 12 per cent. in his calculation. He recollected, when this speech was published, and the propositions came to the knowledge of importers throughout the country, that meetings of merchants were held in Toronto, Hamilton and Montreal to protest against the proposed changes, and twenty or thirty merchants engaged in the West India trade came to Ottawa, interviewed the Finance Minister, and asked him to abandon his ill-considered tariff, the effect of which must have been to place the whole sugar trade of this country in the hands of a sugar-refining monopoly in Montreal to the exclusion of everything in the way of grocery sugars of foreign countries. The Canadian people would thus have been obliged to use Canadian refined sugar only, and would have been prevented from introducing the wholesome raw grocery sugars of the West Indies—indeed, all classes except the low grades for refining purposes. The deputation urged the hon. gentleman to abandon his tariff, which he reluctantly did. In a speech delivered by the hon. member for Centre Huron, on the 1st of May following, he referred to the abandonment of his propositions, and said that the position of the duties was by no means satisfactory, and he would, during the recess, consider the whole matter in question, and arrive at a better decision. The hon. gentleman had had several recesses since that time, but had he arrived at a better decision? He had not, notwithstanding that the American drawback had been increased, that the Canadian refineries had consequently been put in a worse position than before, and that the trade with the West Indies had become less and less, until now it was almost extinct. He was sorry to detain the House at so late an hour, but it might be well for him to give hon. members some idea of the kind of sugar the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite had obliged the people to consume. He had here a letter which was addressed to the Chicago Tribune by a gentleman named Rossiter, who was the proprietor of an extensive refinery which had been in operation a good many years. He was an honest, capable and conscientious man, and he abandoned the sugar enterprise, rather than resort to the expedients to which American refiners resorted in order to render the commodity cheap, and make the business profitable. With a view of apprising the public of the nature of the commodity they were consuming, and giving them a little insight into the manner in which American refiners had been carrying on adulteration, he made the following statement regarding refined sugar:—

“There is another evil almost as pernicious as the poisoned syrups, to which the attention of the community has not as yet been directed. Almost all the refined sugars sold in this country are poisoned in refining with chemicals to a greater or less extent. Most of them do not contain sufficient drugs to produce an immediate sensible effect on those who are in ordinary health. Nevertheless, enough are used to gradually undermine the health of very many who do not class themselves as invalids, and constantly aggravate the sufferings of those who have already become such. Many are daily suffering with headaches, pain in the stomach, and bleeding piles, who have not the least suspicion that sugar may be the principal cause. They are constantly using remedies which fail of producing the desired result, because the chemicals in the sugar are constantly feeding the disease. It is not contended that sugars are the only cause of the complaints, but that they are one cause, and so fruitful a one that it becomes everyone suffering in that way to look into the matter. The case of a man connected with merchandising in Chicago is similar to that of many others. He was a constant sufferer with headaches and bleeding piles, so that he feared he would be compelled to relinquish business. For months he used remedies highly recommended, but without any permanent benefit, never imagining that he was feeding the disease at the family board. A friend said to him: ‘Give up sugar.’ He did so, and in one month he was well. Other cases might be given of a similar character. Multitudes throughout the country are suffering with these and similar complaints who have no suspicion that sugar is one, and perhaps the only, cause of their sufferings, and that which defies the skill of our physicians. The trouble is not caused by the sugar itself, but by the chemicals with which it is refined.”

Previous to the year 1870, the sugar of the Canadian refiners was as good as that refined anywhere in the world. It was refined according to the old system, and chemicals were not used in the preparation of sugar. But subsequently, when, under the drawback system, American sugars were introduced, Montreal refiners were obliged to compete with their neighbours, and accordingly they enlarged their establishments and introduced machinery specially to manufacture sugars of a poorer class. He had those sugars analysed, but neither chemicals nor deleterious matters were found in them, and they were proved to be wholesome. So the House would understand that, under the system which had been allowed to exist during the last four or five years, the Canadian people had been induced, in their ignorance of the quality of the sugar, to take the adulterated, miserable article brought in from the United States by thousands of barrels, believing it was wholesome. When he interrupted the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) the other night, and said a few words with regard to drawbacks, he stated there was a factory in Buffalo engaged in the manufacture of starch, glucose and syrup from Indian corn. In that establishment they used from four to five thousand bushels of Indian corn daily. He was informed by a gentleman who had superintended that establishment for some years, and was brought from England to enable the firm to extract as much saccharine matters as possible from the corn, that large quantities of the glucose and syrup produced in that factory were sent to sugar refineries, and mixed with the sugar sent out from the United States, on which a drawback was received. Thus the commodity by courtesy called refined sugar, which contained a large percentage of glucose, carried with it a large drawback. It would be readily understood by the House, that it was utterly out of the question for the Canadian refiner, who enjoyed no special privileges, to compete with such a system as this. There was another little expedient to which American refiners resorted, with a view of defeating the revenue, and breaking down foreign competition. The product of molasses, that was sugar made in the refineries of the United States from imported molasses, carried with it a drawback of 1½c. per pound. In a certain city in the Union there was a refinery, and the two firms controlling these establishments were almost identical. He would show how they got over the drawback. They brought in molasses from the West Indies, paid the duty, passed the molasses through the machinery, and it came out crystallised sugar of a low grade. It was then taken to the sugar refinery, passed through another process, made into yellow refined sugar, and exported into Canada, and it carried with it the drawback properly applicable, according to the American laws, to exported sugar made from sugar and not molasses, so that the refineries obtained from the revenue of the United States a sum of money which was much greater than the duty paid on the raw material. By that expedient they got from the American treasury money they never paid into it. From an experience of about fifteen years, during which he had purchased considerable quantities of refined sugar in the United States, as well as very large quantities of raw sugar in the West Indies, he was enabled to say that these facts were almost short of the truth, for he could tell the House of chemicals of various kinds which were used in sugar refining. The argument might be used by hon. gentlemen opposite that, if refiners in the United States resorted to adulteration and the application of chemicals in refining sugar, there was no reason why the Canadian refiner should not do likewise. But this House had the remedy in its own hands. There was an Adulteration Act on the Statute-book, and it was quite within the power of Parliament to defend the people against any imposition by the Canadian refiners, or any other manufacturers—and there was, undoubtedly, room for the intervention of Parliament in the matter of the adulteration of food. The only difference between this tariff and the tariff we had had in operation was the addition of 5 per cent. on the ad valorem rate. On all sugars from 9 to 14 Dutch standard the duty had been three-fourths of one cent. per lb., and 25 per cent. Under the new tariff it was three-quarters of a cent. per lb. and 30 per cent.; and above 14 it was one cent. per lb. and 35 per cent. So the difference made with a view of protecting the refiner was simply 5 per cent. ad valorem. That 5 per cent. was not a great deal to contend against. There was nothing now to prevent importers from going to the Clyde, Liverpool, or to the West Indies, as heretofore, and bringing in sugar which would enter into competition with the products of the Canadian refiner. He received a letter from a friend in Toronto a few days ago, who said he was making arrangements to import grocery raw sugars for the trade from the West Indies. When in Toronto during Easter week he saw that gentleman, who told him that he had seriously considered the matter in view of the new tariff, and saw nothing in it to prevent him bringing in wholesome raw sugars from the West Indies to go into competition with the Canadian refined. Some hon. gentlemen might labour under the delusion that there was not any really high coloured sugar to be had in the West Indies. He had imported sugar as white as paper from the West Indies, a sugar that commanded a higher price from the confectioners of the United States than the white sugars of the refiners, because the confectioners knew well that it was purer than the white sugar of the refiners. There was nothing to prevent importations from the West Indies going on under this tariff, nor, if there was sufficient competition between the importers of grocery sugars and the manufacturers in Canada, to cause any increased prices here. He would now show the probable effect of the new tariff on the West India trade. The aggregate quantity of sugar consumed in this country annually was from 105,000,000 lb.

to 110,000,000lb. and the consumption would doubtless be considerably increased, because, under the operation of the National Policy, many commodities for which sugar was required, and which had hitherto been imported, would be manufactured in the Dominion. This 105,000,000lb. or 110,000,000lb. would amount to about 75,000 or 80,000 hogsheads. As many hon. gentlemen knew, the vessels engaged in this trade had each a carrying capacity of less than 250 or 300 hogsheads, so that the aggregate of the sugar consumed by the people of Canada, in twelve months, would be equal to about 300 ordinary cargoes. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith) in speaking of this trade, said it engaged forty vessels of 1,000 tons each. The hon. member, coming as he did from the Maritime Provinces, should have been candid in discussing this question, and should have stated to the House that the vessels engaged in the trade had not a carrying capacity of 1,000 tons, but of about 250 hogsheads. At the present time very little sugar was brought to the lower ports, because the people had been able to buy the commodity, which, by courtesy, was called sugar, cheaper from the United States. But, under the present tariff, they hoped to obtain a purer article. As he stated before, our West India sugar trade had been almost wiped out of existence by the drawback system of the United States. Under the proposed tariff, he had no doubt that it would be revived and restored; that before twelve months had elapsed it would be very active, and that 75 or 80 per cent. of the sugar used in this country would come direct from the West Indies. Suppose we imported 250 cargoes, it was safe to assume that the vessels bringing those cargoes to Canadian ports would take back Canadian products: fish, lumber, breadstuffs, coal—such products being now sent chiefly from American ports to the West Indies. With refineries established at Halifax, St. John and Montreal, and with 200 or 300 cargoes of raw sugars imported direct, a profitable trade with the West Indies would, no doubt, be established. This had not been the case for many years past, because the great bulk of our sugar had come in by American railways, under which system we obtained no interchange of trade and little or no profit. The sugar refining question was one of special importance to the people of Nova Scotia, for the refining of 50,000 tons of sugar involved the consumption of a like number of tons of coal, and this would develop the coal trade of that Province. With respect to sugar refining in Ontario, if hon. gentlemen opposite would name any part of the world where a sugar refinery was established at a point as far distant from the seaboard as Toronto was, then he would admit that the industry could be profitably carried on in that city. But it was well known that no sugar refinery was established so far away from salt water. Consequently, Toronto laboured under a disadvantage in consequence of its geographical position. It was useless to argue that injustice was done to Toronto, for sugar could not be profitably refined in Ontario, under this or any tariff, as such a refinery could not successfully compete with the refineries at Montreal, Halifax and St. John. If sugar was brought from New York over the Suspension Bridge to Toronto, for refining purposes, and the privilege of admitting packages free of duty were granted, even then the industry could not be profitably carried on in his judgment.

MR. MILLS: How about Montreal?

MR. BUNTING: That is a different question.

MR. MACKENZIE: The bulk of the sugar for the Montreal refinery comes by Portland.

MR. BUNTING said that during the winter months, when the import trade was active, and when the raw article could not be sent in by water, it came to Montreal by rail from Portland. But when the river was open vessels would bring raw sugar direct to the refinery. He was afraid hon. gentlemen opposite could not afford him any information on the question. While he did not desire to depreciate their judgment, he was bound to say that, if the information they had given to the House during the tariff debate was of the same character as that presented on the sugar question, it was, indeed, very wide of the mark.

The Toronto Globe, the organ of the gentlemen opposite, in an article published a short time ago on the question of drawbacks, said :

"The French Government, like the United States Government, puts into the refiner's pocket at home the profits he should get from his customers abroad, and thus enables him to undersell the foreign refiners. So systematically have the French refiners gone to work that they have, it is stated, directed the beet root sugar makers to produce an article apparently giving 80 per cent. of saccharine matter, but which really gives 90 per cent. The cunning fellows thereby manage to pay duty on an 80 per cent. assessment of value and receive a drawback on one of 90 per cent. The results to the British refiners have been consequently most disastrous. Several refineries have shut down altogether, and if the unfair competition is continued others will soon follow."

While the Globe made the discovery that the French refiners had an advantage over the English, it failed to ascertain that the American refiner possessed ten times as great an advantage over the Canadian refiner. It professed ignorance of the existence of the bounty given on sugar coming from the United States to Canada, while it was perfectly well informed in regard to the bounty given on French sugar going into England. A few years ago there were twenty-four refineries in the British metropolis, producing enormous quantities of sugar for home consumption and export. But, of these, twelve were closed in consequence of the operation of the bounty system of France and the unfair competition which they encountered from the French refiners. Canada had suffered from a like cause in a much greater degree, and the refiners of this country had had good ground for complaint by reason of the drawback allowed by the American Government on sugar exported to this Dominion and foreign countries. He (Mr. Bunting) had no hesitation in saying that the new tariff was a good one, well adapted to the requirements and circumstances of the country, one that would ere long foster our trade with the tropics and contribute largely to the furtherance of our commercial welfare.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the value of the hon. gentleman's testimony was very great. He recollected when the hon. gentleman came before him as Finance Minister, and his evidence then was marvellously in contrast with his evidence now. When the hon. gentleman from Bothwell was presiding over the Depression Committee, a few years ago, the hon. gentleman from Welland appeared before the Committee, and testified that he did not think sugar refining was indigenous to Canada, and that sugars could be refined in the United States and on the Clyde for less money than in Canada. The hon. gentleman called attention to the fact that a great quantity of sugars had been bought from the United States. He (Mr. Cartwright) found that 45,118,000lb. were brought from England last year, and only 42,500,000lb. from the United States, and he was further informed by the Customs authorities last year that the great bulk of sugars brought from the United States were hard white sugars, of a high class, which sugars, he always understood, were not easily adulterated. The yellow sugars, which could be most easily adulterated, were brought from Great Britain. Finding that complaints were made that sugars were adulterated, the then Minister of Inland Revenue, at his (Mr. Cartwright's) instance, caused an eminent analyst to examine a number of samples of American sugar in Montreal and elsewhere. The result was completely to disprove the allegations that deleterious ingredients, or, indeed, ingredients to any extent, were admixed in the sugars from the United States. He did not dispute that adulterated sugar was made in the United States, but he was sure we would find Canadian rogues and Canadian sugar refiners just as ready to adulterate as were foreign rogues, and he was afraid that particular description of home manufacture flourished amongst us sufficiently and needed no protection, although it got some encouragement under this tariff.

MR. DALY said this subject had occupied the attention of the people of Nova Scotia more than any other. It was this very question of sugar, and the neglect of the late Government to deal with it, that had much to do with his presence in this House. The gentleman who lately represented the city of Halifax in this House had some idea of the importance of the sugar question, but, when he entered the late Government, the renewal of the question of taxing sugar, the remission of duties on the unrefined sugar, and its admission on such terms as would allow the industry of sugar refining to be carried on successfully in this country, received no attention whatever from the Government. He attributed the defeat of Mr. Jones to this great question. He congratulated the hon. the Finance Minister on having grappled with this question—a question so intricate as to puzzle his predecessors—but for which a fair solution had now been found. It would give to this country an impetus in the development of its resources, and give a stimulus to our languishing West India trade. It had been stated that the importation of sugar could not be made direct. He could assure the hon. gentleman who made that statement that there were now six vessels loading in the West Indies to come back with sugar direct to Halifax. They would not now come back in ballast from the United States, but would bring the raw material, which would be sent by the Intercolonial to be refined at Montreal. One of these vessels was owned by the late member for Halifax, who would now be glad to avail himself of the advantages to be derived from the policy which this Government had proposed, and which his own colleagues had not the patriotism to carry into effect. Not only would it revive the sugar refining industry, but it would develop the coal resources of the country. The refining of every 100lb. of sugar would take one ton of coal. It would give increased occupation to our ships, and the shipment of fish to the West Indies would be more profitable. Freight on fish would be lower, as the return freight on the sugar would help to pay the expenses of the round voyage, while such vessels had lately been obliged to return from the United States in ballast.

MR. MILLS said the hon. member for Welland was mistaken in supposing that he (Mr. Mills) had stated that the United States refiners refined in bond. The discussion at that time was as to whether the duties on raw sugars from the United States should be charged not only on the price of the sugar, but also on the American duty as well, and the hon. the Finance Minister stated that when the duty was paid it would be charged on that as well, but not otherwise. He (Mr. Mills) then called his attention to the fact that the rule he laid down, besides being inconsistent with the provision of his tariff would apply to all American sugars, if refined in bond, which obviously they would do in order to avoid the duty he proposed to impose upon them. His impression was that little glucose was used in the manufacture of American sugars, and that was necessarily confined to yellow sugars. Some time last summer Mr. McGibson, of Montreal, to whom the hon. the Minister of Public Works had referred as a high authority, made a statement that the American sugars imported into Canada were poisoned with chemicals, and that they did not contain more than 65 per cent. of pure cane sugar. In order to ascertain the facts, Dr. Baker Edwards, of Montreal, the Government analyst, was directed to investigate the subject, and analysed, if he was not mistaken, upwards of twenty specimens of American and Scotch sugars. There was not an American sugar analysed that gave less than 99 per cent. of pure cane sugar. There was the smallest trace of ash, and scarcely a trace of glucose. No foreign substance of any kind was found. That report was a complete answer to the statement of Mr. McGibson. It was also a conclusive answer to the statement made to-night by the hon. member for Welland. He called the hon. member's attention to this fact, that the average price of sugars imported from the United States last year, exclusive of melado and syrups, was \$6.26, and the price of sugars imported from Great Britain was \$5.20. It was perfectly obvious that the sugar the people paid \$6.26 for, to the refiner of New York, was not the same sugar, or the same class of sugar which they paid \$5.20 for, to people on the Clyde or at Portsmouth. In one case they purchased white sugars, hard or soft, and in the other case yellow refined sugars. It was obvious they would not pay \$1.06 in New York more for sugars than they would pay in Glasgow for sugars of the same quality. The hon. member had also stated that the refineries in Canada were closed in consequence of the drawback given in the United States. He thought the hon. gentleman was wholly wrong. If time permitted, he could show that this statement was misleading. But, if there was any force in it at all, the effect would have been to exclude Scotch refined sugars and English sugars as well. But these sugars continued to come into the Canadian market more largely than before. The fact was that Scotch refined sugars drove nearly all the American yellow refined sugars out of the Canadian market. The sugars imported from the United States during the past year or fifteen months, were superior to those imported the year or two previous. Why? Because the class of yellow refined sugars it was impossible for the Americans to sell in a Canadian market, and compete successfully with the yellow refined sugars from Scotland. Our Trade and Navigation Returns showed that. He had shown the House that the drawback given to the American refiners did not accomplish the object the hon. gentleman said it did, and it was perfectly obvious that it could not. The sugar refiners in the United States imported 1,500 million pounds a year, mostly from the West Indies, and exported but 80,000,000lb. If they obtained the whole price of the sugars exported as a drawback, it could have but little effect on the whole refining business of the country, as fifteen pounds out of every sixteen refined, and on which the tax was paid, and no drawback could be allowed, was consumed at home. The fact that they exported but 80,000,000lb. showed the utter fallacy of the hon. gentleman's argument. If the American refiner received such a bounty as these gentlemen pretended, it would be his interest to export his sugars in order to obtain the bounty; but he did not do so, which proved the statement of these gentlemen to be unfounded. He contended that he could not import into Canada from the West Indies the superior grades of sugar, and successfully compete with the refiners here. This tariff imposed a tax of $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound, and 30 per cent. ad valorem on sugars under No. 9, and on sugars over No. 13 1c. per pound, and 35 per cent.; a difference between the two grades of $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound, and 5 per cent. ad valorem, a real difference of 25 per cent., for that $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per pound meant 20 per cent on the value. This tariff would not help the West India trade. The centrifugal sugars—the higher grades of raw sugar—were manufactured by the planters, and this tariff discriminated against them. They were the only men who were able to enter into close commercial relations with us. That tariff was framed specially in the interests of refiners, and under it the people could receive only, for consumption, the inferior grades of sugar refined here, for which they would have to pay a very high price.

SIR A. J. SMITH said the hon. member for Welland was under a misapprehension with regard to a statement which he (Sir A. J. Smith) had made. The statement he had made was that the carrying trade in respect to this sugar was equal to 40 vessels of a thousand tons each. He did not say it had to be carried in vessels of 1,000 tons and no other vessels. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that sugar could be carried in none but British bottoms. Did he know that sugar was brought to Chicago by the River St. Lawrence. How many cargoes were brought from the West Indies while the sugar refinery was in Montreal? Our vessels now had a large amount of the carrying trade. They took cargoes from St. John and Halifax to the West Indies, and brought back sugar to the United States.

MR. HOOPER said he held a petition which had been presented to this House two or three years ago, at the time the Redpath refinery at Montreal was closed, from the operatives in that refinery, numbering 2,500 workmen, and owners of real estate, shopkeepers and others in the neighbourhood of the works, setting forth the great injury inflicted on them by the closing of this refinery, which had then been in operation twenty-one years. The next question was: What caused these works to be closed? The answer was contained in the extract from the Budget speech of the late Finance Minister, which was read by the hon. member for Welland:

"According to the best opinions I could obtain, and according, also, to the opinions of the Custom-house authorities the present duty is unfair in this respect: that the raw material is at present taxed at 50 per cent. ad valorem, while there is on refined sugars only a duty of 40 to 47 per cent. We propose to rectify this unfairness."

The hon. the Finance Minister did alter the duty as he proposed, which would have enabled the refinery to go on, and others to open, but after it had been a few days in operation he repealed it. The duty of to-day was the same as existed since 1868, under which, although unfavourable, the Redpaths were able to compete until the United States bounty crushed them out. It would appear, from the Trade and Navigation Returns of 1878, that there were nearly 1,000,000,000 lb. of sugar imported into Canada. He would not go into details, as the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Bunting) had gone fully into them; but speaking of the price of sugar, he would merely make a comparison for argument sake. Supposing that sugar had been cheaper the last five years than previously—what would be the effect of that? Presuming the Americans sold their sugar a cent less per pound, in any grade, than what was charged by the Messrs. Redpath, there still remained the important question of glucose to be considered, and in order that this House might understand the extent to which glucose entered into the American sugar, he would read an extract from a Free-trade paper, the New York Bulletin:

"Special Treasury Agent Chamberlain, who has been making investigations for some time past, regarding the alleged frauds in sugar, has forwarded a report to Washington, which, it is said, fully bears out the charges that have been made. The chief of the Detective Service in the Treasury Department has notified Col. Chamberlain that he is coming to New York, and will probably arrive here to-day, to take such action as may be deemed necessary in the interest of the Government. The points of the report have not, of course, been made public, but it is said that high grade sugars, on which a drawback was allowed for exports, have been found to contain, in some instances, as high as 60 per cent. of glucose, and this will be proved by samples which were tested by the Government chemists."

It was well known that in the United States there were three or four large manufactories of glucose. It was only the other day that a factory in Rhode Island was moved into Ohio, so as to be in the midst of a corn growing country, and avoid the expense of freight. The poor starving workmen, for whom hon. gentlemen opposite had such intense sympathy, were paying, under their policy, 10c. for every 4c. worth of sugar and 2c. worth of Indian corn. Millions had been taken out of the pockets of our people to put in the hands of those American refiners. And yet the Opposition call them legalised robbers and taxationists, and said they wanted to take the money from the poor workingman to give it to rich monopolists. And that in the face of the above facts. There was another consideration which entered into this question, and that was the decrease in value of real estate in Montreal, owing to the destruction of the refineries:

"The total value of property constantly employed by Redpaths, including wages, is as follows:—The vessels, cars, horses, hay, oats, coal and wages, $1,400,000. This does not include the refinery or raw material. The number of individuals supported by the works is 3,437 souls. The destruction and loss to dwellings is more than can be estimated by hon. members. Again, men out of employment, horses, vessels, and cars idle, the loss cannot be computed. In short, apart from the works, a whole town of 3,437 souls blotted out of existence by this sugar duty, and this is Free-trade."

The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) stated the drawback paid by the Americans, was simply a drawback on the amount exported. He had frequently heard the very opposite, that the American refiners received a drawback from their Government for every pound of sugar imported. If 100 lb. of sugar made 75 lb. refined, they got a drawback on the 100 lb. These facts were sufficient to prove that the measure introduced by the Finance Minister was one for which there was urgent need, and one which every true lover of his country would support.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Baby.)

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain resolution respecting Weights and Measures.

(In the Committee.)

In answer to Mr. BÉCHARD,

MR. BABY said it was the object of the Government to facilitate, as much as possible, the inspection of Weights and Measures, and to conduct it in such a manner as to incommode as little as possible those who were obliged to submit to it. He trusted the Bill relating to this matter would meet with the approval of the House.

Resolution ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times and agreed to.

MR. BABY introduced a Bill (No. 87) To amend and consolidate the laws relating to Weights and Measures.

Bill read the first time.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P.E.I.)

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain resolutions respecting the tariff of tolls and dues to be levied in the Harbour of Montreal.

(In the Committee.)

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said this resolution was introduced at the request of the Harbour Commissioners under the Act 36 Vict. The tolls were fixed by Statute, and it was not in the power of the Harbour Commissioners to lessen those dues. Montreal had become a very expensive port, so expensive, in fact, that ship-owners almost avoided it and procured cargoes elsewhere. The Harbour Commissioners desired, by lowering the tolls, to encourage ships to go to the harbour as much as possible. This resolution only empowered the Commissioners to reduce the tolls with the consent of the Governor in Council. It did not empower them to increase them.

SIR A. J. SMITH said the first clause, as it was worded, empowered the Harbour Commissioners also to increase the tolls with the consent of the Governor in Council.

MR. POPE said that was a wrong construction to place on the clause. It was only intended to give the power to reduce the tolls with the consent of the Governor in Council. The second resolution had for its object the authorising of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, to make arrangements with steamers and tug-boats with regard to the dues and charges for towage to be imposed. It also authorised the Commissioners to purchase and own such tug-steamers. It was intended to place within their power the means of reducing, by competition, the fees or dues of tug-boat owners when they became too large; the Commissioners might thereby regulate the tug-boat charges on the river.

MR. KILLAM said that it might be possible that the charges at Montreal might have been so excessive as to prevent many vessels from visiting that harbour; but, on the other hand, perhaps the smallness of the number of vessels might have prevented proper competition between the individual owners of the tug-boats. However, this resolution simply authorised the Harbour Commissioners to stop a monopoly by creating another that might be equally injurious to the port. Perhaps there was no fear of their doing that, as it was not in their interest; but the Harbour Commissioners, by an agreement with any tug-boat company, or owners, to do all the towage at stipulated charges, could thus establish a monopoly that might become very injurious. If the Commissioners purchased or built boats better fitted for towing at cheaper rates than the present, it did not follow that other improvements might not be undertaken, and a monopoly established in connection with them. It would be better to leave this work open to the competition of private individuals. He thought it would be just as proper for the corporation of Montreal to purchase cabs and carriages, and contract to do all the cab driving in that city, as for the Harbour Commissioners to enter upon such an enterprise as towing. Unless some better reason was given for this interference with private undertakings, he must protest against it.

MR. TUPPER said the Harbour Commissioners were expending very large sums to improve the facilities of that port and increase its business. While it was suffering from competition with the St. Lawrence route and other causes, it was the opinion of those gentlemen that they might do a great deal to increase its trade and business, and also the revenue from shipping by reducing the charges on it. They believed that instead of decreasing the revenue they would increase it, by attracting more vessels through those greater commercial facilities. Besides dealing with those tolls and dues, the resolution dealt with another point, which they said had become a serious one, namely, the heavy exactions levied by parties for tug service, which had been found a heavy obstruction to the Commissioners and a discouragement to vessels, which dreaded coming to Montreal in consequence. The second resolution would enable the Commissioners to deal with both matters. They had no object but to facilitate and increase the trade and business of the port, which, if they received the power asked, they believed they could do, by relieving shipping from the onerous exactions it now suffered from. The object was laudable, and, as the competition with Montreal was keen, it was important that the House should do everything to promote trade and business through our commercial centre.

MR. McCUAIG said that he understood this resolution in an exactly opposite sense to that taken by the member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam). Its object was to prevent extortionate charges upon vessels by the competition of steamboat owners and tugs. He (Mr. McCuaig) knew that shipowners had refused to come from Quebec to Montreal, owing to the heavy rates for towage. The resolution was intended to give the Commissioners power to check exorbitant charges.

MR. KILLAM said that nobody appreciated more than himself the efforts of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal to improve the trade and facilities for shipping of the port. With regard to this resolution doing away with injurious monopolies, it might encourage the creation of another, more injurious still. He thought they were going the wrong way to work.

Resolutions ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolutions reported, read the first and second times, and agreed to.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) introduced a Bill (No. 88) To amend the Acts respecting the Trinity House and Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

NORTH SYDNEY HARBOUR BILL.

(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P.E.I.)

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain resolution respecting the appointment of three Commissioners, to have the superintendence of the Harbour of the port of North Sydney in Nova Scotia.

(In the Committee.)

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said that this resolution was designed to place this port in a similar position to that of Pictou, where the arrangement had been found to work very well. It merely authorised the appointment of Commissioners to make regulations, and look after the harbour-master, etc.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he doubted very much the policy of this resolution, because this was a port of call, and, if it was intended to tax all vessels coming from Europe, calling there for orders, it would affect it injuriously.

MR. POPE said he understood that vessels did not come inside the harbour when calling for orders, in which case they would not be called on to pay harbour dues. If they entered, however, and remained any length of time, they would naturally be expected to pay dues, one cent a ton, which was all that could be charged.

PILOTAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Pope, Queen's P.E.I.)

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain resolution respecting the Pilotage Act of 1873.

(In the Committee.)

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said this resolution intended that masters of vessels, except those registered in Canada, should not be allowed to obtain authority to act as pilots in their own ships. It contemplated, also, giving authority to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal to engage second-class pilots for the subordinate class of pilotage duties.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he approved both objects of the resolution. Mr. Cramp had convinced him it was in the interests of Montreal to have second-class pilots.

SEAMEN'S ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P.E.I.)

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain resolution respecting the Seamen's Act, 1873.

(In the Committee.)

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said this resolution was intended to amend the 31st clause of the Act, about the interpretation of which there was, at present, a difference of opinion.

SIR A. J. SMITH said the intention of this resolution was to make every foreign vessel, notwithstanding its size, have a certified master and mate on board. That he understood to be the intention of the Act, but, as there was difference of opinion on it, this would make the Act perfectly clear.

MR. KILLAM said this compelled vessels of any size to have a certified master and mate before they could clear for a foreign port. If that were the case, there would be a great scarcity of masters and mates, unless means were taken to give certificates to all masters and mates now employed, and who had not certificates; otherwise many vessels would be prevented from leaving port.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said the resolution would not interfere in this way. It simply made the Act more clear than it was at present.

[BILL 58.]

(Mr. Tupper.)

THIRD READING.

Order for third reading read.

MR. TUPPER said he had looked over the suggestions made by the hon. the leader of the Opposition, and did not think they materially altered the substance of the Bill. As it was founded on an agreement, he did not like to introduce any verbal alterations unless they were absolutely necessary. He had, therefore, not altered the Bill.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not intend to divide the House on the Bill, but he regretted exceedingly that the ninth section should be retained. He could see no use for it. The hon. gentleman admitted that there might be a claim, else why state that the claim should be admitted in any way?

MR. TUPPER said he agreed with the hon. gentleman that there was no claim, and the fact that they both held this opinion ought to be sufficient to set at rest any doubts.

MR. ANGLIN said this Bill made serious alterations in the arrangements with regard to this railway. He thought some of the alterations devolved upon the Government of the Dominion contingent responsibilities, to which they were not subjected under the old arrangement. He wished to draw attention to the personal claims of the gentleman who was formerly contractor for the road. This Bill interfered with his private rights. Under the arrangement made at the time the contract was taken off his hands, it was understood he was to receive certain bonds in payment of his claims then admitted. These bonds he believed would be seriously affected in their value by the Bill, because the Bill provided for a possibility of the railroad passing into the possession of the Provincial Government, and subsequently of the Dominion Government, free from all liabilities. Therefore, he thought these liabilities, which he supposed were to be attached to the road, would be seriously affected. The value of the bonds he expected to receive would be greatly diminished, or, indeed, rendered altogether unsaleable. It was evident that, if, under this Bill, the road was to be relieved from all liability, if the bonds might, through any neglect of the company or of the Provincial Government, be practically cancelled, nobody would be much disposed to invest money in them, no matter how improbable the contingency might seem to be. The Bill had passed a second reading without his perceiving it. He could not imagine that the Government had any wish to interfere in any way with the rights of Mr. Gregory, or to injure in any way his claims, or to affect injuriously the character of any bonds or debentures which he held or was entitled to receive. Nevertheless, Mr. Gregory felt that the provisions of this Bill would have that effect, and he (Mr. Anglin) thought his statement was not unreasonable. It seemed to him that he had a right to complain of the Bill, and to ask that his interests should be protected.

MR. TUPPER said he had looked carefully into the question raised by Mr. Gregory in relation to these bonds, and was satisfied that, far from his having any legitimate grounds of complaint, no person was going to be more benefitted than he himself by the passage of this Bill. By his agreement with the company they were to give him a certain number of bonds, a comparatively small amount of old issue, and he (Mr. Tupper) believed that Mr. Gregory was not in a position to obtain any bonds at all, and that the Company were not in a position to issue bonds, and that without this Bill their bonds could not be put in the market, and Mr. Gregory could not obtain his quota, which, under his agreement with them, he was entitled to. If the company who were to issue these bonds were satisfied with this Bill, he could have no ground of apprehension. What would affect him in a small degree would affect the company to a large extent.

MR. ANGLIN said this matter was of great importance to Mr. Gregory, whose interests amounted to $40,000. If he (Mr. Anglin) understood the case it was this: this Bill provided that, if this company failed to work the road after it was completed, it should then go into the hands of the Provincial Government; and, if they, in turn, failed to work it, it should go into the hands of the Dominion Government, but that in returning into the possession of the Dominion Government it should go free of all liabilities. The arrangement was that bonds should be issued covering the Pictou Branch as well as the new portion of the road, but, if it was provided that under any circumstances that liability should be extinguished, the value of the bonds must necessarily be diminished. If the company contemplated issuing a large number of bonds on which they expected to realise money, or which they expected to issue in exchange for rails or rolling stock, the company should be interested in this particular question. The contingencies, however remote they might be, would nevertheless affect the value of the bonds in the market, and, if Mr. Gregory wished to realise on these bonds, he might find them worthless for that purpose.

MR. BRECKEN said he would ask that this Bill be not read the third time, but be referred back to a Committee of the Whole, with such instructions as would meet the views of the hon. gentleman from Gloucester. Mr. Gregory had a very vital interest in this matter. A few weeks ago he (Mr. Brecken) presented a petition to this House asking that his claim to the issue of preferential bonds to the extent of $80,000 should be a prior claim, and precede the measure sought to be enacted by the hon. the Minister of Public Works. Under a certain agreement that Mr. Gregory entered into with the Canada Improvement Company, and sanctioned by the Province of Nova Scotia, he claimed before this Bill was passed that these bonds should have priority. The history of this contract was briefly this:

"By contract dated October, 1876, Harry Abbott, of Brockville, contracted with the Government of Nova Scotia to build and operate a railway from New Glasgow to the Strait of Canso, called 'The Eastern Extension Railway,' and to establish a steam ferry across the said Strait, in aid of which he was to receive as a subsidy from the Government of Nova Scotia, $7,945, per mile, 150,000 acres of land, and a transfer of the line of railway from Truro to Pictou, called 'The Pictou Branch,' owned by the Government of Canada; which Pictou Branch it had been previously arranged between the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia, should be given by the Government of Canada to the contractor for the said Eastern Extension Railroad, whoever he might be. The said contract provided, that inasmuch as the said Pictou Branch would not be delivered to the contractor as soon as he had anticipated when proposing for the said contract, he should not be bound to proceed further with his contract after his work done amounted to $400,000, estimated by a schedule of values annexed to the said contract, unless the said Pictou Branch should then be delivered to him, as it was then expressed in the said contract to be believed that it would be delivered, and in default of such delivery, the said contractor was to be paid the full value of all work by him done. Abbott transferred the contract, with the approval of the Government of Nova Scotia, to 'the Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company,' established by Act of Nova Scotia Assembly, 39th Vict., cap. 4, and 39th Vict. cap. 74. The Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company contracted with the Canada Improvement Company (Incorporated by Parliament of Canada, 1872), for the construction of said line, agreeing to pay there for, partly in money, partly in first mortgage bonds of said Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company, and partly in paid up stock in said Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company.

"The Canada Improvement Company, sometime in December, 1876, contracted with Charles C. Gregory, the petitioner, for the engineering, clearing, grading, fencing, bridging, sleepers and track laying of the whole of the Eastern Extension Railway, agreeing to pay petitioner therefor monthly, as the work progressed, $4,800 per mile, in money, and $3,750 in first mortgage bonds of the said Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company, and on the completion of the contract 50,000 acres of land, and one-third of the whole stock of said Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company as paid up stock. Gregory gave a bond to the Canada Improvement Company, with sureties in $100,000, for the due performance of the contract. This contract was approved of by the Governor in Council of Nova Scotia, in February, 1877. Gregory, under his contract, proceeded with the construction of the railway, until on the 1st of November, A.D. 1877, he had done work to the admitted value of $400,000, by the Government Engineer's return, entitling the Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company to receive said Pictou Branch, and thence forward until April, 1878, when work to the value of $530,000 (being three-fourths of the whole contract) was done, at which time there was $128,000 due Mr. Gregory. When Gregory had performed the work above-mentioned, and there was so large a sum due to him in bonds, the Canada Improvement Company declared their inability to give Gregory the bonds to which he was entitled, alleging that the Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company could not issue the bonds until they had one mile of said railway finished and in operation for every £3,000 sterling of bonds sought to be issued. Gregory, not receiving any bonds or equivalent therefor, discontinued work, and in May, 1878, commenced suits against Sir Hugh Allan and Hon. John Hamilton, they being Directors of said Canada Improvement Company, who had signed Gregory's contract, and who Gregory was advised were personally liable therefor. On the intervention and solicitation of the Government of Nova Scotia, and through the Hon. P. C. Hill, Provincial Secretary of Nova Scotia, Gregory having no negotiation with either the said Canada Improvement Company, the Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company, or any of the officers of either of the said two Companies personally, a settlement of the suits was arranged and embodied in a tripartite deed of settlement between the Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company of the first part, the Canada Improvement Company of the second part, and Mr. Gregory of the third part, executed in September, 1878. By the said deed of settlement, Gregory agreed to discontinue the suits brought by him against the said Sir Hugh Allan and the Hon. John Hamilton, surrender his contract and deliver up his works to the Canada Improvement Company; and the said Canada Improvement Company, in addition to the sum of $30,000 paid or secured to Gregory at the time of signing the said deed, agreed to deliver to Gregory 'as soon as the same could be legally issued—to which end both the said Companies agreed to use every diligence—$80,000 in good, sufficient, legal and available first mortgage bonds of said Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company, and which should, so far as the said Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company and the Canada Improvement Company could make them do so, attach and be a first lien upon the Truro and Pictou Branch Railway, which is to be handed over by the Government of the Dominion of Canada to said Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company as a subsidy towards the construction of said Eastern Railway Extension (provided always that such branch railway should be so handed over), the said Eastern Railway Extension and also upon said Company and the property, rights and privileges set forth in section 32 of the Act incorporating said Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company, 39 Vic., cap. 74. In the said deed of settlement it was understood that the Government of Nova Scotia should be at liberty, and was thereby permitted and required, to use all means within its power to enforce the delivery of said bonds to Petitioner by either of said Companies, their successors or assigns, or by any other Company or Companies which may be substituted for them or either of them, it being intended that said Government might withhold any consent or privilege, or omit or refuse to do any Act within its jurisdiction, required or necessary to enable said Company or Companies to draw any Government aid or receive any subsidy or subvention, or issue said bonds or otherwise until said Government was satisfied that the right of Gregory to receive said bonds was protected and assured.' The Provincial Secretary of Nova Scotia was privy to all the details of the said agreement and deed of settlement, and strongly urged Mr. Gregory to agree thereto in, as he alleged, the public interest. In negotiating the said agreement Hon. P. C. Hill assured Gregory that the said Pictou Branch Railway would be handed over by the Dominion Government as a subsidy to the said Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company, as contemplated by said deed of settlement; that arrangements to that effect had been made between the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia, and that naught but Gregory's litigation stood in the way of the same being carried into effect. Mr. Hill, as Provincial Secretary, further assured Petitioner, Mr. Gregory, that the Government of Nova Scotia would pass a Minute of Council recognising the said deed of settlement, and that Gregory might rely upon the Government protecting his interests. That at the time of the signing of the said deed of settlement, Gregory pledged to the Government of Nova Scotia $40,000 of bonds, deliverable to him under the said deed of settlement, to recoup the said Government for moneys paid out as relief to labourers who had been defrauded by absconding sub-contractors, which pledging was effected by Gregory giving the Provincial Secretary of Nova Scotia an order on the Canada Improvement Company, for the delivery to said Government of said bonds, which order was accepted by the said Canada Improvement Company, and is now held by the Government of Nova Scotia. Immediately after the settlement before mentioned, a change took place in the Government of Nova Scotia, the security bond not having been returned to Gregory, and no Minute of Council having been made for the protection of Gregory's rights."

It appeared that the remuneration promised Mr. Gregory was not given by the company, and he instituted proceedings against Mr. Hamilton, but withdrew the case, and compromised with them. By the agreement arrived at then, Mr. Gregory was to receive $80,000, half of which was to go to the Government of Nova Scotia, which that Government had supplied to Mr. Gregory to relieve the men employed under him. The petitioner had left the matter in his (Mr. Brecken's) hands to lay before the House. Mr. Gregory contended that the terms and the contract ought to be observed as far as he was concerned. He (Mr. Brecken) would, therefore, move the following amendment to the motion of the hon. the Minister of Public Works:—

"That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to a Committee of the Whole, with an instruction that they have power to make the following amendments, by inserting in line 10, of page 2, after the word 'therein,' the following words: 'Save and except an issue of first mortgage bonds by the said Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company, to the extent of eighty thousand dollars, forty thousand of which shall be issued to Charles C. Gregory, and forty thousand to the Government of Nova Scotia, in accordance with a deed of settlement, dated 31st of August, 1878, between the said Company, the Canada Improvement Company and the said Charles C. Gregory, the said bonds to attach and to be a first lien and charge upon the said two Railways and Ferry upon the Company, and the rights, property and privileges set forth in section 32 of the said Company's charter,' and by inserting in line 15 of said page 2, after the word 'assigns,' the words: 'Except as aforesaid,' and by further inserting in said line 15, after the word 'incumbrances,' the words: 'Except as aforesaid,' and also by inserting in line 22 on said page 2, after the word 'Company,' the words: 'Except as aforesaid'; also by inserting in line 34 of page 3, after the word 'Company,' the words: 'Except as hereinafter provided'; also by inserting in line 34 on page 3, after the word 'liens,' the words: 'Except as aforesaid.'"

The effect of this amendment was to give Mr. Gregory the first lien upon the Company.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. member had put forward in a very clear and succinct manner Mr. Gregory's claim. But it appeared that Mr. Gregory, out of an issue of $1,250,000, was only interested to the extent of $80,000, and a bond for half of that had been transferred to the Government of Nova Scotia. If the parties who were interested to the extent of $1,250,000, less $80,000, did not consider the remote contingency in this Bill, for the purpose of providing for the absolute certainty of this road being continued to be operated, was objectionable, he thought the House did not require to go any further to see that this was one of those claims which parties were always ready to put forward upon however slender basis. It was an amendment that could not be accepted by the Government.

SIR A. J. SMITH said that he could not see that Mr. Gregory was entitled to any further consideration, because there was no bonds issued. He had no claim on the Government, though he might have a claim on the contractor. The Government of Nova Scotia had a joint interest in this matter, and they had not come forward and remonstrated, and that was strong evidence of no claim on the part of Mr. Gregory. This Bill was a very important one, and it seemed to him (Sir A. J. Smith) that it was establishing a very dangerous precedent. There was nothing to prevent the contractors to the Local Government of Nova Scotia, who were making this railway from Truro to the Gut of Canso, getting rid of the road, which they no doubt would, if it were not remunerative, and throwing the responsibility on the Dominion Government at a very great loss to the other. It was a dangerous principle.

MR. TUPPER: The responsibility would not fall upon this Government to work it.

SIR A. J. SMITH said it must be assumed that they would have to work it if it was Government property. If that were the case, the Province of Quebec, which had an enormous amount of railway property would no doubt, be glad to get rid of it, and if the Government assumed the responsibility of working this railway in Nova Scotia, the Government could not draw a line and make a distinction between the Provinces of Quebec and Nova Scotia. It was a bad precedent to establish.

MR. MACDONNELL said he hoped the amendment would not pass. MR.

Gregory had no claim upon that portion of the road which was the property of the Dominion. The claim could only affect the Eastern Extension Railway, which belonged to the Government of Nova Scotia. Therefore, the Dominion could not be held responsible for any claims on the part of Mr. Gregory, or anybody else. If Mr. Gregory had claims on the contractors, he should hold that portion of the Pictou Railway which belonged to Nova Scotia responsible. They should recognise no lien on the Pictou Branch, which was only to be transferred when, and upon condition that, the extension to the Strait of Canso was completed. He hoped the fears of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith), that this road might, ultimately, fall into the hands of the Dominion Government, would prove well founded. The transfer of the Pictou Branch to the Province of Nova Scotia, was strongly opposed in this House, and, notably, by the late member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), who complained that by that transfer Nova Scotia received millions of dollars as a gift. Now, the hon. member for Westmoreland expressed fear that the Government might become repossessed of the road to acquire the title to the new extension also. It was well known that the question of extending our great railway system to the harbour of Louisburg was often discussed in and out of Parliament. That idea has not been abandoned, and he hoped it would soon be resuscitated. Louisburg is the natural eastern terminus of the great highway now being constructed across the Dominion, with its western terminus in British Columbia, and he hoped the day was not distant when the road would be extended from the Strait of Canso to that fine easternmost harbour of our country. For this purpose he hoped the Dominion Government would, at an early day, become possessed of the road between Truro and the Strait of Canso. The provision in the Bill before the House having this in contemplation, was alone sufficient to secure his support of that Bill.

MR. ANGLIN said he must confess he could not agree with the view taken of this case by the hon. the Minister of Public Works. He could not believe that any act of another of the parties to the agreement in which Mr. Gregory was interested could diminish the strength of Mr. Gregory's claim in the slightest degree. He was of opinion that the arrangement entered into more recently by the Nova Scotia Government, the company and the Dominion Government ought not to invalidate the claims of Mr. Gregory. He did not think a great Parliament like this should lend itself to any agreement or arrangement which would interfere with the rights of a private individual, or diminish the value of his property.

MR. MACDONNELL.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman was mistaken in the idea that they had increased obligations under this Bill that did not exist before.

MR. ANGLIN said he would like to ask whether it was or was not a fact that, if the Eastern Extension reverted to the Dominion Government, it reverted free from all liabilities.

MR. TUPPER: Yes.

SIR A. J. SMITH said that it seemed to him the right way would be to leave this railway in the hands of the Nova Scotia Government, and take back the Truro Branch.

Question put and amendment (Mr. Brecken) negatived on a division.

Bill read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS.—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned debate on Resolution 11 relative to duties of Customs and Excise, reported from Committee of Ways and Means (April 9th).

On item—Manufactured tobacco and snuff, 25c. per lb. and, in addition thereto, 12½ per cent. ad valorem,

MR. HOUDE said that the object of the Government in framing the tariff, and of the House in approving of it, was the improvement of the local market for Canadian products. The Excise law in force and the tariff as it stood were not the best to encourage the use of the Canadian grown article in the manufacture of tobacco. He thought there ought to be some means of remedying this evil. Why not impose a duty of 4c. per lb., for instance, on tobacco imported in leaf, to induce manufacturers to use Canadian instead of foreign tobacco, as far as practicable? As the United States had reduced lately their Excise duty, to prevent smuggling from the States we could reduce the Excise duty from 20c. to 16c. a pound, on all tobaccos entering manufacture, which, with the 4c. per lb. on the imported leaf, would not increase the price of the manufactured article in this country, while encouraging the Canadian producer. While a large quantity of Canadian tobacco was not the best, we raised a good deal of superior quality. Our farmers wished to improve the quality of tobacco, and some had gone to Virginia to learn the best mode of cultivation, and now raised tobacco of the first quality. Let them be better encouraged, and our industry might spring up, which would prove very useful to the farmers and beneficial to the country.

MR. TILLEY said that this subject was surrounded with difficulties. With reference to the suggestion to reduce the Excise duty and impose an ad valorem or specific duty on leaf tobacco, the authorities in the United States had recently reduced the Excise to 16c., which, of course, rendered it impossible for us, if anxious otherwise, to increase the duty; because there was 4c. difference between the Excise duties of the Dominion and the United States, and a larger difference would lead to a loss of revenue. It was considered undesirable to make any alteration except reducing the Excise on tobacco on home grown, from 10c. to 4c. per lb., which would be considered after they had passed through the Customs resolutions.

MR. PLUMB said that last year a resolution was introduced by a member from the Province of Quebec, asking the Government to take the Excise duty off home-grown tobacco, and thus encourage the growth of that product, and bring in another article of produce for rotation of crops. In the district where he (Mr. Plumb) resided, tobacco had been successfully cultivated, but, owing to the Excise duty at present existing, the farmers were not willing to experiment in its cultivation. It could be produced successfully in Kent, Essex, and other counties along the shore of Lake Ontario, and it was well known that, after and during the American war, when the supply of tobaccos no longer came from the Southern States, Connecticut, Massachusetts and Ohio produced tobacco in enormous quantities, and that it was now in those States, particularly in Connecticut, one of the largest sources of profit to the agriculturist. Had it not been for the present condition of the finances, he intended to have asked the Government to relax or entirely remove the Excise duty on home grown tobaccos. He had intended also to ask the hon. the Minister of Agriculture to procure a quantity of the best tobacco seed and distribute it among the different Agricultural Societies of the Dominion, with instructions as to its culture and treatment from the best authorities, in order to encourage the growth of tobacco as one of a series of crops desirable, among other grounds, in the interest of a proper rotation; but he did not think the present a desirable time to press such a consideration. In the part of the country where he resided, the agricultural community would not enter on the experimental growth of tobacco so long as they were liable, whenever they had made a small quantity, to be visited by an Excise officer. After our farmers had entered upon the growth of tobacco, it would not be an act of bad faith to them, nor a subject of complaint, to impose an Excise duty. He would probably ask at some future Session, if he were here, for a removal of this duty. He felt it necessary to say this, because, in speaking of the growth of tobacco in various parts of the country during the late election canvass, he had committed himself to a mention of the subject on the floor of Parliament.

MR. BOURBEAU said, the hon. member for Niagara having stated, in the course of his speech, that the farmers in his county had determined not to grow tobacco so long as the Excise duty should exist, he (Mr. Bourbeau) fully concurred in all that had been said by that hon. member, and hoped that the Government would understand the wants of the people upon that branch of industry, and would remove altogether that duty.

Farmers were so much opposed to paying duty upon that article that, in order to avoid the payment of the Excise, they manufactured an inferior article, and disposed of it before having properly prepared it, and there was no doubt that, if the duty was removed, farmers would take the necessary time and precaution to make a much better and superior article, and that, within a very short time, our farmers would be in a position, by the encouragement given to them, to produce an article in many instances equal, if not superior, to any imported tobacco. When the curing of tobacco would have become more protected, the Government might impose a slight duty if such became necessary,

Item agreed to.

On item—Vegetables, viz.: Potatoes, 10c. per bushel; tomatoes, 30c. per bushel; and on all other vegetables, 20 per cent. ad valorem,

MR. ANGLIN said that in St. John and neighbourhood they were dependent for several weeks, in the early part of the year, on the United States, for all the early vegetables. It was exceedingly difficult, if they accepted the theories of hon. gentlemen opposite, to say whether the imposition of that duty would make vegetables cheaper or dearer in the future. He knew no reason why the American gardeners could not combine to raise the prices of vegetables as well as the makers of textiles, hardware, etc., and to injure Canadian hot-beds. These vegetables were not luxuries in spring, but useful food used by all classes. All would find that, if they were diminished in size, or increased in price, the National Policy was not calculated to work all the benefits expected.

MR. TILLEY said that, as those early vegetables were dependent on the climate rather than any competition, it was very likely that the consumer would have to pay the duty; this was one of the exceptional cases. They were not in a position to compete with the Americans successfully in this matter. If people wanted, however, their radishes, or lettuce, a little earlier than we produced them, they could afford to pay a little additional duty. He had no doubt that this rate would lead to earlier production of those vegetables in Canada, by artificial means. He admitted, however, that the additional $3,000 or $4,000 they expected from this source would have to be paid by the consumer.

Item agreed to.

In reply to Mr. BOURBEAU,

MR. TILLEY said that the packages containing lard, referred to, were subject to duty, under the provisions of the Act.

On item—Wool unmanufactured, hair of the alpaca, goat, and other like animals, free,

MR. CHARLTON said he desired to remind the Finance Minister that the farmers had been generally led to believe, when this scheme of Protection for all classes was inaugurated, that they would receive protection on wool. He wished to inquire why this quasi pledge had not been fulfilled—why wool was placed on the free list, while the duties on woollen goods were so largely increased?

MR. TILLEY said that the proposition now about to be considered by the House would be found, taking the hon. gentleman's own line of argument, by giving an increased market for wool in Canada, to benefit the producers of wool more than a specific duty placed upon it. Hon. gentlemen opposite had argued that specific duties on agricultural produce would not benefit us, because we had a surplus ourselves. Taking that view of the case, they could not object to this proposition, provided it could be shown that it would produce a demand and increase the production of that article in the country—that it would be a direct benefit to the producer of wool. He held in his hand a memorandum showing the quantity of wool held in Canada at present, as far as could be ascertained in Ontario and Quebec. There were not the same facilities for obtaining information relative to the other Provinces, because the woollen trade was not a sufficiently distinct trade to induce parties to make a special business of obtaining accurate information as to its extent. In Ontario, there were held in Toronto, 1,600,000 lb.;

in Hamilton, 500,000lb.; in the Province of Quebec, 300,000lb.; making altogether 2,400,000lb. Under this proposition, the brown blankets, for instance, that were made heavy by the addition of Lancashire spar would pay a high ad valorem duty; and the coarser description of woollen goods made in Canada, including blankets, would be in extensive demand, thus furnishing a market for Canadian wool at home, which had formerly to seek a market in the United States, and pay a high rate of duty. If woollen goods increased in cost, and he had statements to prove such was not the case, it would be, as in the case of cottons, on account of the advance in the raw material. It was stated here that cotton goods had risen within the past week on account of the tariff, while it was proved, and they had the statement from a manufacturer to-day, that it was increased because the raw cotton had gone up $1\frac{1}{2}$ c.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Does the hon. gentleman say that the increase in cotton goods was due to the price of the raw?

MR. TILLEY: Yes.

MR. BERGIN said that, representing one of those constituencies which the hon. member for Lambton stated was given over to spurious little manufactures—

MR. MACKENZIE: When did I say anything of the kind?

MR. BERGIN said, when the hon. gentleman moved his amendment to the tariff, he stated that agriculture would bring more wealth to the country than by protecting spurious little manufactures in every petty village.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am surprised to hear my hon. friend considers Cornwall a petty little village.

MR. BERGIN said he had quoted the words of the hon. gentleman; he had not given his own opinion. He did not at all admit that Cornwall was a petty village, but he might say that, before the establishment of the woollen industry and the cotton industry in Cornwall, it was one of the pettiest of petty villages.

For years previous it had made no progress whatever, and the farmers were obliged to take all sorts of barter in exchange for their products. Now all that was changed. Manufacturers had converted that village into one of the most flourishing towns in Canada, and, before many years, he expected to see it a great manufacturing centre. To give an idea of the amount of money expended in Cornwall by these petty manufactories, these woollen and cotton industries, he would read a statement of the sums paid during the past year, in wages, distinguishing between the amounts paid to children, and those to adult working people. The wages of skilled male labour were $1.75 to $3 per day; unskilled male labour 80c. to $1; inferior class of labourers, 50c. to 80c.; children, 25c. to 60c. The total wages paid out in the woollen mill, last year, amounted to $50,000. The different kinds of goods made in this factory included tweeds, flannels, coatings, etc., and they paid out for wool last year $100,000. The wool used last year was nearly all imported, but the change in the tariff would enable this mill to consume 600,000lb. of Canadian wool this year. Owing to the importation from England of shoddy blankets, as was mentioned by the Finance Minister, the Cornwall establishment, which turned out the best blankets ever introduced into our market, was obliged to close down that department; but under the fostering care of this tariff they had recommenced making blankets, and by renewing that industry they would be enabled to make use of the very large amount of Canadian wool which he had just mentioned. But for this tariff, there would not be a blanket made in Canada this year. While on this subject of manufactures, he would say a word or two in regard to the cotton industry, to show how manufactures converted petty villages into thriving towns. Last year the cotton mill at Cornwall imported 1,917,137lbs. of cotton, costing $207,899, and they paid out in wages $2,200 per week. There were in Cornwall now other industries resulting from the previous establishment of these two, the cotton and woollen industries. The farmers there had a home market for everything they produced, and were not obliged to go to Montreal, paying travelling expenses, and freight to sell their produce, but could bring it into Cornwall and sell it for higher prices at their own door than they could get for it in Montreal. If this had been accomplished under the depressing influence of the financial policy of the late Government, how much greater would be the advantage to the farmers under this fostering tariff? He was surprised, the other night, to hear the hon. member for Lambton, followed immediately by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), each contradicting the other; and though each attacked the tariff, advancing the strongest kind of proof in favour of it. They were discussing the article of earthenware. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), produced an invoice, and to that invoice was added the freight and charges, including the Customs duty, showing that the value of that earthenware was nearly double that of its cost in England by the time it reached here. That he (Mr. Bergin) thought afforded a very strong argument why the people of this country should make their own crockery; and his (Mr. Bergin's) conviction was strengthened by the statement of the hon. member for Brant, who stated that he had been told by a gentleman from Staffordshire, England, thoroughly conversant with the manufacture of crockery, that it could be made in this country with as great facility as in England, and the only additional expense which would be put on would be a slight advance on the price of clay in England, one shilling per ton. What made the early settlers in this country rich? Was it not that each house was a manufactory, that they made within their own four walls everything they required—their boots, their shoes, their stockings, their drawers, etc. Was it not that they made everything they required about their farms? Was it not that the way in which they converted their howling wilderness into one of the finest countries on the face of the earth, and had left to their children well-stocked farms and well-filled farm houses? If the people were now suffering under the depression, it was because they had abandoned that Protective system which their fathers followed, because they had sent abroad to purchase that which they ought to make at home. We ought to thank the Government that, by fostering manufactures, they were enabling the people to do now again what had been done by the early settlers. Money would be kept in the country, a home market would be created for everything the farmers raised, and instead of sending their money abroad to contribute to the enrichment of foreign manufacturers, and to the support of foreign labour, or to the support of our own people in a foreign land, for he was sorry to say tens of thousands of our people were now employed in foreign factories, and the adding, by their labour and its products, to the wealth of the United States instead of to that of our own country, it would be kept at home and used in developing our resources. If this tariff should fail to realise all the expectations of the Finance Minister, there need be no difficulty in changing it next year, but that change would be in the direction of increased protection, if it were found in any one instance that the protection now given was insufficient. He might illustrate his argument with regard to these cotton and woollen industries, but would not detain the House by adducing the results in the United States, and by showing that almost the same arguments were used by the Free-traders in the United States against the Protective tariff when it was there introduced, as were used by hon. gentlemen opposite during this debate. But the question had been worn almost threadbare, and he would not further discuss it. He would, however, refer, before concluding, to one fact, that while the manufacturers of woollen goods in Cornwall, last year, had the greatest difficulty in forcing off their goods, they were now unable to fill all the orders they had received. With regard to the cotton factories, before the 17th September he could have bought every dollar of stock in that factory for 10c. on the dollar, now he could not buy it for 20c. Before the late election the storehouses were filled with goods unsold; now they were twelve or fourteen weeks behind with their orders. Need he say more?

MR. OLIVER said he did not advocate the duty on wool. He thought it was the duty of the hon. the Finance Minister to fulfil the pledges that were made by hon. gentlemen opposite during the last campaign. There was one question he desired to ask the Finance Minister. During his Budget speech, he stated we were to have no more shoddy cloth in this country. Had he taken any steps to keep out the shoddy that was being imported, and to prevent its being manufactured in the country? Was there a duty on it, or how was he to prevent it being manufactured here? There was a manufactory of shoddy in this country at present, and in order to prevent the mixture of shoddy with wool there ought to be a heavy Excise duty put upon this manufacturing institution. He was rather amused at the remarks of the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin). The hon. gentleman stated that Cornwall had risen from a miserable village to one of the most important manufacturing towns in the Dominion. Under what amount of protection did Cornwall arrive at this stage of prosperity? Under a protection of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., by having twenty cents on every dollar of advantage over those who manufactured the same goods outside of the country. This proved the whole question that $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. was sufficient to enable any manufacturing institution in the country to be prosperous. If it was so in the town of Cornwall, why should it not be so in every other manufacturing town in the country? The hon. gentleman also made the statement, that if this tariff did not give sufficient protection, we would have more at the next Session of this House. He (Mr. Oliver) desired to know whether the hon. gentleman spoke by authority or not. They had heard hon. gentlemen speaking, as they supposed, by authority, advocating a duty on wool, but it appeared they had no authority whatever for making such statements. Perhaps the hon. gentleman had no authority for making this statement, and might possibly lead the people astray, as it was more likely that a reduction in the taxes would take place, than an increase. The hon. the Finance Minister stated we had in the country at present, 2,400,000lb. of wool in the warehouses. The inference to be drawn from this statement was that this was Canadian wool. This was not Canadian wool, but wool imported from Africa, from the Australian Colonies, and from South America. He (Mr. Oliver) doubted whether we had 20,000lb. of native grown wool. It was imported by the Americans from foreign countries in bond, sold to the Canadian merchant in bond, and brought in free of duty. The most remarkable statement made by the Finance Minister, and the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), was that this tariff would encourage the consumption of Canada wool in the manufacture of our Canadian goods. Was there a sane person in the country who could suppose that if the Canadian manufacturer could go across the line and buy wool from 15c. to 18c., he would give 25c. to 30c. per pound for Canadian wool? The Canadian manufacturer would go to the United States and purchase the foreign wool in that country, and bring it here in free of duty. The Finance Minister stated the Opposition held the doctrine that as we raised more agricultural products in this country than we consumed, the increased duty would not increase the price of the products. That doctrine would not apply to wool, because we did not raise enough for own consumption. In 1876, we imported 3,621,296lb. at 19c., and exported 2,907,229lb. at 32c. per pound. In 1877, we purchased 4,608,825lb. at $17\frac{1}{2}$ c., and exported 2,476,486lb. at 28 $\frac{1}{2}$ c.; and in 1878, we imported 6,230,084lb. at $17\frac{1}{2}$ c., and exported 2,445,883lb. at 29c. These figures proved conclusively that we did not raise enough wool in this country for the consumption of our people.

After Recess.

MR. OLIVER said it had been stated that there was a surplus of wool raised in the country. He (Mr. Oliver) maintained that was not the case. During the last three years there were 14,460,000lb. imported, and 7,890,000lb. exported, showing a deficiency of 6,570,000lb., so that it was clear that there was not a sufficient quantity raised for the consumption of the people of this country. The wool imported cost an average of 18c. per lb., while 30c. a lb. were realised on the wool exported.

Now, there was a very large quantity of wool raised in the country it would be impossible for any Finance Minister or any policy to protect, for the reason that Canada had not the machinery requisite to manufacture the goods. But there was a class of wool—although he was a Free-trader as far as wool was concerned—that could be protected. There was raised and consumed in this country about 1,000,000lb. of short wool, against which foreign wool came into competition. That class of wool could be protected. The growth of some classes of wool might be encouraged. He was amused at the statement of the hon. member for Cornwall to the effect that all the cheese, eggs, cotton, beef, butter, etc., raised in that section of the country was consumed in the town of Cornwall. Was that correct? He asked anyone who knew the town of Cornwall whether any export trade took place there? He thought they did export eggs, butter, cheese, and a large quantity of cereals. According to the statement of the hon gentleman, 5,000 people composing the town of Cornwall consumed all the products raised in that section of the country. Another extraordinary statement made by the hon. gentleman was that when this country was first being settled, and every family manufactured its own goods, the people were wealthy and prosperous. Now, it was well known that if there was a time when the people were poor, it was when the country was being settled. As to the item under consideration, wool was a product that hon. gentlemen opposite had stated ought to be protected. Two years ago the hon. member for Stanstead advocated this policy, as well as other hon. gentlemen; and in the county of Lennox this was one of the items on which the late Finance Minister was condemned. Where were those gentlemen to-day? Two years ago they raised their voices and shed tears over the importation of wool free of duty, but now, when they had an opportunity of bringing pressure to bear on the Finance Minister to put a duty on wool, not one of them uttered a word. If they were sincere at that time, why did they not raise their voices to-day? Their conduct showed clearly that a great deception had been practised on the people.

Mr. BERGIN said the hon. gentleman who had just spoken had put to him a question, and had also misrepresented him, unintentionally no doubt, on one or two points. He would deal with these points first. He (Mr. Bergin) had not said that the first settlers were rich when they came into the country—but that, by their energy, their industry, their frugality and their practical common sense in manufacturing everything for themselves—not handing over the produce of their labour to importers to be sent out of the country to support foreign industries and foreign labourers—they had improved their positions so as to leave a rich heritage to their children. The hon. gentleman also said that if his (Mr. Bergin's) statement with regard to a home market was correct, that the country surrounding Cornwall must be a poor one indeed; that any average township would produce enough to supply a town of 5,000 inhabitants. Well, he was very glad to inform the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Oliver) that Cornwall, though numbering less than 1,600 people at the establishment of the woollen mills, did now number, at least, 5,000 inhabitants. No doubt there are various agricultural products exported from Cornwall, but they were not the products of Cornwall township alone, but of portions of the counties of Glengarry and Stormont. It was not to be supposed that the town would consume the entire production of the three counties, but the statement he made was substantially correct; so correct that, in consequence of this tariff, when it was proposed the other day to establish a new industry in the town, the people of the township, through their Reeves, said they would be glad to contribute $5,000, in the shape of a bonus. In the town of Cornwall, before a stone of the woollen factory was laid, a whole block of six acres could have been bought for $600, but to-day it could not be bought for less than $6,000. The hon. gentleman said that the statements he (Mr. Bergin) had made, afforded abundant evidence that Protection was not needed by the Cornwall manufactories. If that hon. gentleman were a stockholder in those mills, he would think Protection terribly needed. And why? Because the profits of a mill must depend upon its production; and unless it can produce according to its capacity and sell that production as rapidly as it is produced, it was not possible for the stockholders to reap any profits. He had explained that owing to the market being flooded with shoddy goods their blanket industry was completely destroyed. And if they were not able last year to get off their tweeds and flannels it was because the market was flooded with English and American goods. He found, by calculation, that the quantity of woollen goods imported into this country, and which we could make ourselves with our own wool, was more than ten times in excess of the production of wool in this country. We did not grow wool enough by 75 per cent. for our needs in this country, if our mills were running at full time. This showed that there was no necessity whatever for putting a duty on wool, and he could not help thinking that the speech of the hon. gentleman upon this question was more in view of the local elections than in the interests of this country, and that he, with the other gentlemen around and behind the member for Lambton, were of opinion with that hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) that the farmers of this country were lamentably ignorant. He said the other day that "He was amazed at the lack of intelligence that led them to approve of this policy." In no other way could he (Mr. Bergin) account for their now advocating protection on wool, after three weeks opposition to protection of any article or any industry. Most of the wool brought into this country was of a fine quality not generally grown here. The six million pounds of wool the hon. gentleman said had been imported into this country last year, did not represent more than four million pounds of good wool; one-third of it, at least, was filth, and could not be used in manufacture. Farmers reaped more profit from their sheep in the way of mutton than they did in wool, and he regretted that the people of this country did not eat more mutton than they did and less pork, more fresh meat and less of salted meats. In England sheep were bred more for the mutton than for the wool. They were here, he supposed, having but one interest on both sides of the House—the public good. He did not think it spoke well for the patriotism of gentlemen opposite to be casting sneers and slurs from their side of the House to his, and to say to them that "No sane man in the country could believe in the doctrine they on the Ministerial side believed in, that their policy was tyrannical, arbitrary, idiotic and indecent." It might be that they were all insane on his side of the House, all idiotic—but it is not very Parliamentary or very generous for those gentlemen, who claim to monopolise the wisdom of the country, to say that they (the Ministerialists) were not sane, and did not know what they were talking about. At all events, they were obeying the voice of the country, and, if they were insane, so were the great mass of the people; and if the people are insane they had been rendered so by the policy of the late Finance Minister and his colleagues.

MR. GALBRAITH said the farmers of Canada ought to feel exceedingly gratified to know that their interests were so well taken care of by the doctors, lawyers, lumbermen and manufacturers. When the manufacturers held their convention in Toronto, the first resolution adopted was one in favour of the agricultural interests of Canada. They went on immediately after to provide, by other resolutions, that the greatest possible care should be taken of the respective industries they represented. They knew well that unless they could persuade the farmers that they would be protected and benefitted by a change of policy, and thereby secure their assistance, that they could not carry the elections. The principal benefits pointed out to be obtained by the farmers were, that under a new policy of Protection, and a change of Government, the manufacturing industries would become so numerous all over Canada that the people connected with them would be able to consume the entire agricultural products of the country. They were told they would have a home market, that they would be raising the cost of freight, and that the money of the country would be kept here. Well, gentlemen would shortly have an opportunity, under the policy that had been adopted by this Government, to ascertain in how far those representations were correct. They were told that it was necessary to put a stop to the slaughter of our industries by American importations. The woollen industry had little reason to make such complaints. The entire importation of American tweeds into this country, last year, did not amount to over $10,000—a very small amount indeed to come into competition with the large manufacture of those goods in Canada. He understood that the class of cloth generally worn by workingmen ranged from fourteen to sixteen ounces to the yard; and, at 7 per cent. on the yard, they could easily ascertain how much a family would require to pay extra on their woollens during the year. The hon. gentleman from Cornwall had spoken of the happy state of the farmers of Canada, previous to the establishment of the manufacturing industries, when every family did its own manufacturing. He (Mr. Galbraith) could not agree with the hon. gentleman. He could remember perfectly well the great difficulties and the hardships the early settlers had to encounter. The farmers were now in a better position than formerly, but it was greatly owing to the construction of railroads which afforded such excellent facilities of communication, and which had opened up for them an outside market for much of their surplus products. The House knew very well that the woollen industry of the country had not asked for protection against American importations, but they had asked for protection against importations from England, that country which admitted every dollar's worth that we were able to send there free to her markets. The hon. the Minister of Finance told the House that 7½c. per lb. was to be imposed on cloth, to prevent shoddy cloth from being brought in, in order to keep the workingmen of Canada from being cheated and imposed upon by a rotten worthless article. Supposing no shoddy cloth, under the new restrictions, came in from England, he (Mr. Galbraith) wanted to know what provisions the Government was going to make to protect the workingmen against the manufacture of Canadian shoddy cloth? The hon. member for North Wentworth had told the House that there was a mill in the western part of Ontario for the manufacture of shoddy and the Government might find, before the year was out, that a mill for making shoddy, to be incorporated with wool in the manufacture of cloth, would be started within the precincts of the city of Ottawa. If the workingman had to pay 7½c. extra per lb. on the cloth required by his family, as a protection against imported shoddy cloth, how was he to be protected against the Canadian-made article? Would the Government confiscate the cloth after it was made, or impose a heavy penalty upon the person who manufactured it? He thought the Government ought to see to it, in view of the taxation imposed, that a good article only was produced in Canada and sold to our people.

MR. SPROULE said that if the showing of the hon. gentleman who had just sat down was correct, there must be a duty of about 14c. a pound on wool. He thought the argument of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) regarding wool, was about as correct as that of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) in reference to freestone, who argued that, because he was not aware of the fact that there was plenty of it in the country, a duty should not be put on it; and who, even after he had been informed by several members that it could be obtained in Canada in sufficient quantities to supply the demand, still insisted that it was not necessary to protect it. The member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) thought if there was one article more another, in reference to which the Minister of Finance should redeem his pledges to the country, it was the article of wool. It did not necessarily follow that because those hon. gentlemen could scarcely see an inch beyond their noses, that the country was going to be ruined. There was brought into this country about 144,803 pairs of blankets, which required 1,000,000lb. of wool to make them; and now that those blankets, from the duty that is put on that article, were to be manufactured in the country there was evidently a duty put on the wool, because it took the wool raised in this country, instead of as formerly foreign wool, to manufacture those blankets. Then again, take carpets, into the manufacture of which wool largely entered. There were imported last year 1,145,150 yards of carpet; but now that they would be manufactured in Canada, instead of being imported, it would be a substantial duty on wool. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) appeared to forget the fact that, owing to the low rate of duty under which woollen goods could be brought into the country, almost every factory in the country was going down. A few years ago Barber's factory, near Toronto, turned out a large number of the finest blankets to be found in Canada, but that factory had long since ceased to turn out any at all. However, it was confidently expected that under the impetus that would be given to this industry, that establishment would be able to produce as many blankets as it ever did. If there had been a duty on carpets, blankets, tweeds, and all those millions of dollars' worth of woollen articles imported last year, then there must be a duty on wool.

MR. FLEMING said the argument of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) was certainly a very ingenious one, but he was afraid it would not stand any very severe test. He (Mr. Sproule) said the duty placed on the manufactured article afforded protection to the raw material of which that article was made. Suppose the duty was taken off pig iron, would the Londonderry Iron Company think they had received sufficient protection by the increased duties on articles manufactured out of iron? He thought not. Neither did he think that the increased duty on twine, for instance, gave the Canadian farmer increased protection on his wool. He could hardly restrain his feelings when he heard the hon. gentleman opposite proclaiming that they had redeemed every pledge made in the House and in the country with regard to a duty being placed upon wool. If there was any promise more emphatically made than another, during the late election, it was with regard to this duty. On almost every hustings in the country, especially in rural constituencies, the article of wool was mentioned as one on which it was most desirable to have Protection. In the campaign sheets, circulated through the country, were given a list of the various agricultural products sent from this country to the United States. Under the heading of "Canadian tariff," wool was marked free, and under the heading "American tariff," wool was marked 25 to 50 per cent. What was the object of circulating these statements, if it was not to make the people believe that they would receive protection on their wool? He (Mr. Fleming) believed that some hon. gentlemen opposite owed their return—their small majorities—to promises made to their constituents that a duty would be placed on this article. What benefit was it to the farmers that the manufacturers were sufficiently protected? What reason could hon. gentlemen bring forward in favour of increased protection to the woollen manufactures? It could not be said that that industry was in its infancy, that it was just starting into existence. But the truth was a protected industry never got beyond its childhood, if they were to judge by the appeals made for aid. It was forty-six years since Henry Clay said, in the United States, that if "manufacturers were given nine years' protection they would stand alone;" yet, to-day, if it was proposed to withdraw that protection, they would say they were going to be ruined. So it would be with all manufactures pampered and fostered by this means. Although opposed to extreme protection he was no enemy of the manufacturer. He believed they would find out that, in the long run, high duties were injurious to themselves, and that greater ultimate benefit would be enjoyed by having a fair field and no favour. He did not say that all duties should be taken off manufactured goods. So long as our revenue was derived from duties upon imports there would be protection to similar goods made in the country; but what reason had hon. gentlemen opposite to give in favour of granting to woollen manufacturers special legislation for their own particular benefit? Why should capital invested in belts and spindles be made by law to yield a larger return than the same amount of capital invested in lands and cattle? There was no doubt but the woollen manufacturers, with the moderate protection they enjoyed in the past, were making good profits. The census returns for 1870 showed that the annual value of woollen goods made in Canada, was $5,507,549. The cost of raw material was $3,217,068, the wages paid being $917,827; thus every dollar's worth of woollen goods represented 18c. for labour and 25c. for capital. When alluding, a few minutes ago, to the promises made by hon. gentlemen opposite, with regard to Protection to the wool growers of the country, he noticed that the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) was not in his seat. That gentleman had frequently spoken in the House on the subject of agricultural Protection. In 1876 he made special allusion to the wool question. It might be interesting to know what his words then were, and compare them with his conduct to-day. These words, moreover, were endorsed by the party now in power, for the speech referred to formed part of the contents of a pamphlet which was circulated throughout the whole country, so that the farmers might see that protection on wool was one of the planks of their platform. The hon. gentleman in his speech said :

"Our Ontario and Quebec farmers are wool-growers to-day, but how long will they be wool-sellers without Protection? The time is not far distant when wool from Texas, Colorado, and those immense agricultural regions, will be coming into our markets and under-selling the wool produced in Canada. It was a simple question whether our farmers were to be driven from the agricultural industry of wool raising, or whether we should adopt the policy of excluding American wools, except upon the payment of a high rate of duty. The multitudes of sheep which were now being raised upon the immense plains of Texas and Colorado would stock our mills to the exclusion of our wool, unless they were hindered. It was calculated that wool could be produced there at the rate of 10c to 12½c. per pound. With the advantage of these immense feeding grounds, where there was ample pasturage, and a climate of such a character that sheep required no shelter, how long could we compete with Western wool. If it was not to-day, it would only be a year or two, when, if our farmers wanted the benefit of selling their own wool in their own markets, we must make our American friends pay tribute on all that they send to our markets."

These were the statements made by the hon. member for Stanstead in 1876, yet we find him voting for a tariff in which wool is admitted free of duty. As a considerable amount of latitude had been given to members during the debate, he would avail himself of the privilege by calling the attention of the hon. the Minister of Public Works to a statement he made the other evening during the discussion of the coal duty. The hon. Minister said, "During the year when the duty of 50c. a ton was imposed on coal the price throughout the Province of Quebec and at Montreal was less than at any previous time," leading one to infer that the duty had no effect in raising the price. He would like the hon. gentleman to reconcile his statement with the fact that in the nine months of 1870, in which the duty was in force, there were imported into the Province of Quebec 187,000 tons of coal, on which was paid a duty of $93,350. Perhaps the Minister would say this duty was paid by the Americans or the people of Great Britain. Well, if this was the case, he (Mr. Fleming) would like to know what protection the coal owner of Nova Scotia received from the duty? Notwithstanding the statement of the hon. Minister, he was rather inclined to think the purchaser of the coal paid the duty; and in order to show that he had good grounds for that belief, he would make reference to the Journals for 1871. On the 6th of March of that year, there was received by the House a petition from the Montreal Board of Trade, praying for the repeal of the duty upon flour, coal and salt. In the list of names composing the council of that body, that of M. P. Ryan appeared, who, he presumed, was the hon. member for Montreal Centre. The petition went on to say that, "In northern climates fuel of all kinds should be cheap, and that the tax of 30c. levied on coal tended to the injury of the manufacturing interests, while it became a hardship to the poorer classes." How could it become a hardship to the poorer classes, if the price was not increased? He found, on March 8th, the Quebec Board of Trade had petitioned the House also, praying for the repeal of the duty. They said "The coal tax was unwise, unnecessary, and injurious in every respect to the Province of Quebec." How could the duty be injurious to the Province, when the price was less than at any previous time? He would like the hon. gentleman to reconcile his statement with the facts which had been submitted.

MR. HAGGART said he desired to briefly reply to the remarks made by the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Galbraith). The manufacture of woollen goods was very largely conducted in both the Riding which he had the honour of representing and in the Riding which the hon. gentleman had the honour of representing. No gentleman in the House ought to be more qualified to speak upon the subject than the hon. member for North Lanark. The kind of wool they raised did not enter at all into the manufacture of woollen goods in our country. It was called long combing wool, and it was principally bought up by Americans, who exported it into the United States, paying a 30 per cent. duty. The Americans paid a higher price for that wool than was paid for the wool imported from South Africa. The wool they raised was chiefly used in the manufacture of carpets, merino, and women's wear. This tariff put a Protective duty on such kinds of goods of 10c. per square yard, and 20 per cent. ad valorem. This was a direct encouragement to the manufacture of this kind of goods in this country. The Government, by this tariff, offered an inducement to parties to start the manufacture of these goods in Canada. As to the argument of his hon. friend that the poor man would have to pay an enhanced price for his goods, their answer was that the goods would be manufactured in the country, and that, consequently, the price would not be increased one cent per yard. This tariff was framed with a view to so prevent the importation of the rotten goods which in the past had entered into competition with the better class of goods manufactured in Canada. His hon. friend asked what was to prevent parties from starting manufactories for the manufacture of shoddy goods in the country. He (Mr. Haggart) in response to that question had to say that that had been tried over and over again. Whenever a manufacturer in Canada put shoddy into his goods, the purchaser in Montreal found it out. He might carry on his business for five or six months at a profit, but in the end he was obliged to close it up. Not so with the English manufacturer. He could send that kind of goods into the Canadian market continuously by changing the name. There was no industry in Canada that would be more benefitted by the tariff introduced by his hon. friend the Minister of Finance than this one. The price would not be increased to the consumer, but they would get a better class of goods.

MR. SCRIVER said the county which he represented was mainly a dairy county. The people were also engaged largely in the sheep industry. Many of them had imported sheep from the Old Country, had improved the breed, and made the industry a very successful one. During his canvass in the previous election, he met with a great many agriculturists, and he naturally discussed the issues of the day with them. He found that many of them had been led away by the ad captandum cry raised by hon. gentlemen opposite, that because the Americans taxed our products very heavily, it was but reasonable that we should tax theirs to the same extent. His constituents, however, were intelligent enough to see that it would be impossible to do them any great good by protecting their dairy products. They knew very well that we had a duty of 4c. per pound on butter, and 3c. a pound on cheese, and that they were not benefitted at all by that duty. And so in regard to their cattle and their corn; they were intelligent enough to understand that no duty imposed on corn would be likely to benefit them. But those persons did anticipate, and they asserted to him, that they were warranted in anticipating, by the assertions made by leading Protectionists—notably, his hon. friend from Stanstead—that a duty would be imposed on wool. He (Mr. Scriver) had not heard from them since this tariff had been discussed, but he was quite satisfied that those persons to whom he alluded would be seriously disappointed to learn that this tariff had become law, and that no provision had been made for imposing a duty on wool.

MR. DUBUC said that he rose at a very advanced stage of the discussion, and that he did not intend to speak on the item now under consideration. As he had already been called upon to vote several times since the new tariff had been brought down, in the first place upon the tariff as a whole, and later, on several items, he thought that he should not allow the debate to close without offering a few remarks in order to explain his votes. He would occupy the attention of the House for a few moments only. The Province of Manitoba, of which he was one of the representatives, would be considerably affected by the new tariff. It was a young Province, possessing no manufactures, its industries were still in their infancy, it imported nearly everything, and exported but very little. The new tariff would materially raise the price of imported goods, and might be considered as unfavourable to his Province. That was a point that he could not hide from himself. On the other hand, he was of opinion that the National Policy inaugurated by the hon. the Minister of Finance would have a satisfactory result in other parts of the Dominion. Without hoping that it would bring immediate wealth to every home, he had reason to believe that it would help to lessen the crisis that was now making itself felt, and to bring back that prosperity that everyone longed for. He had, therefore, found himself in a rather difficult position. Looking at the general interests of the Dominion, he was obliged to vote for the resolutions; from the standpoint of what might seem to be the immediate interest of Manitoba his vote should have been cast the other way. He was, therefore, obliged to decide what stand he would take upon this important question. It was true that he was a representative of Manitoba, and as such he was specially entrusted with the care of watching over the interests of that Province. But he should not forget that he was, at the same time, a citizen of Canada. He was a member of the Federal Parliament, and this Parliament was entrusted with the care of legislating for the whole Dominion. Anything that concerned the general welfare, could not be indifferent to him. By opposing this measure, which he sincerely believed to be in the well understood interests of the country at large, because it might affect, in a rather unfavourable manner, the immediate interests of Manitoba, he would be exhibiting a narrow spirit of selfishness and exclusiveness that was not congenial to his tastes. He had been an eye-witness to the stagnation of business, to the terrible effects of the crisis through which the country was passing, to the want that was making itself felt, in a woeful manner, in all the great centres of population, and it would be ungenerous for him to say: Let this state of things go on, let want continue, let the people of Canada continue to suffer, provided the population of Manitoba be not affected. No, he would look upon the question from a broader, a higher standpoint, and he believed that he had several good reasons that would justify his way of thinking and acting. In the first place, Manitoba would not be affected by the new tariff, in such a disadvantageous and prejudicial manner as might be supposed. The people of that Province would have to pay a little dearer for the articles they imported, but the duty on wheat was in their favour, and protected them. They produced great quantities of wheat and the protection granted to this grain would permit them to compete with the Western States, at least in the Canadian market. Therein they would find a consumption for the increase of the price of other articles; and this compensation would encourage agriculture which was the principle and the most sure of all the industries that ought to be developed in a country like Canada. Again, if the National Policy, by protecting the industries of the country, by encouraging agriculture, had the effect of bringing back a little more wealth and prosperity, this prosperity would naturally extend to Manitoba. If wealth was seen coming back to the other Provinces capital would soon find its way to Manitoba, where industries of every kind might be started, where it was known that there existed immense resources waiting only for a little capital in order to enrich those who would work them, and at the same time enrich the country; and, when this new policy would leave no deficits in the Treasury, Manitoba could obtain more freely from the Federal Government grants for the great public improvements so necessary in a new country. But especially when the people of Manitoba could point out to the Government the considerable amounts that the Customs Department would collect in the Province under the new tariff, they would then have the right to demand an increase in the subsidy, which would enable them to carry out the great public works, the need of which was so seriously felt from one end of the Province to the other. And in that way the interests of Manitoba would be served better than by continuing the old tariff and the small subsidy that was now granted, and which was inadequate to meet the new requirements created by the continual increase in the population. Now the Protection granted to the national industries would also have the effect of encouraging the establishment of manufactories in the Province of Manitoba; the people of this Province would be able to keep and spend among themselves the enormous sums that they sent abroad every year for goods that they could manufacture themselves. The settlers, both old and new, would have the benefit of it. Another reason that induced him to support the policy brought down by the hon. the Minister of Finance was the stand the Government had taken with regard to the line of the Pacific Railway in the Province of Manitoba. The route adopted by the late Government passed to the north of Lake Manitoba, across a hundred miles of marshy plains quite unfit for cultivation. The people of Manitoba had made many representations on this subject, but these petitions had been laid aside, their just requests had received no consideration, and it had been good news for Manitoba when the hon. the Minister of Public Works had stated the other day that the Government had decided on building the principal line of the Pacific Railway to the south of Lake Manitoba, and through a fine agricultural region already filled with industrious and well-to-do farmers. This would be an advantage for the railway itself and for the population inhabiting that part of the country. This reason, if there were no others, would be sufficient to induce the inhabitants of Manitoba to accept the new policy without murmuring. The last reason which induced him to support a Protectionist policy was the following, and it was not the least. He asked himself what he would gain for his Province, under the circumstances, by voting against the new policy? Would his vote have any effect? Would it affect in any way the result that was to be obtained? He was quite convinced that it would not, even should he possess the eloquence of the greatest speakers, and should he use his utmost endeavours to prevent the adoption of the National Policy, his voice and his vote would change nothing. And this was not to be wondered at, after the verdict rendered by the people on the 17th of September last; it was not astonishing if hon. members were not disposed to ignore the wishes of their electors, and the interest of their respective constituencies, in order to be particularly agreeable to Manitoba. He knew that, and he did not feel disposed to uselessly come in contact with an impossibility. But it might be said that he was entrusted with the interests of Manitoba, and, even though he had no hope of succeeding, it would be agreeable to his electors for him to vote according to their wishes. He was aware that this reason carried some weight with it. He knew that a member was not to ignore the wishes of those he represented. But he counted on their intelligence, on their characteristic good sense, to make them understand that, under the circumstances, he had not betrayed their interests by voting in favour of the National Policy. To accept with good grace, what could not be prevented was a just principle, and one that was always timely. He was convinced that his electors would approve of his voting according to his convictions, in favour of the well understood industries of the country, rather than to endeavour to please them only by taking a step that was absolutely useless, and without any chance of success. By voting against this tariff his only object would be to throw dust in their eyes, to use a common expression, and on such an important question he did not think that he ought to have recourse to such petty means in order to make himself popular. For these different reasons he had not hesitated, and he did not now hesitate, to cast his vote in favour of the National Policy.

MR. CHRISTIE said he only desired to detain the House for a very few moments, as the items now under consideration were of special interest to the farmers of his constituency. They depended largely upon stock and dairy farming, and the raising of sheep, for which the county was specially adapted. Now, wool was one of the few articles which appeared to enter into competition with their farm products; indeed, the only article which they imported largely (excepting wheat and corn) were wool, hides and pork. He found that last year they imported into the Province of Quebec wool to the value of $570,533, and $588,733 worth of hides and pelts, and of pork $161,869 worth, while they exported very little. And, strange to say, wool and hides were admitted free, and pork was only 1c. per pound, almost the same duty as before. Now, before the elections, they were told that their markets were glutted with American products, such as butter, cheese, pork, wool, etc., and that that was the cause of the low prices from which the country was suffering, and that if there was a change of Government and a Protective tariff, these articles would be excluded, and they would get better prices for everything which they had to sell. But these promises had not been fulfilled. The delusive hopes and expectations which were exacted, had not, and could not be, realised. The articles which really competed with our products had virtually no more protection than before. It was true we had nominally got an additional duty of 10 per cent. upon live stock, but that duty was more ornamental than useful, and was virtually of little or no benefit, for the simple reason that our imports of live stock were so limited. The Trade and Navigation Returns for last year, for the Province of Quebec, showed that for every horned animal which was imported, they exported about fifty; and for every horse imported they exported about sixty; and for every sheep imported, they exported upwards of 2,000. Now, what could Protection do for them; it was a perfect delusion. If all the live stock which they imported from Great Britain and the United States were excluded, the whole value would not amount to one cent per capita of our population. But it was quite the reverse with wool, pork and hides. Now, if we were bound to adopt a Protective policy, he thought it would be wiser to impose duties on such articles as were imported largely and came into competition with our own products, rather than upon those which were only imported to a very limited extent, and from which we derived no appreciable benefit.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said hon. gentlemen must see that the claim made that this tariff was framed more in the interests of England than the United States, was utterly groundless. The Trade and Navigation Returns showed that on the article of woollens, $172,000 worth were imported last year from England, and $28,000 worth from the United States. In carpets, the imports from England were $651,000, and from the United States, $15,000; in flannels, the imports from England $261,000, and $68,000 from the United States; in tweeds, $933,000 from England, and $10,000 from the United States. On all these articles greatly increased duty had been put, which would, therefore, operate heavily against Great Britain. But when we came to look at the article of wool, we found their policy entirely reversed, for while we imported 235,212 lb. of wool from Great Britain, we imported 5,688,422 lb. from the United States. But on that article, imported in such excess from the United States, there was no duty whatever. It was not necessary again to remind gentlemen opposite of what their ante-election promises were, with reference to this article of wool. They were conscious that one of the means by which they secured their election in September, was the unconditional promise that a duty should be placed on foreign wools coming into this country. They told their constituents in the rural parts that they did not produce as much wool as the country required, that a duty on foreign wool would enhance its price, and they (the candidates) would support no Government that would not do the farmers justice in this respect. Yet these gentlemen, by their mouthpiece, the member for East Grey, had declared that the farmers were looked after, and were satisfied, though no duty was placed on wool. That is the way those gentlemen treated the pledges they gave to the electors, and no wonder they manifested symptoms of impatience when they were reminded of these things. The hon. gentleman from Cornwall said the remarks of the hon. member for North Oxford were made more with a view to influence the coming Ontario elections than to accomplish good in this House. He (Mr. Paterson) supposed the hon. gentleman from North Oxford was conscious that nothing that could be urged from this side of the House would have any influence so far as the formation of this tariff was concerned, but he was conscious of the fact that it would at any rate not do the cause of good government in Ontario any harm to point out to the people that the men of a certain political stripe had sought their suffrages and obtained them under false pretences. As those elections approached, hon. gentlemen were becoming sensitive, for if they succeeded in carrying a majority of 30 in Ontario, they might reasonably claim that the National Policy had fulfilled the expectations of the people, but if they failed to carry that majority, then it would be seen that the people pronounced against them. If this tariff had fulfilled all the pledges of hon. gentlemen, if it was all the country had asked for, then the more prominently it was brought before the electors of Ontario the better it would be for the cause of those gentlemen in the local strife. Hon. gentlemen said there was necessity for a duty on wool. The hon. gentleman from North Brant read the utterances of one of the ablest, if not the very ablest, of the advocates of Protection on the other side of the House, the hon. member for Stanstead, in his speech of 1876. They, the then Opposition, now the Government party, admired that speech, and hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House cheered it to the echo—and their cheers could almost be heard still lingering in this hall—as he spoke on the wool industry, and pointed out that it could not be ruined without Protection. Another Government has succeeded the last one, pledging itself to do this, yet hon. gentlemen sat there with their mouths shut, recreant to the promises they made, and would fain drown the voice of one who recalled to the memory of the country the promises they made only to break them.

MR. POPE (Compton) said the hon. gentleman who had just taken his seat need not think he could terrify the members of this House by his furious declamation, nor think to deceive the people of the country as to their true interests. The farmers of the country fully understood their position. They all understood that by the tariff brought down by the hon. the Finance Minister they had got Protection on wool. Goods into which coarse wool entered, such wool as was generally grown in this country, had all received Protection. Much of the imported cloth sold as woollen goods was shoddy, containing very little wool, thus reducing the demand for our wool, so that by this tariff what went into the products of coarse wool had got a very large protection. In those returns the hon. gentleman would find that a large amount of wool manufactured in this country was brought from the Cape, Australia, South America and Brazil, and that it was necessary it should come in free if they were to have cheap goods, and these fine wools did not come into competition with those produced here. All our coarse wool would enter into the manufacture of blankets and other cheap goods, for which prices quite satisfactory would be given to the farmers. The hon. member for Brant was trying to draw the wool over the farmers' eyes, but would not be successful. He (Mr. Pope) understood something of the woollen business, and was sure the farmer would get very much higher prices, through this tariff, for wool than for many years before. It would give the poor people a cheaper article, and a better, than hitherto, as it would keep the shoddy out of the country, which had more show than wear, besides effecting other improvements. The manufacturers would be able to give the farmer a better market for his produce, while finding themselves a larger demand for their commodities. They had been getting goods of the worst materials, which they were attempting, and he believed successfully, to replace by a cheaper and superior home-made article. The very object and genius of the tariff was this: the protection of goods made of wool, and a better market for the farmers' wool. What about those other things of which they had heard so much—cattle, wheat and flour? His hon. friend opposite (Mr. Paterson), knew the tariff would not raise the price of flour—that we always raised wheat enough for our wants, and more. It was foolish then to talk about a rise in the price of such articles. But the Canadian produce would be protected against the United States farmer deranging the market. Only a few days ago oats had been taken from Quebec to Ontario, and readily sold, and within a few days, in Quebec, they had risen 7c. to 8c. per bushel—an hon. friend beside him said 8c.

MR. CHARLTON: Do oats not generally rise at this season?

MR. POPE said they did when there was a scarcity, but he only knew of one previous instance of their ever sending oats from Quebec to Ontario. They had never told the people that it was not possible that they might not on some things have to pay for a short time increased prices. What they had said was this: that they would protect goods that could be produced here, after a little fostering, as cheaply as anywhere; that competition would supply them to the farmer and everybody as cheaply as now, and that goods they could not produce in this country cheaply would be subjected to a revenue tariff. He did not exactly agree with the Finance Minister, that they would be obliged to raise $2,000,000 more by taxation. He believed that under this tariff the prosperity of the country would be such as to afford the required revenue without an increased tariff. He believed, however, it was necessary to prepare for that contingency,—but that before twelve months they would be able to reduce taxation to the original rates. The farmers of the country were not so blind as hon. gentlemen opposite thought, for they knew that their prosperity depended upon that of the whole country, and they were as willing as any class to bear their fair share of the burdens of the community. Every syllable that fell from the lips of the hon. gentlemen opposite, on this question, was the merest clap-trap. He told them that these speeches were made for the electors in Ontario. Were they to have this kind of discussion continued after its having lasted for a fortnight? Were they to have a repetition of such speeches and a repetition of the arguments on Free-trade and Protection on every item? On this tariff, Free-trade and Protection had been discussed half-a-dozen times. No hon. gentleman opposite rose without discussing it fully over again. He was not afraid of what the farmers would think of the tariff, but must say those discussions sadly wasted time. But in view of the Ontario and Quebec elections—in view of the desire of hon. gentlemen opposite to influence the people of this country—he did not care if they stopped here for the next few months, feeling satisfied that every word they uttered told against themselves. If they, on this side, looked at the matter in the same way as the hon. gentlemen opposite, with reference to those elections, he would say that the best thing they could do would be to keep those gentlemen here for the next two months.

MR. CASEY said that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture had complained of the waste of time in this discussion, and stated that members on his (Mr. Casey's) side had spoken with a view to the Ontario elections, and that every word they said would tell against themselves. If so, the hon. gentleman could wish nothing better than that they should spout here to all eternity. But if, on the other hand, as he (Mr. Casey) really thought was the case, that hon. gentleman felt annoyed at the close examination of the tariff, and exposure of its numerous errors to the House and the electors of Ontario, it was natural he should feel sore and object to further discussion. But they had had proof to-night that, despite the frequent discussion of the subject, it was not yet threadbare. At this late stage not only had something new come up, but a new rule for taxation, a theory the first time advanced in his hearing by the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and adopted by the Government through its mouth-piece, the Minister of Agriculture. It was that, if they imposed a duty on a plough, or other such implement, they gave protection to the manufacture of pig iron, or the raw material. He was sure that, if anything was required to satisfy the farmers of Ontario that their interests were not in safe hands in regard to the present tariff, it was the assurance that the raw material was protected by the imposition of duties on articles manufactured from it. But this theory would be even less satisfactory to a great many of the manufacturers. The makers of agricultural implements, and everything into which iron entered might say to the Government: "Why did you propose a duty on our raw material? Also on certain kinds of imported timber, on wood-screws, and other articles which are raw materials for certain industries?" The Minister of Agriculture had stated that the protection of the manufactured article secured the protection of the raw material also. Why, therefore, had the Government subjected that material to protection? If they conciliated the farmers in this matter, they would array against them all the manufacturers whose raw material had been unnecessarily taxed, if this theory were true. He thought it was a matter of very serious importance that a theory of that kind should be seriously promulgated by a member of the Government. It required no discussion to show its hollowness. Hon. gentlemen opposite had said as regarded wool, that it had been left on the free list because it had to be got from the Cape and other distant countries, and was the raw material of certain manufactures. This rule would apply, however, to all raw materials, including pig iron; and, if they were protected, the farmer had a right to demand that the raw materials which he produced should be protected. The Minister of Agriculture said, although only Cape or foreign wool would be used in certain manufactures here, by some mysterious process a better market would be created for Canadian wool; that manufacturers that did not use Canadian wools would create a market for it, with a result of cheaper goods than before. That, therefore, too, only required to be stated to be discarded. With regard to the rise in the price of oats, it was always witnessed in spring. The hon. gentleman might as well take credit for a good crop next fall as for that improvement. With regard to wool, he wished to discuss the question whether it was possible to protect the farmer in the item of wool, or whether the increase of the woollen manufacture would assist him. It was stated by his hon. friend that, when the woollen manufacturers got to work, they would use five pounds of wool for every pound that could be raised in Canada. If that was the case foreign wool must be still imported, and would compete with Canadian, when it would be possible to raise the price of it by a duty on the foreign article. If this manufacture would lead to the increased use of Canadian wool, it would be possible to protect the Canadian farmer. But if the manufacturer would only use certain grades of short wool, the Canadian farmer could not be protected till he grew that kind. Possibly it would pay him to grow short wool, if he received a certain amount of protection. But another thing was possible, that under an enormously increased protection to woollen goods, manufactories would be started for goods that required our combing wools. Indeed, it was promised that such would be started. Hon. gentlemen opposite had made statements before the electors, with regard to what would be done for the protection of wool and the woollen trade, which, though successful in gaining them many votes, had been falsified during the discussion in this House, in which it had been asserted that no amount of protection would lead to the use of long combing wool. They were thus placed in a regular dilemma. Only two things were possible: either the farmers could be protected on wool, and, in that case, it was a great shame to leave it on the free list; or, on the other hand, if he could not be protected, it was quite certain that Ministers obtained their places under false pretences. Everybody knew that one of the chief cries to obtain the support of the farmers of Ontario was protection on wool. If it was possible, Ministers should have given it; if impossible, they were convicted out of their own mouths of having falsified the actual facts before the electors. Our combing wools had hitherto found a market on the other side. It was not at all improbable, however, that that market would be played out before long, to use an American expression. In fact, late events had shown that it probably was. Late in the season last year, fortunately for the present members of the Government, the price of combing wool, fell from 25c. to 20c. per pound. This was explained by those hon. gentlemen as being the consequence of the free admission of wool; it was explained by the Liberals as the consequence of surplus production in the United States, or stoppage of manufacturing, or both. We could no longer depend confidently on a good market in the United States for our combing wool. He must, in this connection, quote from a speech delivered in 1876 by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), one of the most convinced, honest, and logical Protectionists in this House, if not the most, and which had been used as a campaign document:

"With the advantage of these immense feeding grounds, where there was ample pasturage, and a climate of such a character that sheep required no shelter, how long could we compete with Western wool? If it was not to-day, it would be only a year or two years, when, if our farmers wanted the benefit of selling their own wool in their own markets, we must make our American friends pay tribute on all that they send to those markets. Some hon. gentlemen, on speaking of the wool trade of the past, said that low prices would not affect us at all, as our long combing wools were a specialty; but he begged to assure his hon. friends from Ontario that the Ontario long wool business was a matter of short duration, for to his knowledge that was a thing that was as well understood on the other side of the line as it was here to-day, and there were sections on the American side where they were going very largely into this wool raising. This business would increase so that in two or three years further the Americans would not take wool from Canada on the terms of paying a high duty on it. The Americans were a shrewd, observant people, and when they saw that a certain class of wool was required by the manufacturers in that country, they were quick enough to perceive that there was no natural obstacle in the way of the raising of that product in the Northern States, and that it was better to raise wool that would fetch 50c. per lb. than wool that would only bring 25c. per lb. They were now paying attention to the breeding of Cotswolds, Leicesters and long-wooled sheep in the United States, for the purpose of preventing the Ontario wool-grower from coming into their markets with their combing wools."

Now this was a clear, and, he might say, a beautiful presentation of the case which was made by those hon. gentlemen, and on it the votes of numbers of wool-growers were obtained. The idea presented was that our market in the States would in future be filled by the Americans themselves, and that it was an absolute necessity for us to arrange the duties as to secure a home market for ourselves. This was not being done, and the excuse given was that by putting a duty on woollen goods they protected the wool grower. The farmers of Canada, like those of the United States, were shrewd, observant people. They would look to their parallel case, they would see it was not looked upon as Protection in any other case, except where the farmer was concerned, and they would believe that the farmer had been systematically disregarded in the formation of this tariff.

MR. BUNSTER said he was astonished at the opposition to the Government for allowing wool to come in free. It was well known that we did not raise sufficient wool at present to accommodate manufacturers, and when we did, he was satisfied the Government would see the necessity of imposing a duty on wool. In British Columbia there were no woollen manufactories, and he did not believe they would ever have any if the Government were to impose a duty on wool, but having imposed a duty on woollen goods, they were certain woollen manufactories. Hence, instead of taking into consideration the interests of the people, the Opposition, in asking for a tax on wool, were looking only to the coming local elections in Ontario. There could be no doubt in the minds of any sincere man that allowing wool in free of duty would encourage the manufacture of woollen yarns.

MR. ORTON said he had entertained the hope that the Government would have seen the necessity of placing a duty on wool, so much so that he waited on the hon. the Finance Minister to try and impress upon him the necessity of a small duty being levied on wool. He (Mr. Orton) had never advocated a heavy duty on foreign wool, but the explanation the Finance Minister gave him satisfied him to very large extent, that he, the Finance Minister, had earnestly endeavoured to benefit the farmers as far as possible in framing this tariff. With regard to wool, the hon. gentleman showed very clearly that the Protection afforded certain classes of woollen manufactures would cause very rapid increase in the price of wool in this country, and he felt convinced the farmers would find they had ample Protection on their wool. The hon. the Finance Minister also stated that should it be found, in the future, that the farmers had not ample Protection for their wool in this tariff, the Government would deem it their duty to impose a duty on wool. In the meantime, if a duty were placed, it would have an injurious effect on woollen manufactures. He was rather astonished to hear hon. gentlemen opposite complain that a duty had not been placed on wool. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) had, on former occasions, stated in this House, that no benefit could be derived from any duty on foreign wool, and argued that it would have a very damaging effect on woollen manufactures. Year after year hon. members opposite, in this House, and outside, argued that the only way to increase the price of wool in this country was to encourage woollen manufactures, and that would be done by admitting wool free. In 1876, the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) stated, in reply to the hon. member for Stanstead :

"That the latter urged that a duty be placed on wool, but this would be a direct tax on the people. The quality we required for manufacture was very different from that which we raised; the latter was long and fine, used in the New England States, and the former was short."

He must congratulate his hon. friend upon the fact of his having, at last, become converted to the idea that Protection could benefit the farmers of this country, and welcomed the hon. member as one who would, in the future, assist members on this side of the House in advocating the true interests of the farmers. Not only the hon. member for North Oxford, but the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and other prominent gentlemen opposite, over and over again, reiterated the fact that it would be a very ruinous policy to impose a duty on wool, and, therefore, when we found them now getting up in this House, and asserting that the Government was doing wrong in not putting a duty on wool, we must feel that they were very inconsistent, and were merely time servers. He (Mr. Orton) believed still it would become necessary, at some future time, to impose a duty on wool. We could raise in this country a certain amount of the kind of wool that we imported from foreign countries. There was one class of sheep, the Southdown, which we could raise profitably. He had not the slightest doubt that the tariff, as now arranged, would have the effect of increasing the prices of all classes of wool, and even the Southdown sheep would become more valuable, and be raised in larger numbers than at present. The flesh of the Southdown sheep was much more valuable than that of the other descriptions, and as the attention of our farmers was directed to a large extent just now, to supplying the British market with meatstuffs, the Government should encourage the production of Southdowns in Canada. There was another fact we must consider in framing the tariff, as the hon. the Finance Minister had stated over again, it was that it was absolutely necessary there should be a little give and take amongst the various classes in our community. It was only by that means a tariff could be arrived at which would do justice to all classes; and if the farmers felt they had not got full justice in reference to this woollen matter, they must remember that they had a very large protection on their other products; on cereals the benefit would be immense, also the increased duty on animals. He had not the slightest doubt that the effect of this tariff would be an increased revenue to every farmer in the country, and in Ontario, with a farm of one hundred acres, well improved, of at least from $50 to $100 per year. The farmers would recollect well that every attempt to obtain Protection in this House in their interest was repelled by hon. gentlemen opposite, who, over and over again, stated that the Government could not possibly do anything to benefit them, that they were "flies on the wheel." Hon. gentlemen opposite had also stated that the duty on oats would have no effect. There was not a section of the country in which oats had not risen in price since that duty was imposed, and the effect would be that, instead of importing oats from the United States, the people of Ontario would import larger quantities of oats from Lower Canada. He remembered that, some years ago, even in his own village, they used to import large quantities from Lower Canada for the manufacture of oatmeal; and he understood that lumbermen were importing large quantities from Quebec at the present time, since the duty was imposed. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) stated that there was a possibility that the United States farmers would be able to supply that market with all the long combing wool they required. That was a very singular argument to come from the hon. member's side of the House, who did not believe in Protection, because, if it meant anything, it must prove that it was very important indeed that every effort should be used to create a home market for our wool, and he (Mr. Orton) thought the present tariff would have that effect. There was one fact to which he would refer, a mistake in the Trade and Navigation Returns, according to which we were supposed to import from the United States 5,600,000lb. of wool. If he was properly informed, the largest part of that came from the Cape and Australia, and should be entered as wool coming from those countries. This tariff, he believed, would give entire satisfaction to the farmers of this country, and they would, for a long time to come, gratefully remember the efforts made by the Government in their behalf.

MR. BOULTBEE said this question had been dwelt on at great length by the various speakers who had discussed it, some of them going so far as to take in butter in its consideration, others diverging into the questions of iron and coal; but it was remarkable, as far as every speaker from the Opposition was concerned, that they all claimed that, more or less, during the late contest, a proposition was formulated that a duty should be imposed on wool. He (Mr. Boulton) did not recollect this to have been the case, and he had something to do with various elections besides his own. The general proposition involved in the policy formulated by the then Opposition, was that there should be a Protection to Canadian industries, such as the best wisdom of the best statesmen, who might have to deal with the question, could manage to bring about. It was a remarkable feature in this discussion, that not one of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who condemned the Government for not putting a duty on wool, said there ought to be a duty imposed on it. Not one of them stated that any loss was going to ensue through a duty not being put on wool. But they only set up the theory that that proposition was put forward by their opponents in the late election, and then proceeded to say a duty should be imposed. One of their speakers, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Oliver) said he did not want any duty on wool. Surely they were not so unpatriotic as to want an evil duty imposed merely because it was promised by their opponents in the late election contest. The wool from the United States did not come into competition with the class of wool raised in Canada, and it would be a disadvantage to the country generally, and the encouragement of home manufactures, to impose a duty on wool. It was but right that they should import, as freely as possible, the wool that could not be produced in the Dominion. Almost every hon. gentleman who had spoken on this subject had told the House what a set of fools the Canadian farmers were, in having placed power in the hands of Conservatives again. That, in their eyes, had been the one great fault of the Canadian farmer. But hon. gentlemen now said they looked forward to a different result in the elections of the future. That was the first remark that had been made on the Opposition side of the House, to the effect that the Canadian farmer was a shrewd man. He (Mr. Boulton) thought the Canadian farmers were shrewd and intelligent men, at least they were so in his constituency. Perhaps in other ridings, where gentlemen opposite came from, they were not so shrewd and intelligent, but perhaps during the period between now and the next election they might become further enlightened. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) had clearly indicated that the next Local elections were to be fought on the question of a Protective policy—that the issue before the country in the late election was to be made the cause of political warfare in the next Local election. It was not proper, perhaps, that this issue should come up in the Local election, and yet it was important that they should not shut their eyes to the fact that it added a good deal to the power of the Dominion Government to be in accord with the Local Governments.

They could not expect to carry out their measures with as much satisfaction to the people if they were on hostile terms with the Local Governments, particularly the Government of the strong Province of Ontario, as they could if in accord with those Governments. So it would be for the people of Ontario, at the coming election, to say whether or not the National Policy, after a trial, met with their approbation. He would say, in spite of the assertions of hon. gentlemen opposite, that this tariff was not going to bring misery on the country. Even at this moment, a better state of things obtained in the Dominion. He spoke of his own personal knowledge. He had been in some of the cities, towns and villages of Ontario lately, and it was a remarkable fact that this tariff was received everywhere throughout that Province with perfect satisfaction. The tariff was not much discussed, probably because the people were satisfied that a better state of things was to be brought about by it. The people of the Province of Prince Edward Island had, in their late election, given evidence that they took the same view. It was the people of Canada themselves who demanded protection to Canadian industries, which they saw were going to rack and ruin, and who, determining to have some redress, brought about the remarkable result that took place in the recent election, and the expectations of the people has been fully realised in the tariff which had been submitted by the hon. the Finance Minister.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. gentleman had better inform the House, in detail, what his computations were of the revenue to be received, and how much goods, particularly under this item, he thought it was likely would be manufactured in this country.

MR. TILLEY said the whole imports of woollen goods of every description last year amounted to a little over $8,000,000. There was imported $1,700,000 worth of blankets from Great Britain, $1,162,659 worth from the United States. After a careful examination it was assumed that when the Canadian industries were fairly in operation, they would be able to produce, under this tariff, something like $1,500,000 to $2,000,000 worth of the goods imported last year, particularly of the coarser class of woollen goods, such as blankets, etc. If the reduction of imports should reach $1,500,000, there would probably be from $150,000 to $180,000 additional revenue, possibly $200,000; but the hon. gentleman would see that that would very much depend upon the increased production of these goods during the next twelve months. If the result expected by the Government were produced, employment would be given our people, machinery and capital, and a better article would be produced, and if the article were not produced to the extent expected there would be an additional revenue, which would go towards making up the deficiency that must be raised. He knew that gentlemen opposite had stated that the tariff would increase the prices of everything; but he had evidence that the prices were the same now as before the tariff came down. Mr. Rosamond, of Almonte, whose mill was a credit to him, and, no doubt, an advantage to the portion of the country in which it was situated, telegraphed him some weeks after the tariff was brought down, that he made no advance in his prices, so that he did not anticipate a rise of prices under the tariff.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he doubted whether the evidence of Mr. Rosamond, or any other gentleman deeply interested in getting this tariff passed was to be taken as a good authority. With respect to this particular duty, although he did not think it was worth while going over it in great detail, it was quite clear that they were about to put an enormous additional tax on somebody for the purpose of getting $1,500,000 goods manufactured here. There were three vices inherent to this tariff, all of which were most marked in regard to these particular articles. In the first place, this tax would discriminate heavily against the poorest class of persons. In the next place, as our trade returns showed, and as pointed out by the hon. member for South Brant, it was perfectly clear this would discriminate most heavily against the English importations, which constituted very nearly three or four times as much as our importations from the United States, and, in the last place, it was perfectly clear they would throw away a large amount of revenue without getting any adequate return in the shape of employment given to persons engaged in this manufacture. Now, as regarded the extent to which this would discriminate against certain classes of goods, he found that the duty on blankets would vary from 40 to 45 per cent., an enormous rate to pay on articles of that description. In the case of certain descriptions of flannels it would vary from 40 per cent. as low as 28 per cent. In the case of certain descriptions of cloth from 41 to 29 per cent., 27 to 26 per cent., and so on all through. In the case of certain tweeds of 1s. sterling, a specific duty of 27 per cent. would be paid, wholly irrespective of the ad valorem duty, while tweeds of a high value, ranging to 4s. 6d. sterling, would only pay some 6 or 7 per cent. So it was in the case of cloths; those less than 2s. a yard paid a specific duty amounting to 20 per cent., while those of a higher value would only pay 10 or 12 per cent. As to the argument which the hon. gentleman appeared to rely most upon, that by this tax they would exclude shoddy goods from our market, he begged leave to doubt very much whether that would be the result for any length of time. He was afraid that they would find that our own manufacturers, after a short time, would begin to introduce the manufacture of shoddy goods here. He remembered that several attempts were made, even under the former moderate tariff, to introduce that description of manufacture. How short or how long a time might elapse before this was done, it was impossible to say, but the only advantage he suspected they would derive from that tariff would be that shoddy would be made in Canada instead of in Lancashire. There were two points he desired most particularly to call attention to. There was no doubt, whether the Finance Minister did or did not make the promise during the late election, that innumerable promises were made by a great number of candidates to the agricultural part of the community that they should have a tax on wool, and there was no doubt whatever that that promise had been entirely violated. As respected the advantages to be derived in the way of employment of additional hands, there was no evidence, unless they accepted the statement of the hon. the Minister of Finance that he did not expect, for a considerable time to come, that more than $2,000,000 worth or thereabouts of the $8,000,000 worth imported into this country would be manufactured under this tax. Therefore, the great advantages the agriculturists in particular were to derive from the number of persons who were to be employed in factories of various kinds was an utter and entire delusion. He had kept a careful note of everything the hon. gentleman said would be manufactured here, and it was clear, from his own computation that, at the outside, only two million dollars' worth of the goods now imported were likely to be manufactured, or expected to be manufactured, under this tariff. Now, the result was this: that the whole commercial policy of the country from the commencement to the end had been subverted, that an enormous annual loss was going to be inflicted on the people of Canada, that their taxation would be literally quadrupled, that was to say, in proportion to the amount the hon. gentleman expected to bring into the Treasury. The sole result, as far as the farmers were concerned, was that they might have the benefit of substituting a million bushels of one kind of grain for another kind, and that they might supply, with their products, at the outside, five or six thousand factory hands, or persons engaged in one occupation or another throughout Canada. In return for this, they would have to pay treble taxes for any article they were in the habit of consuming to a considerable degree. In this the last discussion they were likely to have on the details of this tariff, he would content himself with saying that he did not believe it would have been possible, by any ingenuity, to have contrived the tariff which would take more out of the pockets of the people of Canada, and put less into the Treasury, than this tariff proposed to do; or that it would have been possible to have inflicted greater burdens on all the great leading industries of this country and to have given to these industries less substantial return than the hon. gentleman had contrived to do in this tariff. If these were his objects, as it would appear they were from what they had seen here, he (Mr. Cartwright) could congratulate him on having achieved his mission well.

MR. GUTHRIE said that the hon. the Minister of Finance and many of his followers had stated that the effect of the duty on woollen goods would be to induce the manufacture of wool grown in the country, and, therefore, provide a ready market for it, at an increased price. The charge that was made by gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House was that Ministers had not fulfilled the promises they had made to the farmers of the country. The promise was not that they would give a ready market for their wool, but that they would put a duty on foreign wool. He was prepared to say that he believed, if the whole of the wool produced in this country should be called for, and some foreign wool should be required to be imported, to make up the amount required by our manufactures, an advance in the price of wool might take place to the extent that it would cost to bring wool from some other country. That was the utmost extent that the farmers of Canada could possibly be benefitted in respect of wool, by taxes on woollen goods. He understood that our long wool could be taken from Canada to Liverpool, and all charges paid, at from 1c. to 1½c. per lb. He also understood that wool could be brought from Liverpool, the great long wool market of the world, and laid down in this country, at about ½c. per lb. for freight, Western bound freight being somewhat lower than Eastern bound. Now, that being the case, and there being no duty on wool coming into Canada, no matter how much demand there might be for wool, it was impossible to get more from manufacturers, however liberal they might be, in addition to the Liverpool quotations, than ½c. per lb., the charge for bringing the wool from Liverpool. That was the full extent of the benefit the farmers would derive from these impositions on woollen goods, according to the hon. gentleman's own showing.

Item agreed to.

Resolution read the first and second times and agreed to.

On Resolution 12, item—Until the 1st day of January, 1881, steel in ingots, bars, sheets and coils, railway bars or rails and fish-plates, shall be free of duty,

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he would like the hon. gentleman to explain why that limitation was made.

MR. TILLEY said it was considered desirable to leave it in that form. There was a proposition to establish a steel manufactory in the country, and it was left in that manner; and it was left as a declaration of the policy of the Government, if the manufacture was undertaken in the meantime.

Item agreed to.

Resolution read the first and second times and agreed to.

Resolution 13 read the first and second times and agreed to.

On Resolution 14,

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he did not rise to object to this resolution, but for the purpose of remarking, that he was very much afraid that the hon. Minister of Finance, in imposing this duty, had overlooked the risk of increasing illicit distillation, which notably prevailed in certain parts of the country. They had been attacked by the hon. the Minister of Public Works for increasing the duty in 1874, by some 12c. per gallon. That hon. gentleman on that occasion pointed out, and with truth, that in an increase of this duty there was considerable danger, that instead of getting more revenue they might increase illicit distillation. They knew to their cost that there had been unhappily a very great increase in the illicit manufacture in many parts of Canada, and he dreaded very much that the result of this might be still more largely to increase illicit distillation, which would be a double misfortune, not alone on the cost of revenue, but on account of the demoralisation which would attend the growth of that particular traffic. If his memory served him correctly, the experience of the United States was very strongly in the direction of the view he was then presenting to the House. There they found that the imposition of a heavy duty on spirits led to a direct loss of revenue, and they were obliged to reduce very largely the duties on spirits before they were able to collect anything like a reasonable revenue from them. Even to this day there were most formidable gangs engaged in the manufacture of spirits, and within the last few months he had seen several cases in which the Government troops had been called out, and rather serious skirmishes had taken place between what were known as the whiskey outlaws and the troops engaged in collecting the revenue. He was aware that in the Mother Country very much heavier duties were levied, but the conditions of society and the opportunities for illicit distillation were much less favourable there than in Canada. Therefore, although he did not intend to oppose the resolution, he desired to take this opportunity of warning the Government, and especially of warning the hon. the Minister of Finance, that he was very much afraid he (Mr. Tilley) would not receive any additional revenue from this duty, and he was still more afraid that the illicit distillation of whiskey might be considerably increased by the imposition of this duty.

Mr. TILLEY said the points to which the hon. gentleman had referred had not escaped the consideration of the Government. Of course, they looked, in the raising of the duty, at the possibility of not only increasing illicit distillation, but the possibility of its being illegally imported into the country. But, looking at the present Excise duty imposed in the United States, they felt there would be no difficulty in that regard. The high duty which formerly prevailed in the United States, and which gave rise to a great many fraudulent operations, was double that now proposed. During last year the duty in Canada was 30c., and now it was only increased 10c. The American duty, although the proof gallon was not exactly the same, was equal to from $1.12 to $1.20. The American duty being higher than ours, there was no inducement to import. The hon. gentleman, in referring to illicit distillation, said that the duty on corn increased the temptation in that direction. He (Mr. Tilley) maintained that it decreased the temptation to the extent of the increased cost of corn. He thought, with their experience in the past, and the strict supervision that was exercised by all their officers throughout the Dominion, and the reduction of the duty on malt, that the facilities for distillation were largely diminished. It was estimated that under this duty the Government would obtain $100,000 more than they obtained last year.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he did not object to the hon. gentleman collecting every cent of revenue that could possibly be collected from this article. If there was one article which they were justified in taxing to the fullest extent it would bear, it was the article of whiskey. He only called the hon. gentleman's attention to the risk of increasing the illicit distillation. He rose more particularly to remark that, corn being used by the legal distiller, rye or barley would be used by the illicit distiller, or some other grain of that kind, and consequently they ought to add the duty on corn. He did not know what the exact cost of manufacturing whiskey was, but at any rate an enormous profit was made on the article. The hon. gentleman was probably aware, or at any rate the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue was aware, that there were an enormous number of stills in the country so constructed that a very considerable quantity of whiskey could be manufactured and concealed. He knew that within the last three or four years the convictions of illicit distillers had been increasing in a very rapid ratio. All the evidence submitted to him when he was Finance Minister tended to show that illicit distillation was increasing in certain sections of the country, and that for one still their officers succeeded in seizing, there were, perhaps, three or four in active operation.

MR. GUTHRIE said it was quite true that, when the Excise duty was $2 a gallon in the United States, they collected a great deal less money than they did when the duty was considerably less. This increase of the tax to $1 was something to be approved of, and he thought the hon. the Finance Minister had done wisely in that respect, even running the risk of a little extra illicit distillation. He believed himself that illicit distillation was not carried on as extensively as was supposed. The number of seizures was no indication of the amount of illicit distillation. Very little liquor had been sold that had been made in an illicit manner. The discovery had been so prompt, and the parties had been caught before they had any opportunity of making the whiskey to any very considerable extent. Almost as soon as the still was started, the seizure was made. It got into the newspapers, and the impression got into the public mind that the operations were carried on extensively, whereas, as a matter of fact, he had reason to believe, from the officers who made many of the seizures, that very little of the illicit liquor had been disposed of.

MR. CAPTWRIGHT said he must remind his hon. friend that the opinions he had now expressed were expressed to the late Government two years, eighteen months and one year ago, and their version of the case was that undoubtedly believed by the most experienced officer of the Inland Revenue. He was afraid that, although what the hon. gentleman had stated might possibly be true in certain localities, it was undoubtedly not true as regarded the country at large. There might be certain localities in which public opinion was not in favour of illicit distillation, in which offenders were soon caught. But, where public opinion rather favoured illicit distillation, as it undoubtedly did in certain sections, it would be difficult indeed to detect an illicit distiller until a large amount of his liquor had gone into consumption.

ADDITIONAL JUDGES FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA BILL.

(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain resolutions to provide for the salaries of two additional Judges of the Supreme Court of British Columbia.

(In the Committee.)

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said that he was, at first, under the impression that only two Judges were obliged to live on the mainland in British Columbia, but he found that the Statute provided that not less than three should remain on the mainland. The total expense of the new system, according to the estimate of the Attorney-General of British Columbia, would be little, if any, more than under the old system.

MR. MACDONNELL asked how many Supreme Court Judges there would be under the new system.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said five. There were three at present, and the two additional were provided for by the recent Local Act. The Supreme Court Judge would hereafter perform the duties performed by County Court Judges heretofore. The Union Act provided for the retiring allowance of the retiring Stipendiary Magistrates.

MR. MILLS said he thought there was some apprehension about the provisions in the terms of Union. His recollection was that these gentlemen, in addition to being Stipendiary Magistrates were also Commissioners of Mines, and that the salaries they were receiving were partly for their services as Magistrates, and partly for their services as Commissioners of Mines. As he understood the proposition of the Minister of Justice, it was to give these Stipendiary Magistrates a full retiring allowance, as if they had been only officers of the Dominion Government. The retiring allowance to which they were entitled was only in regard to the salary they received as Stipendiary Magistrates, and not in regard to the whole salary they received as Stipendiary Magistrates and Commissioners of Mines.

MR. DEWDNEY said the hon. gentleman was mistaken. The Local Government relieved those gentlemen of all local duties, as they were found to be incompatible with their duties as Dominion officers.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he did not make a positive statement with regard to these retiring allowances, but his impression was, that, under the Terms of Union, they were entitled to two-thirds the amount of the salaries they had received.

SIR A. J. SMITH said that he approved of the change, but these gentlemen, as County Court Judges, could not be legislated out of office, and the Local Government had no power to do so.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he understood that at the time those gentlemen were appointed that contingency was anticipated, and they were expressly appointed during pleasure, in order that in the event of the Local Government desiring to dispense with their services, they could do so, and that the difficulty contemplated by the hon. gentleman should not arise.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said that the Act recently passed by the British Columbia Legislature enacted that the duties now performed by the County Court Judges should be performed in future by the Judges of the Supreme Court, and that ipso facto the present Judges of the County Court should cease to hold any power whatever.

As regarded the assertion made by the hon. gentleman from Bothwell that these County Court Judges were also Mining Commissioners, he might state that, after Confederation, these gentlemen, upon their becoming County Court Judges, in some instances refused to perform any duties appertaining to mining whatever, and the only way by which the Local Government could compel them to do so, was by passing a special Act, by which additional jurisdiction which was given to the County Court, enabling each Judge to hold terms of what was called the mining jurisdiction of the County Courts. Those gentlemen had been since acting as County Court Judges, holding Courts under that Act. Under the former arrangement, their jurisdiction was limited to cases not exceeding $500; but, under the mining jurisdiction of that Court, those gentlemen had jurisdiction to an unlimited extent. While this British Columbia Act might, perhaps, be an improvement upon the present judicial system, there were still some clauses which needed more attention. The Act provided that the Supreme Court should, in future, consist of five Judges, three at least of whom should reside upon the mainland. There were at present three Judges of the Supreme Court, and two more must be appointed. These three Judges now on the Bench all resided in Victoria, and, while this Act stated three Judges should reside on the mainland, there was no provision as to which of the three now residing in Victoria should remove to the mainland, and no power was given to the Governor in Council or any other person to compel anyone of these Judges to reside there. Nor was there any provision made stating upon which portion of the mainland these Judges should reside. According to the Act, as it now read, the two Judges to be appointed might reside in New Westminster, close to the sea-coast, and the Judge who removed from Vancouver Island might make his residence there too. In that case, the people of Cariboo would be much worse off than they were now, as they now had two County Court Judges within the district, one residing in the mining district, and another at Clinton, 250 miles away. If these County Court Judges were allowed to select their residences, and all lived in New Westminster, the whole interior of the country would be left for months at a time without the services of any County Court Judge, and consequently the people would be placed at great disadvantage. They had always been in the habit of having a County Court Judge among them, and there were many cases in which it was absolutely necessary that one should be living in the mining district. In cases coming under the mining jurisdiction, it had always been customary to issue summonses returnable in seventy-two hours. If a Judge resided 500 miles away, great inconvenience would result in such cases. Also in cases where a debtor wanted to abscond, there would be no power of granting a caapias to prevent his leaving. He trusted the attention of the Government would be directed to these points.

Resolutions ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

In the item of maintenance, the cost of the Kingston institution was $78.28 per capita last year. This year the Government proposed to reduce it to $74. At St. Vincent de Paul, last year, the cost was $149, as compared with $78 for the Kingston Penitentiary. The Department proposed to make an attempt to maintain that institution at $76 per capita , instead of $149, which was giving it $2 a head more than the Kingston institution. At St. John, last year, the cost was $76.84; Halifax, $92; Manitoba, $252; British Columbia, there was no comparison made. In the Manitoba Penitentiary, the Department proposed to reduce the expenditure, per capita , for maintenance, to $86. So far as he could understand the demands of the wardens of the several institutions, he did not see why this calculation should not be successfully carried out. In making the Estimates, he had allowed the prices set down in the different localities by the wardens in their estimates, but the reductions had been made largely in the quantities they asked for. MR. MACKENZIE: I find in the St. Vincent de Paul account four items that were last year left out altogether, namely: returns, maintenance of buildings, capital account, machinery and material for manufacture. Is there nothing allowed for repairs and maintenance of the buildings?

MR. McDONALD: That is transferred to Public Works.

MR. MACKENZIE: That should be stated in a foot-note. It makes an unfair comparison. There is an apparent decrease of $12,000, whereas, if all the items were represented as before, there would be no decrease. Material for manufactures does not belong to the Public Works Department. Are there no materials to be supplied this year?

MR. McDONALD: None.

MR. MACKENZIE: How are the convicts to be employed?

MR. McDONALD: There is sufficient stock there, and we propose, with reference to one item, the clothing made at St. Vincent de Paul, that it shall be made at Kingston, because we believe it can be made much cheaper there.

MR. MACKENZIE: All the clothing was formerly made in the Penitentiaries themselves.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: A good deal of the difference as regards Kingston might arise in this way. I think the Penitentiary at Kingston, having control of a good deal of land, is in the habit of producing a considerable portion of its own vegetables and other articles of that kind. I fancy that goes to the benefit of the institution, and does not appear as swelling the expenditure, and is not taken into account on one side or the other, though, as a matter of course, that would reduce the apparent cost per head.

MR. McDONALD: I think that is the case.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I see, all through, material for manufactures is struck out. Are there any new branches devised for employing persons at Kingston or elsewhere?

MR. McDONALD: None.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: How are they employed at present?

MR. McDONALD: I do not know. The report of the Inspector shows that, I have no opportunity of giving information, other than that derived from the Inspector himself.

MR. MACKENZIE: Last year we had some discussion on the question of the employment of convict labour, and the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government made some very strong criticisms against the Government competing with other trades. I would like to know what his views are this year, what changes he proposes to introduce in order to avoid that competition which he denounced last year; whether he is prepared to condemn the present Government because they have carried on certain branches at the Penitentiaries?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have no objection to gratify the laudable curiosity of my hon. friend. My opinions have always remained the same on this point, that it is a great misfortune that the labour of convicts should be brought into competition with that of honest men outside, and that that should be cured as much as possible. We commenced with the view of doing away with the contract system by degrees before 1873. It could only be done by degrees, because we had contractors there who had much plant and had running contracts. The principal will be carried out as much as possible that the convicts should interfere as little as possible with the honest labour of the country.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is no answer. The late Government were also pursuing that course, but the hon. gentleman undertook to criticise us because we were competing with trades outside. The hon. gentleman must admit that the convicts must be employed in some way. I am aware of it, and I do not blame the Government for it. I assume quite as much responsibility as they for it. I am aware that the clothing of the police force, their boots and shoes, that everything that was required that could be made, was made in the Penitentiary. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that he is not competing with the tailors' trade and shoemakers' who are outside, with those who made furniture for the Government buildings? I gave an order myself that all the furniture for the Military College should be made at the Penitentiary, but still that entered into competition with the cabinet-makers at Kingston and elsewhere. It is, in short, impossible to provide any labour for the convicts that does not enter into competition with labour outside, and, however much a politician may condemn the course we pursued, and that the hon. gentleman is now pursuing, the fact remains the same, that whatever labour is done by criminals deducts that much labour from what is available for men outside. Unless you adopt the system of solitary confinement, and provide no labour at all, it must be continued. The reason I brought the matter to notice now is to point out the unfairness of the hon. gentleman last year, in making the remarks he did, when he knew perfectly well that, if he came into office the next year, he would be compelled, perforce, to pursue the same system, and he is now pursuing it. We have come to the common conclusion, that the best mode of dealing with criminals is to imprison them at hard labour. That has to be provided, and it is the duty of those who administer the affairs of the country to see that it is made profitable. In the neighbouring Republic they have succeeded in making convict labour profitable to such an extent that a number of the institutions have managed to meet the expenditure by the products of the convict labour. We are behindhand in that respect, and anything that can be done by this side of the House to aid the Government in reaching that point will be done.

MR. JONES: Great complaints are being made against convict labour competing against honest labour, and I think that the answer given by the Premier was a good answer, that he is doing all that he possibly can to prevent that labour competing with the labour outside. The Government have only been in office six or eight months, and it is impossible for them to make a complete change in that time. The parties who contracted for this labour have their plant and machinery; they have to be considered. I trust the Premier will do what he said he is going to do, that is, to prevent that labour, as far as possible, from competing with honest labour. I do not think the example of the United States is any example for us. It is a despicable thing that that labour should be utilised against the honest labour of the country. Why cannot we utilise convict labour as it is done in England, where it does not compete with other labour to any great extent? They break stones and pick oakum there, and are not fed with roast beef and white bread. The cost in this country is enormous, compared with the cost in England. It is a disgrace to this country that we should so utilise that labour that it is competing with honest labour.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am not surprised to hear the hon. gentleman express his entire approval of what is done on the Treasury benches. He does that regularly every day. In his anxiety to support the Government, he says it will take some time to get rid of the contractors with their plant. Who are the contractors, and what is the plant that is now in their hands?

MR. JONES: How am I to answer that question? Does not the hon. gentleman know himself that boots and shoes, for instance, are made in the Penitentiary, and many other articles that could be made outside?

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. member said it would take some months to get rid of the contractors and the plant. I asked, for he spoke evidently with authority, who were the contractors and what was the plant. I am not aware there is a single contractor there.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): There is one locksmith.

MR. MACKENZIE: We found, when we came into office, that there had been a locksmith there, but found him unable to continue his contract, and the material he had remained in the hands of the Government, and, if there is one now, it is an arrangement made to use up the half-made materials lying around. Does the hon. gentleman take the ground that we ought not to have had the furniture for our own buildings made there, that the ironwork on the library, the points for the Pacific Railway, should not have been made there? He said, that in England, they broke stones and picked oakum, which did not enter into competition outside. Does it require no labour to pick oakum and break stones? Can he name a single thing that can be done by convicts, in the shape of labour, that does not enter into competition with outside labour? All labour is profitable, no matter how simple it may be, and there is just as much competition in picking oakum and breaking stones as in anything else.

MR. COURSOL said it was well known, and experience had proved it, that all sentences given by criminal Judges had not, in most cases, the desired effect, if the persons were not sent to hard labour. Unfortunately, if the prisoners were not employed, they left, at the end of their terms, worse than when they were convicted. But, at the same time, the moment these prisoners were employed, the result of their labour must be utilised in some way. It must be disposed of, and, if it was only breaking stones, they interfered with the labour of honest men engaged in breaking stones, which was the only means, probably, of saving thousands of families that would otherwise starve. He thought some way might be devised of making the United States the slaughter market for these goods, as Canada had been made a slaughter market for American goods. The labour did not cost anything, and they had only to take the raw material account. The goods might be collected from the Penitentiaries and then sent across the line to be sold. That would, no doubt, pay all expenses and we would lose nothing. At the same time, there would be no sort of competition with the labour of our own people. He did not suppose the suggestion would be adopted at once by the hon. the Minister of Justice, but, at the same time, he suggested it as a means of getting rid of these articles, and utilising the work of these prisoners.

MR. MILLS said he was rather surprised, although he had heard some very extraordinary doctrines of political economy laid down since this Session began, at the opinions advanced by the hon. member for Montreal East. He remembered very well the discussion that took place on the subject last year. He thought it was the hon. member for Frontenac that suggested that the convicts in Penitentiaries should be employed at some labour that would not be of the slightest use to them when they had served their time. Now, the position taken by the hon. gentleman on that occasion, and the position taken by the hon. gentlemen who had spoken that day, had intimated that these people were in a wholly different position, or their industry was in a wholly different position to the industries outside. In the Kingston Penitentiary, they had 800 or 1,000 convicts. These people, if they were outside, would probably be producing a greater number of articles which would come into competition with the products of the rest of the community. Then the labour of the convicts was less efficient than it would be if they were outside. Nothing could be more preposterous than the arguments of hon. gentlemen in this particular. They might as well legislate criminally against the introduction of emigrants into the country. In proportion as the Penitentiary was self-sustaining, in the same proportion it was advantageous to the rest of the community. The community suffered in proportion to the amount of tax it was obliged to pay to support these people. If the convicts were taught trades it would be a practical advantage to them when they went back to the community.

MR. HOUDE said he thought the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was mistaken in one of his contentions. He said the work of convicts was a benefit to the country, and, if they were free, they would do still more work in competition with other workmen. They ought to make convicts work—first, to improve them morally, and, secondly, to reduce what they cost the country. But he (Mr. Houde) was of opinion that they should leave competition in manufacture and labour in general in a normal condition, but they did not want competition with slave work. Such work ought not to be placed in competition with the labour of fathers of families. Such work tended to place the Government in competition against the individual, and deranged the normal condition of labour and industrial enterprise. He thought the suggestion of the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol) ought to be taken into consideration. It was well known that frequently foreign manufacturers sent their goods into the Canadian market, and sacrificed the surplus of their productions because they did not want to destroy the normal condition of their own markets. It was better that our Government should get a little less revenue from the labour of convicts than disturb the natural state of competition in labour and industry.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the proposition of the hon. member for Montreal East had something of a comical air about it. It amounted to this: that the Legislature would be asked for an additional vote of say $50,000 to enable the Government to send their goods out of the country at the expense of the whole people, and sell them at less than they were worth. That was really the proposition of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HOUDE said he did not mean that the goods should be sacrificed at a decided loss. The Government could produce the goods at a less cost than ordinary manufacturers. It was only the raw material that cost anything. The labour cost nothing.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It costs a good deal.

Mr. HOUDE said he contended the labour cost nothing in that case, because the Government had to provide for the living of the convicts anyway. There was another point worth consideration. It was always dangerous to make a class of the population believe that the Government was doing them an injustice, and a portion of the people of the Dominion believed that the Government, in placing the labour of convicts in competition with that of citizens of the country, were doing injustice to honest fathers of families.

Several Hon. GENTLEMEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOUDE said hon. gentlemen might say "hear, hear," but he knew in what sense they meant it. They pretended that the policy of the Government had given dissatisfaction to the people. He knew it had given dissatisfaction to some, whom it would prevent for a long time from returning to power.

Vote agreed to.

Mr. HOUDE.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the bill for food and wages, last year, came to $19,468, which the Department considered so enormous that it caused a detailed statement to be prepared by the Warden. He found the items generally were charged at excessive prices.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) said the present estimate had been handed in by the Warden. The Department allowed the prices estimated by the Warden, but did not allow the quantities, which, per capita of the convicts, were more than was required in the Kingston and other Penitentiaries.

Mr. McINNES said he found only $1,200 was allowed for the Warden's salary, though the Wardens, and even the Deputy Wardens of the other Penitentiaries, received $1,400 a year. Living was just as high in British Columbia as elsewhere, and he did not see why the Warden's salary should not be as high.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) said the Warden had made no complaint about his salary being too low.

MR. ANGLIN said he wished to refer to a matter connected with this vote, in regard to the salary of the Speaker. The law regulating the salary of the Speaker, as interpreted, ever since Confederation, was this : that the Speaker of the House of Commons was entitled to his salary up to the day on which his successor was elected. His (Mr. Anglin's) predecessor was paid up to the day he was elected. In the same way he drew his salary during recess, and performed the duties of Speaker as head of the Department up to the last. He drew the quarter's salary up to the 31st of December. When he went to draw a portion due for January, and for the first thirteen days of February, he found some difficulty. He made enquiry about it, and found that the Auditor, having some doubt, referred the matter to the Minister of Justice, and that the Deputy Minister advised that he was not entitled to the payment of salary after the dissolution of Parliament. He could not understand on what grounds the Minister of Justice came to that conclusion. However, the result had been that he was without his salary for a month and thirteen days. The right hon. the leader of the Government, early in the Session, promised to introduce a Bill relating to the office of Speaker and other matters, and he intended, when that Bill came before the House, to bring this matter up. He supposed he could go to the Courts for a remedy, but that, even if he gained the case, would cost him more than the whole amount due—some $500. Something should be done to let the present Speaker know what position he would be in when his period of office came to a close. The Speaker was appointed when the House met, and his expenses began immediately, and his duties continued from that time up to the day of the election of his successor.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he knew the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) would not suppose that the members of the Government desired to do anything but most ample justice to himself (Mr. Anglin) individually. Mr. Lash, the Deputy Minister of Justice, had some difficulty with reference to the strict legality of the payment under the Act. At the very earliest opportunity he (Mr. McDonald) would inform the hon. gentleman what the Government proposed to do in the matter.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) asked why the allowance of $200 for Deputy Clerk, House of Commons, had been struck off, whilst no change in that respect had been made with regard to the Senate staff.

MR. TILLEY said he could not recollect for the moment why the reduction had been made ; but he thought it was because it was considered he did not occupy the same position as the Deputy Clerk in the Senate, and it was not considered necessary that the sum should be continued. The increase was only made within the last three or four years, and had never been paid before.

MR. ANGLIN said Mr. Hartney was appointed Deputy Clerk some four years ago, and his salary was increased from $2,600 to $2,800, not because he had any duties as Deputy Clerk to perform, as he did not perform any work in that capacity, but because he performed duties for which the sum paid him was not fair compensation. Mr. Hartney was an old and experienced officer, who discharged many onerous and responsible duties. His time was fully occupied. When he (Mr. Anglin) had occasion, as Speaker, to go into the matter of salaries of the House, he never thought of such a thing as cutting down Mr. Hartney's salary a single dollar, and he never anticipated that it would ever be done. The best mode of economising was to reduce the number of officials, dispensing with those who had little or nothing to do.

MR. BABY said it was thought, by the Commission of Internal Economy, that the office of Deputy Clerk of the House, should not be continued, because there were no duties attached to the office. Therefore, as it was necessary to economise as much as possible the expenses of the House, the allowance of $200 for that office was dropped. It was not done because Mr. Hartney was not considered a good officer. On the contrary, that gentleman fulfilled his duties to the satisfaction of everybody, but as Deputy Clerk he had no duties whatever to do. He would now receive $2,600 instead of $2,800, as before.

MR. MACKENZIE said Mr. Hartney's salary, in the first place, was increased to $2,800, because he was Deputy Clerk. The hon. gentleman would observe that the Deputy Clerk in the Senate had $2,800, and the late Commissioners conceived that Mr. Hartney was better entitled to $2,800 than the same officer in the Senate. Why was it his salary had been reduced, and the salary of the gentleman in the Senate left at $2,800?

MR. TUPPER said his recollection of the circumstances was this: the title of Deputy Clerk, with an allowance of $200, was, some two or three years ago—he could not fix the date exactly—conferred on a gentleman who had been very properly and justly described as one of the best experienced and able officers of the House. But this Government considered that that gentleman was sufficiently paid by the salary of $2,600, which he received as Accountant, and, as he had no duties whatever to perform as Deputy Clerk, the $200 allowance attached to that title was taken off.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman must admit that the officers of this House should be equally well paid with officers of the other House. If there was a general reduction made, there would be no objection. But it was quite evident, in looking at the Estimates, that that was not the case. The Clerk of the Upper House received $3,400, and the Deputy Clerk, $2,800. The Clerk of this House received $3,400, and the Deputy Clerk, $2,600. The Deputy Clerk was not, as hon. gentlemen supposed, commissioned by the Government, but by the Clerk of the House, and if
