the Clerk should be taken ill on any day, the duties would have to be discharged by Mr. Hartney. He did not think it was fair at all to that gentleman, who was one of the most efficient officers he (Mr. Mackenzie) ever saw. He never knew any officer so exact and thorough in the discharge of his duties. He should not be placed in a position of inferiority to the same officer in the Senate, who did not discharge one-third the duties performed by Mr. Hartney. He hoped the Government would yet consider the matter, and do Mr. Hartney the justice he was entitled to.

42 Expenses of Committees, Extra Sessional Clerks, &c. $10,300 00

MR. MILLS said that, by a return which was brought down early in the Session, it appeared there had been 78 extra sessional clerks employed, though it was stated that 20 had been dispensed with about the time the return was brought down. It was now stated that these had been all re-employed, with the exception of four, and that a large number in addition had been taken on. He thought the number now employed exceeded 100. It was also stated that a considerable number of persons, who were representatives of various Conservative newspapers, received four or five dollars a day as extra clerks. The names of some of these gentlemen had been given him, and he trusted to be able to bring this matter again under the notice of the House. He thought it was a great abuse. It should not be tolerated that gentlemen connected with the press, who were here for the purpose of representing hon. gentlemen opposite, should be employed at the public expense, under the designation of sessional clerks, for the purpose of advocating the views and acting as the exponents of hon. gentlemen on the Government benches.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he hoped the hon. gentleman would bring the matter up; and, when it was brought up, the House would have an opportunity of discussing it. It would put him (Sir John A. Macdonald) in mind of what was done last Session. Such things were done last year to a very large extent.

MR. ANGLIN said he understood that during the early part of the Session, the Clerk of the House asked for a dozen extra clerks, and he received sixty; and, before there was anything to be done, some seventy-eight had been employed. He understood that there were now some hundred extra clerks, and he could not see upon what pretext so many were employed.

MR. BUNSTER said he could not see that, because gentlemen happened to be members of the press, that they would not make just as competent clerks as any other persons.

MR. MACKENZIE asked if this estimate of $10,300 was based upon the expenditure of this Session so far?

MR. TILLEY: Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE asked if the hon. gentleman could tell what had been the expense up to this period of the Session.

MR. TILLEY: I cannot.

MR. MACKENZIE said he thought the hon. gentleman ought to know. He was satisfied, judging from the number of clerks employed, that the estimate was not nearly sufficient. He wished the hon. gentleman would give this statement before the item was carried.

MR. TILLEY: I shall make enquiries.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he wished to know whether the whole of the extra clerks were to be paid out of the vote of last year, than which he saw no other. A return brought down showed that they had, almost at the commencement of the Session, 75 extra clerks drawing from $4 to $5 a day, representing a daily expenditure of over $300, or at the rate of $9,000 a month. The estimate for those clerks had been $12,800; and, if the statement of the member for Bothwell was correct, that a great many of those discharged on the 20th of March were reappointed and more added, a very serious abuse had been committed, and that item would range from $25,000 to $30,000 for the pay of those clerks alone. That large item might possibly hereafter be charged to the account of the late Government, the members of which were not, and particularly he himself, disposed to bear the responsibility of expenditure to that extent, which was all the worse if many of those clerks had been practically employed and acting as correspondents of newspapers.

MR. TILLEY said that, as the hon. member for Lambton had asked that this item should stand over, he would not discuss it now.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said that the number of employes of all kinds, messengers, pages and extra clerks had been greatly increased in 1879, and particularly as compared with 1877. The extra clerks in 1877 numbered 36; in 1878, 41; and in 1879, 75. Seventeen were dismissed on the 20th of March, but the reappointments exceeded that number.

MR. ANGLIN asked why this large staff was maintained. If he understood all that was said last Session and during the recess, as reported in the newspapers, hon. gentleman opposite found fault with the late Government for having maintained so large a staff of officers at a time when employment could not be found for the people of the country, when the only work these emigration agents did was to overstock the labour market. Perhaps, when the Government framed the Estimates, they had an idea that the National Policy would revolutionise the country, and that employment would be abundant.

MR. POPE (Compton) said the Government had carefully considered the whole question of immigration, and they felt that the money of the country should not be spent in bringing labourers into the country to compete with the overstocked labour market of Canada. Upon that principle they had acted, and, if hon. gentlemen looked at the Estimates, they would find that the amount had been reduced by more than one-half. With reference to the permanent agencies established in the country, they could not reduce them very much. They must continue those agencies, in order that the immigrants coming to the country might be directed aright, and protected on their way to Manitoba from American agents, anxious to allure them to the Western States. Then there had been no time in the history of the country when it was more important to the Dominion to bring out men with money, who could purchase our small farms, settle on our lands, and become contributors to the revenue of the country.

MR. CARTWRIGHT enquired what steps had been taken to invite the immigration to this country of English farmers and persons of that class possessing means. For several years the harvests in England had been of a very indifferent character, and farmers were casting about for some mode of bettering their condition, and he would like to know if any special means had been taken on the part of the Department to call the attention of these people to the openings which existed in Canada just now? A very considerable number of our own people, in the older Provinces, were endeavouring to sell their settled farms in order to move into the North-West.

MR. ROCHESTER asked whether it was the intention of the Government to prevent immigration agents from turning out to canvass and interfere in the elections, and whether the item, $14,000 for travelling expenses for immigration agents had been used for that purpose or not.

MR. BUNSTER enquired why the reduction had been made in regard to British Columbia; it seemed to him altogether uncalled for. An agent was very much needed there to direct the immigrants upon their arrival, and he trusted that vote would be placed in the Supplementary Estimates for this officer.

MR. POPE (Compton) said that their agents had been instructed to represent to small tenant farmers and men of capital the inducements offered to them in Canada. They had published pamphlets, they had advertised in the papers, they had done everything that could be done to show the people the exact position they might occupy if they came to this country. Such had been the work of most of the agents up to the time that they left. From all the information he could obtain, we were going to get comparatively a very large number of immigrants this year.

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked if the attention of the hon. gentleman's agents had been called to the fact that there was a large emigration from the older settled parts of this country to Manitoba, and that, in consequence, a considerable number of good farms would be in the market.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said the agents had been instructed to bring that fact before the people, and to tell them that many small farms could be cheaply purchased.

Mr. ANGLIN said he understood from the hon. gentleman that, while the means employed in Europe to induce emigration to this country were to be seriously diminished, the means employed on this side for the reception of immigrants were to be maintained in the old condition. He would like the hon. gentleman to state how the reduction from $8,700 to $7,000 in the London agency had been brought about, whose services had been dispensed with, and why, and whether it was his intention to make any more changes in the establishment.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said there was less work to do now, and many of the agents had been withdrawn. When, in 1872, he sent these agents to Europe, he never contemplated they should remain there permanently. He supposed they would be able to complete their work in three or four years, and that the immigrants to this country would themselves become agents for their friends at home. Six or seven of these agents had, consequently, been withdrawn. The reason of the reduction in the London office was that there was not so much work to do here. One man, named Talbot, had resigned, and, altogether, the expenses were less.

Mr. MILLS said the hon. gentleman had stated that he was very careful in determining who should emigrate to this country—in fact, he controlled the entire emigration. He had taken good care that parties emigrating hither should not be persons whose labour would bring them into competition with those who were already in the country. They all knew that last year the intending emigrants were told that manufacturing industries were to be built up, and they would have plenty of work to do, and that emigrants from foreign countries would receive employment which these industries would be able to afford them. But now the hon. gentleman intimated that this could not be done, that it was only agricultural labourers that should come here, and that it would never do to have those who were engaged in manufactures to emigrate to Canada, because they would come into unfair competition with those engaged in those pursuits. He would like to know how the hon. gentleman was going to reconcile this policy he had marked out here and the policy he and his friends advocated some months ago. The hon. gentleman said he wanted to secure immigrants to occupy the waste lands in the North-West, and to take the place of the farmers who sold out in the older Provinces, but that he did not want immigrants who would come into competition with those engaged in skilled industry. They were assured, over and over again, during the past year, however, that the Government were going to adopt a policy that would give them a home here, and would create a demand for their labour. The hon. gentleman said he was not going to be a "fly on the wheel," and yet he said the Government had done all it could, had exhausted its resources, and could do nothing more. The last step of this great National Policy was to take care that no one in the Old World, engaged in any skilled industry, should have any encouragement to come to this country.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said there was about as much knickerbocker in the hon. gentleman's remarks as in anything he had heard for a long time. He (Mr. Pope) said nothing of the kind attributed to him; what he said was this: anybody could come to this country that liked, but the Government did not encourage people to come here who would come into competition with our labourers.

Mr. MACMILLAN said he understood the hon. the Minister of Agriculture to say that the Government did not encourage people to emigrate to this country to come into competition with our labourers. He (Mr. Macmillan) thought that was very desirable. He knew that in the West many hon. members carried their elections partially on the ground that it was not desirable to have persons of a certain class come to this country; that if they came of their own accord it was all right, but that it was not desirable that any considerable amount of money should be expended in encouraging immigration. For several years back we had been expending considerable sums in that direction, and had got very poor returns for it, indeed. As for those persons who were anxious to come here, we would be glad to receive them, if they could come at their own expense, and assist in settling up our country. A circumstance had taken place in Ottawa within the last few days which, he thought, justified his hon. friend in the course he had pursued. A few days ago many labourers, in this city, came to the Parliament buildings and demanded that the Government should either give them work or bread. Now, if the Government were doing all in their power to afford employment to these men, by prosecuting public works, and if, at this moment, there were still so many of these people unemployed, it was not at all desirable that considerable numbers more should be brought over here at the expense of the Government, during this summer. He had also observed that many young children were being brought to this country by different parties, and among others, a Miss Birt was bringing many children to this country. He sincerely hoped the Government would not assist in bringing these children here, for we had plenty of that class at the present time in this country. In many cases they were brought to the cities and kept there, and many of them became vagrants, and he did not think it was at all desirable to have any more of them.

MR. CURRIER said he had the greatest confidence in the hon. the Minister of Agriculture. In 1872, when that hon. gentleman first sent agents to the old country, he said, at the time, he only expected it would be a temporary arrangement, and that in a year or two they would be dispensed with. Soon after that, he went out of power, and could not control matters since that time. Now, he (Mr. Currier) would suggest that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture should make a trial, and see whether he could not get along without those agents. Perhaps those who had come out would hereafter act as agents to their friends behind. He observed an item of $23,000, to assist Mennonite immigration, but he thought it might be better to expend money in helping our own people who were not able, without assistance, to go to the Prairie Province. He had always maintained that we might help poor people to remove from this country to the West. There was much talk in this city, a few weeks ago, about forming a joint stock emigration society to raise a sum of money to assist partially to remove people who wished to go to that country from Ottawa. They applied to the Department of the Interior to ascertain upon what terms they could get a portion of the land set apart for that purpose, and the answer was that no inducement of that kind would be given, that a township could not be set apart for that purpose to be settled by emigrants removing from this city. The only inducement they would offer was such as was applied to all—that of 160 acres of land free, with the privilege of buying 160 more at $1 an acre. He thought that the Government might do a little more in this respect. He believed they might have set apart one or two townships for that purpose, to be settled on certain conditions that might be imposed by the Department who had control of the matter. He would be glad if that would be carried out. For his part, he objected to the spending of a large amount of money to bring immigrants to this country. He did not believe that the Minister of Agriculture would be able to make or control a selection of the people that ought to come here. They had still a large number of labourers coming to this country. He regretted that such a large sum was expended in agencies. The United States, he understood, never had any agents in the old country, and yet thousands of emigrants went to that country. He believed just as many emigrants as were required would come to Canada, if all the agents were withdrawn.

MR. BAIN said no doubt there was a difficulty in dealing with the immigration question, which had been aggravated by the depression which had existed in Canada in common with other countries. He had no doubt that his hon. friends from the large centres of population had found great difficulty in dealing with the labouring men out of employment in their midst, already pressing upon their attention the fact that that they were out of employment, and asking for means to alleviate distress. He remembered that a year ago, when the House was in Session, that had been the prominent difficulty on the Opposition side of the House, and presumed that his hon. friend who had just sat down (Mr. Currier) had realised this Session the serious difficulties that surrounded the Government in dealing with this question. There had been a good deal of talk, a year ago, in respect to the class of immigrants that had been encouraged by the Government to come to this country. He remembered that it reached that degree of importance that at last the immigration agent in this city undertook, for the purpose of having the question investigated, to receive applications from parties who were anxious for employment, or wished for aid to remove, and he (Mr. Bain) recollected that there was not a single case presented where the applicant had not been a resident of this country for at least three years, and many were born and bred in Canada. That was the best refutation of the charges made against the administration of the Immigration Department by the Government of that day. He was not disposed to taunt his hon. friends on the Government benches, and to ask them to carry out now, in office, the line of policy advocated by them a year ago. His hon. friend opposite (Mr. Macmillan) had said what everyone in the House acknowledged to be candid and true when he said that a great many hon. members supporting the Government owed their election to the votes they secured from the workmen out of employment, by the cry that the introduction of immigrants was competing with their labour. But he would ask every fair-minded man, without regard to political connexion, how it was possible to increase the wealth of the country unless it were by increasing the producing population? He was pleased to hear that the Minister of Agriculture did not propose to withdraw the emigration agencies from the old country, and that Canada would still be brought under the notice of the tenant farmers of the Mother Country, and those classes possessing limited means there, who every year felt increasing difficulty in earning a livelihood, and who were a desirable class to induce to come here. Evidence had been recently given before a Committee of the House, with regard to the reduction in the value of agricultural products, and the consequent inability of farm tenants to pay the high rents of former times, that landlords had, in many cases, allowed reductions on their rents of from 15 to 25 per cent., and he (Mr. Bain) thought this was a peculiarly opportune time to place before those agriculturists the advantages Canada had to confer on small capitalists, who, in England were now struggling from year to year, and working to maintain their position. If this country ever expected to secure a due proportion of this desirable class, who, from circumstances, would thus be disposed to leave the Mother Country, it was necessary that the inducements offered by Canada should be placed prominently before them. There was evidence to show that the class of immigrants that came here during the last four or five years had not been a burden but a clear gain to the country. It would be found that eight out of ten of the class that was a burden upon the community, in our cities, were those who never were very anxious, at any time, to work for a living if they could beg, borrow, or secure a living in some easy way. There was another feature in connection with this question that showed the class of immigrants that were induced to come to this country under the late Administration. He found, on looking over the returns for last year, and it was about the average of previous years, that there was over $760,000 in money brought in by immigrants to Canada, besides between $400,000 and $500,000 worth of settlers' effects. Here was about a million and a quarter brought into this country annually. Considering these circumstances, he thought every hon. member would agree that it was desirable to secure as large a proportion of this class as possible. There was another difficulty to which he desired to call the attention of the House. His only plea for referring to this matter was that, having been on the Immigration Committee for the last few years, he had been compelled to give this subject some little attention. He found there was a tendency on the part of the agents of steamboat companies in the old country to accept any class of the population there who might be willing to accept the offers made to them, and accept the glowing descriptions of the benefits that would accrue to them by coming to Canada, without regard to their fitness as settlers, and often the class they induced to immigrate was a most undesirable one. He trusted that the Government would keep before the Mother Country the inducements which Canada held forth to the tenant farmer of small capital, and for the man who was willing to work, because he was satisfied that, if the country was to be built up, and its resources developed, he could not say whether under a Protective policy, or under a more liberal policy, we could best do it by doing all we could to attract the small capitalist and the industrious workingman, and as rapidly as possible thus increase both our producing and consuming population.

In reply to Mr. MACKENZIE and Mr. CARTWRIGHT,

Mr. POPE (Compton) said that, with a view to investigate the localities and extent of the cattle disease in the United States, the Canadian Government had sent a veterinary surgeon to several States where it was believed to exist. They wished to satisfy the people on the other side of the Atlantic that there was no disease in Canada, and to be certain themselves as to the reality of any danger in the importation of cattle disease from the States into Canada. It was found that there was no serious risk of that kind.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he would like to know if they obtained any further information, since the opening of the Session, on this subject. Did matters remain in the same position? If he recollected aright, quarantine was declared for a certain time.

Mr. POPE: Yes.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Would it expire on the 17th of next month?

Mr. POPE said he feared they would not be able to dispense with it without exposing Canadian cattle to be slaughtered on their arrival in England. The matter depended on Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. BAIN.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that it would be better to continue the blockade in the West than to have Canadian cattle slaughtered immediately on their arrival in England.

Mr. POPE said that he had got all the information he could with regard to the cattle in the West, and done everything he could to call the attention of the Privy Council to the difficulty and trouble this Order would cause our shippers and railroads, and, when navigation was opened, our steamboats. He had also made a representation to the Government at Washington, that, if they would send a veterinary surgeon into the Western States, the Canadian Government would send one also, with a view to a report, after a thorough investigation as regarded the disease, and in order to a representation to the Privy Council in England; also, that if the United States Government would prevent the exportation of cattle from the Eastern States into the Western States, they would see whether they could get permission from the Privy Council for the bringing of cattle from the States through Canada, on the way to England; but that Government made no reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had had communications with many persons largely interested in this trade, who thought it was absolutely necessary to prevent the spread of the disease into our own country, to avoid sending animals through Canada, which might be suspected of having it. The next most important thing for a trade so lucrative to us, was that it should not suffer any unnecessary injury. He had no doubt that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture would give the same attention to this in the future as in the past. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was not able to make any suggestions in the matter beyond the maintenance of a careful enquiry in order to the ending of the present interregnum as soon as possible. So long as the trade ran out of its wonted channels, there was less chance of diverting it back to the channels advantageous to Canada. No effort ought to be neglected to restore the equilibrium that existed, and that enabled us to carry a great deal of our neighbour's trade, as well as our own.

In reply to Mr. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. POPE said that, within the last few months, as late as the 1st April, some deceased animals had been sent from Portland and Boston to England, but not in Canadian steamers. The imports from Canada into England had been perfectly free from disease. One of the propositions he made to the Privy Council was whether, if the Canadian Government made a thorough examination of the cattle in the West, and placed an inspector at the Canadian port of entry and another at the port of shipment, to see that no diseased animals were admitted, American cattle could not be brought through this country to England. The answer was distinctly this: There was no alternative; that, if cattle were brought from the United States through Canada, they must be scheduled.

58 Towards assisting immigration and immigration expenses, including estimated expenses of transport of Mennonites.....	$86,200 00
-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	-------------

In reply to Mr. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. POPE (Compton) said that the arrangement with the Mennonites was not closed this year. The condition made with them in 1872 was that, up to 1876, they should come from Hamburg to Manitoba for $30 a head. After 1876, up to 1882, the time during which they could leave Russia, the charge was not to exceed $40 per head. In view of our position and the depression, and the difficulties of making ends meet, the Government felt that it was their duty to inform the Mennonites that, from this time, they must pay the $40 per head, which was in accordance with the arrangement in 1872.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: How much does that leave us to pay per head?

MR. POPE: It would leave about $5.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: That is very small.

MR. POPE said that for $45 they could get from Hamburg to Manitoba. The contract was that the Dominion line of steamers should bring them from Hamburg to Quebec for $25. At that time, he had not expected to pay much in excess of that for the additional distance, as he was calculating on transit by the Dawson route, over which they could have been carried for a small sum. The cost from Quebec to Manitoba, by Lake Superior, would be about $20, being in all about $45 from Hamburg. That included everything, as they would furnish their own food.

MR. DAWSON said that the Mennonites were a quiet, law-abiding people, and were very industrious. The same objections could not be urged in their case as in that of the Chinese immigration, of which they had heard the other day, because they brought their families with them, and established themselves permanently in the country, which the Chinese did not. Still, they were a community of peculiar habits and customs, and, until these were modified and changed, they would continue to be an isolated community. We had planted them in the very garden of the continent, where they would prosper and grow rich, and he (Mr. Dawson) wished them every success; but he was not sure that it would not be to their advantage, as well as to that of the district where they had settled, that they should be somewhat mixed with other nationalities—English, French and Scotch. He thought the present a good time to encourage the immigration of people of our own race, and, if they could only be made fully aware of the advantages conferred on the Mennonites, and encouraged to believe that they, also, would be planted in such a fertile district, where they and their descendants were sure to prosper, there could, in his opinion, be no doubt of our ability to induce the immigration so essential to the development of the territories which we were opening up.

MR. ANGLIN said that all hon. members who were members of this House last Session must remember that a great deal of noise was made then because, while money was appropriated for the encouragement of Mennonite settlement, no appropriation was made by the late Government to assist the French, who were in the United States, to return to this country and settle in Manitoba. Very strong complaints were then made, but the same old policy was now being pursued. If it were a crime in the late Government to neglect the claims of the French seeking repatriation, he did not see that it could be a merit in this Government, although some members of it were those who joined in the clamour the Session before. It was strange to find gentlemen changing their views so completely when they changed from one side of the House to the other.

PRAYERS.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 98) To amend and consolidate the Railway Act, 1868, and the Acts amending it. —(Mr. Tupper.)

BREAKWATER AT BAYFIELD, N.S.

QUESTION.

MR. McISAAC enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make provision this Session to continue the construction of the breakwater, commenced last Session at Bayfield, N.S.

MR. TUPPER: That subject is under the consideration of the Government.

GOVERNMENT BRANCH RAILWAYS TO CAPES TORMENTINE AND TRAVERSE.

QUESTION.

MR. YEO enquired, Whether the Government intend, during this year, building a branch railway from the Intercolonial Railway to Cape Tormentine; and also, a branch railway from the Provincial Railway at Prince Edward Island to Cape Traverse.

MR. TUPPER: The report of the engineer charged by the late Government to make the surveys, only came into my hands a couple of days ago, and I have not yet had an opportunity of placing them before my colleagues.

SIR A. J. SMITH: Will the hon. gentleman lay the report on the table of the House?

MR. TUPPER: There is a motion on the paper for this report to be brought down, and I have directed that the report shall be brought down.

PORT ELGIN HARBOUR IMPROVEMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. GILLIES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, during the current Session, to grant a sum in the Supplementary Estimates for the purpose of improving the Harbour of Port Elgin, in the North Riding of Bruce.

MR. TUPPER: That subject is also under the consideration of the Government.

PACIFIC RAILWAY ROUTE WEST OF SELKIRK.

QUESTION.

MR. MACDOUGALL enquired, Whether this House has been put in possession of all reports, recommendations, maps and suggestions of the Engineers of the Department of Public Works on the subject of the best route for the Pacific Railway westward from Selkirk to the Pacific Ocean; if not, whether it will not be in the public interest to lay all such reports, maps, etc., before this House as soon as possible.

MR. TUPPER: I expect to be able, in the course of a few days, to lay additional reports and maps before the House on the subject referred to. All reports and maps, consistent with the public interest, will be laid on the table of the House.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

RESOLUTIONS PROPOSED.

MR. WALLACE said the resolutions which he was about to submit, he knew ran counter to the prejudices of the many and to the interests of some. He had been characterised by his opponents or by the opponents of the principles contained in these resolutions, as a swindler, a fool, and an idiot. But he had only this to say to his assailants—that if their motives in opposing the principles involved were no more selfish than his, they would have no cause to regret having given expression to their views. He was content to abide by the decision of the future in regard to who was the greatest fool. It might be supposed that the opponents of the measure would have some better principles to advocate than those they condemned. He would, therefore, touch upon some of the objections that had been raised to the measure he advocated. First of all, paper money had been characterised derisively as the rag-baby. He was not aware that abuse had ever hurt any person or question, neither did he think that abuse in this case would do anything to deter the rag-baby from becoming a fact, if the principle embodied in it was true, as he believed it to be. He contended that the present system was a worse rag-baby than the one he was advocating, because he did not propose to do anything except present a paper token that should be endorsed and have the confidence of the Government, that should be made law, and pass as a legal tender in this country. Whereas what was the fact at the present moment. The system was dishonest and a fraud. The banking system of to-day promised to pay in gold. Was it able to fulfil its promise. He found, on referring to the banking returns, that the banks had in circulation $19,000,000 and upwards of notes promising to pay in gold. They had also over $5,000,000 of Dominion deposits payable on demand. They had also $598,000 provincial deposits payable on demand, and they had other deposits payable on demand, amounting to some $31,000,000, making in all $57,804,007. What had they in gold to represent this amount? He found that they possessed in specie $5,922,191, as against $57,804,007 of deposits. Then they had Dominion notes payable on demand in gold amounting to $8,341,532, or a total of gold and Dominion notes of $14,263,723, which was equal to a fraction less than 25c. on the dollar on their liabilities payable on demand. This statement shows that the banks had liabilities payable on demand for over $43,000,000, against which they held neither specie nor Dominion notes. For this amount the general public, their creditors, had no security except the solvency of the banks and their customers, and the responsibility of their shareholders, a security which, although unquestioned, could not be as good as if the whole country was held for the amount. He would ask which of the two systems was the best, which was the worst rag baby, was it the honest paper money which made no promise to pay gold, or the paper which promises to pay gold, when its promisors had not the gold to pay? Again, the Government has in circulation $10,527,502 and had deposits in savings banks amounting to $5,741,435, a total of $16,268,938 against which, it held only $2,633,916 in gold. The other $13,000,000 was represented by the confidence the people had in the Government of the country; and he was convinced there was not a man in this country who was not perfectly satisfied with these legal tender notes, although they were only backed by a little over two millions of gold. Take the bank circulation and the bank deposits, and the Government liabilities, payable always on demand. The bank notes and deposits amounted to $57,604,007, the Government notes and deposits in savings banks amounted to $16,268,938; total, $74,872,945, against which the banks held, specie, $5,896,408; the Government held, specie, $2,663,913; total, $8,560,321, or about a fraction under 12½c. of gold on the dollar of liabilities, leaving unrepresented by gold, and represented by nothing but the confidence of the people in the Government, and the banks $66,312,624. He would ask hon. gentlemen what difference in the circulation there would be if these 12½c. on the dollar were taken away? Was it not, when we came down to fact, the confidence the people had in the stability of the Government, and not the gold, which made legal tender notes pass current. Only the importer or the man leaving the country wanted gold, others never thought of it; the legal tender answered all their purposes, and if there was no gold to-day, that confidence would not be impaired in the least.

MR. WALLACE.

Another thing these honorable gentlemen said was, that this was fiat money. He would like them to show any money that was not fiat. It was all, whether gold or silver, paper or copper, fiat money. It would require something stronger, some objections more reasonable and better, than these to convince the people that an irredeemable paper money, convertible into everything, was not a correct system of money. Again, it was said we were taking up the worn-out clothes of the United States. That country, it was said, had gone back on the paper money, and was resuming specie payments. There was no such thing in the United States as the resumption of specie payments, as we understood it. A man could not take up a National Bank note there and go to any of the banks and demand gold for it, as banks were not bound to pay gold. It was true they were equivalent to gold, and the banks, as a matter of convenience to their holders, might give gold for them, but they were not payable in gold, and there was no place where gold could be had by right for them. Greenbacks, or legal tender notes, were exchanged for gold at the Sub-Treasury Office in New York, in sums of not less than $50. As we understand specie payments, a dollar note ought to be payable in gold, by the party issuing it, anywhere, if required. It would have been impossible for the United States to have paid gold to even that extent, had it not been for other circumstances that had materially changed the state of things in that country. For the last three or four years the United States had been exporting more than they imported, the effect of which was that gold had been brought into the country to the extent of sums varying from $19,000,000 to $257,000,000 a year, for the last four or five years, showing that gold was not wanted, and the much-abused legal tender note was to-day considered better than gold. There was, therefore, no such thing as a resumption of specie payments, as we properly called it. To prove how impossible it would be, he would cite the last returns, which showed that they had not a tithing of gold equal to the currency in circulation. On the 1st November, 1878, paper money in circulation in the United States was National Bank notes, $319,000,625 ; legal tender, $346,000,681 ; a total of $666,000,333. Against that how much specie did they hold. The banks in New York and elsewhere held of coin and bullion $17,394,111 ; in the treasury there was $144,539,441 ; total, $161,933,552, as against a total currency in circulation of $666,383,137. How was it possible for the country to pay $666,000,000 with $161,000,000 ? It was impossible. But gold was not wanted to the full amount. There was but one man in the country, the importer, with the exception of the man who was about to leave the country that wanted gold. For all the internal trade of the country, which was vastly greater than its exports and import trade, the currency was equal, and, in some instances, better than gold as he would show. Another thing with which the opponents of this policy attempted to frighten the people was a depreciated currency. What was a depreciated currency ? If a thing would buy its full value it would not be a depreciated currency. Look back to the old bank of Upper Canada which issued notes for which it promised to pay 100c. on the dollar in gold, and could not pay 50c. in gold. That was a depreciated currency. The Commercial Bank showed a depreciated currency also, because it could not pay its notes. The Colonial Bank, the Bank of Brantford, the International Bank, the Farmers' Joint Stock Company, and numerous other banks, which purported to pay gold, but could not do so, their notes were a depreciated currency. The legal tender note only promised to pay an indebtedness. It did not promise to buy a given quantity of gold, a given quantity of flour or butter, or anything else, but it promised to pay its face value of any article in the country in which it is made the money of the country. Hon. gentlemen would distinguish between money of the country and money out of the country. Money was only money in the realm in which it was created ; when it went beyond that it was only a commodity. Its value was its purchasing power in the country where it was issued, because beyond that it was of no value. He had shown them what constituted a depreciated currency. They might as well apply the term to gold, because it did not at all times buy the same quantity of flour, and then was a depreciated currency. In that case they would say flour had gone up ; in the other case, where the paper dollar lost part of its purchasing power, they would say the currency is depreciated. But the paper was not depreciated, it paid its face value, and never purported to do more. But, admitting it was a depreciated currency, it was not half as bad, in the interest of the country that issued it, as the depreciated property that we now had under certain circumstances. This currency would only be depreciated when it was brought into contact with values outside the country. If the country imported more than it exported, the result would be that the currency, or money, of that country from which we exported, would be wanted to pay for the difference between the imports and exports, and, if the currency were not valuable outside, it would take more of it to pay the difference. The effect of that would be, the importer, and he alone, would feel the loss sustained by the depreciation of the currency. There would be no lack of money to meet the requirements of the country. If the importer imported more than the country required, and had to give more for the gold than his circumstances warranted, he would properly come to grief, because he had mismanaged his business. The state of things now was infinitely worse than a depreciated currency ; it was a depreciated property. The exports were not sufficient to pay for our imports, and the consumer had to find the gold to pay for the excess of the former, and the fact of gold being scarce required great sacrifice on his part to obtain it. All property became depreciated, and the result was collapse of trade and ruin. In this case the value of all property suffered, while, in the former, it was only the man who over imported that felt the effects of a depreciated currency. Which, he would ask, was the worst, a depreciated currency, admitting it was depreciated, which he denied, or a depreciated property, that created trade disaster and brought ruin in its wake such as was seen to-day ? He contended that the depression we were suffering from was not from a legitimate cause, but simply from the fact that we had too little money in circulation, and credit was at present destroyed. He thought, therefore, that a depreciated currency was not so bad as a depreciated property resulting from an over importation of goods as compared with the exports. In any country where gold was the basis of its currency, and it had to be withdrawn to make up the vacuum between the exports and imports, the circulating medium of the country was withdrawn and the stoppage of trade was the result. Look at what the much abused greenback did for the United States. The credit of the Union, the Union itself, could not have been maintained except through it. Every one knew that the United States borrowed all they could, that their bonds and promises to pay were selling at one time at 35c. on the dollar, and that they could not borrow a dollar more. All the gold they could get from their own banks was about $12,000,000, but they afterwards succeeded, by their legal tender notes and fractional currency, in getting from the people a loan of between from $400,000,000 and $500,000,000 free of interest. The result was that the people of the whole country had the use of $346,000,000 since the year 1864, the year in which it was issued, and the interest upon that at 5 per cent. would be $260,000,000, showing that the American people got, principal and interest, over $600,000,000 that never cost the Government a cent. If they had borrowed that amount of money from outside, they could only have done so at a third of its face value, and they would have had to pay 5 per cent. interest to outsiders on the whole sum, or $260,000,000, and to-day would have owed $346,000,000 for the $120,000,000, or $140,000,000, which they would have got if that amount in bonds had been sold out of the country. Other causes, besides the issue of money, operated on the American currency. It was not due entirely to the amount issued that it depreciated in value. For, on looking at the returns of that country, it would be found that, in 1864, when they had $833,718,000 of paper money in circulation, it was only worth 38c. and a fraction in gold on the dollar; that the very next year, when they had $983,000,000, or $150,000,000 more, in circulation, their currency was worth 71c. and a fraction in the dollar, so that everyone must see that it was not the issuing of the quantity of currency so much as the fact that the people of the world believed the American nation was going to pieces, and would never be able to redeem its liabilities, which caused the depreciation in 1864. Even the American people themselves did not believe the Government would be able to outlive the war, and thought that their money would be of no value. It was worth twice as much in 1865 as it was in 1864, although in 1865 they had $150,000,000 paper money more in circulation than in 1864. There was another reason why the paper money of the United States became depreciated. They decried their own credit. The Government issued this money to pay all the debts it owed the people, but would not take it in return for debt the people owed the Government. They said: If you owe a debt to the Government you must pay it in gold, but you must take this paper money for any debt owed to you. Every man knew what the effect of any country repudiating its obligations must be. Its currency must come down in value. Americans discriminated between their own money and gold, not from choice, but from necessity. They wanted gold to buy materials to carry on the war: they could not get them at home and they had no credit abroad—they had to get gold to buy their goods, therefore, they had to discriminate against their own money, and so it became unequal to gold. These two facts contributed far more to depreciate paper money in the United States than all other circumstances. But he would inquire what money was, that we might have a proper understanding of it, because, although even all men liked to get money, they would fight for it, toil, rob and murder for it, yet he believed there was a great misapprehension as to the nature of money. It was neither a product of nature nor of labour, it was impossible to produce it by either. It was neither gold, silver, copper or paper, nor any material substance, it was simply a creation of Government. It could be made out of anything, and, therefore, could be nothing of itself. In this country we had gold, silver, and copper money, and in the common acceptation of the term, we had paper money also. This latter was made a legal tender for all that it promised to pay; but when you looked into it, these promises to pay had only 12½c. on the dollar in gold at their back. Yet there was not a man in Canada who was not as well satisfied, nay better satisfied, with the paper money of Canada than with the gold, because it was convenient to carry. Give a man $1,000 in gold, and although he would like to have it very well, he would change it into paper because it was more convenient to carry about with him. He could stick a $1,000 note into his pocket, and never know it was there. He said it was the creation of a Government, but it was more, it was a legalised measure. It was more than a legalised measure, it was a token of value, it was a convenience, and it was a power. He would like to ask hon. gentlemen, why insist on a measure being made of any particular material? Why insist that the measure of value—which money was—should be made of gold any more than a yardstick; why a measure of cloth should be made of gold? There was no reason for it, in his apprehension. Look at the absurdity of the thing—it would embarrass commerce, embarrass the exchange of production. Admit for a moment that a yard measure must be made of some particular kind of wood that was not common in this country, and that no other measure should be or could be used, what would be the effect of that? All the transactions of the country would be brought to a stand-still, or nearly so, on account of the difficulty of getting the measure. Men would substitute something else for it, as they do now for money. Gold, as a measure, was so scarce that men substituted credit for it. So they would substitute for the gold yardstick one of pine, or of white ash. But suppose, for a moment, that an edict was passed that a golden measure, or a foreign wood measure, was the only legal measure, some men would say: I shall not take the cloth by any other measure. Look at the derangement of trade in the case. All would have to get these measures, and trade would have to be stopped until they did get these measures. Would it not be a great inconvenience to have such a measure? But why should measures be limited? Why should not the measures be as numerous as the requirements of commerce demanded? Then why should we not have all the money required by the commerce and business of the country? Why should there be any limit to the measures of value any more than to any other measures we used? He thought there should be none, and if any hon. gentleman would give the matter serious consideration he would see the absurdity of having the measures limited. Then again, he held that an article of value was not fit for a measure, simply because being a changing quantity it could not be a measure. What would be the value of a yard measure that to-day was two feet eleven inches, next day two feet nine inches, and next day three feet one? The thing would be an absurdity, and this must be the case with any measure made of value, because, being itself a commodity, and subject to the law of supply and demand, it must be a changing quantity. Therefore, he contended that an article of value was not fit for a measure, and, therefore, that gold was not fit for a measure. In the first place it was not abundant enough to enable us to have a sufficiency of the measure, and because it was a changing quantity, unless, as was the case now, we made a fixed quantity of it by declaring by law that it was worth so much, and that was the only way we could make it a measure at all. Again, it was not fit for a measure, because it would not measure its own value—it was measured itself, its cost was the labour expended in finding it. A man who was starving would give all the gold in the world for a loaf of bread, so the man who was dying of thirst would give all the gold in the world, if he had it, for a drink of water. Therefore, when the system said that gold could measure anything, the thing was the most palpable absurdity that a man could utter. The only measure of anything, the true measure of everything, was man's necessities, just what a man would give of his labour for that which he wanted. What a man wanted to do with gold, what its use would be worth to him, was the measure of its value. Then, again, money was a convenience. Every man would admit that neither gold, silver, nor copper money was as convenient as paper money, not being as easily transmitted from place to place, nor so easily carried around as paper money. Money as a legalised value gave gold, which was money and the standard of value, an unjust supremacy over all other values, because if gold was scarce every other value was lessened or destroyed without reference to its cost or to its usefulness, which was its intrinsic value. Then, again, it was a power,—and here he held was where money did the greatest wrong if limited in quantity. It destroyed production in this way: You take money that is of value, and that value difficult to be got, and limited in quantity, what was the effect of it upon production? No one value bore any proportion to all other values, but by law we make one value measure all the others, and it measured them in this way: It made them go down in value until the greater meets the lesser, and in putting them down it put production out of existence. For instance, it takes so much labour, or the proceeds of labour, to buy a little gold, that men cannot live by labour. He believed that to-day one of the great causes of trouble was the scarcity of money or gold, which is the purchasing power, had put labour out of existence. Look at the absurdity of it—before a man could exchange his labour for bread he must have gold in between. And it being scarce it took so much of his production to buy a little gold that he could scarcely get bread enough to eat with his labour. If there was no gold in this country then, according to the principle now prevailing, we could do no business at all, because gold was the only legal measure, the only legal value, and consequently commerce must be at an end, all production must cease, and men must starve. The argument, therefore, of those hon. gentlemen who urged that gold was a necessity of commerce, had no logical sequence, it was an evident absurdity; and he also held that, in the power of money, the greatest wrong was in that way committed. For instance, he held that it ought to be true in political economy that the more a man worked the more he ought to have, and that the measure of his ability to purchase ought to be his ability and willingness to work. But was that the case? No. As it stood now, his ability to purchase was measured by the gold he could get by his labour. Was that right? The fact was that labour destroyed itself. The abundance of labour, instead of making more happiness, and giving the laborer more comforts, gave him less, because it made his labour less valuable as compared with gold, and because there was a limit to gold in comparison with labor and its products, to the extent that labour almost went out of existence if there was no gold. There is where the great wrong was done; that we made gold the purchasing power, or money the purchasing power, and, under our system, gold was money, and the only money that the law recognized, except the legal tender notes we had issued, and they were promises to pay gold. The wrong consisted in making the workingman, before he could purchase, exchange his labour into gold with which to purchase, instead of allowing him to exchange his labour, by some easy and convenient method, into the labour of some other man. A man who wanted labour ought to be able to exchange it freely and easily without the interference of gold, which was difficult to be got, and which took so much of the labour to get the purchasing power that the latter was almost destroyed. Now, look at paper money for a moment. He had said it was the best money as a measure, because it had comparatively no value of itself, and therefore was not a changing quantity. It might change in this way, however: If you made it abundant, it would have less purchasing power, but, just in the same way, if you brought into the country a large quantity of gold and put it in circulation, you decreased its purchasing power as you decreased the purchasing power of paper money by increasing its quantity. But what was the fact? When hon. gentlemen were talking of the great advance made by commerce in the last half century, they forgot that the great discoveries of gold in California and Australia gave a circulating medium to the business of the world that enabled it to expand. Gold became less valuable, and other articles went up in value, and that was the effect of the laws of supply and demand. The great feature of money was that, if you increased it in quantity, other articles which it purchased had a tendency to increase in value. Now, paper money being an article of no value, it could never of itself change; it would only represent the power that the law printed upon it. He maintained that paper money afforded the true system of protection to industry—a far better system than customs duties, which were merely a tax upon industry; but these collections of taxes were the method adopted for protecting our industries from coming into injurious competition with foreign industries. We placed a toll-gate on our frontiers, and allowed no one to come in without paying the toll. But paper money would afford industry the means of protecting itself. For illustration: our country imported more goods than it exported, and money had to be found to make up the difference, that is to say, gold had to be found, or its equivalent, because no country would accept as money the money of any other country except gold, or some article of equal purchasing power. If the imports were large, or likely to be large, or if the crops were likely to be short, the importing merchant seeing this, and seeing that gold was going to be scarce, that there was not going to be exports enough to pay for his imports, what did he do? He saw that he had to pay more for the gold and placed a higher price upon his imported goods, to cover the cost of converting them from the money of the country into gold. In this way paper money would afford true protection to production at home, because it increased the value of imported goods, and stimulated the production of articles in the country. Then again he contended that paper money gave stability to the Governmental institutions of the country. A man who held his money in gold could put it in his pocket and walk away if trouble came upon the country, but a man who held his wealth in the money of the country, must stay there, and must use it there, because it was comparatively of little value outside, and if there was a revolution in this country it would be valueless elsewhere altogether. Therefore it was his interest, as well as his duty, to remain in this country, to maintain its governmental institutions. He had said that paper money had, of itself, no intrinsic value; gold itself had very little intrinsic value either. Take an article of food, it had an intrinsic value, beside the labor it cost to produce it; that is, its value as an article for the sustenance of life. Both paper money and gold had a purchasing power, but gold had a purchasing power all over the world on account of the value put upon it by law. But of what value was gold as an article of use to man? Very little indeed. The savage used it to decorate his person, the civilised man to decorate his house as well as his person; but, compared with food or clothing, it was scarcely of any intrinsic value at all. Paper money had just as much value as gold, so far as its legal value was concerned. It was money just as much as gold in a country where it was made money. The two articles as money were on a par in the countries in which they were made money. Then, as far as the purchasing power was concerned, it was regulated by the law of supply and demand, the one just as much as the other. Increase the quantity of either, and the effect was at once to raise the price of everything that you bought with either of these values, because both were inevitably subject to the same laws, and it was impossible to increase the supply of anything without decreasing its value. It mattered not whether it was labour or the production of labour, gold, silver, or anything else, they had only to increase the supply in order to lessen the value. He had endeavoured to show what money was not; what, in his estimation, money was, and what were its uses, and that paper money was the true, the best money. He proposed now to show how it could be utilised by the people of this country. They were all the time borrowing. He believed that any country that borrowed was going to ruin. One party accused the Finance Minister of the other with not having made as good a loan as his predecessor, but he (Mr. Wallace) apprehended that both did equally well if they put the loans upon the foreign market on the same principle. There could be no difference, except in the terms on which the loan was offered. If one Finance Minister went to the old world and put his loan on the market at a certain price, and got it, he did not know but he could have obtained more. Another went to the same market and fixed the least price he would take, leaving it to open competition, knowing that he would thus get the best price, which was certainly the better plan of the two. In the difference of the plan the superiority or inferiority of skill was shown. Both were just in the position of all men borrowing, who were compelled to give the men that had the money what they asked. What did they see? They saw this great country, backed by its enterprising and intelligent population of 4,000,000, the almost untold wealth of its mines and forests and fertile lands, compelled, when they wanted to expend $1,000,000, or $1,500,000, to send the Finance Minister, hat in hand, to England, to the Jews of Lombard street, to ask how much they would give him on his securities. Was not this a humiliating position? He contended it was not a necessary position. If they would allow the intelligence of this people, backed by their enormous resources, to set to work, they could carry on their public works without borrowing from abroad. He contended that if Canadian credit and Canadian resources were good enough to build them with the intervention of English and foreign capital, they were good enough, if they could utilize them, to do so without it. No man, for a moment, would contend that the Englishman, or any other man, was going to invest his money simply for the benefit of the Canadian people. If he invested, it was because he believed it to be to his own interest, and he hoped and believed that when inducing the English capitalists and others to invest in this way, Canadians expected they would be repaid. He trusted the people of Canada had not come so low as to want to cheat them out of their money. They might cover the Canadian Pacific Railway from ocean to ocean with gold and it would not build a yard of the road. It would employ labour which must build it. He believed that Canadian resources could be utilised in a better way for employing Canadian labour than by borrowing gold upon them. He proposed to submit a plan by which it could be done according to his sincere belief. Meantime, people of this country were boasting of their prosperity all the time. Now, what did this pile of buildings, for example, in which they were assembled,—and of which they were so proud—represent—was it Canadian prosperity? No; but rather Canadian degradation, as being the evidence of Canadian indebtedness. It was the same with their Canadian railways, which were not, either, evidences of Canadian prosperity. Every $90 out of $100 invested in those roads belonged to English people, Canadians having but little interest in them, except in their working. Then go down to individuals, and see what the people were doing. The farmers, through the various loan societies, had mortgaged their farms in many instances, the process continuing daily. A large portion of the business of the professional men throughout the country was connected with those mortgages, for which the societies borrowed money from England, at a less rate of interest, loaning it afterwards at rates impossible for our people to pay. The result had been and would be that their farmers and business men had gone and would go to the wall through borrowing money at extravagant rates; and this was what the Canadian people had been calling prosperity. It was his firm belief that the continuance of this system would lead either to Canadian slavery or knavery. Either the Canadian people must become slaves or knaves—must repudiate or become slaves to enable them to repay. They had wealth in this country, and if they could sell large debentures in England could we not sell small ones here to our people? They had lands enough, and let them utilise them for building their public works, and see what their people could do. After the United States had exhausted their power to borrow from abroad, they made a loan at home of $300,000,000 which the people took up, to the advantage of the country. Some hon. gentlemen might say it was Protection that gave the impetus to the manufacturing industries of the United States; he believed it was the much abused paper money of that country that did the most in that direction. Protection helped, but paper money gave the people the wherewith to start manufactures, cheap money enabling them to compete with the cheaper labour of England and other countries. The labour was higher in the United States than in them, but the difference between money and 3 and 10 per cent. had much to do in the decision as to whether they should have manufacturing industries in a country or not. The result of putting that large amount of money in circulation in the United States, although for the destruction of property and life, bringing no useful return, was to start manufactories, because every man had money and wanted to use it to make it worth anything, it being so cheap. But returning to this country, he would try to show how they could utilise such money and the public credit. It was not a credit if they gave a paper dollar for a man's labour; he had earned that money, and, so far as he was concerned, there was no credit about it. Therefore, he contended that this was not credit for the people as a whole, for the people had the work of the man to represent the dollar. It was only giving an acknowledgment in the shape of money, and utilising it as a means for the payment of the people by the Government of the people. The people as a whole could not credit themselves. If they borrowed from outsiders then they owed a debt, but what the country owed to itself was not a debt. They had any extent of wild lands unoccupied, and forests and minerals, and could make iron, and wood-work out of their timber. All they wanted was labour. Let them issue legal tender notes to pay for that labor, and make them convertible into lands of the Dominion, or into bonds of 4, 5 or 6 per cent. interest, for which lands would be sold. At the same time that they issued this land scrip, and commenced building the public works, let Dominion land prospectuses be issued fixing the price of lands within a given distance of the railway; and before the 10 or 15 years that would be required to construct this road—a period long enough—they should have the railway finished, and the money paid for finishing it, back into the hands of the Government for the payment of its lands, those of the Executive of the people, and therefore the people's. So, in that way, the road would be built without creating indebtedness either upon individuals of this country, or the people as a whole. He would ask hon. gentlemen on both sides to consider whether it was not possible, by utilising their own resources, to do better than by mortgaging them to the people of England, or any other country? He believed that they could, and that there was not a moment to be lost in the adoption of this or some similar principle; because, if any country ever wanted assistance, Canada did at present, when everything was at a standstill, when no man knew whom to trust, or when or how business could be done. Such a scheme would give instantaneous relief to the industries of this country, and Canada, under such a system, would take a bound. It was not the kind of system they had had of late. They knew that only a false and fictitious prosperity could be created by borrowed money, which always went out of the country again, and when it was gone left a depression as great in proportion as was the apparent prosperity by which it was preceded. The Dominion owed $170,000,000, that entered in the shape of gold to build its railroads and other works. Where was it now? All that was left of it, apparently, was $8,000,000, all the rest having gone out to pay for imported goods. During the time that money was in circulation, they had a false prosperity—created, not by production or by the labour of the country, but by the increase of the price of both by borrowed money. They then spent more on luxuries; but, in a few years, the money was all gone, and they came down to hard pan, with years and years of depression, such as they now suffered from. The money spent on the Intercolonial Railway, and by the municipalities of Ontario and Quebec to build railroads, had all left the country, and the people were now called upon to pay interest on those loans, without the money to do it. And, to-day, what do we see? Bankruptcy and ruin everywhere. For the last three or four years this country had been borrowing to pay interest on its indebtedness. By adopting this plan, money would be more plentiful in the country, would create production, stimulate industries, and would not go away. Which of the two systems was the best in the interest of Canada? If they believed as he did, they would adopt the system he proposed, and without the loss of a moment. Contrast the two systems briefly. Every now and again they heard of waves of depression, which phrase was thought sufficient to explain disastrous conditions, of which they ought to find out the real causes. He understood depression brought on by the forces of nature, such as a storm, inflicting untold misery by destroying the food of the people, but he could not understand depression bringing severest misery in its train without apparent cause. What did they see? Often the hard earnings of a lifetime gone in a night without any reason; and men, whose arms were paralysed by hunger, willing to work and unable to find it to do. And why no work? Was it because the people had all the comforts that work would create? No; because look abroad and they would see an infinity of suffering men—millions suffering and almost naked, hungry and homeless; and yet people would say there was no work to do. Why was this suffering? It would be said it was on account of one of those waves of depression which periodically sweep over the world. If it was not due to natural causes, it must be due to false regulations imposed on society. He believed that the cause of the depression from which we now suffer was due to the present system of money. They had idolised gold, placed it on a throne, made it master of the world, and, to-day, it was crushing the life out of capital and destroying labour. Yet, when people spoke of anything like this scheme, that he believed would have the effect of alleviating the prevailing suffering, and relieving their industries from their present paralysis, there was no better argument to hurl against them than that it was a rag baby, that its advocates and the opponents of hard money were swindlers and fools. The supporters of the present system undertook to do what was a physical impossibility; they undertook to make the lesser contain the greater; they undertook to say that gold, which bore no comparison at all to the other products of the world, should measure them; they said that it was the only legal value. Could hon. gentlemen say, dare they say, that it was such a perfect system that it should not be touched, that no substitute should be sought for it? And yet they were following a course which would destroy the labour and industry of the country. They were advocating a system which must involve both capital and labour in one common ruin, and putting both within the grasp of gold and of the usurer. Although the fetters were golden and glittering, they were not the less cruel. They were as inexorably destroying both capital and labour, as the locomotive destroyed the unfortunate victim who, whether through accident or design, came in its way. The cause of the depression to-day was that there was not gold enough to carry on the business of the country. Take the commercial transactions of the world, and ninety out of every hundred were done on credit, because there was not sufficient circulating medium. Let hon. gentlemen look back and see if those credit transactions were not the beginning of the cause—the sole cause he might say—of the terrible burdens imposed on the workingmen and business men of the world to-day. When Jay Cook & Co. failed, other business men were brought down, and these brought others with them, with whom they were involved in business transactions. Credit collapsed, and the whole fabric fell like a child's house of cards. So credit was adopted simply because there was not gold enough to carry on the business of the world. They had undertaken to do what could not be done. They had substituted credit which had been followed by the abuse of credit, and credit itself was the result of a false system compelling gold to be the only medium of exchange, the only legal value. It did not matter how much a man had in the shape of wealth—if he owed $1,000 and had $10,000 worth of property, if he had not the gold he would have to give that $10,000 worth of property for his $1,000 indebtedness, for which his creditor insisted on being paid in gold. And that, he (Mr. Wallace) believed, was the cause of the wave of depression that swept over the commercial cities of the world. He asked if that system—if it had that effect on the people—could be called a system of perfection? On the other hand, he proposed a system that would be as expansive as the industries of the country. It was not difficult to give, because paper money was easily made. Hon.

MR. WALLACE.

gentlemen might say he proposed to make the country rich by making money. He never knew any Government make a country or any people rich; but Governments could do this. They could give facilities for becoming rich—means whereby industries could be developed. If hon. gentlemen said it was impossible for a Government to make money, then he (Mr. Wallace) was at issue with them. It was only the Government that could make money. But nothing would make a country rich except nature and the wealth that labour produced. This was the only true wealth of a country. There was no wealth that was not the creation of labour, either active or accumulated, because capital was only labour realized. Nature and labour were the only producers, and, therefore, the only enrichers of a country. It might be said that because paper money had been abused in the past, this measure should be opposed now. He had no doubt that hon. gentlemen who would take the opposite side of this question would tell the House about the French assignats, Continental money, and speak of American greenbacks, refer to George Law's scheme, and tell them about the money of the Southern Republics. But they might as well say a man should not drink water because he could be drowned in it, or approach fire because it burned, as to say they should not use paper money because it had been abused. He wanted hon. gentlemen, when they spoke about those things, to remember the difference between money and a promise to pay. Money completed a payment, whilst the other was an agreement to pay, and only transferred the indebtedness. An agreement to pay became valueless when there was nothing to pay it with. A man who sold 100 bushels of wheat and got $100, accomplished a complete transaction, but he was no wealthier than he was before; he had only exchanged his wheat for money. He held that the adoption of this system of financing would do away with the waves of depression, because it would, in a great measure, put an end to the credit system by which they were produced. He held that this system of money would be expansive and keep pace with the growing industries of the country, and that it would benefit the whole people of Canada. It would do away with the necessity of borrowing from abroad, and thereby save interest. He noticed that the interest on the public debt of Canada amounted to $7,000,000, or $1.75 per head of the population. Well, he proposed, in these resolutions, that the Government should issue $10,000,000 annually for carrying on the public works of the country. They were now paying $1.75 for interest; could they not, to far better advantage, invest in the securities of this country to the extent of $2.50 per head of the population? That would be $10,000,000. For instance, a man with a family of four would subscribe to the extent of $10, and he did not think there was a laboring man in the country that could not invest to that amount in these securities. He thought it could easily be done. In this way, our public works would be built and our country benefitted. If this plan were adopted, it was his belief that the man who saw Canada to-day would not know her ten years hence.

MR. CHARLTON said the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) had frequently advocated, upon the floor of this House, the views put forth to-day, and, while believing that the views embodied in these resolutions would be not only detrimental but ruinous to the interests of Canada, still the hon. gentleman was sincere in his advocacy of these resolutions, and his sincerity warranted him in the expectation that his views should be received with courtesy. That the issue of inconvertible money would quicken industries, and increase the national wealth in some mysterious way, was a fallacy which, though often exploded by irresistible logic, and the practical lessons of cruel experience, continually cropped to the surface, as it did in Canada to-day. In his opinion, circumstances were likely to arise in this country within a short time, which would make this fallacy peculiarly dangerous. They had recently, under the leadership of the hon. members on the Treasury benches, entered upon a fiscal revolution, one of the effects of which would, he believed, be to diminish the revenue of this country. He believed that another effect of that policy itself, already foreshadowed by the manner in which it was received in England, would be to greatly impair the credit of the country. Then the views advocated by the hon. gentleman would become peculiarly dangerous, and then the party in favour of the inconvertible, irredeemable issues of paper money, might become a powerful party, possibly the dominant party in Canada. The hon. gentleman affirmed in the first resolution that money was the creation of Government. That was an error, from which the hon. gentleman proceeded to draw false deductions. He (Mr. Charlton) denied that money was the creation of Government. The time once was that mankind in their transactions had to resort to barter; such a thing as a measure of value or medium of exchange had no existence. They had to confine themselves to the exchange of commodities; under such circumstances trade was crude and limited, and extensive commercial transactions were impossible. Under these circumstances, necessity, the mother of invention, compelled man to invent money. It was not created by Government; it was invented by man. Various articles had, in times past, served for money. Cattle had been used as money; cowrie shells were used among the Africans, and wampun belts made of shells, had been used among the American Indians as money; various articles had, in different countries, at different times, served the purpose of money. But there was one essential requisite it must possess, that was, value. That was the first requisite. Now, the hat before him (Mr. Charlton) possessed value. It possessed a specific purchasing power. If he found a man who wanted that hat, and was willing to give in exchange for it something that he (Mr. Charlton) wanted, that hat formed the basis of a barter, and had a specific purchasing power. The article chosen to serve as money must in itself possess value and have a specific purchasing power. The next step was to make the article chosen as money and possessed of value generally valuable, and to give it a general purchasing power, thereby making it a measure of service and a medium of exchange in which the terms of all values could be expressed, for which all commodities could be exchanged; or which could be exchanged for any and all commodities at the pleasure of buyer and seller. The money invented to serve this purpose was not created by Government; it could only be regulated by Government. The Government stamped upon a \$20 gold piece, a doubloon, or a sovereign, its money value. The public took that stamp as evidence of the fact that that piece of money had a certain degree of fineness and weighed a certain number of grains. Should the Government put their stamp upon a coin that weighed only one-half it professed to do, or that was of base metal, the coin would not pass current; it would be a debased coin. The coin that passed the Government mint did not owe its current value to the Government stamp, but sold within a small fraction of its expressed value for commercial purposes or the arts. For certain good reasons, gold and silver had been chosen as articles that should be made money. They had an account of a commercial transaction which had occurred 3,800 years ago, when Abraham purchased a burial place of Ephron, and paid him 400 shekels of silver, current money with the merchant. In that remote age, silver was used as money, as the medium of exchange. There were good reasons for selecting silver and gold to serve the purposes of money. Naturally, men looking out for some commodity possessing value, for money purposes, looked for something which had a steady value. These precious metals possessed a comparatively steady value for several reasons. First, because a steady demand existed for purposes of art, and steadiness of value would be more completely secured by their use as money. Next, the cost of production was tolerably uniform; they were produced at the cost of great labour and expense, which secured steadiness of value. During the last 1,000 years there had been but two material changes in the value of these precious metals. First, in the sixteenth century, when the mines of Mexico and Peru were discovered. Next, in this century, when gold was found in California and Australia. With these two exceptions, gold and silver had maintained their values, almost without variation, for many centuries. They were eminently suitable for money, also, because of their quantity. The quantity in circulation was enormous; so enormous that the amount annually produced bore no considerable proportion to it; nor did the amount annually lost by shipwrecks, etc., materially affect it; and yet, enormous as the quantity was, it did not exceed, and probably could not be produced in excess of the requirements of commerce and the arts, in consequence of which, the precious metals bore a value steadier almost than any other commodity that could be named. Another feature, as regards these precious metals, and which rendered them all the more desirable for the purpose of money, was their fluency—they passed from one continent to another, and from one nation to another, according to the laws of supply and demand. They were universal money. If gold was scarce in the United States to-day and plentiful in England, by the law of supply and demand, gold would flow from one country to another, like water seeking a level. The value, or purchasing power of gold was regulated and made uniform by this attribute of fluency throughout the whole of the commercial nations of the globe. Another reason why they were suitable for money was, because of their physical peculiarities. One of their peculiarities was, that they were uniform in quality. The silver found in the Comstock lode to-day was precisely the same in quality with that which Abraham used 3,800 years ago; and the gold mined in California and Australia to-day possessed exactly the same qualities as did the gold of Ophir which was used by Solomon in decorating the Temple in Jerusalem. Another quality which rendered it peculiarly adapted for the purposes of money was its portability. They had in gold a great value in a small compass. Another thing which rendered it peculiarly fit for the purpose was its divisibility without loss. If they took a \$20 note, and divided it into two parts, five parts, or twenty parts, its parts were worthless. But if they divided a \$20 gold piece into two, five, or twenty parts, it was still valuable. It had been divided without loss in its aggregate value. Another reason why it was admirably adapted for the purposes of money was the universal and instinctive desire of man to possess the precious metals, because they were always objects of beauty, and, lastly, it was adapted to the purposes of money because it was indestructible. Gold and silver had been used for the purposes of money, to our certain knowledge, for 3,800 years, and during all that time the ingenuity of man had failed to discover any substitute for gold and silver for the purposes of money. As he would have occasion to show, before he concluded his remarks, men had sought out many inventions in this respect, and all of them had brought men to recognise the principle in political economy that there were great dangers attendant upon the issue of money by Governments, even while the Government professed to issue it upon a promise to pay in gold coin, while irredeemable issues had never yet failed to result in loss and disaster. There was some safeguard in respect to the issue of notes by banking institutions which did not apply to Government issues. Bank issues were paid out on loans, and almost immediately returned in the form of deposits, payment of loans, or demand for specie. So it was impossible for a bank to place in circulation a larger amount than the commercial wants of the country required. A Government, on the contrary, had not this safeguard, and notes would almost inevitably be issued in larger amounts than the healthy demands of trade required, and would not be returned to the issuer as in the case of banks. The scheme of his hon. friend from South Norfolk purposed three different modes for the floating of paper money. The first mode was provided in the third resolution, in which he provided for expenditure upon public works to the extent of \$10,000,000 annually, provided subsequent considerations did not induce the promoters of this scheme to increase the payment beyond \$10,000,000 annually, which was very likely to be the case. Now, when public money was expended upon public works in excess of the revenue which that Government received, that money at present must be borrowed. The very fact that the money must be borrowed exercised a restraining influence upon the Government. In the first place, the Government had to bear in mind the fact that, whenever money was borrowed, the interest must be provided for by taxation. That furnished one check on the acts of a Government. Another check was that a Government, on going into the markets of the world to borrow money, must satisfy capitalists, who had money to lend, that the purpose for which the money was to be expended, was a judicious one. No capitalist would continue to lend money to a Government which was reckless in its expenditure and destroying their means of paying the interest on the public debt. Now these considerations did not obtain in the issue of Government money for the purpose of constructing public works. No such safeguard, no such restriction existed. The Government might lavish out its issues by the hundred of millions if they chose. There were no restrictions except the fear of ultimate total worthlessness of the issues, which the advocates of the scheme would not believe. The reckless sowing of millions—jobs, rings, speculations and corruption would inevitably be the result of any such system as the contemplated issue of public money, in large amounts, for the purpose of constructing public works. In the ninth resolution the hon. gentleman provided for the floating of the Government issues, by proposing to make the Government a note broker for the banks. The banks were to receive from the Government Government notes, and in return for this money loaned to them they were to deposit with the Government their notes, and also bonds of the bank as security. Now, in the first place, this scheme would involve most cumbersome details in the management of this business, between the banks and the Government. It would make an opening for manipulation and favoritism, which it was not necessary to dwell on at this time. One feature which would condemn it, apart from all others, was that it would necessarily end in the ruin of the banks, because this Government currency furnished to the banks would constantly depreciate, as he would, in the course of his remarks, satisfactorily show. The banks would be called upon to give their bonds and assets for the currency furnished to them, which was constantly depreciating, and rapidly approaching worthlessness. The third mode by which the hon. gentleman proposed to float this money was by the exchange of currency for the bonds of the Government. He (Mr. Charlton) presumed that, by this scheme, very little money would be floated, as the widening gulf between inconvertible currency and gold-bearing bonds would speedily end all transactions. In regard to the fifth resolution, he must give the hon. gentleman credit for his honesty. In that resolution he provided "That all debts or other obligations heretofore incurred shall be payable in gold or in Dominion money, at a rate that shall make it equivalent to gold, and that hereafter every contract or agreement to pay gold within the Dominion shall be illegal, and shall not be enforceable by law." The hon. gentleman was much more honest in this respect than were the originators of the greenback scheme in the United States, because no such provision was made by them. But the hon. gentleman, in making this honest provision, also made a confession. He practically confessed that it would be impolitic and dishonest to compel creditors of the Government to accept this money for loans made in gold, and therein he confessed that this money would be a depreciated currency that would constantly tend towards worthlessness. The hon. gentleman's scheme was distinguished from all other irredeemable money schemes of which he (Mr. Charlton) knew by the fact that he proposed to repudiate the gold standard. He solemnly repudiated the use of gold as a standard of value. The continental money which the hon. gentleman had referred to, and which became worthless, stipulated that the redemption should be made in Spanish mill dollars. The American greenback stipulated that the United States would pay, at some future time, in gold. He thought he knew of but one case in which Government currency issues were similar in character to those which the hon. gentleman proposed to issue. That was in the Chinese Empire in the ninth century. They used the inside bark of the mulberry tree, which bore the Government stamp, and bore a value in proportion to its size, and it passed as current money in the payment of debts without promise of redemption in anything else upon pain of death. This was an absolute money, fit to be ranked alongside with the absolute money which his hon. friend proposed to make the legal tender of the Dominion. He had in his possession a specimen of absolute money, issued as a specimen of what fiat money in the United States would in future be if the Greenbackers succeeded, and similar to that which we should have ultimately if the proposition of his hon. friend passed into law. It was a bill for \$1,000, and was inscribed: "Absolute money for the sum of \$1,000, redeemable nowhere, in nothing, and by nobody. The law directs that this money shall circulate freely. When this note has been spent, another may be had upon application at the United States Treasury. Brick Pomeroy, Treasurer; B. F. Butler, General Distributer. Full tender for debts, public and private. Death to any man who refuses to give us more credit." The note was of "B" series, No. 59,843,702,086,231,987. On the back of the note he found inscribed: "Civilisation demands paper currency, representing no artificial value.—Francis W. Hughes." This was just the thing—"represents no value whatever." Again, "This is 'honest money,' and will make everybody honest, as no one will counterfeit it, rob, or kill for it." "When the Government has completed its work of issuing one of these notes to each individual in the nation, every person will be worth \$1,000." "This note is to be received at its face for all debts, public or private. To prevent disputes between buyers and sellers as to the amount of this money necessary to purchase any article of commerce, value and prices, in all cases, are to be fixed by the purchaser." Another inscription on the bill was, "Gold is a coward." "H. B. Wright—This money is not afraid of anybody." These were some of the characteristics that would be possessed by the absolute money, which his hon. friend from South Norfolk proposed to furnish to this country. It might be an interesting enquiry to ask how the hon. gentleman intended to provide for the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt of the country. In the United States, the Government, foreseeing that they had debts to provide for, made one exception in which greenbacks would not be received. They were not receivable for duties. Gold alone was received in payment of duties. This provision was made in order to enable the country to pay the interest on their debt, and the principal of the bonds due in gold. There was no such safeguard provided in these resolutions. No provision was made for the payment of the interest on our indebtedness, amounting to about \$7,000,000 per annum, and, under these circumstances, it would be impossible for the Government to provide for the honest discharge of its obligations. His hon. friend, in the fifth resolution, provided "that, hereafter, every contract or agreement to pay gold, within the Dominion, shall be illegal, and shall not be enforceable by law." The hon. gentleman had mistaken his powers, even had he the power to enact laws for the Dominion. A long time ago a British king, flattered by his courtiers, imagined that he could sit upon the sea shore and stay the tide at will. He did so, but the billows of the mighty deep continued to advance. They were not informed that the laws of nature had been set aside by the enactment of Canute. The tide came in, and so rapidly that the king had to save himself from a watery grave by an ignoble flight. And so it was with his hon. friend from South Norfolk. He might enact this law, and make transactions in gold illegal, but gold was a measure of value throughout the world, and had been recognised as money throughout all ages and nations, and the hon. gentleman would be impotent to exclude the influence and destroy the functions of gold. The hon. gentleman, in the fourth resolution, proposed to establish a subsidiary coinage of silver. Now a subsidiary coinage might be kept in circulation for one or two years, but the moment the issues of this legal tender money depreciated below the value of silver as measured by gold, the silver would disappear from circulation. This was in accordance with the principles of what was known as Gresham's law, which was simply that a more valuable money would not circulate with an inferior or less valuable money, but would be hoarded and disappear from circulation. This had been the case in the United States. There, when greenbacks reached a moderate discount, silver disappeared before provision had been made for fractional currency. Provision had been made in the sixth resolution for the funding of this absolute money in bonds or in land scrip, the bonds to be paid in legal tender money when due, or to be funded in land scrip, on which interest would be paid at the rate of six per cent. Now, with reference to the bonds, if it were stipulated that they were payable in gold, there might then be a prospect of funding a considerable portion of this money in bonds, but no man would think of funding legal tender money on legal tender bonds, which possessed exactly the same value as legal tender money, because those who had surpluses to invest would be astute enough to know, not only the probable utter worthlessness of the money, but of the bonds also, and, as no sane man hoarded depreciating currency, neither would anyone buy bonds payable at a future date in such currency for investment. In regard to the provision for funding in land scrip, if they calculated the emigration to the North-West at 50,000 annually, that would represent 10,000 families. These 10,000 families might each, on an average, require 100 acres of land, and that would represent an annual sale of 1,000,000 acres of land. Now, if the legal tender money was absorbed in land scrip, at a rate not exceeding 1,000,000 acres of land a year, provided that amount of land was annually settled, and the sale of land scrip did not exceed that amount, their land scrip would not depreciate rapidly, and the provision for funding currency in land scrip might afford some slight check upon the depreciation of the currency, but the instant the amount of scrip issued exceeded the demand for land, depreciation would commence, and its extent would be in proportion to the excess of supply over demand. He had had some experience in American land scrip. He was aware that the United States, in issuing land warrants for their soldiers, threw a large amount of land scrip of that character on the market, and land warrants, calling for 160 acres, had, within his recollection, been sold for \$100 within recent years, although the land, if sold in the ordinary course of business, would have brought \$200 per 160 acres. Almost all the American States had issued land scrip for the purpose of endowing colleges and other institutions, redeemable in the lands of the State, wherever such lands were situated, and these issues had always been at a heavy discount, which had sometimes been as great as fifty per cent. Such would be the character of land scrip issued by the Government. If issued in a larger amount than the wants of the settlers demanded, as would certainly be the case, it would be the most worthless security of any in the whole class. He would now call attention to some of the general and the certain results of inconvertible paper money issues. There was a rule to which coin always conformed; it was issued, or hoarded, according to demand. Convertible paper money conformed to the same rule. It was issued, or hoarded, according to demand. To-day the banks of the Dominion had \$19,000,000 in circulation. The probability was that, in the busy season of the coming year, that amount would be swelled to \$25,000,000, and, as soon as the demand fell off, the amount would be diminished. But this was not the characteristic of irredeemable paper money. It was not issued according to demand, but was forced into circulation in excess of the requirements of commerce, and became depreciated in value. It might be argued that paper money could be issued without evil result if its circulation did not exceed the requirements of trade; but that was a question so delicate that it was most dangerous to trust it to the haphazard direction of legislation. It was a question that ought never to be entrusted to a legislative body, and that never had been entrusted to one without serious or ruinous consequences, resulting as would unquestionably be the case in this instance, were the policy of the hon. gentleman adopted. He would suppose that this Government adopted the scheme of his hon. friend, and issued such an amount of money as he might advise. Following that very speedily, if the scheme, foreshadowed in this resolution, were adopted, would be depreciation in value. Depreciation in value meant loss of purchasing power. That would affect the Government in this way: The taxes received by the Government would lose their purchasing power in proportion to the depreciation, and to that extent the Government would be under the necessity of making a further issue; then another pressure would come—a pressure that had always been an important factor in affairs of this kind. The debtors would bring pressure on the Government, and demand fresh issues, in order that their debts might be more easily paid. He did not deny that one of the first results of large issues of inconvertible money would be a deceitful glow of apparent prosperity. Prices would apparently rise. Old debts would be easily paid with money constantly receding in value from the point at which it stood when the debt was contracted. Legitimate trade would speedily become fitful and spasmodic. A marked tendency of a desire to become rich without labour would manifest itself, and luxury and extravagance would follow. Next, they would have stock gambling, and, as an attendant to this state of things invariably, corruption of legislative bodies and public morals followed, which worked greater injuries to the State than the depreciation of values. After this system of the issue of irredeemable money had been in operation for a while, one of most marked speculative movements would be found to be in clothing, food and the necessaries of life. These articles would rise in value, measured by the paper money, more rapidly than any others. While this process would be going on, attempts to increase compensation of labour would be resisted; and it would be found invariably that the wages paid to the labourer in irredeemable money eras did not advance in the same ratio as did the prices of the necessaries the labourer must have. The consequence was that, while the commodities which the labourer must purchase would advance perhaps 100 per cent., his wages would scarcely advance 50 or 60 per cent. The rich man, however, who had the capital, and could forecast the operation of this system, inevitably became richer, so that the tendency of the system in all cases was to add to the burdens of the poor man and swell the gains of the rich man. As this money became more abundant, and consequently more worthless, those who had fixed incomes suffered severely. The widow and the orphan, with a pittance barely sufficient to sustain life under ordinary circumstances, would be reduced to beggary. One could imagine the consternation that would arise among the gentlemen belonging to the Civil Service of this country if this system were introduced, which would result in giving a nominal dollar the purchasing power of, perhaps, 25c., or 50c. If the policy of the hon. gentleman from South Norfolk were adopted, he would venture to predict that in five years members of Parliament coming to attend the Session would barely be enabled to pay their board bill with their sessional allowance of \$1,000. Whoever might fill the position of Speaker would, perhaps, be able upon his salary to pay his board bill and give two entertainments in the Session. Another feature also attendant on this system was that prices were not only enhanced by depreciation, but by fluctuation. He had seen the operation of this law in the United States for years. A man buying a line of goods for which he gave his note, or even cash, and which he expected to sell at some future time, was compelled to add to his profits a margin to cover the probable fluctuation of prices, in consequence of the fluctuation of the premium upon gold, and to his certain knowledge the consumers of the United States had for twelve years paid on an average from 15 per cent. to 20 per cent. more than they would have paid under the ordinary course of things, as a premium to cover the fluctuations in the prices of goods consequent upon the fluctuations in gold during the time that intervened between their purchases and their sales. As this process of depreciation, which set in with the inauguration of the irredeemable money, proceeded, the creditor continued to be robbed, because the money he received in payment of debt was certain to be of smaller value than when the money was loaned or the article representing it sold. But if, after reaching a certain point, contraction was inaugurated for the purpose of touching solid ground again, then the condition of things would be reversed, and, instead of the creditor being robbed, the debtor was put through that process. That had been the state of matters in the United States ever since the inauguration of a system looking towards resumption. From that moment, greenbacks approached par, and consequently every time a debtor paid a debt he paid it in a currency worth more than when the debt was contracted. It was estimated that more than half of the bankruptcies that had occurred in the United States since that period were owing to that gradual process of shrinking. When speculating upon the probable result of any scheme, they might argue upon the theory as long as they liked, but it was always well if they had practical illustrations in point, to pay some attention to these. In considering this question, which was evidently going to become an important question in this country, they would do well to heed the practical illustrations resulting from the issue of irredeemable paper money, in various countries and at various times. He had referred to the mulberry bark money of China, issued in the ninth century, and found in circulation in the empire in 1160 by Marco Polo, circulated under pain of death, and which afterwards became entirely worthless. Several of the American colonies, before the revolution, tried that policy. In Connecticut, in 1740, \$1 silver was worth \$4 legal tender of that colony. In nine years later \$1 silver was worth \$8 in currency, so great had the depreciation become. Rhode Island issued paper money for the express purpose of promoting manufactures and advancing commerce. In 1763 \$1 of silver money in Rhode Island was worth \$7 legal tender, and six years after it was worth \$27, and shortly after the legal tender was abolished. Massachusetts first issued paper currency in 1690. In 1706 exchange upon London was 135; in 1749 it was 1,100. Massachusetts, about that time, received £138,000 sterling, as her share of the ransom of Louisburgh, and, with Yankee 'cuteness, she devoted that money to the redemption of legal tender in the proportion of 1 to 11, and enjoyed afterwards an enviable distinction for prosperity, in consequence of adhering to the specie standard, being in future years known as the "Silver Colony." In 1740 the paper currency of North Carolina was so depreciated that \$14 was equal to only \$1 in silver, and the same year it required \$8 of the currency of South Carolina to purchase \$1 in silver. One of the best illustrations furnished upon this continent of the natural result of this system was that furnished by the continental money of the American colonies during the revolution. Its first issue, which was payable in Spanish mill dollars, was made in 1775; eighteen months afterwards, it stood at a discount of fifty per cent. In 1780, the depreciation had become so great that Congress felt it was necessary to make some readjustment, and they agreed to pay three and one-third cents on the dollar in promises-to-pay, and they funded their continental money in certificates, \$1 in certificates representing \$30 of continental currency. Very soon \$1 in silver equalled \$5 in certificates, or \$320 in currency. Shortly after, this money became so abundant that \$1 in silver was worth \$1,000 in continental money, and very speedily the entire system was abolished by total loss. What were the circumstances attendant upon the return to a metallic basis in the American colonies? Property was sold under execution without satisfaction of claims, and so serious were the derangements and general distress that many States passed stay laws. Massachusetts, being determined to reach a sound basis as soon as possible, refused to pass a stay law, and an insurrection broke out in consequence, which was with difficulty suppressed. The evil results of this issuing of irredeemable money were so palpable that, when the Constitution was adopted, a few years afterwards, it contained an explicit clause forbidding the States from emitting letters of credit or enacting tender laws, and it was believed the intention of the founders of that Constitution was to apply that clause to the United States. The United States Supreme Court decided that that clause did apply to the United States, but that decision was afterwards reversed by a shameful juggle, which want of time prevented an explanation of. If they turned to England, they found that the suspension of specie payments occurred there in 1797. It produced serious financial derangements, but it differed from the system of his hon. friend, in the fact that the notes of the Bank of England were never made legal tender. There was no over-issue; the bank always professed to be able, ultimately, and most of the time professed to be immediately, ready to resume specie payment, and resumption was effected in 1821. The highest rate of premium in England was about 30 per cent. during the period of that suspension. One of the most instructive illustrations of the folly of irredeemable currency issue was furnished by France. France, in 1716, had the good fortune to have among the gentlemen who came to Paris for the purpose of pushing their fortune, a Scotchman, by the name of George Law. He talked very much as the hon. member for South Norfolk did, in listening to whom one would almost fancy he heard George Law in Paris addressing the French Council, and telling them that this idea of basing issues upon gold was a fundamental error; that one acre of land was as well worth £20, and was as good a basis for £20 in money as £20 in gold was. Law succeeded in inducing the French to believe in this theory. He established a bank in 1716, which was soon made the Royal Bank. Its issues were guaranteed by the State, and rested for security on the value of State property. This bank issued 3,019,000,000 francs in notes. The scheme ran its course in four years, after a period of wild speculation, the Mississippi scheme being a craze of the day, and in 1720 the notes of the Royal Bank of France were worth no more than waste paper, and George Law was a fugitive from justice. Time passed on; in 1789 the revolution came, and it was again proposed to issue paper money. But it was resisted in the French Assembly; they pointed to the experience of France in 1720; they said: Do not again introduce a system fraught with ruin, such as France suffered from then. Others said: Forewarned, forearmed, we know the result of over-issue in the days of George Law; such a mistake can never be made again. Church estates were confiscated, and assignats were issued, based upon the value of the church property. The first issue was 400,000,000 francs, made in the spring of 1789. The next issue, late in 1789, was 800,000,000 francs. Then great excitement prevailed in Paris. It was urged that progress towards repudiation, loss and ruin was rapid, and that such a result would certainly be reached. Then the French Assembly solemnly enacted that the total issue of assignats should not exceed 1,600,000,000 francs. The third issue was made in January, 1790, of 600,000,000 francs, which made a total of 1,800,000,000 francs, 200,000,000 francs in excess of the maximum limit fixed by the French Assembly. And then what occurred? Why, capital withdrew from active employment, labour was in demand only where labour had to be had, business dwindled down to only what was necessary for actual living from hand to mouth. Commerce was dead, and betting had taken its place. In February, 1792, 3,400 million francs of assignats had been issued, and then the money had become so worthless that the Government could scarcely be carried on in consequence of the resignation of officials. That result had been reached, that result would be reached here, if this scheme were adopted, when their salaries would not keep the wolf from the door, in consequence of the depreciation of the currency. The Assembly felt it was necessary to do something—just as his hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) had in that resolution he had foreshadowed—stating that it should be illegal to do business in future in gold. The first step was to pass a law providing that no food or wine or any other article or necessary of life should be sold above a certain price in assignats, under severe penalty. Next, a law was passed prohibiting the purchase of specie, and the penalty for that heinous offence was six years in irons. Next, a law was passed prohibiting the sale of assignats for less than their face value, and the penalty for the offence was twenty years in chains. There was a party then in France, who held that France was for Frenchmen, and that no French capital should be invested abroad, and a law was passed visiting the penalty of death upon any Frenchman who invested his means in a foreign land. Event followed event in rapid succession, and in 1795, 238 assignats in paper were worth twenty-four in silver; in 1795 the depreciation had so far increased that 5,337 assignats in paper were worth twenty-four in silver and, a short time afterwards, 100 assignats were worth five sous. Then the French Assembly felt called upon to go into bankruptcy, and offered to pay 3¼c. on the dollar in promises. The plan adopted was to convert the assignats into mandats, one mandat representing thirty of the original issue. Speedily these mandats were worth only one-thousandth of their par value, at which rate the original assignat was worth $\frac{1}{30000}$ of par value, and very soon after this the whole fabric crumbled to ruin and was wiped out by repudiation. Then, what followed? The Assembly passed an edict allowing transactions in any money, and, when that was passed, hoards of gold and silver were brought out, the anxiety to possess real money was so great that goods and wares were sold at a low rate. Exchange turned in favour of France, from that day. During all the wars of Napoleon, France conducted her vast military operations, and made her enormous military expenditures, on a metallic basis, as might be done in any country. That experience would last France, it was safe to say, for centuries to come. Twice, indeed, since then, the Bank of France had suspended specie payments,—in 1848 and 1870,—but at no time, during either suspension, had the premium upon gold exceeded 3 per cent. Suspension was, in each case, a precautionary and temporary measure only. Faith in speedy resumption was, in each case, unwavering. The position of the Bank of France, in each instance, was a strong one, and during its latest suspension, it had accumulated the greatest hoard of gold of which history gave any account, amounting, if his memory served him, to \$350,000,000. Time would not permit him to dwell in detail upon the experience of Russia, where, in 1834, the paper rouble was funded in silver, in proportion of $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 1; the experience of Austria, where the premium on silver in 1810 was 1,200 per cent., and where the Government funded its original issue of florins in a new issue of 5 to 1. Had he time, he might refer to Turkey, with a medley of debased coins and irredeemable notes, almost worthless; the sickest thing about the sick man of Europe was his sick finances, made sick mainly in consequence of irredeemable paper money. He might refer to the South American States, where all degrees of discount had been reached, being, in some cases, 400 of paper to 1 of silver. He might refer to the Confederate States where, before the fall of Richmond, \$100 of Confederate money was worth \$1 of silver. He might refer to Spain and Italy, he might refer even to the little negro kingdom of Hayti, while they had the hon. gentleman's panacea for commercial ills, and where it took \$100 in legal tender to buy a breakfast. They had a very interesting illustration of the evils of irredeemable paper money in recent times in the nation to the south of us. At no time did that nation profess to issue an absolute money; at no time did it profess, or intend, to pay anything but gold for its bonds, principal and interest. At all times that nation affirmed that the money issued as a legal tender should be redeemed in gold, and the people of the United States had faith that that promise would be redeemed. Notwithstanding that greenbacks were at one time worth but 34c. on the dollar in gold; notwithstanding that the United States had suffered enormous loss from the prevalence of this system in the country; to-day it owed \$1,000,000,000 more than it would have owed had its currency been kept on a specie basis. That \$1,000,000,000 represented a loss to the tax-payers of the United States, which had been produced by the suspension of specie payment, but it was only a tithe of the loss that had been inflicted on that country during the last 15 years, in consequence of the evils of an irredeemable paper currency. What had been the verdict of the American people? That country had had sad experience since 1862, of the blessings, or the curses, of an irredeemable paper currency. And what had been the action of that people? Had they retained it as a blessing? No; the United States, after an ample trial of an irredeemable paper currency, had returned to specie payment. He knew his hon. friend from South Norfolk would deny it: it would militate somewhat against his arguments if he were to acknowledge it. The American Government did, about three years ago, enact that, on the 1st day of January, 1879, they would return to specie payment. They proceeded to accumulate funds sufficient for that purpose, and on the 1st day of January they did resume, and every day since that time whoever might want gold on any United States promise to pay could have it on application to the Treasury of the United States. It was a fact that the United States had resumed specie payment. He knew his hon. friend from South Norfolk held that the supply of gold was inadequate for the purpose. There were, he believed, about 25,000 people in the city of Ottawa, and it was a well-known fact that every man, woman or child of them was liable to die to-night, but it was not necessary to keep 25,000 coffins on hand, because it was almost certain they would not all die at once. So it was with the reserve of specie kept on hand by the United States and in Canada. All the bills in Canada, or in the United States, were liable to be presented at once for specie payment, just as all these people in Ottawa were liable to die at once, but the one event was just as likely to happen as the other. It had been ascertained from long experience and satisfactory data what reserve it was necessary to maintain to meet the probable demand for specie, and that proportion was maintained in the United States and Canada. The fact that the United States returned to specie payment furnished us with proof that they, at least, after a full and fair trial, could not see the blessings of this system that his hon. friend from South Norfolk imagined would come to Canada. Should we be blind to the teachings of experience? In all the States he had pointed out there was not one in the long weary list that could not tell of the misery, suffering, loss and ruin that were the results of such fallacious theories as those advocated by his hon. friend. He hoped it would be long before any considerable portion of the Canadian people would listen to such fallacious arguments with regard to the paper currency system of this country. He begged to move, seconded by Mr. Trow, that the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that the resolution under consideration be referred to the Committee of the Whole House this day six months.

Mr. BOULTBEE said he did not think the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk had treated the mover of the resolutions in exactly the way he should have done, and he had treated this very grave subject with more levity than was becoming. Some of his illustrations and figures were, to say the least, very unhappy ones. For instance, he showed his hat as an illustration of value. He (Mr. Boulton) took it, without having seen it closely, to be a second-hand one. Now, a second-hand hat was not a good example of a value. If a man were driven to desperate extremity under a burning sun he might not give much for the hon. gentleman's hat. He (Mr. Boulton) questioned whether it would be of any greater value than an American $1,000 bill. That might purchase his hat, or the hat the bill. The hon. gentleman in opening had shown that he still felt rather melancholy with regard to the tariff, as he characterised it as revolutionary. He had yet to learn that, when we had a 17½ per cent. tariff, adding 2½ per cent. more was a revolutionary proceeding. It had been found necessary to raise the tariff in order to meet the deficiency in the revenue caused by the hon. gentleman and his friends. Surely there could be nothing revolutionary in that. There could be nothing wrong in taking our national revenues to pay our national debt. The whole tone of the hon. gentleman's argument was based on the assumption that this Government, and the Government to which he had alluded, wished to issue, or would issue, under a scheme like this, an improper amount of currency. But it surely might be thought proper for a Government, in its own interest and to develop its own industries, to issue a certain amount of notes based on the property of the nation. If a Government wished to carry out certain great works, why could it not issue its own notes in payment of those works, and have those works at its back, as well as the resources of the country, to give them credit? He took it that there was no need that that currency, if issued in a proper amount, should depreciate. This currency of China, to which the hon. gentleman alluded, though it was composed of bark, or any other material, if it was based on the resources of the country, and only used for certain purposes, so that its revenue might meet the interest, and finally the principal, was just as good as any other currency. The hon. gentleman from North Norfolk had manifested an extreme affection for gold, holding an idea very general in the world, that gold had some intrinsic value beyond anything else. In point of fact, however, gold had no intrinsic value, but the fancy that it had had grown up among people, because it had been for a long time accepted as the national standard of exchange. Hence it had come to have a fictitious value. He could not go as far as the hon. gentleman's resolutions.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 99) For the relief of Eliza Maria Campbell.—(Mr. Macdougall.)

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 28.]

(Mr. Cockburn, West Northumberland.)

THIRD READING.

Bill read the third time, on a division, and passed.

MARINE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS ACT REPEAL BILL.—[BILL 44.]

(Mr. McCarthy.)

THIRD READING.

Order for the House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the Bill read.

MR. HOLTON said that, since this Bill was up, they had had two or three precedents for a reference of Public Bills to the Standing Committees. He thought this Bill ought to be referred to the Railway Committee, for it affected private rights, by the repeal of a law that touched private rights. Public Bills did not necessarily go there, but it was the usage in the case of Bills respecting railways, canals, or telegraphs that they were sent to that Committee, where enquiry could be made as to their effect on private rights. Though this was a Public Bill, it was promoted by private parties as much as if a Private Bill. He could imagine no reasonable objection to its reference to that Committee, where evidence and all parties could be heard. The Act of four or five years ago which this Bill attacked was so referred.

MR. MCCARTHY said he rose to a point of order. The order was that the House do go into Committee, therefore, the hon. gentleman's suggestion was not in order.

MR. HOLTON said that he had only to move in amendment that, instead of the Speaker leaving the Chair, the Bill be referred to the Railway Committee, to be perfectly in order.

MR. MCCARTHY said that, according to May, it was quite a different thing to move that amendment now, because the House was already directed, after a second reading of the Bill, to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider it. The hon. gentleman at the second reading could have moved its reference to a Committee, but could not now.

MR. HOLTON said that, on a point of order, it would be perfectly in order for him to move that this order be discharged, and that the said Bill be referred to the Railway Committee. Any order on the paper could be discharged on a motion in any way known to Parliamentary usage. As to the merits of the question, the hon. gentleman would find it difficult to allege any reason why the Bill should not be referred.

MR. SPEAKER said that he did not see any objection to the discharge of an Order of the House in this way which was very often done in the Canadian as well as in the English House of Commons. May, on this point, said :

"When it has not been determined, until after the second reading, to commit a Bill to a Select Committee, the Order, or Order of the Day, as the case may be, for the Committee of the whole House, is read and discharged, and the Bill is committed to a Select Committee; or, when the question is proposed for the House to resolve itself into Committee, or for the Speaker leaving the chair, an amendment may be made to commit the Bill to a Select Committee."

MR. MCCARTHY said the matter was discussed the other night, and he did not apprehend that it would have been raised again. The Bill, which was read a second time, was for the absolute repeal of an Act, saving any rights that had been acquired under it, and he was at a loss to understand why it should be referred. The House had affirmed, on the second reading, that it was right the Bill attacked should be repealed. He did not know that the Bill interfered with any private right, but the Bill on the Statute-book did so improperly and injuriously, which was the reason he wanted it repealed. The object of the hon. gentleman was to kill the Bill, as there would not be time for its return from the Committee this Session. For that reason, if for no other, he objected to its reference to Committee, and pressed his motion.

MR. MACKENZIE said that no private rights were interfered with by the Bill the hon. gentleman sought to repeal. On the other hand, it had created rights, and some, perhaps, which the hon. gentleman might not be aware of. One company, at least, had been chartered by Parliament since that Act had been passed. A reference to a Standing Committee was to ascertain whether any such rights did exist, and what prejudicial effect the repeal of this Act would have on any existing organisations. The course now taken was very extraordinary: The very company that had been here urging legislation to protect them against the Anglo-American Company, had now an agent here practically promoting its interests, though it had been inimical to Canadian interests. The object of the Bill which it was desired to repeal was to provide for the management of the companies in the same way as the Act of 1851 provided for the management of telegraph lines on land. Three-fourths of the clauses of the Bill were of public importance, though they did not affect private interests any more than the establishment of certain rules and conditions as to the transmission of messages. But the remaining sections of the Bill, after providing for the management of such company in a general way, did affect existing companies, being intended to prevent the monopoly by the Anglo-American Company of the submarine telegraph between Great Britain and this country, and, at the same time, to provide a means whereby companies organising under our law might obtain certain rights and privileges. There could be no question that, if the repeal of the Statute affected private rights, those affected should have an opportunity of appearing before a Committee to establish them, and, if that was the case, he believed it was absolutely necessary, as a matter of order, that such a Bill as this should go to the Standing Committee on Railways and Telegraphs, and any Bill which contained such provisions must necessarily go to the Committee appointed for the purpose of investigating such claims.

MR. HOLTON said this was precisely such a Bill as ought to be enquired into by the Standing Committee. It might affect private individuals, and it did appear to him to be a Bill repealing provisions directly affecting private interests. They could get no information in the House, and the House could not hear the promoters of the Bill, unless they were brought to the Bar of the House. The information that could be got in Committee, he need not tell his right hon. friend, could not be obtained in the House. Some information ought to be obtained as to whether the parties who promoted the original Act, were the parties who now promoted its repeal. They were the same parties in name, but the House ought to know if they were so in fact.

MR. MCCARTHY said they were the same parties in name who were now promoting this Bill, but not the same parties in fact. The old Direct Cable Company had gone into liquidation, and this company, which was now formed, had taken its place.

MR. HOLTON said this was a case that called for searching enquiry into the reason of the proceeding they were about to take. The statement made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that his (Mr. Holton's) obvious desire was to kill the Bill, was untrue, and, moreover, it was absurd, because the Bill could be taken to the Railway Committee, and then, coming back to the House with the sanction of a majority of the Committee, it could go through the House without any further debate. It would be treated as all Bills coming from that Committee were treated.

MR. MACDOUGALL said he was surprised to hear his hon. friend opposite allege that this Telegraph Bill was not a Public Bill, but that it was a Bill introduced for the purpose of accomplishing private objects. Though he was not in the House at the time the previous measure became law, he understood it was for the purpose of promoting the interests of a private and rival company. He had the honour of being retained in that case, and he must say that in all his experience he did not remember a case of a Bill being introduced into Parliament which proposed to interfere to so enormous an extent with the private rights of existing companies. In that particular case, what had been the proposition? It was to compel the Anglo-American Telegraph Company, which had expended £7,000,000 sterling in their operations, which lay at the bottom of the ocean, to give up the privileges which they enjoyed under a contract with another country—to give up a portion of their rights and privileges to a rival company. That was what this Parliament had lent itself to. Looking at this Bill as it now stood, he had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the honest thing for this Parliament to do was to repeal the former Act at the earliest moment, and in the most summary manner. He did not see any object in sending it to a Committee of the House, unless there were private rights, which had grown up under the operation of the previous measure. If there were any such rights, they should be protected. But surely if such rights had existed, the House would have heard something of them. Petitions would have been received, asking that this Bill be not repealed. There had been ample time for that purpose.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the actual expenditure of the Company referred to did not represent half of £7,000,000 sterling. The stock had been watered for the purpose of reducing the apparent dividend. He recollected that, while the dividends were stated in the Committee in 1875 at only 8 or 10 per cent., it was proved that the dividends amounted to nearly 20 per cent. on the actual expenditure. The Bill protected private interests which then existed and which now existed. He denied that the Direct Cable Company was in liquidation, as stated by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). They could not go into liquidation under existing circumstances. But the repeal of this enactment would allow them to do anything they pleased, and that was the object the hon. gentleman must have in view in repealing the Act. This Bill was not a Government Bill in the first instance, but the Government gave it their support so as to have clauses added to it, purely of a public character, providing for the management of telegraph companies, and these the hon. gentleman, in his haste, would blot from the Statute-book. At least two-thirds of this proposed Bill were of a satisfactory character to every person, but the hon. gentleman, in his hurry to get the Act repealed, would destroy the provisions for the management of such companies. He was surprised that the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government would support such a species of destructive legislation as this, instead of having legislation of a constructive, building-up character. He had no doubt in his mind that this Bill, if passed, would interfere with interests which existed at this moment, and the hon. gentleman was bound to let it go to Committee to have evidence taken to ascertain to what extent private rights were interfered with, also, to ascertain to what extent public interests, if any, were interfered with.

MR. ANGLIN said, as he understood the object of this Bill, it was to restore a monopoly. The time had arrived when an end should be put to monopolies of this sort. But they were now dealing with a Bill that declared that such monopolies ought to be maintained. It was a very serious measure, and he thought they should proceed, at all events, with due deliberation. He had never before heard it whispered that the Direct Cable Company was in liquidation. He was told, some time ago, that they were in difficulties, and they knew that for some time their cable had ceased to work. The hon. member for Lambton asserted that it was not in liquidation. He thought they had seen notices published in the newspapers which would seem to indicate that the company was still in active operation. It was asserted that they now enjoyed rights created under the Bill now on the Statute-book, and he did not think they should sweep these away without being fully satisfied of the justice of such a proceeding. He was of opinion that they ought, as was proposed, to refer the Bill to a Committee, in order that the statements made by some hon. gentlemen, and which were contradicted almost as soon as made, might be investigated. He considered that there was a grave responsibility resting upon the Government in this case, and that the measure, if passed, should be passed as a Government measure. He believed the Government, in the former case, acted quite properly in taking the measure into their own hands. It might, of course, be said that every hon. member had a right to introduce a measure of this kind if he chose, but, while they had the existing Parliamentary system, the Government could not divest themselves of the responsibility for a measure of this kind, which undertook to restore a monopoly which a former Parliament considered it a duty to destroy.

Mr. COURSOL said the hon. member for Chateauguay had asked that this Bill should be referred to a Committee, and he (Mr. Coursol) believed, as a general rule, so far as he could judge since the beginning of the Session, that this had been done. For instance, the Bill making the 1st of July a holiday, and the Brokers' Bill, and one or two more, were referred to a Committee. But, before voting on this question, he would like to ask the hon. the leader of the Opposition, whether there had been any petition from the Anglo-American Company in regard to the measure. The Bill had been before the House since the 13th of February last, and he was not aware that any petition had been sent in against the proposed legislation.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed:

Bill (No. 32) To amend an Act to provide for more effectual enquiry into the existence of corrupt practices at the Elections of Members of the House of Commons.—(Mr. Ives.)

Bill (No. 70) To remove doubts as to the true intent and meaning of certain provisions of the Canada Temperance Act, 1878.—(Mr. McCuaig.)

Bill (No. 77) To make the first day of July a Public Holiday, by the name of Dominion Day.—(Mr. Cockburn, West Northumberland.)

INSOLVENCY LAWS REPEAL BILL.

(Mr. Bechard.)

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Order for second reading read.

MR. BECHARD said it had been agreed that this order should stand over until the Committee appointed to enquire into the subject of insolvency had had an opportunity of reviewing the whole question. That Committee having prepared and reported a measure, he thought he could with propriety now move the second reading of this Bill. He had been urged by several hon. gentlemen to take this step, in order that the House should have an opportunity of giving a square vote upon the question of the repeal of the existing Act.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he would suggest to his hon. friend that he should not press his Bill to-night, but that he should await the discussion on the Bill prepared by the Committee which would probably be moved to-morrow. He could then raise the direct issue as to whether the House desired that the law should be repealed or not, by moving an amendment that the Bill be not read a second time, or that all the clauses except the clause which repealed the present Insolvency Law be left out. It would be unfair to the Committee and the country if, by a direct vote, his hon. friend's Bill were supported, and the consideration of the very important changes in the Committee's Bill were excluded. Even hon. gentlemen who had strong views in favour of repeal would not desire to exclude consideration of the amendments prepared by the Committee.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said it was in the public interest that both Bills should be discussed conjointly if possible, but he did not wish to see his hon. friend's Bill jeopardised in any manner. There could be no objection to allowing the Bill to stand over until tomorrow if the Minister of Justice would allow it to go in Government orders in his name, as had been done with the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), so that the vote could be taken on it before the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead was gone into.

MR. HOLTON said the matter was very simple. If the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) desired to take the sense of the House upon the proposition that the Insolvency Law should be repealed before entering upon the consideration of the proposed amendments to the law, he could do so by moving that the Bill containing the amendments be not read a second time, but that it was expedient to repeal the Insolvency Act. This would not repeal the law, but would affirm the decision of the House, and be followed, undoubtedly, by a Bill, or he might allow a second reading of the Bill to be taken, and move the repeal on going into Committee. There were many ways in which the hon. member could accomplish his object without absolutely negating, in the first instance, the Bill prepared by the Committee.

SIR A. J. SMITH said the amendments should be discussed before a vote for the repeal of the law was called for.

MR. MACDOUGALL said he had made up his mind that, in the interests of the country, it was desirable to repeal, absolutely and definitively, the existing Insolvency Law, and he desired to have an opportunity to express that opinion in the proper parliamentary form, and he did not see any difficulty in taking the sense of the House upon that question. It was unfortunate this Bill of the Committee had been placed in the name of the Minister of Justice, as that gave it the appearance of a Government Bill, and, when the hon. member for Iberville moved in amendment to it that it was expedient to repeal the law, that would be a sort of vote of want of confidence in the Government, and, therefore, would not get so many votes as it otherwise would. Therefore, as the first clause of the Bill of the Committee, in the name of the Minister of Justice, proposed itself to repeal the law, his hon. friend might make some progress with the measure by voting for the measure of the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard).

MR. HOLTON said the course taken by the Minister of Justice was precisely the one taken by the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member in 1869. No one understood this to be a Government measure, and he (Mr. Holton) presumed the Government would divide on it when the vote would be taken. The Committee had devoted a great deal of labour to the preparation of the Bill, and the Government had, as they were bound to do, given those labours the facilities of being considered which could not be given under the ordinary rules of the House. This Bill would have fallen still-born, as they had, practically, but one day in the week now of the two weeks which remained, for private measures, if the Government had not given this facility to the Bill.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he had agreed that the Bill should be put on Government Orders for the sole purpose of securing for the House an opportunity to consider it. He did that at the request of the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), who was good authority, that he was perfectly right in adopting that course. He would suggest to the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) whether that course recommended by the hon. member for Chateauguay would not be entirely satisfactory.

MR. OUIMET said he was ready to vote for the Bill of the hon. gentleman from Iberville, as he had already done in this House. He saw no inconvenience in voting on that Bill now, because, in voting for the repeal of the Insolvent Act, they would be simply affirming the principle of the Bill introduced by the hon. the Minister of Justice, entitled, "An Act to repeal the Insolvent Act of 1875." He did not mean to declare himself, in advance, opposed to the latter Bill, or any well-considered measure for the liquidation of insolvent estates. This Bill was a very large one, and they might not have time to consider and pass it, before the end of the Session, and for that reason it would be better to vote at once for the Bill of the hon. gentleman from Iberville. If the Private Bill was not carried, the Government Bill could be delayed, and thus the present Insolvent Act could remain for another year. He thought the country desired to see that Act repealed. Some measure might be necessary for some Provinces, whose Common Law did not provide for winding up insolvent estates; and, though it was not necessary in the Province of Quebec, where the Common Law was sufficient for the purpose, the Quebec members had no objection to come to their assistance, but they did not want the Insolvent Act, as it now stood, to remain on the Statute-book. Therefore, the sooner they voted for its repeal, the better and the safer.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said that he was willing to accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from South Huron, if it was acceptable to the hon. gentleman from Iberville, which was to allow the Bill submitted by the Committee to go to its second reading at the earliest opportunity, and, if the opinion of the House should be adverse to the continuance of the Insolvency Act in any form, then the hon. gentleman should have the earliest opportunity of submitting his Bill to the House.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said what they desired was to have a vote on the repeal of the Insolvency Law before they voted on the other Bill.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he thought that was what, in fairness to the country, should be avoided. He thought there was a strong conviction in the country, that an Insolvent Law, in some form, was desirable, and he believed that the form most generally desired was that which the Committee had given to their Bill. It would be putting himself and other members of the House in a false position, to vote squarely upon the repeal of the present law, when they had prepared, and were ready to submit to the consideration of the House, a substitute which they thought would be acceptable to the House and the country. If the House, in discussing this Bill, should make it manifest that a repeal of the present law was desirable, then his hon. friend from Iberville should have an opportunity of submitting his Bill to the House, and of taking a square vote upon it.

MR. BÉCHARD said the agreement might be satisfactory to those who were not in favour of the unconditional repeal of the law, because, if the Bill of the Minister of Justice was carried, the House would be prevented from voting squarely on the question of repeal this Session. He was quite disposed to accept any arrangement which would secure to those in favour of an unconditional repeal an opportunity of giving such a vote. He would accept the suggestion of the hon. the Minister of Justice, if the Government would allow his (Mr. Béchard's) Bill to go on the Orders of the Day immediately before that of the hon. gentleman.

MR. COLBY said he thought there could be but one desire on the part of all fair-minded members of this House—and in a question of such importance all ought to be fair-minded—and that was to arrive at an expression of the real feeling of the House. Now, that would not be done upon the vote proposed by the hon. member for Iberville, if that was taken to-night, because the issue then would be between the existing Insolvency Act and its repeal, pure and simple. But that was not all that was involved in this case. A Committee of this House had addressed themselves industriously and faithfully to the endeavour to do away with many, if not all, of the imperfections and abuses of the present Act which had been complained of. He thought it was not fair that a Bill to repeal the present Act, pure and simple, should precede the explanations and discussions of the propositions submitted by the Committee. When the House was seized of the whole matter, then it would be in a position to deal with it as might be deemed best. He thought his hon. friend from Iberville should be content with the assurance of the hon. the Minister of Justice, that, after an expression of the House had been obtained, if that expression was in favour of the repeal of the Insolvency Act, and adverse to the propositions of the Committee, then every facility should be given him to carry his Bill for the repeal of the Act. He had no doubt that, if the hon. gentleman from Iberville consented to hold his Bill in abeyance until after the House had pronounced on the propositions of the Committee, he would find some supporters to his Bill at that stage who could not support it now, and, possibly, himself (Mr. Colby) among the number.

MR. HESSON said he came here with his mind made up that, if a Bill to repeal the Insolvent Act came before the House, he should vote for it. He now found before the House a Bill of that nature, and a Bill presented by a Committee who had been inquiring whether it was possible to make some provision for winding up insolvent debtors' estates. Now, he did not desire to see the country deprived altogether of some provision such as that, and, from what he had seen of the Bill of the Committee, and from the care they had taken in framing the several clauses, he was disposed to think it deserved the careful consideration of this House. He thought the hon. gentleman from Iberville had better accept the proposition of the hon. the Minister of Justice, as he believed the Bill of the Committee would meet the wishes of the House and the country generally. As for the details of the Bill, some of them might be found objectionable, and he himself did not like the proposition to establish Insolvent Courts in some of the cities of the country. The objectionable clauses could be eliminated from the Bill when referred to its proper Committee.

MR. TILLEY said it was of no small importance that they should have a full discussion on the Bill, as submitted by the Committee, who had carefully looked into the whole subject, and prepared what they considered important improvements on the existing Insolvency Act. If they disposed of the question without taking that Bill up, they would do so prematurely, and perhaps without having the information before them it was desirable they should have. For his own part, he was ready to assent to any proposition that would enable them to consider the Bill reported by the Committee, and, failing that, to take up, immediately after, the proposition of his hon. friend from Iberville. They could then all approach the subject in a better position to decide on the merits of the case. He was satisfied the Government would afford every facility in their power to the hon. member to introduce his Bill after the Bill submitted by the Committee.

MR. MACKENZIE: I suppose the Minister of Justice will proceed with the Bill to-morrow.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): It is high up on the Orders. It is our desire to take the Bill up to-morrow. After that is disposed of, then my hon. friend will have an opportunity of bringing his Bill forward.

MR. BÉCHARD said he would allow his Bill to stand.

Order for second reading postponed.

DEPENDANTS' COSTS IN CROWN SUITS
BILL.—[BILL 17.]

(Mr. MacDonnell.)

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order for second reading read.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he had intimated the other day that the Government had some objection to this Bill. He might be mistaken, but he was under the impression that the hon. gentleman had consented to go on with it.

MR. MACDONNELL said he did not intend to give the hon. the Minister of Justice to understand that he would withdraw the Bill. He should move the second reading.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he regretted the hon. gentleman should think it necessary to press the Bill. In any case it was desirable to explain the Bill to the House.

MR. MACDONNELL said that, a few evenings ago, in the absence of the Minister of Justice, he explained the object of this Bill, which was to provide that in any action brought in any of the Superior Courts of the different Provinces, or cases in which such Courts had concurrent jurisdiction with the Exchequer Court of the Dominion, at the suit of the Crown, the defendant in such cases should be paid his costs if successful. There was no reason in such an action, brought at the suit of the Crown for the recovery of a penalty or other consideration in which the name of the Crown was used for the people of the Dominion, why the party prosecuted should be disallowed his costs and required to pay them out of his own pocket, while, in any action brought by a single individual against another, the party recovering was entitled to the costs as against the other suitor. He could not see on what principle it could be held just, that while a private individual was responsible for the costs in any suit commenced by him, the people of Canada, taken in the aggregate, were to be considered as paupers, and not called on to pay costs. In 1876 the injustice was so apparent that, in the Act passed in that year to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act, the following clause on the subject was enacted :

"The Judges of the Supreme Court, or any five of them, may, under the 79th section of the said Act, from time to time make rules for awarding and regulating costs in each of the said Courts, in favour of and against the Crown as well as the subject."

The practice had been to give costs to the subject in cases where he proceeded against the Crown, where the Crown failed. It was unjust and inconsistent that, while a party sued in the Exchequer Court of the Dominion might recover his costs against the Crown a party, if an action was commenced in one of the Superior Courts of any of the Provinces was denied his costs, although the cause of action was the same. The present Bill was intended to give to the Courts of the various Provinces having concurrent jurisdiction with the Exchequer Court, concurrent jurisdiction also as to costs in actions brought before them, as he had already said.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said this Bill affected the Royal prerogative, and the assent of the Crown must be given to it. He was not prepared to give that assent. The second clause would establish a charge on the public revenue against the people, and, as the assent of the Crown had not been given to the Bill, it could not be proceeded with.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said that over and above the objection mentioned by the right hon leader of the Government, the hon. mover of the Bill sought to base the relief he asked on the character of the Exchequer Court, and its supposed resemblance to the higher Provincial courts. But, in the Exchequer Court, all cases were tried before the Judges, while, in the Provincial Courts having concurrent jurisdiction, those cases were all tried before juries. That made a very serious difference with respect to the possible result of suits pending. On that ground more especially, he did not feel it desirable or expedient that the Bill, in its present form, should pass at that moment.

MR. MACDONNELL said he was very much surprised at the objections to this Bill. It was introduced in the early part of the Session, and, in courtesy to the leader of the Government, he consulted with him in respect to it, when he directed him to the Minister of Justice. He then conferred with the Minister of Justice about it, and he gave his word that the assent of the Crown to this Bill would be forthcoming. He (Mr. MacDonnell) showed him a draft of the Bill, which he said was a proper one, and he had, at the hon. gentleman's suggestion, expunged a line of it. He had been led from day to day from the beginning of the Session to believe that the Government would consent to the Bill, which should be considered an open question, and bring down the assent of the Crown. The Minister of Justice knew that he (Mr. MacDonnell) could have moved for an address of the House, asking for such assent, and he should have done so had he believed that the Government would not have secured it as promised. The House would see that no objection was made to the Bill on its merits. The objection that the assent of the Crown was required was captious. Why the Government should have taken the course they did, after his courteous conduct towards them, he could not understand. The Bill commended itself to every member imbued with a sense of justice, its principles being now law as regarded the Exchequer Court. The argument of the Minister of Justice was really in favour of the Bill; for it was known that decisions by juries were more equitable than decisions of Judges, simply because juries did not decide on any legal quibble, whereas justice often miscarried before Judges on some technical objection. Were they to be told that a decision in one of the Common Law Courts, presided over by one of their Common Law Judges, was not to be treated as equitable and sound, because a jury formed the constituent part of the Court? This was something new, and was a most flimsy objection. The Minister of Justice and his leader had both misled him in this matter, and that, he did not hesitate to say, deliberately, and he would have moved for an address of the House for the Royal consent, had he not been given to understand, up to this date, that it would be forthcoming through the Government. But he was not so certain, after all, that this Bill infringed any rights or prerogatives of the Crown. It only provided that any costs taxed should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund by the Receiver-General, and he did not think that it trenched upon the rights of the Crown. There was another reason why the Bill should be read a second time; the House had agreed with its principle, and it might be advanced to the third reading without the Royal consent. The Minister of Justice and the Premier, if anxious to do justice in this matter, might allow the second reading, after which they could procure the consent of His Excellency.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou), said he regretted very much that any misunderstanding should have arisen between the hon. member for Inverness and himself, with regard to the Bill. But he thought he could promise him that hereafter there would be no opportunity for such misunderstandings.

MR. MACDONNELL: I will take good care there shall not.

MR. McDONALD said that the hon. gentleman was generally correct in his account of what took place in his interviews with him in regard to the Bill. But he (Mr. McDonald) was not aware that he had spoken to the leader of the Government on the subject. The hon. gentleman had shown him the Bill as originally prepared, and he had told the hon. gentleman that the Bill was entirely unsuited to the object in view, and that if he desired to succeed he must reconstruct it entirely; also, that he (Mr. McDonald) would take an early opportunity of submitting the Bill to the leader of the Government, and ascertain whether he thought it expedient that he should give his assent to it. It was quite true that he had not had the opportunity of obtaining the right hon. gentleman's views till recently. About a week ago, the member for Inverness came across the floor, when he told him that the Premier thought the Bill not advisable, and that, therefore, he could not assent to it. He thought, therefore, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. MacDonnell) ought, in candour, to have stated those facts, if he felt aggrieved. He did not say that he had misstated the facts intentionally, but he had not set them forth as fully as he ought to have done. He had no reason to complain of any action by him, in regard to the Bill. He knew that he (Mr. McDonald) had stated personally that he thought it desirable, if practicable, in the public interest, that the same course should be pursued with reference to costs in the Courts below as in the Exchequer Court, and also his grounds for thinking that the Bill could not pass. He did not care to bandy words with the hon. gentleman, having only risen to express his regret that his desire to be civil to him, and to afford him any facilities he could in the matter of his Bill, should have afforded him the opportunity of making the remarks they had heard.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said that he thought his hon. friend from Inverness had fair and reasonable grounds for complaint. He had introduced his Bill on the 8th of March. On several occasions since then he was prepared to move the second reading, and had more than once been asked by the leader of the Government and the Minister of Justice to allow it to stand over, without giving him any notice that the Bill would be opposed on the merely technical ground raised by the First Minister. It appeared to him (Mr. Cameron) that the Bill ought to pass, and the consent of the Crown ought to be given. The Minister of Justice had not advanced, and, in fact, could not advance an argument against the passage of the Bill now. It appeared an extraordinary anomaly that the Crown could bring an action against the subject, an action without the shadow of a foundation, put him to enormous costs, and that the subject should have no remedy against the Crown to recover the costs of such an abortive action. Surely that state of things should not exist. This was a Bill the Minister of Justice ought to have dealt with himself, and, if not himself, he should have afforded his hon. friend the member for Inverness every facility for the passage of the Bill.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that he would not argue now whether the Bill was fair and reasonable or not. One thing was clear, the principle that the Crown did not pay costs had always been insisted on. It was part of the Royal prerogative. In other words, it was one of the checks against the Public Treasury being robbed, and although the practice had been continued for many centuries in England, there had been no legislation compelling the Crown to pay costs. He regretted very much, like the Minister of Justice, that any misapprehension had arisen in this matter. The hon. member (Mr. MacDonnell) said that before he introduced his Bill he had spoken to him about it. Now all the hon. gentleman said was that he had introduced, or prepared, a Bill.

CAPT. LAVOIE OF THE RIMOUSKI.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned debate on Mr. Fiset's motion, for a statement showing the orders given to Capt. Pierre Lavoie, during the time he had charge of the steamer Rimouski.

MR. Fiset said he had reason to believe that Capt. Lavoie was discharged for political reasons. It had been pretended that he had disobeyed the orders of his superiors; but he thought, if that was the reason for which the hon. the Minister of Public Works had discharged him, the hon. gentleman must have been in error, or, perhaps, had been deceived by other parties. In March last he (Mr. Fiset) had taken occasion to remark that Capt. Lavoie had obtained, on the 17th of February last, a letter, declaring that he had always faithfully performed his duty up to that time. He had also produced a letter from Mr. Brydges, stating that up to that time Capt. Lavoie had not received orders from any Department of the Government, but only from himself, and that he had always obeyed those orders. In further support of his innocence of having disobeyed orders, Capt. Lavoie had made a solemn declaration, which he (Mr. Fiset) read to the House. He wished to see the papers in the case, in order to establish whether the charge of disobedience was well founded, and whether Capt. Lavoie had ever received orders from either the Department of Public Works, or that of Marine and Fisheries.

MR. TUPPER said he should be sorry if the hon. gentleman withdrew his motion, after what he had just said, because he was anxious to bring down the papers in order to show that Capt. Lavoie had not carried out the instructions given him. He objected to the motion chiefly because of the statement it contained, that Capt. Lavoie had been dismissed. He was informed that Capt. Lavoie was only engaged for the season; he was paid off at the close of the season and his connection with the Department ceased altogether thereafter. When it became necessary to re-engage parties for the next season, Capt. Lavoie was informed that his services would not be required again. He (Mr. Tupper) on enquiring the reason why he was not re-engaged was told that Capt. Lavoie had been instructed that he was not to purchase anything for the service, but to make requisition therefor, and that he had subsequently incurred debts without requisition. This having occurred more than once, it was determined not to re-engage him. He had no objection to the papers being brought down.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not know what fault had been found with Capt. Lavoie; he might have been properly dismissed, but dismissed he was. It would not do to say he was not in the employment of the Government because he was idle in the winter time. It had always been customary with merchant vessels, as with Government vessels, that the captain should remain in charge of the vessel during the winter, although navigation could not be carried on. The captains of Government steamers had been continually in service, and were paid a certain rate per month. This gentleman undoubtedly had a right to consider himself still in the employ of the Government. It had been a universal practice to continue the captains in charge the next season.

MR. TUPPER said that was precisely where a difference of opinion might arise. Lavoie was his own master, he was ready to go to any part of the world, the Government had no claim on his services, nor was he under any obligation to serve them if called on. No doubt he would have been re-employed if it had not been found that he failed in obeying instructions.

Motion agreed to.

USURY PROHIBITION BILL.—[BILL 35.]

(Mr. Méthot.)

SECOND READING PROPOSED.

Order for second reading read.

MR. MÉTHOT said that, on rising to move the second reading of this Bill, he desired to draw the attention of the House to the necessity of passing a law to prevent the numerous abuses committed by usurers throughout the whole Dominion. The object of this Bill, as its title indicated, was to suppress usury, by fixing the legal rate of interest in Canada at 6 per cent., and conventional interest at 8 per cent. In order that the law should be put in force, and that it should not become a dead letter, this Bill prescribed a penalty against those who should break the law, by obliging them to refund all interest on sums of money thus obtained. This Bill, that did not affect, in any way, contracts made and entered into before the putting in force of the present Act, applied to all loans and contracts for the use of a sum of money. Such were the provisions of the Bill. When it was sought to modify an existing law, it was but in accordance with common sense to examine, from every possible standpoint, all the defects of the old law, as well as the advantages of the new one. To that end it was well to look into the past, and not to undervalue the experience of centuries. On opening history, which should be the guide of the Legislature, it would be found that among old nations efforts had been constantly made to suppress usury, that had always been looked upon as most hurtful and unfavourable to the welfare of the State. All nations, both ancient and modern, had had but one way of regarding usury, they had all looked upon it as a public calamity and a crime. The Jews, the Romans, the French, and even the Canadians, had legislated, from time to time, in the most severe manner, against usury and usurers. But it was not necessary to go abroad in order to find examples of severe legislation against usury. In 1873, had not this House deliberately passed a law prohibiting usury in one of the Provinces of this Dominion? Chapter 71 of the Federal Statute 36 Victoria, contained a law fixing the rate of interest and putting a stop to usury in the Province of Nova Scotia, and since that time no complaints from that Province had been heard. He wished to know why a law that was good for one Province should not be good for the rest of the Dominion. Was not the feeling in Nova Scotia the same as the feeling that was manifesting itself every day in other parts of Canada? Let enquiry be made of all the farmers of the different Provinces of the Dominion, and they would all answer, as one man, that they desired and requested the adoption of a law against usury, that was gnawing at the vitals of this young country, that was destroying commerce, and that was one of the causes of the numerous failures that the country had to deplore. This unlimited liberty, enjoyed by money-lenders, was, moreover, one of the main causes of emigration, and was, consequently, a great obstacle to the prosperity of the agricultural classes of this country. If usury was favourable to a majority of the population, one would be able to explain why this House should remain deaf to the voice of the people asking for the passing of laws against usury and the fixing of reasonable rates of interest. But everyone was aware that the present state of things was favourable to a small number of speculators who profited thereby in order to grow rapidly rich upon the work of the poor man. Was it not especially the agricultural classes that were taken in and made the victims of these selfish men, who had neither bowels nor conscience? Why were so many farmers seen going into exile, emigrating to the United States? Why did so many settlers find themselves obliged to give up the land they had cleared by the sweat of their brow, in order to go and ruin their health, and that of their families, in American manufactures? The reason of this was very simple. It was because, not being able to pay their debts when due, the creditors exacted, as the price of a short delay, an exorbitant interest. It was needless to speak of the bargains, agreements, and high interests resorted to in the country places. It was a well-known thing. Therefore, he would refrain from revealing the hideousness of this cancer, that was eating at the heart of the people. Since this Bill was before the House, he had received from all parts of the country numerous letters of encouragement and congratulation. He trusted that among these letters, coming from all classes of society, he would be allowed to read one. It was as follows:—

“QUEBEC, March 29th, 1879.

“To Mr. MATHOT, M.P., Ottawa,—

“SIR,—Allow me, in the name of a certain number of persons suffering from the high rate of interest exacted by money-lenders, who, while pretending to render service, are practicing usury at the expense of those to whom they lend, allow these victims whose needful condition obliges them to pay these high rates of interests, allow them to congratulate and thank you for the Bill you intend to introduce in order to put an end to the present state of things, for it is a crying shame to see usury practised in such a frightful manner. How great will be the gratitude of those sufferers from the want of conscience of these usurers. May Heaven bless your undertaking, and grant you the favour of succeeding in having your just law adopted. We, the victims, we beseech the Divine Providence for the success of your Bill, and we, moreover, pray Heaven to reward you for your good intentions, in coming to the help of many victims, who will never cease to offer up prayers for your happiness and prosperity, you, whose good-will prompts you to lend a helping hand to those who suffer.

Was not this letter written by an unknown person of Quebec; was it not the outpouring of the victim's heart, and did it not show to what an extent the usurer oppressed and tyrannised over the unfortunate borrower, whom he held so tightly in his clutches, that the wretched man dare not sign his name? Thus, if he moved the second reading of the Bill, it was because he was firmly persuaded that by restraining the liberty granted to the money-lenders, Parliament would be favouring the interests of the great majority of the inhabitants of the Dominion of Canada, and doing away with the disastrous effects that usury never failed to produce on the agricultural classes, on commerce and industry. It would be especially favourable to the farmer, in whose name he was speaking, whose revenues were not, and never would be, proportioned to the exorbitant exactions of the usurer. Indeed, the cultivation of land never yielded on an average more than six per cent., and if, as it often happened, a farmer was unlucky enough to require suddenly $100, he was obliged to pay from 20 to 25 per cent. This money was lent to him for a month or two. Afterwards, if the money-lender saw that the farmer was pinched, he would exact a renewal with from 25 to 50 per cent. Was not that the surest means of driving the agricultural population from Canada, and of making a desert of the country? On the contrary, if hon. members wished to encourage agriculture and colonisation, they should take away from the usurer this tyrannical liberty, by depriving him of all hope of realising large profits surely and in a short space of time, thereby inducing him to withdraw his money from speculation and shaving, and to invest it, at reasonable rates, in real estate. And what would be the result of this? Capitalists investing their money in agricultural pursuits, agriculture would again be prosperous, property would be doubled in value, the disheartened settler would take courage, and not only would emigration diminish, but Canada would behold, with joy her children, who were now the servants of the American people, wending their way back to their country, in order to cultivate and render fertile the wild lands of this Dominion. He would now consider the objections that might be raised against the passing of this Act. The first would probably be that this Act was useless, that it would be easy to evade it, by lending at the legal rate, and by afterwards selling to the borrower an article at double its value. But this objection fell to the ground, for there was a clause in the Bill, by which these shameless money-lenders could be put under oath when sued for infringement of the present Act. The second objection that might be made to this Bill was that it hampered money transactions, and that it would be hurtful to borrowers. He would answer that, in this as in other things, the people wanted protection, and they were right, for since the repeal of the laws against usury they could no longer borrow money without paying exorbitant rates of interest. The third objection was that money was an article of merchandise like anything else. He said that it was not that, for money did not deteriorate or wear out like other goods, and if its value changed in an almost imperceptible manner, it always remained the basis of the value of all other objects of commerce. Moreover, money was always current. A man who owed £1,000 was not uneasy if he had £1,000 in his pocket to pay what he owed, whilst he might be ruined if he was asked to pay this sum, and had to meet it, in only real estate or goods, even were they worth twice or three times the amount. For all these reasons, and for many others that it would take too long to enumerate, he was fully confident that this Bill would be supported by a majority in the House; and by adopting it Parliament would be protecting agriculture, giving new life to industry, favouring commerce, and yielding to the wishes of the people. In a word, they would be adopting a measure that would give general satisfaction.

MR. TILLEY said the Bill proposed by his hon. friend was a very important one, the principle of which was very energetically discussed in the first Parliament. Few questions had created such excitement and called forth such diversity of opinion as the one involved in the Bill of his hon. friend. He thought, however, it would be unwise to disturb existing legislation on the subject—at all events, it would require more time than the House had now at its disposal. Seeing the advanced stage of the Session, he suggested that his hon. friend should withdraw the Bill.

MR. PLUMB said there had always been a very strong opinion on the subject of the usury laws. Perhaps the strongest legislation on the subject was found on the Statute-books of some of the American States, each of which had the right to regulate its internal affairs and pass its own laws in that regard. In New York State, for example, there was a law making it highly penal to charge higher than 7 per cent. No doubt, some Canadian institutions had taken advantage of their powers and charged a higher rate than was apparent, and a strong opinion prevailed in the community that there should be some restriction to prevent grasping lenders from taking advantage of needy borrowers. At this stage of the Session, however, it was impossible to obtain expression of opinion through the Dominion, and he, therefore, moved in amendment that the Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.

MR. MACKENZIE said he felt disposed to support the Finance Minister. The Finance Minister had said that this would disturb existing legislation. He congratulated the hon. gentleman on the resumption of a Conservative policy. But he must not forget that the tendency of the whole work of the Government this Session had been to disturb all existing legislation. In fact, there was very little of Conservatism left with hon. gentlemen opposite. As they had come to the conclusion now not to further disturb existing legislation, as the line must be drawn somewhere, he would support them.

Bill ordered to be read the second time this day six months.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first and second times :—

Bill (No. 100) To amend the Act incorporating the Detroit Tunnel Company.—(Mr Kilvert.)

CANADA AND DETROIT RIVER BRIDGE COMPANY INCORPORATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Kilvert.)

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

Mr. KILVERT introduced a Bill (No. 101) To amend the Act incorporating the Canada and Detroit River Bridge Company.

Bill read the first time.

Mr. KILVERT moved the second reading of the Bill.

In reply to Mr. PATTERSON (Essex),

Mr. KILVERT said there was no change of the location settled in the charter; this proposed an extension of time.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was necessary to obtain the consent of the American people, and that had been obtained and the difficulty had been removed. This was a work of immense importance to one of our lines of railway to enable it to carry Western traffic. He hoped the Bill would be read a second time to-day.

MR. McCALLUM said it was a serious matter to say that a bridge should be built over the Detroit River. During the season of navigation a vessel passed every three minutes, night and day. He objected to the Bill being read now, except according to the rules of the House.

MR. MACKENZIE suggested that the Bill should be read to-day, if it was to go to the Railway Committee on Thursday. It was one of those Bills to which they ought to afford every reasonable facility.

MR. TUPPER said the introducer of this Bill stated that it was simply to extend the time for carrying out a policy already on the Statute-book. That placed it in an entirely different position from the introduction of a measure providing for something new. His hon. friend knew that in the Railway Committee there would be every opportunity of examining the Bill to see if anything new was introduced. Seeing that they were in the last days of the Session, and that business was pressing, he trusted his hon. friend would consent to the second reading. The House was never regarded as being committed to the principle of a Bill by allowing it to go to a Committee.

MR. HOLTON said he was in sympathy with the hon. member for Monck in this matter. While disposed to give every possible facility for the consideration of these Bills, the urgency of which he quite understood, he felt considerable reluctance to vote for the second reading of a Bill which was not yet before them. He thought it would be establishing a dangerous practice. He was the more inclined to take that view because no time would be lost by allowing this Bill to stand for the second reading to-morrow, as its twin Bill did at this moment. His own impression was clear that they still had an hour on Wednesday for Private Bills—that after half-past seven. At all events, the Government could easily solve any doubt there might be on that point by allowing it to be so considered. He was sure that, with the strong desire on all sides to accelerate the close of this Session, the Government must see that there could be no possible objection to the second reading of these Bills being called to-morrow at half-past seven, and thus obviate a very unsound practice of reading a Bill the second time before it was in the hands of members.

MR. McCALLUM said the reason he objected to this Bill was that there were large interests involved, and, if it went to a second reading to-day, not being printed or in the hands of members, how could those in the country, interested, know anything about the Bill? The ship-owners of this country, and those engaged in commerce, should have an opportunity of being heard in reference to it. He looked at the scheme of bridging the Detroit River as one calculated to block that river entirely. He did not oppose it on personal grounds, but solely on public grounds. How were they going to notify the country if they brought in Bills and passed them before the members knew what they were? He did not wish to obstruct legislation, but he considered that if he could do anything to prevent a measure of this kind being put through the House, it was his duty to do so.

MR. PLUMB said it was well to impress on the House the fallacy of the proposition that ordering Bills to a second reading was endorsing their principle. No doubt it would obstruct all legislation if such an opinion should obtain in the House of Commons. Everyone who knew anything about railways, must understand that large expenditures of money had been prevented by the diminution of traffic, and no company had suffered more in that way than the one which now asked for its approval. The Railway Committee was composed of a majority of the members of this House, and he thought that any examination into the merits of the Bill might be very safely entrusted to that Committee.

MR. MCCALLUM said if this Bill was to go before the Railway Committee on Thursday, how were they going to get those opposed to it to come here and give their evidence on the other side? If he waived his right in this matter, it would be on the ground that he threw all responsibility upon the Government, trusting that they would see that no obstruction was laid across the Detroit River.

MR. PATTERSON (Essex) said, as he understood the present Bill, it was merely to prolong the duration of existing charters. Under existing charters, all plans affecting the bridging of the Detroit River had to be approved by the Dominion Government and that of the United States. Under these circumstances, he thought they would be justified in allowing the measure to go to the Railway Committee, reserving the right to take such action as they thought proper in the interest of their constituents.

Bill read the second time.

[BILL 59.]

(Mr. Tupper.)

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order for second reading read.

MR. TUPPER said he would ask leave of the House to withdraw this Bill. There were other amendments to the Act that were required, and they were so numerous that he had introduced an Act for the purpose of consolidating the Railway Act, which would embrace these two amendments.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was this objection—that it opened up a field of discussion on the whole law. It would, of course, have to go before the Railway Committee, and there everyone would be bringing in amendments. He thought it was inexpedient to consolidate the law in the last days of the Session, and would prefer that the hon. gentleman should adhere to his amendment for this Session.

MR. TUPPER said he did not think it would at all embarrass dealing with any of these proposed amendments. It would be quite impossible, perhaps, to attempt a review of the general Railway Act, but the Act would stand in the same position after these amendments were introduced, with the exception that they would not be spread over a great variety of Acts. But a step would be taken towards a review of the Act, at a time when they would have more leisure to deal with it.

MR. MACKENZIE said it would involve a reconstruction of the Bill from the time it had been introduced to the present time, embodying, in the respective sections, whatever amendments had been made. He was afraid the hon. gentleman had undertaken an amount of labour in that respect they could hardly overtake.

MR. TUPPER said, when the hon. leader of the Opposition saw the Bill, he would find it was not open to the objections he supposed. It was merely bringing all the present legislation into one Act, and marking the few new clauses in brackets.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURT ACT
AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 74.]

(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said that the Bill had been in the hands of the members of the House for some time, and, as it concerned more particularly the legal gentlemen in the House, he would only say now, that it did not, in any way, affect the principle of the Act, but referred to one or two clauses especially—clause 11 and clause 17 of the original Act—which defined the occasions in which appeals should lie from the several subordinate Courts in the Provinces to the Supreme Court. All the clauses, with one or two exceptions, were definitive, and stated with more particularity the cases in which appeals should lie. He might say that the Judges of the Supreme Court had had an opportunity of examining them, and had concurred in them generally, as well as the leading members of the profession from the several Provinces in this House. There was one clause which provided for a difficulty such as occurred in the absence of the late Chief Justice, providing for the administration of the oath of office in certain cases by the senior Puisne Judge in the absence of the Chief Justice. The Bill, as first introduced, provided for only two terms, leaving it for the Supreme Court, or the Chief Justice, to appoint, when thought necessary, a third term. But leading members of the Ontario bar had represented that the uncertainty as to when the third term might be held would prove an inconvenience, and, to meet that difficulty, he had inserted a clause fixing the third term for the month of October.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said he did not propose to discuss the Bill at present; but he might say that the memorandum which the Minister of Justice had said he had sent to members, in connection with it, he, for one, had not received.

MR. McDONALD (Picton) said that he had sent the memorandum this morning, and would not move for the consideration of the Bill in Committee to-day since the memorandum had not been received. When they would have received it to-morrow he would move the House into Committee.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said that, without approving of all the changes in the Bill, he believed that most were in the right direction. One change he thought the Minister of Justice ought to have given his reason for, and explained how it was to be carried into actual effect: The clause with regard to appeals from judgments upon preliminary objections to Election Petitions. The Minister of Justice had said nothing on that subject, though the change appeared the most important and radical of all. He (Mr. Cameron) thought this change also in the right direction. The only thing he complained of was that the hon. gentleman had not explained more fully the meaning of the provision, and how he proposed to carry it into effect. He understood him to say that the two sections of the Supreme Court Act that the Bill proposed to deal with were 11 and 17; and, if he (Mr. Cameron) recollected aright, section 17 provided for general appeals on general questions. Surely he did not intend applying the provisions of section 17 to sub-section "m" of section 1 of this Bill. The provisions of section 17 were wholly inapplicable to the proposed amendment. Section 17 of the Supreme Court Act applied to general appeals from the judgments of the Courts below to Judges of the Supreme Court. He apprehended it was rather meant to make this an amendment to section 48 of the Supreme Court Act which had reference to special election appeals. The section itself was an extraordinary one, and very peculiarly worded, and he was quite sure it would have to be recast before it could be made workable. Other provisions of the Act would also be found objectionable. Was it proposed that sub-section "a" of this Bill should apply to all orders that were made by Judges in the Court of Chancery, whether final or interlocutory? If so, he entirely objected to any amendment of the right to appeal in any such cases. He also objected to the right to appeal reserved in sub-section "b," in matters within the discretion of the Judge in Equity matters. To allow appeals in the classes of cases referred in these two sub-sections, would cause endless delays, add largely to the cost of litigation, and would, in many other respects, be exceedingly objectionable, and he hoped the Minister of Justice would strike out these objectionable clauses from his Bill. He (Mr. Cameron) did not object to the appeal in preliminary objections in election cases, but to the mode in which the Minister of Justice proposed to deal with the question, and the defective machinery provided for carrying the proposal into effect. He said that there should be an appeal from the judgment, rule or order of any Court or Judge, on any preliminary objection to an election petition. The clause further provided that there should be an appeal from a judgment or decision that was final and conclusive. How did the hon. gentlemen propose an appeal from a judgment that was final and conclusive? Moreover, how did he propose to bring the appeal before the Supreme Court at all, when there was no machinery provided for carrying the appeal into effect? This was not an amendment either to section 17, which provided for general cases, or to section 48, which provided for special appeals in election cases. Neither the machinery provided for by section 48, nor section 17, could be applied to this provision in the hon. gentleman's Bill, nor under these sections could he bring such cases before the Supreme Court. He apprehended that what the Minister of Justice really proposed to do was to amend section 48 of the Supreme Court Act relating to special election appeals, and to enable complainants to appeal from the judgment of the Judges on preliminary objections to the Supreme Court, and to utilise the machinery provided in section 48 for that purpose. If that was what he meant, the whole clause must be recast, and section 48 of the Supreme Court Act must be amended. Section 10 of the Controverted Elections Act, which made the decision of a Judge of the Court on these preliminary objections final and conclusive, must also be amended, so as to enable parties to appeal to the Supreme Court, not after judgment had been given on the whole case, and the costs in the whole contest incurred, but after judgment had been rendered on preliminary objections before the merits of the case had been entered on at all, and in that case the merits of these preliminary objections could be disposed of in the most expeditious and least expensive way. If that was what the hon. gentleman meant, he was entirely with him. He could not assent to a proposition that a litigant should be bound by the judgment of a single Judge, in disposing of preliminary objections, and have no appeal to the Court of Appeals or the Supreme Court. Everybody knew the great importance that was attached to many of these preliminary objections to election petitions. Where the power of Parliament to pass the Controverted Elections Act, and the power of the Local Courts to try cases under that Act were questioned, those doubts and difficulties should be set at rest with the least possible delay. He (Mr. Cameron) observed that the Bill did not say when the appeal to the Supreme Court on preliminary objections should take place—whether within the thirty days covered by section 17, or the period covered by section 48 of the Supreme Court Act, whether the appeal might be made at any time before the case was finally disposed of on the merits, whether in such the appeal was limited or unlimited in point of time, and whether subject to the condition comprised by section 48, or wholly unconditional. If the latter was the hon. gentleman's view, he entirely agreed with him. The appeal should be subject to the conditions provided by section 48 only. He thought that, in dealing with these preliminary objections, especially when they involved questions of the first importance, such as the power of Parliament, and the jurisdiction of the Courts, and when we had the extraordinary anomaly of the Judges of the different Provincial Courts giving diametrically opposite rulings, on precisely the same legal propositions, and the seats of members of Parliament were affected by such contradictive rulings, the Minister of Justice would be only dealing fairly and properly with a question of such grave importance, by allowing it to go to the Supreme Court for final adjudication in all cases now pending and thus, at an early day, some uniformity of decision in these disputed legal questions might be obtained by which the Provincial Courts would thereafter be guided. Then one member would not be able to retain his seat by a decision given by one Judge, while another member took his because another Judge took an entirely different view of the law. He apprehended that was what the hon. gentleman meant by the peculiar wording of sub-section "m," that the appeal should cover the cases now pending, and should be unconditional, except as to the terms provided for by section 48 of the Supreme Court Act, and that thus an end should be put to the anomaly in the law that now existed, and that affected many of the seats of the members of this House. The Bill, as a whole, he thought, was a step in the right direction. No doubt in Committee it would be amended in several important particulars, including sub-sections "a," "b," and "m," in which the Minister of Justice could rely on his assistance to inspect the measure. With the changes and amendments he suggested, he had no doubt the Bill would be an improvement on the present law.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said that it was quite possible the Bill was capable of improvement, and he was very glad to have the assurance of his hon. friend (Mr. Cameron) that he would help in Committee to make it as perfect as possible. He was right in supposing that he did not draft the Bill himself; it was drafted by a much abler mind than his, by a man who, at any rate on some questions to which the Bill related, stood pre-eminent as an authority wherever known, so he was quite sure that the hon. gentleman would discuss those clauses with the same respect as he (Mr. McDonald) did. He thought the hon. member, however, a little hypercritical, and that a discussion of the Bill would be more practical, and, perhaps, more beneficial in Committee. With regard to his criticism as to the portion of the Bill relating to appeals from Election Courts, he (Mr. McDonald) did not see the difficulty mentioned with respect to the time. The general clause of section 48 prescribed the mode of appeal in election cases from the Election Courts to the Supreme Courts. This Bill did not interfere with the clause regulating the appeal, but simply gave the appeal to the Supreme Court in another branch of enquiry in these cases. He did not anticipate any other opinion from his hon. friend opposite and other members, than that this provision would be found very desirable indeed. Though the phraseology might not be as clear as desirable, he thought it expressed the view they all desired to enforce. An appeal should lie to the Supreme Court from any judgment, rule, order, or decision defined in the Bill. That was not an appeal from a final decision, but from any rule that might have effect of terminating the inquiry. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) was right in saying that he desired to give an appeal from an Election Court to the Supreme Court on preliminary objections raised during the trial of a case, which would have the effect of a final decision.

SIR A. J. SMITH: These preliminary objections, I understand, come before the trial is entered upon.

MR. McDONALD (Picton) said yes, before the trial on the merits of the petition was entered on. He referred to the technical objections taken before entering upon the trial on its merits, and that suspended everything until the order was determined. For instance, a case happened the other day in the Province to which his hon. friend opposite (Sir A. J. Smith) belonged, in which the question of jurisdiction arose. He submitted whether it was not better, where there were preliminary objections, that they should be determined one way or the other, before the immense expense of the petition, on its merits, was gone into; and he thought it better that the dissatisfied party should have the opportunity of getting the opinion of the highest Court of Appeal at the earliest possible moment. With these observations he trusted the House would consent to the second reading of the Bill.

SIR A. J. SMITH said the second clause of the Bill required reconstructing. In New Brunswick they had experienced the difficulty of having no appeal from the decision of the Court on a preliminary objection. This he regarded as objectionable. His hon. friend had thought it necessary to prescribe the mode of procedure in regard to appeal. That he (Sir A. J. Smith) did not think necessary, because the Judges had power to make regulations in regard to appeal, so as to give effect to the Act. He regarded the provision in subsection "f" for appeal, direct to the Supreme Court, and ignoring the intermediate Courts of Appeal as anomalous.

MR. McDONALD (Picton) said that applied to Ontario and Quebec. In Ontario, for instance, it would undoubtedly be a hardship if the litigant did not possess that privilege. There was no objection to this from the gentlemen from Ontario.

MR. MILLS said he supposed the object was to cover cases where the rule might be already settled in the Provincial Court of Appeal, when the rule might never have been settled by the Supreme Court of the Dominion, in which case he supposed the litigant was allowed to appeal to the Supreme Court in the first place.

MR. MCCARTHY said he did not agree with the view of the hon. the Minister of Justice in regard to sub-clause "n." The ordinary preliminary objection was of a formal character, and related merely to the status of the petitioner, of his right to be a petitioner. They knew very well that in election cases it would be sometimes a great objection to have an appeal which would entail a delay of two or three months. That clause, he thought, ought to be amended. He agreed that, if, by the judgment on a preliminary objection, the petitioner was disposed of, there should be a right of appeal. He thought, in the long run, more substantial justice would in this manner be had. He sympathised with his hon. friend from Westmoreland in regard to sub-section "f." He was of opinion they laboured under a great disadvantage in the number of Courts litigants had to pass through. He considered with his hon. friend that the power of appeal direct from the Court of first instance to the Supreme Court should be one that either party might exercise at his option. If a poor man knew his case was going to be appealed, he ought to have the means of bringing the case to an issue at once, at the least possible expense.

Mr. MOUSSEAU said he strongly opposed the second reading of the Bill for the same reasons which he advanced in 1875. They preferred that the appeals in regard to civil matters should be decided by the Privy Council of England, because there they could argue their cases in their own language. They could not do the same in the Supreme Court. He did not want to make any aspersions upon the character of the Judges of the Supreme Court. If they had English cases bearing upon English law, they were perfectly satisfied to submit them to the Supreme Court, but they could not conceal the fact that there were only two Judges on the bench of the Supreme Court who understood the French language and laws. The other four knew very little of the French language and law. That was the only reason why he protested against the enlargement of the powers of appeal. He next came to a clause which gave appeals in cases where there were none before. He protested against this. In their Province they had too many Judges and too many jurisdictions, and it seems as though Parliament had been only here working to ruin suitors and give fees and fortunes to lawyers.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) said that this clause would be considered in Committee, and most probably taken out.

Mr. MOUSSEAU said clause "h" provided :

"That no appeal shall be allowed from any judgment rendered in the Province of Quebec in any action, suit, cause, matter or other judicial proceeding wherein the matter in controversy does not amount to the sum or value of two thousand dollars, unless such matter, if less than that amount, involves the question of the validity of an Act of the Parliament of Canada, or of an Ordinance or Act of any of the Councils or Legislative bodies of any of the Territories or Districts of Canada, or relates to any fee of office, duty, rent, revenue, or any sum of money payable to Her Majesty, or to any title to lands or tenements, annual rents, or such like matters or things where the rights in future might be bound."

Did his hon. friend the Minister of Justice intend to withdraw that clause also ?

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) said he would discuss it with his hon. friend presently.

Mr. MOUSSEAU said clause "i" said :

"Provided, however, that an appeal shall, by leave of the Court of Queen's Bench in the Province of Quebec, lie to the Supreme Court from the final judgment of the said Court of Queen's Bench in any action, suit, cause, matter or other judicial proceeding originally instituted in the Superior Court, although the sum or value in dispute may not amount to two thousand dollars, and although the judgment may not involve any of the questions or relate to any of the matters or things in the next preceding subsection mentioned."

That provided that a man who had a suit which amounted to, say $100, he would have to go first to the Superior Court, then to the Court of Review, the Court of Queen's Bench, then to the Supreme Court. Well, it would be very funny, if it were not monstrous and outrageous, to know what such a trial was going to cost. As he understood the clause, and it was the construction put upon it by many of his friends, supposing a man took a case involving the sum of $100 into the Superior Court, even supposing there was no evidence to be taken in enquête, where, as everybody knew, the proceedings involved very heavy costs, there would still be the lawyers' and prothonotaries' fees, which would come to at least $72. Now, supposing he went to the Court of Review, the costs on all sides would come to at least $60. Then, should the case go to the Court of Queen's Bench, appeal side, it would cost at least $300. Then, by this clause, it could again go to the Supreme Court, and it would cost an additional $400. Altogether, in the suit to recover $100, there would be the small legal protective tax of $832. In his opinion there was too much jurisdiction, and there ought to be a stop to it. They had passed laws to protect every man in the country. There was protection to the flour dealer, the coal dealer, the merchant, and to all kinds of manufacturers, and it seemed to him time to protect the suitor, and the best protection to him was to reduce the number of Courts to which his suit might be referred.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said that, in answer to the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), he would just say that it was quite possible he (Mr. McDonald) had, to some extent, misapprehended the requirements and interests of the Province of Quebec, in the formation of this Act, and its relation to the former Act of which this was an amendment; but, when he stated to his hon. friend the object of the several clauses to which he (Mr. Mousseau) referred, and the object he had in view in inserting them, he would be able to correct him if he had erred. He had preserved direct appeal from the ordinary Courts of jurisdiction of Quebec to the Supreme Court, and he took it for granted it would meet with approval. Section 5 was the first one the hon. gentleman objected to. It was as follows:—

“An appeal shall lie to the said Supreme Court from the judgment of the Court of Review for the Province of Quebec in any action, suit, cause, matter or other judicial proceeding originally instituted in the Superior Court in which an appeal would lie from the judgment of the said Court of Review to Her Majesty in Her Privy Council.”

Now, if he understood matters correctly, there was, in the Province of Quebec, a Superior Court and a Court of Queen's Bench. In the Superior Court, when a case was brought before the Judge of first instance in that Court, there was an appeal from his judgment to the Superior Court sitting in what was called a Court of Review. At the present time, he had been told, it was held in the Supreme Court of Canada that, under the wording of the Act giving the right of appeal as heretofore, there was no appeal to the Supreme Court from the judgment of the Court of Review, and that the only appeal from the Court of Review was to the Privy Council. The object of this clause, of which his hon. friend complained, was to give the power of appeal from that Court of Review to the Supreme Court of Canada. His sole object in framing this clause was to give the right of appeal as above stated. Perhaps he did not apprehend the feeling of the members from the Province of Quebec, but he thought it desirable to give the right of appeal, where appeal was necessary, to the Supreme Court, instead of, as at present, litigants having to be put to the expense and trouble of going to the Privy Council. He had in his hand a memorandum which had been handed to him—and his hon. friend could see whether he was correct—saying that section “h,” which he had objected to, was taken from the Civil Code of Procedure of Quebec, article 1178. It did not give the right of appeal to the Supreme Court, if the case in dispute involved less than $2,000. He thought he had fitted the measure to the requirements of the Province of Quebec in that particular, but, of course, when the House went into Committee, his hon. friend (Mr. Mousseau) might be able to show the House that certain features of the Bill could be struck out. Section “i” gave litigants in the Province of Quebec full liberty of appeal from the Superior Court of Quebec, when, in the opinion of the Judges of that Court, it was desirable that appeal should be granted, although the amount involved should be under $2,000. There was, he understood, no appeal in the Province of Quebec from the Court of Review to the Court of Queen's Bench.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Yes.

MR. McDONALD said then he had been misinformed. It appeared to him that these three clauses did not retract the liberty of litigants, but rather increased their right of appeal. It was his desire, and, the desire of the Government, to make this Bill meet the requirements of each and all the Provinces, and as the requirements of each Province were better known by the gentlemen representing that Province, he would be glad to meet their views as far as possible.

MR. LANDRY said the hon. gentleman from Bagot had pointed out certain objectionable features in this proposed legislation. He, along with the members generally of the Province of Quebec, concurred in the views expressed by that hon. gentleman. If this legislation was adopted, it would be unfavourably received in the Province of Quebec. He was pleased to see that the Government had decided to expunge from the Act whatever might affect injuriously the Province of Quebec, but he thought the Government would do still better to expunge the whole Act.

MR. OUMET said he was one who, in 1875, fought hard in opposition to the Bill constituting the Supreme Court. He still held the same opinion, and, if he could possibly deprive the Supreme Court of the appeal jurisdiction in civil matters, more especially as regarded Quebec, he would do so at once. He was aware, however, that such a measure could not be carried in this House. But as it was now proposed to amend the Supreme Court Act, he would venture to make some suggestions. It had been well stated that we had two many Appeal Courts. One appeal lay from the Superior Court to the Court of Review, from the Court of Review to the Court of Queen's Bench, and from that to the Supreme Court here, and in some cases from this Court to the Privy Council. Suitors were all of the opinion that it would be a great benefit to the public if some of these appeals were abolished. Suppose they took all the Final Appeal Courts from the Provinces and made a great Appeal Court at Ottawa, to which would be brought all appeals from the different Provinces; suppose that, instead of having these Supreme Court Judges, they should have fifteen Judges from the several Provinces, of whom, Quebec, for instance, should furnish five; they would then have a Court to which they could bring their appeals with greater confidence than at present, and bring them directly from Courts of first instance, without passing uselessly throughout the other Courts. They all know that the common law differed in the different Provinces; the civil law in Quebec differed a great deal from the laws of the other Provinces. If they had such a large Court as he suggested, they would have thereby a large legal centre, and by the daily intercourse of the Judges they would become, in a few years, conversant with the laws of all the other Provinces. One result of this would, perhaps, be that these Judges, being thus acquainted with the laws in all the Provinces, might be able to fuse them into one system for the whole Dominion. Some persons might say of him, perhaps, that he seemed ready to give up the French law, but he thought they had nothing to fear in Quebec from a comparison of their French laws with the common law prevailing in the other Provinces. Indeed, he believed that the result of such comparison would sooner lead the other Provinces to prefer the French law, with some amendments, to their own, and he had heard a similar opinion attributed to a distinguished member of this House. This great advantage likely to be gained, that was, a unification of all the laws in the Dominion, would do much towards bringing about the result to which all patriots aimed — the consolidation of our heterogeneous elements into one Canadian nationality, governed by the same laws in civil as well as criminal matters. These suggestions might appear premature and presumptuous, but he thought after all we must come to that. Everyone felt that we had too many Courts at present, and if we were going to have a Supreme Court, let us make it useful to the public in general, and useful to the working of our institutions.

MR. DAWSON said he did not rise to take any part in the discussion, but merely to say that he repudiated the idea of having voted for the abolition of the Supreme Court in voting for the introduction of the Bill of the hon. member for East Northumberland, which, in fact, he had not seen; nor did he wish to throw any reflection on the Supreme Court. He believed the Supreme Court was in every way deserving of the confidence of this House and of the country.

INSOLVENT ACTS REPEAL BILL.

[BILL 85.]

(Mr. Colby.)

SECOND READING NEGATIVED.

Order for second reading read.

MR. COLBY said that, as chairman of the Committee appointed some time ago by the House to consider the question of Insolvency, it, perhaps, properly devolved upon him to state the views at which the Committee had arrived with regard to the subject, and the recommendations which they had seen fit to make. He trusted the observations which he might feel himself called upon to make would be received by this House with the attention which the importance of the subject deserved, and in a spirit of candour. There was, perhaps, no subject which at the present time was a source of greater anxiety than this Bill. He would not go into the details of the Bill proposed by the Committee. The hon. gentlemen from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), St. John (Mr. Weldon), and South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), whose experience in the practical working of the Insolvency Law was greater than his own, and who were more familiar with the details of the Bill, would have an opportunity of speaking on these points. He would confine himself to the principle of the Bill. He might say, at the outset, that the Committee, at their first meeting, found themselves very much divided in sentiment, as were this House and the country, with regard to the expediency of continuing the Insolvency Act, or repealing it pure and simple, and, at an early meeting of the Committee, when the sense was taken upon the question, eight members voted for the repeal of the Act, while nine members voted for a modification of it. He mentioned this in order that his hon. friends, who were in favour of its repeal, might see that the entire question had been considered by a Committee composed largely of gentlemen whose views coincided with their own, and they might be prepared, perhaps, to receive with greater favour the recommendations which a Committee so composed might have felt called upon to make. After the Committee at large had determined to prepare amendments to the Act, they appointed a sub-Committee, and it became the duty of the sub-Committee, at the very outset, to seriously consider the evils of the Insolvency Act, which, in the interests of the public, it was desirable to remove. Now, he did not assume to speak for the whole Committee, but, in giving expression to his own views, he believed he would also fairly represent the prevailing sentiment among the members of the Committee. Representations had been made from one end of the country to the other, through the press, on the floor of Parliament, from various sources, to the effect that the present Insolvency Act had given rise to great evils. The Committee felt bound to ascertain the nature of those evils, with a view of providing the proper remedy. They found the complaints against the Act were that it had given rise to great recklessness in trade, to great extravagance in living among the trading classes, to great dishonesty. Deputations which had appeared before them had set forth that the effect of this Act had been, not to stimulate men in difficulties to endeavour to extricate themselves from their difficulties, but acted as an inducement to them to place themselves under its operation, because a man in difficulties would see he was a fool, or if he did not, others would make him see it, to spend the best years of his life in endeavouring to extricate himself from his troubles, when he could do so by the easy process of starting anew in life, free from the load of debt, and, by a favourable compromise with his creditors, save out of the wreck of his estate a very considerable sum, with which to start business again. He (Mr. Colby) had no hesitation in saying that if the only method of getting rid of that condition of affairs, was the repeal of the Insolvent Act, pure and simple, he would work heartily for its repeal. The evils which existed here also existed in England. In looking over the recent speech of the Lord Chancellor, in looking over the articles in the press and in the reviews, in reading the comments made with regard to the working of the Insolvent Act in England, precisely the same expression of opinion as in this country, concerning the evil effects of the Act, would be found. He would beg to draw the attention of the House to one or two extracts. The Saturday Review, with reference to the working of the Act, stated as follows :

"The Chancellor's Bankruptcy Bill may be described as a measure for retaining the present system of dealing with defaulting debtors, but weeding it of its abuses. At present there are two methods in which an insolvent may be treated by his creditors; he may be made a bankrupt, or he may escape the ignominy of bankruptcy by being allowed to compound with his creditors. The latter is the method of treatment which debtors naturally prefer, and which creditors, through supineness, good nature, or a calculation of their interests, are generally willing to sanction. It is around the working of this method that the frightful abuses which now call for the intervention of the Government have gradually sprung up. The chief of these abuses is, that insolvency has lost all its terrors. Many men think no more of not paying their debts than of taking a trip to Brighton. A little friendly manoeuvring is exercised in their behalf by persons who have made this curious art their profession, and they are completely whitewashed. They are at once released from the effects of the past without any inquiry into their conduct, and a future exactly like the past is immediately opened to them. Through the facilities thus opened to dishonest or reckless trading the national loss, through bad debts, has risen to the startling amount of eighteen millions per annum."

[That was through the facility with which these arrangements were made. In the Fortnightly Review he found, at the summing up of a long and able article on the question, the following :—

"The facility of getting rid of liabilities, however contracted, is rapidly demoralising all branches of trade, from the highest to the lowest. Men waste their own means, large and small, and waste the means of their relatives, friends and creditors in starting enterprises of which they have no real knowledge. They carry them on recklessly; they live profusely; they reduce to beggary honest and hard-working competitors in the same line of trade; and for the very sufficient reason that the magnificent insolvent, with a complacent reliance on the easy process of liquidation, to be conducted practically under his own guidance, can and does go on for years, so conducting his business that losses have no terror for him. Under such a state of things it is idle to talk of economic laws of supply and demand. Those laws suppose honest trading, and a wholesome horror of the disgrace of bankruptcy. We have had hundreds of examples lately, and on the largest scale, that the vicious weakness and laxity of the Bankruptcy laws are rapidly expelling the honesty and putting an end to the sentiment of disgrace. For this end, a swift and certain remedy must be found; and a remedy which ought to be all the more swift and certain, because, properly carried out, it will not add one single farthing to the expenses of the Public Treasury."

In the United States the same evil had been complained of. In a letter which was addressed by Mr. Claffin, one of the largest merchants in New York, to a gentleman in this city, and which was read before the Dominion Board of Trade, he found these remarks :—

"However the general features of the Bankrupt Act may commend themselves to philanthropists and political speculators, we have found that whenever a composition is guaranteed to a debtor by law, it has operated to the disadvantage of all honest traders. How is it possible for a merchant of moderate capital to pay 100c. in the dollar of his obligations when his neighbour is compelled to pay only 20c., or even a more nominal consideration, by the virtue of the provisions of a bankrupt law. In the United States bankruptcy had degenerated into a trade and a profession, and a man who was successful in this department received from our degenerated public sentiment only applause and credit for his successful performance. A little while longer and all trade would have been prostrated under the operation of such a law."

In Canada, in England, and in the United States; the same condition of affairs, the same injurious effect had resulted from the Insolvency Act in each country. What was that injurious effect? It would be well to analyse it, to see where the difficulty was, and apply the remedy. The difficulty lay in the facility with which the insolvent could make his composition, arrange with his creditors, and get his discharge. Now, if that dangerous facility were removed,

if it were made impossible for a man to get his discharge under any such circumstances, to buy back his assets under any condition whatever, the evil would be removed just as effectually as if the law were repealed altogether. The Committee had struck the axe at the root of that evil by making it impossible for a creditor and debtor to enter into this composition arrangement, which, of itself, seemed reasonable enough in theory, but which had been productive of such enormous evils. There was nothing more humane in theory than the idea that, if a man surrendered his property to his creditors, he should have absolution and start free in life again. The idea of protecting the honest and unfortunate debtor was a humane and a proper idea, but in England, in the United States, and in Canada, where endeavours had been made to protect the honest and unfortunate trader, the door had been, unfortunately, opened to fraud, demoralisation, recklessness and evils so numerous that it became necessary, in the public interest, that these facilities should be done away with. The Committee had, consequently, in their Bill, made it impossible for an insolvent to make this composition and arrangement with his creditors, by which he would buy back his estate. They had made it impossible for him to obtain his discharge, as a matter of right, under any circumstances whatever, from the obligations he had voluntarily assumed. He could only obtain it by the concurrence, the free action of his creditors, and in attaining that concurrence his relatives were not permitted to take part and vote. They had not said it was necessary he should have the assent of every individual creditor upon his list, because experience had shown that, while such a condition as that existed, some creditor, for the sake of being paid in full, would stand out and insist that he should be paid in full before such an arrangement could be entered into. Consequently the Committee had made this provision, which might be relaxed or made more stringent. When the Bill was discussed in Committee, if the House thought any alteration necessary: that, in order to obtain a discharge under any circumstances whatever, it was necessary for the insolvent to obtain the assent of four-fifths in number of his creditors, representing four-fifths in value of the entire indebtedness against him, his relatives not being included in the number. All experience had shown that the man who was really honest and unfortunate, who could show a good honest record, and who, by some unforeseen calamity, by some providential infliction, had fallen into adversity, would, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, obtain a free discharge from his creditors; but experience had also shown that some creditor, knowing that such would be the tendency of the others, would, in order to improve his own position, say to the debtor: You cannot carry out that arrangement unless I am paid in full. Consequently, the Committee had not made it necessary that the assent of every individual creditor should be obtained before a discharge could be granted. It had been the honest endeavour of the Committee to meet the evils of this Act in this way, to put an end to every inducement which would prompt a man to put himself under the operation of the Insolvent Act, so that, henceforth, men in difficulty, instead of flying to the Insolvent Act for refuge, would flee from it, would have nothing to gain under it, and, instead of surrendering in a cowardly, timid, or dishonest manner, to the debts that were upon them, would strive manfully to keep themselves out of the operation of the Act. Now, he submitted to those who asked for a repeal of the Act, pure and simple, whether, if that were accomplished, their views were not fully met. Year after year he had deemed it his duty to advocate the repeal of the Insolvency Act, and had pointed out these very results as results that were certain to follow, when times of depression came on, as they had unfortunately come. But he had, invariably, gone further, and held that while these evils should be removed, a law was needed for the fair distribution of assets, but that was a matter to which he would presently allude. The Committee believed that, in striking out the clauses providing for the composition and discharge, those providing for a judicial discharge, and those providing for the sale of an estate en bloc, they had struck at the root of the evils complained of.

SIR A. J. SMITH : You have abolished official assignees.

MR. COLBY said the Committee had abolished them, and that fact would, he believed, be hailed with pleasure by all in this country. He was aware that among the numerous class of official assignees in this country, there were many most estimable men, many honest, competent men, who did their duty in a most satisfactory manner; but there were also, in that numerous class, men who had brought discredit upon the name of official assignee. There were in this class men who, having the opportunity of taking possession of the estate and books of a debtor, could, by collusion with a friendly insolvent, or by inducements held out to the creditors, provide themselves with proxies and cause themselves to be appointed permanent assignees, and wind up the estates in their own interest. In order to do that, estates had been very badly depreciated. But among the worst evils of this system of official assignees was the fact that it created a class of men who were making money out of insolvents' estates, whose interest it was that every man should go into insolvency, and who were responsible, to a very large extent, for the great rush which had been made into insolvency in times past. Now, the Bill had abolished composition, judicial discharge, official assignees, and contemplated another improvement. It limited the proxy system in this way. It obliged every creditor, living within the jurisdiction where the insolvent estate was to attend the meeting personally, or be represented there by his book-keeper or agent, and no one, in such case, could hold a proxy for another, except he were a creditor, and no creditor could hold but one proxy; so that this Bill practically did away with this manipulating an estate by means of proxies, and made the creditor himself attentive to his own business. There had been too great neglect by the creditors themselves. There was no doubt the Insolvency Law would have worked very much better had the creditors given that attention to their own affairs which they should have done, but, when difficulties arose, when they saw a thing was going to the bad, there was something repulsive in the idea. They wanted to wipe the thing out. They did not care to attend meetings; they wanted to wipe it off their books as soon as possible, and in that way neglected their interests. Of course, this Bill did not deprive the creditors in England, or in jurisdictions other than the one in which the insolvent failed, from being represented by proxy. They hoped that the creditor would be induced to give more of his personal attention to the affairs of the insolvent than he had hitherto given, and that beneficial results would ensue from this. Thus, by those three methods—of limiting the system, by abolishing the official assignee, and doing away with composition and discharge, and judicial discharge, they believed they would strike at the root at almost all the evils—he might say all the evils that had ever been complained of in the House and country in regard to the Insolvent Act. In place of the official assignee, they had provided for a guardian of the estate, who would take possession of it as a sheriff did, and hold it during the time the creditors were being convened, but no longer. This guardian received a very moderate fee. $5 for every seizure, and a moderate allowance for the custody of the estate. His bill for an estate of $5,000 would not exceed $30. Otherwise, he could make no costs against the estate, nor be eligible to become a permanent trustee of it, and he could have no object in endeavouring to influence parties to obtain it. The creditors, represented by their agents, were at perfect liberty to select, for the winding up of the estate, such men as they deemed in their interest advisable, except him who had been its legal guardian. They had felt called upon to make that great change. They had made another very important change—important, he was sure, in the estimation of some members of the House; while the non-trader did not come under the operation of the Act, was not affected by it in one way, they had stipulated he should not be affected in the other way; so that in the case of the farmer or non-trader creditor, should a discharge be given the debtor by four-fifths in number and value of the trading creditors, it did not cut off the debt or claim of the farmer or non-trader, who could come in for a dividend like all other claimants, and hold over the balance of his claim against the debtor. So that the discharge, difficult as it was to obtain, was not one that cut off the claim of the non-trader. Those were the essential features of the changes, and they were such as should commend themselves especially to members, who, like himself, had been for years endeavouring to obtain the abrogation of the Insolvent Act. His views with regard to the question were the same as in 1870, 1871 and 1872. When in 1872 he introduced a Bill to abolish the Act, which passed this House, he begged to call the attention of his hon. friends who then voted with him for the repeal of the Insolvent Act to this fact: while he pointed out the same class of evils then existing, as to-day, he stated in the same breath, that it was necessary in his judgment, in the interest of the Dominion, that there should be a uniform law throughout the Dominion; that they should not be thrown back on their Provincial laws; that the general law should be based on the equitable principle of the law of Quebec, giving a fair distribution of the proceeds of a bankrupt's estate among the creditors. Now, he called attention to this fact, when this Committee considered the petitions before the House for the repeal of the Act, there was but one in the whole long list which asked for its repeal, pure and simple. They had petitions from Halifax and various parts of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, from Montreal, Toronto and various parts of Ontario and Quebec, all suggesting that they should repeal the old Act, but should also pass another Act which would do away with preferential assignments. That was precisely what the Committee had done; they had repealed the Act so far as the abolition of those objectionable features was concerned, and simply proposed the passing of another Act which should give a uniform law throughout the Dominion. Was it not desirable to have a uniform law for the collection of commercial debts? When they considered the vast increase in inter-Provincial trade, and the manifold relations between the merchants of one Province and the people of another, was it not desirable that there should be uniformity of law, so that the merchants and manufacturers in Ontario and Quebec, sending goods to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, should know what was the law for the collection of debts in those Provinces. This feature of uniformity in the law was a great advantage in itself, provided the law was good. It would be superior to the old system of diverse laws in the different Provinces—a perplexing patchwork—the laws of each Province differing from those of the others. People would be under the necessity of learning them all in order to know what their remedies were. He would go a step further and say that there should be a law providing for a speedy and summary way of taking possession of the debts and estate of the insolvent. It should not be necessary that every creditor should rush into Court and institute his separate action against an insolvent debtor. There should not be a multiplicity of actions in order that each creditor should get his rights. Such a condition would be unsatisfactory in the extreme. It involved a multiplicity of actions, which the spirit of all laws very properly abhors. Instead of that, the law which they proposed made one action suffice. If a man was in a state of difficulty, and unable to pay his debts, one proceeding or attachment would take his entire estate. Instead of having 30 or 40 actions in the hands of as many lawyers, perhaps, to wind up an estate, with immense law costs, one attachment would put the estate into the custody of the creditors, and secure it till it was disposed of. The Bill of the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) revived the old Provincial laws, pure and simple. He would thus revive in the other Provinces a principle of law which the people of the Province of Quebec abhorred—the system of preferential assignments and snap judgments, first come, first served—now that hon. gentleman and his hon. friends from Quebec were taught to loathe that system. They believed that a man's estate should be fairly and equitably divided among all his creditors. Now, his hon. friends from Quebec, who should vote for the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville, would maintain the law of preferential assignments and kindred evils. They would fly in the face of that system, which they, in Quebec, had been educated to believe was most excellent and beneficent—the best that existed on the continent of America, and which was based on pure equity. If the estate could not pay all demands, it should pay according to the amount of each claim fairly and honourably as far as it went. That was the proposition which the Bill affirmed. The proposition of the hon. member for Iberville affirmed, was the revival of the system of law in the other Provinces, which they would not tolerate for a moment in Quebec. Another thing the Bill proposed, not attainable under local laws, which made an Act of this kind necessary—the creditors of a man in difficulties might take possession of his books, examine him as to the condition of affairs, and find out who were his debtors who might be pursued. Under the old Provincial laws, creditors had to go on a voyage of discovery, having no means of taking possession of the books, or finding out the insolvent's debtors, or who had got most of his goods within a short time. But under the proposed law they would take possession of the books, examine the debtor, and obtain disclosures with regard to the position of his affairs. They would compel him to disclose if his property was concealed, and reveal to his debtors. What was done with the proposed Bill was simply this: they had attempted to remove the evil while endeavouring to preserve certain features which were beneficial and believed worthy of preservation in the interest of the trading community. In one sense it might be said not to be an Insolvent Act. It was just enough of an Insolvent Act to be brought within the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament. It would enable the creditor to take possession of an insolvent estate by one action instead of a multitude. He asked if this was not a laudable purpose. They had stripped the old Act of its evils as thoroughly as if they had repealed it, and had furnished the commercial community with what they did desire—a law by which the creditors might possess themselves of an insolvent's estate and fairly divide among themselves its proceeds. Hon. members could not find a single expression of opinion from the mercantile bodies, or from merchants anywhere in Canada, which went in any other direction. The Dominion Board of Trade had expressed itself in favor of preserving the clauses of the old Act, which the Committee had retained. The Boards of Trade of the great cities had pronounced themselves in the same sense—that they wished to remove the evils of the Act, but also to provide for a fair distribution of an insolvent's assets. He would pass from that to another matter. Some hon. members said that this was a bulky Bill, which they could not get through this Session, and that they might as well continue the old Act. He believed however, the Bill fell 40 clauses short of the old Act. The sub-Committee had before them a Bill introduced by himself, and drawn up by a leading barrister of Montreal, one of the most competent men in Canada, Mr. Ritchie, and they had before them a Bill drawn by the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) but they had put them both aside, and why? Not that they did not consider them without merit, for he believed the Bill he had introduced, ably as it was explained by Mr. Ritchie, commended itself to the favourable considerations of its members, and he believed that the Bill of the member for Jacques Cartier, had many excellent features, but they thought it better to retain, for the present, an imperfect Act, with clauses with which the trading community were familiar, with which the gentlemen of the Bar were familiar, and which had been adjudicated upon, than to an try attentive or experimental Act that, however carefully drawn, might be defective in particulars, and would be new in its provisions. They could not but perceive that it was impossible, with a limited time at the command of the sub-Committee, to elaborate an entirely new system. Consequently, they had decided to retain the old Act as amended. It would have been very pleasing, no doubt, to the members of the Committee to have had their names associated with a new Insolvent Act if it had worked all right. But if it had been found that the law, the first time it went to the Court, had failed in its operation, they should not have felt so happy. Hon. members need not be intimidated by the length of the Bill. The new clauses were printed in italics, and the clauses expunged described. If any hon. member would put himself to the extraordinary exertion of turning over the leaves of the Bill, he would find very few clauses printed in italics, and but a very few clauses the House would have to consider if it went into Committee on the Bill.

After Recess.

MR. COLBY said it was his intention to have closed his remarks at six o'clock, and he would have done so but for some enquiries that had been made from him during the recess, in regard to the provisions of the Bill. An hon. member referred to his (Mr. Colby's) observation, that in doing away with composition and discharge they had struck at the root of the evil, and had said: "But you have not done it—you have not abolished composition and discharge." He (Mr. Colby) proposed to refer to the matter for a few moments. They had repealed those clauses which entitled the insolvent to a judicial discharge as a matter of right. Hon. gentlemen would agree with him in this: that if a debtor under this Bill could obtain a discharge, it was as a matter of grace by the nearly unanimous consent of his creditors, and not at all as a matter of right. But they had done what he did not specially dwell upon in his former remarks. They had abolished what were known as composition arrangements, by which the debtor could purchase back his estate and start again in business, paying to his creditors a certain percentage of his indebtedness. Sales en bloc were also impossible, or they intended that they should be so, if not they would make them so in Committee, when they had the opportunity of going into Committee. One of the most serious evils in the practical working of the Insolvency Act, was the facility with which debtors could get their estates back again. He would read an extract which would illustrate this better than he would, perhaps, be able to demonstrate it by language. It was an actual, and not an exaggerated, instance, and he therefore desired to direct the attention of the House to it, as a representative case :—

"The insolvent thus obtained, as the consequence of his failure, a surplus which he could not possibly have accumulated by less than eight years of successful trade, backed by patient and continued thrift. The very broad hint given to his neighbours in trade requires no further mention, and the effect of such cases, constantly occurring, upon the morals of the trade generally, may as easily be imagined as described."

Now that was the class of case, and that was the evil which they sought to avoid. That man made a composition of 40c., and by that means saved $9,000 out of his own bankrupt estate. He undertook to make the payments at four, eight, and twelve months, and, in order to realise his payments, he was obliged to do it out of his estate by underselling the solvent trader. This condition of the law tended to demoralise the whole community, and it had the effect of breaking down the solvent trader who was endeavouring, in an honest and faithful manner, to keep his head above water and pay his debts. Under this Bill, it was impossible for the debtor to buy back his estate, nor could he purchase it through a third person. Sales en bloc had been effectually prevented. The Committee had been guided, in making these provisions, by the disastrous experience of years back, and by the opinions of intelligent merchants and men who had watched commercial matters carefully. They had guarded every point which had caused demoralisation and injury to the honest trader. Under the composition arrangement, the insolvent went to his creditor, and said: "My assets are nominally so much," and he made a proposition which by no means represented the value of the estate. The creditor said: "It is better to have something now, than an indefinite amount by-and-by," and if the estate showed 80 per cent., the creditor took 30 per cent. for the sake of getting the matter closed out. The Committee had had this matter under consideration. They had weighed all these points carefully, anxiously, and earnestly, and had endeavoured, in every possible way, to guard against all these abuses. Another hon. member had referred to the clause which provided for a Judge in bankruptcy at Montreal. He would, with the permission of the House, explain the views of the Committee upon that point. The original draft of the Bill provided for Judges at the chief courts of trade, and it provided also for the imposition of a tax of one half of one per cent. on the estates administered within the jurisdiction of the Judge. But a feeling grew up that this was creating new judgeships, affording additional patronage, and making the Bankruptcy Law a permanent tax on estates that should not be so taxed. In deference to that sentiment the Committee modified their proposition, and instead of laying a tax on the estate, the Judge was to be paid like other Judges, and to be limited to the city of Montreal. He wished to say how that hon. gentlemen need not oppose the second reading of the Bill on account of that provision. That was one of the minor details, and, in Committee of the Whole, it would be the privilege of the House to take it out entirely if they considered a Judge was not required in bankruptcy in Montreal, or enlarge it, if they thought it necessary that there should also be Judges in bankruptcy in Toronto, Halifax, St. John, or any other business centre. There was one other matter which he would refer to. It was very evident that many members from the rural districts had come to this House with the intention of voting for the repeal of the Insolvency Act. Many members had, very likely, declared to their constituents that such was their intention. He himself was a representative of a rural district, and it was his intention to have voted for the repeal of the Insolvency Act, and he believed he might say, on behalf of the hon. gentleman who would second this proposition, that it was his intention, also, to have voted for its repeal. But the aspect of the matter had entirely changed. The farmers felt that they had a great grievance. They saw traders taking advantage of the Insolvency Act when they were in difficulties, and when in similar straits they (the farmers) had no such privilege. But the Committee had changed this by their Bill. It was no object to any trader or non-trader to put himself under the operation of the Bill as it now stood. More than that, however, they had provided that the farm in common with other creditors, would come in for a fair share of the distribution of the effects, but that he should not be affected by any discharge given to the debtor. He held the balance of his claim in its entirety. He appealed to members from the rural districts, and he did so with a great deal of confidence, because he was one of their number, not to favour a repeal of the Insolvent Act, pure and simple, but to allow the commercial community some means of taking possession of, and distributing, insolvent estates. If the commercial community wanted such an Act, why should we withhold it from them. If the great commercial centres of the Dominion required an Act by which they could take possession of the estate of an insolvent, and wind it up in a manner pleasing to themselves, why should the representatives of the rural districts say "You shall not have it." As an evidence that the commercial community desired it, he would read several telegrams. The hon. gentleman then read telegrams from the Board of Trade of Quebec, Hamilton and Toronto.

In these they had the views of Quebec, Toronto and Hamilton. The petitions which came before the House from Truro, Halifax and other parts of Nova Scotia, asked for a suspension or repeal of the present Act, and the substitution in its place of an Act for the prevention of preferential assignments. Then they had Montreal, Sherbrooke, St. Hyacinthe, Brockville, Quebec, and Hamilton, asking for a repeal of the Act, on the ground that its continuance was an evil, and that it might be replaced by an Act protecting alike both the debtor and creditor without affording facilities for fraudulent transactions, or preferring one creditor before another. They had, from every commercial centre in this Dominion, an indication of the same sentiment. He ventured to say that if a division on this question should take place in the House, they would find the older members who had debated the question, and who had been familiar with it for years, and the members from the cities would be in favour of the modifications proposed by the Committee. He would give the House the substance of two letters he had received from a Montreal merchant. On the 25th of March he wrote to him as Chairman of the Committee, asking him to do all in his power to repeal the Insolvent Act, which had done so much evil in the country, and pointing out the demoralisation and injurious consequences that had resulted through it to legitimate trade. On the 14th of April, the same gentleman wrote that he had seen the propositions of the Committee, and that he desired to withdraw his former letter, that the Bill proposed to the House met his views and met the views of every merchant with whom he had conversed in the city. From this cumulative evidence, from the petitions coming from Boards of Trade and from every commercial centre in the Dominion, there was one universal expression—the denunciation of the abuses and evils of the present Act, and a desire that it should be replaced by another, that would provide for a fair distribution of assets, and do away with preferential assignments. Why should they, representing the rural constituencies, gainsay the wishes of the commercial men, and say they should not have a law which they conceived to be in their interest? Why should they, who had been hitherto in favour of the repeal of the whole Act, not be willing to content themselves with the retention of those features which enabled a creditor to take possession speedily and summarily of an estate, and wind up its affairs? He thought they were living at a very critical period; in times of extreme depression; in times when many a merchant had sleepless nights, as he considered the state of his ledger and his obligations. He thought they were living at a time when they could not afford to risk new experiments. It might be hazardous to rush from the one extreme of an Insolvency Act, that the trading community were familiar with, to the opposite extreme, the entire repeal of the Act. He believed the middle course was the safe one—the course which repealed the evils of the Act, and retained its benefits. He did not believe it was opportune, judicious, or business-like, to act precipitately in this matter, and to throw the whole business of this country into chaos. Suppose the law was instantly changed, and merchants thrown back on the old Provincial laws, see how unsettled a condition of affairs would exist; how excited men would become under the new trouble that would be thrown upon them in being obliged to seek new remedies—new measures for the protection of their interest—in places where they did not understand the law. He believed the sound judgment and fair consideration of the interests of this country, would teach the better sense of this House that the prudent course was the middle course, and not the extreme one. That was the basis of what the Committee proposed to-day: to protect the commercial community, to relieve the non-trading community from the operation of the laws, and when an estate was taken possession of, to enable a fair distribution to be made.

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier) said, in every country the subject of insolvency and bankruptcy had always been considered as one surrounded by serious difficulties. Everywhere, especially in countries not governed by the maxims of the Roman or Civil law, it had been difficult to frame laws equally just and fair to the creditor and the debtor. In England, the task had been found exceedingly complicated, and almost impossible of being accomplished. While in Scotland, France, Germany, and Italy, where the principles of the Roman law prevailed, laws for the settlement of insolvent estates had for years, almost centuries, been accepted as settled institutions. England, the United States and Canada, were still in search of such laws, and seemed to be as far as ever from coming to a satisfactory conclusion. In Scotland, for instance, there had been no important legislation on the subject since 1839, when an Act to amend the laws of Scotland, relating to bankruptcy, was adopted. It was not altogether a new Act. It was chiefly confined to the sequestration of estates of bankrupts, and had ever since been in force, with few changes of minor importance. In France the origin of bankrupt laws can be traced to 1673, as forming part of the celebrated ordinance of that year of Louis XIV., and ever since they have only been twice reconsidered—first in 1808, at the time of the promulgation of the Code of Commerce; and, secondly, in 1838, when the law, as now in force, was enacted. In England, on the contrary, not to go back beyond the present reign, we find that no less than three distinct Bankrupt Acts have been tried—one in 1849, another in 1861, a third one in 1869; and the people of Great Britain are not yet satisfied. The Act of 1869 is pronounced to be far worse than the former Acts, and a general cry is heard from all parts of the Kingdom, demanding its repeal. A portion of the mercantile community were so disgusted with the present state of things, that the repeal of all insolvent laws, pure and simple, was even thought of in that great commercial country. The London Spectator, of the 1st February, 1879, says:—“We are glad that the great bankers and merchants in the city of London are, as the important memorial addressed to Lord Beaconsfield shows, giving their minds to the subject of the scandalous working of the Bankruptcy Act of 1869. When fifty of the leading banking and mercantile firms in the city put any complaint respecting commercial law into shape—when such weighty firms as Barings; Barclay, Bevan & Co.; Glyn, Mills, Currie & Co.; Hoare & Co.;

Smith, Payne & Smiths, and the London and Westminster Bank, append their names to an address, praying an amendment of any law affecting them, no Government can disregard the matter. *

* * * Not the least remarkable feature of the memorial is that it is a virtual recantation. Before the Act of 1869 came into operation—certainly before Lord Westbury's measure of 1861 was passed—nine out of ten men of business would have said:—The best Bankruptcy Law would be practically no Bankruptcy Law. Leave creditors alone to settle with their debtors as they see fit. Let there be no interference on the part of official assignees, with the accompanying official harpies, and the assets of bankrupts will be divided promptly, cheaply, and fairly. Contrast the slow and expensive operation of the old Court of Review, and that in Basinghall street, with their multitude of highly-paid officials (serenely indifferent to the miserable creditors) with the cheap procedure in Scotland, where the creditors arrange matters for themselves, and where the work of distribution is done better, as well as more cheaply, than here. Only let the creditors do the work which the Courts do, and all will be well. * *

The memorialists see plainly enough that matters are very wrong. It can, indeed, be hardly denied by anyone who looks into the comptroller's annual reports, that the present Bankruptcy Law is almost as injurious to honest trading as if there were in the city of London an Alsatia, in which the Queen's writs or warrants did not run, and to which thieves might retire in safety.” However, the Spectator, like the Times, in fact the whole English press, and the largest portion of the English people, demand a Bankrupt Law. The Lord Chancellor had gone to work, and had just submitted to Parliament, a new Bankruptcy Bill, which would probably receive its approbation; although fears were entertained by many that this new piece of legislation would be too lenient and permissive, in fact, as is alleged, “a mere patching of an old rotten garment.” “A harder Bankruptcy Law,” says an able writer in the April number of Fraser, “would tell greatly in favour of the honest insolvent, who is at present confounded with the rogue, and it would also serve as a check on reckless trading." In the United States, the first Bankruptcy Law was passed in 1800, and was expressly limited to the period of five years, but was repealed before the expiration of that period, on the 19th December, 1803. The second Act was passed in 1841, and repealed by an Act which took effect in 1843. The third and last Act had been the Bankruptcy Act of 1867, which was repealed in 1878. It was well-known that those Acts were framed mainly for the benefit of the debtors. They were passed to meet special emergencies, such as the disasters of the unprecedented Civil War of 1861-65; and it was not surprising to hear that the abolition of those laws had had a good effect upon the trade and commerce of our neighbours. We must finally bear in mind that most of the States have State Insolvency Laws, which provided for the distribution of insolvent estates equally between the creditors. In fact, the States of Massachusetts, New Jersey, and other States of the Union, have Insolvency Laws almost as voluminous as the law now under consideration in this Parliament. With regard to our own country, general Bankrupt Laws were introduced for the first time in 1839, and repealed in 1843, when a temporary Act, based upon the same principles, favourable to the debtor, was enacted and continued to 1849, when it ceased to operate. In 1863, Hon. Mr. Abbott, then a member of the Canadian Cabinet, introduced a new Insolvency Act, which was passed the following year, under the name of the Insolvent Act of 1864. The author announced that he intended to have a law "creating a summary mode of realising and distributing the estates of insolvents, and of affording relief from liability to debtors, making a full disclosure and delivery of their estates to the creditors." It was, however, an undisputed fact—and the features and practical result of the Bill proved that it was intended to work against the creditor—that it was framed to meet the then prevailing feeling of the community, which was then suffering from the great commercial crisis of 1857, and was altogether in favour of the unfortunate insolvents. He (Mr. Girouard) then took the liberty to review and criticise this new law. He said, quoting from his "Review of the Insolvent Act of 1864:"

MR. GIROUARD.

—"Since the first of September, it has been in force as law, to the great satisfaction of insolvents, who cannot fail to invoke its protection, and have already, to the number of hundreds, made their announcements to the country, but, at the same time, to the great dissatisfaction of a large number of merchants, who do not find in it the guarantee which was promised, or the simple, short, clear and easily understood dispositions which they ought to understand, and be able to apply without possessing the skill of its author, a man well-known to all as thoroughly conversant with the practical affairs of commerce, and with the laws relating thereto. * * * *"

What is to be expected from a law which, from the first to the thirteenth clause, and from the first to the hundred and thirty-first paragraph, favours almost always the insolvent, and not the creditor? When we glance at the provisions of the Act, the mode, voluntary as well as compulsory, of winding up the affairs of the insolvent; when it is observed that the bankrupt has himself the control of the important delays of the announcement of his failure, and the divesting himself of his estate; that he can still, with impunity, defeat the law and defraud his creditors, obtain, in spite of the latter, a judicial discharge; when it is clear that the hope of such discharge will be for the debtor a powerful motive to induce him to diminish his assets, and afterwards to declare himself in a state of bankruptcy, in order to come out of it enriched with the spoils of the mass; when, we say, we consider all these complications and formalities, which here, as always, serve the debtor and not the creditor; when we remember, in fine, all these delays and costs of liquidation, without forgetting the expenses of the insolvent in obtaining his discharge, and attending the meetings of creditors, for the arrangement of his own affairs, it is easy to see, we say again, that the fact, the evidence of which we invoked, is but the rigorous consequence of the law, the inevitable result of the provisions of the Act. Finally, we think we do not stretch the truth in affirming that a large number of merchants, if not the greater number, would be satisfied with few amendments, and simple additions, to the existing laws, for the sole purpose of defining and punishing fraud, and giving to the cession de biens its proper and necessary effects. Let the Legislature, by rigorous enactments, endeavour to banish fraud; and, in order to do so, let it introduce the presumptions of fraud consecrated by the codes of the commercial nations of Europe; let it require from each trader, the keeping of regular books of account, and authorise the seizure of the same; let it strike without mercy at séparations de biens and fraudulent commercial partnerships—the two great plagues of our trade;—let it force the marchande publique to carry on business under her own name, and not under that of her husband; let it limit the right of conservatory process of the non-paid vendor, above all, let every fraud be considered a crime, and punished as such, at least to the full extent of modern legislation—all so many rules, perfectly distinct and independent of all systems of bankruptcy; and, it will be seen, that to arrive at the most equitable and easy arrangement of the affairs of the insolvent, it will remain only to define the rules of making a cession de biens, voluntary or forced, and the effects thereof, by the creation of the office of assignee, and in giving to a certain number of the creditors, say the majority in number and in value, the power to control the minority and to grant, amongst other things, the discharge to the insolvent." In 1869 and 1875, the Insolvent Acts were reconsidered, and supposed to have been entirely remodelled, but the principle remained the same. The debtor was favoured to the detriment of the creditor, who then found himself in the presence of a new enemy, far more formidable than the insolvent, the Government official assignee. The result had been that for years past the cry had been general, from one end of the Dominion to the other, that the existing laws should be repealed. The feeling now was quite the reverse of what it was in 1864. It was exclusively in favour of the creditor, and the debtor must be left to his fate. Petition after petition has been sent to this Parliament, praying for the repeal of the Insolvent Act of 1875. Boards of Trade have unanimously condemned the working of the present system, and all demanded radical changes to it. However, he believed public opinion was not misunderstood, but on the contrary, acted upon, by presenting to the country a Bill which, repealing the existing laws, at the same time, provided for the winding up of insolvent estates. The Bill drafted by the Committee commended itself, in his humble opinion, to the favourable consideration of the members of this House, to both the repealers, pure and simple, and the champions of Insolvency Law and insolvency principles, as it provided both for the distribution of assets and the discharge of the insolvent in a fair and equitable manner. At the beginning of the Session he had the honour of introducing a Bill which was intended, in some respects, to improve the Civil Code of the Province of Quebec in insolvency matters, to extend its provisions to the whole Dominion, and thus do away with the great evils which Ontario and other Provinces would have to contend against under the English common law system, such as preferential assignments and priority by judgment. The hon. members from the Provinces governed by the English jurisprudence should not be astonished at his attempt. The Civil Code of Lower Canada was based upon the well settled and most admirable principles of the Roman law which Lord Mansfield embodied, more or less, in the commercial law of England, and which more and more, every day, found its way into her Equity Courts—not those inhuman Roman principles which permitted the rigid creditor to cut into pieces the body of his debtor, and sometimes allowed the former to sell the latter, and send his wife and children to perpetual foreign slavery. No; he meant those benevolent laws introduced by the Christian Emperors, and remodelled by the modern commercial nations of Europe, which enacted that the estates of insolvent debtors should be for the common benefit of their creditors, and provided that an unfortunate and honest trader, who delivered all he possessed for the benefit of all his creditors, should be secure from being dragged to jail. He alluded to those Roman laws which permitted a certain majority of the creditors alone, and not a Court of Justice, to grant a discharge to an insolvent. He found these principles in the law proposed by the Committee; he discovered the features of the Quebec Civil Code in it; he noticed that its deficiencies and wants had been met and remedied ; he finally saw the great evils of the English common law provided against ; and, although at first he did not anticipate that such a law as that now under consideration could be agreed upon, and in consequence, at the beginning of the proceedings of the Committee, voted for the repeal of the Insolvent Act, pure and simple, he at last, and he hoped not too late, but not without some hesitation, gave his support to the Bill. For the benefit of those who were still in favour of repeal, pure and simple, he would call attention to a few of the consequences of such repeal. According to the laws of most of the Provinces of the Dominion, preferential assignments and priority by judgment could be obtained from insolvent debtors. In Quebec, the principle was the very reverse of that. The moment a debtor became insolvent, the whole of his estate belonged to all his creditors equally. Thus, if the Insolvent Acts were repealed, there would remain preferential assignments and priority by judgments ; and not only the interests of Ontario and of the other Provinces which were governed by the principles of the English common law, but also of the Province of Quebec, would, to a great extent, suffer. Montreal dealt largely with the Ontario and the Maritime Provinces, and before the Act of 1864 it was not uncommon, and was sometimes considered a smart thing, for a debtor in any of the other Provinces to make a preferential assignment in favour of a trader residing in that Province, with a view of cheating the Montreal creditor. It was, therefore, important to the Province of Quebec that the evils, which existed before the Insolvency Law was introduced in 1864, should not be renewed. The people of the Province of Quebec who had the benefit of a special common law, based on equity and justice, would find in this Bill the provisions of their own common law. It was true, they had the right of attachment allowed by the code of civil procedure, which permitted creditors to take possession of the estate of an insolvent ; but that was only when the insolvent was secreting his property, or was about to abscond, or when a demand of assignment had been made upon him. There was no machinery provided by law to contest this demand of assignment, and the consequence was that the debtor was, in this respect at least, in a worse position than under the Insolvency Law, when he was permitted to show that such a demand was not just. Under the common law, the books of a trader could not be seized ; and a trader becoming insolvent could dispose of a portion of his estate, get the promissory notes of the party who purchased the same, put them in his pocket, or otherwise dispose of them, and there was no possible means of forcing that debtor to give up that portion of his estate. Not only that, but the creditors were not even in a position to examine the insolvent as to the state of his affairs. In Ontario and New Brunswick, the law was not so defective in that respect, as it was possible to bring an insolvent debtor before the Judge, and there obtain a full investigation. But in Quebec, there was no machinery provided by the common law to obtain such a result. It would also be remembered that the law of partnership was, before the introduction of the Insolvency Law, the source of a great deal of dishonesty. A trader, anxious to get through his troubles, used to take a friend of his into partnership, which, under the common law, could only be dissolved by lapse of time ; and the insolvent always took good care to provide for a considerable length of time—from eight to ten years. Consequently, when the insolvent trader was put into insolvency, or rather when the creditors took possession of his estate, they found that the debtor was carrying on another business under a different name, and that they were altogether at his mercy. Since the Insolvent Act had been introduced, a fraud of that kind could not be perpetrated. Notwithstanding the Insolvent Laws of 1864, 1869, and 1875, merchants in trouble have been known to transfer their estates to their wives' names. In the Bill of the Committee there was a provision against this fraudulent proceeding. It would also be remembered that, under the common law, very great difficulty resulted from the fact that it required the unanimous consent of every creditor, however small he might have been, to get the discharge of an insolvent. It was almost impossible to obtain a settlement of an estate without giving some preference to several creditors. Under this Bill, a majority in number and value could dispose of an estate, but could not make a sale en bloc of the whole estate, both real and personal, although such estate could be disposed of in lots. A discharge could also be granted by a certain majority of creditors. Those under $100 were not to be consulted, and the giving or accepting of anything like a preference was prohibited under severe penalties. Not only these defects of the common law, but also all the objectionable features of the Insolvency Act of 1875, and of the Insolvency Laws introduced since 1864, had been greatly, if not entirely, removed by this Bill. Official assignees were abolished altogether. He need not say for what reason. The feeling was general that one of the principal reasons why the Insolvency Laws would not work satisfactorily, was the number and conduct of official assignees, especially since they had been appointed by the Government. Section 22 stated, "The Governor-in-Council may appoint in the several Provinces in Canada, one or more guardians, in and for every county, city and town; and, except in the larger centres of trade, the Sheriff of any county or district may be appointed; but no guardian, nor any partner of, associate, agent, employé, or clerk, or relation, or connection, of the guardian, within the degree of cousin german of any guardian, nor any barrister, advocate, solicitor, or attorney, shall be elected or appointed trustee to any estate in insolvency under this Act; nor shall any guardian, his partner, associate, agent, clerk, relation or connection, as aforesaid be employed by the trustee in any other manner, directly or indirectly, in the winding up of the estate; and any guardian, directly or indirectly, soliciting or inducing any creditor to take proceedings to place any estate in the hands of such guardian under this Act, shall not be entitled to any fees or remuneration from such estate, and shall also be incapable of acting thereafter in the office of guardian." It was well known that official assignees had been in the habit of soliciting creditors to take proceedings to put solvent traders into liquidation, sometimes offering great inducements with a view of being entrusted with the winding up of the estate.

Under this clause that practice would be altogether impossible. Whether we were to have the repeal of the Insolvency Law, pure or simple, or any law at all, it was perfectly well known that the estate of insolvents must be wound up by some officer or trustee. Under the common law, and before the Insolvent Act was enacted, the creditors used to meet, and, if they could agree unanimously, an assignee was appointed. This Bill kept as close as possible to that principle of the common law, by providing in section 24, that the trustee shall be appointed by the creditors at their first meeting, and if at the first meeting the creditors did not proceed to make such appointment, on the petition of any creditor the Judge sitting in insolvency should select the assignee or trustee. In order to prevent any understanding or conspiracy between the guardian and his assistants or clerks, which would tend to bring back the estate to the guardian directly or indirectly, there was a provision in section 24 to the effect that the trustee so appointed by the creditor should have no right to employ the guardian, his partner or employé, in the winding up of the estate. Under the present law, some official assignees had been known to fight for months against creditors who had appointed other assignees in their stead. Under section 25, on the production of the appointment of a trustee, the guardian would be bound to give up the estate to him without any question or excuse whatever, not even upon the ground that his bill of expenses had not been settled, saving his remedy against the creditors for the settlement of the same. Another evil which existed under the present system resulted from the use of proxies. Some assignees had made it their business to get hold of insolvent estates, in order to do which they sometimes offered some consideration to creditors to obtain their proxies. By section 90, it is provided that no proxy should be used to a certain extent in the appointment of a trustee or an assignee. Only one proxy could be given and that must be addressed to a creditor, and that creditor could only hold one proxy, so that it would be impossible for trustees or assignees to solicit the winding up of estates. The remuneration of trustees had also been regulated. In an estate realising $10,000 the whole amount of the expenses and commission due to the trustee would be $170, and, under section 37, there was a penalty for overcharging. Another improvement had been made in the examination of insolvents. According to some of the decisions rendered in the Province of Quebec, an insolvent might claim the privilege of refusing to answer any question of a nature to criminate himself. There was a provision in section 21 of the Bill which provided that the insolvent, or any other person under examination should be obliged to answer without being able to claim any immunity. This provision was similar to that in the Election Law, and the answers could not be used against the witness in any criminal case except for perjury. An important feature of this Bill was that composition and discharge had been abolished, and discharge had to be granted, not by the Court, as it had been under former Acts, but by four-fifths of the creditors in number and value only, and in that proportion relatives and non-traders were not to be computed; in fact, the proportion required was almost equivalent to unanimous consent. One of the principle reasons why he (Mr. Girouard) supported the Bill was that it entirely exempted non-traders and their claims from the operation of insolvency laws. Then as to composition and discharge, he would refer to the article from Fraser, already referred to, to show that in England, where the Act of 1869 was introduced with a view of introducing a mode of arranging by composition, which was called the Scotch system, it had been found that the system was altogether unsatisfactory and the cause of great abuses. It was there now suggested that deeds of arrangement or composition should be discouraged, partly by increasing the amount of dividend at which the Court should grant such composition, thus being ten shillings in a pound. They had had experience in that sort of discouragement in this country. In 1876, the Insolvent Act was amended by providing that no composition should be granted unless the estate paid 33c. on the dollar. In 1878 this amount was raised, if his recollection was correct, to 50c. on the dollar, and still the community was no better satisfied to-day than it was under the Act of 1869. For these reasons the Committee was of opinion that composition and discharge should be altogether done away with. Of course it would be possible to obtain a deed of composition and discharge at common law by obtaining the unanimous consent of the creditors, but it would be impossible to obtain it under the Act. A discharge being granted by four-fifths of the creditors in number and value, the debtor had a right then to apply for a confirmation, and if he did not a creditor might apply to set aside the discharge, and all the grounds which had been provided by the Insolvent Acts of 1864, 1869 and 1875 could be set up against the petition for confirmation or the annulment of the discharge. He could easily understand that having no deed of composition and discharge the framers of the Bill were under the necessity of providing that there should be no sale en bloc of the estate, because otherwise the insolvent would be in a position to obtain a discharge from four-fifths in number and value, and would induce some of his friends to tender for the estate and obtain indirectly what he could not get directly. He would also call the attention of the members from the Province of Quebec to some very great improvements which had been introduced to the sale of real estate in that Province. By clause 73 it was provided that the assignee or trustee might be authorised by the creditors or the inspectors to sell by private sale the estate subject to mortgages to one of the mortgaged creditors and without incurring the expense of a sheriff or an assignee's sale. It was also provided in section 85 that the sheriff's sale of real estate already commenced should be proceeded with during the insolvency of the defendant, and the proceeds should then be distributed according to the ordinary rules of the procedure, and the balance, if any, remitted to the trustee. It was also provided in section 62 that mortgages must be mentioned in the assignee's notice of sale in order to place the creditors in a position to know exactly the standing of hypothecated creditors and the value of the property seized to the general estate. By section 63 the expenses connected with the sale of real estate would be materially decreased; no charge would be made in connection with the sale of real estate in Quebec except the necessary charges ; no commission was allowed to the assignee. Under the present law, it was not provided that the assignee's sale should be registered like sheriff's sale under the codes of Quebec. The provisions of the existing insolvent laws for the punishment of fraud and fraudulent practices were preserved. Finally, one of the last provisions was that there should be a Judge in insolvency, as explained by the mover of this Bill. In England, in the memorial presented by the leading merchants to which he had already referred, they advocate the appointment of a mercantile lawyer for the Court, and this was supposed to be absolutely necessary for the working of the Act. It had been found, in Montreal, almost impossible to work the Insolvent Law without having a Judge sitting in insolvency. Insolvency matters interfered always more or less with the ordinary administration of justice. The duties of Judges of that district were very onerous, and it was provided by section 133 that a Judge in insolvency should be appointed for the city of Montreal. Before concluding, he would refer to the clauses which he considered unconstitutional. One of them was the English law of stoppage in transitu introduced into the Province of Quebec. He referred also to clause 110, having reference to registration of the marriage contract, a contract altogether civil, and, in his opinion, without the jurisdiction of this Parliament. He would, however, mention that similar clauses were to be found in the Acts of 1864, 1869, and 1875. He was not aware that the question had been decided by any Court of justice, although he believed there was a dictum of Chief Justice Ritchie when sitting in New Brunswick, to the effect that the Dominion Parliament had jurisdiction in insolvency and bankruptcy, and all matters essentially connected therewith. He could not see why the Insolvent Law could not be perfect without curtailing the privilege accorded by the civil laws of the Province in favour of clerks and landlords, and especially without revoking the stipulations made with regard to marriage contracts and leases. He could also understand that a bankruptcy law might be complete without introducing into Quebec the law of England with regard to stoppage in transitu. However, those clauses had been allowed to stand as law for the last fifteen years, and, therefore, he would not offer any amendment. He might say, in conclusion, that it seemed to him that it would be going to extremes to ask for the repeal of the Act, pure and simple. In France, where they had the same common laws as in Quebec, for the last three centuries, they had always had insolvent laws. It was true that the insolvent laws in France, Belgium and Germany, as well as in Scotland, were short, for the reason that the provisions of the common law were providing in a great measure for the settlement of insolvent estates, and had not to be repeated in their bankruptcy laws. He (Mr. Girouard) found that in the Bill before the House, the principles of the common law of Quebec were so amended as to meet the requirements of the mercantile community of the Dominion ; and even if he had doubts as to whether the repeal, pure and simple, would better suit Quebec or not, he would give the benefit of that doubt to the other Provinces. In considering a question of such general importance, the interests of the majority must be consulted. He would, therefore, second the second reading of this Bill ; but if the House was opposed to its becoming law, rather than have the existing law, he would vote for its repeal, pure and simple.

MR. BÉCHARD said he should not attempt to follow the hon. members who had preceded him in the able speeches they had pronounced. Not being a lawyer, he might, perhaps, find it a hard task to discuss properly the details of this Bill, and he would leave it to the hon. gentlemen belonging to the legal profession ; but it was agreed that in discussing this Bill, an opportunity should be given to take the sense of the House upon the question of the repeal, pure and simple, of the Act, and it was for that purpose that he rose. It had been stated by his hon. friend from Stanstead, that the principal merits of this Bill consisted in the fact that it did away with the official assignees, and with the easy way by which debtors obtained their discharge under the operation of the existing law. With regard to official assignees, he saw they were replaced by another set of men who were called guardians, and God only knew what those guardians, with all their inventive ingenuity, would find they could do under the operation of this Bill should it become law. When the Act of 1875 was passed, no one foresaw the abuses which resulted from the actions of some of the official assignees, about whom so many complaints had been made throughout the country. He thought the same might be said of these guardians. The Committee had removed the facility with which debtors obtained their discharge under the existing law. True, a great many abuses had been developed in that respect, and, perhaps, this Bill was an improvement upon the existing law, but he was afraid that, in their anxiety to remove those evils, the members of the Committee had gone to the opposite extreme. They had given extraordinary powers to creditors to throw debtors into insolvency; and this power was a very dangerous one. By this Bill a man could be put into insolvency for $200; a merchant in a rural district, who through some accident had been somewhat delayed in meeting his payments, could be put into insolvency, and ruined by the cupidity of a rapacious creditor. Such cases would often occur, no doubt, particularly in a time of depression, such as we now suffered from, when confidence in the ability of debtors to meet their liabilities was shaken. He thought this power was a very dangerous one, and placed the debtors absolutely at the mercy of their creditors. When the Insolvency Act was passed in 1875, he heard it frequently stated upon the floor of the House by gentlemen who were in favour of that Act, that the principal reason for which an insolvency law was necessary was, that it afforded relief to the unfortunate and honest debtor. By this Bill the honest and unfortunate debtor found it very difficult to get his discharge; in fact, no debtor could receive a complete discharge from his liabilities.

MR. COLBY: I would ask my hon. friend what his position would be under the repeal of the Act, pure and simple?

MR. BÉCHARD said he would tell his hon. friend. He did not mean to be understood as thinking the debtor should not get any discharge, except with the assent of every one of his creditors; but that, so long as no debtor could obtain his discharge under the operation of an Insolvent Law, there was no reason why such a law should exist, and they had no need of such a law. He believed that the creditors and debtors should be left alone to settle their affairs, according to the principles of the common law; and that, whenever this House attempted, by exceptional legislation, as an Insolvent Law, to set aside the application of the sound principles of the common law, nothing wholesome could result, but only evil. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) had made several good points against the existence of any insolvency law; he had said that, in France, they had had an insolvent law existing for two centuries, and that the French legislation had amended it but once or twice during that long period. The reason for this was obvious—in France, the commercial morality was so good as to render an Insolvent Law unnecessary. If commercial morals were as good in this country, doubtless they might not amend the Insolvent Law oftener than the French legislators. Let them do away with Insolvent Laws, and in four or five years the commercial morals of the people would be so good as to obviate the necessity for them. He moved in amendment.

“That the said Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be resolved that, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the Insolvent Act of 1875, and all amendments thereto, should be unconditionally repealed.”

MR. COLBY said that he had no disposition to take the point of order. He would prefer not to do it, but it struck him the motion was out of order, as it proposed exactly what the Bill did, the repeal of the Insolvent Act.

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the amendment was in order.

MR. LANE said that he fully agreed with the remarks of the mover of the amendment, that the promoters of this Bill, in their anxiety to conciliate the outcry against insolvent measures, had overlooked the interest of the debtor entirely. He thought that there always ought to be an Insolvent Law upon the Statute-book, provided the law answered the purpose for which it was intended.

MR. BÉCHARD.

The principal object of such a law was permission to an honest debtor to get rid of his debts on giving up his property by virtue of the Act. He did not think under the clause providing that the debtor must secure the consent of four-fifths in number and value of his creditors, to his discharge, that in one case out of a hundred he could procure it. Some creditor would insist on having his pound of flesh; and one creditor, under this law, might be sufficient to prevent a discharge. The Act was formed on the principle that it would be better to hang ten innocent men than that one guilty should escape. That was not the principle of British law. He would prefer the repeal of the Insolvent Act to a Bill with that clause unamended, as it was a one-sided measure. The present Act providing that a debtor must secure the consent of, at least, a majority in number and three-fourths in value of his creditors, before getting his discharge, was severe enough to protect the creditors. Debtors were not altogether to blame for getting into debt, as merchants often forced goods upon them by having their agents on every side-road and concession line in the country. As to the doing away with the assignees, he did not know they had acquired such a bad reputation. They were not different from ordinary mortals, and estates must be placed in somebody's hands. Till they could make people more honest than at present, he did not know that they would improve matters much by changing assignees for guardians, which was simply a change of name. At present, debtors' property was put into the hands of the assignees, in the first place, and by this Bill it would be entrusted to a guardian, who, after the first meeting of the creditors, could be displaced by their vote. By the present law, the creditors could take it out of the hands of the assignee at their first meeting, and entrust it to anybody they pleased. If that was not done, he supposed it was because the assignees gave general satisfaction. If the creditors did not look after their own business, he did not see how they could help them by the change proposed. There had been no improvement in the scale of fees proposed, and he did not think that anyone would take the trouble of looking after the interests of others for the paltry sum allowed by the Act. Whoever assumes the responsibility must be fairly paid. He thought that the clause requiring the trustee to give security for the forthcoming of the estate, would be found impracticable—that they would find it difficult, if not impossible, to get anyone to assume the responsibility and trouble of getting sureties for the express purpose of winding up only one estate. He did not like the clause with regard to farmers, not seeing why they should not be included in the general clause provided for traders. The Act should give them the same opportunity of getting a discharge as anybody else, and it would save a great deal of trouble to place them in that position. A difficulty would arise in determining who were traders, and whose debts should be protected under this Bill. He thought it would be wiser for them to include the farming community under it. Unless the clause requiring the assent of four-fifths in number and value of the creditors to a discharge was altered, he would consider it incumbent on him to vote against the Bill; but, if the proposition in the existing Act was adopted, he would support the Bill.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said that, although he was free to admit that many evils had arisen under the Insolvent Law, he was opposed to its absolute repeal, as he believed that it was necessary that there should be some provision for the equitable distribution of the assets of an insolvent debtor amongst his creditors, and he would, therefore, be compelled to vote against the motion of the hon. member for Iberville. He (Mr. White) was, however, not entirely in accord with all the propositions contained in the Bill submitted by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby). The Bill purported to be framed in the interest of the creditor, and yet it provided that the creditors should not dispose of insolvent estates in such a manner as they deemed best in their own interests. Was this House to declare that creditors should not have the power to sell estates en bloc, or to effect a composition with the insolvent, if they thought proper? The proposition submitted in the Bill, instead of doing what its friends desired, would have an opposite effect. There were other objectionable features also. He thought the appointment of a Judge in Insolvency was unnecessary. They had enough Judges in the country already, to deal with those questions; and certainly it was not to be presumed, if this law had any effect at all, that the number of insolvents would be increased. If not, why establish an additional tribunal? Whilst he felt those objections to the Bill, he would very much prefer that it became law to the sweeping away of the Insolvent Act.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) said he agreed substantially with the remarks of the hon. member for North Renfrew. Having had some experience of the Insolvency Law in Ontario, he was not prepared to assent to the total repeal of the law, which would result in the reintroduction of all the evils they had felt so severely in that Province. Its repeal would result in that unfortunate race of creditors for unjust preferences in the matter of a debtor's estate, which was generally witnessed before the Insolvent Law was introduced, while it entirely depended on who had the sharpest attorney, and the sharpest agent, whether one or another creditor should get most and leave the rest nothing. At the same time, he was not entirely satisfied with the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Stanstead, as the exponent of the views of the Special Committee on the subject. That Bill seemed to him to have been framed in the interest of creditors alone, and he thought that when they were looking at the question of insolvency that they ought to have in mind that there were two classes to be considered—creditors and debtors. In fact, many advocates of the Insolvency Law considered that it was not only right, but proper, that such a measure should be what was generally called a whitewashing measure for the purpose of relieving debtors, and that had been the sole principle in the Insolvent Laws of many of the States of the Union. It had also been the course of legislation in this country when they had an Act that was introduced for no other purpose than that of whitewashing and relieving debtors. While he thought that there should be some provision inserted in the Insolvent Act to prevent fraudulent debtors from obtaining their discharge, he maintained that it ought not to be framed entirely in the interest of the creditors, more especially as had been stated by the hon. gentleman who spoke before the hon. member for Renfrew, that the creditors were as much to blame for all the evils they so loudly complained of as were the debtors. If the merchants in the various centres of trade were not so anxious, through their travellers, and in every possible way, to force their goods upon country customers to a greater extent than their means would allow them to legitimately purchase, they would not have so many bankruptcies. He thought the evils arose as much from the creditors as from the debtors. It was unjust to talk about fraudulent debtors without, at the same time, admitting that the evils had been largely brought about by the injudicious forcing of their goods upon young men just starting in business, without the necessary business experience and capital, and who ought never, for one moment, to have been entrusted with their goods. Consequently, he thought, that when they were legislating here, they should not legislate as if the unfortunate creditors were the only class that had to be protected. They should also consider the honest debtor, the man who, by force of circumstances, while honest in his dealings was driven into insolvency. Their rights ought to be considered just as much as the so-called important creditors. In fact, the advocates for the alteration of the law claimed that their creditors were to blame for the maladministration of the law, that the law itself was good enough, but was ineffectual, because the creditors would not look into their own affairs. His hon. friend from Stanstead proposed to compel creditors to look after their own interests. He (Mr. Cameron) did not consider that kind of reasoning logical. Parliament should not be asked to compel the creditor to look after his own interests, which he had hitherto neglected to do. He thought the judicious course in the whole matter would be to defer legislation for the present. The Insolvent Law, as it at present stood, was bad in theory. It was bad in justice, in some respects. It was admitted by the advocates for alteration that it was bad in practice, because those who ought to look after their own affairs would not do so. He was of opinion that no harm would be done if they gave creditors an opportunity of looking after their affairs for another year. He considered that it would be judicious and proper to allow the mercantile community an opportunity to consider the measure before the House, which had only been distributed that very day, and the members of the House of ascertaining the views of their constituents upon it before coming to a deliberate conclusion as to what kind of legislation was in the interest of the country.

MR. BRECKEN said he agreed with the remarks of the hon. member for North Victoria, that it was inexpedient to repeal the Insolvency Law. He (Mr. Brecken) came from a Province that, for many years, had no Bankruptcy Law, and he knew what an unsatisfactory state of affairs resulted from the absence of a law of that kind. The hon. member for North Victoria thought the proposed measure too much in the interest of the creditor. If he (Mr. Brecken) understood the temper of the House on this question, and the public at large, it was that the Insolvent Law had been too much in the interest of the debtor. The practical working of the Insolvent Law had proved that creditors really required something like legislative direction and control. The Bill before the House proposed, in the first instance, to do away with official assignees, which was one of the greatest and most crying evils complained of. Then the mode in which compositions were made under the existing Act was remedied. The contemplated Act proposed that four-fifths in value, and four-fifths of the proved creditors, must agree to a discharge before a debtor could receive his discharge. This was a most important measure, and it would have been better had it been dealt with at an earlier period of the Session. However, he was of opinion that it would be in the interest of the country if the House dealt with the subject, even at this late period of the Session, because there was no doubt that the law, as it existed, was, with the system of official assignees, a crying grievance and a great injury to the commercial community. The hon. gentleman found fault with the Bill because they were forcing creditors to look after their own interest. He (Mr. Brecken) admitted that it was difficult to reconcile a position of that kind, as it did seem to be an anomaly to direct men to look after their own interest, but the carelessness evinced by creditors necessitated that something should be done. He was of opinion that it would be a deplorable state of things if they should be without any Insolvent Law, as it would open the door to fraud. The Committee thought that the House was in favour of retaining the law with certain amendments which had been made, and he thought that if the law were placed upon the Statute-book that it would be found to be a great improvement on the law at present existing.

MR. WELDON said that, although he was prepared to admit the defects of the present law, he felt that an Insolvent Law was a necessity. They found, in the Mother Country, that the first Bankruptcy Law was introduced in 1571, and from that time to the present, the principle had been steadily adhered to. In 1825, the first attempt was made to consolidate the laws, and, from that time to the present, the subject of remodelling the Bankruptcy Laws had engaged the attention of nearly every Lord Chancellor who had sat upon the woolsack. While able jurists and men of experience had lent their energies to the reform and amendment of the law, not one single voice had been raised for the repeal or abrogation of the law. The great difficulties which had been experienced in England in regard to this matter, had also been felt in the United States, where they had taken the somewhat violent course from time to time of repealing the law. But it must be remembered that under the American Constitution measures relating to bankruptcies and insolvencies were separated. The former came within the jurisdiction of Congress, and the latter within the jurisdiction of the State Legislatures. The reasons which should induce them to repeal the Insolvent Law should be extremely cogent, before they departed from the policy adopted in the Mother Country, the great commercial centre of the world. Another reason against the repeal of this law, was that it would unsettle the commerce of the country, and render the trade unstable. He might say, with regard to the measure before the House, that the members of the Committee were extremely careful to preserve the language of the old Act, so that the amendments would not interfere with any judicial decisions therein. There was another point they had to consider. The legal legislation which had taken place since 1869. Before that period, there was the Act which the hon. member for Jacques Cartier referred to. The Act of 1869 was a re-enactment of the existing law, and in 1875 the whole Dominion adopted the principles which had been in force in certain Provinces. During that time, local legislation had changed, and as far as the Province which he represented, was concerned, the laws had been materially changed, and to repeal the Insolvency Law, pure and simple, would, he was satisfied, work distress and ruin. He believed he was correct in stating that there was an Attachment Law also in Ontario, and if the Attachment Law in force were not repealed, it would be very disastrous for the Insolvent Law was repealed, as, under that law, every man who was unable to pay a debt, would find his property swept away for the benefit of the creditor. If the amendment of the hon. member for Ibrerville (Mr. Béchard) prevailed, the debtors would not be benefitted and the creditors would not be benefitted, but some shrewd practitioners would receive the benefit. He had heard it urged in Committee that the Insolvent Law allowed very great opportunity to reckless trading, and was a temptation to parties to engage in recklessness in speculations over trade. He quite agreed in the remarks of the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) and the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Lane) that that was due to the present system of trading in this country. In old times the country trader went to the centres of trade and purchased what he could afford, and what was sufficient for his trade; but now there were travellers throughout the length and breadth of the country, who, with a pertinacity of an insurance agent, persuaded a man by the temptation of long credit, to buy more goods than his capital or the extent of his trade allowed him to dispose of, and then at the end of the credit the trader found his note dishonoured at one of the banks, goods lying on his shelves depreciated and unsaleable. He believed that the unsatisfactory result of the Bankruptcy Law was owing largely to reckless trading, and to the want of commercial morality, which was not merely extended to this Dominion, but prevailed in the whole of the commercial world. There was another objection to the Bankruptcy Law. It enabled bankrupt stocks to be thrown upon the market, which were purchased at low figures, and the effect was to bring them in competition with the honest trader, who, though he had paid his debts, could not successfully compete with those stocks. The same difficulty had arisen, whether the Bankruptcy Law was in force or not. He found that under sheriffs' sales, etc., which were forced sales, the proceeds only went to one creditor, instead of to the whole. The main features of the changes in this law, as pointed out by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), referred principally to official assignees and composition and discharge. With regard to official assignees, he must confess that when he first entered upon that Committee, he was strongly in favour of the appointment of official assignees, as so far as the Province of New Brunswick, a part of which Province he represented, was concerned. It was a system that had worked well; but it had found, from evidence before the Committee, and from information he had received, that so far as the upper Provinces were concerned, it was a system of fraud, and gave an opportunity to official assignees to make money at the expense of an estate. Now, he found the same objection prevailed in England with regard to public trustees there, as was felt in Canada with regard to official assignees. So far as he (Mr. Weldon) could see, the difficulty, so far as official assignees were concerned, was that, in Ontario and Quebec, an official assignee was placed in such a position that when an estate was thrown into his hands, he could ascertain who the creditors of the insolvent were, and by that means be enabled to secure a majority of the persons in favour of his managing the estate. That was one of the difficulties that were removed by the present Bill. The trustee into whose hands an estate was thrown, became merely the guardian pro tem. of it, and he was ineligible for appointment by the creditors to the office of assignee. If he chose the position of guardian, he could not act as assignee, and therefore the temptation now given an official assignee to endeavour to obtain an estate for the purpose of enriching himself at the expense of the creditors, was done away with. The complaint with regard to creditors being represented by proxy was well founded, and it was a re-echo of the complaint in England, with respect to the supineness of creditors in neglecting to act in their own interests in this direction. He found that almost the same provision in respect to further stringency, was contained in the Bill now before the House, as was to be found in the 17th section of Lord Cairns' Act, and it was in very much the same wording. It was clearly shown that if a creditor did not take sufficient interest to attend personally a meeting for the arraignment of an insolvent, his proxy was only sent there for the purpose of doing injury to the estate for the benefit of some particular creditors. Another point was the deeds of composition and discharge. For many years, before he had a seat in the House, he was strongly of opinion that the provision for liquidation, which allowed an insolvent to obtain deeds of composition and discharge when at a meeting of creditors, and a majority was in favour of it, was a very beneficial one. He knew it had been practised in England, and he had himself advocated it. One argument in favour of it was, that it relieved a man of the stigma of bankruptcy. But moral feeling in this respect had become warped. However, when he saw the statement made by the Lord Chancellor in England, with regard to these liquidations, he stating that they were, in many instances, only made for the purpose of getting property back into the hands of the debtor, and showing figures bearing out his statement, he had come to the conclusion that some stringent measure should be taken to remedy the evil. He felt that the House was taking a step in the right direction, and he had come to the conclusion that they were doing away with one of the greatest objections to this law. Those were the two strong salient features which made this law different to the law of 1869 and 1875. The difficulty about the late law was that it was too easy, too much in favour of the debtor. Under the law now proposed, it would be far more difficult for the debtor to obtain his discharge. He had known, in his own experience, the difficulty in getting creditors, after they had lost debts, to take action. That, no doubt, was to a great extent due to the fact that traders calculated a certain percentage to cover bad debts, and did not, in a great many cases, wish to go to the trouble of taking extreme measures to force payment. What this Bill proposed was, that the burden of obtaining a discharge should be thrown upon the debtor. If a party went into insolvency, he would be bound to take the steps required to obtain a discharge. He did not doubt that where a man honestly and fairly surrendered his property to his debtors, he would have no difficulty in obtaining a discharge. That there were Shylocks in every age, that they existed now, he had no doubt, but they were few and far between. But generally, when a man was made unfortunate by circumstances beyond his control, and his property had been swept away from him, if he honestly surrendered what was left to his creditors, he would be leniently and fairly dealt with. While, on the other hand, the debtor who attempted to reap benefits out of the estate to the detriment of the creditors, would be unable to obtain a discharge, until he showed a clean sheet, or gave up what the creditors were entitled to. It would not be in the interests of the country that the amendment of the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) should be agreed to.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell) said the position in which the question was now presented to the House, made it necessary that he should explain his position in the vote which he would have to give. He was very strongly opposed to the existing Insolvency Law, and if the question presented to the House was, simply whether they should continue that law or repeal it, he would have no hesitation in voting in favour of repeal. But that was not the question. He desired very much that there should be some law, for the equitable distribution among creditors of the assets of insolvent estates. The Bill proposed by the member for Stanstead made provision for such distribution. It was the result of the painstaking labours of a Special Committee composed of members of ability and experience, and he thought the interests of the country would be best subserved by placing that Bill upon the Statute-book. Holding these views, he would vote against the amendment of the member for Iberville; but in doing so he wished to be understood as in no way expressing any opinion in favour of the continuance of the present law.

MR. COURSOL said that Parliament had often been reproached for hasty legislation, for having hurried through without proper consideration, at the end of the Session, important measures; and in this instance it was clearly manifest that such hasty legislation would have an injurious effect. The Committee was composed of men of ability, knowledge and experience, who had worked for two or three weeks with a great deal of zeal; and, as the result of their labours, they brought forth this voluminous Bill, which only came down two days ago, and was delivered to the members but yesterday, and had not yet been translated into French. Those hon. gentlemen who had distinguished themselves to-night by their able speeches on behalf of this Bill, deserved a great deal of credit for the labour they had taken, and the ability they had displayed in the preparation of this Bill; but the other hon. members who had not formed part of this Committee had not yet had time to read the Bill properly, and were not prepared to-night to vote that it should pass, as it was one of the most important measures of the Session, one which might make a complete revolution in legislation, which might affect the interests of families. There were several clauses in the Bill which could not be accepted. The official assignees, against whom complaints had been properly made, were represented by guardians at $1 per day, and sole guardians at 50c. per day, who were to take charge of property, worth, sometimes, $100,000. It was impossible for this House to decide so quickly; it should have time to examine the Bill in its details, and the Government should fix a day for its discussion. If a vote were forced to-night, he would feel bound to vote for the repeal of the law at once. If a delay were granted, the measure might be modified to suit the requirements of the country. He would, therefore, move that the debate should be resumed on Friday.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said that those in favour of the repeal of the Bill consented that the debate should be adjourned last night, on the distinct understanding that it should go on this evening, and if not finally concluded to-night, it should go on to-morrow. If this debate were now allowed to stand over, as proposed by the hon. member for Montreal, its simple effect would be that the whole of another day would be consumed in discussing this question. He might say, at the outset, that he was in favour of a total, unconditional, absolute repeal of the Insolvent Law, but if that proposition could not be carried, rather than deal, at this late period of the Session, with the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead, with its many radical and revolutionary changes, he would be in favour of allowing the present law to stand for another year. It was impossible, utterly impossible, to deal in anything like a satisfactory manner with the many provisions of the new Bill, within a week of the prorogation of Parliament. The Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead contained 150 clauses, a large number of sub-clauses, and subsections. He had made many and complicated changes in the law, and, at this late period of the Session, it was quite impossible to give such changes the consideration they required. Since the Bill was submitted to Parliament he had tried to master its provisions and understand its clauses, but he could not say that so far he had been completely successful. Were it a question between continuing the old law and adopting this Bill in its present shape, he would vote for the former. There was not a single clause in the 150 of the new Bill, that would not require a very considerable amount of discussion, many of the clauses would require important changes, and some of them would require to be recast altogether. If the House consented to a second reading of the Bill of the hon. member for Staustead, and entered into Committee of the Whole, a whole week would be spent in discussing it, and making its provisions suitable for the commercial wants of the country, and at this late period of the Session, that was not to be thought of. If the proposition of the hon. member for Iberville was put to the House, and carried through, the question would be disposed of now. The present law would then be repealed, pure and simple, and the country would, for one year at least, escape the evils resulting from a law which had received almost universal condemnation. If, however, a majority of the House was not prepared to support the proposition of the hon. member for Iberville, then the propriety of going on with the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) could be discussed, although, for one, he was opposed to that course. He was entirely opposed to the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead. He would not, at this late period of the Session, enter into a general discussion of the principles on which a Bankrupt Law should be founded. He would shortly call the attention of the House to one or two fallacies in the argument of the hon. gentleman who moved, and those who supported, the Bill. Hon. gentlemen, in discussing this Bill, appeared to think that it entirely abolished the office of official assignee, and that by doing away with official assignees, one of the evils complained of under the old Insolvent Law, was entirely cured by this Bill. But, so far as official assignees were concerned, they were, in the proposed Bill, abolished in name, and in name only; the office was still there, and the official, under another name, still maintained in this Bill—under the name of guardians or trustees—and maintained with all the power and authority vested in them under the old Insolvency Law. Under section 22, the Government reserved to itself the power of appointing, in each county, one or more guardians, and that guardian took possession of the estate of the insolvent, and dealt with it precisely as did the official assignee under the old law. He was bound to notify the creditors, call a meeting of the creditors, and these creditors could appoint an official assignee, under the name of an official trustee, of their own, as under the old law. In this respect, nominally, there was a change—practically and substantially there was none—for the better. If the system was vicious under the old law, it was equally so under the new. Another proposition, to which the promoters of the Bill appeared to attach importance, was that it did away with judicial discharges, and deeds of composition and discharge. He denied that. If hon. gentlemen would examine the Bill they would find express provision made for deeds of composition and discharge. No doubt greater restrictions were imposed on the debtor, and it required the consent of a larger number of the creditors representing a larger amount, than under the old law, before a discharge could be obtained; but the principle was there all the same, and if the object was to allow no discharge whatever, that object was not secured. On the other hand, the Bill if intended as a general Bankrupt Law, did not cover the principle upon which such laws were based, namely, that if a creditor forced his debtor into bankruptcy, the latter should get his discharge, provided he acted honestly in the conduct of his business and his failure was through no fault of his own. One of the most vicious principles in the old Insolvency Act was the enormous costs connected with the administration of an estate, and the expensive and complicated machinery used in administering the estates. That was not remedied in this Bill, but on the contrary, rather increased and intensified. Under this Bill there would still be the same difficulties to deal with, the writ of attachment, demand by the creditor, petition to set aside the writ of attachment, petition to set aside the demand on the insolvent, the appeal, and the Judge to set aside these proceedings, the appeal to the Court of Appeals, were still continued in, if anything, a more objectionable form than under the old law. Precisely the same complicated and objectionable machinery that formed one of the vicious features of the old Act were continued under the new. Another objectionable feature in the old Act was said to be cured by this Bill, namely, that a larger portion of the estate of an insolvent would, under this Bill, go into the hands of the creditors; that the process of winding up an estate was lessened; official assignees abolished and discharges done away with, and the expenses comparatively light. He denied this. Practically no changes were made in any of these respects. The expenses were as great and the machinery as complicated as under the old law. With fifteen years' experience of the old law—its waste and expenditure and frauds in practice, which no amendments had been able to cure—he was in favour of the total, absolute, unconditional and immediate repeal of the law. The almost unanimous opinion of the people in the rural districts in this country was in favour of the repeal; and if a vote of the people was taken on the question, a large majority would vote in favour of the repeal of the law. It was an unwise principle to adopt, a principle not in the interest of trade and commerce, that a Bankruptcy Law should be considered as permanent, and should always find a place on the Statutes of the country. The law had been in existence for fifteen years, had never proved a success, had given very general dissatisfaction, and that was the experience of every country where such a law had been tried, and the best they could do would be to abolish the law for two or three years at least. If the circumstances of the country, and the necessities of trade required at the end of that time, a new Insolvent Law, modified and changed with the various features of the present law eliminated, it could then be passed. We were in the habit, and properly so, of drawing our inspiration largely from the Mother Country. From the experience of business men in England in relation to this law and its working, we might learn practical and useful lessons. What did we find there? We found that in almost every Session of the Imperial Parliament, for the last eight or ten years, changes had been made in the Bankruptcy Law, and so far, the changes had utterly failed in giving satisfaction to the mercantile community and to the country. The same state of things existed in the United States, from which hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House drew largely their inspiration. The first Bankruptcy Law in the United States was passed in 1800. It continued in force for two and a-half years, and was then repealed. For nearly half a century the United States had no Bankrupt Law. In 1841 the law was re-enacted, and continued for thirteen months only—was again repealed, and again re-enacted thirteen years ago; and so great a general was the dissatisfaction with the law, that Congress, by an almost unanimous vote, repealed the law. Even during the few years the law was in force in that country, several attempts were made to repeal it, all of which were successful in Congress; but the attempts failed in the Senate until last year, when, by an overwhelming vote in Congress, and by a majority in the Senate, the Bankruptcy Law was finally repealed in that country. He was satisfied, from the experience of the past fifteen years, that the great mass of the people of this country were in favour of the repeal of the law. The best thing Parliament could do was to pass the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville, and abolish the law in the meantime; and if they found the necessity of the country required a re-enactment of the Bankruptcy Laws again, Parliament could easily re-enact it, with its provisions modified, and with the defects, which past experience had pointed out, cured. He would, therefore, vote for the proposition of the hon. gentleman from Iberville. As long as there was a Bankrupt Law on the Statute-books, so long would commercial frauds continue. The only way to check and prevent that evil was by a total abolition of the law. He was perfectly satisfied, from the returns brought down to this House in 1875, that a much larger portion of the estate of insolvents went into the hands of the creditors by private arrangement between debtor and creditor, without the intervention of the Bankrupt Laws than under these laws. The same facts were established by returns submitted to the Imperial Parliament. In 1876, the Lord Chancellor of England, in discussing proposed amendments to the Bankruptcy Laws of England, took the same view of it, and submitted to Parliament a return that clearly sustained his contentions. The experience of Canada and of the United States, established the correctness of that supposition, and the minds of the people of Canada were so confirmed in that view that a repeal of the law was urgently demanded. If we were to have a Bankruptcy Law at all, and it was proposed to prevent fraud by the provisions of an Act of Parliament, a different and more stringent law than had yet, in modern days, been submitted to either the Canadian or the Imperial Parliament, would have to be devised. In fact, with respect to commercial frauds, we would have to do as we had already done, with respect to the violation of some of the criminal laws of the land. For an effectual mode of punishment, go back to the days of our forefathers and introduce the whipping posts, and re-enact the law of 170 years ago, which provided that, if a bankrupt fraudulently retained his goods from his creditors, or aided in other respects in a fraudulent manner, he should stand in the pillory for two hours, have his ears nailed to the pillory post and then cut off. For his own part he doubted very much if even these punishments, with the commercial morality that had been fostered and developed by this Act, would check the growing and monstrous evils complained of. He would, therefore, vote for the repeal of the law.

MR. ORTON said he desired to express his gratification at the labours of the Committee who had drawn up this Bill. But while confessing that they had bestowed a great deal of labour upon it, and removed some of the most objectionable features to the present Act, he was not yet prepared to say that this Bill removed all the complaints against the old Act. It appeared to him that it introduced many new objectionable features that the other did not contain. He did not think that the House, at this late period of the Session, could give to this Bill the careful consideration it deserved; and, further than that, he had long felt that the proper thing to do was to repeal the Insolvent Act entirely. The evils which had been caused by this Act were so intolerable, the injustice done to the honest trader was so gross, and the evils which had resulted to the non-trader, had become so great that the feeling in the country was intensely in favour of the repeal of the Act. He had had the honour of presenting to this House a petition, signed by a large number of traders, in the county he represented; and there was not a single one in that locality of either party who refused to sign a petition, praying for the repeal of the Insolvent Act. That was a correct idea of the almost universal feeling that prevailed in this country. We all knew that, under the operation of the present Act, it was almost impossible for the honest trader to continue in business, and not only so, but it did a great wrong to many a non-trader in our community. The discussion on this Bill showed that there was a strong feeling in this House in favour of the repeal of the Insolvent Act. If that Act was not repealed, the effect would be that many who were now engaged in business would take advantage of it during the coming year, and we should have wholesale failures, throughout the country, and greater wrongs would be done than ever before. He was, therefore, in favour of the total repeal of the Act, and believed this House would not do its duty to the country if it did not vote for repeal.

MR. CASEY said he did not rise to discuss the Bill, for the very good reason that he had not yet become thoroughly acquainted with its provisions. The motion of his hon. friend from Montreal East represented a very general feeling in the House, that it was desirable the Bill should be more thoroughly studied than was possible in the limited time now at their disposal, and that it was desirable also to have the views of their constituents on it. The Bill itself did not introduce a totally new system, nor did it abolish all the evils of the old one, but it did introduce a good deal that was new. The general drift of the Bill, so far as he understood it, was to protect creditors against the carelessness or the dishonesty of their debtors. He felt justified in supporting the proposition of the hon. gentleman from North Victoria, that the consideration of this Bill should be postponed till next Session. If that course were pursued, it could not be said that the labours of the Committee would be wasted, because the Bill would go before the country, and be carefully considered. But, holding his present views, he should be compelled to vote for the three months' hoist, unless the promoters of the Bill could see their way clear to agree to a postponement. He knew there was a strong feeling in many quarters in favour of total repeal, but he felt himself unable to vote for it. The people in Ontario, unlike those in Quebec, who were happy in the possession of the Code Civile, had not the proper machinery for a fair distribution of bankrupt estates, and he would not be justified in voting to deprive them of all means, whatever, for that purpose, until the country had fully tried all expedients for securing a fair distribution of assets. His position, then, was this: He should have to vote against the proposition of the hon. member for Montreal East, as insufficient; he should have to vote against the motion for repeal, because he thought it would not be in the interests of the country to repeal the law altogether; but he was strongly in favour of the postponement of any amendments to the law until next year.

Mr. MACDONNELL said he was opposed to the present Bill, though in favour of an Insolvency Law of some kind, he rather preferred the law as it now stood. The chief feature of the present Bill was that, while it gave the power to creditors to force a debtor into insolvency, it did not provide for the discharge of the debtor, and that was left at the discretion and good will of the creditors. Now, he contended that if power was given creditors to put a debtor into insolvency, that power should be coupled with the condition that the debtor should have his discharge, provided he was not proved to be guilty of fraud or other misconduct. He was amused at the argument of the hon. gentleman from the city and county of St. John (Mr. Weldon), who pointed out, as one of the chief objections of the present law, that it gave too great a facility to a debtor to obtain his discharge, as he could obtain it at the end of twelve months, provided there was no sufficient cause shown against it. That hon. gentleman had further stated, in extolling the Bill before the House, that, if a debtor was not guilty of fraud, if it was shown that he had been just and faithful in his dealings, his creditors would be ready to grant him his discharge. But who was to decide the question of fraud! The Bill provided that four-fifths of the creditors must consent to a discharge, fraud or not. The creditors were no judges of fraud. If there was fraud, it could only be clearly established by judicial enquiry. As far as the debtor was concerned, the Bill did not make proper provisions for his rights and interests. He held that the present Bill introduced a radical change in the Insolvent Law because it gave a tyrannical power to creditors, and left no means whatever to the debtor to get his discharge. No matter how fair a debtor had been in his dealings, he was left entirely at the mercy of his creditors as to whether he should be discharged or not. They had the power of forcing him into insolvency, of violently taking charge of his property, of breaking up all his calculations, and of disposing of all his property. No matter how unfortunate he had been, how energetic he had been, with what enterprise he had conducted his business, if he could not get the consent of four-fifths of his creditors he must remain for ever their victim, incapable of becoming again a useful member of society, or of embarking in any enterprise whatever. He was curious to hear the hon. the Minister of Justice in regard to this Bill, as that gentleman was the introducer of it, and, as far as the House was concerned, the father of it.

Mr. CAMERON (North Victoria) said he rose to a point of order. The Bill was not printed in French.

Mr. HOLTON said he thought that the hon. gentleman was too late for that objection, which should have been urged when the motion was first made, and not after a debate upon it.

Mr. SPEAKER said that the point was raised too late, the hon. member himself (Mr. Cameron) having spoken on the motion.

Mr. HOLTON said that the effect of the motion of the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol) would be to deprive the House of the opportunity of passing an opinion on this measure during the present Session. He thought that it was in the last degree desirable, whether they proceeded with the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead or not, but the sense of the House should be taken on the general question, as to the desirableness or not of continuing the Insolvency Law. That expression of opinion could be got on the motion of the hon. member for Iberville. He (Mr. Holton) did not believe that the majority of the House were prepared to affirm either that the old law was so perfect that it might be continued another year, or, on the other hand, that it ought to be repealed, absolutely and unconditionally. He would, therefore, implore the House for a decision on that cardinal point to-night.

MR. COURSOL said that if the motion of the member for Iberville was carried, the Bill would be destroyed; it could not be considered if they adjourned the matter until Monday. If they voted for a repeal now, they would have no Insolvency Law at all. If the sense of the House was for repeal, let it be fairly ascertained.

MR. ROSS (Dundas) said that this was an important measure that ought to be discussed intelligently and deliberately, without hurry. The sooner the Act of 1875 was repealed, the better for the people. If it was demoralising, and encouraging fraud, as the member for Stanstead described it, surely it ought not to remain on the Statute-book. There were several important clauses in the Bill to which he would not be strongly opposed. Therefore, he hoped the suggestion of the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron), for delay, would be accepted. Let them repeal the Insolvent Act of 1875, and give the people an opportunity of deciding whether they wanted another Act or not. He believed none would be demanded for years to come.

MR. BÉCHARD said he was desirous to meet the views of the mover and seconder of the motion in amendment, that he thought the adjournment of this debate to Monday next would postpone the settlement of the question too long for a settlement this Session. This would practically violate the agreement made with the Minister of Justice yesterday, who, with the Minister of Finance, agreed, that if he waived his right to moving his Bill, so as to give an opportunity of discussing the present Bill, he should have the time he wanted, and his Bill made the first Order of the Day for debate. He also understood that the House, while discussing the Bill, should have the opportunity of voting on the principle of the amendment he had submitted, in case of the adoption of which the Government was to give all possible facilities for the passing of his Bill. He would have to vote against the motion of the hon. member for Montreal East, which would postpone the question too long.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he wanted the member for Iberville to rest assured that the agreement he made with him should be religiously observed. He understood the arrangement was that the opinion of the House should be tested on the Bill of the member for Stanstead, when the member for Iberville should have an opportunity of proceeding with his Bill.

MR. COURSOL said he was not aware there had been any such agreement with the Minister of Justice, or the motion of the hon. member for Iberville, for the repeal of the law, would be tested this evening. That being the case, however, he would withdraw his motion.

Motion to adjourn the debate, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

[BILL 15.]

(Mr. Béchard.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said he felt warmly on this matter, and he desired to say a few words before the vote was taken. He had no reason to impugn the motives of hon. gentlemen, or to say that they were not as good judges as to what was best for the country as he himself was, but he was persuaded that, if effect were given to the resolution passed just now, it would produce a most disastrous state of affairs in the country. The passage of this motion for the repeal of the Insolvent Law would result in the destruction of all confidence. He felt he was speaking in the interests of the country. This question was above all party consideration. If he were acting from a party standpoint, he would ask nothing better, in the interests of his party, than that this measure should prevail. But it would produce a most disastrous state of affairs and react on the Government. What would be the effect? The House knew that, under the operation of the present Act, it was not in the interest of the creditor to bear heavily upon the debtor behind in his payments. How many men were there in the country behind in their payments, but who were in a solvent state, who, if given time, would ultimately meet their engagements? But the moment the Insolvent Law was repealed, these men would be crushed down. The consequence would be that, though a creditor might be willing to give time to a debtor, he would reason with himself that he was quite willing to give him time, but Mr. Jones, or Mr. Smith, to whom he was indebted, would not give him time, and necessarily he (the creditor) had to press heavily on his debtor. That would be the effect. There would be universal bankruptcy all over the country. He ventured to predict that, after the repeal of this Bill became law, there would be a crisis in this country of the most serious nature, a crisis that would not be confined to the wholesale and retail traders, for the retail men, forced by the wholesale men, would be compelled to resort to extreme measures to compel payments from the farmers, the mechanics and the labouring men of the country, who had got into their debt on the understanding that they would have time for payment, but which time could not be allowed them owing to the pressure brought to bear on the retail traders themselves. There would be a strong feeling in the country against the action taken to-night, which it would be very difficult to allay. He would not pretend to say that the House was not justified in giving way to the feeling which appeared to exist in the country in favour of the repeal of the Insolvency Law, but he would say that they, as members of the House, had something more to do than merely to give effect to the wishes of their constituents, expressed, perhaps, without proper thought. There was another responsibility resting upon them. They were supposed to know a little more about some matters than the bulk of their constituents. If there was no other way in which this matter could be set aside, he hoped it might be set aside in the other branch of the Legislature. He thought that the Senate would not sanction this legislation, and the result would be that, instead of giving effect to the amendments proposed by the Committee charged with the preparation of the new Bill, the old law would remain on the Statute-book. In case that should not be the result, he, for one, protested against this legislation, which would produce most disastrous results.

Mr. HOUDE said that, at the beginning of the Session, when it was proposed to appoint a Special Committee to enquire into the working of the Insolvency Law, he stated that, if an improvement could be made in the existing law, he would be in favour of it. That was the reason he had voted, a moment ago, against the amendment of the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard), in order to allow the Bill presented by his hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby) to replace the old law, on which it seemed to him to be an improvement. But, since that Bill had been defeated, he was consistent with his former declarations in voting for the repeal, pure and simple, of the existing law, which he had already condemned as too objectionable in its character, and too disastrous and demoralising in its effects, to be retained any longer in the Statute-book.

Mr. COLBY said the views which he entertained, with regard to the evil working of the Insolvent Act, were fully expressed when introducing the amended Act this evening. They were not new views, as they had been often expressed by him before upon the floor of the House. He had laboured conscientiously and industriously to remedy the evils contained in the present Act, and at the same time, to preserve to the commercial community what he believed was needed in their interest. He had failed in that effort, and he had no alternative now, acting on his antecedent and well understood views, except to vote for the repeal of the law.

Mr. BROOKS said he desired to make a few remarks in explanation of the vote he had just given and the vote he intended to give. He thought the discussion, this evening, would convince everyone, that, as shown by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), this was a very difficult matter to deal with, and, if hon. members looked at the legislation on this subject during the past fifteen years, they would see that it had been so considered by the House. He would simply refer to the amendments which had been proposed and passed during that period. This law was first introduced in 1863, and was passed in 1864. He found that amendments were made to the Act in 1869, 1870, 1871, 1873, 1874, 1875, 1876 and 1877. This Parliament had been ten years endeavouring to perfect the law. But what had been the result? The Act had become more and more unpopular every year since it had been first introduced, and there had been greater complaint against it throughout Canada within the last year than there ever had been before. The country had had fifteen years of this Insolvency Law, which had been continually found more and more unsatisfactory. Let them have at least one year's interregnum, during which there would be no law. The House could then see whether the voice of the people demanded such a law. He fully appreciated the remarks of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), whom he (Mr.

Brooks) had followed in reference to this matter, during the time he had been in Parliament, and who, during the whole period he had been in the House, had been a consistent opponent of this Insolvency Law. He fully appreciated what had been done by the Committee which had been appointed by the House in their efforts to frame a new law. He believed that the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Stanstead was the best improvement upon the law that had ever been offered to the House in reference to insolvency matters. But he had felt very strongly that the feeling existed in the country, and it was the feeling he always had from the first day the law had been in force, that it was a premium upon dishonest and reckless trading. They were inaugurating a new era—taking a new start in this Dominion. They had, during the present Session, entirely changed the fiscal system of the country, and why not take a fresh start in this matter of insolvency, and reverse the first principle of the law? Why not declare, as he thought they would, that all men in business would have to pay their debts? They all knew that throughout the commercial world there was a great eagerness in this country to become rich, and that, in carrying out that principle, they had found their young men, and the old men, too, recklessly entering into commercial transactions without, in many cases, having either capital or experience, never doubting but that, if they failed to succeed in their business, they would obtain the benefit of the Insolvency Act. The Insolvency Act was first introduced for the benefit of insolvent debtors, but that principle was entirely reversed in the Bill introduced by his hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby), which was now framed in the interest of the creditors. He believed that in that Act there were some principles which were entirely contrary to the principles which should be inserted in an Act of this kind. He believed that the Act should apply with equal fairness to both creditor and debtor, and he saw no reason why it should not apply to non-traders as well as traders, to farmers as well as merchants, if they were equally unfortunate to incur liabilities which they could not meet. He did not desire to enlarge upon this subject. He had voted in this matter, as he had always voted, conscientiously, believing that it was the interest of the country to repeal this law. He believed that the effect of this Insolvent Act had been most demoralising upon the trading community of the Dominion. He thought the House should have an opportunity of ascertaining whether a change might not be beneficial. He had voted in favour of the resolution of the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard), and, logically, he could not but vote for the repeal of the existing laws.

Mr. CAMERON (North Victoria) said he endorsed the remarks made by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), because, as a representative of Ontario, he could not but feel that the effect of the vote that had been passed to-night would be most disastrous upon that Province. He felt it his duty to express that opinion, but whilst doing so he also felt it his duty, as a member of the legal profession, to thank the House for opening the flood-gates of litigation, which would benefit his profession to the detriment of the whole commercial community of Ontario.

Mr. MACDOUGALL said, if his hon. friend the member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) and his hon. friend behind him (Mr. Cameron) spoke for Ontario, he thought it was desirable some other members for Ontario should express their opinions before a vote was taken. He did not believe that either of these gentlemen interpreted the public sentiment of that Province upon this question. If any one fact in this case was clear to his mind, it was that the experience of the great mass of the people, commercial as well as professional, showed that in its working the present Insolvent Law was of no practical benefit to creditors—that insolvent estates were usually swallowed up by expenses before dividends were realised. He did not see any grounds for the prediction of the hon. member for Brant, that the repeal of this law would be most disastrous in its effects. Creditors got very little now, and the lawyers got very little; but the official assignees, and other people concerned in the administration of the law, carried off the principal portion of the spoils; so that, probably, when the contracts of traders were restored to their normal place in the commercial law of the country, traders being allowed to make their own bargains, and pay their debts as they best could—the country would be just as well off, the trading class would be in quite as good a position as before, and the effect would be that this extensive credit system, which had carried the present depression in trade, would be abolished. He (Mr. Macdougall) had great respect for public opinion and for the sentiment which he found pervading a great representative body like this. He did not believe that the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Paterson) truly represented public opinion, nor that he would change the current of feeling in this House, when he prophesied such disastrous results from its action to-night. He (Mr. Macdougall) fancied the House knew very well its duty to the public. The hon. gentleman ventured to lecture the House for undertaking to repeal this Act, on the ground that they were legislating hastily and rashly. This question had been thoroughly discussed throughout the country, on the platform and through the press. It had been before the House at various times, and every hon. member must, long ago, have made up his mind in respect to it. The hon. gentleman intimated that, in another place,—after this House had exercised its authority and power as representatives of the people on a question affecting the people,—the deliberate decision of this assembly would be overruled. He trusted that suggestion would not prevail. He hoped that a majority of those who had a voice in this matter in another place would not be persuaded to set themselves in opposition to the opinion expressed by this House. He believed that public opinion was unfavourable to the Acts upon which they had just recorded their judgment; and, therefore, he felt assured that the other branch of the Legislature would concur in the decision which this body, by a decisive majority, had pronounced to-night. He intended to vote for the Bill of the hon. gentleman from Iberville (Mr. Béchard.) It would certainly be very improper to cut short those winding-up proceedings, which were now going on, and he supposed there was a clause of that kind in the Bill.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) had given expression to a very extraordinary opinion, that, when the House once voted upon any question, no member of the House was warranted in expressing any hostility in regard to that particular measure which the House had decided to adopt. The hon. gentleman spent the greater portion of the last five years in denouncing the last Legislature that assembled here, when, according to his new doctrine, he should have paid great respect to its doctrines. He (Mr. Mackenzie) adopted no such ground. Everyone had a perfect right to draw the attention of the House to what he considered the unwisdom of the Act. With reference to this particular measure, no doubt the hon. member for Halton was right in saying that public opinion was hostile to the continuance of the present Bankruptcy Law. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was hostile to it, but he believed the introduction of a repeal of that Act at present would be a measure of a very grave character to the commercial interests of the country. He believed commercial men had not yet attained the position which would enable them safely to repeal the Act. In Ontario, there was no proper legal provision for the equitable distribution of assets. That was one reason why he would not vote for the repeal of the law at present. Though there was a strong feeling against the law, by far the largest number of mercantile men, whom he had seen and who had large capital invested in business, looked with the gravest apprehension on a repeal of the Act during the prevalence of commercial depression.

MR. DOMVILLE said the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) was, from his point of view, a good one; but it did not meet the wants of the farmers, whose interests were as much entitled to be regarded as those of other classes. The present law had worked so much mischief that we would be better without it. A law should be enacted occasionally, during a lapse of years, to give relief to unfortunate and honest debtors, but should not be allowed to remain on the Statute-book for a number of years, and thus afford opportunities to dishonest debtors to take advantage of their creditors. The proposed law, whilst it professed to do away with assignees, substituted something else in its place, which did not curtail the expense, and, in addition, it entailed the cost of the Court which was to be established, and to be paid out of the insolvent estate. This was making matters even worse than it was before, and the result would be the estate would be eaten up by law, whilst the hapless debtor could get no relief. He did not believe in a young country like Canada keeping a man under the hatches forever, but he could not sanction a law which would deprive the debtor of his estate, give it to the lawyers, and leave the insolvent hampered and unable to help himself or his family.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) said he endorsed everything that had been said on this question by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson). It was a great misfortune that the House should have so disposed of the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead, and a still greater error would be committed if this House passed the Bill now before it for the repeal of the Insolvent Law. He would ask the hon. members from the Province of Quebec, who were in favour of the repeal, to remember that in Ontario the position was different from what it was in Quebec. In Quebec the creditors had an opportunity of dealing with the estate of an insolvent, whereas, in Ontario, there was no such opportunity. This was purely a commercial question. He would tell the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) that the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead, against which he had voted, gave protection to the farmers. If the law were repealed, there would be no protection for any one, either the honest debtor or creditor; the creditor who first got judgment would get the amount of his claim, and the others would be left out in the cold. Public sentiment was not against the Insolvent Law. Not a single petition had been presented to this House for its entire repeal. Any petition presented had always embraced the idea or suggestion, that some other measure should be introduced in its place. He regretted exceedingly that the Government had not thought proper to take hold of the measure of the hon. member for Stanstead, and make it a Government measure. It was their duty to do so. This Bill ought not to be allowed to go without being thoroughly discussed, and, therefore, he thought it would be advisable that the debate on it should be adjourned.

MR. MACDOUGALL said the hon. the leader of the Opposition was in error in assuming that he (Mr. Macdougall) had taken the ground, that the decisions of Parliament could not be reversed. He had argued in favour of the principle which lay at the foundation of Parliamentary law that, the House having pronounced on a question, that question could not be again put the same Session; there could not be contradictory decisions of the House the same Session. That rule was explicitly laid down by May, and was necessary to the proper conduct of business in a Legislative body. They had now the decision of this House on the question of the repeal of the Insolvent Act, and his hon. friend's objection to the Bill was a proposal to reverse the decision of the House.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was not the same, but a different question entirely which they were now discussing. A new Insolvency Law was introduced, and there was a motion made to read it a second time. A motion was made, in amendment, that it be read this day three months. But there was an Insolvent Law at present upon the Statute-book; the motion now before the House was to read the Bill repealing that Statute a second time. Without a repealing Act, the present law would remain in force.

MR. McCARTHY said he had come here with his mind made up to vote for the repeal of the Insolvent Law, but was prevailed upon by the arguments he had heard in the Committee to think that the amendments proposed would be better than a repeal of the law, and, therefore, he voted for the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead. He could not, however, vote in the same direction. He must, in accordance with the views he had formed after consulting the commercial men of his constituency, believe that if no change were made in the law, they would prefer to see it swept away. It was his duty, in his position, to give this explanation of his vote.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 102) Respecting certain Ordnance and Admiralty Lands in the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.—(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

HIS EXCELLENCY'S DESPATCHES CONCERNING THE TARIFF.

REMARKS.

MR. MACKENZIE said he desired to call the attention of the Government to a statement in the public press that certain despatches had been printed in England, which were transmitted by His Excellency, concerning the tariff. As these papers had become public in England, he could conceive no reason why they should not be brought down to the House here. He desired to ask the Government if they intended to lay them on the table; he presumed they would do it without requiring any formal motion.

MR. TILLEY said he supposed there could be no objection, seeing the papers had been made public on the other side; but he should have to decline giving an answer until he had had communication with the Governor-General. He would probably be able to give an answer to-morrow.

MR. MACKENZIE said that, as these documents bore upon a subject that was still to be discussed, he hoped the hon. gentleman would try and get them down to-morrow.

MR. SPEAKER.

MR. TILLEY said he would make enquiries about it.

SUPPLY.

X.—PENSIONS.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

61 To meet the probable amount required for Pensions to Veterans of War of 1812. $35,000 00

MR. IVES said it was to be regretted that the Government had not found it possible to bring down a larger amount for this year than a sum of $35,000. From the best information he could get, the original expectation, when the sum of $50,000 was appropriated, was, that it would afford a sum sufficient to pay about $100 to each of these old soldiers; but a much larger number had put in claims than was expected, and the result was that $20 a year was all that had ever been paid. As the number decreased, however, the appropriations decreased also, and the original sum had been kept at $20 a year. This year, some $35,000 only was brought down. The House would remember that returns were asked for early in the Session, showing the number still surviving, and the number of those who were commissioned officers during the war. That return had been brought down, but, of course, it only showed the number surviving one year ago, when the amount for that year was paid, and it would be noticed in that return that nearly one-third of the original number were now dead—because he took it that those who had not been heard from were dead. When it must be considered that those men must be now all of them nearly 90 years of age—because those who were 21 years of age in 1812 must be 90 years old now—when that fact was considered, it might reasonably be expected that a very large number of those who had made application for the last year had not made application this year. He should say, in all human probability, at least one-half of those who received pensions last year would not make application on this side of time for the pension this year. Now, therefore, he thought, from the fact that these men could only last a year or two longer, and many of them being in destitute circumstances, and from the fact that the services they rendered were honourable services, for which the country ought to be proud and grateful, the Government this year, without raising the amount of the appropriation, might use it all up in paying these old men. In his opinion, even though the sum appropriated was only $30,000, yet, if the whole amount was paid, it would be found sufficient this year to pay them $40 each. He regretted that the Government should continue to pay only $20 each, and return the rest of the money to the Treasury. He thought, in the first place, we should return to the original sum of $50,000. It would only be required for one or two years longer any way. Even though the Government should not be willing to do that, he believed the sense of the House, if it could be taken on the matter, would be that the whole amount of $35,000 should be paid out, and not the sum of $20 each, with the remainder carried back to the Treasury. He had no doubt, whatever, that $35,000 would be sufficient to pay each pensioner $40 a year. He did not desire to make any formal motion, but he was certain, from conversation he had with many members, that a large proportion of the House would be glad to see the original amount voted, and the amount increased that should be paid this year to each of these old men.

Mr. PLUMB said his hon. friend had been mistaken in supposing the pensioners who were on that list were all twenty-one years of age, or over, at the time they rendered their services. He knew of cases where they were very much younger, and he did not think that the Government had been, or was required to be, particular in scrutinising the ages of the applicants. Those who were twenty-one years of age even at the close of the war, would be now eighty-five. He knew a case where a man, Bernard Welman, of Niagara, had served as a teamster in the war of 1812, had applied four or five years ago for a pension, and had been refused, though another veteran of 1812, three or four years his junior, who had worked in the same service, at the same time and place, and was afterwards a member of the Parliament of the two Canadas, had been put on the pension list. He had applied to the Department on that veteran's account, and trusted that he would not only receive his pension hereafter, but the arrears to which he was entitled. They should act liberally towards all veterans, and if they had actually served, as had the claimant in question, without doubt, they should not be excluded upon a technical definition. His old friend was present at engagements at Niagara, at Lundy's Lane, and at Stoney Point, and was under fire at those places while serving out ammunition. He was crippled while in discharge of his duty, and was now tottering helplessly upon the verge of the grave, "to dig unable, and to beg ashamed," and he (Mr. Plumb) desired most earnestly to appeal to the Government in the old man's behalf.

Mr. JONES said, as he understood it, in 1874, $50,000 was set aside for those veterans. It was found that instead of their getting $50 a-piece, which they were to receive, their pension was reduced to $20. They only received $20 each, yet, because the Government decreased the total amount yearly, as the poor fellows fell off—they had not increased it from $20 up to $50, intended to be given, notwithstanding the yearly vote for that purpose. He thought it a very small matter on the part of the Government, who should have been giving the $50 instead of $20, as first contemplated.

Mr. HAGGART said he would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Militia to a subject he had often brought before that Department. In 1837, a company of volunteer artillery from the section he represented, had served in Kingston, when the General commanding the troop promised them a grant of 100 acres of land. This promise was published in the general order, but the men had never been able to obtain the land, or get any satisfaction on the subject. He understood that the promises and all the liabilities of the Imperial Government, on all such subjects, had been assumed by the Canadian Government. He would like to know the intention of the Government on the subject.

MR. McCUAIG said that the grant of the veterans should be raised from $20 to $50, or as much above $20 as possible, as most of them were very poor. He (Mr. McCuaig) urged an increase in the amount granted, from $20 to $50. He wished the Government would divide the whole original grant among the survivors, many of whom, through the infirmities of age, were unable to take care of themselves, and were supported by their families and friends. Their meritorious services rendered to the Empire in times of need entitled them to be rewarded in a substantial manner by a grateful country.

MR. BOWELL said he was sure there was no hon. gentleman who would not be pleased to see the veterans of 1812-13 get as much as the public revenue would justify, but at present, with a depleted revenue, it was not thought advisable to ask for an increased sum. The hon. member for Sherbrooke was mistaken in supposing that any portion of last year's appropriation for the old veterans went back into the Exchequer. On the contrary, the $35,000 was not sufficient to pay them the $20 a piece formerly allowed, between $2,000 and $3,000 having to be taken out of the Supplementary Estimates for that purpose. The $35,000 now asked was believed sufficient for that purpose. In reference to the case mentioned by the member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), he was informed that the applicant was but a teamster during the war, who never had been enlisted, but had been paid by the day when employed. Parties who had given evidence of having been in the service in 1812-13, had been placed on the pension list. With regard to the case mentioned by the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), he had been informed by the officer of the Department that there never had been any order passed promising land to volunteers for services during the rebellion of 1836 and 1837.

MR. IVES said he was fully of the opinion that even the small sum of $35,000 would be sufficient to pay a much larger amount than $20 to each of the survivors this year. Was it intended to pay the $35,000 to the survivors, or adhere to the payment of $20 each, saving the balance to the country out of those poor people?

MR. PLUMB said that the case he had presented was a parallel case to that of the former member of Parliament, who had received his arrears and a pension for service in 1812. The veteran for whom he applied was injured at the time, and had never been able since to go without a crutch or a cane, and it would be very tardy justice to that old man that he should have this miserable pittance at the hands of the country, which should not scrutinise any of those cases too closely.

MR. TILLEY said that this vote was, no doubt, a popular one, as would be any increase of it. It was a recognition, though small, of important services rendered to the country. But he feared that, in the present condition of the finances, it would be exceedingly difficult to increase the annual vote. If the finances of the country improved, they might be able to increase the vote twelve months hence.

MR. McCUAIG said he was quite content to leave the matter in the hands of the hon. the Finance Minister, who, he was sure, would appreciate the claims of these brave men in their old age and helpless condition, and do them justice by increasing the annual pension to the survivors, as he had suggested.

MR. BOWELL said that the intention of the Government was to pay $20 each to those who had been receiving it. An exception was made by the late Minister of Militia, who had placed a teamster on the pension list for special services of some kind. The person for whom the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) spoke would be placed on the pension list if found as much entitled to it as the other teamster.

XI.—MILITIA.

Ordinary.

63 Salaries of Military and District Staff....	$23,800 00
64 Salaries of Brigade Majors ...	17,400 00

MR. THOMPSON (Haldimand) asked if it was the intention of the Government to decrease the staff, which, it was well known, absorbed money which should go to the men.

MR. SCRIVER said he had a distinct recollection of questions put by the present Minister of Customs on this subject, when in Opposition. He hoped that hon. gentlemen had not forgotten the clear and able reasons he gave for his belief that the staff ought to be reduced—that it was too expensive. He trusted he would give the House similar reasons to-day for a similar conclusion, and that a change in this respect would be made before long; that the volunteers themselves would receive some portion of the money, which, he was afraid, was not too wisely expended on a large and expensive staff.

MR. WILLIAMS said that before this item passed, he wished to say a word or two in reference to it. He saw, by the detailed statement on the following page, that the salaries of the officer commanding the militia, and the Adjutant General, were not included in the Estimates, but were fixed by Act of Parliament passed in 1875. Upon referring to the Act he found that the officer commanding had to be an officer of Her Majesty's regular army, of stated rank, and, consequently, of experience. Although he must admit that, during the régime of the hon. gentlemen opposite, the military spirit of the country had been allowed to languish, he must also say that they deserved commendation for the course they pursued in this matter. He was sure the militia force felt the desirability of having at their head an officer who had made the study of arms his profession, who must possess the scientific knowledge as well as the practical experience necessary to lead the forces of the country in case of emergency. He thought, also, there was another consideration which we secured under the present arrangement. The General commanding was the connecting link between our militia system and the army authorities of the Home Government. He would, naturally, come to the country under the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief of the Imperial troops, and might be considered as his accredited representative, and would act, no doubt, to a certain extent, under his suggestions. The force had been singularly fortunate during the last four years in having had in this position a gentleman, who, by his courtesy, as well as by his military knowledge and appreciation of the position of military affairs in the country, had gained the esteem, as well as the confidence, of all with whom he had come in contact. He thought it particularly desirable that these positions, from which must spring the life and stability of the military defensive strength of the country, should be placed on a comparatively permanent basis. As regarded the gentleman who now occupied the position of Adjutant-General, no one more competent could be found for the position; he was the admitted father of the present militia system, and its successful development was due greatly to his business abilities. On referring to the Militia Report of the year, he found it suggested that a further saving of expenditure might be made by the merging of some of the Military Districts; he could only express the hope that, if these suggestions were acted upon, the services of so valuable and experienced an officer as the gentleman now commanding No. 3 District at Kingston would not be dispensed with.

MR. BROWN said that it was understood last Session that some reduction would be made in this item. He was of opinion that several reductions might be made in the staff, and that either the Brigade-Majors or Deputy-Adjutants General might be done away with in the districts. He also thought that one paymaster might do for two or three districts, or that the payments might be made direct from headquarters. Everything had been done in attempting to economise, as far as the men were concerned, but where the largest expenditure was, nothing had been done.

MR. McCUAIG said the nominal strength of our militia was 45,000, and the actual strength, 37,000, and only 20,000 of these were annually drilled. Now, if there was anything he felt a pride in, as a Canadian, it was the militia of the Dominion. When the country was threatened by invasion, some years ago, the militia turned out with alacrity and cheerfulness, and he thought the country appreciated it. The promptitude with which the militia responded to the call of their country on the occasion, created a confidence in them, and he was of opinion that the officers and men should be encouraged, after the laudable manner in which they performed their duty at that time, and he hoped that, under the guise of economy, the expenditure for this purpose would not be injuriously curtailed. If there was one thing more than another, in regard to which the Canadian people were inclined to be liberal, it was in the militia. He was opposed to any reduction on this item, believing it would be better to make a saving upon items less necessary. Although he approved, as a general rule, in cases where our militia were called out in support of the civic authority, that the expense should be borne by the municipality requiring the service, he, nevertheless, urged strongly the militia should be promptly paid by the Government for such service, and the municipality be made to reimburse the Military Department. He was aware of instances where delays had taken place in the payment of the militia by municipalities, greatly to their inconvenience, and he hoped this matter would receive the careful and earnest consideration of his hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence.

MR. BOWELL said if his hon. friend would take the trouble to look at the Estimates, he would see that a reduction had been made in the staff. In the first item a saving of $4,800 had been effected by combining the duties of paymaster and store-keeper in one office. In some cases they did away with the paymaster, when they found the store-keeper better fitted for the duties. The services of the Brigade-Major that had been dispensed with had been so dispensed with by the late Government, and, in answer to the hon. member for Gloucester, he would say that that gentleman was Mr. Reed of Nova Scotia. An additional saving was effected by paying to each District Brigade Major $400 for the whole district, instead of $8 per company. This would result in a saving of about $1,600, which, together with the amount saved by dispensing with a Brigade Major, made a total of $2,600. This change had been effected in order to prevent the possibility of Brigade Majors being charged with reporting companies efficient in order to obtain the $8 per company. The question of the Brigade Majors was, and had been for some time past, under the consideration of the Department, and he was in hope that his hon. colleague would be enabled, when the House met again, to show that another economy had been effected by dispensing with those officers in the manner suggested by his hon. friend from West Hastings (Mr. Brown), that was by combining the two offices of Brigade Major and Deputy Adjutant-General. He was quite in accord with the hon. gentleman on this point, and he had no doubt that, had the health of the Minister of Militia been such as to justify his looking more closely into these matters, he would have provided a plan by which this reduction could have been made. They would find that in the 68th item there was an increase. It was intended to apply that increase of $-0,000 to assist rural companies to drill at battalion headquarters, and to pay for the transportation of men living a distance from headquarters. This expenditure would be made up by savings in other items. It was proposed to decrease the sum given to the Dominion Rifle Association by $2,000, making it $8,000 instead of $10,000. If the association did not send a team to Wimbledon they would not receive the appropriation of $6,000 which was given for that purpose.

MR. McCUAIG said he desired to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Marine to the position of the mariners of Canada. They had no organisation of officers and seamen in the Dominion. He thought, in view of the difficulties of navigation, it was desirable, in the event of hostilities breaking out, that we should organise lake and river masters, mates, pilots, engineers and others familiar with our rivers, as it was well known the navigation, particularly of the River St. Lawrence, with its swift currents and shoals, was difficult, and, without experienced and trained men, was dangerous to vessels navigating it. It took years to give the officers and men the necessary naval training and experience, and he was sure, if the Government would give them the slightest encouragement, they would cheerfully organise. He hoped that, by next year, his hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would have given this matter his consideration. The chief reliance of Great Britain was in her Royal Navy and her merchant marine, and, in times of danger, she depended as much, and, in certain cases, even more, upon this arm of her service than upon her soldiers, and, in the event of any difficulties arising in this country, an organisation of mariners would form a very strong power, and, being organised, would be subject to naval service without any delay.

MR. WILLIAMS said, as the hon. the Minister of Customs had referred to item No. 68, he thought that the attention of the House should be more particularly directed to it, and to its smallness, comparatively speaking, when it was considered that it covered the whole appropriation for drill pay, and the expenses connected with the training of 44,000 officers and men. He thought it should be clearly understood that the efficiency of the force could not be maintained on any such pittance. He was not in favour of any extravagant expenditure for militia purposes, but thought some fair consideration should be given to cover the expenses of those who, at great sacrifice, desired to make themselves efficient defenders of their country against internal as well as external troubles. He had listened attentively to the patriotic effusions of the hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, and to their declaration of loyalty and attachment to the Motherland, and felt satisfied that the sense of the House would have sustained the hon. the Minister of Militia, had he thought it desirable to double the amount of this item. The militia has been of great service to the country during the past years, and that it had been fully equal to all the emergencies it has been called on to meet, was fully sustained, not only by the General Officer commanding the militia, but by such authorities as Sir Garnet Wolsey, General Lindsay, Col. Thackwell, and other officers of the regular service. He saw, from the report of the Major-General, that he suggested that three standing battalions should be created; but he felt that in this he would not be sustained by the voice of the people of the country; the expenditure for them, alone, would be almost equal to the amount of the whole appropriation now asked for militia purposes, and he thought the active militia, as it now stood, would have to be sacrificed, and a blow given to the patriotic sentiment of the country. What we wanted in this country was a militia system that would be expansive, one that could reach and utilise the willing arms of the population in case of trouble. The present system, he thought, was such an one; it could be managed with strict economy, and, at the same time, be made to produce an efficient force. The object we should aim at was to secure well-qualified officers and non-commissioned officers conversant with their duties. Opportunities for acquiring such knowledge could be given to them at a small expense by opening again the Military Schools at Kingston, Quebec and Halifax, placing them under the control of the Deputy Adjutants-General of their Districts, and utilising "A" and "B" Batteries for the purpose.

MR. COURSOL said it was well known that Montreal had a large force of volunteers, well drilled and disciplined, and, he believed, second to none in the Dominion. The officers of the force were subject to very heavy expenses on account of the want of accommodation for drill purposes, and of paid officers to look after the various regiments. Unfortunately for Montreal, the drill shed, which had been erected some years ago, tumbled down, and at present there was no place where the volunteers could drill. He would ask the hon. the Minister of Militia, whether any provision had been made for the rebuilding of the drill shed. Interviews had taken place with the volunteer officers and the Adjutant-General, also with the members of the corporation, and he hoped to hear that the shed would shortly be rebuilt.

MR. BOWELL said he understood the Corporation of Montreal had now $12,000 in their possession with which they should have rebuilt the drill shed, but had refused to do so. They should either spend the money in rebuilding it or hand it over to the Government and allow them to build it. He was also informed that if they would place the property at the disposal of the Government, the probabilities were the Government would rebuild the shed. This was the statement made by the late Government, that the city of Montreal had this money to build the drill shed.

MR. GAULT: It would cost $20,000 to build it.

In answer to Mr. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. BOWELL said there was one paymaster retained on account of the quantity of work to be done in Military District No. 1. The storekeeper that had charge of the stores of districts Nos. 5 and 6, would act as paymaster for No. 6, while the paymaster for No. 5 District would be retained.

MR. STRANGE said he wished to call attention to the small amount allotted for drill pay. In his opinion, the sum was altogether too small, and out of all proportion to the total amount expended on the Militia Service. For the last five years the appropriation for drill pay had been so meagre that it had been found impossible to organise any brigade camps, and unless a brigade camp was held at least every alternate year, it was impossible to keep the militia in a state of efficiency and discipline. He did not wish to embarrass the Government on this question during the financial distress under which the country was labouring, but he strongly urged upon the Administration the absolute necessity of liberally augmenting the vote for drill pay, as soon as the Public Treasury would permit. If the Government found this to be impracticable in the future, they would have no other alternative than to permanently reduce the number of battalions by disbanding all those which were weak or inefficient, and applying the available funds to the equipment and drill of those regiments, which, by the liberality of the officers, and the self-abnegation of the men, had remained efficient under most trying and adverse circumstances.

MR. BOWELL.

MR. BÉCHARD said a considerable portion of that money was wasted: Some of the companies in the rural districts were utterly disorganized, and the officers, when the occasion arrived, would obtain the services of mere boys to go through the allotted drill. Military instruction should be confined to large centres where the militia could not fail to be kept organised.

MR. CHARLTON said that his hon. friend's experience must be limited to that part of the Province of Quebec known as Iberville. His (Mr. Charlton's) observation had led him to form a different conclusion. He should be sorry to see any discrimination against these battalions in the rural districts, especially those on the frontier. If his hon. friend had read the report of the Minister of Militia and the reports of the several Adjutants-General, he would have found that the organisation on the frontier compared favourably in numbers and discipline with those of the large centres of population.

MR. PLUMB said that, living on the frontier, he felt a great interest in everything connected with militia expenditure. He was sorry to see that the spirit which had prevailed in the House for the last few years had been in the direction of largely reducing the expenditure in that important Department. There had been a reduction during the past three or four years from an expenditure of $1,300,000 down to about $600,000. That was a poor economy, and whenever any spasmodic reduction of a large amount was made in any permanent expenditure in any single year, it was sure to result in a very extravagant expenditure later. In England, during the rage for cheese-paring economy of the Gladstone Government, a great reduction was made in the militia expenditure, and they all knew the enormous outlay which followed it. It was desirable that we should have an effective force, however small, and any expenditure made should be made in the right direction. He had seen the very bulky report of the Militia Department which had been laid on the table of the House, but had failed to hear the slightest allusion to that report, which offered the only justification for making those large allowances to be expended in that Department. He had before him the report of the gentleman who was in charge of the militia forces in this country, but had heard no reference made to it whatever. That report came to us with a certain amount of authority. That gentleman was an old, experienced officer in the British army, who had seen active service, who came here entirely free from political prejudice, with the authority of the British Government, which had decorated him for able services, and whatever he said should be listened to with respect. That gentleman had proposed, that in the condition Canada was in at present, some provision should be made for a permanent force. Of course, the name of a standing army, however small, would create alarm at once, and no member of Parliament would attempt to ask such a thing. A recommendation of this kind was entitled to respect. He did not say that it should be carried out, but he wished it to be considered. He (Major-General Smyth) gave very strong arguments in favour of the forces so massed and arranged together as to provide for emergencies which were liable to rise in a country situated as Canada was. He referred to the trouble which occurred in Montreal last year, and pointed out very properly that no local force could ever be effective in case of a rising in its neighbourhood. Opinions from a gentleman such as the Major-General of the Dominion, speaking as he always did, in the interests of the country, was worthy of acceptance. He asked the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bowell) acting for the hon. the Minister of Militia, whether it was intended this year to provide a volunteer camp at Niagara? He thought there was no gentleman in the House who ever had anything to do with volunteer camps in Ontario, but would acknowledge that the town of Niagara afforded the best accommodation for volunteers' camps that could be found anywhere in that Province. He appealed to his hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Skinner), who had experience in this matter, to say whether he (Mr. Plumb) was correct or not in that assertion. He did not urge the formation of a camp at Niagara this year, because he knew the position in which the present Government found itself upon getting into power. He knew they were forced, from the financial position of the country, into a kind of economy, which he (Mr. Plumb) fancied was not sound economy, but which was made necessary by the temporary condition of the finances. He trusted that the hon. gentlemen who were now in charge of the Militia of the Dominion, would see that it was not in the true interests of the country—as represented by the great majority of this House occupying seats on the Government side—to pursue a system of petty economy in the matter of the militia expenditure. It would be the poorest economy in the world to follow the course pursued during the last two or three years in cutting down the Militia estimates for the sake of showing an apparent reduction in the expenditure of the country.

MR. BOWELL said there were not to be any brigade camps formed this year. Drill would take place at battalion headquarters, and, therefore, there had been an increase in the amount for this particular service. He found, in looking at the report of the Deputy Adjutant-General of the inspection of the companies at Iberville, to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Béchard) had referred, that it was stated by that officer that, while they were nearly all recruits, and wanting in drill, "they were able-bodied and active men," and not what his hon. friend had declared them to be—nearly all boys and striplings.

MR. BÉCHARD: I stated that a portion of them were merely boys.

MR. BOWELL said if they were good-sized boys he would not object. He thought that as soon as boys were able to shoulder a rifle they should commence to drill. If that were done, it would furnish better men for the service. He hoped the hon. gentleman did not desire to cast any reflection on the hon. Mr. Marchand, the Colonel of the battalion, when he stated that his command was composed of boys unfit for service. If they were to believe the Deputy Adjutant-General they were all able-bodied men. He regretted to have to inform his hon. friend from Niagara, (Mr. Plumb) that the finances of the country would not justify the Government, at the present moment, in the expenditure of a larger sum for this particular service than they proposed to expend.

Mr. THOMPSON (Haldimand) said he regretted that a camp could not be formed at Niagara this year, as a great deal of good had been accomplished by those camps. He saw by the newspapers that some volunteer battalions were to go to Montreal on the 24th of May, and he desired to know if they were to be sent at the public expense?

Mr. BOWELL said that a proportion of the cost of the transportation of the Queen's Own, of Toronto, the Governor-General's Foot Guards, of Ottawa, and of a Quebec battalion, to Montreal, to take part in the demonstration in that city on the 24th of May, would be paid by the Government. The total amount to be contributed by the Government towards that service, was $4,000.

Mr. IVES said he wished to call the attention of the House to an instance of economy on the part of the Government. Last year, the country battalions in the vicinity of Montreal were called away from their harvest work to do duty in that city. They were on duty three nights and two days. The city of Montreal paid them for two days—the three nights had to be thrown in, and the Government had actually made a charge against these men to the amount of half their pay for rations while in that city. Yet now, the Government proposed to expend a large sum of money in enabling three battalions to go to Montreal for the purpose of having a pleasure party. He did not think that right or proper.

Mr. BROWN said he thought it was an injustice to appropriate money for the benefit of two or three particular corps, and he did not see why it should not be left open to any of the militia battalions that wished to take advantage of it. But he did not believe the money should be spent in that way at all. He certainly agreed with the hon. gentleman who had preceded him (Mr. Ives) in reference to economy. He thought the rural companies mentioned by the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) would compare favourably with any other class of the militia, and were equal to any town or city battalions.

Mr. RYAN (Montreal Centre) said he rose for the purpose of protesting against the objection made by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) to the small appropriation for the purpose of assisting the Toronto and Ottawa Regiments in being transported to Montreal, for the purpose of taking part in the demonstration in that city on the 24th May, in honour of the birthday of Her Majesty the Queen. He felt that, if there was any occasion upon which the volunteers were to make a creditable display, it was on an occasion like this, when a regiment was coming from New York, at their own expense, to join the volunteers in Canada in the demonstration at Montreal. He was satisfied that the turn-out of the Canadian volunteers would be one that would reflect credit on themselves and on the whole Dominion. He did not quite agree with the hon. member for Niagara, when he regretted exceedingly that the finances of the country were not in a position to expend a larger sum for militia purposes. He was quite sure that on all occasions in the future, as in the past, the volunteers would be always ready to turn out and do their duty with honour to themselves and with credit to the country. But there was one great question which occupied a great deal of public attention, and that was, whether the country received an equivalent for the very large amount annually appropriated for the volunteers' service. He thought that the best way to train the population to the use of arms was to train the youth of Canada in the schools. Those who had charge of the educational system of the country should, as early as possible, bring their influence to bear with every Local Government, in order that in every public school, which received a dollar of public money, an hour or two a day should be set apart for the purpose of training the youths of the country to the use of arms. By that means, he believed, we would get the whole country accustomed to the use of arms, and, if ever an emergency arose, the country would have at its service a large number of comparatively well-trained men. A great number of people were prepared, if necessity arose, to make greater sacri-

nices in the future than they had already done, for the maintenance of our volunteer force; but, at the same time, they had doubts as to whether the present system was the proper one for this country. He desired to make another remark, with reference to a statement of the hon. gentleman acting for the Minister of Militia, in regard to militia affairs in Montreal. The Government of Canada had given a certain sum to the city of Montreal to aid in the erection of a drill shed. The city had borrowed, in its corporate capacity, a certain sum of money, for the same purpose. The drill shed had been erected, but the roof had fallen in, and ever since it had been unoccupied, except for storage purposes by the city. Gentlemen, who, in the past, had made great sacrifices for the volunteer force of Montreal, believed that the city was bound by law to reconstruct that drill shed. So far they failed to do so; but, as regarded the $12,000 given by the Government, he had no hesitation in saying—because he had the authority of the Chairman of the Finance Committee of Montreal for the statement—that they were ready to return that sum of money at any time. The Government gave not only $12,000, but they were bound to pay an annual rental of $1,200 besides, for the use of the drill shed. He admitted that the city of Montreal had not done, in connection with this drill shed, what it should have done, and had not treated the volunteer force as it deserved. He merely alluded to the fact now, in order to say that the Government of Canada ought to take some steps to bring this question to a settlement at the earliest possible moment—either to get back the money they were entitled to receive from the city of Montreal, or compel the Corporation to fulfil their duty toward the volunteer force of that city.

MR. THOMPSON (Haldimand) said he did not object to the troops going to Montreal on the 24th of May, but he did object to any money being taken out of the public chest to pay their expenses. The people of Montreal were able to pay for any celebration they might undertake. Instead of spending money for such purposes, it should be given to drill the country battalions, who were the bone and sinew of the militia force. He did not believe in these pet militia associations in Toronto, Ottawa, and other places being taken to Montreal at the public expense.

MR. RYAN (Montreal Centre) said they were not going at the public expense, as he read sometime ago in the newspapers that, in Toronto, Colonel Otter called his men together, and every one of them was prepared to make a pecuniary sacrifice, and pay his own expenses to Montreal.

MR. PERREAULT said he desired to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Militia to the existence of the Charlevoix Battalion, which was composed of well-trained men. Unfortunately, however, they had not sufficiently frequent occasions for meeting together and drilling. He hoped the hon. the Minister of Militia would think of them, and enable them to meet together oftener. By this means he would ensure the existence of a battalion of excellent men, who asked nothing better than to develop their military qualities.

MR. MILLS said the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) complained that the volunteers who were called to Montreal last year to assist in maintaining the peace, were charged with rations. He thought there was some misapprehension on this point. Whenever the volunteer force was called out for the purpose of maintaining the peace, it was not as military at all; they were not called out in a military capacity, but simply as a constabulary force. If the hon. the Minister of Customs, who appeared to dissent from this view, would take the trouble to look at the Act providing for the calling out of this force, he would see that they were called out as a constabulary, and not as a volunteer force. The principle was well recognised in Mr. Clode's work on the Military Forces and Crown. It was the duty of every citizen to assist in maintaining the peace, and the responsibility of maintaining the peace devolved on the local authorities. It was quite competent for the Local Government in every Province to organise the people into a constabulary force, to arm and drill them the same as a military force, and to make it their duty to turn out for the purpose of assisting to maintain the peace. In England, in recent years, since 1839, that had been the practice; and the military force were called upon as rarely as possible for that purpose. The principle was also well recognised in Bowyer's work on the Constitutional Law of England, in which he said:

"We have seen that the House of Commons has never admitted, and the preamble of the Mutiny Act by implication denies, that a standing army is required to maintain the Government at home; yet it sometimes happens that the aid of the military force is called for by the civil magistrate, in cases of riot or disturbance, to preserve the peace. But in such cases the law looks upon the soldiers rather as armed citizens (and, perhaps, as sworn servants of the Crown) than as a body of men under martial law, and separated from the rest of the community. Thus it has been laid down that a soldier is gifted with all the rights of other citizens, and is bound to all their duties, and he is, therefore, as much bound to prevent a breach of the peace, or a felony, as any other person. If it be necessary for the purpose of preventing mischief, or for the execution of the law, it is not only the right of soldiers, but it is their duty, to exert themselves in assisting in the execution of a legal process, or to prevent any crime or mischief being committed. So it has been laid down that a magistrate may assemble all the King's subjects to quell a riot, and may call in soldiers who are subjects, and may act as such; though this should be done with great caution. And thus much for the militia state, as acknowledged by the laws of England."

That was exactly the principle recognised here. It was not in the power of the Government of Canada to call out the militia force as a militia force for the maintenance of peace. The Government of Canada had gone to the utmost limits of its authority, in his opinion, on the occasion already referred to. It was extremely doubtful whether they had the power to place the militia force of the country as such at the disposal of the local authorities, but there could be no doubt that, when that force was placed at their disposal, it was not as a military force at all, but as a constabulary force, to assist the civil authorities in the maintenance of peace. This principle was fully discussed on the occasion of the Lord George Gordon riots when the Mayor of London permitted the insurrection to go on for days together; and, after the Houses and members of Parliament were attacked, upon the advice of the Attorney General of the day, Wedderburne, the King called out the military force, but he did so on the understanding that the riot had assumed such dimensions that a state of rebellion existed within the city, and then the force was called out as a military force—not to aid the civil authorities, but to assist in putting down an insurrection. In this matter, if the volunteers were charged with the rations, it was simply because there was no other course open; and, if there was anyone to be complained of, it was the municipal authorities where the presence of this force was required.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said he always found some difficulty in reconciling himself to the large expenditure which this country annually made for military purposes. He did not agree with the hon. gentleman from Niagara (Mr. Plumb), that it was desirable to incur a large expenditure for keeping up a military force. The Minister of Militia would confer a boon on this country if he could reduce this expenditure even below its present figure—not, however, that he objected to an expenditure of money for militia purposes, if it could be directly applied to those purposes. This large sum of over $700,000 was not all applied directly for drill purposes; on the contrary, a large portion, perhaps the largest portion, went to the payment of officers' salaries. During the last few years our volunteers had scarcely done the usual amount of drill, and yet he found the officers' salaries still continued the same. Large sums were also expended for Departmental management and Adjutants-General, and when they came to figure up what the volunteers actually received for the time and labour they gave in drilling and preparing themselves to serve the country, only the comparatively small sum of $175,000 was paid to them. He believed there was no danger of our being called upon to do much fighting for some years to come, in defence of our country; still, he should never object to the expenditure of a reasonable sum of money annually, in order to maintain a certain military spirit which every Canadian must recognise as having an important influence on the institutions of a free people. What he objected to was the large expenditure for other purposes than for the development directly of the military spirit among our young men. He desired also to call attention to the Wimbledon Team annually sent to the Old Country. He was not quite satisfied with the mode in which that team was selected. While agreeing that it was well our various Provinces should be represented in such a team, still, he thought that, for the honour of Canada, the best men should be selected irrespective of Provincial distinctions. He would like to see Canada take a higher position, if possible, in military competition in the Old Country, but, as long as the selection was by Provinces, and, perhaps, not the utmost care being taken to select the best riflemen from the various Provinces, there would always be a lack of military éclat derived from the expenditure of this money. A better mode would be to select the best men irrespective of Provinces, and send them over to allow them to practice there for some time before the competition opened, and we should then, probably, score higher results than we had done heretofore. He did not call attention to these matters in any carping spirit, because he agreed that the militia item was an important one, but for the purpose of securing the expenditure of this money in a more direct manner towards the purposes in view.

MR. CASEY said his hon. friend (Mr. Ross) was mistaken in his reference to the Wimbledon Team. The men were not now selected by Provinces, but by competition open to the whole Dominion. Matches were held in the different Provinces, and the highest scores taken entitled the winner to a position on the Wimbledon Team. It was a very difficult matter to decide as to the best means of selecting the best men from the whole Dominion to compose this team. The Dominion Rifle Association had had this matter up year after year, yet had not been able to come to any satisfactory decision. He thought the best plan would be for the Government to give the Rifle Association an annual grant, sufficient to allow competitors from the different Provinces to meet at one place at the same time, with their expenses paid, and there to have the trial take place for the best men. He thought the House would agree with him that the money expended in sending this team to England every year was money well spent. It had been a small grant, but he was sure that every member in this House would agree with him that no sum of money had done so much towards bringing Canada before the British nation, and producing a good feeling abroad towards this country.

MR. SKINNER said he desired to draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of Militia to an article now going the rounds of the press, which was directly insulting to some of our militia regiments. He had received numerous letters from friends all over the country desiring to know whether there was any truth or not in the article, which was copied from the Detroit News. He wished to know whether Col. Gzowski had really said that only 2,000 men could be recruited in this country under the circumstances.

Several HON. MEMBERS: He never said it.

MR. SKINNER said the article was highly insulting to the force, and he wanted to know whether there was any truth in it.

MR. BOWELL said he could inform the hon. gentleman that there was no truth whatever in the statement so far as the Government was concerned. On the contrary, they all knew that had they required 10,000 men at that time there would have been no difficulty in raising double the number in Canada to assist in fighting England's battles.

MR. MACKENZIE said that this referred to something that was alleged to have taken place when there was a prospect of war in Europe, in which Britain was thought likely to be involved. The Government was then constrained, by public appearances, to take measures to prepare the coast defences for any emergency, and, no doubt, confidential communications passed between the Canadian and Imperial Governments; but up to the time the late Ministers left office, there was no such commission entrusted to Col. Gzowski, or anybody else.

MR. BOWELL said that he might supplement the remarks of the hon. member for Lambton with the statement that, since he had left office, there had been no such correspondence between the Imperial and Canadian Governments on that subject. He would inform the member for Richmond and Wolfe that the Government had nothing whatever to do with the militia force, when called out to assist in putting down a riot, further than to see that the requisition made by magistrates was carried out. The expenses attending the calling out of the volunteer force, including transport, rations and pay had to be met by the municipality requiring their services. It was not his intention to discuss whether the volunteers should be called a constabulary, or to be considered as acting as policemen. All he would say in reply to the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was that, if he had looked at the Militia Law, he would have found that he (Mr. Bowell) was right when he indicated his dissent from the hon. gentleman's remarks. He was not disposed to discuss the constitutional point or any theoretical question in connection with this subject, but would say that the Canadian law, which provided for the turning out of the volunteers, enacted that they should be liable at all times to be summoned in aid of the civil power, in any case of riot, disturbance of the peace, or on any other emergency; also that they should then act only as a military body, obeying the orders of their commanding officers only. They were then under the Queen's regulations and martial law, like soldiers in her Majesty's Army. It was true that, in the suppression of riots, the officer took his instructions from the mayor or magistrate officiating, and, so far, he was under civil authority. In reference to their pay, in the case referred to, they knew that the volunteers were not properly treated by the municipality into which they had been called to prevent what was then thought probable, a riot. It was the duty of Montreal to have provided not only for the transport and rations, but the pay of the men. Failing to do so, a suit was instituted. In the meantime, the late Government advanced a sufficient sum to pay for the rations. Whether they would enforce their claim, for which a demand had been made, was not yet decided. His hon. friends would observe by the notice papers that it was the intention of the Minister of Militia to so amend the law as to enable the Government, under similar circumstances, to pay the men and officers of the force, and also their transport and rations, and then hold the municipality served responsible for the expenditure. That Bill, he thought every member of the House, and of the force, would support, its object being to prevent the force from being kept out of its pay and provisions, and exposed to suffering, as it was when called out last summer. In reference to the aid to be given to some of the battalions on the 24th May next, the concession was made after a very great deal of pressure on the part of some of the men, and after they had agreed to pay a large portion of their own expenses. For instance, the Queen's Own of Toronto—than which a better battalion was not in the service of the Dominion—had offered to pay for their own rations, and to contribute $2 per head to make up the expense of their trip to Montreal, and the Government had agreed to appropriate $2 a head, in addition, to assist in covering those expenses. As to the propriety of sending many battalions down to Montreal on that occasion there might be room for discussion. But it was well known that there was a very great desire, on the part of those who had lately arrived among us, to see what the Canadian volunteer force really was. He had no doubt that, after they had witnessed the review in Montreal, on the 24th May, they would go away satisfied that Canada had, at least, produced as fine volunteer corps—men as able, ready and willing, to do their duty in case of necessity, as any country in the world. He thought that his hon. friends who had referred to this matter would concede that, for the small expenditure that would be incurred on this occasion, the country would be amply remunerated by the éclat the force would gain in other sections of the Empire. His hon. friend from Middlesex had called attention to the great expense attending the departmental staff at headquarters. He (Mr. Bowell) supposed that the labour of that staff would be just as great, or nearly so, whether there was company drill at headquarters or not, or any drilling at all.

MR. MACKENZIE.

But he thought the hon. gentleman played upon another string, and sang another tune upon this subject last Session. If he would consult the Estimates he would find that the item for drill had been increased by $20,000 over last year. If he understood correctly the member for West Hastings (Mr. Brown), he had complained that a sufficient sum was not appropriated for the drill of rural battalions and companies. While fully in accord with his hon. and gallant friend, who commanded the 49th battalion, he might reply that a step had been taken this year, to be followed, he trusted, in future, in the direction of an improvement in this respect, by adding $20,000 for that purpose, most of which had been saved from staff expenditure, of which they had complained for years. In reference to the Wimbledon team, the selection was made not by the Government, but by the Dominion Rifle Association, and, if the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) had any suggestion to make for the better selection of the marksmen, he was quite satisfied the President of the Dominion Rifle Association would only be too glad to receive it, and probably act upon it. There would be very little difficulty in carrying out his suggestion if the House was prepared to double the appropriation in aid of that association. But, if he (Mr. Bowell) recollected aright, it had been a disputed point, on every occasion when the militia estimates were before the House, as to the propriety of making any appropriation to send that team to England. The hon. gentleman had said that a sufficient sum might be set apart to enable the selected men to go to England some time before the competition for practice. He (Mr. Bowell) had no doubt that such practice would aid them materially; but he questioned whether the House would be prepared to double the estimate for that purpose, and thought that the reduction of $2,000 this year was a step in the right direction.

MR. THOMPSON (Haldimand) said that, on the occasion of the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunter), for the publication of the names of those who had offered their services to England, when trouble in the East was anticipated, he had said that the 37th Battalion, to which he belonged, was among the number, but in a return brought down it had not been mentioned. After a good deal of hunting and correspondence with the Adjutant-General, he had received an acknowledgment from that gentleman, which had been previously sent to the Colonel commanding, who forwarded it to him, which he would read to the House, in order to place himself right before it, and prove that his battalion had offered their services on the occasion:

"BRIGADE OFFICE,
"HAMILTON, 12th July, 1877.

"SIR,—I have the honour of enclosing an official letter from the Adjutant-General, in answer to your official address to the Major-General commanding, on the efficiency of the 37th Battalion, and beg to offer my congratulations.

"OTTAWA, 5th July, 1877.
"SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 28th ult., enclosing marching out state of the 37th Battalion after their annual drill, and letter from the commanding officer, addressed to the Major-General commanding, who directs me to inform you that he has been much pleased with the report of the efficient state of the 37th Battalion during their training under Lieutenant-Colonel Davis, and regrets being unable to see that fine body of men, and that the loyal volunteers of the battalion shall not be lost sight of, should occasion arise to use their services in the ranks of the Rifle Brigade or of any other corps of her Majesty's Army. A note has been made accordingly.

MR. BOULTBEE said that the member for South Oxford (Mr. Skinner) appeared to have fallen into the trap set for him and others by a paper in Detroit of no reputation. Such charges were frequently made in such American papers. Of course, their object was attained by the notice of the matter in the House of Commons. He thought such notice was unfortunate—that the charges were unworthy of it. It would be better not to notice them hereafter. The people of Canada were instinct with loyalty, intelligent, energetic and brave; and, having seen the militia in England, France and the United States and other countries, he might say as a Canadian militia man himself, that our force was second to none of them. There was no doubt that, in the event of any difficulty to the old Motherland, if necessary, the last man in the force competent to bear arms would be willing to serve in her defence.

Mr. BROWN said the whole of the names of the persons had not been given in the return that had been asked for. There was another matter he desired to mention, and that was in regard to the ammunition. He thought it would be a great benefit to the volunteer force if the Department would reduce the price of ammunition. He was aware that the Government had reduced the wholesale price, but if they could sell it to the Rifle Association for Regimental Clubs, it would be a great inducement to them to practice. He desired to know where the money realised by the sale of ammunition went, whether to the Receiver-General or to the credit of the Militia Department?

Mr. BOWELL said that money was placed to the credit of the Receiver-General, and went into the general fund.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex) said he desired to call the attention of the Minister of Customs to the great disproportion between the amount expended on the men and the amount expended on the staff. He saw, from the report of the Minister of Militia, that, in the Province of Manitoba, 200 men were drilled, and received the usual sum of 50c. a day, which amounted to $1,200, whilst the maintenance of the staff amounted to $29,000.

Mr. THOMPSON (Haldimand) said that, last year, the Minister of Militia announced that he intended to have two armoury sergeants to examine, and put into proper order the arms of the militia. He desired to know whether those armourers were in the country?

Mr. BOWELL said these two men were in the country. One was stationed at Toronto, and the other at Kingston. They had been in the country six or eight months, and received $1.50 a day. In answer to the hon. member for Middlesex, he would say the amounts were disproportionate, but he hoped in the future they would be enabled to make changes which would remedy this defect.

Mr. CASEY asked what was the drill programme for the coming year? He saw that there was an increase in this vote, which he thought was a step in the right direction.

Mr. BOWELL said the programme was that 21,000 of the volunteer force would be drilled this year, and they would be selected by ballot. The extra amount was for the purpose of assisting rural companies to get to battalion headquarters.

Mr. CASEY enquired if all the drills were to be at battalion headquarters.

Mr. BOWELL: Not necessarily.

Mr. CASEY said he would strongly urge upon the Government the drilling of the volunteers at headquarters as far as possible.

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked what was the cause of the increase proposed.

MR. BOWELL said it was for the purpose of providing for military instruction in collegiate institutions throughout the Dominion. Inspectors would be taken from the batteries, four for Ontario and three for Quebec, and two for the Maritime Provinces, and would visit the different colleges throughout the Dominion. They would devote their whole time, except during the holidays, to the instruction of the pupils. During the holidays the instructors would return to their batteries, when they will be prepared to give instruction to militia volunteer officers desirous of obtaining a second-class certificate.

PRIVATE BILL.

THIRD READING.

The following Bill was considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 30) To amend the Acts incorporating the Côteau and Province Line Railway and Bridge Company, and the Montreal and City of Ottawa Junction Railway Company, and amending Acts, and to amalgamate the said Companies.—(Mr. McLennan.)

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

RAILWAYS.

77 Intercolonial, to deep water at St. John.....$100,000 00

MR. TUPPER said this was for the purpose of completing the work that was under contract, and was the final vote expected to be required. The whole expenditure on the work, including this $100,000, was $337,796. The work had cost more than was estimated. This covered the dredging as well as other work.

Vote agreed to.

78 Intercolonial, Nut Locks..... $40,000

MR. TUPPER said the attention of the Government had been called to an invention to prevent nuts from unscrewing. The liability of nuts to become loose was not only a source of great danger, but involved a heavy expense in watching the road in relation to that. A patent nut-lock was recommended to the Government, and referred by the Department to the Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Chief Engineer of the Intercolonial Railway, and, after careful examination and report by these officers, and evidence from Mr. Light, Chief Engineer of Quebec Provincial Railways, who had applied the patent, the Government concluded the adoption of this patent would save a large amount of money in the maintenance of the road. A contract was entered into to expend $55 per mile, on the application of this patent, to 651 miles of railway, the total cost amounting to $35,805. Mr. Senecal was the contractor. He claimed to be in possession of the patent, and no money would be paid him unless he was in a position to fulfil the contract.

MR. MACKENZIE: How many nut-locks to the mile, and the cost of each nut-lock?

MR. TUPPER said that, before the item came up for concurrence, he would bring down the reports of the engineers upon which the contract was made.

MR. MACKENZIE: Was this submitted to the Mechanical Engineer?

MR. TUPPER said it was submitted to the Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Chief Engineer of the Intercolonial Railway, and it was supported by the authority of Mr. Light, who, after applying it to several miles of the Quebec Government Railway, and thoroughly tested it, said that it fulfilled all that was claimed for it.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was always the practice, in his time, to send every mechanical appliance to the shops at Moncton, to be tested by Mr. Whitney himself. Whilst a civil engineer might be an exalted civil engineer, he generally knew very little about applied mechanics. He recollected that something of this kind—though he could not say positively that it was the same thing—was submitted to him (Mr. Mackenzie), and it had been rejected as worthless. He believed he was correct in saying there was a general impression that the lock was not worth more than one-quarter, one-fifth, or even one-tenth part of what was paid for it. He had no objection to deferring further remarks until full information was obtained, on the understanding that there must be the same latitude for discussion on concurrence as was allowed now. He objected to this being placed to capital account. It was clearly the same as a renewal of stock, and should be so considered.

MR. TUPPER said the opinion which he entertained, and it was fortified by the judgment of the Chief Engineer of the road, was that it was a repair in no sense of the word, and that he was fairly justified in charging it to the capital account of the road. The calculations entered into by the engineers to whom he had referred, were not based upon the value placed upon the patent by the inventor, who asked a very much higher sum than was allowed; but the amount which the Government engaged to pay was based upon the estimated value of the Chief Engineer, and upon his calculation it was found that the use of this lock would save a very large sum of money annually. He might say, in relation to not having submitted it to the Intercolonial Engineer, he thought better evidence was furnished than could be furnished by any engineer, in the fact that this patent had been in use on the Quebec Government Railway, and that the Chief Engineer of that road, Mr. Light, after testing it for a considerable time, stated that it proved to be all that was claimed for it. Under these circumstances, he believed he was justified in having it applied to the road. He would bring down the papers, to which he had referred, and would be able to give the fullest information on concurrence, when there would be the same latitude for discussion as in Committee.

MR. ANGLIN suggested that the article itself might be brought down.

MR. TUPPER said he had a section of the rail, with the patent applied, which he would bring down, so that every hon. gentleman would have an opportunity of seeing for himself the exact character of the invention.

MR. BURPEE (St. John) said he desired to know if the hon. gentleman had taken into consideration that there was a great necessity for a passenger station at St. John. The present station was entirely unfit for traffic or for the accommodation of the public.

MR. TUPPER said he was surprised to hear that observation from the hon. gentleman, after occupying the position he did for the last five years. Knowing how zealously the hon. gentleman had, while in office, guarded the interest of St. John, and how thoroughly alive he was to everything connected with the welfare of that city, he hardly expected that there was anything in relation to that city that would have been left unattended to by the hon. gentleman. But that would come under the question of management, because it was charged to revenue, and the matter could be discussed when that was reached.

Pacific.

79 Canada Central Extension
(subsidised)..... $1,000,000 00

MR. TUPPER said it had been usual to take the discussion upon the very important question of the Canadian Pacific Railway when passing these items in the resolutions. As the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) knew, he (Mr. Tupper) had always endeavoured to defer raising any discussion until that period, so as to save time by limiting the discussion to one question, which was found to be very much more convenient to the House. He proposed to have these items passed without taking up the general subject, because he intended, in a few days, to submit to the House the whole question of the policy of the Government in relation to the Canadian Pacific Railway, by resolution, when the whole matter could be fully discussed. If that proposition met with concurrence, the House could pass these items now without discussion.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had no objection at all to do that, although the hon. gentleman had objected to him (Mr. Mackenzie) doing that on more than one occasion. It was a matter of indifference to him when the discussion came up, provided it was not in the last two or three days of the Session. He would like the hon. gentleman to explain what he meant by submitting the policy by resolution. Was it intended to have a new Bill?

MR. TUPPER said he did not know that a new Bill would be required, but he required to take authority from the House in regard to two or three sections in connection with the Pacific Railway, in the form which had been taken by the leader of the Opposition.

MR. MACKENZIE: Regarding contracts?

MR. TUPPER said yes. There was no intention to submit to the House any material modification of the Railway Act as introduced by the hon. the leader of the Opposition.

MR. ANGLIN said the hon. the Minister of Public Works appeared to have forgotten that to-morrow would be the 1st May, on which day one of the Provinces of the Dominion contemplated secession in case the expectations which it regarded as just were not fulfilled. He thought it was understood that a statement would be made to-day, that would probably allay the apprehensions of that Province, and induce them to wait a little longer. To-morrow that Province determined to leave the Dominion, and yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) had not said a word.

MR. TUPPER said he was quite sure the hon. member for Gloucester would agree with him that the Government could not give a much better earnest of their determination to vigorously press the prosecution of the Pacific Railway, then by voting nearly six millions of dollars for that purpose, and, when they did take up the discussion, their friends in British Columbia would find that they had no just reason to complain of the desire of the House, on all sides, to do full justice to that Province.

MR. MACKENZIE said, as to that Province, it never had any reason to complain, and yet it went on complaining all the same. He grieved most that the hon. gentleman would to-morrow lose his colleague, the right hon. member for Victoria (Sir John A. Macdonald). He observed that hon. gentleman was absent to-day, and presumed he was packing up preparatory to removing to-morrow. He (Mr. Mackenzie) sent his sympathy across to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) and his colleagues now in distress, and could only hope the Dominion would survive the shock to be received to-morrow upon that extraordinary movement. He proposed, if the hon. gentleman's colleague should again have the pleasure of gracing the House with his presence, to give some reasons why he thought some other steps should be taken than what were proposed.

MR. DECOSMOS said he was surprised at the leader of the Opposition daring to rise in his seat and say the people of British Columbia had no just reasons for the rejection of the policy of the Canadian Government, when led by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie). He was utterly astonished that a gentleman, occupying the political position he did, who had sent ambassadors to British Columbia to offer to build the railway from Victoria to Nanaimo, and to expend at least $1,500,000 per annum in the building of a line on the mainland, should dare to tell this House that the people of British Columbia had no just ground of complaint, when those promises were not fulfilled. How could the hon. gentleman justify his want of honour in that respect, and make the assertion he had just made? To use the hon. gentleman's own words, he was amazed at the audacity of the hon. gentleman.

MR. MACKENZIE said, if the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) thought, by using this offensive language, to frighten him (Mr. Mackenzie) or the House, he was greatly mistaken.

MR. TUPPER said the House was taken a little aside from the question before the House. He did not take the remarks of the hon. the leader of the Opposition in so serious a manner as the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos). He might say there was no desire on the part of the House to excite any uneasiness in the ranks of the hon. gentlemen from the Province of British Columbia, and there would be found no ground for uneasiness to anybody, as his hon. friend behind him (Mr. DeCosmos) would find when the resolutions were brought down.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman behind the hon. the Minister of Public Works would allow hon. gentlemen now on the Treasury benches to do anything they pleased, and express perfect satisfaction with the result.

MR. TUPPER said he had forgotten, in consequence of the hon. member for Victoria forestalling him, to refer to the jocular remarks of the hon. the leader of the Opposition in reference to his right hon. friend (Sir John A. Macdonald). He regretted very much that, owing to temporary indisposition, the right hon. gentleman was not in his seat. But the Government had this to console themselves with, that if any untoward event, at any time, deprived that gentleman of his seat as representative of Victoria, there would be found any number of constituencies in the Dominion delighted to place their representation at his service.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is consoling.

MR. BUNSTER: Mr. Chairman—

Some HON. GENTLEMEN: Hear, hear.

MR. BUNSTER said he congratulated the hon. members of this House, and this country, for giving him such a hearty cheer on rising. The hon. the leader of the Opposition had treated with jocularly the complaint of the Province of British Columbia, and had characterised the remarks of the hon. the member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos), in regard to his (Mr. Mackenzie's) jocularly, as offensive. The remarks of his hon. friend were not offensive, and they had been well called for. The Province of British Columbia had been treated most unfairly by the Government of Canada, especially by the Government led by the present leader of the Opposition during the past four or five years. Every contract made with that Province by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), and his colleagues, had been violated, and, when hon. gentlemen who were sent to this House as the agents of that Province, to watch over her interests, complained of the treatment which their part of the Dominion had received, they must be jeered at, and their remarks called offensive. Was that just? Would any hon. gentleman in the House, within whom there was a spark of statesmanship, say that the Pacific Province had been fairly treated by the late Government? It was well-known that Canada was the first British colony that had failed to fulfil promises such as those made to that Province. It was a matter for consideration that, to-morrow, the first of May, was the day in which that Province threatened to secede should the contract made with British Columbia not be carried out, and he would ask hon. gentlemen if it would not be a serious blow to the prosperity of this Dominion if that threat were to be carried out, as it most certainly would, sooner or later, if the just expectations of that Province were not realised.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Oh.

MR. BUNSTER said hon. gentlemen might cry "Oh," but, nevertheless, they owed British Columbia a debt that they now claimed to have partially paid, if not paid in full. Although some might say they came here exacting their pound of flesh, they never had done so; they came patiently, believing that the present Government would have brought down their policy more promptly than they had done.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. BUNSTER: Hon. gentlemen might cry "hear, hear," as much as they pleased, but the people and press had done British Columbia an injustice, such as the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway could not remove, by the language that had been used towards British Columbia. Was it just, was it reasonable, to abuse the only Province that gave this country an outlet to the Pacific, and when this item of the estimate came up, to make objection to the paltry sum of $1,000,000? By not bringing down their policy before this late hour, the Government was imitating their predecessors. They had delayed it until the eleventh hour when the representatives of that Province were preparing to go home, as was jocularly remarked by the leader of the Opposition, who stated that the hon. member for Victoria (Sir John A. Macdonald) was packing up because he was absent from his seat. This Pacific Railway matter had brought more ridicule on this Dominion than it had on British Columbia. He could say, without contradiction, that British Columbia would have been better off to-day if she had never entered the Confederation. Before that time she had her Agent-general in London inducing emigrants to come to her shores, but when she joined the Confederation she withdrew him, thinking that the building of the Pacific Railway would attract all the emigrants she required. Had they done it? No, they had not; they had been foolishly spending their money in works that were not required in the interests of this Dominion, in order to stave off the question until after another election. This election had taken place, and, by it, the people had declared in favour of British Columbia, in favour of the present Government which had declared itself willing to build the Canadian Pacific Railway; but he was sorry to say that, though the present Government had such a power at their back, they had not come forward vigorously with their policy. They had got their warrant from the people to build that railroad, no matter at what expense, because the people of this country knew that Canada had entered into a contract for the building of this road. The people of British Columbia had fulfilled their part of the contract by taxing themselves over $100,000 extra in accepting the National Policy, in order to assist in building the Canadian Pacific Railway, and there could be no excuse for the Government in not building that railway. Now, British Columbia had got something to say about the building of that railway, since the right hon. the Premier represented one of their constituencies. For five years he (Mr. Bunster) had sat in this House, and he had never been able to see anything in the way of bribery or corruption committed by the leader of the Government, and he believed that he (Sir John A. Macdonald) would yet consummate the great achievement of his laborious and eventful life—the construction of the great highway across the continent on British soil. Some hon. gentlemen present treated this great national enterprise in a jocular way. Why? Because they had not got brains or ability enough to treat it in any other way; if they had, that railway would be an accomplished fact to-day. The building of the Union Pacific by our American neighbours showed the feasibility of our own road. Had Sir Hugh Allan's scheme, about which so much hue and cry was raised, gone on, the people of Canada would to-day have been glad to give him double the amount the leader of the Government was going to give him. Instead of giving him $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land, they would have been glad to give him $60,000,000 and 100,000,000 acres of land. But the more this scheme was decried in the British market, and the more its difficulties were magnified, the more the people of British Columbia would have to suffer. But the people of that Province would suffer this no longer, probably, than to-morrow, because to-morrow the contract was up; and, if the people said to-morrow that they had no longer any confidence in the promises of the Canadian Government, and should request their representatives to return home, they would obey that summons and leave this House, regretfully, but firmly determined to stand by their own territory and people. They would go home, bidding adieu to deception and broken pledges, and he would say more—to false pledges. He was in sober earnest, and meant business, and he would say again, if the people of his Province asked him to go, he was ready to go at once, and so cut short all connection with this great Dominion of ours.

An Hon. Member: Go.

Mr. BUNSTER said he had said he would go if his people told him to, and probably that was more than the hon. member would do under similar circumstances. His Province had been mocked and insulted, both by members of this House and by a portion of the press—he did not say the respectable portion of the press, because there were some newspapers too respectable to abuse his Province. He still hoped that the people of British Columbia would, for the present, at all events, wait for the development of the Government's policy, in order that it should not be said hereafter, that the Province was anxious for separation. Let the responsibility for that step, if it should come, rest upon the shoulders of a people and a Government who had deceived and betrayed a loyal, generous-hearted, and confiding people.

80 Georgian Bay Branch (as under contract).....$800,000 00

Mr. DAWSON said he had a great deal to say about this Georgian Bay Branch. He did not intend entering into the controversy of the general question, but he would offer a few suggestions in regard to it, which might, possibly, be of some value.

Mr. BUNSTER.

Mr. TUPPER said he supposed his hon. friend was not in the House when he (Mr. Tupper) stated to the Committee that, for the purpose of saving time, he proposed to ask them to pass these items through Committee, and, before concurrence, he expected to submit the whole policy of the Government in relation to the Canadian Pacific Railway, when discussion would be in order. He hoped, therefore, his hon. friend would fall in with the suggestion, as he would have an opportunity, within a very few days, of discussing the whole question.

Mr. DAWSON said he had no intention of entering into a long discussion, but, under the assurance just given him by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, he would withhold his remarks for the present.

Mr. BUNSTER asked if it was the intention of the Government to have this money really expended, or was it merely put in the Estimates as it had been for the last four or five years, and brought up again each year.

Mr. TUPPER said that it was the intention of the Government to expend the money for the purpose for which it was voted, and the expenditure would commence as early as possible.

Mr. BUNSTER said he was glad of that assurance, but was really sorry that they had not put the amount of the Carnarvon award of $2,000,000 in the Estimates, instead of $600,000.

91 Lachine $1,500,000 00

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Does that close the expenditure, or nearly so?

MR. TUPPER said it nearly closed the expenditure for the present. It was not expected it would be necessary to draw off the water another year, the work being so nearly completed.

In reply to Mr. MACKENZIE,

MR. TUPPER said this outlay was not expected to deepen the canal to the extent ultimately contemplated, which would involve additional expenditure not necessary at present. This item was expected to complete the works in progress, with the exception of from $29,000 to $30,000.

93. St. Lawrence.....$ 80,000 00

94. Welland..... 2,000,000 00

Mr. McCUAIG said that there was a difference of opinion at present as to the superior mode of carrying produce, many favouring railroads as against canals. If grain could be carried cheaper by rail, the policy of expending such large sums on the canals was very doubtful. The Government, he thought, should fully and carefully consider whether, with all these improvements, under the present trade policy of Great Britain, we should secure benefits corresponding to the enormous canal expenditure, and whether we could carry grain from Chicago and other western ports to tide-water at cheaper rates by water than by rail, and successfully compete with the great rival route to Europe via New York, particularly in the fall of the year, when the movement of grain from the west for the European markets was the largest in volume, and insurance largely increased. He contended that the Welland Canal had not been taxed to its full capacity, even before the enlargement, for which the present appropriation of two millions of dollars was wanted for its completion. In the United States freights from the west to New York had been lower by rail than by water, and the most distinguished American statesmen, in connection with the leading commercial men of that country, had now under consideration the advisability of converting the Erie Canal into a freight railway, or the construction of a railway for the sole purpose of carrying freight, at slow speed, along its banks. He deprecated the expenditure, at the present moment, with a depleted Treasury, of any additional undertakings, with the view of deepening the channel of the River St. Lawrence to fourteen feet, which, he contended, could not be accomplished. For all practical purposes, in the present state of the transport trade of this country via the River St. Lawrence and Montreal route to the ocean, he thought the capacity of the whole line of the St. Lawrence Canals was sufficient to meet the growing wants of the trade for some years to come. Time and experience had demonstrated that our expectations in connection with the enlargement of our canals, in the hope of securing the trade from the great West, had not been realised, and if Great Britain continued her present policy towards her colonial possessions on this continent, it was doubtful if we would succeed in the expensive race of competition with our neighbours on the south of us, for the coveted profitable transport trade with Europe, for which our canal system was first undertaken. He would ask whether the Government tug line, established many years ago, between Kingston and Montreal, in connection with our canal system, and which had realised the expectations of its advocates, was to be continued? He contended the policy of our Government, in the establishment of this tug line, was wise and patriotic. It gave security to shippers of grain from the West to the European markets, of prompt transport and despatch, which could not be so successfully obtained in any other manner. His lengthy experience in the transport trade of the country, extending over a period of thirty years, enabled him to speak authoritatively on this subject. The contractors with the Government, for the proper discharge of this service, Messrs. Calvin & Buck, eminent business men, and of large and extensive practical experience, and of established responsibility to meet their engagements, gave the desired confidence to Western shippers that the conditions of the contract for the tug service would be faithfully and efficiently performed, and that vessels reaching Kingston with cargoes could proceed by the aid of the tug line, at a low rate for tonnage, which was fixed by the Government, in their contract with Messrs. Calvin & Buck, by the payment of a reasonable subsidy, in 48 hours to Montreal, instead of running the risk of delay at Kingston for want of barge capacity in which to tranship at that port. The struggle with our American neighbours for supremacy in securing, for our own St. Lawrence route, the transport trade of the West to the ocean, would require all our energies, and would call into requisition all our resources and enterprise. The Government, which commanded every confidence and respect, would be found equal, he had no doubt, to the emergency, and a policy would, he hoped, be carefully considered by its members, and adopted with promptitude and energy, in connection with the Mother Country, which would secure to us the splendid prize now within our grasp.

Mr. TUPPER said that the questions raised by the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig) were of great importance. He (Mr. Tupper) was much inclined to the opinion that the ideas he had thrown out, as to recent experience having shown that railway communication for large amounts of freights was rather gaining on the canals, was correct. The advantages in favour of water seemed to have diminished. But the question of public policy was hardly before them now. The whole of the item before them was for the completion of existing contracts. In reply to the hon. member for Lambton, he might state that this item was expected to complete all the works on the Welland Canal but what would be represented by $700,000.

In reply to Mr. Ross (Dundas),

Mr. TUPPER said he did not think it was intended to make any alteration with regard to the tug line between Kingston and Montreal this year; nor to expend anything on the Williamsburgh Canal this year.

Mr. MACDOUGALL said that the member for Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig) had brought under the notice of the House a very important question, with regard to the expenditure on those great public works, the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals. Though this proposed expenditure was in accordance with a policy sanctioned by Parliament, and in order to complete public works in progress, it was just as well, when they were voting those millions for this purpose, that they should consider whether the Government might not very properly take means to prosecute a scientific and practical enquiry in regard to the expediency of proceeding any further than they were obliged, under existing contracts, in the completion of the great through line of water communication. Could the Minister of Public Works give the Committee an estimate of the millions that would be required to complete the improvement of the navigation to Montreal, and secure a depth of 14 feet? He (Mr. Macdougall) thought it would require a great many, as there were considerable stretches in the St. Lawrence that would require to be in some way deepened, or otherwise vessels would have to break bulk or lighten, thus failing to carry to Montreal those freights which were the object of this expenditure. If they had to break bulk, the steel rails would beat them in the competition. He would repeat what he had said many times—that he thought it was a great misfortune, and a great blunder, on the part of Parliament, to have appropriated enormous sums for the vain purpose of obtaining cheaper means of transport, by way of the St. Lawrence, in competition with their railway system, especially since the introduction of steel rails. He quite admitted, that when they had carried the produce of the North-West to Thunder Bay, they would find it expedient to put it on vessels for transportation a considerable distance by water; and, no doubt, it would be expedient to provide for vessels of a large class, in order to carry it cheaply. It would be convenient, for our own purpose, to be able to send the produce of the great North-West on its way to the markets of the world as far as possible by water. He was afraid it would be a good many years before they would realise their expectations of railway communication between the railway system of Ontario and the railway system of the North-West; therefore, for a long time, they would have to depend upon the water communication, and he confessed, if they were not mistaken in regard to the productions of that country, that the expenditure on the Welland Canal would not be altogether lost. At the same time, while they could not alter the past and recall the millions they had sunk in the bottom of the Welland Canal, they might ascertain the expediency of attempting to secure a 14ft. water communication between Lake Ontario and Montreal. A great many millions would be required to effect it, and he did not, for one, consider that he was justified in voting to involve the country in the enormous expenditure required to realise the whole of this scheme. What had they accomplished by the deepening of the Welland Canal? They had provided a better highway to the ocean for the producers of the United States. They had provided a means, by which the farmers of the Western States could send their productions at a cheaper cost to the market of the world, and undersell the Canadians. The Welland Canal was quite deep enough, before its enlargement, to convey all the Canadian produce seeking that outlet to Europe. While admitting, therefore, that they might derive some advantage from this expenditure, by carrying our own produce from Manitoba and from the great Provinces that would grow up beyond it, he trusted the Government would take steps to examine the whole question in the light of past experience, and in view of the improvements which were likely to be made in transportation by land, and that they would stay their hand, as much as possible, in the meantime. They required the money they were raising for the development of our great empire in the West, and for the realisation of the expectations of British Columbia. The people of that Province might be a little impatient, but when they looked at the deficits in the revenue, and how much more the little that had been accomplished had cost than was expected, he thought their friends on the Pacific would acknowledge that they were asking Canada to assume burdens that the people could not bear, and that necessity would compel the Government to go a little slower than their friends had expected them to go in that direction. He was quite willing that they should stay their hands with respect to those large expenditures on canals, in order that they might be better able to open up communication with the North-West, and thereby reach British Columbia, and realise, at an earlier period, the expectations of their friends in that part of the Dominion.

MR. McCALLUM said he was surprised at the remarks of the last speaker, because it was well known that he took a very active part, and he deserved great credit for it, in the union of the Provinces of the Dominion. One of the terms of Confederation was that the canals of the country should be enlarged, and it was too late for the hon. gentleman now to say that he had always been opposed to that policy. He (Mr. McCallum) had had some experience in regard to this question, and he believed the expenditure on canals would be a great benefit to the country. The only public work they had to-day in the country that paid any money to the country, over and above repairs and expenses, was the Welland Canal. One reason why the trade had gone to the Erie Canal was that larger vessels were used in the Western trade than could be accommodated by the Welland Canal. If they deepened the Welland Canal to the extent of 14 feet, and, according to the Minister of Public Works, only $700,000 additional would be required to accomplish that, it would prove an incentive to the building of large vessels, to engage in the trade during the summer months. If they had 14 feet in the Welland Canal a large proportion of the trade that now went by the Erie Canal would be diverted to the St. Lawrence. The deepening of the Welland Canal, he was satisfied, would turn out to be a successful financial undertaking, and it would be a great benefit to the country, irrespective of that, because if they were going to carry the trade from the great North-West they must have large vessels. In this respect the Americans had the advantage of us. The Americans, as he predicted they would last year, had lowered the tolls, and that had taken trade from the Welland Canal. He would like to ask the Minister of Public Works when this work would be completed?

MR. TUPPER said it was expected to open the Welland Canal in 1881 for general use. He agreed with his hon. friend (Mr. McCallum) in regard to the responsibility of the hon. member for Halton in reference to the canal policy. He (Mr. Tupper) thought it was quite possible that, if Parliament were now considering the subject for the first time, they might be disposed to view it from a somewhat different standpoint from that which they did a few years ago. But, if he understood aright, the country was committed to this question, which was the policy of the Government when the hon. member for Halton was Minister of Public Works. If that were so, he thought his hon. friend would scarcely be in a position to shift all responsibility from off his own shoulders in regard to that important question of public policy. He might say, in regard to the question asked by the hon. the leader of the Opposition, that the completion of the aqueduct was not expected to be effected by 1880.

MR. MACKENZIE: Is it not intended to use the canal until the maximum depth of 14ft. is obtained?

MR. TUPPER said he thought not.

MR. PLUMB said he had always been deeply interested in this work, and he was somewhat surprised at the general attack made by the hon. member for Halton, on the canal policy of the Government. He had been very much disappointed in the progress of the work of enlarging the Welland Canal, without which we could not compete with the Erie Canal for the western trade, which could be carried to Buffalo in a larger class of vessels than could now pass through the Welland Canal. In the State of New York great efforts were made to prevent the western trade from being diverted from the Erie Canal. Although his hon. friend might state that the railways had taken the place of canals for the traffic which must be carried eastward to the sea board, it would be found that the tonnage of the Erie Canal was much larger than that of all the railways in the State of New York competing with it during the season in which the canal was opened. He had before him an able and exhaustive argument which was addressed to the representatives of the State of New York in the Legislature, in respect to lowering the tolls on the Erie Canal, and if it were necessary to keep the trade, the whole toll would be taken off. It was now so far reduced that the amount the canal paid to the revenues of the State was merely nominal. The State debt, which had been incurred for the building of the canal, had been nearly, if not altogether, paid off. The following was the argument to which he had referred. It was on the speech of an influential member of the New York State Senate, delivered before that body in the Session of 1878:

"The question for the Senate is not one of the amount of canal revenues—it is the question whether the Erie Canal shall earn any revenue at all, and whether the five or six thousand canal boats, and the thirty thousand or more canal boatmen, and the sixty thousand or more people dependent upon them, shall be thrown out of employment, and $1,500,000 of capital invested in canal boats remain not only unproductive, but depreciating in value. I do not assert that the proposed reduction will increase the tonnage on the Erie canal; but it will give the partners of the State in its transportation business an opportunity to struggle through an unpropitious year, and possibly to earn an honest livelihood, and aid in retaining a portion of the income, which, without it, would be lost to the State.

"The pending question is one entirely outside of, and above, political considerations.

It is purely a business question which involves not only the future of the canals, but the future of our internal and foreign commerce. New York city is falling behind in her percentage of the increase of business, growing out of the rapid development and increased product of the agricultural regions of the West. New York cannot afford to retrograde—she cannot afford to stand still. She must keep step to the music of the age, and advance to the front in her commercial policy. The producers of the great growing West demand, and are seeking, cheaper transportation, and New York must furnish it, or strip her motto from her coat of arms! And more than this, lose the millions upon millions that she has expended in constructing this great artificial waterway,—upon which should float the commerce of a continent—and which is to be driven from it, if lost, by individual enterprise and foreign competition, aided by a short-sighted policy adopted under circumstances which have no application to the present, and which, if persisted in, will drive the commerce from our State.”

That canal was the chief competitor the Welland Canal had to fear. And he was very sorry that the policy of the late Government had so long retarded enlargement. One of the principal sections of the canal was nearly completed, but the water had not been let into it. Another very important section, which cost several million dollars, had been completed for some time. He knew, from what had been stated in this House and elsewhere, that the central part of the work, which was essential to the utilisation of the whole, had only very lately been put under contract, and it would be at least three years before that part of the canal could be utilised for vessels of the size which could navigate the east end of it now. That part of the canal which lay the nearest to his place of residence, was being materially injured by not having the water let into it. The frost and the floods, cutting out the banks and undermining the masonry, were greatly damaging the work. That might not be the fault of the late Minister of Public Works, but every year during the last five years, when the Welland Canal question came up, the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) had stated the necessities of the case in the language of a practical man, of a man who understood the subject, and who had as deep an interest in it as any man in the country. He remembered perfectly well that another gentleman who ought to have an equally large interest, used to express himself as perfectly satisfied with the arrangement of the canal. The late First Minister stated last year that the work would be completed in about a year and a half. Now, the hon. the Minister of Public Works had stated it would be two years, at least, before that work would be completed in such a way as to afford transit to vessels of the twelve feet draft of water. He trusted that, under the efficient management of his hon. friend, the work would be pushed forward as speedily as possible.

MR. TUPPER said that, in referring to the additional amount of six millions that would be required to give the depth of 14ft., he referred to the canals for which they were taking estimates to-night. They would have to add, in addition to that, about $3,000,000 for the Williamsburgh Canal, in order to give the 14ft. of water navigation from Kingston to Montreal, and an equal amount for the Beauharnois canal, making $12,000,000 in all.

MR. MACKENZIE said, to his recollection, the deepening to 12ft. would require 1½ million; it would require a much larger amount to deepen it to 14ft. He had long ceased to expect any fair play or candour from the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb). He had never said the canal would be finished in 1½ years. He said all but the aqueduct could be finished in that time, and he believed so still. He did not even intend to deepen the canal to 14ft., but intended opening it with 12ft. before the other aqueduct was built. That was the statement, but it was impossible for that hon. gentleman to say one word without falsifying some person's testimony. No one said one word to bring up this offensive speech to-night, but it seemed a monomania with the hon. gentleman to attack every person opposed to him, whether there was cause for it or not.

MR. MCCALLUM said, if the hon. gentleman would consult the Hansard, he would see that, in reply to the question of the hon. member for Frontenac, he said that the canal would be finished in a certain time. He (Mr. McCallum) had then got up and said that the First Minister should be very cautious in announcing the time a certain public work would be finished; that in this the shipping interest was watching the work closely, and shipbuilders would change the whole character of their ships, depending on the word of the Minister that the work would be completed at a certain time. He was not finding fault with the hon. gentleman. It was a matter of impossibility to tell when the canal would be finished, but referred to the matter merely to prove that the hon. member for Niagara was right in his statement.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the contract for the aqueduct was newly let, and these contractors had until 1881 to finish the aqueduct. He could not possibly have meant that the aqueduct and everything would be finished, but that in one and a-half years the canal could be used for the passage of vessels by means of the old aqueduct. That was the scheme of the late Government, and to which he must have referred in the answer he gave.

MR. McCALLUM: At the time the hon. gentleman announced the Welland canal would be ready for twelve feet of water, I said he was only thinking of that portion from Marlatt's Pond to Dalhousie.

MR. PLUMB said, with reference to the remarks of the hon. the leader of the Opposition, he was accustomed to see that hon. gentleman lose his temper and was not in the slightest affected by it. He paid no regard to what the hon. gentleman said, because the hon. gentleman was in the habit of making statements on the floor of the House which, on being called to account for them, he denied having made. He (Mr. Plumb) had always addressed this House in a courteous and parliamentary manner, and could afford to pass without further comment the remarks which the spleen of the hon. the leader of the Opposition had induced him to make.

MR. ROSS (Dundas) said he felt called upon to place before the House what he believed was the common-sense way of proceeding with these improvements. The hon. the Minister of Public Works had stated that the estimated cost of enlarging the Williamsburg, Cornwall and Beauharnois Canals was $6,000,000. His hon. friend (Mr. Tupper) was greatly mistaken if he expected that $6,000,000, or $10,000,000, or $15,000,000 would give him fourteen and one-half feet of water from Kingston to Montreal.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman was mistaken. He (Mr. Tupper) had stated it would take $6,000,000 to complete the works for fourteen feet draft of water in the Lachine and Cornwall Canals and Gallops Rapids. He had also stated that it would take $3,000,000 additional for the Williamsburg Canals.

MR. ROSS (Dundas) said that they had heard in the House, some time ago, a gentleman who stood as high, professionally, as any gentleman in this country, and it was his opinion, expressed in this House, that a fourteen foot channel from Kingston to Lachine was impracticable in this way. He had some experience of the St. Lawrence, as he had lived on its beautiful banks all his life. He knew the depth and the various peculiarities of the water, and had a knowledge of the public works there. At the point where he lived, the depth of water changed frequently during the fall as much as six feet in twenty-four hours. He agreed with his friend, Mr. Shanley, the gentleman to whom he had first referred, that a ten foot channel could be obtained in the St. Lawrence at all seasons of the year during navigation, and that he thought was quite sufficient for any purpose for which that river was applicable. He knew also the opinion of those who navigated that river, and an opinion which he had often placed before the House, that a fourteen foot channel was impracticable, taking into account the matter of expense alone, because if vessels drawing fourteen feet of water were to be enabled to run up and down safely, the canals would all have to be made of equal depth, and to do that it would not cost one cent less than $20,000,000. If they looked at the Gallops Rapids, they found that there was a rocky bottom, but at what depth could not be stated, because no person had been down to examine, but there was a rock projection, which, at ordinary times, prevented vessels, drawing even eight feet of water, passing safely, and the expense to remove it would be very great. It was not contemplated that vessels going eastward should enter into the Williamsburg Canal. The policy was, that these vessels should pass down the river. In the channel at the head of the Cornwall Canal, it was found quite impossible to give a sufficient channel for vessels of fourteen feet draft, and, besides that, it was stated that west of Kingston there was no safe harbour for vessels of that description. The opinion he had received from persons of experience in this matter was, that vessels of that size were not requisite. He hoped the gentlemen would consider well their policy in this enlargement scheme. It would be a useless waste of public money to spend so many millions as would be required to make a 14ft. channel east of Kingston. Besides enlarging the canals, the rivers in certain portions between the canals would have to be deepened or enlarged, and what with the cost of that work and the improvements that would be required at the various ports, the whole would cost a sum of money that certainly this country was not prepared to expend for such a purpose. He did not believe the wants of the country demanded a canal of that capacity. A vessel of 10ft. draft of water would carry 40,000 bushels of grain from Chicago—a sufficient quantity for any vessel to carry with safety. A 10ft. canal system would cost only half the expense, because if they went 4ft. below 10, the value would be increased at an enormous rate, besides the cost of clearing away the obstructions that would present themselves under a depth of 10ft. Nineteen out of twenty, having any knowledge at all of the subject, would tell the House that the business of the country could just as efficiently and profitably be performed by a 10ft. canal system as by the larger system proposed. If the Government could save to the country the large amount of money they proposed to expend in this direction by changing their policy in this matter, it would be but right to alter it, whatever they might have committed themselves to. It must be borne in mind that there were great facilities for the carriage of grain by railway. He thought the age demanded that they should review their policy with regard to the canal improvements on the St. Lawrence River. A considerable length of canal was in his county, and it was consequently in his interest to have this money expended there, but public interest forbade such a course, as he was confident that all the wants of the country in respect to the transport of grain by our water system could be amply satisfied at half the expense which the fourteen foot scheme would necessitate to the country's loss.

MR. TUPPER said the question raised by the hon. gentleman was a very important one, and on which there was a great difference of opinion among gentlemen well qualified to form a judgment upon such a subject. But he might state, for the information of the hon. gentlemen, that there was nothing asked for in this estimate that was not required to complete contracts now being carried out, with the exception of $80,000, which was asked for the purpose of testing a system by which it was hoped to deal with the Gallops Rapids in a manner to accomplish a much larger amount of work, by the chaining system, than could be done under the usual mode. They thought it was desirable, as a considerable expense had already been incurred in dealing with this question, to ask for this vote, in order that the system might be fairly tested. If it was successful, the cost of dealing with rock, under water, would be largely cheapened. Before there was any other expenditure of money, the Government would have an opportunity of weighing, maturely, the observations of his hon. friend (Mr. Ross), and considering the question in its various details.

MR. MACKENZIE said he observed, from the calculations made by Mr. Page two years ago, for the Welland Canal, that $9,240,000 would complete a twelve foot water navigation, and to get fourteen feet of water, it would require $12,240,000. By a return brought down to the House, early in the Session, he found that there had been an expenditure, up to the 1st January, 1879, of $8,907,754, and that there was required to complete, the sum of $3,592,246, making in all $12,500,000, or $260,000 more than Mr. Page estimated for the fourteen foot water channel. It was not the intention of the late Government to go beyond 12ft. So that there was about $3,000,000 expended, or to be expended, on the Welland Canal more than the late Government intended to expend, except what would have to be expended on the permanent structures above the Thorold level. He admitted it was a question for argument whether it was desirable to have a 14ft. navigation or not. His opinion was it was desirable to get it; but he did not think they would be justified in carrying out such a scheme at a time when so much money was being expended elsewhere. Mr. Page's estimate for the Lachine Canal, two years ago, was $5,920,347 for 12ft. navigation, but he understood the estimates now before the House were for a depth of 14ft. in the Lachine Canal.

MR. TUPPER: 18ft. below, and 12ft. above.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was very glad of that, because he quite agreed with the hon. member for Dundas, that whatever might be done with the Welland Canal, and however desirable it might be to get to Kingston with 14ft., any attempt to get 14ft. below that should be given up as impracticable. It would cost such an enormous amount of money that it was entirely out of the question. The estimate of Mr. Page, two years ago, was $5,920,347 for 12ft. depth on the Lachine Canal. There was expended on the Lachine Canal, up to the first of last January, $4,010,341; and it would require to complete it, according to the return brought down, $1,904,659, being within $5,000 of the amount estimated by Mr. Page three years ago. This was for 12ft. Then for the Cornwall Canal the estimate was $2,160,000. When the late Government commenced the works on the Cornwall Canal it was done much for the same reason that the Lachine Canal was commenced three years ago—not so much because they believed it an absolute necessity at the moment, for making the large locks 12ft. deep, as for the purpose of furnishing employment to masses of our people, as far as possible, on works which were likely to be executed, at any rate, within a comparatively short time. As to the works that were let out on the Cornwall Canal, they were for the more difficult portion of the work at the lower end. It would not take a large amount of time or money to finish the balance, if it should be found necessary, but it would not be found necessary for some time; he presumed, as the only advantage to be gained by enlarging that canal to the same size would be chiefly for the accommodation of steamers. Large barges could now be taken down the St. Lawrence by tugs and transport grain, not, certainly, quite as cheap as larger barges, in locks similar to the Lachine and Welland, but still at a comparatively small cost. Mr. Page's estimate for the Cornwall Canal was $2,160,000 for 12ft., and that of the Williamsburg Canal at $2,110,000. The deepening of the St. Lawrence in the two places he had mentioned, that is, through Lake St. Louis and above the Gallops Rapids, was estimated to cost $1,520,000. He thought the estimate might be safely depended upon for Lake St. Louis, but it was premature or speculative, to some extent, at all events, in the other place. It was a rough estimate altogether in the upper reach above the Gallops Rapids; it might cost much more, or it might not. Mr. Page was usually very close in his estimates, and they might be taken as nearly correct where he had proper data. Then, supposing a canal to be requisite where the Beauharnois Canal was situated—and it was a question with engineers whether it was possible to navigate the Cascade Rapids by means of a stationary tug, such as that now experimented with at the Gallops Rapids—if that could be done it would save a large amount of expenditure. There was a very general belief with some engineers that the canal was made on the wrong side of the river at the Cascades, and he was not at all certain that the hon. member for Soulanges did not share that opinion. He believed himself that was the right place, but it would cost to make it there now, according to Mr. Page's estimate, $3,360,000, to which he (Mr. Page) thought 10 per cent. might be safely added, making $3,700,000, while the enlargement of the Beauharnois Canal to the same dimensions as the locks in the Cornwall Canal, and the same size as the locks in the Lachine

Canal—that is, 12ft.—would cost about $2,000,000. The deepening of the channel, at the head of the canal, about $450,000, making altogether a little less than $2,500,000. Now, the conclusion at which he had arrived himself, while officiating as Minister, with all the responsibilities of these matters on his mind, was this: that it would be desirable to get 14ft. in the Welland canal as soon as possible, but he did not think that there was such an urgent demand for it as would justify the Government in asking for $3,000,000 additional at the present time; and he had, therefore, adopted the plan of having all the works constructed to suit 14ft., but without raising the walls of the locks on the descent from the top of the hill above Thorold, without raising the locks to the height where they could get 14ft., as that could be done, and the locks enlarged a little without obstructing traffic, or seriously interfering with it, some years afterwards. He could see no immediate necessity for building the works between the Lachine Canal and Kingston. It would be advantageous to have got them larger, so as to make the transportation by the large barges cheaper than it could be transported in vessels carrying what could now be carried by the present locks; but, at the same time, he did not think the difference in transportation would be so serious as to justify us, in a time like the present, in the expenditure of $11,000,000 or $12,000,000 on that part of the river. He believed that the grain, at any rate, would always have to be shifted at Kingston, and transhipped again into the vessels going to sea at Montreal. The idea had long since been given up by practical shipowners and mariners, of attempting to bring ocean vessels to the upper lakes, and taking in cargo at Chicago and other places, and going directly to Liverpool. It could be done, but it was not a profitable business, and we must, therefore, calculate on transferring grain at Kingston from vessels suited for lake navigation to barges suited for river and canal navigation, below that point. For these reasons, he had adopted the course he did. He ventured no strong opinion or criticism upon the decisions of the Government, in getting 14ft. at present on the whole line of the Welland Canal, further than to say that, in his opinion, it was premature, though he had no doubt it would serve a good purpose. The principal object, perhaps, that would be served was this: it would enable parties who were building vessels suitable for the lake trade to build at once a class of vessels that lasted from ten to fifteen years, to build them at once with a draught of 14ft. of water, instead of building them with a draught of 12ft., which would subject them to a certain loss. He presumed there was no doubt but that vessels drawing 14ft. would carry a good many more thousand bushels of wheat, and with the same proportion of sailors, which was another benefit to be derived. It was a benefit, no doubt, but it was one that we were purchasing for them at the expense of three millions of money. He doubted the wisdom of that course at the present time, though it might be the best; he ventured, as he had said, no strong criticism upon it.

MR. TUPPER said he would like immediately to follow the remarks that had just been made, because there was a misapprehension involved in them. The leader of the Opposition was under the impression that his policy was to secure a draught of 12ft., and rest at that, for the Welland Canal. Now, he (Mr. Tupper) thought, if he remembered right, that there was a formal decision of this House that there should be 14ft. draught, and that his hon. predecessor proceeded on that principle. He believed he would be able to convince the hon. gentleman that he was labouring under a misapprehension in the impression he had just expressed, that there had been a change in his policy. There had been no change; the matter had never been brought under his (Mr. Tupper's) notice at all. The contracts had proceeded precisely as they were going on under the Administration of the hon. gentleman; and the expenditure, as he had correctly stated, to obtain the draught of 12ft., was only $9,240,000. Now, the expenditure up to the end of the fiscal year in carrying on the contracts, as they were proceeding under the Administration of the hon. gentleman, would exceed $9,000,000 considerably.

MR. MACKENZIE: To the end of this financial year, the expenditure, according to the return brought down, was $8,907,754.

MR. TUPPER said the expenditure up to the 30th of June next would be $9,079,186; and the hon. gentleman knew perfectly well, from the state the work was in, that it would be utterly impossible to complete the work now going on within the estimate, that is, Mr. Page's present estimate, which was $9,240,000, which was required to give 12ft. of water. He was, therefore, satisfied the hon. gentleman would find that Mr. Page had been proceeding on the principle of obtaining a draught of 14ft. of water.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is quite possible; there may be some mistake.

MR. TUPPER said he was satisfied of that, because the hon. gentleman had correctly stated the amounts, and he would find also that it would be utterly impossible to complete the work for less than $200,000 and open the canal. He merely drew attention to that, because he thought it was undesirable that there should be any erroneous impression as to where the policy resided. He was not complaining of it at all, but his impression was that there was an expression of the House, upon which the hon. gentleman acted, which was, that so far as the Welland Canal was concerned, 14ft. draught of water should be obtained. The hon. gentleman knew that the whole question was taken in consideration with the Sault Ste Marie Canal, and that it was intended that there should be there a draught of 14ft., and that it was considered desirable to have navigation for ships drawing 14ft. of water as far as Kingston.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman was correct in stating that opinion had been assented to in the House. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had stated before that he approved of that opinion, but he doubted merely as to whether it should have been done then. His impression was that he had only so far modified the plans as to make all the structures, which required to be sunk to the Lake Erie level, to the 14ft. depth. He presumed nothing had been done yet towards raising the locks on the descent eastward. Some of them, as the hon. member for Niagara had pointed out, had been finished for a considerable time. One between St. Catharines and Thorold, built on the 12ft. principle, had been finished nearly two years. He could not recollect of having done anything to complete those portions of the work for 14ft.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he might, perhaps, be allowed to say something on this matter, as he remembered the discussions that took place in this House with reference to the depth of water in the Welland Canal and the St. Lawrence Canals. He thought the hon. member for Lambton was correct in saying that he promised that the works in the Welland Canal should be so constructed as to obtain 14ft. of water when necessary, but for the present they had to be completed for a depth of 12ft., with the works for making it 14ft. when necessary, without disturbing navigation. That was the decision, but he did not know that the House had formerly pronounced in favor of 14ft. navigation. There was a motion brought forward about it, and a strong feeling expressed in favour of it. Various arguments were given, and the opinion of the House was that Lake Ontario should be for the present, at all events, the foot of lake navigation, and that vessels capable of navigating the upper lakes should be enabled to come down to Lake Ontario. The opinion was also general that at some not distant day it would be necessary to get 14ft. of water in the Welland Canal. The hon. gentleman declared that he was of the same opinion, and that he would make the necessary works in the locks so that the depth of water could be obtained without disturbing navigation. This was the 28th of March, 1877. With regard to the St. Lawrence canals, he entirely concurred with the hon. gentleman opposite, and he was fortified in his opinion by conversation he had had with men who were interested in the navigation of the St. Lawrence, and they all agreed with him that the work of constructing or deepening the canals to the depth even of 12ft., would involve such an enormous cost as practically to put it out of the question. The hon. gentleman said the estimate made was $12,000,000. The hon. member for Dundas had said he believed it would involve a cost of some $20,000,000. Why should these canals be enlarged? For the purpose of bringing the commerce of the West down these canals, so that it could pass out to the sea by way of the St. Lawrence. The hon. gentleman said it would cost $12,000,000 to build these works. At 5 per cent. interest this would be an outlay to the country of $600,000 a year. Now, last year about 12,000,000 bushels of grain passed down between Kingston and Montreal; at 5c. a bushel that would amount to $600,000. But that would mean that the country should pay towards bringing that grain down to the sea, 5c. per bushel. But the actual cost was only 3c. per bushel, last summer, for all the grain transported between Kingston and Montreal, including the cost of elevating the grain at Kingston. He was sure this fact alone would induce the House and the Government to pause long before they incurred the great expense of going on with this work of enlarging the canals. There was no use in enlarging the Cornwall Canal, which was but one link in the system of St. Lawrence navigation, unless we determined on going on with all the rest of these works, and deepened the channel of the River between the canals. He hoped, therefore, that the House would, as the present state of the country required the employment of all their energies and resources to develop the North-West and carry on those important works, pause long before entering on that gigantic expenditure; and he trusted that this work might be placed in the category of those spoken of by the member of Lambton as practically impossible.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell) said that this discussion, although on a very practical and important subject, was largely of a speculative character. There was no item in the Estimates for any new works, but only for the completion of some long in progress. He agreed with some of the remarks of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall), but disagreed with others. He did not concur in his view, expressed in 1871, and since, that the enlargement of the Welland Canal and St. Lawrence Canals was expressly for the benefit of the Americans. Our object was, in reality, to gain the profit of handling and transporting their produce on its way to the ocean and Europe. Whoever was responsible for the deepening of the Welland Canal to 14ft., he thought were to be congratulated for having decided upon its being done at once. What they wanted in connection with the Welland Canal was, that vessels navigating Lake Erie, many of which drew 14ft., should have access to Lake Ontario. The moment they entered that lake, the contest lay between Oswego and Kingston, and Montreal; because it was a remarkable fact that, notwithstanding those magnificent works, and the number of propellers that came down the lakes, 90 per cent. of the grain that came from the west to Montreal to be shipped there for Europe, was brought in barges from Kingston. If that was the case, so far as the grain trade of the West was concerned, he thought they might assume the St. Lawrence canals were large enough for all practical purposes for many years, and might be left as they were. He was quite sure that there could be but one opinion, one of regret, that the late Minister of Public Works should have incurred an expenditure of $2,000,000 for the enlargement of the Cornwall Canal, the largest, if he mistook not, on the St. Lawrence, at a time when there was no intention of going seriously to work to improve the entire navigation between Kingston and Montreal. It was quite true there was, at that time, an event in progress in the neighbourhood of Cornwall, or at any rate expected: that a very important member of the Government had been transferred to a position he had since adorned as Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, and that an election was imminent in the neighbourhood of those works. That the expenditure of those $2,000,000 was now admitted to give work to the people of the vicinity, and not solely for the purpose of improving the canal, showed, at any rate, that the expenditure might have had some connection with that other event. But, whatever the motive was, he thought that the discussion to-night must lead them to the belief that the expenditure at that time was most unwise. No doubt, however, there had been a very strong feeling in Ontario in favour of the enlargement of those canals; and at Confederation, a clause, with that object, was inserted in the Union Act, to offset the Intercolonial Railway, which was supposed to be exclusively for the benefit of the Maritime Provinces. It was then thought that vessels from Liverpool could be passed through the enlarged canals to the West, and, in addition, that a large intercolonial trade between eastern and western Provinces might be developed by them. But the moment the Intercolonial Railway was opened, it was worked as to tariff arrangements, so as to drive off the Gulf port steamers, whose business had been destroyed by that railway. They need not, under those circumstances, look forward to any great trade between the West and the Maritime Provinces by vessels in summer; there was no certainty of such a trade as would justify them in enlarging those canals. The hon. member for Halton referred to the competition of railways with water ways. They were building the Georgian Bay Railway, presumably to draw the trade of our own North-West to tidewater at Montreal and Quebec, and he sincerely hoped, with a view to this object, that everything would be sacrificed to easy gradients. The question of competition between rail and water depended very largely on the character of the railway. No doubt that the bringing of grain from Manitoba, by rail, to Thunder Bay, and there passing it through an elevator into vessels and subjecting it to a similar operation at French River and Montreal, would put it in such a condition as to realise, on the other side of the Atlantic, more than the cost of the handling. That fact led him to think that the scheme of the Georgian Bay Railway might be looked forward to as a very important factor in their struggle for the grain transport trade of the North-West. He sincerely congratulated the Government on its determination to deepen the Welland Canal to 14ft., as soon as possible. Unless they set to work with a view to availing themselves of every means of competing with the Erie Canal and the American Railways, he was afraid they would not realise those great advantages they had in view in their enormous expenditure of money in those improvements.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the member for Cardwell (Mr. White) had been pleased to insinuate that the enlargement of the Cornwall Canal was intended to assist a candidate of the party of the late Government in his election. When he told that hon. gentleman that that contract was not let, nor the estimate for the work voted, till nearly a year after that election took place, he might be satisfied that he was as unfounded in his insinuation, as he was ungenerous in his conception.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell) said he thought the hon. member for Lambton was mistaken. He had taken a tolerable active interest in that election, and knew that discussion included the contract that had actually been made.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not believe it was let in 1875, the year of the election.

MR. WHITE said he begged the hon. gentleman's pardon for having said it was let at the time. It was not actually let, but it was generally understood that it was to be, and it was given out immediately afterwards.

MR. MACKENZIE said that that was a very different matter, but the hon. gentleman was not yet quite correct. He recollected very well that during the second Session of the late Parliament, when Mr. A. F. Macdonald was a member, he urged the letting of the contract; so it could not have been done for the purpose of promoting his election.

MR. McLENNAN said he remembered the rumour that the work was to be commenced, and that it did its work quite as well as if it had been.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was not responsible for rumours. Mr. Macdonald had been elected in the month of May, 1875, to support the Government. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was out of the country about three months, and he thought it was during his absence that the election took place. There never was a word of discussion about the contract one way or the other.

Mr. CAMERON (North Victoria) said that he remembered the circumstances of the canvass for that election, which resulted in the return of Mr. McNab, and the retirement of Mr. Macdonald, who was appointed Lieutenant-Governor in the spring of 1876. In the summer of that year, when the election was held, his hon. friend (Mr. McLennan), now the representative of Glengarry, was a candidate. His hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. White), and he himself took an active part in that Glengarry election, which enabled him to corroborate the statement of that hon. gentleman; that the proposed letting of the work for the extension of the Cornwall Canal was made use of to the utmost extent by the friends of the Liberal candidate. The farmers in the neighbourhood of Cornwall, were told that their teams would be hired, and an era of general prosperity created if they would only support Mr. McNab.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that might well be the case, but Lieutenant-Governor Macdonald was appointed in May, 1875, not 1876. The Government had no responsibility for the circulation of rumours. His experience, besides, had invariably shown that the Government had invariably lost support from the location and building of public works in the localities benefitted. In the constituencies on the line of Lachine, Cornwall, and Welland Canals, the late Government did not ultimately find one supporter, notwithstanding the millions spent on them. This showed that the difficulties which arose from people not obtaining what they wanted for their lands, and expected on other grounds, led to infinitely more injury than benefit to the Government in such outlay. He (Mr. Mackenzie) never recollected a word of discussion with Mr. McNab about the Cornwall Canal, though Mr. A. F. Macdonald had urged publicly and privately it that should be proceeded with, and the present Minister of Militia and Premier had also urged it in order that employment might be found for the people. The work was undertaken wholly on public grounds, and at the time the Government need not have been very anxious about the election of a single member when they had a majority of sixty or seventy.

Mr. MACKENZIE asked if the Government had let the shovelling of the snow by contract this winter.

Mr. TUPPER said they had not. The Government saw, from the tender sent in, that, if the winter proved a long one the contractors would be unable to do the work. Therefore, they considered it would be safer to do it by day work.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that one day he saw forty-five men at work, thirty-five of whom seemed to him to be doing work entirely unnecessary. The expense, he thought, must be enormous.

Mr. TUPPER said he would bring down the amount of the expenditure in this particular.

Mr. MACKENZIE enquired how much more would be required for clearing the Quebec Harbour, and how much had been realised from the sale of the anchors and chains.

MR. TUPPER said the labour of removing the anchors and chains had been practically completed. The expenditure asked for this year was for the purpose of removing a rock, the removal of which was indispensable to the safety of navigation. He was not aware at that moment what had been realised from the sale of the chains and anchors, but negotiations were in the course of progress for the sale of a large amount of scrap iron.

MR. MCCUAIG said he desired to make a few observations in regard to the grants for the erection of Custom-houses, post-offices, etc. He wished to know whether these grants could not be capitalised, and a certain amount awarded to towns if they would undertake to erect buildings for these purposes.

MR. TUPPER said the subject had been under the consideration of the Government, and they would be glad to consider any proposal that would save the money of the country.

MR. BROWN said that Belleville was classed, last year, with Brantford and Windsor for assistance in this regard, but circumstances over which they had no control prevented the late Government from carrying out their intention. The Government derived a large revenue from Belleville, and he thought the matter should receive the attention of the Administration.

MR. TUPPER said he would like to speak for a great many members as well as himself, and say that the Government were quite of opinion that the town of Belleville, from its importance and its population, and its resources, was entitled to the consideration of the Government in regard to the provision for public buildings. But these Estimates were framed principally with a view of carrying out the contracts of their predecessors. In reference to new work, the Government had not felt themselves able, in consideration of the present fiscal condition of the country, to engage in these expenses until they restored, as he trusted they would restore, the equilibrium between the expenditure and the revenue.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the towns of Guelph, Brantford and Windsor had been selected, in this regard, on account of their size and importance as commercial centres. It was the intention of the Government to take the towns next in importance and population, which would have been St. Catharines and Belleville. It was not their intention to take the towns all together, but one or two at a time, so that they could provide the required accommodation without entering into very serious engagements all at once.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings) asked how it was that Quebec got everything and Belleville was passed over? The revenue collected at Quebec was not as great as that collected in Belleville, and he was satisfied that, had the late Government remained in power, Belleville would not have been so passed over.

MR. MACKENZIE said that no one could fairly complain that the Province of Quebec got too much during the last few years. It so happened that there had been a large expenditure upon the canals, but that was not of a local character. The expenditure upon the Customs buildings and the new post-office in Montreal, were, no doubt, very large in the years 1873, 1874, 1875, 1876 and 1877, but, with those exceptions, and the erection of a small building in St. Johns, there was no very large expenditure in the Province of Quebec, and there was a general assent to the proposition made two years ago, that something ought to be done to preserve the historic character of the historic city of Quebec. With regard to Belleville, a good deal of money had been spent there in connection with harbour improvements, and the hon. member for East Hastings could have no ground for reasonable complaint in that respect.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings): $2,000 was just the amount spent in Belleville. That was not a great sum.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) said, as Canadians, they all desired to see the old fortifications of Quebec kept in repair, and would have no hesitation in voting this sum. With regard to the Custom-house at St. Johns, and the buildings at Belleville, Guelph, in Nova Scotia or Manitoba, or elsewhere, they were all for the benefit of the whole Dominion, and brought revenue into the country. The sectionalism shown by hon. members, in carping at these small items, was to be regretted.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings) said he found no fault with these items. They were all elected to look after the interest of their respective sections. He would ask the Minister of Public Works if the Government intended to think of Belleville next year.

MR. TUPPER said as soon as the Government was in a position to deal with those public works, they intended giving them their consideration.

MR. DOMVILLE said he would like to ask why these works had not been constructed heretofore. A fire took place in June 1877, which destroyed a large portion of St. John, and yet those buildings had not yet been rebuilt. New Brunswick had contributed $400,000 or $500,000 in duties to the public revenue owing to that fire, and deserved better treatment.

MR. TUPPER said the reason given by the late Minister of Public Works was that the rebuilding of them, shortly after the fire had occurred, would have caused an undue expenditure, owing to a scarcity of labour at the time, and would have interfered with private parties, who were building, by taking from them a certain amount of available labour.

MR. DOMVILLE said he could not accept that as an explanation. There was any quantity of labour to be had, and it would have been a godsend to have furnished work to the people. It was a disgrace to the late Ministry that they had not carried out these works.

MR. MACKENZIE said he felt no disgrace in the matter. If there was any place above another, unless it were Halifax, which had reason to be satisfied with regard to public works, it was St. John.

MR. ANGLIN said the statement of the hon. the Minister of Public Works was correct. It was impossible, for some time after the fire, to find labour to do anything like the amount of work required. Buildings had to be long delayed, because skilled labourers could not be obtained. Numbers of mechanics came from the United States, and from various parts of the Dominion, to supply the demand, still, the first year, it was almost impossible to get work done, particularly in stone buildings, and it would have been very unwise for the Government to have entered into competition with private parties for labour.

MR. DOMVILLE said he was surprised to hear the statement of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), that the late Government could not go on with the building. Why, they ordered the iron work for the vaults from Boston, and then employed a company in St. John to make them. There were two sets of vaults for that building before it was completed. There was any quantity of labour to be had, and relief had to be provided for the labouring classes.

MR. MACKENZIE said everything was absurd that did not please the member for King's (Mr. Domville). Before many weeks elapsed after the fire, the Chief Architect of the Department was instructed to go to St. John to make such investigations as were necessary to enable him to prepare plans for the new buildings. The plans were prepared as rapidly as possible, and the Government proceeded as fast as the regular forms required by the Government rendered absolutely necessary. Of course, every hon. gentleman knew that a Government could not proceed in the same way as a private individual could. It was necessary to proceed in a form acceptable to Parliament. They had first to prepare the plans, and then wait to get a vote of money in the Session of 1878. Then the contract had to be let and approved in the regular way, and it so happened that they had very serious difficulty with the contractors in getting them to carry out their engagements. It necessarily took a considerable time to do that. He hoped the hon. the Minister of Public Works would not, in connection with public buildings, attempt to hurry their construction unduly, for the sake of being able to say that they were completed within a certain number of months, or years. The more years taken to build, the better the building would be. The building in which the House was now sitting, although it had taken twenty years to finish, would have been a much better structure if more time could have been afforded for its construction. He spoke from a personal knowledge of architectural work. There was not a single day unnecessarily lost in proceeding with these St. John buildings. The foundation of the Custom-house had to be sunk some 17ft. or 18ft. below the level of Water-street.

MR. DOMVILLE: The foundations had to be sunk?

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes.

MR. DOMVILLE: I think not.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is so wise, and knows so much, in his own estimation, that it is impossible to inform him on any subject. The hon. gentleman knew he had already made a great many mistakes, and ought not to make rash statements. It would be better for him to get his leader, the hon. the Minister of Public Works, to bring a statement from his Chief Architect, to show how far the foundations had to be sunk. The foundations of the Custom-house were on a sloping rock. The old walls had to be taken down.

MR. MILLS said he wished to know if the Minister of Public Works intended to ask the House to make an appropriation for Morpeth Harbour.

MR. TUPPER said that was one of the works that had to be postponed for the present.

MR. ROBINSON asked whether the $10,000 for Toronto Harbour was to be expended solely in dredging the western entrance. The hon. the Minister of Public Works would recollect that a deputation waited upon him the other day asking for improvements to the eastern entrance. The importance of their suggestion would be recognised, especially as the Welland Canal was enlarged to 14ft. navigation, which would make it necessary that some permanent improvement should be made in the Toronto Harbour, otherwise the larger vessels would have no harbour of refuge in the lakes.

MR. TUPPER said there was no doubt this was an important question. The $10,000 was intended exclusively for the western entrance, for the purpose of obtaining a channel 15ft. in depth, and 300ft. in width. The work to which the hon. gentleman referred was of great importance, but it was a matter that was still a question of controversy between engineers, and the Government intended to investigate it carefully before any expenditure was made, in order to see just in what way the expenditure could be made most serviceable.

MR. BROWN said there were a great many improvements required every year at Belleville, and the Government had, during the past eight years, contributed $13,550 towards those improvements. During the same time, the city had paid towards dredging the harbour $47,151. The harbour was frequented by very large vessels from foreign ports, and it was necessary that the harbour should be kept in good condition. He trusted the Government would see its way to aiding the city either with a money grant or in lending them one of the Government dredges to keep the harbour clear.

MR. McCALLUM said he protested against the Government expending money on works such as Morpeth Harbour, which would be of no advantage to the country. The moment they came over to the Government side of the House, they got new light, they saw they could help their friends all through the country by taking hold of local works of no interest to the public. He raised his voice now and protested against this Government spending money on local works. We had plenty of public works to carry out without attempting to improve private property.

MR. McCARTHY said he did not rise to make any complaints about the plans for Collingwood Harbour, but to ask whether it was the intention of the Government to spend the money voted for that purpose. Last year a grant of $10,000 was made for the improvement of that harbour, but he saw, by the returns brought down, that only $2,000 had been spent. It was a cause of great dissatisfaction to the people of that town, after being promised time and again that a grant should be made for the improvement of the harbour, to find that a sum of money was voted for that purpose, and only a pretence made of expending it.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not think the hon. gentleman had reason to complain that the harbour of Collingwood had not received its full share of the public money. Large amounts were spent there years ago. The vote taken last year was with the view of getting a greater depth of water, by dredging the existing harbour. The Government and the Northern Railway, combined, had spent about $30,000 on that harbour.

MR. McCARTHY said the expenditure of which the hon. gentleman spoke was not altogether by the Northern Railway Company, but partly by the municipality, one-fourth being by the company and the balance by the municipality. That was after the agreement made at the time and which they complained had not been kept. At that time it was understood the harbour was to be free; but shortly afterwards, when the hon. member for Lambton's Government was in office, the harbour was placed subject to harbour dues, which, to some extent, interfered with the business of that place.

MR. MACKENZIE said Mr. Kingford received instructions to take the necessary steps to get the money expended which was voted, but the hon. gentleman would remember that there was a difficulty about getting a dredge in that quarter, and the dredge that was ultimately sent to Collingwood was sent from Lake Ontario. There were peculiar difficulties in dredging those northern harbours, and he had never spent a cent for dredging in his own county during all the time he was in office.

MR. McCARTHY: The dredge never got to Collingwood.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was no kind of intention of not proceeding with the work. He had endeavoured to do his best to carry out the intended improvements, but was unable to get a dredge into the harbour before he went out of office.

MR. TUPPER said the year for which that money was voted did not expire until July 1st; the expenditure was still going on, and a considerable portion of the money would be expended before the expiration of the fiscal year for which it was voted.

MR. MILLS said the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum), had laid down a principle to which he (Mr. Mills) had never subscribed since he had been a member of this House. He moved for a return some time since, which he hoped would be here, before this discussion took place, in order to show whether such a principle had ever been acted upon. He was sorry to see the hon. gentleman did not adhere to that principle with anything like consistency. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that it was right and proper to make expenditures for harbours of refuge, but that it was entirely wrong for this House to appropriate money for harbours of commerce. What were they making appropriations for post offices, Custom-houses, etc., for? Was it understood that the people in the neighbourhood who were accommodated with those buildings should pay for their erection? They did not act on any such principle. The hon. gentleman was a shipowner; would he like to have Government say to him that he should build harbours of refuge for himself? What claim had the hon. gentleman and other shipowners on the Treasury of the Dominion, any more than any other portion of tax-payers? He did not act on such a principle, and he believed that expenditures of money for harbours of refuge, where they were needed, were very proper and justifiable.

MR. MCCALLUM said he did not consider the lake shore a harbour. He could tell his hon. friend that he could not get shelter there at all. The hon. gentleman asked this House to appropriate money for a locality within twelve miles of where the Government had spent a quarter of a million to build a harbour, and yet the hon. gentleman called that locality on the lake shore a harbour. It would not benefit commerce, because the railway station was within five or six miles of the harbour.

MR. CASGRAIN said he desired to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Public Works to a very dangerous place in his county opposite St. Roch, where the people had, at their own expense, begun to build a harbour of refuge. If the Minister would refer to the documents, he would find a petition from the municipality and adjoining parishes asking for aid to build that harbour. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue was aware of the facts.

MR. TUPPER said he thought that was provided for; he would look into the matter.

114 St. John Harbour $5,000 00

In answer to MR. MACKENZIE,

MR. TUPPER said this sum was to repair a breakwater that was carried away. It would protect the harbour, and prevent any further damage until the Government was in a position to undertake the work as before.

MR. ANGLIN said he desired to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Public Works to a case that was not provided for here at all. An appropriation was made, some two or three years ago, for the purpose of opening what was called the Gully, at Shippegan, in his county, and rendering the passage accessible and useful to a great number of fishing craft, at all times of the tide. It was of great importance to all who were engaged in the fisheries in that part of the Dominion. Through that gully, in the season, several hundred boats passed in the course of a week, and there was no other harbour within a great many miles. Many lives had been lost there at various times, because the water was shallow at low tide. He had made these representations to successive Governments of the Dominion, and from the late Government he obtained an appropriation for the purpose of building a brush breakwater, extending from the point close to this gully to the extreme point of the sand bar. He hoped that by this means a harbour of refuge would be afforded, at all times of tide, for the hundreds of fishing smacks engaged in that part of the country. Unfortunately, there was a great difficulty in getting contractors to take this work, and the man who eventually took the contract made some mistake in regard to the facilities for obtaining material in the neighbourhood, and he broke down. The work was again let, and again the contractor failed, and the work remained unfinished. What had been done, however, had already rendered great service to the fishing smacks. But as the breakwater was not yet extended to the end of the sand bar, the sand still washed in, and the passage was not as deep as it might be made. Even as it is, in stormy weather it afforded protection to the smaller craft that succeeded in getting under its lee, but it would be of much greater advantage if the work were carried out according to the original intention. It would afford a short cut to vessels engaged in the trade of the Miramichi and Bay Chaleurs of about 100 miles. He hoped the hon. the Minister of Public Works would, at least, expend this year, towards completing the work, the balance of the amount appropriated for this service last year, and which still remained on hand.

MR. TUPPER said that the work was of considerable importance. There was an unexpended balance in hand, and he intended to carry on operations with it in order to extend and secure the work between this and the 1st July.

MR. ANGLIN said it was almost impossible to do any work before June, as the coast was stormy and the ice troublesome.

MR. MACKENZIE asked for explanations as to the works at Cow Bay. Was it intended to pay Mr. Archibald?

MR. TUPPER said the item was for work to be done, and not to pay Mr. Archibald, whose claim was under consideration. If the Government submitted any claim of that kind, they would state so openly.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the late Government declined to pay that claim, after full consideration. What did they want the $2,000 for at Digby?

MR. TUPPER said it was to repair damage to a pier to which a storm had driven a vessel. The work was indispensable.

MR. MACKENZIE said that that place was in no sense a harbour; there was simply a wharf or landing, which ought to be maintained by the locality. The local authorities collected dues at it, and yet begged Government assistance for that work. If the Government was to maintain it, they should levy tolls to meet the expenditure.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman himself had expended $2,500 on the work, in 1874. It had been built, and since repaired, by public money. Digby pier was the point of communication between a large portion of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, thus possessing a public character.

120	Annual Subsidy for the Cables to Anticosti and the Magdalen Islands and Land Lines on the same..	15,000 00
	For several Land Lines in the Maritime Provinces to join the Lighthouses on prominent points to the telegraph system of Canada. Subsidy once for all.....	20,000 00

Mr. MACKENZIE asked for information in regard to the vote for telegraph lines.

Mr. TUPPER said that this expenditure was necessary in the interest of humanity, in the interest of commerce, in the interest of navigation, and in the interest of the fisheries of the country. The matter was briefly explained on the vote itself. It was for the purpose of enabling the company to lay down cables to Anticosti and the Magdalen Islands, and land lines on the same. The next item proposed a subsidy once for all, of $20,000, for several land lines in the Maritime Provinces to join the lighthouses on permanent points to the telegraph system. It was hoped that by this appropriation an extensive system of telegraphic communication would be opened between the lighthouses and the humane establishments. It was believed that this would result in a great saving to the country, not only by causing an additional saving to life and property in connection with shipping, but by reducing the rates of marine insurance. In regard to the vote of $15,000, that was placed in the Estimates to recoup the company for an outlay of $300,000, which would be necessitated; $12,000 for interest on that sum, and $3,000 for unforseen expenses.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not rise for the purpose of objecting to either sums, but of calling attention to the fact, that in regard to the first item a Bill ought to be introduced. It was a perpetual contract, and should be introduced by way of resolution, and a Bill founded on the resolution.

Mr. TUPPER said he was satisfied the hon. gentleman was correct.

Mr. ANGLIN said he supposed it would be necessary to have lighthouse keepers who were telegraph operators, and that would entail additional expense.

Mr. TUPPER said that there were instruments upon which anyone could send messages, and that this would not involve much, if any more, additional expense.

121 Maintenance and repairs of steamers Napoleon III, Newfield, Druid, Glendon, Sir James Douglas and Northern Light..... $125,000 00

SIR A. J. SMITH: What are the intentions of the Government with regard to the Northern Light? Are they going to continue the steam service? I had hoped the Government would have made provision for bringing the railway to Cape Tormentine, so as to facilitate communication between the mainland and the Island.

MR. POPE (Queen's P.E.I.) said the Northern Light was altogether a failure, and had been a most expensive plaything. The Government had not finally decided what to do with her, but it would never do to maintain her at such great expense considering her maintenance, cost, and the small amount of work she could do. She was now lying in Georgetown. There were seasons when it was impossible for a vessel to cross between Georgetown and Pictou. The service could be done by a good propeller in the fall and early part of the winter, and in mid-winter the crossing would have to be made between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse, small boats being used when the ice was too close packed for a steamer.

The Government had asked $5,000 less than was voted last year, and he hoped it would not all be required. He hoped they would have a railway down to Cape Tormentine.

SIR A. J. SMITH said the Northern Light was built in pursuance of a treaty obligation entered into by this Dominion with Prince Edward Island to have steam service between the Island and the mainland when Prince Edward Island came into the Union, and for which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was partly responsible. With respect to the Northern Light, there was a difference of opinion as to whether she was a failure or not. As the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) had a motion on the paper with reference to the Glendon, he would not discuss that question now, but would only observe that she had done, and was at present doing, good service.

MR. PLUMB said the treaty obligation had nothing specially to do with the Northern Light. The late Government must bear all the responsibility for having built her. She had been a most conspicuous failure in every respect. After the hull was completed, it became necessary to strengthen her in every direction, and the Superintendent appointed by the Government stated that she could not be made sufficiently strong for the work, that when she got into the ice she became squeezed together like an orange, and that the expenditure on her was fabulous. He should be willing to take his share of the responsibility for having moved for the papers in reference to that vessel.

MR. VALIN said he would advise the Government to sell the vessel, as it would cost more than she was worth to put her in a good state of repair.

SIR A. J. SMITH said, in regard to the repairs of this vessel at Picou last year, the Public Accounts Committee examined Capt. Scott yesterday, and Mr. Doull, who was present, and who was the cause of the enquiry being made, after the witnesses were examined, had the fairness and manliness to state that he acquitted and exonerated him (Sir A. J. Smith) of all blame in connection with the matter.

MR. POPE.

MR. TASSÉ said he would seize this opportunity to take exception to the manner in which the annual report of the Marine and Fisheries Department was usually prepared. He was animated by no personal feelings in calling attention to this matter. The officials of that Department were, as a rule, most zealous and painstaking, and had done much to ensure its proper working. But the voluminous shape which was given to the report of the Department, accompanied, as it was, with numberless appendices, was well calculated to defeat the very object of public usefulness, which it must have in view. The Department spent annually not more than a million dollars—less even than the Post Office Department—and, nevertheless, it threw all the other Departments in the shade by the voluminousness of its publications. In order to be useful in these busy days, when time was money, their Blue-books must be prepared in a clear and concise way, and the extent of their contents kept within proper bounds. A report of 300 pages would be read, perhaps, attentively, whilst a report of 2,200 pages would hardly be turned over by those who were more specially concerned in these matters. He believed this report could be reduced to 400 or 500 pages, without the slightest prejudice to the public interest. He would not conclude, however, without making a few remarks on some statistics in connection with our shipping. According to the report, Canada was to-day the fifth maritime power of the world, being surpassed only by Great Britain—the Queen of the seas—by the United States, which occupies the second rank; by Norway, and by Italy. Such a statement might flatter our national pride; he wished it could not be disputed; but official statistics led forcibly to another conclusion. We possessed, undisputably, an important marine, which was increasing gradually; but—not to mention the maritime powers he had already referred to—we could fairly claim to hold a larger tonnage than either France or Germany. Our tonnage was magnified by our official returns, because it was calculated on the number of ships registered in Canada, whilst it should be based on the number of ships registered and owned by our people. Many of the ships enumerated in our official list, and built in Canada, some as early as 1819, had been sold to people of other countries, or destroyed for various reasons, and yet they appeared as our property. Moreover, in our tonnage was entered every craft of the smallest description, whilst foreign tonnage included generally but sea-going vessels, and not those navigating inland waters, which proved conclusively that a proper comparison could not be established on the basis adopted by the Department of Marine. According to the census of 1871, which gave the number of ships owned in this country, we had then a total tonnage of 843,126—whilst, according to the report of the Department, it should be 1,360,425—the tonnage of the sea-going vessels being 660,446, which was the proper tonnage, somewhat increased since, to be compared with that of European nations. Our census had been made under the supervision of a man thoroughly versed in statistics, Mr. J. C. Taché, Deputy Minister of Agriculture; and, to show the authority to be attached to the result of his labours, he might state that his statistics were of the greatest use to the International Commission which sat at Halifax in 1877. If our tonnage was of about 700,000 tons, not including our inland tonnage, we could not claim to be more than the seventh or the eighth maritime power, having, however, a more important marine than such great nations as Russia or Spain. The total tonnage of the world, according to the statistics of the Bureau Veritas, was estimated at 21,000,000 tons, out of which Great Britain possessed 6,170,000 tons; the United States, 3,180,000; Norway, 1,500,000; Italy, 1,400,000; Germany, about as much, and France, 1,000,000. We had nothing to gain by exaggerating or magnifying our resources; it was far better that a true statement of the facts should appear before the public; for even with the naked truth we had no reason to be ashamed of the proud position which we already held among commercial nations. After having urged the reduction of the report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries as a matter of public usefulness, he might observe that such a massive report, published in both languages, was the cause of an enormous and wasteful expenditure.

The cost of the printing of that report increased immensely under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, for, while it was but $2,611.24 in 1872-73 under a Conservative Government, it reached the enormous sum of $14,680 under the auspices of the hon. member for Westmoreland. This hon. gentleman had acknowledged lately that he made a blunder in purchasing the steamer Glendon at such a high price; he claimed that he had been deceived by some people, not altogether, perhaps, disinterested—but in this case he could not appeal to the mercy of the House, and he must be held responsible for that extravagant expenditure. If they were to believe certain letters read lately before the House, the hon. member for Westmoreland had been evidently more anxious during his administration to induce other people to sail in his own boat, although the wreck was not then far distant, to secure the alliance of such an upright politician as the Minister of Finance, than to conduct this Department in an economical manner. When the celebrated Edmund Burke proposed, in 1780, his plan for the “better regulation of His Majesty’s civil establishments, and of certain public offices,” which included the abolition of the Board of Trade, it was urged, in order to prove the utility of that establishment, that it had published 2,500 volumes in folio; but Burke replied that an institution which had accumulated such a pyramid of huge and dusty volumes, which no one cared to look into, had well deserved its fate. He did not desire to obtain such a result in this particular case, but, having called the attention of the House and of the Government to this matter, he trusted that prompt action would be taken to reduce such an enormous and unnecessary expenditure, and to reduce the report of the Marine and Fisheries Department, of which he understood 1,300 pages were already printed, to the proportions of other official reports which had an equal importance.

Mr. HACKETT said the Northern Light, though not realising the expectations of the people, had not proved a total failure. It was well understood that the undertaking was merely an experiment, and, in placing her upon her present route, between Georgetown and Pictou, it was not anticipated that she would successfully navigate the Straits at this point during the whole of the winter. Her operations on that route chiefly proved that, while she might keep up communication with the mainland for a month or so later in the fall, and commence a month or so earlier in the spring than heretofore, she would have to lay up during the middle of the winter. It was clearly proved, however, that the only route by which communication could be kept up with the mainland was by Capes Traverse and Tormentine. It was stipulated, at the time of Confederation, that the Dominion Government should maintain efficient steam communication between the Island and the mainland, winter and summer. This was one reason why the people agreed to the terms, as they knew that without such communication they could not participate in the advantages which the people of other parts of the Dominion would derive from the great public works then undertaken by the Dominion Government, and for the construction of which they would have to contribute their share. But up to the present time very little had been done, and the people remained in the same isolated condition as before Confederation. During the present Session hon. gentlemen from the Island were cut off from all communication with their homes and families for upwards of twenty days; at one period twelve consecutive days elapsed without an opportunity offering of crossing the Straits with the ice-boats. The late Government placed the sum of $5,000 in the Estimates last year for the purpose of making a survey of a suggested line of railway from the Intercolonial, on the mainland, to Cape Tormentine, and from the Island Railway to Cape Traverse. He believed that this survey had been made, and a report was now in the hands of the Government, made by a very competent engineer, who, he believed, reported not unfavourably on the proposed route. The Government should take this matter up without any delay, as the people of the Island considered that they have been unjustly treated with regard to this part of the compact. It might be said that the building of these railways would cost a considerable amount of money, but, when they saw the sum of $6,000,000 voted for the purpose of building the Pacific Railway, so that the terms of Union with British Columbia might be maintained, they were surely asking too much if they insisted upon the Government expending $500,000 to carry out the solemn compact entered into with Prince Edward Island. They felt greatly aggrieved over this question; communication must be kept in midwinter by the ice-boats, as of old, and, although the brave men who worked those boats were generally successful in crossing, still, at times, they must succumb to the influence of the weather, their boats being but small, and not calculated to withstand heavy storms. The carrying of the mails across the Straits of Northumberland in mid-winter was the most arduous and difficult to perform of any service in the Dominion of Canada, and the hardy men who performed it were the worst remunerated. He hoped, however, to see increased accommodation for this service, shortly; that the branch railways would be built; that a small steamboat would be placed there to supplement the ice-boats, and that good and sufficient boat-houses would be erected on each side for the accommodation of all parties interested. This, in a measure, would satisfy the people of Prince Edward Island.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said he could not endorse the opinion of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith) with regard to the usefulness of the Glendon. The vessel did the same work that a scow might do, and certainly she was not a credit to any Government. The Glendon was reliable enough in calm water, but she was altogether unserviceable against a breeze of five or six knots an hour. In proof of that, he would read an extract from the report of Captain Brown who was in charge of the vessel:

"Owing to the very small power, in proportion to the size of the ship, the least head wind or sea is immediately felt, and materially deadens her way. Against a strong breeze (say force 5 or 6), with the usual amount of sea, caused by such wind, she would not carry steerage way. It might be thought that in such cases, sails might be set, and the vessel worked to windward under steam and sail combined, but I have found, by experience, that she is much too leewardly for any advan-

age to be gained by adopting this course. Under any circumstance the model of the Glendon must be put down as a bad one, and when, in addition to this, we consider that there is but a single engine of 21 nominal horse-power, to propel a bluff-bowed, full-built vessel of 267 tons, and with thirty feet beam, it will not be difficult to understand why she is able to do so little against wind and sea."

He (Mr. Pope) thought it necessary to make the statement as the hon. member for Westmoreland had appealed to him for approval of his (Sir A. J. Smith's) assertions as to the usefulness of the Glendon. With regard to the crossing of the Straits, he was satisfied that this Government would endeavour to carry out faithfully the arrangements made for the maintenance of the winter service. The estimated expenditure for the steamship service was $5,000, but he did not think that the whole of the sum would be required. The Government was not disposed to spend $30,000 on the Northern Light for the sake of one or two months' service.

122 Steam communication between Halifax and St. John viâ
Yarmouth $10,000 00

MR. FLYNN said he saw by the Estimates that there was no similar service provided for between Halifax and Charlotte, touching intermediate ports. A Mr. Fishwick had placed a boat on that route, which was the only means of communication between the eastern section of Nova Scotia and the Intercolonial Railway. Previous to that line being opened, the trade of that section of the Province had been gradually going towards the United States, but since Mr. Fishwick's boat had been running, the people there had been enabled to get their supplies from the Upper Provinces. If they were denied the advantage of this boat, the trade which Mr. Fishwick had been helping to build up must eventually go to the United States, and, in view of the duties imposed by the present tariff, there would be a great burden upon the people of that section of Nova Scotia who felt that they had contributed their full share towards the construction of the Intercolonial, and justly claimed that they were entitled to some of the advantages derivable from it. The Government should do all in its power to effect a continuation of this interprovincial trade, and the only way to do so was to place a sum in the Estimates for the service he had mentioned. He wanted to know upon what principle the Government was justified in placing $10,000 in the Estimates for steam communication between Halifax and St. John viâ Yarmouth, and emitting to do the same with regard to the service between Halifax and Charlotte, calling at intermediate ports. He need say nothing of the enterprise of the gentleman who was placing a steamer on that route, at a large sacrifice to himself, and the people of that section would be deprived of the advantage of connection with the Intercolonial Railway if that boat was taken off. He trusted that a sum would be placed in the Supplementary Estimates for that service. No appropriation would be more acceptable, or profitable, to the people of that section. Some apprehension existed that she would be taken off were no appropriation made.

123 Steam communication on Lakes Huron and Superior	$12,500 00
124 Steam service between San Francisco and Victoria, British Columbia	54,000 00
125 Steam communication with the Magdalen Islands....	4,200 00
126 Steam communication be- tween Grand Manan Island, N. B., and Mainland	1,500 00
127 Subsidy to steamer between Campbellton, N.B., and Gaspé and intermediate ports	10,000 00

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he thought that service was to be performed for $5,000.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said there had been an arrangement with a party to do that work, but his vessel was too small, and unfit to give satisfaction. The service had been strongly recommended by Mr. Brydges, on whose advice the Government placed that amount in the Estimates in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. He supposed that a portion of the amount,

$5,000, was, last year, charged to that railway. The present was a larger and more efficient boat, which would add to the business of the Intercolonial, and give to the ports below important advantages in getting their produce to market. The contract was made with Mr. Lunt—$10,000 for the first year, $9,000 for the second and $8,000 for the third.

MR. ANGLIN said that the boat last year failed entirely to fulfil the agreement with regard to calls at the south side of the bay, and he thought that the service on the north side had been very inefficiently performed. He now wished to urge on the attention of Ministers the fact that on the south shore of the bay there was a population of from 10,000 to 12,000 people principally engaged in the fisheries, and from thirty to sixty miles distant from the Intercolonial, from which they derived no benefit. They were one of the largest fishing communities in the Dominion, contributed largely to the public revenue, and were entitled to all possible consideration at the hands of the Government. There were in that part of the country two very fine harbours, Caraquet and Shippegan, offering every possible facility for visits of the boat, and for reception and discharge of cargo. He was satisfied that for a very small sum the proprietor of the steamer would be willing to make a call at Caraquet and Shippegan once or twice a week, which would be a great benefit to that district.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said he thought the people of that region were very favourably considered in having such a fine steamer put on that route.

MR. TILLEY said he would like to know how much the steamer would have to go out of her way to touch the ports spoken of by the member for Gloucester.

MR. ANGLIN said that the width of the bay was from 25 to 30 miles, and it would not cost much more to have the steamer make those calls.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said that he had no doubt the steamer would call at all places where the trade offered a necessary encouragement.

MR. POPE.

MR. HACKETT said that it was no doubt desirable that the Government should place a steamboat on the north side of the Baie des Chaleurs, as he believed the inhabitants of that locality required such accommodation. But he was surprised that the Government had not considered the interests of the people residing on the western part of Prince Edward Island, and on the north shore of New Brunswick, when entering into the contract. He believed that this boat could make a weekly trip between Campbellton, Gaspé, Cascumpec, Prince Edward Island, and Miramichi, New Brunswick, calling at intermediate ports, which, in his opinion, would be quite sufficient for the requirements of the people of that section. This route would place the western portion of Prince Edward Island one hundred miles nearer Quebec and Montreal than the present one, and, as a rapidly increasing trade was now springing up between the Island and the larger Provinces, a good steamboat could be profitably employed on this route. He hoped, then, that the Government would take this matter into their serious consideration, and have the contract so modified as to admit of the boat calling at those points, which would add materially to the prosperity of a large number of people, who had been heretofore denied the privileges of steam communication.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said it was thought it would be as well to withdraw the subsidy for steam communication between Halifax and St. Pierre. One of the reasons for discontinuing it was that there was a good deal of smuggling carried on in St. Pierre, and it was thought it might receive a check by the discontinuance of this service.

MR. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said this was one of the most important services in the Maritime Provinces, and the withdrawal of this subsidy would create a good deal of disappointment in Prince Edward Island. He trusted the Government would see their way clear to place this sum in the Supplementary Estimates.

MR. RICHEY said he thought that the withdrawal of the subsidy at this moment would be a very unfortunate circumstance. He trusted that the matter would be reconsidered, and a vote placed in the Supplementary Estimates.

MR. TILLEY said that, when this matter was first considered, it was thought that this communication with St. Pierre offered increased facilities for smuggling. They had, however, found that this was incorrect, and that the smuggling was mainly carried on by sailing vessels. The matter was under the consideration of the Government, and, in the event of a favourable conclusion being arrived at, the vote would be placed in the Supplementary Estimates.

XIV.—LIGHTHOUSE AND COAST SERVICE.

135 Salaries and Allowances of Lighthouse Keepers.....	$154,938 00
--------------------------------------------------------	--------------

MR. SNOWBALL said he found that the Inspector of Lights, in New Brunswick, received a salary of $1,200 and $400 for travelling expenses, while the Province of Nova Scotia, with nearly double the number of lights, had no such Inspector. This officer had received as much as $2,332.41 in one year, and, since his appointment in 1872, had received about $13,000 in salary and travelling expenses, for doing absolutely nothing. The person receiving these favours at the public expense was James Mitchell, brother to the late member for his county, and all he (Mr. Snowball) desired was that this gentleman should be appointed to an office to which there were some duties attached. He did not think that this money should be spent year after year, unless some duties were to be performed for it.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) said a petition had been sent from his county and presented by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Domville), asking for certain improvements in connection with a lighthouse at the entrance to the harbour. Was it the intention of the Government to grant those improvements?

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): I have taken a note of the hon. gentleman's question, and will give him an answer.

137 Completion and construction of lighthouses and fog alarms.....	$40,000 00
--------------------------------------------------------------------	-------------

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne): Will the hon. Minister give an answer in reference to a question I asked some time ago as to the position of the coast light that is to be rebuilt at Shelburne Harbour.

MR. POPE: The Department will make every enquiry into this matter. All the officers connected with the Department recommend that the light be put at Surf Point.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne): Is it the intention of the Government to erect a fog-whistle at the entrance of Shelburne Harbour?

MR. POPE: Not this season.

MR. ROBERTSON said he was surprised at that announcement. Prior to the 17th September last, the present Minister of Public Works visited Shelburne, and, in a political speech delivered there, referred to the fact that the late Administration had neglected the interests of that port, and assured the people that, if the present Government were returned, a fog-whistle would be erected there. He trusted the Minister of Public Works would keep that promise.

MR. COCKBURN (Muskoka): Does the Government intend to carry out the lighthouse improvements, recommended by Mr. Thompson, in Parry Sound Harbour?

MR. POPE: The Department has provided for a light there.

SIR A. J. SMITH: Is the amount of $40,000, asked for the completion of lighthouses and fog-alarms, required to finish lighthouses under contract, or to construct new lighthouses?

MR. POPE: It is intended for both. We have asked for $10,000 less than the usual grant, and hope, on the amount asked for, to be able to provide such works as are absolutely necessary.

MR. ROBERTSON said he had presented, the other day, at the request of the Inspector of Fisheries of Nova Scotia, an account for a quarter's salary of that officer, who had been paid to the 31st December, and was dismissed on the 1st February; also a balance due for travelling expenses. Would that account be paid?

MR. POPE: Whatever the late Inspector is entitled to he will get. He was dismissed because he never attended to his duties.

139 Fish-breeding, fish-ways and oyster beds $16,000 00

MR. SNOWBALL said, according to the fishery reports last season, the whole amount expended in New Brunswick was $10,926, of which $2,190 was paid for salaries in the county of Northumberland. In addition to that, the Inspector got $1,400 per year, his clerk, who was his son, $400, making the total bill for the Inspector, his clerk, and expenses, $2,949. There was disbursements for travelling expenses of Warden, $584. These made a total of $5,723, being more than half the appropriation for the whole Province of New Brunswick. The Inspector did not live in the vicinity where his principal work lay. For this amount, everything should be in perfect order, but the fishermen were constantly annoyed by unnecessary regulations.

After Recess.

MR. SNOWBALL said that he understood that the Department of Marine and Fisheries had issued instructions to prohibit entirely the catching of gasper-ax in the Miramichi, during the present year. This was a great injustice to the fishermen, who had furnished themselves with fishing apparatus at a considerable expense. They should be allowed to catch fish as usual, under such regulations as the Department might deem necessary. Another important species of fish was bass, which frequented the North-West Miramichi and Napan Rivers in large quantities. The people in the North-West were allowed to catch fish during the fall and winter months. In January and February, when the principal quantity was caught, the fish lay under the ice almost dormant, when people took them with scoop nets in large quantities during spring tides. In that section of the country people were allowed to prosecute fishing to an improper extent; 600 licences for that purpose were granted in a single season for a district not exceeding ten miles. In this fishing locality, during the winter just passed, one fisherman was known to have in his possession as many as ten bushels of these undersized bass, and no attempt was made to enforce the regulation, whereas, in another instance, among a large number of small fishermen, where only one peck of these undersized bass was found, all these fishermen were subjected to great annoyance. Now, what he complained of was this: that in one section of the country people were subjected to unnecessary annoyances, and in other sections of the country they were allowed every liberty. He was afraid political reasons lay at the bottom of this partiality, and he would like to hear from the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on that point. Since he came to this House he had been asked in reference to the fish-breeding establishment on the Miramichi River, and he would now say something about it. Very grave complaints were for a long time current, concerning its inefficient management. On the 4th April, 1877, he visited this establishment to assure himself if these complaints were well founded. He was accompanied by a gentleman who took a deep interest in the fisheries. He found the man in charge of the establishment somewhat surly, and evidently not pleased to receive visitors. While the keeper was in company with the other gentleman, he (Mr. Snowball) improved the opportunity to count the trays containing eggs, and to calculate the number of eggs in the establishment. When the keeper saw this, he forbade him to count the eggs, but it was too late, as he had already assured himself that there could not be over 240,000 eggs in the establishment. He asked the keeper how many he estimated there were, and the latter replied that he was told there were about 700,000. The Government then sent an inspector, Mr. Wilmot, to visit the establishment, and in his report that gentleman stated there were 326,000 ova, less than half the number claimed by the people in the establishment. The only defence they made of the discrepancy of their statement with the facts was that the ova had died. But in the end of March they had reported that the ova were all in a healthy condition, and that they had not lost 50,000 during the season; when he visited the establishment on the 4th April, he found at the most only 300,000. What, then, became of the ova during the interval? There was fraud, evidently, and he (Mr. Snowball) claimed that all in any way implicated should have been at once discharged. But no person was discharged. Mr. Wilmot said, on page three of special report:

"The great loss of fish eggs being of such an extraordinary nature, the statement of the number of the trays being so conflicting, and the cause of their mortality, as related, being untenable, has not been satisfactorily explained. I am, therefore, compelled, however unpleasant it may be, in following out the dictates of my judgment, to say that the true cause of the difficulty and loss of ova at the Miramichi Fish-Breeding Establishment, has resulted, in my opinion, from incompetency or neglect, or both, on the part of the officer in charge of the building; and that deception has been resorted to in order to cover up the actual state of affairs."

Again:

"It would be almost impossible, even with the most ordinary care, and quite unprecedented elsewhere, that the enormous loss of 50 per cent. of the whole should take place in so short a time. * * * Of the loss in 1875, I very plainly stated to your Department that it was caused by negligence and want of attention to the work. I am of the same opinion still."

That was the way the head officer of the Department referred to the establishment. The officer in charge of the establishment, Mr. Venning, undertook to contradict that statement, and, in doing so, he said that his statement as to the number of eggs was corroborated by Mr. Wilmot, which was far from being the case. Mr. Venning said also that the statement of Mr. Snowball was not correct. He (Mr. Snowball) maintained that his statement was correct, and wished to draw attention to the discrepancy between the 300,000 ova then admitted to be in the hatchery, and the 650,000 said by the official report to have been there a few days previous. If this great loss of ova really occurred between the dates stated, the end of March and 14th of April, as stated by Mr. Venning, why had it not been reported to the Department previous to his (Mr. Snowball's) visit? Again, Mr. Venning, on page four of the report, said he considered Mr. Sheasgreen, the keeper, incapable of making a false report, adding, that this could not be done without his and Mr. Hogan's knowledge. This was his (Mr. Snowball's) opinion, strengthened by Mr. Sheasgreen's assertion, before referred to, that he had only given such a number as he had been instructed. He (Mr. Snowball) distinctly laid the charge of misrepresenting the facts in reference to the establishment on the Inspector. These facts would show the incompetent manner in which the propagation of fish was conducted in this district. The establishment was provided with a suitable decked boat for bringing live fish from the spawning grounds. The boat had been injured by driving nails through, splintering her badly inside, and also leaving many of the nails protruding an inch. The fish, naturally frightened, scratched and cut themselves against these splinters and nails, became diseased and died. The loss was so great that, on page 25 of the same report, it was stated that, of 374 parent salmon taken, 300 were killed. The men who had charge of this service knew little, or absolutely nothing, about it. Yet he found one of these men received that year, for salary and disbursements, $955, a sum sufficient to pay a competent man, especially when it was considered that not over one month's service was given to the work. The parties who received salaries for this service could find plenty of time to interfere in elections. One of them had tried to annoy him (Mr. Snowball) five years ago, by disturbing meetings held in his interest, and trying to break them up, and again at the last election the same party stood at the door of one of the lecture halls, giving liquor to boys to induce them to disturb the meeting. He never had an unpleasant word with the man, and never intended to have. When he saw such things as these going on, he thought it was about time the attention of the Government was drawn to it. In his county there were twenty-nine of these officials. Mr. Venning, the inspector, was not at all suitable for the position. He might be a clever man, but he was, unfortunately, deaf, and, therefore, had only half the means of obtaining information that other men had. He claimed that a strict investigation should be held respecting the manner in which these matters were conducted in his county, and, until some remedy was applied, he would continue to press it upon the House and the country.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said that the hon. member for Northumberland had commenced his remarks by telling them that the people of Northumberland had become totally demoralised, and, indeed, he thought so when he heard they had elected that hon. gentleman. But he (Mr. Pope) had had some doubt on the subject until that hon. gentleman's exhibition this evening. He never would have imagined that anyone, unless demoralised, could have made so gross an attack on his own best friends and those who had endeavoured to serve him, including the late Minister of Marine and the late Government. The charge of mismanagement in the hatching establishments and the destruction of fish concerned acts that took place under the late Government. The present Government had nothing to do with the circumstances complained of, nor were the estimates for those fishery services during the last few years theirs; so his indictment really stood against the late Government for its management during the last five years. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Snowball) was true in the statement that the fishermen of Northumberland had become thoroughly demoralised. He (Mr. Pope) was not in the Department a week till he perceived the fact, and that the hon. gentleman had done more to demoralise them than anybody else. He had found a good deal of trouble in his Department, there were certain regulations which might have been right and proper in some respects, but had not worked well. Much complaint had been made that the fisheries were being altogether destroyed: that no regulations had been observed. He endeavoured to ascertain what the regulations were, then ordered them to be carried out. If they were not what they ought to be for the proper protection of the valuable fisheries of the Miramichi, they were to have been improved with that object. He found that those regulations had been set aside or relaxed from time to time at the special request of the member for Northumberland himself, who represented that, if he could not get all he wanted from the late Minister of Marine, he would even go to the late Premier and beseech his interference to obtain a relaxation of those rules and regulations necessary for the proper protection of the fish. He (Mr. Pope) had been told that the great injury inflicted on the fisheries there, with the mismanagement and confusion witnessed, had been owing to the interference of the hon. gentleman himself. They now knew that hundreds of tons of small smelts and bass had thus been caught and destroyed and hauled on the land for manure, those fisheries being used up as fast as possible. Bass worth 12c. per lb. was taken in large quantities, little fish three or four inches long, and used for the sake of catching smelts, worth from $\frac{3}{4}$ c. to 1c. per lb.; in this way both those kinds would soon disappear. Their information showed that all the fish around the coast, except salmon, which had received more than ordinary care, was becoming scarce, the catches of many sorts amounting almost to nothing. Unless some protection, therefore, was given to those fisheries, they would soon be exhausted, and the people would lose one of their most valuable interests. It was the duty of any Government, and particularly of the Minister of Marine, to enforce the regulations necessary for the protection of the fisheries. He (Mr. Pope) did not know what the hon. member for Northumberland wanted investigated. He would find a great deal of information in the able report of Mr. Venning, the able Inspector of Fisheries, who had been grossly abused. The hon. gentleman said that an inspector should live in Miramichi; but he should know that St. John was a better and more suitable centre for his operations. His heart was thoroughly in his work, for which he was most competent. All the waste and destruction of fish complained of by the member for Northumberland had taken place under the Administration of his political friends. If there was any grievance shown in regard to Miramichi or any other place, he (Mr. Pope) could order an investigation, but he would require good reasons for the step. The result of his advice with regard to the bass which were near the spawning season would be their destruction. With regard to the charge of dismissing officers for political reasons, when he entered office, he found a desire of one party to get the mastery over the other, and also, demoralisation. He had endeavoured to impress on the officers and Mr. Venning himself, the propriety of getting good, able men, living on the spot, who would take an interest in the fisheries, and of avoiding the appointment of men who had strong political opinions. His wish was to allay that bitter feeling that existed in Northumberland, and particularly Miramichi, to promote good feeling among them, and impress upon them the fact that the laws and regulations must and should be observed, and, if it was necessary to appoint additional wardens and obtain extra assistance, notwithstanding the declaration of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Snowball) and his friends, that they would defy the laws, he would do so to make sure of their enforcement.

The laws and regulations must be enforced, the threats of the hon. gentleman not making the slightest difference.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) said he desired to direct attention to the river fisheries in Nova Scotia, in which there were hardly any fish now left, owing to the fish-ways, the ladders in those streams, under the superintendence of Mr. Rodgers, the recently appointed Fishery Inspector. It was stated by newspapers and other authorities that the fish could not get up those ladders. He believed the Commissioner of Fisheries in Ottawa (Mr. Whitcher) was desirous of improving the fisheries of Nova Scotia, but he did not believe that Mr. Rodgers was a proper man to administer the law.

MR. POPE: Under whose administration was this done?

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) said he was not finding fault with the present Minister of Marine, or Government, but with the fish-ways laid down by Mr. Rodgers.

MR. GILLMOR said he knew that the Fishery Inspector in New Brunswick had performed his duties well, being quite competent and not receiving too much pay. He had no other motive but his duty, and no officer had more difficult duties to discharge.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he rose to a point of order; the noise was so great that he could hardly hear his friends behind him. If there was not better order preserved he would be obliged to offer a series of motions that would consume more of the time of the House than the remarks of the hon. gentlemen who were so much disturbed.

MR. MACDONNELL said he had always remarked that, when the question of the fisheries was discussed, members were listened to with the greatest impatience. It was a fact that many of the members of this House and a great portion of the people of the Dominion were entirely ignorant of the nature of those fisheries. But hon. gentlemen were not ignorant of the fact, nor were the people of Canada, that, while they were suffering from great depression, and bankruptcy was staring this Dominion in the face, it had got $4,500,000 paid to it through those fisheries to relieve it from its bankrupt condition.

MR. FORTIN said the fisheries of our rivers dwindled to almost nothing until the system of protection in this regard was established some twenty years ago. In establishing fish-hatching in this country, they had only followed the example of France, England, Germany and the United States, and one of the oldest countries in the world, China. It was only by the artificial cultivation of fish that the Chinese were able to sustain a large part of their immense population. He approved of the solicitude of the Government in this particular. The oyster banks, particularly, required a fostering care. The whole subject was one of great importance, as the land never produced food in such abundance as the sea, if well protected and fostered.

157 Geological Survey $50,000 00

MR. DAWSON said there was no grant so well applied as this $50,000 for the Geological Service. He would ask the hon. the Minister of the Interior whether he had any intention of removing the museum to Ottawa. In Montreal it was visited by very few people, only 1,800 having visited it during the past year. It was in a bad situation there, and the building itself was falling to pieces.

MR. MILLS said he concurred in the remarks of the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson). The Act providing for the creating of this branch, provided that the clerks and officers of the Geological branch might be employed in any other portion of the Department of the Interior. There was a great deal of work of a topographical character done in this branch, which could not be done as well by ordinary surveyors connected with the Public Lands Department, as by the highly scientific men employed in this institution. If the people of Montreal were anxious to have a Geological Museum continued in their city, there were plenty of specimens from which to leave them an excellent collection. The amount paid in rent and repairs in Montreal would be sufficient to provide for a suitable building here. He had been looking with interest for a report of Professor Bell's explorations in 1877, but it had not yet come down. No doubt the hon. the Minister of the Interior would give satisfactory explanations of the results of the exploration.

MR. COURSOL said he was not at all surprised at the desire of the hon. member for Bothwell to have the museum brought back to Ottawa. No doubt the hon. gentleman would like to see Montreal deprived of all her public buildings as she had been of the Parliament buildings. Montreal was the chief city of the Dominion, and the most suitable place for such an institution. He trusted the Government would not remove it from that city. If necessary, a branch of the museum might be established here.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there was a good deal to be said in favour of having the museum here. It had not attracted the public attention in Montreal to the extent he thought it would. There was a great deal to be said in favour of having the officers here under the direct supervision of the Government. In their present isolated position, scientific men, who might be infinitely better employed, were doing surveyors' work, which could be well done, if they were here, by the surveyors' branch of the Department. The expense was a consideration in these hard times. He knew the rental paid in Montreal was very large, and capitalised, the amount might suffice to put up a suitable building. However, if a building could be got here, which would answer for some years, it would be well to use it. The Clarendon Hotel could be got at a sacrifice, and might be fitted up to suit the purpose. When the Supplementary Estimates were brought down, he would bring this question up again. Owing to some misunderstanding about the maps in Mr. Bell's report, the report had been delayed.

MR. HUNTINGTON said it would be scarcely fair to suppose that if the museum were here it would be better patronised than it was in Montreal, or, to take the statement of the hon. member for Algoma, as to the number of visitors at Montreal last year, as an evidence that it had not attracted sufficient attention there, multitudes of people, including scientific men, visited Montreal who never came to Ottawa. True, during three months of the year, numbers of people visited Ottawa, but they were mostly contractors and other business men, and not scientific men for whom this museum would have an interest. He hoped we would not lay sacrilegious hands on the labours of years without careful consideration, without remembering that, after all, Montreal is the chief centre of scientific interest in the Dominion.

MR. MILLS said there was no difficulty whatever, if the city of Montreal wished, to keep up the museum as a separate institution—or to connect it with McGill University, as a scientific branch of that institution—quite as full and complete as at the present time, and to enlarge it constantly as occasion arose. But that was wholly beside the question of its utility as a branch of the public service. Besides its educational value, it had an economic value, and in that sense it was necessary that it should be under the immediate supervision of the Minister. There would be as much propriety in removing the Public Lands branch of the Department to Montreal or Toronto, away from the supervision of the Minister, as in removing the Geological branch. There was only a small portion of the year that the parties connected with this branch were in the field. The whole of the winter, and part of the autumn and spring, they were at the offices in Montreal. Whether they were well or ill employed was a matter of which the Minister could form but an imperfect opinion. In fact, this institution, as it now stood, was without any ministerial head, and without any proper supervision. In the Bill that was introduced when this branch was established as a part of the Department of the Interior, it was also provided that it should be a Museum of Natural History as well as of Geology. The Bill was passed in 1877, during the first Session he was in the Department as Minister. It provided for establishing a National Museum of Geological Science and Natural History, but that could never be efficiently done until there was a suitable building. The hon. the Minister of the Interior spoke about obtaining the old building known as the Clarendon Hotel, in this city. But if the hon. gentleman consulted Professor Selwyn on that point, he was sure that Mr. Selwyn would tell him that it was not a suitable place. A building to be used as a museum ought to be situated where the specimens would be wholly free from dust, and where the objects collected, representing the fauna of the country, would not be exposed to injury in that way, and where there would be an abundance of light. The Clarendon building was unsuitable for these reasons. A plain building had better be erected, such as was found in some of the American States, like the one in Central Park, in New York, for instance. It should be made to serve as a Museum of Geology and Natural History, and might be of great practical utility—of real scientific value—largely contributing to the development of the mineral resources of the country. It should be here, under the immediate supervision of the Minister, and open to the inspection of the representatives of the people; and there was no doubt whatever, if this were done, but that it would be of great value in giving scientific information, and would lead to important economic results.

Mr. RYAN (Montreal Centre) said he was glad to see, from the Estimates, that there was no intention to remove the Geological Museum from Montreal. It was quite true, as had been stated, that if the museum were removed from Montreal it would not be visited by nearly as many persons as it was now. Two years ago he accompanied the Emperor of Brazil on a visit to that institution, and the illustrious visitor paid a high compliment to the gentleman in charge of the institution. He said it reflected credit on the Dominion of Canada. Apart from this, there was another reason why the geological collection should continue at Montreal. A large portion of the specimens, and of the expense attending their collection had been borne, not by the Dominion of Canada, but by the late Sir William Logan, who made it rather a labour of love than of remuneration, and out of respect for the memory of that distinguished man, who had done so much to benefit this country, the geological collection should continue at Montreal. He was aware that this was not the first time this question had been brought before the House; it had been discussed years ago, and invariably with the same result. The hon. gentleman, who was the late Minister of the Interior, said that this institution ought to be conducted under the immediate supervision of a Minister. In reference to that, he (Mr. Ryan) thought he might safely say there was no Department under the immediate supervision of any of the Ministers of the Government which was conducted with more care and more diligence than that institution at Montreal. He knew that in the past the officers who had had charge of that institution had been governed by a higher principle than that of emolument. He was satisfied the gentleman in charge at the present moment discharged his duties faithfully and well. He trusted the day would be far distant when the Government of Canada should remove the Geological Museum from Montreal.

MR. MACDOUGALL said it appeared to him there were two questions involved in that discussion that ought to be kept separate. He was sorry the hon. gentleman. (Mr. Mills) had not carried out the measure he now advocated when he had the opportunity, and was at the head of the Department. He was not disposed to pay much respect to the tu quoque argument, and he did not think neglect on his part would justify neglect on the part of hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side; but still one would think he ought to have distinguished his administration by doing himself what he now urged upon others. The point that struck him as important, was, that we should have here, at the seat of Government, the official staff of the Geological Department. They would then be under the observation and control of the Government. We should have the benefit of their explorations and discoveries in every part of the Dominion at the earliest moment. What was the position they were in to-day? Parliament was on the point of closing its labours for this Session, and they knew, some of them, at least, that very important information had been secured with reference to a portion of the North-West Territory. For instance, the character of the country in the neighbourhood of the Nelson River; facility with which communication might be established by rail between Lake Winnipeg and Hudson Bay; the climatic conditions with reference to navigation. All these matters had been ascertained and reported upon by a gentleman connected with the Geological Staff. He had had conversation with him on his return from his explorations, and was much pleased and instructed by the information he was able to collect in the course of an evening. But they had not yet received any report from Professor Bell, and could not therefore avail themselves of any new discoveries he might have made. He was satisfied that if the Geological Staff were located at Ottawa, this kind of information would not be kept from the view of Parliament; they would have, at all events, an opportunity of interviewing these officers as well as the officers of the other Departments. Therefore, it seemed to him, that if this Geological Survey was part of the public service; if the people of this country were to reap any benefit from the money they were expending, the officers of that Department and the central organisation must be at Ottawa, where members of Parliament and the Government could have it under view. He had had the pleasure of visiting the museum at Montreal, on various occasions, during the life of Sir William Logan, and while the survey was under the charge of the Department over which he (Mr. Macdougall) for a short time presided. He must say that he would regret to see the institution, as an exhibition, as a museum, removed from Montreal. He thought in that city, the commercial capital of their country, it was desirable to have an institution or place where the geological character and the economic minerals of the country could be studied. He thought it was worth the expenditure involved in paying the rent of a building there; but let it be a local institution, let it be placed under the charge of some College or University in Montreal. Allow specimens to remain there, and, he believed it was a fact, as stated by the hon. gentlemen from Montreal, that there was some bargain, or some fact in the history of that institution, which would make it unfair on the part of the Government to move the entire collection, because a large portion of it was contributed by Sir William Logan himself, and left as a legacy to Montreal. But that need not prevent a selection from the specimens for use and exhibition at Ottawa. Further additions would be made in the prosecution of the Geological Survey. He hoped that the hon. gentleman at the head of this Department would take early steps to carry out that idea, and place the Geological Staff where it would be in close communication with the Government, and where members of Parliament would have an opportunity of knowing, by personal communication, the progress of the Geological Survey of the country.

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked whether any progress had been made in the negotiations with the Ontario Government for assuming this $14,000. He considered this sum should be properly charged to the Ontario Government.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the matter had been engaging his attention during the short period he had been Minister of the Interior. He quite agreed with the hon. gentleman that the Ontario Government were responsible for this sum.

MR. DAWSON said there was not only an annual grant of $14,000, but there were arrearages belonging to the Ontario Government, as well as a large revenue from the ceded lands of the Indians. This revenue was so large that, from that district alone, giving them credit for everything they had paid out, the Ontario Government had now a balance of $820,000 on hand.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said correspondence had been going on, and somewhat vigorously, between the two Governments on this matter. The Ontario Government had promised again and again to approach the subject, but they seemed in no great hurry to do so.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said it would probably be convenient if the First Minister would inform the House of the position of affairs as regarded the Indians, both of the North-West and of British Columbia.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said from all he could learn, the situation in British Columbia, with respect to the Indians, was not unsatisfactory. The apprehension of trouble seemed to have disappeared. The Indians were expressing a great desire to settle at once on the reserve. The reserve was doing a good work, and Mr. Sproat, at the head of it, was satisfactorily performing his duties. With respect to the Indians on the east of the Rocky Mountains, it had been found that the buffalo had left that country altogether, left, at all events, for the present year. They might return another year. A great deal of distress had been suffered in consequence.

MR. MILLS asked if the buffalo had left the whole country.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said they had, and some of our Indians were pursuing the buffalo across the border and the United States hostiles had also crossed for some distance. Nothing unfavourable had occurred as yet, but, at the same time, as long as these Indians were there, and especially as long as the pressure for food existed, and while there was very little chance of there being a diminution of this pressure, or the danger of starvation operating upon the savage minds, disagreeable consequences might ensue. The Indians might quarrel with each other, or attack the whites. It was therefore necessary that the Indians should be induced by every possible means to settle down on the reserves, and take to agricultural pursuits, and those tribes which were purely nomadic, and which might be for the present considered incapable of settling down to such pursuits, at all events should be induced to become herdsmen, and have flocks and herds. The Department had carefully selected practical farmers, who were now being sent out to the country to induce the Indians to take to agriculture. Of course this would be followed by the Indians in a very rude and inefficient style, but when they settled down on the reserves and found that there were no buffalo and no game, they would, by degrees, it was to be hoped, take to farming, as was done in Ontario and Quebec, and the older portions of the Dominion, and become farmers to a certain extent. Of course, there would be a great many disappointments, and a good deal of money expended. They would find that the cattle bought for the Indians would sometimes become the food of the proprietor instead of being used for the purposes intended. But yet the Government must put up patiently with all this kind of disappointment, in the hope that in no great length of time these people would leave their wild life and settle down.

MR. MILLS said he thought that last year the correspondence relating to Indian difficulties with British Columbia had been moved for, but he did not remember that it had been brought down. His recollection was that the Department was unable to get it ready before the House rose, as it was moved for late in the Session. Now that the difficulty with the British Columbia Indians was over, he thought there would be no harm, in fact, some advantage, in allowing the correspondence to come before the public, so that the people might see how very narrow an escape there had been from an Indian war in that country. There was, no doubt, that the Indians there all along felt that they had not been fairly dealt with by the local authorities; in some instances the reservations which they had held for many years, and upon which they had made considerable improvements, and spent a great deal of labour in preparing them for irrigation, were taken possession of by the white population. The Local Government had, in a few cases, granted patents for lands that had been in possession of the Indians for half a century, and a few of these cases had not been disposed of when the late Government went out of office. They had called upon the Local Government to cancel the patents they had issued, but, at the same time, they noticed no action had been taken. Could the hon. gentleman inform the Committee whether he had any further correspondence with the Local Government on the subject?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No.

MR. MILLS said it was very desirable to have every dispute settled. It was noticeable that where the rights of Indians came into conflict with the white men, the former generally went to the wall. It was particularly desirable that the Indians should feel that the Government was disposed to deal fairly with them. It was safe to say that, at the time the Indian war was feared in British Columbia, there had been a warlike combination of the Indians of that Province with the Nez Percés of Washington territory, and if the latter had been successful under Chief Joseph, in their contest with the United States troops, he thought that trouble would have ensued by the general confederation of Indians on the Pacific slope. There was no doubt that such a confederacy had been formed, and it was only the failure of the Nez Percés that put an end to the union. This being the case, care should be taken to prevent the possibility of such alliances taking place in the future. He observed that an appropriation was asked for the purpose of employing farmers to teach the Indians agriculture. That, he thought, was highly necessary, and the late Government had determined upon making the trial had they continued in office. In fact, last year, they had made a special effort to secure the location and survey of various reservations to which the Indians were entitled under the treaties made with them, to carry out, without delay, this policy. The late Government felt that, unless the Indians were induced to settle down and devote themselves to agriculture, as their natural supplies of food would soon be exhausted, serious difficulties would arise the moment they were reduced to want. Now that these surveys had been made, and the reservations marked out for a large number of the Indian population, and agricultural influence had been furnished them, to a limited extent, it was necessary that competent people should be employed to teach them how to use these implements. He noticed that the Estimates this year also contained a considerable sum for agricultural implements. His impression was that the late Government had gone a long way towards fulfilling their obligations to the Indians in this direction. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could state how much the Indians were still entitled to under the treaties which had been negotiated? He thought it desirable that the House should be in a position to assist the Ministry in carrying out the policy upon which the late Government had entered with regard to the Indians. If men were to be employed to teach agriculture to the Indians, it was necessary that they should be active, vigorous and competent men, and that this work should not be made a refuge for men who could not find employment in any other sphere of life, and who knew little or nothing of agriculture. They should be persons in good health, ready and willing to work, and of such an age that the Department would be pretty certain that they would not become invalids, wanting their salaries and leave of absence when they got there. He had not been able to obtain information which the Minister had promised, and which he had hoped to have obtained with regard to the official changes made in the North-West Territories. But he would state what his own views were upon this particular matter. They had two superintendencies in the North-West—one known as the Manitoba Superintendency, which embraced Keewatin, Manitoba, Western Ontario, and a considerable portion of the North-West Territories, and the other, the North-West Territories proper, which embraced that region lying west of Qu'Appelle from the Saskatchewan southward to the American border. In the Manitoba Superintendency, the Indian Treaty Districts embraced were Nos. 1, 2, 5, and part of 4, and in the North-West Superintendency they were part of 4, and Nos. 6 and 7. The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) knew, from the papers in the Department, why the late Superintendent of the Manitoba Superintendency was removed. For some time there was no one appointed to that position. Mr. Graham, the assistant, and who was also office clerk, acted as Superintendent for the time being. Sometime in July, the late Government communicated with Mr. St. John, who had, about three years before, been appointed Sheriff of the North-West Territories, and induced him to resign his position as Sheriff and accept the position of head of the Superintendency. He was asked to take money from Winnipeg to Fort Ellice, for the payment of the Indians in Mr. Laird's Superintendency, and after his return he was to have been appointed. But owing to the elections coming on shortly after that time, an Order in Council appointing him was overlooked until after the elections. However, he was practically appointed as early as July. He had been induced to resign his position as Sheriff of the North-West Territories, and he was appointed to the office of Superintendent, solely on the ground that he was believed to be able, honest, energetic, well educated, and in every respect well suited for the work of that particular office. He (Mr. Mills) now understood from Mr. St. John himself, and from other parties, that he had been removed from that position, and that he had been placed in a very much worse position than before, for no defensible reason in the world, because the Superintendency still existed. When he (Mr. Mills) had entered upon the duties of the office, after looking over the accounts and the arrangements made for supplies, and after communication with the then Deputy-Minister (Mr. Meredith), he was convinced that the management of the Manitoba Superintendency was not at all satisfactory. At that time he submitted to the House the appointment of an inspector, though the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) did not approve of the idea. He (Mr. Mills) was then of the opinion that if they were to have a condition of things different from that which prevailed in the United States, if they were to have an honest administration of Indian affairs, it was necessary that an intelligent surveillance should be exercised over the various agencies, and that some one should be in a position to know exactly the views and feelings of the various Indian bands, how the agents discharged their duties, and be able to advise the Government with regard to the treatment of the Indians. Mr. McCaul, a very intelligent, energetic and upright gentleman, was accordingly appointed to that position; the result had been most satisfactory, and he (Mr. Mills) had no doubt the present Minister of the Interior would find that Mr. McCaul would discharge his duties wisely and thoroughly. He now understood that Mr. McCaul had been appointed as purveyor. The late Government had transferred the work of purveying from the Indian Superintendent, because the work was unsatisfactorily done, to the purveyor for the Department of Public Works, who also purchased the supplies for the North-West Mounted Police. It was a mistake, a retrogressive step, to require the inspector to act as purveyor. He should have nothing whatever to do with purchasing supplies, or with any expenditure of money. It ought to be his business to ascertain the character of the supplies furnished to the Indians, to find out how the treaty stipulations were, in all respects, being carried out, to see if the agents were discharging their duties, and how the farmers who were employed were doing the work assigned them, to inspect any schools in operation, and to keep the Department informed in reference to them. It had been his (Mr. Mills') intention to make the local agents, in some places, act as farmers, and those who would not do so, when necessary, could be dispensed with. If it was the intention of the Government that the inspectors should have a healthful supervision over these people, and see that they assisted the Indians in their farming, furnished the necessary supplies, it was important that they should have nothing to do with any expenditure whatever. Their proper work was to supervise it, and report to the Government the manner in which it was done. The late Government had also appointed Major Walsh to inspect and report the condition of the Indians in the south-west portion of the North-West Territories. His instructions were verbal. He (Mr. Mills) had several interviews with Major Walsh before he was sent. After making enquiries, it was found that the inspection of that region would cost more than was contemplated, and that the amount asked from Parliament for the purpose would not be adequate. After consultation with the Secretary of State, under whose charge the Mounted Police were at that time, the understanding was arrived at that Major Walsh should remain in the force, that his salary should be paid by one Department, and his expenses by the other, and that he should be relieved from active service in the Mounted Police for the year. He was to endeavour, as far as possible, to induce the Nez Percés to return to Washington Territory, and to try to accomplish the removal of Sitting Bull and his Indians from that section of the country, and secure their return to the United States. The arrangement was a temporary and tentative one. The hon. gentleman could, perhaps, inform the Committee what Major Walsh had done. He might say, before passing from this subject, that Major Walsh was instructed to ascertain the condition of our own Indians, and how far it might be possible to carry out the policy upon which the Government was entering, and to ascertain whether they could be induced to settle down on reservations and engage in agricultural pursuits; also, to ascertain where it would be necessary to furnish them with cattle for the pastoral occupation. So far as they could learn, the Black Feet Indians would not willingly take to cultivation of the soil, and, perhaps, the best thing that could be done, would be to furnish them with cattle and let them raise herds; but the prospect was not very encouraging. He was informed that, whenever their supplies became scarce, they destroyed, or were disposed to destroy, the cattle furnished by the Government. Was the Government carrying forward this policy, or had they marked out some other? He thought the hon. gentleman ought to tell them why he had removed Mr. St. John. It was, too, rumoured that Mr. Laird had resigned. Mr. Laird had tendered his resignation to the late Government, who declined to accept it, thinking that his position would give a greater influence over the Indians than any other person could obtain. While acting as Superintendent, he was discharging most important duties. It was rumoured that the hon. the Premier had removed him, and it was important to know who had been put in that very responsible position. Mr. St. John was practically appointed in July last. He was induced to resign an important position to undertake the duties of a most arduous office; and if the hon. gentleman was disposed to act fairly towards him, if he had asked him to resign the Superintendency of Manitoba, he would transfer him to the position made vacant by the resignation of Mr. Laird, or restore him the Superintendency of Manitoba.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was rather inconvenient to discuss the question on the appointment or removal of an officer on the Estimate. All he knew about the matter was that he understood Mr. St. John had never performed any duties, though appointed on the 8th of October last. He believed that the Department was rather over-officered, and simply from the motives of economy, Mr. St. John's appointment was not confirmed. He had heard for the first time to-night that he had been employed actively as a Superintendent of the Indians for some months, and had assumed the duties. If so, his claim would be fairly considered. He heard that he was a man of some ability, but he (Sir John A. Macdonald) thought he might well have kept his former office. Mr. Laird had written, saying he threw up his office of Superintendent of Indian Affairs, which, so far, was inconsistent with his position of Lieutenant-Governor. He thought at the time Mr. Laird was appointed he would be expected to assume the chief charge of the General Superintendency of the whole of the Indian affairs in the North-West, as for a large part of the time the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West had very little to do. He was rather opposed to the appointment of a Lieutenant-Governor for the North-West, thinking that until there was a larger population in that country the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba might well perform all the functions of the new office. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) was satisfied that, with the increasing difficulties of the Indians in the North-West, in connection with the growing scarcity of food, and the unfortunate intrusion of a large number of American Indians, that the greatest care would have to be taken, and prudence exercised, and the greatest vigour and promptness manifested in the management of Indian affairs in the region east of the Rocky Mountains to Lake Superior. It would be very difficult to find a man exactly suited to perform all the duties of that office—prompt, vigorous, experienced men, understanding Indian character, virtues and frailties, and possessing philanthropic views with regard to them, and who would see that, when the white man and the red man came into collision, the red man did not always go to the wall. Though very difficult, some person of this kind must be found to represent the Dominion Government in the management of Indian affairs. It was impossible to govern an Indian Department satisfactorily from Ottawa. It seemed to him that a man in the position of Lieutenant-Governor Laird would be looked up to by the Indians, and that he might usefully exercise prompt control over all the local agents. As regarded Mr. McCaul, from all he could learn, he was a good and energetic officer. Perhaps, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) said, the inspector and purveyor ought not to be the same person; that arrangement was recommended by a prominent officer of the Department for the sake of economy and efficiency. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) did not mean to say that the two offices, in the long run, should not be separated. As regarded Mr. Graham, no alteration had taken place. He intended to endeavour to study the Indian question with the same zeal and earnestness as the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), in order to carry out the principle he had enunciated of a general supervision of Indian affairs on the spot, for which a man of high character and standing should be obtained, with a view to the settlement of any dissatisfaction or trouble that might arise in connection with the Indians.

MR. MILLS said he thought that if the hon. Premier wanted effectual supervision, he must have more than one officer—namely, three Superintendents for as many districts, and who should be responsible to the Department in Ottawa. The country was too extensive for one officer.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that Mr. St. John had not been dismissed.

Mr. MILLS said he was perfectly satisfied that if the hon. gentleman would permit Mr. St. John to enter upon the discharge of his duties, he would find him a very efficient and intelligent officer.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was simply a question of salary. He had been appointed Indian Agent, at a salary of $1,200 a year, the same as he got as Sheriff. He was placed at Edmonton.

MR. MILLS said the hon. gentleman could hardly expect a man of his ability and attainments to serve for that salary.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was appointed Sheriff at $1,200 and had never served a writ.

MR. MILLS said he had resigned his Shrievalty to take the office of Superintendent. If the hon. gentleman had appointed farmers, men thoroughly competent, besides the three inspectors or superintendents, he would find no necessity for other officers.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) said the right hon. gentleman had informed the House that it was the intention of the Government to send farmers into the North-West, to instruct the Indians in farming, and lead them, if possible, to adopt a pastoral life. That was very praiseworthy, indeed, and he trusted the result would be satisfactory. But, unquestionably, it would be a very slow process. It would be a very difficult matter, indeed, to lead the hunter of the plain to become a farmer, or even to tie himself down to any certain spot. No doubt at present there was very great uneasiness in the North-West, and cause for serious apprehension. He never had been an alarmist, but he believed that, at this moment, there was cause for using very great judgment in the treatment of the Indians of the North-West. It was well known that at present great misery existed amongst them, and, in some instances, their extreme want had led them to help themselves to food at several of the posts. He desired to know what steps were to be taken to provide for their present necessities, as there was great cause for apprehension on that ground.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he perceived that there was an increase of $23,640, and he desired to know if this arose from the fact that more Indians had appeared as claimants than was expected.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was expected that this would cover the whole expenditure.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that this question of annuities to Indians was becoming a serious question. It had occurred to him, and he would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to it, that it would be extremely desirable, in the course of time, as the Indians became settled on the reservations, to endeavour to make some bargain in the way of commuting these annuities. Otherwise they would become a very serious charge to the revenue.

MR. DAWSON said he did not think there was any risk of the Indian population increasing. It would be contrary to all experience. He desired to remark that great care should be taken not to interfere with the tribal system which was so firmly engrafted in the Indian disposition. The law, as it stood, offered a premium to the breaking up of the tribal system, which, if broken up, severed the only tie that held the Indians together, and removed that which was the best protection to the white man.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that this applied not only to the Sioux on the Assiniboine, but to some at Forts Qu'Appelle and Prince Albert.

so far as an Indian would labour at all; but, on the other hand, they were continually in the habit of committing petty thefts, and the danger had arisen there, through their thieving habits, of a collision between them and the whites. This was far more than sufficient to counter-balance any good to be derived from them as agricultural labourers. He hoped the Department would exhaust all possible means to get them to go on their reserves.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) said the farmers were glad to have the Indians to work for them, especially in the autumn and fall.

MR. ANGLIN said that there was not an item in the Estimates to which greater objection was made than this, during previous Sessions. He had anticipated seeing this year a large reduction in this expenditure, but found it exactly the same, although Customs duties would be very much smaller this year than the previous years.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman had not established the premises upon which he based his criticism. The Government did not anticipate a decreased revenue next year. The hon. gentleman assumed that the late Government collected the Customs' duties for the amount they asked Parliament for, whereas the expenditure incurred, largely exceeded the Estimates. If he assumed, as he appeared to assume the amount in the Estimates would cover the expenditure, the first element of the hon. gentleman's calculation would be wanting.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: What is the excess?

MR. TUPPER said something like $17,000 or $18,000, and the hon. gentleman would find that exceeded, after the new tariff had been introduced, and that, in the new course of things, the collection of the revenue must be attended necessarily with a large increase of expense; but notwithstanding that, they might anticipate a largely increased revenue over last year. He believed the hon. gentleman would have good reason to congratulate himself, that the gentlemen who were responsible for the construction of these Estimates had been entirely consistent with the views held on the other side of the House.

MR. ANGLIN said he was not aware that the expenditure did exceed the Estimates to such an extent last year. We had no assurance just now, beyond what we derived from our faith in the honesty and administrative ability of gentlemen on the Treasury benches, that the excess would not be very much larger next year than was now anticipated. It was quite possible that they, too, would find it necessary to expend more than they had asked for. The hon. the Finance Minister, in his Budget speech, did not anticipate that we were to get a much larger revenue next year than two or three years ago, yet he did seem to anticipate, and correctly so, a larger increase of expenditure for the collection. While the cost of collection would be very high, according to the opinion expressed by the hon. gentlemen themselves last year, the cost would still remain high in proportion to the amount to be collected. His impression was that the hon. the Finance Minister would find a larger revenue next year coming into the Treasury than he calculated, because it must be sometime before the manufacturers could supply all the wants of the country. He apprehended, moreover, that the Government would have a great deal of difficulty with smugglers, who would carry on their operations to such an extent along the whole frontier, that it would be necessary to employ a larger number of persons to watch them, and expend a larger amount of money than had hitherto been the case.

MR. RYAN (Montreal Centre) said, in reply to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Gloucester, he could say that he regretted exceedingly that the late Government thought proper to dismiss, from the port of Montreal, an officer appointed by their predecessors, under the pretence of economy. They had also thought proper, on the same pretence, to reduce the salary of some of the most efficient officers at that port—he referred to the chief appraisers. In 1873, the former Government thought proper to increase the salaries of those gentlemen who had held a high and responsible position during many years; their salary was increased from $1,800 to 2,000. One of the first Acts of the late Government was to reduce their salaries under the pretence of economy. How had they fulfilled that profession of economy? He held in his hand, to the utter discredit of the late Government, a list of a number of people, who had been employed at the port of Montreal, and yet not officially appointed, but holding absolutely permanent positions, and drawing regular pay for the last three years at the rate of two dollars per day. The Government did not dare to put them on the permanent civil list, because they feared public indignation. More than that—these men who were taken on to perform only a temporary service, received a higher remuneration for their temporary services which they were supposed to be rendering, than men who occupied the position of second, or even first-class clerks, in the Customs Department. They were placed over the heads of men who had been in the Department for ten years. Some of them received, he remembered, $600, and fifteen or twenty others received $550 a year. And so these hon. gentlemen, who professed so great a love of economy, employed some twenty-six men as a permanent charge on the country when their services were not needed. Their salaries were charged to incidental expenses, because the late Government did not dare to allow their names to appear on the Public Accounts. If the present Government had thought proper to act on the principle that, to the victor belongs the spoils, they would have dismissed everyone of these men. But he was glad to say that the Government had no desire to remove one of these men, though he believed it was the intention of the hon. the Minister of Customs to place these men on the permanent civil list, and appoint them on a reduced salary. In regard to another point which had been referred to, everyone knew that, during the summer months, an additional number of men were required as tide-waiters. In 1873 the amount of revenue collected at Montreal, amounted to $5,000,000, collected at an expenditure of $87,000. But, during the last fiscal year of 1878, the revenue collected at that port was but little over $3,750,000, yet the expense of its collection was $117,000. That was the kind of economy the hon. gentlemen opposite practised at the port of Montreal.

MR. BOWELL: You may add $5,000 to the expense of collection last year.

MR. RYAN said that only made their case worse. The hon. gentleman from Gloucester complained of the lax way, as he said, in which the Montreal Custom-house was conducted during the late Conservative Administration. He (Mr. Ryan) could state, from personal knowledge, that the affairs of the Montreal Custom-house were conducted in a manner infinitely superior, under the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald, to the manner in which they were conducted under the Administration of the hon. gentleman from Lambton. Whenever, under the late Government, a difficulty arose between a merchant and a collector, and an appeal was made to Ottawa, in every case the result of that appeal depended, in a great measure, not on the merits of the case, but almost entirely on the amount of political influence which the party could bring to bear. He was aware that was not the case at the present moment, and he trusted it never would be again.

MR. JONES said that the late Government had failed to practice economy in other places besides Montreal, particularly at the port of Gananoque, in his county. In 1875 a Custom-house officer was sent to that port, without any commission, but merely upon day's pay, receiving $2.30 per day; whereas the collector, a most able man, and one who had been twenty years in the service, received at that time $2 per day. This man, who came in 1875, and who was sent from Prescott, at the instance of a political friend of the gentlemen opposite, received $30 a year more than the collector at Gananoque, who had been twenty years in the service, and was between sixty and seventy years of age, That man was not required at all for any service at that port. The whole of the work could be done, and was done, to the satisfaction of the Department by the collector himself.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) said he saw the sum of $2,500 for the North-West Territory. He would ask the hon. gentleman how that was to be expended—if it was the intention to appoint regular officers of Customs for the North-West; and, if so, at what point they were to be placed?

MR. BOWELL said it was not intended to make any permanent appointment at the present time. He was informed the duty was satisfactorily performed by the Mounted Police. They were paid in the past by a percentage, and it was proposed to continue that system.

MR. BURPEE (St. John) said a great deal of stress had been laid upon the expenditure at the port of Montreal by the hon. member from that city (Mr. Ryan). There was no doubt there was, and always would be, more or less expenditure there. It was very unfair for any hon. member to say the cost of collecting revenue could be increased or decreased according to the amount collected. The amount collected last year was some $2,000,000 less than collected in 1874-'75, but the depression in the value of goods between those years was nearly the same, so that the volume of goods imported was about the same. It was true there was a larger number of officers in Montreal now than in 1873-74; but it was also true that there was always a large number of officers there not on the permanent staff. It was necessitated by the large number of warehouses. Now, that the new Government building was completed, he thought a great many of the warehouses could be dispensed with, and thereby a large saving could be effected. He was not aware that any unjustifiable dismissals had been made during his term of office.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Ryan), while complaining very bitterly of the late Government for their extravagance in connection with the Customs Department, failed to notice that there had been a reduction last year on this item, as compared with the year previous, of $9,000 in the actual expenses. The hon. gentleman ought to be candid enough to give the late Government credit for that, at least. He ought also have candidly admitted that, in the Estimates for the ensuing financial year, there was an increase over the Estimates of last year of nearly $2,000. His hon. friend failed entirely to see this. In fact, he could see nothing but extravagance under the late Government, and nothing but economy under the régime of the hon. gentlemen now on the Treasury benches. The present Government proposed to increase the expenditure at Gananoque. The hon. gentleman did not discover that fact. Last year, the present Minister of Customs occupied a good deal of time in criticising this expenditure. The criticism of last year's outlay, as compared with the present year's, and the saving placed his hon. friend opposite in no very enviable position. The great reductions the Minister of Customs claimed to have made in Montreal were truly astonishing. What did they amount to? To one-thirtieth of one per cent. of the whole collections at the port of Montreal. The whole reductions in the Province of Quebec amounted to one-sixth of one per cent. on the whole amount collected. That was the economy for which the hon. gentleman most deserved credit. He hoped that when the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Ryan) next espoused the cause of the Administration, he would be distinct in his statements, and say that they deserved a good deal of credit for the economy practised at that port.

MR. RYAN (Montreal Centre) said he had not particularly referred to the increased number of warehouses, noticed by the ex-Minister of Customs (Mr. Burpee) but to the fact that the 26 men who were temporarily employed were kept permanently—the last three years, and paid more than the Government employes for the past 10 or 15 years; apart from that, the supernumeraries employed during the open season, had been increased by 100 per cent. under the late Government. The present Minister of Customs proposed to do the work by 20, as efficiently as it was done before by 36. Appointments had been made against the strong remonstrances of the chief officer, which was in keeping with one of the last acts of the late Government, in appointing an officer at a salary of $1,200, when the collector of the port said he did not require him. He was glad that the present Government, in the interest of economy, had dismissed him. The Customs service of Montreal had not been more efficiently conducted under the late Administration, notwithstanding its enormously greater cost, than under their predecessors. Further, he believed an enquiry would show that a quantity of goods had been taken out at Montreal which had not been accounted for to this moment. He trusted the Minister of Customs would early endeavour to test the truth of that statement, which he (Mr. Ryan) believed.

MR. ANGLIN: When were those goods taken away.

MR. MACKENZIE: Who took them.

MR. RYAN said he did not know, but they were taken away within the past four or five years, at a heavy loss to the country. This showed that the increased deficiency claimed by the ex-Finance Minister as an excuse for the increased expenditure of the Department, was not justified. In reply to the member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) he did not complain of the excessive payment of the officials, as he believed in paying adequate salaries, but the present Minister of Customs would do with 20 men the work formerly performed by 36. No more efficient, reliable men could be found than the Deputy Appraisers, for whom $2,000 salaries were not too much, though the late Government had reduced them to $1,800 on the pretence of economy, which was falsified by an increase of the expenditure by $30,000. The ex-Minister of Customs had stated that the change in the system mentioned was largely due to the fact that the produce merchants of Montreal had paid charges incident to the transport of goods from the vessel to the bond warehouse. He (Mr. Ryan) was not aware of any remonstrances on that subject. It was the first time he ever heard a change took place at the instance of those merchants. He was informed it was made because of the existence of that pernicious system in St. John, N.B.

Mr. BOWELL said that the member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) called the saving of $20,000 on the whole estimate a very small item, $4,000 to $8,000 of which was to be saved in Montreal alone. During the tariff discussion he stated he would have to ask for about $17,700 in addition to the Estimates voted for the service last year to cover the excess of expenditure by the late Minister, for the year ending 30th June next. The excess in Ontario would be $7,430; Quebec, $6,690; New Brunswick, $1,290; Nova Scotia, $1,150; Prince Edward Island, $180, and Manitoba, $1,000. The member for St. John (Mr. Burpee) and the member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) told the House that the expenses attending the collection of a small revenue, would, or should be, just as much as that of collecting a larger amount.

MR. ANGLIN: What I stated was, that it did not necessarily follow that because of a falling off in revenue there should be a decline in the cost of collection, because that decline might be caused by the fall in the price of the goods, the volume of importation being as large as before.

Mr. BOWELL said that might be all true, but it did not follow that if it cost $87,733 to collect between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000 of revenue in 1873-74, that it was necessary to charge the revenue $117,982 for collecting about $3,500,000 in 1878. If the gentleman would recollect this fact, and, with his usual logic and plausibility, convince the House that it was necessary to increase the expenditure from $87,000 to $117,000 odd to collect nearly $2,000,000 less revenue, he would exhibit greater rhetorical skill than he believed he possessed. He (Mr. Bowell) was quite prepared to admit that an officer might collect $10,000 with as little, or very little more, trouble than $6,000 or $7,000; but he could not understand how it should require $2 to collect $5,000, when one could collect $10,000. The rate at which the expense of the Montreal office increased would be seen in these figures: In 1873, it was $87,000; 1874, $95,000; 1875, $99,000; 1876, $117,200; and 1877, $117,989. An explanation was attempted by the member for St. John, but he could not, by any possibility, cover such extra expenditure unless he would add the increase of the staff of that port, as had been so well pointed out by the member for Montreal Centre. The amount asked for Montreal this year, in the Estimates of 1878-79, was $108,925. The amount expended for the year at that port would exceed that sum by $5,000, and the amount asked for next year was but $104,000, being a retrenchment of $9,925. So that when the member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) attacked the Estimates for the ensuing year, and compared them with the Estimates for this year, he was probably not aware of the fact of this extra expenditure, or, if aware of it, had intentionally misled the House, and would mislead the people in the same way. The hon. gentleman must understand that the additions which had been made to the expenses of the port of Montreal were mostly of a permanent character, and the present Government must either go to work and dismiss a number of officers, or cut down their salaries, or they must provide for them in the Estimates. During the five months he had held office, not a single vacancy which had occurred, by death or superannuation, in Montreal, had been filled up. Why? Because the collector at that port had informed him that the extra services were not required. The fact was, men were pushed on him for political reasons, and that he had nothing to say in regard to their appointment. Other ports had been treated in the same manner. In regard to the appraisers, he thought there would be a saving of money if they gave more liberal salaries to them; many at present employed were reported as unfit for the position. They could not tell the difference between the various grades of sugar, nor did they know anything about the price of cotton, or any other goods which they had to appraise. These officers he intended to remove. Other appointments had been made which were not required; and he did not hesitate to say he was prepared to justify himself, not only in the House, but in the country, in telling those gentlemen who had been appointed unnecessarily that their services were no longer required. Hon. gentlemen, if they made a careful examination of the Estimates, would find that there had been a considerable reduction in this respect. He thought the late Minister of Customs was not strictly accurate in stating that the Government paid cartage in all the ports of the Dominion except Montreal. He was not prepared to say that a uniformity should not exist, but he was aware that a uniformity did not exist. He did not believe that the revenue should be charged with the cartage. Merchants, however, should only pay the actual amount of the cost of carrying their goods to an examining warehouse. The House would observe, notwithstanding the criticisms of the Opposition, that the Estimates showed an actual saving.

Mr. BURPEE said the hon. gentleman had spoken about the Estimates of last year being prepared for election purposes. When they prepared the Estimates last year several reductions were made, and he was satisfied that the thought of the elections never entered his mind, nor the minds of his colleagues. In reference to the appointment of officers against the remonstrance of the Collector of Montreal, he might say they did appoint men there; but no letter was received, before he left, against any of the appointments. With regard to the efficiency of the appraisers—he believed the hon. gentleman referred to the appraiser appointed at Hamilton—they thought that that gentleman, accustomed to a general business, ought to make a good appraiser; but he (Mr. Burpee) had heard it said he had not proved the man he ought to have been. In regard to Montreal, there were only nine men more in the service, than when they assumed office in 1873. Merchants now paid the cartage from the examining warehouse to their own places of business. The appraisements, in almost all the small towns where there were no examining warehouses, were done at the merchants' stores' or at the ships' sides. The hon. gentleman stated that Customs decisions in Montreal were influenced by political considerations. The late Government had made enemies of their friends there through their decisions, and the charge made was entirely untrue.

PRAYERS.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 103) To regulate the labour of children and young persons in the mills and factories of the Dominion of Canada.—Mr. Bergin.

DIRECT UNITED STATES CABLE COMPANY BILL.—[Bill 47.]

(Mr. McCarthy.)

BILL WITHDRAWN.

MR. MCCARTHY moved that the Bill be withdrawn, and the fees paid thereon refunded, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Motion agreed to, and Bill withdrawn.

DIVORCE IN ONTARIO.

MOTION TO INTRODUCE BILL NEGATIVED.

MR. HOOPER moved for leave to introduce a Bill to enable the Court of Chancery in Ontario to dissolve the contract of marriage in certain cases.

MR. ANGLIN said, that although it would be a great relief to this Parliament, if divorce was to be permitted at all, that a Divorce Court should be established. Nevertheless, being entirely opposed, on religious grounds, to the principle of divorce, he must oppose this Bill at the very first stage; and if he could get another hon. gentleman with him to divide the House on it, he should call for the yeas and nays.

MR. HOLTON said he thought there was a stronger reason than that why the Bill should not be introduced at this stage of the Session, and that was, that it would have no possible opportunity of being considered. To introduce a measure of that kind in the expiring hours of the Session, was trifling with Parliament, and he hoped the hon. gentleman would withdraw it, and not press it any further. To introduce a Bill within a very few days of prorogation unprinted, and expect to make any progress in passing it this Session, was preposterous. He hoped the hon. gentleman would not press the motion.

MR. HOOPER said he should press his motion.

Motion negatived on a division.

INSPECTION OF PETROLEUM BILL.

(Mr. Baby.)

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain resolutions respecting the inspection, and safe-keeping and storage of petroleum, and the products thereof.

(In the Committee.)

MR. BABY said the object of these resolutions was to protect, as far as possible, life from accidents occurring through the bad quality of imported petroleum. The Bill which the Government intended to found on these resolutions would be in accordance with the Act 14 Vict., chap. 14, the dispositions of which were well known to hon. gentlemen. The only new clauses to be introduced were those providing that the test of the oil should be 130 degrees; that inspection of the oil should be more thoroughly performed than hitherto; and that on the packages containing oil the inspector should affix the date, the contents, the test, etc. As the difficulties of inspection would be increased and the officers would have more to do than heretofore, it was found necessary to increase the fees, and to this all the manufacturers had consented. This Bill was introduced with the consent of the various coal oil manufacturers in this country. The fees on every package of Canadian petroleum would be increased from five to ten cents.

MR. HOLTON said it seemed to him that the inspection en masse, as it were, of petroleum in large tanks would afford more opportunities for fraud, and for the substitution of an inferior oil, than existed under the present arrangement. By these resolutions the hon. gentleman seemed to be offering a premium to the mode of inspection which would be most open to abuse. But, obviously, if they imposed a less charge for inspecting it in the tank than in the cask, they offered a premium pro tanto for fraud and deception.

MR. OLIVER said he would ask if this 5c. for every ten gallons would apply to petroleum in mass in the tank, because, if it was, it would make the inspection of petroleum in the tank higher than if it were barrelled.

MR. BABY said that the only thing changed in the law was that the fees were doubled. In every other respect it remained as before.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said he would like to ask how they proposed to inspect coal oil imported in air-tight tin cans without irretrievably spoiling the package.

MR. BABY: Just the same as we do at the present time.

MR. ANGLIN said there was an important point in the second resolution. He doubted very much if they had authority to make any enactments in relation to the storage of oil after it had paid duty. He thought it was a question of civil rights and property with which they had no power to deal.

MR. BABY said that question would be taken into consideration.

Resolutions ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolutions reported, read the first and second times, and agreed to.

MR. BABY introduced a Bill (No. 104) To provide for the inspection, safe keeping and storage of petroleum and the products thereof.

Bill read the first time.

MILITIA ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Bowell.)

FIRST READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain resolutions respecting the Militia of the Dominion of Canada.

(In the Committee.)

MR. MILLS said he would ask the hon. gentleman to state the object of the resolutions. He thought the maintenance of the peace was unquestionably with the local authorities, and, in that case, it would not be in the power of the Government to force a volunteer corps to be taken for the purpose of suppressing a disturbance or riot in another Province. A volunteer force could only be called out in a place to which it belonged. There was nothing to prevent the Local Legislatures from creating a constabulary force to perform the functions now performed by the volunteer corps. It was perfectly obvious from the discussion they had heard in the House on this question, that this distinction was not always remembered by the members of the House, and it was much more frequently forgotten by people outside. Now, this force, if called out, ought to be provided for by the Provincial authorities. He was perfectly satisfied that, if this question was decided, they would find they had no power to legislate in this direction.

MR. DESJARDINS said it was dangerous to leave, in the hands of irresponsible parties, the power to call out the military force when they at any time judged it necessary, or it suited their feelings. The experience of last year certainly proved that it would be better to follow the suggestions made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and leave in the hands of the Provincial Government the responsibility of providing for the necessary forces to quell any disturbances within the limits of the Province. Although the Justices of the Peace might act in a proper way, public feeling was opposed to their continuing to be entrusted with this power. They had not the necessary responsibility that ought to be imposed on those who could cause, at any time, heavy expenditure to municipalities, and they were liable on that account, to call out the troops for dangers which existed in their own inauguration, or which could be quelled by the force at the disposition of the municipality. The suggestion of the hon. member for Bothwell ought to be taken into consideration, and a change made in that direction.

MR. MACDONNELL said there was a word in this resolution connected with the defray of the expense of militia, the word "municipality," which ought to be defined. It had no special signification in law or otherwise. It had different meanings in different places. There were Provinces in the Dominion in which there were no municipalities.

MR. BOWELL said the difficulty suggested by the hon. gentleman had already been experienced, arising from the calling out of the volunteer force some time ago, to suppress a riot at Cape Breton. There being no municipalities in Nova Scotia as understood by this law, consequently there was no corporate body which the commanding officer could compel to pay for the services of the volunteers, and the result was they had not yet been paid. The Nova Scotia Legislature had, he believed, passed an Act dividing that Province into municipalities, which would remedy this evil in future. The constitutional point raised by the hon. member for Bothwell, was not involved in the resolution before the House. The law, as it stood now, provided that any three magistrates, of which the head of a municipality might be one, had authority to call out the troops. This right it was not now proposed to interfere with. What the resolution proposed was to give power to the Government to advance money to meet the expenses of transport, subsistence and pay of the volunteers when called out, so that the men would not have to wait until the money could be recovered from the municipality. It also provided that the amount of pay for the men should be 50c. per day for services, and 50c. per day for rations, and to officers the pay allowed to them when in regular service. It was not proposed to relieve municipalities of the responsibilities they assumed when volunteers were called out, the power being left for the collection of the expenses from said municipality by the commanding officer.

MR. MILLS said the Government ought to allow this resolution to stand over until next Session, as it was now too late to give it the attention it deserved. It was not desirable they should legislate further in this direction, but should rather retrace their steps to a defensible position. The whole legislation on this subject had resulted in confounding the functions of those called out to maintain the peace with the functions of a military force. They had control over the subject of legislation with regard to military forces, but not as regarded maintenance of the peace in the ordinary sense. That was a municipal matter. If the hon. gentleman had submitted resolutions providing that when any of the volunteers were called out to serve on juries, this House should provide for the payment of them in the first instance, the preposterous character of the proposition would be obvious; but because a force, when called out as a constabulary force, had functions somewhat similar to those of a military force, there was a confusion in the public mind as to the character of the duty that this force was to discharge. As early as the time of Henry II, when provision was made for the organisation of a constabulary force, the same body which was called out to preserve the peace could be called out for military purposes; but the objects were always considered as different, and this distinction became very obvious after a standing army was maintained. At the time of the Lord Gordon riots the mayor refused to call out the troops. The Houses of Parliament were besieged, and the Government was unable to take the first step towards the suppression of the riots, until the Attorney-General advised the king that these riots had assumed such proportions that they might be called a rebellion, when the Government called out the forces and quelled the disturbance. When the Lord Mayor was subsequently tried for neglect of duty, he was convicted because it was his duty not only to call out the ordinary citizens of the country, but also the military forces, and to direct them as to what should be done to restore the peace. Lord Mansfield said then, as he had said before in the House of Lords, that a man did not lose his character of citizen by becoming a soldier. The same opinion was laid down by the Court, in the case of the Bristol riots. All legislative authority, for the purpose of maintaining the peace in any municipality, or district, was vested in the Legislature of the Province. There was nothing to prevent the Government of a Province from saying that every man, under certain named circumstances, should be called upon to serve as a constable, and assist in upholding law and order. A Provincial Legislature could pass an Act making the volunteer force a police force. It could give the officers the same rank. It could compel them to serve. It could do anything but use the arms and ammunition—the property of Canada. It was the Provincial law, and not that of Canada, which must decide by whom such a constabulary force shall be called out. Upon the Provincial authorities devolves the duty of maintaining the peace. The Government might authorise the military force to be called out, in their organised capacity—as the military force of Great Britain might be called out to assist the civil authorities in the maintenance of peace—but beyond that the Government and Parliament of Canada had no right or power to go. They had no right to authorise a military organisation from one Province to be sent into another, for the purpose of maintaining the peace there, because they were not citizens of that Province. If the Committee kept in mind that those who were acting as a constabulary force were discharging a duty on behalf of the Province, which, by the common law, devolved upon every citizen or subject, they would see that those who lived in another Province, were, as to the maintenance of the peace, within a foreign jurisdiction. Canada, in this matter, simply lent its arms and military stores to the local authorities; beyond this it had no power. The function of maintaining the peace rested on the Government of the Province, and the people on whom it might call for that purpose were its own citizens. It was perfectly obvious, that, if they went further, they were certain to be involved in serious complications and difficulties. If that provision were to become law, in many cases, the expense which would be borne by the Public Treasury in the first instance, would not be collectable from the municipality where the difficulty occurred. The municipality is a creature of the Provincial law, and is responsible to the power which created it. That Parliament had no control over it, and had nothing to do with the preservation of the peace, no more in Montreal than in New York. Our whole system of political organisation and government was based on a theory, that every part of the community had an interest in upholding the law and maintaining peace and order; therefore, it was the duty of the municipality to see that peace and order were upheld within its own borders. A municipality might resist payment of these militia expenses, when it might be very disagreeable for a Government to have to enforce them under this law. It would be only the old system of municipal indebtedness over again, which had been found so hard to extinguish. Why should the Government interfere not only to provide local authorities with a constabulary in case of trouble, but also to provide for its payment? His contention then was this: that the preservation of the peace—the suppression of disorder—devolved upon the Local Government of each Province. The Local Legislatures could create constabulary forces for this purpose. They could declare by what persons this force, within the Province, should or could be called out. The Parliament of Canada could declare that they might so use the volunteer force with their arms and equipments; but, having taken this force to the border of Provincial authority, there the power of that Parliament ended, and Provincial legislation must step in to give legal and constitutional effect to the acts of such a force in upholding law and order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said, if he was not mistaken, not very long ago a force of militia was sent from Ontario to Montreal with the sanction of the Government, of which the hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was a member.

MR. MACKENZIE: The Government had no business to sanction it. The only responsibility it had, was in regard to two batteries.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The magistrates, according to the doctrines of the member for Bothwell, who had summoned that force to Quebec, had no power to bring that force from Ontario.

MR. MILLS: I was speaking of what the law ought to be. The hon. gentleman is speaking of the action of parties under the existing law.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I thought that some of the militia went from here.

MR. MACKENZIE: They did not.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: It was on the 24th May they went down.

MR. MILLS: Volunteers may go anywhere for the purpose of drill, but when they were called on to put down disturbances they acted as constabulary.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he should be very much surprised if, in Canada, or anywhere else, it were decided that the doctrine of the hon. gentleman were true—that the paramount or central Government had no power to keep the peace—that the duty was promissory. No Government was worthy of the name unless strong enough, if necessary, to maintain the peace. It was true, a parish constable or beadle, in the case of a fight between individuals, was the person to be first called upon. Everybody knew that; but if an insurrection or riot broke out the central Government had power to suppress it. Here, as in England, central power had full right, if they thought the public safety in danger, to interfere. However, that was a proposition more appropriate for discussion on some other occasion. By the present Bill, it was provided that the magistrate might, in certain cases, call on the enrolled militia to help them to maintain the peace, and that the municipality aided should pay them a certain sum as compensation. That was the law in England, and, practically, it was found to operate occasionally. In riots like those of Montreal, it might be necessary to call for a certain force, and, it might be that a riot did not arise in a municipality, but had been caused by outside influences. They knew that as regarded the riots apprehended in Montreal, a large number of persons were expected from other places to take part in them—some from Ontario and the United States. In such a case it would obviously be very unfair that the individual municipality should pay the whole expense. At all events, it would be very unfair that the volunteers should be called upon to go to it in large force from a distance, and pay their own transport, and afterwards look to the authorities for reimbursement.

MR. MACKENZIE: We pay the transport under the law of 1877.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that they had a right to recover that from the municipality. If so, the whole argument of the hon. member for Bothwell was knocked into "pi." If the General Government, by the Bill passed in 1877, which charged the General Government with the cost of transport, exercised the sovereign right of bringing troops from one Province to another, or from one portion of a Province to another, and authorised the payment of the expense, where was the argument of the hon. gentleman? He held that that hon. gentleman contended that the General Government had nothing to do with this work, that it was the provincial or municipal authorities; and yet the late Government passed a Bill authorising the General Government to pay for the transport of troops called out by a municipality.

MR. MACKENZIE: That does not affect the principle.

MR. MILLS.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that was paying money for a matter of Provincial or municipal concerns.

MR. MILLS said he did not hold that the law was defensible as it stood, but that they should make it intelligible and defensible.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the constitutional question was not raised at all in that matter. The hon. mover of this Bill proposed, that, in the case of the calling out of those troops, the Government should pay the volunteers and recover the cost from the municipalities. There was no necessity of making a great ado about the constitutional question.

MR. ANGLIN said the constitutional question had something to do with it, though he believed the hon. gentleman from Bothwell was mistaken. He (Mr. Anglin) thought that when the volunteers were called out for the preservation of the peace, they became a constabulary, and that it was only the Provincial or local authorities that could control them in that character. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) contended, furthermore, that the Local Legislature had power to provide for calling out organised bodies of volunteers, because they could call out and require any individual to act as a constable. He thought that the hon. gentleman was entirely mistaken, and that while able to call out an individual to serve as a constable, they had no right to call out the organised volunteer force. Individuals might be called out and organised by the local authorities, but when so called out they became a volunteer force, under the order of the commanding officer. The force could only be called out by virtue of the authority given by Parliament; and, therefore, if it were desirable that the Local Legislature should be called on to provide for the payment of that force, this Parliament and the Local Legislature could co-operate. Only this Parliament could authorise the disposition of the volunteer force or any portion of it, while its members continued possessed of all the rights and duties of British subjects. Nevertheless, in their organised capacity, they were subject only to Federal law, and to such orders and duties as it imposed.

MR. BOWELL said that the resolutions before the House simply empowered the Government to advance money for the payment, transport and rations to the volunteers when called out under the Militia Act. The constitutional principle raised by the member for Bothwell, was not properly involved, and why they should have had a discussion as to whether Parliament had a right to give power to magistrates to call out the force, under certain circumstances, he could not well comprehend, and that power had existed for years under the old law. All knew that a riot might take a very general character, such as that connected with the strike on the Grand Trunk, when it was contended that that being an organised resistance to law and order, extending from Island Pond on the one side, to the Western boundary of Ontario on the other, that it was unfair to ask the particular municipality in which the men congregated to pay the whole expense. The member for Lambton was mistaken as to the power conferred by Mr. Blake's Act. The old law provided for the transport, pay, and rations of the militia, when called out by the municipalities, and that provision still continued. The law passed by the late Parliament simply enabled the Government to declare, if a general riot took place, what proportion of the expense attending the calling out of the force should be paid by the Government of the Dominion to the municipality in which the volunteers served. There was no provision in that Act, if his recollection served him, other than to pay the transport, and such proportion of other expenses the Government might think proper. If the member for Bothwell held such strong views on the subject as he now professed to hold, why did he permit the Government, of which he was a member, to advance $10,000, contrary to law, for a purpose similar to that for which the present Government asked the power to do by passing these resolutions, or, in other words, to take power to do by law what the late Government, of which he (Mr. Mills) was a member, did contrary to law. He was not condemning that act, knowing there were circumstances in which Governments might be compelled to strain the law to maintain the peace. The view of the member for Gloucester

(Mr. Anglin) was fully borne out by the Act itself, which provided that, in case of riot, or anticipated riot, certain officials in the country should have power to call out the military force for service. But the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said that they were to act as constables, not as soldiers, when called out to quell a riot. The words of the law itself provided for that, but they could only obey the orders of their officers, and were under martial law and the Queen's regulations, though termed special constables.

MR. MILLS: They are that.

MR. BOWELL said the law made them special constables, without taking the oath administered to special constables. But, at the same time, it provided that they should act only as a military force, obeying the orders of their commander, and their commander could only act on the authority of some magistrate, who would take command of the troops for the time, merely to give them authority.

MR. COURSOL said that when the volunteers were called out to aid the civil power, they had only one duty to perform, and that was to obey. There had been many occasions where the troops had been called on to repress anticipated riots—though the riots had seldom taken place, and the civic authorities had refused to pay the troops, on the ground that they were not a party to the calling out of the militia, as generally some magistrates had taken that power into their own hands, without consulting the mayor or the city authorities. The process of calling out troops in such cases was very simple. Two or more magistrates, if they fancied there was going to be a riot, got one or two witnesses into their office who swore to a statement to that effect, upon which an order was issued for a certain number of troops. Such had been the case in Montreal on several occasions. A meeting of magistrates, last July, more than 150 in number, decided unanimously not to call out the militia, but that did not prevent three or four Justices of the Peace from calling troops out in aid of the civic power, and the city authorities who had to pay the expenses were not aware of what was going on at all, and they refused to pay the troops, as the mayor did not see the necessity of calling them out. He would not say whether the law was right or wrong; but such existed. It depended upon the Government whether they would sanction the large expense entailed by sending troops from one end of the country to the other, simply on the demand of two magistrates.

RAILWAY ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL 98.]

(Mr. Tupper.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. TUPPER said he would explain to the House the reason why so large an Act as this was proceeded with under the circumstances. Of course, it was only by common consent that it could be proceeded with at all, seeing it was not marked as printed, either in English or French, on the paper, but all of the Act that he proposed to deal with had been for a long time before the House, printed in both languages, so that every hon. gentleman had had an opportunity of becoming familiarised with it. All that was proposed by this measure was merely a consolidation of a number of Acts scattered through the Statute-book, and such a consolidation would facilitate that careful reconsideration and examination of all the provisions to which the hon. leader of the Opposition had referred the other night. There was not a word changed in the law as it now stood, nor was it proposed to change a single word except in relation to two subjects. These were found on the 19th and 20th pages of this Bill, to which he invited the particular attention of the House. These new sections related to the taking of gravel and other material for construction purposes, and the height at which bridges should be constructed, in future, over the railways, so as to avoid the injuries and loss of life which were continually occurring. These two matters were marked in the Bill (new) so that attention could easily be drawn to them. The first clauses of this Bill which he would invite attention, were the 38th and 39th and 40th, which read as follows :—

“38. Whenever stone, gravel, earth, sand or water is required for the construction or maintenance of any railway, or any part thereof, the Company may, in case they cannot agree with the owners of the lands on which the same are situated, for the purchase thereof, cause a Land Surveyor, duly licensed to act as such, in the Province or Territory, to make a map and description of the property so required, and they shall serve a copy thereof with their notice of arbitration, as in the case of acquiring the roadway; and all the provisions of this Act as to the service of the said notice of arbitration, compensation, deeds, payment of money into Court, the right to sell, the right to convey, and the parties from whom lands may be taken, or who may sell, shall apply to the subject-matter of this sub-section, and to the obtaining materials as aforesaid, and such proceedings may be had by the Company, either for the right to the fee-simple in the land from which the said material shall be taken, or for the right to take material for any time they shall think necessary; and the notice of arbitration, in case arbitration is resorted to, shall state the interest and powers required.

“39. Whenever any gravel, stone, earth, sand or water is taken as aforesaid, at a distance from the line of the railway, the Company may lay down the necessary sidings, water-pipes or conduits, and tracks, over or through any lands intervening between the railway and the lands on which such material or water is found, whatever the distance may be; and all the provisions of this Act, except such as relate to the filing of plans and publication of notice, shall apply and may be used and exercised to obtain the right of way from the railway to the land on which such materials are situated; and such right may be acquired for a term of years or permanently, as the Company may think proper; and the powers in this and the next preceding subsection contained may at all times be exercised and used in all respects, after the railway is constructed, for the purpose of repairing and maintaining the railway.

“40. Whenever, for the purpose of procuring sufficient lands for stations or gravel-pits, or for constructing, maintaining and using the railway, any land may be taken under the compulsory provisions of this section, and by purchasing the whole of any lot or parcel of land over which the railway is to run, or of which any part may be taken under the said provisions, the Company can obtain the same at a more reasonable price, or to greater advantage than by purchasing the roadway line only, or only such part as aforesaid, the Company may purchase, hold, use or enjoy the whole of such lot or parcel, and also the right of way thereto, if the same be separated from their railway, and may sell and convey the same, or any part thereof, from time to time, as they may deem expedient; but the compulsory provisions of this Act shall not apply to the taking of any portion of such lot or parcel; not necessary for the purposes aforesaid.”

That was all that applied to the taking of land or gravel or materials or water for the purpose of constructing railways. Then, on page 21, would be found the clause referring to bridges :

“And whenever a highway bridge or any other erection or construction shall hereafter be constructed over a railway, or whenever it shall become necessary to reconstruct any highway bridge, or other erection or structure already built over a railway, or to make large repairs to the same, the lower beams or members of the superstructure of any such highway or overhead bridge, or of any other erection or structure over any railway, and the approaches thereto, shall be constructed, or reconstructed and raised, at the cost of the railway company or of the municipality or other owner of the bridge, erection or structure, as the case may be, and shall at all times be maintained, at a sufficient height from the surface of the rails of the railway to admit of an open and clear headway of not less than 7ft. between the top of the highest freight cars then running, or thereafter to run on the railway, and the lower beams or members of such bridge or other erection; and thereafter, any railway company, before using higher freight cars than those running on their railway at the time of the construction or reconstruction of, or large repairs to, such bridge or other erection or structure, shall, after having first obtained the consent of the municipality, or of the owners of such highway bridge, or other erection or structure, raise the said bridge or other erection or structure, and the approaches thereto, if necessary, at the cost and charges of the railway company, so as to admit, as aforesaid, an open and clear headway of not less than 7ft. over the top of the highest freight car then used, or thereafter to be used, on the railway."

These clauses embraced the whole of the alterations in the Railway Act. He would like, therefore, with the permission of the House, to move the reconsideration of this Bill, and have it referred to the Committee, where it could be considered.

MR. MACKENZIE said he could have no objection to embodying in the Railway Act those provisions which should have been in it from the first, respecting the taking of gravel, and the provisions respecting the height of bridges, which was one in the interests of humanity, as many accidents had occurred from the bridges being lower than the height of a man above the top of the ordinary freight cars, which employes were obliged sometime to walk upon while they were in motion. But while he had no objection to these new clauses at all, it did seem to him an extraordinary thing to print 61 pages of Statutes merely to get four new sections put in the Act. He asked the other night, and the hon. gentleman had not yet answered the question, whether it was intended in this consolidated Act to embrace the various amendments which had been made from time to time, in their proper place. For instance, a clause might have been amended by inserting certain words; had such clauses been printed here in the amended shape, or were the several Acts merely brought together?

MR. TUPPER: They are all consolidated; they are in their natural sequence; there is not a word of alteration in the law.

MR. MACKENZIE said one had a shade of suspicion that this vast Bill, together with the Land Bill, were prepared for the purpose of making a respectable sized volume of Statutes, because otherwise the legislation of this Session would not be any thicker than what the hon. leader of the Government characterised the late Government's Statutes, one year, as being no thicker than Scobie's Almanac. He wished to make another remark about consolidating the Land Bill. The Department of the Interior had already consolidated the Land Bill, and it was printed and distributed for general use in the consolidated shape, but still they found the Act, making of itself an ordinary-sized volume, brought in during the last week of the Session. If the Railway Act had been brought in for consolidation early in the Session, he would have proposed going over it very carefully, and considering what amendments might be made in certain parts of it. During the last six or eight years of our legislation, various points had occurred to himself and other members of the House as needing amendment, but clearly it would be utterly useless to send this large volume to the Railway Committee at the present time. We should require to read about twenty pages a day, and it would take to the end of the Session to get the Bill read through, without considering the amendments. If the Bill was to be put through, he would advise the hon. gentleman, instead of sending it to a Committee, simply to read it a second time, and take it in Committee of the Whole, instead of sending it to the Railway Committee.

MR. TUPPER said that was just what he proposed to do. He quite agreed with the hon. gentleman that it would be utterly impossible to attempt to give such a review to the Railway Act as, no doubt, it was desirable to give it—such as would embody the experience that hon. gentlemen, who had paid particular attention to it, would like to give it. There was no intention, therefore, to change a line or a word in the law as it now stood, but only to introduce these new provisions, in which the hon. gentleman had expressed his entire concurrence. Existing legislation, on that subject, was scattered through so many volumes, that it was thought desirable to bring it together as preliminary to a more thorough revision of the law on another occasion.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) had stated, and perhaps correctly, that there had been no changes made in this Bill, except the four sections he had read; but, after all, they had to take that upon trust, unless each member went carefully into the Bill for himself and read every section and subsection of it, 200 in all. The hon. gentleman said this was a transcript of the old law, but the House would recollect that there were ten amending Acts to the old Act of 1868, and it would be necessary to examine the original one and each of the amending Acts, before they could judge how far the principle of those amending Acts had been incorporated with this Bill. It would be utterly impossible to understand this gigantic labour at this late period of the Session. Many an important change and amendments were absolutely necessary in the Railway Act, as the hon. mover of this Bill admitted. That as these changes and amendments, at this stage of public business, could not receive that calm consideration that was necessary to make their legislation perfect, it appeared to him exceedingly unwise to proceed with the proposed consideration of the amendments now, and, clearly, the hon. gentleman had neither shown the necessity nor the policy of introducing and pressing in the House this long Bill at this late period of the Session. He admitted, of course, that, for professional men, who had occasion frequently to look into and advise on railway legislation, and to the Judges of the various Courts, who were daily called on to interpret that law, it was convenient that the original Act, and all the amendments thereto, should be consolidated, but that only showed more clearly the necessity for proceeding with every care and deliberation in doing so. With respect to some of the new provisions incorporated in this Act, he found that in sub-section 39 of section 9, the hon. gentleman proposed to enact that stone, gravel or other material required for a railway, might be taken for railway purposes at any distance from the railway works, and power was further given by this section to pass over or through the land of people who lived between the railway and the place from whence the material was to be taken.

Under section 38, this power could not be exercised by the railway company until after a plan of the required works—setting forth the powers and rights which the company intended to use and exercise, had been duly filed in the proper office, and due notice thereto given—while the power and authority given by subsection 39, might be invoked or exercised without the filing of any such plan or the giving of any such notice. Parliament should be exceedingly cautious in giving to any company the extraordinary powers conferred by section 39, powers that may be exercised in defiance of and to the injury and damage of individual proprietors, and without taking the preliminary steps required by the General Railway Act. He thought they ought not to be allowed to exercise the powers conferred by sections 38 and 39, except on precisely the same conditions as were imposed by the old Railway Act before a company could take possession of the roadway or any property required for the railway. The proposed amendments went further than that, and he was decidedly opposed to them.

MR. TUPPER said he thought there was reason for that, and that was the mere laying down of a pipe or the carrying of water for a distance, was a very different thing from acquiring the fee simple of a property. Whatever injury was done to the property was to be settled by arbitration.

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked if there ought not to be some limit as to the distance in the case of stone and gravel pits. He thought the distance from the line should be limited.

MR. MACKENZIE said that this was in accordance with the view of the Railway Committee. The same provision had been accorded to certain railway companies, and could not now well be refused.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On subsection 38 of section 9,

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said that this subsection seemed to convey very extensive powers to railway companies. It gave them the power to take possession of lands for a term of years, or in perpetuity or as they might think proper. It appeared to him that if lands were only acquired for a term of years, they should be put in the same position as when originally taken possession of by the company.

MR. TUPPER said of course it was not to be expected that the railway companies were going to return the lands in the same condition, after having paid for them.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said what he objected to, was that the company should have the power of crossing a man's land without filing a claim of the piece of ground they proposed to take, and giving the necessary notice before they could exercise the powers given by this Statute. There were larger powers given under this section than was given under almost any other Statute. He found one of the Acts with respect to the Corporation of the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway Company, that the powers only extended to the construction over the land.

MR. MILLS said the 19th section of this Bill gave a very large power, which applied to the lands situated any distance from the road, as well as those over which the road ran. This was giving to a private corporation powers of greater extent than were possessed by the Government. While it might be convenient to get lands a short distance from the road for gravel-pits, and such purposes; yet to give the company absolute powers of this sort was unprecedented, and a dangerous encroachment on the rights of citizens.

MR. TUPPER said the whole Bill was based on the principle that the construction of a railway was of public value, not like the building of a house—an advantage to the individual, but of benefit to the community at large. The hon. gentleman knew that the owner of a gravel-pit would give a large sum of money to have a railway brought into the neighbourhood of his farm, but the moment it was there, would exact enormous terms for the use of the gravel-pit, if he found the company at his mercy. If there were no means by which a quarry of stone or bed of gravel could be utilised, except by private agreement, the company would be at the mercy of private individuals. As these works promoted the trade of the country, and were of great advantage to the parties whose property lay in proximity to the line, there should be some means by which the persons promoting the public benefit should be protected from undue exactions on the part of those whom they benefited. All experience proved that the interests of private individuals were perfectly safe as between themselves and corporations and governments. Experience had taught promoters of railway enterprises the absolute necessity of having some such means to protect themselves from undue exactions.

MR. MILLS said the parties who had property in the vicinity might be benefited, but that was a common benefit. A gravel pit might be taken possession of which was situated miles away from the railway, and where it might be nearer another railway, and might be rather injured than otherwise by the construction of the road.

MR. TUPPER: The arbitrator would take that into consideration.

MR. MILLS said the owner of the property might not want to part with it. The Bill proposed to compel the party to sell whether he wished to or not.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

ELIZA MARIA CAMPBELL RELIEF BILL.

[BILL 99.]

(Mr. Macdougall.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. MACDOUGALL said the House was aware that in this class of Bills it had been the practice that the enquiry and investigation of evidence should be had in the Senate. Mr. Campbell, the husband of the present petitioner, applied to Parliament in 1876, for a Bill of divorce against his wife, for the alleged crime of adultery. That petition was referred to a Committee of the House, the wife appearing in her defence, and its allegations were investigated. Evidence was taken at great length before a Committee of nine Senators, presided over by a gentleman of distinguished ability as a statesman, and a lawyer of considerable eminence. After that investigation of fourteen days, the Committee came almost to the unanimous decision that the petitioner had utterly failed to make out his charge against his wife. In the course of that investigation, on the examination of his witnesses, including the petitioner himself, and witnesses for the defence, it appeared that the husband had treated his wife with great cruelty, that he deserted her, and removed his children from her custody on a false pretence, making no charge against her at that time, but leaving her to suppose that he had gone on an ordinary visit to his relatives. On his return, he took steps to eject her from her home, by preventing her from receiving any aid from friends—giving notice to tradespeople and others not to supply her with necessaries, as he would not be responsible for them; in short, endeavouring to starve her out. For a month she maintained the unequal struggle, when finding she was not likely to give up the domicile, he proceeded with two constables, under an alleged warrant—not a real warrant at all—and those men, pretending they were officers of the law, took his wife violently from the bed in which she lay, under an attack of illness, carried her down stairs, and threw her out on the verandah, in a cruel, heartless, brutal manner. She was taken in by some of her friends in the neighbourhood, and from that time to this had been supported by them. Therefore, he (Mr. Macdougall) had felt it his duty as her counsel, at the time, to present to the Senate a petition in her behalf, charging desertion and cruelty, and demanding the usual relief in such cases. After examining the allegations of that petition, and taking further evidence, the Committee felt satisfied that the charges of desertion and cruelty were sufficiently and satisfactorily made out. Her petition prayed that in that event the Bill which he had introduced into Parliament might be so amended as to give to her the ordinary relief given in all civilised countries, under such circumstances—divorce a mensa et thoro, or separation from bed and board, with an allowance for support. The Committee, after two or three days' investigation and a careful review of all the evidence, concluded that she was legally entitled to that remedy. At this point the question arose as to whether the Parliament of the Dominion had the constitutional authority, in dealing with questions of marriage and divorce, to grant such a remedy in a case of that kind. The Committee concluded that Parliament and the Senate, as a co-ordinate branch of Parliament, had that authority; and the Senate ratified that decision, after a lengthened discussion, by a decisive vote, and the Bill was passed in 1877, giving this woman a separation a mensa et thoro, and imposing on him the duty of paying a sufficient sum for her support, giving her also the custody of one of the children. That Bill failed, in consequence of a technical objection, raised by the Standing Orders Committee of this House, namely, that no notice had been given of the application, in that Session, although the parties were still before Parliament. The Bill had been postponed from the Session in which it originated to the next Session, which, he thought the Senate had full power to do, and that the House of Commons, as a matter of comity, ought to have taken notice of that fact. But the Committee on Standing Orders held that there was no proof of notice having been given to the husband, although he was in Court all the time. Her application was, on that ground, disposed of for that Session. Next Session the wife applied to Parliament, by petition, for a suspension of these rules in her case, when objection was taken in the Private Bills Committee of the Senate, that she had not given six months' notice of her application. The Senate had passed her Bill in the previous Session, and her petition was then before the House, asking to be allowed to sue in forma pauperis, being without means; and, although she prayed to have the rules respecting notice suspended—a very common practice in both Houses—yet the Private Bills Committee, by a majority of one or two, held that the rules of the House should, in her case, be strictly enforced, and so her cause was lost for that Session. A new, and, he hoped, a juster Parliament having been elected in 1878, and notice having been given in the ordinary way, as if for a new Bill, Mrs. Campbell appeared before the Senate during the present Session to urge her claim for justice. Evidence was again taken in support of the allegations in her petition, and her husband appeared to oppose her application. He appeared by counsel, and had an opportunity of producing further evidence, but offered none. He cross-examined her and made some objections visa voce, but, notwithstanding his representations, the Committee again reported the preamble as proved. The Bill reported by the Committee was passed by a decisive majority, after lengthened debates on the constitutional question, and the loss of several votes on that ground which were in her favour on the merits of her case. That Bill was now before this House for its concurrence. He would move presently that the Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Private Bills for their examination and report. The ground upon which Mrs. Campbell was asking for the Bill which had passed the Senate was, that her husband, without just or legal cause, had deserted her, and had, therefore, made himself liable to provide for her necessities. By that desertion he had given her the right enjoyed by all married women in all civilised countries, of applying for this kind of relief. It was necessary to make this point clear, for he knew that in the House, and in the country, there was a very large number of persons who thought that it was not expedient or proper that Parliament under any circumstances should grant divorce a vinculo—divorce from the marriage bond. This Parliament had been in the habit of overriding that opinion in cases of adultery, and divorces a vinculo have been granted, though not very frequently. But he would call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that this case was not objectionable on the religious or moral grounds so often urged against divorce Bills. It was not divorce a vinculo. It was simply separation. It was the very kind of divorce which, under the Civil Code of Lower Canada, was granted by the Courts of that Province, in a case like the present. In this case he was proposing to follow the jurisprudence and ordinary practice of their fellow-subjects in Quebec. The grounds for which Mrs. Campbell was proceeding would, in some countries, entitle her to absolute divorce; but she did not ask for that, she did not ask to be relieved from the obligation of the marriage bond. She merely demanded, what in England is called judicial separation—to be placed in the position of a feme sole, except that she did not ask for the privilege of marrying again. In all other respects, she claimed, by reason of the circumstances proved in evidence—and which, if necessary, could be proved again—that she is entitled, according to the law of all civilised countries, and, therefore, of this country, to be legally separated from her husband. Unfortunately, in Ontario, persons in her case were obliged to come to Parliament for this form of remedy. There were judicial tribunals in other Provinces for such purposes, but not in Ontario, and no authority was vested in the existing Courts which would enable them to grant judicial separation. The only remedy there was alimony, which might be granted or refused by a Judge of the Court of Chancery. But, in this case, he contended that Mrs. Campbell was entitled to a higher and more complete remedy. The point was raised in a paper circulated by the husband, that these proceedings were a reflection upon the Courts of Ontario—that we were making of Parliament a Court of Appeal from the judicial decisions of the Courts of Ontario. But this was not an appeal from the decision of any Court. There had been no decision in any Court which legally convicted Mrs. Campbell of the crime of adultery. He was able to produce the judicial decision of the Chancellor of the Court of Chancery on this very point, and as so much had been said about it in the other House, and might be repeated here, he would read the Chancellor's judgment. He would here state that, notwithstanding the decision of the Committee of the Senate, and the passage of this Bill in 1877, the husband of Mrs. Campbell applied to the Local Legislature in—he (Mr. Macdougall) must say—a clandestine manner. He applied for an amendment to the Law of Dower, for the purpose of enabling him to deprive this lady of her legal right in his estates, in the event of the predecease of her husband. This clandestine amendment of the law was not observed, owing to the hurried way in which amendments were made, in what was called the “Omnibus Act” of that Session. It was not made in a Private Bill, but in manuscript, at the last stage in Committee. It had not been observed by him, although a member of the Assembly, and he was not aware of its existence until it appeared in the Statute-book. By it a husband was permitted, in any case in which his wife had lived apart from him for two years, no matter under what circumstances, provided she could not obtain alimony, to apply to the Courts for an order by which his property could be sold free from her dower. Of course it was an amendment to the existing law, for the purpose of meeting this particular case, and of course the husband promptly applied to Vice-Chancellor Blake, who, feeling no doubt that it would be an outrage to put this villainous law in force behind Mrs. Campbell’s back, and permit her husband to discharge his lands, of her claim, without her knowledge, refused to act ex-parte. Notice was, therefore, given to her, and it was by this means he (Mr. Macdougall) became aware of the existence of the law. The Legislature was then sitting; he (Mr. Macdougall) raised the question in the House, and an amendment of the law was introduced. While the matter was still pending before the Court of Chancery, the law by which Campbell hoped to defeat his wife even after his death, was repealed, and the repealing Act was promptly sanctioned by the Governor. It was the judgment in this case which established his contention that Mrs. Campbell had not been found guilty of adultery by any Court in Ontario. He would read a few passages :

“The exemplification of judgment in Campbell versus Gordon is not a matter of record affecting the petitioner’s wife, as she was not a party to that record; and there is no other evidence before me to establish the fact of adultery. The only other evidence upon that point is that of the wife; and by her the alleged fact is denied.”—(25 Grant, p. 483.)

“My conclusion is that there is no legal evidence of the fact of adultery by the wife, and in the absence of such proof, it is not made to appear that she has been living apart from her husband, under circumstances to which the Statute would apply.”—(Ib.)

That judgment was pronounced in 1878, and he hoped he would not again hear the statement in Parliament that, by doing justice to Mrs. Campbell, we were reversing the decision of a Court. Another point was brought under the notice of that learned Judge, one of the most distinguished in the Ontario Courts, that had been the subject of discussion in the other branch of the Legislature, and might possibly be raised here. That was, whether the 91st clause of the Confederation Act, which declared that “all matters coming within the classes of subjects” enumerated as being within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament, included the matters dealt with by this Bill. Among the enumerated subjects they found “Marriage and Divorce.” On that point, Chancellor Spragge, although it was not necessary to be decided in that case, said :

“By the British North America Act, exclusive legislative authority is conferred upon the Parliament of Canada, in among other matters, ‘Marriage and Divorce,’ while among the exclusive powers conferred upon Provincial Legislatures is ‘the solemnisation of marriage in the Province,’ proceedings are now pending before the Dominion Parliament, and while they are so, it would be unseemly, and, I think, improper, to make such an order as is prayed for in this petition.”—(25 Grant p. 484.)

Why “unseemly,” if Parliament had, in the opinion of the learned Judge, no jurisdiction in the case? It appeared to him (Mr. Macdougall) perfectly clear, from an examination of the clauses of the Act, both affirmatively and negatively, that the whole subject of marriage and divorce in this Dominion was placed under the legislative control of this Parliament. Then, if, as he had said, there was no power in the Courts of Ontario, nor in the Legislature of Ontario, to deal with this question, it was the duty of this Parliament, upon general principles, to apply the remedy which it had the power to apply in a case properly before it. To refuse in such a case, was to ignore right and deny justice. All that the wife had to do, under this application, was to prove, as Mrs. Campbell had proved in the other branch of Parliament, the fact of desertion and the fact of cruelty. The Senate, on the evidence before it, came to the conclusion that there were sufficient grounds set forth in the preamble of this Bill, to justify a legal separation of these parties. He would call attention to one or two features of the Bill, not usually found in Parliamentary Divorce Bills. If the husband choose to set apart an adequate portion of his property for the benefit of his wife, he may relieve himself from this semi-annual demand, but he must do so under the approval of a Judge of the Supreme Court; and if he chose to become reconciled with his wife, the Act becomes inoperative, and the parties may live together again, and, as it were, start anew as man and wife. He (Mr. Macdougall) had seen in the newspapers, and the proposition had come to the knowledge of the Committee of the other House, that the husband, finding at last that the Senate was determined to re-affirm its previous decision, and that in all probability this House would concur, came to Ottawa and offered to be reconciled to his wife, but upon such conditions that the wife felt she could not, with due regard to her own honour, and respect for the position of her children, family and friends, accede to. What did he propose? That he should take her into his house as a sort of upper servant, to look after his table and his children, but he would not even promise that she should occupy her proper position in his household, or in any way guarantee her future happiness therein. Mrs. Campbell declined. She made to her husband what he (Mr. Macdougall) repeated in her name to the House, a perfectly fair proposition. She said to him, "Make no further opposition to this Bill. You say it is the reputation and position of our children you are anxious about, and that, therefore, you are willing to receive their mother, and forget the past. Will it not be greatly to the advantage of our children, in their future career in life, to have the verdict of Parliament in my favour? Will it not be a comfort and a benefit to them to have it recorded on the Statute-book of their country that your charge was not sustained; that your proof was not sufficient to satisfy that critical and dignified body? Will it not afford our children an immense advantage, when this unhappy dispute is referred to, to be able to say, 'Our father was mistaken; he was under a delusion; he was the victim of a conspiracy, and the fact is recorded in the Statute-book of our country, in the form of a solemn Act of Parliament?'" She spoke as a wise and prudent and loving mother would instinctively feel in such a case. Her reasoning was unanswerable; but her unreasoning and vindictive husband refused, and gave the lie to his proposal for reconciliation by distributing amongst the members of this House a printed paper containing copies of letters alleged to have been written by her, but which were proved before the Committee of the other House to have been extracts from writings found in her desk, which were ingeniously patched together and made to appear as if they were the actual letters written to her paramour. The evidence clearly showed that nearly all these extracts, harmless and unmeaning as such, were copied from books. She was addicted to literature, which proved an unfortunate pastime in her case, for the most condemnatory evidence—until its weakness was exposed—were extracts from a book which he (Mr. Macdougall) produced from the library. He was sorry to say that even a learned Judge drew the illogical inference that, because a letter, expressed in familiar and affectionate terms, was found in her desk addressed to one party, therefore she ought to be found guilty of adultery with another party. But Mr. Campbell forgot to mention in his paper, or petition, that his wife had recovered by the verdict of a jury, $1,000 damages for the false charges made against her, and that was one of the most material facts in the history of this case. He moved the second reading of the Bill.

Bill read the second time.

[BILL 98.]

(Mr. Tupper.)

THIRD READING.

House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. McCALLUM said he desired to see the Act amended so as to compel railway companies to keep up their fences. Under existing legislation, the cars might kill people's cattle, and there was no redress for it. The Railway Act, as it stood, appeared so as to allow the companies to evade responsibility for these losses. He hoped to see the Act amended so as to compel them to keep up their fences or be liable to a penalty if they did not do so.

MR. TUPPER said it was not contemplated to take up this Act and amend it in such particulars as hon. gentlemen might desire. It was inexpedient to introduce any new amendments now in the sense proposed by the hon. gentleman, unless they took up and went over the whole Act. All the Government proposed to do now, was to insert the two provisions he had alluded to. However, the Government would carefully consider the suggestion, and he hoped that any other hon. gentleman, who desired to see the Act amended in any particular, would give the Government the benefit of their suggestions which would be carefully considered during recess with the view of taking the matter up next Session. He could not see the necessity of the alteration the hon. gentleman had spoken of, because it was already provided that the railway company should make fences, and that, until such fences were duly made, the company should be liable for all damages occurring, by such negligence, to animals on the railways.

MR. GUTHRIE said this section rendered the company liable for damages for cattle killed, but the object of compelling them to maintain the fence was to protect the public, because, if cattle were allowed to stray on the railway track, they might throw trains off the track and injure the passengers. The object of the law was two-fold; but he took it that they must have some penal clause by which they could punish the company if their trains killed the inhabitants' cattle, or injured the lives of the travelling public by neglecting their duty. He knew the circumstances of a railway company in the west, where the fences were burned down, two or three years ago, for five or six miles, and to this day they had not been built up. Those who lived along the railway, and had cattle killed, could get no redress, because the company were worth nothing. They were thus running their trains and endangering the lives of the public, and there was no way of punishing them.

MR. McCALLUM said, in a case he was aware of, the company had built the fences and let them go down, and, to his own knowledge, as many as five head of cattle had been killed at a time, without their owners getting redress. It was high time the law was amended that allowed such carryings on as that. The hon. gentleman said they were now consolidating the law; then this was just the time to make the necessary amendments. He hoped the Government would accept his amendment.

MR. TUPPER said he could not accept it. This was a matter that required the study of professional men to deal with it in all its bearings, and nothing could be more injudicious than hurriedly to accept amendments while the Bill was in Committee. He understood his hon. friend to say that the company had neglected to put up the fences. The law said that, until the fences were up, they were liable for damages. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Guthrie) said that cattle strayed on the road and were killed. If the hon. gentleman would search the English law, he would not find any language to meet that case more thoroughly than the expression of the law which said, "that if the company were guilty of negligence in not keeping up the fences, they should be held responsible for damages." People had the best of protection under the law. He hoped his hon. friend would not press the amendment at this moment, because he could not accept it.

MR. McCALLUM said he considered it was the duty of whoever had charge of this Bill to amend the law so as to remove the grievances he had complained of. The hon. gentleman said he had no time now, but he (Mr. McCallum) was not responsible for that. If the hon. gentleman had no time to consider the Bill why did he bring it in?

MR. DOMVILLE said the rights of the public should be guarded with respect to these fences. He could point to cases on the Intercolonial Railway where cattle had been killed, and no redress obtained by their owners.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he quite agreed with the hon. the Minister of Public Works, that it was not possible to amend this Bill at the present time. He understood that the hon. member was one of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and he desired to ask whether such a case as the one referred to by his hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) should not be referred to that Committee.

MR. McDONALD (Picton) said he quite agreed with the hon. the Minister of Public Works, that the citation which he had made from the law was strongly drawn, and if the company allowed the fences to remain down, they were answerable for damages. In the face of this provision of the law, he did not see any necessity for any amendment.

MR. SHAW said that the Courts in Ontario had frequently decided that parties could not recover for cattle killed by railways, at such points as the Statutes prescribed, if the cattle were running at large. The 79th section of this Act prescribed that cattle going at large within a certain distance of any railway crossing, or if they went on to the track, they were trespassing, and the price of them could not be recovered against the railway company. The object of the amendment was to compel the railway companies to keep up the fences, so as to avoid the decisions which the Courts had arrived at.

MR. TUPPER said that, last Session, an amendment was passed to the Railway Act, which, to a large extent, met the difficulty as to the neglect of the railway company. The complaint, then, was that, when cattle were killed, the investigation was relegated to officers of the railway, who were naturally liable to decide that the claimant was not entitled to damages. An amendment of the law was enacted last year, under which the Government were authorised, where parties were not satisfied with the decision, to have one arbitrator sent to make a report to the Government. He thought, under the operation of that Act, most causes of complaint had been removed. He did not think there was any subordinate ground of complaint now.

On section 17,

MR. DOMVILLE said he was constrained at this point to ask in regard to the Intercolonial, that some justice should be done to the people of New Brunswick. When the elections took place on the 17th September, he had hoped that he had heard the last complaints in regard to the Intercolonial Railway. He regretted to say, however, that much dissatisfaction existed now. He had received a number of letters upon the subject, and he would, with the permission of the House, refer to the necessity of so legislating that the rates would not discriminate as between one man and another, and as between one point of the Dominion and another. His people thought it hard lines when they had, under the National Policy, to obtain their produce in the West, to have to pay more for freight from Montreal to Sussex, which was 40 miles nearer Montreal than St. John—that they should be compelled to pay $10 a load more than the people of St. John, and that, under the present tariff, it cost more to take potatoes and cereals to Ontario from New Brunswick than to bring down flour, which was unjust. He said this without any feeling except the feeling that justice should be done to all parts of the Dominion. He thought if they were to have a National Policy, that this discrimination should not be made against one section of the country. He might make a reference in order to show that certain industries obtained a favourable discrimination. There was one manufactory who obtained a priority over other manufacturers, and his goods were carried at a reduced rate. In his humble opinion, these discriminations were not justice. It was stated that railway men considered this all right; it might be so, but it was not common sense. He would not read the letters of complaint which he had in his possession, but would merely ask the hon. the Minister of Public Works if he could give him some assurance that the people of the Lower Provinces would not be discriminated against. He thought he had a right to ask this, not on personal grounds, not on party grounds, but on the ground of simple justice.

MR. TUPPER said his hon. friend from King's had raised a very important question. He regretted the hon. gentleman had raised it on this Bill, as he (Mr. Tupper) had proposed that the explanation should have been on the Estimates; however, the time was appropriate, and they might as well proceed with this discussion at this time as any other. He regretted very much that he was not able to give the hon. gentleman the assurance which he had asked. He could assure the hon. gentleman the subject had not escaped his notice. It had received the most careful consideration it was possible to give it, and he was free to confess he saw no solution to the difficulty. At first sight the ground of complaint appears to be a difficult one. The distance from Toronto to Halifax was further than the distance from Toronto to St. John, and the hon. gentleman complained that the charge for carrying freight was greater for carrying it a short distance. Every person knew that the distance from Toronto to Sussex was very much less than the distance from Toronto to St. John; yet the fact remained that the charge for carrying goods from Toronto to Sussex was larger than from Toronto to St. John. He saw no means of removing the difficulty. In the first place the hon. gentleman said they should disregard commercial principles in relation to the management of the railway; that the object was to produce an interchange of commodities, and, therefore, whether it costs the country less or more, they must make the rates of freight to suit the wishes of the people. He did not think that he or any other Minister of Public Works could ask this Parliament to spend more than half a million a year in paying the deficit on the Intercolonial Railway. He did not think it possible for any person holding the high and responsible position he did to venture to ask the House to incur any larger expenditure for the purpose of operating the Intercolonial Railway than had previously been incurred. If that were the case, they must deal with it as a commercial enterprise. The Government was powerless in this matter, even if they were disposed to meet the difficulty alluded to. The rates on flour from Ontario to the Maritime Provinces were as low as it was possible to make them consistently with justice to the whole country, in relation to the cost of carrying it. The road, instead of paying, was run at a heavy loss, and, in order to promote traffic, the rates had been placed as low by his predecessor as he believed they could be. But he might be asked why was it they charged a larger amount for carrying the same article a shorter distance. The reason was perfectly plain. Halifax and St. John, N.B., were points at which the Intercolonial Railway had competition, and every person knew that the prime factor in cutting rates was competition. In Halifax the competition was keener with the Intercolonial than it was at St. John, because there was a line of steam communication running from Portland to Halifax in direct competition with the railway, and, in order to retain the business, the railway must reduce their rates. At the intervening stations, however, they were able to maintain their rates, because there was no competition; but if they desired to reduce the rates, in accordance with the wishes of the hon. gentleman's constituents, they were powerless to do so, because the rate was made by the Grand Trunk Railway—it was made by the parties who transmitted freight to the Intercolonial for carriage. He would tell his hon. friend that the Grand Trunk Railway Company was making a demand upon the Intercolonial Railroad of a considerable sum of money, because they allowed freight that was rated for St. John to stop at these way stations on the road, at the same charge that was made to St. John. The Grand Trunk demanded that they should be recouped, and that the Intercolonial should refund to them the difference, consequently the Government had no power to stop at Sussex or Moncton, or any other place on the line, and deliver goods at the same rate that was charged through to St. John, without paying back to the Grand Trunk, the difference between the rates to the way stations and the point from which the traffic was taken. The hon. gentleman would, therefore, see that the rates to St. John and Halifax were regulated by competition, and that they were utterly powerless to reduce the rates to the intermediate stations.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked why should not the railroad carry the flour up to these places, which were a very little further off, at their own expense? Why these people should be thrown into the hands of large places such as Halifax and St. John, was more than he could understand. They were told that, under the National Policy, they were going to make iron for the Upper Provinces. Iron could not be freighted from Halifax to Montreal under two or three times the price for which English iron could be freighted. They were met with the argument that the English iron was through freight; admitting that, still, if through freight was to go at that rate, of what good was the duty on iron? He could not see why the English iron should be carried cheaper than native iron. Five years they had been groaning under the trouble and tribulation of that railroad, and to-day there was very little improvement. He did not blame the Minister of Public Works, because he had a great deal of work to attend to, but brought up the matter to see whether some solution of the difficulty might not be arrived at. He brought this matter before the House, the Government and the country; it was his duty to do so, and the Minister of Public Works must, hereafter, take the responsibility if the necessary alterations were not made, as it was not in his power to remedy what he considered a serious injustice to the Lower Provinces.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) asked if the Intercolonial tariff discriminated in favour of Spring Hill Mines and against Pictou Mines. He understood that an important memorial had been given to the Government by the Pictou Mining Association in reference to this matter, and he knew that a very short time ago the tariff was that, from Spring Hill, a cargo of coal was carried 91 miles for $16, and from Elmsdale 71 miles for $13. He had, within the last couple of weeks, received a number of letters asking him to bring up this matter.

Mr. TUPPER said it was necessary to have lower rates to Halifax and St. John, because the railway met keen competition from steamers at those points. His hon. friend said, why not make the rate to St. John and carry it back to these way-stations for nothing. The moment that would be done, everyone would send flour to St. John by water to be distributed all over the country by the Intercolonial for nothing. With regard to iron, the Londonderry Mines were bringing all the power they could to bear on the Government to induce them to reduce the very low rates which were judiciously arranged by the late manager, Mr. Brydges, on the ground that they carried iron that came from England in the steamers at a lower rate. The Government did not make the rate on the English iron. It came in connection with a mass of through freight, which paid foreign rates. The question was, whether they should take the through rate that was made in England, and have the business come to Halifax, or put up the rate and drive that business to Portland. The statement that there was any discrimination in favour of Spring Hill Mines was entirely unfounded.

Mr. DOMVILLE said the hon. the Minister of Public Works stated he had not proved his case. He had, however, proved that English iron could be carried from Halifax to the Upper Provinces at one-half the rate of native iron. Handicapped in that direction, the native iron could not compete with the English iron. He hoped the Minister of Public Works would find means to remedy this difficulty.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) said the member for King's (Mr. Domville), did not put the matter fairly. If it were a question of English iron remaining at Halifax, and thence being shipped to the West at half the rate of native iron, there would be reason in his argument. But, unfortunately, that was not the case. The rate was determined in England, not in relation to the Intercolonial Railway, but by the rate for which that iron could be brought into any part of Canada from England. There were other ways of getting into Canada besides by the Intercolonial, and were the rate raised, the iron would be sent to American ports, and thence into Canada. It was not fair to compare the freight from Halifax on English iron with that on native iron. The comparison should be made between what it cost to bring iron from England to Montreal or Toronto, and the freight from Halifax to those cities on native iron. This question of through rates was an exceedingly difficult one to settle, and one which would always give occasion for complaint against the Government, while they retained railways under their control.

MR. DOULL said he had received a letter from the Secretary of the Pictou Mining Association which confirmed the statement of the hon. member for Shelburn (Mr. Robertson) that there was discrimination in favour of the Spring Hill Mines. He had forwarded the letter to the Minister of Public Works, who, he trusted, would see that this matter was adjusted. With respect to iron, the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) was right. Iron was carried from Great Britain to Montreal at a through rate of freight of $3 per ton, while iron from the Nova Scotia mines had to pay something like $4. That was most unfair and should be altered.

MR. GUTHRIE said in regard to the 25th and other sections, many of their larger railways did not come under their operation, and it was desirable they should. One of these provisions was, that railways should be held liable to the public for any negligence or omission in handling goods, notwithstanding any notice, condition, or declaration to the contrary. In shipping by a railway, the shipper was often obliged to sign a contract containing a number of conditions exempting the company from liability. Under the second subsection of section 2, the Grand Trunk, Great Western, and Northern Railroads—all the great railroads—escaped liability, because not constructed under an Act of Parliament of the Dominion. Railways subsequently constructed under this and other clauses were liable. He would suggest that those provisions of this Act be made to apply, not only to every railway built under the authority of an Act of this Parliament, but to every railway subject to its legislative authority, and as the great railways are subject to it, they ought to be governed by this Act.

MR. SHAW said the Bill should be amended so as to require sounding of the whistle as well as the ringing of the bell, or without the ringing of the bell, on the approach of trains to crossings and stations. At present, accidents occurred from the bells not being heard.

MR. TUPPER said that, with reference to the suggestion of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), the adoption of his amendment would involve a substantial alteration in the law. He would consider the subject, however. He did not see why the law had not been made applicable to all the laws within the jurisdiction of Parliament. It was the same with reference to the amendment of the member for South Bruce (Mr. Shaw). A substantial difference would be made in the law, involving a penalty. Doubtless the amendment suggested would be a great improvement, but, as it involved penalties where they did not exist, he was not then prepared to adopt it; it would be considered, however.

MR. GUTHRIE said that, if his contention was correct, a change would be absolutely necessary, because, otherwise, there would be nothing to bind those older railway companies, who had no Railway Act referring to them. He hoped attention would be given to this matter at once. He thought that Ministers would find it to the interest of the public to make those clauses refer to all railway companies.

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

MR. TUPPER moved the third reading of the Bill.

MR. MILLS said he desired it should be reported as carried on a division.

Neither he himself nor the House had had time to consider a Bill of such extent and importance at this advanced period of the Session. It should have been brought up earlier in the House, when there was little or nothing to do.

MR. TUPPER said he had resisted some proposals for amendments that appeared to be quite reasonable, because there was no intention of altering the law, except the two particular points noticed. Every possible precaution had been taken to secure the most perfect accuracy. He did not quite catch what fell from the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Doull), but, if he understood him to refer to the accuracy of the statement of the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. Robertson), he was labouring under a mistake. There had been no discrimination against the Pictou coal mines, or in favour of the Spring Hill—the rate per ton was the same in both cases. Unless there was a pretence that coal should be carried 100 miles by the Intercolonial Railway for nothing, he knew of no ground for complaint on the part of the member for Pictou. Then there was this to be considered. The Spring Hill coal mines had been giving all their business, summer as well as winter, to the Intercolonial. They furnished a vast amount of freight for the road, and at a rate which, although low, had been somewhat profitable, whilst the Pictou coal mines only used the road during the winter, when the cost of carriage was much greater than in summer. Under these circumstances, he could not see there was any reasonable claim on the part of the latter company that coal should be carried from their mine over the road for nothing.

MR. DOULL said the hon. the Minister of Public Works would see the letters that he (Mr. Doull) had forwarded to him to-day from the Secretary of the Coal Mining Association of Pictou, which confirmed the statement made by the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. Robertson). Whether it was correct or not, he was not prepared to say. So far as giving the preference to Spring Hill, on account of it giving its business to the railroad in summer as well as winter, was concerned, he did not think that was a good argument.

MR. MILLS.

MR. TUPPER said there was no preference that he knew of. The same rate per ton and mile was charged from Pictou as from Spring Hill. He had asked the gentleman in charge of the Intercolonial Railway if he had made a careful examination of the communications from the Mining Association in Pictou. He said he had, and that there was not the slightest ground for the impression that there was a discrimination in favour of the Spring Hill Mines, that precisely the same charge was made in each case.

Bill read the third time, on a division, and passed.

SUPPLY.

XXVI.—EXCISE.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

181	{	Salaries of Officers and Inspectors of Excise.....	$175,240 00
		Travelling Expenses, Rent, Fuel, Stationery, etc....	35,000 00
		To pay Collectors of Customs allowance on duties collected by them.....	2,000 00
		Preventive Service.....	5,500 00

XXVII.—CULLING TIMBER.

182	{	Quebec Office.....	$62,900 00
		Montreal Office.....	4,600 00

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said he saw that the estimate for the ensuing year was $67,500, whilst last year it was only $49,000. He desired to ask the hon. the Minister if he was prepared to accept the suggestion he (Mr. White) made last year, that there would be a reduction in the cost of measuring charges at the port of Quebec. During the last few years this service had produced a considerable sum in excess of the requirements. This excess, which, during the past eleven years, amounted to $40,211, as shown by the Public Accounts, had been a special tax on the trade during that period. He believed it was about time there should be a reduction in the charges at that port, to such an extent as would make the amount of collections more than would be required to meet expenses.

MR. BABY said that, instead of there being an excess, there had been, altogether, since Confederation, a deficit of some $340.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said the Public Accounts showed an entirely different state of affairs:—

In 1868 there was a surplus of.....	$	324
1869 do deficit of.....		4,000
1870 do surplus of.....		7,000
1871 do do		1,000
1872 do do		8,880
1873 do do		10,000
1874 do do		13,000
1875 do do		8,000
1876 do do		5,000
1877 do deficit of		1,044
1878 do surplus of.....		6,734

Adding the surpluses together, and deducting therefrom the deficits, it showed a total surplus of $40,211. Against that, however, the returns showed an uncollected balance of $29,981. But that uncollected balance could not be assumed as entirely lost to the country, because he knew that a number of specifications, as a general thing, upon which charges were made, remained in the office until the charges upon them were paid. In a season of depression, such as that undergone by the lumber trade during the last two years, very few of those engaged in the trade took out their specifications, for the simple reason that they were unable to dispose of their lumber. He presumed that the statement of the Minister of Inland Revenue was correct, that a larger amount had been expended than was received; yet, he took it that there would be a surplus, as almost the whole amount owing to the Department would be collected. Therefore, taking these circumstances into consideration, he contended that a reduction should be made in the cost of measuring timber.

MR. LAURIER said his hon. friend, the Minister of Inland Revenue, had, he thought, referred to one class of cullers, the cullers of square timber. Under the law of 1876 or 1877, they were to be paid at the rate of $700 per annum. The hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White) knew as well as anybody that the cullers complained that they were not overpaid, and he (Mr. Laurier) knew, from his short passage through the Department, that they had been strongly pressing for an increased tariff. But he did not think it would be possible to meet their wishes, unless the tariff were reconsidered both as far as the work was concerned and as far as the cullers were concerned. During the summer they had not much to do, but their whole year was lost, because they could not devote themselves to any other occupation. They had to report themselves from time to time to the office, and could not be long absent. He thought they should be better remunerated than at present. It would also be right and proper if the Minister could see his way clear to place the deal cullers on the same footing as the square cullers.

MR. CURRIER said the hon. gentleman from North Renfrew (Mr. White) had stated the fees for culling ought to be reduced. Considering the great falling off of timber, he would find it impossible to do that. This year, he was told, there would not be over 24 rafts going to Quebec, whereas last year there were from 75 to 140. Unless the expenses of the office in Quebec could be reduced, as well as the number of cullers, it would be impossible to reduce the fees charged for culling timber. He maintained that one-quarter of the cullers on the list last year could do all the work that was to be done this year. But while the present system prevailed the fees for culling could never be reduced. He thought, moreover, that the expenses of the officers might also be reduced, and if any vacancies occurred they need not be filled. He hoped the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue would look into the matter and see if some way could not be derived whereby the charges for culling would be reduced. He had nothing to say against the officers in that office; they did their duty, but what he found fault with was that there was not work enough for them to do.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) concurred in what had fallen from the hon. gentleman from Ottawa (Mr. Currier) that the number of officers might well be reduced. He desired to bear testimony to the very efficient manner in which the deputy supervisor and the cashier had performed their duties. They had given satisfaction to the trade, and if the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue could see his way to increase their salaries he would be doing them justice.

MR. BABY said that his predecessor, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) had stated that he (Mr. Baby) was mistaken in the statement he had made about the expenditure being less than the receipts in the culling of timber. He found by an official statement containing the receipts and payments of the Department in regard to the culling of timber from 1867 down to the 31st of March last, that there was a balance against the Government of $376.72. This statement showed all the fees from the culling of the square timber, the deals, and the staves, and it applied to both receipts and payments. The arrears amounted to $29,781. The hon. gentleman must know that the greater part of these arrears could not be collected, for he was sure, if there had been any possibility of collecting these arrears, his hon. predecessor would have done so. The arrears had not increased, he supposed, during his (Mr. Laurier's) time, and he hoped they would not during the present Administration. He did not see how the fees could be diminished. As to the deputy supervisor and the cashier at Quebec, he believed they were worthy officers, but it seemed to him that $1,600 a year, for the work they did during seven months of each year, was a sufficient salary, under the circumstances, and when compared to the salaries of other officers.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said these arrears were not so valueless as some supposed. In 1876, the arrears were $33,901, and in 1878, they had been reduced to $26,880. They were thus a fluctuating account, and formed an asset that was collectable.

MR. CURRIER said he was surprised that there should be so many arrears. Whenever he had anything to do with that office, he never could get a specification for culling without paying the charges. It was a grave matter for the officers to let specifications out of the office without getting paid for them. There must be something wrong somewhere, and he hoped the hon. Minister would look into it.

MR. WHITE.

In answer to Mr. HOOPER,

MR. BABY said he found these arrears when he came into office, and his intention was to collect them. He could not tell how they came to be so considerable, but was afraid there had been a screw loose somewhere in the previous administration of the Department.

MR. LAURIER said these arrears had been accumulating during a period of ten years. Some of them were tedious claims, arising out of a difference of opinion between the Department and the parties charged. He knew that a number of suits were now pending in Quebec for the collection of these arrears.

Vote agreed to.

XXVIII.—WEIGHTS AND MEASURES AND GAS.

183 Salaries of Deputy Inspectors of Weights and Measures... $40,800 00

In answer to Mr. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. BABY said he proposed to make the reduction of $14,000 in this item by reducing the number of deputy inspectors. There had been, in Ontario, forty-four of these officers; in Quebec, thirty-three; and in the other Provinces in a similar proportion. The intention of the Government was to appoint inspectors for the different Provinces to the number of seven for Ontario, four for Quebec, three for New Brunswick, three for Nova Scotia, one each for Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and British Columbia. In the large centres of Toronto, Montreal and Halifax, there would be two or three assistants. The intention of the Government was to increase somewhat the salaries of the inspectors in the large centres. Those in Quebec, Toronto and Montreal, $1,200 each, and the assistants would receive $500 each. In Ontario, under the new law, the number of officers, comprising inspectors and assistants, would be twenty-two; in Quebec, ten. He should retain, as much as possible, those who had performed their duties well, and discharge those who had not. He hoped that this reduction would meet the approbation of the House and country.

MR. ANGLIN said this was another instance in which the present Administration had disappointed their most earnest supporters and the people of the country. This Act was one they had declared entirely indefensible. He had hoped the Government would have introduced a measure to transfer the appointing of inspectors and regulating of their fees to the municipalities or counties.

MR. CURRIER said the law was a heavy tax on the people. It would be a great boon to have it repealed and let the people go back to the old arrangement.

MR. TUPPER said he had maintained this was one of the most important laws on the Statutes, and was always prepared to take his share of the responsibility of the measure. It had been rendered unpopular by bringing it into operation long before the Government were prepared to administer it effectually. A large number of officials were foisted on the country without having anything to do, or without having the machinery requisite for their work. The Act was absolutely necessary. The amount which had been swindled from the people through false weights and measures, was ample justification of the Act, and all that was required to convince the people of its usefulness, was a just administration of it.

MR. ORTON said he agreed with the hon. the Minister of Public Works, that this law was required; but he would have to get further information before he could exactly be convinced that all the evils complained of with regard to the operations of the Act under the late Administration, were removed. One of the principal complaints was, that the inspectors charged exorbitant rates, and when the people attempted to get their scales corrected by their own mechanics, they were found fault with, and the people were compelled to have them again examined by these men who charged exorbitant fees for their work. If that system were allowed to continue, the Act would be brought into further disrepute.

MR. BUNSTER said there was absolute necessity for this Act. In one of the collieries in British Columbia a riot took place, because the men felt they were being swindled by false weights and measures. Representations were made to the Local Government, who replied it was a Dominion affair, and they could do nothing in the matter. Now these were facts, and he hoped the Government would not wink in seeing that this law was vigorously enforced. At present the honest trader had no chance whatever in competing with the dishonest, who could use false weights and measures. He was sorry to hear the member for Ottawa (Mr. Currier), saying that the law should be done away with. What was to be done in that case—was every householder to keep scales in his house? It was the duty of the Government to appoint officers who would do their duty, and ensure justice to all.

MR. SPROULE said that the people in his district considered the law necessary, but complained of its Administration. He could confirm the remarks made as to the charges being double or treble the proper amount. He knew of an inspector, a very courteous man, who would advise traders to sell, to the farmers, scales troublesome to re-adjust, and purchase others, which was not remedying the evil, but merely shifting it from one class to another. Defective scales and measures should be entirely excluded from business. Another defect of the present administration of the law, was the excessive cost of inspection. He knew also of an inspector advising parties to purchase from one particular dealer, thus tending to create a monopoly, and giving colour to the suspicion of a speculation. The law was considered very good, but expensive in execution. The results were not supposed to commensurate the cost of its administration. This law, with that of the adulteration of foods, was among the most important on the Statute-book, and might be much more cheaply carried out.

MR. CURRIER said he did not affirm that the law was bad, but hitherto it had been impossible to carry it out properly; besides, it was too expensive. Possibly the change made by the Inland Revenue Department, last fall, would remedy the evil, though he did not expect much improvement. How often were those officers to make their inspection? They could not be expected more than once or twice a year, and people could imagine what might be done to falsify weights and scales between their visits, and when nobody was present to watch the offenders. If this service was left to the municipalities it might be made better and cost less.

Mr. HOOPER said that the administration of the Act was universally detested not only in his, but in the adjoining ridings, and the unanimous request to him was to vote for the repeal of the Bill. Unless some other system was adopted, the people would continue dissatisfied. If the law was properly carried out, it would be beneficial.

Mr. BERGIN said there could be no doubt that the Minister of Public Works was correct in observing that that was one of the most important measures on the Statute-book; but it was equally true that the administration of the law had been made so oppressive, and in many instances so unjust, that in some localities it was looked upon with detestation. The difficulty was not that the law was bad, but it had been badly administered. He trusted there would now be a change for the better. He would impress on the Minister of Inland Revenue the importance of being very careful in the selection of officers, who should be properly qualified for their duties, not only by education, but by a freedom from the meddlesome habit or the desire to exercise their authority excessively.

Mr. ANGLIN said he did not object to a proper inspection of weights and measures, but this law had so far proved insufficient, and become so unpopular in many districts, that hon. gentlemen on the other side had found it to their interest to denounce the administration of the law, and the law itself, throughout the country. They had not been told by Ministers what the administration of the law was henceforth to be, but simply that there was to be a reduction in the number of inspectors and sub-inspectors, and that the duties were to be discharged more efficiently, without being informed how this would be accomplished. Nothing had been said to satisfy the Committee that the law would be more efficiently administered. He thought it would be impossible to carry it out efficiently for the amount named, the country being so large, and the number of those who bought or sold by weight and measure being so great. How was the oppressive operation of the law to be remedied? The fees were fixed, and where weights or scales were condemned, they might be readjusted where the owners pleased, or better might be purchased. But, although it was absolutely necessary to get defective scales put aside or readjusted—that was what was regarded as so oppressive and troublesome—it was possible, in the cities and other large centres, to have efficient inspection. But the zeal of the officers was found fault with. They could not be efficient without becoming troublesome; they must examine and condemn when necessary. The law would be very troublesome in any way administered. They could have a system under which officers would inspect and pass all weights and measures and condemn nobody, and so satisfy all. He thought that the work could not be properly done with the proposed number of officers. Every trader should feel himself liable to be visited, at any moment, and punished were he guilty of fraud. The new would not, he thought, work better than the old system, and it would be better to empower the municipalities to appoint inspectors, and to clothe those officers with all necessary powers, including power to collect the requisite dues for their remuneration. Considering the unpopularity incurred by the late Government in connection with this Act, and all that had been said for some years past in the House and elsewhere by hon. gentlemen now at the Speaker's right, the hon. the Minister of Public Works could not reasonably imagine that he (Mr. Anglin) had gone out of his way to indulge in taunts on the subject.

Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Tupper) used very loud words about mal-administration of the law. It was very easy using general terms, but he (Mr. Mackenzie) would like the hon. gentleman to define more clearly where the mal-administration was. If the hon. gentleman said it consisted in appointing too many officials, he would tell him that the matter gave the Government a great deal of trouble, and the conclusion arrived at was that one officer to about 40,000 people was as near as possible what one officer could overtake in the way of work, and the appointments were made accordingly. These appointments were not all made at once. The hon. the Minister of Public Works stated they were made too early. He (Mr. Mackenzie) believed they were, simply because the Government had reason to believe that standards were available at once. But an unaccountable, unexpected delay in procuring these standards, which it was supposed would have been here in time, took place on the part of the officer of the Department, whose duty it was to obtain them. There could be no possible disposition on the part of the Government to appoint improper officers. There was no mal-administration in that. He counted ten gentlemen appointed when the present Government came into office, who were not fit for office. The saving proposed to be effected by the hon. gentlemen opposite, was simply by appointing fewer in number and imposing a larger area upon them. If the work was to be done at all, he denied that it could be done by the number supposed. It was mere speculation. There was no intelligent conclusion in the matter—it was purely a groping in the dark. The unpopularity attaching to one measure was owing to the excessive stringency with which the rules were carried out. He was amused when he found that such orders were issued, as required inspectors to stamp and obtain fees for every measure in hardware shops. Ten cents were charged in some cases upon the three-foot tape lines used by seamstresses, and carpenters' foot rules—of which a dozen could be sold for a couple of dollars. It became the duty of the late Government to have these absurd rules rescinded and have them made moderately correct. It also became their duty in 1877, to amend the law very materially. Was that mal-administration? As time developed many evils connected with the law, they had these evils removed, and he believed the system, so far as it could be made to work, was working tolerably well when the late Government left office. Some gentlemen mentioned that some inspectors were engaged in some way or other as agents for the owners of machines, selling them. Some accusations of this sort came under the notice of the late Government, but he was not aware of any case having been established. By comparing the original Act with the modifications made in 1877, it would be found that instead of there being mal-administration there was an honest and resolute attempt to have the law carried out properly, and in such a way as not to entail hardship. Another thing the late Government found, and that was that every manufacturer making an improved weighing machine, and putting it in his shop, had to have it stamped or he was liable to a fine, and they also found that the law justified this extraordinary rule. They, therefore, provided, in the amended Act, that a manufacturer or dealer, having weighing machines in his possession for sale, should not be bound to have the same inspected and stamped, so long as the same remained in his manufactory or warehouse. He might go over all clauses of the amended Act and point out all the modifications which the late Government made to the original law, and the ameliorations that were effected. They had to encounter all the hostility to the law, and that hostility was very great in the country. They had to encounter all the difficulty of putting the law into operation, and now the hon. gentleman, Mr. Tupper, must indulge in loud talk about mal-administration. He (Mr. Mackenzie) remembered when the hon. gentleman was sitting on the Opposition side of the House, he charged him (Mr. Mackenzie) with mal-administration of the Intercolonial Railway in imposing what he Mr. Tupper called outrageous rates, and yet, to-night, the House found the hon. gentleman endorsing what had been done by him (Mr. Mackenzie), and declaring that when he looked into it, he found the rates were very fair, and there was nothing to complain of. He was sure that anyone who looked at the position taken by the late Government in relation to the Weights and Measures Act, would find that they adopted every possible means in order to have the law fairly carried out. An hon. gentleman spoke about repealing the law.

The Government must remember that was a very serious matter. But he (Mr. Mackenzie) had to consider that, while the law, under the old Province of Canada, was under the administration of the local officers of the Provinces, this law was repealed by the superior authority of the Dominion, that the Local Parliament had no further authority to re-enact it, and that the repealing of this law would leave them entirely without any law whatever with regard to the regulation of weights and measures. No one could ask that such a state of anarchy should be introduced. It was practically impossible, and was utterly destructive of all surveillance of weights and measures, because nothing would be put in its place. He believed that, generally, under the Provincial law of Ontario, this law was fairly administered. He denied that there was, what the hon. gentleman called universal demoralisation, cheating in the administration of the Weights and Measures Law. He was bound to say that, so far as he had been able to ascertain since this law went into operation, that it had made no change whatever in the receipts, and that the weights and measures were as fairly inspected as under the old law, though not under immediate Government supervision. He could only say, with regard to this law now, that he would be bound, as a member of the House, partially responsible for putting it in operation, to give every assistance to make the law effective, to remedy the defects that might exist in it, and to assist in any legislation required to accomplish that object. But he was not to sit down quietly and hear the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) throw taunts and accusations of mal-administration across the House, for he utterly defied him to prove any mal-administration of the law.

MR. TUPPER said he was prepared to prove by the most conclusive evidence, before any Committee that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) chose to move for, the statement he made to the fullest extent. He charged the hon. gentleman and his Administration with having involved this important measure in the greatest and gravest unpopularity and he would state the grounds upon which he made that charge. The Administration which preceded him (Mr. Mackenzie) had placed on the Statute-book an Act for the purpose of providing due inspection of weights and measures. The hon. gentleman had stated that he (Mr. Tupper) said there was universal cheating over the country. He (Mr. Tupper) denied it. He said he found evidence had been brought before the Government that established conclusively the fact that, either through dishonesty or ignorance, the conditions of things that existed demanded at the hands of the Government the introduction of this measure; that the evidence they had collected as to the condition of the weights and measures of this country was sufficient to show that no Government could faithfully carry out the duty imposed upon it, of providing for a just meting out of fair weight and fair measure to the masses of the people, who were being cheated, either through ignorance or dishonesty. He had never stated that there was universal cheating and swindling, and the hon. gentleman had put words in his (Mr. Tupper's) mouth he had never used. With regard to the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Mackenzie's) excuse for appointing the officials too soon, he would state that the measure put on the Statute-book provided that it should not become law until the Government were prepared to see it carried into execution properly. The provision of the law that said it should not go into operation until the proclamation was issued by the Governor-General, was intended to prevent the law being carried into effect before the Government was ready to administer the law, and to prevent the country being thrown into confusion, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie), by mal-administration under that law, had thrown the country, by issuing the proclamation before he was prepared to execute the law. Why, the hon. gentleman himself admits mal-administration.

MR. MACKENZIE: No; he does not.

MR. TUPPER said yes. He (Mr. Mackenzie) admitted issuing the proclamation, and bringing the law into operation, long before he could carry it into execution, and then attempted to throw the responsibility upon a subordinate officer of the Government. Was the hon. gentleman not able to enquire of the Minister of Inland Revenue whether he was prepared to put the law into operation, or did he put such an incompetent man in charge of the Department that the country was placed in the condition he admitted it to have been in? If he admitted that the hon. gentleman had admitted to the fullest extent all that he (Mr. Tupper) had charged, a graver act of mal-administration could not be shown. No person could formulate a more distinct act of mal-administration than that a Government should bring into operation a law, by a proclamation which was provided in the law, for the purpose of preventing it being brought into operation until the Government were prepared with means to carry it out properly. Yet, although the late Government were not in a position to put the law into execution properly, they fastened the salaries of one hundred officials upon the Treasury, at a time when those officials had nothing to do. It was soon shown, throughout the country, that this measure, which was supposed to have been framed for the benefit of the people at large, was used to find places for the friends of the Administration. That was the position of the matter, and he contended he had sustained his charge out of the evidence of the hon. gentleman's own mouth. He (Mr. Tupper) could point to several counties in the Dominion where these officials were drawing public money whom the Government had provided with no means whatever for carrying out the law. They were doing nothing except feeding themselves at the public crib, and giving nothing in return. He (Mr. Tupper) denied that he was inconsistent in reference to his statements in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. He (Mr. Mackenzie) said that he (Mr. Tupper) had charged him with having committed a great outrage; made a great blunder in fixing the tariff on the Intercolonial Railway. So he (Mr. Tupper) had, and he did it justly. After he (Mr. Mackenzie) got in power, the General Manager of the road, of course on the authority of the late Government, increased the freights some twenty per cent., and he

(Mr. Tupper) said it was a blunder and a mistake, because, instead of increasing the receipts, they would lose money, that instead of putting money into the Public Treasury, it would be taken out of it. So it proved, and the result was that the hon. gentleman, or the Manager of the Intercolonial Railway, reconsidered the tariff, and after altering it a dozen times, it was brought back to the condition the hon. gentleman found it when he got into office. He (Mr. Tupper) said in his place at the time, that he was glad to find the hon. gentleman ready to learn by experience.

MR. MACKENZIE: Where did you say that?

MR. TUPPER: I said it from the place where you are now sitting.

MR. MACKENZIE: I would like the hon. gentleman to find any place where he said that.

MR. TUPPER said he could find that, on more than one occasion, he had made the statement he was now repeating, where he showed that the hon. gentlemen opposite had changed the tariff, and that, having found his (Mr. Tupper's) statement to be correct, they altered the tariff until it was brought back to the condition in which they found it. He defied the hon. gentleman to show any exception taken by him to that tariff from the time that was done—some three years ago. But the hon. gentleman found it was much easier to derange traffic, to drive people off the railway, and compel them to find other means of carrying on their traffic than to bring it back, and the road was suffering to this hour from the mistake the hon. gentleman made when he came into power.

MR. MACKENZIE said that, during the whole time the hon. gentleman sat opposite him during the last Parliament, he never ventured one word of approval of anything he (Mr. Mackenzie) ever did that he could remember. He could remember well, however, that the hon. gentleman, in a manly way, undertook the responsibility of the Weights and Measures Act, and he could do nothing less than that, but to-night he was so unfair as to attempt to saddle on the late Administration all the odium that was cast on Parliament in consequence of that Act. He could produce Conservative journals by the dozen that ascribed the authorship of that Bill to him (Mr. Mackenzie) and his Government, but those papers did not blame the administration of the Act but the Act itself. It was the excessive charges that made the Act unpopular in the country. If they had been decreased, as they were under the amended Act of 1877, there would have been little of that outcry. It was the Act itself that was unpopular, and hon. gentlemen opposite confessed last year it was unpopular. Now, however, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) chose to throw all the odium of the unpopularity of the Act upon the late Administration, and declared that the measure itself was all that man could do, but it only lacked the immense abilities and the great honesty of the hon. member for Cumberland to put it in operation and make it popular.

MR. McDONALD (Victoria, N.S.) said, if the Act was so badly administered everywhere as it was in his own county, he did not wonder it was unpopular. He could give the hon. gentleman from Lambton a case in point, on the authority of the Inspector of Weights and Measures for the county of Cape Breton, who was a well-qualified and truthful officer, that when he began to put the law into force, he did so in several districts, but when he was about visiting certain other districts, he got instructions from the Government not to do so, and the consequence was, that the law had not been administered in certain districts up to last fall. This had caused great dissatisfaction in his county. In the district of North Sydney, the Inspector informed him last fall that none of the business men had had their measures inspected, and that he had had express orders from Ottawa not to put the measure in force in that district.

MR. MACKENZIE said he hoped the Government would bring down these instructions from the Department.

MR. ROSS (Dundas) said it was important that they should have just weights and measures but, frankly, he could not see that they derived any benefit from the Act under discussion. The scale was brought in to be inspected, the weights might be correct, and the man went away with the scale and commenced his operations of weighing and measuring just as before. But did that make a man honest? There was no way of making him honest, and the Act amounted to nothing. If a man was disposed to give false weight or measure, there were ways enough of doing it, and this Act would not prevent him. Take a platform scale: it might be perfectly correct, but the man weighed as he pleased, and what control could we have over him? It was well to say we should have just weights and measures, and honest men would have them, and would use them honestly, whether they were inspected or not, for the sake of their reputation. After all, the great sums formerly expended in the administration of this might almost as well be kept in the Treasury for all the good it did the country. He himself had his weights and platform scales, and he could take them to the Inspector and pay him his fee, but that did not make him an honest weigher of grain; he could arrange them in five minutes so that he could take extra weight, and the inspection amounted to nothing. The Government, however, proposed a saving of some $40,000 in the carrying out of the provisions of the Act. All he could say was, that it was a sound procedure, and in the right direction.

MR. HUNTINGTON said it was desirable that a matter of this kind should be discussed without regard to party advantages, and he regretted that the hon. the Minister of Public Works could not have allowed it to occupy the undivided attention of the House upon its merits, instead of making it the occasion of unfair attacks upon his predecessor in the Department. The hon. gentleman said the law was all right, but what he complained of was, that the late Government issued a proclamation to give it effect. The hon. gentleman, moreover, was unhappy in his allusions to a Committee. He knew quite well that no Committee could be appointed now; he had no intention of asking for one. The habit which prevailed in this House on the part of certain hon. gentlemen of rising and declaring what great things could be revealed by a Committee, was an empty boast and had better be dropped, as those hon. gentlemen dared not move for a Committee. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) really regarded it as important to show the malfeasance in office of the hon. gentleman from Lambton, it was his duty to move for a Committee. He talked about what he could prove by a Committee. It was unworthy the hon. gentleman in his high position to say this without putting his threats into execution. He complained that his hon. friend's (Mr. Mackenzie's) Government, issued a proclamation before the standards were ready. Supposing he did, and made a mistake; the hon. gentleman who enacted the law declared it was all right. The Conservative party at the last election sought to take advantage of the unpopularity of the law which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) had passed, by trying to make the people believe it had been passed by the late Government. In all the counties which he (Mr. Huntington) had been in, this was one of the standing accusations against the late Government. It was well known that the people were accustomed to a certain way of doing things, that could not be changed without creating some unpopularity; but, sometimes, a statesman had to run the risk of unpopularity in order to accomplish a great public good. If the hon. gentleman had found it necessary to introduce a system to regulate weights and measures, he might, at least, have undertaken it with a sense of responsibility, and with a statesman's willingness to brave unpopularity for the public good. But what did the hon. gentleman do? He passed the law, and then, when he found it unpopular, he disowned it, and declared that he did not proclaim the laws, and it was all the fault of those on this side of the House. There could be no more unhappy position in which the hon. gentleman could place himself than one regarding his own child; looking into its eyes with the dear affection of a parent, he declared that he never intended to open its eyes. The fact was, the law was an unpopular one, as it would be unpopular in England to change the currency to dollars and cents. If this law was necessary, it ought to be carried out in a patriotic disposition by both sides of the House. He hoped that the amendments which would be made to it would be successful, and that they would not be passed in a sense of partisanship.

MR. BABY said he wished to answer the hon. gentleman from Lambton, who stated that this intended reduction was not systematic, and that we were groping in the dark. He must say that he had not framed this measure entirely alone; considering himself inexperienced, from the short time he had been in office, he was obliged to ask the assistance of officers of the Department, and particularly to one appointed by his hon. predecessor. This gentleman, who had had great experience, went round the country and reported exactly what he (Mr. Baby) stated a few months ago—that the system might be remodelled, and that a great saving might be effected by grouping, as he had done, different counties into inspection districts. That gentleman was Mr. Johnson, his hon. predecessor's appointé. He was guided considerably by the report made to the Department by that officer. The hon. gentleman said the law was odious by reason of the excessive charges collected under it. His hon. friend was labouring under misapprehension; there was nothing of the kind in the law; the charges were imposed by an Order in Council passed by the hon. gentleman from Lambton and his colleagues. If the law had been rendered unpopular, it was by these charges which traders found onerous, and also by the unhappy selection made of the Deputy Inspector by the late Government. He thought his hon. friend (Mr. Tupper) had a right to be proud of his child, seeing it was adopted immediately by the late Government as soon as they came into power. They had brought it up carelessly, spoiled it, and made it bad, but he hoped the present Government would manifest more interest in it, redeem it, and make it of some use to the country.

MR. ALLISON said that, in his opinion, the inspector had never visited Hants in his official capacity, but merely contented himself with drawing a good salary for nominal duty. He referred to the lumber trade in his county, which had been nearly ruined by the large increase of tariff on the new branch of the Intercolonial through that county, and it was not until the leading organs of the late Government had drawn attention to those heavy rates that they altered them.

MR. MACMILLAN said the Inspector for the city of London and the East Riding of Middlesex, was in the pay of the Government for several months before he paid a single visit to that locality. After he had been appointed and had got a standard, it became necessary to enquire into his conduct, and it was found that there were discrepancies in his inspections in some ten or fifteen instances. He was consequently suspended. Though there were discrepancies in ten or fifteen different instances, they, nevertheless, restored him to his original position without, as far as he could ascertain, any reason in the world. He was incapable, and, besides, did not conduct affairs in an upright manner. The head of the Department knew the whole of the circumstances, notwithstanding they reinstated him immediately prior to the last general election, knowing him to be a defaulter in the way mentioned.

on the Welland Canal, amounting to $2,000, and it was supposed that the gates were defective or decayed, and therefore the sum of $900 was deducted from that, leaving a balance of about $1,100 to be paid by the owner of the vessel which did the damage; but, instead of that amount having been collected by the Department, $500 more was deducted, leaving only $600 which was collected. Was it usual, when sums had been assessed in favour of the Crown, that the Minister of Public Works should, of his own motion, and without the intervention of assessors or arbitrators, establish the exact amount to be received; if so, where was the necessity for arbitrators? He had no doubt that the reduction was made after due consideration, and properly, but there was no explanation of it in the report. He also thought it would be due to the late Administration, and for the benefit of the Public Departments, that the late Minister of Public Works should explain the reduction of this item. The amount was small, but the principle was important.

MR. TUPPER said that this was the first moment his attention had been called to the matter. He had no doubt that a reference to the Department would give a perfect explanation of it, and justify what had been done. It was not unusual, when an officer of the Department reported certain damage, to require bonds for its payment, when, after subsequent investigation, the Minister might return the amount of bonds exceeding the damage in question, on the report of a proper officer. He (Mr. Tupper) would enquire into the matter, however, if the hon. member for Lambton did not remember it.

MR. MACKENZIE said he could not remember the minutæ of the matter, but thought he remembered the case very well. A valuation was made and remained unpaid for a long time. Many representations were also made to the Government, who finally, on consultation with the Deputy Minister, deciding to reduce the amount somewhat. The assessors were not appointed to make valuations, which was the duty of the superintendent. A vessel doing damage, as in this case, had to be held until the amount he estimated as damages was paid, or bonds given for it. Bonds were given on this occasion. But, even if the money had been paid, it was the custom in the Department to return sums when good reason could be given for it. In this instance the owner of the vessel was a poor man, ill able to bear the loss, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) thought had been absent from the country six or eight months.

MR. RYKERT said that the owner of the vessel, Mr. Battle, was worth from $50,000 to $100,000.

MR. MACKENZIE said he knew nothing of him personally, but was merely stating his recollection of the case. He had no doubt that the Minister of Public Works would find in the Department that his statements were correct, and that good reason existed for the action taken.

MR. TUPPER said he was bound to say that the practice in the Department was to obtain from the officer in charge of the dock gates, in cases like the present, an estimate of the damage, and, as was stated by the member for Lambton, the owner of the vessel, or party causing the damage, was bound to pay it, or give bonds for it before his property would be released. On proper reasons given, such as an excessive estimate, the Department reduced the amount claimed. He would enquire in the Department the reasons for modifying the amount originally assessed in this case. The officer in charge of the property made his estimate, and the Department gave judgment on it.

MR. MACKENZIE said, according to his recollection, the late member for Welland, Mr. Thomson, called frequently at the Department about that matter. He (Mr. Mackenzie) assumed the full responsibility for the reduction, which he believed right at the time, and did still.

MR. MCCALLUM said he knew something about this matter, and that the damage to the gate was assessed by Mr. Bodwell at $2,000. Afterwards, it was put at $1,100. Of course, he did not say the late Minister of Public Works did wrong in making the deduction; but it required an explanation. Besides, Mr. Battle was well off. Mr. Bodwell's report read as follows:—

“October 16th, 1874.

“SIR,—I have the honour to report that, on the 7th July last, as per my telegram of that date, the schooner Louisa, of St. Catharines, carried away all the gates of Lock No. 21, on the Welland Canal; that in forty-eight hours thereafter they had been repaired and navigation re-opened. It was not then, and has not since been, disputed, that the accident occurred through the carelessness of those in charge of the vessel. I allowed the vessel to proceed on receipt of the enclosed bond, taken by Mr. Currie, the Solicitor to the Welland Canal, and signed by Mr. Matthew Battle, the owner of the schooner, and his brother, John Battle, of Thorold. I have assessed the damage at eleven hundred dollars.

“It was contended by Mr. Battle that the gates were rotten and nearly worthless. I find that the timber in one or two of the gates was somewhat decayed, but not so badly as to prevent their use for some years yet; while one of the gates was nearly new, the others had been in use eight years. Estimating a new set of gates as worth, at the present time, say $2,000, I thought an allowance of a difference between new gates and the old ones, of nine hundred dollars, a reasonable allowance. I am still of that opinion. I have informed Mr. Battle of my decision, and have asked him for payment.

“I have the honour to be, Sir,

“E. V. BODWELL,

“Superintendent Welland Canal.”

If the hon. the late Minister of Public Works found that the gates were rotten, he had a perfect right, in the interest of this country, to make that reduction. But there was nothing before the House to show that that was the case. They only found that an official sent a letter to a member of Parliament accepting $600 as amount in full for the $1,100. He would not say it was for corrupt purposes; but either this reduction was made for corrupt purposes, or else it was allowed because the works were defective. There must have been some reason for it; but there was nothing to show what was the reason or what arrangements were made with Mr. Thomson. Here was the letter that was written to Mr. Thomson:

TWOROLD, February 1st, 1877.

"Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, "Minister of Public Works,
"Ottawa, Ont.

"In the matter of "The Queen vs. Battle,
"For Lock Damage.

"Sir,—

"I herewith enclose you certified check for $600, being the sum agreed upon between you and Mr. Thomson, M.P. I regret not having had it sooner, but times have been very hard on shipping and money very scarce.

"I have the honour to be, sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"JOHN BATTLE."

"DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS,
"27th April, 1877.

"Sir,—

"Reg. vs. Battle.

"In compliance with your request, I beg to state that the sum of six hundred dollars ($600.00), with cost, amounting to $36.13, has been paid by Mr. Battle, and accepted by the Minister in full of all claims in connection with this case.

"I have the honour to be, sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"F. BRAUN,
"Secretary.

"W. A. Thomson, Esq., M.P.,
"House of Commons."

There was nothing in that letter to show the grounds on which the reduction was made, except it might be that the gates were rotten. If the hon. member said they were rotten, then he (Mr. McCallum) was bound to accept the explanation.

MR. TUPPER said he had received a telegram in relation to the Welland Canal he was sure would be heard with great pleasure. It was as follows:—

"WELLAND, May 1st, 1879.

"The Welland Canal will be opened throughout on Monday morning for the first time. It is intended to take water for the full navigation from Lake Erie.

"JOHN PAGE."

MR. RYKERT said it might be a source of congratulation that the canal was opened; but it was a matter for serious consideration that vessels could not pass in several places in the Welland Canal, for the simple reason that there was not sufficient money spent on the work. Then there were several places in the canal where there were traces of where vessels had passed last year, and the Hon. the Minister of Public Works would find that damages would be very frequent. A short time ago the Superintendent of the Welland Canal called out sixty or seventy men to make repairs on the canal, but after working three or four days, they were discharged, because the Government would not give enough money.

MR. TUPPER said that was rather a grave statement, which, if true, should be enquired into. He would take immediate steps to ascertain whether the canal had been sufficiently cleaned out for the purpose of navigation, or whether it was requisite that more should be done. He had been assured that all that was absolutely necessary had been done.

MR. HOLTON said the hon. Minister having stated that these estimates were much below those of Mr. Brydges, he ought to put Mr. Brydges in a position to produce his estimates, and explain the difference between them.

MR. TUPPER: I am quite prepared to do that.

MR. HOLTON said that, perhaps, the Committee would consent to pass these estimates now for the sake of closing, with the understanding that explanations should be given at the next stage.

MR. TUPPER said he was prepared at this moment with every detail, but, if the Committee would pass the items now, the House should have an opportunity of discussing the whole question on concurrence.

MR. HUNTINGTON said, before the Committee rose, he desired to call the attention of the Government to an item which it might be well to consider before concurrence, in order to give the Minister an opportunity to make some explanation to the House. His information—he did not know how credible—was that the mail service between Kamouraska and Paspébiac, which, two years ago, was let to Mr. Carr, had been taken away from that gentleman, and the contract annulled by the hon. the Postmaster - General after it had run two years. His information was that, after the annulling of that contract, it was advertised for again, and Mr. Carr was the lowest tenderer by a considerable amount, but it was not given to him. On concurrence in these items, he would like an explanation of this circumstance.

MR. TUPPER: We will take a note of it.

MR. HUNTINGTON: According to the whispering of the little bird, which had been so frequently appealed to by hon. gentlemen opposite, there is some little irregularity in this matter.

MR. MACKENZIE asked if the despatches, to which he referred to two days ago, were to be brought down.

MR. TUPPER said that the hon. leader of the Government had told him that he had applied to Lord Lorne to obtain information as to what despatches there were, but he had not yet obtained that information. At the next sitting of the House he had no doubt that information would be submitted.

MR. MACKENZIE said he supposed we could procure the papers by telegraphing for them. It was a remarkable thing that the Canadian Parliament could not get papers affecting their own business, that had been published in the London newspapers some days ago.

MR. TUPPER: If the Governor-General transmitted a despatch to the British Government, it is not an act of this Government at all, and he has to be applied to for permission to bring down that despatch. That application has been made to the Governor-General by the leader of the Government, and he stated to the hon. gentleman opposite that so soon as he obtained it from the Governor-General he would lay it upon the table. I do not anticipate the slightest difficulty.

THE FISHERIES AWARD.

RESOLUTIONS PROPOSED.

Mr. FORTIN said, in rising to propose this motion, he thanked the hon. the leader of the Government for having asked the House to set this day apart for the consideration of the important matter that formed the subject of this resolution, and he thanked the House for having consented to sit on this day. He well understood the grave responsibility that rested on him, when he undertook to bring forward before the House, and before the country, this matter of the Fishery Award, but he thought it rested on him to perform that difficult task, as he had had so many opportunities of getting acquainted with all the facts relating to our fisheries. He had, as everyone knew, no private or personal interests in the matter, but, having, after an experience of twenty-seven years, acquired the conviction that our fishing industry laboured under great disadvantages and that it was attended every year with great loss from want of proper assistance on the part of the Government, and particularly from the danger to which our fisheries were exposed of being ruined, he thought he would be guilty of want of patriotism, and of want of consideration for one of the greatest interests in this country, and for the welfare of that part of the nation which was engaged in the fishing industry, if he remained silent, and did not communicate frankly and correctly to the House the result of his experience and studies and give a timely warning of the great danger threatening the very existence of our fisheries in many parts of our coasts, and humbly offer what he considered the remedial agents, to stop one of the greatest evils that might befall this country. This country, in relation to this question, could be divided into two parts, the eastern part and the western part. The eastern part was inhabited principally by fishermen and mariners, and devoted to the great industries of the fisheries, and to navigation, while the western part was devoted to inland navigation, agriculture, commerce and manufactures; and, as the people of this portion were not as cognisant of the importance of the fisheries as they ought to be, he would address them in a few remarks relative to this matter. At all times, nations living on the sea-shore had understood the importance of the fisheries, and out of those nations which had developed this element of wealth had sprung nations of warriors and traders. A nation so advantageously situated as Canada was for carrying on the fisheries should go as largely into that industry as possible, because Canada would not only derive from it an important article of food and of domestic commerce, but an article which could be exported to the furthest countries—to warm as well as cold climates. Fishing had been regarded, from all time as an essential element of prosperity for the people that could prosecute it, when it was judiciously and vigorously carried on, giving the greatest benefits to the fishermen themselves, as well as being the source of many industries, such as the construction of vessels, the production of hemp for sails, etc., wherein a country situated so advantageously as Canada should reap great advantages. He would cite a passage from a work on the fisheries by Lacipede, one of the greatest of modern writers :—

“The prosecution of fishing,” said Lacipede. “preceded the culture of the fields. It is contemporary with hunting, but there is this difference between hunting and fishing, that the latter is natural to a civilised people, and that, far from being opposed to the progress of agriculture and of commerce, it assisted in multiplying their happy results. If, during the infancy of society, the prosecution of fishing furnished to a half civilised people a means of subsistence at once sufficient and nourishing, if it accustomed them not to dread the dangers of the sea, if it made them sailors, it gives to a cultivated nation abundant homes for the poor, various tributes for the luxurious livers, preparations for the necessities of distant commerce, rich manures for less fertile lands. It leads men to cross the seas, to brave the ices of the poles, and bear the fires of the equator, to battle with tempests. It launches on the seas forests of masts, experienced mariners, foreign trading, and intrepid genius."

The following extracts from P. L. Simmonds, London, on the commercial products of the sea, would show also the high estimation in which the fisheries, as an industry, were held in England :—

"It is not our purpose to speak of the inhabitants of the ocean generally, but only to restrict ourselves to the investigation of those which are of some use to man. Pliny enumerated ninety-four species of fish. Linnaeus increased the number to 478; but recent naturalists have described over 13,000 species, one-tenth of which confine themselves to the fresh waters. The human race derives almost incalculable benefits from them, as is evidenced by the extent and value of the river-coast and sea fisheries of the world. The harvest of the sea has not yet been attended to and garnered to the same extent as the land. Some nations, as the Chinese, have, it is true, long given close attention to the profitable utilisation of its commercial products, and several European nations, and the Americans, have also prosecuted certain fisheries; but systematic and scientific management has only of late years been specially directed to the various branches which have been termed pisciculture, aquiculture, and ostriculture, and the transfer of fishes of one locality to those of another district. In respect of fish, no natural cause prevents their co-existence in the greatest abundance with man in his highest state of civilisation and refinement, in the midst of the greatest agricultural or manufacturing opulence. Easily scared in the first instance by unusual sights—for it has been proved by a series of curious and interesting experiments on the trout, that most kinds of fish are insensible to sound—the natives of the water are speedily reconciled to appearances, which become habitual when found to be connected with no danger. By all civilised and commercial nations, especially the Dutch, the English, the Americans and the French, the products of the sea have been accounted fully as important as those of the land; because they not only afford cheap, nutritious, and abundant food for the people, but contribute largely, moreover, to the national resources, and to the maintenance of a maritime ascendancy. The Americans and the French offer bounties to their fishermen, which, of course, tells against the fisheries in British America. The fishery question is of urgent consequence to the people generally. Our population is increasing rapidly; cities and towns are gradually covering fields, which used to be available for agriculture; and though steam farming is increasing the efficiency of husbandry labour, it cannot possibly augment the supply of home-grown food so rapidly as the bread-eaters increase in number. Fish is among the articles of diet, which are too little familiarised among us, and any information ought to be welcomed which increases our knowledge of fishing grounds within reach of England. The fisheries are not only of importance to us in consequence of the vast amount of wealth that can be drawn from the deep, apparently without diminution, or exhausting its source, but because by this means a body of able and hardy seamen may be found to conduct the commerce of a maritime country during peace, and become its gallant defenders on the ocean in time of war. This inexhaustible source of national wealth and greatness appertains in an especial manner to the British possessions in the northern hemisphere, and has long excited the rivalry of the citizens of the New England States, who are aided by bounties granted by the general Government."

Now, he would make a few remarks on the fisheries as they were carried on at different times by different nations. On reading history we found that the most famous nations of the world were those which had sprung from fishermen. The city of Tyre, for instance, the great city of the past, was, at the commencement, nothing but a village of fishermen, who afterwards became the navigators and traders of the world, and who founded many colonies which still existed under other names. If we went further, it would be seen that in the Straits of Gibraltar towns owed their foundation to the fisheries. More recently, Venice the beautiful was founded by fishermen, who built their huts almost on the quick sands, because at that part of the Adriatic the sea teemed with fish. It was not long before that village became a town, and that town the centre of Mediterranean trade during the middle ages; and, like Great Britain, Venice had not only an influence over the sea, but over the land, and her commerce extended to the Black Sea. Byzantium, now Constantinople, was founded by fishermen who flocked to the passage between the Sea of Marmora and the Mediterranean, which was teeming with fish, and for this reason it was given the name of the Golden Horn, and soon rose to be the highest, richest and most powerful city in the world. Further down the page of history, we saw the Dutch, the Danes, the Norwegians, the French and the English, engaging in fisheries as much as they could, and deriving from them not only food and articles of trade, but power. He would, later, cite articles from statesmen, to prove that when the fishing trade of these countries was prosperous, these countries prospered, and if the Dutch had lost their power it was because they had lost the bone and sinew of the country—the fishermen, who made the best sailors. They all remembered that the celebrated Dutch Admirals, especially Van Tromp, swept the seas; how Van Tromp carried a broom at his mast head and swept the British Channel, and entered the Thames as far as London, which he was only prevented from taking on account of the low tide. He had none but fishermen with him, but they were the greatest seamen of the time. He could not refrain from citing from the fine work of Raymond Thomassy, entitled, “History of the Fisheries of the Two Worlds,” the following interesting extracts:—

“Holland, as in former days Venice, already rises out of the waters that surround her, and the net upon her shoulder, leaps into the fisherman’s bark. She is becoming the ruling republic of the ocean, and renews in the seas of the north the wonders wrought by the Queen of the Adriatic. Towards 1582 she employed, each year, in the herring fisheries only, more than twenty thousand boats of twenty to thirty tons draught; and, in 1610, she sent to the coasts of England three thousand vessels, escorted by nine men-of-war, and manned by fifty thousand fishermen. She had, moreover, nine thousand other vessels, with fifty thousand men, engaged in carrying provisions, especially salt, and bringing back cargoes of fish, that were sold to all the consumers of Europe. What marvellous results of a labour that was sure of finding its reward in the depths of the ocean.

“This was in the days of Sully, who, too forgetful of maritime economy, looked upon ploughing and pasturing as the only two nourishing breasts of the State. But the Dutch, who had a third, still more prolific, ‘boasted that they could earn more, and with more honour, by ploughing the sea with the keel of their vessels, than the French could by ploughing and cultivating their lands.’ This confidence rendered Holland mistress of the Seas of the North and of the markets of Europe. Richelieu and Mazarin soon understood the secret of this power, and they also precluded the restoration that Louis XIV was to render so glorious by giving encouragement to our fishermen.

“But this is not all. The Dutch had the pretension of keeping the French from the whale fisheries, although they had learned this industry from them. It is well known that our Basques were the first to harpoon the whale, and to pursue it from the Gulf of Gascony as far as the Seas of Greenland. As far back as the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, they applied themselves successfully to this perilous industry, and employed more than nine thousand sailors. The Port of Saint Jean de Luz contained not less than from fifty to sixty whaling vessels till 1636, when the Spanish seized this place. Fourteen vessels arrived at that time from Greenland, loaded with fish oil. They fell into the hands of the enemy; and this event, by destroying the Basque fleet, deprived us of this industry, that had been so prosperous.

“The Dutch, however, informed of the advantages accruing from these expectations, hastened to entice away our harpooners, who taught them, in a few years, all the secrets of this perilous, as well as lucrative fishery. Well, it is in return for this knowledge, that after our religious wars, Holland, in her selfishness, endeavoured to disgust our sailors with these rich fisheries of the North. ‘They will not allow them,’ says an unpublished memoir addressed to Louis XIII, ‘to catch the whale or to melt the blubber on the island of Greenland, which obliges them to do so on the high seas, with great danger of being lost or burnt, as it often happens. Wherein, the Dutch appear the more ungrateful, because it is the French who taught them how to pursue this industry.’ Let us add that, according to De Witt, by this industry, and especially by the herring fishery, 450,000 persons in Holland earned a living, that is to say more than a fifth of the population—a memorable example of what maritime economy can do. And thence an unparalleled glory. This little people, raised by such feeble resources to the rank of a naval power, could at one time successfully contend with the united fleets of France and England. Upon what rested, however, this supremacy of the seas that victoriously counterbalanced continental influence? That is what must now be stated, without further delay. Well, it rested upon a mere trifle, upon a detail that will never be appreciated by superficial minds, it rested upon a simple process of fishing, upon a better preparation of the products of the fisheries, upon the economical and improved manner of barrelling herring by salting them only after the gills and the entrails had been removed. A superior quality of fish obtained by this means at less cost had driven off all competition, and secured all the markets,—and the simple improvements of an article that had become indispensable by rendering all the consumers of Europe tributary to the Dutch had, by degrees, converted the commerce of fish into a sort of universal domination. A remarkable result of maritime industry, the humble beginnings—whereof are often carried to unexpected greatness' by some common process. To worthily honour the inventor of this modest process, it required no ordinary man, it required Charles the Fifth, whose vast mind understood that the smallest means, indefinitely repeated, produce the greatest results, and that any improvement applied to an article of universal and daily consumption, must necessarily effect the well-being of immense populations. Therefore, this Emperor rendered public homage to the memory of William Beuckels, who had succeeded in improving the fisheries by a better process of salting and barrelling herring; and in August, 1536, he held it as an honour for himself to visit, at Biervliet, with all his Court, the tomb of this humble fisherman, who had carried the prosperity of his country to such a high degree."

The Basque fishermen, who lived on and frequented the Bay of Biscay, for whale fishing, because that sea was full of these mammiferous animals, were attracted in pursuit of schools of whales to the middle of the Atlantic, and even to the banks of Newfoundland where the whale were more abundant, because on these banks, and banks similarly situated, the mollusca and crustacea, and small fishes, which served as their food, were found in abundance, so that it was an opinion that rested on good foundation that the Basque fishermen discovered the banks of Newfoundland, and probably Newfoundland, before Columbus discovered America, and this led to the existence of a fishing industry carried on by fishermen from Biscay, Spain, and Brittany, in France especially, of which they had no conception, because it appeared from documents and history that those fishermen and merchants connected with them kept it as secret as possible. They knew what took place shortly after the discovery of America, that European nations tried to effect settlements in it, and also that the only settlements that were prosperous from the beginning were those where fishing was carried on. The settlements of the Eastern United States owed their prosperity and progress to the fisheries prosecuted by the early English settlers, whilst in New France the population living on the Nova Scotia coasts, Cape Breton and the Bay of Fundy derived nearly all their subsistence from the fisheries. France at the time considered this industry of such importance that she spent immense sums in building fortresses, under which the fishermen and their vessels could shelter themselves in danger. The prosecution of fisheries in Canada, perhaps, was more ancient than was generally thought. When Jacques Cartier made his first trip into the St. Lawrence, he did not say he discovered the Gulf or the coast of Labrador; but that, sailing along the Labrador coast, he met a vessel from LaRochelle, bound for the port of Brest. In 1534, Port of Brest, which was now called the Bay of Old Fort, received 200 or 300 vessels from France every year, all the small vessels congregating there when the fishing was over, and afterwards going over to France under the escort of men-of-war, with thousands of quintals of fish. The following extracts from a diary of a journey made in 1704, by Sieur de Courtemanche, on the coast of Labrador, would show how abundant the marine animals and fish were in those days:—

"In the Bay of Ahaha, which is a few leagues below Great Mecatina, coast of Labrador, I had 200 seals shot in two days.

"The French establishment (that of the Port of Brest) is twenty leagues from there; its aspect is very gay, its harbour is very fine, and vessels of every kind can enter it; it could even contain more than one hundred vessels.

"At the extremity of the Bay, above the fort, are three very pleasant looking hills, on the top of which are small lakes, where trout and salmon are so abundant that, with two or three single hand lines or a net, enough fish might be caught to feed a garrison, even a considerable one, and half a league further down is the Esquimaux River, which abounds in salmon of an extraordinary size; eight leagues further is Spanish Bay, in which cod fishing is very profitable, as I have myself experienced, having sounded in several places and had three men to fish who caught 1,300 in a day; the cod is taken at four, three, and two fathoms and a half. In a word, the line has not the time to go to the bottom, so abundant is the cod. In this Bay there is a place where I expect to trap seal, and where I have begun a second establishment where I intend to fish on a considerable scale.

"The Spanish, according to the Indians, used to frequent this place, and would probably still be there had it not been for the bad treatment they received from the Esquimaux. There still may be seen traces of their establishments, furnaces for melting seal oil, houses, tile roof, and etc."

The Seignory of Spanish Bay passed from Sieur de Courtemanche, into the hands of a Mr. de Bouranague Pecieur, and became the property of a company established at Quebec, called the Labrador Company. The colonists soon saw the importance of the fisheries for the future of the colonies, history stating that, when the war raged between England and France, and when the New England colonists were asked to levy troops and contribute money to invade Canada, or form a maritime expedition like those which besieged Louisbourg, and several other towns in Nova Scotia, they did so very willingly, their principal object being the acquisition of the valuable coast fisheries of the Maritime Provinces, and of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The Americans, before the revolutionary war, had been so successful in the fisheries as to excite jealousy in the Mother Country. Were he allowed the liberty to say so, he would add that some greedy English merchants then, as now, considered that the colonies should be inhabited only by consumers of British manufactures. The fishermen were so successful on the coasts of the Eastern Colonies that the British Government, inspired by those greedy merchants, prohibited the importation of their fish into England. The consequence was distrust between her children and the Mother Country, enmity, recriminations, and afterwards the revolutionary war and separation. After a long and bloody war came peace, and, in 1783, the Treaty of Ghent. What did the colonies and their Government do? What did the clever statesmen that were sent to Ghent by the now independent colonies to defend their interests do? They showed themselves ready to sacrifice everything in order to possess the fisheries of New France, then a British colony. Their best diplomatists who had been sent to Ghent argued, threatened and got the help of European nations in their enterprise. At that time England and France were in deadly rivalry, France having helped the colonies in conquering their independence. The statesmen of the new republic fought hard for those fisheries, because they saw, in their possession, a continuance of the prosperity of that industry which they had established in their own country, seeing in it power and wealth. Unfortunately, Canada had no one to defend her in the British Councils—no friends in England, or, if so, they were powerless. Had this country had a friend to warn the English people, would England have consented to give to America the possession—that is the right to fish and to land—on about 10,000 miles of coast, or an extent equal to nearly half the circumference of the earth, whilst the Americans were not giving an inch of their coast in return? By that unfortunate treaty, Nova Scotia lost 1,060 miles of coast; New Brunswick, 485; Quebec, 1,320, and Newfoundland, 2,370, besides about 4,500 miles of coast along Cumberland Island, in Baffin's and Davis's Straits. But to the English people then, and perhaps to Canadians, those fisheries did not seem important, and even at present one would find some Canadians not attaching to them their deserved importance. What was the consequence? That the Americans went into fishing industries with renewed vigour and energy, while the Canadians found the American fishermen in their way everywhere. The Americans had not only built a fishing fleet, but also fleets of merchant vessels to carry a trade in fish all over the seas of the world. Through the assistance of those fisheries they were enabled to cope with England, in the war of 1812, vessel to vessel and man to man. Why? Because, the moment war was declared, they called in their hardy fishermen—many of whom had been all their lives in the Gulf on our coasts—to man their vessels, and were thus able to carry on a glorious war against a country with a population five or six times larger. They sent their men-of-war and merchant vessels all over the world, while the fishing trade in Canada was carried on by a few schooners that traded only with the West Indies. Had Canadians not had some English merchants and traders to settle on the coasts of Newfoundland and the coasts of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and carry on a business in fish, which they exported to foreign countries, there would have been little trade with them in that article. Then it was seen that the Americans carried on their fishing after the Peace of Ghent successfully, and Congress passed laws to encourage it by a bounty to each vessel, which was granted during a term of seventy years, and which came to $7,000,000, this sum being given to vessels working mostly in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Thus the world saw these very strange facts: one nation giving up this valuable right of fishing to a foreign nation, and the foreign nation encouraging its fishing by every means, even a bounty, to gather wealth in the waters of the nation that had been imprudent enough to concede that privilege. The consequence was an immense fleet of fishing vessels in the United States, whose crews had manned the war vessels which had fought so gloriously against England in 1812. At the negotiations for peace in 1812, the Americans pretended that they had a right to continue to take fish in those British waters, while England maintained that the war destroyed all former rights, and that the American fishermen had ceased to have any right to fish in British North American waters, and, as the two nations could not come to any agreement, the question of the fisheries was not included in the treaty of peace. It was only in 1818, after England had at last taken up the cause of Canada, by seizing several American vessels and selling them, that the Americans thought it best to make arrangements with England. They made a convention with her which was signed in London in 1818. We did not lose as much then as in 1783; but it was utterly astounding to think that, after the war, which was not inglorious for Canada and England, and in framing a treaty with a nation which was far from being her superior—which was, on the contrary, her inferior in many respects—England should have given away again a part of the fishing coast of the Province. If it had only been a few hundred miles of coast, and if the United States had given any return, or some kind of reciprocity, he would not have brought this question before the House. But what did they see? It was true the Americans did not insist on being permitted again to fish in common with our fishermen on the coast of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, or Gaspé, countries that were then inhabited.

But they still claimed the right to fish on many parts of the coast, and England was weak enough to give them the liberty of fishing on the coast of the Magdalen Islands, although they were then inhabited, and this interference with them had a very material injury on the fisheries of those Islands. On the coast of Labrador, they acquired the right to fish over a distance of 295 miles in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Straits of Belle Isle, and then from Cape Charles towards the north, on the Atlantic coast of Labrador as far as Hudson's Straits, a distance of 750 miles. They had the same right, as before, of fishing in Davis's Strait, Baffin's Bay and Cumberland Inlet, on the British coast. They also managed to keep the right of fishing over no less than 480 miles on the coast of Newfoundland—on the whole 5,000 or 6,000 miles of coast. And so we were bound by that treaty or convention, so that, on more than half of the coast of the Dominion, the Americans were just as much masters as we were. On the coast of Labrador they could line and dry their fish with the same liberty as ourselves. But we had not the right to fish nor to land on any nick of their coast, by the Convention of 1818. In the Gulf of St. Lawrence, no efforts had been made by any Government of this country to establish any kind of regulations for the protection of the sea or river fisheries before 1852, or, if some were made, they were not put into force. In that year, the Government of Canada, who had until then neglected that great interest, at last, on the repeated demands of the people who had been pillaged on the coast of Labrador, who had seen their establishments destroyed, consented to establish a protective service. But, as they were doing it unwillingly, they established it on the smallest possible scale. A common schooner was chartered, carrying 15 men, and as a stipendiary magistrate to organise that service, the Government chose himself. It was a bad choice, because he had no experience when he undertook the duties. In 1852, nearly all the river fisheries of the Gulf of St. Lawrence were, in great part, destroyed. They were no longer remunerative, and many people who had gained their living by them had to leave the country for want of protection against the depredations of white men and Indians. Now, with regard to the sea fisheries. The Americans, as he had stated, excited by a bounty which amounted to $4 a ton, had already begun to visit those fisheries, although they had no right to do so. But from lack of protection by British cruisers, the Americans were in the habit of fishing on our best inshore fishing grounds, and using our best harbours, and sometimes excluding our men, because they were first in the harbours, and used the largest seines, and the greatest number of boats. Owing to the great number of these men, they soon occupied, almost exclusively, the best fishing grounds. He could name them here because he had been over them, and what he was stating now had been told to him by residents of those places, who had seen the damage done by the Americans. He would speak first of the celebrated banks of Natashquan and Kegashka. In the old times 200 American vessels used to congregate there at the beginning of the fishing season. They used to go with their seines and force our men fishing with lines to heave their anchors, and fish in other places that were not so good. He could cite many other places as far as Mingan and St. John, on the north shore of the River St. Lawrence; he could also name other places where they had no right to fish at all, and places where they had a right to fish, by the Convention of 1818, as the Dog Islands, Bonne Espérance, Belles Amours, Eradore Bay, Blanc Sablon, where the American fishermen carried on in the same way. He was not exaggerating; he had been for sixteen years in constant relations with the fishermen, not only of the Province of Quebec, but of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and Newfoundland, and that was the result of all the experience he had gathered from them. The experience of the Americans in fishing on their own coasts as well as ours enabled them to equip that celebrated fleet of clippers, which, for a time, rendered the American sailors so celebrated. Those fleets went all over the world, to Japan, China and Australia. They carried on an immense trade between the Eastern and the Pacific States.

MR. FORTIN.

How could they have equipped them except by means of the fishermen, who had spent their youth on board the fishing vessels, and who were the hardiest and best sailors in the world? The Canadians, on the contrary, suffering from American competition, were carrying on an indifferent trade. But, by-and-bye, came a greater blow—he meant the Treaty of Reciprocity that was made between England and the States in 1854. He was not going to attack any gentleman in this House or out of it; he was going to speak of the treaty in general. That treaty had a disastrous effect on our fishermen, although, perhaps, it enabled some merchants to sell their fish a little better in the United States. It gave the Americans the right of fishing not only on the coast, according to the convention of 1818, but in the Bay of Fundy, on the coast of Nova Scotia, Cape Breton, Prince Edward Island and Gaspé, because England did not insist on the question of headlands, and the Americans were able to fish in all our best grounds, in the Baie des Chaleurs, the Bay of Gaspé and at the head of the Bay of Fundy. It was then that we began to see that the value of our celebrated fishing banks was disappearing from the excessive takes of our own and American fishermen. But this treaty lapsed, and then, for a while, we had the licensing system which was as bad as the treaty itself. After a while the fisheries returned to us again, and we became masters at home. We hoped that our territorial rights would remain in our own hands, but some unhappy events happened between England and the United States, and a treaty was entered into between the two countries, in which we had to take part. The second treaty, he was sorry to say, was not so advantageous to us as the first one, because, by the first one, if we sacrificed the fisheries and the rights of the fishermen, we acquired, by that treaty, certain privileges of trade which enabled the farmers, the traders, and the inland population generally, to carry on a very lucrative business with the United States. If they read the papers of those times, they would find that the western part of the Dominion prospered under that treaty. But we did not, by the last treaty, acquire any rights to trade with the Americans, except selling fish and oil; far from that, the Americans had built up a Chinese wall between the two countries in the shape of a tariff which taxed all our natural products very heavily. True, we acquired the right of selling our fish to them, but that right was of doubtful value, because, whether there was a tax or not, if there was a demand in the United States beyond what the Americans could supply themselves, it would have to be supplied here because the fish could not be procured elsewhere. There was fortunately a clause in that treaty providing for the establishment of a tribunal, by which it was proved that the value of the Canadian fisheries was much greater than that of the American fisheries, and a sum of money was awarded as a compensation to the Canadians. They knew that a Commission sat at Halifax, composed of three members, one for England, and one for the United States, and one who was neutral. The latter gentleman, Mr. Delfosse, was the real Judge in the matter, and judgment was given in our favour for the sum of $5,500,000, representing the surplus value of our fisheries over those of the United States. Now deducting $1,000,000 of this sum to be given to Newfoundland, the remainder formed the subject and the object of the resolutions he was about to present to the House. But, before doing that, he would allude to the American fisheries. Why was it that the Americans as early as 1873 insisted so much on the right to fish in British waters? Why was it that again in 1818 they asked for the same privileges, even threatening war if it was not granted to them? Why was it that they consented to the Reciprocity Treaty? Why was it that the Treaty of Washington was negotiated—and though the people in the Western United States contended the award was too high, the fishermen themselves knew very well that it was not, and that no sum of money could replace the advantage they had derived from fishing in British waters? Why did they insist on four occasions on acquiring possession of the Canadian fisheries? Because, firstly, they considered the fishing industry of paramount importance, and the following extracts from a report on the principal fisheries of the American seas, by Lorenzo Sabine, would show the strong opinions some of the most distinguished statesmen and writers had on the subject:—

“The following statements of the Hon. Elbridge Gerry, a distinguished statesman of Massachusetts who, after having filled several posts of distinction in his own country and abroad, became Vice-President of the United States, made in the beginning of the century, are very interesting. He says: ‘At a time when the policy of every country is pointed against us, to suppress our success in the fisheries, when it is with extreme difficulty that it continues its existence, shall we lay burdens upon it which it is unable to support? If this important interest is injured, it will not only destroy the competition with foreigners, but will induce the people to sell their property in the United States and remove to Nova Scotia, or some other place, where they can prosecute their business under the protection of Government. * * * I will not reiterate the arguments respecting the fisheries; it is well known to be the best nursery of seamen; the United States have no other, and it never can be the intention of gentlemen to leave the navigation of the Union to the mercy of foreign powers; it is of necessity, then, that we lay the foundation of our maritime importance as soon as may be, and this can be done only by encouraging our fisheries. It is well known that we have a number of rivals in this business, desirous of excluding us from the fishing banks altogether. This consideration, of itself, is sufficient to induce a wise legislation to extend every encouragement to so important a concern.’

“Congress were not unmindful of these representations and appeals. An Act was passed in 1789, which allowed a bounty of 5c. per quintal on dried, and the same sum per barrel on pickled fish exported from, and imposed a duty of 50c. the quintal and 75c. the barrel on foreign fish imported into, the United States. The system of Protection, of bounties and allowances, is as old, therefore, as the Government itself, and was devised and adopted by the statesmen of the Revolution.

“In 1790, Washington, in his speech to Congress, remarked that: ‘Our fisheries and the transportation of our own produce offer us abundant means for guarding ourselves against the evil of depending upon foreign vessels.’

“The Senate waited upon the President and the Vice-President with an address.

“Among its topics we find the following: ‘The navigation and the fisheries of the United States are objects too interesting not to inspire a disposition to promote them by all means which shall appear to us consistent with their natural progress and permanent prosperity.’

“The additional relief desired was not long delayed. Early in 1792 an Act was passed, which abolished the bounty on dried and pickled fish exported, and granted in lieu thereof a specific allowance to vessels employed in the codfishery.

"This allowance was graduated according to the size of the vessels. Boats between five and twenty tons burden were entitled to receive one dollar per ton, annually; those between twenty and thirty tons, 50c. per ton additional; and to those more than thirty tons, the allowance was fixed at $2.50 per ton; but no vessel could receive more than $175 in one season.

"By a subsequent Act the same year, these several rates were increased one-fifth, to commence in January, 1793, to continue seven years, and thence to the end of the next Session of Congress.

"We have seen that, through all the wars and territorial and maritime disputes between France and England, touching their respective possessions in America; through all the changes and chances of our colonial submission, from its commencement to its termination; through the war of the revolution, and the negotiations for peace; in the Convention that framed and in the State Conventions that consolidated the Constitution of the United States; in the First Congress, and in the negotiations at the close of the war of 1812, the fisheries occupy a prominent place, and were often the hinge on which turned questions of vast importance.

"We have seen that once entire communities seemed to believe that no way to wealth was so sure and so rapid as adventures for herrings and codfish; and that men of the highest rank, and of the most shining talents, accordingly set their hopes and fortunes on the cast of the net and the line. We have found that eminent writers, on matters of commerce and navigation, and statesmen of world-wide fame, have declared that 'the English navy became formidable alone by the discovery of the inexpressibly rich fishing banks of Newfoundland; that writers of acknowledged judgment have observed, that 'by the cod-fishery in America, the navy of France became formidable to all Europe; that our own statesmen, of the revolutionary era, considered that we also must look to our fishermen to man our navy; and that a French Minister of the present time, expressed the opinion, in 1836, 'that without the resources which were found in the sailors engaged in the fisheries, the expedition to Algiers could not have taken place.'"

And secondly, it was because there was not room enough for them on their own coast, nor fish enough and because they had ruined part of their own fisheries. Whenever the American people engaged in any industry they prosecuted it with astonishing vigour and perseverance. They prosecuted the fishing industry to such an extent that they exhausted it in a few years. And that was the reason that they were so anxious for the privilege of using our own fisheries. But, if the Americans had exhausted their own fisheries, would they not also exhaust ours if we gave them the chance? Besides, our own fishing population now numbered many thousands, and was increasing faster than any other population on the globe; unless this fishing population were assisted to find means of subsistence they would be obliged to emigrate to the United States. We practically said to our own fishermen, the fisheries along the coast are not extensive enough for your own support, still we will allow the Americans, who are the greatest destroyers of fish, to come in and compete with you. He was not trying to hurt the character of the American fishermen. It was their nature to make as much money as they could and as quickly as possible, and if they could take all the fish in the gulf within ten years they would do so, if it paid them. He would ask the Government was it proper the fisheries should be destroyed in a year, ten years, or fifty years? Were we only to look to the present? No; all statesmen should look to the future, and if we did not look to the future of our fisheries, what had happened to other countries would happen to us. We had formerly, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the most valuable whale in existence—the black whale. It was so abundant that it could be killed easily, and fishermen from Nantucket and other harbours in Martha's Vineyard used to come every year, and, in the space of two or three months' whaling, get oil enough to support them the whole year. Those fish were now completely extinct. It was one of the mildest of whales, although one of the richest in oil and bones. The whole coast of Labrador was strewn with the remains of those whales. Would it not have been better if the Americans had killed less whales, and had left sufficient to provide from 10,000 to 20,000 gallons of oil every year for each whaling vessel, instead of slaughtering them so that now they were extinct? Not one had been seen since 1854, when the last one was killed near Kamouraska. Another valuable animal destroyed was the walrus. When the French came to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, they found the walrus in immense numbers. These animals used to bask on the sandbanks in the sun, and were so tame that people could drive them to land and kill them by thousands. The Acadians killed a great number, but they were not so persevering as the Americans, who, when New France became a British colony, erected establishments where the walrus could be found, and in twenty years the whole of the walrus were destroyed. Of course, the destruction of the fisheries was not all done by the Americans, but, when two were engaged fishing on the same grounds, the destruction was greater than when there was one alone. Our people had also destroyed certain fishing grounds by over-fishing, and by fishing at all seasons. His hon. friends from the counties of Temiscouata, Kamouraska, L'Islet, and Montmagny would remember the time when herring used to come up as far as River Ouelle, in the River St. Lawrence, that was to say 300 miles from its mouth, and even further up, in immense schools. Instead of protecting the fish, the people made brush fisheries into which the herring went by millions, and a large quantity became choked and died there. A certain quantity would be used as food, and some of the rest used as manure, but the greater part were left to rot. According to the best naturalists, the fish, like birds, preferred some places to others. They came to these places to spawn, and, if, during that time, they were disturbed, in the manner they had been in the St. Lawrence, they could not be expected to come there again with the same abundance. If they were continually disturbed, from year to year, a time would come when the fish would be so few that the fishing for them would cease to be remunerative. With regard to the cod fishery, the Isle aux Basques, opposite Trois Pistoles, was at one time a celebrated fishing ground. Escoumains, and the coast of Rimouski, were also much frequented by this fish, and by the halibut and sardines, but now codfish could not be taken at Isle aux Basques or at Bic, and only at Cape Chat, a distance from Isle aux Basques of 150 miles below. Formerly spring and fall herring were caught along the north shore, west of Mingan, even west of Point des Monts. This was a most valuable fish, which could be exported by thousands of barrels to Europe and the West Indies, but now it was very scarce. A few schools might be seen one year, and none would appear for two or three years after. In former times the fisheries had a better chance to last than now. The proper way to catch codfish was by line and hook. In this way the schools of fish which were at the bottom of the sea feeding were not disturbed; but, when the Americans came with their trolling lines and seines about 600 feet long and more, with their bag seines, and their purse seines 1,500 feet long, and 80 feet in breadth, then the real danger began; and every day the bad effects of this fishing, under the Reciprocity Treaty, but mostly since the Treaty of Washington came in force, appeared. Before that treaty, there was a time when, on the south shores of the St. Lawrence, from Cape Gaspé to Cape Chat, and even as far as Matane, they could see schools of mackerel by the hundred. Our people only fished for codfish and herring, and left the mackerel alone, and when the Americans came, they slaughtered the fish indiscriminately, and after ten years sufficient mackerel could not be caught for bait. The Bay of Gaspé, in the months of August and September, used to be full of mackerel, and there was also found a fish preying on the mackerel, called, in this country, the horse mackerel, the tunny, the celebrated fish of the ancients. He would now cite authorities to prove that the modes of fishing practised on our shores were highly injurious, and that the consequence was that many of our fisheries had been injured and were now less productive than ever. He would first quote some figures from the celebrated report of Professor Baird, who wrote a history of the whale fisheries of the United States, giving the number of vessels from the beginning down to 1876. The numbers of whaling vessels sailing from American ports during the years 1875 and 1876, were as follows:—

From year	To year	No. of Vessels.	Ave. Ton.
1790	1800	194	112
1800	1810	324	230
1810	1820	427	259
1820	1830	1038	293
1830	1840	2149	328
1840	1850	2342	290
1850	1860	2150	285
1860	1870	1176	232

This table showed the rapidity of the decline of the whale trade, owing to the destruction of the whale fisheries. He could prove by statistics that the whale fisheries had diminished in as great a degree in England; while, in other countries, in France for instance, where this industry flourished under the reign of Louis XVI, and was revived after the peace of 1815, it had dwindled to almost nothing. By these extracts it would be seen how plentiful the cod fisheries and seal fisheries were in those days. In order to prove that the fisheries had not only diminished, but were in danger of being further injured on many of our coasts, owing to the injurious practices resorted to by the fishermen, especially the American fishermen, he would cite some of the testimony and evidence adduced before the Fishery Commission. At page 34 of Appendix G. they read:

"J. E. Marshall, Anticosti, fisherman, born State of Maine, U.S., carried on fishing about thirty-three years—In eleven days I stocked 7,000 in Gaspé Basin. I have seen at Godbout, about twenty-three years ago, two American vessels loaded in one haul of the seine. I believe that the practice of seining is injurious to all kinds of fish. Codfish offal should not be allowed to be thrown overboard on any fishing-ground around the shores, because it injures the small fish and drives away the large. Fishing by Americans in Canadian waters injures their fisheries."

"Daniel West, Grande-Grève, fisherman, practised fishing this forty years—The practice of throwing fish offal overboard by the Americans is a great injury to the fishery, because it poisons the water, drives away the large fish and kills the eggs. Seining, as practised by the Americans, is injurious to the fisheries, because it takes large and small fish; all the small fish are thrown away, and left to perish on the strand."—p. 126.

"Michael McGinnis, Port Daniel, fisherman and merchant for fifteen years—The practice of throwing fish offal is injurious to the fisheries, because it gluts the large fish and kills the small ones."—p. 127.

"Frank LeBlanc, Port Daniel, having been a mariner and fisherman for these thirty-six years—I attribute the falling off of halibut to the number taken by Americans with trawls; each vessel carries from four to six doreys, and each dorey had 1,000 hooks, which is an extremely destructive mode of fishing, as it kills the large mother fish. The practice of throwing overboard offals is very injurious to the fishing grounds."—p. 138.

"John M. Luce, Grande-Grève, in the county of Gaspé, for sixteen years manager for Wm. Frewin & Co., of Jersey—Halibut were plentiful all along this south coast of the St. Lawrence, especially at Grand Vallée and Magdalene River. Now, the quantity is very small. I attribute this destruction of the halibut fishery to the exhausting fishing of the Americans, with their numerous and large trawls. All these halibut and other fish are taken close along shore within the three-mile limit."—pp. 179 and 180.

"William Hyman, J. P., Mayor, Cape Rosier, merchant, and lived here for thirty-four years—The American vessels fishing cod on the banks cause injury to the inshore cod fisheries, first, by using trawl lines, they kill the mother fish; second, by the hurt caused to the cod fish, by the offals, which being swallowed by the cod, the bones swallowed destroys them."—pp. 142 and 181.

"James Rooney, of Percé, fifty-two years, keeps a fishery, always lived in Percé—The habit of the Americans of throwing offal over on the banks, is injurious to our cod-fishery. It gluts the fish, and they will not bite on the lines; it floats away with the tide, and draws the fish off after it."—pp. 147 and 187.

"Wm. Johnston, House Harbour, merchant, acquainted with fisheries these 27 years—The practice of throwing fish-offal over board is injurious to our fisheries. It gluts the fish, and, decaying on the bottom, poisons the water, driving away the large fish, and killing the young and eggs."—pp. 148 and 189.

He also cited the evidence of Alexis Noel, Fox River (p. 190), John Packwood (p. 151), Messiah Tapp (p. 152), James Samuel (p. 152), Edward Bunn, (p. 154), John D. Payson (p. 197), Philias Sirois (p. 175), John Renouf (p. 223), Julien Boudreault (p. 178), and Pierre Brochu (p. 185), to the same effect.

"George Harbour, farmer and fisherman, Sandy Beach—It was right inside of Sandy Point where the Americans swept round with their seines, and obliged my brother to go away. The effect of throwing offal overboard, the codfish eats it, and they will not take the bait; another thing is, that it makes the water impure, and kills the eggs that are deposited; it will also kill the young fry. I have passed over the water where there was a very disagreeable smell arising from this stuff rotting on the bottom. I have seen the Americans using the hauling seine; as a natural consequence it destroys the fish, that are no good when caught, but which would be good if left until later. Seining is injurious to the fishery. I have heard from Americans, and of my own knowledge I know it to be so. I have been told by themselves that if they were allowed to frequent our waters for the space of ten years our fish would be extinct.

The Americans told me their codfish on their own banks had been ruined. —App. E, p. 79.

“Gregoire Grenier, of Newport, county of Gaspé, fish-trader—I have seen Americans seining close to the shore at our place. They throw the offals overboard and this is what spoils the codfish, because at the place where they have thrown this overboard, you need not try to catch a fish for a long spell. I have proved that myself. I would say that the fish eat too much of what is thrown overboard, and I think that it makes the water in the vicinity impure.”—p. 87.

“Wm. McLeod, farmer, formerly seaman and fisherman for forty years at Port Daniel,—One fourth of the mackerel seined, at least, is thrown away. It would be injurious to all kinds of fish. If you destroy the young fish it is like cutting down the young forests. My opinion is that this sickness is caused by offal thrown overboard at these places; it impregnates the water, and makes it unwholesome for the fish, and they will die. Last year fever prevailed in the neighbourhood where the offal has been thrown out, and two years ago, Americans stated themselves that it was injurious; it was not our affair, that they would kill the goose that laid the golden egg, for the sake of the present profit.”—p. 99.

“John James Fox, Collector of Customs, overseer of fisheries at Amherst Island, lived there twenty-six years—Americans stand as near as possible to the beach and fish. I have known them to hire boats at the Island and fish in shore, the fish are all inside. I have heard Americans say that they hoped these seines would never be brought into the gulf, or else these fisheries would be very soon destroyed. They throw the offal overboard. The throwing overboard of codfish offal is very destructive. Besides, so many small fish are destroyed, it poisons the fish ground. Fishing with trolls, it destroys the mother fish, the large fish that come in to spawn.”—p. 113.

“Thomas Savage, of Cape Cove, Gaspé, merchant and shipowner, member of Legislative Council of Quebec, lived at Cape Cove about 53 years.—The Americans land their fish and draw their seines ashore. Trawl fishing has increased, and I think that it injures the fishing. Some Americans told me that although they trawl, they knew that it destroyed the fish in their own waters, and that in a few years they would have the fishing here destroyed.”—p. 262.

“T. J. LaMontagne, of St. Anne des Monts, Gaspé, fish merchant, since 1859—The effect of trawling is disastrous especially to large fish, because the large fish are considered to be the spawning fish, as far as it is to my knowledge to ascertain. Trawls take the bottom fish which are the large fish. Fishermen all agree to say that the Americans took away the halibut from our coasts.”—p. 280.

“Abraham Lebrun, of Percé, speaks of the North-Shore fisheries.—Trawling has been detrimental to the halibut fishery. I mean that the fish are not now so abundant as formerly; if fishermen desisted from fishing for a period, the fish would then increase in number. I should think the fishing would be restored in six years. If it continues it will ruin the fishery completely.”—p. 286.

Those were a few extracts from the prominent evidence brought before the Fishery Commission at Halifax, from the Province of Quebec only. He did not speak of testimony from the other Provinces, because he left that to be done by gentlemen from those Provinces who were better acquainted than he with the fisheries on their coasts, and, therefore, more competent to defend the causes of their Provinces. It was this testimony from the Province of Quebec, as well as other Provinces, which proved first the grand advantage the American fishermen derived from participation in the Canadian coast fisheries; and, secondly, the danger these same fisheries ran of being destroyed partly or wholly, by too many fishermen fishing over the same grounds, and the injurious and destructive modes of fishing resorted to, which won the case at Halifax, and secured the $5,500,000. It was the testimony in relation to facts connected with fishing on the sea-coast during the last fifty years, brought before the Commissioners, Mr. Delfosse especially. He might cite, also, testimony of a number of other men who had been brought up on the coast, and spent their lives in fishing, who also derived means of subsistence for themselves and families, and, consequently, were interested in the welfare of the fisheries. One and all were but of one opinion, that, if such things as had been going on in the past were allowed to go on in the future, the fisheries of the Dominion would soon be destroyed. When they read a natural history of fisheries, and the way they were multiplied, of the number of millions of eggs with which the fish were loaded, they were told by naturalists that the fisheries were inexhaustible. He admitted that they were inexhaustible in one way. Why, birds were also inexhaustible, that is to say, all the varieties could not be destroyed? But what did they see in this country? Why, many years ago, all our forests were enlivened by the singing of myriads of birds. Still, from want of protection, and oftentimes wantonly, the birds were destroyed to such an amount that the insects got the better of it, and we had to import birds to do the work which Providence had assigned to those birds that we had allowed to be destroyed. When man altered the laws of nature, he soon felt the evil consequences of it. He would now speak of the Province of Quebec. Everyone who had read history, knew that there was no valley in the world finer than the valley of the St. Lawrence; no lands more suited to all kinds of culture. The French came and took possession of that beautiful valley, prepared by Providence to be the home of a happy people; but they did what others had done before in other countries. They scorned the advice of wise men, who told them that, by the way in which they cultivated this land of milk and honey, they would in fifty years deprive it of its substance, and their grandchildren would starve. The prediction was verified, and to-day the people were obliged to get their flour from the States. He had the honour to be at one time Commissioner of Crown Lands in the Province of Quebec for a year and a half, and had seen the destruction which was going on in their forests, and had done his best to stop it, but, to a certain extent, ineffectually. Austria, although settled before the Christian era, had more and richer forests than the whole of the Dominion, because they were scientifically husbanded. When these forests would be in great part destroyed, then perhaps means would be taken, when it was too late, to restore them. The same would happen as in the case of agriculture in the Province of Quebec, where, after the lands had been forced until hardly anything was left in them, and it would take half a century to bring them back to their former position, agricultural societies were organised and premiums given at exhibitions. If the advice of the wise men had been heard with regard to agriculture, the lands would be in a state of production better than they were fifty years ago, and the Province of Quebec would not be obliged to buy her bread from the United States, but would export wheat to England and other countries by thousands of bushels. He remembered the time when vessels could be anchored opposite Verchères and other villages, being loaded with wheat for England, but now the land was destroyed, as the forests were being destroyed, and as the fisheries would be destroyed, if means were not taken to stop their destruction. He (Mr. Fortin) was the mouth-piece, the toll-bell of the fishermen, who saw nothing in the future but emigration to the United States, nothing but the obligation to go and live under a flag they did not like. Hundreds of our people were leaving Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to go to the United States, to swell the ranks of that mighty nation—our greatest rival, not only in fisheries, but in commerce, if we did not open our eyes. He came here to-day backed by the people of this country, especially those who were directly interested in the fisheries. If this country were only like a plain along the Red River, and its people only agriculturists, it could never become a great country or have a foreign trade, by which wealth and power were only obtainable. It was fortunate for this country that it had in the east elements of prosperity different from those in the west, and thus the means of carrying on a domestic trade, which was after all the best of all trades, and which could procure food and work for the greatest number of the people of Canada. The National Policy meant the protection of every industry, and, therefore, the fishery industry should not be left to defend itself. They should not allow it to be crushed by one of the most vigilant and ambitious nations, commercially speaking, in the world. He was in favour of that policy, but, in order to foster manufactures, we must have consumers. Where were they to be found?—not in the States, where they had erected a wall against us; nor in England, where they manufactured cheaper than we could; nor in France, which had a Protective policy; and not much in the West Indies, where we had to compete with the Americans, who had more capital, and more manufacturing skill, a greater experience, and occupied an intermediate, and consequently a better position than ourselves, in regard to the trade with these ports, and did the business there; and not in Brazil, which was nearer to England than to us. The nearest and best consumers of our manufactures were the population of the Maritime Provinces, and of the eastern part of the Province of Quebec. These people purchased nothing but what the west produced, and could, in return, supply the west with fish. The people of the west were not sufficiently acquainted with the population of the east. On account of their laborious pursuits, and the good food they consumed, in order to keep up with the work, and, also, owing to the salubrity of the country, and the healthy tone of the population, the maritime population multiplied in a greater degree than any inland people. He was afraid, if matters went on as at present, a great many would have to emigrate to the States. The people who went away were generally intelligent and ambitious, the very ones whom we should do our best to retain in the country. He would now come to the subject of the resolution. We had now the means of creating a fund, the interest of which could be devoted to protect and develop our fisheries, and renovate those which were extinct. This could be done without any injury to any portion of this Dominion, and ought to be done now, when we had the means of doing it. What the resolution asked was that the money should remain in the Treasury. If this fund were not created now, when we had the means to do so, how could it be expected, when this country was engaged in costly works, that a fund could be created with equal facility? The destruction would be consummated, and with all our resources engaged in one way or another, there would be difficulty in raising money to restore the fisheries, and that hardy population, having lost its means of subsistence, would have to emigrate in large numbers to the United States. Our manufacturers would lose a great part of their best consumers, and, come what might, our manufactures would come to a standstill; but, the most likely event was that they would begin a retrograde movement. The doctrine of the necessity of the protection and the fostering of the fishing industries of the fisheries was not new; it had been held in England, France, Norway and the United States. The American Government had given $7,000,000 bounty in seventy years for the maintenance of that industry, and the French Government were giving bounties to their fishermen at the west coast of Newfoundland, at Iceland, and on the banks of Newfoundland, at the rate of two millions of francs a year. They considered the fisheries of such advantage as a nursery of seamen for their war-fleets that they would not give them up on any consideration. The National Assembly of France had passed a law of the following tenor, relative to the great maritime fisheries, June 24th, 9th, and 22nd July, 1851:—

“Cap. 1.—Cod Fishery.—From the 1st January, 1852, to the 30th June, 1861, the bounties granted for the encouragement of the cod fishery will be fixed as follows:—

“1st. Bounty on the outfit.—Fifty francs per man of the crew employed at the fishery, either on the coast of Newfoundland, at St. Pierre and Miquelon, or on the Grand Bank, and possessing a drying place.

“Fifty francs per man of the crew employed in the Iceland fishery, without a drying place.

“Thirty francs per man of the crew employed at the fishery on the Grand Bank of Newfoundland, and without a drying place.

“Fifteen francs per man of the crew employed at the Dogger Bank fishery.

“2nd. Bounty on the produce of the fishery.—Twenty francs per metric quintal of dry codfish, the produce of the French fishery, to be shipped either direct from the fishing settlements, or from the ports of France, for the markets of the French colonies of America and India, or for the settlements on the west coast of Africa, and other transatlantic countries—provided always that the fish be landed at a port where there is a French Consul.

“Sixteen francs per metric quintal of dry codfish, the produce of the French fishery, shipped either direct from the fishing settlements, or from the ports of France, and destined for the countries of Europe, and the foreign states on the shores of the Mediterranean, Sardinia and Algeria excepted.

“Sixteen francs per metric quintal of dry codfish,—the produce of the French fishery, that may be imported into the French colonies of America and India, and other transatlantic countries, when said fish are exported from the ports of France, without having been there landed “Twelve francs per metric quintal of dry codfish, the produce of the French fishery, shipped for Sardinia and Algeria, either direct from the fishing settlements, or from the ports of France.

"Twenty francs per metric quintal of the hard roe of codfish, the produce of the French fishery, brought into France by their fishing vessels.

"NOTE.—One kilogramme is equal to 2lb. 3oz.; 220½lb. equal to 1 metric quintal."

This law was not only still in force, but the French Government was contemplating other measures to protect and develop its sea fisheries, although their products amounted, in the year 1876, to 88,990,591fr., equal to about seventeen millions of dollars. 21,263 vessels and boats, manned by 79,676 men, were employed in these different fisheries. England herself, in 1633, in the reign of Charles I., showed her interest in the fisheries by enacting the following ordinance taken from L. J. H. Young's book on sea fishing:—

"In 1633, Charles I. ordained 'an Association of the three Kingdoms for a general fishery within the hail seas and coasts of His Majesty's said Dominions.' A standing committee was named for the government of the Association, which was joined by many persons of distinction. For the encouragement of this adventure the King ordered that Lent should be strictly observed, but the breaking out of the civil war put an end to this scheme.

"In 1654, the Government, in order to give protection to the fisheries, remitted in favour of Sir Phineas Andrews, who had embarked in the same, the salt duties and Customs and Excise duties upon all naval necessaries, besides which voluntary collections were made from wealthy and patriotic individuals for building wharves, docks, and storehouses, and for defraying other expenses."

The following extracts, also from Young, would demonstrate that the British Parliament, as well as the British nation, were at one time anxious to keep up the British fisheries in a good state of production:—

"A Select Committee of the House of Commons was appointed, in 1833, to inquire into the state of the British Channel Fisheries. A second Committee was appointed in 1836, to consider the state of the Salmon Fisheries of Scotland, and, in the previous year, Commissioners had been instructed to investigate the condition of the said fisheries. From each of these bodies reports have proceeded, which have been laid before the Houses of Parliament, and contain a considerable amount of information upon the subject. Taking these branches of the inquiry in the order here given, I will proceed to describe, as briefly as possible, the actual condition of the fisheries connected with these coasts and rivers of the United Kingdom. The appointment of the Committee in 1833, arose out of the distress which was at that time said to affect the several Channel Fisheries, and, in its reports, the Committee stated that these fisheries were generally in a very depressed state, and on decline; that they appeared to have been gradually sinking since the peace of 1815; that the capital employed did not yield a profitable return; that the number of vessels and of the people to whom it gave employment was diminished; and that the fishermen who formerly could maintain themselves and their families by their industry, were in a greater or less degree pauperised. The cause of this unfavourable change, to which as being in its opinion the most readily susceptible of remedy, the Committee gave its principal attention, was the interference of the fishermen of France and Holland; but the principal cause of the distress was stated to be, 'the great and increasing scarcity of all fish that breed in the Channel,' compared with what was the ordinary supply forty years since; operating prejudicially to the fishermen, at the same time that a continual fall of prices has taken place in the markets."

Professor Baird, the celebrated American naturalist, one of the best authorities on this subject, had written as follows:—

"Extract from report of Professor Spencer Baird, United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, 1872 and 1873, pages xi., xiii., xiv.:

"6. Conclusions as to the decrease of cod-fisheries on the New England coast.

"Of all the various fisheries formerly prosecuted off the coast of New England, north of Cape Cod, the depreciation in that of the cod appears to be of the greatest commercial importance.

"Formerly the waters abounded in this fish to such an extent that a large supply could be taken throughout almost the entire year along the banks, especially in the vicinity of the mouth of large rivers. * * *

"Mr. W. B. McLaughlin, of Southern Head, Grand Manan, says:—'At that time cod, haddock, and pollock, as well as halibut, were taken in great abundance in Seal Cove Sound, between Hardwood Cove, on Wood Island, and Indian or Parker's Point, on the mainland. They were to be met with during the greater part of the year, especially from May to January; and the fishery in the channel was really more productive than on the banks, or further out at sea. * * *

"The fishery in question diminished very soon after, and in a few years ceased almost entirely, so that up to the present time there are not enough cod in those waters to repay the experiment of attempting to catch them. * * *

"Whatever may be the importance of increasing the supply of salmon, it is trifling compared with the restoration of our exhausted cod fisheries; and, should these be brought back to their original condition, we shall find within a short time an increase of wealth on our shores, the amount of which it would be difficult to calculate.

"Not only would the general prosperity of the adjacent states be enhanced, but, in the increased number of vessels built, in the larger number of men induced to devote themselves to maritime pursuits, and in the general stimulus to every thing connected with the business of the sea-faring profession, we should be recovering, in a great measure, from the loss which has been the source of so much commutation to political economists and the writers of the country."

The Professor thus declared that the United States cod fisheries were partly exhausted. He had other authorities proving this fact, which was a consequence of the stimulation afforded by a market of 40,000,000, who were great consumers of fish of all varieties and sizes. The American fishermen and merchants had large inducements in their endeavour to obtain the trade and fisheries of our coasts in the existence of such a market. They naturally wished to shut us out from such a valuable source of profit, for which they had kept us out of their fisheries, while taking possession of ours. If we did not stop them, they would ultimately accomplish their design. At present we did not find that we sold more fish to the States than before the Washington Treaty. On the contrary, even in Canadian cities, and the most distant parts of the country, our people were supplied with American fish, mostly all in a fresh state, winter and summer. It seemed to him that this was a state of things that should not be allowed to continue. Of course we could not break the Treaty, which had four or five years to run, but he should indeed be glad if the Americans terminated it, and then we should do our best to foster, protect, and renovate our fisheries, increase the prosperity of the fishermen and all connected industries. It was with that view that he and several others who took an interest in that industry, thought that the Government should seize this opportune moment to create a fund which no Government or people, adverse to our fisheries, could destroy, for the development of the fisheries, the renovation of those exhausted, and the general revival of that interest. This question was so new that some still doubted the possibility of renovating sea fisheries by hatching and otherwise. But that was as practicable as the renewal of river fisheries by such means, and the following letter of Professor Baird, proved it beyond doubt:—

"UNITED STATES COMMISSION,

"FISH AND FISHERIES.

"WASHINGTON, D.C., April 16th, 1879.

"DEAR DOCTOR.—The experiments I made last winter in the artificial hatching of cod satisfied me that it is entirely practicable to multiply this species to any desired extent. If I had had the proper machinery I could readily have hatched out young cod and turned them into the ocean by hundreds, almost thousands of millions. I am now constructing a steamer, at a cost of about $50,000, expressly to do this work. The methods devised by my associates are equally available for all kinds of sea fish, including mackerel. As it was, simply by way of experiment, we planted some eight or ten millions of cod. My report for the year will contain an exhaustive account of the whole business, which I think you will study with much interest.

"Sincerely yours,

"SPENCER F. BAIRD.

"Commissioner.

"DR. P. FORTIN,

"House of Commons, Ottawa, Canada."

He did not see why this Government, since former Governments had voted considerable sums for hatching for river fisheries, which had not the thousandth part of the importance of sea fisheries, should be reluctant, or Parliament either, to do what was asked, in regard to the forming of a fund for the preservation, improvement and development of the fisheries, not only for the present, but for the future, so as to enable us, on the expiration of the treaty, to supply all the demand in the States and in other foreign countries. It was not the Americans who should take all the profit of our fisheries, but ourselves and those who would come after us. He was not in the habit of taking up much time of the House, and must thank it for its kindness in listening to his remarks, which he had tried to make as clear as possible on that occasion. He had had several years' experience in connection with those fisheries. Before he had visited the Gulf of St. Lawrence, he had never suspected the importance of that interest, although he had perused with delight, in his younger days, the adventures of those great captains and sailors, Spanish, Portuguese, Dutch, English and French, who had made so many discoveries in the unknown seas 300 years ago. Most of those great seamen were fishermen, brought up on the coast, who had spent their youth in small boats and coasting vessels, and were afterwards able, on setting foot on the large vessels, to learn to perform any duty confided to them in two or three months. On reaching the Gulf of St. Lawrence, he soon realised the importance of the fisheries, and particularly in 1858, when he went to enquire into the French fisheries at Newfoundland and St. Pierre and Miquelon. France, owning only two small rocks in that region, 3,000 miles from her home territory, and the right of fishing off the west, north-west and north coast of Newfoundland, with but the simple right of occupation during the fishing season besides her own coasts, was able to derive, as he had said before, 89,000,000fr. a year, in 1876 from her sea-fishing industry furnishing employment to 21,000 vessels and boats and 79,000 men. That showed the importance she attached to that industry, which would enable her to man her war fleet in a fortnight, or a month at the latest. The following statement would show the paramount importance of the fishing industry in Norway, and it must be remembered that a still larger quantity of fish was taken for local consumption, making the total value of the catch nearly $30,000,000 :—

He (Mr. Fortin) further recognised the importance of that interest when he met the fleets of United States fishermen congregating in the harbours of the north shore of the Magdalen Islands, and the estuary of the St. Lawrence and Baie des Chaleurs, or the fleet of the French fishermen at St. Pierre or Miquelon and on the coasts of Newfoundland, and when he knew that our fish went further in the markets of the world than any other products of this country, as far as the Mauritius, Greece, Naples, Portugal, Spain, the West Indies, and Brazil. Afterwards, in 1868, he visited the Maritime Exhibition at Havre, including fishery interests as well as the interests of navigation, when he saw every appliance used in the fisheries, and the boats and vessels employed in the transportation of those goods to market, and all kinds of prepared fish, not only from the United States but Canada, and every nation in Europe, especially Norway, now, perhaps, the greatest fishing nation in the world. In conversation with the exhibitors, he learned enough to convince him that this fishing industry was one of the largest and most important to Canada, if properly developed. Perhaps they would think him an enthusiast. He did not think he was; but, if he was, it was in a great cause. At any rate he was disinterested; he had no property within 600 miles of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. He had no relations, but a great many friends, in all the localities interested in the fisheries. He had never yet met an individual who did not say that the fishing interest was among the greatest of this country; and he had not yet met anyone who did not say that the matter of this resolution was equitable, and that it was just to make a fund of the money obtained by giving the fisheries to the Americans, for the benefit of the fisheries and the fishermen who had been injured. Was it sound policy to allow that money to be expended for general purposes, and to abandon the fisheries to destruction, when we had the means of repairing them and further developing our fishing industries? He was certain that, if the present House did not agree with him, the House sitting fifteen years or twenty years hence, would agree with him and others pleading for the same cause, but it would be probably too late. This was just the time to create a fund with this money, to be used for the protection of the fisheries. The whole country would ultimately benefit by it, for the fishing population—who were, no one could deny, the best class of consumers of the manufactures and the agricultural products of this country—would increase in number and in wealth. Under our new Protection policy, the people of the Western Provinces would, he had no doubt, become more and more prosperous and wealthy, and, as a compensation for the higher Protective duties, it was only just that the fishing interest should receive some assistance in the way he had indicated. The National Policy would encourage an interchange of goods between the eastern and western sections of the Dominion, by the route of the St. Lawrence, and thereby benefit the carrying trade. If these fisheries were fostered and developed, instead of having 26,000 people engaged in them, we would soon have 50,000. France, on her other fishing coasts, gave employment to 60,000 men; England, 100,000; and Norway, 150,000. The latter country produced annually nearly 1,000,000 quintals of codfish alone, as a result of the care and protection which that country had given to their fisheries. The fish exported from that country, in 1876, represented a value of $13,270,000. When he was arguing for the establishment of the telegraph line on the coast of Gaspé, he cited the example of Norway, who, more than ten years ago, encircled her entire fishing coast with a wire, with a station at every prominent point, manned by a guardian and telegraph operator, who gave information at all the stations of the movements of the fish as well as the arrival of storms. The poor fishermen, who, formerly, had to go out to sea day and night, now sat quietly in the harbour and waited for the information by telegraph. What Norway had done, this country might do. We should do what other nations had done for the development of their fishing industry, and as regarded the telegraph as an auxiliary to the fisheries, he was very glad to thank the Government for having taken the initiative in this important matter, and adopted the proposed scheme of sea coast telegraph for the Gulf and lower River St. Lawrence, and coasts of the Maritime Provinces, and the House for having voted money to carry out part of it this year, more or less. Scarcely a year passed that England did not vote sums of money to build piers and protect boats on the coast of Scotland, in the interest of the fishermen engaged in herring fisheries in the North Sea. She spent thousands of pounds, at short intervals, to build breakwaters to shelter the boats of these fishermen. Was that money wasted? Not at all. If they looked into the reports of the British fisheries, they would find that the herring fisheries prosecuted on the coast of Scotland produced last year 750,000 barrels of fish, each barrel worth $4 or $5. He had tried his best to establish his case. If he had omitted anything essential, the hon. gentlemen defending the same cause would be able to supply it. At all events he had spoken with earnestness and with the strongest possible convictions. If he were not convinced of the truth, he would not have dared to come before this House and ask it to sanction the measure he had proposed. In conclusion, he thanked the House for the kindness and attention with which the members had listened to his remarks. He moved that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole, to consider the following resolutions:—

“1. Resolved, That it is agreed by Article eighteenth (18) of the Treaty of Washington, by the high contracting parties, that is to say, the Government of Her Britannic Majesty and the Government of the United States, that in addition to the liberty secured to the United States fishermen by the convention between Great Britain and the United States, signed at London on the 20th day of October, 1818, of taking, curing and drying fish on certain coasts of the British North American Colonies therein defined, the inhabitants of the United States shall have, in common with the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, the liberty, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, to take fish of every kind, except shell fish, on the sea coasts and shores, and in the bays, harbours and creeks of the Provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and the Colony of Prince Edward Island, and of the several islands thereunto adjacent, without being restricted to any distance from the shore, with permission to land upon the said coasts and shores and islands, and also upon the Magdalen Islands, for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish; provided, that in so doing, they do not interfere with the rights of private property or with British fishermen in the peaceable use of any part of the said coasts in their occupancy for the same purpose; and it is understood that the above-mentioned liberty applies solely to the sea fishery, and that the salmon and shad fisheries, and all other fisheries in rivers and the mouths of rivers, are thereby reserved exclusively for British fishermen.

"2. Resolved, That it is agreed by Article nineteenth (19) of the said treaty, by the said high contracting parties, that British subjects shall have, in common with the citizens of the United States, the liberty, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of the said treaty, to take fish of every kind, except shell fish, on the eastern sea coasts and shores of the United States north of the thirty-ninth parallel of north latitude, and on the shores of the several islands thereunto adjacent, and in the bays, harbours and creeks of the said sea coasts and shores of the United States and of the harbours and creeks of the said sea coasts and shores of the United States and of the islands aforesaid, for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish, provided that in so doing they do not interfere with the rights of private property, or with the fishermen of the United States, in the peaceable use of any part of the said coasts in their occupancy for the same purpose; and it is understood that the above-mentioned liberty applies solely to the sea fishery, and that salmon and shad fisheries, and all other fisheries in rivers and mouths of rivers, are thereby reserved exclusively for fishermen of the United States.

"3. Resolved, That, inasmuch as it is asserted, in Article (XXII) twenty-two of the said Treaty, by the Government of her Britannic Majesty, that the privileges accorded to the citizens of the United States, under Article XVIII of the said Treaty, are of greater value than those accorded by Articles XIX and XXI of the said Treaty, to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, and this assertion is not admitted by the Government of the United States, it was further agreed that Commissioners should be appointed to determine, having regard to the privileges accorded by the United States to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, as stated in Articles XIX and XXI of the said Treaty, the amount of compensation, if any, which, in their opinion, ought to be paid by the Government of the United States to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty, in return for the privileges accorded to the citizens of the United States, under Article XVIII of the said Treaty; and that any sum of money which the said Commissioners might so award should be paid by the United States Government, in a gross sum, within twelve months after such award should have been given.

"4. Resolved, That, in virtue of the same Article, Commissioners were appointed in the following manner, that is to say: one named by Her Britannic Majesty, one named by the President of the United States, and a third by Her Britannic Majesty and the President of the United States conjointly.

"5. Resolved, That the said Commissioners appointed under Articles XXII and XXIII of the said Treaty of Washington, of the 8th May, 1871, to determine, having regard to the privileges accorded by the United States to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, stated in Articles XIX and XXI of the said Treaty, the amount of any compensation which, in their opinion, ought to be paid by the Government of the United States to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty, in return for the privileges accorded to the citizens of the United States, under Articles XVIII and XXI of the said Treaty, having carefully and impartially examined the matters referred to them, according to justice and equity, in conformity with the solemn declaration made and subscribed by them on the 15th day of June, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven, did award the sum of five millions five hundred thousand dollars in gold, to be paid by the Government of the United States to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty, in accordance with the provisions of the said Treaty; and the said award was signed in Halifax, on the twenty-third day of November, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven, as follows:—

(Signed) "MAURICE DELFOSE.
"do. "A. T. GALT.

"6. Resolved, That the said sum has been paid by the Government of the United States to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty.

"7. Resolved, That, out of that sum of $5,500,000, a sum of one million dollars has been paid to the Government of Newfoundland for their share of the same award.

"8. Resolved, That there remains a sum of $4,500,000 which has been awarded to the Dominion of Canada, the expenses of the Commission to be deducted proportionately from that sum and the $1,000,000 awarded to Newfoundland.

"9. Resolved, That the said sum of $4,500,000 has been acquired by the Dominion of Canada by the giving to the fishermen of the United States the right of fishing, in common with British fishermen, in our municipal waters, over an extent of coast of 3,160 miles, inhabited by a population of over half a million, who derive their subsistence almost entirely from the sea fisheries.

"10. Resolved, That the participation of the American fishermen in our sea coast fisheries is known to be a great injury to our own fishing population, and that besides the American fishermen have injured those fisheries in a marked degree, and even depopulated some well-known fishing grounds which formerly were very productive, as has been clearly proved by the testimony given before the Fishery Commission of 1877, and have consequently greatly diminished the products of our fisheries, lessened the chances of our fishermen, and threatened the future of our fishing industry.

"11. Resolved, That, if nothing is done, not only to stop the destruction of the fish, that is taking place on our shores, but to repair the injury done, by restoring in some way, as suggested by several scientists, the fishing grounds that are now almost unproductive and which were formerly teeming with fish.

"12. Resolved, That merchants, fishermen and traders from the Dominion, as well as from Great Britain, have established themselves on our fishing coasts, and have erected thereon costly buildings of all kinds, suitable for the fishing industry, for the purpose of carrying on the different fisheries which exist on our shores, and have erected such costly establishments, and placed so much capital in the fishing industry, under the belief that the British Fisheries of the Dominion would never be given up to foreign fishermen.

"13. Resolved, That the giving up of the right of fishing in our waters to the American fishermen has injured the trade of our fishermen very much for the present, and the prospects are still worse for the future, if no remedy is adopted.

"14. Resolved, That it is in the interest of the Dominion that such injury to the fisheries and the fish trade should be repaired to as great an extent as possible.

"15. Resolved, That the interior of this country was largely benefitted by the Reciprocity Treaty which was in operation from 1854 to 1866, between Canada and the United States, and that treaty was obtained by conceding to the American fishermen the right of fishing on all our sea coasts.

"16. Resolved, That our fisheries and our fishermen suffered considerably in consequence of that concession of our fisheries to foreign fishermen.

"17. Resolved, That, during the time the said Reciprocity Treaty was in operation, no sum of money was expended in improvements of any kind on our sea coasts for the development of our fisheries, or to help the fishermen in their arduous labours.

"18. Resolved, That it is but equitable and just that what comes from the fisheries should return to the fisheries.

"19. Resolved, That, for the foregoing reasons, it is the opinion of this House that the amount of the award accruing to Canada (after paying expenses) should be made a special fund, and that the interest thereof should be employed in restoring exhausted fishing grounds, and developing in every way the sea-fisheries of the Dominion."

MR. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) said he had listened, with a great deal of attention, to the eloquent address of the hon. member for Gaspé. It showed that he was very conversant with the history of the great fishing interests of the Dominion. While he (Mr. Macdonald) was willing to assent, in general terms, to the proposition laid down by the hon. member for Gaspé, that what came from the fisheries should go to the fisheries, he was not quite prepared to say with him that the money arising from the award should be appropriated for the restocking of the fishery banks of this country, that had been depleted in the manner in which the fisheries had been carried on for many years past. Yet, he believed with the hon. gentleman, that this fund should, in an especial manner, be set apart to protect and develop the fishing interest of this country. We knew very well that our great fishing banks were becoming rapidly unproductive; that, whereas it was formerly a very easy matter to catch an abundance of fish, now, owing to the state of the banks, it required a large outlay with very uncertain results, which made the business scarcely remunerative. But while he agreed on this point with the member for Gaspé, he could not lose sight of the fact that the Province of Prince Edward Island had an especial claim to a portion of this award—that was, apart from the general claim of the other Maritime Provinces. They knew that Prince Edward Island assented to the Washington Treaty while she was still a separate Province. She always looked upon the fisheries as one of her greatest sources of wealth. She had no manufactures to fall back upon; no canals or anything of that kind, nor great public works from which she could expect to get money from the public chest. They knew that, under the Washington Treaty, this award was given on the grounds that a large portion of the fish that was taken by the Americans on our coast, was taken within the three-mile limit. When the Province of Prince Edward Island came into the Confederation, the terms were silent as to the surrender of her fisheries, and, therefore, she reserved to herself her rights to a fair proportion of the award to which she was a consenting party before she entered into the Confederation. They knew, also, that Prince Edward Island had received no equivalent for the surrender of her fisheries, that the liberty given to the American fishermen had been a source of great injury to her own fishermen, who had thereby been deprived, to some extent, of the means of subsistence for themselves and families. In this way the Maritime Provinces could be shown to have suffered a great injury, and, therefore, he contended that, in a like proportion, they had a claim, and a first claim, on the money received under the Washington Treaty. The ratification of that treaty took place before Prince Edward Island became part of the Dominion, and they knew that the rental of those fisheries was not made by the Dominion, but by the Island, as a Province distinct from the Dominion. She never signed away her right to her share of the award, and, if she had remained, like Newfoundland, apart from the Dominion, she would have received a fair portion of the award, in like manner as Newfoundland had done. For these considerations, when the House went into Committee on these resolutions, he should take the opportunity of moving the following amendment:—

“That after the word ‘should,’ in the third last line, the following be inserted: ‘Subject to the claims of Prince Edward Island,’ and, at the end of the last paragraph, the following be added: ‘That Prince Edward Island has special claims upon the moneys arising out of the award, and that the amount of such claims should be fixed and settled at as early a day as possible.’”

MR. MACDONNELL said he had several charges to make against the hon. member for Gaspé, who had moved these resolutions. In the first place he had to complain that that hon. gentleman had allowed this very important question to be delayed until so late a period in the Session. In the second place, he had introduced the resolution on a Saturday, which was a non-sessional day, thus tacitly admitting that the subject was not worthy of the attention of the House on an ordinary day. He had another charge to make against the hon. gentleman, one in which he was supported by the hon. member who had just sat down. It was that the hon. gentleman asserted that the Maritime Provinces could not claim a share of this money as a matter of right. Such an admission was giving up the case completely. Another charge he had to make against the hon. gentleman was that, while he took the fag-end of the week, and the fag-end of the Session to debate his resolutions, he spoke and read for three hours out of the four at their disposal, leaving less than one hour to all the other members who desired to speak on the subject. This was a question of vast importance, not only to the Provinces claiming the money, but, according to the hon. gentleman himself, to every section of this Dominion from Vancouver to Cape Breton; and that he should, on this question, which other hon. members were anxious also to discuss, engross three hours of the limited time at their disposal to discuss it, was unfair to the interests involved and to the people concerned in it. The hon. gentleman could certainly have dispensed with going back as far as the days of Columbus, with giving them the history of the various kinds of fish which inhabited the Sea of Marmora and adjacent seas in days gone by. Dealing with so practical a subject in so circumscribed a time, the hon. gentleman might have dispensed with entering into a learned disquisition on these matters. There was no necessity to enlarge on the value of our fisheries. They had only to point to the five and a half millions just paid to us by the award of a just and enlightened tribunal as the evidence of that value. To corroborate that evidence they had the returns of the product of the fisheries, which, in 1878, amounted to $12,030,000. He was satisfied with that evidence, and did not think, on the face of it, that the importance of this great resource of our country would be questioned, and he regretted that the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin) had not been of the same opinion, so that more time would have been at the disposal of hon. members to treat this question as it ought to be treated. Now, there were two questions, admittang the great value of the fisheries, which naturally presented themselves. Were the Provinces, out of whose waters the Americans fished, entitled to a portion or the whole of this money, and, if they were, how could this money be best appropriated? As to the first question, he hoped there was not an hon. gentleman in this House, beside the hon. member for Gaspé, who would hesitate to say such Provinces had a right to this money. The forefathers of the present inhabitants of the Maritime Provinces, who followed the fisheries as a means of livelihood, emigrated and settled in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, and Quebec; many of them, fishermen from Scotland and the islands of Scotland. The rich fisheries of those countries induced them to settle along the inhospitable shores of those Provinces, which offered then, and now offered, no other means of existence to these hardworking and enterprising men. These fisheries became the just inheritance of the descendants of these people, and it was because they expected these fisheries would be owned by them and their descendants that they settled down upon the barren shores and mountain lands adjoining them. If they could have had foreknowledge of the fact that they would form a portion of this Dominion, and that Parliament would sit and legislate on their rights and properties, could they have anticipated that this Parliament would have bartered away their fishery rights, at their very doors, to a foreign nation, whose people came there, and not only carried away their fish, but by their destructive engines and means of fishing, entirely ruined and destroyed them forever. These fisheries had become the inheritance of these people, who generation after generation laboured on them as their farms, and they might as well take away the air they breathed, or render it unsafe to sustain life, as to take away those rights. That the fisheries were being destroyed there was no doubt; it had been proved most conclusively by a discussion that took place in this House early in the Session; and the hon. mover of these resolutions was right in saying that the people who inhabited these shores would be obliged to emigrate to the United States if these fisheries were not protected. The other question was how should this money be appropriated? He did not agree with the mover of the resolution in his proposition to invest the money as a special fund, and dispose the interest towards fish-breeding establishments. It had not yet been established conclusively by experience, that the artificial fish-breeding enterprise was successful. That hon. gentleman had bestowed a great deal of time and pains on the matter, and, if he could have produced conclusive evidence that this system was a success, he would have done so. The only evidence he produced was a letter from Mr. Spence Baird, Fishery Commissioner of the United States, in reference to the artificial breeding of cod and other fish. That experiment was in its very infancy, and it was an old maxim that said:

Nor yet the last to cast the old aside.”

He had very little faith in restocking our deep sea fisheries by artificial breeding. There might be something in the system as regarded our rivers. If it were practicable thus to restore the cod and other deep sea fisheries, there would be an amount of disagreement as to which grounds should be chosen, and he felt satisfied much money would be wasted on what might turn out to be a vain speculation. There were other purposes to which the money could be applied. Many of our own fishermen never went beyond three miles from our shores, and a very great extent of our coast was without harbours. Other portions required piers and breakwaters for the protection of boats and fishing craft. The best fishing grounds were often on the most rocky shores. The county which he had the honour to represent had a sea-coast line on one side of 120 miles, without a single good harbour. There were several harbours that could be much improved by the expenditure of money, and which would benefit the fisheries. The Island of Cape Breton was adjacent to the best fisheries of the Dominion. Neither Prince Edward Island, Gaspé nor New Brunswick, possessed fisheries equal to the fisheries surrounding the Island of Cape Breton. That was apparent from the number of American and other fishermen from all portions of the Maritime Provinces, who resorted to the waters adjacent to that Island during the fishing season. The following was a comparative statement of the products of our fisheries in 1878, already mentioned, amounting in all to $12,000,000, contributed by the four different Provinces: Nova Scotia, $5,527,858; New Brunswick, $2,133,237; Quebec, $2,560,148; Prince Edward Island, $763,000. It appeared that Nova Scotia produced alone, in one year, more fish than the other three principal Provinces, and about one-half the product of the whole Dominion. It was known that the best portions of our fisheries were the waters adjacent to the Island of Cape Breton. The most beneficial manner of expending this money, if it was to be specially appropriated, would be to improve our harbours, build piers, and other navigation securities for our fishermen. Every year, when autumn approached, they looked for wrecked boats and vessels of their seamen and fishermen. He was sorry to see that the Government had allowed this matter to stand so long. Various questions had been put to them as to the disposition of this money, but without satisfaction. They had assigned Saturday to the discussion of this question, when hon. gentlemen were absent from the House, regaling themselves after the week's work, and when their minds were occupied in other directions than the business of the country. It was known that last year a grant of $10,000 was made for the purpose of commencing to build a breakwater, to protect and improve the harbour of Port Hood. The present Minister of Public Works then advocated that work, and interpellated the leader of the Government as to whether he was not going to undertake that (to use the hon. member's own words) "important public work." He (Mr. MacDonnell) had the assistance of the hon. the present Minister of Public Works in getting the Government to grant that sum. The Fishery Award was not then paid, nor was it certain that it would be paid. Notwithstanding, that the award was in the meantime paid, the hon. the Minister of Public Works cancelled that grant, although tenders were received for its expenditure the moment he got into power, and the work was abandoned. The fishermen of Nova Scotia were interested more than any other in these public works. It was in such works as these that the money or a great portion of it should be expended. The Province of Nova Scotia came into the Confederation very reluctantly. Its people complained that, when they came into it, the duties on the necessaries of life were raised from ten to fifteen per cent. By the legislation passed in this House a few days ago, their duties had been raised again, this time to thirty and thirty-five per cent. Now, they found that their fisheries were sold, and that the money consideration of that sale was to be used for the purpose of building a railway of Ontario, through Manitoba out to across the continent through a portion British Columbia. Were the people of Nova Scotia going to acquiesce in this? It was the duty of this House to harmonise the various interests and Provinces of the Dominion, to work out the problem of Confederation in the best manner possible. This could be done only by respecting the immutable principles of justice. In taking this money, the price of the sale of the birthright of the fishermen and people of the Maritime Provinces, and in appropriating it to the works in the far West, those principles had been violated. It was iniquitous and unjust to the Province of Nova Scotia. It might be that, because that Province was small, weak in point of population and representation in this House, the Government considered it wiser to pander to the large and growing Province of Ontario. He appealed to the magnanimity and sense of justice of the people of Ontario, and that without fear of being disappointed. Was there any member in this House who had the hardihood to say that that Province had an equal right to that money with the Maritime Provinces? He thought not. There was no portion of the people of the Dominion that contributed so much per capita to the revenues as did our fishermen. They consumed more dutiable goods than any other class of the community. Yet they did not complain. They did not come to this House knocking at the doors as common paupers, asking for legislation to keep their nets, as the manufacturers did in regard to their looms, from being idle. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fortin) who so feebly advocated their rights, had not a petition from the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. The rights of these fishermen should be protected, and this money should be expended for their benefit, to enable them to prosecute, with advantage, their arduous and dangerous calling.

MR. HACKETT said he congratulated the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin) on the able manner in which he had dealt with the subject before the House. While agreeing with him generally, he (Mr. Hackett) could not overlook the fact that the people of Prince Edward Island had a special claim to the award. At the time of the ratification of the Washington Treaty, it was found that the Province of Prince Edward Island had, through Sir Edward Thornton, entered into treaty negotiations with the American Minister, Mr. Fish. He found, on looking over a despatch at that time, a Memorandum of Council in reply to a letter from Downing-street with regard to the Island allowing American fishermen to participate in their fisheries, the following paragraph:—

"The Committee submit that a commercial arrangement with the United States, in consideration of the use of the fisheries, would have been most acceptable, but as the Royal High Commission were unable to induce the American Government to change its commercial policy, the people of this Island, being extremely loyal, and devotedly attached to British institutions, would be most unwilling to throw any obstacle in the way of an amicable settlement of all causes of difference between Great Britain and the United States, and would, therefore, willingly accept any reasonable money compensation, in addition to the privileges granted, as an equivalent."

Which showed that, should that privilege be surrendered, the Island would receive a money compensation therefor. This document was received in evidence before the Commission which sat at Halifax. The privilege of allowing American fishermen to fish in their waters, was, at least, taking away from the Island fishermen something that specially belonged to them. As had been stated by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell), when these people settled on the shores of the Maritime Provinces, and made homes there for themselves, they looked upon the fisheries as the only means of subsistence for themselves and families. Now, on account of matters of State, these fisheries were taken away from them, and foreigners were allowed to come in and destroy the fish. Then, as the means of subsistence were taken away from these fishermen, the money which was obtained for these fisheries ought, in justice, to be returned to the people who suffered by the sale. He did not agree with the suggestions of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin) respecting the means of developing the fisheries. The possibility of restocking the deep sea fisheries was not a demonstrated fact. It was only an experiment. This Fishery Award could be appropriated to far better advantage than by experimenting with fish hatcheries. The only authority they had on this subject was Professor Bird, who stated that he had been experimenting, and that the sea fisheries could be restocked. Supposing fish were put in the waters of the Province, within the three-mile limit, there was no means of preventing them going outside that limit, and the consequence would be those American fishermen would come along and receive a portion of the money appropriated for this purpose. Money appropriated in that way would be hard cash thrown away. Instead of indulging in any such Quixotic ideas, we should preserve the valuable fisheries we now possessed. If Americans were allowed to go on fishing by means of purse seines, the fisheries would soon become exhausted, and, therefore, this destructive method of fishing ought to be prevented. He was a little amused at the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell), who waxed so indignant when referring to the hon. member for King's (Mr. Macdonald's) remarks respecting the value of the Prince Edward Island fisheries. The value of the exports of fish was no criterion of the value of the fisheries. It was well known that the same amount of capital was not invested in Prince Edward Island as was invested in the larger Province of Nova Scotia; but that did not detract from the value of the fisheries of the former Province. The hon. gentleman knew that many vessels from Nova Scotia fished around the coasts of Prince Edward, which possessed the most valuable fisheries in the Gulf. If the hon. gentleman's Province had such valuable fisheries, why were not these people kept at home? But no, they were glad to come around the shores of the Island and benefit by their valuable fisheries, and it ill became the hon. gentleman to detract from their value. With regard to the general question, he would say the fishing interest was a very important one, and one to which full justice should be done. There was no product of the Dominion that commanded so unfluctuating a price in foreign markets as the article of fish. He thought it was the duty of the Government to take such steps as would protect the fisheries of the country. He hoped that, in the distribution of this award, the Province of Prince Edward Island would be considered, and that she would receive, what he considered was her just right, a fair proportion of it.

MR. ANGLIN said it was advisable first to get possession of the money, and, after that, settle how it was to be appropriated.

House adjourned at Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 5th May, 1879.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CORRECTIONS.

MR. COUGHLIN corrected a statement in the London Advertiser, in which it was stated that he voted both ways on the Usury question. He only voted once, and, though he had pointed out the error by letter to the editor of the Advertiser, the statement had been repeated. He called on the Clerk to state to the Speaker whether that was correct or not.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. member voted against Mr. Plumb's amendment for the six months' hoist of the Usury Bill.

MR. COSTIGAN said the hon. gentleman's name was taken when he did not vote, and, Mr. Thompson (Haldimand) calling attention to it, the name was struck out. What the hon. gentleman complained of was not that the mistake occurred, but that the incorrect statement was repeated after it had been denied.

MR. THOMPSON (Haldimand) said it was, perhaps, only right that he should say that, when the vote on the Usury question was taken, the vote of the hon. gentleman was taken twice, the vote one way being taken erroneously, and when the hon. gentleman did not vote.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he was not in the habit of troubling the House, but he wished to correct a statement made by the Chignecto Post, a paper published in his own constituency, to the effect that, when the reciprocity negotiations were going on, he left for Washington to see Mr. George Brown, that he did not get farther than Boston, and that he charged $2,000 for the trip. This accusation was doubly false. In 1874, he went to Washington, and, on his return, he deducted his actual expenses, and also what would be deducted from his Sessional allowance, as he thought it was hardly reasonable that he should lose this allowance, as he was away on public business. Of the $2,000 he returned $1,515.46, as was shown in the Public Accounts, leaving a balance of $485, which he kept for his actual expenses and Sessional allowance, to which he was entitled. He saw that the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) had on the notice paper a motion for information on this point, and, as he feared that this motion could not be reached this Session, he made this explanation to the House.

MR. DOMVILLE said he thought it was very unfair that the hon. gentleman should anticipate his motion, and the bringing down of the papers by making such a statement. As matters stood, they had nothing save a mere verbal statement of the hon. gentleman, who, he thought, should produce documentary evidence on the subject.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he thought his hon. friend (Sir A. J. Smith) had the most ample right to refute a most gross and villanous attack levelled against him by a newspaper published in his county. If the hon. member for King's, N.B., (Mr. Domville) had looked at the Public Accounts for 1875, he would have found, on page 39: "Hon. A. J. Smith, returned for expenses on account of the Reciprocity Treaty, $1,515.46."

SIR A. J. SMITH said he did not know what the hon. member for King's meant, as to no evidence being produced. The Public Accounts were sufficient.

JUDGE POLETTE.

MR. MÉTHOT presented a petition praying for the dismissal of Judge Polette, of the Three Rivers District. He moved the reception of the petition.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said, as this was an indictment of a Judge of a Superior Court, special care should be exercised as to how the House proceeded. The petition should not be received until the proper time had expired.

MR. MÉTHOT said this was a peculiar case. If action were not taken this Session, the Three Rivers District would be denied justice for another year. The Judge well knew that action was proposed. Five years ago a resolution was passed by the advocates of that district asking the hon. Judge, in view of his old age, to retire from the Bench. In February last a resolution was passed by sixteen to one of the members of the bar asking the Government to take steps for the removal of the Judge, as he was unable to efficiently perform his duties, and the assistance of other Judges had to be asked.

MR. SPEAKER ruled the petition out of order.

PRIVATE BILL.

THIRD READING.

The following Bill was considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 101) To amend the Act incorporating the Canada and Detroit River Bridge Company.—(Mr. Kilvert.)

NAVIGATION OF THE TRAVERSE.

QUESTION.

MR. LAURIER enquired, Whether the attention of the Government has been called to the following resolution adopted by the Quebec Board of Trade at one of their late meetings, viz: "That in order to secure the navigation of the Traverse earlier in the spring and later in the fall, it is expedient that a permanent crib-work be erected at the eastern entrance, upon which lights would be placed, instead of the floating lightship now in use," and if so, is it the intention of the Government to take any steps for the carrying out of the views expressed by the said resolution.

MR. POPE (Queen's P.E.I.) said the attention of the Government had been called to the subject, but it was not the intention of the Government to take the steps referred to.

SETTLERS' CLAIMS IN MANITOBA.

QUESTION.

MR. DUBUC enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to recognise the staked claims of the settlers in Manitoba, particularly those followed by possession and improvements.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is the intention of the Government to recognise such claims as have been followed by possession and improvement.

SQUATTERS' LANDS ON THE RED RIVER.

QUESTION.

MR. DUBUC enquired, Whether the Government intend to concede the lands squatted upon by the settlers on the Red River, at more reasonable conditions than $5 an acre, price fixed by the late Government in 1877.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have made enquiries into this matter, and found that there is a great competition to get those lands at $5 per acre. Therefore we do not propose to reduce it.

STEAM FERRY BETWEEN GEORGETOWN AND PICTOU.

QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to insist on the Steam Navigation Company of Prince Edward Island running a boat between Georgetown and Pictou, in accordance with the terms of the original contract.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: On the 1st June, 1876, the Postmaster-General agreed to substitute for the service between Georgetown and Pictou, a service between Charlottetown and Pictou, and no application has been made since to the Department on the subject.

ONTARIO COMMON SCHOOL FUND.

QUESTION.

MR. GILLIES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, during the current year, to pay over to the Government of Ontario the amount due to the Province from the Common School Fund, including the Land Improvement Fund, under the award of the arbitration recently confirmed between the late Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada.

MR. TILLEY: The Government will be prepared to meet all its engagements under the arrangement between the Dominion and various Provinces.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman has not observed the form of the question. It says: "Under the award."

MR. TILLEY: The legal obligations under that award the Government will be prepared to pay.

SITTING BULL.

QUESTION.

MR. DUBUC, in the absence of Mr. SCHULTZ, enquired, Whether the Government has any official knowledge of the alleged facts contained in the following Washington telegram to the St. Paul Pioneer Press:—

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

"WASHINGTON, April 21.—It has been decided, after repeated conferences between the Secretaries of State, War, and Interior, that the troublesome individual on the northern frontier, known as Sitting Bull, is a British subject; that he, with his followers, voluntarily left the country of the United States, and placed themselves under the protection of Her Majesty, who will hereafter be held responsible for their good conduct.

"The Secretary of War has written a letter to General Sherman to this effect, and the Secretary of State will notify the British Government.

"This may become a serious International question if Sitting Bull makes a raid on the frontier during the coming summer. General Ruger, who has gone north of Dakota, four miles south of where Sitting Bull's camp lies, with the Eighteenth Infantry, who will build a military post in that locality, has been notified of this decision, and will govern himself accordingly."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the Government had no notice or information, official or otherwise, on the subject. They fancied the report must be a mere canard, inasmuch as it must be obvious that neither the Secretary of the United States, the Secretary of War, nor the Secretary of the Interior, could decide who was a British subject.

WINDSOR AND ANNAPOLIS AND WESTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY COMPANIES.

QUESTION.

MR. LONGLEY enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill this Session for the purpose of settling the long pending dispute between the Windsor and Annapolis and Western Counties Railway Companies and the Government.

MR. TUPPER: The Government will not be able, I fear, this Session to introduce a Bill for that purpose.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND THE FISHERY AWARD.

QUESTION.

MR. BAIN, in the absence of Mr. YEO, enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to comply with the memorial of the Prince Edward Island Government, in reference to the appropriation of the Fishery Award.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the whole question was under the consideration of the Government.

LAND GRANT TO VOLUNTEERS OF 1837-38.

QUESTION.

MR. HOOPER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take into consideration the services of the volunteers of 1837-38, by giving to each of them a grant of land from the the unoccupied Dominion lands in Manitoba or elsewhere.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: This matter has been brought under the attention of the Government for the first time. I think it is too late for us to take it up and settle it this Session.

TORONTO POST OFFICE.

MOTION FOR ACCOUNTS.

MR. MACMILLAN moved for copies of all accounts rendered by the postmaster at Toronto, or compiled for the postmaster at Toronto, at the Post Office Department, between the first day of July, A.D., 1874, up to the first day of July, A.D., 1878, together with copies of all Orders in Council and memoranda of the Postmaster-General, or Deputy Postmaster-General, authorizing the payment of an increased salary or commission to the said postmaster within the periods above mentioned.

Motion agreed to.

PURCHASE OF THE STEAMER GLEN-DON.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. DOMVILLE, in the absence of Mr. PLUMB, moved for copies of all papers, reports and accounts connected with the purchase, repairs, and seaworthiness of the steamer Glendon. He said that the object of the motion was to get certain papers, in order to inform the country as to the value of this steamer, and the propriety of the purchase. It had been so often mentioned in this House that almost every hon. gentleman must understand the question. The Glendon was purchased some years ago, after she had, in a measure, been abandoned as unfitted for the purposes for which she was intended when built. She had been found so useless for the purpose intended that her owners decided it would be useless to keep her in the trade contemplated, and that it would be best to sell her. They managed to dispose of her to the Government of Canada. There had been a good deal of dispute in the House as to the desirability of the bargain. Her purchase, at $20,000, was a dead loss to the Government, as it was alleged she could have been bought for $5,000. She was useless, as would be seen from Captain Lavoie's report, and cost a large amount for repairs. The late Minister of Finance had endeavoured to show that that steamer's purchase was highly in the interest of the Government. On the Ministerial side they contended that her purchase was a waste of public money—they had reports that she was useless. The late Minister of Marine decided to buy that vessel, though warned it would be a bad bargain, as he afterwards admitted; for that reason the hon. member for Niagara wished all information on the subject. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith) having admitted in the most unequivocal manner that she had caused a great loss to the country, perhaps he (Mr. Domville) should say a little more about it. But he thought the papers would show for themselves, as they could have shown before a Committee, that that hon. knight had bought the steamer in opposition to those who knew somewhat better. She was bought in a hurry, and he thought the report was that $5,000 would have been a very large price. Tens of thousands had been spent to keep her in order, yet they had evidence she was able to go only a few knots an hour. He did not believe it was from the inability of the hon. member for Westmoreland that he had been induced to buy that vessel, which had entailed a public loss, but that he had been led away by the reports of others, who had interests to serve. Had any of the present Ministers ever committed such an act, they would never have heard the last of it. The hon. gentleman had admitted that the country had sustained a heavy loss. He did not hesitate to say that, if the hon. gentleman had followed the advice of those surrounding him, the steamer would not have been purchased, and the country would have been spared the loss sustained by reason of her purchase. He would be glad to hear what the hon. gentleman had to say in his defence, and what reasons he could give why these papers should not be brought down.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he thought he could satisfy the House that this transaction was a bonâ fide one, and he was glad that this motion had been made, because it gave him an opportunity of making this explanation. He had been charged by the St. John Sun, and some other newspapers, with having concealed some reports that were made before the vessel was purchased, which reports were to the effect that this vessel was unseaworthy. He characterised that statement as an absolute falsehood and a slander. There was not a word of truth in it. Now, what were the facts of this case? There had been no fraud in this transaction; he did admit that a mistake had been made, but it was through the Inspector's report, and, if he had the transaction to do again, knowing what he did know of the vessel, he would not purchase her. He had acted throughout on the report of an officer of his Department. The report which had been referred to by the hon. gentleman from King's (Mr. Domville) and which he stated was made before the vessel was purchased, was, in fact, made months after the vessel was bought. This service had been performed by a schooner called Le Canadien, of about 150 tons. In the fall of 1874, it was discovered that this vessel was no longer fit for the service, and it was the desire of Captain Lavoie, and of some other officers of the Department, that she should be replaced by a steamer. He was reluctant to go to the expense of providing another steamer, but, after consultation with the deputy head of the Department, they concluded that if they could get a cheap steamer they would buy one to replace Le Canadien. He had no idea of spending $40,000 or $50,000 for a steamer for that service, because he did not think the service needed it, although, no doubt, Captain Lavoie would have liked one costing that much. While they were discussing this matter an offer came from some party in St. John interested in the Glendon. He had never heard of the vessel before, and did not know such a vessel existed. He received an offer of sale of the Glendon, and, after advising with the deputy on the subject, they concluded, before having anything to do with it, to send to Mr. William M. Smith, Deputy Chairman of the Board of Inspection at St. John, and to get his confidential report on the vessel. They did send down and got his report, which was dated 10th of February, 1875. When this offer was made, he did not know who were the owners of this steamer, but it turned out that Mr. Nicholson, who was not a political friend of theirs, was interested in this vessel. He read the report of Mr. Smith; and asked any hon. gentleman if that report did not show that vessel to be a good vessel? Mr. Smith stated she had a speed of seven knots an hour, and that was all they required. After consultation with the deputy, they concluded she was quite fast enough. She was much better than the vessel which preceded her, which was nothing but a schooner. She would only consume eight tons of coal in twenty-four hours, which was a very small quantity indeed, the Lady Head having consumed twenty-five tons in the same period. They concluded to offer $20,000 for the vessel, though the price asked was $26,000. Mr. Smith, the Inspector, said she was worth $25,000, but they did not give that sum. The hon. gentleman from King's (Mr. Domville) had stated this vessel was not worth more than $5,000, but from the exhibition the hon. gentleman had made of himself on several occasions, the House would know what dependence to place on his statement. There was no political object to be served in the purchase of this vessel. They thought the vessel a cheap one, and they did the business exactly as they would have done if they were buying a vessel for themselves. The report of Mr. Smith stated the vessel would be ready for sea with the ordinary repairs which a vessel required every spring. She was put on the slip and underwent repairs. He was in St. John shortly afterwards, and found that the repairs were costing a great deal more than he anticipated. He had no idea, from the report, that she would cost so much. He saw the agent in St. John, and Mr. Smith, and expressed to both these gentlemen his great dissatisfaction that the repairs of the vessel cost so much more than the report gave him reason to believe. She was prepared for sea at a very considerable expense. She went round the service in the River St. Lawrence, and, after three or four months, Captain Lavoie, who he did not think was much in love with this vessel, reported to the Department that she was totally unfit for the service, that life was not safe on the vessel, and that he would not risk himself, or his crew, on board. Upon receiving this information, after consultation with the Deputy, he concluded to have a survey made of this vessel. He directed Mr. Risley, the Chairman of the Board, and Mr. Lawson, to make the survey, and send for Mr. Smith to be present. They made an examination of the vessel, and reported she was not fit for the service she was in. There was end to that vessel. He saw Mr. Smith afterwards, and expressed great dissatisfaction with him; he told him, in fact, that his conduct deserved dismissal, and he believed it did. But hon. members knew that one did not like to take an extreme measure of that kind. He did not want to take his living away from him, and did not dismiss him, although he might have been in fault in not doing so. This vessel was then sent to Halifax, where she had since done valuable service. His own report said so. If there was any blame in the matter, it rested upon Mr. W. M. Smith.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): Then there is some one to blame.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he had always blamed Mr. Smith. The hon. member for Ottawa made a speech a few evenings previously, in which he made an attack on the Department, particularly in regard to the voluminous character of their reports. He was sorry to see the hon. gentleman declare himself the enemy of the Maritime Provinces. The hon. gentleman said that the report contained too much. That might be, so far as he was concerned, but they must remember that they had, as the deputy head of the Department, a gentleman who had been forty years connected with maritime and merchant shipping matters, and he had a pretty good idea of what would be interesting to maritime people. The report, certainly, cost a good deal of money, but there was no Department in the public service that dealt with such a variety of subjects as did the Department of Marine and Fisheries. He had no doubt that the hon. member for Ottawa would not think these subjects worthy of being read, but there was no report published sought after with so much interest by the people of the Maritime Provinces. The publication of the details connected with almost every branch connected with the service of the Marine and Fisheries, cost a good deal of money, but it gave employment to people living in Ottawa, and in that way was a local advantage. What object could he (Sir A. J. Smith) have, in publishing all these details, except the good of the public service. His successor had followed his example, and any reflection the hon. gentleman passed upon him also fell upon the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The head of the meteorological branch of the service was very anxious that his report should be published in full, but he (Sir A. J. Smith) had it condensed to about one-third. He thought he had satisfied the House, and he was sure he had satisfied the country, that his conduct, in the purchase of the Glendon, was blameless.

MR. DOMVILLE: No.

SIR A. J. SMITH said the hon. gentleman spoke ex cathedra. Anyone hearing the hon. gentleman speak in the House would think that he was the sole authority on New Brunswick matters. The hon. gentleman had spoken too much for his own good, and he thought he would find that to be the case when he returned to his constituents. He was quite willing that a thorough investigation into this matter should be instituted.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said that in the purchase of this vessel a disgraceful waste of public money had taken place, and an injury to the public interest had been effected. He thought the proper course for the hon. gentleman to have taken in this matter was to have advertised for tenders for the supplying of such a vessel as might have been wanted for the service, instead of making in his own Province a purchase in which some of his political friends were interested, directly or indirectly. The hon. gentleman, when the matter was under discussion, a few Sessions ago, said that Mr. Smith reported her fit for the service for which she was intended. He (Mr. Pope) maintained that this vessel was proved to be unfit for that service, and that she was laid up at the time. The hon. gentleman said that the vessel was approved of by Mr. Smith. Now he would read the report of Mr. Smith, in regard to the vessel.

SIR A. J. SMITH said that the motion was for the papers, and that the papers should not be read without his having had an opportunity of seeing them.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said the hon. gentleman had referred to the report, and had made use of information which he had had access to as Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He (Mr. Pope) simply put himself in a position to reply to the hon. gentleman's statements. The report was as follows:—

"For reasons explained by Mr. Simons, Bureau Veritas surveyor of this port, in his report herewith enclosed, we are of opinion that the hull is a bad model, is unseaworthy, and is already strained. The engine and boiler are too small to make her a serviceable boat in bad weather; altogether we believe the vessel to be unfit for her present employment. Her best rate of speed as made by trial to-day was 6-12 knots per hour, with tide and wind on the quarter, and 5½ against the tide. These results were obtained in fresh water, opposite Quebec. What could be done in salt water, on a voyage of any length, we may assume she would not do so well."

The following was an extract from a letter of Commander Lavoie, in command of the Glendon, dated 19th October, 1878:—

"We entered the Bay of Gaspé last night to repair the damages sustained by the steamer on our trip to the Magdalen Islands. It is through the mercy of God we were not all lost.

"In spite of my anxiety, to find some good in the bargain of the Department, it is impossible to do anything useful with her. For three weeks past, since the stormy season has commenced, it is proved that this steamer will certainly be the grave of its crew if continued in the service.

"The Captain had already told me that the vessel came near filling and upsetting, owing to its faulty construction, when crossing from Ste Anne des Monts to Trinity the other day; that she was unfit for navigation, and would surely be wrecked. I could not believe it, but during this last trial I was convinced of the truth of the Captain's assertion. The steamer is flat-bottomed, and makes more leeway in a heavy sea than headway. When leaving Magdalen Islands we very nearly drifted on the Downs, and had it been during night time, must have been lost on them, where so many men and vessels have been destroyed. We were five days at the Magdalen Islands, with gales blowing every day from all points of the compass, and we always experienced greater difficulty than the American schooners in reaching our anchorage.

"This steamer runs five knots in calm weather, three with wind and sea ahead, and her greatest speed is seven knots assisted by a tearing gale. The steamer can run only during calm weather, and fair winds. With such a vessel we cannot stir while the wind is blowing from the seaward, and continues a few hours, even if we are only at a mile's distance from shore; and this may happen fifty times during a season.

"With our old schooner there was no such danger under similar circumstances, so long as we could keep sail on her.

"The steamer goes neither under sail nor steam, and I do not believe one man among the crew will consent to embark on her for another year.

"The engineer, who is a man of superior ability and courage, is disgusted.

"The hull is strained and leaks all over.

"We sail two days, and it takes three or four men four days to repair the damage.

"The night before last, during a heavy gale, when we lost our sails, the fires were extinguished by the leakage of the boiler, consequently we could raise no steam.

"We left Magdalen Islands on the 7th, for Natashquan, with a strong breeze from the S.S.E. We steered so as to double the East Point on leaving Entry Island. With a schooner we could have doubled a point twenty miles longer, but with the Glendon we had to return, as we made more leeway than headway, and we would have drifted on the Downs before reaching the Point.

"We subsequently tried the West Point, which was an easier job, there being a fair wind. After passing the Point we set sail for Anticosti Island, but as the gale increased and the vessel laboured heavily, I took the advice of the Captain, who thought it was more prudent to anchor at Gaspé, owing to the imminence of the storm and the unseaworthiness of our craft. His advice proved good, for, at 6 p.m., the weather became very dark and the wind very great. Waves mountains high rose at our stern, as if to drown us. We were then about half way to Gaspé. Our foresails, the only ones which could be set, were carried away, and our fires were nearly extinguished.

"This lasted until 3 p.m. It is impossible to describe the anxiety we experienced. None but those who saw the thing can understand it. We arrived at the basin of Gaspé last night, and very tired. I believe none of the crew has undressed since last Sunday.

"I repeat it—there is no rest to be had with such a vessel. We are to-day occupied in repairing the sails, and the engineer and firemen are working at the boilers. If the engineer says we can risk crossing to the North coast, I will go; if not, I will sail for Bay des Chaleurs, and then to Quebec, to deliver the steamer into the hands of the Department forever."

The following was an extract of Captain Lavoie's Report of Progress, dated 2nd October, 1878 :—

"Our chief engineer has just informed me that another leak has manifested itself in the boiler, and may take some time to repair. He states that this boiler never could have been new or good when placed in the Glendon, or else has been terribly neglected by those in charge. The machinery has been a source of great anxiety and trouble to us ever since we left Quebec. Mr. Poliquin further states that it is only with great care that the boiler will carry us through this season, and that it will be necessary to replace it by a new one if the vessel is to be used next spring. It therefore may happen that our cruise will be longer than usual, as we shall have to depend a great deal on fair winds along the North shore."

The hon. member could further refer to the report of the captain :

"Owing to the very small power in proportion to the size of the ship, the least head wind or sea is immediately felt, and naturally deadens her way. Against a strong breeze, say from five to six, with the usual amount of sea caused by such wind, she would not carry steege way. It might be thought, in such case, the sails should be set, and the vessel worked to windward under steam and sail combined, but I have found by experience that she is much too leewardly for any advantage to be gained by adopting this course."

In his (Mr. Pope's) opinion, no Minister or any person entrusted with any charge of a Department had a right to go down to his own Province, amongst his own friends, and buy a trap of that kind that he never saw, and which was never properly examined. $28,000 were paid for that boat, which no man would give $5,000 for. The course pursued by the hon. gentleman was not justifiable. The duty of the Minister was to invite tenders for a suitable vessel, not to act upon a report which was no report at all.

SIR A. J. SMITH said it was something new, in parliamentary proceedings, on a motion made by an hon. member, that a Minister should have the papers required in his hands, and make use of them, without allowing the person attacked an opportunity of seeing them. The hon. gentleman had attacked him (Sir A. J. Smith) systematically, on every occasion, although he had treated the hon. gentleman in quite a different spirit. But he had ceased to expect anything like courtesy or fair play from the hon. gentleman. Was it reasonable, when the hon. member for King's (Mr. Donville) had made an attack on him (Sir A. J. Smith), that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should produce the papers without giving him (Sir A. J. Smith) an opportunity of seeing them, although he had not seen them for years. Why did he not send them across to him (Sir A. J. Smith)? The hon. gentleman said this vessel was no good. If so, why did he retain her in the service? In his own report it was stated she was doing good service in Halifax. This money was not wasted. He (Sir A. J. Smith) had stated before that, if he had had proper information with regard to this vessel, he would not have bought her. The hon. gentleman in quoting from reports, after the vessel was purchased, and when she was in service, was not dealing with the matter in a fair judicial spirit. It was on the report of Wm. M. Smith that she was purchased. Wm. M. Smith knew the purpose for which the vessel was intended, and he said she was good for that purpose; that she was built for a freight steamer. What was wanted was a vessel, economical in the consumption of coal, with a speed of seven or eight miles an hour. W. M. Smith said, in his report, the vessel was worth $25,000; she was bought for $20,000. The hon. gentleman knew this was a bonâ fide transaction. He (Sir A. J. Smith) supposed, and the Deputy Minister supposed, that this was a cheap vessel. In view of these facts, it was unprecedented that he should be treated in this way. The hon. gentleman, not satisfied with this subject, brought up the Northern Light question again. What had that to do with the subject? He (Sir A. J. Smith) challenged the hon. gentleman with regard to the Glendon matter, and other matters, to appoint a Committee at any time, this or any other Session, before which he would be prepared to meet him.

MR. TASSÉ said that the hon. member for Westmoreland complained of the strictures he lately made upon the proportions of the report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries which, within the last few years had become so extensive. He was entirely mistaken when he claimed that he (Mr. Tassé) did not sufficiently appreciate the importance of this report. It was precisely because he felt the importance of this report that he wished it to be reduced to reasonable proportions and pruned of all useless and incorrect matters, so as to render it truly useful and interesting. It was not necessary to dwell in the land of oysters and lobsters in order to understand that the interests connected with the Marine and Fisheries deserved the most serious attention. He had also objected to the too extensive proportions given to this report, overloaded, as it was, with details that were often insignificant, on account of the enormous expense it entailed. The printing of this report cost, last year, $14,680, whilst it only cost $3,000 in 1872-73, when the Conservatives were in power. That was really an extravagant expenditure, for which the hon. member was responsible, since he had been Minister of Marine for the last five years; but he had no idea that he would venture to justify the expenditure before the House. The hon. member for Westmoreland had added that, being one of the representatives of Ottawa, he (Mr. Tassé) should not complain of this expenditure, seeing that his (Mr. Tassé's) electors had profited by it. That was a very sorry excuse coming from one of the leaders of a party that at one time laid claim to the title of the party of economy par excellence. With such a principle every extravagance might be sanctioned. Although his electors might be interested in having the public moneys spent here, he was persuaded that they were not ready to approve of useless expenditures when these same moneys might be applied to the execution of improvements that would be much more advantageous for them.

SIR A. J. SMITH.

RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT IN CANADA.

RESOLUTION POSTPONED.

Notice of motion (Mr. Mousseau) for resolution declaring: "That, in the opinion of this House, the fact of submitting the advice of the Privy Council of Canada to the review of Her Majesty's advisers in England, upon questions which are purely of an administrative character, under the British North America Act, 1867, is subversive of the principles of responsible government granted to Canada," called.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I would ask my hon. friend to allow that motion to stand for the present.

MR. SPEAKER: Stand.

MR. HOLTON said there was some novelty of asking a member who had given notice of a motion of want of confidence to allow it to stand.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman is out of order.

MR. HOLTON: I have a perfect right to move that the order be struck off the paper because he did not proceed with it. I have a perfect right to speak to that, and I begin my speech by saying it is a novelty in my parliamentary experience for a First Minister to ask an ordinary supporter of his to let a notice of a want of confidence motion stand. I do not see that he can do it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think the hon. gentleman is out of order.

MR. SPEAKER: There was an understanding, at the beginning of the Session, to allow motions to stand when that was asked by some member of the Government, and, when I heard the hon. Premier asking the hon. member for Bagot to allow his motion to stand, of course I said as usual "stand;" and, in that case, I hope the hon. gentleman will respect my decision.

MR. HOLTON: I do not appeal from the Chair, I accept the invitation of Mr. Speaker to act upon the understanding made beyond the rule. The rule undoubtedly was that which was established on the recommendation of a Committee three or four years ago, of which the hon.

gentleman and myself were members, that these notices of motion should be dropped if they were not proceeded with when called; but, to facilitate business, when Ministers were not prepared to discuss questions, and to grant returns asked, the understanding come to was that notices of motion should, on application of the Minister, stand, but it was in order that they might be taken up at a more convenient season. But I never dreamed of a notice being asked to stand to get rid of a troublesome question, as is obviously the case here; and therefore I should be in my right if I were to say that it might be in the letter but not at all in the spirit of the understanding, as well as against the express letter of the rule, that a motion of this kind should be asked to stand by the Minister. But he has now got rid of a troublesome matter, and all is serene again between him and his malcontent followers.

SELKIRK ELECTION.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) moved for copies of all letters, certificates, reports and correspondence from, to, or with any Judge or Returning Officer or other person, relating to the recount of ballots at the last election for the Electoral District of Selkirk, in the Province of Manitoba, and to the trial of the contested election for the said Electoral District. He said the motion involved a matter of great importance to the administration of justice in the Province of Manitoba. He had made two motions in the present matter for this reason: After the last election in Selkirk, Mr. Morris, who was one of the candidates, appealed to Judge McKeagney, under the Statute of last Session, for an order for a recount, or readdition of the ballots of that election. An order was made by that Justice, who fixed the 3rd October for the recount. A couple of days afterwards, an application was made by the member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith), who had been returned elected by the Returning Officer, to another Judge of the same Court Mr. Betournay, for a recount only of the, ballots, and he fixed the 1st October for it. On 1st October, Mr. Betournay, in pursuance of his order, proceeded to act on it, and the parties appeared before him, when Mr. Moore objected to the Judge proceeding on the ground that Judge McKeagney was previously seized of the case. He produced the order and showed Judge Betournay that another Judge of the same Court was proceeding in the matter and had issued an order for a recount under the Statute. Judge Betournay ruled that, inasmuch as the order of Judge McKeagney was for a recount or readdition of the ballots, and his own order was for a recount only, the orders were not identical, and, therefore, he was at liberty to proceed, although the Statute specially provided for a recount or readdition, the order of Judge McKeagney was properly granted to make a recount or readdition under the 14th clause of the Act of last Session. For any person to say that a recount or readdition did not cover the whole matter, and was not the same as a recount, was an insult to their intelligence. In pursuance of that decision, and against the protest of Mr. Morris, Judge Betournay recounted the ballots, and ruled that certain of them that were objected to were properly counted, and declared the member for Selkirk elected by a majority of nine. He then immediately directed the Returning Officer to transmit all the ballots and papers, with the return, to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. On the 3rd October, Judge McKeagney sat on the case when the Returning Officer appeared before him. When asked where the ballots were, he said that he could not produce them, inasmuch as he had sent them all away, and Judge McKeagney was rendered powerless to proceed by the action of Judge Betournay. The report of Judge McKeagney was transmitted to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and by him sent to the Minister of Justice, and it was necessary for him (Mr. Cameron) to move that it be brought down with other documents in charge of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. The report of Judge Betournay confirmed his (Mr. Cameron's) statements, being a candid confession that the only reason why he had acted as he had done was that he believed he was entitled to proceed, in spite of Judge McKeagney's order. If one Judge of a Court was to be at liberty to take a matter out of the hands of another Judge under such circumstances, there would be an end to anything like judicial propriety in the administration of justice. There could be no doubt that the action of Judge Betournay had brought the administration of justice in Manitoba into very great disrepute. It was very questionable whether it was not a matter that ought to be proceeded with by prosecution, or impeachment, in this House, especially as, in accordance with the ruling of the Court of Queen's Bench in Toronto, under this Statute, with regard to a recount of votes, he was merely acting as an officer of this House, and, if so, his conduct in the present case might properly be censured by it. As to the fact that, when one Judge was seized of a matter, another Judge ought not to interfere, it was almost too clear to require any comment, let alone argument. He would read an extract from a standing authority on such cases, Kerr on Summary Convictions, which was simply a statement of the general law :

"It is proper here to mention that, though all the Justices of each division are equal in authority, it would be contrary to the public interest, as well as indecent, that there should be a contest between the Justices. It is therefore agreed that the jurisdiction in any particular case, attaches to the first set of magistrates, duly authorised, who have possession and cognisance of the facts to the exclusion of the separate jurisdiction of all others. So that the acts of any other, except in conjunction with the first, are not only void, but such a breach of the law as subjects him to indictment."

If a civil magistrate, acting in this matter, would be liable to indictment, there could be no question that an officer of this House, even if he were a Judge of a Superior Court, would be liable to at least the severe censure of this House for having acted in this indecent and improper manner. It had been stated in the public press, and the statement had not been contradicted, that there were strong personal reasons which induced Judge Betournay, in defiance of what was right and proper, to seize hold of this jurisdiction, in order to make a return in favour of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith), who he (Mr. Cameron) regretted was not in his seat in this House at present. When they were aware that this same Judge, notwithstanding the personal relations which existed between him and the hon. member for Selkirk, was now actually proceeding with the trial of this very controverted election ; when it was found that the Judge who had acted in that partisan manner had been openly charged with being heavily indebted to the hon. member for Selkirk, whose real estate and everything he owned in the world was said to be under lien to that hon. gentleman, he (Mr. Cameron) thought that, after what he had previously stated, that the administration of justice in Manitoba had been brought into the greatest disrepute by the indecent and improper conduct of Judge Betournay, it was a matter well deserving the consideration of this House. When the papers were brought down he would be prepared to take such further action in the matter as was proper under the circumstances. Respect to the power of the House required some action, as the purity and propriety of an election to this House had been entirely violated by the course of Judge Betournay in this matter.

MR. MACKENZIE asked if the hon. gentleman was speaking from documentary evidence in making the charge of indecent and improper relations between the member for Selkirk and this Judge. It was the most extraordinary charge he had ever heard, especially from a legal gentleman, to impugn a Judge with respect to a matter now under consideration.

MR. CAMERON : I stated expressly that it had been publicly stated in the press, and that the statement had not been contradicted.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

DOMINION LANDS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Tupper.)

FIRST READING.

MR. TUPPER introduced a Bill (No. 107) to amend and consolidate the several Acts respecting the Public Lands of the Dominion.

Bill read the first time.

INLAND BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL.

[Bill 16.]

(Mr. Doull.)

THIRD READING.

Bill considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed.

STATUTORY HOLIDAYS BILL.—[Bill 57.]

(Mr. Domville.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said that there were very serious objections to the Bill. He had suffered serious inconvenience from the number of bank holidays that already existed. He thought this was a step in the wrong direction.

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

MR. DOMVILLE moved the third reading of the Bill.

MR. HOLTON moved in amendment that the Bill be read a third time this day three months. He said the Bill was fully considered in the Committee, when a division took place upon the propriety of it. It was regarded as a piece of class legislation—legislation in the interest of employes of banks, giving them more recreation and rest than any other class of the community. He regarded it as a frivolous and mischievous Bill, and one that would disgrace the Statute-book.

MR. JONES said the hon. gentleman used very strong language with regard to this Bill, although it had been reported to the House by the Committee on Banking and Commerce. The hon. gentleman took what he regarded as a selfish exception to the Bill. Quebec was the only Province which objected to the Bill, which, he thought, was a good one.

MR. DOMVILLE said he thought hon. members generally would admit that the Bill was calculated to do good, and to help a class of people overworked. The question was should they create a public holiday throughout the country, in order that certain employes might obtain a little relaxation. He had no personal interest in the matter. He brought the measure in because he thought it was the correct thing to do, and he hoped the House would allow the Bill to pass.

MR. TUPPER said he was rather surprised at the course which was taken in this matter. The Bill had received an exhaustive discussion in Committee, and it was hardly to be expected, after the measure had received the support of a considerable majority of the Committee, that the hon. gentleman would raise the question here. The evidence given before the Committee was that bank managers and directors, men most qualified to speak in relation to the matter, and most interested in it, were in favour of the Bill. He thought, under the circumstances, the House would scarcely be disposed to deal hardly with the measure.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he did not think there was the slightest impropriety in his hon. friend testing the sense of the House upon the subject. He did not think the hon. member for Cumberland was warranted in assuming that the general public and bank managers were in favour of the Bill, because they had not objected to it. He could not see that there was any use in putting on the Statute-book a provision of this kind. If it were to do the employes any good, it would be better to give them a few holidays together, at Christmas for instance, when it would not interfere with business, as he was informed these holidays would do.

MR. ELLIOTT said, in his opinion, the bank clerks had quite enough holidays already. They were less worked than any other class of people in the community. He could well remember, in his younger days, when he had to work thirteen and fourteen hours per day, week after week, as the farmers had now, through all kinds of weather; and he thought it would be injurious to the bank clerks themselves, as well as a hindrance to the commercial interests of the community at large, to grant the holidays proposed in this Bill.

Mr. BROOKS then moved in amendment that the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power so to amend the same, as to exempt from its operation the Province of Quebec. He said the Province of Quebec was exceptional in regard to matters of this kind. They had already twelve non-judicial days, and nearly all of them bank holidays, consequently it was desirable that this Bill should not apply to Quebec.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he voted against the Bill because he believed it was likely to prove prejudicial to the business of banking men. It had, however, been carried by a very large majority, and now the hon. member for Sherbrooke proposed to except one Province. He was entirely opposed to the exception of any Provinces in the legislation of this House.

Mr. CARON said the amendment seemed to him to be one that should appeal to the good sense of the House, and should be carried. There was no desire whatever on the part of the members from Quebec to prevent any Province from seeking legislation similar to that asked for by his hon. friend the member for King's (Mr. Domville). But the hon. member for Sherbrooke had given a reason against its being applied to the Province of Quebec, which seemed to him to be conclusive. He had shown that, from peculiar circumstances, the Province of Quebec was placed in a position different from the other Provinces, as far as holidays were concerned. It was quite obvious that, in a Province where there were thirteen or fifteen bank holidays in a year, business men in that Province did not wish to have that number increased; and he (Mr. Caron), although in favour of a Bill similar to the one introduced, extending to the other Provinces, could not but, under the circumstances, vote for the amendment.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said there was something a little illogical in the position taken by the mover and seconder of this amendment. They had voted that an increased number of bank holidays be fixed for the other Provinces, but were not willing it should apply to their own Province. He (Mr. White) had the same objection to increasing the bank holidays in the Province of Ontario and the other Provinces as the Province of Quebec; and, although he considered their position illogical, he felt himself obliged to vote for the resolution of the hon. member for Sherbrooke on that ground.

MR. JONES said it appeared there were thirteen holidays in the Province of Quebec, and this Bill would increase them by two, which was not a very large addition. He agreed with the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) that they should not make exceptional legislation for the different Provinces when it could possibly be avoided, and he would vote against the motion of the hon. member for Sherbrooke.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was obliged to vote for the motion of the hon. member for Sherbrooke, because while in Ontario the banks had too few holidays, in Quebec the banks had too many. The hon. member for Lambton was opposed to sectional legislation; then he ought to have assimilated the bank holidays in all the Provinces when he was leader of the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE: They were.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Act relating to the establishment of holidays in the different Provinces stated that, in Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, Sundays, New Year's Day, Good Friday, Christmas Day, the birthday of the reigning Sovereign, and any day appointed by proclamation for a public holiday, or a general fast, were to be observed as legal holidays; and in Quebec, the same days were to be observed, with the addition of Epiphany, Annunciation, Ascension, Corpus Christi, St. Peter and St. Paul's and All Saints.

MR. MACKENZIE: These are religious holidays.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it required Dominion legislation in order to make them public holidays, and, if the hon. gentleman wanted assimilation, he should have moved that they should be struck out.

MR. WHITE.

MR. COURSOL said it was quite true there were a large number of holidays in the Province of Quebec, but many of them were fêtes d'obligation, and not holidays for the banking clerks. The banks were opened as usual, and the clerks kept there. They were holidays kept peculiarly by Catholics, and not by Protestant institutions. He did not see why they should make special legislation for the different Provinces, and he hoped the House would not agree to this motion.

MR. HOLTON said he was glad to observe that the right hon. the leader of the Government preserved his old-time versatility. The other day, in Committee, he pronounced this a most admirable measure, applicable to the whole Dominion, and now it was to be made a great deal better by excepting the second largest Province from its operation. He (Mr. Holton) was free to vote for a better thing for his own Province than this Bill would be, and was also free to vote for uniformity of legislation, which ought to be the controlling principle of action in this House. As the motion to go into Committee would be carried, and the third reading of the Bill would be moved, he would reserve his vote until the question was reached again, which would be some time in the Greek kalends.

MR. VALIN said he was in favour of the amendment. He had sent copies of the Bill to the presidents of the various banks, who had replied that they had enough holidays in Quebec already. There were the holidays of the Ship Labourers' Society, St. Jean Baptiste Day, and the holidays of a couple of other societies, which interfered greatly with trade. Again, when a Bill of Exchange was wanted on Monday, it had occasionally to be obtained on Saturday, which was inconvenient and caused loss of interest. With thirteen or fifteen holidays in Quebec, there was no necessity for any more.

MR. ANGLIN said the speech of the member for Montreal East suggested to him an idea that the difficulty to which objection had been taken could, in some degree, be obviated, if two of the holidays especially named for the Province of Quebec were selected as the holidays to be observed under this Statute, and in that way a certain degree of regard would be paid to the religious feelings of a very large number of people of the other Provinces, who regarded those as holidays of obligations.

Question put, and amendment (Mr. Brooks) agreed to, on a division.

House again resolved itself into Committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

INSOLVENCY LAWS REPEAL BILL.

[BILL 15.]

(Mr. Béchard.)

THIRD READING.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. GIROUARD said he wished to move a few amendments to this Bill. He accepted the verdict of this House, pronounced the other evening, as an undoubted expression of public opinion on the Insolvency Laws. He only intended to introduce a few provisions with a view of averting the dangers pointed out by the press of the country, as likely to result from the total repeal of the present Insolvency Act; he referred to preferential assignments, and priority of judgments by default. In the Province of Quebec the principles of the common law were altogether different from the principles of the common law in the other Provinces. In the former Province the property of the insolvent was the common pledge of the creditors; in the other Provinces, if he was correctly informed, the contrary principles prevailed, the first creditor, in order of time, being the first entitled to be paid. It seemed strange that in a civilised country such provisions should exist. In most of the United States these deficiencies in the English common law had been met and remedied. In considering the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville, they ought to endeavour to provide for these same deficiencies in their own Provinces. The amendments he proposed had for their object merely the repeal of those provisions of the English common law with respect to preferential assignments and priority of judgment. The hon. gentleman explained the scope of his amendments, and went on to say that it was perfectly evident that these amendments had nothing to do with the Insolvency Bill, which the House had pronounced against the other evening. They were brought forward in the interest of those Provinces who were not benefitted by the provisions of the Civil Code. It might be said that this matter should be left to the Provincial Legislatures, but they had no jurisdiction in a matter of this kind. Insolvency matters belonged to this Parliament exclusively, and the moment they had to deal with insolvent traders, or the laws relating to them, the Provincial jurisdiction ceased. He had voted for the second reading of the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville, although he supported the Bill presented by the Committee. He was now endeavouring to amend the former Bill, because it seemed to him fraught with danger to the country in repealing the Insolvent Act altogether. If the Committee was of opinion that these amendments should be accepted, he hoped that no proceedings would be taken to prevent the third reading of the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville; and when that third reading came he should certainly vote for it whether amended or not. The majority of this House was pledged to the repeal of the existing laws.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said the effects of the amendments of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, if accepted, would be to destroy effectually the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville. Those hon. members who were in favour of the unconditional repeal of the Insolvent Law, were bound to vote against these propositions. In addition to that, he did not think his hon. friend, if honest in his desire to repeal that law, should have submitted these propositions to the House at all, because if accepted by the House the present Bill could not possibly pass this Session, and the effect would be that the old law would exist for another year. By an overwhelming majority this House affirmed the other night the proposition that it was desirable to repeal the Insolvent Law, without condition. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) in the course he was now pursuing, was acting an inconsistent part. When this matter was formerly up for discussion, that hon. gentleman voted for the principle, affirming that it was expedient that the law should be unconditionally repealed. That principle was affirmed by the House, and he voted for the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard)—the logical consequence of the general principle so affirmed—and yet, he must now introduce a set of resolutions which made the repeal of that Act subject to certain conditions, and, in fact, made the immediate repeal of the Act impossible. The hon. gentleman, to justify himself for this extraordinary course, said he was looking to the interests of Ontario. The hon. gentleman need not concern himself about Ontario, the members from that Province were quite capable of taking care of their own particular interests in this respect, and were quite willing to let the hon. gentleman look after the interests of his own Province. The hon. gentleman introduced what he was pleased to call amendments to the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville. His propositions were really new enactments—a new Insolvent Bill by way of amendment to a proposition for the absolute repeal of the law. In fact the hon. gentleman's proposition contained an entirely new enactment without a single good quality, without a single merit, and without a single workable provision, with all the defects of the old law, and without any of its meritorious provisions. If he were disposed to support any proposition at all in lieu of the repeal of the Insolvent Law, pure and simple, he would have voted for the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), because it had some merit, and was based on a sensible and easily understood principle, though a principle to which he was opposed. The proposition of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) had no merit whatever in it. It was one that could not be worked out and would serve no practical purpose, but would complicate every transaction and involve every estate in expensive and endless litigation. Of all the crude and undigested pieces of legislation submitted to any Parliament for adoption, this was the crudest and most ill digested; in fact, it was utterly unworthy of the hon. gentleman, and he was surprised that a gentleman of the reputation, ability, and learning of the hon. gentleman should wish the House to assent to any such proposition. The proposed amendments contained some twelve or fourteen legal propositions, and the violation of any one of them would make an individual insolvent, and his estate subject to the provisions of the Bill, and yet there was no machinery provided by the hon. gentleman by which a single one of his propositions could be carried into effect. He (Mr. Girouard) provided that, on the happening of certain things, and in the violation of certain provisions of the law, a trader should become insolvent and his estate be placed in liquidation; and yet he did not provide that any official, or, in fact, anyone, should take possession of the estates of such insolvent. He did not provide for collecting the assets, for realising the estate and distributing the proceeds of the estate. And not only that, the amendment declared that, under certain circumstances, a dealer would become an insolvent, but it did not state upon what evidence the fact of insolvency should be established. Under the present law, when it was alleged that a man became an insolvent, that fact must be established by the evidence of a creditor; whilst, under this extraordinary proposition of the hon. gentleman, there was no such wise provision; and a man might be declared an insolvent without the fact being established in any way, upon a mere allegation, unsupported by any proof. There was another objection to the proposal of the hon. gentleman. He proposed that on the occurrence of certain events a man might be declared an insolvent, but if a man were improperly or maliciously put into insolvency, as was often done, there was no way by which the debtor could be relieved from such illegal and improper proceedings. He had to submit, and that without redress. The House should pause before committing itself to any such legislation. The Insolvency Law was bad enough; the proposed amendments were worse than the law they proposed to improve. There were many other objections, but he would not trouble the House with an extended reference to them now. If hon. gentlemen would take the trouble of reading the amendments, they must come to the same conclusion that he had arrived at, after a careful consideration of all the clauses, that of all the extraordinary propositions ever submitted to Parliament those propositions were the most extraordinary. The hon. gentleman admitted there was no machinery provided by this Bill, by which effect could be given to the changes which he proposed making; but he said that the Courts in the various Provinces had the power of making the necessary rules and regulations for carrying the law into effect. But, according to the proposals of the hon. gentleman, these rules and regulations could not be put into operation until Parliament pronounced upon and considered them. The effect of this would be that, even if Parliament assented to the hon. gentleman's proposition, they could not go into operation for twelve months, that is, until after the next meeting of Parliament. In the interest of the country, and in the interest of the entire trade of the country, it would be much better to leave the old law in force for twelve months, than accept these propositions with their effect suspended for twelve months. Apart from the merits of the proposed amendments, and on a pure question of order, he did not think the proposition of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) could, under any circumstances, be accepted as an amendment to the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard). The proposition of the latter hon. member, which was assented to by the House, and to the provisions of which it was committed, was that the Insolvency Law should be repealed pure and simple, and the House had resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider that proposition. The proposition of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier was, that there should be an Insolvency Law—that there should be a repeal pure and simple of the existing law, but that the repeal should be conditional, not unconditional, as the House had already agreed. It was not in the slightest degree relevant to the former proposition, a proposition to which Parliament was committed, nor was it germane to the main question now before the Chair, and could not, therefore, be submitted as an amendment to it. If the propositions of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier were agreed to, it would have the effect of defeating the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville; and the result would be that the present law would remain on the Statute-book for the next twelve months, and that the House had already pronounced against it. He submitted, therefore, that this proposition could not be put, and was clearly out of order, and therefore asked the ruling of the Chair on the point. He would put a case, taken from English Mirror of Parliament for 1838, vol. 6, page 4,729, and which appeared to him to be a case exactly in point:—

“MR. WILLIAMS moved the order of the day for the House resolving itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain Bill, called the Freeman's Admission Bill, and Mr. Hutt moved in amendment that,

“After the passing of this Act, no person whose name is or shall be on the register for the time being, is entitled to vote in the election of a member of Parliament for any city; or in England, shall be required, in order to entitle him to have his name inserted in any list of such voters for that city, or for the following year, to have paid any poor rates, or assessed taxes, except such as have or shall have become payable from previously to the 10th October in the year previously.”

It would be observed that the object of the Bill was to abolish the payment of stamp duties then payable on the admission of freemen as a condition to having their names inserted on the register, and that object was clearly expressed in the title of the Bill. The amendment moved by Mr. Hutt, it was contended was wholly irrelevant to that object, and therefore out of order. Mr. Williams, mover of the Bill, said, in raising the point of order:

“It will save the time of the House if I at once take the opinion of Mr. Speaker as to whether the amendment contemplated by the hon. member can now be offered to and entertained by the House. The Bill is strictly confined to the abolition of stamp duties, now payable on the admission of freemen, and the proposition of the hon. member does not go at all to that matter, but goes to amend a very important part of the Reform Act. Now, I desire to know from the Chair, first, whether such a clause as that proposed can be incorporated in the Bill; and, secondly, whether, if adopted, it will not be inconsistent with the enactment of another measure which has already been sent up to the House of Lords?"

Now, he (Mr. Cameron) desired to know whether the amendment of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier to the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville could be properly incorporated with the Bill; and secondly, whether, if adopted, it would not be wholly inconsistent with the title of the Bill, wholly irrelevant to the object of the Bill, and wholly inconsistent with the solemn resolution of Parliament, that the Insolvent Act should be repealed unconditionally. According to the authority of the case just referred to, both propositions must be answered adversely to the motion of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. Mr. Speaker, in delivering his decision on the points submitted to him, said:

"The same question occurred in the course of last Session, and the opinion I then expressed was that, if a clause was inconsistent with the object of a Bill, it was contrary to the usual practice of the House to incorporate it. That opinion I still retain, particularly as it has been confirmed by the House; and, therefore, the point is, I conceive, set at rest."

He submitted that that decision governed the case now before the House. May, in his Parliamentary practice, lays down the same rule. He says: "An amendment may be made to a clause in a Bill, provided the same be relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill." Within the title of the Bill, and not inconsistent with the object of the Bill. Here the object of the Bill was the unconditional repeal of the law, the object of the amendment was exactly the opposite—not the repeal of the law, but its continuance in a modified form, and clearly the motion cannot be put in amendment to the Bill. If, however, the Chair should otherwise rule, he (Mr. Cameron) would strongly urge on those who favoured the repeal of the Insolvent Law, to vote down the propositions of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier.

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier) said the hon. member for South Huron

(Mr. Cameron) found his (Mr. Girouard's) propositions to be the most crude piece of legislation he ever had occasion to read; but the hon. gentleman appeared to ignore, or to forget, that they were not of his (Mr. Girouard's) own invention. The provisions which he had the honour of submitting for the consideration of the Committee had been reproduced from the Roman laws. He defied the hon. member to produce a piece of legislation that contained more equitable and reasonable principles; it was certainly not the English law which, in this respect, at least, was admitted by all as iniquitous, and had been abandoned by the English people for years, almost centuries. The principles he (Mr. Girouard) was now advocating had been reproduced in the commercial codes of Europe and America.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): Oh.

MR. GIROUARD said the hon. gentleman might laugh or appear astonished, but he defied him to quote better laws. These Roman principles have been pronounced as most perfect by English jurists of higher authority than the hon. gentleman; they have been highly lauded by the best legal minds of Europe, and have, finally, in their favour the experience and sanction of ages, and he did not hesitate to say that the amendments embodying these principles were far superior to any that the hon. member might produce. These amendments had been put before the House after mature deliberation by more than one hon. member—and he might mention that amongst them were the hon. members for Stanstead and St. John—and he regretted that they were not in the House to support them, as they intended to do. The hon. members from the Province of Quebec have been gravely told by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) that they had no interest in the commercial laws of the other Provinces. Was the House not to consider this legislation simply because the hon. gentleman would, and, in fact, could, not produce a better measure himself? Was it to be said that the Montreal representatives especially were strangers to the commercial interests of the other Provinces? Was the hon. gentleman not aware that the Montreal importers supplied, to a great extent, the dealers of the other Provinces, and for that reason they were exceedingly interested that no preferential assignments and judgments should be allowed to favour the resident friends of debtors, and thus defraud the Montreal creditors?

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) said he certainly agreed, to a certain extent, with what had fallen from the hon. member from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), in relation to his proposed amendments; but he must say, without some machinery by which they could be put into operation, they were not exactly what were required. This was a matter of very great importance to the commercial community of this Dominion. He held in his hand some letters and telegrams received from several leading merchants, expressing regret at the action taken by this House the other night. There had not been more than one petition presented to the House, asking for the repeal of the Insolvent Law, pure and simple. He was told there was one, but certainly there was not more than one. Every petition, excepting that one, had prayed that the law might be improved. The reason was very obvious why it should be so. Supposing the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville was to become law, what would be the result? They would find that every person who had a claim against another doing business would do his best to get the first judgment, and the consequence would be that the sharpest creditor would be able to get payment in full, whilst the others would have no way of recovering a shilling. He repudiated the idea expressed by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) that Ontario should merely look after its own interest, and accept no advice from the representatives of other Provinces. He was always willing that the Ontario members should receive suggestions from the members of any other Province, in relation to legislation for the whole Dominion. There should be some machinery whereby the provisions of the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), if agreed to, would be carried into effect, and he would suggest that the procedure pointed out by the Absconding Debtors Act in force in Ontario, should be utilised in connection with these amendments. That Act, he thought, could be made to work under these provisions. If a creditor had absconded from Upper Canada, or remained concealed therein so as to avoid being served with process, and that fact was made manifest by an affidavit made by two disinterested persons, then the Judge could make an order for the issue of a writ of attachment against the debtor's estate, both real and personal. That writ would be placed in the hands of the sheriff, who would take possession of the estate and sell it, if it were perishable property, or hold it, in case it was not, until an execution was placed in his hands. The Statute made a provision that the perishable property should be converted into money, but the sheriff held it until the person issuing the writ of attachment obtained through the ordinary course of the Courts a judgment against the absconding debtor. With reference to the other creditors, they had a right, within six months after the issuing of the first writ, and the placing of it in the hands of the sheriff, to prove their claims, and their executions were then placed in the hands of the sheriff, who, under the Statute, divided, pro rata, the whole proceeds of the estate among the creditors. By utilising the procedure provided by that Statute, they could work the proposed amendment to the Act. He would ask that the following amendment be added to the ones proposed:—

“The provisions of any code, law, Statute or Act respecting absconding debtors, in any of the Provinces, and any procedure authorised under the same, may be resorted to for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this Act; and particularly a writ of attachment and all subsequent proceedings may be had upon any of the grounds for which a debtor may be deemed insolvent.”

By adding this amendment to those propositions, the law could be worked out for the benefit of all the creditors. It would certainly not give the debtor his discharge, and would prevent any one creditor getting an undue advantage over another. He could not understand why an hon. member should be so carried away with the idea of repealing this Insolvent Law as not to give one creditor a fair chance with every other creditor. It appeared to him that that important point had been lost sight of, and he hoped, therefore, the proposition introduced by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) would be considered and adopted by the House, and that the House would also adopt this suggestion, which he would propose in due time.

MR. MACDONNELL: Before framing that amendment, did the hon. gentleman enquire into the laws of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island with regard to absconding debtors?

MR. ROBERTSON said his amendment was made to apply to all the Provinces, if they had laws which would apply to it. If they had not, he hoped the hon. members would suggest some provision for themselves. He understood that Quebec had got such a law, and that was the reason why Ontario stood in such a very unfavourable position if the Insolvent Law was repealed. He did not know what the law in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick might be with respect to absconding debtors, but he made this amendment wide enough to cover it if there were such laws.

MR. MACDONNELL said the hon. gentleman ought to have ascertained what the laws in those respective Provinces were on this subject before introducing an amendment which extended to those Provinces as well as to Ontario.

MR. MOUSSEAU said that this Insolvent Law was one of the grievances which the people of the Province of Quebec had against the late Government, and the hon. members from that Province desired to put in operation the principle they had enunciated. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) had denounced that law during the late elections. Both the hon. member and himself had, in the county of Jacques Cartier and elsewhere, complained against the laws in existence on bankruptcy. At the opening of the Session, his hon. friend was strongly in favour of having those laws repealed, but after having attended the Insolvency Committee the hon. gentleman came here with this strong Bill, which comprised the best principles of Insolvency Laws for the last 2,000 years. In the House the feeling was so strong against laws on Insolvency—even the most perfect, even those amended and purified by the hon. member—that they rejected that Bill without even answering the able speeches made by its two promoters. His hon. friend took it very coolly. The second reading of the hon. member for Iberville's Bill was carried by 57 of a majority, among which was the name of his hon. friend. To-night, what did the hon. member do? He wanted this House to stultify itself. He wanted this House, after having voted that it was opposed to any law on insolvency, to accept that famous and perfect Bill, those principles which were so respectable and aged—2,000 years. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier knew very well that, by introducing those amendments to-night, he was playing into the hands of the wholesale traders of Montreal. He knew, after what had happened to the hon. member for King's, that if this amendment was introduced, that of the 60 who voted against repeal only one would ask that it should come up to-morrow, and then the old, bad laws would continue to exist. He knew that this amendment would kill the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville. How could the hon. gentleman claim to be consistent, after having argued before the electors that these laws were bad, and now he was doing his best to prevent their repeal. His hon. friend was grandiloquent on the score of the principles, so old and respectable, which the Bill contained. Any copyist upstairs could copy those famous principles, but the machinery was wanted to put them into operation, and there was no machinery in this Bill. It would be impossible to work it if it were passed, so that he hoped his hon. friend would think more of his electors and less of the merchants of Montreal, and, coming back to a sense of duty, withdraw his amendment.

MR. HOUDE said it was useless to enter into the merits of any amendment. It was the duty of all those who were opposed to the existing law to vote down all amendments to the motion of the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard). If they considered, in Committee of the Whole, any amendment, the course of proceedings would be deferred until to-morrow, and at this late stage of the Session, to-morrow meant until next Session. Every amendment against the motion of the hon. member for Iberville must be voted down, otherwise the existing law would continue with its official assignees, and all its other deficiencies.

MR. CAMERON : I rise to a point of order. The amendment is irrelevant to the Bill, and should not be put.

MR. CHAIRMAN said, as there was no regulation in our own rules of practice, he must refer to May to decide the point. May said, on page 473 :

" Amendments were formally required to be within the scope and title of the Bill, but by Standing Order, 19th July, 1854, any amendment may be made to a clause, provided the same be relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill, or be otherwise in conformity with the rules and orders of the House."

In his opinion this Bill was to repeal the Insolvency Act, and the amendments proposed would make of this Bill a partial repeal. They were, therefore, not irrelevant or inconsistent with the Bill, and might be put.

Mr. RYKERT said, if the result of voting from time to time would keep in force the old law, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Honde), he hoped they would go on voting until midnight. It would be a great calamity, if the present Insolvent Law were repealed—more especially if it were repealed pure and simple—to commercial interests ; but he would prefer to vote for the repeal, rather than for such amendments as those before the House. The amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) did not provide a proper remedy. The remedy was worse than the disease. If that was carried, no creditor would get a single dollar ; the estate would all go into the hands of the sheriffs and lawyers. The amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton would impose on the Statute-book a cumbersome piece of machinery, such as would not accomplish the object desired. Neither were the amendments introduced by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, in his opinion, such as this House ought to endorse. He fully appreciated the efforts of the members of the Committee, but the Bill introduced by them was too cumbersome and too complicated. He would much rather have the old law, than have the Bill presented by the Committee. As pointed out by the hon. member for South Huron, these amendments did not provide any machinery by which this law could be carried out. It was true, provision was made for the Judges to make rules and regulations, but were the Judges to say that the sheriffs or official assignees were to wind up the estates? This was a power which this House should never delegate to Judges, viz., the appointment of sheriffs and official assignees. If the law in Lower Canada wound up the estates economically and satisfactorily to the creditors, as has been repeatedly alleged in this House, then, by all means, give us that law for the whole of the Dominion. If these amendments should be adopted by the House, in lieu of the present Insolvent Act, we would have a law on the Statute-book which would be entirely inoperative, and practically deprive both creditors and debtors of the power of winding up estates, unless the machinery was provided for carrying it into effect. If the House was determined to repeal the present law, he would rather vote for its absolute repeal, than for amendments which would be utterly useless. He hoped the House would let the present Act remain for another year, by which time the Government could be prepared with a measure which would be of a simple and inexpensive character.

Mr. BÉCHARD said if these amendments were adopted they would have the effect of killing his Bill, because it was well known that if this Bill was to pass Parliament this Session, its third reading must take place to-night. If it had not been sooner proposed it was not by his neglect. It was in accordance with an agreement come to with the Government, when the Committee was appointed to investigate the whole matter, that it would be fair to let it stand on the Orders until the House had an opportunity of seeing the report of that Committee. It had stood on the Orders ever since the second week of the Session. If the third reading was not reached to-night it would be postponed until next Monday, when it would probably be too late.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) said it was not for him to question the propriety of the decision at which the House had arrived the other night, in voting the second reading of the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville, respecting the present Insolvent Law; but he might venture to suggest to the House before they again divided, that, as far as he had been able to scan public opinion, through the ordinary channels by which they derived a knowledge of the sentiment of the country, the vote given that evening was not the vote of the people of this country. We were accustomed to receive the utterances of the press on all great questions as representing the public sentiment of the country, and in that view he had scanned, most carefully, all the great organs of public opinion, as well as the local journals in the various counties, and so far as he was able to see those papers, he could say that, with scarcely an exception, the vote on the Bill he had referred to was deprecated as a great misfortune to this country. Every member of this House, who took the trouble to look over the papers, would come to the same conclusion. He should be sorry to say that newspaper opinion ought to control the opinions of members of this House, but he did not say that if hon. gentlemen voted for the repeal of the present law because they supposed it was the sentiment of the country, that sentiment did not find expression in the ordinary channels of public thought. The organs of public opinion went further, and declared, almost unanimously, that, in their opinion, it would create great disaster to the trade of this country. The repeal of the law would affect injuriously every branch of trade and commerce, and notwithstanding the vote given the other evening, it was well for members of this House to reconsider the question submitted to them, and to ask themselves whether there would be any inconvenience to the country in suffering the present law to remain another year on the Statute-book. It was idle to suppose that the press did not represent, at any rate, the large and overwhelming commercial sentiment of this country. On the division, the other evening, he thought the members opposed to the law, would not deny the fact that the vote in favour of the continuance of the Insolvent Law represented the great commercial thought of this country. The representatives of almost every great commercial centre in the country voted in one direction. He did not say it was universally so—there were a great many gentlemen on both sides of this House who represented large commercial interests in the country, and for whose opinions he had the greatest respect—but the division, the other evening, showed the large preponderance of the commercial sentiment, both in the House and in the country, to be in favour of the continuance of the Insolvent Law. This was a fact worth the serious attention of the members of this House, before, by a last vote, the Committee pronounced definitely on this subject.

MR. MÉTHOT said the newspapers represented the opinion of the towns, but the opinion of the country at large was opposed to the Insolvent Law, and the members from the rural constituencies knew the feeling of the country as well as the newspapers.

Mr. McDONALD said he, himself, represented a county of over 30,000 inhabitants, a large proportion of whom were farmers. But with all due deference to his hon. friend, he thought the commercial people of this country were better qualified to pronounce a sound judgment on the desirability of a law of this kind, than were the farmers. If his hon. friends opposed to this law would carefully examine the question, they would see that it was desirable they should retain on the Statute-book some kind of bankrupt law. If this law were repealed who would suffer? Not the farmers, not the mechanics, but the large trading classes of the country, the importers and the wholesale dealers of the Dominion. With his strong view as to the desirability of the law, it was not necessary to use strong language, but he endorsed to its fullest extent the expression of opinion by the hon. gentleman from Chateaugay the other evening. On the eve of a change in our fiscal policy, it would be most unfortunate if Parliament were to repeal, at this juncture, a law that had woven itself into every commercial transaction in the Dominion. Credit had been framed on the basis of this law, trust had been given and contracts had been entered into on the same basis, and it was impossible to strike it down without affecting, more or less, the whole commercial policy and transactions of this country. He only expressed these views in the hope that some hon. gentleman would feel that, although opposed to the law, and although he dared say, pressed by the obligation of promises given, or opinions expressed, previous to the election, nevertheless, in the present condition of the country, the House would do well to allow the law to stand for another year; at any rate, with the combined exertions of gentlemen on both sides of the House, some means could be found to retain what was essential and necessary in the law, while rejecting what was immaterial or objectionable, and what the members of the House appeared to think objectionable. With these views he should sustain the amendments of the hon. gentleman from Jacques Cartier, because he felt that he must vote for them as against the simple question of repeal. It was, doubtless, true that these amendments did not afford machinery for their own enforcement, but they did this much at least, they declared preferential assignments to be a fraud, and that a man should not make a present of his property to a friend or relative, or favour one creditor to the exclusion of the other. An important difficulty was, whether we had a constitutional right to declare in this House, irrespective of an Insolvent Act in its true sense, that propositions such as these should become law. In his own opinion, however, the propositions of his hon. friend were in the direction of what he conceived to be the interests of the country, and in the direction of sound legislation. They were not, certainly, all that was desirable, but they were largely preferable to the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) said his hon. friends from the Province of Quebec were willing to do away with the Insolvent Law because they had other provisions which could replace it; but, if this law were repealed, it would result in great hardships in the other Provinces, who had no such provisions to fall back upon. He (Mr. Macdonald) did not think that the farmers were affected by a bankrupt law or the want of one. It was the wholesale merchants and jobbers who profited by it. He thought that the tone of the public press seemed altogether in opposition to the total repeal of the Bankrupt Law. Therefore, he would support the amendment of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard.)

MR. McCUAIG said he had voted for the absolute and unconditional repeal of the Insolvency Law, because he understood, that, if it were repealed, they would have time for the passing of a law against preferential assignments, which had been the curse of the country. If it be shown that a Bill could yet be introduced that would prevent those assignments, he was yet willing to vote for the repeal of the Insolvent Law, but not otherwise. Those preferential assignments led to a great sacrifice of property, and unless security against them could be assured, he would be obliged to reverse his vote.

MR. SHAW said that the question now was not the repeal of the original Act, proposed by the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard), but the amendments which the hon. member for South Huron had described as very crude. The original law, from which they might have been copied, was all right, but they were simply copied out of some sections of the old Insolvent Act, and introduced here for the purpose of defeating the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville. Under that Act, so far as Ontario was concerned, it would be quite impossible to work the law, and any one might be made an insolvent, if there was any machinery, or an affidavit, on which an order of a Judge might be obtained. The Absconding Debtors' Act would only apply to those who had left the country, and no judgment could be obtained against an absconding debtor until assessed before a jury. So, in the different counties, assessments could only be made at the June or September session of the County Court, or before the Assizes. Therefore, all the insolvency cases would have to be decided at those Courts twice a year. The law was utterly unworkable. Not one cent would ever reach the creditors, under the amendments of the members for Hamilton and Jacques Cartier (Messrs. Robertson and Girouard). The frank and honest way of placing those amendments before the Committee would be to ask that the question go before the House and have the Insolvency Act repealed, but not to come in force till the lapse of a year. The idea of throwing the whole commercial legislation of this country into confusion by the introduction of those amendments, should not be entertained, and the Committee should not stultify itself by adopting them. He denied that the desire for repeal was confined entirely to the farmers and mechanics, as every solvent merchant in the rural districts desired the repeal of the Insolvent Act. It was only those who feared they might not be able to pay in full, who were anxious to take advantage of the Insolvent Act. He believed its repeal would be useful. On the introduction of the National Policy, the Legislature ought to take a new course in this matter, and young men entering business should understand that they had better be honest, and earn a reputation for honesty and integrity, when they would get the credit wanted.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) said there was no necessity for the claims to be proven before a jury. He was rather surprised to hear the hon. members for Lincoln and South Bruce (Messrs. Rykert and Shaw), crying out against the extraordinary expenses that the creditors would be put to in proving their claims. There must be some means of doing so. Without that, any claims might be accepted as bonâ fide, even the dishonest. But if the hon. gentlemen were very much alarmed about trying such cases before a jury, he (Mr. Robertson) was ready to provide that it was not necessary to prove any case before a jury, as a jury, under the practice now in vogue, might be dispensed with. It was all very well for certain members to find fault with suggestions or amendments; they should show their inventive genius by offering something better. There would be no difficulty whatever with his amendment. The procedure was indicated by the Absconding Debtors Act, which could be meted out as cheaply as possible, at this late stage of the Session. He did not say that this was the best scheme possible, but was strongly convinced that the Bill introduced by the member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) was better than the present law. But, if they were not to have that Bill passed, the existing law should be amended so as to provide for a fair division of debtors' estates among the creditors.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell) said he realised very thoroughly the responsibility of the vote he gave the other night, and which was in accordance with the decision of the majority of the House. There were in this country, at this moment, a great many merchants of high standing, doing a very large business, who viewed that vote with considerable alarm. He knew that telegrams had been received by hon. members of the House using expressions such as that the passage of the resolution, repealing the Insolvency Law, had created consternation amongst the merchants of the country, and especially amongst those of Montreal. But, in spite of that, he saw no reason to regret the vote which he gave. He had given the subject, since that time, as much consideration as he possibly could, and he was bound to say that, in the peculiar position of affairs in this country, he believed that the failure to pass this Bill would be a greater calamity than the repeal of the Act itself. The House must recollect that the vote of this House settled the fate of the Insolvency Act next Session at any rate. No one could look at the vote and realise the public expression of sentiment which it indicated without feeling that the public sentiment of the country, at this moment, was strongly adverse to the continuance of the existing Insolvency Act on the Statute-book. There was no doubt, whatever, that the Insolvent Act had been a source of utter demoralisation to the commerce of the country. He ventured to say that, during the last few years, numbers of men had gone into business in Canada with the Insolvency Act as their principal capital, believing and intending, if the event should occur—as they undoubtedly had reason to believe it might occur—believing and intending that if misfortune overcame them, that they, at least, would have the Insolvent Act to fall back upon—that they could go to their creditors and offer a composition of ten shillings, or five shillings, instead of twenty shillings in the pound; that they could go back and advertise bankrupt stocks, and ruin the honest trader alongside them, who was endeavouring to pay twenty shillings in the pound. He remembered a prominent merchant of Toronto, talking about this matter, and gave, as an illustration, a country merchant whom he had supplied with goods. The country merchant called to see the Toronto merchant, who expected that the former had come to order a bill of goods. He was astonished, however, to find that he had come to offer a composition of 10s. in the pound. When he asked how it was that his affairs were in this condition, he asked how could it be otherwise. There was John Jones on one side of him, and Peter Smith on the other, who had paid respectively 5s. and 10s. in the pound. He, at that moment, was compelled to ask his creditors to take 10s. in the pound, as he had taken it in regard to the others. And that had been the experience of a large number of merchants, who, rather than go through the trouble and difficulty of managing an insolvent estate, had consented to any composition offered. Men had literally traded in Canada upon the existence of this Insolvent Act. Now, he quite realised, while that was the fact, danger might accrue from the repeal of this law. He quite understood, while that was true, if they repealed the law they might have another condition of things. They might have, instead of the assignee taking possession of the estate, a lawyer taking possession of it. They might have one favoured creditor getting a preferential judgment or assignment, and in that way secure possession of an estate. To a large extent, that, undoubtedly, was the danger they had to face; but if the Act was not repealed every man in Canada would have the fact before him that he had only twelve months within which to arrange his affairs. Every man who was in the slightest degree shaky would inevitably go through insolvency during the next twelve months, and they would have a condition of general insolvency during that period. Recognising that it was a choice between two evils, and believing that the interests of the country would be best subserved by passing this Act, he hoped it would pass through this Session. There was another reason. They could not ignore the fact that during past years a great deal of the depression they had had in this country had been due to the conduct of the merchants in pressing goods on unwilling buyers throughout the country. They sent their drummers out pressing people to buy goods they did not want, with a consciousness that even if a difficulty occurred they would be able to get a composition or a portion of the assets. The passage of this Bill would stop that kind of thing for a while. Credit would not be so general, and that fact instead of being a disadvantage to the country, would be an unmixed advantage to it. After all the thought he had given to this subject, and all the responsibility he felt in relation to it, and he could assure the House he felt the deepest responsibility in regard to it, he was satisfied they would best subserve the interests of the country by passing this Bill for the total repeal of the Act.

MR. VALLÉE said that he was opposed to the amendment of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, for several reasons. With regard to donations between living persons, the present law provided that a creditor must wait a year before he can file his complaint, but these amendments limited this delay to three months. He considered this an undue interference with the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures. He believed, also, that the eighth and ninth amendments were unconstitutional, and that the Federal Parliament had not the right to interfere with legislation respecting agreements. This Parliament had not the right to say that such and such agreements were fraudulent. This right belonged exclusively to the Local Legislatures. The Minister of Justice, seeking to influence the House had stated that the representatives of the rural districts had hardly the right to vote against the Insolvent Act. He would say that those members represented a great many merchants, and that they represented the commercial opinion of a large portion of the community. It had been stated that the press had spoken against the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville. He begged leave to say that he had also followed the opinion of the press, and he had noticed that there were hardly any editorials in the leading papers censuring the vote given the other evening in this House. He held in his hands a letter from Mr. Jean Baptiste Renaud, of the city of Quebec, one of the foremost merchants of Canada, who stated that he was quite satisfied with the vote of the House repealing the Insolvency Act. He had met several other influential merchants of Quebec, who expressed their satisfaction at seeing this Act repealed. Before there was any Insolvency Law the country had been prosperous, and he did not see why it could not be dispensed with again.

MR. BRECKEN said it was a matter of regret the Lower Provinces had not such wise laws as the Province of Quebec. In the absence of insolvent laws in the Lower Provinces, the creditor who levied the first attachment would have the debtor's whole property. He admitted the amendments of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier were incomplete, because they provided no machinery for their own enforcement. In Ontario, if a man absconded, an attachment was levied on his property by the sheriff who took charge of it, and every creditor who went within six months and put in his claim was entitled to a share of the estate. If a man absconded in Prince Edward Island, a creditor attached his property, if it was perishable, and got an order from the Judge to have it sold. If it was not perishable, it remained in the custody of the sheriff, and the creditor went in the usual way and proved his claim. Suppose a man was worth $1,000 and had twenty creditors; if one creditor, to whom was owed that amount, came in one hour before the other creditors, he could attach the property and seize the whole of it, not a cent being left to the other creditors. He hoped the advice of the hon. the Minister of Justice would be taken by this House, for it would be a great misfortune to large sections of the country if the Insolvent Act were entirely repealed. A law of this kind should not be framed more in the interest of the creditor than of the debtor, or vice versa. It should be equitable. If this law were entirely swept off the Statute-book, it would immediately result in one creditor being benefitted at the expense of the rest. He hoped some means would be taken to devise a measure that would prove satisfactory to the country at large.

MR. GIROUARD said he had been charged with representing a constituency which would not approve of the action he had taken on the question. He admitted he had promised the electors of Jacques Cartier to vote for the repeal of the existing Insolvency Laws; but he contended that he had kept that promise. When the Bill of the Committee was rejected the other night, he had voted without hesitation for the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) repealing the existing law. He was far from considering the amendments he (Mr. Girouard) had introduced as equivalent to an Insolvency Bill. As he had already stated, if these amendments were to have the effect of causing the rejection of the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville, he would withdraw them because he did not desire that result. After listening to the discussion that had just taken place with regard to them, he saw there was no doubt they were incomplete. He had been, and still was, under the impression that under powers intended to be conferred by the Bill as amended, rules and regulations could be made by which Judges would be enabled to provide the necessary machinery to put his propositions into effect. Perhaps he was mistaken. He had never been in favour of the existing Bankruptcy Laws, and he had no wish that any action of his would result in their continuance on the Statute-books. Therefore, unless the House was willing that the Bill of the hon. member for Iberville should receive its third reading to-day; or, unless he had the promise of the Government that it would receive its third reading sometime this week, he would withdraw his amendments. He believed the provisions of his amendments were a step in the right direction, and that they would and to prevent preferential assignments and judgments. Nevertheless, if they should have the effect of defeating the proposition of the hon. member for Iberville, as was feared by certain hon. gentlemen, he would not, as he had already stated, have the slightest hesitation in withdrawing them, and he begged for leave to withdraw the same.

MR. MOUSSEAU said he regretted very much the interference of the Minister of Justice in this discussion. The House had been led to believe that this question was an entirely open one. They had many reasons for thinking so. Every Session that the Insolvency Law came before this House during the last Parliament since 1875, the Minister of Militia and Defence, and Inland Revenue, and the Postmaster-General, were opposed to it. During the partial elections which took place in the years 1875, 1876 and 1877, the Conservatives had always reproached the late Government with not having abolished that law. He thought the reasons given by the hon. the Minister of Justice did not justify the position he took in favour of that law. He (Mr. McDonald) said, first, that the vote given on the second reading of the Bill, of the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard), did not represent the opinion of the country. He (Mr. Mousseau) contended that if ever a vote had been a faithful echo of the feeling of the country, it was the vote referred to. It was the vote of public opinion. It was a vote recorded in favour of legislation, supported by a large majority of the members of the House, and given against both the leader of the Opposition and of the Government. There must have been some reasons for such a large number of members leaving their leaders, and he (Mr. Mousseau) thought that the principal reasons were to be found in the wishes of their constituents. Their constituents had suffered for many years from this law, and had always been against it. Their constituents, during the last election—that of 1878—told them that if they elected them, they wanted them to vote against this particular law. The hon. the Minister of Justice thought it was not the proper opinion of the country. He thought that the principal papers in the large cities were the real organs of public opinion. He (Mr. Mousseau) begged leave to differ from the hon. gentleman. The large organs represented say the ten or fifteen principal traders in the great commercial centres, but they did not represent the opinion of the large body of traders throughout the country, or the farming and working population. The great commercial feeling was spoken of as if there was nothing else to consider. During the last fifty years the public men of Canada had made a great mistake. They had been legislating not for the farming and working population, not to develop the industries of the country, but only to increase importations, and during that time the youth of Canada had been leaving for the United States and elsewhere. It was about time to put a stop to such legislation. They were beginning a new fiscal policy, and they ought to inaugurate a new policy in regard to this Insolvency question. They were told that they ought to reconsider this law. He thought if the hon. the Minister of Justice had followed closely the debates and proceedings of the last Parliament, he must have known that that law had been considered in the Sessions of 1875, 1876, 1877 and 1878, under one form or another, so that the country—especially the farming community—was prepared for the repeal of these laws. The remarks of the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Shaw) told very heavily about the evils of over-trading. It was exactly the position of affairs in the Province of Quebec. There was nothing so damaging to the prosperity of a country than this over-trading which had existed during the last twenty-five years, and more especially in the last five years. Bankrupt stocks were thrown upon the market through the want of experience or capital on the part of young men—sometimes men who had heretofore been carpenters or farmers, who rushed recklessly into trade, knowing that if they did fail, they had the Insolvency Law to fall back on to enable them to escape serious consequences. The result was, that the honest trader had to compete with these bankrupt stocks, which were often purchased at a nominal figure, and, therefore, could be sold at prices entirely beyond the competition of traders who bought their stocks from the wholesale men at their regular value. There was no doubt whatever that public sentiment was clearly against the continuance of the Insolvency Law. That was sufficiently proven by the discussions that had taken place in this Parliament during the last five years, and in the press of the Dominion—not, perhaps, in the great organs of cities, but certainly in the greater part of the valuable country newspapers. They found that even the Dominion Board of Trade at their meeting in Ottawa, in January last, expressed the opinion that some extensive alteration should be made in the existing Insolvency Law, and the following letter from Messrs. Patterson and Greene, members of the Committee on Insolvency, appointed by that Board, was read at the meeting :

“While we concur in the alterations and additions to the Insolvency Act, recommended in the report of the Committee, if it is decided to retain the Act in its present form, we would prefer its repeal.”

It was the well-known opinion of the vast majority of the people of this country, that the repeal of the law, pure and simple, was far preferable to the retention of the law as it now stood. He thought it would be rendering a great service to the country to try, at least, one or two years of honest trading without the Bankruptcy Laws.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said there were one or two remarks which had been made by the hon. gentleman who had just sat down, to which he desired to respond. One of the arguments of the hon. gentlemen in favour of the repeal of the Insolvent Law was that the merchants of this country had been in the habit of pressing their wares on their customers. So far as his (Mr. McDonald's) reading extended, he did not know of any period in the history of the world where people having wares to sell did not press them on those who wished to buy, and, as far as his knowledge of trade extended, that was one of the first principles of all active, energetic business men. He sold his goods wherever he could so long as the goods were in safe hands. Otherwise, he would be like a Turk or a Jew, and squat on his hands and knees, and merely pray to Allah for customers. An active and intelligent business man sold to whoever in good standing commercially wanted to buy. Sometimes the merchant sold to the wrong man, but this was one of the accidents of trade. Another reason of his hon. friend was that evils arose from the law not being properly administered. This was no reason why the administration of bankrupt estates should not be left in the hands of the creditors, but put into the hands of paid officials, whose duty would be to see that the administration of the law was effectively carried out for the benefit of the people and the country. In England they had taken the administration of the law out of the hands of the creditors, and had placed it in the hands of officers duly appointed for the purpose. He felt quite satisfied that the repeal of the law was a foregone conclusion, but, feeling as he did upon the subject, he could not allow this opportunity to pass without making the last remark he wished to make upon the subject.

MR. SHAW said he would like to correct what appeared to be a misapprehension in regard to the law of Ontario. Without the Insolvent Law, they had a law in Ontario that was against preferential assignments.

MR. GUTHRIE said the hon. member for South Bruce had undertaken to read an Act of the Ontario Parliament, with the view of catching some votes. Anyone looking at that law would see that the interpretation was not a sound one, and it was not the one which had been put upon it by the Courts. If the Insolvent Act were repealed, it should be distinctly understood that they had no better Statute than the Statute of Queen Elizabeth, and they had no protection against judgment by default or against preferential assignments.

MR. GIROUARD said he would withdraw his amendments, as they could not be considered this Session; and he preferred the law should be repealed, than that it should continue to exist.

MR. MACDONNELL said the hon. the Minister of Justice was right in saying that the sentiment of this Dominion was not in favour of an unconditional repeal of the Insolvency Law. He would like as evidence of this from the speech of one of the strongest supporters of repeal, the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), delivered a few evenings ago. The hon. member stated that, although this House was petitioned in connection with this subject from various parts of the Dominion, from the metropolitan cities of the Dominion, not a single petition asked for an unconditional repeal of the law. Of the various Provinces, only one was prepared to meet such a disaster as the repeal of this Act. He would, therefore, move in amendment, that the following clause be added to the Bill :—

“This Act will not come into operation until after the expiration of one year after the passing of the same.”

This would be a notification to every Province of the Dominion that had not a law for the distribution of Insolvent Estates at present upon their Statute-book, and thus give them an opportunity, before Parliament met again, to enact laws to meet the repeal of this law.

BELLECHASSE CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

JUDGE'S REPORT.

MANITOBA ADDITIONAL GRANT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Order for House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to consider a certain resolution respecting a temporary annual grant to the Province of Manitoba, read.

MR. TILLEY: As the Order in Council and the communications from the Government of that Province have been laid upon the table of the House, and hon. members are in possession of the facts connected with it, it is scarcely necessary for me to enlarge upon the subject further than to say that, in 1876, the leader of the then Government submitted to the House a proposition by which the subsidy of Manitoba, for reasons stated, was increased $25,000 a year. This Province is in a very exceptional position. Its position was exceptional at that time, and warranted an increase, in the opinion of Parliament. That exceptional state of affairs has increased owing to the influx of population and the necessarily increased expenditure of that Province. Under the terms of the Union, no increase of subsidy could take place until the census had been taken in 1881. From the papers on the table, it will be found that the population, the present spring, was estimated at 55,000, and it is supposed that at the close of the year it will have reached 70,000. After giving the whole subject the most careful consideration, the Government considered it but fair and just to that Province, under these exceptional circumstances, that the population, until 1881, when the census will be taken, should be estimated at 70,000, the number that it is supposed the population will reach at the close of the year, and the Government felt themselves warranted in asking the House to increase the subsidy, and base it on a population of 70,000 until 1881. This will make the annual appropriations $105,654, or an increase of $15,635.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said, although he was quite aware that the circumstances of Manitoba were exceptional, and it might, perhaps, be necessary to comply with the demand, he regretted very much it had been found necessary to propose a second addition. The House would remember that, when, with very great reluctance, the late Government brought down a proposition to add $25,000 to the allowance to Manitoba, they deemed it necessary that the Manitoba Local Government should make strenuous efforts to meet that expenditure, which they did in several ways, notably by abolishing their second chamber, and very considerably reducing their expenditure. He did not propose to object further to this, but, at the same time, it was quite obvious that it was to the last degree unadvisable that any of these Provinces should be coming here, at intervals of two or three years, for additional grants. It would be almost impossible to say where that might stop. If this went on in the cases of the other Provinces, this Parliament would be in the unenviable position of acting as a sort of tax collector for the benefit of Legislatures over which it could exercise no control. He would almost deem it better, under the circumstances, to make provision for the taking of the census at more frequent intervals, than to have every two or three years fresh demands made upon the Exchequer for sums which, if not large in themselves, might become dangerous from their frequency.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he agreed with the remarks of his hon. friend to a certain extent, but the answer was that the position of Manitoba was quite exceptional. It had not the ordinary sources of revenue which the other Provinces had. It had shown a praiseworthy desire to practice economy in the administration of its affairs. In the views of some, it might have gone still further, but, whether large or small, certain expenses could not be diminished, and the expenditure was much larger in small Provinces than in large ones. It had no public lands, nor the resources of revenue that the older Provinces had, and was latterly in a permanent state of poverty. This was merely introduced from absolute necessity, just as it was by hon. gentlemen opposite when they took the same step. He hardly thought it would be well to have a quinquennial instead of a decennial census in the small Provinces. It was better to make an advance in this way, up to a certain time, and, after the next decennial census, they could deal with this subject in a comprehensive manner, and settle the future relations of Manitoba with the Dominion on a basis on which any new Provinces established in the North-West might be treated.

MR. MILLS said the condition of Manitoba might be relieved by transferring to it the management of the public lands and school lands. This would take the burden of management from this Government, and the lands, being under the direct control of the Local Government, could be more economically managed than at present, and considerable revenue be derived from them.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was glad to see his predecessor's line of thought ran in the same direction as his own with respect to the manner of treating Manitoba. It would not be well to hold out anything like an implied promise to convey the Dominion lands to that Province until Parliament dealt with the whole subject. The hon. gentleman would find that there was an attempt to deal with the school land matter in the Bill before the House to which he would invite attention to-night.

MR. RYAN (Marquette) said it was too late to adopt the suggestion of the hon member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). If it had been adopted when the Province was admitted this Parliament would not be troubled with applications for increased subsidies. Most of the lands within the limits of that Province had passed out of the hands of the Dominion Government. There was very little land left in the Province that the Government had control of, and, therefore, it was too late to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Bothwell. Of course, it was very unpleasant to have their Province continually appealing for assistance, but it was one of the necessities of their situation. They had all the machinery in the North-West for the government of a population a dozen times as large as the present. The true remedy would be found in the extension of the boundaries of the Province, and the re-arrangement of the terms of union, so as to avoid the necessity of continual applications of this nature.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) said he was very glad to find that the Government would take into consideration the representations of the people in the North-West. It was certain that the revenue of the Province was very much under that required for the maintenance of the roads and other works, which, at this moment, it would be well to have administered by Government.

MR. ANGLIN said there were many obvious reasons why the Local Government should not have received additional lands in Manitoba. It was absolutely necessary to extinguish the Indian title in that Province, and settle other matters that could have been settled only by the Dominion Government. Yet it was evident that, as soon as possible, the Dominion Government should transfer to the Local any lands that could fairly be disposed of. He would suggest that this Province, being so ridiculously small, should be made three or four times its present size. Its 11,000 square miles formed scarcely more than the area of some counties in the older Provinces. It should be enlarged at the earliest opportunity.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the suggestion, of course, was worthy of all consideration. The hon. gentleman from Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) quite understood, no doubt, the reason why the boundaries of Manitoba were made so limited—that that Province had no revenue. To administer the affairs of justice to a larger population, and larger Province, would cost the Government more, while their means would not increase in proportion to the area or population. There must be some means of adding to the population of the Province before its bounds could be properly enlarged.

House resolved itself into Committee on the resolution.

(In the Committee.)

Resolution ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times, and agreed to.

MR. TILLEY introduced a Bill (No. 108) To provide for the payment of an additional temporary grant to the Province of Manitoba.

Bill read the first time.

MR. TILLEY moved the second reading of the Bill.

MR. SMITH.

MR. MACKENZIE said he would like to know if the hon. the Premier could inform the House what proportion of the population in the North-West was outside Manitoba—he meant the districts immediately contiguous. He understood a very large proportion of the emigrants to that region had not settled in the Province, and those people would have no expenditure of any kind made among them.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would endeavour to get information on that subject.

MR. RYAN (Marquette) said that the voters' list, from which the number of votes in Manitoba was computed, did not contain the name of a single person settled outside the boundary. The 9,000 or 10,000 referred to by the hon. member for Lambton, were resident in the Province.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was a very large population outside its boundaries, and these people had to continue to govern themselves the best way they could under the North-West Territory Act, without any cost to the Dominion. His own impression was that it was a great mistake to give a Provincial Government or Parliamentary system to Manitoba at all, and that the small number of people in that Province could have governed themselves much more economically under some such plan as the North-West Territory Act provided. He feared that, unless the whole subject was carefully considered with a view to prevent difficulties in future, they should have a succession of such demands as this, before a firm system of government was established in Manitoba or the contiguous territory.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he quite agreed with the hon. gentleman that perhaps the present Constitution of Manitoba was premature; but the hon. gentleman would, doubtless, remember the exceptional circumstances under which it was granted. It was a Bill or measure of peace after a measure had been passed to make Manitoba a Crown Colony, somewhat after the fashion of the North-West Territories beyond. But, to quiet the somewhat disturbed state of the country, it was necessary, somewhat prematurely, to introduce the system that obtained.

MR. MILLS said he thought that the returns brought down would show that there was a mistake of 20,000 in the addition of the population of Manitoba—that it was 33,000 instead of 53,000. That made some difference as regarded the appropriation, and took away the ground for additional grants to that Province. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Ryan) would require a new reason for asking that additional amount. Before the late Government went out of office, they were asked for an appropriation for bridging the Little Saskatchewan and other streams, where 9,000 to 10,000 people had settled. He had some communication with the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West as to the possibility, out of the $17,000 granted, to appropriate sums towards making some of those improvements, and as to whether the people were ready to contribute to the work considerably in the shape of labour, but required some monetary assistance, but he (Mr. Mills) thought they had received no answer up to the time of their leaving office. But, as nearly the whole of the population of the North-West was between the border of Manitoba and Fort Ellice, he had no doubt that it would become desirable to aid them in bridging some of the streams, which were, at seasons, nearly impassable, and doing something to facilitate communication between the settlements and the interior. He thought the Government would find that necessary, and that he should mention those facts before the Supplementary Estimates were brought down.

Bill read the second time.

ESQUIMALT GRAVING DOCK.

RESOLUTION WITHDRAWN.

MR. TILLEY said that, since he laid on the table the resolution on that subject, he found that in 1874 an Act was passed by Parliament almost in the terms of the resolution on the Orders for the purpose therein mentioned, except that the amount was fixed at $250,000 instead of £50,000 stg., towards the construction of a dry dock in British Columbia. Under those circumstances, and as the legislation in British Columbia on the subject referred to $250,000 instead of £50,000, he would let the resolution drop.

Resolution, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

NEW BRUNSWICK SUPREME COURT ADDITIONAL JUDGE BILL.

(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

FIRST AND SECOND READING.

Order for House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to consider certain resolutions for the appointment of an additional Judge in Equity in the the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, read.

SIR A. J. SMITH said that the Local Legislature of New Brunswick, last Session, passed an Act authorising the appointment of an additional Judge. He was of opinion there was no necessity for any more, there being now five Supreme Court Judges and five County Court Judges for a population of less than 300,000. In some portions of New Brunswick, lawyers had got into the habit of increasing and protracting litigation, and, in cases not involving over $40, days would be spent on the trial. He believed that the business could be despatched as in Ontario, in which case there would be quite sufficient Judges to perform the business. He referred mainly to the County Courts, but his objection applied with considerable force to the Supreme Court also. In Nova Scotia he thought there were seven Supreme Court Judges, and seven or eight County Court Judges, or about the same proportion, considering population, as in New Brunswick.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said it was difficult sometimes to determine exactly where to draw the line in reference to these matters, but, in a Province like New Brunswick, he thought it was safe to rely upon the sentiment of the Local Legislature. He held in his hand, not only the Act which was passed authorising the appointment of a Judge, but the report of Mr. Fraser, the Attorney-General of New Brunswick, going fully into details, and, if his statements were well founded, they afforded ample justification for the appointment contemplated. He understood Mr. Fraser to be, not only a man of ability, but a man of high character, who would not make such a report to the Parliament of the Dominion unless the facts were as he stated. If it were a fact that people were being deprived of their rights from want of more Judges, this Government would not be doing its duty if it did not submit to Parliament the measure asked for by the Legislature of New Brunswick. It was, undoubtedly, a fact that the greatest difficulty was experienced, and that the Judges had been unable to keep down arrears, either because more time was occupied in the trial of causes, or because the amount of business was abnormally increased. Within his own recollection the business in the Courts had increased to such an extent, at any rate in Nova Scotia, as to make an increase of judicial strength absolutely necessary, and he did not doubt the same state of things existed in New Brunswick. In reference to the salary, it would be observed that the Judge to be appointed was called a Judge in Equity, although a Judge in the Supreme Court, following in that respect the example of Nova Scotia, which, before the Union, appointed a Judge in Equity. At that time the salary of the Judge in Equity was $5,000, being the same as that of the Chief Justice in that Province. The Government had thought it right not to make a distinction in the case of New Brunswick. It was the intention of the Government, however, to reduce the salary of the Equity Judge in Nova Scotia, as soon as they were able to do so, which would be on the next appointment to that office. Of course it was out of the power of the Government to withdraw from the present Judge in Equity the salary he enjoyed when he was appointed, but, whenever that office had again to be filled, the salary would be equalised to that of the other Puisne Judges of the Court.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said it seemed to him an extraordinary proposition to submit to Parliament, that a Province with a population of only 300,000 should require so many Judges. The Province of New Brunswick already had five Superior Court Judges, and now the Minister of Justice was asking this House to sanction the appointment of another one. In Ontario, with a population of about 2,000,000, the Superior Court consisted of nine Judges exclusive of the Court of Appeals, three for the Court of Chancery, three in Common Pleas, and three in Queen's Bench. That New Brunswick, whose judicial strength was now very large considering its population, should have an additional Judge, appeared to him to be simply outrageous. The hon. the Minister of Justice justified his proposition on the ground that the Legislature of New Brunswick desired this additional Judge, but, if the Minister of Justice, on the recommendation of every Local Legislature, proposed to increase the strength of the judiciary in each Province, there would be no end to such appointments, and the annual burdens thus imposed on the country would be enormous. They had already seen, this Session, the Government introducing and passing a Bill adding two Superior Court Judges to the judicial strength in British Columbia, entailing an annual expenditure in the Dominion for all time of about $9,000, and now they were asked to add to the strength of the judiciary of New Brunswick to the tune of $4,000 a year more, while, by another proposition, still before the House, they were asked to add to the salaries of the County Court Judges of Prince Edward Island a sum which would increase the cost of administering justice in that Island, by $1,500 a year. He understood that the hon. gentleman's proposition was based solely on Acts of Local Legislature, and on the recommendation of the Attorney-General of New Brunswick, who stated that large arrears of business had accumulated in the Courts of that Province, and that the judicial strength of the Province could not successfully undertake the work; but the hon. gentleman should have inquired into the cause of the arrears himself, and not have rested satisfied with the mere recommendation of a local official, perhaps directly interested in the appointment, before he submitted this proposition. The arrears might have accumulated from other causes than the want of numerical judicial strength in that Province. It was well known that, before the appointment of the late Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ontario, there was a vast accumulation of business in that Court, solely because the judicial strength had not been put forth in the proper direction and with the proper energy. There were arrears in that Court alone of about 100 cases, and they were all disposed of by that Judge in a very short time after his appointment. If the hon. gentleman had made the necessary enquiries, he would, no doubt, have found that the accumulation of business complained of in New Brunswick was entirely the fault of the Judges, and was not attributable to the paucity of their numbers. Judging by the population, the size of the Province, and its commercial transactions, he was quite satisfied that the Superior Court Judges could easily and satisfactorily administer the laws in New Brunswick, and that no additional Judge was required. He believed the judicial strength all over the Dominion was in excess of the necessities of the country, and the hon. gentleman would find that, if he pursued his present course, and acted solely on the recommendation of the local authorities, he would have a Superior Court Judge for every 10,000 of the population. In some of the Provinces they had that state of things now. In Prince Edward Island they had six Judges to a population of 90,000. The sooner the hon. gentleman stayed his hand on this kind of legislation the better, and before committing the country to these constant increases in judicial appointments, he should make the most thorough and diligent enquiry as to the necessity of the proposed additions.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he had stated to the House, in answer to the hon. member for Westmoreland, that his information as to the state of the Courts was founded on the statement of the Attorney-General of New Brunswick, that the difficulty arose not from an unwillingness to work on the part of the Judges, but because it was impossible for them to overtake the work. The hon. member for South Huron, in the face of that allegation, stated that he was satisfied that, if the Judges worked as they ought to work, they could overtake the arrears. He (Mr. McDonald) would leave that question to be settled by gentlemen who knew the Judges of New Brunswick better than he did. The hon. gentleman had drawn a comparison of the expense of the judiciary of New Brunswick with that of other parts of the Dominion. He did not think that question ought to enter into a discussion of this character. The administration of justice in every part of the Dominion, whether the Province were large or small, should be adequate to all the wants of the people. But the hon. gentleman's argument did not apply here; for, if he had taken the trouble to inform himself, he would have seen that, compared with the expense of the administration of justice in other Provinces of the Dominion, the pro rata outlay in New Brunswick was no larger than in Ontario or Quebec—indeed, he did not think it was so large. The administration of justice last year in Ontario amounted to about $215,000, and in New Brunswick to $37,000. That included all the Courts in both Provinces. But, even if this argument was a sound one, it would not affect the main fact, that there was an undoubted necessity in New Brunswick for the appointment of another Judge.

MR. ANGLIN said he was pretty well acquainted with the business of the Courts of New Brunswick, and was perfectly satisfied that another Judge was not required. Some years ago they had a Chancery Judge called the Master of the Rolls, and four Judges of the Supreme Court; all five were afterward made Judges in Equity and Judges in Common Law. He did not think this had worked very well, and a good deal of dissatisfaction existed because all the Judges were liable to be called on at any time to hear causes in Equity. He believed it was now proposed to go back to the old system, and create a Judge in Equity. In that way some time might be saved, but the only instance in which any delay was caused, was in the hearing of final motions on appeal before the Supreme Court sitting in banco in the Circuit Court in the city of St. John. Unless some means were taken to facilitate the progress of business in the full Court, it was evident that an increase in the number of Judges would not enable them to get on any faster than at present. He understood that this Bill proposed to divide the full Court, so that one set of Judges could hear one set of causes, and another set of Judges hear other causes, and this might be an improvement. The increase in the number of Judges, unless there was some such readjustment, would not enable them to perform their duties any more rapidly than at present. It was stated that twenty-six Circuit Courts were held, but some of them lasted sometimes scarcely more than a day, and very few more than a week. For many years past, there had been, or there seemed to be, great arrears of business at the St. John Circuit. It was the fashion for young lawyers to enter a great number of cases on the docket in order to make a display, sometimes without any intention of taking them to trial. It was true, as stated by the hon. member for Westmoreland, that lawyers had got into the habit of wrangling over every little trifling cause, so that many days were spent on what, to any person of ordinary common sense, would appear to be a case that could be disposed of in an afternoon. The chief cause of this waste of time, on the part of lawyers, was that they were paid by the day. In St. John, in the Circuit Courts, it frequently happened that, even when there was a large docket, the Judge could find no business to do, because the parties interested, or the lawyers, were not ready. The Court might sit four or five weeks, and yet not do more than try four or five cases. Up to 1866 they had only there five Judges. In 1866, prior to coming into Confederation, it was deemed advisable to create County Court Judges. Five were created, and they had very large criminal and civil jurisdiction. They could try criminals for any but capital offences, and relieved the other Courts of a large amount of work. They had also small Courts to try small debt cases, and, altogether, they had an enormous judicial staff. Of these Supreme Court Judges, four resided in the little town of Fredericton, while, in the large city of St. John, only one of these Judges resided. He had a great deal to do in Chambers. The lawyers thought it very desirable, no doubt, to have another judicial prize created, but he was perfectly satisfied they did not want another Judge. A good deal might be done to facilitate the transaction of business by the redistribution of work amongst the Judges. The appointment of another Judge would, without such readjustment, do very little to reduce the number of untried cases.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said they must look at this from a constitutional point of view. The responsibility for the administration of justice must rest somewhere. It rested by the Constitution in the Legislature of the Provinces. If the Legislature of a Province declared that it was necessary, for the due administration of justice, that a Court should be constituted in a particular manner and have a certain number of Judges, it would be twisting the Constitution for the House to assume the responsibility of saying to the different Provincial Legislatures that they were wrong in the matter. They ought not to suppose, or allow themselves to believe that any Province would be actuated by a sordid desire to get a small sum out of the Dominion revenue in the shape of an additional salary for a single Judge. The Legislature had solemnly declared, by an enactment, that it was necessary for the due administration of justice that a certain number of Judges should be appointed. He thought they must accept the decision of the Legislature whatever might be their private opinion. If an Act was passed by the Local Legislature, it was only on very strong grounds, such as the Act being ultra vires, that the Government could recommend its disallowance. The Act in question was clearly within the power of the Local Legislature, and would any Ministry be justified in recommending its disallowance because it put a small additional charge upon the revenue? By the Constitution, the Local Legislature had the right of increasing their judiciary, and the provision of the salary was thrown upon the Dominion. That was a constitutional duty of the Government. He thought the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) had, by his remarks, shown the necessity of the increase of the judiciary, and he (Sir John

A. Macdonald) was of opinion that the measure should be allowed to pass.

MR. MILLS said he did not subscribe to the constitutional doctrine the hon. gentleman had laid down, and, in fact, the friends of the hon. gentleman did not subscribe to it. It was not long since the Legislature of Nova Scotia passed a Bill for establishing County Courts, and the late Administration asked Parliament for an appropriation to make the necessary provision for the payment of the salaries of these Judges. The friends of the hon. gentleman then took a wholly different view of the constitutional obligation of the present Parliament, from that which the hon. gentleman at present expressed. They rejected the Bill in the Senate, thereby declaring that the appropriation should not be made.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I did not vote against the Bill.

MR. MILLS said he did not know how the hon. gentleman voted, or whether he voted at all; but he did know that gentlemen, who were now the colleagues of the hon. gentleman, opposed the measure and secured its defeat. They did not act upon the constitutional theory now propounded. He (Mr. Mills) held that, if the Local Government wanted to increase the number of their Judges, or alter the constitution of their Courts, they ought to enter into correspondence upon the subject with the Dominion Government, pointing out why they believe additional Judges or additional Courts to be necessary; and the Government, in asking for the appropriation, ought to be able to justify the appropriation on its merits. He held that it was quite as appropriate for the Minister of Justice to make suggestions to the people of New Brunswick, in regard to the conduct of business in their Courts, as it was for the late Government to say to Manitoba, when she asked for an additional subsidy, that she ought to do away with the second chamber. If they accepted the doctrine of the hon. gentleman they might have their obligations increased indefinitely, without their having, in the slightest degree, any power over this portion of their expenditure.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) said his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) friends had voted against the appropriation for some County Court. Well, his friends must defend themselves in the Senate or elsewhere. He thought he had given the stronger proof of his adhesion in the most extreme cases to the principle that each Province was responsible for the administration of justice, and that the Dominion Government should provide the salaries. And for that reason, though he held that the establishment of the Court of Appeal at Toronto was unnecessary, he voted for its establishment. He expressed the opinion at the time that the Court was not wanted, and that it would impede justice instead of assisting it. But, as the Province of Ontario took the responsibility of saying it was required, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) did not take the responsibility of opposing it in any way whatever. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) spoke about a joint concern between the Dominion Government and the Provincial Governments. Well, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) thought there were to be no joint concerns, no entangling alliances of any kind.

MR. MILLS: There ought not to be, but there are.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there were. He had known of several. There had been joint concerns in every way; and, therefore, he assumed that the responsibility of the establishment of the Court of Appeal for Ontario, and of the appointment of three additional Judges, was expected—was an arrangement made between the Dominion Government and the Provincial Government. Was it a fact that the Dominion Government settled beforehand that these additional Judges should be appointed, that the additional salaries should be paid out of the Dominion Treasury, on their own responsibility, before it was submitted to Parliament, and the Provincial Government was merely acting as the mouth-piece of the Dominion Government in establishing that Court, to afford an opportunity to the Judges to get these additional salaries?

Some HON. MEMBERS: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) stated so. That was the legitimate result of his argument. He asked the hon. gentleman if there was any communication, direct or indirect, respecting the appointment of seven County Judges in Nova Scotia before the Act passed—whether there was any arrangement, direct or indirect, between the Dominion Government and the Government of Nova Scotia, before the seven Judges were appointed? He would pause for a reply.

MR. MILLS said the hon. gentleman should address his question to some person else. He (Mr. Mills) was not a member of the Government at the time, and did not know what the practice was. He was pointing out what the practice ought to be under the Constitution, that this House had the right to determine whether this was a proper appropriation or not to make. It was the business of the hon. gentleman, when he brought down a proposition of this kind to the House, to be in a position to defend that proposition upon its merits.

MR. ANGLIN said, if there had not been any correspondence between the two Governments, regarding the Judges, there should have been some. There should have been an understanding. If the doctrine laid down by the Premier were accepted, any Province of the Dominion could, hereafter, increase the number of its Judges at pleasure, and saddle additional burdens on this Dominion for all time to come. There was no question but that the increase in the number of Judges must be made by joint action. The co-operation of the Local Legislature and Dominion Parliament was necessary to complete a reconstruction of the Provincial Courts. For his own part he would prefer to see this whole power of constructing and reconstructing the Courts vested in the Dominion Parliament. He entirely disented from the extraordinary doctrine of the leader of the Government that, if a Provincial Government chose to declare that additional Judges should be appointed, this Parliament must necessarily accept that decision, approve of the appointments, and pay the salaries attaching thereto. He had not, as stated by the right hon. gentleman, charged the Judges in New Brunswick with dereliction of duty. He

(Mr. Anglin) had said that, of the five Judges referred to, one or two did not devote very much of their time to the judicial work. Nevertheless, he was not prepared to charge these with any neglect of duty. It would not be possible, by any mere increase of the number of the Judges, to overtake the arrears of work of the Supreme Court at Fredericton and the St. John Circuit Court.

MR. DOMVILLE said he was surprised to hear what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Anglin) had stated. He desired to call attention to the fact that when, early in the Session, reference was made to the delay in disposing of election petitions in New Brunswick, the hon. gentleman had said that the Judges of that Province were overworked, whilst, to-day, he stated they had nothing to do. Therefore, he trusted the House would attach very little importance to the statement of the hon. gentleman.

MR. BRECKEN said it would be an extraordinary course for this Parliament to pursue, if they refused to provide the necessary salaries for these Judges.

MR. TILLEY said, though not a member of the legal profession, he had, during the last five years, an opportunity of forming an opinion with reference to the work done by the New Brunswick Judges. He denied that—as stated by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin)—with the exception of one or two, the Judges of the Province had very little to do. He (Mr. Tilley) did not hesitate to say that, in his judgment, there were no gentlemen in any branch of the Civil Service whose time was more fully occupied in the discharge of their duty than the Judges of New Brunswick, and he expected that, if the Insolvent Act were repealed, the amount of litigation would be double what it had been, and there would be a corresponding increase of the duties devolving upon these Judges. As hon. gentlemen knew, there were eight or nine election cases pending in the Province of New Brunswick, which had been standing over for over six months, on the ground that the Judges had not time to take them up and consider them, and he did not hesitate to say that the necessity of disposing of these pending cases was a sufficient justification for the appointment of an additional Judge.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman might be right; but it proved either that there was more litigation in New Brunswick than anywhere else, or that the Judges were not as capable as anywhere else.

MR. TILLEY: Not at all.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman was mistaken. The Minister of Justice stated that the rate per capita was as small in New Brunswick as any other Province.

An HON. MEMBER: He said as small as Ontario.

MR. MACKENZIE said, well, take Ontario. The hon. gentleman made the statement without looking at the figures. The fact was that the cost per capita of the Administration of Justice in Ontario was only a little over eleven cents, and in Nova Scotia it was twelve and a-half cents. In New Brunswick it was fourteen cents, including this increase, and in Prince Edward Island it was a fraction over fifteen cents per head of the population. He could easily understand that, in the smaller Provinces of British Columbia and Manitoba, the expense would be exceptional. But the expense of the Administration of Justice in a long settled Province like New Brunswick, where they had a complete judicial system, with a fair population, should not exceed the average of the other Provinces. He protested against the doctrine advanced by the hon. the leader of the Government. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had repeated conferences with the Premier of Nova Scotia, and one or two of his colleagues, who had come to Ottawa as a deputation upon that and other business, in the winter of 1874. He recollected very well discussing with these gentlemen, and the then Minister of Justice, Mr. Dorion, the advisability of the appointment of these County Judges. Those gentlemen urged the necessity of the appointment of these Judges, and the late Government coincided in the existence of that necessity. It would be observed by the Estimates that the salaries of the County Judges of New Brunswick were exceptionally high. There were few higher in the Province under the old law; but the whole five had a maximum salary of $2,400 each; whilst many of the county Judges did not get more than $2,000. In Prince Edward Island, and in Nova Scotia also, the salary was only $2,000. Therefore, in New Brunswick they had the advantage of disposing of judicial matters in the County Courts with the best talent the Province was likely to produce, as they gave salaries which seemed higher than those of the other Provinces. It was tolerably clear, from the remarks of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith) and the other legal gentlemen from the Province of New Brunswick, that there was no real justification for the creation of this additional Judge.

House resolved into Committee on the resolutions.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND COUNTY COURT JUDGES BILL.

(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, to consider certain resolutions respecting the salaries of the County Court Judges of Prince Edward Island.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said the clause in the Act 37 Vict., relating to the County Court Judges of Prince Edward Island, left a discretionary power in the Governor in Council to fix the salary at any sum not less than $1,000 and not over $2,000. The salaries of the County Judges in New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, were fixed by law at $2,000, for the first three years, and $2,400 thereafter, being the same as the County Judges in Ontario. The salaries of the Judges of Prince Edward Island were fixed by Order in Council at $2,000, so that as regarded the amount on which they entered office, they stood upon the same ground as the County Judges in the other Lower Provinces, but why there should have been an invidious distinction made between them and the County Judges of the other Provinces, after the three years' service, he did not understand. So far as the income was concerned, he fancied, whatever might be the views of laymen, that no professional man in the House would think that these gentlemen were overpaid.

MR. BRECKEN said he was glad the hon. the Minister of Justice had moved this resolution. But he regretted that the resolution did not extend to the salaries of Judges of the Supreme Court of the Province of Prince Edward Island. Under the Act regulating those salaries, the Chief Justice was allowed the small salary of $3,000, the Assistant Judges $2,500, an addition to which they were each allowed travelling expenses of $2,000 per year. He had been given to understand that the reason why these salaries were fixed so low by the Dominion Act was that, while the Judges were officers of the Provincial Government, they were paid smaller salaries. True, the salaries were then very small, but they were the outcome of the agitation attending the introduction of responsible government, when the popular idea was that a public man should serve his country for nothing and find himself. Since then, the Provincial Government, owing to the increased cost of living, had increased the salaries of the other officers of the Civil Service. He could understand that Judges of the great Provinces of Ontario and Quebec should be remunerated at a higher rate than those of the other Provinces; but, when he remembered that the Chief Justices of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick received $5,000 a year, and the Puisne Judges $4,000, that the Chief Justices of British Columbia and Manitoba received $5,000, and the Assistant Judges $4,000, besides expenses, he could not see on what grounds the late Government, led by the hon. member for Lambton, thought proper to fix the salaries of the Judges of Prince Edward Island at so low a rate. The population of that Province was somewhere about 100,000. He did not know that in British Columbia there was anything like half that number of white people, and in Manitoba that there was over one-tenth of that number. Each of the Chief Justices in those Provinces received $5,000, and the Assistant Judges $4,000; while in Prince Edward Island the former received but $3,000, the latter $2,500. The duties of those Judges were very onerous. They held three circuits in two of the counties twice a year, and in Queen's County four terms a year, and only three Judges constituted the Supreme Court. The cases they were called to adjudicate upon were, no doubt, more numerous and much more intricate and difficult than, in all probability, those which engaged the attention of the Courts of British Columbia, and certainly those of Manitoba. A Prince Edward Island journal, the Patriot, which represented the Reform party in that Province, had just been put into his hands, and which contained the following remarks concerning the representatives from the Island Province.

SIR A. J. SMITH: Is not the authority a good one?

MR. BRECKEN said, not at all. The statement respecting the Island members was largely inaccurate, as much as the editor of that paper generally indulged in when commenting on the conduct of his political opponents; and he (Mr. Brecken) could assure the hon. member for Westmoreland that meant a good deal, for the publisher of that paper was an adept at the business of misrepresenting his political opponents. The extract was as follows:—

"Then the Minister of Justice moved for a Committee of the Whole on a resolution relative to the judiciary of British Columbia. The Bill which the Minister of Justice is about to submit to Parliament, provides for two additional Judges of the Supreme Court, and gives each of them a salary of $4,000 per annum. It does seem singular that a Judge in that Paradise of the Dominion should get $4,000 a year, while just as good, and, perhaps, better, men in Prince Edward, are allowed not a great deal more than half the money for their services. The Minister of Justice can hardly be entitled to his title as long as he permits such a manifest injustice to continue. The Prince Edward Island Judiciary should, in common justice, be placed on the same footing, as regards remuneration, as the judiciary of the other Provinces. Since there is no chance of the Judges of the larger Provinces being levelled down to the Island level, it is but fair that the salaries of the Island Judges should be levelled up to those of their brethren in the other parts of the Dominion. There was a good deal of discussion on the resolution, but none of the Island supporters of the Government had the courage to direct attention to the difference between the salaries proposed for the British Columbia Judges and the salaries paid the Prince Edward Island Judges. The poor fellows, I suppose, did not get leave to say anything on the subject, and it would never do for them to move in any direction without special instructions."

It was the latter part of this extract that he charged as being largely inaccurate. He had no doubt that the gentleman who wrote this article, and he (Mr. Brecken) knew him very well, had not forgotten the impression that the political tameness of the members who misrepresented the Island during the last Parliament had made upon his mind, he had forgotten that they had been displaced, he was measuring the present representatives by his own party standard. He (Mr. Brecken) claimed to be the free representative of a free people, and would never so far forget what was due to the people who sent him to Parliament, to ask permission either from Government or Opposition as to when, or in what manner, he should express himself on any question under the consideration of this House. When the resolution providing for the salaries of two additional Judges for British Columbia was submitted by the Minister of Justice, he (Mr. Brecken) could not, without being guilty of a breach of the rules of debate, have alluded to the matter of the salaries of the Judges of the Province of Prince Edward Island; the gentleman who undertook to direct public opinion ought to have known this. When he (Mr. Brecken) asked to allude to this matter when the resolution providing a salary for an additional Judge in New Brunswick was just now before the House, the hon. the member for Lambton very properly objected, that it would be irregular and inconvenient. He repeated he never could understand upon what principle it was that the late Government fixed the salaries at such a paltry rate, nor did he understand what the other representatives from the Island were thinking about when they quietly submitted to such a stigma being cast on the Province they came from. If there were any class of men that the public interests required should be well and liberally paid, it was the Judges of the land. It was a principle well and long recognised in the Mother Country. Judges should be placed in such an independent position that they should be placed above and beyond the suspicion of partiality and being influenced by sordid motives. It was a case in which the amount of labour should not be the sole measure of the remuneration. They were the custodians of our lives, our reputations, and our property, and everything that we held dear to us. There was every reason why they should be placed in an independent position. He might say that this matter had been brought under the consideration of the Government, and that he had pressed the matter upon the consideration of his hon. friend the Minister of Justice. He hoped and believed that next Session the Government would see their way clear to remedy this injustice.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) moved the second reading of the Bill.

MR. ANGLIN said that one of the Judges in the County Court of New Brunswick, Judge Watters, of St. John, did as much work as any of the Supreme Court Judges, and work of a high character, for which he received only $2,400 per annum. He (Mr. Anglin) would suggest that it would be a simple act of justice to increase the salary of that hard working Judge.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said that he fully admitted the high character and learning of that Judge. His salary had been fixed at $2,400 at first. The same observation would apply to the Judges of the same Courts in Halifax and Toronto, who received the same salary, and performed very important services with a great deal of work. But he thought it would be better to deal with the present question, and, if it should be found desirable, at some other time, to reconsider the salaries of the County Court Judges, he was free to say that not only the case of Judge Watters, of St. John, but the Judges of the other cities mentioned, would be entitled to reconsideration.

ANTICOSTI AND MAGDALEN ISLANDS TELEGRAPHS SUBSIDY BILL.

(Mr. Tupper.)

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, to consider a certain resolution respecting the granting of an annual subsidy towards the construction and maintenance of telegraphic communication between Anticosti and the Magdalen Islands.

(In the Committee.)

Resolutions ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

MR. ANGLIN.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times, and agreed to.

MR. TUPPER introduced a Bill (No. 111) For granting an annual subsidy towards the construction and maintenance of telegraphic communication to and upon the Anticosti and Magdalen Islands.

MR. MACKENZIE said he would like to know what the Bill provided—whether a permanent or temporary grant for that object?

MR. TUPPER said the Bill was to authorise the payment of $15,000 a year in perpetuity for the purpose of securing submarine cables to Anticosti and the Magdalen Islands, and connect with the lines of communication on those Islands. He had stated already that he expected the expenditure for those lines would reach or require a capital of $200,000, and it was proposed not to give the whole of the subsidy if the object could be attained for less. It was proposed to provide 6 per cent. on the amount invested, and leave $3,000 over for contingencies. It would be quite impossible to make a contract for the performance of a work of that kind without power on the part of the Government to guarantee a subsidy while the service was well performed.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he hoped the Government would be cautious in that matter. If the grant were to be an annual one, it would be something serious—interest on $300,000. He had a strong conviction that the beneficial results from the establishment of those lines would not be for the people. At certain seasons, when shipping accidents, with casualties, happened, even with the telegraph, they could not procure the assistance wanted. He did not intend to oppose the scheme, but requested the Government to be careful in regard to it. Had the Government any correspondence with any telegraph company with a view to the accomplishment of that work?

MR. TUPPER: No negotiations have taken place. All that is proposed by the Bill is to take power to make a suitable contract for this work on a fitting opportunity:

SIR A. J. SMITH said that the matter would involve much enquiry as to the cost of the enterprise, which should be known to the Government before action was taken.

MR. FORTIN said he was glad the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith) was not opposing the Bill, but was surprised that he expressed the opinion that connecting the Island of Anticosti and the Magdalen Islands with the main land by means of electric cables would not do the good that was expected or would do no good at all; and he was the more surprised, as the navigation of the River and Gulf of St. Lawrence, which the telegraph scheme was intended to assist and benefit, formed the main, he should say the only, outlet by water for the trade of this country, and the most important factor in the development of the navigation and the fishing industry of this country. As one of the originators and propagators of the sea-coast telegraph system which this country was about to establish, he (Mr. Fortin) would say, if the hon. gentleman who held the high position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries for the last four or five years had taken the trouble to acquaint himself with the progress that had been made in this respect in France, Spain, Portugal, and England, he would have seen that the sea coasts of these countries had been girdled with a system of telegraph lines, with which the signal and meteorological systems were connected, so that at every prominent point, whether there was a lighthouse or not, there was a signal or semaphorical station and a guardian or two watching day and night, so that the moment an accident occurred they were ready to assist the distressed mariners themselves, or call in the assistance of the life-saving stations, and of the wrecking steamers from the nearest ports. It was the bounden duty of the Government of this country to make provision for the lives and health of crews and passengers in distress on our sea-coasts, and also for the saving of wrecked vessels and cargoes. And this telegraph relief system was more necessary on the Gulf coasts than on the coasts of the maritime countries of Europe, which possessed an abundance of sea-ports and towns, from which steamers could come out and render the necessary assistance even without the existence of a regular telegraph signal system. In the Gulf and Lower St. Lawrence, it was quite the contrary, for, as it was now, very little assistance, if any at all, was given to shipwrecked crews and passengers, and to the vessels and cargoes which had the misfortune of being stranded on these distant, desolate, and thinly inhabited shores. In summer, the communication with these parts was difficult and unreliable, while, in winter, it was utterly impossible to communicate with Anticosti, the Magdalen Islands, and Labrador. But the connecting of the above-named islands with the mainland, and also the extension of the telegraph system to the lighthouses situated on the most prominent points of the sea coasts of the Maritime Provinces, for which $20,000 had been voted this year, were only parts of the telegraph and signal systems which the Government had engaged itself to build and complete in the space of five years, and which embraced, among others, a land line from Murray Bay, on the north shore of the lower River and Gulf of St. Lawrence, to the furthest fishing and trading establishments, and, in the course of time, reaching Forteau, in the Strait of Belle Isle, and connecting the St. Paul and Sable Islands with the mainland. But the connections about to be established this year were, without any doubt, the most important and essential, as Anticosti and the Magdalen Islands were on the track and in the way of vessels bound to and from the ports of Quebec and Montreal, other ports of the Province of Quebec, some of the sea ports of New Brunswick and several important ports of Nova Scotia. To show the importance of that navigation, he cited extracts from the evidence he had given in 1876 before a Select Committee appointed by the House of Commons of Canada, to enquire into the possibility of establishing a submarine telegraph system, and into the advantages and the necessity of such a system of telegraphy in the waters of the River and Gulf of St. Lawrence. If this country was to become as rich and as great as they expected it would be by the proper use of the St. Lawrence for the purpose of foreign commerce, the people of Canada must become, by means of this beautiful, and he might add unrivalled lake and fluvial route, the carriers of the greatest part of the Western produce; if not, then the destinies of this country were blighted and the hopes of the Canadians unfulfilled. But, in order to accomplish this national end they must carry as cheaply, or more cheaply by that route than the rival routes, especially that of New York could do. To cheapen to the lowest minimum the rates of carrying, either by steam or sail, through the St. Lawrence, was then the great desideratum that they should try to attain. He had already said that Canada expected from this magnificent water-course, which took its source in the very heart of North America, a large part of the carrying trade of the great West. But, in trying to carry out that idea, they had a formidable rival in the port of New York, which took by far the greatest part of this trade. We had been trying to compete with that port for the last thirty years, and if we were to succeed in the struggle, how was it to be done? By carrying cheaper than our rival. What was the charge in the cost of carrying that could be reduced? We could not cut down the expense of building a vessel or the wages of a crew to a lower figure than at present, but we might attempt a reduction in the cost of insurance upon our goods and our ships, and this, it seemed to him, was what the Government should try to bring about, by giving greater protection to vessels, when afloat, but no less so when stranded. The best means to be adopted for this end, was, he believed, the construction of the system of telegraphy in question. He cited the evidence of Mr. Murray, the President of the Montreal Assurance Company, on the subject, extracted from the Committee's report, and also a memorandum prepared for the same Committee of the House of Commons, by Messrs. Henry Fry & Co., Lloyd's agents at Quebec. The friends of this scheme deserved and expected through it also a reduction of insurance on the St. Lawrence route. On the New York route it had been reduced materially the last year.

MR. FORTIN.

Would the shipper think of sending his goods by the St. Lawrence if it were dearer than the New York route? Within the last five or six years the change accomplished by its great rival, New York, was most dangerous to the future of the carrying trade of Canada, trade returns showing that the New York was gaining on the St. Lawrence route. Was it not the duty of the Government and Parliament to do everything possible to change that state of things? If the St. Lawrence route were partly abandoned or materially injured, a great portion of the Dominion, that is to say, the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario, would suffer much; indeed, would lose their greatest element of wealth and prosperity. Among the means of improving the St. Lawrence route was this coast telegraph system and semaphore signals, with every provision possible that could reduce losses to shipping to a minimum, and thereby reduce the rates of insurance on ships and their cargoes to a minimum. As it was now, with no system of telegraph communication at all, with receivers of wrecked goods being named according to their political creed, some of the most incapable being sometimes chosen, and with our lighthouses in the hands of persons, some of whom were unfit for the work, was it any wonder that rates of insurance were so high through the St. Lawrence, especially in the fall of the year, say in October and November, when navigation was, it must be conceded, more dangerous than in summer? The system would immediately procure assistance to vessels wrecked or in distress, so that the vessels and their cargoes could, in many instances, be saved, and thereby the main object, which was to reduce the rate of insurance to its minimum would be attained. As might be seen by Mr. Murray's memorandum the Cunard steamers' rates from New York to Liverpool were the lowest, $\frac{1}{4}$ to 3-8 per cent. and other steamers paid by the same route $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., while the first-class sailing vessels never paid more than $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., and wooden ships $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 2 per cent. In the St. Lawrence, the rates were much higher, because the underwriters of a vessel going up the St. Lawrence knew that, if she got wrecked there, she would get little or no help at all, or, perhaps, fall into the hands of persons who would not do their best to save the property. How, then, could the insurance be otherwise than high? We never paid in Canada less than one-half per cent. on steamers, and that in midsummer, and one per cent. on clippers, while in the fall the rate ranged from four per cent. upwards, sometimes even reaching 10 per cent. It was true that the rates on steamers were considerably lower than on sailing vessels, particularly last year. It was the sailing vessels, however, that did the greatest part of the trade of this country. How could a remunerative trade be carried on when we had to pay such high rates. Insurers in every part of this country, and many other persons acquainted with navigation, had stated that the establishment of a telegraphic system would result in materially diminishing the rates of insurance. Something must also be done to keep our route open. The ports of Montreal and Quebec were visited yearly by a diminishing number of vessels, while the number visiting New York was constantly increasing. This was one of the means that could be adopted in order to attract commerce through the St. Lawrence. The telegraph in question would also have the most beneficial results in the development of the fisheries, and would assist materially in enlarging the sphere and usefulness of our meteorological system. In respect to the fisheries, it was true that they required assistance in many ways, but especially in the way of establishing speedy communication between the different fishing coasts on the islands, and on the coast of Labrador, and the trading centres, where the fishing expeditions were served with supplies, that, when the telegraph and signal systems were completed, and worked on all our sea coasts, the products of our fishing industry would increase in a greater degree, while the labour and operations of the fishermen would be rendered, on one side less arduous, and, on the other side, more remunerative. He concluded by citing extracts from a report of Her Majesty's Vice-Consul General at Christiana, on the Cod and Herring Fisheries of Norway, for the year 1866. He was glad the House had adopted the item, and was satisfied the most beneficial results would follow.

MASTERS' AND MATES' CERTIFICATES ACT EXTENSION BILL.

(Mr. Pope, Queen's, P.E.I.)

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

Order for House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to consider a certain resolution respecting certificates to masters and mates of ships, read.

MR. HOLTON said he desired to call the attention of the House to the loose practice they had fallen into in regard to these money resolutions. The rule of Parliament was very clear that a preliminary motion, appointing a day for the consideration of these resolutions, should be made before the House could go into Committee upon them. In only one or two instances this Session, had that wholesome rule been observed. It was a very simple thing to do, but it was, in his opinion, of considerable importance that that rule should be observed. It had never been waived in England, and he did not like to see it departed from here. If they should meet here another year, he should insist on the fulfilment of this rule. In strictness, the Speaker of the House of Commons should not allow a motion of this kind, when this rule had not been observed. They might do almost anything by universal consent, but there were certain cardinal points of parliamentary law, which the Speaker enforced of his own right and duty from the Chair.

House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee.)

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said this resolution required that the first and second mates of vessels should have certificates of service. For some years Canadian ships going to England had been subjected to a great deal of inconvenience because of the mates not having certificates, and in many cases masters and mates had to take on strangers from other ships. In 1878, an Act was passed authorising certificates to be given to the master and first mate. This law had worked exceedingly well, and had saved much trouble and inconvenience to ship-owners. The certificates of our officers obtained here from a Canadian port, were fully recognised at home, and, so far as the master and first mate were concerned, there was now no inconvenience. The intention of this Bill was to authorise the voluntary examination of second mates. Under our law there was no authority for the granting of certificates to second-class mates, and many of our young men who were scarcely fit to pass an examination as first mates, might pass as second mates. It was expected that the revenue would amount to between $500 to $1,000, which would be sufficient to pay the expenses of the Board of Examiners.

Resolution ordered to be reported.

The following Bill was introduced, and read the first and second times:—

DYNAMITE EXPLOSION IN STRATFORD.

REMARKS.

Mr. HESSON said he desired, with the permission of the House, before the Orders of the Day were called, to make a few remarks in reference to a sad occurrence in his own town, and to direct the attention of the Government to the matter. It was well known to the members of the House what he referred to—the explosion of dynamite which occurred the previous morning at the town of Stratford, by which a large amount of property and several valuable lives were lost. He was sure he need only say that an occurrence of that kind might take place at any time, perhaps under more unfavourable circumstances. He was pleased to know they had escaped a much greater calamity than might have befallen them had the explosion taken place some five minutes before, when the express train was passing within a few yards of the scene of the accident. Hon. gentlemen who would take the trouble to read the details would, like himself, be very much affected, and very much concerned for the safety of the public, when they also reflected that a similar disaster might occur at any moment. He thought it would be the duty of this Government, or of any Government, to take such steps as might be deemed necessary for the protection of the lives and the property of the public. This 3,750lb. of nitro-glycerine or dynamite, which exploded, was shipped under the name of blasting powder for Mr. Vanderbilt, or his contractor, for blasting a tunnel at Amherstburg. He thought it was desirable that some provision should be made whereby the transit of such dangerous explosives would be entirely prohibited in the future. He thought it was quite within the power of the Government to make such regulations. He believed the company refused to carry these explosives, if they knew it, and he was of opinion the Government should deal with the matter in the public interest. They could imagine what would be the result of a similar explosion at the Union depot, Toronto, or some more densely populated place. No doubt the company would feel it their duty to ascertain who the parties were who shipped this dangerous matter without the proper precautions. He was sorry to trouble the House with the matter, but he thought it was of such importance that it would not be amiss for the Government to take the matter into their consideration.

Mr. TUPPER said there was no doubt that the subject to which the hon. gentleman had drawn the attention of the House, was one of very grave importance indeed, and the frightful disaster which had occurred showed how much more extensive it might have been if it had been in a different locality, or if it had occurred, as the hon. gentleman had said, a few minutes earlier than it did. The attention of the Government had already been drawn to the matter, and they had satisfied themselves that there would be a thorough investigation into the deception which appeared to have been practised on the railway authorities, who were not aware that they were carrying dynamite. The matter would receive the fullest consideration at the hands of the Government after the investigation took place, and they were satisfied no effort would be lost in endeavouring to ascertain how the deception was practised.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think there is a law already that relates to the subject, if it is only put in force.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that his impression was that it was a penal offence to carry these explosives without notice. If not, it ought to be so.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

THIRD READING.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 74.]

(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On section 7,

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) moved that the clause be amended by adding after the last word, the following: "provided that such appeal shall be from the Court of Queen's Bench only."

Amendment agreed to.

On section 9,

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) moved that the clause be struck out.

Motion agreed to.

On section 12,

MR. GUTHRIE said it was not desirable that they should be deprived of the power to apply to those Judges for a writ of habeas corpus. He did not think that this clause should be passed.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he thought it was hardly necessary to encumber the time of Judges of the Supreme Court with appeals, which were practically appeals from the Ottawa Police Court. In any important case, which was really a habeas corpus matter, a delay of twelve hours to go to Toronto would not be of great consequence. It was not right that Judges of the Supreme Court should sit and listen to objections from the Police Court on warrants of pretended false committals and matters of that kind.

MR. GUTHRIE said that such a view should not be encouraged. The administration of justice, even in a small matter, should not be beneath the dignity of these gentlemen. Cases of extradition might arise, cases of very great importance, in which it would be convenient for parties having counsel at the capital here, to argue the case before one of the Supreme Court Judges.

MR. TASSÉ said this section took away from the Court the jurisdiction which it possessed in cases of habeas corpus. Till now, this jurisdiction had been found most convenient to parties interested in Ottawa and in the surrounding country, and, if it were abolished, whenever a writ of habeas corpus was asked for, it would be necessary to go to Toronto, at great inconvenience and expense, and apply before some Judge there in order to obtain such a writ. In the Province of Quebec, where the judicial power was not centralised as it was in Ontario, such an inconvenience would not be felt by the adoption of this section, but it would be here one of its immediate results, as there were no local Judges to try these cases. The tendency of their legislation had assumed already too much of a centralising character, and such a tendency should not be encouraged any longer. If the Judges of the Supreme Court were overworked, as were the Judges of some other tribunals, the expediency of restricting their jurisdiction to cases strictly appellate might fairly be considered, but no such complaint had been heard from the proper quarter. He could not endorse the contention that it was below the dignity of the Court to take cognisance of such cases. Under the English law the liberty of the subject was considered one of the most important, one of the most sacred things that could be involved in any legal suit or proceeding. In fact, the liberty of the subject was one of the fundamental principles of the English law. This fact was so well recognised that, by the Statutes of Charles and George (31 Charles II, chap. 2 and 56 George III, chap. 100), all the Judges in England, the 'Lord-Chancellor, or any of Her Majesty's Justices of one Bench or the other,' etc., had jurisdiction in such cases. And what was not deemed infra dig. in England ought not to be considered infra dig. in Canada. For these reasons he trusted that the Minister of Justice would find it proper not to suppress the jurisdiction at present enjoyed by the Judges of the Supreme Court in matters relating to the habeas corpus, which was so important and so essential to the liberty of the subject.

MR. HOLTON said why should these gentlemen be exempt from a duty of that kind, the highest duty that fell to a Judge—the duty of protecting the rights and liberties of the subject? The highest Judges in England discharged that duty. All the Common Law Judges, from the Chief Justice downwards, sat in habeas corpus cases, and, according to the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Tassé), the Lord Chancellor also performed that duty. He could not see why this clause should be inserted. He understood this Bill was drawn up by the Judges of the Supreme Court, and offered to the Minister of Justice to be presented to Parliament for adoption. He was opposed to those Judges being relieved of this duty.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said the only object of this clause was to relieve the Supreme Court of a jurisdiction which was of no earthly advantage to anyone, except that it made it, as he was instructed and believed, a mere Court of Appeal from the Police Court. He believed that any invasion of the liberty of the subject could be remedied perfectly and regularly as before, without falling upon the Judges of the Supreme Court, and that it was well to relieve them of that duty. However, on the objection of any hon. member of this House, he would not insist upon the clause being adopted, but would withdraw it.

Section withdrawn.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said that the only remaining clause was that fixing the terms of the Court. He desired to fix the terms as follows:—The second Tuesday of February, the last Tuesday of May, and the third Tuesday of October, which he understood the Judges had approved of. The distribution of the time had been made with a view to the convenience of the Judges. The difficulty, on the other hand, was with the members of the Ontario Bar, who desired to fix times more convenient to themselves in attending the Assizes and other Provincial Courts. While very anxious to meet the views of every member of the Bar, he thought that the convenience of the Supreme Court ought to be a paramount consideration. He had a statement from one of the Judges of that Court in favour of the proposal submitted in that clause, and who best understood the requirements of the Court with a view to its convenience. He was sure that every member of the Bar would agree to submit his convenience to that of the Supreme Court.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) said that this matter had been considered very fully by leading members of the Bars of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. With regard to the first hearing term beginning on the second Tuesday in February, every member from Ontario knew that that was the beginning of the second week of Hilary term. The fixing of that day was a very unfortunate matter, it being highly important that lawyers from Ontario and other Provinces should be allowed to attend to their own cases in the Supreme Court, if they could, which, with this proposal of the Minister of Justice, would not be possible, so far as Ontario was concerned, as then the leading members of its Bar would be all very much engaged. He could not understand why it would not be just as convenient for the Government to fix a date more suitable to the Ontario Bar. The letter read by the Minister of Justice showed no great objection to the third Tuesday, although the second was suggested. Certainly no more inconvenient time for the Ontario Bar could be chosen. With regard to the June term, he believed that, after a consultation with one of the Judges, it was agreed they would put up with any inconvenience of their own to meet the views of the Court, by holding a session on the first Tuesday, although that term also came within the Easter term in Ontario. With regard to the October term, he understood that the fourth Tuesday would suit the Judges, and the leading members of the Bars from Ontario could hardly attend before that day, and even that interfered very much with the Assizes. He hoped that the Minister of Justice would consider not only the convenience of the Bar in this matter, but that it was of great importance to the suitors that the counsel who conducted their cases through the lower Courts should be able to attend to them in the Supreme Court. He hoped that the Minister of Justice would accede to the request of the members of the Bar, who had agreed with the Judges in that matter.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said that, if the Judges would consent, he should be delighted. He had fixed the dates after consultation with one of the Judges representing, as he understood, the ideas of his brethren; but, if they agreed with the lawyers on a change, he had nothing to say.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) said that he had not consulted with the Judges, but the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) had, and he had informed him that the days suggested by him (Mr. Robertson) were satisfactory to the Judges. Mr. Weldon informed him that he had consulted with the Chief Justice, and that those days were satisfactory to him. That clause unamended would cause a great deal of dissatisfaction.

Section agreed to.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he had an amendment to submit with reference to the inscription of appeals for hearing by the Registrar of the Court, those from the Maritime Provinces, Quebec and Ontario respectively having to be set down separately, so that gentlemen from any Province might know approximately when their cases should come on for argument.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

Amendments read the first and second times, and agreed to.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) moved the third reading of the Bill.

MR. CASGRAIN said he would like the Minister of Justice to reconsider his decision as to the right of appeal. He thought he would, on second sober thought, leave it alone.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he did not think they need discuss the matter again. He had considered it already.

MR. HOLTON said that, as a mere matter of courtesy to private members, a Bill of such importance ought not to take so many stages the same night, and particularly if any considerable number desired to understand the precise effect of the amendments made. He did not think there could be any objection to the taking of the final stage to-morrow.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said that, if there were any difficulties in the amendments, he would consent to delay as a matter of courtesy. But his hon. friend and himself had discussed the only amendment on which discussion was desired, with reference to the question of appeal in election cases. He thought the House fully understood the question, and he did not think his hon. friend from Chateauguay should ask him, as a mere matter of courtesy, to delay the passage of the Bill for another day, since the House already understood it so well.

MR. HOLTON said his hon. friend had already carried the Bill one stage by courtesy—the concurrence in the amendments made in Committee. They had given three or four stages to a great number of Government Bills in the course of the same sitting; but in this case some hon. gentlemen would like to see the Bill in its complete form before sending it to the Senate.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he understood the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland objected to only one clause. The question was whether an appeal ought to lay in election cases on preliminary objections. It seemed to him that there could be no question, whatever, on that point. This Bill made no new law in elections; it did not provide any new rights, whatever; it only provided a mode of ascertaining by means of the highest tribunal in the country what the law of the land was.

SIR A. J. SMITH said he objected that a law should be passed with a retroactive operation, so as to change the rights of parties, and expose them to further litigation. This was a subject of considerable importance, and he had understood from the hon. the Minister of Justice that they would have a full opportunity of considering this Bill in its various phases, to-morrow.

MR. McDONALD said, although it was so late in the Session, he would allow the Bill to stand over, in order that the hon. member should feel that no injustice had been done him.

MR. McDONALD.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. KIRKPATRICK said the object of this Bill was to limit the jurisdiction of the Maritime Court of Ontario, so that the right given by the Act constituting that Court should not be applicable to cases where mortgages existed at the time the Act came into force; that was to say, that rights that had accrued before that Act came into force should not be affected. Everyone would admit that this Act should not have a retroactive effect. The second clause of this Act also changed the law with regard to mortgages; it said that they should be cut out in certain cases, that certain claims should have priority to mortgages, that no right or remedy given by the said Act should apply against vessels where mortgages had been given in cases of towage or claims for damage by collision. Under the law as it stood at present, any claim for towage, for damage by collision, for seamen's wages, or for salvage, should have priority even of mortgages that had been given. It was considered by a great number of vessel-owners throughout Ontario that this was an injustice, and they had difficulty to borrow money on their vessels, because the law cut out mortgages. Persons building ships could not raise money on them to go on with their industry in consequence of the uncertainty in which their mortgages were placed. Large vessel-owners had represented this matter to the Government, and this clause was to provide that mortgages should only be cut out by claims for wages and for salvage. There were a great many vessels plying in the inland waters of Ontario that were registered in the port of Montreal. In former years all vessels trading on the upper lakes were registered under the Merchant Shipping Act generally at Montreal, and, consequently, a large number of the vessels navigating the Inland waters of Ontario were registered at that port. The original Act contained the clause making it apply to vessels registered in Ontario and Quebec, and, therefore, he thought that the words at the end of this clause should be amended, so as to read: "Shall be enforced as against any bonâ fide mortgagee, whose mortgage is duly executed and registered in a port of either the Province of Ontario or Quebec.

SIR A. J. SMITH said this Act would not apply to the Lower Provinces, but, as it was limited to the Province of Ontario, he could see no objection to it.

SELKIRK ELECTION.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) said he rose to a question of privilege. He had noticed in a Ministerial paper of this city the report of a matter with regard to the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Campan) reflecting on himself (Mr. Smith) as a member of this House, in connection with a recount of the ballots cast in the election for Selkirk. The inference to be drawn from the statement of the paragraph was that he had benefitted a Judge of that Court by giving him money to a large extent on a property—more than its worth. It had, he believed, been said that Judge Betournay, who was universally respected, had insisted on obtaining from himself (Mr. Smith) or agent the large sum spoken of, $10,000 or $15,000; but, on the whole, he had only $4,000 on a mortgage, not from him individually, but from his agent, who had acted in this case, as in every other with which he had been connected in Manitoba, simply as his agent to invest moneys, and in most cases without his personal knowledge. In many cases he did not know the parties dealt with or sums handled. The particular transactions spoken of in this instance took place in August, 1874, when his agent, Mr. Blanchard, a barrister of Winnipeg, was put in charge of his (Mr. Smith's) personal affairs in Manitoba, and who had invested for him to a considerable extent, on his belief that the security given was ample. That sum of $4,000 was loaned to Judge Betournay on property said to be worth $8,000 or $10,000. More than that, not a penny had Judge Betournay received from him. So the case was very different, indeed, from what it was made to appear before the House and country. Since that time he had had no knowledge whatever of the transaction. Accounts had been rendered to him of this and other matters, but, with regard to anything in the shape of a mortgage, he had never learned anything. He was determined he should be free from suspicion. In this, as in every other case in which he had done business in the North-West, it was purely a business transaction. There could be no question, whatever, that the property was worth two or three times the money placed on it. Consequently, it would be seen that Judge Betournay, very far from being indebted to him to the extent of all his personal and moveable property, as was said or inferred, might, at any moment, transfer his mortgage to parties who would have been very glad to take it up as a business transaction. He disliked very much to come before the House on any personal matter, and for his own sake would not have spoken. He had shown he had cared very little for what might have been said against him in the public press; but, when they knew that the reputation of a Judge depended so much on the estimation in which he was held by the people, he believed that it was his duty to come forward and vindicate the Judge reflected upon in that journal.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said it was with some reluctance that he again re-opened the discussion on this subject, after it had continued for nearly a month on the floor of the House, but as this was, to all intents and purposes, the last opportunity they would have of making any comments on the revolutionary legislation contained in this measure, he desired, before it to finally left their hands, to call attention a few points which, it appeared to him, might not unprofitably be discussed. When this measure was first introduced to their notice, it was only possible to scan rather cursorily what appeared to be its real tendency. Since that time they had had an opportunity of sifting it in detail, and he was bound to say now, after two months of exceedingly careful consideration, all those fears which he expressed, appeared likely to be even sooner realised than he had then anticipated. They had now, as far as legislative enactment could do it, committed themselves to the theory that the Dominion of Canada, being very largely a maritime country, and having a very large interest in everything which could promote the free exchange of commodities between one country and another, could best do that by reducing the total volume of its trade with other nations; that, seeing we had a very large tract of unoccupied country, which it was very important for us to settle, and on success in settling which the whole future of this country largely depended, they had solemnly declared, by way of encouraging settlers, that henceforth it was better that we should manufacture bad goods, or indifferent goods, at a dear rate, rather than purchase excellent goods cheaply where we best could. Having expended enormous sums of money for the purpose of facilitating and cheapening transportation, they had now decided that we could best attain this object by inflicting heavy penalties on those who desired to use the great highways they had provided. He must say the morality of the transaction appeared to be quite on a par with the wisdom of the theory he had adverted to. Here in Canada, for the first time in its history, they had formally decided that was no sort of objection to the imposition of any tax, that it would work the grossest injustice, not only to special classes, but even to whole Provinces of our Confederation. He felt convinced that the battle on this question, which took place last September, was fought in the dark, and, although it was true enough, as stated by the hon. gentleman opposite, that the contest was between a revenue and Protective tariff, still he knew right well that, had the tariff now submitted been then presented to the people of Canada, the result would have been entirely different as to the duration of this duel between legislative enactment on the one side, and the laws of truth and nature on the other side; he would say that, accidents apart, he believed it would be of much longer duration than most persons supposed. Knowing, as he could not fail to know, that the tariff would, of necessity, for years to come, press with extreme vigour upon the population of many Provinces, he was satisfied there were many conditions likely to bring about an end to this state of things, even sooner than might be supposed. He entirely denied that there was any fair analogy between the condition of things in Canada and in the United States, and those gentlemen who expected the success of this experiment from the temporary success that attended a similiar tariff in the United States, would do well to remember that in that country there existed the actual fact of Free-trade over almost half a continent between twenty or thirty powerful States, many of which were as populous as the whole Dominion. Now, they had been told by many gentlemen opposite that so clearly was the will of the people expressed, so overwhelming was the decision at the polls, in favour of a Protective tariff, that it was presumptuous for them to oppose their opinion to that of the great majority of the people of Canada. He denied entirely the existence of any great majority of the people in favour of this tariff. He repeated that this battle was fought in the dark, this victory was obtained under false pretences, and the result shown by the election returns, which were lately placed on the table of the House, established conclusively that the great alleged majority was an utter delusion. These returns showed that of a total of 485,000 votes polled, in the contested elections throughout the Dominion, there were cast in favour of the Protective tariff 254,000, and against it 231,000; in other words, if we had at this moment in Canada a system of proportionate representation, the great majority of 80 in this House to which these hon. gentlemen appealed, would have shrunk to a genuine majority of eight. If they looked at Ontario, they would find that out of about 30 seats carried against the Government of his hon. friend, the total aggregate majority in these 30 constituencies was barely 1,162 votes; and in 82 constituencies in Ontario, excluding two large cities, the total aggregate majority in favour of this tariff, by actual count, was barely 3,150. Now, he was not going to deny that a wave of public opinion did set strongly in in favour of a Protective tariff, but he called the attention of the House to the fact that these returns showed how very slight was the majority in favour of this policy, and how very unsubstantial, indeed, was the ground upon which a great public majority and a decided expression of public will had been claimed in favour of a tariff which the people never saw and which, he dared to say, no man believed would ever be brought down. He wished to call the attention of the House also to the fact that all through this discussion no answer had been given to the facts brought forward by his hon. friend the late Minister of Customs (Mr. Burpee), when he showed conclusively that by the application of the existing tariff to the importations for the year 1877-78, a total tax exceeding $7,000,000 a year would thereby be placed on the people of Canada for the purpose of making up in part an imaginary deficit of about $2,000,000. Nor could this be answered, because, if they took the statements of the hon. the Minister of Finance, it followed that, as he expected, to prohibit the importation of a large amount of duty paying goods, the people would have to pay, in the shape of additional taxation on these goods, a largely increased sum, which would go for the benefit of certain manufacturers, which, at the same time, in addition to the $2,000,000, he would have to provide for the whole loss of revenue caused by the prohibition of the importation of these goods. But what he chiefly desired to call attention to, was the utter failure, on the hon. gentleman's own showing, of the one thing which, more than anything else, contributed to induce the people to consent to this tariff being carried into operation. Everybody who knew anything at all of the mode in which that contest was conducted was well aware that the agriculturists and the workmen were induced to support the proposition for additional taxation by these two arguments—first, that they would get better prices for their products, a thing which they were all beginning to perceive was a mere delusion; and, in the next place that a large home market would be provided by the number of persons to be given employment in the various industries about to be created. He wanted to call the attention of the House to the way in which, according to the statements of the hon. gentleman himself, these promises were likely to be fulfilled. They knew now what the possibilities were which he expected, and what was the utmost number of men likely to be employed. Making a careful estimate of all who were likely to be employed by reason of this tariff, if they manufactured all the goods the hon. gentleman expected, they would be able to give employment to about 1,000 additional hands in the manufacture of cotton; 1,200 in the manufacture of woollen goods; at a large allowance, 1,000 in the manufacture of iron wares; 500 in coal; 500 in sugar; and in various miscellaneous occupations perhaps 1,200 more. If the hon. gentleman was correct in his estimates, between 5,000 and 6,000 hands were about the total number of persons to whom there was any reasonable prospect of giving employment by reason of factories which would be brought into operation under the tariff. If they looked to those who would be injured by the operation of this tariff, what would they find? First of all, they found in the occupation of lumbermen and in saw-mills, 45,620 men; as fishermen, about 18,362; common carriers or railway employes, 2,700; blacksmiths, 15,000; carpenters, 32,000; printers, 2,700; shipwrights, 6,000; seamen 16,000. Now, there had been no sort of pretence set forward that any of these men would be benefitted in the slightest degree by the tariff. On the other hand, it had been shown conclusively by gentlemen conversant with those industries, that while they might possibly give employment to 5,000 or 6,000 people additional, this tariff would, in fact, work a serious injury on some of the most important industries in this country, employing, at the last Census, at least, 142,000 full-grown men. That was a fair indication of the relative percentage of loss and gain to the whole people of Canada under the operation of this tariff. Why, if all the hon. gentleman claimed was wrought out, and if he did give employment to all these people, the closing of half-a-dozen great lumbering establishments more than destroyed all the possible advantages to be derived from the home market professed to be established. He saw nothing, at the moment, of the fact that in order to do this they could not diminish the purchasing power of the whole 4,000,000 people of Canada. Just so much more as the people of Canada had to pay for their sugar, or iron, or coal, or cotton, or woollen goods, just so much less would they have to expend in the purchase of agricultural implements, and in the purchase of all those articles which had been hitherto successfully manufactured under the tariff which then prevailed. Now, he wanted to call attention to one point especially, in connection with this tariff, and that was the enormous taxation it would impose on the whole agricultural population of Canada in comparison with the utterly insignificant return, which, on the showing of the hon. gentleman himself, they could hope to obtain. But before going on to that, he might say that, although he believed there were not a few industries, which might be profitably enough conducted in Canada, he believed that there were many industries which it was physically impossible for them to conduct advantageously here as they could be conducted in other countries. He said this not because he thought there was any inferiority on the part of the people of Canada, but because he recognized the situation in which they were placed. He said that because the physical and geographical conditions in which they were placed, offered a serious impediment to the carrying on of certain industries successfully. For a long time to come the cost of capital in Canada would be considerably greater than in many other countries; and, in addition to that, being only a population of some 4,000,000 or 5,000,000, and not likely to increase with great rapidity, they could not, for a long time to come, hope to have as large a market as was necessary, in order to manufacture many articles cheaply. Therefore, it was impossible for them to compete successfully with the manufacturers of other countries in certain branches of trade. He did not say that these obstacles were irremediable, but it was not likely that a great many would be removed for generations to come. He desired next to consider how the taxation was likely to affect the agricultural community. Of course, to a very great extent, they must share the right of any taxation which is imposed on the people of this country; but, when they considered how any policy was going to affect the Dominion it was a very grave question, indeed, how it would affect the agricultural class, for the simple reason that in all probability, at least, three-fourths of the adult male population of this country were engaged in agriculture. If they supposed that the proportions had remained unaltered since the last Census, they found then that out of an aggregate male population of about 700,000 strong, over 476,000 were reported as farmers, while a large proportion of the 124,000 set down as day labourers were undoubtedly engaged likewise in agriculture. A consideration of that fact alone would serve to show conclusively how very grave an objection it would be if it could be shown that the operation of this tariff was going to press most unfairly on the agricultural population in the Province of Ontario, where 226,000 farmers and 62,000 labourers, mostly employed on farms, used to reside. He had caused careful examination to be made into the practical working of this tariff on the farmers of that Province. He did not base his calculations in this matter on mere hearsay evidence or mere idle assumption. Within the last two months he had received a number of detailed accounts from traders in various parts of the country, who had been in the habit of dealing with farmers resident in the neighbourhood, and from these returns, which represented the transactions of farmers, not of large, but of ordinary means, he found that the total amount of dry goods, hardware and groceries, likely to be purchased by an average family, would amount to $250 or $300 a year. In certain sections of the country it was a common thing for farmers to spend in hardware, exclusive of agricultural implements, from $80 to $82 a year, and their accounts of dry goods ranged all the way from $100 to $500. Those who knew the state of well-being in which the farmers of Ontario were living, would admit that his estimate was a moderate one. By a careful examination he found that the average increase of duty on these articles which the farmers chiefly consumed, was 12 per cent., in other words, that under this tariff the great majority of the farmers of Canada, or of Ontario at any rate, in moderately comfortable circumstances, would be taxed to the extent of $25 or $30 per family. Was there any reasonable possibility of any advantage being gained in return for this? Were it possible to create a large number of home consumers something might be said, but they had seen how utterly idle that expectation was. For his own part, he believed that the losses inflicted on the class he had referred to, would so seriously diminish their powers of consumption as to so far equal any trifling advantage that might arise to them from having 5,000 or 6,000 additional consumers to provide for. What were the direct benefits the farmer was to receive? No man who had listened to the discussion on this question would maintain, particularly after the announcement made by the First Minister, that whenever a time of necessity arose he was prepared to abandon the duty on breadstuffs. No man would maintain that there was the slightest possible advantage to the farmer in the duties imposed on wheat, barley, peas, or any article of that description. There were but two articles, Indian corn and oats, out of the duty on which any possible advantage could arise. He did not himself believe that would be the case, because it was perfectly clear to him that the effect of the duty on Indian corn, at any rate, would be to take the money out of the pockets of a very large number of farmers, rather than to give any advantage to them as a class; but, for argument sake, he would take the statement of the hon. gentleman himself, that he expected to diminish the importation of Indian corn by 1,500,000 bushels. He would suppose that the 7½c. proposed to be levied on this quantity would, by some extraordinary hocus pocus, benefit the farmers of this Dominion, although it was notorious that the distillers would not abandon the use of Indian corn, and that the whole weight of this tax must fall on those farmers who were in the habit of purchasing corn for the improvement of their stock. But, granting, for argument sake, that, from this source and from the duty on oats, some advantage might be derived, to what did it amount? Eight hundred or nine hundred thousand bushels of oats were the total quantity that could be affected by this tax, because it was not pretended that the tax on oats, which they imported for the purpose of exporting in oatmeal, could in any way benefit the farmer. They, therefore, obtained this result: that, whereas the farmers of Canada were likely to be taxed to the extent of at least $25 or $30 per family, they might possibly get the benefit of the increased duty, amounting to about $180,000, divided among 476,000. In other words, when they lost $25 or $30, they might, peradventure, gain 30c. or 40c. apiece. He thought that was a very fair illustration of the mode in which this tariff was likely to benefit that class which contributed most, and was always likely to contribute most to the revenue of this Dominion. The hon. gentleman had forced another subject upon the attention of the House, by causing or permitting to be published in the English newspapers, a copy of the communications which were yesterday, for the first time, submitted to the House. In looking over these papers, which he must necessarily treat as being communications of the Minister of Finance, he could not but regret the mode in which the hon. gentleman had thought fit to parade his views before the English people. He would not say that the statements which he had made were false, but he would say this, that though the hon. gentleman might have told the truth, he had been very far indeed from telling the whole truth. All through these papers there ran a delusive meaning, anything but creditable to that hon. gentleman, and which he would hardly have resorted to, unless he had believed, perhaps, with too much truth, that very little was known on the other side of the Atlantic of the position of the finances in Canada. He defied any man to take up this memorandum and read the account of the several deficits which occurred from the years 1875 to 1878, without being brought to the conclusion that, in all probability, by reason of these deficits, the debt of Canada had been increased by about $4,500,000. Now what were the real and actual facts? The hon. gentleman, when he put into the mouth of His Excellency this statement, knew perfectly well that in 1874-75 $555,000 was applied to the Sinking Fund for the reduction of the public debt; that in 1875-76, $832,000 was similarly applied; in 1876-77, $328,000, and in 1877-78, $945,000. He also knew that the actual result was, that in four years, beginning 1st July, 1874, and terminating 1st July, 1878, so far from there having been $4,500,000 added to the net debt of Canada, after they deducted these sums which were applied to the Sinking Fund, and the surplus for the year 1874-75, the actual deficit over these four years amounted to barely $400,000. If they went back to 1873, and took the amount paid into the Sinking Fund and the surplus of that year, they would find that in these five years, beginning 1st July, 1873, and terminating 1st July, 1878, so far from these deficits having caused an increase in the net debt of Canada, the net debt of Canada was diminished by $1,000,000; and, bearing in mind the condition of the country during the last few years, it was absurd to parade the fact that there was, in the last four years, a total addition to our net debt of $400,000, as any cause for serious alarm, much less for the total revolution in our fiscal policy. In a paper like this, he thought it would have been wise and proper to have called the attention of the English public and the English Government to the notorious fact that, during these three years, there was an unprecedented shrinkage in the value of those commodities on which our revenue chiefly depended, a shrinkage more remarkable than any that had occurred for perhaps more than thirty years. Passing by that fact, he said it was not quite correct for the hon. gentleman to talk about the amount of our debt to be redeemed, which he put down in 1885 at $32,467,000, and not to add that that debt was redeemable entirely at our own pleasure. It was a still more disingenuous statement, a statement which he regretted to see in any memorandum signed by the Canadian Minister of Finance and submitted to Her Majesty's Government, to find such an explanation given of the relative effect of this tariff on our exports and imports as between Canada and the United States and Canada and Great Britain. The very largest item which the hon. gentleman paraded as a proof of the alleged fact that this tariff discriminated against the United States consisted of $13,300,000 worth of breadstuffs. Now, the hon. gentleman ought, in common honesty, to have told Her Majesty's Government that of that $13,300,000 to which he referred, probably quite $11,000,000 worth were goods merely passing through Canada in transitu, which would not be affected, which he did not intend should be affected, which he hoped could not possibly be affected, by the operation of this tariff. If this document were honoured by the English press or Government with anything like a critical scrutiny, and if that fact were brought to their notice, the impression produced on their minds could not fail to be most unfavourable, not only to the hon. gentleman, but to the whole course of the discussion on this subject in Canada. It remained as a disgrace to a paper, even dated from the Department of Finance, that in this, by far the most important item in this list, the material fact necessary to guide Her Majesty's Government, in forming an opinion on this tariff, was entirely omitted. It was not necessary to call the attention of the House to the fact, that, while a great deal had been said of the enormous preponderance of imports from the United States, our exports to that country had been absolutely kept out of sight, that of that import of $48,000,000, probably $11,000,000 was simply bought by us for the purpose of selling again, or passed absolutely, entirely in transitu through our country, while of the other articles that we imported from the United States, a very large proportion was hides or wool, or other articles which simply passed through the United States in transitu for the benefit of our manufacturers. When we came, on the other hand, to deduct from our exports to England the eleven millions or thereabouts which were bona fide American goods, we found as a result that the actual trade between England and Canada and between Canada and the United States, when it was critically analysed, was almost precisely carried on on the same footing with England as it was with the United States. It would have been more honest and more consonant with the dignity of his position for the hon. gentleman to have told the English Cabinet, as some of his organs had done, that it was no concern of theirs, that he was going to regulate this tariff as he thought best for the interests of Canada without paying regard to how it affected the interests of the English people. What he had done could not possibly have good effect, but might, on the other hand, go far to deepen the bad feeling which, as almost every English newspaper showed, had been created in the minds of a very large portion of the people of England with respect to the legislation which had just enacted. Although he could not hope to influence, in any shape, the votes of hon. gentlemen opposite, it was well that the people should be informed as to the views of the ultimate results of this policy, held by persons on the other side of the border. There had been lately placed in his hands a complimentary notice from the Industrial League of the United States, to which he would beg to call the attention of the House:—

“Of a totally different nature is the aspect of our commercial relations with our neighbours on the north, where we see with interest that Canada in her turn is giving her adhesion to the policy of furthering home industries. It must be admitted, however, that the smallness of her population, of her home markets, the exclusively northern character of her productions, in contrast with the almost unlimited variety of ours, and the immense extent and expensiveness of her Customs line, render her an unfavourable subject for a separate experiment. A commercial union with the continent of which geographically she is a part, and with which she is connected by identity of race, would afford her large and unrestricted markets, free participation, perhaps, in our coasting trade, with other commercial advantages too numerous to specify, and, at the same time, give her the needful protection against that European competition from which her rising industries have most to fear. It would, in fact, afford to her what we already enjoy—all the practical advantages of both Free-trade and Protection. Obviously, no policy of tariff legislation hostile to the United States can long be sustained in Canada, since her chief markets for barley, lumber, fish, and other products, as well as her indispensable access to the sea across our territory, can be cut off at pleasure, whenever her tariff policy shall have become sufficiently annoying to provoke retaliatory legislation from our Government."

He (Mr. Cartwright) did not mean to say that the hon. gentleman was bound to regulate his policy according to the dictates of gentlemen on the other side of the line, but it would be worth his while to consider whether there was not some considerable amount of common sense and truth in the remarks which he had just read, coming from a source very decidedly favourable to the policy of the hon. gentleman. The Government had chosen to take up what would very shortly be the cast off clothes of the people of the United States. They had brought in a shallow and ignorant copy of a shallow and ignorant policy, the only excuse for which was that the people of the United States, rent and distracted by a great civil war, were for the moment at the mercy of a number of men who preferred their own selfish interests to the real welfare of their country; and they, with far less advantages in the race, were about to compete with them in an experiment which the ablest of their own advisers had pronounced and proved to be a decided failure; at anyrate, as far as the welfare of the great mass of the population was concerned. As far as the Opposition was concerned, they had done their duty sufficiently in this matter. They could not be accused of having neglected to give sufficient warning against the policy which had been forced on the people. In conclusion, he would advise his hon. friends behind him, during the succeeding year or two, to devote themselves in their constituencies as they had done on the floor of this House, to sift out in minute detail the policy from end to end, and they would speedily succeed in obtaining innumerable instances of the folly which disfigured every line of it, and in all probability, within a short time, they would see the people of Canada once more returned to a right mind, and convinced that it was utterly absurd to attempt to enrich themselves by doubling and trebling the taxation of the people of this country.

MR. TILLEY said the hon. member who had just taken his seat thought it advisable to read him (Mr. Tilley) a lecture as to what he considered to be the proper course that should have been pursued by him in the preparation of the memorandum submitted for the consideration of His Excellency the Governor-General. The hon. gentleman said it was not a false statement, but that it did not contain the whole truth. Had any other hon. member of the Opposition taken him to task on a question of this kind, he would have listened with interest, and have been, perhaps, improved by the suggestions which might have been made or criticisms offered, but if there was an hon. gentleman on that side of the House who should have been the last to have undertaken to point out to him what he should have written or prepared, as he said, for the press of England, with reference to the financial conditions of this Dominion, it was that hon. gentleman who had been brazen-faced enough to rise and admit, before the people of this Dominion, that he, in asking for a loan of money from the people of England, presented to them the silver side of the shield, and presented, when he came back to Canada, the brazen side of the shield, to influence the position of the Opposition of that day. The hon. member said this was prepared for the press of Great Britain. It was not prepared for the press of Great Britain; but there had been a great deal said of late in this House, with reference to the opinion of the English press, and he (Mr. Tilley) recollected, on more than one occasion, that the hon. member quoted, with a great deal of feeling and emphasis, an editorial or two that appeared in the London Times, as expressive of the opinion of the people of England, with reference to the tariff and policy of the Government, and as to his course as Minister of Finance. He (Mr. Tilley) then said that if it was an editorial, it was written by an emissary of the hon. gentleman opposite. It turned out to be the fact that it was not an editorial, and he would venture to say the hon. gentleman opposite could point to the man who wrote that article. He could quite understand that the English people and manufacturers, when they were imposing additional duty on coarse woollens, upon certain descriptions of cottons of that country, would say this interfered with their trade, inasmuch as it would transfer the manufacture of these articles from England to Canada; but it was remarkable that, in that article quoted by the hon. gentleman, his (Mr. Tilley's) course in permitting the moneys received into the Treasury to be paid into the respective banks on which the cheques were drawn, irrespective of any political influence, was referred to. On the face of it, it was a political—

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Does the hon. gentleman say it was not an editorial?

MR. TILLEY: I understand it was a communication.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Here it is; an editorial of the plainest character.

MR. TILLEY said then that editorial was inspired by some person with the authority of the Opposition.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Give your proof.

MR. TILLEY said he looked to the hon. gentleman for that. He could, no doubt, give evidence.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: The hon. gentleman refers to me for proof. I know nothing about who wrote it, and had nothing to do with inspiring it, further than the communicating my speech may have done.

MR. TILLEY said he knew that responsible governments were supposed to be responsible for despatches written by Governors-General, but here the hon. member called attention to a despatch of the Governor-General, and questioned the accuracy of its statements with reference to the deficits in the last four years. He did not say these statements were not correct, but that he (Mr. Tilley) should not have put in the Governor-General's mouth that there were certain liabilities falling due at certain periods, and he referred particularly to the $35,000,000 due at a certain date, and said this was redeemable, or not, according to the will of the Government. He stated, that if we would take into account the Sinking Fund, that would be largely reduced. Was not the Sinking Fund one of the liabilities of this Dominion? Had it not to be provided for, not by vote of Parliament every year, but by Statute? It was the first charge upon our Treasury. The hon. gentleman had stated, year after year, from 1874 until he resigned, that there were certain fixed charges upon the Treasury of the Dominion, and this was one of them, which amounted to $10,000,000 or $11,000,000, and sought to justify the large expenditure which took place under his Administration, on the ground of having to provide for this uncontrollable expenditure. He (Mr. Tilley) had never seen one word or letter of that despatch until it was put into his hands as a despatch to be submitted to this House.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman does not mean, solemnly, to tell us he is not responsible.

MR. TILLEY: Certainly, constitutionally. But the hon. gentleman said I put words into His Excellency's mouth. I am prepared to take every responsibility.

MR. MACKENZIE: You have no right to say you never saw it.

MR. TILLEY said he had a right to say so. He had stated at the outset that, constitutionally, the Government was responsible for this despatch. The hon. gentleman was endeavouring to make a point. We had had nearly a month's discussion on this tariff, and he doubted if they would have had this speech from the hon. gentleman, if it were not for the approaching elections in Ontario. A large portion of the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Cartwright's) speech was directed to the farmers of Ontario. He (Mr. Tilley) would not say why it was, that the hon. gentleman was so solicitous for the interests of Ontario. Perhaps it was because it was the Province he more especially represented. But why he selected the farmers of that Province especially to prove his points, he (Mr. Tilley) could not well see. The hon. gentleman endeavoured to produce an effect upon the farmers, also upon the lumbering and shipping interests of the Maritime Provinces, in reference to the increased taxation imposed upon them. Why had he not endeavoured to make it as apparent as possible that the Government were not responsible, that this taxation was absolutely necessary, that the Government were not asking one dollar more than the late Government engaged to extend during the current year? Looking at the Estimates submitted, could the hon. gentleman deny that? It would be found that the expenditure proposed to be made next year was considerably below what would be expended during the current year? And still the hon. gentleman endeavoured to impress upon the farmers of Ontario and the lumbermen of the Province, that the present Administration were imposing additional burdens upon them. They simply asked the people to contribute the same sum of money which the hon. member asked to be collected; and to make up the deficiency of $2,400,000. That was the position, and yet the hon. gentleman endeavoured to impress upon the farmers of Ontario and the people generally throughout the Dominion, that the Government of the day were responsible for this taxation which was necessarily imposed upon them. Such was not the case. He took exception to the arguments of the hon. gentleman, which referred more particularly to the farmers. He held the position of the farmers was just the opposite to what the hon. gentleman had endeavoured to prove. He held that the whole of the farmers, whether they were wealthy, in easy circumstances, or poor, did not pay in the same proportion to the revenue that the residents of cities did. That was conviction. Under the operation of this tariff was the grocer's bill increased? Did the hon. gentleman mean to say that the cost of tea had been increased? Had they increased the cost of tobacco? On the contrary, the cost was something like six cents a pound less than before. Had they increased the cost of sugar and molasses? On the contrary, they had reduced the taxation upon them, and they were the articles mainly bought by the farmers from the grocers. Then, it was known that the farmers, especially in the Maritime Provinces, wove the woollen cloth they used. He did not hesitate to say that, in his judgment, taking the means they had at their disposal, that the farmer would contribute less in proportion to their wealth and circumstances of the additional taxation than the residents of cities. He believed that as a whole they would pay a smaller proportion in proportion to their wealth and number than would the shipbuilder or the manufacturer. Hundreds and thousands of men were now employed, and many were working on full time, who had been previously working on half time, or were out of employment previous to the 13th of March. This was demonstrated beyond a doubt. And would it be said that the farmers, who were supplying those men, and brought the produce into the market, would not sell it more readily, and in many cases obtain better prices, now that they were working on full time and at high wages? Why, they found that even now men were demanding increased wages, and that strikes were going on in Montreal and elsewhere. Would hon. gentleman opposite say that farmers, suppose they had no other direct benefit or encouragement than the home market, in the towns or cities to which they were in the habit of taking their produce, were not directly protected apart from anything else given them under the operation of this tariff? Certainly it would be so. And, further, the farmers did not consume as much wine and spirits, on which the taxation was increased, as the residents of a town. He took, for instance, the Province he represented, where there were counties in which there had not been a licensed tavern for years. In one-third of the Province wine or spirits could not be obtained, and were they to believe that the farmers consumed as much intoxicating beverages as was consumed in the cities? No. The feeling of the House, he was satisfied, would not support such an assertion. When his hon. friend endeavored in this manner to influence the farmers of Ontario, it might be that he thought they would see through his eyes. He (Mr. Cartwright) was excedingly anxious to convince them that under the operation of this tariff they were to be ground down to the dust, and that they would be taxed exorbitantly without any compensation. The House had heard statements of various kinds. One gentleman said that the imposition of these duties was going to increase the cost of certain articles, whilst another hon. gentleman said they would do nothing of the kind, in fact, that they would amount to nothing. He was satisfied that the statement that a taxation of seven millions additional was to be imposed upon the people for the purpose of getting an additional $2,000,000, could not be shown, or worked out in figures.

MR. CARTWRIGHT : It was shown.

MR. TILLEY said such a statement would be accepted should those who made it prove that the price of articles would be increased to the full extent of the duties, and that could not be proved. It had been said that this tariff was an imitation of the 35 per cent. tariff. In reply to that, he would just point to the fact that the tariff of last year was a 13 $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. tariff on the whole imports, and that the tariff that would become law soon would be about 16 per cent. on the whole imports of the Dominion.

MR. MACKENZIE : Embracing the free goods ?

MR. TILLEY : Exactly. Admitting the free goods. The hon. gentleman said that the increase would be 12 per cent.

MR. CARTWRIGHT : So it will.

MR. TILLEY : No, only 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The United States tariff was 26 per cent, or on all dutiable goods, 45 per cent., and still the present tariff was pointed at as a United States one, as one of the same outrageous character. It was not necessary for him to stand up and justify the United States tariff, or to question the propriety or wisdom of it. While they might be Free-traders or Protectionists, they must look at this question as it was, and not as they desired it to be. The hon. gentleman had referred to natural principles. Was he prepared to resort to direct taxation—to go back to natural principles ? If so, he thought there were many hon. members in this House, who, though in favour of a Protective tariff to-day, under present circumstances, who would say, "Let us go back to natural principles. Let us exchange our products freely with the products of the world, if the world will trade freely with us." But as there was no question of direct taxation, that was not the position of Canada to-day. They had to deal with the fact that they were alongside a country that protected its industries and labour, that was seeking, in fact, to secure for itself not only its own market, but outside markets, and especially the Canadian market. The statement had been made that the increased duties would increase the price of everything. Why, what were the facts ? The American manufacturers were coming in already and saying : "We will sell you our goods as cheap, if not cheaper, than you can produce them. Your market we are determined to have." And he did not hesitate to say, that, if under the operation of this tariff, such a result followed, as much employment would not, perhaps, be given to the people as the Government expected, still they would realise the revenue. If our neighbours reduced their prices in order to get into our markets, this country would have the additional revenue, our people would not pay the duty, and they would get their goods as cheap as before. Then the hon. gentleman desired to belittle the decision of the House on this ground, that the majority represented but a small majority of the people. Well, it was the same in the election of 1874, verified as nearly as anything could be by an hon. member who sat upon the Government side of the House in the last Parliament as a supporter of the present leader of the Opposition. He referred to the Hon. Mr. Blake. But, supposing the two-thirds majority in Parliament did not represent a corresponding two-thirds majority of the people, would hon. gentlemen opposite say that the representatives of the people were not to be taken as the exponents of the sentiments of the people ? The hon. gentleman wishes to destroy the effect of this proposition by saying, in the first place, that it was not supported by a large majority of the people ; in the next place, that it would be destructive to the people of Canada who did not understand what they were doing, then the hon. gentleman could take a little comfort from the supposition that at the expiration of five years—the people having the experience which they were not supposed to have had—he would be restored to power again. His (Mr. Tilley's) conviction was, that instead of the proposition being less popular, it would become more and more popular as its operation was understood, and that at the expiration of five years the country would be stronger than ever in favour of the tariff, which, he hoped, would in a few days become a law in the Dominion of Canada.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not desire to bring on a general discussion, but there were a few points he wished to touch upon. In the first place, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tilley) forgot his position when he told the House he never communicated to the Governor-General the information contained in that despatch, although he assumed the technical responsibility.

MR. TILLEY : I did not send the figures.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was another attempt to place the Governor-General between the Administration and public opinion.

MR. TILLEY : No.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was a sorry exhibition in the House, a few weeks ago, when they found that the Premier had tendered certain advice to the Governor-General, and then came to Parliament before they knew whether their advice was accepted or rejected, and gravely told the House it was a matter of regret that the Governor-General had not accepted the advice, and that it would have been well had His Excellency at once accepted it. And now the Finance Minister, the senior member of the Cabinet, next to the Premier, told the House that the published despatch, written by His Excellency, did not contain anything that he had communicated to the Governor-General.

MR. TILLEY : I am referring to the despatch in which the figures are mentioned. I said I did not see one of those figures.

MR. TILLEY.

MR. MACKENZIE said he knew what the hon. gentleman referred to. It was the duty of a Minister not to say he was not aware of anything in a despatch, but to assume the responsibility.

MR. TILLEY : I did.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was the duty of a Minister to say nothing about it. If he was there as a Constitutional Minister he was bound to accept the responsibility without any special announcement of the fact, but, as a matter of course.

MR. TILLEY : Certainly.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was an unprecedented thing in this country, or anywhere else, as far as his knowledge extended, for a Minister to say that, although responsible for the words in His Excellency's despatch, that he did not know or communicate those facts to His Excellency, on a subject relating solely to his own Department. It was the most extraordinary exhibition of official incapacity.

MR. TILLEY : Hear, hear.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was the most extraordinary exhibition of want of official propriety that could well be made. It was very well that the hon. gentleman was able, when it suited him or his colleagues, to shift upon the Governor-General the responsibility of something or other that had been done or had not been done. On a former occasion the Governor-General was made to bear the weight of not having done something, and on this occasion the House was gravely told by the hon. gentleman that, although responsible nominally for this statement, he was not aware of the facts which were connected solely with his own Department, being communicated to the Governor-General.

MR. TILLEY : No ; I stated that the Government were, of course, responsible, constitutionally, for the despatch, but all I could say was, I had not seen one of the figures until I saw them sent to me from the Governor-General embodied in the despatch.

MR. MACKENZIE said he hoped that the Government, if they intended to take Parliament into their confidence as to what was or was not communicated to the Governor-General, would tell the whole story, if they were to be called upon to say whether the Minister of Finance's figures contained in this despatch were official or not, and if the hon. gentleman meant to get rid of any responsibility himself—officially, to use his (Mr. Tilley's) own word. He (Mr. Mackenzie) rose chiefly to protest against the statement that the Government were not morally responsible, and this manner of introducing the Governor General's name into discussion—this practice of bringing the Governor General's name between the Government, public opinion, and official responsibility, had been pursued this Session for the first time, so far as he was aware. He desired to say a few words upon another subject. He would not enter into a discussion of its questions which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tilley) and the late Minister of Finance (Mr. Cartwright) had dealt with, because he was quite willing to allow the speech of the one to pass under review in face of the other, and both to pass for what they might be respectively worth. He proposed to notice one or two matters which neither gentlemen really dealt with. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tilley) in his reply, maintained that the figures used by the late Minister of Customs (Mr. Burpee), were not correct. That was, in stating that $7,000,000 would be the amount of additional duties levied on the people now based upon the imports of last year.

MR. TILLEY : The hon. member said that the people would be taxed $7,000,000 additional on the goods imported, over and above the $2,000,000 paid into the Treasury.

MR. MACKENZIE : His statement was, that in order to get $2,500,000 paid into the Treasury, the hon. gentleman imposed additional taxation, assuming last year's imports as a basis, of $7,000,000. That was stated very clearly by the member for St. John.

MR. TILLEY : Seven millions over and above.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman could not deny that statement. It had never been answered. The calculations had been given special publicity, and it was shown by the hon. gentleman behind him (Mr. Burpee), that, in order to get $2,500,000, the people would have to pay $7,000,000, assuming the same amount of imports this as last year. To be sure, the Finance Minister said that importations of certain articles would be largely limited, and that to whatever extent they were, the difference would be seen in the calculations or collections. But, in either case, the hon. gentleman would observe that the people would have to pay $7,000,000, unless he assumed that the protection would not raise prices. He knew that the hon. gentleman expected it would not in several instances. But it was not human nature not to avail one's self of any protection. Although he might find several parties telegraphing that there was no increase in prices, an increase must be assumed, else there was no protection. The very end and object of the Finance Minister, as he explained it, was to give protection, which meant not merely a larger market in our own country—

MR. TILLEY : That is it.

MR. MACKENZIE : But increased prices.

Several HON. MEMBERS : No, no.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was an increase of prices. He could give abundant evidence of the fact, if necessary. One illustration was thrown away by the hon. gentleman, the very illustration that did not suit his purpose. He said there were thousands now employed who were idle on the 13th March. He (Mr. Mackenzie) would be delighted if that were true, but he believed that the hon. the Finance Minister was misled by any assertions of that kind. He happened to know that many were now idle who were employed on the 13th March. But he admitted that in several branches of business the natural effect of the tariff would be the employment of some idle men; but the question would arise whether that employment was not obtained at too high a price for the whole community. The hon. gentleman stated that the farmers who might be influenced by some statements in the speech of the member for Centre Huron (Mr. Cartwright) would not, in his opinion, pay as much per head as the citizens of the towns. That might be true as to groceries, but as to hardware, crockery, and all kinds of dry goods, the reverse was the case, in Ontario, at all events; and the farmers purchased very largely in excess of the ability of the mechanic or workingman. He (Mr. Mackenzie) knew that it was the farming population who would pay the largest proportion of the taxes. The hon. gentleman had referred to the fiscal policy of the United States, and had attempted, apparently, to compete with their Protection policy, but his (Mr. Mackenzie's) information was that the period of inflated prosperity which the United States tariff had, apparently, created, had now passed away; and he had shewn, a few nights ago, that the realised capital of that country was less than ten years ago, according to some of its best authorities. It was alleged that the tariff was imposed with a view of competing with the States. Some of its particular advocates, however, had another object in view. He would read the letter in an English newspaper, from a somewhat prominent gentleman in Canada, who had been writing strongly in favour of hon. gentlemen opposite. It would be interesting to know why he had worked for them at the last elections, and what kind of an alliance he had formed with them. The following was the letter written by Mr. Goldwin Smith to Mr. Potter, a distinguished English publicist, and member for Rochdale:—

"THE GRANGE, TORONTO,

"MY DEAR POTTER,—This new Canadian tariff, which shocks you all so much, is the inevitable outcome of the political situation. You must set it down to the account of the Empire which you have just been toasting at the Dufferin banquet.

"Canada is merely the border of the habitable and cultivatable portion of this Continent. She is not even an unbroken border, but broken by an uncultivable tract between this Province and Manitoba, and again between Manitoba and British Columbia by mountain ranges, through which the projectors of the Pacific Railway have not yet found a practicable route. Cut off this border by a Customs line from the rest of the Continent, and you will have commercial atrophy and financial deficit. The true remedy is commercial union with the rest of the Continent; but this 'Empire' forbids, and so the Canadians, in a state of deep commercial depression, and with their Government on the high road to bankruptcy, are forced to try something else.

"Of the deficit which compels the imposition of fresh taxes, more than half may be charged to the Intercolonial Railway, a politico-military railway constructed for the purposes of the Empire, in which some six millions sterling have been sunk, and which is still run at a loss. Of the rest a considerable proportion may be charged to the military force, which we are made to keep up against the Americans.

"We are now going to sink twenty millions sterling in the Pacific Railway for the purpose of uniting British Columbia, with its population of 10,000 whites, to the Provinces on the Atlantic coast, with which it has no natural connection whatever. This will probably be the end. But thanks to the assiduous cultivation by Dufferin and Co. of an Imperialist and anti-Republican feeling here, the end will probably not come without a convulsion, perhaps not without a bloody one.

"If Canada had been in the Union she would have turned the scale so completely in favor of Freedom against Slavery that there would most likely have been no civil war. If she were in the Union now, she would, in the same way, render hopeless the attempt of the South to regain its ascendancy in conjunction with the Democrats, which is apparently going to breed fresh troubles on this Continent.

"Leave the New World to its own destinies, and you will have first its assured friendship and then its trade. You have sent us, and are daily sending us, many good things of other kinds; but your political interference has been and is mischievous, alike to yourselves and to the communities of the New World.

"I enclose 'Professor' Fanning on Court Etiquette, and one or two cuttings from the papers, which which will give you some idea of a court in a colony. Professor Fanning is a Toronto dancing master, who went to England and interviewed the Lord Chamberlain in order to qualify himself for being the Beau Nash of the Court of Ottawa.

"I suppose you begin to see now what a humbug Dufferin's 'policy' was.

"Yours most truly,

"GOLDWIN SMITH.

"P.S. You will observe that the tariff is not so Protectionist, in the proper sense of the term, as intended to enforce Reciprocity. Our duties are to be lowered again, if the Americans will lower theirs. But they will not lower their duties or do anything else to foster a political outpost of the British aristocracy, and a possible source of future trouble to this continent. The case of the Canadian manufacturers was really a very hard one. They were shut out from the markets of the continent, and, at the same time, exposed to the influx of American goods whenever there was a glut in the States. If the quantity in the aggregate was not very large, the liability was enough to disturb their calculations."

He read that letter chiefly to show the object which this ally of hon. gentlemen opposite had in view of supporting them at the late elections. Mr. Smith thought it desirable there should be a union of Canada with the United States, and that that object would be promoted by the adoption of the same system of commercial legislation which prevailed in that country, although they, on this side of the House, believed that that was not only a failure, but that nothing was more unpalatable to the people of this country than any such project as Mr. Goldwin Smith estimated was to be the real and proper destiny of Canada in our day. They, on the Opposition side of the House, believed in the very opposite policy. They did not believe that any party advantage should ever be gained by any attempt to obtain any benefit of that sort at the expense of the connection between Canada and the Mother Country. The hon. gentleman had declared, in his first speech on this subject, that this was a revolution. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had no hesitation in expressing his firm conviction that no kind of revolution would stand between the hon. Premier and power; that a revolution even more extensive would be resorted to, without scruple if necessary, to obtain his and his party's ascendancy. It would be an easy matter to illustrate that statement, but it was too late in the Session to do so at present. The hon. gentleman said that the payment into the Sinking Fund was an ordinary liability of the Government. It was not so; payments to that fund was a redemption of obligations already existing, a reduction of the country's debt; and so the late Government were compelled to pay a much larger amount into the Sinking Fund in consequence of increasing liabilities under the legislation of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

AN HON. MEMBER: No.

MR. MACKENZIE said he would like to know what legislation of the late Government was concerned in the expenditure on capital account of late years. Not an act of theirs created any extension of capital expenditure, except those respecting the St. Peter's Canal and the west wing of the Western Departmental Block, Ottawa. But if they had paid a much larger amount into the sinking fund, it was at the expense of the revenue for the year, for the purpose of redemption of the debt, and the member for Centre Huron (Mr. Cartwright) was quite right in taking credit for that as against the deficits. Hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to think it something of a crime in the late Government to have a deficit. Why, it would have been easy to lay on taxation to prevent any; but they took the view, which hon. gentlemen opposite might condemn as a matter of opinion, that, during commercial distress, it was not desirable to increase the burdens of the people, believing that a restoration of confidence, at no far off day, would enable the business of the country to resume its wonted elasticity and produce the funds necessary for the public service without fresh burdens. As an English example, Sir Stafford Northcote was not, at this moment, increasing the taxation to meet the whole deficiency, but was extending it over a number of years to avoid taxation necessary to meet it all at once. What course did the hon. Premier opposite take from 1858 to 1862, during which a deficit accrued five times the amount of that of the last four or five years? Did he ever attempt to reduce it by fresh taxation? No, he did not; though he now attacked the Opposition for not having done it in their time. To leave the money in the people's pockets, when they required all obtainable for their paramount and pressing wants, was not an act to be blamed, but commended. Hon. gentlemen opposite were, in the first place, responsible for the deficit itself, which arose from obligations contracted by them. The sinking fund payments of the succeeding Administration were nearly equal to the entire deficit, and, with the surplus of the first year, entirely equal. Therefore, nothing could be more prudent than the course the late Government pursued, although hon. gentlemen opposite might fairly differ as to whether taxation should be increased to make up for deficits at all times. He believed now they pursued the proper course, and was quite satisfied that the hon. gentlemen opposite, in imposing a rate of taxation so excessive, so largely in excess of that borne hitherto, had adopted an unwise course which would result disastrously to the country. He had only now to call the attention of the House to the hon. gentleman's statement that the average rate of duty would only be $16\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. this year, although he had imposed duties averaging from 12 to ≈ 30 per cent. on goods coming into the country. In arriving at that conclusion the hon. gentleman had taken into consideration the imports of free goods into the country, which were merely in transitu from the Western States to England. That was not a fair mode of calculation. Let him compare the revenue tariff of last year, upon all articles bearing duty, with that of the present year, and give the percentage, which would show the real increase and the rate of taxation. But the hon. gentleman had proceeded with his illustrations, both in the despatch that he declined to acknowledge having seen before it went to England, and in his speech to-day, in a manner to give a totally false impression of the real condition of matters under this tariff.

SIR JOHN. A. MACDONALD said he observed that the debate had taken a wider scope than the consideration of the tariff, and that the hon. gentleman from Lambton had introduced a constitutional question. The hon. gentleman had charged his hon. friend the Finance Minister, and the Administration of which he was a member, of being guilty of the crime of sheltering themselves behind the Governor-General, and of throwing the blame on the Governor-General by introducing his name, and all because his hon. friend stated that he had never seen this despatch sent by Lord Lorne until it was communicated to him by His Lordship, and after it was asked for by this House. That was a most extraordinary position for the hon. gentleman to take. The hon. gentleman had been a First Minister himself, and knew exactly the relation of the Ministry of the day to the Representative of the Sovereign, and the relation of that Representative to Her Majesty, who was the Sovereign of us all. The hon. gentleman knew that the Governor-General was an Imperial officer who could send such despatches as he pleased. It was a matter of no consequence to us what were his private opinions, or what his political or religious principles might be, or what communication he might make, or what opinions he might have about the personnel of his Government, or about their policy, so long as he loyalty and truly carried out the constitutional principles of listening to his advisers, and following their advice, constitutionally tendered, as long as they had the confidence of Parliament. The Government were responsible for all their own acts, but they could not be responsible for instruments or documents which they were not consulted about, and such as might be of no consequence in the Government of the country. The opinion of the Representative of the Sovereign, as an Imperial officer, was a matter with which they had no concern whatever. Now, what were the facts? The Governor-General asked from the Minister of Finance, as one of his advisers, and the adviser principally interested in financial matters, for a memorandum connected with the tariff. That was furnished to him, and His Excellency, as an Imperial officer, transmitted it to Her Majesty's Government, accompanied with a despatch containing such views as he thought proper to express. His Excellency might have stated, if he had chosen, that he was sorry his advisers had recommended this tariff, that he was a Free-trader in principle, and regretted extremely they had taken that course, but as Constitutional Governor he must accept their advice and had done so. He might have said that if he had chosen, and this House had no right to find fault with it. We had no right to know what he communicated to Her Majesty's Government or to Her Majesty. But Her Majesty's officers in England thought proper to lay this despatch before Parliament, with the accompanying memorandum. That having been done, the hon. gentleman opposite very naturally asked for it, and the Government had to ask permission of His Excellency to lay it before this House, as they had never seen it before, and were informed of it in the same way the hon. gentlemen were informed of it, and in no other way. It was now laid before this House as a matter of information because, after having been communicated by Her Majesty's Government to the British Parliament, there could be no reason why His Excellency should decline to comply with their request that it should be submitted to this Parliament, and, therefore, it was quite absurd—he did not wish to use that expression offensively—but it was extraordinary rather than the hon. member for Lambton should take the course of charging his hon. friend the Minister of Finance with sheltering himself behind the Governor-General, and throwing the blame on him. He (Mr. Mackenzie) said he never heard of that being done before. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) was not aware it had been done before by this Government, but he knew it had been done by the Government of which the hon. gentleman was the head. He could remember well how that hon. gentleman and his whole Government sheltered themselves in the pardon case for Riel and Lepine. They all remembered how, before that hon. gentleman was a Minister at all, before he was a member of this House, and while he was a member of the Legislature of Ontario, how he hoisted the "bloody shirt," as it was called in the United States, and invoked the ghost of the slaughtered Scott; they all remembered that, and how he tried to rouse up the country on that question, and how, when he came to be a Minister here, he was willing to crouch behind his French-Canadian and Catholic supporters. He forgot the bloody shirt then, he forgot the ghost of the murdered Scott, and he got the Governor-General—they had a right to say so, as he had said the same of the present Government—he got the Governor-General to intervene and take the responsibility off his shoulders, letting off Riel and Lepine. It did not rest in the hon. gentleman's mouth to make such a charge now, especially when the charge was altogether unfounded, that this Government in any respect, or on any occasion refused to assume the full responsibility of all their acts, of all their advice, and of all their conduct. He supposed the hon. gentleman did that in consequence of his alliance—rather an entangling alliance he would find it—with the present Ontario Government. For the purpose of assisting that Government in their great straits, he had tried to make political capital of such a dry subject as a tariff. But now, instead of talking about tea, sugar, wheat and barley, he talked about independence, he talked about ministerial responsibility, he talked about Goldwin Smith, he talked about everything, especially about the hardships of the poor farmers who were going to be crushed by this tariff. Poor farmers.

"Alas! unconscious of their doom,
The little victims play;
Careless they are of ills to come,
They think but of to-day."

The poor farmers were quite unconscious of all the ruin the tariff was going to inflict upon them, and if the hon. gentleman had the correspondence put into his hands that had been received by the hon. the Finance Minister, he would find that whether the letters came from the farmers, the manufacturers, or whatever class it was, the complaints were all, and especially those of the farmers, that the protection was not sufficient.

MR. MACKENZIE: They say, then, it is a failure.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said those who wanted Protection, were like the squaw who said about whiskey that a little too much was just enough. Those who wanted to get protected, wanted all the protection they could get. When his hon. friend was making that exhaustive speech of his—if he were allowed to pay a compliment to his own colleague—whenever he mentioned an increase of duty on any article, he was cheered by the immense majority of this House, and whenever he spoke in hesitating tones, as to the smallness of the duty on any article, the House sat in silence. The same feeling existed all through the country, and the hon. gentlemen opposite knew that, be the cause well or ill founded, this country had deliberately—not by surprise, not by false pretences, as the hon. gentleman for Centre Huron had said, but of a full and lengthened discussion for years, of a strong pressure for Protection on the one side, and an able resistance by the hon. gentleman in favour of Free-trade on the other—the country had deliberately accepted a Protective policy. Therefore, the present Ministry came into power on that policy, the vast majority of this House were elected on that policy, and, true to their promises, true to their pledges and their principles, they had presented this tariff to Parliament, and the country had gratefully accepted what it considered a boon. If there were any dissatisfaction in the country at all in the matter, it was they did not go far enough in the right direction. The hon. gentleman from Lambton generally argued logically, but sometimes his logic did not follow in easy sequence, for in one breath he stated that there was going to be an increase in prices in consequence of the tariff, and in another breath he said there was no improvement in the country at all, and that he believed more people were employed before the tariff was introduced than since. But it was well known, that if prices rose on any article, that business became profitable, and more people were employed in it; and yet, the hon. gentleman in one breath, stated the prices had increased—therefore the profits had increased—and in the next breath he stated that the number of employes had decreased in every branch. But the hon. gentleman had brought in Mr. Goldwin Smith. Now, Mr. Smith was no ally of his (Sir John A. Macdonald's), but he was a member of a celebrated club which, perhaps, the hon. member for Lambton had heard of—the Cobden Club—and he was a Free-trader, like the hon. gentleman. But there was a difference between them; one was a philosophical Cobdenite, and the other a fanatical Cobdenite. There was as great a distinction between the hon. member for Lambton and Mr. Goldwin Smith in that respect, as there was between John Stuart Mill and the hon. member for Lambton. John Stuart Mill, the great exponent of political economy, pointed out that there might be disturbing causes which made Protection desirable. Goldwin Smith, in that letter, which the hon. gentleman had lugged in by the head and shoulders, said the same thing: that in this country, there were disturbing causes; that as it was a new country, and placed on the ragged edge of this continent—he did not know as that was the phrase—that they suffered a good deal by being excluded from the American market, while the Americans could come in and kill any particular industry whenever they liked; and in that letter he announced that the country was suffering from the causes which John Stuart Mill, in his celebrated work, said justified Protection.

Several HON. MEMBERS: No, no.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said yes; if the hon. gentleman could show that he was wrong, let him do so in his answer. He affirmed that John Stuart Mill said there were cases when Protection was allowable, and that meant, he supposed, protecting struggling industries against heavier capital and established industries. Goldwin Smith said, in that letter, the same thing—neither more nor less. He began to think that the reason the hon. gentleman brought in that letter, was because Mr. Goldwin Smith, in the same letter, intimated that he thought this country ought to walk alone, that they ought to be either an independent people or a portion of the United States. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) did not agree with him in that opinion, nor did the hon. member for Lambton agree with him either. On that point they both agreed that Goldwin Smith was wrong, but though he might be wrong on that point, he might still be a very good political economist. It did not lie in the hon. gentleman's mouth to speak of Goldwin Smith as the ally of the present Government, when one of that hon. gentleman's own colleagues in his Government, had written an essay, and boasted of it, in which he declared that Canada could never be prosperous until she was free from Great Britain. That was the hon. member for Shefford, and when he was charged with it in this House, he drew himself up and said he did not write that letter as a politician or as a member of the House of Commons, but he did it as a mere literary man. And so Mr. Goldwin Smith would say the same thing; he was a literary man, and not a politician, he had no responsibilities, he was not a member of Parliament. He had no constituency as the hon. member for Shefford had, when he made that independence speech, and yet the hon. gentleman tried to lug him in, in order to hit us over the shoulders. As long as that hon. gentleman was an opponent of the Government, prior to 1873, he was hail fellow well met with the hon. member for Lambton, they would sleep in the same political crib together, and the hon. gentleman did not then feel he could dispense with his assistance. We could all remember how his variable letters—some, perhaps, not very agreeable to himself personally, —were heralded and quoted with such unction by the hon. gentleman in attempting to hurt us. However, we could leave Mr. Goldwin Smith to take care of himself, as he was quite able to reply to the attacks made upon him by the hon. member for Lambton.

MR. MACKENZIE : I made no attack upon him.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said : Oh, no, it was no attack upon him at all, but they knew perfectly well that before 1873, he was a strong Liberal, he was a strong opponent of the Government which existed from 1867 to 1873. He was the accepted ally of the hon. gentleman opposite. He was united with the Hon. Edward Blake in getting up a Liberal newspaper that was to dispose of the old and effete Globeites, and succeed in bringing about a return to the old golden—not Goldwin—days. But, strange to say, strong as Goldwin Smith was in his opposition to the old Tory Government under himself (Sir John A. Macdonald), he changed his tone. Notwithstanding the extreme liberal views he entertained in England, notwithstanding his somewhat peculiar views as to the failure of this country, strange to say, he changed his tone. Two years' experience of hon. gentlemen opposite was quite sufficient to change his honey into bitterness, and to induce him to support the present Administration, and support the majority of the Dominion. They could not be surprised at Mr. Goldwin Smith changing his opinions, when 50,000 Liberals must have done the same thing, and must have changed their views between 1874 and 1878. The people now found that they had an "abiding city," and it would take more than five years—it would take a good many five years—before the memory of the past five years would fade away from the memories of the people. The grandsons of the present electors might inaugurate a change, but it would not be in his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) time. It might be that, in the far distant future, he would have an opportunity of looking down upon the House from a very impartial standpoint, and see the positions of the parties reversed, but, he would repeat, it would not be in his time.

MR. MACKENZIE : I would merely remark, the hon. gentleman does not mean he would look downward. He would look upward.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I always look up to my hon. friend.

MR. HOLTON said he would call the attention of the House to one or two points in connection with the papers that had been laid before them that day. It appeared to him that there was a hiatus in the despatch, in fact, two or three hiatuses, which ought to be explained. It seemed to him they had not all the papers before them. He remembered not very long ago, a statement was made in the English House of Commons, by Sir Stafford Northcote, to the effect that an explanation had been invoked from the Government of Canada as to their policy. He would ask the hon. gentleman opposite, whether this despatch and the accompanying memorandum were in reply to the demand for information, and whether they were complete.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said they were not. There was, however, a telegram forwarded to Canada, which was read in the House of Commons, and which was published everywhere.

MR. HOLTON : Was this in reply to that ?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : No.

MR. TILLEY said the reply in question was despatched on the Tuesday, and he did not submit his financial statement until the Thursday.

MR. HOLTON said the hon. gentleman had stated that he knew nothing about that paper until it was brought down. Now, it was quite clear that the writer of the despatch used the third person plural, and it was manifest that that was the opinion that had been given him by his Ministers.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Very likely.

MR. HOLTON : It must be so. The despatch is so written by the Governor-General as to convey the impression that the information had been imparted to him by his responsible advisers.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD :
Certainly.

MR. HOLTON said it was evident hon. gentlemen desired to shelter themselves behind the Governor-General. He thought that hon. gentlemen were acting wrongly in making use of the Governor-General's name, as they had done this Session, notably in the case of the Letellier affair some weeks ago.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD :
We did not.

MR. HOLTON said he thought hon. gentlemen acted wrongly in making such free use of the Governor-General's name. Did not the hon. gentleman say from his place that he regretted exceedingly the Governor-General had not acted on the advice they had tendered to him ?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD :
What of that ?

MR. HOLTON : I say it is taking shelter behind the Governor-General.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD :
Hear, hear.

MR. HOLTON : Why does he cast odium on the Governor-General ?

Several HON. MEMBERS : Order.

MR. HOLTON : It tends to make the Governor-General unpopular.

Several Hon. MEMBERS : Order.

MR. HOLTON : A few days later he was obliged to come down and say, "I advised the Governor-General to do this."

Several HON. GENTLEMEN : Question ; order.

MR. SPEAKER : The hon. gentleman is out of order in alluding to a previous debate.

MR. HOLTON : Well, this is a debate in which the greatest latitude and freedom is allowed. I know the hon. gentleman does not like any reference to be made to that matter. He hopes this Session will be allowed to pass without his being brought to task.

MR. HOLTON.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD :
Order.

Several HON. MEMBERS : Question.

MR. HOLTON : That attack of his on the Governor-General—

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD :
Order.

MR. HOLTON : The hon. gentleman may cry "order." He is very apt to cry "order" when he is out of order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I never was called to order by a Speaker in my life.

MR. HOLTON : I have heard the hon. gentleman say that often, after his being called to order by myself, and my being sustained by the Speaker.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD :
Your memory is failing you, Sir.

MR. HOLTON : I think the hon. gentleman finds my memory rather too long.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman had stated that there was apparently something left out in these papers. The hon. gentleman had been a Minister for a short time, and he ought to know that there were such things as verbal conversations between the Sovereign and his advisers. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) had had several conversations with the Governor-General on subjects of public interest, and he had no doubt his hon. friend the Minister of Finance had had similar conversations with the Governor-General. It was his Excellency's right of his own mere motion to send such despatches to England as he pleased. They desired to point out, and they did point out, the circumstances mentioned here again and again. Governors-General were all desirous of getting information from all sources, not only from Ministers, but from Opposition politicians, and from the world in general. The Governor-General got that information, no doubt, from the Government. His hon. friend had said that they were responsible for every word used in that despatch. They were responsible, because they knew every fact to be true. They were responsible because he had no doubt that most of these facts were conveyed by his hon. friend and himself. The hon. gentleman knew well, and, if the hon. gentleman did not know, the hon. member for Lambton would teach him, that a Governor-General had a right to convey to his Sovereign whatever he pleased, without reference to his Ministers. They had no right to know what his private or confidential correspondence was with the Imperial Government or the Colonial Office. All they had a right to insist upon was that he should take the advice of his responsible advisers as long as they had the confidence of Parliament, as every Governor-General he had served under had done without exception. In reference to the Letellier matter he would take the opportunity, before the House rose, of discussing that matter a little more with his hon. friend.

After Recess.

MR. MILLS said the hon. Premier had complained, when he objected to the interpretation put by the hon. gentleman upon certain views that were to be found in Mr. Mill's work on Political Economy. He would ask the hon. gentleman to read the paragraph, to which he alluded, to the House, and to show that Mr. Mill, in any degree, upheld the opinions which he had put forward.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I will send for the work and read the passage.

MR. MILLS said that Mr. Mill contended, that as long as a system of Protection continued, it was a financial loss to the country. The hon. gentleman did not admit that. His contention was that Protection itself was an economic advantage. Mr. Mill contended that the only ground upon which Protection could, at any time, be defended, was that an industry for which they had not the necessary skilled labour, was well adapted to the country, and he held that a financial loss might be submitted for a time in order that by-and-by, when that industry was established, it might become economically advantageous. But, so long as Protection was required, the country was losing financially. This was the position taken by Mr. Mill, and not that taken by the eminent literary writer to whom the hon. gentleman referred (Mr. Goldwin Smith), and certainly of the view put forward by the hon. gentleman himself. The hon. gentleman ought not to persist in attributing to Mr. Mill opinions which he would have been the last man to uphold. He (Mr. Mills) had not risen to discuss the subject of the tariff at all, and would not allude to it further. What he rose to take exception to, was the constitutional doctrine laid down by the hon. the Premier, with reference to the papers submitted to the House. He (Mr. Mills) did not admit that the Government could put on the table any public document discussing public questions of this country—the financial policy of this country, at the instance of the Government, for which the Government were not responsible—documents or communications between the Governor-General and the Government of Great Britain. Confusion, no doubt, had sometimes arisen in distinguishing between the communications written to the Colonial Office by the Governor-General as an Imperial officer, and that written by him as the Queen's representative—as the chief executive officer of this country. The hon. gentleman had submitted to the House a document which he called a private despatch, written by the Governor-General to the Colonial Minister, for the contents of which he claimed to be in no way responsible. That was not the opinion of the hon. the Minister of Finance. He stated that, constitutionally, the Government was responsible. It was not to be supposed that communications between the Governor-General, in his capacity as Imperial officer, and the Colonial Office, he would become simply the mouthpiece of his advisers, and would discuss their acts and opinions with a view to making a defence of them. He was as free, in such communications, from their advice, as he would be were he writing to an intimate friend. But, when the views of the Government were to be communicated to the Colonial Secretary, they should be communicated by a memorandum in Council, or a memorandum prepared by some member of the Government, as the exponent of the views of the Government. When the hon. gentleman laid down the doctrine that he could bring down to this House public documents and despatches discussing the affairs of this country, putting forward the views of the Government professedly, and disclaim any responsibility for them, he (Mr. Mills) entirely dissented from that view. He remembered some years ago, when the hon. gentleman was leader of the Government, that while a matter was under discussion in this House, he expressed an opinion that it was not desirable that the House should proceed with the discussion at all until a certain communication from the Governor to the Imperial Government was laid on the table of the House. The hon. gentleman brought that document down without any motion of the House, and after it was laid on the table the hon. gentleman stated he was not in any way responsible for the contents of the despatch, and that it was not proper to say it was brought down for a purpose. To day the hon. gentleman laid down a similar doctrine from which he (Mr. Mills) dissented. If the Government chose to discuss this question with the Imperial authorities, with a view to defend themselves, whether they did it through the Governor-General or through an Order in Council, they were equally responsible to the House. This communication said: "They also desired to point out." Who desired to point out? Why, the hon. gentleman and his colleagues. Point out to whom? To the Colonial Secretary and the Government of England. Did the hon. gentleman pretend that a document written at their instance—because it was perfectly obvious they could not desire the Governor-General to point out certain things to the Colonial Minister and his colleagues, unless they thought he was going to communicate with them on the subject—was one for which the Government were not responsible? It was not written by His Excellency in his capacity as an Imperial Officer, but as the Chief Magistrate of this country, advised by his Ministers, in defence of their fiscal policy. That was patent on the face of this communication. The only way in which the Government could avoid responsibility, was to provide that communications between the two Governments should be carried on in such a way that the despatches of His Excellency might wholly drop out of sight, without impairing the correspondence. Communications from the Colonial Secretary, when in reply to a Minister or memoranda of the Council, could be brought without its being necessary to bring down the despatch of His Excellency. But so long as they contained the views of the Government, at the instance of the Governor, they were despatches for the contents of which the Government must be held responsible by Parliament. Every communication made to the Colonial Office, discussing and defending the policy of the Government, explaining or defending the views of the Government in any matter of difference, was a communication for which Ministers were responsible as much as Her Majesty's Ministers in the United Kingdom were for the despatches of the Foreign Office.

MR. PLUMB said he did not suppose any leading member of the Opposition would have ventured to make a statement on these resolutions in the direction of tariff argument unless he had something new to say in a matter which had been so long agitated and discussed in this House and elsewhere. He did not suppose that the late Finance Minister would have ventured to present to this House a restatement of the arguments that had been made by the hon. gentleman himself as well as by most of the hon. gentlemen on the Opposition benches, but that he would have brought some new matter into the discussion if he had opened it at all. The hon. gentleman had again stated what he had reiterated very often, namely, that the tariff did not benefit the farmer, and he had given one extremely apocryphal authority to show that the farmers of Ontario would suffer under it. He stated that the average expenditure of the farmers in dry goods and hardware and groceries ranged from $250 to $500 a year. While the hon. gentleman might perhaps know something of the farming interest of the county he once represented as a non-resident, he (Mr. Plumb) knew something of the farming interest in the West. He knew what it was for a farmer to buy a farm and to struggle during twenty or thirty years to get it cleared and paid for, and with the most rigid economy it was usually the case that he was fortunate if he was barely able to leave 100 or 150 acres as a heritage to his children. Such a man had not spent $250 or $500 a year at the shops, or his farm would not have been paid for. The basis of the hon. gentleman's statement was an entirely fallacious one. He said the tariff had been aimed particularly at the farming class. The organ which was now the hon. gentleman's patron, but which was not his patron in 1872, the Toronto Globe, had claimed to be the farmers' organ for a great many years, and had claimed to be the exclusive protector of the farming interest. That paper had constantly asserted that the proposed tariff was against the interests of the farming community; but the farming community did not believe that statement. It was to the farming community, and not to the manufacturers, that the present Government was indebted for the position they now held as Her Majesty's advisers. The farmers knew perfectly well that it was necessary that they should have a home market, and that they should be permitted to relieve their starved lands by a rotation of crops. They understood clearly the arguments that were addressed to them. Their intelligence might be underrated by hon. gentlemen on the other side; he thought it had always been underrated by those hon. gentlemen. He believed the intelligence of the farmers of the great Province of Ontario was equal to that of any other class, and he thought they would appreciate at their true value the arguments of the hon. gentlemen opposite. It was useless for them to imagine that they could bring those arguments to bear with any effect upon the farmers of Ontario in the coming election. The hon. gentleman from Centre Huron said that this tariff would impose additional taxes upon the farmers to the extent of $25 or $30 a year. He (Mr. Plumb) thought, on the contrary, that they would be benefited to a far larger extent; for instance, as one advantage with the tax upon coal, they would now be able to obtain a higher price for their cord wood. This was an important item. The farmers were sellers, not buyers, of fuel. He also undertook to say that, having a home market which would be induced by the employes of manufacturers who they sought to encourage in their midst, the farming community would benefit to an extent far beyond twenty-five to thirty per cent. a year, which the late Finance Minister asserts will be their several shares of the burdens of the tariff. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) also accused the gentlemen on the Government side of the House with having provided that, whenever there was a time of scarcity, they were prepared to abandon the duty on breadstuffs. Did the hon. gentleman not know that it was not necessary to pass any new provision to that effect, and that full power, contemplating such a contingency, was given under the eleventh clause of the tariff? There was no new power granted in the tariff in that respect. It was precisely similar to the power granted to the late Minister of Finance in the legislation of 1877, and that was the re-enactment of an old Statute. The hon. member for Centre Huron (Mr. Cartwright) said the Sinking Fund was not to be considered in reckoning the deficits which took place under his disastrous administration of the finances of Canada. That was a new doctrine—not so far as the hon. gentleman was concerned—but to every sound financier in the world. The Sinking Fund was provided by our contract with the public creditor for the purpose of reducing the public debt by an annual contribution, and to say that it should not be taken from the current income of each year, or that it should not be included as an item of outlay, was a statement calculated to injure the credit of Canada. The doctrine would not stand examination for a single moment. They had it from the hon. the late Premier that it was not proper that there should be a discrepancy between the receipts and the expenditure, and, at the same time, he said that it would be easy to bring the expenditure within the receipts, and that deficits should not be excused or palliated by saying that any part of them was occasioned by payments into the Sinking Fund. That fund was a sacred trust not to be trifled with by sophistries so inexcusable as those of the late Finance Minister. Yet, under that hon. gentleman's management, there had been deficits for three or four years in succession. And, what was the apology offered by him for that state of affairs? Why, that there had been a deficit under Sir John A. Macdonald's Administration, in old Canada, somewhere before 1862. He (Mr. Plumb) did not consider that the members of this House to-day had very much to do with deficits that might have occurred in old Canada prior to 1862. They were not to try the Minister who conducted the financial affairs of Old Canada seventeen years ago, but the hon. gentleman who administered the finances of Canada from 1874 to 1878, and against whom the people of Canada had pronounced judgment. In the course of his harangue, the hon. gentleman stated that the trade with the United States and the trade with England, were practically the same, and bore the same relations to us. He (Mr. Plumb) took issue with the hon. gentleman, and so, he thought, would every practical man upon his side of the House who had even taken the most superficial and cursory glance at the condition of things which existed between the United States and Canada, and the United States and England. The hon. member (Mr. Cartwright) said there were some $13,000,000 worth of agricultural products brought into Canada under the free list, whilst, at the same time, there was some $11,000,000 worth of the same products exported from the country. In fact, it was merely in transitu, and to tax it, would injure the carrying and commission interests. There never had been a more fallacious statement made in the House. It was easy to bond produce in transitu. Everybody knew that more than $2,000,000 worth of the agricultural produce of other countries was consumed in the Dominion. He acknowledged that, under the system inaugurated by the hon. gentleman opposite and his friends, the whole relations of this country with the United States were changed. Under that system, the farmers of Canada exported their produce when there was not enough in the Dominion to feed the country, and they were obliged to import from the United States to make up the deficiency. We all knew that the inferior wheat which came into Canada from the United States was mixed with Canadian wheat for home consumption and for export. The hon. gentleman said it was an unfair statement to make, to assert that there was an amount of the five per cent. debt to be provided for in 1886, because, although nominally then payable, was in fact payable at our option at or after that date. It was to be provided for, because his hon. friend (Mr. Tilley) would choose to reduce the rate of interest and make a four per cent loan in place of it. He trusted when his hon. friend the Minister of Finance went to England, he would make a fair, straightforward statement of the financial affairs of Canada, like the statements so truthfully made by the hon. the late Finance Minister when he went to England in 1875 or 1876. Those statements were truthfully made, but he (Mr. Plumb) would not vouch for other statements so largely and scandalously at variance with them which were made by the late Finance Minister in Western Ontario in 1877, which he unblushingly called the brazen side of a shield of which he had presented the silver side to the capitalists of England. It was the brazen side of the shield that was placed before the electors of Canada in order to damage his predecessors, and the hon. gentleman had seen the result of it in the judgment passed by the people of Canada upon him. That hon. gentleman had also alleged that the industrial league of the United States had endorsed the policy of this Government. The hon. gentleman had made quotations from certain financial authorities in the United States before, and he had quoted at public meetings from the pamphlet of Mr. D. A. Wells, only stopping at a certain passage, which stated that the annexation of Canada with the United States would be the result of the policy which Mr. Wells advocated and the hon. gentleman endorsed. After quoting a writer whose tendencies were clearly annexationist, the hon. gentleman talked about the policy of the Conservative party as tending to sever the golden link between Canada and England. He, forsooth, was one of the gentlemen who took up the cry of loyalty. He thought it ill-became them to make any such claim as that, as against the gentleman who now governed the country, who had stood with unbroken front against any attempt to sever the golden link from the time that he first entered public life, and upon whose loyalty there never had been a shadow of suspicion. It was not the place of hon. gentlemen opposite to talk about loyalty. It was not a fair line of argument either, to produce paragraphs from English Provincial newspapers, in support of their contestations, because, forsooth, there had been, perhaps, some little feeling in the manufacturing districts, with respect to a tariff that might impose a small increase of charge upon certain classes of English manufacturers, as to which the wildest misrepresentations had been made here and elsewhere, by the Opposition, in order to create a prejudice against their policy in England. They had all a very high respect for the great commercial and manufacturing interests of England, and a strong desire to prevent injury to those interests; but they must also remember that there was a large investment of English capital in Canada not representing, directly, the manufacturing interests. Capitalists had entrusted large sums of money in this country for which they were not receiving a return, and if the Government pursued a revenue policy that would secure for those capitalists, through reviving prosperity, a better return for their investments in railway and other works, a small amount of that return would more than recoup the $400,000 or $500,000 which, it was claimed, would be taken out of the pockets of English manufacturers, and even those manufacturers themselves, would be largely benefitted by a policy which would increase the purchasing power of the Canadian public, who must continue to be large consumers of English goods, whatever might be the effect of the National Policy. If the tariff was intended to promote and foster the manufacture of coarse woollens in Canada, it would also stimulate household manufactures. He did not think that anybody who understood the interests of this country would find fault with a system which would create a home demand for Canadian wool. The hon. the Minister of Finance would be a public benefactor, if he could do anything which would increase the domestic industries of the Canadian farmer, which heretofore had been too much neglected, if he could cause the hum of the spindle to be again heard, instead of the strain of the piano. His hon. friend on the other side (Mr. Cartwright) was somewhat too sanguine in his estimate of the efficacy of the appeal he made to the country. He (Mr. Plumb) had a little extract from a speech delivered, on the 9th July, 1877, and reported in the Globe of the 25th July, by the then Finance Minister. It was as follows:—

“The Protection resolution of Sir John, which my hon. friend Mr. Mackenzie disposed of effectually, in a speech of eight minutes by the clock, in reply to Sir John’s so-called oration of one hour.”

The people of Canada did not seem to have disposed of those resolutions of the right hon. gentleman who was again at the head of the Government in that way, and the hon. gentleman who had made that wonderful eight minutes’ speech by the clock, must have been rather astonished that his speech had made no such impression upon the people of Canada as had been asserted. That it was not effectually disposed of by Mr. Mackenzie, was shown by the large majority on the Government’s side of the House. He (Mr. Plumb) was not astonished at his hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) rising to a point of order on constitutional practice. His hon. friend had no other weapon with which to flourish in his little tours de force. He (Mr. Plumb), in common with many others on this side of the House, had long since ceased to be alarmed at his frown. That hon. gentleman spoke as if the gentlemen on the Treasury benches were habitually interposing the Governor-General between themselves and responsibility. His hon. friend now kept jealous watch over the rights of His Excellency. He (Mr. Plumb) could recollect—he was not in public life at the time, but he read it in the newspapers—when his hon. friend was not so great an advocate for the shielding of the Governor-General from attack or censure when the Press upon his side were pouring abuse upon Lord Dufferin, and the hon. gentleman himself cried privilege till he was hoarse in an attempt to force the Governor-General into the performance of an unconstitutional act. Lord Dufferin stood firm, and refused to permit the hon. gentlemen and others of his political leanings to hold a Session of Parliament for the despatch of business in 1873, when, in the Governor-General's opinion, no such Session had been called or agreed upon. Lord Dufferin, in a speech at Halifax, playfully alluded to the castigations of the organs of the hon. gentleman's party in the following language. Speaking of the official relations between himself and his Government, and between himself and the people of Canada, he said :

" Sometimes, of course, no matter how disconnected his personality may be from what is taking place, he will get dragged into some controversy, and he may suddenly find himself the subject of criticism by the Press of whatever party may, for the moment, be out of humour; but, under these circumstances, he must console himself with the reflection that these spasmodic castigations are as transitory and innocuous as the discipline applied occasionally to their idol by the unsophisticated worshippers of Mumbo Jumbo when their harvests are short or a murrain visits their flocks."

He (Mr. Plumb) heard, then, of no attempt of the hon. gentleman from Chateauguay to interpose the ægis of constitutional protection between the Governor-General and his virulent assailants. He (Mr. Plumb) even suspected that the hon. gentleman himself was in the fore front of the attacking party. It was under such circumstances that Lord Dufferin's utterance was made, and he (Mr. Plumb) was somewhat surprised to see that they had changed places on the subject. They on the Ministerial side had won their position by fair play. No argument addressed to the farming community during the contest of next June would have any weight, except one favourable to the Conservative side. He had seen no deception practised on the electors but by the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, who constantly said that the Conservatives never intended to carry out their promises. Indeed, he might truly say :

" When, without stratagem,
But in plain play and even shock of battle,
Was ever known so great and little loss
On one and on the other."

The contest had been a fair stand-up fight, in which the hon. gentlemen opposite had been worsted, and he thought that if they bore their defeat without exhibiting so much bitterness and so little resignation, they would stand much better with the country. They were welcome to tear open and display their wounds as long as they chose, but he believed that the country had no sympathy with their gashes, and would willingly see them remain in hospital till they were healed, if they were not incurable.

The motion for the third reading of the Bill was put and declared carried on a division.

THE LETELLIER CASE.

REMARKS.

Order for House to again resolve itself into Committee of Supply read.

MR. HOLTON said that he had intended on the motion for the third reading of the Tariff Bill to say a word or two in reply to the remarks of his right hon. friend the leader of the Government, on a previous occasion. Not to put himself out of order by speaking twice on the same question, he had waited until the next motion was presented, but it had passed so suddenly that he had not the opportunity of saying anything on it. He was very glad to hear that they were to have an opportunity for discussion on the Letellier matter before the House rose. However, the real motive for his reference to it was to bring about some discussion on the subject before the House rose. It was very important that that matter should be discussed. They had sent an ambassador to the Court of St. James in reference to it—a distinguished member of the Government—to attend to the prosecution, whether against Mr. Letellier or the Governor-General, they were not yet informed. The first impression was that he had gone to prosecute a suit as between the advisers of His Excellency and His Excellency himself. But the subsequent statement made by the right hon. gentleman rather led to the supposition that he had gone to conduct the prosecution against the Lieutenant-Governor. He (Mr. Holton) might say now, when perfectly in order, that there seemed to have been some little doubt about the course of His Excellency's advisers on that occasion, and about that of his chief adviser, especially, in drawing a line between himself and His Excellency, as he had done in the first instance—a course which he (Mr. Holton) thought then, and still thought now, was not only contrary to sound constitutional usage, but extremely unfair to His Excellency. He believed the doctrine that there could never be a variance between the Crown or the representative of the Crown, and the advisers of the Crown or of the representative of the Crown for one single hour; and his own judgment was, although he did not shine in anything, according to his right hon. friend the Premier, that there had been a grievous sin against sound constitutional usage in the course he took in communicating to the House at all any difference of opinion between himself and the head of the Executive. He (Mr. Holton) had sought an opportunity of saying so much, and if a further opportunity should arise, he would amplify somewhat his views on that question. Which of them would shine on that occasion remained to be seen, and the matter would be passed upon by an intelligent posterity, if not by the vindictive partisans of to-day. Opinions might differ, and men might depart from their principles; they might not do as well as they knew how to do. His right hon. friend knew pretty nearly what was right in such matters. As his hon. friend Mr. Mackenzie remarked, his was not the sin of ignorance, but a sin against knowledge, and he desired, before the debate passed on, to emphasise his opinion on that question, and say that then, as to-day, he thought the Government were open to the charge of the hon. member for Lambton, of taking shelter, in doubtful circumstances, under the name of the Governor-General, and making an unfair use of that name. That was his (Mr. Holton's) deliberate opinion. The right hon. gentleman must vindicate himself if he could when the debate which he promised was entered upon, from the charge of his having, on the occasion referred to, made a very improper use of the Governor-General's name, and, having violated all correct notions of responsible government.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that all he could say would be to take back what he had uttered about the hon. gentleman from Chateauguay not being a shining light. He admitted the hon. gentleman was a shining light.

209 To meet further expenditure in full, on account of publication of Debates of 1878. 5,364 28

MR. MACKENZIE asked what was likely to be the expenditure this year. When this work was first undertaken, it was with the understanding that the maximum expenditure would not exceed from $12,000 to $14,000. It exceeded that the first year, last year it was about $18,000, and now it was nearly $21,000. Judging from the size of the present report, and the number of days it was behind, he found it would be still more this year.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said the matter at present stood in this position : last year it cost $18,000 and a trifle over, but the service, which should have closed the 1st of July, was not all paid for, so that this amount of money had to be carried over into this year. That was what this vote was for. He fancied the debates would not cost as much this year.

MR. STEPHENSON said it was a mere matter of book-keeping ; it was the amount of money expended before the close of the last financial year, and this was a re-vote to meet the expenditure which ran into the present year. The amount of money left in Mr. Hartney's hands was refunded, and this was part of the money voted to meet the expenditure incurred since the close of the last financial year, because the volume was not finished on the 30th of June last, and the cost of finishing it was borne on this year's appropriation, which they wanted $5,000 to recoup.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD explained that in reference to the library catalogue, it appeared that Mr Todd thought he had authority to print and prepare a catalogue, and he placed it in the hands of the contractor. It was in process of being printed when it was found that it was literally impossible for the contractor to have it ready for the meeting of Parliament. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) told Mr. Todd that if he could not get it ready as he desired, he had better divide the work. This was done, and a portion given to the Citizen Company.

MR. MACKENZIE : What authority had Mr. Todd ?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not know. The catalogue was ordered before they knew anything about it. Mr. Todd said that every ten years he had prepared a catalogue, and he imagined that he had now the authority.

MR. MACKENZIE said Mr. Todd had no such authority.

Mr. MACKENZIE said, from the slight perusal he had been able to give the papers in this case, he had come to the conclusion that it ought not to have been taken out of the Court. He had formerly stated that his impression was that the judgment of Judge Fournier was interlocutory, not final. Curiously enough, he had used the same phrase in dealing with it. A reference of it was made to obtain correct information by re-measurement of the work, and, as soon as that should be done, he was to reconsider the case for judgment. He (Mr. Mackenzie) considered the case should not have gone before Mr. Keefer; that the Registrar of the Supreme Court, as directed, should have taken the evidence, assisted by some professional or Engineer, as assessor. There was no leading engineer of the Intercolonial called to give evidence, neither Mr. Fleming nor Mr. Schrieber, both of whom were responsible for any change of location. With regard to Grant's evidence, no doubt he was a resident engineer at that work; but they had evidence in the Department of great want of accuracy and preciseness in his work, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) would not be surprised at mistakes being found. Yet he was the only witness summoned, apparently, except a rod man or chain man was called to give evidence before the arbitrator. He thought the case had been mismanaged.

Mr. TUPPER said he was quite sure that if the hon. member for Lambton had had sufficient time to examine the papers, he would have arrived at a very different conclusion. In the first place, although the judgment was interlocutory, it was one, in the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, that ought to be remitted to the Registrar for the taking of evidence, which must, in the nature of things, be accepted when taken, although it would go back to the Judge for final judgment; that the Deputy Minister also thought that it would have been utterly impossible for the Registrar, or any gentleman, without technical knowledge of the work done, to have performed that task with any degree of accuracy whatever. Therefore, it was thought best to take it before an engineer. The course adopted was deemed the only one that would secure the Government a right decision. So the case was managed before an arbitrator. But the gentlemen entrusted with the case for the Government were those to whom the late Government confided it, Messrs. Walker and McIntyre, who, if there was any failure or fault in not calling Messrs. Fleming and Schriber, were responsible. But they had produced those engineers before a Court, and their evidence was in the hands of an arbitrator. Those lawyers had conducted the case in an able and judicious manner. He (Mr. Tupper) did not believe they had omitted anything towards a proper discharge of their duty. The award of Mr. Keefer, in the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, was still appealable to the Supreme Court, but, possessing the opinion of Messrs. Walker and McIntyre, he believed the finding was fully warranted by the testimony, and that the result of an appeal would not be satisfactory. Under these circumstances the hon. gentleman would hardly feel that they were not warranted in accepting it. They, therefore, asked Parliament to vote the amount.

MR. MACKENZIE: Why did the hon. gentleman not direct those engineers to give evidence before the arbitrator?

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said that he was unable to advise in this matter, under any respect, in consequence of having been engaged in the case before taking office, and, therefore, he had not even conferred with the Deputy Minister of Justice on the subject. But the interests of the country were ably cared for by that gentleman. The evidence of Messrs. Schriber and Fleming, which the member for Lambton erroneously thought had not been taken, was taken and used by the arbitrator, and they were examined and cross-examined by the counsel of the respective parties. Mr. Grant, the engineer under them, and the assistant, were also examined.

MR. MACKENZIE: One was examined.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said all were who were supposed to know anything on the subject. The judgment was only interlocutory, so far as to be subject to review, as was the evidence directed to be taken. But he thought legal gentlemen would say it was merely in the form of a decree of reference on which all the leading elements of the case were finally determined. The Judge, by that judgment, defined with greater preciseness and clearness the points on which he desired testimony in order not to arrive at a doubtful conclusion. But as the certain and only fact to be ascertained was the amount due, Judge Fournier settled the principle on which the ultimate decision was to be founded. He determined that the surveys were not reputable to the parties responsible, and it was on that ground he referred to one fact, defining what the liability was for the change of grade and location. He refused, in distinct and positive terms, the ascertainment of the value either pro or con. on that change of grade. On those two points he thought the hon. gentleman would find that, although the Judge used the phrase interlocutory, the fact was it was a final decree on the legal elements of the case, refusing to the Registrar of the Court the ascertainment of the amount due. That all took place, except the reference to Mr. Keefer, before the present Government took office. The only charge of indiscretion, if even that could be proved or used against the present Minister of Public Works, would be in reference to the appointment of Mr. Keefer, who was a professional man, in relation to such work, instead of the Registrar.

MR. MACKENZIE said that after Mr. Fleming became intimately connected with the Pacific Railway, he (Mr. Mackenzie) thought he ought to devote his whole time to that enterprise, reserving to him still two or three great engineering works, such as the Miramichi and Restigouche bridges, and Mr. Schreiber did all the rest of the work. He was more than half the time on the road, and must have known a great deal about the sections, and all those matters were gone over by Mr. Fleming also.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) : He was examined.

MR. MACKENZIE said not before the arbitrators. Messrs. Bill, Jелlette and Mitchell were the only parties that appeared by the papers to have been examined before the arbitrators. Even if the two chief engineers had not been examined technically as to the measurements, they ought to have been there. No lawyer could have conducted the case without the assistance that either of these two gentlemen could have rendered.

MR. TUPPER desired to ask the hon. gentleman which of the two, himself or the hon. gentleman, was to blame for not calling Mr. Schreiber or Mr. Fleming before the arbitrators. All that was done, as far as he was concerned, was to refer the matter to the Deputy Minister of Justice, to find whether the ends of justice would be better attained by the course he had adopted. Was the counsel the hon. gentleman employed, and which he (Mr. Tupper) simply continued, responsible, or was it himself (Mr. Tupper), for any failure to secure proper testimony? The hon. gentleman must know that this matter being in the hands of counsel selected by himself, if there was any failure in calling proper witnesses, or in the management of the case, then those gentlemen employed by the late Government were responsible, therefor, and not himself.

MR. MACKENZIE said he took care that those gentlemen should be at the Court in all the cases that were tried. He conferred with them about the case, and they did attend Court, but they did not attend the Court that was held after he went out of office, and he did not know why. He would ask the hon. gentleman if Mr. Odell gave exactly the same evidence before the Judge as before the arbitrator.

MR. TUPPER said he knew nothing about it whatever. It being in the hands of gentleman who had conducted the cause, it was left in their hands, and every assistance they asked for was furnished them. They managed the case before the arbitrators and not himself.

MR. MACKENZIE : The exact measurements were only gone into before the arbitrators.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) : I think my hon. friend will find that Odell made the measurements before he was examined by the Judge, and he was examined on those measurements before the Judge, and then was re-examined on the same measurements afterwards.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron) said the question which came before the Court for adjudication, and upon which evidence was taken, was quite different from the one that came before the arbitrator, and the kind of evidence necessary to elicit before the Judge, in order to enable the plaintiff to establish his case, or the Crown to make a defence, would not be at all applicable before the arbitrator. The only thing that struck him in the matter was, that the evidence of experts in the Department was not taken before the arbitrator on the two questions which were practically submitted to him.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not think they could consent to this vote. That breakwater had been conveyed in fee simple to the Government, which then spent $20,000 upon the work. He never heard of any one pretending to have a claim against the Government on account of the breakwater. The Government was in possession of it on the most undisputed title.

MR. TUPPER said that Mr. Woodworth had paid out the amount in the resolution in buying up small shareholders, who would not consent to convey their title to the Government. The reason the claim had lain in abeyance was that the amount was a comparatively small matter to him in his former circumstances, but having lost his property the money would now be a consideration to him.

MR. KAULBACK said a very large amount of money was expended by the Dominion yearly in the payment of salaries to officials in the protection of river fisheries in Nova Scotia without an adequate return being shown, proofs of which were exhibited to the public very clearly by the sad and apparently wilful neglect that was exhibited by officials in charge of the river fisheries, in permitting mill-dams, without fishways (or imperfect ones, if any), and obstructions of various kinds, to be thrust across the most valuable rivers, and carelessly permitting deposits of saw-dust, not only to the utter exclusion of the passage of fish, but to the passage of ships navigating some of their waters. He had no hesitation in saying that, unless the rivers were protected by proper and efficient officials—men willing and ready to discharge their duties fearlessly and impartially—their rivers, being the nursery of their deep sea fisheries, they would see their fisheries, in a short time, a complete sacrifice and failure. He would very particularly urge upon the Government the necessity for early and prompt attention to this long-countenanced evil.

244	To further provide for the maintenance of the several fish-breeding establishments in the Dominion.	$4,000 00

MR. KAULBACK said he hoped that fish-breeding would not be confined to the inland lakes and rivers, but that the deep sea fisheries would be carefully looked after as well. Under the Washington Treaty the poor fishermen of the Maritime Provinces were greatly interfered with in their rights and privileges in having to surrender to the fishermen of the United States the right of fishing in common with themselves in our municipal waters over an extent of coast of 3,160 miles, inhabited by a population of over half a million, who derived their subsistence almost entirely from the sea fisheries. The American fishermen, having had these privileges, had abused and injured our fishermen to a very marked degree, depopulated some of our finest fishing grounds, which formerly were very productive, diminished the production of our fishermen, and materially affected the chances of a living to the hardy, honest and hardworked fishermen. The fishermen, some five years ago, were enabled to gather their harvest within sight of their dwellings, the fish frequenting their bays and harbours. Now they were obliged to launch out into the trackless deep, often beyond sight of land, spending sleepless nights in hard toils, at the risk and peril of their lives, to get a scanty living for their poor families, all in consequence of their rights and liberties having been ceded to foreign fishermen, who were permitted to fish in their waters in the most illicit manner. In consequence of the concession of our fisheries to foreign fishermen, much injury had been done to our fishermen, for which privileges and the injury done to our fisheries and fishermen he contended that the amount awarded us in June, 1877, by the Washington Treaty arbitration, should go to the fishermen, on the principle of equity and justice, that what came from the fisheries should return to the fisheries; all he asked of this Government was to fund the amount of award for the benefit of the fisheries, and apply the revenues derived therefrom in restoring the all but exterminated fishing grounds, and developing the deep sea fisheries of the Dominion, which were the greatest source of revenue to the Dominion.

MR. MUTTART said he did not object to the item, but he wished to express his regret that the Government had not seen fit to allow Prince Edward Island the sum which was justly due to her out of the Fishery Award. At the time the fisheries were ceded, Prince Edward Island was not in the Confederation. The treaty was ratified by the Government in 1872. Between that time and July, 1873, there could be no question that the Island could have got her separate amount if she had insisted on it. The union of the Island with the Dominion was on condition that this amount should be paid. He was aware the terms were silent on that question, but the delegates from the Island submitted a memorandum, in which they stated that, if the conditions of the memorandum were agreed to, they were prepared to submit a further memorandum in regard to the fisheries. This memorandum was not submitted, but they took it for granted that the intentions were that the Island should receive its fair share of the award. He did not think the Dominion intended at the time that this amount should be thrown into the general revenue. He had reason to believe that, if the people of the Island supposed that that award was going into the general Treasury, they would never have entered Confederation. The Halifax Commission took into account the Island fisheries, and he asked if it was fair the Government should distribute this award for general purposes? Manitoba and some other Provinces could have no claim to a portion of this award, because their fisheries had not contributed to swell the amount. He trusted the Government would see its way to pay what was due the Island, which he believed was equitably, if not legally, due.

MR. TILLEY said the instructions to the delegates and their report had been prepared to lay before the House; but the correspondence included communications Sir A. T. Galt had had with the Imperial Government on the subject, and when it was submitted to His Excellency, he thought it desirable to ascertain whether there were any objections to these communications accompanying the papers. He (Mr. Tilley) expected to have had a cablegram yesterday, and, as he had heard nothing from His Excellency on the subject, he had not felt himself in a position to submit the papers. Sir A. T. Galt was appointed a Commissioner, and Col. Bernard, an Assistant Commissioner. In Spain they had to employ a Spanish interpreter, and had to incur several other items of expense, the whole being about $6,000; $3,000 had been allowed to Sir A. T. Galt for the five months he was engaged in the matter, and $800 to Col. Bernard, and the whole amounted to a little less than $11,000. Sir Alexander's salary was on the same footing as that of a Cabinet Minister.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman could not, by law, pay a super-annuated officer in that way. Compensation and salary could not run concurrently.

MR. BOWELL said the hon. gentleman, when in power, had superannuated Customs officers and still employed them at a large salary. Did the hon. gentleman remember the case of Mr. Yarwood, of Clifton?

MR. BOWELL: Yes, that is, about $1,200.

MR. BURPEE: I notice, in our last year's Estimates, we omitted to provide for collection in the North-West Territory.

MR. BOWELL: That is not included in this sum, because it was 10 per cent. paid on the amount of collections, and consequently does not appear.

MR. BURPEE: In the year 1872, the charges were put into the revenue, and a supplementary vote was taken last year for the service. I fancy, under the present law, there requires to be a large expenditure for weights, scales and measures. Are they provided for in this amount?

MR. BOWELL said no, these accounts were to make up the amounts expended over the estimates of his hon. friend, and he would give him the particulars of every item if he desired it. He did not desire the country to think that this sum was made up by any items of expenditure or any increase in the service since the present Government came into power; the items were made up exclusively of over-expenditure, which occurred during the last year of the hon. gentleman's tenure of office.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES LAWS CONSOLIDATION BILL.—[BILL 87.]

(Mr. Baby)

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. BABY said this Bill was the consolidation of the two Acts now on the Statute-book relating to weights and measures. Some very important amendments were here made to the existing laws. He had already alluded to the fact that the number of inspectors was to be considerably reduced. By this Act no deputy inspectors were to be appointed, but there were to be seven inspectors for Ontario, four for Quebec, four for Nova Scotia, three for New Brunswick, and one each for the other Provinces, with divers assistants. By this Act the Government hoped to make a considerable reduction in the expenses. $14,000 would be saved in salaries alone, and between $10,000 and $12,000 would be economised in office rent, fuel, contingencies, etc., on the whole, about $40,000, without diminishing in any respect the efficiency of the Act. He would now indicate the principal changes intended by the new law. By the 18th section heaped measures were prohibited. This was taken from the English Act now in force, which enacted that when a bushel was sold it should not be heaped. It would be, as said in French—mesure rasée, and would be a protection to the farmer. Moreover, the Act made it imperative to use but one measure; the Imperial doing away with the wine measure, the use of the two, as permitted by the now existing laws, having been a great source of trouble and inconvenience, if not of fraud to the consumers. From the official reports it would appear that from all parts of the Dominion this change was asked as a proper step in the right direction. However, as this radical change might somewhat disturb certain traders, this Act contained a proviso by which the use of the wine measure would be tolerated until the first of May, 1880, which date was the original one on which the Weights and Measures Act introduced formerly by his hon. friend the Minister of Public Works was to have gone into operation. Thus ample time was given to the traders in some parts of the Maritime Provinces principally, where the Imperial measure was not much in use, to prepare to the final adoption of the same. By the 23rd section, exceptions were made in favour of those who sell liquids by the vessel instead of by the ordinary measure. This was to meet the case of those liquids contained in demijohns, carboys and other vessels, so that when an article was sold by the bottle or by the demijohn, it was not necessary that it should contain the exact quantity mentioned in the law. By the 38th section it was provided that the inspector, as well as his assistants, should be allowed to adjust. It had been found that the greatest objection heretofore made to the Weights and Measures Act was that the inspector was followed by an adjuster, who very often charged three times as much as the inspector. By this section that difficulty was obviated, by allowing the inspectors to do that business themselves. Everybody who was experienced in the matter knew perfectly well that that was, to a great extent, the principal objection to the Act, and that traders objected to the adjusters being employed, and the onerous fees charged by them. It often happened that the inspectors were not the right men for the place, and frequently the adjusters connived with the inspectors to charge people what they liked. By the Act the inspectors were not bound to adjust, but it was intended to place that duty upon them by an Order in Council. There was a notable change in the 43rd section. Heretofore the trader was obliged to have his scales and weighing machines verified every year, but under the new Act he would only need to have them verified every two years, making the verification and stamping biennial instead of annual. The 44th section enacted that dealers in scales and other weighing machines should not be obliged to have them stamped when in stock, but only when they were sold by retail, so that the party who bought should know that the scales or other weighing machines were made according to law. These were the principal changes in the law, and he hoped they would meet with the approbation of the Committee. Some such law was absolutely necessary in a civilised country. It was found in the Statutes of all the great European nations, and should also find its place in ours. By this Act, the Government had the right, by Order in Council, to make such rules and regulations for the guidance of the officers, and fix a tariff of fees. Hon. gentlemen might rest assured that the utmost care would be taken in the framing of the said rules and tariff as would not bear too heavily upon the people. The Government had endeavoured to make this Act as efficient as possible, and they hoped the amendments he had mentioned would make it more popular in the community.

MR. HOUDE said that he would take the liberty of drawing the attention of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue to the fact that there were a good many farmers and traders who thought that it would be better to put the bushel of oats at 32lb. instead of 34lb., the bushel of turnips, carrots, parsnips, beets, at 56lbs., instead of 50lbs., as now, and onions at 60lbs. As to the inspectors of weights and measures, he would have preferred, for his part, to have the number increased instead of decreased, and he thought that it might be done without any additional cost to the country. By appointing inspectors in the different counties, the salaries might be reduced to a very small sum, whilst securing at the same time the services of competent persons; this would be more convenient for the public.

MR. BABY said that, in answer to his hon. friend, he would state that he had forgotten to mention that, by an article inserted in the law, the merchant or the trader would not be obliged to go to the inspector, but the latter would be obliged to go to the former. This was an important article that would certainly meet with the approval of the House. Heretofore, the inspectors went to a certain place designated a little beforehand, and persons wishing to have their scales, weights and measures verified, were obliged to go and meet the inspectors at the places designated, and sometimes to travel to no purpose long distances, undergoing thereby much trouble and expense. The present law did away with those difficulties. Now, as to the weights of different grains and vegetables, he would say that they had been in existence for the last twenty-five years. If the hon. gentleman would refer to the Consolidated Statutes of Canada, he would therein find the same provisions when the hon. the ex-Minister of Public Works introduced this law a few years ago. No objection was then raised to the weight of grain and vegetables as then fixed by law. He could not, therefore, venture to meddle with them, at least for the present. Lastly, he did not think that it would be possible to appoint a larger number of inspectors than the Government intended to appoint after the passing of the Act, without increasing the expense, and without rendering the successful working of the law very doubtful. The experience of the past was there to prove it.

MR. BÉCHARD said a short time ago he called the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that the people in the rural districts complained that the merchants had to fee the inspectors when their weights and measures were perfect. He desired to know if that was provided for in the Bill.

MR. BABY said it was not provided in the Bill, but it was the intention of the Government to remedy that evil by Order in Council.

MR. BOURBEAU said that he approved of the provision that obliged the inspectors to go to the houses of those who had weights and measures to be verified, for there was cause of complaint in several counties in the Province of Quebec, especially in the counties of Drummond and Arthabaska, because the deputy-inspector of that locality resided in the farthest corner of the county, and being obliged to go to him to have their weights and measures inspected, certain merchants were obliged to cross the whole county of Drummond, and then the whole county of Arthabaska, in order to reach his residence. It was true that after a while it was discovered that this was displeasing to the merchants, and the inspector was ordered to travel. As to the inspection of weights and measures, it had been noticed, in his county, that the inspector was obliged to take with him a person to adjust the weights and measures. But this manner of proceeding was very costly, for this person who followed the inspector charged sometimes too dear for adjusting the weights and measures; and, in the county he had the honour of representing, a great many complaints were heard. All those who had weights and measures to be adjusted, complained that they had been charged exorbitant prices. He would suggest that the inspector should have at his own expense, or at the expense of the Government, an assistant, capable of adjusting the weights and measures. Heretofore, they had been obliged to pay ten cents for every weight or measure inspected, and that ought to be sufficient to remunerate those who inspected and adjusted the weights and measures without it being necessary to pay them a salary. He thought that scales should not pay more than weights, at least when too much work was not required. Heretofore, inspectors had been in the habit of using lead for adjusting weights; unfortunately this metal was not solid enough, for pieces were often detached three or four days after inspection, and then recourse had to be had to the inspector, in order to have them re-adjusted. Another observation he wished to make was, that, under this Act, and as it had been practised under the former law, they would not have the privilege of having their weights and measures inspected and adjusted by another inspector than the one appointed for the particular district in which those whose weights and measures were to be inspected lived. He would have desired more liberty for the merchant. For instance, when a merchant living in the country, had business either in Quebec or Montreal, if he discovered that he had a weight that was not correct, he ought to have the privilege of taking it with him in order to have it adjusted. He hoped that the hon. Minister would pay attention to this point. Merchants, and those who had weights and measures to be inspected in his division, complained that too high a price was charged for the levels that had to be adopted to platform scales, and many persons, who understood the matter, thought that these levels were superfluous. He trusted that the hon. Minister would take these suggestions into consideration, and that the inhabitants of the Province of Quebec would not have to complain of the new law.

MR. LAURIER said the hon. gentleman's motive in making these changes was avowedly one of economy, which was certainly very laudable, but he questioned much if these changes would secure this object. No doubt there would be a good deal of saving in the salaries, but that saving would be more than counterbalanced by the expense in travelling. Take the Province of Quebec, for example. The hon. gentleman proposed in that Province only four districts, with an inspector in each, and three or four agents. At the same time, this Bill proposed that the inspection should not take place at the centre of a division, but at various localities in the division. There was to be one resident officer in Montreal, Quebec, Three Rivers, and Sherbrooke, and whose position, to all intents and purposes, would be a mere sinecure. The actual work of inspection would be done by the agents, who were to travel from place to place. Take the District of Quebec, for example, containing at least twenty counties, and two hundred and fifty municipalities; did the hon. gentleman pretend the travelling expenses of these agents for such distances would not amount to much more than the salaries now paid to the inspectors and their deputies? It would be the duty of the agents to be constantly on the road to make this inspection. If the agent was to travel to the Magdalen Islands, on the one shore, to the coast of Labrador, on the other, the expense would, evidently, be a very serious item. He would rather favour the view of the hon. member for Maskinongé, and instead of diminishing the places of inspection, he would multiply them as far as possible. At the same time the inspection could not be so efficient. At present if an infraction of the law took place in Gaspé, for instance, the complaint could be made to the resident officer with very little trouble; but, according to the provisions of this Bill a person who wished to make a complaint would have to go all the way to Quebec, and the probability was that justice would fail to be done. Another feature of the Bill was, that it provided that adjusting should be done by inspectors, but if the inspectors were to be adjusters themselves they should have a knowledge of mechanics and a practical knowledge of the whole subject. He thought, moreover, that it would be better to have an open system of competition than the present system of having weights inspected by the inspectors themselves and by nobody else. He thought that if the inspectors were constantly on the road, the system must prove more expensive than the present one. He was of opinion that the better plan would have been to have increased the staff and decreased the salaries.

MR. KAULBACK said it was worthy of the consideration of the House whether parts of this Bill might not be amended, placed as we were geographically with our American neighbours across the border, and considering the great dissatisfaction the Weights and Measures Act had been to the country the last few years. He thought they should adopt the measures now in use in the United States, the four quart wine measure instead of the Imperial gallon, it being what they were more accustomed to, considering that the Dominion had a larger interchange of trade with the United States than with Great Britain. Under the Weights and Measures Act, the last few years, much dissatisfaction arose among the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces, they having to part with their fish oil to the merchant by the Imperial gallon, and getting in return molasses or other commodities measured to them by the smaller or wine measure, and, in the sale of fish, the fisherman had to part with them to the merchant by the quintals (112lb.), and get in return from the merchant the 100lb. net of any article he might require. A pleasing feature of this Bill was the provision for uniformity of weights and measures, and consequently the dissatisfaction between the merchant and fisherman would be removed, but still he would much prefer the wine measure. He thought section 36, appointing inspectors, could readily be dispensed with, and the country saved so much money. The present Weights and Measures Act had been a very expensive one to the Dominion. In 1875 the expenditure was $69,969; in 1876, it was $99,784, and in 1877 the expenditure was $111,084, and the only return was $50,423. Last year, by some unknown circumstances, the outlay was slightly less. He contended that the benefits derived from this service was not sufficiently adequate to this immense outlay, and if this House considered a Bill of some description necessary to prevent unfair dealing, let the section referred to be struck out, and the Dominion furnish weights and measures to each municipality or county, and allow them to carry out the further intentions of the Bill in their meetings of council, as they from time to time might think proper. By this means many a poor trader would be saved the expense of the large annual tax now imposed upon him.

MR. BOLDUC said that he desired to draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue to the third paragraph of the twentieth section of the Act now submitted to the consideration of the House. Under this section a person selling his products by any other weight than the Imperial pound would be liable to pay a fine of twenty dollars. He believed that it would have been preferable to impose this fine upon the purchasers who obliged the sellers to sell their goods by the old French weights. The hucksters in the Quebec market dealt unfairly with the farmers by this means, and took advantage of their good faith in order to deceive them, and he thought that the only means of doing away with this abuse, was to impose a fine upon buyers who should continue to oblige the farmers to sell their produce by French weight, for they were the ones who were interested in perpetrating this abuse. The means proposed might appear radical, but he thought it was the only way of making the hucksters cease from dealing unfairly with the farmers, and to great evils strong remedies must be applied.

MR. MILLS said the hon. gentleman ought to have introduced this Bill ten weeks ago, and if he was not prepared with it then it was obvious he was not prepared with it now. It was perfectly obvious that it was not in the public interest this Bill was introduced. But the hon. gentlemen opposite had not the courage to dismiss all the inspectors appointed by the late Administration, and so they introduced this Bill to provide indirectly for the dismissal of all those appointed as inspectors of weights and measures by the late Administration. He found that the new provisions of the hon. gentleman were already law, and yet he introduced them as new measures. Evidently he had not given this Bill very careful consideration.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman opposite said they had no moral courage; well, they did not desire to have the pluck of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who had taken $40,000 more than was required from the public chest, in order to make places for their political friends. If this Act had become unpopular, it was owing altogether to the way it had been administered by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and not from any inherent faults of its own. It was called for by the numerous frauds and the increasing diversity between the various weights and measures. It was absolutely necessary that a standard should be introduced. The measure introduced by his hon. friend would diminish the expense of the administration of the law without decreasing its efficiency and without weakening the protection which the measure was intended to afford the people from fraud. The grouping of the counties, the diminution of the number of employes, and the easing off of the stern aspect of some of the clauses, would be attained by the Bill of his hon. friend. He was sure the enormous expense of the original measure would be reduced by this Bill. He did not mean to say that the late Administration was responsible for much of that expense. They carried out, by their appointments, the measure of their predecessors, and, therefore, their predecessors must bear the blame of any expense which experience had proved to be uncalled for. He should suppose the hon. gentlemen opposite would gladly hail these amendments and support them. He should hope that hon. gentlemen opposite would greatly hail the amendments, which experience called for, and which would give a diminution of expenditure without a decrease of efficiency. As regarded the question of appointments, he did not think, in this age of the Dominion, that it should be discussed here. It was scarcely worth while for the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to say that this Bill was introduced simply for the purpose of dismissing one set of officials and appointing another. This Bill had been introduced with a sincere desire to make the law more workable, and popular, and economic in expenditure.

MR. LAURIER said it was very fine to hear the hon. the Premier say that no officers would be dismissed, except so far as compatible with the working of the Act. He hoped that would be the case, because, if otherwise, a serious question would arise for the consideration of the Government. All the officers at present appointed under the Act were civil servants, and could not be dismissed, under the law, without proper compensation. This consideration would have to weigh with the Government when they would come to the serious task of appointing officers under the new Act. He took issue with the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue on the principle of the Bill—that this was a matter calculated to diminish the expenditure. The hon. gentleman had said that he was acting in conformity with the suggestions made by an officer of the Department; but if he (Mr. Laurier) understood the suggestions, they were not made so much with the views of diminishing expense as of providing a uniform administration of the Act. It was impossible to provide for the principle of uniformity, and at the same time diminish the expenditure. He did not see how in administering this law by means of agents travelling from place to place, whose travelling expenses would have to be paid, that expenditure could be diminished. The diminution in the number of salaries would be more than counterbalanced by the extra expenses of these officers in the discharge of their duty. In the case, for instance, of an agent who, started from Quebec, travelled as far as the Magdalen Islands, 600 miles distant, and thence along the Labrador coast, the expenses would exceed his salary. He dissented from the opinion of the hon. gentleman that this Act was calculated to diminish the expenditure.

MR. MCCUAIG said in the part of the country where he resided, the people considered the law was necessary, but found great fault with its administration. The expenditure was greater than they expected, and he was glad the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue had introduced legislation upon the subject, with a view to reducing expenditure.

MR. BOULTBEE said he did not think there was any piece of legislation brought in by the present Government, more satisfactory to the country than this. The late Act, when worked, was found to be an intolerable nuisance. The men who had the carrying of it out, seemed to have been appointed chiefly as a reward for political service, and seemed to try and make as much out of it as they could. For the most part they were not at all civil or obliging, and there was no uniformity whatever in the system. This Bill secured uniformity, and even if the cost were a little more than under the present law, which he did not believe would be the case, the country would be satisfied. The present Government would take care that proper men would be appointed, and they would be instructed to do their work in a proper manner, not like the others, harrasing the people needlessly.

MR. BABY said, in answer to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), who stated the object of the Bill decreasing expenditure would not be attained, he would say that he had been guided in framing this Bill, in a great measure, by the very efficient officers who were at the head of the office. The report was made by Mr. Johnson, and corroborated by the other officers of the Department, who were conversant with the matter, and who had devoted considerable time to its study, to the effect that this system would make a great saving to the country; and he based upon this report, in that respect, as he did in several others, the Bill which he now submitted. The hon. gentleman said the reduction made in the salaries would be more than counterbalanced by the additional travelling expenses. This was not correct, and, at a glance, he would see that he was in error. The Act, as it now existed, and in the loose way in which it was carried out, was a loss to the country of about $50,000 per annum. The revenue derived from the fees collected on stamping and verification by the officers, was about $33,000, whilst the expenditure under it was above $81,000, including salaries and contingencies, such as office rents, fuel, light, travelling expenses, etc. Now, under this Bill, they would have but a small amount to pay in salaries, &c., say $40,000. There was a very small margin, and he did not doubt that it would bring about the contemplated reduction of about $40,000. The object of the Government in making a verification biennially, instead of annually, was to obviate the necessity of keeping the officers continually moving about, and thus entailing a large expenditure in travelling expenses. The Government would see that those officers did their duty in an economical manner, without diminishing in any way the protection the public had a right to look for at their hands. The hon. member for Bothwell, in that off-hand style which so-called philosophers occasionally adopted, said the promoter of the Bill did not know exactly its contents. The hon. member concluded from the particular to the general, in saying, because he thought the scale-maker could not sell his scales unstamped under the old law, that the promoter of this Bill did not know its contents at all. This was strange logic in the mouth of that gentleman assuredly. It was the hon. gentleman who was ignorant of the contents of the Bill, for, by referring to the forty-fourth clause, he would see the difference indicated, that was to say, that by the new law the manufacturer could keep his scales in his manufactory without being obliged to have them stamped; but the moment he gave them up to the trade he must have them verified, a provision certainly not contained in the law now existing. Now, curiously enough, the hon. member said that the Bill contained nothing new, and, in the same breath, hurled his objections against it, alleging that there was no time at this late period of the Session to look into the many new enactments contained in the Bill. With regard to the remarks made by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Bolduc), the Government would certainly take them into consideration, but he could not see his way to do all that his hon. friend suggested. With respect to the case of the Quebec hucksters, who contrived to get the country farmers to sell their provisions by the old French measure, which was a clear loss to them, he (Mr. Baby) would represent to him that it would be difficult to say to the buyers: "You shall not buy what the seiler wishes to sell you," because he could sell in bulk and always defeat the law, by saying, "I cannot sell by the pound or the measure, but I will sell you the articles you require in bulk." He had met, as far as possible, the views of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain), which were exactly the same as those of the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Bolduc). By the law introduced, any contract which was made without a measure, contrary to the Act, was null and void. That was the only clause that could be introduced under the circumstances.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said that he had always thought that one of the great defects of the Weights and Measures Act, was the permission of the use of two different standard gallons. He saw no good reason why two different measures of capacity should be allowed.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) said he concurred in the view of the hon. gentleman who had just spoken. The parties interested had had sufficient time to prepare for a change. Those two measures had been before the country for two or three years, and it was high time for a change.

MR. ANGLIN said he thought the feeling of the business community was against the use of the Imperial measure, the introduction of which was a great mistake, that had produced great inconvenience in business. He thought that, in New Brunswick, the old measure was the one preferred. The old measure was used in the United States, with which we dealt largely.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said, if it would be a good thing to adopt the standard from the 1st May, 1880, it would be a good thing to adopt it from May, 1879. He thought it was very desirable that either the wine or Imperial measure should be adopted for all sales and purchases. Fraud was often perpetrated through the use of those different measures.

On section 19,

MR. BOURBEAU asked if, after a bushel of oats was measured rasée, or even with the top, it did not weigh 34lb., would the buyer have the right to demand enough more oats to make up the 34lb.?

MR. BABY: If they are bought by weight they must weigh 34lb. to the bushel; if they are bought by the measure the full bushel will suffice. If there is no agreement, the bushel by weight can be exacted.

MR. BOURBEAU said there ought to be a special clause put in to that effect. He hoped that not only the retail dealers would be obliged to sell by measure, but the wholesale dealers also.

MR. BABY said the law made no exception between dealers. In reference to a remark of the hon. gentleman from Gloucester, he would say that he believed the great majority of the traders in New Brunswick were in favour of the Imperial measure. What they wanted was a uniform measure, although, in certain parts of New Brunswick, the Imperial measure was unknown. In the city of St. John, a great many merchants had told him they would prefer to keep the wine measure, because they bought by the Imperial measure from England, and they retailed by the wine measure. The proviso in the law was to meet that difficulty. The hon. gentleman from Stanstead (Mr. Colby) and other hon. gentlemen representing the border counties, had asked him to introduce this proviso, because they dealt largely with the United States, where the wine measure was the measure of the country.

Section agreed to.

On section 28,

MR. WRIGHT said the second subsection might be amended. It allowed manufacturers to keep on hand, or in store, certain scales without being inspected, but did not allow them to sell them without inspection. They could not inspect a Fairbanks' hay scales till they were put up. Besides, by the adjusters, in the best scales, one could, with a few turns of a screw, secure an incorrect result. The inspection of those scales could do no good. This Act might be useful for wine or dry measures, but, when applied to weights or weighing machines, he did not see it was of any use, while imposing a tax for nothing.

MR. BABY said there was an Order in Council respecting those scales, and it was for the Department to see that they were correct. A great many things called scales were forfeited and not allowed to be sold.

MR. HOOPER said he would like to know with regard to the 27th clause, if it was the intention of the Bill that every beam in the possession of farmers should be stamped.

MR. BABY said the Act would apply only to trailers.

(In the Committee.)

273 To provide a grant to assist in giving to the forthcoming Ontario Exhibition (to be held at Ottawa) a Dominion character; the distribution of the grant or any part thereof to be applied and apportioned in such way as to satisfy the Minister of Agriculture $5,000 00

MR. TILLEY said the object of this grant was to give this Exhibition a Dominion character, and to distribute medals to the different competitors. Circulars would be addressed to the different Provinces to induce them to enter their products at the Exhibition.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not consider that people in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and New Brunswick would send any products in animals or perishable commodities, to Ottawa, merely to enter into competition with the people of this neighbourhood. It was very difficult, even in Ontario, to get people to bring from the extreme west to the extreme east the products of the farm for competition. The Agricultural Society of Ontario, at its last Exhibition here, had great difficulty in inducing people having costly herds of cattle to send them to this place, and far less would it be possible to induce them to send from the different Provinces to one centre. A Dominion Association had been organised some two or three years ago, but so far as he was aware very little was done except to have a few of those appointed directors who took some interest in the breeding of a certain class of cattle. Had any concerted action taken place with the Dominion Association, or was this merely a vote without any definite plan.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was sorry the Minister of Agriculture, on account of indisposition, was unable to be present. Very strong representations had been made to the Government on behalf of the Agricultural Association of Ontario, that this exhibition, to be held at the seat of Government, should be given a Dominion character. Mr. Wilnot, the President of this Association, and Senator Christie, had been in communication with the Agricultural Association of the Province of Quebec, with whom they were, he understood, acting in concert. The Province of Quebec had given up their exhibition in order to join with Ontario in a joint exhibition. Communications had also been opened with the Maritime Provinces to induce them to send here specimens of their various products. No doubt, as far as their valuable animals were concerned, not many could be sent from the Lower Provinces, but their productions of all other descriptions could well be sent.

MR. MILLS said the danger of the proposition was that it would be difficult to lead the people of other Provinces to believe that this grant was not for a purely Provincial Exhibition, inasmuch as it would be impossible for them, without great cost and risk, to send many of their products here; and, whenever an exhibition would be held in any of those Provinces, a demand would be made on this Government for a similar grant. Why should Manitoba, British Columbia, or Prince Edward Island be called on to contribute—for, this being paid out of the Dominion Treasury, they did contribute—towards an exhibition to which, owing to the great distance and expense, coupled with the uncertainty of success, they would be precluded from sending their products?

274 Pacific Railway, west of Red River, including Bridge and Branch to Winnipeg. $1,000,000 00

MR. TUPPER said the object of putting this vote in the Estimates was to carry out the engagement made by the Government and communicated to the Railway Committee. The members of that Committee would remember that application was made to obtain a charter to construct a line of railway from the Canadian Pacific Railway, where it was to cross the Red River at Selkirk, and running in a south and westerly direction for some hundred miles or more, after it had reached a certain distance south of Lake Manitoba. The Government, when they came to consider this question, found there would be reason to apprehend that, in the design of carrying the Canadian Pacific Railway line by the narrows of Lake Manitoba, if the charter was granted for this line, which seemed to be urgently demanded in the interests of colonisation, it might form a very serious competing line with the Canadian Pacific when constructed. But, after considering the subject, it was decided that, at present, at all events, with a view to promote the flourishing communities on lands in that direction, it would be better to carry the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway south of Lake Manitoba. It would serve the double purpose of getting extension westwardly, and affording facilities to carry on the business of the settlements that were already being established to the south of the lake. Under these circumstances, as he had already stated in the Railway Committee, it would be impossible for the Government to refuse to allow a charter for the line which they considered likely to come into competition with the Canadian Pacific, and, at the same time, take no measure to carry on the work. This vote was for the purpose of bridging the Red River and extending the line westward. In the charter which was asked for by the hon. member for Selkirk, no extension was proposed from Winnipeg to strike this main line when constructed. The Government considered it would not be desirable that that connection should be in the hands of private individuals; that it would be better, as it would be a third branch from the main line, that that connection from the town of Winnipeg should be made by the Government, and he (Mr. Tupper) proposed to ask in the resolutions he had already laid on the table, the authority of Parliament, not only to make a contract without submitting it to Parliament previous to its becoming effective, for the western extension, but also for the extension of a branch from that main line to the town of Winnipeg.

MR. MACKENZIE said then the Committee was to understand that the Government had deliberately determined, in spite of the reports of the engineers, to change the route at this place.

MR. TUPPER said he intended to convey no such idea. He was disposed to concur in the views of the engineers and of his predecessor, as to the best line for the Pacific Railway, provided they were in a position to go on vigorously and rapidly constructing the line from Lake Superior to the shores of the Pacific; but when they came to consider the question, either of refusing a charter to these parties, or of allowing them to establish a line which bade fair to come into competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway, it had been decided to deflect the main line south of Lake Manitoba. Ultimately, when the country became settled, and it became a matter of importance to shorten the distance, it was quite possible that the original idea might be carried out. In the meantime, this line was to form a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

MR. MACKENZIE: For what distance does the hon. gentleman propose to ask the House to allow the Government to let the contract?

MR. TUPPER: For one hundred miles, reaching beyond Portage-la-Prairie.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. MACKENZIE said if it was Portage-la-Prairie that it was proposed to reach, it would be better to state that in the resolution.

MR. TUPPER said this line would carry them in close proximity to Portage-la-Prairie, and the 100 miles were merely mentioned, as it was necessary to give some limit to Parliament. It did not necessarily involve the immediate putting of the 100 miles under contract, or any further section than was required by the settlements.

MR. MACKENZIE said this was the first time that Parliament had been asked to give authority for building a railroad, the route of which had not been surveyed, and it would be necessary for the Government, in taking that authority, to define, in some way, the points to which, and through which, the road was to pass.

MR. TUPPER said there was no location, but a good deal of country had been surveyed.

MR. MACKENZIE said people had walked over it, and they knew the country, generally, very well, and it had been ascertained principally that it presented no physical difficulties. He observed from the resolutions—the discussion of which he would not anticipate to-night—that it was proposed to examine other passes in the Rocky Mountains, from 100 to 200 miles further north than the one selected some time ago, as the most open pass to be found, and now, while they were going north at the west end, they were going south at the east end. By diverging southward from Selkirk, it would make the route a great deal longer than Mr. Fleming stated would be the length of the road by the Northern route. Mr. Fleming had placed the additional mileage to Yellow Head Pass at thirty miles, and the additional expenditure at $1,000,000. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was wholly opposed to deflecting the line for any ordinary local advantage to such an extent as to increase the mileage expenditure so much. It was the old, settled portions of Canada that had to pay all these bills, and their interest as taxpayers ought to be considered quite as much as those of the settlers who had gone into that country under more favourable circumstances than those under which the settlers of the old Provinces of Canada settled. He had always said that, if the cost was trifling, local interests should be considered, but, in a matter where the cost would be $1,000,000, and the additional mileage thirty, he thought it was a great technical mistake that, when the whole line would be constructed, the people would have to pay for thirty miles additional freight and passenger rates for all time. Where the country was open, and the roads perfectly natural in all directions, they ought to pay the greatest possible regard to those considerations which related to the ultimate trade and prosperity of the country. He could not help feeling that the Government had made a mistake in thus acting. Of course he could do nothing more than utter his protest; his advice was not sought or heeded. The hon. gentleman had a majority behind his back, able to carry through anything he chose to propose. He regretted that such a course should have been followed, in spite of the advice of the engineers, and in spite of the proposal, which was shadowed in the distance, of the hon. gentleman taking the Northern route, in order to pass through the Rocky Mountain range. He would like to know whether any estimate had been made of the cost of crossing the river at Selkirk, and what proportion of this vote was intended to be devoted to that, what proportion to grading the road, and also what was to be the length of the branch from this railroad into the town of Winnipeg?

MR. DAWSON said that the engineers whose opinions were best worth having, had never been consulted in reference to the route to be adopted. The present system, if system it might be called, precluded the opinions of the field engineers from reaching the public, or even the Government, until it was too late to correct the blunders which a desire of making the line conform to preconceived notions, as to the route, without reference to the character of the ground, had occasioned. This had led to the great and unnecessary expenditure taking place in the Rat Portage section. There should be a Board of Engineers, or a Board of Commissioners, to supervise such a vast expenditure; a Board which could analyse the reports of the engineers, and place all the circumstances fairly, and without prejudice, before the Government. To his (Mr. Dawson's) knowledge, engineers who knew anything of the country between Lake Superior and Manitoba, were generally averse to going north by Rat Portage when there was every evidence of a better and shorter line to the south; a line, too, which, in opening it in the first instance, would have cost $10,000,000 less than the one adopted would. There was, at present, a very bad, a very unsatisfactory state of things existing at Rat Portage; and, between that place and Manitoba, a state of things which could never have arisen if there had been a competent Board to look after the work. He would, however, say no more on this matter, as it was understood that an investigation was to be made. But he could not insist too strongly on a complete change in the system of management. The cost of a competent Board would be a small matter where such a vast expenditure was being made. He meant a Board in communication with, and acting directly for the Government.

In answer to Mr. RYAN (Marquette),

MR. TUPPER said it certainly was not desirable that, before the resolutions were submitted, there should be any expression of opinion on them. He merely took the opportunity of saying that his predecessor (Mr. Mackenzie) was very wrong in supposing that his advice was neither desired or heeded. He (Mr. Tupper) felt extremely anxious to have the benefit of the assistance and experience of every hon. gentleman who had given this subject any consideration. In saying that, because the Government had a majority at their back, they could do anything they pleased, the hon. gentleman mistook the temperament of the majority of the House. While the Government had a considerable majority in support of their general policy, they felt that, in order to retain the confidence of that majority, they must bring forward measures that commended themselves to their independence. The hon. member for Lambton had drawn attention to the fact that this work had to be constructed by the older portions of the country, and, therefore, objected to the line being extended south, because that would increase the cost. He (Mr. Tupper) would merely remind that hon. gentleman that there were two things to be considered. First, that the line had to be constructed, and, secondly, that it had to be maintained, and if, by lengthening it a little, it could be carried through a fertile country that would be rapidly settled, and in which it would maintain itself, it was undoubtedly desirable to do so.

MR. MILLS said he regretted that the hon. gentleman should have combined his Pacific Railway scheme with provisions embodying a colonisation scheme. They were wholly distinct. The result would be to largely increase the expense of railway construction, and put impediments in the way of the progress of the work. The hon. gentleman had just made a statement that was inconsistent with itself. The hon. gentleman told the House that the only reason for departing from the located line across the Narrows of the Lake of the Woods, was that the country through which the road would run in that direction was unsettled. It was perfectly obvious that, if the road were taken over a settled country without any previous arrangement, it might injure this colonisation scheme. Speculation would be incited by the division of saleable land, in order to increase the fund for railway purposes. He would say, further, that, if the hon. gentleman took the road north of the Riding Mountains, he would, of course, strike the line already located, at a point that would be most desirable to take the road, in the Peace River district. But, if he took the west, as he must do if he was going in any way to accommodate settlers, he would carry his road to a point that would make it extremely inconvenient. He did not agree with the Minister of Public Works that the building of a branch railway from Winnipeg or Selkirk into the country now being settled, the Little Saskatchewan, was in any sense a rival or competing line with the Canadian Pacific Railway as located. He believed it would be a valuable tributary of the road from Selkirk eastward to Lake Superior. A year and a half ago he had pointed out to the people in that district, if the road had been run westward to the south of Lake Manitoba, and into the Little Saskatchewan country, that they would not have received their lands as homesteads on the payment of a fee of ten dollars, but would have had to pay the value of those lands in aid of the construction of the road; and that, if a road tributary to the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, they would be subjected to no hardship or injustice in being required to contribute one or two dollars an acre towards the cost. He never met anyone who objected to that idea. The Minister of Public Works was taking the road into that country at the expense of the Public Treasury without any assurance that the people who received so much benefit from it would contribute anything towards it. If he had left that undertaking to some private company receiving aid in public lands along the line of the road, it would have been built at once without any cost to the country. Last year gentlemen, offered to pay into the Treasury 10 or 12 per cent. of the construction capital as an assurance that they would proceed with the work at once. What would have been done at once and without any charge upon the Public Treasury, the hon. gentleman now proposed to accomplish by its funds. His proposal was to take possession of roads that would be better managed for the public generally, as well as for the people in localities particularly interested, by private companies, than by the Government.

rate of $50,000 per annum, to line of steamers to trade

Indies and Brazil (provided Brazilian Government).... 37,500 00

In answer to Mr. CARTWRIGHT,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the way in which this project arose was through a visit of an official of the Brazilian Government to Canada. The Roche line of steamers, that formerly plied between ports of the United States and Rio, having been refused a subsidy formerly received from the United States Government, had ceased running, when it was suggested that the present would be a good opportunity for the Canadian Government to take up this project in the interest of Canadian trade. They were assured that the Brazilian Government would readily co-operate, with a subsidy, for the support of that line, which could be established between Canada, Rio, and the West Indies. The steamers would ply from Halifax or Montreal in summer, and Halifax in winter, as might be determined, calling at St. Thomas, which was a point of distribution for the West Indies, and thence proceeding to Rio. They were informed that, in addition to this, there would be no difficulty in establishing a branch line to the Argentine Republic, a coast line connecting the River Platte with Rio. It was not proposed that this projected Canadian subsidised line should go further at present than Rio, and the trips would be monthly.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: How many steamers will be required? The voyage proposed would be tolerably long.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is proposed that three substantial steamers will do the work.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Of what size?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: From 1,800 to 2,500 tons burthen. It is believed that, with a certainty of the establishment of a Canadian line, touching at St. Thomas twice a month, going and returning, we shall induce the West Indies, or the British West Indies at all events, to meet it with another line.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that would be a very considerable advantage. The subsidy would have to be for a term of years.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Three years.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that any information as to the extent of trade that might be expected with Brazil would be very desirable. Of course, a considerable quantity of sugar could be brought back to Canada, and it would be interesting to know what kind of trade could be carried on with that country.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that Mr. Darling, the Brazilian Consul-General at Montreal, had furnished a very interesting memorandum on the subject, and as to what he believed should be the chief object of such an international trade. He proposed the establishment of a museum in Montreal, for example, for the exhibition of agricultural implements and other manufactures consumed in Brazil and the West Indies, which would show our manufacturers the kind of market they might supply. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) presumed that a museum could be opened at Rio for the exhibition of the commodities of Canada required.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Will the hon. gentleman lay that memorandum on the table of the House?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: The line, as I understand, that it is intended to establish, formerly plied between Brazil and the United States. It is not intended it should be allowed to touch at United States ports?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: They will not call at United States ports. Roche's line formerly had a grant from the United States and Brazil. But they failed to obtain a renewal of it by the United States Congress the last two Sessions, and I understand the proprietors, having abandoned hopes of the subsidy, have given up that service. It was thought, therefore, that it was worth while trying this experiment, the subsidy being so small.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that he agreed that, if the Brazilian Government was going to subsidise that line, the experiment was worth trying.

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said these two items were inserted by mistake, and should be struck out.

MR. ANGLIN said he proposed to avail himself of the opportunity afforded by this error of offering a suggestion to the right hon. gentleman. He thought the hon. gentleman would find if the Indians were to be taught agriculture, that some of the religious associations formed for the purpose of teaching useful arts, such as agricultural and mechanical arts, would impart this knowledge at a very cheap rate. They were persons who devoted themselves to this kind of life from philanthropic motives, and merely required sufficient to provide themselves with food and clothing.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was satisfied that the best civilizers were missionaries, both Catholic and Protestant, and the matter would be taken into consideration.

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked how many persons were supposed to compose the Board of Experts, and what were their duties and salaries to be.

MR. TILLEY said that matter had not been finally settled. It was contemplated that such persons should be added to the number of employés here at Ottawa. The scheme, however, had not been properly worked out. Then, persons would be employed for the purpose of ascertaining the value of goods from the different parts of the world, and the proper value upon which they should be entered when received into the Dominion.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. gentleman had said nothing with regard to the outside service.

MR. TILLEY said at present it was impossible for them to say that their arrangements would be in that respect. Officers would be placed at the principal ports, and the most vulnerable points in the Dominion.

42 Expenses of Committees, Extra Sessional Clerks, &c... 10,300 00

MR. CARTWRIGHT said there ought to be a distinct supplementary vote for sessional clerks, otherwise there could be no sort of control over them, as there was no doubt, under the present system, very considerable abuse had been committed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said no doubt the whole system wanted reform. The expense of this House was excessive. The Government were endeavouring to establish what would be the best mode of avoiding it in the future, and had come to the conclusion there should be no extra sessional writers or messengers at all. They should be considered permanent officers to be employed only during the Session, and paid for the Session, the rest of the year being free to them, but would be required to attend every Session, and to do night work when there was a rush of work to be done. By this means, hon. members could inform those who solicited them for positions as sessional clerks or messengers, that they had no patronage in that respect, that the positions were all filled by permanent employes, and that no additional men would be taken on outside of the assigned number.

MR. MILLS said he did not think the hon. gentleman opposite (Sir John A. Macdonald) had succeeded in accounting for the extravagance of the expenditure on extra clerks this Session, by the change in the system. He might as well have engaged one hundred as seventy-five. The doors of the House were literally besieged in the early part of the Session by applicants for these situations. Last Session the number was forty-one, the largest ever employed before; but several were dismissed when there was nothing for them to do. This Session for five weeks those clerks had nothing to do for their pay. The Clerk had applied for six or seven, and got over seventy. Last Session the present Premier insisted on the vote being cut down some $8,000 or $10,000; but this year $20,000 went for sessional clerks. A number of them were newspaper writers, who had denounced the policy of the party in Opposition, and had supported that of the party on the Treasury benches. Those writers, therefore, had been paid for their services out of the Pub Treasury.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : No.

MR. MILLS said yes ; many of those clerks had nothing to do up to this hour. The member for King's, N.B., had had two of those clerks assisting him as private secretaries in his private business at the cost of the Public Treasury, and other hon. gentlemen opposite had received similar benefits. It was not desirable that the hon. Premier should ask the House to make the additional appropriation, or to interfere with the strict audit of the accounts at the inception of the new system. The only excuse for the payment of sums of this sort without any appropriation was some unforeseen circumstance necessitating an expenditure subsequent to a Session.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he believed they could economise other votes connected with Parliament sufficiently to pay this extra expense. The hon. gentlemen opposite followed a similar course. The Government would undertake to submit a scheme next Session securing a more strict audit of the accounts.

MR. ANGLIN said that, if the leader of the Government, as he had promised, made the sessional clerks permanent members of the Civil Service for the future, he hoped he would remember the claims of clerks who had served the country efficiently during the last five years, and not pursue a one-sided system in the appointments.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that some of the old servants ought to be considered, and would be.

On Resolution 77, Intercolonial Railway extension to deep water at St. John, $100,000,

MR. DOMVILLE said, in bringing up the matter he now proposed to bring before the House, he had no other object than to do his duty to the Lower Provinces. It was felt that a grievance existed there in regard to the freight rates on the Intercolonial Railway. The other night he brought the matter before the Minister of Public Works, but he was sorry to hear that things were so ordered that nothing could be done to benefit the people of those Provinces in this direction. They complained that it was a grievance that the freights from Ontario to the Lower Provinces should be higher than the freights from the Lower Provinces to Ontario. He (Mr. Domville) did not bring this matter up as a complaint against the Government. His past action showed, and the country was aware, that he was entirely in accord in every way with the present Government. He felt that the Minister of Public Works, when this matter was thoroughly considered by him, would exert his influence in order to place the people of the Lower Provinces in a better position. He (Mr. Domville) trusted his action would not be considered antagonistic to the Government. At this late hour he did not wish to take up the time of the House, further than to state his objection on the parts of the people of the Lower Provinces, more especially of New Brunswick, and of King's County there, against any discrimination in freights on Government railways, and, therefore, he would move that the following words be added to the said Resolution :

"And in the opinion of this House all rates for freight to any station in Canada shall not be greater than through rates from Chicago or any point in the Western States of America ; also, through rates for freight to any intermediate station on the Intercolonial Railway shall not be greater than rates for similar kinds of freight to terminal points of the said Railway. That no preferential rates of freight shall be given to anyone, manufacturer, farmer, merchant or trader, over another for similar class of goods over the same distances on the Intercolonial Railway; that the rate per mile shall be so adjusted from the Maritime Provinces to the Upper Provinces by the Intercolonial Railway that no one shipper will be able to convey his goods at a lower price than his neighbour."

MR. OLIVER said he would suggest that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Domville) should so amend his motion as to make it include all railways under the control of the Government.

MR. TUPPER said it was somewhat strange that the hon. member for King's, N.B., should have taken the present occasion to make this motion. He (Mr. Tupper) quite accorded to that gentleman, and to every other gentleman in the House, the right to use their own independent action in relation to what regarded public interests, and he had no doubt whatever that his hon. friend the member for King's, N.B., (Mr. Domville), in making this motion, believed he was acting entirely in the public interest. But he thought it rather strange that the hon. gentleman, who announced himself in sympathy with the Administration, should take the present opportunity of putting upon the Journals this resolution, having taken no such action on this subject during the past five years when on the Opposition benches. The hon. gentleman had the same opportunity of knowing what the business of the country required then as now, and he was not now in position to state that the freight rates were not as favourable to the country at this moment as during the past five years. The hon. gentleman knew perfectly well that this question of rates on the Intercolonial Railway had from time to time been the subject of discussion, but the hon. gentleman was content merely with an expression of his opinion, and never made a hostile motion in the interest of the country in connection with that question. He (Mr. Tupper) could only say he must beg the House to vote down the resolution of the hon. member for King's. He asked the House to take that course, because it would be impossible to allow this motion to be carried, without completely changing the whole system under which the Intercolonial Railway was managed, and bringing upon the country an enormous additional expenditure. The hon. gentleman had undertaken to affirm a proposition in relation to the management of the railway, which his hon. predecessor and every hon. gentleman in the House, who had any acquaintance with the subject, knew to be practically impossible. It was perfectly well known that, in order to manage railways, they had to change the rates of freight in accordance with the competition, or lose the business. The effect of adopting this resolution would be to entail an enormous additional cost on the country. If the House and the people of the country were willing that the railway should be run at the cost of a million dollars instead of half a million dollars, he would not have a word to say, and would submit with the best possible grace. But he did not believe that either the House or the country was prepared to adopt such a policy. Take the article of pig iron. What would be the result of adopting the policy the hon. gentleman proposed, that of increasing the rates upon that kind of freight? The result would simply be to drive that kind of traffic away from the line. Would that be any benefit to the country? Would it be any benefit to the iron manufacturers at Londonderry, or at St. John? Such freight came together with freight of a general character, a large portion of which was remunerative, and from which they derived a fair and legitimate return. The result of refusing iron at the present rates, would be to send all that freight which came over the Intercolonial to United States ports. The motion of his hon. friend he believed to be ill-advised, and one which would result in reducing the receipts of the Intercolonial Railway. The Government had not increased the rates, but the hon. gentleman knew that wherever a change had been made, it had been made in the other direction. In regard to ocean cargoes, the Government had ventured further than their predecessors, and they had done everything that they could to endeavour to direct business to the Intercolonial. They had used every possible means for the purpose of reducing the expenditure of operating the road, and had endeavoured to bring about a nearer equilibrium between the receipts and expenditure of the road than had existed before. And they were prepared, wherever it was possible, to foster the trade or business of the country at as cheap a rate as they possibly could, without utterly disregarding the principles upon which a great work like that must be run.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was quite impossible that the motion of the hon. gentleman could be carried if the House had any regard for the principles upon which trade must be conducted. They must see at once that, by carrying a motion of that sort, they must either impose very heavy burdens on the country or drive the trade to other seaports than Halifax or St. John. He was quite sure, from the attention he had given this matter himself, that no one living on the line of the Intercolonial Railroad had any fair right to complain in regard to the rates. No railroad on the continent carried traffic so regularly or so cheaply as they had been carrying traffic on that road. The country was already sufficiently taxed in order to operate this road, and it was utterly impossible for any great line of railway to avoid entering into traffic arrangements with the lines at its termini. They would destroy their traffic by doing so, and he felt bound to support the Government and vote against the motion of the hon. member for King's.

MR. DOMVILLE said he hardly thanked his hon. friend the Minister of Public Works for the castigation he had given him that evening. He desired to state that the reason why he had not brought this up before, under the former Administration, was that he did not see any possibility of the motion being carried. He did not think the hon. gentleman had given an answer to the part of his motion relating to preferential rates being given to one man over another. He did not think the hon. gentleman had any right to characterise him as an independent member. He (Mr. Domville) wished to stand by his party, even if the party did not stand by him. He thought that, in bringing this matter forward, he had merely done his duty, and he would not have made the motion had he thought that he would embarrass the Government.

MR. TUPPER said there was no member of the House more anxious to meet the spirit of the resolution than he was himself, and, if he asked the House to reject the resolution, he did so from a constrained sense of duty. The hon. gentleman said he had not answered the last part of his argument in reference to parties doing business at places on the line. He maintained that, in the policy upon which the Intercolonial was administered, there was no discrimination. From station to station every individual stood in precisely the same position. There might be distinctions in favour of parties creating a great industry, but that was done for the purpose of promoting the interests of the country, and in order to carry on and sustain a great industry. That was a principle recognised in all the commercial transactions in the world. All parties stood in precisely the same relation to the road, provided their business was of the same character.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: As my hon. friend has had an opportunity of explaining his views, and has heard the acceptance of what he considered the most important branch of his resolution, I would ask him to withdraw his resolution.

Amendment (Mr. Domville), with leave of the House, withdrawn.

Resolution read the first and second times and agreed to.

On Resolution 78, Intercolonial Railway, nutlocks, $40,000.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had looked over the papers in connection with these nutlocks, and his conviction was that the Government had made a bad bargain. They had been imposed upon in some way, or were made the victims of a conspiracy. Mr. Senecal was well known to be one of a class of railway speculators, who lived by their wits in connection with contracts. He was well known as the gentleman who succeeded in defeating the member for Quebec East in Arthabaska by a profuse use of means in some of the parishes of that county. He was well known as one who was constantly engaged in work of this kind for the hon. gentlemen opposite. It was found in these papers that the request was made that this patent should be used. The person who had the patent went about telling his story not long ago, here and elsewhere ; but he had, like the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville), been arranged with, and had disappeared. The fact was that, while Mr. Senecal asked $100 per mile, the Government offered $55 per mile, without having a computation made by any practical engineer as to the cost of the article, the necessity for it, or its utility. He was informed also, that, while Mr. Senecal had a contract at $55 per mile, he was sub-letting the doing of the work for about $16 per mile, and that there were altogether 750 of those bolt locks to be put on each mile of the road, each of which was not worth over one cent, with another cent for putting on. The Government should have advertised for tenders for these articles. The sum was a large one, $40,000, and $40,000 would not be sufficient at $55 per mile, if all the Government railways were to be done over. If it was thought desirable to have these nut-locks on the bolts, tenders should have been asked, and the Government should have seen, by application to the Mechanical Engineer at the head of the workshops, that the article was a useful one, that the price was a fair one, and that it could not be as well and as cheaply supplied in their own workshops as by this person. Besides getting $55 per mile, Mr. Senecal was to be supplied with the means of travelling over the line free ; he had two cars specially placed at his disposal. The whole thing was practically useless, and if it were of any use, it could have been done at our own workshops by our own men. It should, at all events, have been submitted, as everything of the kind should be, to the Mechanical Engineer for approval. The opinion, on a question of this kind, of a mere civil engineer, who was unacquainted with plain mechanics, was valueless. The transaction was one, so far as his knowledge extended, that was not justifiable. The price paid was excessive, and no proper plans were taken to ascertain the value of the work.

MR. TUPPER said he could only say with reference to this that the hon. gentleman's knowledge of Mr. Senecal was greater than his. He knew nothing of that gentleman whatever until he came to him with his proposition to apply this patent to the Intercolonial Railway. He (Mr. Tupper) dealt with it in the manner best calculated to secure the interests of the country. He took the opinion on the matter of two gentlemen, as one that necessarily and naturally belonged to them—one, Mr. Fleming, the Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the other, Mr. Schreiber, the Chief Engineer of the railways in operation. Both these gentlemen were well known to the hon. gentleman opposite. They had been entrusted by him with quite as great responsibilities, and their judgment adhered to in matters of quite as great importance as the one under consideration.

MR. MACKENZIE : Never anything of this kind.

MR. TUPPER said he wanted to know if a gentlemen who spent his life as a railway engineer, whose business it was to devise rails, patterns, fastenings, and everything of the kind, was not the person of all others who was competent to speak in reference to the value of an invention of this kind. It was all very well for the hon. gentleman to sit in his place in the House and ex cathedra say what he believed to be the value of these articles.

MR. MACKENZIE : I said I was informed.

MR. TUPPER said he would like to know where he got the authority for the statement that this could be put on and manufactured for a cent. He knew, in the first place, that the right was a patent right, and they had not the right to have them made in the Government workshops, and applied to the road without payment for the patent. He (Mr. Tupper) applied to these gentlemen for their opinion of the character of the work, and they stated in their report, which was on the table, that in their judgment the contrivance was an admirable one, that the object was a most important one, that the operation of a railway involved a tendency of these nuts to become loose and unscrew, and it cost a large amount for the purpose of watching to see that the nuts did not become unscrewed. He had also the evidence of Mr. Light, Chief Engineer of the Provincial Railways in Quebec, that it was a most valuable contrivance, that he had actually applied it, and found it to work satisfactorily. He (Mr. Tupper) had made a calculation of the number of men he could dispense with on the railway, by the adoption of the patent, and found he could save a large number of men by its adoption. The Chief Engineer of the railways in operation, reported it was worth $55 per mile, that was for the McKay patent; the model which he had brought down to the House would give the House an opportunity of seeing whether it was worth a cent a piece. It was made of spring steel, and there was an improvement on it, which caused it to be more simple in its operation, more easily managed, the road altered and repaired with the greatest facility, and the difficulties which applied to the patent were altogether avoided. The application of the patent would save a large sum in the maintenance of the road per annum.

MR. MACKENZIE said why the Government did not acquire this patent themselves, and get the articles made at their own workshops. The road had to be attended to by their own men, at any rate, by whom the work could be done at much less expense than it was possible to make arrangements for with another person. Why was it not sent to the mechanical engineer at the workshops to report upon? Did the hon. gentleman ascertain what Mr. Senecal paid McKay for the patent? Had he done that, they would have known at once what the value of the patent per mile would be and the total sum paid for it, then the actual cost of the article to be purchased. Spring steel was one of the cheapest articles they had. Their own workshops should have been applied to to know what the article could be produced for. This was not done, and, from the information he had obtained, he believed they were paying three times the value of the thing at the very least.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I should like to be informed by the Minister of Public Works if this particular nut-lock is used by any of the other great railroads or not, or if he knows what they have paid for a similar patent?

MR. TUPPER: I am not aware that it is.

MR. KILLAM: What is to be done in the case of Mr. Wiser, whose patent has been used on the Prince Edward Island Railway and the Intercolonial?

MR. TUPPER: That matter is being investigated. The Government have no right to use a patent without acquiring it.

MR. MACKENZIE: The Government can use a patent in the first place if they like to pay the value of it. They have done so repeatedly.

MR. TUPPER: The Government can use the patent, and, on the report of the Commissioner of Patents, pay the patentee.

Resolutions 79 to 87, and 89 to 102, read the first and second times, and agreed to.

On Resolution 103, Ottawa Drill Shed, $15,000,

MR. MACKENZIE said he observed that in the Supplementary Estimates there was a sum of $2,000 for this drill shed within the current year. They were told, after the vote in Committee, that this, with the $5,000 from the city, would be the cost of this building, but now $2,000 more was asked. The cost to the country would be $17,000.

MR. TUPPER: It will make $17,000, but that gives it to us in the current year. The architect reports they have met with difficulties in the foundation which will increase the expenditure and necessitate the use of a different class of bricks.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not think the hon. gentleman should have commenced the work before he got the money.

Resolution read the first and second times, and agreed to.

Resolutions 104 to 120 read the first and second times, and agreed to.

Resolutions 121 to 180 (May 1st) read the first and second times, and agreed to.

Resolutions 181 to 191 and 194 to 196 (May 2nd) read the first and second times, and agreed to.

On Resolution 197, Post Office, $1,758,000,

MR. McLENNAN said he noticed that the cost of the Post Office beyond the revenue had increased from some $91,000 in 1868, to $590,000 in 1877—something like 15c. a head to every man, woman and child in this Dominion, and, as there was a large number of men, women and children in the country who derived no direct advantage from the Post Office, he thought it was worth while enquiring whether they had value for this large expenditure. He found that the increase in the three years, from 1874 to 1877, had about doubled, that was, from $247,000 to $590,000.

MR. MACKENZIE: What was that increase in?

MR. McLENNAN: In the cost of the Post Office Department, beyond its income.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

MR. McLENNAN said he could easily see the process in his own county by which it grew to those proportions. He could easily see it was one of those evils that grew by what it fed on. He knew it was a very unpopular thing to say a word against it, from his experience of it in his own county. He believed that a great number of the post-offices had been established at cross-roads, corners and by-ways, where there was no real necessity for them, and where the people derived no advantage from them. But of course they gave political strength to the Ministry of the day, and everybody knew the process that went on at these corner post-offices. There was a class of literature disseminated through the post-offices that formed the staple of mail matter that he had seen among the people.

AN HON. MEMBER : The Globe.

MR. McLENNAN said the Daily Globe was an important element, no doubt. The process was very well known. The corner postmaster, who was very likely to be a political partisan, retailed the news, just as the itinerant philosopher and bard of old used to do, but with the difference that there was nothing original. There was nothing useful or amusing in those newspapers. Since he had been in the House he had received, as, no doubt, others had received, applications from men in his constituency, who very naturally said there were post-offices at the next corners or cross-roads, and why should they not have them? He (Mr. McLennan) had asked them where they got their letters, and they replied that they got them at a railway station several miles off, where they went to market. He believed that, a good many years ago, when the Post Office expense did not exceed $90,000, there was quite as much facility for any necessary postal requirements as there was at present. The same objection arose with regard to the distribution of letters in the cities. There was a great hue and cry raised, a few years ago, about the great advantage of cheap postal communication with the United States. He did not know that any business man who had correspondence with the United States begrudged to pay five cents for his letters. He believed the delivery of letters in towns and large cities did not facilitate that necessary or important correspondence that was desirable to be delivered. Because, as far as he could understand, people who carried on important and urgent business still kept their boxes in the post-offices, and sent for their letters, and the other handful of correspondence that reached the outskirts of the city, and which was delivered by the postman, would be almost equally valuable whether delivered to-day or to-morrow. He did not know that the family correspondence, or the correspondence of domestics, was of so urgent a character that a few hours in the delivery was a serious matter, or that it was worth while paying for it what it cost the country. He called attention to this matter because he believed it was very important that members in this House should fortify the Government in any attempt that might be made to retrench, and, if $500,000 or so could be saved, it was very desirable and important that it should be done. He thought it was worth while for the Government to consider the experience related a few evenings ago, when the leader of the Opposition explained, in connection with the expenditure on canals, that under a very large expenditure the Government had very few supporters on the route of that expenditure. He thought that, perhaps, as a matter of policy, it might be worth the while of the Government to consider the advisability of making an effort in this direction. He would take the liberty to say to his friends on the Treasury benches that they might, as an experiment, try what the good effect would be of saving a little money.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Just for the novelty of the thing.

MR. McLENNAN : Yes, just for the novelty of the thing. He thought, if it did not accomplish any political purpose, such a saving would have some virtue. He recommended to the notice of the Government the possibility of making a saving in connection with this very large Post Office expenditure.

MR. HESSON said he thought, if there was any part of the administration of the Government that was worthy of commendation, it was their efforts to keep pace with the wants of the country in the new settlements. He was of opinion that they had no right to complain of this expenditure, unless it could be pointed out that the expenditure was not in the interest of the people.

MR. McLENNAN.

MR. HUNTINGTON said there was no doubt that the Post Office expenditure would be much more satisfactory if the deficits could be replaced by revenue returns. They had to consider, as the hon. gentleman had placed the matter fairly before the House, whether they would give the country the best facilities they could derive, or whether they should return to the state of things which formerly existed. The hon. gentleman had condemned the system of free delivery because he did not see the advantage of it. But it must be borne in mind, that the system of free delivery was introduced because it was believed it would produce such an increased correspondence in cities as to make it self-sustaining. Although it had not reached the extent anticipated, there was no doubt the system had increased the correspondence, and had largely facilitated the business of the Post Office Department. The hon. gentleman complained, also, that in certain places in Canada there were post-offices at the corner roads, and that postmasters were appointed for political considerations. He (Mr. Huntington) had no doubt politicians had been appointed postmasters, and that they would be appointed postmasters in time to come. But the postmasters at the corner roads had only a mere pittance for salary, which was no comparison with the benefit which accrued. The post-offices the hon. gentleman referred to had nothing to do with the deficits of which the hon. gentleman complained. It was the railway service and various other Departments which were expensive, as the hon. gentleman would find when he came to deal with the figures. He admitted that the system was expensive, but, if they were to keep pace with other countries, and afford the facilities which were afforded in other countries, they must incur this expenditure. Of course some discretion must be employed in order to see that they did not go too fast. Our railway system was enormously expensive, but he did not suppose the hon. gentleman would ask that stage coaches should be restored and railways ignored. If the hon. gentleman believed there were too many postmasters in his county, it was an easy matter to make a representation to the Government and get rid of them.

But he thought the hon. gentleman would find that these offices contributed very little towards the deficits of which the people complained. At this late stage of the Session, he had no intention of entering into a discussion of the whole question, which was an important question, and which, he thought, might be fairly discussed on this proposition. But, if the money which was expended was fairly expended for the purpose of affording facilities to the people, in regard to the postal arrangements, the expense was not too much, and the people could well afford it. They had not gone faster than the rest of the civilised world. They had increased the facilities of postal communication between Canada and the United States. They had an opportunity of affording the cities a free delivery system, of which he had not heard a complaint, and he thought the House might be asked, in the interest of the intelligence of the country, to wait a little, and to stem the tide during the period of adversity until there was an opportunity for those ameliorations to be justified by a more happy state of business relations. The hon. gentleman had alluded to a speech made in another Chamber, in which speech he believed it was represented, speaking from memory, that in the eight city post-offices, which had a free delivery, there was a deficit in the revenue of from $107,000 to $108,000. In that speech, however, the sale of postage stamps was regarded as a source of revenue. He (Mr. Huntington) desired to call the attention of the House to this fact. The sale of postage stamps was not an indication of the revenue derived from the office where the sale of these stamps took place. The office at Toronto, for example, might sell a great many postage stamps, but a great number of letters might be posted, the stamps of which might have been purchased at other offices. If the distinguished Senator would make enquiries, he would find that, instead of there being a deficit in these various offices of $107,000, there was really an increase of some $56,000 or $58,000. There ought to be some means of remedying this means of acquiring information. He had indicated that the sale of stamps did not show the revenue of an office. When, during his time, they discovered this deficiency, they undertook to remedy it by counting the letters, and they found enough to verify the fact that the sale of stamps was not a criterion by which to judge the revenue. But they did not go so far as they hoped the hon. gentleman hoped to go in making the test complete. He had this to say, that, so far as he knew the administration of the Post Office Department, it was directed by able officers, and officers who understood the work of the Department. The head of the Department might exercise his influence as he liked, but there was there the machinery by which the Post Office Department was directed. And he believed the money voted to that Department was honestly and usefully expended for the public service. It was a fallacious idea that the Post Office Department, in its expenditure, showed an enormous increase, and he wished to call the attention of the House to the fact that he was satisfied the present Government would find there was no necessity for such a reduction as was indicated by the hon. member. So long as the money which the House voted was within a reasonable limit, and was fairly and honestly expended for increasing the facilities in postal communication, there need be no cause for complaint, and the best evidence that the Government had not found the extravagance of which they had preached was to be found in the fact that the Estimates did not propose reduction. When the Estimates were before the House, he told the hon. gentleman who presided over the Post Office Department that he would on concurrence ask for information in regard to the mail service between Campbelltown and Paspébiac. The late contractor for that service and his family had carried this mail for forty years, and the contract was re-let to him for the sum of $4,000 or $5,000. It was represented to him (Mr. Huntington) that this contractor did his duty as well as it was possible for him to do it. The contract was for four years, but was annulled at the end of two years, when the present Government came into power. When the contracts were again invited, the late contractor tendered $1,700 below the present contractor, but the contract was let for the larger sum. If this were true, some reason should be given for the acceptance of the higher tender—why, in the first place, the contract was taken from the late contractor at all? and why, in the second place, the higher tender was accepted?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: What is his name?

MR. HUNTINGTON: Carr. And I am told, further, that the present contractor was a postmaster who was dismissed by the late Government for reasons which appeared to be apparent, and no one was dismissed except for reasons.

MR. BABY: Hear, hear.

MR. HUNTINGTON said the hon. gentleman said "hear, hear," but he desired to state that he never—and he did not believe the hon. gentleman himself would do it—dismissed a man because he was a politician, or for political reasons.

MR. BABY: I said "hear, hear," because I remember my postmaster was put aside because he was a good, sound Conservative.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he stated to the House some time ago, and he stated it now, that, during the time he was Postmaster-General, no postmaster was dismissed for political reasons. More, no one was dismissed except for good cause. He was quite willing that a Committee should be appointed next Session to enquire into any of the dismissals that took place during his administration, and, if this were done, it would be found that all allegations of this kind were groundless.

MR. ROSS (Dundas) said he had occasion to bring to the notice of the Department before that there was something very loose in the matter of carrying out the system of registration. Money letters had been lost, conductors dismissed, and no effort made to recover the money. Mail contractors were taken on without any security being given by them to guard against loss. He remembered an occasion, during the term of the late Minister of Customs, when three money letters were lost. The conductors admitted they had the letters in their possession between Iroquois and Montreal, and that they did not leave their place except to take their tea at Cornwall, and yet three registered letters were abstracted, and there was no opportunity to recover the amount lost from these conductors. One of them was dismissed. Employés in such a responsible position should be required to give bail. He knew plenty of young men who would take such a position, and give security against loss. With reference to the statements of the hon. member for Gleggarry, that county was more fortunate than others. In Dundas there were not sufficient post-offices. There was no money better spent than the paltry sum given to postmasters.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said, by an order issued in January last, all productions of the electric pen were classed as correspondence and charged full postage. In the United States these were classed as ordinary printed circulars, and the same rule should be adopted here.

SUPPLY.—CONCURRENCE.

Resolutions reported from Committee of Supply considered.

On Resolution 192 (May 2nd), Inter-colonial Railway, $1,500,000,

MR. TUPPER said the hon. member for Lambton had asked for information with reference to this item. It would be seen that the estimate for the coming year was $1,500,000. The amount appropriated for 1877-78 was $1,600,000, and the amount asked for by Mr. Brydges, the then manager of the railway, was $1,750,000. The result of the year's operations showed that Mr. Brydges had not at all over-estimated the amount he would require, as the actual expenditure was $1,811,273, including steel rail renewals $200,000. In 1878-79, Mr. Brydges again estimated the amount required at $1,750,000. The Parliamentary appropriation was as before, $1,600,000. The expenditure for the first eight months was $1,387,112, and the last four months he (Mr. Tupper) estimated at $412,888, a very great reduction, compared with the first eight months. This would make the total expenditure for the current year, $1,800,000. Now, the amount appropriated for the steel rail renewals charged off, and which completed the suspense account, was $143,000 for the current year. That charged off the whole expenditure, which, as the hon. gentleman knew, had been incurred some time ago, but had been charged at the rate of $200,000 for the two preceding years. Deducting that $143,000 from the expenditure of the current year left a balance of $1,657,000. He had asked for $1,500,000, from which it would be seen that he proposed to effect a saving of $157,000, irrespective altogether of the question of renewal with steel rails. Deducting the whole amount for renewals of steel rails charged against the current year, his estimate was $157,000 below the amount of expenditure for the current year, and it was greatly below the actual expenditure of the year 1877-78. The details of the savings which he hoped to accomplish during the coming year, he might state briefly to be the steel rail renewals, $143,592, the account having been closed and the work done; a saving on the salaries of the staff of $42,000 per year by dispensing with officers, and reducing the salaries of those who remained; and, in the Mechanical Department, and labourers' wages, he hoped to effect a saving of $91,000.

MR. MACKENZIE: By doing less building?

MR. TUPPER said no. By providing for the same service as formerly, but having it done in a more economical manner.

MR. MACKENZIE: How?

MR. TUPPER: By dispensing with the services of a vast number of employes who had not half enough to do.

MR. MACKENZIE: Where were they?

MR. TUPPER: In the workshops and along the line.

MR. MACKENZIE: There is no work done along the line, except that by the ordinary staff.

MR. TUPPER said there were workshops at Rivière du Loup, St. Flavie, Campbellton, Newcastle, Moncton, and Halifax.

MR. MACKENZIE: But you said work done along the line.

MR. TUPPER said the saving in salaries of the staff, exclusive of station masters, would be $42,000 per annum, and in the Mechanical Department $91,000; in maintenance of way, and in material in the shops, $23,408, making a total saving in the coming year of $300,000.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Will the hon. gentleman state how many employes there are?

MR. TUPPER said he would lay on the table a statement of the number of employes. The amount paid for the staff, including station masters and telegraph operators, was, on the 1st July last, $254,689; on the 17th September it had increased to $263,240, an increase of $8,551. The amount paid for the staff to the 1st July, exclusive of station masters and telegraph operators, was $133,163. Under the new organisation the amount proposed, exclusive of station masters and telegraph operators, was $89,376, making a saving of $43,787.

MR. MACKENZIE: What rolling stock has been provided for this year?

MR. TUPPER said the same number of locomotives as before was provided for in the estimate of $1,500,000. The hon. member for Centre Huron (Mr. Cartwright) had asked him whether the serious accident which had occurred was covered by this expenditure for this year. He (Mr. Tupper) had made enquiries with reference to that, and might say that accidents was included. Since the change of management, but one accident had occurred. That would involve an expenditure of about $7,000, which was included in the estimate for the coming four months, because, of course, the repairs would be gone on with to the locomotives that were damaged. He expected to save a very large amount annually, by the application of the patent nut-lock, by a very large reduction in the number of men employed in watching the track. He was informed that that could safely be done, that one of the most fertile sources of both accidental and intentional mischief on railways, was the facility with which these nuts unscrewed themselves, and the readiness with which evil-disposed persons could unscrew them.

MR. MACKENZIE: There will be no difficulty in taking off the other.

MR. TUPPER said that, suppose it were discovered, on the inspection of the track, that the nuts were loose, and that, on a curve, the train would be dashed to pieces because, these fastenings to the rail being gone, it would go beyond the embankment, there was no means of proving that the nuts were loosened maliciously, or that, through oscillation of the train, they became unloosened; whereas, with the patent nut-lock, the screw could not become loosened, except it was done maliciously, and the fear of detection would avert the danger. The hon. gentleman referred to the value of this article. He (Mr. Tupper), as he had already said, did not profess to be a judge of that, but he had made enquiry as to the correctness of the hon. gentleman's estimate, that one cent would furnish the material. He was told the material was of the best spring steel, that each one of these appliances weighed six ounces of the best spring steel. If the hon. gentleman could purchase that for a cent, he (Mr. Tupper) would be obliged if he would put him on the scent to do the same. It would cost, at present rates, something like 7c. per pound. The hon. gentleman occasionally charged him (Mr. Tupper) with exaggeration; in this case the hon. gentleman could not be charged with exaggerating.

MR. MACKENZIE: I gave an estimate that was given me.

MR. TUPPER: Did the mechanical engineer at Moncton give that estimate?

MR. MACKENZIE: I never had any communication with any of the officials of the Government since I left office.

MR. TUPPER said he had not insinuated anything of the kind, but, as the hon. gentleman had stated that he (Mr. Tupper) should have ascertained the opinion of the mechanical engineer, he merely wished to ascertain whether the hon. gentleman had applied to the same authority. The hon. gentleman had said that he (Mr. Tupper) should have charged that to the current expenditure of the coming year. Why should he? It was not a renewal or a repair. It was a new appliance, an addition, just as a new mile of railway would be.

MR. MACKENZIE: If the hon. gentleman gets a new sort of pump to a locomotive, it would be charged to capital account.

MR. TUPPER said, if the Government were to obtain the use of the Haggis patent, now offered to it, it would be perfectly proper to charge it to capital expenditure, because it was an addition, the effect of which would largely reduce the annual expenditure. He had taken every care with the Public Accounts, and public interests were consulted in the course adopted.

In answer to Mr. CARTWRIGHT,

MR. TUPPER said the cost of the staff, on the 17th September, was $263,240, and now a very large reduction had been made, the operation still continuing. The number of employes was being steadily reduced, till they should reach the point he had mentioned.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: What is the income up to the present date?

MR. TUPPER said a comparative statement of the receipts showed that they reached, from the 30th June, 1877, till the 20th February, 1878, $919,781.98, and from the 30th June, 1878, till 20th February, 1879, $895,192. The decrease in the seven months of the current year was $24,749.

MR. ANGLIN said it was to be regretted they had not these returns a day or two ago, as this was a matter in which they all felt a very great interest. Sometimes, a Minister of Public Works could effect a very large saving without impairing the efficiency of such a service, or allowing such a road to run down, when he would deserve very great credit. He was not aware, and was not yet satisfied, that there was much room for saving in such departments. He did not think there was any room for a reduction in the number of station masters, and, as far as he was acquainted with the matter, in the salaries of the station masters at the smaller stations. He did not think, in fact, there was any reasonable room for the reduction of salaries. He knew some of them complained that they were worked excessively, and that their salaries were not adequate to their responsibilities and labours. Repeated applications had been made for increase of salaries, and sometimes for additional assistance, under the late administration and management of Mr. Brydges, without success. If the employes or their salaries had been reduced, he did not think the public service would be promoted, while in very many cases very great injustice might be done to individuals. With regard to many of the employes on the track, he thought there had been, at various times, great complaints from ardent supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite. The Minister of Public Works had complained very bitterly of the reduction of the wages of the labourers, while the salaries of the high officials remained at a high figure. He (Mr. Anglin) now saw it was not proposed to cut down their salaries. Before they could fairly consider the effect of those readjustments, and whether any saving had been effected, he thought they must learn how the new Department of Public Works, the Department of Railways, was to be constituted, and what number of employés were to be devoted to the work formerly done by parties whose salaries were charged to the Intercolonial Railway account. He saw that Mr. Schreiber, who formerly was paid from the construction account of the Intercolonial, was now entered as one of the staff of the Public Works at a salary of $4,000, which was not charged to the Intercolonial, but to the Public Works account. That might be all well enough, but evidently his services were still connected with the Intercolonial, though no longer with its construction, but, so far as he knew, with its management. That ought, in any estimate of the saving to be effected, to be fairly taken into consideration. He had no doubt they would find, by-and-bye, a great many other thousands ought to be taken into account in the same way, and debited to the Intercolonial Railway. With regard to the discharge of a great many of the men from the workshops, chiefly at Moncton, they must depend on the statement of the Minister of Public Works, given in good faith, no doubt; but, unless those men did not do half the ordinary amount of work in former years, the large reduction he proposed must seriously reduce the number of cars and locomotives kept on the road, and so impair its general efficiency. They could not say otherwise, without evidence to the contrary. No doubt, employés on the Intercolonial not wanted should be dismissed. But, so far as he could learn, great pains were taken to keep down the staff of the Intercolonial workshops at Moncton. He had failed to obtain the employment of persons in whom he took an interest when there was not sufficient work for them, and he believed there could not be such a crowding of the departments as the Minister of Public Works imagined. When it was necessary some time ago to discharge a number of those men, loud complaints were made by papers supporting hon. gentlemen opposite of the harshness of their treatment; no matter on what principle they dismissed them, complaints were always made. He (Mr. Anglin) did not suppose that, in the present case the action of the Government, if justifiable, would be treated similarly. He thought they should all be glad to find proper and reasonable economies without impairment of the efficiency of the service, or the railway, or its stock. There ought to be no difficulty in ascertaining, at the very start, how many men were required to keep the railway track in proper order, and provide safety for the travelling public and all the traffic. The experience of the whole country ought to be sufficient to guide the managers of the road in all respects. He doubted very much the wisdom of reducing the number of men below the well-known standard. They could not expect a road through such a country could be properly maintained and worked by less than the usual number on such railways. Some of the reductions of the staff had been very extraordinary; the reduction of road-masters, or track-masters was very material. He thought it would be impossible to expect one man to supervise sufficiently some hundreds of miles of railroad—to be responsible for 200 or 300 miles, which he was supposed himself to continually examine. He (Mr. Anglin) believed that such men would have to depend on their deputies. He was sorry, in one instance, to learn of the dismissal of a very desirable workman, who had fairly earned promotion as a track-master, another having been appointed in his stead, who had no special claim to the consideration of the Government or public. He thought it was a mistake to remove that man, as it would be difficult to find one so efficient and trustworthy. He had been removed under this fit of economy. They did not know whether the hopes of the Minister of Public Works would be realised. They should have had these items submitted for some day to enable them to discuss this question more intelligently before passing the item.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was quite impossible to discuss intelligently the various items connected with this road, without having had sufficient time to look over the information furnished by the Minister of Public Works. Certain things were apparent on the face of the papers and reports, which changed very materially the statement of that hon. gentleman as to the saving effected. He said that he had saved a certain amount in wages by dispensing with a large number of men at the various workshops; but, owing to reductions made a year ago on the completion of the 400 new railway cars, there was little to be accomplished in that respect.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman must not forget that that was charged to capital account.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was quite aware of that. The stock being thus complete, from that time out, the working expenses had to embrace the repairs to cars and the re-building of a sufficient number to replace the old. For instance, in the last year, in addition to the three locomotives, there was a somewhat expensive mail car built. He did not know whether there was anything of that kind in the present Estimates; but, having a large stock of cars—and as the hon. gentleman had shown a decrease in traffic during the current year to the extent, in seven months, of $25,000—there would be less necessity than formerly for the maintenance of a staff to keep up the car stock. This, however, might be carried to too great an extent. It was an easy matter to shunt past a number of cars requiring repairs, instead of sending them to the shops, and, although a temporary saving might be accomplished in that way, it would be at the expense of a heavy expenditure in succeeding years. He did not believe that ample provision had been made, if so many men had been discharged from the workshops, as would be sufficient to keep everything up to its present standard. By whatever amount the stock was reduced, the efficiency of the road would be impaired. Then, the hon. gentleman would observe, by his own report, that during last year they found it necessary to expend a large amount of money upon ballasting, the ballasting provided for by the contract in the Intercolonial Railway not being deemed sufficient to support a heavy traffic. There was during last year expended for ballasting $52,000; they put in three miles of additional sidings, which ought properly to have been charged to capital account, but the whole was charged to the working expenses, embracing $20,000. He also adopted new semaphore signals, which should have been, and would have been, ordinarily charged to the capital account, at an expense of $3,500. They put up additional station buildings to the extent of $4,500, and increased the water supply, fencing, car-shops, machinery and works of that sort, $25,000 more, being last year an expenditure for these objects of no less a sum than $105,000, for what was much more legitimately capital expenditure than the $40,000 which the hon. gentleman had taken for nut-locks, and charged to capital account at the present time. Then, there was the decrease which the hon. gentleman mentioned in the purchase of materials. That was not a saving at all, because the material was required for the building of cars, for the supply of repairs to engines, boilers, and everything else, and it was simply an anticipation that less material would be required, and was based on the calculation that there was material on hand at the expense of previous years, to suffice to a great extent for that of the proximate year. In that case, the material had been provided for the previous year, and therefore saved the hon. gentlemen $25,000 in the expenditure of the proximate year. It was an easy matter to put up accounts in this way, so as to show a material saving. Then, the train mileage must, of necessity, be higher, as there was a decrease in revenue. The true test of economy in running a railroad was the amount per train mile of the road. When he came into office, he found the expenditure for train mile was about $1.02, as given in the report. In 1876-77, this was reduced to 82½c.; in 1877-78, it was further reduced to 74c., or a decrease altogether during the time he was responsible for the expenditure of running the road, of 26·87 per cent., although they ran much heavier trains over the line than ever before. This showed a real saving, and it was the only true test, and, when he had time to examine the accounts the hon. gentleman had referred to in round numbers, he would have no trouble whatever, he believed, in establishing the fact, that there was no saving whatever in the Estimates for the proximate year, that had been presented to the House; but he believed that the expenditure per train mile next year would be larger than it had been during the current, or even the past, year.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said, perhaps, the hon. the Minister of Public Works would be able to give the details later on. This was another proof of the inconvenience of passing by the discussion in Committee of Supply, and reserving it for Concurrence. In order to form even a guess at the value of these savings, they ought to know the exact number of men who were employed under the former régime, and the exact number whom the hon. gentleman now proposed to employ. Possibly he could obtain a rough statement from the engineer, who was present, of the gross number of men engaged in the several services. The accounts which the hon. gentleman was good enough to send down, did not include the large majority, numerically, he presumed, of those employed. He would like to know to what extent there was a reduction in the number of men actually employed in preserving the tracks.

MR. MACKENZIE said he understood, from some remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper), that he was under the impression that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had said something derogatory to the Chief Engineer in connection with the nut-locks.

MR. TUPPER: Oh, no.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was glad of that, because that gentleman had been of great service to himself when Minister, and he might say at once, frankly, and he did it with the greatest pleasure, that he did not know any more faithful, zealous public officer than the present Chief Engineer, who had charge of the railway. He had placed the utmost confidence in him, as he did in all the chief officers of his Department, and had no doubt, whatever, that he would do everything conscientiously, and to the best of his ability.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. TUPPER said he had no idea the hon. gentleman had said anything else, but he said he was not satisfied, although he had the opinions both of the Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and of the Engineer of the Government railways in operation. He thought the hon. gentleman ought to have been satisfied that he had discharged his duty on the evidence he had obtained. The hon. gentleman for Gloucester had said it was not a new appointment. The appointment of Mr. Schreiber to the position he now occupied took place more than five years ago. The then Government, after careful examination, thought the management of the Intercolonial Railway and the Government railways in operation required the presence in the Department here of an engineer of standing character and experience; and in 1873 Mr. Schreiber was appointed Government Engineer of railways in operation—the very position he occupied now—and he had been discharging a variety of duties in connection with everything the Minister had to do with the railways under charge of the Department. That gentleman had been called upon to discharge the practical duties of Chief Engineer of the Intercolonial Railway, in regard to its construction, but then there had not been much work in that Department for some years past, and the position therefore was unaltered, the only difference being that the salary which had been charged to construction, was now charged in the Department of Public Works, as they intended five years ago it should be when they made the appointment.

MR. MACKENZIE said the work was wholly different; Mr. Schreiber had nothing to do with the running of the road—that all fell to Mr. McNab.

MR. TUPPER said Mr. McNab's place was filled by Mr. Archibald, who was previously Assistant Engineer in charge of the road.

MR. MACKENZIE: Then it is a new office.

MR. TUPPER said it was not a new office. He filled precisely the same position Mr. McNab had previously filled. The position which Mr. Schreiber held was that to which he was appointed five years ago, that was Chief Engineer of the Government railways in operation, and he was the person to whom the Government looked, just as they looked to Mr. Page in regard to everything in connection with the canals, and to Mr. Fleming in regard to everything in connection with the Pacific Railway; in the same way, the Government looked to Mr. Schreiber and held him responsible for everything in regard to the management of the Intercolonial Railway. Therefore, there was no transfer of salary that was not already borne by the country outside the Railway Department. He had placed in the hon. gentleman's hands papers to show that they had effected a saving in the salaries of officers of $43,000 per annum. The hon. leader of the Opposition was hardly in a position to say that the work could not be as efficiently done after this reduction was made. The hon. gentleman was hardly, therefore, in a position to say it would be no saving at all. It was an actual, tangible saving which had no reference to the amount of business. But, if they found they could not operate the road efficiently with the present staff, they would have to increase it and admit that they had made a mistake. But, finding the annual deficit of the Intercolonial Railway averaging half a million, he felt it his duty to give the subject the most careful examination to see whether they could not effect a large saving without impairing the efficiency of the road. He would say at once, however, that, if any saving was effected at the expense of efficiency, if the road was allowed to run down, if the rolling stock was allowed to deteriorate, then it was altogether a delusive saving which would prove to be the very reverse in the end. But what they aimed at was the operation of the road without impairing its efficiency in the slightest degree. They might be mistaken, but, if so, they would have to ask the House to increase the appropriation, so as to enable them to work the road with the same efficiency as at present. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) had asked him for fuller details with reference to the saving he proposed to effect. In regard to that, he would say, first, that he had obtained the services of a gentleman whom he had never previously seen, but who, he was informed, was an expert in such matters, and had a thorough acquaintance with everything connected with machine shops, and the maintenance and operation of a railway. This gentleman was detailed to go over the road carefully from end to end, to go into the shops, and to make a detailed report showing what saving, if any, could be effected. He (Mr. Tupper) had not been making a hap-hazard change, but everything that had been done was based upon the best information the Government could obtain. The gentleman he referred to was Mr. Tandy, who had had vast experience in connection with machine shops in Kingston, and was recommended to him, after he had made enquiries, for a most able, reliable, and efficient person. He was going upon the estimate which Mr. Tandy had given him of what would be necessary in order to maintain the road in a state of efficiency. He reported they could reduce the number of engine men from ninety-four to eighty-six; the firemen from one hundred and four to eighty-six; the cleaners, or persons who simply rubbed up the engines, from one hundred to fifty. He would like to ask the hon. gentleman opposite if he had the least idea what the country was paying for the services of these cleaners? It was $36,000 a year, but, upon Mr. Tandy's report, this item would be reduced to $18,000.

MR. HOLTON: Is that gentleman an engine builder, or an experienced railway manager?

MR. TUPPER said he was a mechanical engineer of the highest capacity in the country, as he was informed, and experienced in the building, operation and repairing of locomotives, and everything connected with them. If he had been simply a railway manager, he would not have employed him for that purpose. He had never heard of the gentleman's name, until Mr. Schreiber, who had gone over the road himself, had recommended him very highly as just the person needed. Mr. Tandy was then detailed to assist, and these alterations in the Mechanical Department were based upon the report he had given as to what was necessary to maintain the road and the rolling stock, and everything connected with it in its present condition of efficiency. At Moncton, he proposed to reduce the machinists from eighty-one to seventy; the boiler-makers from thirty to fifteen; blacksmiths from forty to twenty-eight; labourers and fuel men from ninety to sixty; pattern-makers from four to two; watchmen from eight to two; carpenters from ninety to sixty. He felt it to be the most painful and unpleasant duty which, as a public man, he had ever been called upon to discharge. The dispensation of patronage was not an agreeable matter, for the reason that, for one friend for whom an hon. gentleman procured office, he made an enemy of twenty, and, perhaps, he made that one only half satisfied with his position. But, to have to dispense with the services of a valuable public servant, against whom there was no complaint whatever, was an extremely distasteful duty. It was, therefore, with this feeling, that he acted as he was doing, though he was doing what he conceived to be a duty in the public interest. If, as had been said by the hon. the leader of the Opposition, it proved that this was done at the expense of the rolling stock and permanent way, it certainly would not be a proper course; but, if $43,000 could be saved in the salaries of the staff, who were not engaged either in keeping up the rolling stock, or in maintaining the public way of the road, and the work could still be efficiently performed, it was certainly a duty which should be performed.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he would be extremely glad if the hon. gentleman could make the reduction. But there must have been either a very large staff before, or an enormously less amount of work to be done in future, if an expenditure of $130,000 could be reduced by $95,000, leaving scarcely one-third. He thought the House ought to have some information to show how far the proposed saving might be expected to be permanent, and how, after these reductions were made, the road would compare with other roads. He believed it would be in the true interest of this country that the capital account of the Intercolonial Railway should be absolutely closed. If he (Mr. Cartwright) understood the Minister of Public Works, he expressed the opinion that he might be induced to re-open the capital account.

MR. TUPPER: No; it has never been closed.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Does the hon. gentleman propose to close it within the next year?

MR. TUPPER: Entirely, except for the construction of new roads.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said, as he understood the position taken by the hon. gentleman, he proposed, at an early date—within the next year—to close absolutely the capital account of the Intercolonial Railway, with the single exception of the purchase of new roads such as the Rivière du Loup branch, or the construction of any sidings or distinct branches. That was the position the hon. gentleman took.

MR. TUPPER: Yes.

MR. ANGLIN said he hoped that when the statement was brought down, it would be printed, so that hon. gentlemen would have an opportunity of watching the matter, the next year or two, and seeing how far the proposed arrangements would be carried out. He presumed the hon. gentleman would not object to a careful scrutiny of the matter, with regard to Mr. Schreiber. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) had stated distinctly that Mr. Schreiber during the last five years was employed in the work of superintendence; also, that Mr. Schreiber's salary was charged to construction account. He presumed that, in the proposed arrangement, salaries against construction, whether charges or other expenditure would cease. Mr. Schreiber, no doubt, rendered valuable services, and, no doubt, it was necessary he should be retained, but he (Mr. Anglin) thought the hon. the Minister of Public Works had stated that a very great part of the work performed by Mr. Schreiber was such work as Mr. Brydges performed when in charge of the road as Superintendent. Mr. Schreiber went over the line, determined what reduction could be made in the Mechanical Department, readjusted all the other branches, and in that man ner rendered such services as Mr. Brydges was supposed to render. Therefore, he thought it would be but fair that, in any estimate of the saving by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, Mr. Schreiber's salary should be added to the expenditure on staff account. He also thought, that in regard to the office of travelling agent—$3,000 a year, exclusive of travelling expenses—the salary of that officer, Mr. Black, should be added to the cost of management.

MR. TUPPER said it was true that Mr. Schreiber discharged a portion of the duties of Mr. Brydges, but the bulk of those duties were now discharged by the Superintendent of Moncton, who was on the line instead of being absent from it. Mr. Black's office was not a new one. Mr. Black was a gentleman of great experience and had been connected with the Grand Trunk Railway. He was employed as travelling agent, and visited localities along the line of the Intercolonial Railway, with a view to bringing as much traffic on the road as possible. His salary of $2,500 was embraced in this reorganisation, which still admitted of a reduction of $43,000. So it was not to be considered in the way of additional expenditure.

Resolution 193 read the first and second times, and agreed to.

Resolutions 200 to 209 (May 7th) read the first and second times, and agreed to.

On Resolution 211, To pay a gratuity to E. U. Piché, Esq., late Clerk Assistant of the House of Commons, on his retirement, $1,000,

MR. ANGLIN asked what was the cause of Mr. Piché's retirement. The House had never been informed that he had ceased to be the First Assistant Clerk of the House. Mr. Speaker had informed the House that Mr. Piché had not been dismissed. He thought the House should receive some formal information on the matter.

MR. TUPPER said he presumed the hon. gentleman was not in the House when this painful subject was discussed before, or he was certain he would not have brought it up again. The matter was then explained to the satisfaction of hon. gentlemen opposite.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was only stated that his retirement was caused by ill health, and he thought he then remarked that he was one of the most robust invalids he ever came across. There ought to have been a letter or certificate from a physician certifying ill health. There ought to have been a letter of resignation, or an intimation from the Speaker if he was dismissed. If he was dismissed for ill health what was his ailment? He might doubt the veracity of the hon. the Minister of Public Works in some things, but the hon. gentleman understood calomel and all its concomitants. Again, he would ask what was his ailment? When did he take ill? Was there any prospect of his getting better; or of his resuming the duties of his office? He was sorry when any gentleman's health failed, and would like to know if a little leave of absence might not restore his wonted elasticity of body and mind. They would be glad to see him back again. Was there any prospect?

MR. TUPPER said he was very much surprised at the tone in which the hon. leader of the Opposition approached a serious subject of this kind. He knew perfectly well that, when he was leader of this House, the health of this gentleman whom they were discussing was very indifferent, and his fits of indisposition so frequent that very constantly his place was vacant at the table. He was sure it did not require much information to show that the interests of the service required that a change should be made.

MR. HOLTON said he thought that the Speakers, both past and present, were entitled to have an explanation of the circumstances attending this removal made in the House.

MR. PLUMB said he had had occasion, within a few weeks, to know something about superannuation during the administration of the late Government.

MR. HOLTON : I call the hon. member to order ; he is not speaking to the item we are now considering.

MR. PLUMB : I think I am in order. I shall not be put down by the majestic way in which the hon. gentleman rose.

MR. HOLTON : I rise to a point of order. It is a well-known elementary principle that, in discussing items in supply, the observations of an hon. gentleman must be confined to the point under discussion. The hon. gentleman's remarks had reference to the general question of superannuation, which was not at all in debate.

MR. SPEAKER : The hon. gentleman must confine himself to the subject under discussion.

MR. PLUMB said he had a perfect right to say that those gentlemen who were pressing the Government so earnestly now upon that principle did not apply the same sort of pressure to themselves, when they, as they frequently did, dispensed with the services of public officers upon the ground of ill health, or for other reasons which were not always justified by the facts. He thought he would be able to show that he was arguing that it was improper for the hon. gentlemen to press the Government with that sort of pertinacity upon this subject. If the hon. gentleman insisted upon it, it might be possible that a satisfactory reason could be given. But he had such confidence in his hon. friends on the front benches, that he was satisfied that they had acted upon just grounds, and without party considerations or prejudices. That was what he had intended to have said, and he was perfectly in order in saying it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the facts of Mr. Piché's removal were these : It was considered by the Committee of Internal Economy that, before the new Speaker was elected, some selection and some preparation must be made for the present Session. That Committee, who were members of the Government, had considered that it would not advance the public service if Mr. Piché, whose health had broken down, was continued as an officer of the House. He was, therefore, informed that it was considered that he was not an efficient officer, and he agreed to retire, and he got his gratuity and superannuation.

MR. CARTWRIGHT : That is new information. I was going to call the attention of the House to that. What superannuation is he to get ?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : The superannuation is very small. $500 a year.

MR. CARTWRIGHT : When was he appointed ?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : In 1872.

MR. CARTWRIGHT : Then he got four years' extra allowance, or how many ?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he could not tell, but he would get the information for the hon. gentleman. They thought it was for the efficiency of the public service that Mr. Piché should retire. His superannuation allowance being small, they agreed to give him a gratuity of $1,000.

MR. MACKENZIE said this was a very important question, and he wanted to know whether this removal took place before or after the election of Mr. Speaker. It seemed that the Internal Economy Commissioners had assumed the duties of Speaker, either as against Mr. Speaker or as against his predecessor. It was also whispered by a little bird, and he thought the hon. gentleman would recognise it at once by its plumage, that more persons were employed by the Internal Commission than by Mr. Speaker, and that Mr. Speaker had either to discharge them or accept the responsibility of appointments he had never made. That was currently reported about the House, and he thought they all knew that a number of parties were employed about the House that were not employed by the late Speaker, and could not have been employed by the present Speaker. This was another specimen of the interference of the Executive in the obligations and privileges of the Speaker of the House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not see how the late Speaker could well interfere in the selection of sessional officers or clerks for the present Session. He had certain authority under special Act until his successor was appointed, but could not consider himself responsible for the selection of officers for this Session after he had ceased to be Speaker. The hon. gentleman said it was an unwarrantable interference on the part of the Government. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) did not think there was any warrant under the Act for that statement. The Committee selected to assist the Speaker, as soon as he was appointed, had every right to make provisional arrangements until the House selected its Speaker. Those arrangements were, of course, subject to reversal when the Speaker was appointed. The efficiency of the Parliamentary Service had been improved by the retirement of Mr. Piché.

MR. ANGLIN said the Commissioners of Internal Economy could only sit and act when the Speaker was present. With respect to Mr. Piché's frequent absence from the table, it was owing, he believed, to the severe illness of his wife. Though he (Mr. Anglin) considered that those absences were very awkward, he could not refuse permission under the circumstances, and, he might add, Mr. Piché's wife died later. The impression would remain that hon. gentlemen opposite had determined to get rid of Mr. Piché, as he had in some way incurred their displeasure.

Resolution read the first and second times and agreed to.

On Resolution 210, To meet the cost of printing and preparing catalogue of the Library of Parliament, $5,300,

MR. MACKENZIE said this item was excessive, and the work was done without authority. The hon. gentleman had promised to bring down a statement of the account.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not think he had promised that, but said he would endeavour to find out how the matter stood. It was simply that the Librarian thought he had the authority to put the matter under contract. As the work could not be done in time by the contractor, he divided it, giving a portion to somebody else.

MR. MACKENZIE said he regretted Mr. Todd had taken the responsibility to give this work to the printers himself. On a former occasion, in 1878, he did the same thing, and the House very reluctantly paid the account and placed on record their condemnation of the transaction. It was impossible the account could be correct, unless the most extravagant prices were given.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said this method of having the printing done was not only irregular, but was likely to be expensive. He had made a calculation of what this work would have cost on the basis of contract rates, and found that it had cost double the regular contract prices. If the House allowed these irregularities to creep in, the result might be very serious. He was strongly of opinion, besides, that the contractor could have done the work in sufficient time. In no single instance during the past five years had he delayed his work. He (Mr. Ross) proposed to move that this item be not carried, but be referred back to the Committee of Supply, with instructions to reduce the same to $2,535, being the amount for which the same work could be performed by the contractor for the Government printing.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said such had been the pressure of work on the contractors that they had not been able to complete their portion of the catalogue. As to whether Mr. Todd was right or wrong, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) could not say. When he arrived here, Mr. Todd wrote him, saying this work was in progress, and that he was anxious that a portion of the work should be given to somebody else, as the contractor could not get it ready in time, and he (Sir John A. Macdonald) consented to that arrangement being made by him.

MR. MACDOUGALL said he took this opportunity to call the attention of the House, and especially of the Minister of Justice, to another branch of this printing question, which was worthy of consideration, the printing of the reports of the Supreme Court. He hoped the Government would enquire into the reason why the very important judgments delivered by that body had not yet been printed and put in the hands of the profession. The contractor for the Government printing, who was charged with the printing of these reports, was overloaded with work, and the same difficulty arose as with respect to the printing of the library catalogue. As far as the public was concerned, it mattered little who had the work, provided the rates charged were reasonable, and the work should be given to some other competent printer to perform. It would be a great advantage to the public if the House or the Government had initiated a proposal to do their own printing, to have a printing office of their own and a superintendent of printing. They had such an establishment at Washington; they had one in France; and that system was, to a great extent, followed in England.

MR. HOLLION said there could be no doubt Mr. Todd had acted irregularly in this matter, but he should vote with great reluctance for a motion conveying censure upon so valuable an officer as Mr. Todd was known to be, and he hoped his hon. friend would withdraw his motion. He happened to be named on that Committee for two consecutive Sessions, and had never discharged any duty whatever, which was very much the case, he was afraid, with many of the members. He thought the fault was with the Committee of the Library. At all events, he hoped his hon. friend would see it consistent with his duty to withdraw the motion.

MR. MACKENZIE said that, during the last Session, the Librarian ought to have called the attention of the Speaker, or the Committee, to the necessity of having a new volume of the catalogue printed, when it could have been submitted to the Printing Committee. He was quite as loth, as the hon. gentleman to say anything against Mr. Todd, but such an irregularity had occurred before, and ought not to have been repeated. If the calculations of the member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) were correct, the printing of those documents had cost twice as much as in the contractors' hands.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No.

MR. ROSS: The member for Lambton was quite correct.

MR. MACKENZIE said, as he was quite correct, then there must have been some serious mistake; but they knew nothing about it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said no doubt there had been some irregularity; but he thought the hon. member for Chateauguay had attributed it to the right cause,—Mr. Todd's enthusiastic interest in his library,—which induced him to believe that, every ten years, at least, there ought to be a new catalogue, showing the treasures of their library. Evidently he had put the catalogue in hand without having received instructions from any Committee, or from the House, doubtless with the best intentions; and, although his act was an irregularity, no loss had accrued. At all events, they had got the catalogue earlier than otherwise. The expense had to be carefully looked into. Whether that sum had been paid or not, he did not know. They would take care there should be no excess in the payment allowed for the work. He understood it was merely a division of labour, owing to the contractor not being able to perform it.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said that, if the hon. Premier would abide by his promise that the work would be paid for at contractors' prices, the purpose of his motion would be satisfied. His only object was to defend the House against any imposition for printing. With that explanation, he would withdraw his motion.

Resolution read the first and second times, and agreed to.

Resolutions 212 to 220, read the first and second times, and agreed to.

On Resolution 221, Pacific Railway, To pay Mr. Wallace as compensation for his loss of time whilst employed in this service, $1,750,

MR. MACKENZIE said the Minister of Public Works had promised to give the dates and the months for which it was proposed to pay Mr. Wallace.

MR. TUPPER said that Mr. Wallace, while a member of Parliament, rendered services to the Canadian Pacific Railway from the 1st September, 1872, to the 1st March, 1873, and during June and November, 1873—in all eight months, and his travelling expenses included five trips between Ottawa and home—$1,750.

MR. ANGLIN : Was he not paid for those services ?

MR. TUPPER : He never received a farthing for them.

MR. MACKENZIE said, when this subject was before a Committee of the House two years ago, the Accountant handed them a statement, and another had been recently sent in by Mr. Fleming, showing that the total payments in the year 1873-74, after July, 1873, reached $1,025.76, on account of wages, increasing the balance against him to $1,772.95, leaving a balance of $800, after his getting a salary for all the months mentioned. Those facts were proved to the Committee.

MR. TUPPER said that that was an entirely new subject. All that the hon. gentleman had asked him to bring down, was the dates of the payments. He did not ask him (Mr. Tupper) to account for the settlement with Mr. Wallace, or he would have brought down a statement showing that, after those accounts were satisfactorily adjusted by Mr. Taylor, referred to, and Mr. Tims, it was found a balance was due Mr. Wallace of some $400 or $500, apart altogether from those services, which was the only question he (Mr. Tupper) had been asked to furnish any information upon, Mr. Fleming had had addressed a letter to Mr. Braun, dated 28th September, 1878, upon which they put the item on the Estimates, and that was outside of any accounts, all of which had been thoroughly settled up, and after the most careful examination by Mr. Tims, in addition to the Auditor engaged on it, who found this amount was due Mr. Wallace on the old account.

MR. MILLS said the returns brought down showed that, while Mr. Wallace was a member of Parliament he had received compensation for his services in the North-West.

MR. TUPPER : No.

MR. MILLS said Mr. Wallace did not pretend to deny it, and the evidence taken before the Parliamentary Committee showed that Mr. Wallace had received money.

MR. TUPPER : Not a dollar.

MR. MILLS said he had produced the testimony of Mr. Wallace to show that he had received compensation—whether adequate or not—in violation of the Independence of Parliament Act, as a clerk of the Public Department, while a member of the House.

MR. TUPPER said that he had not said anything of the kind, but had proved the contrary. The letter of the Chief Engineer stated that Mr. Wallace was entitled to payment for his eight months of service, and he gave all the time that he was engaged, while a member of Parliament, for which he said he received no compensation whatever.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the extracts from the books showing differently were in the hon. gentleman's hands.

MR. TUPPER said that this matter had been investigated and the accounts balanced and settled entirely irrespective of any services performed by Mr. Wallace, the small balance due him being paid.

MR. MILLS said that that would depend on what was allowed Mr. Wallace for disbursements, the account of which was lost. Mr. Wallace had been liberally dealt with, the Government of which the present Minister of Public Works was a member having paid him for services after he was a member of the House.

MR. TUPPER : No.

MR. BOWELL said that what the hon. gentleman stated was that large sums were paid to Mr. Wallace, that they were charged to his private account, having been paid to him for the purpose of paying debts on behalf of the Pacific Railway. Mr. Wallace had denied positively and distinctly that his private account, as presented to the Committee by Rattan had been appropriated by himself. The accounts had not been adjusted. It was unfair to say that the books of Mr. Wallace were in such a state that it was impossible to balance them, thus leaving the impression that he had kept them improperly. He (Mr. Bowell) had already explained that those books could not be balanced at that time for the reason that the returns had not been made to the Board of Works, one of the clerks having died, and another run away.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

ELIZA MARIA CAMPBELL RELIEF BILL.

[BILL 99.]

(Mr. Macdougall.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee of the Whole and reported.

MR. MACDOUGALL moved the third reading of the Bill.

MR. MILLS said he was not going to discuss the merits of this Bill, but he was satisfied that, if his hon. friend went into Court, under a general law, to obtain what he here proposed to accomplish by legislation, he could not have succeeded upon the merits of his case. He was opposed to this Bill, in the first place, because Parliament had no jurisdiction in the matter. This Parliament had jurisdiction over the subjects of marriage and divorce, but this Bill related to an entirely different subject—it was an attempt to give to a woman a part of her husband's property, against his will, while she was living apart from him. He did not at all admit that that was a power they possessed. In order that the House might understand this question, it was necessary to enquire how it stood prior to Confederation. Every one of the Provinces, before that epoch, had control over the subject of alimony and other rights of the wife. If they looked at the condition in which the subject stood in Great Britain, it would be clear that, when the word divorce was used in the Act of Confederation, it referred to divorce a vinculo, and not to divorce a mensa et thoro. It was not divorce from bed and board, but an absolute divorce from the marriage bond. In all Catholic countries, and in Great Britain prior to the Reformation, people looked upon marriage as a sacrament, and considered the bond one of perpetual obligation. In no case could divorce be obtained, except in the case of parties whose affinity was such as to forbid the relation of marriage. Consequently, they found that marriage had been dealt with as a sacrament, and the jurisdiction in Great Britain on this subject was vested in Ecclesiastical Courts. These Courts could deal with the subject of judicial separation, because that was recognised in certain Courts as a thing right or proper in itself. After the Reformation, a change came over public opinion in England, but they did not find that that Parliament changed the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts so as to make them correspond with the change in the opinion of the nation. That was the condition of things down to a recent period. The same policy was extended to the Colonies. This subject was referred to in the Instructions given to the various Governors of the Colonies, showing that divorce in no instance had the slightest reference to the subject of separation from bed and board. Bills upon the subject of divorce were reserved for the consideration of Her Majesty, for the reason that they related solely to the Marriage Law. Judicial separation was not considered as coming within the meaning of the term divorce. When the Act of Confederation was passed, it provided that the subject of marriage and divorce should be reserved to the Government of Canada. Now, it was clear that expression must be understood with reference to the past policy of the Mother Country. They knew it was a rule of legal construction that, whenever general power was conferred, and express exception made to that power, the exception was to be strictly construed. In the British North America Act the subject of property and civil rights was conferred on the Local Legislature, and if there had been no exception made, that term was broad enough to include the marital relations. Not only so, but they found that, in the same Act, the power to deal with the subject of marriage and divorce was expressly carved out of this general power; these terms, therefore, must be strictly construed. But, whether they construed the expression strictly or not, it was perfectly obvious that the term in that Act had not the slightest reference to the subject of divorce from bed and board. The Royal Instructions showed that fact, and the powers that were possessed by the Ecclesiastical Courts in England, and that had been conferred upon the secular Courts in this country, made it equally obvious. But, however that might be, the question was not really involved in the Bill submitted to the House. This Bill was a Bill to give alimony, and was, therefore, something that the Courts had the power to bestow. There was nothing else in the Bill but the subject of alimony. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdougall) said he proposed to provide for the separation of the parties. Now, there was no necessity in this country, at all events as far as Ontario was concerned, that there should be any Court decreeing a separation of the parties. The position of parties in Ontario was not the same as in England; the husband had no power to compel the wife to live with him. The matter of separation was a simple matter of fact, and, the fact being once established, all that was necessary that the Court should have the power to do was to decree alimony where the party was entitled to it. The party who sought relief by this Bill had already been to Court asking for alimony; the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) argued the case on her behalf, and the Court refused to entertain her petition. Now, the hon. gentleman in effect appealed from the Court of Equity in Toronto to the Parliament of Canada, and he (Mr. Mills) contended that this House had no jurisdiction over the subject whatever. If it had, it could deal with the subject of dower, it could deal with the question as to how far a married woman should have an interest in the property of her husband; it could deal with her rights to make contracts: with her control over her separate estate. If it could so deal with the wife and her property, it could also deal with the husband and his property; it could deal with the children; it could deal with the subject of guardians and wards. As an incident of a special and restricted power, the whole subject of property and civil rights within the limits of the domestic relations would be usurped. It was obvious that this House had no power to pass such a Bill as the hon. gentleman had submitted. He, therefore, moved that this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be read a third time this day three months.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) said he did not desire to enter into the merits of this particular question. He believed that few members of this House had familiarised themselves with the evidence on which the promoters of this Bill desired that this House should vote on a question affecting the social standing of the two persons before the House. They had not merely to consider the question whether Mr. and Mrs. Campbell should be separated as to bed and board, but to determine whether this House had power and jurisdiction to legislate in the direction proposed by this Bill. He was sure the members of this House would deprecate hasty legislation in a direction not authorised by the Constitution. He did not mean to say one word with reference to the merits, although he had read the evidence in the case and had formed a strong opinion on those merits. If he were asked to decide whether the petitioner had made out a case in her favour, he would be obliged to declare that she had not. But a much more important question for this House to decide was the question raised by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills), as to whether, under the Constitution, they had authority to grant the relief prayed for. It would certainly be something to be deplored, if, from any sentiment of sympathy, this Legislature should be led beyond its domain. The important question was whether they had authority to decide on this matter before them. The hon. gentleman had dealt with the question as to whether the word divorce in the British North America Act meant divorce a vinculo or whether it related solely to judicial separation. He was much disposed to agree that the word divorce meant the separation of the marriage tie. From the best consideration he had been able to give to the question, he had arrived at the conclusion that their authority under this Act did not allow them to legislate in the manner proposed. Admitting the doubt in relation to the subject raised by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to be the case, he (Mr. McDonald) submitted there were other clauses in the Bill which were so entirely beyond the jurisdiction of this Legislature, and so completely within the cognisance of the Local Legislature of Ontario, and which the Local Legislature was constituted to determine, that this House could not, without overstepping its authority, pass this Bill. He was of opinion that the rights of the Legislature of Ontario would be invaded by the passage of the clauses of the Bill which involved the payment of alimony, and the disposition of the children of this marriage. The Bill involved the question as to whether this Parliament had the authority and power, on the judicial separation of man and wife, to declare that the husband should pay to the wife what was called alimony, or, in other words, should set aside a portion of his estates in order to support her for life. He contended that power was entirely and solely within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature of Ontario. Alimony, it was argued, must be within the jurisdiction of this Parliament, because it was incident to and connected with the question of divorce, and this argument was advanced on the ground that the British North America Act gave jurisdiction to this Legislature over the questions of marriage and divorce. Now, it must be recollected that before Confederation the Province of Ontario had made provision within its own Courts for the granting of alimony in the case of the judicial separation of man and wife. At that time, there was no divorce, as he understood it, in the Province of Ontario, as there was in some of the Lower Provinces. Where it was necessary to obtain judicial separation, or separation avinculo, it was necessary to go to the Legislature of that Province, and the Court of Chancery had entire jurisdiction on the question of alimony. They had also provided that in all matters where the disposition of children was involved, that same Court should determine as to which parent, or either of them, should have the disposition of the children. These powers had not been taken away since the Union. The Act passed before the Union confirming the power of the Court of Chancery, was still in force, and that power, as had been stated by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), had been exercised in this very case. The suppliant in this case recognised the authority and power of that Court by seeking in it the relief which was now asked from this Parliament. The petition was refused in that Court on the grounds that, by her own misconduct, the suppliant had forfeited the right which the law gave her to be supported out of the estate of her husband. He agreed with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that this Parliament had no jurisdiction in this case, on the ground that the questions of alimony and the disposition of children came clearly and completely within the provisions for civil rights, which the Constitution granted solely and entirely to the Provincial Courts. Was alimony a civil right, or was it not? If it were a civil right, if it were not in any way incident to the question of divorce, then he fancied the House would feel that there could be no doubt in the world that they would invade the just rights of the Local Legislature if they sought to pass this Bill. Alimony was described by the highest authority as that apportionment of a husband's estate which, by the decree of the Chancellor of the Court of Chancery in Ontario, was allowed to the wife for her maintenance. It could not be contended that alimony must be included in the word divorce. It had nothing whatever to do with it; because there might be divorce without alimony. If alimony followed in all circumstances after the separation of man and wife, there would be grounds for saying that the passage of this Bill, would be constitutional. But, inasmuch as alimony was the right of a wife to some portion of the estates of her husband, and that right not being dependent upon divorce, it surely could not be contended that alimony must follow as a matter of course from, or be incident to, the separation of husband and wife.* He maintained, therefore, alimony being purely a civil right, that the question could only be adjudged by the decree of the Court of the Province in which the parties resided. This Bill provided, not only that a separation should take place, against the will of the husband, but that a portion of his estates should be taken, against his will, and given to the woman whom he declared, and who in his (Mr. McDonald's) opinion had been proven to be, unworthy to associate with him. Now, the question to be determined first was whether this were a civil right? How could it be contended that the disposition of this property was not a civil right? How could it be contended that this Legislature could take away property from one man, against his will, and give it to another? He could not understand how the hon. gentleman who so ably defended the Bill could take the ground he did. There was another very important question, and that was the rights vested in the several Provinces, and the judiciary of the several Provinces in relation to this particular subject. In the Province of Nova Scotia, before the union, by the powers vested in the Legislature of that Province, a Court of Marriage and Divorce was duly constituted. He admitted frankly that this Parliament had the power to repeal that legislation, but up to this moment they had not done so, and there existed in that Province a Court having the power not only to grant divorce, but to make provision for alimony, and possessing all the other powers incident to these questions, as adjudged in the Court of Divorce in England. Now, if the Legislature of the Dominion had the power to deprive a husband of a portion of his estate, what was to prevent their ignoring altogether a divorce in Nova Scotia, or of undertaking to say a divorce should be given where it had been refused by the decree of that Court? The Divorce Court in Nova Scotia would be a nullity if, by an Act of Parliament, passed by gentlemen who had, in all probability, not read the evidence nor had an opportunity of seeing the witnesses, and comparing the respective merits of each party, the solemn decision of the Court, duly constituted and vested with full authority to determine these questions, could be set aside by this House. In many States in the neighbouring Union, it had been determined, and rightly so, that, when the legislative authority had once parted with its power in the question of divorce, and other kindred questions, and conferred such powers on the judicial authority appointed by them, the judiciary was vested with full power and authority previously held by the Legislature, without interference by the latter. And it must be so; otherwise, the Legislature would be continually setting aside the decisions of Courts legally constituted for the very purpose of giving such decisions. And that would be exactly the position of the Legislature in respect to the Court of Chancery of Ontario, if the Bill now before the House were passed. The disposition of property being a civil right, this Parliament had no authority to say that the property of an individual, separate from his wife, should be transferred, by the legislation of this House, to a third party. He was, therefore, of opinion that it would be unconstitutional, and in excess of the authority of this Parliament to decree the payment of alimony, in any form, by the man Campbell to the suppliant, Mrs. Campbell. The competency and jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in Ontario was recognised to determine this question; had been recognised by the suppliant in this case, as she had gone into that Court and endeavoured to assert her right. She gave what she thought was necessary evidence; but the decree of the Court showed that the suppliant was not entitled to this portion of her husband's property, not because the law said she was not entitled to alimony, but because she had forfeited the rights which she would otherwise have. This Act went further. Not content with declaring that Mr. Campbell's property should be taken from him, it declared in what form it should be done. Such legislation on the part of this Parliament would clearly be ultra vires. If he understood the Constitution at all, nothing was more sacredly reserved to the legislation of the Provinces, than the control and management of the property of the inhabitants thereof. But this Bill, after declaring that Campbell should pay a certain amount to his wife, declared, also, if he did not pay it—even if misfortune should sweep away his property, and he should become unable to do so—that he should, on the action of the Courts, be confined to jail for life. because they said that the non-payment of the money would be contempt of Court, subject to imprisonment. This Bill further declared that the real estate and property should be mortgaged by an Act of Parliament; that was, that the land owned in the Province of Ontario, governed by the laws of Ontario, the title to which was fixed by the laws of Ontario, should be subject to a lien created by this Government. He humbly submitted that the Bill was ultra vires. He thought this Parliament should hesitate before assuming these powers. With reference to the disposition of the children, he thought the Statutes of Ontario made the most free and ample provision. They declared that the Court of Chancery of that Province, on the application of either the father or the mother, should determine, after ascertaining the facts upon the merits, to whom the custody of the children should be committed. His opinion was that this Parliament had not the power to take this matter out of the hands of the Court of Chancery in Ontario; but, even if they had the power, he should think they would hesitate before asserting it. He trusted, in view of the duty they owed to the Constitution, irrespective entirely of the merits of the case—and he desired to say nothing whatever on the merits as between these parties—that this Parliament would not usurp the powers of the Local Courts in dealing with this matter. With reference to the mode of procedure in this case, this was the first occasion upon which he had had any experience in reference to matters of this kind, and he thought the House would be somewhat surprised at the summary mode in which they were asked to assume jurisdiction in a matter of such vast importance. He presumed every member of this House, and he was sure the people of the country would feel that few questions of a graver character came before Parliament than those which separated and dissolved the marriage tie between man and wife, and which struck at the root of the social ties and the happiness of individuals, at the very root of the happiness of the children which God had given them; therefore, he thought they ought to approach a matter of this kind with due consideration, and he would ask members of the House in what position they were upon which to judge on the merits of the case. They were to determine whether or not this woman ought to obtain the alimony she sought. He desired to know how many members of the House had made themselves masters of the evidence sufficiently to determine whether Mrs. Campbell was the woman she asserted herself to be, or whether she was the character her husband asserted her to be. He, after examining the evidence before the country, could only say that he had formed an opinion so adverse to Mrs. Campbell's claims, independently of the relations which now subsisted between them—after the evidence adduced before the Courts, where the question had been thoroughly sifted and discussed, and irrespective of the question of jurisdiction, which he thought inseparable—that he could not, as an honest man, declare she had any right to come to Parliament and complain of the conduct of her husband. He was bound to say that she had forfeited, by her own conduct, the redress she sought there, and which she had sought elsewhere and failed to recover. He had no feeling whatever in the matter, but he thought this Parliament should not forget the important position they occupied as legislators and judges, and that they should not invade the rights of the Provincial Courts and the Provincial Legislatures.

MR. MACDOUGALL said he was considerably surprised that the hon. the Minister of Justice should have waited until the third reading of the Bill to explain to the House his strong objections on constitutional grounds to their entertaining the Bill at all. The measure had been before Parliament since 1876. It had been discussed in the other branch of the Legislature to which, by their rule of practice, they had assigned the duty of investigating cases of this kind. It had been discussed every Session but one since. The constitutional question had been discussed, and they had declared that there was no question but that Parliament had authority to deal with the question of marriage and divorce, and incidents which belonged to marriage and divorce. It had been suggested that they ought to dispossess themselves of this inconvenient question connected with marriage and transfer it to judicial bodies. He was quite of that opinion after the long experience they had had. But, if they had no constitutional power to deal with the question, how could they give that power to a judicial body which they did not possess themselves? As to the merits of the case, he thought the evidence was abundant. There was no judgment of any Court declaring that this woman had committed the crime of adultery. The evidence satisfied those who heard it that Mrs. Campbell had been the subject of a conspiracy, and that the witnesses had sworn themselves. That point had been determined. Now, what were they asked to do. They were asked to separate these two parties from bed and board; to do precisely that which, by the law of Lower Canada, was done by a decree of the Court, the separation of the marriage tie, in so far that the parties lived separate, were not under the control of each other, were entitled to a share of the marital property, and were restrained from again entering into marriage. Parliament was the only tribunal in this country which could grant her that to which she was entitled, and in this case, what it was within the power of Parliament to do, it was its duty to do. Its duty was to separate these parties, in the form of a Bill, leaving it to them to become reconciled, and declaring it should have no force or effect if they did become reconciled and resumed their original relations.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he must ask that this matter stand over. His opinion was very strong in the same direction as that of the Minister of Justice, and he desired some opportunity of expressing himself at some length. He did not think the public business could be detained longer for the sake of this case.

The hour allotted to Private Bills having expired, the further consideration of the motion was postponed.

SUPPLY.—CONCURRENCE.

House resumed the further consideration of Resolution 221, reported from Committee of Supply (May 7th).

MR. MILLS said he must ask for a division, as the papers brought down did not sustain the case of the Government.

MR. McCALLUM said he was surprised at the position taken by the Opposition. Both the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Bothwell now wanted to go back on the Government Engineer, under whose directions Mr. Wallace had been employed. They had been glad, on a former occasion, to shelter themselves under the wing of that gentleman, when they gave him as their authority for buying 50,000 tons of steel rails without the sanction of Parliament. As an excuse for this unwarrantable Act, they stated that the engineer had thought they should purchase those steel rails. In the Goderich Harbour matter, in which $30,000 were squandered, they sheltered themselves under the engineer, and got a letter from him. The hon. member for Bothwell spoke of the independence of Parliament. For the five years the Government were in power, they never heard a word about the independence of Parliament, but now that they were in Opposition, where they would long remain, in the interests of the country, they advocated the independence of Parliament. Mr. Wallace had been sent for by the engineer, to act in the public service; he worked eight months, paid his own expenses, and the engineer certified to his account. Did the people expect a man to work eight months for nothing? He (Mr. McCallum) held in his hands that infamous letter that was written to John Stewart by a Prime Minister, and shown to the electors of Norfolk when Mr. Wallace was a candidate for that county, in which letter it was intimated that Wm. Wallace was a defaulter to the amount of $59,000; and now, when, after an investigation had taken place, he stood before the country as an honest man, his character cleared of the slanderous imputation, and it was proved the Government owed him a large sum of money, they tried to make a point, and to show that they had some grounds for writing this letter.

Resolution read the first and second times, and agreed to.

On Resolution 222, Intercolonial Railway, $132,474.02,

MR. MACKENZIE said, with regard to this item, it embraced the sum of $101,753 for the payment of the award in the case of Boggs & Murray. He had stated briefly, the other evening, what he had to say on this point, with the expectation that concurrence would not be taken on this item for two or three days yet. He had been utterly unable to read the documents, they were so voluminous, and on account of the pressing work of the House. At the present moment, he must content himself with saying that he believed a fatal blunder was made in this case. He was firmly convinced that the public suffered a grievous wrong by taking the case out of Court, and disregarding the order of the Judge as to the remittance of this subject to the Registrar, and then taking it back to the Court to be dealt with on its merits. He need not discuss it now further than to enter his protest against this mode of settling a case which was once entered in the Exchequer Court, to be dealt with, as all other cases were dealt with, under an order from the Judges. He believed the case was mismanaged in not having sent from the Department of Public Works the Chief Engineer and his assistant, the present Chief Engineer of that road, both to attend to the evidence that was being given and to give evidence themselves. Sending subordinate engineers in a case where there was $100,000 involved, seemed to him a very extraordinary act of negligence on the part of the Government. He believed it had resulted in the country being amerced in a large amount for damages where there was, perhaps, none, or if any, an extremely small sum, due. He would, therefore, content himself for the present with this brief statement of his views, and allow the item to pass on a division.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 114) Respecting the Consolidated Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Tilley.)

Bill (No. 63) To grant certain powers to La Société Permanent de Construction du District d'Iberville.—(Mr. Mousseau.)

MOIRA RIVER TIMBER DUES BILL.

(BILL 49.)

(Mr. McCuaig)

THIRD READING.

Order for House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill read.

MR. HOLTON said this Bill caused considerable discussion in the commencement of the Session, and he had been led to understand that some compromise had been effected, and that the Bill had been dropped.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the matter had been settled, and it had been agreed that the Bill should be allowed to pass.

MR. MCCUAIG said that, before the Committee, the town of Belleville was represented by its solicitor, and they came to an agreement, and this Bill was the result.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings) said that the parties interested thought it would be better to get this Bill through, in order that they might have the matter finally settled.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

House adjourned at Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRAYERS.

INSOLVENT ACT AMENDMENT.

MOTION TO INTRODUCE BILL.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) moved for leave to introduce a Bill to further amend the Insolvent Act of 1875. He said the object of the Bill was simply to carry out, as far as possible at this late stage of the proceedings, the object the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) had in introducing his Bill some time ago. It was for the purpose of doing away with the great evil under the law of official assignees. This would prevent assignees being appointed by creditors to take charge of an estate, also the discharge under the Act applying to any debt due by a person who was not a trader.

MR. HOLTON said this Bill, which was one of urgency, should have been brought in by the Government. He was entirely in sympathy with its object, but thought that, in the hands of a private member, it could be hardly expected to pass by unanimous consent. The Government, with its control of the days remaining for consideration of public business, would obtain from the House a consideration which it would not yield to an individual member.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said the amendment appeared to him to be in accordance with the sentiment of the House, as expressed by their vote in favour of the repeal of the Insolvent Law. It removed the principal evil complained of in the present law, and he could not understand how hon. gentlemen, who were opposed to the continuance of the present law, should object to this amendment, which cured the defect in the present law which was the main cause of their opposition to it—the appointments of official assignees.

MR. CASEY said he quite agreed with the remarks of the hon. member for Chateaugay (Mr. Holton). The Government had, to a certain extent, committed themselves in favour of the Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), and it was their duty to introduce this amendment.

MR. DREW said the House had decidedly voted against having any Insolvent Law, and, if the Senate choose to reject the Bill repealing the law which was carried here, they should bear the responsibility. He objected to the Bill being introduced.

MR. ROBERTSON.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) said he was therefore obliged to withdraw the Bill. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. Drew) would have to take the responsibility of his course.

Motion withdrawn.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

RESOLUTIONS PROPOSED.

MR. TUPPER: Mr. Speaker,—It is not my intention, at this late period of the Session, to occupy the time of the House at any great length in discussing the very important questions which these resolutions present for its consideration. I may say, in the first place, that the question is one that is rendered thoroughly familiar to the minds of all hon. members from the reports which I have presented to the House, whereby I have endeavoured to convey to hon. gentlemen the information of which the Government was in possession, in order that they might be as fully prepared as I am to consider the question; and, in the second place, important and great as is the question, I do not believe that any laboured argument will be required at my hands in order to commend the propositions which the Government submit, to the favourable consideration of hon. members on both sides of the House. It will be remembered that, after the Union of the British North American Provinces, as at first embraced, the general opinion and sentiment of the people was that it was exceedingly desirable that the North-West Territory should be added to the Dominion, and measures were taken which, I believe, met with the approval of all political parties for the purpose of acquiring that vast territory. Then it was felt on the part of the then Government, led by the right hon. gentleman who is now the head of the present Administration, that the consolidation of British North America would be incomplete; that the consolidation of British power on this continent would be incomplete if the Pacific coast Province of British Columbia were not added to the Confederation. When the addition of that Province to the other united Provinces was brought under consideration, it was found that to have a real union between that Province and the other portions of Canada, a line of communication of some kind was indispensable, and to make that line valuable it must be a railway. The Government addressed themselves to the duty of devising measures by which that might be accomplished, but when they pledged themselves in good faith to British Columbia to promote the construction of that line of interoceanic railway, they were under the impression that the question was much easier of solution than it has since proved to be. The Government believed that by appropriating 50,000,000 acres of land, and $30,000,000 of the public money, parties would be found who would take the scheme up as a private enterprise, and carry it to completion. It may be said that those opinions were not well founded; but the Government, at that time, believed they were well founded, and that they had abundant evidence that this great work could be accomplished in that way. Those expectations were not realised, and I need not say to the House we have been disappointed in accomplishing the construction of the work in the way it was then proposed. Hon. gentlemen opposite who succeeded us in power, recognised not only the great importance to the whole of Canada of carrying to completion the building of the great Pacific Railway, but also that in the position they then occupied, good faith with that Province involved the necessity of carrying it forward by another measure, having that object in view. That measure was very widely different from the proposal of their predecessors, which was to give a limited amount of public money and land for the purpose of constructing the railway; but the Government, of which the present leader of the Opposition was the head, brought forward a Bill and carried it through Parliament, not only recommitting the Government to accomplish the construction of the railway, but providing the means and giving the authority to construct it as a Government work. At the end of five years, my right hon. friend the First Minister, who first proposed this great measure, finds himself again charged with the responsibility of dealing with the subject, but he finds it in a different position from that which the question occupied when he dealt with it before. When he previously undertook it, the right hon. gentleman believed that the work could be accomplished by a limited obligation on the part of this country, and not only limited, but limited within those reasonable bounds that everybody felt the country might safely undertake. It is not my purpose to offer the slightest word of animadversion upon the course which the late Government pursued on this question. I am free to confess that, when the Administration of my right hon. friend first inaugurated this policy and committed the country to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it was apparently much easier of accomplishment than it has since proved to be. I am also free to confess that when the late Government were charged with the responsibility of dealing with the question, having found the country already committed to the construction of the work, and feeling compelled to carry it out by any means which might be found feasible, they directed their efforts with a sincere and anxious desire, as far as the position of the country admitted, to carry out the obligations undertaken.

MR. DECOSMOS: No, no.

MR. TUPPER: As I have already said, when the right hon. the First Minister has again come to deal with the subject, he finds it in an altered position from that which it formerly occupied. I will briefly refer to the amount of public money required in order to carry to completion works already undertaken, and contracts to which the country is now pledged. The amount of money required to complete the road from the shores of Lake Superior, at Kamistiquia or Thunder Bay, to Red River, is estimated, in round numbers, with a fair equipment, to cost about $18,000,000. To that, of course, the country is committed. It was impossible for the First Minister to hesitate, for a single moment, when he found that 185 miles in the middle of that section of country was required to make effectual the large expenditure already incurred, both east and west, to fill in that gap as rapidly as possible, in order to make those portions of road already built available for the purpose for which they were intended. The subsidy to the Canada Central, to which the country was committed by the late Government, is about $1,500,000. The Georgian Bay Branch, with a canal at French River, with a fair equipment, is estimated to cost $1,900,000. The Pembina Branch, with an allowance for a fair amount of rolling stock, is estimated at $1,750,000. The cost of the Pacific Railway Telegraph contracts, of which 1,300 miles have been already constructed, will reach $1,100,000. The rails delivered at British Columbia will cost $345,000, and exploration surveys up to the end of the year $3,861,000, making the total sum of money expended and required to complete the engagements already entered into to render the work effectual, $28,456,000. Now, as I have said, it would be quite impossible for the Government, for a single moment, to hesitate as to what was their duty in regard to this question. First, there is still the importance of constructing this great work, admitted by all political parties; second, there is the fact of the good faith of the country being pledged to the Province of British Columbia to carry as rapidly as possible the railway to completion; and, third, the large expenditure already involved to carry it out. Under these circumstances, Sir, the Government were obliged to address themselves to the important question of how this object could be attained, good faith with British Columbia maintained, the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway accomplished, and, at the same time, measures adopted that would prevent the financial condition of this country being seriously embarrassed or imperilled. The Government have addressed themselves to the consideration of this question in the most careful and attentive manner, and the result of their deliberations is now submitted in the form of these resolutions to the House. I may say, Sir, it is not surprising that the building of a Canadian Pacific Railway should have commended itself not only to one side of the House, not only to one great party, but to both the great parties, into which this Dominion is divided, when we recollect the great facilities that existed for the construction of such a work, as well as the great importance of carrying it to completion. Now, I may say here, as I have said before, that it is not my intention to call in question the efforts that have been made by my predecessors in relation to this work. I recognise, to the fullest extent, the serious responsibilities thrown upon them when they came into power, and I am prepared to recognise the efforts they made to carry this work forward.

AN HON. MEMBER: No, no.

MR. TUPPER: I know from the voice I hear behind me that their efforts have not been sufficient to satisfy British Columbia. I am aware that a great deal of uneasiness and apprehension has been excited in that Province, not only with reference to the action of the late Government, but with reference to the probable action of this Government. But I do trust that our friends in British Columbia will feel that they must not look at this question from the favourable point of view from which we were able to look at it several years ago when it was first introduced; but that they must look at it surrounded with the difficulties that have since presented themselves in carrying it out. They must remember the fact that in relation to railway enterprise on this continent a great change of opinion has taken place among British capitalists and among the capitalists of the world; that it was much easier a few years ago to bring foreign capital into this country to promote a work of this kind than it is to-day. They must recognise the fact, that in the changed financial position of Canada, we must all bow to the inevitable in relation to a question of such magnitude as this, and provided they find the Government of the day earnestly making efforts to accomplish that work, they must be satisfied, although those efforts should not be commensurate with their reasonable expectations a few years ago. I have no hesitation in saying that the work I have referred to, as involving an expenditure of over $28,000,000 of public money, has largely contributed to remove the difficulties and promote the progress of the entire undertaking. I believe, that as we originally looked to the development of the great North-West as the only basis upon which any Government or company could undertake the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, so we cannot but regard the expenditure of $18,000,000 of public money in permeating that difficult, almost inaccessible, district of country between Lake Superior and the Red River, as money expended in a way that is most likely to so develop, so improve, and so people the great fertile country of the North-West as to give us a substantial basis upon which we may hope to succeed in permeating the still more difficult and extensive region from the Rocky Mountains down to the shores of the Pacific. And, although this expenditure of public money has not been made within the Province of British Columbia, I am free to say that that expenditure, in my judgment, has been made in a way much better calculated to secure the actual realisation of this work than if every dollar had been expended in British Columbia, commencing at the shores of the Pacific, because no expenditure in British Columbia could materially contribute to the opening up of that great North-West region upon the development, and upon the peopling of which must necessarily depend the successful prosecution of that gigantic undertaking the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, Sir, I have stated that we have great advantages in the construction of such a work as this. There has been a great advance made within the past five years; not only have we accomplished an important work in providing for an early, rapid and easy communication through our own country, from the shores of Lake Superior to the Red River, but we have acquired information with reference to the North-West Territories, which is invaluable in its character. High as was our estimate a few years ago, high as was the opinion we were warranted in entertaining as to the capabilities of the great North-West, we were comparatively ignorant of the vast extent of fertile lands of that country. The surveys which have been made, though attended with a large amount of expenditure, are cheap compared with that which has really been accomplished; inasmuch as that we can only hope for the successful accomplishment of this great work, by showing to the world the value and character of that country. I hold that the explorations that have been made, and the increased knowledge we possess of its resources, place us in a position to appeal to capitalists much more confidently and successfully for this great work, than would otherwise be the case. I do not now intend to criticise at any length the course taken by the late Government, but I may say that these resolutions propose a divergence in one particular from the policy of four predecessors, and that is, that while carrying out their policy so far as the line from Lake Superior to the Red River goes, I propose a slight deviation, going west from Red River, from that which was originally intended. I am not prepared to say that the engineers were not perfectly right in the line they located. I am not prepared to say that the original intention of locating the line by way of the Narrows of Lake Manitoba was not right and proper, provided we were in a position to carry out, as we hoped we would, the rapid construction, by means of a company, of this interoceanic railway from end to end. But we find ourselves brought face to face with the fact that a change has come over the spirit of the world in reference to railway enterprise on this continent, and that whereas it was comparatively easy, five or six years ago, to draw capital into this country for railway enterprises, it is now almost impossible to do so. That change having taken place, I think we must deviate from our original plan and, in order to secure the rapid construction of this work, combine to a greater extent than originally intended, our progress across the great prairie country of the North-West with a system of colonisation; and though that may add a few miles, here or there, to the length of the line to be constructed, it will carry it through the districts that will best afford a basis for rapid colonisation upon which we can rest, and to which alone I look, as the only means by which successfully, in our time, at all events, one may be able to achieve the construction of this railway. Now, Sir, I believe there will not be any great difference of opinion on this point. I am satisfied hon. gentlemen opposite will agree with us, that whether the line goes to the Narrows or the south of Lake Manitoba, in the first instance the true policy of the country is to find the best line of railway for settlement across the prairie region of the North-West. I will, therefore, address myself to the third and last difficulty, that of the selection of the route through British Columbia. It is stated in the Globe that these resolutions indicate in a clear and unmistakeable manner that we have abandoned the line to Burrard Inlet and adopted Bute Inlet as the terminus of the road. I have no hesitation in saying that these resolutions contain no arrière pensée. The views held by the Government are embodied in the resolutions I offer to the House. Had it been decided to reject the location of the route established by hon. gentlemen opposite, the Government would have cancelled the Order in Council, locating the route to Burrard Inlet, and stated frankly their intention not to go to Burrard Inlet, but to Bute Inlet. They have not arrived at that conclusion. They have arrived at the only conclusion that the selection of the Burrard Inlet route was premature. I am not prepared to say that if I had been in the position of the late Government—for I admit the uneasiness and anxiety felt in British Columbia imposed great and serious pressure on hon. gentlemen in the selection of that route—that if I had been brought face to face with the question, and it was held to be indispensable to then select the route, I would not have adopted the route with the information then possessed, which the late Government adopted. What I do blame hon. gentlemen opposite for is this, that they rejected the suggestions made two years ago by the present First Minister and myself, that before the final location of the route, and the large expenditure involved on the Burrard Inlet route, the season should have been utilised, by having a thorough examination made of the country lying to the North of Fort George, and in the region of the Pine and Peace River passes. I think there was abundant ground for maintaining the absolute necessity of an immediate and most careful exploration survey in order to ascertain precisely the character of the country in the region of the Pine and Peace River passes, before the final location of the line was made. I do not intend to enter into the technical details of the question, because the engineers' reports give the information with greater accuracy than I could give it; but I may say why I regard the location of Burrard Inlet as premature. There are practically but three routes before the House and country, for consideration. After all the examination made of the subject, it has resolved itself into a choice between three routes, Burrard Inlet, Bute Inlet at Waddington Harbour, or the route to Port Simpson to the north. I leave out of the question the easier, shorter, and, perhaps, the best line of all, that to the Dean Channel, because the reports go to show that navigation to that point will be obstructed by an archipelago of islands in that neighbourhood.

MR. MACKENZIE: You mean that navigation is obstructed during the winter.

MR. TUPPER: The navigation of Dean Channel is so obstructed by an archipelago of islands as to render it practically unfit for the terminus of the Pacific Railway. There is, moreover, the further difficulty that the approach is obstructed by ice during the winter. There can be no doubt that Burrard Inlet possesses many advantages over the Bute Inlet route.

MR. BUNSTER: No.

MR. TUPPER: I hear an emphatic "No," but perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to state the impression on my mind, and I will listen with great attention to any information which may be given on that question by any hon. gentleman who holds a different opinion. I regard the Burrard Inlet route as preferable to that by Bute Inlet, in regard to distance. It is fifty-seven miles shorter to Port Moody at Burrard Inlet than to Waddington Harbour at Bute Inlet, taking into account the three miles saved in consequence of the exploration of last summer, and if the railway were at Burrard Inlet, there would be only eighty miles of navigation from Port Moody down to Victoria or Esquimalt, while you have to add about 180 miles more of navigation from the Bute Inlet Terminus at Waddington Harbour to reach Esquimalt. I am also free to admit that in point of gradients, a most important point, the Burrard Inlet route, so far as our information goes, has a great advantage over that to Bute Inlet. It will be difficult to obtain on a portion of the last named route, grades easier than 100ft. to the mile, while on the Burrard Inlet line the grades will not exceed 52ft. to the mile.

MR. DECOSMOS : What about curvature ?

MR. TUPPER : I am not informed that the Burrard Inlet route involves any serious curvature which would materially interfere with the operation of the line. There is a considerable section of wheat-growing country in the region of Kamloops, to which the late Government proposed to construct 125 miles of road from Yale. But while I admit there is a great advantage, both in point of distance and of grades, in favour of Burrard Inlet, I cannot conceal from myself that there is a very grave objection to that route. The approach to Burrard Inlet involves the passage of the island of San Juan, and although, today, and I hope for many years to come, we will enjoy the most amicable and peaceful relations with our friends to the south of us, yet, as this will be a great national highway, and as a great expenditure of British capital will be involved, I feel we ought not to lose sight of the fact that at some remote period those who come after us may find our friends to the south not animated by those purely commercial and peaceful sentiments which, we are glad to know, at present prevail. I regard, therefore, the possession of that island by the Government of the United States, and the fact that communication from the sea to the terminus of the railway would be under the control of the fortifications of a foreign power, as serious obstructions. And I cannot regard with indifference the fact that, when we have expended a hundred millions on the extension of the line to the Pacific, and before we have reached Burrard Inlet, we have reached a point at which it is perfectly easy for our American neighbours to tap our line by a road of 50 or 60 miles in length, and carry our traffic down to Holmes Harbour, which is to be the terminus of the Northern Pacific now under construction through the United States, and which, should our line be so tapped, would become a new San Francisco, literally built up with Canadian trade. Now, I am not willing to see the two termini of the Canadian inter-oceanic railway system in the United States, one terminus at Portland and the other at Holmes Harbour. I believe if it can be done, it is highly desirable that we should not place ourselves in such a position as that, and I look upon the points I have referred to as very important and very great obstacles in the way of the adoption of that line. But while I have stated that the length of railway by Burrard Inlet is shorter, and the grades easier, there is a more important question still than the question of length and grade, to which I wish to draw the attention of the House; and that is the question of traffic. It is better to spend our money in the construction of a longer road, involving more severe grades, if, notwithstanding the length and the grades, we are going to have a greater traffic for the road. The great difficulty that presents itself to my mind in the consideration of this question, is this: It is a long distance, by any route one can find, from the Pacific, before you reach a country that can be looked upon with any confidence as furnishing the traffic and business by which the Canadian Pacific Railway must be sustained. I regret, therefore, deeply, that the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, two years ago, when my right hon. friend, Sir John A. Macdonald and I, and other members in this House, urged him to do so, did not spend the season he expended in exploring the Fraser and the present location of the line, in making a full examination of the country in the region of the Red River and Peace River passes. Had that been done, we would have been in a better position to deal with this question than we are to-day. If it should prove—as we have reason to assume it will—that by the adoption of the Bute Inlet route, or the other route to which I have referred, we can materially shorten the distance between the coast of the Pacific and a section of the country to which we may fairly look for a large amount of traffic to sustain the railway, then we would be warranted in building a longer line or taking the severe grades to which I have advert-

ed. We, therefore, propose to ask the House to allow us to make a rapid exploration of that district before we finally decide the question as to whether the road is to go by the route adopted by our predecessors or by some other route. Then there is the important question of Port Simpson. The line to Port Simpson might be somewhat longer, but there are few persons who will not admit that if a line can be found, that, though somewhat longer, that would not only cost less money, but would bring us, regarding this as a great line of interoceanic communication, a great deal nearer to the east than any other line now proposed it is worthy of consideration. It is a matter of no little importance, and it is a matter which gives us no little confidence in the enterprise, to know that any one of the routes to which I have adverted, the Burrard Inlet line, the Bute Inlet line, or the line to Port Simpson, will provide a shorter line of communication between the great centre of commerce of the United States, New York, and the eastern world, than any other route. It is a matter of no little importance to know that, notwithstanding the construction of the present Pacific Railway in the United States to San Francisco, parties from New York wishing to go to the east would shorten the distance very materially by adopting any one of the routes I have named. By adopting one of these routes they will find the distance from New York to Japan 650 miles shorter than by any route the United States can afford. So far as European traffic is concerned, the citizens of London, the citizens of Great Britain, will find that they can reach China and Japan by the line of the Canadian Pacific, and over Canadian soil from Halifax, instead of the line now existing to San Francisco, and effect a saving of over 1,200 miles. I look upon this as an important point, and one that ought to inspire Canadians with confidence in the ultimate success of this great national work. Now, Sir, I do not intend, at this moment, to go further into that question. Having laid before the House fairly and frankly, and without reserve, the position of the Government in relation to it, I may say now that we ask the permission of the House to let a contract, not exceeding 125 miles, in British Columbia. We do that because, in the excited condition of feeling in British Columbia, in consequence of the long delays to which the people of that Province have been subjected, we feel ourselves compelled—just as the late Government felt themselves compelled when they adopted a location and prepared to run a line from Yale to Kamloops—I say we feel ourselves obliged to pledge ourselves to British Columbia, that the construction shall be commenced during the present season.

MR. DECOSMOS: Where?

MR. TUPPER: In British Columbia. I have already told the hon. gentleman as distinctly as I can, that we do not know where. I may say the line from Yale to Kamloops is ready for construction. The quantities have been taken out, and it is in such a condition that we may fairly invite contractors to deal with it from a practical and business point of view. I may also tell my hon. friend that at this moment the staff of the Department is engaged in taking out the quantities on a section of the line on the Bute Inlet route, in order to have it prepared to submit to the contractors, so that the contract can be pushed forward if we adopt that route, and if we decide that the interest of the country would be promoted by the abandonment of the decision of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and the adoption of the more national line by Bute Inlet. I do not underrate the importance of the fact, that the line from Bute Inlet means a longer course of navigation to Victoria, or the construction of a railway on Vancouver's Island. But taking all these questions into consideration, the Government feel they would not be discharging the duty they owed to the country in relation to the railway if they did not first ask permission to make an exploration before carrying out the work which they stand pledged to carry out in good faith, and placing this season under contract a substantial part of the road in British Columbia. I have not, in my remarks, reflected on the action of hon. gentlemen opposite. They charged us with having imposed obligations on them, and called on us to aid them to carry out this great work; and now we may in turn fairly ask the support of the hon. gentlemen opposite. They must not forget, that, although we incurred a limited liability, amounting to $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land, it was agreed that the work should be accomplished by the agency of a private company which was to provide the additional capital required, and incur all liability and risk above and beyond our contributions to carry out the work; yet when they assumed power they increased very largely that liability for the purpose of satisfying the views of the people of British Columbia and meeting the views of the Imperial Government. They placed an absolute and binding obligation on this country to construct 2,000 miles of railway, from Lake Superior to the Pacific, by 1890, within fourteen years from the date at which it was entered into, and that without any reservation whatever, and solely upon the responsibility of the Government. I only recall this fact to the attention of the hon. gentlemen opposite as the ground I have for asking their aid in carrying any measures to accomplish the great work to which both political parties have been irretrievably committed by the action of the Governments representing those parties. I may be asked how we propose to build the railway without entailing on the country such financial burdens as it is unable to bear. We revert largely to our original policy. We believed at the outset that the vast fertile territories of the North-West would furnish the means to a very large extent to construct this interoceanic highway. We believe that, to-day, being now in possession of increased information beyond that which we possessed five years ago, and from the opinions expressed by authorities who are well able to judge, we have vast regions only partially explored which are not second to any lands in the West. We believe we have there the garden of the world. We believe we have something like 180,000,000 acres of land which, in regard to fertility and grain-bearing qualities, are equal to any on the face of the globe. We believe, therefore, we are justified in considering that, by a wise arrangement for the utilisation of that land, we may make it, to a very large extent, provide for the construction of the Pacific Railway without imposing, at all events, any large additional burden to that which has been already incurred in connection with this work. I believe those who have watched the progress of that country under all the great disabilities under which it has laboured for the last few years, will feel I am not over-sanguine when I express the hope, that with these new and increased facilities, and, with the co-operation of the Imperial Government, we may rapidly fill up the country with an industrious population, which will prove a source of wealth, and provide a substantial basis for the construction of the railway. I have adverted in these resolutions to the national character of the work, and the ground Canada has for asking further substantial aid from the Imperial Government in regard to it. I have pointed to the fact that it will open up the nearest means of access between Great Britain and her dependencies in the Pacific. It will bring the Imperial authorities 1,200 miles nearer to China and Japan than by any other route across this continent, and it will provide comfortable and happy homes for the suffering millions of the United Kingdom in our North-West Territories. Hon. gentlemen are aware of the fact that, on a comparatively recent occasion, a large deputation brought before the attention of Lord Derby the unprecedented extent of distress existing among the working classes, whereupon that eminent nobleman, who has devoted much attention to the improvement of the condition of the labouring people, stated that he looked forward to a well devised and systematic system of emigration from the British Isles as the only substantial means of affording relief to that over-peopled and suffering country. I believe, when we present this policy, and say that, while thousands of people in the United Kingdom are in a state of enforced idleness, the construction of the Pacific Railway would afford them immediate employment, and, at the same time, develop on this continent a great British power, we will present a scheme which will not be regarded with disfavour. It has long been the pride of every British subject that whenever a slave touches British soil, in any part of the world, his shackles fall away. So I say we in Canada have greater pride in knowing that the thorn of the feet of the most discontented British subjects touch Canadian soil, that discontent disappears, and no sooner do they realise the fact that they are in possession of the fullest freedom and the means of successful employment, than they become truly loyal to the British Crown. It is the pride and boast of Canada to-day that, while the great parties of this country—the party represented by gentlemen opposite, a party greater in point of influence and numbers than their relative representation in this House at the present moment, would indicate—while that great party may differ from us on political questions, and while the party led by my right hon. friend the Premier may believe that the interests of the country are safer in his hands than in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite; while we may differ on questions of fiscal policy, and as to whether Free-trade or Protection to our industries is the wiser course, there is one thing upon which we all agree, and that is pride in British institutions, and a determination to uphold them. It cannot be an object of indifference to Great Britain that this country presents an opportunity, not only of thinning the over-populated districts of the British Islands, but of attracting Frenchmen from France, Germans from Germany, and, in fact, people of all nationalities from the overcrowded populations of Europe, to settle on British soil, and become loyal and devoted supporters of the British Crown and of British institutions. Although we possess a population of but 4,000,000 at this moment, it was but yesterday that men of all parties loyally determined to spring to the support of England and the Empire in a prospective European struggle. The loyal volunteers of this country then by tens of thousands offered to go to any part of the world to assist in fighting the battles of England, and I am sure the time has come when the Empire regards the determination on the part of Canada to maintain and uphold British institutions here and British power elsewhere as a source of strength to England. The time has, therefore, come when Great Britain cannot look with indifference upon the question whether millions from the overcrowded districts of Europe shall settle here on the fertile prairies of the North-West and build up a great British power on this side of the water, or whether they shall be transferred in another direction to promote the commercial prosperity and increase the power and strength of a country which, although at this moment enjoying the most peaceful relations with England, may at any time be in a position to imperil her interests. I believe that, under these circumstances, we may look with confidence to the action of England in this matter, and, considering that Canada is at this moment committed to a large expenditure, in permeating the best and more accessible portions of the fertile prairies of the North-West, we may ask the Imperial Government to give us substantial aid, or to give us a guarantee, which will cost the Empire nothing, to assist us in reaching the rich prairies of the North-West by penetrating the Rocky Mountains, from the Pacific coast. And, Sir, we can go to the Mother Country with additional confidence, seeing that, again and again having received her endorsement of our bonds, we have always maintained our credit, and have never allowed England to be called upon to contribute a single dollar in consequence of any guarantee she has given us. Under these circumstances, we look with confidence to the Mother Country as a source to which we are entitled to look for substantial aid in the construction of the work. But we are not only prepared to give the sound, untarnished credit of Canada in support of any aid or assistance we may ask, but we are prepared to place at the bottom of that national credit of Canada one hundred millions of acres of the most fertile land in the world. Exception may be taken to the appropriation of such a large extent of land for the building of this road, as exception was taken by hon. gentlemen opposite to the appropriation of fifty million acres of land to be under the control of a company. We do not propose here to put the land under the control of a company, although I confess, so far as I am concerned, I would be glad, did the condition of things permit of it, if a company liberally aided could be found to take this work up, and, at their own responsibility and risk, carry it to completion. But, in the absence of that means of attaining our object, we believe we are right in placing in the hands of a Commission—on which the Imperial Government shall be with us jointly represented—a hundred million acres of land for the construction of this work. Why, if we gave the whole of the land in the North-West for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it would be better than to leave those immense fertile districts untrodden, for I may say an age to come, neither contributing to the benefit of the world or the consolidation of British power and the extension of British interests on this continent. That being the case, Sir, I believe we have a substantial basis to which we can look for the building of the road. Exception may be taken to the minimum price of two dollars an acre, but who is there who will not say, looking to the character of that land in the North-West, that the settler will prefer to give two dollars an acre for land within twenty miles of a railway that will carry his produce to market, than have as a free gift land without railway facilities. We may, therefore, fairly utilise that great work in such a way as will thus promote the settlement of these lands. I may be told that the purchasers of this land will lock it up. They cannot afford to do that, Sir. It is only by settlement that the purchaser can make the land more valuable; and if they do lock it up they will only be contributing to build the railway and to give railway communication to the rest of the country still left untouched. The House will see, Sir, that we have not increased the amount since our former proposition. Then we proposed to give a company fifty million acres in alternate blocks, the Government reserving the alternate blocks. Now, in the changed condition of things, we utilise the whole immediately, and propose to make it form a substantial basis for the building of the road, not quite covering the views of my friend from South Norfolk, but looking in the direction of making the land and the road the basis of credit upon which to obtain the money necessary for the purpose of accomplishing the construction of this great national highway, which alone can make the land of any value. I do not, Sir, intend, at this late period of the Session, to detain the House any further, but feeling that

hon. gentlemen opposite will be able to give their cordial support to the Government on the main features of this great question, however we may differ on some of the minutiae; feeling that we are agreed in the necessity of immediate action, and in such a way as to promote the prosperity of our country, and looking to hon. gentlemen opposite as not prepared to take any serious objection to the proposals I submit, I beg leave to submit the following Resolutions:

"1. Resolved, That engagements have been entered into with British Columbia as a condition of union with Canada, that a line of railway to connect the Atlantic with the Pacific shall be constructed with all practical speed.

"2. Resolved, That the Pacific Railway would form a great imperial highway across the continent of America entirely on British soil, and would provide a new and important route from England to Australia, to India and to all the dependencies of Great Britain in the Pacific; as also to China and Japan.

"3. Resolved, That reports from the Mother Country set forth an unprecedented state of enforced idleness of the working classes, and the possibility of a scheme of relief on a large scale being found indispensable to alleviate destitution.

"4. Resolved, That the construction of the Pacific Railway would afford immediate employment to numbers of workmen, and would open up vast tracts of fertile land for occupation, and thus would form a ready outlet for the over-populated districts of Great Britain and other European countries.

"5. Resolved, That it is obvious that it would be of general advantage to find an outlet for the redundant population of the Mother Country within the Empire, and thus build up flourishing colonies on British soil, instead of directing a stream of immigration from England to foreign countries.

"6. Resolved, That in view of the importance of keeping good faith with British Columbia, and completing the consolidation of the Confederation of the Provinces in British North America, and for the purpose of extending relief to the unemployed working classes of Great Britain, and affording them permanent homes on British soil; and in view of the national character of the undertaking, the Government of Canada is authorised and directed to use its best efforts to secure the co-operation of the Imperial Government in this great undertaking, and obtain further aid by guarantee or otherwise, in the construction of this great national work.

"7. Resolved, That it is further expedient to provide (1) That one hundred million acres of land, and all the minerals they contain, be appropriated for the purposes of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway. (2) That the land be vested in Commissioners to be specially appointed, and that the Imperial Government be represented on the Commission. (3) That all the ungranted land within twenty miles of the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway belonging to the Dominion be vested in such Commission; and that when the lands along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway are not of fair average quality for settlement, a corresponding quantity of lands of fair quality shall be appropriated in other parts of the country, to the extent in all of 100,000,000 of acres. (4) That said Commissioners be authorised to sell, from time to time, any portions of such land at a price to be fixed by the Governor-in-Council, on their recommendation, at the rate of not less than $2 per acre; and that they may be required to invest the proceeds of such sales in Canadian Government securities, to be held exclusively for the purpose of defraying the cost of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

"8. Resolved, That the withdrawal for sale and settlement of lands for twenty miles on each side of the located line of the Pacific Railway, has, in part, had the effect of throwing settlements south and west of Lake Manitoba.

"9. Resolved, That in the existing state of things, it is desirable to combine the promotion of colonisation with railway construction on the Canada Pacific Railway west of Red River.

"10. Resolved, That the Government be authorised and directed to locate a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway from the Red River westerly, running to the south of Lake Manitoba, with a branch to Winnipeg; and if they deem it advisable to enter into a contract for expending a sum not exceeding $1,000,000 in constructing the said railway without previously submitting the contracts to Parliament.

"11. Resolved, That it is expedient to make further explorations in the Peace and Pine River Districts, and other sections of the country not yet examined, in order to ascertain the feasibility of a line through the largest extent of fertile territory, before beginning the work of construction in British Columbia.

"12. Resolved, That in the opinion of the House the selection of the Burrard Inlet terminus was premature.

"13. Resolved, That it is necessary to keep good faith with British Columbia, and commence the construction of the railway in that Province as early as is practicable.

"14. Resolved, That the Government be authorised and directed to make such further explorations as they may deem necessary for the said purpose, and so soon as they have finally selected and located the line, to enter into contracts for constructing a portion of the same, not exceeding 125 miles, without the further sanction of Parliament, so that the work of construction may, at latest, be commenced during the present season, and, thereafter, be vigorously prosecuted."

MR. MACKENZIE: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the hon. gentleman, but I only regret he has brought up the subject in the last days of the Session, because it is impossible, at this stage, to discuss it in that full and exhaustive manner which the serious changes the hon gentleman has proposed render necessary. I will, before I sit down, refer to the very difficult method which he proposes to adopt, and to the difficulties that must necessarily present themselves to any person in giving to the Government of the day the power which is here solicited. Whatever may be thought of the confidence which the House may possess in the Government, that Government should never presume upon the mere strength of a majority to violate well known constitutional principles.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Hear, hear.

MR. MACKENZIE: One of the resolutions which is here submitted proposes that the House should give the Government the power to give out a contract to build 125 miles of railway, in one of the most difficult countries in the world for railway construction, without a knowledge of the location of the 125 miles, without giving a hint or an idea, far less explicit information, as to the position where it is to commence or where it is to end. Such a power was never solicited, so far as I am aware, by any Government before now. We have, on former occasions, in consequence of our anxiety to proceed with the construction of some portions of this work, sought from the House explicit power to build a certain part in a place well defined; and, when the hon. gentleman last night sought a similar power in respect to a section immediately west of Red River, I did not feel, although the location of the line was somewhat poorly defined, inclined to withhold my own personal consent to his request. But, before discussing further the constitutional difficulties which are involved, I propose to devote a few minutes to considering the general principles of the resolutions, from the point of view which the hon. gentleman has selected. First, let me congratulate the hon. gentleman on the moderation of his tone. There is nothing like placing a gentleman in a position of responsibility to force him to moderate the terms of his previous fault-finding and denunciations, and to change his style of argument. The hon. gentleman has, to-day, frankly admitted that the late Administration could adopt no other course than the one they pursued. He admitted the extreme difficulties which were placed in the path of that Administration, by the action of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, prior to our advent to office, and that the engagement made with British Columbia to construct a road from Lake Nipissing, in Ontario, to some point on the Pacific coast, within ten years, was an engagement impossible of fulfilment. When we came into office, we found that Parliament was solemnly committed almost to a treaty obligation with that Province, to accomplish this stupendous work. He repeatedly pointed out to the House, and he said it again now, that in no country in the world had such formidable difficulties been experienced in making a survey as what was presented on the Canadian Pacific Railway. Yet we were attacked, year after year by the hon. gentleman and his friends for not having kept faith with British Columbia. Now we are called upon by hon. gentlemen opposite to help them in their difficulties. They will always find that gentlemen on this side will be prepared to consider all such questions from a truly national point of view. We recognise the obligations resting upon us as Canadians, and, while I assert, in the most positive manner, that nothing could have been done by any Administration during our term of office that we did not do, or try to do, in order to accomplish, or realise those expectations which were generated by the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite, in their admission of British Columbia into the Confederacy, I say, at the same time, that we endeavoured, not merely to keep the national obligations, but we ventured, to a great extent, our own political existence as administrators; we risked our political position for the sake of carrying out to completion, in the best way possible, the course which hon. gentleman opposite had promised should be taken. We knew that, no matter what course we took, we would be subject to blame either from hon. gentlemen opposite, or from our own friends. We had, on the one hand, to maintain that which was equivalent almost to a treaty obligation with British Columbia, whose population only reached a few thousands.

MR. DECOSMOS: I hope my hon. friend will place British Columbia as it should be before this country. She pays to-day, per capita, more than Ontario or any other Province.

MR. MACKENZIE: If I placed some of the British Columbia members in their proper position before this House and country, it might not be a very happy one. Whatever other portions of Canada may have to say in regard to the policy of the late Administration, British Columbia has no ground for any other feeling than one of extreme gratitude. I was aware that there was a strong feeling throughout all the eastern portions of Canada, comprising 4,000,000 inhabitants to a few thousands in British Columbia, that we had undertaken to tax our people for the accomplishment of an object which would have taken the energies of a people of five times our population and wealth. We had to contend with the difficulties incidental to such a position and never received the slightest sympathy, assistance or co-operation from the gentlemen who are now on the Treasury benches. That, however, would be no reason why we should not extend to them different treatment. It is true they are quite independent of our votes. They have a majority which will enable them to carry almost anything they desire, and to plunge this country into a vortex of debt which we may not get out of for half a century to come. I quite admit the serious difficulties which hon. gentlemen opposite have before them in the administration of this part of their public duties, and I warn them that it will be an evil day when we enter recklessly upon an immense expenditure beyond our means, and that, while it may be advisable for the time to continue some portions of the operations in a time when trade is dull, when there seems to be no immediate prospect of relief to our people, it is a very serious matter to undertake enormous obligations such as those that were incurred in 1872. The hon. gentleman referred to the change of plan, as he calls it, which was adopted by the late Administration, as compared with the plan originated by hon. gentlemen opposite. The plan originated by them was this: Before they obtained any authority from this Parliament at all, they had arranged a plan of giving out a contract for the construction of the entire line to a company, without any competition whatever, paying that company 50,000,000 acres of land and the sum of $30,000,000 of money as the entire consideration for the building of the road. If the hon. gentlemen had received, to the slightest extent, any encouragement from the capitalists of England to carry out their plan, they might speak with some confidence and assurance of their plan having been afterwards rejected, but they knew very well that, before they left office, the plan had completely broken down; that Sir Hugh Allan, as the chief of that company and some of his associate directors had visited England, had conferred with the leading bankers and capitalists there, had seen all the contractors they could, and came back without a single ray of hope that their scheme could be carried out in England. Sir Hugh Allan and his company were released from their obligations, their surety money was paid back to them, and the contract and plan fell to the ground together. It is, therefore, absurd in hon. gentlemen opposite to talk now grandiloquently of their plan and the results, if adopted. It became my duty in 1873 to consider this question. I had to consider the necessity of keeping, as far as possible, the obligations of Canada to British Columbia, and the extent to which it was possible to tax the labour and productive power of the rest of Canada, in order to accomplish that result. The Government decided at once that to keep these terms was out of the question. More than two years and a half had elapsed, the surveys were barely commenced, and it was impossible to commence construction until we had obtained ample information from surveys, and, when I say that, at that time also, over half a million had been expended upon surveys, and those entirely of a preparatory, exploratory character, and that, to this moment, according to the statements of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, the expenditure has been within a fraction of $14,000,000, it will be seen how gigantic the work was, and how unreasoning the complaints made from British Columbia that we had not yet commenced a mile of the railway. It was impossible to commence it until the surveys had been made, and it was impossible to complete them without a very large amount of labour and time being expended upon them. The Chief Engineer is aware, as is the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, that he had liberty to employ as many men as possible for this purpose, and that the surveys have already cost $1,400 a mile, while the average cost of surveys, exploratory and preparatory, and also for construction, on the most expensive railways, in the settled parts of the country, has not exceeded $1,500 a mile, while here, before we were able to let a contract even, very nearly $1,400 a mile has been spent on those surveys. Our proposal was this: We endeavoured, in the first place, to obtain some modification of the terms. We despatched an agent to British Columbia, and Lord Carnarvon ultimately offered his good services, in order to arrive at some understanding with that Province; and we reached the understanding that we would endeavour to build a railway from Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean by 1890; that we should expend a certain amount per annum in British Columbia, after the surveys were completed, and line adopted. The line never was surveyed sufficiently to enable us to reach that conclusion till last year, and, as soon as we had information sufficient to guide us, we adopted the Burrard Inlet route, and immediately advertised for tenders for the construction of that line. The hon. the Minister of Public Works has spoken of our departure from the former terms of the construction of this road. Now, what was this departure? We had precisely the same provision of land, and equivalent as to money; only, instead of $30,000,000, we named $10,000 a mile, which would have amounted to $26,000,000, and two-thirds of the land was to be controlled by the Government in respect of sales and management. We also then provided that, in asking for tenders, we should invite tenderers to say upon what additional amount they would require a guarantee of four per cent. for 25 years. But, in the meantime, we felt that, while it would take some years to complete the surveys, it was of immense importance to the scheme, as a whole, that we should get into the prairie country with a road through our own territory. I was glad to hear the Minister of Public Works declare that those initial contracts which we gave out to secure a railroad from Lake Superior to Red River were as much in the interest of British Columbia as if the expenditure had been incurred in that Province itself. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman is correct in that statement. It must now be quite evident to every person that the railroad must be a lamentable failure, unless means be adopted, in the first place, to throw a very large population into that country in the centre of the continent; and, without means of access to those western prairies equivalent to that of the United States to theirs, we never could hope to get a large population into that country. It was a question some time ago, however, and is a question still, whether there was any wisdom in immediately proceeding with the railroad west of Selkirk or Red River, because at that point we reach the prairie country and lines of communication in certain directions, and the colonisation schemes entrusted to those settlers themselves, probably present the best solution of the difficulty of settling up a vast country like that. Our settlers, being enterprising, naturally push forward a few score or hundred miles in advance of any railway, and, when settled in sufficient numbers, having realised the importance of transportation for their products, they would strain every nerve to get railroads constructed into their districts. The scheme submitted to the House in a tentative manner by the Minister of the Interior in the late Government (Mr. Mills) was one fairly embodying the views entertained by his colleagues on that subject. It was submitted, experimentally, in order to test the feeling of the country and the House, with the idea, however, that the country should avoid, as far as possible, any railroad expenditure in that country which might be provided by private and individual effort, aided by municipal and other help in the localities interested, as in other parts of Canada. While we let out contracts between Thunder Bay and Selkirk, with a view to get a road opened into that country, it was with the determination to adopt this method, and I explained this several times during my administration. We intended, when we had obtained a full completion of the surveys, and finally adopted the route to the ocean, through British Columbia, to endeavour to place the entire work from Lake Superior westward under contract,—the contractors assuming the expenditure already incurred, and allowing themselves to be charged with it as part of the $10,000 a mile to be paid to them on the contracts for the entire line. The hon. gentlemen opposite, and the whole country are aware that we solicited tenders in England for some months upon this ground, before hon. gentlemen opposite came into office; also that Mr. Sandford Fleming, the Chief Engineer, was instructed, while in London, to place himself in communication with contractors and financial men, and also to obtain the assistance of Sir John Rose, who, in many things, had been the active, energetic and patriotic agent of the Dominion, with a view to the carrying out of this scheme. But I am informed that, notwithstanding all our efforts, we signally failed in obtaining one single offer (there was one imperfect offer made) for the construction of the railroad on those terms, which were the grant of 20,000 acres and $10,000 cash, per mile, with a guarantee of 4 per cent. upon such balance as might be represented as necessary. No terms could be more explicit; it would be difficult to mention terms more favourable, and yet the hon. gentleman seems to expect, by his speech, that the colonisation scheme, with the 100,000,000 acres instead of the 50,000,000 acres and $30,000,000 current money, is somehow or other to succeed in getting this road built. His own remarks showed to-day that it is utterly useless at present for him to expect British railway contractors, or great financial firms to engage in any railroad enterprise on this continent. Much of this is due to the want of confidence which he tells us is experienced in financial circles in Britain, and a great deal is due to the unwise legislation in Canada and the Provinces, with respect to railway lines, and to the fact that foreign capitalists have obtained little or no return for the money they have laid out in this country. I have made up my mind long ago that it will be exceedingly difficult for a population of 4,000,000 so to conduct financial transactions connected with the building of that railroad of 2,600 miles, across an unknown and almost untrodden continent, in many places extremely difficult. I frankly say now, after my experience in endeavouring to accomplish something in that direction, that I fear we shall be incapable of accomplishing anything in that direction at present. I am convinced that what I have repeatedly urged must now be done—that the consent and co-operation of the entire population is absolutely necessary in undertaking any large expenditure of money; that, while we are bound to consider what we have engaged to do by British Columbia, we are also bound to consider still more what is due to the people we represent in this House, and whether the taxation which may be demanded is not such as no people should submit to for any consideration whatever. That is my position, and I shall take occasion, before those resolutions are adopted, to, in some way or other, place my views on record, in order that no one may misunderstand the ground we occupy on this side of the House. I believe that any obligations such as the one incurred, if at all possible, should be carried out, but not to ruin the rest of the country. But the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Tupper) has struck a mine on this occasion. He says there is a vast multitude of people idle in Great Britain, and unprecedented distress, and he is to invite those distressed people to take refuge on the prairies. This country is so pictured by the hon. gentleman now that he is in office, and so pleasant are all its circumstances and surroundings, that it appears to him a paradise to which he is to invite all the distressed people in the four quarters of the globe. But a few weeks ago, the hon. gentleman was descanting, with the greatest possible emphasis, upon the deep, universal pervading distress that had settled down upon Canada, and we know that it was such representations that enabled the hon. gentleman and his friends—not representations, but misrepresentations like these—to settle himself down comfortably with his colleagues on the Treasury benches. Now everything is couleur de rose. Everything is right now, and I fear very much the hon. gentleman is much more imposed upon by his pleasant surroundings than by this affected sympathy for the distressed people of Great Britain. I have considered the distress in Great Britain, Canada and the United States, and have proved to the country and Parliament that there is ten times the distress in the United States than exists in Britain. The hon. the Minister of Public Works might learn from history that what he calls the present unprecedented distress in Great Britain is nothing compared with what existed when the doctrines of hon. gentlemen opposite were its rule of legislation. He says he cannot doubt that the British Government will show the greatest possible interest in assisting his policy by accepting his invitation to send a Commissioner to act with those from Canada in bringing those thousands of distressed people to the prairies, and getting us money to build the road, while he himself and colleagues have, within the last few days, legislated wholly against Great Britain.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: No, no.

MR. MACKENZIE: And have legislated in favour of the United States, this legislation being a direct insult to the Mother Country.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: No, no.

MR. MACKENZIE: This legislation has been an insult thrown in the face of British statesmen and the British people, and a defiance. Notwithstanding the hon. gentleman has not hesitated to express his belief, after legislating in this sense against the policy of the Empire, against the interests of British commerce and in favour of the commerce of a foreign people on our borders, he has not hesitated a moment to say, in the face of all this, that he expects to go to England and get the active sympathy of the British Government. As a Canadian, I fervently trust that the British Government, notwithstanding the ill behaviour of Canada to Britain, will show us that consideration which they have always hitherto been disposed to show; but, at the same time, I must say that, if I were a British statesman, and were to act in the interest of British commerce and British workmen, it would be impossible for me to extend a particle of consideration to the hon. gentleman's proposal. It is a very remarkable thing that the Imperial Government is to be expected in this way, by the introduction of such resolutions in this House, to be influenced in their favour. When I saw the notice of those resolutions, I supposed that the hon. gentlemen opposite had been in communication with the British Government till I heard the speech of the Minister of Public Works, that he had in some way reason to believe that something of this kind would be done, and I confess I was astonished at the liberality of the statesmen of Britain, who were capable of so returning good for evil. But the hon. gentleman has given us no information on the subject. It seems these resolutions were introduced at haphazard in the hope that something would turn up. Ministers are in a strait at present; they are pressed on the one hand by the financial circumstances of the country, and, on the other, by the two members for Victoria and the members for British Columbia. We have the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government sitting for a little borough of British Columbia, and the other member (Mr. DeCosmos) sitting behind him, considering how they can bring relief to their constituents, and, at the same time, keep the responsibility to the people of the country intact. There are more than British Columbia and Victoria represented in this House. British Columbia and Victoria seem, Sir, in the estimation of the hon. member behind the Premier (Mr. DeCosmos) to be one thing, and British Columbia, Victoria and Canada seem to be convertible terms. Those gentlemen speak with the utmost coolness and indifference of the expenditure of millions; they speak of it as the smallest possible thing. Now, I propose to refer for a moment to the engineering question involved in the resolutions; I propose to refer to what was said regarding the question of route, and I think it is a very unfortunate matter that the leader of the Government should be in a position to have—what shall I call it?—his fealty to his constituents and his fealty to the Dominion antagonistic to each other. No one can read the newspapers of his constituency without observing this.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not read them.

MR. MACKENZIE: If he does not read them, I read them very diligently, and I observe the newspapers published in the hon. gentleman's constituency say frankly and plainly that they elected him for the purpose of bringing the route by Bute Inlet to Esquimalt and Victoria. That is the very purpose and object for which the hon. gentleman was elected, and, no doubt, he accepted the nomination and election with the intention of complying with the request of his constituents. I cannot reconcile the hon. gentleman's well-known honesty in political matters in any other way. Everybody who knows the hon. gentleman's political career knows that he would not, on any account, lead his constituents astray in regard to political matters, and we are, therefore, bound to believe that he accepted the nomination and election for Victoria on the express condition that this was to be accomplished, and we have the first instalment of it here. We are told gravely, in one of the resolutions, that we are to be asked to vote—what? "That in the opinion of this House the selection of the Burrard Inlet terminus was premature." Well, what does premature mean? That it was selected too soon—is that it? Very well, then, Sir, what will be said when it is known that the member for Victoria, the Premier, and his Administration selected a route by Bute Inlet to Esquimalt, five years before that. It was premature; that is, it seems, after we had completed the surveys on all the known possible lines, that only then did we announce our final determination. But the hon. gentlemen opposite, before there was an inch of country surveyed, committed themselves to the selection of the Bute Inlet and Esquimalt route. How could the hon. gentleman opposite word that resolution? How could he dream of accusing us of selecting the Burrard Inlet route too soon, in the face of that fact? But it is politically necessary, in the meantime, to quiet the apprehensions of the hon. gentlemen from that part of the Province. Then, Sir, we have two members here from the mainland of British Columbia; they are interested in the Burrard Inlet route, I presume, and the hon. the Minister of Public Works to-day tells those gentlemen, for their comfort, that these resolutions do not necessarily imply that the Burrard Inlet route will not be adopted after all. They are told, in fact, practically—and the Minister of Public Works candidly states, and I think he made his statement with great candour to-day—the hon. gentleman candidly states that, as far as he is able to say, Burrard Inlet is at present the most available. He states what is true, that the grades are much more favourable, and that is everything, I may say, upon a great road like the present. In consultation with the Chief Engineer during my term of office, I found he invariably laid the greatest possible stress upon grades, and I entirely concurred with that gentleman, on the necessity of obtaining favourable gradients on a great railway. He endeavoured to obtain, going eastward from the centre of the continent, a grade not exceeding 26ft. to the mile, and not exceeding 40ft. to the mile going westward. Now, on the Burrard Inlet route there is no grade in excess of 52ft. to the mile, a very large proportion of it is less than half of that, and a considerable portion is entirely level. The hon. member for Victoria, who sits in the rear of the Premier (Mr. DeCosmos)—I do not know which of them is the senior as to votes—called out to the hon. the Minister of Public Works, while he was speaking of the favourable gradients on the Burrard Inlet route, as compared with the Bute Inlet, that he had forgotten the question of curves. I think the hon. gentleman was quite right in that. It is a very important matter. Now, I am able to give the hon. gentleman and the House the information he desires. On the Burrard Inlet route, out of a distance altogether of 493 miles, there are 285 miles of straight line; and on the Bute Inlet route, out of a distance of 546 miles, there are 328 miles of straight line. The percentage of straight line on the Bute Inlet route is 58, and on the Burrard Inlet route, 60, showing that there is a larger amount by 2 per cent. upon the latter than upon the former. Then, the radius of curves on the Burrard Inlet route from 4 to 5 degrees, reached 36 miles, and on the Bute Inlet route it reached 22 miles, showing a difference in these curves, between 4 and 5 degrees, of 14 miles in favour of Bute Inlet. Then, on the Burrard Inlet route there is a quarter of a mile with a radius of from 955ft. to 819ft., and there is one other, occupying very small space—a mere fraction of a mile—from 819ft. to 716ft. of a radius. These are the sharpest curves on the line, and, when I say to the House that nearly all the curves on the Intercolonial Railway, near Halifax, where the trains run 30 miles an hour, are less than 700ft., it will be seen that there is nothing in the curves which will materially interfere with conducting the traffic of the country over it. The entire percentage of curvature on the Bute Inlet route is 39.76, and the entire percentage on the Burrard Inlet is 42.10. Now, the hon. the Minister of Public Works touched upon another matter in reference to the Burrard Inlet route. He said, and said truly, that it passed through a country partially settled, and most available for agricultural purposes. Other advantages may be mentioned besides that, which would materially lessen the cost of construction. One of those magnificent turnpike roads, constructed by the energy and enterprise of the British Columbia people, passes over that part of the country. There is, besides that, in the interior, near Kamloops, a bed of coal known to exist, which would be available both for fuel and traffic. These advantages are not counterbalanced in the least, in my opinion, by the military consideration referred to by the hon. the Minister of Public Works. The hon. gentleman said it was a serious consideration to go so near to the United States. Why, all our great railways pass within sight of the United States. Even the Intercolonial, at one point, is only 26 miles from the United States border; the Grand Trunk passes, for nearly 100 miles, within gun-shot of the United States territory, and even less, for a great part of this distance is on the shore of the River St. Lawrence, which is open to both countries. No one, I am sure, dreams of military considerations interfering with the route of a railroad built on Canadian territory. But the hon. gentlemen actually seem apprehensive that a large portion of the traffic from and to the United States, contiguous to British Columbia, would pass over our route. Why, instead of being an argument against the Burrard Inlet route, it is a strong argument in its favour. Besides, the hon. gentleman must recollect that the naval officers, by a very large preponderance of opinion, selected Burrard Inlet when they were requested to report upon it. Our own Lieutenant-General Smyth also considered that there was no objection to taking the Burrard Inlet route, from a military point of view. I would also refer to the opinion of General Moody, a celebrated officer of engineers, who was at one time Governor of British Columbia.

MR. DECOSMOS: I am sure the hon. gentleman has no desire to mislead the House, but allow me to say that General Moody was never Governor of British Columbia, and the best character I can give to that gentleman is that, in his own words, he is simply a mathematical Christian.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am sure no one will accuse my hon. friend from Victoria of that crime. An hon. gentleman near me suggests that, if the hon. gentleman is a Christian at all, he is a curvilinear one. I always understood that General Moody had been Governor of British Columbia. I learn from an hon. gentleman that he was Administrator only; but it is a matter of no importance. He lived in that Province, and made himself acquainted with its topographical features, and with the engineering features necessary for the construction of a railway. I am sorry his views have not been presented by the hon. gentleman opposite. I asked General Moody to place himself in communication with Mr. Fleming, and I understood by Mr. Fleming that they had been in communication. I thought it was important to get the views of a perfectly impartial and independent British officer, who had a practical knowledge of the profession and the locality, which would enable him to give such an opinion fairly.

General Moody informs me—at all events, I am at liberty to say—that he sees no military objection, whatever, to choosing that route. But, even if it were possible that there should be some military objections, I would not, as a Canadian, permit this mere objection to stand in the way of accomplishing a result so desirable as that of obtaining the cheapest and best route for a railroad through our own territory. But there is another great danger. I pointed out last night that, in ascending the Fraser River, it is possible in the meantime to obtain communication by water as far as Yale, and, by the construction of 125 miles of route, we reach again for a short distance the navigable waters in the interior, either by Lake Kamloops or as following the route of the Thompson River. I believe, therefore, that we, as a Government, adopted the proper line. There is no information before the Minister at present—that he admits—which would justify him in taking any other line. The line to the mouth of the Skeena leads, as he says, to an impracticable harbour, and we have some information, the hon. gentleman must recollect, with regard to reaching Fort Simpson; we know that it is only possible, by following that River Skeena to the forks of the Westonquah, and ascending that river towards Fort Fraser, and then diverging southwards through the chain of lakes and the head of the river to Fort George. That route, I think, is really out of the question, and, besides, we must remember that, if that is the object the hon. gentleman aims at, it would take the railway 100 miles northward of the entire population of the Province, both of the island and the main land, and that is a matter we must seriously look to. As to the trade of the Pacific being carried over our railway, it is a matter too remote, I am sure, for present consideration. It is a matter that will not trouble us for twenty years to come. It is a matter that ultimately will be of importance, but it is of little importance now; and, even as regards that matter, we must remember that there are considerations other than those of the character of the land route. We must take the currents of the ocean into consideration, and, although we would have most ready access to the ocean from Portland, or Dean Inlet, the most ready access to the railroad from the Sound outside, we must remember that the currents change the course of navigation so materially, that, without considering them, it is impossible to say which route would be best by sea. But we do know this, that from Burrard Inlet there is an open sea which can be easily reached. We know, that in the event of war, which is anticipated by the hon. gentleman as a possible contingency, it is just as easy to go from Burrard Inlet to Vancouver Island at Nanaimo, and easier, than it is to go from Waddington Harbour to Otter Cove on the Island opposite to the Inlet. The distances are much less; the distance across from Nanaimo to Burrard Inlet is not over 25 miles—this distance I have had measured by careful parties—while the distance from Waddington Harbour to Otter Cove is 66 miles. From the head of Bute Inlet to Frederic Harbour is 51 miles, from which point to Vancouver Island is 15 miles, over which an expensive ferry would have to be maintained. Now, Mr. Marcus Smith admitted himself in his reports that from Waddington Harbour to Esquimalt would take $27,000,000, including bridging, and we know it could not take less than from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 to construct the remainder of the route, including bridging. These reasons seemed to me so conclusive against the Bute Inlet route that we could not for a moment hesitate, and I will say this to the House that up to two years ago my mind was wholly biassed in favour of Bute Inlet. My reasons were these: I saw that, other considerations being equal, we struck the centre of the Island instead of striking one end of it. I also saw there were good harbours at the Alberni Canal and Quatsimo, both of which could be reached in a shorter distance than by going to Esquimalt. And, if the route via Bute Inlet is selected, one of these harbours must be chosen, unless there is a reckless disregard of the public interests on the part of the Government. But there is no necessity for going to either place. I was convinced of this solely by the experience of my engineers, and by getting opinions which they gathered in the course of their explorations through the country. It is a most serious matter to undertake to build a railroad with gradients such as there would be encountered in passing through the Homathco Valley from Bute Inlet.

MR. DECOSMOS: What are they?

MR. MACKENZIE: They are as high as 104ft. to the mile. I do not recollect the mileage precisely, but I think there are from 11 to 15 miles of this high gradient. The hon. gentleman will find the exact statement of mileage in some of my former speeches. Now, we have to consider the best course to be adopted with reference to these resolutions. The statement in the first resolution is not literally correct. The first resolution declares that engagements have been entered into with British Columbia as to the conditions of union. Now, that is not literally correct. The engagement with British Columbia was to build the railway within ten years, and, if hon. gentlemen mean to respect their bargain, they should do it in the exact words of the engagement itself. If there is no objection to a modification of the engagement, it has been owing to the efforts of the late Administration, and if there is any difficulty now in accomplishing the result that we thought to be desirable—the construction of the railway—it is because of the unwisdom of the course the hon. gentlemen opposite pursued in entering into an engagement so far beyond the power and resources of this country. I do not see how it is possible that this House can authorise the Government first to select a line, and, at the same time, when that line is not made known to Parliament, that we should authorise the Government to enter into a contract for building 125 miles of the railway. If the Government ask for power to let out contracts on lines that have been already thoroughly surveyed and are located, I would not blame those who approved of the policy of the Government for giving them that power, and, if they ask for the power to build 125 miles on the line that I believe to be the best, I will be prepared to support that proposition, but I am not prepared to support any proposition to place power in the hands of any Government to expend money in building a portion of a railway, without, at least, communicating the place where that money is to be expended. We have no reason to believe, from recent experience of the cost of building the road in a much more favourable country—from Lake Superior to Selkirk,—that it will be possible to build these 125 miles of railroad in British Columbia below $70,000 per mile. I question very much if even that will do it. So that the Government are really asking us to give them power to commit the country to an expenditure of from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000 without informing the House where the expenditure is to be made. That is contrary to all sound constitutional principles, and cannot be commended to any man's judgment. If the Government want further time to explore other routes, and want money to conduct surveys upon these routes, I am prepared to agree to those propositions, but I am not prepared to agree to such an extraordinary proposition as that embodied in the resolution. I have only to say upon the general proposition that I am quite willing to consider any scheme of colonisation that will settle up the interior of our continent. I am quite prepared to consider the propriety of extending any aid that may be thought desirable in advancing such a proposition. I am convinced, and have always been, that, in order to make our railroad a paying one, we must have a large population thrown into the heart of the continent. We have already opened up a highway through that country, and, by building the Pembina Branch, we have brought the railroad almost to the doors of the settlers in the North-West Territories. I do not understand why the hon. gentleman anticipates a large revenue from the lands to be sold, because it is absolutely indispensable, in order to induce settlers to come into the country, that we should furnish them with land free of charge. Does the hon. gentleman imagine that settlers will go to the North-West, and buy land at $2 an acre, when there are millions of acres of land offered for nothing in the United States?

MR. PLUMB: Where do they give land for nothing in the United States?

MR. MACKENZIE: There can be no question about that.

MR. PLUMB: I think there is room for question.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, my hon. friend from Niagara is exceedingly wise, but I doubt his possession of information on that point. If the hon. gentleman will examine the condition of the State of Texas, he will find that that State alone will furnish more land free than he has any idea of. The very fact that they are pouring ten or twenty times the number of people into these new territories that Canada is able to do, proves conclusively that it is true. If the hon. gentleman is proceeding on the hypothesis that in Canada alone is there any land available, he will find himself greatly mistaken. We have found it very difficult indeed in Canada to promote settlement, even where the land was given away by the Government. It is still more difficult to send settlers to the far-off western country, where they have the initial difficulties of a new country to contend with, not less in amount, though different in kind, than the settlers of our own wooded districts. They have a long winter, absence of lumber and building materials, and difficulties of transportation. We must, therefore, make up our minds, if we are to settle that country, that it will be done only at the expenditure of a large amount of money to aid settlers in going in and giving them land free after they get in. That is my conviction. If the hon. gentleman's expectation should be realised of getting $2 per acre for those 100,000,000 acres, I will confess to him that I have been utterly mistaken in my ideas upon this subject. In conclusion, I have simply to say that, while some of the resolutions of the hon. gentleman are of such a character that they can scarcely be approved or opposed, the main features of the scheme are those which are merely suppositions. If such and such things can be done, it will be better to do such and such other things. This resolution that refers to giving power to the Government to do certain things, and that which condemns the decision of the previous Government in selecting the Burrard Inlet route, I cannot give my assent to. If the Government really mean to change the character of the enterprise to this extent, I think they should have given Parliament more details, and enabled us to discuss this particular point with some regard to that freedom of discussion, and that exhaustive research necessary in a great scheme like the present. The hon. gentleman thinks to revert to the plan that was lauded by hon. gentlemen opposite during the late elections, when they told the country that the Government then in power had spent between $10,000,000 and $12,000,000, "while we," said the hon. gentlemen opposite, speaking for themselves, "were prepared to build the road with $30,000,000, and 50,000,000 acres of land." Well, I can only say, in conclusion, that any scheme whatever, if it has for its object the building of this railroad, or a portion of it, such as will commend itself to the wisdom of this House, or of the people of Canada, I shall be prepared to consider; but any scheme which is on its face a delusion, and any scheme which asks Parliament to commit itself to a policy unheard of in the records of parliamentary history, I never can consent to, however much I desire—and I do desire—to do everything in my power to facilitate the construction of the railroad into our prairie country, and that is now far on towards accomplishment. I desire to say, while I feel that obligation on the one hand, I feel also compelled to pay serious regard to the state of our finances; and to consider, as a Canadian and as a member of this House, how far these additional obligations will lead us in the way of taxation. We deliberately decided in Parliament, in 1871, afterwards in 1872, and again in 1874, that under no circumstances would we, for the purpose of accomplishing this object, increase the rate of taxation throughout the Dominion. The same resolution governed the Carnarvon terms. The rate is now alarmingly increased for other purposes, and the burdens on the people have been seriously aggravated. We occupy a very different position, relatively, to the position we occupied last year, and, in any conclusion we may reach, it is impossible to avoid paying most serious attention to the burdens which will be imposed by any such obligations as those upon the people of this country. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr.

Wallace) believes that the road can be built by the aid of a paper mill and a printing press. If it were possible to carry out that scheme, I should be glad to furnish the hon. gentleman with all the paper and printing presses he desires, and send him off to the wilderness with carte blanche, to pay for the building of the road with all the money he could manufacture.

MR. WALLACE: We want a loan as the basis of it.

MR. MILLS: It is an airy scheme.

MR. WALLACE: It is a sensible scheme, whatever may be the opinion of the member for Bothwell with all his philosophy.

MR. MACKENZIE: There is a good deal of philosophy with both hon. gentlemen—one being a practical philosopher, and the other an æreal one; the one a philosopher on subjects which are capable of being demonstrated, the other a philosopher on subjects which have been demonstrated to have no basis whatever. I have no faith in the obtaining of money in any other way than by the taxation of the people of this country. We may have any scheme we please; we may hold out any investments we please to English capitalists, but they will not come to build this railroad on any other basis except to obtain profit; and, whoever may be the contractor, the country will have to pay the money in the long run, directly or indirectly; we may borrow money, but, in order to meet the interest and sinking fund, the people will have to be taxed. Therefore, the scheme is one which, in its inception, was a mistake, and one only to be accomplished by additional taxation on the people of Canada, and at the present moment I am not prepared to submit gracefully to the present taxation, far less to the imposition of a much heavier one.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have listened attentively to the hon. member for Lambton, to hear from him, as leader of the Opposition, his explanations of the last five years' distinct railway policy, and the objections he could possibly take to the resolution of my hon. friend, the resolution proposed by the Minister of Public Works, with the assistance of the members of the Government. I am glad to find that the hon. gentleman still adheres to the idea that the Canadian Pacific Railway is a necessity, that it must be built some time, must be built speedily, as soon as practicable, as soon as it is consistent with the revenues of this country. I listened attentively to discover the number of the objections that he had to this scheme. Both sides of the House, now, as in the past, being agreed that we must have a Canadian Pacific Railway, the only question that remains, is, by what scheme, by what mode, in what way, this great object can be accomplished. The hon. gentleman's remarks, though somewhat discursive, and not for the major part of his speech directed to the resolution, seemed to point out some three or four objections to the present scheme. In the first place, he says, the setting aside of 100,000,000 acres of land was a delusion, and that his scheme was to send in the emigrants and other settlers free—that the land must be given to them free, and that there must be no revenue got from those lands at all. Secondly, he objects, on constitutional principles, to that portion of the resolution which provides that 125 miles of railway shall be built without the line being previously specified, and submitted to Parliament, and approval obtained. Then he objects, also, to the apparent doubt as to whether Burrard Inlet or Bute Inlet should be the terminus of the Pacific Railroad. Then he pooh-poohed, he laughed, he spoke with scorn of the idea of the Government going to the British Government and to English capitalists for aid in the construction of this great enterprise. These, Mr. Speaker, so far as I can gather, are the objections the hon. gentleman takes to this scheme. Now, as to the first objection, that it is a delusion and a snare that 100,000,000 acres can be set aside and profitably sold for the purpose of constructing this railway, that has always been the course taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite. They have always said that we could not make any use of the land.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Well, that we could not make much use of the land along the line for the purpose of building the railway. We can all remember—those of us who were in the old Parliament, previous to 1873—how the Opposition of that day took the ground that there were not 100,000,000 of acres of arable land in the North-West. They said that it was absurd to suppose it was worth money or fit for cultivation or settlement. It is now found—by the explorations which we have paid for, or have to pay for—that from 180,000,000 to 200,000,000 acres can be found fit for the settlement and occupation of civilised men. I should have thought the hon. gentleman, in view of the condition of the country, would have looked to these lands in the North-West as a means of building this railway. The policy of the Government, of which I was formerly a leader, is the same as the policy of to-day. We believe the Pacific Railway can be built from the head of Lake Superior to the Pacific, without the cost of a farthing to Canada. We believe that the road will pay its own expenses. We believe that the country will eventually be reimbursed for every farthing they devote to building the Canadian Pacific Railway. We believe that the hundred millions of acres which we now desire to appropriate, and which we desired to appropriate in our scheme of 1873, will be amply sufficient for the purpose of recouping the over-taxed people of Canada, for whom the hon. gentleman has so much sympathy, every farthing they may have contributed. The policy of the hon. gentleman opposite has always been to disparage that country. He says the only way of using that land is by giving it away. He says that it is covered with snow, that there is no fuel, that there is no wood, and that there is no water. If the hon. gentleman had been employed by the Texas or Kansas, or by the Northern, Southern, or Central Pacific Railroads of the United States, in order to run down and ruin the country, and destroy the prospects of our railway, he would have used the language he has done.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is very well done.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : The hon. gentleman says it is very well done. I am glad to get his approbation, as well as the approbation of a large majority of this House, that he joins his cheers, enthusiastic cheers, with those of the majority of the House, when I declare that I am doing well. In the North-West, I believe, Sir, that we have an advantage over the American Pacific Railway in the countries through which these railways pass. I believe we have got more arable land. I believe we can avoid the depths of snow. I believe we will have a railway passing through a rich fertile country, stretching over regions of national extent, if I may use the term in the European sense of size. We have immense stretches of land fit for pastoral purposes, great regions of country rich with every kind of mineral wealth. Yet the hon. gentleman, in his speech, follows up the course of his speeches ever since the subject was laid before Parliament, by attempting to disparage and underrate our country, as he did in 1873 with the view of destroying the prospects of building the Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman is following up the same practice in 1879, telling the people of England, telling British capitalists, German or Dutch capitalists—what? If the hon. gentleman ceased to be a Canadian statesman, perhaps the country would not suffer much.

Mr. MACKENZIE : Hear, hear.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : What said that hon. gentleman : "If I were a British statesman, I would say to the English capitalist, 'Do not spend one farthing in this scheme?'"

MR. MACKENZIE : I said nothing of the kind.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : "Do not spend one farthing."

MR. MACKENZIE : I did not say anything of the kind.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I appeal to the House to say if he did not. He says "Canada has insulted England, Canada has affronted England, Canada has legislated against England and in favour of the United States, and, therefore, on all these grounds, I say, if I were a British statesman, I would tell the English public, I would tell the English and foreign capitalists, not to give one farthing towards the construction of the road."

MR. MACKENZIE : I said nothing of the kind.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : This, Mr. Speaker, is his patriotism—his anxious desire to help the present Government in carrying out this scheme. He said, "When you were in Opposition you opposed our scheme and our policy. We got no fair play from you, and we are going to return good for evil. We are going to heap coals of fire on your head and we will gladly assist you in this great enterprise." At the same time, every word he used, every sentiment he uttered, every insinuation he dared—

Several HON. MEMBERS : Order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Was done for the purpose of attempting to destroy and injure the prospects of building this Pacific Railway, for which he had such a paternal regard.

MR. MACKENZIE : You are overdoing it now.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : The hon. gentleman says I am overdoing it now. It is better to overdo it than not to do it at all. Doing nothing at a great expense the hon. gentleman arrived at to perfection,—doing as little as possible at the greatest possible cost to the country. That was the policy of the hon. gentleman, and successfully carried out, as the numerous deficits and increased taxation of the country, consequent upon these deficits, has shown. Mr. Speaker, it was laughable to hear the hon. gentleman talk about his respect for the authority of Parliament. Why, I remember when we were placed on the other side of the House, and used to ask the hon. gentleman if he were going to submit his contracts to Parliament, he said : "I never said so, and did not intend to."

MR. RYKERT : Irving pitched into him about it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We remember that even the worm trod upon will turn. Even the member for Hamilton could not stand it. When the hon. the leader of the Government said he never said he meant to do it, then the member for Hamilton said: "Well, those were the principles on which the hon. gentleman was elected, and on which I was elected, and which I expected the Government would carry out." Then, Mr. Speaker, I think I remember something about the hon. gentleman asking for a resolution for an authority to enter into a contract, during the recess, for the Pacific Railway.

MR. MACKENZIE: Define the place.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Somewhere on the route of the Pacific Railway, eastward from the Pacific Ocean. I remember, also, that the hon. gentleman, in 1876, moved for certain works of construction on the road from Fort William westwards toward Lac des Mille Lacs.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, that is clear.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Well, here we are going eastwards towards Lake Manitoba. The resolutions are precisely the same. The principles are precisely the same, but I think the hon. gentleman was not satisfied with the resolutions. He once introduced a Bill providing for the construction of the road from Esquimalt to Nanaimo. At that time the hon. gentleman believed in Bute Inlet.

MR. MACKENZIE: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, he will find that, in that event, it did not require a Bill. The hon. gentleman's decision gave me authority, and I—

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We know perfectly well that this was for the purpose of building a portion of the Pacific Railway. The original intention was to make it a portion of the Pacific Railway.

MR. MACKENZIE: No, it was not.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have been reminded that in less than two years he was in favour of Bute Inlet as a terminus. Now, I am speaking about the constitutional question, and the great impropriety of introducing this Bill. In one clause it is provided "That in case it shall be found by the Governor in Council more advantageous to construct the said railway, or any portion thereof, as a public work of the Dominion of Canada, the construction thereof shall be let out by contract, offered to public competition, and the Governor General may—" and so on. My hon. friend the present Minister of Public Works moved a resolution affirming that, before these contracts should be given, the line of location should be laid on the table of Parliament, and should be approved of by Parliament. That was voted down by the majority the hon. gentleman had behind him then. Now, we arouse the indignation of the hon. gentleman by introducing a resolution by which we say that, in order to keep faith with British Columbia, we shall, during the season, commence 125 miles of the road, building from the west to the east.

MR. TUPPER: No more than 125 miles.

MR. MACKENZIE: On the mainland?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE: Where?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Echo answers, where. We tried very hard to find out what was the hon. gentleman's policy with regard to this railway. It was a policy of a protean colour, of a chameleon hue. Sometimes it partook of all kinds of changes. Why, we remember the hon. gentleman came down and said it was impossible, in the embarrassed state of the country, to build an all-railway line; that we should take advantage of the magnificent water stretches across the continent—a mingling of land and water, which, Sir, generally produces mud. By mingling land and water, it was held we should have a perfect system of railway communication across this continent. It was a little eccentricity of the hon. gentleman. Another eccentricity of the hon. gentleman was the construction of the Fort Frances Locks, which cost the country some hundreds of thousands of dollars. This was a waste of the public money just by way of eccentricity. There was such a thing as making contracts without the previous approbation of Parliament. There was the contract respecting these rails, which was a very advantageous one, especially as to price. We have seen the hon. gentleman's Esquimalt and Nanaimo policy. He took up water stretches and abandoned them.

MR. MACKENZIE: No, he did not.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Then he took up a stretch towards Lake Nipissing and laid down railways where there had been no surveys, and he changed that. He started once from Douglas to Pembroke. That was carried and then he gave up that. His policy was as varying as a summer cloud, and it would be amusing, only for the great loss of time it entailed, together with the great loss of money to the over-taxed ratepayers of Canada. Now the hon. gentleman objects to Bute Inlet. Now, suppose the Government had taken up Bute Inlet, it would have been rather a venial fault, because the hon. gentleman avowed that was his policy.

MR. MACKENZIE: I said nothing of the sort. I said up to two years ago I had a strong bias as to that being the best route, meaning simply that up to that time the information I had led me in that direction.

MR. DECOSMOS: Whether or not, did the hon. gentleman make an Order in Council to bring the road that way?

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, the report will tell who is correct.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I would like to know whether there was not an Order in Council making Bute Inlet—

MR. MACKENZIE: There was not.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman says there was not. At all events, the hon. gentleman spent millions for the purpose of surveying, with the object of making the terminus Bute Inlet.

MR. MACKENZIE: It was not.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I say it was. I will say this: On no occasion yet did the Government which expired in 1873 decide on Bute Inlet.

MR. MACKENZIE: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say they never passed an Order in Council making Esquimalt the terminus?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There was such an Order, and the hon. gentleman, when he introduced his Bill to build the railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo, did not, thereby, bind himself over to Bute or to Burrard Inlet.

MR. MACKENZIE: Certainly he did.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He did not. It will be better to look back to the record, that there may be no mistake. On the 28th May, 1872, we find that Mr. Langevin, who was then the Minister of Public Works, was pressing upon Parliament the construction of the Pacific Railway, laying down our policy, and Mr. DeCosmos said: "The explanation was quite satisfactory in one respect, but he wanted to know whether, in case the railway should be constructed to Burrard Inlet, the Government was prepared to construct a branch line from Victoria to Nanaimo, and, in case they reached the straits, whether they would cause a line to be constructed along the east coast." Mr. Langevin, in reply, said that the intention of the Government was to go to Esquimalt, and, if that was impracticable, and the road went to Burrard Inlet, a ferry would be established to connect it with Esquimalt. There was no uncertain sound on our part as to the choice of Esquimalt, but, when we were asked: Will you have the terminus at Bute Inlet or Burrard Inlet?, we said, Whether we choose Burrard or any other terminus, we will still have the ferry to Esquimalt as the Pacific harbour of British Columbia. The hon. gentleman objects to our going to England at all. He says: "There is no use in your going there; you have tried it already. You boast of your plan, but you sent Sir Hugh Allan there, and he failed." Yes, and we failed through the same line of policy of the Opposition of that day, by which they are attempting to make this scheme fail in 1879. We had the members of the Opposition denouncing the scheme, disparaging our own country, patriotically decrying our resources, using every opportunity they could in order to prevent our carrying out this great, grand, glorious consummation of the Confederation of the Dominion, of the consolidation of British authority, power, and interest on this continent. And the hon. gentleman said that he advertised in England, and that for nine months there was not a single offer made. Was the hon. gentleman sincere in advertising in England? Could he have hoped, for a moment, that he would succeed? Why, he had gone and called out "stinking fish," to use a celebrated expression of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cartwright), and no man in his senses would have taken a contract from the hon. member for Lambton, as he had stated in Parliament that the security was not worth one farthing, that the railway would be a tax and a burden which the people would be unable to stand; while the Hon. Mr. Blake, from his place in this House, told the people of British Columbia that they could not expect to get that railway, and that if they did not like it they might go in peace. Every effort was made to destroy the chances of the Canadian Pacific Railway in England. No stone was left unturned to ruin the chances of building this great trans-continental work. But what did the hon. gentleman care? It was fair game to him. He did not care if Canada was ruined, and he shows no signs of repentance. At this moment, in 1879, he is committing the crime again, and we know what ought to be the punishment of men twice convicted of the same offence. What did he care, so that he could displace the Government of that day, and get possession of power? Canada's credit has not only withstood the failure of the scheme in 1873, but has risen superior to five years of the Government of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, and, after having stood, it will be capable to build the Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman has admitted, however, that, with all the efforts that can be made, there is no possibility of building the railway by means of capitalists or a company; that it must be a Government work. We tried it with every prospect of success, but that was killed by the hon. gentleman; he tried with no hope or prospect of success, and failed; therefore, we agree on this point, that the road, if it is to be built at all, must be built by the Government. The hon. gentleman charged us, in these resolutions, with committing a great political and constitutional crime in asking for liberty to build 125 miles of railway without coming to Parliament with specifications and the Engineer's report.

MR. MACKENZIE: I said nothing of the kind.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Then he said, without pointing out whereabouts it was. Well, the whereabouts of the railway is to be found by the Engineer's survey; that is the only way. I remember when the hon. gentleman, without asking the sanction of Parliament, in any way whatever, made a solemn contract with the British Government, to which the Canadian Government was pledged by him, the British Government was pledged, and the Government of British Columbia was pledged, to build 2,000 miles of railway across the continent by 1890, and the hon. gentleman will not allow us to build our miserable little 125 miles without giving him all the details of the matter. He says, after the failure of these two schemes, it is quite impossible this can succeed. The scheme is going to succeed. Although Canada is overtaxed; although she is running a ruinous course of expenditure; although she has adopted a faulty, a disloyal, and I do not remember what other phrases are used—commercial policy, I believe—Canada can go into the English market and borrow, at a fair rate, at this moment, all the money required to build the railway. With the plenty of money there is in England; with the great Imperial objects, as shown in these resolutions, which are involved, Canada can get the money on fair terms now. What does she offer? The proposition of the Minister of Public Works is this: We are going into the English market; we will tell England: Here, we are going to build a great railway across this continent. It is going to pass through one of the finest countries the sun shines on, and will be the happy home of millions of descendants of Englishmen. Every emigrant that settles there will be an additional strength to England. We offer you a great road, the shortest to be found in the world for your trade, across the continent to China and Japan and all the North Pacific, and, besides that, we offer you the credit of Canada, the consols of Canada. It will be a special and favoured stock, and when put into the English market, the capitalists of England will find in all a profitable investment. Canada says: We pledge you our faith for all the money, besides 100,000,000 acres of land, worth $2 an acre, and we pledge you, besides, the road itself. Never was stronger security given. The consols of England are not stronger, or based on a stronger condition than will be the amount that will be required to build that road. We will allow the British Government to choose one Commissioner, we will choose another Commissioner, and those two men shall hold a quasi-judicial position, somewhat like the Auditor-General in England, and the Auditor-General here, free from all political exigencies, from the chance of all political change. They shall be charged to faithfully and honestly administer that enormous estate of 100,000,000 acres, to invest it in Dominion securities, not to sell any land under $2 an acre, except with the joint consent of the two Governments, the Government guaranteeing and the Government borrowing, and, besides all that, to administer the operation of the railway itself. I have faith in the future of the railway. On the extreme east and the extreme west we have a difficult and rugged country, but the main body of that railway passes through a magnificent country, which will be the happy abode of millions. Just consider what a hand, if I may use a simile from the gaming table, a Minister would hold, who should go to England and say, not only is the credit of Canada pledged for this road, but 100,000,000 acres of land are set aside for it, not to speak of this great railway itself and all its future earnings, which is to be built by Canada, and kept free of incumbrances. It will be good substantial security for all it can earn over its working expenses. It is a scheme that must succeed, and not all the puny well-directed shafts by which it is attempted to disparage this great work will have the desired effect. This railway is going to be built by this country, which has wasted the last five precious years in regard to it. I hope the prospect will be greeted by hon. gentlemen opposite with great favour, and have no doubt that, eight or ten years hence, we shall be told that they were the originators of the successful policy. It is said that the minimum price of $2 an acre is too high for those lands. I believe that we ought to open up that 'great North-West as fast as we can for settlement, and that the homestead system is a good one. But we are bound not only to give a man a free prairie farm, into which he can run a plough the day he arrives on it, but to furnish a railway to every man's door; so, if he has a railway near his door, or within 20, 30 or 40 miles of it, he can afford to pay for his land. Look at the difference between the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite and ours. They have admitted that the plan of building the railway by private enterprise or capital is a failure; that, if built at all, it must be by the Government, and they pledged themselves to build it by 1890. But it never occurred to them that there was any means by which this railroad should be made self-paying, or that the people to be benefitted by it should give a single farthing for it. On the contrary, the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Mackenzie) honestly said that was not his policy—he does not believe in it, but that the old Provinces of Canada should build this railway across the continent, without the slightest chance of the taxes imposed for the purpose of its construction ever being repaid in any way. It ought to have occurred to them, as men of business, and men of sense, that that was not the proposition to make those lands valuable for building the railroad. Yet, they took no steps to make them valuable. We can judge of the value of those lands by the average value of the lands in the United States. More good land will be pledged to build the Canadian Pacific Railway than was given to build the Northern, or the Union Pacific, by far. On the one, the average value was $6.50, and, on the other, $4.50, an acre, and those United States lands are selling now at $20, $30, and $40 in favourite places. We are very moderate in our calculations, then, in estimating $2 as the average for the 100,000,000 acres we propose to give, and which will yield $200,000,000 at least. We will thus have that magnificent work completed in our time, and the satisfaction of knowing that, if the scheme be carried out, it will not entail a debt upon the old Provinces of Canada, upon us or our children, but the regions and the people that gain the benefit of this work will pay its cost, only too glad and grateful for the opportunity. This is upon the supposition that we get no guarantee that Canada assumes all the debt on the credit of those lands. But I believe that, when the scheme is presented to Her Majesty's Government, and they have seen the Imperial importance of this work—when they see the enormous advantage it will be to relieve the over-crowded portions of the Mother Country, by removing the surplus population into the new Britain in the far West, they will grant a guarantee where they have granted it before, with this additional security which, without obliging England to pay a single sixpence, will enable us to push on the work and obtain all the money required for this great work on as advantageous terms as if it were a direct liability of her own. I contend, however, that, if England should not think a guarantee should be given—and we have only the right to ask her and point out the advantages that would result from it—we have no right to complain if she declines. With the security connected with the scheme we offer, it would be a favourable stock in the English market, where it would be readily, greedily sought for. I believe that money would flow into Canada, as also immigration, and that the country now roamed over by the savage red man and the buffalo, would be the home of a prosperous body of Englishmen, Irishmen and Scotchmen, living under British institutions, and enjoying all the free laws and advantages of our system, with all the benefits, besides, that a good soil and salubrious climate may afford.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Believing, as I have always done, that, no matter what mistakes may have been committed, no matter what errors, no matter what crimes may have disgraced the inception of the Pacific Railway project—believing it to be a matter of the greatest possible moment and importance to the future well-being of Canada that our great North-Western inheritance should be developed by all possible means, I am not disposed to reject rashly the propositions which come from the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. On the contrary, I desire to examine them as calmly and dispassionately as I can; but, at the same time, we are not to be deterred by any fear of the displeasure of those hon. gentlemen, much less by any such outburst of affected indignation as the right hon. the First Minister has just levelled at the head of my hon. friend the member for Lambton. In discussing this question, I think, for once, the right hon. gentleman might well have taken a lesson from the calm and deliberate manner in which the Minister of Public Works has dealt with the subject. To that hon. gentleman, although I may not agree with his opinions, I can give the credit of having presented this matter in a style and tone which was not unworthy of the great theme he had to handle. Those hon. gentlemen who, like myself, have held seats in this House the last ten years, can, I doubt not, remember well how the original propositions of the present Government were introduced and received. On that occasion, eight years ago, my hon. friend the member for Lambton and Mr. Blake, the hon. member for Chateauguay, and half-a-dozen hon. gentlemen whom I see around me, all pointed out to the then Commons the precise difficulties, dangers, and probable blunders which, by the confession of the Minister of Public Works to-day, have resulted from the most unwise and unstatesmanlike manner in which that project was conceived and placed on our Statute-book. I regretted very much to hear the hon. the First Minister—I suppose in the attempt, in some way or other, to lessen the damaging effect of the admirable speech of the hon. member for Lambton—dare to accuse that hon. gentleman—a man whose patriotism is as unblemished as that of any man in Canada—of having, on a former occasion, meanly, maliciously, dishonestly, and unpatriotically, done his best to destroy the scheme brought forward to enable the people of Canada to construct a railroad to the Pacific. Why, for very shame, the First Minister might have recollected that the conduct which, more than anything else, caused the failure of that project and the downfall of his party, was a charge which, at first, I did not believe—that the greed of place and power had induced that right hon. gentleman, to the lasting disgrace of himself, his party and the country, to commit a crime that stands recorded as among the most shameful of our annals, and which led to his and his colleagues' ignominious expulsion from power. How could he have expected English capitalists, or honourable men, of any country or clime, to have anything to do with a Government which lay under the imputation of having sold the charter of the greatest public work they ever had to handle for the sake of a paltry bribe to keep themselves in power? And, when those hon. gentlemen opposite talk to us, now, as the Minister of Public Works did, of the inevitable difficulties which attend the inception of this enterprise, they must remember that, when I, myself, moved that we should insert words in the treaty with British Columbia which would limit our exertions in regard to the railway to all that could reasonably, considering her circumstances, be expected of Canada, they promptly voted it down. When we proposed to appeal to the people, and ascertain whether they would ratify the contract their representatives were entering into, those hon. gentlemen voted it down also. When we proposed to insert a declaration that we would not go on with that project unless it could be done in such a fashion that undue and unnecessary burdens might not be imposed upon the people, those hon. gentlemen, led by the First Minister, voted down the proposition. The right hon. gentleman talks of people disgracing our country. I wish it was in our power to have removed from Canada the ignominy and disgrace which the conduct of those hon. gentlemen has inflicted upon it, and which, say what they will, must, I fear, prove a formidable obstacle in relation to any of those projects they may now undertake. The First Minister desires to see signs of repentance in my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie). The right hon. gentleman had better pluck the beam out of his own eye before attempting to remove the mote from my hon. friend's. They talk of our having made a solemn compact to build 2,000 miles of railroad in twenty years. What we did was this: We knew it was our duty to modify their own most absurd and impossible contract, to build 3,000 miles of unsurveyed railroad in ten years; we reduced the work to two-thirds, doubled the amount of time for the construction, and got rid of a section of 1,000 miles, or thereabouts, which would have probably cost as much as the difficult section in British Columbia. He tells us that we have lost five years. Well, as his own colleague, the Minister of Public Works, has just shown in the clearest and most emphatic manner to the House, he, the responsible head of that great Department, knowing the magnitude of the task, having come at last to understand something of the difficulties that must attend the construction of this road, has formally, and in terms, acquitted my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) of any negligence or unnecessary delay, and, so far as his words can do it, has lent, substantially, the whole weight of his authority to the policy my hon. friend has been carrying out. When the right hon. gentleman tells us that we never proposed to make use of the lands along the route of the Pacific Railroad to lessen the burden of its cost, has he forgotten not one but twenty sections of the Act of 1874, brought in by the hon. member for Lambton, containing a series of provisions, setting forth how those lands were to be used for the purpose of aiding in the construction of that railroad?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I will call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that his leader said, in his speech, that the lands could not be sold, but would be given free.

MR. MACKENZIE: I said nothing of the kind. What I said was that it was impossible to send settlers into that country unless they got land free.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: My hon. friend is perfectly right in saying that, for the purpose of developing that country, it is, in the very initial stages, of great moment to give away some land to encourage settlement. But he never pretended it would be part of his policy or that of any Government to give the great mass of the lands along the line of the Pacific Railway in free grants. We recognised distinctly and clearly the fact that, for the purpose of promoting the settlement of that country, some sacrifice might be undergone, more especially because we knew there was great competition to be borne with from the United States in the settlement of the North-West, and that they offered great tracts of land to settlers on very favourable terms, and that so long as that rivalry continued, it would be practically impossible for us to attract to the North-West any but the most inferior class of settlers, unless prepared to give corresponding advantages to those offered by the United States. But that statement in no way detracts from the well-settled policy, set out in the Act to which I have alluded, of using a large portion of those lands to aid in the construction of this railroad. The right hon. gentleman tells us that it is the same thing to start a railroad from the Pacific Ocean eastwards, 500 miles, beginning from a base of 500 miles broad, to a point which he does not know, which neither the Minister of Public Works nor any of the engineers knows, as asking the consent of Parliament to start from a well-defined point like Fort William, on the shores of Lake Superior, to another point, equally well defined, 100 or 150 miles distant. To compare that to the proposition brought down by the Minister of Public Works, shows the First Minister must feel how poor is the cause he is advocating. Then he calls attention to the fact that the member for Lambton proposed to build sixty-five miles from Esquimalt to Nanaimo. He knows that that was expressly provided as compensation to British Columbia for the delay in the prosecution of the principal work, and that it was not intended or accepted as any part of the Canadian Pacific line. He tells us my hon. friend from Lambton proposed a thing of shreds and patches—a scheme of half water-stretches and half railroad. The right hon. gentleman forgets that the railroad under his management, as well as ours, comes to a dead stop at the west end of Lake Superior, and that Lakes Superior and Huron interpose a tolerably good water-stretch between the two sections. When does the Minister of Public Works, or the Premier, hope we shall be able to bridge the long stretch of 700 or 800 miles extending from end to end of those magnificent inland seas? Do what he will, it must be his scheme, as well as ours, to continue to use those great water-stretches. What my hon. friend did say was that he proposed to use those great inland seas at one end of the line, and save the construction of 500 to 600 miles of railway through an uninhabitable country, and that he designed, at the earliest moment, to connect Lake Superior and Red River by the railway, and that, when so far west, he thought he would use those other magnificent inland seas which drain the interior of Manitoba, and which, together with the navigation of the Saskatchewan, gave ship-way or water-stretches of between 700 and 800 miles, or very nearly to the base of the Rocky Mountains. That was a great and well-conceived policy; but I never heard or understood my hon. friend to say that other water routes than these would be used except as a mere temporary expedient, as he designed to make use of the portage system for the present between Lake Superior and Red River.

After Recess.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I shall detain the House but a few moments longer, but I feel it would be unwise, on our part, to allow these resolutions to pass this stage without calling attention to certain points in connection more particularly with the natural aspect of the country, which I think the hon. the Minister of Public Works has hardly sufficiently considered, that is to say, if I understood correctly the proposals he has introduced to the House. Sir, we have lately engaged in a two-fold experiment. In the first place, we are attempting, by means of an enormously increased taxation, to relieve the depressed condition of certain portions of the people of this country. Now, whatever may be said as to the correctness of the views of the hon. gentlemen opposite, I do not think that anyone, even among themselves, will be found bold enough to deny that we are engaged in an experiment, the result of which nobody can accurately foresee. Just at the time, therefore, when it is, to say the least of it, a matter of great uncertainty what will be the exact revenue upon which the people can count for the next three or four years, at any rate, we find the hon. the Minister of Public Works bringing down a scheme which may, if I understand it aright, result in an enormous addition to the annual fixed charges of this country. Now, I think it will be necessary to consider a little the two series of the resolutions which the Minister has brought down. At the time the Budget was introduced, I called the attention of the House to the fact that it was very probable that, over and above the expenditure to which the Minister of Finance had made reference, we would be called upon, before we rose, to provide for the purchase and working of the Rivière du Loup Branch, as I see he actually proposes to us to do by the second set of resolutions on this very paper. It is a matter of very great importance that we should understand exactly what are the facts, as the expenditure is one which we may be called upon to provide for within the next year or two, wholly apart from any expenditures that may be incurred under the resolutions of the Minister of Public Works. By the first estimate brought down by the Minister of Finance, a sum of $23,425,000 was required for the service of the year 1879-80; to that, by the recent Supplementary Estimates are added about $186,000, together with certain minor charges by Statute for Manitoba and Prince Edward Island, and one or two other matters. We may, therefore, put the total annual expenditure, as estimated by the hon. gentleman, at $23,650,000 in round numbers. Now, the second set of resolutions on these papers contemplates the purchasing for about $2,000,000 (including the sum requisite to put the road in order) of the Rivière du Loup Branch of the Grand Trunk Railroad, whereby an annual expenditure of $100,000 a year will be added to our fixed charges. Over and above that, I think the Minister of Public Works will admit that I am within the mark, in saying that $100,000 a year will have to be provided for the running expenses of the 114 miles of road he proposes to assume. It is not possible for us, nor will it be possible for the hon. Minister himself, to give the House any exact information, I fear, as to the extent of the deficit that will be involved by taking this branch over, and that for two reasons: first of all, there is only too much ground to believe that it is now run by the Grand Trunk at a heavy loss, and, in the next place, he knows—we all know—that it will be a matter of extreme difficulty to ascertain how far a great portion of the traffic, which now goes over the Intercolonial Railroad, may then be diverted to Portland. That he will endeavour to avoid this as far as he can, I have no doubt, but we all know it will be a matter of extreme difficulty. I do not know, but I may say it will be impossible, to prevent shippers at the western extremity of the line from deciding what Atlantic port their goods shall go to.

MR. TUPPER: Perhaps the hon. member would allow me to say that the surplus over working expenses last year, a very unfavourable year, was $28,000.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: But I also know the condition the company had allowed the road to get into, and I am afraid that, if the hon. the Minister of Public Works keeps the road up in fair condition, that will not be a sum on which he can depend, wholly apart from the other contingency to which I alluded—the risk of a diversion of the traffic. I have no right, I admit, to insist upon that, but I call attention to the fact that there is great risk that a very considerable additional annual charge will be made, not only for the purchase money, but particularly by reason of the diversion of traffic which will arise. Now, the hon. the Minister of Finance brought down a demand for about $11,000,000 for public works, and the least we can count on will be a further additional charge of about $550,000 a year, although not all falling within next year, for the interest and sinking fund on the $11,000,000 which he proposes to expend ; and that, as I perceive from the statement of the Minister of Public Works, is a thing wholly and entirely apart from any expenditure which may be incurred in the prosecution of the Pacific Railroad westward of Red River. Supposing it is possible for the Minister of Finance, and for the Government, to keep within the limit of their own estimate of $23,650,000, and, supposing that only $800,000 require to be added for the other services I have alluded to, he will find our annual expenditure raised to the sum of $24,500,000 in round numbers. Now, it is, as I have said, a matter of very grave doubt in the mind of those who are best qualified to judge what will be the real effect of the tariff we have just introduced. My hon. friend behind me (Mr. Burpee), to whose information on such subjects I would be disposed to bow, is inclined to think that, at first, though at first only, the Estimates of the Finance Minister may be somewhat exceeded, but it is, to say the least, extremely likely that the other result may occur, and that our importations may, as they actually did, in the case of the United States, fall off to a considerable extent, and that, so far from obtaining $2,000,000 or $2,250,000, on which the hon. the Minister of Finance relies, we may find ourselves scarcely in possession of more than one half, and, perhaps, even less of the amount he expects to obtain. The matter, as I say, is one of opinion, and I do not express any decided view on the subject, but I say it is an experiment. I say that it is a danger, and I say that, until that experiment is decided one way or the other, and until we know with some degree of accuracy on what we have to depend, I think it is a matter involving the extremest risk to commit ourselves to other expenditures, which may add largely to the annual outlay of $24,500,000, which, according to the statements submitted by those hon. gentlemen, we are almost certain to incur, if not within the next twelve months, certainly within the next eighteen months. I may further state that I fear other expenditures will arise, which will swell our annual expenditure to something like $25,000,000 ; at any rate, I should be extremely relieved if the hon. gentlemen are able to keep the expenditure within the sum they have named themselves, in the Estimates recently brought down. Now, whether the amount be more or less, there is no doubt whatever that the immediate effect of a Protective tariff is to take a good deal more out of the pockets of the people than it puts into the Treasury. We must, therefore, recollect that we are now about to undertake large additional expenses, so large that the hon. gentleman is not able to give us any accurate estimate of what they may be, with a certain fixed expenditure of about $24,500,000, and with the probability that the burdens of the people for some time to come will be largely increased by the necessary results of the operation of the tariff we have lately introduced. Under these circumstances, I would earnestly advise—as far as it is possible for me to hope my advice will be listened to—I would advise the hon. gentlemen opposite, more especially the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Public Works, not to commit themselves on any account to a large expenditure in this direction, unless they are able to rely with perfect certainty on being able to obtain large sums of money on very favourable terms. Whether they can do it or not by the sale of these lands, time alone can show. I do not say it is not fair to expect to make a considerable amount of the cost of these railroads out of these lands, but I must point out that it will require a very large sale indeed to give any perceptible relief to the public finances ; and, although I entertain, as I have said at the outset, myself, high hopes of what may be the future of this North-West country, yet I feel that, at present, and until we know more accurately than it is possible for us now to know, what the true financial position is, the hon. gentleman will do a very mischievous thing indeed if he commits the people of this country, on the faith of such resolutions as these, to any considerable expenditure in any direction whatever. My own objection to the resolutions before you are chiefly these : I object, as does my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) to the statement with respect to the Burrard Inlet route, as no doubt the hon. gentleman knew we must object. I object also, and for the same grounds, which he (Mr. Mackenzie) has ably stated, to the proposition that the Government should be allowed to locate 125 miles of the road when they are not acquainted with the country, which their engineers are not able to define in the contracts, and which may not improbably involve an additional expenditure of $9,000,000 or $10,000,000. Moreover, I doubt extremely the wisdom of the precedent of establishing a Commission, without stating to the members of this House exactly what the powers of this Commission may be, and who are to be the gentlemen appointed thereto. This whole business, however, is at present in a tentative shape. From what I can gather from the hon. the Minister of Public Works, he does not appear to have, or to be able to communicate to the House, any single fact whereon he can base an assurance that this project will be taken up by persons in England in a position to afford him material aid. If he gives, or if he proposes to give, as I think the First Minister more than intimated, the guarantee of Canada in addition to the lands, and in addition to the railway itself—if he proposes to give that for a large amount, I do not doubt that he might obtain or secure some company to start with the operation. Nor do I think that there will be any great difficulty, probably, in bridging the 1,200 or 1,400 miles, which intervene between Red River on the one side, and British Columbia on the other, but he will find that he will run very great risks; that, inasmuch as his conditions are extremely stringent, and, moreover, unless the parties with whom he makes a bargain are possessed, in their own right, of a large amount of capital, he will run great risk of getting this country committed to an enterprise, for which we will be called upon to furnish further funds from time to time. Do what he pleases, he will find it almost impossible to induce or compel contractors to execute the really difficult parts of the road at once. Moreover, as I understood his scheme, he proposes to make this largely subsidiary to a great colonising movement, and, if he does that, it will be necessary for him, in the first instance, at any rate, to allow them to construct the road, and to receive advances while engaged in the easy part of the task, leaving over the more difficult portions to a later period. I think, therefore, that the hon. gentleman ought to be content with a general discussion of these matters; he ought to be content with knowing that, if he brings anything like a matured and well-considered scheme, no unreasonable opposition will be given to it on either side of the House. The resolutions he has presented, and the discussions he has had, will serve his purpose nearly, if not altogether, as well as the passage of these resolutions through the House; as I take it for granted, from certain remarks of his, that his intention is simply to pass the resolutions, and not to put an Act on the Statute-book.

MR. TUPPER: I may say the Act is already upon the Statute-book. We do not propose to ask any legislation except with reference to the Pembina Branch, which alone, of all the portions embraced in these resolutions, is unprovided for.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I am not aware there is anything on the Statute-book which would authorise the location of these 125 miles by the mode proposed, nor that there is anything which would authorise the creation of the Commission; and I think the quantity of land, which is proposed to be given, is very much larger under these resolutions than under the existing Statute—all three points of the gravest moment. Moreover, the hon. gentleman has given us, indeed, very little information as to the mode in which he proposes to float his bonds. We have got a little more in an indirect fashion from the First Minister, but no such full statement as I think the House ought to be presented with before being asked to plunge headforemost in an undertaking which may easily enough end in requiring us to provide $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 more within the next four or five years, over and above the large liabilities which we have already. As I stated in my place last year, the policy which I then thought the wisest policy, and which I still think the wisest, would be to complete, in the first instance, that portion of the line from Lake Superior to Selkirk, and, after that, not to commit ourselves rashly to any further expenditure until we have ascertained distinctly and clearly what the resources of the country will permit, in conformity with the opinion expressed by all the legislators that, up to this time, have dealt with this subject. That, I think, is the course which commends itself to the prudence and common sense of every hon. gentleman here, and, although we are powerless to prevent, we are not without power to warn, and we are not without power to call the attention of the country in future to the evil results which may follow, which, I fear, all follow from any hasty action in the premises, just as they followed with such serious consequences to the hon. gentlemen themselves in the case of their hasty and ill-considered action in 1871. Of the proposition that we shall apply to the Imperial Government for aid to construct this road, I have only to say that it was the duty of the then Government of Canada, before they came to terms with British Columbia, to have made application to the English Government. I hold it showed a great want of statesmanship on their part that they allowed themselves to become charged with the care of that Pacific coast, and with the still more onerous burden of constructing a railroad across the continent without having first applied to the British Government for assistance. I think that they had a right to ask for it, and, if they had done so then, they would probably have got it. I shall support, with all my heart, any reasonable proposition in that direction now; but I am bound to say that I fear the course pursued by hon. gentlemen themselves is one which is calculated to throw many unnecessary difficulties in their way. Anyone who has watched the tone of public opinion in England of late, must be aware that they felt annoyed that large classes of their goods are being shut by the high tariff of this country. Although, I hope, with the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), that they will return good for evil, still I must say it is a very extraordinary way to propitiate, and to induce them to come to our assistance at a time when we can advance no legal claim upon them for aid, that we should commit ourselves to a policy which is utterly opposed to the whole policy of the Empire, and which, at a time of very considerable need in England—a time, according to the hon. gentleman's own admission, of extreme need—has, beyond all doubt, contributed in no small degree to aggravate the difficulties with which they were now struggling. Nevertheless, with the exception of the point to which I have referred, I shall be glad to do anything in my power to assist hon. gentlemen in that particular direction, and, although I am not able, at present, to say that I think they have any very considerable chance of success, although I fear their own conduct has seriously interfered with the prospect of that success, still I am not disposed to complain of their attempt, even at this twelfth hour, to obtain that assistance whereby alone, I fear, they will have a chance to float this scheme.

Mr. DAWSON said that the resolutions were statesmanlike and comprehensive, as was also the very able speech which the Minister of Public Works had delivered in bringing them forward. The true policy was certainly to set aside lands, from the sale of which, in course of time, funds more than equal to the cost of the railway, which was to render them valuable, would be realised, and the plan of vesting these lands in Commissioners, for sale and administration, seemed to be a wise one. Every practical man who had given attention to the subject must approve of the policy of combining colonisation with railway construction west of the Red River, and he was very much pleased with the eleventh resolution, which referred to further exploration in the Peace and Pine River districts. It was not going too far, as stated in the second resolution, to say that our railway would be a highway to the dependencies of Great Britain in the Pacific, as well as to China and Japan. The route would certainly be the shortest and the best for passenger traffic, but, in considering this great undertaking, it would be well to keep in view the change which had taken place in the direction of a carrying trade which it was at one time supposed would go far to support it. They should not now be led away with the idea that the line would be the main highway of traffic between Asia and Western Europe. The Suez Canal had been opened about the time at which the Canadian Pacific Railway was projected, and it would for ever divert the bulk of the carrying trade between Asia and Western Europe from the railways of this continent. Its success had been such as to throw out of employment the great fleets of sailing vessels that used to pass by the Cape of Good Hope, and it had disappointed the projectors of the United States Pacific Railroad in the anticipation that their line would command a large share of Asiatic traffic. California and Oregon had, however, grown to be great States, and the trade from these and the mineral regions of the Pacific slope supported the transcontinental line of our neighbours. They carried teas and other merchandise of China and Japan for the populous Eastern States of the Union, but they had been, in a great measure, disappointed in the stream of traffic which they had anticipated from beyond the broad waters of the Pacific Ocean. Canada should, therefore, to a large extent, eliminate from its calculations the carrying trade of China, Japan and the East Indies; and could not, moreover, reckon on any great trade from the Pacific coast, for an indefinite period. No doubt, British Columbia was destined to become a populous and thriving Province, but, at present, its traffic would not go far towards the support of a transcontinental railroad. In view, therefore, of a limited carrying trade from the Pacific, it became less a matter of importance to have the very shortest route, than to have the line which should best open up and lead to the settlement of the vast unpeopled districts of the North-West. Their policy should be to place the railway where it would pass through the greatest extent of fertile land, if they did not thereby greatly divert it from the straightest obtainable course, and still more should this be their policy if they could run it through the most fertile belts, and, at the same time, have easier gradients, which were, within certain limits, quite as important to a railway as a diminution of distance. He (Mr. Dawson) was glad to see that this was the policy indicated by the resolutions, and it was well known that to the east of the Rocky Mountains there was a better route than the present projected line to the Yellow Head Pass. Before reaching that Pass a long extent of indifferent country had to be passed through. The plains east of the mountains, on the route projected, were at a great elevation, cold, and, to a considerable extent, barren. The great desert of the Missouri extended in a strip, always narrowing, even to the North Saskatchewan, and the line ran through a portion of the desert. Even after passing the Pembina River, which was west of the desert, on reference to Mr. Marcus Smith's published report of 29th March, 1878, it would be seen that there would be between four and five hundred miles of very inferior, if not absolutely barren country, almost in a continuous stretch. There was, undoubtedly, a better route, as regarded the development of the country, by the Passes of the Peace River, better also as regarded gradients and alignments. North of the Saskatchewan, both the Rocky Mountains, and the plains to the east of them rapidly decreased in altitude, and there was a marked change for the better in soil and climate. They had some valuable information in regard to the region through which a line to the Peace River country would pass, both from reports of officers of the Pacific Survey, and the writings of explorers of a former day. Mr. Marcus Smith, whose high character for integrity and truth gave weight to every word he uttered, in his official report just referred to, had remarked as follows:—

MR. DAWSON.

“The south slope of the Moose Hills, where the trail runs, is covered with a dense growth of aspen, but, in crossing to the west end of these hills, a magnificent prospect opened out. Stretching away to the east, north and west, as far as the eye could reach, there appears a vast undulating plain, rising in places into lofty rounded hills, dotted and intersected with groves of aspen mixed with spruce and tamarac and clumps of willows. During these days, wherever the trail was left, great difficulty was found in forcing a way through thick masses of grass and peavine, three to four feet in height, and sometimes reaching nearly to the horses' backs. As Lac la Biche was neared, the country became more wooded, and the track lay through long glades, between belts of poplar and willows.”

After passing the Lesser Slave Lake, he said:

“The line enters on a vast region of great fertility, extending far northward on both sides of the Peace River, and westward to Pine River. By this route, what is termed the fertile belt, or wheat-producing country, extends nearly three hundred miles further to the west, before the Rocky Mountains are reached, than by the route over the Yellow Head Pass, a corresponding reduction being made in the breadth of sterile country to be crossed in the Rocky Mountain district.”

Surely such a country as this was not to be left out of calculation, but he would read another extract regarding it, and from an earlier writer. Sir Alex. McKenzie, after whom the Great McKenzie River was called, in his journal under date of 10th May, 1793, wrote of the Peace River country as follows:—

“From the place which we quitted this morning, the west side of the river displayed a succession of the most beautiful scenery I had ever beheld. The ground rises at intervals to a considerable height, and stretching inwards to a considerable distance. At every interval or pause in the rise, there is a very gently ascending space or lawn, which is alternate with abrupt precipices to the summit of the whole or, at least, as far as the eye could distinguish. This magnificent theatre of nature has all the decorations which the trees and animals of the country can afford it. Groves of poplar in every shape vary the scene, and their intervals are enlivened with vast herds of elks and buffaloes—the former choosing the steeps and uplands, and the latter preferring the plains. At this time the buffaloes were attended with their young ones, who were frisking about them, and it appeared that the elks would soon exhibit the same enlivening circumstance. The whole country displayed an exuberant verdure, and the trees that bear a blossom were fast advancing to that delightful appearance.”

Professor Selwyn was equally struck with the country; and Professor Macoun, a distinguished naturalist and botanist, said of it:

“Clumps of willows and poplars of various ages were interspersed with the most astonishing growth of herbaceous plants I ever saw. In many places the peas and vetches were in such abundance as to completely cover up all other plants, causing the country to look like a field of mixed peas and vetches. It would be folly to attempt to depict the appearance of the country, as it was so much beyond what I ever saw before that I dare hardly make use of truthful words to pourtray it.”

The same writer remarked further on (page 33, reports of 1877):

“I was on Peace River the whole month of October, 1872, and the constant record was warm sunshine, west wind, balmy atmosphere, and skies of the brightest blue. Even as late as the 15th of October, the thermometer was 48° at daylight, and 61° in the shade at noon.

“Within the foot hills of the Rocky Mountains, I picked up three species of plants in flower as late as the 26th of the same month. These facts, and the testimony of all the residents in the country, show conclusively that there is an open fall all along Peace River from the Mountains to Lake Athabaska.”

It would be needless to multiply descriptions, but he (Mr. Dawson) might say that the testimony of all the writers and voyageurs, who had been in the Peace River country, was to the same effect. The river opened about the 20th of April, and sowing commenced about the 1st of May, and that was more than could be said of the beautiful and populous Ottawa region where they now were.

In proceeding westward by the Pine River Pass, the Rocky Mountains were crossed at an elevation of 2,400ft. above sea level, and west of the mountains, the country was said not to be so barren as that in the latitude of the Yellow Head Pass. Now the point at which he wished to arrive was this: If, by keeping to the valley of the Peace River, we developed such a country as was described, population would flow in, and our railway would, in course of time, have traffic arising within the country itself to sustain it. If, on the other hand, it should run through 600 miles of barren country, which the reports showed to be on the Yellow Head Pass route, it never could have local traffic, and we could not get capital wherewith to build it. The true policy was to run the railroad where it must ultimately yield the best return for the capital invested. As to the line projected by the Yellow Head Pass being cheaper to build, he (Mr. Dawson) much doubted it. The reports of the engineers differed widely, and he feared that the estimate had been made in this, as had been seen in other cases, without sufficient data whereon to found it. Over the projected line no location had been effected, and the figures given in the report were the merest guesswork. It was well known that the engineers differed in their views, and did not pull together, and it was said that reports of very great value had been suppressed, for what reason it was difficult to conceive, seeing that the public had a right to all the information which it had cost such enormous sums to obtain. In the published report of Mr. Marcus Smith, a map was referred to, without which the information conveyed could not be readily understood, and it was said that a map prepared by the Department of the Interior had also been suppressed. Rumour had it that these maps were suppressed at the time Mr. Fleming was about to proceed to England, last year, because they showed that the line which he was to advocate—that by the Yellow Head Pass—ran through a great extent of barren country, and that there was a much finer country not far off and nearly parallel to it; but he (Mr. Dawson) would have great difficulty in believing that maps could be suppressed with such an object. It would have been unfair to those who were invited to join in such a great national undertaking to withhold from them any information which could enable them to form an independent opinion of the work to be done and the road to be opened up by that work. In the meantime, he must say that the report just issued by the Chief Engineer was a most extraordinary document. On reference to it, it would be seen that its pages bristled with the words "nothing reliable known," in reference to the sections regarding which it was most important to know something, and that, too, after eight years of exploration and an expenditure of $4,000,000 on surveys alone. The late Premier had just said that he had not limited the Chief Engineer as to the surveys, and that he had been at liberty to employ as many men as he chose, and the result was, according to this report, "nothing reliable known." The report was inconsistent with itself, inasmuch as on the map—and a most unique map it was—sections were set down as fertile which a careful study of the extracts actually given would prove to be barren, or comparatively so; but other extracts might have been made from some of the works quoted, which would have conveyed a better idea of the opinions of their authors. And in this view some of the extracts could only be regarded as garbled. The map showed large areas on and near the projected line, well known to be inferior, as being fertile, while, as regarded the Peace River region, except a small strip along the river, it was set down as unknown, with notes to the effect that no reliable information had been obtained regarding it, although it had been pretty well known for a long period, and recently explored by some of the officers of the survey, Macoun, Horetzky, and others. Both map and report were ex parte, showing one section in too favourable a light, and another as unknown to an extent which existing information did not warrant. It would be questionable policy to send such documents to England, because, in the first place, apart from any higher consideration, English engineers would soon analyse them and see what they were worth; and, in the next, if capitalists were led to invest on information which the circumstances did not justify, if they were led to believe that the great elevated plain east of the mountains and south of the North Saskatchewan, was a grass-covered flowery region, instead of a comparatively arid waste, with good soil and grass only in the bottom lands, they might come afterwards on the country for damages. The true policy, in his (Mr. Dawson's) opinion, was to publish all the information that had been obtained, especially the official information, obtained by the Department of the Interior, or the officers of the Railway Survey. Surely the Deputy Minister of the Interior—himself a surveyor, and a highly scientific man—was quite as able to describe the country so long under his supervision as Mr. Sandford Fleming. A map had been prepared under his supervision, showing a very different condition of the country as to fertile and barren areas from that exhibited on Mr. Fleming's map. The latter was evidently a map got up for a purpose. It gave an incorrect view and misleading information in reference to the character of the country east of the Rocky Mountains, both on the Saskatchewan and on Peace River, showing the one district to be better than it really was, and the other worse or unknown. In regard to the country between Lake Superior and Manitoba, the report just issued—showing that it would cost $83,000 per mile to complete Section 15, and over $80,000 per mile to complete the adjoining Section B—would take this House and the country by surprise, more especially when the enormous sum of $18,000,000 was set down as being necessary to complete the entire line from Thunder Bay to Selkirk, making an average of $44,000 per mile, where the first estimate had been $24,000 per mile, or less than $10,000,000 for the entire line, fully equipped. These figures had fully vindicated him (Mr. Dawson) in his long and persistent advocacy of the Southern Route, by Sturgeon Falls, which, had his advice been taken, would have been by this time in operation, with no greater outlay than had already occurred. It was shorter by 30 miles than the present line, and it would have ended at Fort Garry, which was the best starting point for railway extension westward through the prairies. True, there would, for the present, have been a navigable stretch in the middle of this route, extending from Sturgeon Falls to the Narrows of the Lake of the Woods, but this navigable stretch led past the rough sections. Nature had placed it where it was most wanted, and, by making use of it, as a temporary expedient, the line would not thereby have been in the least deflected from the straightest obtainable course, when an all-through line of railway became necessary. In the meantime, there would have been a saving of $10,000,000, and it should be remembered that, until a railway was in operation from the point in Ontario to which existing railways had reached, through the wild regions to the north of Lakes Huron and Superior, we could only have communication with Manitoba through our own territory during the season of navigation, so that a navigable stretch was, as regarded speedy transportation, a matter of less consequence than it would otherwise have been. He was sorry that, after the Premier of the late Government had got on the right track, he had suffered himself to be driven out of it by a ridiculous cry about "magnificent water-stretches." The water-stretches were really magnificent, and nature had placed this one in the very position where it was most needed, but, instead of taking advantage of the beneficence of nature, millions upon millions were being wasted on the stern and unyielding rocks of Keewatin. It was always claimed by the late Government that they had acted on the advice of the engineers, but this was by no means the case. The opinions of the field engineers could not reach the Government. They had to make their views conform to preconceived notions. If they did otherwise, they were discharged. All the Government had to go by was the view of the Chief Engineer, who had never been over the ground, and who had shown himself to be anything but a safe guide. Reports had been held back and information which would have been of great value to the country had been suppressed. There had, in the first instance, been a great deal of unnecessary expenditure on all the surveys, and there had existed a foregone conclusion to take the northern route, cost what it might. The southern route would have developed mines, opened up a fine forest country, where timber, much needed in the prairies of the west, was abundant, and it would have brought settlement into the country between Lakes Superior and Manitoba; whereas the line adopted passed far to the north, through a region where there was little or nothing to develop. The difference in cost, even taking the figures in the report as a basis of calculation, could not be set at less than $10,000,000, and that was a sum which would press heavily on the present as well as on future generations. It was much to be regretted that a scheme which had had so much to recommend it in the way of economy, facility of construction, and ultimate advantage, should have been abandoned without due consideration. Years had been frittered away in looking for a route in the rocky regions to the north of the Lake of the Woods, and during all that time we had been building up and fostering settlement in a foreign country, instead of our own. Our people had been caught on their way through the United States, and led to settle in Minnesota, and we had encouraged a trade with that State which it would be difficult to regain. The policy adopted in respect to the line from Thunder Bay to Manitoba had, indeed, been suicidal, and the evidence being taken before another branch of the Legislature, showed a most deplorable state of things still existing in the management. There seemed to have been very strange proceedings in respect to Section 15; he meant the section immediately west of Rat Portage; and, in regard to Section 14, of 77 miles, leading from Selkirk to Cross Lake, for the most part over a level country, it was let at $402,750, but its cost was now set at $723,134, or something less than double, and so on with other works. Was this in the interest of the country, or would any man tolerate such management on the part of agents in his own affairs? The same mismanagement and extravagance which had characterised the surveys had been continued on the works. The only true remedy to apply, was to effect an entire change in a system of management which had proved so disastrous. Means should be taken to ascertain the real opinions of the field engineers, and they should be in a position to feel that they were at liberty to express them, without, as at present, the risk of losing their places. The best way of effecting this would be to have a Board of Engineers, each one of whom should be independent of the others, and, above all, independent of the contractors. The sums being spent were enormous. This vast expenditure would affect the country for a long time to come, and a little present outlay, in employing the best talent that could be commanded to decide on the reports of engineers and the direction of route, would be the truest economy. In regard to the Georgian Bay Branch, in his (Mr. Dawson's) opinion, it should, if made, be continued all the way to Sault St. Marie, and be designated the "Sault St. Marie Branch," instead of the "Georgian Bay Branch." A very good line, with easy gradients, had already been found and surveyed, from Cantin's Bay and French River westward to Sault St. Marie. It passed not far from the coast of Lake Huron, through a district fast rising into importance, a district rich in minerals, with considerable areas of good land, and in which there would always be a considerable trade in lumber. But this branch line, if adopted, would have something more than mere local traffic to support it. Once completed to Sault St. Marie, the people of the States bordering on Lake Superior, would see its importance as a winter outlet for their products, and a means of rapid conveyance to the seaboard in summer, and would soon form a railway connection with it. In winter it would, without doubt, command a fair share of the trade of the Western States, and, if carried a little beyond Sault St. Marie, to the open waters of Lake Superior, it would be of very great advantage to that portion of the Pacific line which we were now building between Thunder Bay and Manitoba. Lake Superior was an open sea which did not freeze, even in the bays, until winter was far advanced, and navigation would be not only practicable, but easy, over the 300 miles of open water between the Sault Ste. Marie Branch and the terminus of the Pacific Railroad at Thunder Bay, all through the months of November and December. This would be of vast importance to the trade of the North-West, for it would enable the harvests of Manitoba to be carried out in the fall. The Sault St. Marie Branch would thus have a traffic from our own territories, and a traffic from the western territories of the United States. It would render unnecessary, for a long time to come, the construction of the main Pacific line through the wilderness to the north of Lakes Huron and Superior. The country could not at present afford to build 700 miles of railway through that unbroken wilderness, and the true plan was, in the meantime, to run a branch to Sault St. Marie, and he might add that, in his belief, a considerable part of this branch would, eventually, form a portion of the main Pacific line—perhaps half-way up Lake Huron, or even to the Mississauga River; it would, for the ground was better for railway construction near the coast than it was further inland. They should not be deterred from this scheme by the silly cry that, in building a branch to Sault Ste. Marie they were favouring United States lines. People who raised such cries should know that a railroad could not live without traffic, and that if we could secure any considerable share of the trade of our neighbours, it would be highly desirable to do so. Let the Sault Ste. Marie branch be opened, and a stream of traffic would pour over it during the winter months, flooding the Canada Central and the Occidental to their utmost capacity of carriage, giving winter freights also to the railroads of Ontario, as soon as she shall have extended some of her lines to the Nipissing region. But what could be gained by making a branch merely to the Georgian Bay, or by converting the French River into a canal? These would only be summer routes, at best, and large vessels, once loaded, would not leave the high waterway to go up hill and unload at Lake Nipissing, or even at the mouth of French River, were the Georgian Bay branch to stop there. These schemes were delusive, and the best policy would be the bold one of running the branch all the way to Sault Ste. Marie. He (Mr. Dawson) was not opposed to the opening up of the French River and constructing a canal, by way of Lake Nipissing and the Ottawa, but it was too vast a scheme to enter into while we had the Pacific Railroad with its branches on our hands. There was really a fine country to develop on Lake Huron. Among the hills of the north coast there were valleys of unsurpassed fertility, fast filling up with an industrious population, and that too of our own people from the older settlements. The Island of Manitoulin was nearly as large as the Island of Prince Edward, and quite as fertile. There were other large islands along the north shore, and both islands and mainland were alike cut off in winter. A branch to Sault Ste. Marie would remedy this. It would lead to the development of mines, forests, fisheries and agricultural lands in a region which, with all its vast and varied natural resources, its fine climate, its rapidly increasing population and growing trade, was, as yet, inaccessible in winter. By running a branch to Sault Ste. Marie, we would not only open up a most important section of country, not only lengthen the period during which communication could be kept up with the North-West Territories, over Canadian waters and Canadian railways, but secure a large share of a foreign traffic while we created a very important local traffic. He observed that the Chief Engineer had suggested that the grant of $800,000 for the Georgian Bay Branch should be expended in making what he called a "territorial road" from the east end of Lake Nipissing westward along the line of the Pacific Railway. The Chief Engineer had a hobby about territorial roads, and he (Mr. Dawson) feared rather an expensive and impracticable hobby. In this case, if the line of the Pacific Railway were to be adopted, it would have, in the first place, to be located, and at the rate which the location surveys have hitherto cost, the $800,000 would not go very far in that work. Not to speak of the territorial road, it certainly would not suffice to locate 600 miles in such a manner as to make the line available for a railway track in the future. But, admitting that the territorial road were made, it certainly would not, of itself, draw settlement from its natural course along the lakes and lines of water communication, and, unless large sums were annually spent in keeping it open, it would, in a few years, be covered with a dense forest. Experience had shown that a road made through the woods, and so left, was immediately taken possession of by young trees, and so densely did they grow that the roadway soon became the most impenetrable part of the forest. The fact was that territorial roads through a wild region could not be made in such a way as to be of use. The idea was chimerical, although not quite original, and it would be much better to expend the amount on the line for which it was intended, extending it, as circumstances would permit, to Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. McLENNAN said they all remembered the proposition that was made by the Government soon after Confederation, to construct a railway across the continent to the Pacific Ocean, upon the basis of a subsidy of money, and of public lands for settlement. They remembered that when that project was framed, which would probably have met with the requirements of capitalists and provided for the construction of the road, the hostility of a faction in this country prevented that consummation. He had been amazed to hear from the hon. the leader of the Opposition and his friends, all the old ground-out arguments about the utilisation of water-stretches, and that this system was enlarged by the colleagues of the hon. the leader of the Opposition, to include the great lakes. When that project was presented, it was not a project for connecting the great lakes; it was a project for connecting lakes in the interior, that had a beginning and an end, but led to nowhere. After some years' trial of that system, the late Government came back to the necessity of providing for the construction of the road by the use of the public lands and by such money grants as would cover their cost. What he wished to impress upon the Government was that they should try to get back to that principle in the future, because he maintained that there was, and would be, perpetual difficulty in the Government constructing and working the railway, and that, if it was possible, the Government should rid themselves, by a very liberal contribution of public money, of an incubus of anxiety, trouble and difficulty, of which, they could, perhaps, have no comprehension at the outset. The questions which had come up already in connection with the Intercolonial, were a very small epitome of the difficulties to which they would be subjected in undertaking to build this railway and run it. Another feature that he should like to impress upon the Government was, the question of the line to be adopted. He had heard it stated with great confidence from the other side that the true policy for this country was to find the most direct line across the continent. He hoped the time would come when we should have a great trade developed across the continent, that would make it important for us to cross the continent; but, in the meantime, the most important matter and the true policy of the Government was to assist the construction of the railway in that fertile land, where it would find some sustenance. It would be impossible to carry on satisfactorily the next stage of the railway without considering the whole question in relation to the settlement of the country. In this connection the question of population came up very cogently, and he did not think it had been sufficiently considered. In discussing this question, he feared they were too largely influenced by the circumstances of the people that were more immediately under their notice. They had been told that there were a great many labourers out of employment, and, for that reason, it would be unwise to encourage immigration. Did any gentleman consider for a moment the value of people to a country? How were we going to get on in this country without a vast number of people out of all computation beyond the present population, or how were 4,000,000 people even going to turn to account the great stretch of country upon our hands? There were, indeed, some idle people in the country, but they did not help us. What we wanted was a people who would be of some use to us, who would settle this great fertile country towards the North-West, who would build the railways as they went, and be a perennial source of wealth to the country. The value of these 100,000,000 acres of land had formed the subject of very exhaustive discussion; these lands might have a value of $1, or $5, or $10 an acre, but had no value at all until they were settled. What had been done in similar cases in the United States? The Illinois Central Railway was built by a system of that kind, of very large grants of land. That land was sold, at first, at a very small price, $1 an acre; it gradually rose to $10 an acre, and to-day the lands of that company were worth $20 an acre. There was no reason why a similar result should not happen in the North-West, but these lands would never be worth anything unless people settled on them. At present, the state of affairs in Europe was favourable to immigration, and, by giving the necessary information, in a concise form, of the position, the resources, and the possibilities of this country, and by using intelligent agents to scatter that information in Europe, the same class of people who had settled on the waste lands in the United States, these people from the Northern countries of Europe that were of such great advantage to the country, that furnished the population from which we had sprung ourselves, would be induced to settle in this country. Our ancestors in the fens of Northern Europe, those Angles and Saxons from whom the British original stock was developed, was considered of very little account, just as little as that great North-West now was, but the possibilities of a vast and powerful people were there. The possibilities were here if we would but use them. What he meant to suggest was that, in carrying on this railway project, it was a matter of so much less consequence that we should get directly across the country than that we should follow those lands of the country that were capable of settlement, and that the extension of our railway line by two or three hundred miles, in order to follow the direction of those lands, would be a wise thing; and, if, at some future day, the development of trade across the continent reached and connected with the Eastern hemisphere by the Pacific Ocean, it would be a much wiser thing than to construct the shorter and more direct line ; but, in the meantime, the true policy of this Government would be to follow the fertile belt, and carry on the construction of the railway in the section of country where it would sustain itself. In connection with these resolutions, they had the report of the Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which was a very instructive report. Some allusion was made in it to the development of the means of transportation from the country. In connection with this, he might refer to the report from the Canal Commission, issued in 1870 by the Government of this country ; and the changes that took place in the methods of transportation, from that time to this, were very instructive. The report of the Commission stated that the route of the St. Lawrence, with the improved navigation, was the one that must necessarily be adopted as the great carrying route of this continent, and figures were quoted to show that, whereas wheat would be carried from the western side of Lake Michigan for about 10c. a bushel less by the St. Lawrence than it could be by New York, to-day, wheat was carried to New York for about 10c. per bushel. That was supposed, only seven or eight years ago, to be the difference we had in favour of the St. Lawrence. That was the effect which resulted from the development of a carrying system completed and made cheaper by the construction of railways. The figures that were stated at that time, were altogether lost to-day. They were left far behind, and the mixed route by water-stretches, which had been taken up and abandoned, was out of the question. He was rather surprised to hear repeated, after it had been hammered out so much to the merest chaff, the statement that they had been legislating against Great Britain, and in the interest of the United States. He thought that every man in this country must have come to the conclusion that they must adopt a system for themselves, with regard to the carrying trade with the Western States, when they had in Canada the very best facilities, and a large margin in favour of this route. There never was a season when he could not count upon his fingers the cargoes of grain or packages of goods sent by the Americans through this Canadian route. The fact was, that the Canadian route had to depend upon the Canadian people, and that the measure of traffic by it was the power and resources of Canada in capital and enterprise to buy and move it. Before they would be able to accomplish any material result in carrying out the enterprise under consideration, they must receive a vast accession of people from across the Atlantic. No country was better able to assist them in that respect than Great Britain. He thought he saw in these resolutions the germ of a system that he imagined must ultimately become the system of the British Empire, in which the parent country would be the partner of Canada in the carrying of it out for the financial and industrial development of the whole Empire. Thus, England would take her part with Canada in extending trade and settlement across this continent, through the fertile region about which they knew so little, but of which they knew enough to believe that it was a country of vast resources and possibilities. If it were true that they were one with British Columbia—that they were all citizens of one country—he believed that the Provinces on this side of the Rocky Mountains would consider that the interests of all, on both sides, were identical. He hoped, then, that British Columbia would not ask them to undertake the impossible, or make engagements of an impractical or absurd nature in obedience to sectional interests. It would be as unwise for one section as for the others to rush prematurely upon an expenditure of money on any portion of that road that would not produce satisfactory results. He thought more highly of the patriotism of British Columbia than to suppose that they had made a bargain by which the older Provinces were bound hand and foot to spend a certain sum on the other side of the continent on something that might produce no result. He hoped that the people generally would develop a patriotic interest in the whole country, and that all sections would work together for the interest of the country, and that all their interests would be one. He regretted very much that these resolutions had been brought down at so late a period. He thought the whole matter was of so much importance that it required the earnest consideration of the House. The resolutions were suggestive, and necessarily a little indefinite in terms; but he saw no serious objection to the scheme proposed, if they had confidence in the Government. He believed, however, the Government was assuming a very great responsibility in undertaking to deal with 100,000,000 acres, and, possibly, constructing 125 miles of railway on the other side of the continent. He was not afraid, however, to leave that responsibility in their hands. But, in placing 100,000,000 acres in the hands of any Commission, the conditions and relations of that Commission in any connection that might be formed with Great Britain, were matters that should be very carefully considered; and the whole question of the settlement and development of the country should be carefully guarded, no separate feature of the undertaking being considered simply by itself, but the policy of the country considered as a whole, and well considered.

Mr. MILLS said he protested against the introduction of so important a subject in the closing days of the Session. The Government might, by the introduction of this subject at the last moment, prevent discussion in the House, and the proper consideration of one of the most important subjects ever submitted to it; but they would not be able to prevent its discussion in the country; and hon. gentlemen supporting the Ministry, who undertook to throw off discussion, would find some difficulty in defending, before the country, the propositions the Minister of Public Works had submitted. He (Mr. Mills) dissented from them. He did not believe, in the first place, that the hon. gentleman had much chance of success; but, if he were to succeed, the injury to the country would be infinitely greater than if he should fail. If he could secure the co-operation of the British Government in the obtaining of a loan by the Canadian Government, he (Mr. Mills) had no doubt that they would spend an amount of money in unprofitable undertakings that the resources of this country would render it impossible to meet. The present scheme was not likely to succeed any better than the previous scheme of the hon. gentlemen opposite. This country was not able to construct a railway across the continent, and the sooner they honestly admitted their inability in the matter, the better for all classes. It was not fair, then, to hold out hopes of the very early completion of this undertaking. How was the country committed to those propositions? The hon. gentleman opposite agreed, on the union with British Columbia, to conditions utterly incapable of fulfilment, including the construction of the railway in ten years. The hon. gentleman knew well that he agreed that this road should be constructed in ten years, and he had no doubt the hon. gentleman introduced these resolutions at the close of the Session, in order to avoid a full consideration of the question. He believed the intention was to choke off discussion and to prevent that full consideration which the importance of the question demanded. The hon. gentleman had submitted series of a resolutions ill-considered, ill-digested, contradictory, and incompatible with the policy submitted to this House, and he now asked the House to lend its sanction to them. The hon. gentleman spoke about this being a great Imperial highway. Did the hon. gentleman believe that any railway ever constructed across this continent would ever be a line by which Asiatic commerce could pass? If he compared the Asiatic traffic on American railways, with that through the Suez Canal, he would see it was the merest bagatelle. There was no Asiatic traffic; there were no articles of commerce from Asia that were likely to find their way over this railway. The only traffic we could ever make for a railway was that which arose from its immediate vicinity along both sides. The hon. gentleman expected to get aid from the British Government. Had he any pledge that he would get it? He had admitted that he had not. The hon. gentleman had introduced this scheme in order to place at the disposal of the Government some gigantic piece of patronage rather than with the object of promoting the welfare of the country. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture told this House, a few evenings ago, that the Government did not intend to encourage the immigration of the manufacturing classes of Great Britain, but their object was to bring out agriculturists. And now the hon. gentleman told them that the people of England were in distress; but who were those that were suffering? It was the manufacturing classes that were thrown out of employment, and not the agriculturists. But it was not the manufacturing classes the hon. gentleman wanted, but the agriculturists. Did the hon. gentleman expect to get a population here for whom, he admitted, he could find no employment, and who, from their previous habit, would be ill qualified, indeed, to perform the work required of them if they were to undertake to rough it in the North-West Territories? The hon. gentleman alluded to the views of Lord Derby, but Lord Derby was at this time connected with neither party. Why did the hon. gentleman not allude to the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? He knew well that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had recently announced that it would not be wise for the English Government to encourage immigration from the country. He did not desire to denude the country of its population and increase wages. The Minister of Finance in England had announced, in the most explicit manner, his entire opposition to the policy of the hon. gentlemen here, for which, they were told, to-night, it was possible to get the support of the Imperial Government. The hon. gentlemen proposed to lock up 100,000,000 acres of land. According to their scheme, the First Minister would be in the position of Othello—his occupation would be gone. He proposed that a Commissioner should do the most important portion of his work. The hon. gentleman proposed in these resolutions nothing less than a vote of want of confidence in his leader. He had also intimated that the English capitalists would have no confidence in the administration of the public lands by the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government. Was not the hon. gentleman as competent to manage lands as the Commissioners would be? What was the necessity of Commissioners for this purpose? He (Mr. Mills) admitted that the public lands could be made an important auxiliary in the construction of railways, but it ought to be laid down, as a fundamental principle, that no land should be applied to aid in a construction of a road that would not be improved in value, and rendered accessible to the people, by the construction of that road. Last winter, he had a discussion with many parties when the late Government introduced a Colonisation Bill, offering to deposit money as a guarantee that roads would be built in various directions. He thought it important to the public that these roads should be built, but he always said to everyone who asked if they would give them lands elsewhere than along the lines, that he would never give his assent to a proposition of that sort. The building of a Pacific Railway would render lands valuable for a few miles on each side, but not those a considerable distance away. A year or two ago the Government told the people going into the North-West country that they might settle on lands, devoted to railway purposes, for one dollar per acre, and that they would be asked to pay nothing more until an arrangement was made with the railway company for the construction of this line. In that way, the settlement was not impeded. Persons could go in any part of the country they liked; they could go where the railway was projected, with the understanding that, when the land came to be sold for railway purposes, they would be called upon to pay an amount that might be fixed upon between the Government and the company. But to devote lands to railway purposes, where they were not made valuable by the railway, was simply to misapply public lands. If lands were fit for settlement, they would require railways to go to them. If the Pacific Railway did not go there, other railways would. A more unwise course could not be adopted than to devote lands to the construction of a Pacific Railway, which would not be benefitted by it. They might be necessary to assist in building other railways which would render these lands accessible for settlement. He would say further, that Mr. Fleming some years ago estimated that the interest on the money required for the construction of the railway, for many years to come, and the cost of working the road, would amount to $14,000,000 a year. Looking at the progress of settlement, looking at the time within which a reasonable portion of the North-West country could be settled if the road was completed within twenty years, it must be admitted that a large portion of the cost of construction and of working must fall on the Public Treasury. Bearing that in mind, he held the resources of this country were wholly inadequate to undertake so gigantic an enterprise as the hon. gentleman had submitted to the House. This country was committed to the construction of a road as fast as the existing rate of taxation would place moneys at the disposal of the Government for that purpose. All the terms of agreement made with Lord Carnarvon were contingent on the ability of the country to furnish the necessary funds at the existing rate of taxation. He affirmed that these resolutions proposed hopelessly to involve this country, and would render it incapable of meeting its engagements, putting it, in fact, in the position of a bankrupt. There could be no doubt that the only solution of the difficulties in which it was proposed to plunge the country would be a change in our existing political relations. He was anxious that this country should remain master of its own destiny, and he said that the Government had now submitted to the House a scheme that took away her freedom. The hon. gentleman proposed, here, that they should give him permission to construct 125 miles of railway in British Columbia, nobody knew where; the hon. gentleman did not know himself. He said the selection of the route by Burrard Inlet was premature; he proposed further surveys, and admitted that they could not be completed this year. While the work was still pending, he asked a vote to allow him to go on with the construction of 125 miles of railway before Parliament met again. If his representation was correct, why should he ask for a vote at all? The hon. gentleman did not know where this road was to be located; he did not know whether it was to run north or south, east or west, where it was to begin or where it was to end; and, until the hon. gentleman knew what he wanted at all, and knew where he was going to place what he wanted, he was not in a position to ask this House for a dollar. All the reports of the engineers, and all the information that had been collected, pointed in the one direction, and he was not prepared to support a series of resolutions censuring the late Administration, and putting an indefinite power at the disposal of the present Government. He therefore entered his protest against the production of resolutions involving a question of such magnitude to the country at this period of the Session. He entered his protest against the submission of a series of propositions which tended to deprive this House of its own conscience, and convert it into a simple registering body of the intentions of the Administration, when those intentions were not even known to the House, and if they were to believe what the hon. gentleman had stated, they were not known to the members of the Administration themselves. He was anxious that the House should not rush forward in this way, and he was not disposed to incur obligations, the mischievous nature of which no member now in this House would live to see the end of. He opposed the scheme submitted by the Hon. the Minister of Public Works as one detrimental to the public interests, as crippling the resources of this country and as seriously interfering with its future prosperity and welfare.

Mr. BUNSTER said these resolutions proposed to place at the disposal of the Government all the mineral lands in British Columbia. There was no doubt that there was mineral wealth enough in that Province to build ten Pacific Railways. It was well known that British Columbia was the only Province in the Dominion where gold could be obtained in any quantity, and hence the terms upon which that Province went into the Union could not be changed unless a royalty was paid. Notwithstanding the fact that the people of British Columbia were willing to aid the Dominion in every way to carry out this great national enterprise, they had not, heretofore, been treated at all justly. He supposed many hon. members expected that British Columbia would swallow these resolutions as a whole. Well, from the good faith expressed by the Government, and the manly and straightforward manner in which the Premier and the Minister of Public Works had dealt with the question, he had no doubt that they would fulfil their pledges to the House, and that British Columbia would accept these resolutions. It was well known that the present was the only Government possessing the ability to frame such resolutions as had been laid before the House to-day, and the carrying out of which would not cost one dollar to the people. What would it cost the people of Canada to put into operation the proposition of the Government? Why, merely 100,000,000 acres of land, by the sale of which it was proposed to throw into the Public Treasury $200,000,000 to be utilised for the purpose of building this railway? The land was now valued at the low figure of $2 an acre, but, when the railroad was commenced, it would be worth at least $10 an acre. Take the Union Pacific Railway for instance—the land along that road which was not one-twelfth as good land as that in the vicinity of the Canadian road, sold for $12 an acre. The people of the Dominion were convinced that the present Government would build the railroad to their satisfaction. He was surprised that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was so little acquainted with the circumstances of the case, and had such a limited knowledge of the Statutes bearing upon the admission of British Columbia into the Confederation, as to say that there was nothing in the Carnarvon Award to guarantee assistance from Great Britain. He read for his information—and he regretted that, owing to the hon. gentleman's want of information on the subject, he should have taken so much of the time of the House in doing so—the resolutions which were agreed to at the time of the Union. Yet, notwithstanding that, the hon. member for Bothwell stated that Great Britain had not given them any assistance. Why had the Mother Country given Canada the voice of one of her ablest statesmen, who offered, if the Government of the day would accept his proposition, to obtain that money from England? So much for the statement of the hon. member for Bothwell in reference to British statesmen not being willing to assist in the construction of the Pacific Railroad. Then the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) said that the only traffic on that road which would pay would be the local traffic. He (Mr. Bunster) thought that was completely refuted to-day, to the satisfaction of every candid-minded member in the House, by the fact that the distance by this road to the Pacific Ocean would be so much shorter than by other roads that it would command the carrying trade of the world across the continent. The distance in favour of the Canadian road was 1,169 miles. This was well-known to the right hon. gentleman the present leader of the Government for years, and he was working out the problem successfully, when the late Government tried to grapple with the question, and, by their misrepresentations and bungling, the work was thrown back so much that it would take twenty years to regain what had been lost by their maladministration. Hence, the widespread dissatisfaction in the Province of British Columbia against the late Government. This he stated fearlessly of anyone being able, successfully, to controvert his statement. That Province abounded in mineral wealth, which had been locked up for years for this Dominion. And that fact alone kept a great many settlers from going into the Province, for they were told, when asking for the land, that it had been reserved for the Dominion Government as a recompense, or in lieu of building the Pacific Railroad. That land would have been opened out for settlement long ago, but that the people of British Columbia felt that the present Government would return to power and build the railway. Therefore, the land was still reserved in good faith for Canada. But had Canada kept good faith with British Columbia? Not by any means. One gentleman had made use of this language: "Until these surveys are thoroughly completed, and until we find a less impracticable route through that inhospitable country—that sea of mountains—it is folly to talk of commencing the work of construction." The name of this gentleman was Blake, and he was called Aurora, a gentleman in whom the people, in his own constituency, had so little confidence, that they thought the interests of the country would not suffer by his absence from this House. And in this way the people of Canada would roar at any representative who worked against such a national enterprise just the same as they roared against the late Government for their treatment of the Province of British Columbia. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) was pleased to say it would not be a matter of great regret even if that Province were to be let go. It was for making such expressions as these that the people of this country had lost confidence in him, and that the British Government had, to a certain extent, lost confidence in the great national enterprise, and it was in that way that Canada had lost the great interest which Great Britain would have taken if the scheme had been proceeded with in the manner first proposed by the Government of which the right hon. member for Victoria (Sir John A. Macdonald) was the head. The hon. member for Lambton had asked upon what consideration the hon. the Premier was elected for Victoria. He (Mr. Bunster) could give him the information. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) sent him a telegram as his friend in Victoria, which arrived at one o'clock p.m., and at seven o'clock one of the largest gatherings that ever convened together in the Province of British Columbia unanimously decided that the right hon. gentleman should be one of their agents in this Parliament. Could the hon. member for Lambton be elected to represent any constituency in British Columbia? No. Many persons were now going from Ontario to British Columbia, and he had not the least doubt that soon the hon. gentleman would have no constituents left even in Lambton, and that he would not be able to get into this House. He (Mr. Bunster) thought it would not be much to regret. These resolutions had been a long time in being brought down to the House, and the only reason he could see for the delay was to be found in the fact that they had been carefully prepared in the interest of the country. He believed that they would commend themselves to British statesmen when they were placed upon the British market to obtain the money required, notwithstanding the efforts of the Grand Trunk Railway company. What had the late Government, who were under the influence of that company, done for the country? They ran the country into debt, though when they assumed office there was a surplus in the Treasury. When the late Administration succeeded to the reins of Government the people were confident that, with the surplus in the Treasury at the time, they would be well able to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, but, through the enlargement of canals, building locks and other useless works in Ontario, that surplus had been squandered. The surveys made in British Columbia had, to a great extent, been unsatisfactory, except those made under the immediate supervision of Mr. Marcus Smith. He was sorry to see that reports in connection with that work had not come before this House as frequently as they should have done. It had been well said that some reports had been suppressed in order to keep capitalists from going into the Province. The policy of the late Government had created a good deal of disappointment and discontent in the Province of British Columbia, and neither the British Government nor the people of this country could have blamed the people of that Province if they had seceded, as they had a right to do, under the Carnarvon terms. It was only through the confidence they had in the present Government that the Province was still in the Union. What would Canada be to-day without British Columbia? The instructions sent to British Columbia by Mr. Mackenzie's agent, looked to him a great deal like driving the people of British Columbia into annexation with the United States. Notwithstanding the abuse that British Columbia had received, she still lived, but the hon. gentleman still went on to abuse British Columbia. He thought he might have left off abusing that colony after the chastisement he received at the polls. The members for British Columbia were supporting a Government that he believed would carry out its pledges. He thought the attack of the hon. member was very uncalled for. He himself had never intruded himself upon the House any further than the interest of his Province demanded. It was a well-known fact that, had it not been for the late Government, this scheme would have been carried out. The manner in which British Columbia had been treated had caused her to lose a good deal of confidence in the words of British statesmen. He trusted, however, that the manner in which the present Government would carry out their pledges would tend to restore that confidence.

MR. HUNTINGTON said, in reference to this subject, that, from the manner in which the hon. gentleman representing that Province spoke of this undertaking, one feared that the English language used in that Province was not precisely understood as they used it in the eastern portion of Canada. The Province of British Columbia was a small Province. Did the hon. gentleman claim it was equal to Ontario?

MR. BUNSTER: Yes.

MR. HUNTINGTON said there were other Provinces besides British Columbia whose interests had to be consulted, and there were other interests to be considered besides the Pacific Railroad. In consequence of this, they could not tamely take the advice he had just given them. The hon. gentleman sneered at their railways, sneered at their public improvements, and said that, in spending money upon these, they were wasting money which ought to be devoted to the construction of the Pacific Railroad. He (Mr. Huntington) maintained that there was no bargain to construct the road—they were not compelled to increase their burdens for the construction of the road. He would ask every man in the House, and every man of common sense in the country, if the Pacific Railway were built to-day, and were in the same running order as the Intercolonial, what would be their means of keeping it running? They must have something outside of buncombe speeches and glowing sophisms. It was about time the House and the country told the people of British Columbia the terms upon which they entered the Confederation. He could conceive of nothing more childish or absurd—nothing showing how little their friends from British Columbia had studied the affairs of the Dominion, than the speech of the hon. gentleman who had just told them that the hon. member for Lambton was defeated because he did not meet the views of the British Columbia people in regard to the railroad. The hon. leader of the Government was not defeated on account of his Pacific Railway policy, but because the accidents of political life placed him where he was. Let the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bunster), let them all understand where they were. Let them begin to deal with this question as a serious question which affected the finances of the country, and which they would have to discuss in years to come. Let them remember that the people of Canada were not going to submit to build the Pacific Railway to the ruin of all other interests. The hon. gentleman told them that, if the hon. member for Lambton had remained in power, British Columbia would have gone out of the Union. British Columbia could not have gone out of her own accord. She was a part of the Dominion, and a part of the Empire. The hon. gentleman had stated that they had wasted five years in regard to this work, when he knew they had been doing everything to acquire information for the building of the road. Then British Columbia questions had given occasion for more careful, painstaking thought and discussion than almost any other questions in this House. Let not the hon. gentlemen lay the flattering unction to their souls that this House or this country, whether led by the hon. member for Lambton or the right hon. gentleman opposite, was going to push them into the perils of bankruptcy for the purpose of securing the object of hon. gentlemen coming from that Province. Several hon. gentlemen had spoken of the Union Pacific Railway and the Central Pacific Railway as evidences of what might be done. Now, in relation to this, it was well known that a certain number of men, when the United States were in the throes of civil war, and when it was of national importance that they should have communication across the Rocky Mountains, took hold of the work. The hon. gentleman said that they would have carried out their scheme had it not been for the partisanship, or the desire to get on the Treasury benches, displayed by the hon. member for Lambton and his friends. He remembered when the hon. gentleman was not so thoroughly a party man as he was now. He believed the gentleman, and his friends from British Columbia had done, perhaps, some discredit and harm to the cause they represented by being so inclined to look with jealous eyes on everything that was done by those whom they came here to oppose. Had the hon. gentleman considered this question in a judicial character, rather than made it an opportunity of parading his glorification of one party, and his denunciation of the other, he might have addressed himself more keenly and with greater prospects of success to the hearts of the people of this country. The hon. gentleman told them that the party of which the hon. member for Lambton was leader had caused the arrangements, which might otherwise have carried, to break down, and the Prime Minister had said that the Liberal party, in 1873, had exercised every means possible to destroy British confidence. He did not think the hon. gentleman could mention a single particular in which an attempt was made to prevent British capitalists investing in that scheme if they proposed to do so. He did not believe that there was the remotest chance of their doing so. He believed that the circumstances which attended the initiation of that scheme were an embarrassment to it, as he believed that, if the hon. gentleman went to England to-day with his present scheme, the history of the Pacific Railway transaction would prove ruinous to it. Did the hon. gentleman expect the English capitalists to jump on their desks and cry "hurrah" when they saw his emissaries. They would ask, Are these the gentlemen who signed the charter in 1873 for funds to be used in the elections? The hon. gentleman would not find himself a gainer by the memory or reminiscences of days gone by. When the right hon. gentleman came into power, the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster) stated he came in on the Pacific Railway question, whereas the fact was he came into power on the desire of the people to have a change in the fiscal condition of the affairs of the country. There was no lack of this Pacific Railway matter in any of the constituencies in which discussion took place with regard to public affairs, but the first thing the right hon. gentleman did when he got elected was to spring upon a platform in Quebec and declare that the people had condoned the offence. He (Mr. Huntington) did not think the British Government and people would condone the offence. The people of this country had condemned and never approved of it, and his restoration to power had no connection with that matter. He had assumed power, and, in surrounding himself with his old colleagues, he had shown the disposition which was alluded to by the hon. member for Bothwell: "The king has come to his own again, let us take up the bones of Cromwell and dishonour them." These men had given them no earnest that these vast interests which they were now about to take, would be put into sound hands. There was no evidence that there would be a fair and just administration, no reason to suppose that corruption would not again run rampant in the hands of men who had done wrong for many years, and he warned the hon. gentleman that he had taken up a scheme which would not benefit himself, and might bring ruin on the country in the future.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) said the hon. gentleman who had just taken his seat had evidently been waiting for a good while for an opportunity of recounting to this House some of the exploits on which he prided himself in the past. His speech, in the first instance addressed to the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster) rather than to this House, was evidently intended to lead back to the revival of the old story of the Pacific scandal. Those who remembered the circumstances which existed at the time that the hon. gentleman had ventured to move his resolution in this House—those who remembered what there was behind that resolution, and the reason for placing it in the hands of a member in the back benches instead of one on the front benches, would probably appreciate the title the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) had to lecture hon. gentlemen on the Government side of House every time he rose. He talked of the First Minister going to England and being met by the recollections of the Pacific scandal, being asked whether he was Prime Minister at the time of that Pacific Scandal He (Mr. White) could tell the hon. gentleman that the First Minister could go to England, and that he (Mr. Huntington) dared not. If the Prime Minister went to England, he would go there as a man villified at the instance of that hon. gentleman, on the motion of that hon. gentleman, who, when the Commission was appointed to try, was too cowardly to present himself for examination. He would further tell the hon. gentleman that, if he would go to England, he would find there persons most anxious to meet him, to settle accounts with him, and ascertain what had become of the money of which he had robbed them. It ill became the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) to lecture hon. gentlemen in this House as he had done on every occasion on which he had risen to address the House, and he (Mr. White) could tell him that, until he cleaned his own hands, until he had succeeded in wiping out the infamy which attached to his own name, he had better not deal in invectives, as he had been so fond throughout this Session. With these remarks he would dismiss the hon. gentleman from his further consideration. As to the serious question with which they were dealing to-night, what was the position in which it stood? As the First Minister pointed out, both sides of the House admitted that we must have this railway, that this country was practically pledged to the building of it, that it was in the interest of this country that the Pacific Railway should be built at the earliest possible moment, that the future of the country depended on its completion, and that without it we had, in the North-West, instead of an advantage, a great burden to the country. Both sides of the House having admitted this, they would imagine that, when the Government came down and asked the authority of Parliament to adopt a scheme by which the road could be built out of the lands of the country, by which, in fact, the country itself which was to be principally benefitted would be charged with the expense of building it, this scheme would have met with the hearty concurrence and support of both sides of the House. It had not done so, because those hon. gentlemen now, as in the past, must be bribed by office to say a kindly word of their country. When the scheme was brought down in 1872, they decried this country in order that they might have a temporary political triumph; they warned the financial men of England against investing a single dollar in an enterprise of this kind; and here to-day they had the same story repeated over again, the same warning to the people of England, who were to be invited to assist in this great Imperial enterprise. What was the position in which we at present stood in relation to these North-West Territories? Judging by the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, one would imagine that this building of the Pacific Railway was to be a burden for all time upon the 4,000,000 of people who now inhabited the Dominion, upon the resources of this country as they now existed. If we looked at our friends on the other side of the line, at the enormous development of settlement that had taken place, then we would realise how important it was for us, if we would have any part whatever in the race of progress on this continent, that we should follow their course. In 1830, thirteen States, which were now known as the Western States, had only a population of about three-quarters of a million; at the last census, nearly ten years ago, these thirteen States had a population of very nearly thirteen millions, while, during that time, in which that enormous development and progress had taken place, over 30,000 miles of railway had been constructed within those States. We might well look forward to a great future if we could only be true to ourselves. The Government had submitted a policy which did not seek to burden Canada, but sought to develop that North-West country by means of lands there. The Government asked the power to permit that North-West country to develop itself, and to bear not only the cost of the building of the railway, but to return it to Canada by its great resources, and the enormous contributions, through Customs dues, of the millions of people who would settle there, a people whom they could not over estimate. That was the policy submitted, and he believed that the attacks which had been made upon it by the Opposition were due solely to the fact that they realised the truth that this policy was certain to be popular and successful.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he desired to say—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order; spoke.

MR. CARTWRIGHT moved the adjournment of the House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman could not move the adjournment, as he had already spoken.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) moved the adjournment of the House.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he was glad to see that he had evidently made a little impression on the right hon. gentleman, since he had caused his henchman to attack him (Mr. Huntington) in this House in the same manner in which he had slandered him through the columns of his newspaper since 1873. The hon. gentleman's newspaper, in connection with the Mail—he (Mr. Huntington) would not say whether they were respectable newspapers or not—had, so far as he was concerned, indulged in baseless falsehoods for the last few years. It never gave him any uneasiness, or affected his position in this country, and, except in the breast of some benighted Tory, they never created the impression they were telling the truth. The hon. gentleman from Cardwell (Mr. White) commenced those falsehoods in 1874, and filled his paper with them, though he admitted the hon. gentleman could not have known them himself. He said that a suit was brought against him (Mr. Huntington), and it was taken, only long after, and he filled his newspaper with gross, wicked, and monstrous falsehoods against him, in regard to transactions in Lower Canada, in respect of the Pyrites Mining Company. He then sued the hon. gentleman for damages, when his (Mr. White's) advocate came to him (Mr. Huntington) and asked delay, as he wanted to go to England for six weeks; the matter went on for a time, and, finally, he was foreclosed from pleading. He did not plead to this action, his lawyers constantly making the excuse, "What is the use of pleading; the case is not going on?" Two or three years afterwards, on some dispute with the right hon. gentleman, who insulted him (Mr. Huntington) grossly in this House, as he would not, perhaps, under ordinary circumstances, some altercation occurred, and the next day but one, two and a-half years after the action was instituted, Mr. White made an affidavit in Court that the reason why he had not pleaded was that the hon. gentleman's (Mr. White's) lawyer had been in England; and, upon that statement of the reason for not having pleaded, he hurled against him (Mr. Huntington) all the accusations hurled against him before, which the Mail also published. He was all right, and all the lies of all the Tory newspapers could not bring him down till he had done wrong. He was stating the circumstances under which the action was brought. Before that time the people in the Old Country, at whose instance it was brought against him (Mr. Huntington), had sent a representative to Canada, who examined the facts, after which a deed of settlement was passed withdrawing the actions, and saying they had been brought on false information and every action against him was withdrawn. He (Mr. Huntington) did not think, after that, that there was any particular hurry about pressing on this suit that the hon. gentleman from Cardwell became, two and a-half years afterwards, so eager to push on, though not having pleaded all this time. So much as regarded the first accusation, which was a miserable falsehood, as the hon. gentleman must have known when he published it, as he had all the facts, which proved it false in his (Mr. White's) possession. He could do and say more were the seal of secrecy removed from his lips.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell): The hon. gentleman's lips are unsealed—let him tell everything.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he was sure the hon. gentleman must have known that nothing could be more despicable, more dishonest, or better calculated to show the demoralisation of his newspaper than that an attack on him should have been published without any circumstance of justification except the declaration of a suit drawn by a lawyer. The majority, however, believed the hon. gentleman read falsehoods every time he read those stories. The right hon. gentleman opposite was the man to start those charges in this House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is not the case; it is a fib.

MR. HUNTINGTON: The right hon. gentleman did, and threatened me.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is not the case.

MR. HUNTINGTON: The right hon. gentleman did threaten me in the celebrated three-hour speech, when he held up his hands.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is not the case.

MR. HUNTINGTON said that the hon. gentleman held up his hands—at any rate, he could not deny that. When the settlement was made in Montreal with the representatives of this company, they were anxious that the action against the Gazette should be withdrawn, because they did not want more litigation. His own attorney and the lawyer of the company were authorised to consult with the counsel on the other side, when they reported they had not seen Mr. White, but only his attorney, who said he would not care about humiliating him by asking him to publish an apology, but that they would be very glad to reach an understanding and settlement, and allow the matter to rest. He (Mr. Huntington) always regarded the thing in that way. He did not know how long it was afterwards that the hon. gentleman (Mr. White) plucked up courage to file an affidavit. The quarrel with the right hon. gentleman had led to the re-statement of the old falsehoods, and that though two and a-half years had supervened. He had read in the Mail and in hostile papers published in Glasgow, accounts of an action there with regard to the Huntington Copper Mining Company. But he never had any demand from them or heard of correspondence with them—he meant the company to which it was said he sold the property. He never was served with a writ by them, nor had the least reason to suppose they were going to sue him. Did the hon. gentleman think he dared not go to England, having committed some crime against widows and orphans?

AN HON. MEMBER: That is all.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he dared go to England any time. The worst that could happen to him would be the service upon him of a writ in the second suit that the hon. member for Cardwell was so much interested in. But what difference did it make whether it was served there or here? He had been represented by those slanderous newspapers, the Gazette and Mail, whose reporter in the gallery slandered him (Mr. Huntington) daily, as having been sued by this company, when all he knew about it was what appeared in the newspapers. He had something more to say with regard to the second suit. The hon. member for Cardwell said he (Mr. Huntington) had bought up the stock to influence them. That was false; he had never bought up a dollar's worth of it; he never voted or had any influence in that stock. He had never sold the Huntington Copper Mine to the company or people in Glasgow. He had submitted the whole case to lawyers in this country, since the newspapers had attacked him, and he had received their opinion that, in the course he had pursued, he was in no way responsible for the formation of the company in Glasgow. He was not in the country, and the hon. gentleman's story was not correct. He had sold the property six months before, his only relations with the company being those of a director, which they had made him. When about organising the company, in the spring of 1872, they wrote to him to know if he could persuade Sir Hugh Allan to act as one of the directors. He then showed Sir Hugh this request, and told him that the parties in Scotland wanted him to act as a director. He then told him (Mr. Huntington) that there was this difficulty, that the company, as a copper mining company, would command his confidence at once, as he had seen the mines, but he did not know the chemical process to be applied, and till he did, would not act; and he authorised him to telegraph that, so far as he (Sir Hugh) knew anything of the mine, he would be happy to act as a director, but would first require to know more about the chemical process. Without his (Mr. Huntington's) knowledge, they had made him a director. He had sat twice as a director in Glasgow, but never had anything further to do with the company, and resigned shortly after. He had dared the hon. Premier to put him out of the House if he thought him unworthy of a seat in it. He had the opinion of able lawyers that he was in no way responsible for those transactions of the company, as also the opinion of that distinguished juriconsult, Judge Day, that he (Mr. Huntington) had had nothing to do with the formation of the company and no responsibility for it; and he would lay those opinions beside the baseless slanders of the hon. member for Cardwell. The Eastern Townships mines had long engaged attention, and all the slanders upon him could be judged of from the fact that, as to the first transaction, he had given his lands for the prices he paid himself, and that for all his trouble he was only to have some stock, which he never got. The hon. gentleman knew this undertaking was not a swindle; that, so far as he (Mr. Huntington) was concerned, there was a clause in the contract by which he made himself not responsible for titles of any description, except such as he was able to prove. And, as to the second property, when he sold it, it was examined by experts from the other side of the water. He believed then, as now, that it was a good property, and that the present holders had made a vast mistake in allowing themselves to be used by the Tories, with the view to making party capital out of it. He believed that the mine itself was a good one. He had never blamed Sir Hugh for buying the hon. gentlemen opposite, as he would buy any other commodity for sale; and he (Mr. Huntington) supposed the hon. member for Cardwell also had his value. He had no doubt he knew it, and to-morrow his paper would say it was all a lie.

AN HON. MEMBER: And so it is.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman says he has no doubt it is all a lie.

MR. HUNTINGTON: The hon. gentleman is Prime Minister of this country, and some of his friends call him a statesman, but, if he were out of this House, he would be a blackguard.

MR. HUNTINGTON.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I ask you to rule whether the language of the hon. gentleman is in order or not. I think it is disgraceful to this House.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: I think it is time this thing should be put a stop to.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I would call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the member for Cardwell, in my hearing, was good enough to describe my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Huntington) as a robber, and, unless my ears deceived me, the First Minister stated audibly to us here that what my hon. friend said was not true. Now, I regret very much my hon. friend, even under that provocation, should have gone as far as he did, but, if ever a man had an excuse for his language, my hon. friend had it.

MR. COCKBURN: There can be no excuse for the use of such language; the term is the worst that can be used.

MR. SPEAKER: I admit that, since a certain time, the language of some hon. members has not been parliamentary.

MR. HUNTINGTON: As far as I am concerned, if I have transgressed any parliamentary rule, I am willing to apologise, but I regret the hon. gentleman who called me to order had not noticed cases still worse that occurred.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. member for Northumberland says the word "blackguard," that was used by my hon. friend, is the worst term that could be used. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman whether that is worse than telling an hon. gentleman that he is a robber and a swindler? It seems to me even worse than the other term.

MR. COCKBURN: The hon. member replied to another hon. gentleman, altogether without reference to the member for Cardwell. His remarks were applied to another hon. gentleman, and I say that so applied they were unjustifiable by all the parliamentary rules and laws that obtain in this House.

MR. MILLS: That is beside the question.

MR. COCKBURN: It is exactly the question.

MR. MACKENZIE: No; it is not the question.

MR. HUNTINGTON said it was in answer to the right hon. gentleman charging him with falsehood that he made the remark he did. He was sorry to be the occasion of this trouble, but he had committed a sin in the eyes of certain hon. gentlemen opposite, for which, it appeared, he was to be punished every day of his life, and he was compelled to protect himself against the slanders and unfair treatment which he received from the other side of the House. At the same time he thanked God that he could make his voice heard in justification in this House, and in this country, where he was born, where he had never done an act of which he was ashamed, and where the men with whom he had daily and weekly intercourse, knew these foul slanders were without foundation. He was glad his character was sufficient to stand the assaults of such mere politicians as the member for Cardwell. That hon. gentleman had thought it suited his political convenience to make him this challenge, but the right hon. leader of the Government had only to shake his finger and he would talk in an entirely different strain. The country would understand that these newspapers and public hacks were only dealing exactly as they were told to do by the leader whom they came here to serve. He (Mr. Huntington) presented himself before this House and before this country, as a man against whom—God knew he had faults enough—there were no faults of dishonesty. He stood here as a victim of hatred, but he could not be deterred from doing his duty by all the slanders and assaults made upon him ever since the hon. gentleman from Cardwell changed his mind as to the fact that there had been a prima facie case made out against his leader.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell) said the members of the House who had had the privilege of listening to the member for Shefford last year, and of contrasting the speech he had then delivered on this subject with the speech he had delivered to-night, would realise that there was a marvellous change in tone since that time. He could remember, last year, when the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) brought this matter up, the magnificent, the indignant tones in which the hon. member for Shefford repudiated all guilt—in fact, all intention of guilt in the premises, and charged those who ventured to make any insinuations against him with cowardice and with every baseness. To-night those who listened to the halting, doubting speech of the hon. gentleman, and who contrasted the tones with which he addressed the House, with the tones in which he usually addressed it, must have come to the conclusion that he knew there were facts in waiting for him, the exposure of which he had better not have provoked. The hon. gentleman said that he had sued a newspaper in Montreal for libel, that that paper took two years before it pleaded, and since that time he seemed to be under the impression that for some reason or other that suit was withdrawn. He (Mr. White) could only say that, speaking for that newspaper and for its proprietor, who was to-day responsible for it, if the hon. gentleman would gratify him by bringing this matter before twelve of his peers anywhere in this Dominion, he would undertake to prove every allegation made against him in the Gazette. The hon. member told them to-night that his only fault consisted in the fact that he had sold some mines in the Eastern Townships. He (Mr. White) proposed to state some of the facts connected with those transactions. There were two great mining companies involved—there was the Copper Pyrites Company and the Huntington Mining Company, the company which was honoured by having the name of the hon. gentleman attached to it. In the case of the Copper Pyrites Company, the charge which was made against the hon. gentleman—the charge which stood on record in the Courts against him to-day—the charge which he might, if he had the courage to proceed with the suit, disprove, if he was innocent—that charge was: That, whereas he told the people who put their money in this scheme in Scotland that he was simply acting as agent, for which they paid him, buying mining properties and giving them to them at the price which he paid for them, he was in fact getting money from the vendors as well, acting as a commission merchant for both sides, and taking wrongfully about $250,000, which came into the pockets of himself and his associates who were engaged with him in the transaction, a proceeding of which the people who bought the mines in Scotland knew nothing whatever, but, on the contrary, supposed that the money had been paid to the original Canadian proprietors.

MR. HUNTINGTON: At the time these commissions were taken, there were two or three of the directors in this country who knew all about it.

MR. WHITE said that certainly was no mitigation. The hon. gentleman had stated that this company had passed resolutions exonerating him from all blame in connection with the matter. He (Mr. White) could remember, last year, when the hon. gentleman stood near where the hon. the Finance Minister now sat, the indignant tones with which he flourished these resolutions, but he did not tell the House then how much these resolutions had cost him. He and his friends, finding themselves in the position in which they were, obtained control of the company by buying shares at the reduced price to which they had gone down, elected friendly directors, and then withdrew the suits against themselves.

MR. HUNTINGTON called attention to the fact that a person who had a seat on the floor of the House was making remarks on the subject under discussion.

MR. SPEAKER ordered strangers to leave the floor.

MR. WHITE said, if anyone wanted to know why that plea of justification on the part of the publishers of the Gazette stood on record to-day unanswered by the hon. gentleman, why a public man in this country deemed it consistent with his honour and his character to permit that plea to remain there, he (Mr. White) would tell them that, when that suit was brought against the Montreal

MR. WHITE.

Gazette, the hon. gentleman was endeavouring to fight off the suits in England, and, being desirous of stopping the discussion in Canada, he believed the best way to do it was by bringing an action for libel. He did succeed in stopping discussion for two years. But, when, by the process just described, the hon. gentleman did succeed in buying off the suits and getting them withdrawn, he had the strongest interest in preventing this matter coming into Court, where the exposure of his proceedings must be made, and the record stood there a damning evidence of the hon. gentleman's conduct in connection with the formation of this mining company. Then there was another company, the Huntington Mining Company. In the case of the Copper Pyrites Company, he bought mineral lands and sold them, taking commissions from both sides. In this Huntington mining case, he had lands of his own which he put into the company, about 5,000 acres of Bolton lands. The hon. gentleman knew how he became possessed of those Bolton lands—that was another story that it was not worth while now referring to. But he put those lands in at $47 an acre, or about £50,000 sterling.

MR. HUNTINGTON: Not a word of it is true.

MR. WHITE: Not true, did the hon. gentleman say? Well, he would see how true the statement was. The description of these lands in the prospectus, which bore the signature of the member for Shefford, was as follows:—

"The purchase money to be paid for the mines is £125,000. This includes the whole working plant, steam-engines, water-wheels, crushing-mills, and dressing machinery, offices, dwelling houses, and about 5,000 acres of freehold land in the same township, a great part of which is heavily timbered—all of which will be valuable for the purposes of the mine and for fuel. These lands, though little explored, are known to contain minerals, and may therefore become a valuable asset of the company."

Recently a gentleman had been sent out from Scotland, to investigate the affairs of the company, and to report to the shareholders, and the following was an extract from the report of the proceedings at a general meeting of the shareholders, as published in the Glasgow papers:—

"Mr. Andrew B. Gray reported that at the request of the directors he had visited the mine in Canada. He had only returned three days ago, and had not had time to prepare a formal report for the meeting. He had acquired very valuable information regarding their property and its history, but it had not yet been submitted to his co-directors, and it therefore seemed to him to be somewhat premature, in the present circumstances, to lay the information before the meeting. He would, however, be glad to answer any question, if he could do so, without injuring themselves, as a company. He had visited all their property that was accessible to ordinary persons like himself (laughter), and it would, no doubt, surprise many of them to know that what was designated as valuable, heavy-timbered land, for which they paid $47 per acre, consisted of swamps and high rocks, and was truly described in the Government records as waste lands. (Laughter.) He had gone through all the workings of the mine, and it was only too evident that but a small portion of the 2,000 tons per month which were promised in their prospectus, could be obtained, notwithstanding all the expense they had been at in opening it up."

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. I ask you, Sir, to decide whether it is competent for this House to hear a personal quarrel of this kind, not in the public interest, a matter that cannot be determined by this House in one way or the other, and during the debate on a great question affecting the interests of the Dominion at large. Is it proper that a question of this kind should be intervened to draw away the attention of the House from the resolutions that are now before the Chair? I ask you, Sir, to decide whether this discussion is pertinent to the question before the House? I can quite understand that a member may rise to make explanations, but this far exceeds the limits of the rule. It is really dragging on to this floor a question which we have no right to be troubled with at all, and which I decline myself, as a member of this House, to be troubled with.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I do not object at all to this question of order being decided. If I am on my trial here, I am willing to be tried; but I cannot allow the slander of the hon. gentleman has uttered to go without my having permission to state why they are false.

MR. COCKBURN: I think that is not the question. The question is not whether any member should be tried here at all. A member has the right to rise and justify himself if he will, but to go beyond that is not the vocation of this House. We are dealing with public measures and public questions, and not private issues between the member who has just spoken and the member for Cardwell, and I object to it.

MR. MACKENZIE said they must remember that the member for Cardwell first made a personal charge in a matter that this House had no cognisance of whatever. He denounced the member for Shefford in the most unmeasured terms in connection with some private transaction that had no kind of relation with the business before the House. He (Mr. Mackenzie) would have called attention to that matter at the time, but, from the fact that the hon. member for Shefford was one of his colleagues, and that he knew personally he was entirely innocent of any wrong-doing in the matter, he felt that, as this had been attempted once or twice before, it would be better that he should deal with it. Were they to ask the House to undertake the task of trying every member who had been deemed guilty in the estimation of some hon. members of a moral offence? This was an unprovoked attack on a matter touching the hon. gentleman's private affairs altogether, and which had not the slightest connection with the question under debate.

MR. SPEAKER: The main motion that the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, has disappeared altogether, and the question now is the adjournment of the House. There was ample latitude allowed the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) to make the charge against the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington), and then, to allow the hon. member for Shefford to make a reply, the motion was made to adjourn the House. It is true that these personal recriminations are far from being right, but, as the matter has been commenced, and the charge made, it is as well to allow the matter to go on.

MR. WHITE said the hon. gentleman would recollect that, almost in the first speech made by the hon. member for Shefford during this Session, he referred to the attacks made upon him, and challenged controversy concerning them. Every time he had risen in the House since he had made reference to those attacks, he had never ceased to charge those who ventured to doubt his great disinterestedness and morality with being slanderers and villifiers, and it was simply now that the Session was nearly over, and when again the hon. gentleman assumed a lecturing tone, and ventured to say to the hon. the First Minister that he dared not show himself in England, and when that hon. gentleman's character was impugned, that he (Mr. White) referred to the hon. member as he did. He entered into the details he was now giving, because the hon. member for Shefford had declared these charges to be utterly false, and, in view of that denial, he (Mr. White) thought it was a matter of interest to the House and to the country to know the grounds upon which those charges were based. As he had already stated, the hon. gentleman had had an opportunity of bringing the gentlemen who made the charges before a proper tribunal, where they could be investigated, but, after challenging the investigation, he refused to go on. When he (Mr. White) was interrupted, he was going on to say that these 5,000 acres of land in Bolton, which were put in by the hon. gentleman as so valuable that they were worth $47 an acre, had been recently valued by an old surveyor, well known and greatly respected in the townships, at eighty cents an acre. The report of this surveyor was referred to two gentlemen of undoubted character—both of them being prominent political friends of the hon. member for Shefford himself. They made an examination of the land, and confirmed the report of the surveyor. So the House had—on evidence which was indubitable, and which he ventured to say neither the hon. gentleman nor anyone else would undertake to impugn—the fact that the member for Shefford had put into this company land which he described in glowing terms, and as worth $250,000, but which, in reality, was at the time of record in the Crown Lands Department as waste lands of the Crown, and was now proved to be only worth eighty cents an acre. Recently, the company held a special general meeting, and the same game was attempted to be played as had been so successfully played in connection with the Copper Pyrites scheme. A motion was made to withdraw the suit against the hon. gentleman and his co-directors, and that motion was carried; but the scrutineers decided that the people who were interested as defendants in the suit, or their proxies, had no right to be counted, and as a result the suit had to be proceeded with. The Courts were appealed to and sustained this decision of the scrutineers. Since that time, the co-directors of the hon. gentlemen had arranged with the shareholders, on the ground that they too were victims of the deception practised by the hon. gentleman, and now, by common consent, the suit was going on against the hon. gentleman alone, as he (Mr. White) was informed. And yet the hon. gentleman got up here on every possible occasion, and undertook to lecture this House, to lecture the public men of this country, and to set himself forward as the purifier of the public life of the Dominion, while, in reality, if he (Mr. White) were to repeat the language of the original statement complained of in the libel suit, he was himself steeped to the very lips in the most wicked frauds. But the hon. gentleman had a somewhat original plea—which would be amusing if it had not so serious a side to it—which he was constantly putting forward. They were told that those charges were the result of a conspiracy between people in Glasgow and the Tory leaders in Canada to crush the hon. gentleman for the part he played in the Pacific scandal. They were actually asked to believe that these gentlemen in Glasgow, most of whom he (Mr. White) ventured to believe were Radicals of the first water, had conspired with the Conservative leader in this country to ruin the hon. gentlemen opposite. Unfortunately for the plea, they had evidence of the intensity of the feeling against the hon. gentleman, on the part even of his own co-directors in Scotland, before any charge was made against him in Canada. Here was an extract from a letter written by one of the gentlemen, dated on the 26th of December, 1873:

"A very remarkable and suspicious affair, which, I think, has been now mentioned to you for the first time, and which, to me, probably more than to the other directors, except McEwen, shows me the mind of Huntington all through this affair. Each of the directors put their names down for 1,000 shares, signed their applications, paid their deposits and calls—all except Huntington. He never applied for shares. McEwen did for him, but Huntington never signed the letter of application; he is not legally even a shareholder, and much less a director. To all the secretary's applications for calls, he has never answered a word nor acknowledged himself a shareholder. We refused to give up the £50,000 fully paid shares to McEwen, unless these calls were paid, and the end of it all was that, to save the Company, I had to purchase 1,000 shares from McEwen, £6 paid for £4 a share, and now hold nearly 5,000 shares, mostly bought up from people—friends in distress. I am quite clear that Huntington all along knew that it was a gross swindle, and kept clear of the shares. He has legally never been a shareholder, and has cruelly fleeced us. And this is the man who sets up for the Simon Pure of Canada! Some people say the John Bright of Canada. You and I, and everyone who has any honesty of purpose, should bend all our energies to expose such a man."

MR. HUNTINGTON: Who was the writer of that?

MR. WHITE: Mr. Henderson wrote it. That was in brief the record of this transaction. And yet the hon. gentleman got up in this House and hurled his epithets of falsifier, slanderer, and liar, against everyone who ventured, in the face of these patent facts, to accuse him. He (Mr. White) had only been provoked into this statement by the frequent references of the hon. gentleman to this matter since the commencement of the Session, and by his bold denial to-night; and, in closing, he challenged the hon. gentleman to answer the plea of justification which had been filed in this case, and thus leave the decision of the question to twelve of his countrymen in an arena where every one of these facts would be brought to light, and their truth or falsity would be fully established.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he would mention one circumstance that would throw a little light on the affair. He had never heard the letter which the hon. gentleman read. He had nothing to do with the organisation of the company, and he was not in the company. If he had 5,000 acres of land to sell in times of mining excitement, it might be worth some money. The hon. gentleman made out that it cost $47 an acre, but the fact was that almost all of it sold for $9 an acre. That was all he (Mr. Huntington) had received for it, and there never was a blacker falsehood than that which was told at this meeting by this man, who, however, he (Mr. Huntington) believed was misled by false information. The mining property in that country, for which he had been offered as much almost as he got for it, was included in these lands. That was, they purchased from a well known man in the county of Brome, and the exact price that person got he (Mr. Huntington) got. He (Mr. Huntington) simply drew the man's money. The price, altogether, would not yield $2.25 an acre. It was true that two friends of his certified it was not valuable for timber. He had nothing to do with the representations in this prospectus.

MR. WHITE: The hon. gentleman's name is affixed to the prospectus.

MR. HUNTINGTON said the hon. gentleman knew how it occurred. He had nothing to do with the money given to Mr. Henderson, or with any arrangements made in the organisation. What he had to say was that the whole story was as baseless and false as the hon. gentleman's story about these 5,000 acres of wild land.

MR. TUPPER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

PRAYERS.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

MR. MACKENZIE said he desired to call the attention of the House to what took place in it on Saturday night last. During the discussion, a stranger, who named himself John A. Macdonell, sitting on a seat here, used the most vile language towards a member of the House. The attention of the Speaker was called to it, and he directed, not merely his withdrawal, but the withdrawal of all beside him, including a Senator. A moment afterwards the same party appeared in the House again, and the third time appeared, and still another time attempted to force his way to this entrance, in defiance of all propriety and against Mr Speaker's express directions. He (Mr. Mackenzie) never knew of any occurrence of the kind previously. It was the first time he ever heard of any party coming into the House and speaking at all, but especially addressing himself to a member of the House, and using such grossly insulting language. But, even if Mr. Speaker had directed the Sergeant-at-Arms, ultimately, to remove him from the House, as he (Mr. Mackenzie) understood, he went outside and sent this letter to Mr. Huntington:—

"SIR,—I desire to state, out of the House, you are a cheat and swindler.

"JOHN A. MACDONELL."

It, therefore, became the duty of the leader of the House to deal with this matter, and to take such steps as were necessary to vindicate the proprieties and independence of this House, and secure its members from insult while sitting in it. What action did the leader of the House propose to take in this matter?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I ask the hon. member to lay that letter on the table. This is the first notice I have had of this matter. I shall consider it, and state to the House what course I think is due to the dignity of the House and the protection of its proprieties.

MR. MACKENZIE: I understand from the leader of the House that he will deal with this matter to-day?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I hope I shall.

MR. MACKENZIE.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order of the House to resume the adjourned debate on Mr. Tupper's proposed motion for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider certain resolutions with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway, read.

MR. DESJARDINS said that he begged the attention of the House for a few minutes, in order to correct certain statements made by the hon. member for Shefford, upon the important question contained in the resolutions now submitted. Upon this question, as upon almost all others, the member for Shefford did not represent the views of the Province of Quebec, and was in no way authorised to speak in her name. In giving an honest support to the work of Confederation, the people of the Province of Quebec recognised and accepted all the consequences thereof. That was why they had always been found ready to support the Government in any measure that might be thought necessary for the carrying out of the plan of Confederation. That was why they had accepted with so much earnestness the gigantic scheme of building the Pacific Railway. They had looked upon the acquisition of British Columbia as an important one, not only on account of the advantages and the wealth she possessed, but also because she opened to Canada the highway to the Pacific, and completed the act of Confederation. They had also looked upon this scheme as a political act, that raised Canada several degrees higher among the nations of the earth. They had not changed their opinion since then, and, in 1874, when the hon. member for Lambton thought fit to come before the House and offer a new policy, they had opposed it with all their might. Those who had been present during the debates of the last Parliament would remember the remarkable speeches delivered by the hon. the Minister of Militia, who, he regretted to say, was unable at this moment to support with his eloquence the question that had been discussed since 1874. The broad views of the hon. the Minister of Militia, which were the views entertained by the population of the Province of Quebec, were calculated not only to meet the interests of the Province of Quebec, but the general interests of the Dominion as well. The people of Quebec would see that the hon. the Minister of Public Works had gone back to this truly national and equitable policy, which was based upon the agreement they were always desirous of carrying out. The Act of 1872 was not a mere Statute, it was a compromise between the Provinces, and not only had the Province of Quebec wished to carry out the letter of the agreement, but she had anticipated the realisation of the scheme it contained by taking upon herself an expenditure of nearly $14,000,000 in order to build a railway that would connect the Intercolonial with the proposed Pacific Railway. But, if the people of the Province of Quebec had contracted these obligations, if they had loaded their Province with a debt of several millions in order to build this road and to carry out the policy of the Dominion, they had always thought that, when the Conservative party would regain power, justice would be rendered them, and that their share in this great enterprise would be restored to them. It was in vain that the ex-Premier had thought that he could lead public opinion astray on this question by offering the Georgian Bay Branch as a compensation for the abandoning of the terminus fixed upon by the Act of 1872. The more this Georgian Bay Branch was examined, the more it became apparent that it would not realise the hopes that had been held out, nor could it make good to the Province of Quebec the losses she would sustain by the carrying out of the policy inaugurated in 1874, which placed the terminus at Thunder Bay instead of placing it at some point east of Lake Nipissing. If something was to be done in that part of the country before the completion of that part of the road starting from the east side of Lake Nipissing, and going westward as far as Thunder Bay, it would be by going to French River, rather than to build the Georgian Bay Branch, because the opening up of French River would open up immediately the navigation of the Lakes as far as the extremity of Lake Nipissing, towards which would converge the railways of Ontario and Quebec. That would be a compensation, not for the abandoning of the remainder of the line, but for the time that would necessarily elapse before the road would connect by an uninterrupted line with the terminus at Lake Nipissing and with the Provincial lines. He was convinced that he was giving utterance to the views of the vast majority of the people of Quebec, when he stated that they approved of the policy contained in the resolutions brought down by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, because he was sure that their vested rights would be respected, and that the Government would go back to the policy of 1872, not only with regard to the financial part of the undertaking, but also with regard to the particular conditions that were to ensure equal advantages to the Province of Ontario and to the Province of Quebec. They could not refrain from approving also, in spite of the contrary opinion expressed by the hon. member for Lambton, the inauguration of a policy the aim whereof was to make the territories through which the road was to pass pay their share of the expenses. He entertained entirely, in this respect, the hope that the Government had expressed, to wit, that, when they would go to the money markets of Europe with a hundred million acres of land to offer as security for the loan required to build the road, they would be just as well received as any other that was obliged to borrow on the English markets. He would ask whether there was any country, even in Europe, that could offer to capitalists such advantageous and safe conditions as Canada could offer them. The people of Quebec had other reasons for looking favourably upon any policy calculated to ensure the possession and the enjoyment of the vast regions of the North-West. They could not but recal with respect the ancient traditions of their history. The North-West Territories that the present Government invited them to acquire for the advancement of industry and colonisation, their predecessors had formerly travelled over, and taken possession of, in order to introduce true civilisation. For this reason, as well as on account of the political necessity, the Province of Quebec could not but eagerly accept any occasion calculated to write her history over again, as it were, and to unite to the ancient French possessions the ancient territory that both her missionaries and explorers had acquired. If this question was one of sentiment for them, it was also a question of political interest. Not only did they look upon the construction of the Pacific Railway as the necessary link that was to unite the different parts of the Dominion, but they would insist upon the carrying out of the agreement made in 1872, which guaranteed to them a legitimate share of the advantages that were to flow from this undertaking. Thus he hoped that the debate upon these resolutions would not be closed before the Government made known their views with regard to the eastern part of the road, that was to say, the part between the east side of Lake Nipissing and the western extremity of Lake Superior. He had no reason to doubt a favourable answer, from what he knew of the views and opinions of the hon. Ministers from the Province of Quebec, as well as those entertained by the hon. the Minister of Public Works—views and opinions that they had so openly and frequently expressed during the last Parliament. He could strongly express the conviction that the road would really be for the advantage, not only of a section of the country, as was to be the one proposed by the late Government, but for the advantage of Quebec and the Lower Provinces, as well as for the great Province of Ontario. He would conclude by expressing the hope that the absence of the hon. the Minister of Militia would be temporary, and that he would soon be able to resume the position that he occupied in the councils of Her Majesty, in order to continue, with his worthy colleagues, to represent in the Cabinet the views of the Province of Quebec, and to cause her interest to be recognised, as he had so well succeeded, with his colleagues, in making them prevail with regard to other matters of equal importance.

MR. ANGLIN said that, though he had examined these resolutions with a great deal of care, and had listened with attention to the speech of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, he had, as yet, failed to understand them. They seemed to him to be the strangest series of resolutions ever submitted to this House. The hon. the Minister of Public Works in introducing these resolutions departed widely from all the positions he had ever taken upon the Pacific Railway. During the time he was in Opposition, he made repeated, and sometimes violent, attacks upon the policy pursued by his predecessor, charging him with a want of skill, a want of ability, a want of earnestness, in relation to this Pacific Railway. A more thorough and satisfactory vindication of the policy of his predecessors, a more complete reply to the charges made by that hon. gentleman himself, could not possibly be furnished, than was furnished by the speech he made on Saturday last. He had admitted that the continued surveys were useful and necessary, and that his predecessor was actuated by an earnest desire to carry out, as far as possible, the bargain made by the previous Government with British Columbia, and that, if he had constructed a portion of the road between Thunder Bay and Winnipeg, he had done more than ought to satisfy the people of British Columbia, and more than could have satisfied reasonable people, had he commenced the construction of the work on the Pacific shore itself. The hon. gentleman only objected to one thing, namely, that the late Minister of Public Works did not, last year, cause a survey of the Peace River country to be made. He (Mr. Anglin) thought he could remember within the last year sufficient reasons were given why that survey was not ordered, and why the late Minister of Public Works had declined to consider even the possibility of building the line through the Peace River country, and the reasons then given were good reasons still. The hon. the Minister of Public Works must admit that the Bute Inlet route was now in question, and it was out of the question that this line should be continued up to Fort Simpson. They all knew that in approaching Bute Inlet the road would have to run some 200 miles through a country, where the difficulties in the way of construction and working the road were of the most formidable character. The route through the Peace River country must find its way to the Pacific coast at one or other of these termini, all objectionable in the opinion of the late Minister of Public Works, and two of them, he thought, objectionable in the judgment of the present Minister of Public Works. After six or seven months of consideration of the whole question, and of consultation with the engineers, the hon. the Minister of Public Works on Saturday last did, in fact, endorse in every particular the policy and conduct of his predecessor. There was another consideration also, which stood directly in the way of the adoption of a line running through the Peace River country. He believed it was stated, last year, and the statement had not been contradicted, that, were the main line built through the Peace River country, it would be lengthened fifty or sixty miles, which would involve not only the cost of building the additional fifty or sixty miles, but the cost of working them, of transporting every passenger, and every ton of goods over them. As far as he was acquainted with the subject, there seemed to him to be insuperable objections to the extension of the main line of the Pacific Railway through the Peace River country. The hon. the Minister of Public Works, in comparing the Burrard Inlet route with the Bute Inlet route, admitted that, in every point of view but two, the Burrard Inlet route was the best. It was somewhat shorter, the grades were incomparably easier than by the other route, and it ran through a comparatively fertile country. The only objections were these: In the first place, it approached so near to the American frontier that they might possibly build a branch line, tapping it at its terminus, and so divert a great portion of the trade to one of the harbours of Oregon. In this part of the Dominion, he encouraged connection of American railroads with our own system of railroads. We believed that it was a great advantage to us that a large portion of the American trade should pass over our roads. We were expending many millions in enlarging canals, not so much for the convenience of our trade and our own farmers, as for the purpose of securing a large portion of the carrying trade of the United States; but, while we were doing everything in our power on this side of the continent to secure, as much as possible, that carrying trade, the hon. the Minister of Public Works seemed to think it was a fatal objection to the Fraser River route, that it approached somewhat near to the American frontier, and that an American line should be there connected with it. It seemed to him (Mr. Anglin) that, if we could do the carrying trade for Oregon over our railroad, we would be the gainers; but, at all events, if we did not choose to allow the Americans to connect with our road, we need not permit them to do so. They could not do so without the permission of this Parliament, which permission we were free to withhold. The other objection which the hon. the Minister of Public Works seemed to consider a very serious one, was an objection taken from a military point of view. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) stated correctly that, in the present condition of our railroads running close to the American frontier, connecting at so many points with the American system, we must have made great blunders in the past in our railroad policy. But this objection was a feeble one. If, unfortunately, the United States and Great Britain should go to war at any time, the fate of this country must be determined all along the frontier. Every one must be satisfied that a war between these two countries could never be settled within this century, at all events, by anything that might happen on the Pacific coast, whether the Americans chose to erect a fortress in San Juan, or to occupy Vancouver Island, or whether we had the strength to occupy the island which now belonged to the United States. It would be almost folly for this Parliament to provide rather for one year of war than for ninety-nine years of peace. They would prepare this country best for war by cultivating the arts of peace, by strengthening our people commercially, agriculturally, and otherwise. He (Mr. Anglin) considered the objection in a military point of view as so feeble that it could hardly be urged, except as a pretext for the selection of a longer and more expensive, and comparatively impracticable route by Bute Inlet. The hon. the leader of the Government had made on Saturday a remarkable speech. They had heard him occasionally make remarkable speeches in the House, but his speech on Saturday was, on the whole, a most remarkable one, and a very fair sample of those he had made during the last elections on the hustings; for he dealt not with facts but with fancies altogether. He chose to fancy that the hon. member for Lambton had attacked and belittled this country, and he replied to those imaginary attacks. One of his fancies was that the hon. member for Lambton had stated that the North-West was unfit for settlement, and on that he dwelt feelingly and emphatically for some time—the only lack in his whole argument being that it was entirely without foundation, as the hon. member for Lambton had never made such a statement. Having dwelt on that, the right hon. gentleman proceeded to speak of the probability of our obtaining some assistance from Great Britain. On that he dwelt at great length, but he (Mr. Anglin) confessed not very convincingly. That Great Britain ought to help us, he (Mr. Anglin) was perfectly willing to admit, but we should have sought that help when we first obtained possession of the North-West, when we relieved the Imperial Government of the responsibility, then becoming a heavy responsibility, of governing that country. He (Mr. Anglin) remembered that in those days the Hon. Joseph Howe, then sitting on his side of the House, urged very strongly that it was the duty of Canada not to assume that responsibility, unless the Imperial Government would render that assistance which, under the circumstances, it was reasonable on our part to demand. His protests were, however, unavailing. Another opportunity occurred when the hon. gentlemen opposite might fairly have called on the Imperial Government, in some way, by guaranteeing interest or otherwise, in the working of and constructing the great Imperial highway, as it was called in the resolutions. That opportunity occurred when British Columbia became part of the Confederacy. There could be no doubt, at that time, that the British Government were very much in favour of that Union; that they did very much to remove the difficulties that stood in the way of adding British Columbia to Canada. That was the time when we could have pointed out to the British Government the enormous work which we had to undertake, and ask their assistance in carrying out the bargain which, at their instance, we were making with British Columbia. To-day he could hardly imagine that the Government of Great Britain seriously entertained the belief that it would be possible for them to induce the Government and Parliament of Canada to guarantee any amount of money or to give any aid towards the construction of this railway. The people of Great Britain were now suffering from want of employment. The only thing that he could see in these resolutions was a determination to appoint Commissioners. He had no doubt that that would be carried out, that these lands, now sufficiently managed by the Department of the Interior, would, in the future, be managed by highly paid Commissioners. But he had no idea of gift, guarantee or aid from England, and could, therefore, have no idea that the British Government would appoint Commissioners.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is proposed there will be a Commission, whether there is a guarantee or not.

MR. ANGLIN said it was his impression, and this statement made it a conviction, that a Commission would be appointed, at all events; that they should have highly paid Commissioners.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That does not follow.

MR. ANGLIN: But that the Imperial Government would not appoint a Commissioner, because they would not consent to give either guarantee or aid to this great work. One of those things he could not understand was that the Government began by misstating the terms of agreement between Canada and British Columbia. These terms were distinctly and absolutely, without qualification of any kind, that this work should have been commenced within two years of the time of the Union, and built within ten years. It was true that they had passed an Address to Her Majesty, asking her to incorporate those terms into the British North America Act; that other resolutions were moved declaring that the work should be so carried on as not to increase the burden of the people of Canada. But it was also true that the House deliberately refused to adopt a motion made by Mr. Dorion for an Address to the Queen asking Her to incorporate their conditions with the other conditions in Her Proclamation, so that an Address to the Queen contained only those specific absolute conditions, and these only were embraced in Her Majesty's Proclamation, and thus formed part of the Constitution of Canada. The qualifying resolutions had no part in the Proclamation, and ought to have no effect whatever. It was stated then, and had been stated again since, that the gentlemen who then represented British Columbia were satisfied that these terms so solemnly promised by this House, and solemnly promulgated by Royal Proclamation, could not be completely carried out, and were willing that the object should be reached as best we could, if they could only be satisfied of our sincerity. Hon. gentlemen were not authorised to make any such terms. They did not assent to any such terms, and speeches made could not be held to modify the terms of an actual bargain. British Columbia had a right to insist that Canada deliberately pledged herself to commence that road within two years and to complete it within ten years. Yet the Minister of Public Works spoke as if the Act of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) in accepting the Carnarvon terms did increase the liabilities and responsibilities imposed on this country. The Carnarvon treaty gave Canada some nine years more in which to complete two-thirds of the original road. That surely was making the terms much easier for Canada, and yet both the Minister of Customs and the Premier spoke as if, in accepting these terms, the hon. member for Lambton had imposed new liabilities and responsibilities on this country, and that then, for the first time, was Canada bound to a specific period within which the work was to be done. It was hard to believe that these gentlemen made this statement unintentionally. When this proposal to build the road first came before Parliament, he (Mr. Anglin) took the ground that this country was absolutely unable to complete it within ten years. He believed, now, that this country was absolutely unable to build that road in the additional time estimated by the hon. member. He was rather pleased to learn, from the tone in which both hon. gentlemen opposite had spoken on this side of the case, that they were of opinion that the road could not be built in this time, and that it would be unjust to the people of this country to build this road from Lake Superior to the Pacific in the time mentioned in the Carnarvon terms. It would be well that the representatives of British Columbia, here and elsewhere, should quite understand, to-day, what was the deliberate opinion of members on both sides of the House on this part of the question. They had, at all events, the right to complain, hitherto, that the bargain had not been carried out, and the only acceptable defence that they could make, was the fact that it was, as some of them stated some eight years ago, absolutely beyond the means of the people to carry it out. About seven or eight years ago, it would have been easy for us to induce English capitalists to invest their money in works of this kind. It was found impossible, and hon. members blamed the Opposition of the day, particularly the hon. member for Lambton, for the failure of the project entrusted to Sir Hugh Allan. He (Mr. Anglin) believed they should rather blame the sound sense of the capitalists of England, who did not believe that investments in wild railroad schemes were likely to prove profitable. They had to-day the same scheme modified. Instead of having a company, and allowing them 50,000,000 acres of land, these lands were to be manipulated under a new form. He (Mr. Anglin) said, then, that he was satisfied that, if a company could raise capital enough to succeed in partially commencing the work, not only would the $30,000,000 be used up, but additional assistance would be required, and by the time the road would be built the people would be responsible for an amount of money equal to the total cost of the road. The gentleman who was at the head of the company had a very large number of men in this House bound to sanction it, and had the work gone on they would have supported his demands for additional assistance and the country would have been involved in debt. They would have paid the full cost of the railroad, the lands would have passed out of their control, and the company would have owned the road. They were told these lands would furnish money enough to build the road. Could that be the case, the only question would be how so to manage that land as to promote the settlement of the country. The Government were resolved to pursue the policy of their predecessors. They held to this land question. The mere transferring of those lands to the care of Commissioners would not add to the area of these lands a single acre or to their value a single dollar. When they came to a calculation as to how much money was to be raised by the sale of these lands, it would be found that hon. gentlemen opposite were indulging in delusions when they fancied they could, by the proceeds of these lands, pay the cost of the construction of the railway. One of the attacks made by the leader of the Government on the hon. member for Lambton, was on the ground that the latter had denied there were 150,000,000 acres of valuable land in the North-West, although, in fact, the hon. member for Lambton had not spoken of the value of the lands at all. He said it would be necessary, were the scheme of colonisation, faintly shadowed forth in the resolutions, carried out, to give away a very great portion of the lands to the first settlers. How were these lands to pay? The Minister of Public Works informed them on Saturday that the obligations at present on account of that railroad amounted to about $25,000,000. The interest upon the sums of money they were now expending on account of that railroad for some years back had never been charged against the road. The interest and Sinking Fund had hitherto both been met and paid by the people of the various Provinces. Assuming that these $25,000,000 had all been spent within a year or two, they had at once, at five per cent., an interest of one and a quarter million dollars for each year. Supposing that the land could be sold at $2.00 an acre, and leaving out of question the cost of surveying and laying out the lands for settlers, they would have to sell 500,000 acres this year to meet the interest of $1,000,000 on the $25,000,000 already expended. No doubt there was an extraordinary emigration this year, but he questioned whether there would be sufficient settlers to occupy that large quantity of land. Giving 100 acres to each family, it would take 5,000 families to occupy that portion. If they were to meet the wishes of the population, ten or twelve millions a year would scarcely be sufficient to meet the expenditure on that road. The entire cost would at least be $100,000,000. They now began to see how fallacious the original estimates were, that, even after careful explorations, the expenditure was increasing from 50 to 70 per cent. First, 500,000 acres, next, 625,000, then 750,000 must be settled merely to pay the interest. Did anyone imagine that the settlement of that country would progress more rapidly than at that rate? There would not be more than sufficient to pay the interest on the money, and by the time the road would be built a very great portion of those lands would be disposed of. They could not imagine that, by any manipulation of those lands, money could be got to pay one-quarter the cost of the railway. They talked of bringing distressed English operatives into this country. It was rather strange to find that on all these resolutions there was not a word about exporting our own distressed population from our cities where they vainly sought employment, out to the North-West. Perhaps the insertion of anything of that kind would be admitting that the National Policy would prove to be a lamentable failure. What class of people in the Old Country was out of employment? What class would it be desirable for us to induce to come and settle here? There were agricultural labourers in the old country who might be induced to come out here, but he did not believe that many would come, nor did he deem it desirable that a large number of them should come; for, on the whole, the agricultural labourers of Great Britain were an ignorant class, and not those who would be calculated to direct their energies in a proper way. When they came to the operatives, the people employed in manufactures, not many of them could be induced to come out to settle in the North-West. Supposing a large number of those could be got, they still would not have money enough, after paying their passage, to buy agricultural implements and pay $2 per acre besides. Some settlers could be induced to come, but not the very large numbers that hon. gentleman opposite chose to assume. If large numbers were to come out, very many of them would prove to be very undesirable settlers. He had endeavoured to run briefly through some of the objections to the scheme. They were asked to condemn the selection of Burrard Inlet as premature. The hon. the Minister of Public Works took great care to warn them that there were great objections to the selection of other routes, and that, after all, it might be found necessary to choose the Burrard Inlet Route. These resolutions, in the first place, asked the House to condemn the selection of the Burrard Inlet as premature, and then asked for absolute power to select what route they pleased for the construction of 125 miles of railway from the Pacific coast inland, without having previously to consult Parliament. No matter how undesirable the selected route might be believed to be, Parliament would be absolutely powerless to prevent it. That, he took it, was the most important part of the whole series of resolutions. He attached very little importance to what was said regarding public lands. But he presumed the result would be the appointment of a Commission for the management of those lands. He thought that, in a matter of such enormous importance as the selection of this road, the House ought to insist that it should be left to their approval before any work was undertaken upon it. He thought it should not be left in the hands of the Government to choose what route they pleased. He was glad to know that the Government was satisfied that this road could not be completed within the prescribed time, and that they were not disposed to rush madly into debt. The sober second thought of the Minister of Public Works, went much further in the direction of common sense, and afforded a much better security to the people of this country against additional taxation, than was afforded by his rather wild and reckless speeches of the past five years. He was delighted at the change of tone and sentiment of the hon. the Minister of Public Works and that he was inclined to do justice to his predecessor. He could only express the hope that the law would be wisely and patriotically put in force.

MR. MCINNIS said he always felt that the selection of the western terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the route through British Columbia, was not a question for the people of British Columbia, or their representatives in this House, or even for the people of the Dominion of Canada, as a whole, to decide. He looked upon it as a purely scientific question—one that appertained solely to the engineering profession. Such being the case, he proposed to make a few remarks with respect to the twelfth resolution, which asked the House to condemn the course pursued by the late Government, in selecting Burrard Inlet as the terminus of the British Columbia section of the Canadian Pacific Railway—or, rather, to say that it was premature. The hon. the Minister of Public Works, a couple of evenings ago, very properly stated that the Burrard Inlet route possessed some advantages over the Bute Inlet. Among other things he said that the Bute Inlet was fifty-seven miles longer. That was quite true; but the hon. gentleman did not go far enough. He did not tell the House that the most sanguine advocate of the Bute Inlet route never for a moment considered that the road would terminate there, for the very good reason that there was no harbour nor anchorage, consequently it never could become the terminus of a great trans-continental railway. Instead of it remaining there, it would require to be carried down to Frederick Arm, across the Valdez Islands—thence by a ferry of fifteen miles to Vancouver Island, and from there down the eastern side of Vancouver Island to Esquimalt, which was on the southern extremity of the Island. The distance, instead of being fifty-seven miles, would be 304 miles of additional railway to be built, not to speak of the delay and inconvenience incident to the fifteen miles of ferry required in getting to Vancouver Island. Then they had to take into consideration, also, that the gradients in the Bute Inlet route for fifteen continuous miles averaged 110ft. to the mile, whilst on the Burrard route the greatest was only 52ft. to the mile, and that only for six miles. There was another fact in connection with the Bute Inlet, not mentioned before, and that was that no less than eighty miles of tunnelling would be required on it, as compared with one mile a few feet of tunnelling on the Burrard Inlet route. Again, when they looked at the enormous cost to build the road by Bute Inlet, with Esquimalt as its terminus, in excess of the Burrard Inlet route, he thought that every hon. gentleman in the House and the country would have just reason to pause before deciding on the adoption of that route. He wished to impress on the House that he was not giving his own opinions on this important question of routes, involving the necessary expenditure of so many millions of dollars of the public money, or statements founded upon vague rumours, but the result of the engineer's surveys, not merely for one year, but for eight, according to a carefully prepared report, submitted to this House about a year ago—the last report brought down. That report showed that the Bute Inlet route would cost no less than $21,000,000 more than the Burrard Inlet route, and that, too, without conferring the slightest benefit on British Columbia or the Dominion, besides the inconvenience and delay of those fifteen miles of ferry. They were told, on the same authority, on page 60, that the running expenses, the cost of the maintenance of that section of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, would cost, in excess of the Burrard Inlet route, no less than $693,000 per annum. Then, when they took the interest at five per cent. on the value of the money invested—and that, he thought, was a fair estimate—five per cent. on the $21,000,000, besides the $693,000 he had just mentioned, it would amount to something nearly $2,000,000 interest per annum, for all time to come, to be drawn from the Dominion exchequer—saying nothing of the 304 miles extra distance, which would be sufficient to condemn the Bute Inlet route once and for all. With regard to the objection raised by the hon. the Minister of Public Works to the adoption of the Burrard Inlet route, that it was in too close proximity to the United States, and that vessels would have to go within range of the San Juan Island guns, he (Mr. McInnes) would read an extract or two from the Engineer's report of last year:

"In the event of war with the United States a very fair succession of channels from Active Pass, across Swanson Channel through Morsby passages, Sydney and Baynes Channels to the Strait of Fuca, can be had by the erection of a few beacons, and buoying out the channel where intricate and narrow; a vessel then using those channels need not, at any time, approach within five miles of foreign territory, as will be seen in statements by Admiral Cochrane, Captain Graham, and Commander Pender."

He thought the military objection was scarcely worth noticing, for the reason that, so long as Great Britain held the supremacy of the high seas, and could command the Straits of DeFuca, she would, in that way, be able to afford all the protection necessary to the commerce of the country in that region. Besides using the channels he had just mentioned, in the event of such a calamity as war between the United States and Canada, they could go around by the north end of Vancouver Island. In these days of treaties and arbitrations, he could not conceive war with the United States possible—or, if possible, it was certainly very improbable; hence this objection, like all the others, against making Burrard Inlet the terminus, must fall to the ground—fall before undeniable evidence. The hon. the Minister of Public Works also appeared to attach considerable importance to the fact that there was a harbour known by the name of Holmes Harbour, where it was possible and practicable for the United States to tap the Canadian line, and thereby draw our commerce to that harbour, and build up a second San Francisco in the United States instead of British territory. Well, he (Mr. McInnes) apprehended no danger from that. In fact, instead of it being an objection, it ought to be an inducement; because, he thought it ought to be policy of the Government to attract in every possible way the commerce from the neighbouring States, and induce it to pass over Canadian railways. But, assuming the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Tupper's) supposition to be correct, that a second San Francisco would be built on American territory, to the detriment of the Burrard Inlet route if it were adopted, was it not within the sphere and the jurisdiction of this House to say whether they should grant a charter to any foreign company to tap the Canadian line or not? Therefore, that did not present any serious objection when the Government could say, "Thus far you can go, but no further"; therefore, the argument of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, in this respect, must fall to the ground. Besides all he stated about the Burrard Inlet route, he considered the present Government was committed to this route quite as much as the late Government, inasmuch as when the question was brought before the House last spring, not one hon. gentleman on the Treasury Benches to-day, with the exception of the President of the Council, raised his voice against the adoption of Burrard Inlet as the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia. It was true it was not finally settled in this House last year, but the late Premier indicated, in every possible way, that that was the terminus to be adopted. The people of British Columbia had been very unfairly charged with being unreasonable in their demands, with asking for impossibilities. Well, he did not deny the fact that they had in British Columbia some as unreasonable people as were to be found elsewhere in the Dominion or other countries. Yet, he claimed that, when the House took into consideration that one of the principal clauses of the terms of Union with British Columbia was that the railway should be begun simultaneously at both ends of the road, it could not be denied that they had some just grounds for complaint. They had been waiting—anxiously waiting for the last eight years for railway construction, but not one dollar had been expended in actual construction, not one foot of railway constructed. Now, let them see what had been done on the Atlantic end of the Canadian Pacific Railway. They found, according to the statement of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, a few days ago, that the very large sum of $25,000,000 had been expended, or, to be strictly accurate, the credit of the country was pledged to that amount. Now, he asked every hon. gentleman in the House if British Columbia had not great reason to complain? They had heard a great deal within the last few weeks about British Columbia going to secede from Canada. He was happy to say that was not the prevailing sentiment in the Pacific Province. It was quite true there were a number of people in British Columbia who favoured the secession movement unless the railway was begun this year; they were land speculators and merchants, who had invested largely in land at Esquimalt, Victoria, and Bute Inlet, and expected that the choice of that route would raise their lands to a fabulous price, and give them fortunes in a few years at the expense of the Dominion. He denied that the people of British Columbia, as a whole, desired secession. They were true and loyal, not only to Canada but to the Mother Country. A great majority of the people of that Province did not wish, but would rather object to the building of that road in four or five years, as some desired. He believed they would prefer its completion in the inside of the next twenty years. What they wanted, however, was an assurance that it would be built, and meantime placed under actual construction. If it was only a million that was spent yearly, they would be perfectly satisfied, so long as they knew that the Government and people of Canada intended to build the road. But the putting of the work off from year to year, he and the people of British Columbia must and did object to. Were it not the intention of the Government to build the road, it would be their bounden duty to say so, which avowal would give more satisfaction than the keeping of the people in suspense, as during the last four or five years. The hon. member for Lambton had remarked that the surveys were never completed. That was true. He believed that they would not have been completed, and that Burrard Inlet would not have been selected last year as the western terminus had it not been for the influence of Lord Dufferin, who visited that Province in 1876, and went to Bute Inlet, and up the Fraser Valley some 250 miles. He also saw that Burrard Inlet had everything claimed for it as a harbour; that there was no harbour at Bute Inlet, and that it was quite possible to carry a railroad through the canyons of the Fraser; and he (Mr. McInnes) was a member of the deputation that requested of His Lordship a survey of Burrard Inlet before Bute Inlet was selected. They had complained that the Burrard Inlet route had not been equally well surveyed with the

Bute Inlet, and observed that, if it was not in the interest of British Columbia to adopt the Burrard Inlet route, they would have nothing further to say, but would adopt the decision of the engineers. The noble Earl stated that it was a very reasonable request, and he would bring it before the notice of his Ministers at the earliest possible moment. He was only forty-eight hours at the most returned to Ottawa when the engineers, then on their way from the Interior to Victoria, were telegraphed to, to make a preliminary survey of the canyons of the Fraser. It was made, and it met the most sanguine expectations of every one in favour of that route. The consequence was that all the surveying parties were placed on the Burrard Inlet route in 1877, with the result as brought down by the report of last year, showing that the route was perfectly practicable, despite the prejudiced reports of Marcus Smith to the contrary. He had used all his influence to get the Bute Inlet route selected, upon which $2,500,000 was spent in surveys which showed it impracticable. He (Mr. McInnes) was told on good authority, that Mr. Marcus Smith said he would rather take the road to—well, to a hotter country than any to be found in the Torrid Zone. The Burrard Inlet route was found to have grades much easier; it was 304 miles shorter, and would cost twenty-one millions less, besides $693,000 per annum less for working expenses, while terminating at a harbour which was second to none on the Pacific coast. A Custom-house officer at Burrard Inlet had made up a statement showing that in the last three years 163 foreign ships had entered that port, with an aggregate tonnage of 102,269 tons. Over one-sixth of them entered and cast anchor without the assistance of tug or pilot, the only two that sustained any damage receiving it, not in the inland waters of British Columbia, not in the Gulf of Georgia, but at the mouth of Esquimalt Harbour and the Pacific Ocean. Another reason why Burrard Inlet would be much more suitable for a terminus than Esquimalt was that it had over 25 times the amount of anchorage that Esquimalt possessed. Before a Special Committee of the Senate, three weeks ago, one of the ablest engineers who had served in British Columbia during the last five or six years stated on oath that he thought Burrard Inlet should be selected for the terminus of the Canada Pacific Railway, and considered it equivalent to Liverpool, New York, or San Francisco. In view of all the facts, therefore, he (Mr. McInnes) refused to believe that the present, or any Government, entrusted with the welfare of this country, would be guilty of such an irreparable blunder, such an injustice to the already too heavily taxed citizens of the Dominion, as to adopt the Bute Inlet route in preference to the Burrard Inlet. It would not only be an injustice but a gross outrage on the people of this country—an outrage on the rising generation and posterity. He was fully prepared to give all the resolutions but the 11th and 12th, his unqualified support. He believed they would give general satisfaction to the country, being of a practical nature.

MR. TUPPER said that, as no one appeared desirous of saying anything more on the resolutions, he would briefly reply to some of the criticisms and remarks which they had elicited. He had endeavoured, in introducing the resolutions, to avoid opening up any debateable ground between the two parties that did not necessarily come under the consideration of the very important questions involved. He regretted very much that hon. gentlemen opposite should not have felt it their duty to confine themselves to the discussion of the questions naturally and necessarily raised by the resolutions themselves. He would not follow their bad example on the present occasion. He did intend to discuss what was familiarly known as the Canadian Pacific Railway Scandal, and he did not think that hon. gentlemen opposite had any reason to suppose its revival would benefit either themselves or the country. It was quite true that hon. gentlemen opposite had snatched a hasty verdict from the country, by using that question as a means of exciting the public mind. But, they ought not to forget that, after five years' of continuous discussion of the question in and out of Parliament, after the whole matter had been deliberately submitted to the people, its verdict had been of the most unmistakable character, against the views and conduct of the hon. gentlemen opposite. That verdict ought, forever, to set the question at rest. He would think that the hon. gentlemen opposite would hardly be prepared to utter so great a slander against the people of this country, as to assume or declare that any gentleman with the slightest taint upon his personal honour could receive the deliberate support as Premier of the vast majority of the people of Canada. It was obvious that they had utterly failed in convincing the public mind of the soundness of their views on this question, and they saw the party charged with one of the greatest political crimes, the sale of a great public charter for personal or party interest, considered by the people more worthy of their trust than the men to whom they had recently given five years of trial. He did not intend to say more on this subject, which he regretted had been introduced. He had made what he hoped would be a successful appeal to the patriotism of the hon. gentlemen opposite. He believed they had party issues enough on which they could legitimately divide, without dragging down into the arena of party strife a great question that the public interest demanded should be raised above it; and he did hope that, in the further consideration of the question here and elsewhere, hon. gentlemen opposite would feel that they owed it to their country, even at the sacrifice of party interest, to give all the aid and co-operation that he (Mr. Tupper) solicited at their hands to the Government engaged in dealing with this great question. He intended briefly to examine some of the objections of hon. gentleman opposite to the resolutions. The language of the leader of the Opposition, and of the late Ministers of Finance and of the Interior, would lead to the supposition that in those resolutions the House and country was asked to commit itself to some new and onerous obligation. He (Mr. Tupper) denied it. On the points raised by those hon. gentleman, Parliament had already committed itself to everything asked in the resolutions. Those hon. gentlemen stood as fully committed as gentlemen on his side to everything asked in the resolutions. Exception had been taken to the demand to appropriate 160,000,000 acres for the purpose of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway. On the Journals of Parliament of seven years ago would, however, be found a declaration that they would give to a company that would construct that work 50,000,000 acres, and, in alternate blocks, an equal quantity, or 100,000,000 acres in all, should be reserved for the purpose of covering the expenditure in connection with the construction of this work. Therefore, as far as the amount of land claimed, as far as the authority asked for in relation to this appropriation of lands, it was put, seven years ago, upon the Journals of Parliament, and had never been withdrawn. The hon. leader of the Opposition objected to the sale of these lands at $2 an acre, for the purpose of covering the cost of the construction of this work. Why, the hon. gentleman would find, in the law which he himself placed on the Statute-book, a declaration that, of the 20,000 acres of land per mile to be appropriated, one-third was to be given to the contractors, and the other two-thirds were to be reserved in the hands of the Government, for the purpose of paying the contractors for the work. There was no change of policy in relation to it; it was a change in terms, apparently, but only such a change as, while not involving any additional expenditure, would provide the means for the liquidation of the amount necessary for the construction of this great work. The hon. member for Bothwell reminded the House the other night that all these engagements had been subjected to the proviso that no increase of taxation should be involved, that all these expenditures in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway should be limited by the declaration put forward in the outset, and always maintained, that it should not add to the taxation of the country. He wished to deal especially with the remarks of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who were committed by everything that could commit public men, to give a united support to every line of these resolutions. The late Minister of the Interior should remember that, while it was declared in the first instance that the whole scheme should be limited by our ability to obtain a company who, for thirty millions of money and fifty million acres of land, would, at their own risk, supply all the capital that was required to complete this work and operate it afterwards, the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite entirely changed and extended that responsibility. They admitted that they had made a binding contract with the Imperial Government and with the Government of British Columbia, not limited by any such clause or consideration.

AN HON. MEMBER: No.

MR. TUPPER said that, on the floor of this Parliament, he had so thoroughly established the point that the late Government made no such limit, but had imposed a binding obligation on the Government of Canada to complete, by 1890, two thousand miles of railway as a Government work; he had made that so clear and palpable that a member of that Administration drew up a new resolution, and placed it in the hands of a gentleman opposite, renewing the former declaration, that it must not involve additional taxation. He was not blaming hon. gentlemen, but he was showing that they were much mistaken if they supposed that, after the light that had been thrown on this question, they could to-day relieve themselves of the responsibility that they incurred when they bound the Government to complete this work in eleven years from to-day, comme que cotee, from the waters of Lake Superior to British Columbia, and without any reservation or qualification whatever. They stood committed to having adopted and imposed on Canada an obligation vastly greater in extent than anything that had been attempted or contemplated by their predecessors. But he did not blame the hon. gentlemen; he believed they did this under a sense of the responsibility imposed on them when they came into power, and, that looking upon this question from a statesmanlike point of view, they felt that they could not turn back, and that, good faith having been pledged to British Columbia to complete this road as rapidly as possible, they believed they were consulting the best interests of the country when they assumed that binding and onerous obligation. Having done so, it was not possible for these hon. gentlemen to escape from their liability, or to raise a question to-day as to their own obligation, nor could they refuse their co-operation to any Government in redeeming the promises to which they bound themselves both to the Imperial Government and the Government of British Columbia. But that was not all. He wanted the leader of the Opposition, who seemed to be hesitating about allowing this Government to put 125 miles of this route under contract without previous submission to Parliament—

MR. MACKENZIE: I never said so; I said I would be prepared to consider any resolution giving authority to place 125 miles under contract if I knew where the place was.

MR. TUPPER said he understood the hon. gentleman to go a great deal further, and to be committed to the same principle as the hon. member for Bothwell; he understood the hon. gentleman to take exception to the principle of the adoption of the policy that these resolutions propounded, that of beginning the construction of this work within the Province of British Columbia, and committing the people of this country to prosecuting it steadily. One of the great objections to this proposal on the part of the hon. gentleman was that it would commit Parliament to the expenditure of $10,000,000 for the construction of these 125 miles. The hon. gentleman said that he had sent Mr. Fleming to England, and obtained the able assistance of Sir John Rose, and those gentlemen united exhausted their efforts in endeavouring to influence British capitalists to come forward and construct this road. He gave the hon. gentleman credit for it; he believed he (Mr. Mackenzie) was doing his duty to Canada, and that he never did it in a more satisfactory, a more laudable manner, than when he was endeavouring, through the best agencies he could command, to secure the accomplishment of that work. But, when those hon. gentlemen told him that they could not obtain any encouragement from British capitalists—he (Mr. Tupper) would not now discuss the reasons that led to that position—what did the hon. gentleman do? Did he abandon the line? Did he shrink from the responsibility? No; but he put in the newspapers all over this country advertisements, asking for tenders for 125 miles of road from Yale to Kamloops, to be closed on the 31st of December last, so that, at this moment, if there had not been a change of Government, the hon. gentleman would either be in the position of having trifled with the people of Canada and of British Columbia, or he was bound in honour to have let 125 miles of road before Parliament met, and that it was not let at this moment he (Mr. Tupper) believed was due to a change of Government. How, then, could those hon. gentlemen raise the question of responsibility attaching to them, to say they were not prepared to endorse the onerous obligations proposed in the resolutions? They were proposing no onerous obligations, but a means by which the obligations first assumed by themselves, and subsequently adopted with a much greater degree of force by the hon. gentleman opposite, should be rendered lighter, and the means provided at the same time to keep faith with British Columbia and with the Imperial Government, who also were made parties to this compact by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and at the same time do it without imposing any such financial disasters on the country as must ensue, unless means something like these were provided for utilising the magnificent territory that was to be opened up, and making it bear the expenditure that would otherwise be borne by the people of the older Provinces. He trusted he had shown the hon. gentlemen opposite that they were mistaken in supposing that any new obligation was proposed; he trusted he had satisfied them that the Government were limiting the obligation and lightening the burden instead of increasing it, and that the policy proposed ought to commend itself to the confidence, to the support of every member of this House. The hon. gentlemen opposite were bound by every principle of statesmanlike conduct, and every principle of honour, to give it a hearty support. But the hon. gentleman said it was a very serious thing to adopt the location of a line without the consent of Parliament, or without asking the consent of Parliament.

MR. MACKENZIE: I never said so; I said it was a serious thing to ask Parliament to give a large amount of money for the purpose of building a line not stated to Parliament.

MR. TUPPER said the burden of the hon. member for Gloucester's (Mr. Anglin's) speech was that they were going to adopt a line without the consent of Parliament. He (Mr. Tupper) held in his hand a description of a line adopted by the hon. gentlemen opposite, on the recommendation of the hon. member for Lambton, and without the consent of Parliament ever being dreamed of. Last Session this subject was discussed in Parliament, and he then asked the hon. gentleman if he proposed to submit his adoption of a route to Parliament, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) not only answered no, but, after Parliament had risen, he recommended to Council, on the 11th July, 1878, the adoption of the 500 miles not already located, from Tête Jaune Cache to the Pacific. Previously, he had located the line from Thunder Bay to the Rocky Mountains, without the consent of Parliament or without consulting Parliament. In that Order in Council locating some 1,500 miles of Canadian Pacific Railway, the hon. gentleman declared over his own signature that there were but two points to choose between, one Bute Inlet, and the other Dean Channel. What produced this change in favour of Burrard Inlet,—that line which the hon. gentleman had previously condemned?

MR. MACKENZIE: I condemned nothing.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman, after locating the Canadian Pacific Railway Telegraph by the Burrard Inlet route, cancelled the contract, and ordered the contractor to stop the work, and subsequently recommended that either Bute Inlet or Dean Channel should be the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and adopted, in fact, the location of the line to Fort George, which was far beyond any point that would go to Burrard Inlet. He did not blame the hon. gentleman for having reconsidered that question, but he was showing that it was not so easy of solution as the hon. gentleman from New Westminster (Mr. McInnes) would lead them to suppose, since, after the most careful consideration that his hon. predecessor could give this subject for three years, he had decided that the Fraser River route to Burrard Inlet was not practicable. Therefore, he believed the hon. gentleman did what he believed to be right, when in his judgment he supposed he had been mistaken, and was prepared to retrace his steps, and to reconsider that question. He would draw the attention of the hon. member for Gloucester to the fact that here was a Government receiving his hearty support, who had been guilty of the great enormity of locating a line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, without reference to Parliament. The hon. the leader of the Opposition limited his objection to letting the contract on a line that was not specified. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would be surprised to be told that there was no law on the Statute-book of Canada that required any contract on the Canadian Pacific Railway, made by the Government as a Government work, to be submitted to Parliament at all. Certain gentlemen of the Opposition claimed that, whereas the Government of his right hon. friend were prepared to let the Canadian Pacific Railway, without submitting the contracts to Parliament, their successors had changed all that, and had decided that every contract must first have the approval of Parliament before a single blow was struck. He was surprised, when he came to look at the law, at the discovery that there was no such law, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874 was divided into two parts; one part dealt with the proposed construction of the railway, or sections of it, by a company, aided by a grant of lands or money; and, having provided all the machinery for constructing it in that way, there was a clause declaring that all contracts must be submitted to Parliament; but then it went on to provide another way if, in the wisdom of the Government, it was thought better that it should be done directly by the action of the Government, and, strange to say, no such clause requiring the submission of contracts to the Government in that event could be found. He sent this law to the Deputy Minister of Justice, in whose legal acumen hon. gentlemen opposite had the same confidence as himself, and that gentleman stated that there was no law on the Statute-book requiring the submission to Parliament of any contract made by the Government for the construction of any portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway as a Government work. So far from taking advantage of this Statute, he was going beyond it, and endorsing the sound principle that where it was possible it was desirable that all these contracts should be submitted to Parliament. He would tell the hon. gentleman that of all the most important contracts that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had made in connection with the Pacific Railway, now covering an expenditure when completed of over $28,000,000, he had scarcely submitted a contract to Parliament for its approval. He was not blaming him, he believed that, in asking power from the House from time to time to override what was supposed to be the law, the hon. gentleman believed he was doing what was in the public interest. No person gave him a more hearty support in this direction than he (Mr. Tupper) did, because he believed that it would facilitate the work. Therefore, he was asking nothing from the hon. gentleman which the hon. gentleman had not asked and obtained from the House when he and his friends were sitting on the Government benches. When the Government asked power to let a section, they did not engage to let the whole 125 miles, but they had adopted the policy the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had assumed in the advertisements asking for tenders for contracts which were to be closed on the 31st of December last. He did not believe that, if the Bute Inlet route was adopted, it would be possible to submit 125 miles of that route to contract, but he would say to the hon. gentleman that sixty-two miles from Waddington Harbour through Cascade Range was in a better condition, and was far more accurately surveyed, to be submitted to the contractors than the large sections of difficult contracts that the hon. gentleman took power from the House to let without the previous sanction of Parliament. So much for the engagement the Government were now asking the House to assume, and he now came to the criticism offered by the late Minister of Finance, as to the mode they would take to carry out this policy. He was asked whether he proposed to submit an Act. He (Mr. Tupper) replied no. Of course they could not carry out the resolutions without an Act, but they were tentative to an Act. The Government proposed to invite the attention of the Imperial Government to the matter, and to endeavour to obtain assistance from them in accomplishing this work. If the Imperial Government gave the required aid, of course it would be necessary to come to Parliament to authorise the appointment of Commissioners, and to define by law the mode by which the scheme was to be carried out. But that legislature would be premature until they had first, under these resolutions, made those efforts which they hoped would be successful to obtain aid and co-operation from the Imperial Government. The ex-Minister of Finance had accused the Government, at different times, of having introduced a tariff hostile to British interests, and in favour of the United States, and had stated that, therefore, they could not expect to obtain aid in England.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I did not say it was in the interest of the States. I said it was hostile to all interests.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman, at all events, had said that the reason the Government would not go to England was because they had adopted a tariff prejudicial to British interests, that the time was inopportune. The hon. the leader of the Opposition had also taken that ground in the most emphatic terms. He stated that the tariff was in favour of American and against British interests. He held a different view. One of the reasons which led the Government to consider the necessity of re-adjusting the tariff was, that all the trade of Canada was flowing in the direction of the United States instead of the Mother Country. He (Mr. Tupper) maintained that the present time was opportune. This Government could go to the Imperial Government with the confidence of receiving their support in their application. This Government could do that which their predecessors would not have been warranted in doing. They would be in a position to say that they felt it their duty, when they found the expenditure of the country exceeding the resources, to come down with a tariff that would give such a revenue as would cover the expenditure. That was not likely to hurt us in the estimation of the English capitalists or Government, when they would be called on to endorse the bonds of Canada, for we had not only given them the assurance that all the credit they had given us had been fully redeemed, but that the Government, in order to show to the world that the credit of the country always should remain unimpaired, had brought down a tariff which would create a revenue ample to meet all expenditure. He had endeavoured to show hon. gentlemen opposite that there was no increase of obligation, no demand for power such as had not been given by Parliament to our predecessors, and that the Government was warranted in the effort they were making. He had been asked by the Opposition how it was that he had portrayed a paradise in the North-West, when in discussing the tariff he pointed to the want of prosperity in Canada itself. He (Mr. Tupper) would not have ventured to propound such a policy if the Government had not dealt with the one grievance before they brought in a measure in relation to the other question. The first effort of the Government was to provide the means by which Canada was to return, as she would at a very early day, to a condition of things in which the great demand would be not for labour but for labourers. That was the cardinal point of their policy. The Government, by these resolutions, provided for the demand for a vast body of unemployed men in addition to all our own country supplied.

MR. MILLS: What class?

MR. TUPPER said that 10,000 of the best men in Canada were at this moment pouring into the North-West to create a great fertile and prosperous country, and a demand would shortly be felt here for every class of labour that could be brought into this country. He had stated that the Government had proposed no additional obligation, that in those resolutions were propounded the means by which those* obligations now before us could be met. There was no Canadian with a spark of patriotism within his heart who could look at this great Canada of ours, and could dwell for a single moment upon the fact that here in Canada, washed by the two great oceans, was a country below the arctic circle as great as Europe, if they took the small countries of Spain and Italy out of it. We not only had this magnificent country, but we had it endowed by nature with all those natural features which were necessary to make a country great and prosperous. We had within our country over 200,000,000 acres of the most fertile land in the world, inhabited by a people who, though only numbering 4,000,000 now, were as industrious, as intelligent and as enterprising a population as could be found on the face of the globe. Under these circumstances, what Canadian statesman was there, with the responsibility of developing this magnificent country thrown upon his hands, who would not be a traitor to the best interests of his country if he did not put forward every effort to construct a great national highway that was to be a bond of union from one end of this magnificent country to the other? They ought not to appeal in vain to the hon. gentlemen opposite. Instead of raising an old exploded cry, instead of raising a single feeling that was calculated to damage their efforts, it was their duty, it was the duty of every patriotic Canadian to unite on this grand question; and, fight as they might upon questions of personal or party politics, on this great question of a great national highway for Canada, to which all parties in this country had been committed in the most solemn manner, they should all unite in one steady continued patriotic effort to bring to consummation a scheme on which the undoubted prosperity and rapid progress of the whole country depended.

House resolved itself into Committee on the Whole on the Resolutions.

(In the Committee.)

On Resolution 7,

MR. HOLTON said he would be obliged to the hon. the Minister of Public Works for definite information as to where the 100,000,000 acres of fertile land in the North-West, of which he had spoken, were situated.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. TUPPER said it was not contemplated that it should all be found near the railway; though, provided the lands within twenty miles on either side of the line of railway were all good, there would be no difficulty in getting the 100,000,000 acres.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Between what points?

MR. TUPPER said from one end of the line to the other; from the terminus at Nipissing to the Pacific Ocean. They might not be able—though that was not at all certain—to get on all parts of the line land 20 miles in breadth for farming purposes; but there was no doubt it could be obtained in the neighbourhood of the line. The report of Professor Macoun, who had given special attention to this subject, warranted the conclusion that that country may be fairly estimated to possess 180,000,000 acres of arable land. On Vancouver Island, on the table lands of British Columbia, and on Queen Charlotte Island, there was a very large amount of such lands.

MR. TROW said he had travelled very much in the North-West. The fertile lands were not continuous, and it was his impression that these 100,000,000 would absorb all the fertile lands in that quarter. Too much land was already locked up, and, in case these lands were held at $2 an acre, this fact would discourage immigration into the North-West, while the United States would hold out to settlers superior advantages.

MR. TUPPER said that he was astonished at the hon. gentleman's remarks. While supporting the late Government, the hon. gentleman had extolled the boundless resources of the North-West, and had voted for a grant of 50,000,000 acres for this purpose. He ascribed the hon. gentleman's changed tone to his change of position in the House.

MR. TROW said that he had opposed the late Government's policy with regard to the route. He believed that there were homes for millions in the North-West, but he did not believe in locking up the lands available for free settlement.

MR. DECOSMOS said that, at the time Lord Dufferin travelled to British Columbia in 1876, the Globe stated that the distance between Kaministiquia and Bute Inlet was 2,000 miles. Taking that to be the distance, and the width of the reservation being forty miles, twenty miles on each side of the line, it would give 51,200,000 acres of land. He did not suppose that it would be found to be all good land, but what could not be obtained along the line could, no doubt, be obtained elsewhere, and provision had been made in the resolutions for that. He had not the slightest hesitation in saying that the 100,000,000 referred to could be obtained. The Central Pacific Railway Company received a certain acreage per mile, for which they were allowed to charge $2.50. But according to a recent return to Congress they sold the land at $7.50 per acre, $5.50 above the price for which the Government proposed to sell the land along the Canadian line.

MR. DAWSON said that there was much more arable land in the North-West than was imagined. Much land that was set down as valueless, was, in reality, available for agricultural purposes.

MR. MILLS said, with reference to the quantity of land to be reserved on each side of the railway, in his opinion, the Government would be wasting the public resources in dedicating land in aid of the railway at any distance from it. The hon. gentleman knew he could not count on available lands except between the Red River and the Rocky Mountains. He would find, no doubt, wherever he went, a considerable portion of waste lands. But, on the line of the railway, it was doubtful if he would find more than thirty or forty million acres of good land within any reasonable distance of it. They would be made capable of settlement, and desirable only by the construction of a railway. If they selected lands at any point in the North-West, more than a few miles away from the road, they would, unless independent lines or branch railways were run to them, not be available. They could not find any fertile tract fifty miles wide on each side, and 1,500 miles long, such as was required to make up the 100,000,000 acres; and much of the land could have no value till reached or opened up by railroads. Then, just in proportion as they locked up those lands, or dedicated them to the construction of this road, would they interfere with the colonisation of the North-West. The Government could have had a road constructed without the contribution of a single dollar from the Public Treasury. He knew that from the proposition made to the late Government last year. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) said he was going to obtain immigration from Great Britain. His colleague, however, said they wanted none but agricultural immigrants, and intended discouraging all others. The Minister of Public Works had spoken about everybody being favourable to those terms for the construction of the Pacific Railway. Now he (Mr. Mills) and a great many others had never approved of them. He proposed to take North-West lands, no matter how far from the road, though 300 miles away, and dedicate them to the construction of a railway that would give them no value; he would simply sacrifice them to its construction. The hon. gentleman had taken this matter out of the hands of his colleagues, having proposed to place the lands in the hands of a Commission. Why? Because capitalists and others would not trust the Government. The conduct of the hon. gentleman showed he believed that the people of England would not advance money upon those lands as security, if allowed to remain in charge of the Administration—a very extraordinary compliment for those hon. gentlemen to pay themselves.

MR. MACDOUGALL said he thought it was hardly worth while at this late stage of the Session to discuss at much length the question of the obligations of Canada towards British Columbia. There was a difference of opinion in this House on the subject. He had never, however, been persuaded that Canada was under any obligation to ruin itself for the sake of carrying out a particular construction of the terms of Union between British Columbia and Canada. He did not think that the fair meaning of those terms involved such consequences. It was not so construed or understood at the time the Union was effected. He took it, that a very large number in the House and country desired to see a railway constructed from Thunder Bay to the Rocky Mountains as speedily as possible, for the purpose of opening up and settling that great and fertile country west of the Red River. Whether they could, after reaching that point, acquire the means or establish a credit that would enable them to borrow money enough to cross the Rocky Mountains and reach the Pacific Ocean in British Columbia, was a question which, perhaps, their success would have to determine. This Parliament should do what it could in the meantime to bridge the great space that intervened between us and the boundary of British Columbia. With regard to the resolutions themselves, he had some doubt as to whether they ought to lock up all the cultivable lands in the fertile belt, for he presumed, after taking 100,000,000 acres for the railway there would be little left to attract free grant settlers. Even if they adopted the florid views that prevailed in some quarters as to the extent of the arable land of that region, he doubted whether any one could figure out of the country now unoccupied between Red River and the Rocky Mountains, 100,000,000 acres of good land within reach of a railway. He thought they must penetrate the Peace River country to make up that quantity. In that case, if recent reports could be relied upon, it might be possible to find it. But what he objected to in the resolutions was the absolute, unconditional form of expression. If they were to be binding in future—and, judging from past experience in dealing with British Columbia, they had need to act cautiously, lest their successors should be charged with a breach of faith—they ought not to fix so arbitrarily the price of the lands. If they were to appropriate 100,000,000 acres for the Pacific Railway, with a condition that it was not to be sold at less than $2 an acre, how did the Government expect to induce poor settlers from the old country to go there? They would certainly not be able to persuade settlers from eastern Canada to go to the North-West, and pay

$2 an acre, when they could secure homesteads in a more southern latitude, with, perhaps, as good land for nothing. They would be compelled to wait till the free homesteads and good lands of the Western States were all taken up, before they could persuade people to pass them by and purchase lands from the Canadian Government at $2 an acre. He (Mr. Macdougall) saw, therefore, great difficulty ahead. The wave of settlement now setting towards our country would, he feared, be stayed if these resolutions were passed. He assumed that no more free grants could be made within any reasonable distance of the line of railway. There would be an inconsistency in it, and if Parliament was to be pledged so that hereafter, upon further information and more experience as to the difficulties of settlement, and the circumstances which determined its course, they were not at liberty to change their policy, he was afraid they were moving too fast. They had the fact admitted in these resolutions that the reservation of land along the line of railway had deflected settlement away from the forty miles reservation, and this was given as a reason for changing the line so as to accommodate the settlers, and the same thing must happen again. There were few settlers, if any, north of the present line, and he apprehended that there was no land unoccupied and fit for settlement east of Lake Manitoba that could be made available under these resolutions. He only desired to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Public Works to the probable effect of his policy. He did not think it was wise to pass resolutions in so absolute a form, if the object were really to facilitate settlement. It was proposed to lock up this enormous quantity of land until they could sell it at $2 an acre, in order to raise money for building the Pacific Railway. But would they be able to sell the land for $2 an acre? Could they induce settlers to pay that price? Would the immigrants they were likely to get have the means, after buying horses, cattle and implements, and building houses and barns, to pay the Government this $2 an acre? He was afraid that it would prove a great hindrance to rapid settlement, while he agreed, on the other hand, that it was unfair to ask the people of the old Provinces of Canada to tax themselves, and to lay burdens upon their children for the purpose of building a railway through a new but naturally rich country, for the benefit of strangers, immigrants not yet on this side of the Atlantic. He thought they ought to make the country itself pay for the road. It was rich enough. It was large enough. It was able, out of its own resources, to furnish the means for constructing one railway, at all events, from end to end of it. Any scheme which would accomplish that object, he, as a representative of an Ontario constituency, was ready to give his assent to. The objection he now made was that there appeared to be in these resolutions an absolute, unconditional reservation of—as he and many people believed—all the good land within reach of the railway at the minimum price of $2 an acre. If so, they could no longer grant lands to settlers as homesteads. That would deter people from coming into the country and turn them aside into the United States, and so they would be killing the goose that laid the golden egg. He feared that would be the result unless some means could be found to reserve land fit for settlement within a reasonable distance of the proposed line of railway for those persons who would go into the country as settlers, but who would not be able to settle on lands and pay $2 an acre for it. He presumed, the Government, in carrying out this scheme, if they did not exact the money down, would exact interest from the day of sale, otherwise the scheme would not be a success financially. Indeed, the scheme as a whole involved a fallacy. They owned this land already, and did not increase the area of their estate by passing these resolutions. They could not convince a farmer that he would make a good financial operation, if, when he wanted to build a barn, he should set apart for that purpose the produce of a certain field, and appropriate that particular money for the construction of the barn. He did not think they could lift themselves over the fence by pulling at their boot straps, nor that they would be any richer in the eyes of capitalists after the adoption of this scheme than before. They owed it to their constituents to see that, in the development of that new country, it produced the means to pay for the national improvements they were constructing there; but they must remember that they could not have their cake and eat it at the same time.

MR. DECOSMOS said he could not allow the utterance of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) to pass unchallenged, namely, that the Dominion had not made a deliberate and solemn engagement with the Government and the people of British Columbia. When the hon. gentleman dared to influence the members of this House with such utterances, he (Mr. DeCosmos) would tell him that he was advocating that Punic faith that had carried one nationality down to eternal obloquy. This country could never be built up by violated pledges, but the utterances of his hon. friend ran in that direction. If we, as Canadians, could not carry out our obligations, let us take the honourable and manly course of saying to the people of British Columbia that we could not do this thing, and then, if the people of British Columbia wished to leave the Confederation, let them have the opportunity of doing so. But as long as hon. gentlemen here stated that the obligations of this Government toward British Columbia need not be carried out—

MR. MACDOUGALL: I said nothing of the kind; no member of this House will go further, or urge more earnestly the fulfilment of all honest obligations that Canada has made with British Columbia, but I interpret them in my sense, and not in the hon. gentleman's sense.

Resolution agreed to.

On Resolution 14,

MR. MACDOUGALL said a difficulty seemed here to present itself. It was proposed to send further exploring parties to the Pine River Pass. From past experience, he thought it was perfectly clear it would occupy the whole of this season to send explorers from Ottawa now. They would not be able to make much of an exploration and send in their reports before the season would have expired. But in this resolution it was stated to be the intention to commence the work of construction this season;

how then were they to benefit by the result of the explorations? How were they to determine the propriety of any particular line in British Columbia unless they had more information than they had now?

MR. TUPPER said he admitted it would be desirable not to be so much hurried, but a great pressure existed for the commencement of the work of construction in order to meet the long deferred hope of the people of British Columbia. They wanted to obtain further information, and, at the same time, satisfy the people of British Columbia that the construction of the road would not be unnecessarily delayed. There were now 125 miles ready for the contractors on the Burrard Inlet route, and 60 miles on which the line had been located by the Bute Inlet route from Waddington Harbour, westwardly. They expected to have a hurried but sufficient exploration, not a survey, to settle the question as to the character of the country in the region of the Pine River Pass, and to see how far they might reasonably hope they could, by the Bute Inlet route, bring a large tract of country available for settlement nearer to the Pacific.

MR. MACDOUGALL said he understood, then, the hon. gentleman to say that he expected, by this hasty exploration, to get sufficient information to justify him in deciding either upon the Burrard Inlet or Bute Inlet route, because, of course, he must decide that before beginning the work of construction, or was there only a small portion of the country that required to be examined by the engineers in order to determine the question of routes?

MR. TUPPER said, yes, and he thought it could be accomplished in time to offer it to the contractors. The work could be proceeded with in winter as well as summer. As soon as the exploration was made, the Government would be able, finally, to settle upon the line that would be best in the interests of the country.

MR. MILLS asked if the hon. gentleman meant if it should be found that the Pine River Pass, or the Peace River Pass, was not as favourable as the route already selected by the engineers, that then the Burrard Inlet route would be adhered to. He would like to know whether there had been such an exploration of the country between the Riding Mountains and the Rocky Mountains in the Peace River district, or at the Peace River Pass, as would enable the Government to know what might be the engineering difficulties on the line to the Rocky Mountains?

MR. TUPPER said that, unless the exploration which it was intended to make should reveal the fact of there being a large tract of valuable country fit for settlement, through which the railway could be brought, nearer to the Pacific than by the other line, the Government would not be warranted in changing the location that had been made. A rapid exploration would settle this question.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had already called the attention of this House to the fact that there had been a hurried exploration already. Mr. Horetzky had examined the Peace River in 1874. Mr. Hunter, one of their best engineers, crossed the Rocky Mountains by the Pine River Pass, in 1877, and the result of his exploration was before the House.

MR. TUPPER: That was too hurried.

MR. MACKENZIE said that if engineers were to be sent from Ottawa on the 1st of May, to travel a thousand miles to the Pine River Pass, and spend all the summer there, they would not be able to accomplish more than was done in 1877. Hunter was near the base of his operations; he had only to proceed from the neighbourhood of Fort George, and within a few days reached the scenes of his year's operation, and even then he was only able to accomplish a rapid survey. His report was not a favourable one. He reported it was possible to get a line through, but that in one place, five miles in length, there would have been a gradient of 60ft. to the mile, which was greater than any on the Burrard Inlet route. The Peace River Pass had been explored not merely by Mr. Horetzky, but by Alexander Mackenzie, Professor Selwyn, and a number of others who had examined it so thoroughly that it was known nearly as well as the Jasper House Pass.

MR. RYMAL said it was evident, from the nature of the discussion, that they were not ready to commence the construction of this road. He had always looked upon this scheme as one calculated to outweigh the capacity of Canada. He did not believe there were 100,000,000 acres of fertile land in the North-West, and he feared that the price of $2 per acre placed upon the land there would turn the tide of emigration to the United States. He would advise the hon. the Minister of Public Works not to act hastily in this matter, to consider carefully before assuming this great responsibility which would, sooner or later, bring tribulation on Canada.

MR. DECOSMOS said that the hon. member's statement, with reference to gradients in Pine River Pass, was not correct, and read Mr. Hunter's report, Sessional Paper No. 20, 1878, to prove that the gradients were not as high as the hon. the Minister of Public Works represented them to be.

MR. DAWSON said that the railroad would open up a far greater extent of country than that immediately bordering on the line. It would cross great rivers having hundreds of miles of navigation on either side of it, and when it reached Peace River it would connect with more than a thousand miles of navigation, broken by only one little fall. But he would suggest to the Government that great care should be observed in the selection of engineers to examine the Pine River region. They should be without prejudices in favour of any other route. A great mistake had been made in the country between Lake Superior and Manitoba, a mistake which would involve, and was involving, the waste of millions. Such mistakes should be avoided in the future, and the best way to guard against them was to re-organise the engineering staff. It should be remodelled and a Board of Engineers formed, a Board which should see that the surveys and explorations were made economically and organised with a somewhat greater degree of intelligence than that which had hitherto marked their management.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Resolutions reported, and read the first and second times.

MR. TUPPER moved concurrence in Resolution 1.

MR. MACKENZIE said it would not be at all surprising if he should refer for a few minutes to what took place last Saturday. He considered that in that debate he had confined himself very strictly to the subject before the House. His criticisms might have been light or heavy in the estimation of hon. gentlemen opposite, but, at all events, they were fair criticisms called for by the necessity and the nature of the subject under discussion. The remarks of the Minister of Public Works were not such as he (Mr. Mackenzie) had a right to complain of, but, on the other hand, they traversed, to a great extent, the position which he (Mr. Mackenzie) had taken when he was leader of the Government. The First Minister made a speech remarkable for its unfairness. In his effort to break the force of such remarks as he (Mr. Mackenzie) had made, the hon. gentleman did not scruple to attribute to him designs which it was impossible for any patriotic Canadian to entertain. He (Mr. Mackenzie) never made any effort to discredit either the Government or the progress of the work, the manner of doing which by the Government he (Mr. Mackenzie) opposed. There was nothing in his whole record, as a public man, which he did not challenge the hon. gentleman to bring up, if he could, to prove the calumnious statements he had made.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: What were they?

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had stated that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had deliberately misrepresented the country, that he had tried in every way to prevent the company which had been organised in 1872 from succeeding, and that it was owing to the efforts of him (Mr. Mackenzie) and of his friends, that the company had failed to succeed. He had challenged the hon. gentleman before, and he now challenged him again, to substantiate these statements. It was well known that the scheme to which the hon. gentleman had alluded had broken down before there was a whisper of the transaction known as the Pacific Railway scandal. It was known that, during the Session, when these gentlemen were in England, the Minister of Public Works announced a few days before the close of the Session that he had every reason to believe that the contractors were meeting with success in negotiating their bonds. He (Mr. Mackenzie) expressed his pleasure at hearing the good news. He was suspicious of the correctness of the news from what he had seen in other correspondence, but, assuming that the Minister himself must necessarily have known the facts, he accepted the hon. gentleman's declaration. It was known to all in official circles that the scheme had hopelessly failed, and the hon. gentleman opposite, on Saturday, as on other occasions, tried to throw the odium of the breakdown upon his political opponents, when he knew it was owing to his own crude, undigested scheme, which could find no favour with English capitalists. The hon. gentleman was afterwards guilty of such transactions as did bring discredit upon the scheme and the country. The hon. gentleman had not only made this unwarranted attack on him (Mr. Mackenzie) but also said that the late Government had lost five years. He would ask the hon. gentleman to take any five years he chose from 1867 to the time he left office, and to show that he had accomplished as much work on the Intercolonial as he (Mr. Mackenzie) had on the Pacific. In no single undertaking that could be named in this country was there any such progress made as had been made with that scheme in the five years. Almost the entire surveys were completed. Nearly 300 miles of railroad were made ready in that time, and all the rest was ready for placing under contract, and yet the hon. gentleman would deliberately say, in that extravagant style of his, that no progress had been made. He also said that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had initiated an absurd scheme of land and water, and he was pleased to diverge from the line of argument, if any of his speech could be called an argument, to characterise the product of these as what he would designate mud. In the first place, he (Mr. Mackenzie) would have no hesitation in abandoning any plan conceived, if he found any better plan could be devised. He came into office with his late colleagues at a time when this enterprise was but in its infancy, finding the country committed to an extent of work that was impracticable. They had, at one and the same time, to get a mitigation of those terms with British Columbia, and to conduct the work, to some extent, forward to completion. In endeavouring to do that, he conceived this plan; he conceived that it would be desirable to utilise the great stretches of water navigation, and he failed to see in that scheme anything that should or could provoke the merriment of even hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman, in his scheme, proposed to commence at Lake Nipissing, and build continuously westward around Lake Superior, in a country that was, perhaps, the most barren of any we had in Canada. He did not know very much of that country, but he thought he was warranted in saying that he knew more than any of the present Ministry, for they were never there. But they all knew enough to understand that, while, no doubt, there might be portions of it here and there valuable for settlement, a great part of the country westward to Lake of the Woods was not favourable for settlement, and it presents very rough natural features. Its topography was of a very forbidding character generally, and there was very little arable land to be found there. They concluded, then, to utilise the waters from the east end of Georgian Bay to the west end of Lake Superior, in the first place. Had hon. gentlemen opposite put an end to that scheme? They proposed to let out contracts from Lake Nipissing to the west end of Lake Superior. If they had faith in their own scheme, and objected to this mixture of land and water, termed mud by the hon. gentleman, why did they not change their present policy?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD :
Un bon jour viendra.

MR. MACKENZIE said yes, but, in the meantime, the hon. gentleman adopts a plan that he ridicules whilst he acts upon it. Well, west of Selkirk they had again to use the water stretches. If the road were completed to the Narrows of Lake Manitoba, very little work, indeed, would enable them to connect Lakes Manitoba and Winnipegosis with the Saskatchewan River, and to obtain 700 or 800 miles continuous navigation there, which would serve a very good purpose in promoting the settlement of the Saskatchewan Valley. Such was his scheme. He proposed, also, in the first place, to build the road towards the Narrows of the Lake of the Woods, passing by Sturgeon Falls; and from Sturgeon Falls, by building a lock at Fort Francis, there would be continuous navigation to the Narrows of the Lake of the Woods. That was the scheme they devised. It was a wise one, as by it they would have a large investment of money by Canada, and it would, in the meantime, be a great and undoubted blessing. The hon. gentleman opposite (Sir John A. Macdonald) seemed to think it would be no blessing, and that the grand scheme which he had initiated, and which met with such a total failure, rejecting all considerations obtained by experience, and all the teachings which they had acquired by the exploration surveys, should be carried out. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was not ashamed, at this moment, to say that in devising that scheme of using the water-stretches of navigation, they did what was in the public interest. At all events, they did it in the most perfect good faith, and in making use of that plan they did not build a mile of railway but what could be utilised in acquiring the most direct route to the places where they intended to go, and they proposed to utilise as much of the railway as was possible in settling up the interior of the country. He had not deviated one iota from that plan, because he saw no reason to deviate from it; but, as he said a little while ago, he would not be ashamed to depart from a preconceived notion, if he found a plan that would suit better and save money to the country. As the Minister of Public Works, as the Premier, and as a Canadian, he was bound to do the best for the country. He did try his best to accomplish what was in the interests of the country, and he had no doubt that what they did was done with all the wisdom which could be collected at the time from those employed as engineers under them. The hon. the First Minister also referred with a jeer to his suppressing a map.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I ?

MR. MACKENZIE : Yes.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I said nothing about suppressing a map.

MR. MACKENZIE : At all events, as the thing is mentioned, I will simply refer to it in this way. When Mr. Sandford Fleming came home, he found a map prepared by Mr. Marcus Smith, his deputy, and the Deputy Minister of the Interior, Colonel Dennis. He represented to me, in the strongest terms, that the map misrepresented the country, that there was much better country than the map represented, and he protested against it being published with any report of his. Acting upon the Chief Engineer's strong protest, the map was not published. As to suppressing the map, why it was my object to give the greatest amount of information to the public, but I would never publish anything against the evidence of those responsible as engineers for the road. The hon. gentleman said I deliberately misrepresented the extent of good land. I am not aware of having made any such misrepresentations. I recollect, very well, when the hon. gentleman, with a recklessness which no information in his possession could have justified, stated there were 350,000,000 acres of valuable land in that country. I never gave any information except that given to me in public documents, at the disposal of every member of the House, consequently I could have made no misrepresentation. The fact is, I have been personally and politically a devotee to the settlement of that country, and the promotion of the interests of Canada there. I have looked upon the North-West as the place that was to give solidity and power to us. Two years ago I employed a well-known gentleman, a writer in this city, to prepare a condensed statement of all the facts that could be found out respecting the country, its geological and topographical features, its waters, its woods, and its soil. That statement was circulated in England amongst those who it was supposed might be induced to become contractors for the road, as the best means of giving them the information they might require.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Who was the writer ?

MR. MACKENZIE : Mr. Ryan.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Which Mr. Ryan ?

MR. MACKENZIE : Mr. Carroll Ryan.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Oh !

MR. MACKENZIE : Well, what about it ?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I wanted to know merely.

MR. MACKENZIE : The hon. gentleman knew quite well. Of course, the hon. gentleman can sneer.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I am not sneering.

MR. MACKENZIE : The humblest man in the country is entitled to respect, and the gentleman I have mentioned commands respect from every person.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I have said nothing against Mr. Ryan.

MR. MACKENZIE : Of course not.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : It is only the Globe talks against him.

MR. MACKENZIE : The hon. gentleman always accepts the opinions of the Globe, when he finds anything to suit his purpose ; but, when it finds fault, it is only the Globe. I have known the hon. gentleman and his colleagues to read passages of the Globe to prove that they were right. The hon. gentleman will remember reading two columns of the Globe to prove that they were right in attaching all the importance they did to the Pacific Railway, and, the next day, speaking of the Globe as an authority which no person would ever dream of giving. I have now to call the attention of the House to the present position of the matter. The hon. the Minister of Public Works referred to various matters upon which I desire to make some remarks. In the first place he complained of the debate on Saturday. He complained of party questions being introduced. Why, the hon. gentleman must see that this is a party question as much as any question that comes into this House.

MR. TUPPER : I did not complain so particularly of you, as of your colleagues.

MR. MACKENZIE : I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman. I say I conducted the discussion in a proper manner, and criticised what was squarely before the House ; but the leader of the Government immediately afterwards got up and changed it into a party discussion, and he accused me falsely of having determined to injure the country, and with endeavouring to influence English capitalists and contractors against the enterprise of his former Government, and then it became the duty apparently of my late colleagues to point out that, if there was any wrong-doing, it was not on my part, but on the part of the hon. gentleman himself. If the leader of the Government had not dragged the discussion in that direction, it would not have gone in that direction, and the hon. gentleman has himself and his friends to blame for forcing the discussion into a channel in which we did not intend to go. I have no desire to discuss these unpleasant things. I prefer infinitely to have a dignified discussion purely on the merits of questions of this sort, and I did so conduct the debate. Now, I am bound to say that the Minister of Public Works did not say anything which I could take exception to as unfair, and he gave statements which clearly suited his own views. I deny at once that I for a moment tried to, or dreamed of making it a mere party question ; but the hon. gentleman will not forget that, on several occasions, he and his colleague, the First Minister, did so act in this House. Why, after obtaining authority from the House to let some contracts, does not the hon. gentleman recollect moving that the contracts be not approved of ?

MR. TUPPER: No.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, the hon. gentleman will find in the Journals of 1875, page 350, that "Mr. Tupper moved, seconded by Sir John A. Macdonald, that the question of approving contracts 13 and 14 be postponed for three months." When there was no possible objection, why was this done? Why should the initial sections at each end, between Fort William and Selkirk, be postponed for three months? If the motion had carried, the hon. gentleman knows that it would have delayed the construction of the initial portion for a year. Was this done for party interests? The leader of the Government also blamed me because I asked for a definition of the place where these 125 miles of road were to be located. What was the hon. gentleman's reply to my demand? Why, he said we did the very same thing. Now, did we do the very same thing?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE: I shall read a motion to the hon. gentleman, and ask any member on his own side of the House, if the question justified the hon. gentleman's quibbling on that particular matter. On the same page will be found a resolution that the Government be authorised to enter into a contract during the recess with the party sending in the lowest available tender for the construction of that portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway extending from Rat Portage to Cross Lake, a distance of thirty-seven miles. There is one of the instances; the mileage is mentioned, and the two objective points of the road given. The Government proposition is to make further explorations, and, as soon as they have located a line, to give out a contract for a portion not exceeding 125 miles. Where are those 125 miles? The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) replied in British Columbia, which extends several hundred miles along the Pacific coast. There are a number of possible routes for a railway, all of which I rejected, but the most southerly. The present Government do not give any indication of which one they propose to accept. They wish to have further explorations as they may see fit, in that vast country, and power to build 125 miles of railway anywhere in it; and the hon. gentleman says that this is a precisely similar proposition to that of the late Government. Is it so? The most devoted adherent of the right hon. gentleman would not venture the assertion that they are one and the same thing. I would not object to the further explorations proposed in the Pine River Pass, if the Government deliberately intended to make an elaborate survey, for only upon an elaborate survey can reasonable estimates be framed. It would require at least two years for an intelligent, reliable survey of the Pine River region. I do not consider that we should discuss, in an exhaustive way, the question brought up by the leader of the Government on Saturday, in connection with immigration. I would merely reiterate what I have said already, that I do not believe in any land scheme that will lock up the great mass of the valuable land of the country, and prevent settlers entering upon it. I believe that, if the country is to be settled, if a certain breadth, say twenty miles on each side, is to be made available, other lands must be given cheap, or for nothing, to attract people into the country. Because, after all, the money obtained for the land is no equivalent for the labour and prosperity produced by a large influx of immigrants. Those people will do far more to enrich the country than will the holding of the entire land for settlement, at a high price. As to the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) in which, in closing, he spoke loudly and eloquently of the character and achievements of the men of the North, it had nothing to do with this question. But it is not true that the men of the North are always triumphant. The Grecians, Carthaginians and Romans were not Northmen. All that kind of remark is mere nonsense, and has no proper place in a serious debate. What Canadians have to determine at present is the wisdom, or unwisdom, of adopting the policy foreshadowed in these resolutions. I believe the hon. gentleman was mistaken in the effect those resolutions will produce. If I believed that we would get $200,000,000 for those 100,000,000 acres, no person would be more delighted. But the hon. gentleman must not be offended if we, on the Opposition side, do not agree with him in this notion. The emigration into Manitoba during the present year is claimed by hon. gentlemen opposite as one of the meritorious things accomplished by the National Policy; but it has no more to do with it than with the emigration of the negroes from Louisiana to Kansas. There was precisely as much emigration to Manitoba last year, when the National Policy was not contemplated. I have endeavoured, as a member of Parliament and Minister of the Crown, to conduct the affairs of the Canadian Pacific Railway as earnestly and anxiously as I could in the interest of the country, and with a fair regard to the claims upon us, which, rightly or wrongly, have been given to British Columbia. I was quite conscious that an enormous expenditure upon that road would, to a greater or lesser extent, affect the stability of my own Administration. I was aware that it was impossible to satisfy what I considered to be the unreasonable attitude and demands of some of the people of British Columbia. But, while anxious so to conduct the enterprise as to show that we were doing everything in our power, we, at the same time, resolved, at all hazards, not to commit the country to such an expenditure as would overbalance the reasonable expectation of obtaining a revenue to meet it without increasing the burden of taxation. I believe we went as far as it was possible, certainly as far as it was prudent, to go. I am, therefore, very much surprised that the hon. the Premier should have declared that the late Government had lost five years. We shall see what the next five years will bring forth, and the result of the right hon. gentleman's engineering and planning. I will not venture upon any prophecy, although I know tolerably well what must be the inevitable result of a certain course, if followed, and of a certain other course if not followed. The first resolution resolves that engagements have been entered into with British Columbia as a condition to the union with Canada; that a line of railway shall be constructed between the Atlantic and the Pacific, and that it shall be constructed with all possible speed. I have not been able to find any language anywhere that justifies that resolution. I think it much better that the resolution should be properly worded, and give the truth in the matter, as well as the exact opinion of the Canadian people.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It conveys the present opinion of the people of Canada.

MR. MACKENZIE said it conveyed it only to some extent. He, therefore, moved in amendment:—

“That the said resolution be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the same, by inserting the following words after the word ‘That,’ in the said resolution:—‘The Government of the Dominion undertook to secure the commencement simultaneously within two years from the date of the said Union, of the construction of a railway from the Pacific towards the Rocky Mountains, and from such point as may be selected east of the Rocky Mountains towards the Pacific, to connect the seaboard of British Columbia with the railway system of Canada; and, further, to secure the completion of such railway within ten years from the date of the Union; that the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, 1872, provided—“that the public aid to be given to secure that undertaking should consist of such liberal grants of land, and such subsidy in money or other aid not increasing the (then) existing rate of taxation as the Government of Canada should thereafter determine;” that the Canada Pacific Railway Act, 1874, provided that “it is proper to make provision for the construction of said work as rapidly as the same can be accomplished without further raising the rate of taxation;” that, during the Session of 1876, the following words were added to a resolution appropriating money for the Canada Pacific Railway, viz.: “While granting this sum, this House desires to record its view that the arrangements for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway should be such as the resources of the country will permit, without increasing the existing rates of taxation; that the circumstances of the country are not now such as would justify a departure from the ground taken in the said Acts and resolution, and that the construction of the railway should only be proceeded with at such a rate as will not necessitate increasing the rate of taxation beyond that existing at the date of the above recited resolution in the Session of 1876.”’

MR. BOULTBEE said it did not seem to him that the leader of the Opposition had spoken directly to his amendment.

He spoke with a good deal of feeling with having been charged by the leader of the Government with having, with his friends, tried to defeat this scheme from its inception. He denied it here to-day, but the conviction of the Canadian people was that the charge was correct, that, both in Parliament and in the press, they had endeavoured to thwart that scheme. The people generally believed that if that scheme had been dealt with in a fair statesmanlike manner, it would have gone through then, and that the impetus which this country would have gained would have saved the people from the severe depression which they had been suffering from. That was the impression that remained on the minds of the people, and it was not too much to say, from the utterance of the leader of the Opposition, that he was still instinct with the same feeling. When this plan was now launched before the House and the country, what position did they find the leader of the Opposition taking? He said that, while he would be glad to see it succeed, and would do everything he could to help it forward, yet that such was the treatment received by the people of England from this country, if he were an English statesman he would not give a cent. Was that the utterance of a patriot who wished a great scheme to succeed? This was not the expression of a man who wished well to this scheme. The hon. gentleman and his friends hoped this scheme would fail, so that they could make use of the common expression afterwards, "I told you so." The hon. gentleman challenged the leader of the Government to show that progress had not been made in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway during the last five years. Well, what had we got? We had got a piece of road, partially completed at one end, badly constructed at another, with a large gap between. It was a most inferior road. The only great progress that seemed to have been made was the purchase of a large quantity of steel rails at an enormous price, that had never been used. The hon. gentleman and his friends had selected a terminus on the Kaministiquia River at an enormous expense, and it was the conviction of everybody who knew anything about the matter that it would have to be abandoned. Everyone acquainted with the facts admitted that it should be at Prince Arthur's Landing, where it should have been originally located. The hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) seemed to doubt the assertion of the leader of the Government that there were from 200,000,000 to 250,000,000 acres of land in that country to be made available. He (Mr. Boulton) had taken some interest in this subject, had read the reports of experts, and he found, upon collecting the most reliable information, that the fertile belt had an extent of 900 miles in length by 600 miles in breadth, and the evidence of experts showed it to be one of the finest tracts of lands in the world. This tract contained nearly 300,000,000 acres of land, or nearly three times more than would be required for the purpose. The leader of the Opposition said that he desired to conduct this discussion in a fair and legitimate way. He (Mr. Boulton) had heard nothing at all from the leader of the Opposition, except what was fair and legitimate, but he was sorry to see that the hon. gentleman did not seem to look with disapprobation on the conduct of some of his colleagues, who were the first to travel out of the legitimate line of debate. Why did not the hon. gentleman get his colleagues to take the same stand as himself and discuss this matter fairly? Considerable exception was taken by the leaders of the Opposition to the fact that the Government asked for power from this House to construct 125 miles of road at the western extremity as soon as they should have ascertained the proper route. It was well understood that one of the two routes must be taken to reach the Pacific coast, and it seemed that the explorers had not yet satisfactorily determined which was the best. But if this House had confidence in this Government, or any other Government, it could safely leave this matter to the discretion and good sense of the gentlemen composing that Government. In winding up his speech, the leader of the Opposition said that, after all, these things amounted to very little, that what we had to do was to consider the wisdom of the plan submitted to this House, and decide on its merits; but he did not then proceed to discuss the scheme on its merits, and he (Mr. Boulton) would venture to say that the hon. gentleman would find it difficult in discussing this scheme on its merits to show it was not the best one that could be proposed. He said he did not like to lock up large quantities of land for the purpose of building the railroad; but, as we were bound by obligations to build this road, we should construct it through this land, and what would be the use of these fertile lands unless there was a railroad running through them? It was a bad position to take to say this scheme was not a good one, and yet not attempt to show that it was bad, nor attempt to find a better one. The hon. leader of the Opposition said he had always tried to do the best he could for the country. It would be hard to say here that he had not; it would be hard to charge any man holding his high position, with not having tried to do the best he could for the country; but in doing so the hon. gentleman seemed, on many occasions, to have acted hastily, and not to have been at all successful in his efforts.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not think that the hon. member for Lambton, with all his abilities, had in any way impaired the position that either the hon. the Minister of Public Works or himself (Sir John A. Macdonald) had taken on Saturday. Therefore, as they must get through the Session, he would say no more, but ask the House to concur in the resolutions. The hon. gentleman had also been good enough to allude to what he called "The Pacific Railway Scandal," and so did the hon. member for Shefford. True, the country had replied to it, but he should be glad to meet this House as he would be glad to meet anyone of his countrymen whenever they chose to bring up that matter for discussion. The Minister of Public Works disposed of that matter very summarily in his remarks to-day. They said, whilst supposing it to be true that the Government which existed before 1873 had committed all kinds of possible atrocities, and that they had been corrupt, what must be the estimation of the people of the Administration that existed from 1873 to 1878, when, with all the faults of John A. Macdonald, Sir George Cartier and Mr. Langevin, they deliberately, by an overwhelming majority, chose to accept those gentlemen, and all their friends, with all their faults, rather than retain that Government. Such an exhibition of imbecility and corruption never was exhibited to the country, as was exhibited by the Government which was formed in the end of 1873, and expired on the 17th day of September, 1878. What condemnation could be so great as the condemnation that was pronounced on the 17th day of September, 1878?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said, yes, there was the night-march, there was the plot, there was the conspiracy. Let the hon. gentleman bring that subject up again, either now or at any time. Let him bring up the Pacific Railway question again, with the charges that were made against him and his colleagues, and they would have the means of meeting those charges, because they had the evidence now, that they had not in 1873-74, showing the foul conspiracy of 1873, and they would prove it whenever hon. gentlemen opposite chose to challenge it again. He offered the challenge that night—not a challenge like that which was offered in 1877, on very nearly the last day of the Session, when the then leader of the Government, the hon. member for Lambton, said that, if at the beginning of the next Session the members of the Opposition did not choose to move for Committees, with respect to the charges that were brought against the late Government, the Macdonald-Cartier Administration, he would move for them himself. Week after week passed, until, in the last week of the Session, the hon. member for Lambton rose and asked: "Why did not hon. gentlemen opposite move for a Committee?" They waited and trusted to the hon. member for Lambton to move early in the Session for a Committee to examine into the charges that were brought against their Cabinet. He did not do so. Now, the hon. gentleman had stated, with regard to the extension of the railway westward, that he was at one with them, and that, in respect to the water stretches, Lake Huron and Lake

MR. BOULTON.

Superior were the water stretches he meant.

MR. MACKENZIE: I did not say so.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said yes, his understanding of the statement of the hon. gentleman was that the selection of the head of Lake Superior as the starting point was agreed upon by all. It was the policy of the Government of which he was a member, that they should start from some point on Lake Superior, and work westward. The only point of departure, then, from the present policy, was that the point of departure was west of Lake Nepigon, instead of starting from Prince Arthur's Landing.

MR. MACKENZIE: Why did he send surveyors to Lake Nipissing?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said they sent surveyors everywhere, as did the hon. gentleman, and sometimes it was useless. He knew the Engineer-in-Chief, Mr. Fleming, was in favour of Lake Nepigon, and he remembered quite well that the hon. gentleman said the starting point would be from Nepigon River.

MR. MACKENZIE: Certainly.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was the joint opinion of both sides of the House that they should start from Lake Superior, and move westward, and afterwards work eastward. Now, when the hon. gentleman stated that the water stretches he spoke of were Lakes Huron and Superior—

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman has misstated me again. He asked me if there were any other water stretches, and I said yes, from Lac des Mille Lacs to the west end of Lake of the Woods, then west by the Saskatchewan and Lake Manitoba.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman must remember that the member for South Huron attempted to explain on Saturday night that they meant to run to Lake Shebandowan. The hon. gentleman plainly proposed a combination of lock, river, and railway, instead of one through line. He was driven from the water stretches to the through railway course, and then, on the other hand, he attacked the policy of the present Government. The hon. gentleman had said that the terminus of the Pacific Railway should be either Bute Inlet or Dean Inlet.

MR. MACKENZIE said he stated on Saturday that his own bias was in favour of the Bute Inlet route until two years ago, and that his bias was derived from engineers' reports, and that he had no personal choice. He desired only to get the best route. Dean Channel and Gardiner Channel were also commended to him. When they found more favourable reports of Burrard Inlet, they had no hesitation in taking that route, as stated in the Order in Council last year.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that long explanation did not answer his question. The question he put was simply this: Whether he did not settle that either Dean Inlet or Bute Inlet should be the terminus of the Pacific Railway?

MR. MACKENZIE: I have already said we did not.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would read the Order in Council.

MR. MACKENZIE said they adopted the route as far as would leave it possible to select either of those points as terminal points, but they never adopted the road to either of them. They went past Fort George to the Black Water Valley. It was for the purpose of having a telegraph line erected.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the thing was perfectly clear. He asked him simply whether his Government had not finally settled on the terminus, and he said his Government was in favour of Bute Inlet. He did not ask the hon. gentleman if he had been in favour of that Inlet, but whether his Government had not decided that either Bute Inlet or the Dean Channel should be the Pacific Railway terminus. Here was an Order in Council passed by the Government of the day, stating that there were two lines for the Pacific Railway, either by Bute Inlet or by Dean Inlet. Going to Burrard Inlet never crossed the mind of the hon. gentleman, as Minister of Public Works of that day. Therefore, when he (Mr. Mackenzie) pointed out the superior advantages of Burrard Inlet, it was most remarkable that on June 1st, 1877, not only he, but all the Government decided that the terminus on the Pacific must be either at Bute Inlet or Dean Inlet. Therefore, he did not think there could be any very grave charge against the Government, if they still held the matter in suspense. Some more enquiry should be made as to the reasons which led to the conversion of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) which occurred in 1878, shortly before he left office; because it was very remarkable, and an evidence of the way in which business was conducted in those days. On the 1st of July, 1877, the Government of that day pronounced that the Pacific Railway terminus must be at Bute Inlet or Dean Channel. On the 23rd of May, previously, an Order in Council was passed, stating that an Order in Council of the 7th June, 1873, fixing Esquimalt as the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and appropriating a strip of land twenty miles in width, was revoked. There had been one Order in Council that Esquimalt should be the terminus, but, by a subsequent Order in Council, the terminus was to be at Bute Inlet or Dean Channel. They deliberately gave up twenty miles in width of the finest mineral lands on the Pacific coast, by this Order in Council on the 23rd May, and yet, on the 29th May, without an Order in Council, without authority, they found a letter written by the Secretary of the Department of Public Works, using these words:

"I am further directed to state that Burrard Inlet will, in all probability, be adopted as the western terminus of the Canada Pacific Railway."

It was not until the 13th July that the Government finally made up their minds that the Burrard Inlet route should be adopted. The Minister of Public Works, had, without the authority of his Government, ordered his officer to rescind and to give up all the land on Vancouver Island. Yet only a year before the Order in Council of the 13th July, 1878, an Order in Council defined the route to be followed in British Columbia in the event of Bute Inlet or Dean Channel being ultimately adopted, one of which it seemed probable would be adopted. That was the course pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite. They, at one time, adopted water stretches; at another, Dean Inlet, then Bute Inlet, and then, at the last moment, Burrard Inlet. Yet they attacked the present Government because they thought that, in view of all the contradictory opinions offered, they ought to have some time to consider what terminus should, in the best interests of the Dominion, be adopted. In the meantime he (Sir John A. Macdonald) believed and knew that the Government would carry out the policy which had been indicated—that they would vigorously prosecute the Canadian Pacific Railway, and press it to a successful completion, and he hoped, believed, and knew, that, not only this House, but the whole country, would sustain them in doing so.

MR. TUPPER said he wished to take up the time of the House for a moment in settling a question of personal accuracy, in reference to a statement he had made this afternoon, and the contradiction of that statement which the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) had made to the House.

MR. MACKENZIE: I simply read from the Journals.

MR. TUPPER said that the hon. gentlemen, in stating that he (Mr. Tupper) had voted against certain contracts, was entirely mistaken. The statement he (Mr. Tupper) made was that, in asking gentlemen opposite to support the Government in a proposition to put 125 miles of railway under contract, he was only asking from hon. gentlemen opposite that which they asked the late Opposition to concede to them. He had called the attention of the leader of the Opposition to the fact that, while he (Mr. Mackenzie) had on several occasions asked the House in advance to give him its approval before the contracts were let, so that he might proceed with the work, the late Opposition had cheerfully accorded their approval. The hon. gentleman brought up, as evidence that he (Mr. Tupper) was not accurate in that statement, the fact that he had opposed a resolution to sanction a contract from Thunder Bay for Kaministiquia to Shebanowan. It was quite true he had opposed that resolution, and, if the hon. gentleman would refer to the Hansard, to the discussion that took place on that resolution, on April 3rd, he would find the reason there given; and that was that the contract proposed was not for a portion of the main line. The hon. gentleman stated to-day that their policy was to construct 45 miles of railway from Kaminstiquia to Shebandowan. Was it for the purpose of constructing a through line to Red River? Not at all. The hon. gentleman told the House that his object was to go to Sturgeon Falls, and use 276 miles of water stretches. The late Opposition opposed it, on the ground that it was not a direct portion of the Pacific Railway. It would take three or four days to get through by that route, and a large sum of money had been spent for nothing, as passengers or freight would not go by that route when the road by Duluth was available. Resolutions were moved by the hon. gentleman in 1875 to let contracts for two lines, one from Selkirk to Rat Portage, and the other from Rat Portage to Keewatin, 117 miles in all, and the hon. gentleman was mistaken in supposing that objections were taken by his right hon. friend (Sir John A. Macdonald) to the proposition submitted to the House. The late Government did not object to these contracts, because they were portion of the main line. He merely drew the attention of the hon. gentlemen to these facts, because he (Mr. Mackenzie) had questioned the consistency of his (Mr. Tupper's) statements. He was amused at the resolution proposed by the hon. gentleman, for the reason that the hon. gentleman had wasted so much paper in expressing what he (Mr. Tupper) had put—and he thought in improved language—in a couple of lines, and that was a proposition to proceed with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway as rapidly as practicable. But what more? Why, the hon. gentleman wished to put on record the fact that the late Government had been grossly violating the laws of this country and the authority of this Parliament for five years. The hon. gentleman asked the House to-night to vote for a resolution, which, the moment it was passed, would cancel every contract now entered into, and stop the expenditure of $25,000,000. It would also prevent the expenditure of one dollar of public money on the Canadian Pacific Railway, if such expenditure would increase the taxation. Yet the first act of the hon. gentleman, when he got into office, was to ask the House to vote $3,000,000 additional taxation, and his colleague, Mr. Blake, had declared that it was intended to secure the construction of the Pacific Railway. His first act was to violate the decision of Parliament, by taxing the people of this country, according to the statement of Mr. Blake, to the extent of $3,000,000 for the construction of the Pacific Railway. Did the hon. gentleman venture to state, after meeting this House three years in succession, with the statement from the mouth of the Finance Minister that there was a serious deficit, that he did not know that every dollar of the $25,000,000 engagements to which he committed the country, was not a gross and direct violation of the authority of Parliament? Did not the hon. gentleman know, a year ago, after having had deficits to the extent of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000, when he asked to put under contract 125 miles of railway from Yale to Kamloops, that it involved, in the clearest and most distinct terms, largely increased taxation upon the people of this country? And now, with the practice of five years against those declarations, he (Mr. Mackenzie) finished up the resolution he submitted to the House with the declaration:—

“That the circumstances of the country are not now such as would justify a departure from the ground taken in such Acts and resolution, and that the construction of the railway should only be proceeded with at such a rate as will not increase the rate of taxation beyond that existing at the date recited in the above resolution in the Session of 1876.”

Not a blow had been struck on the 1,500 miles of railway required between Selkirk and the Pacific coast, yet a solemn binding engagement had been entered into between the hon. gentleman, British Columbia and the Imperial Government, that, before 1890, that 1,500 miles should be completed, no matter whether additional taxation would be required or not. He had also entered into engagements which involved the expenditure of $25,000,000, and now he stultified himself by asking the House to cancel all these engagements.

MR. MACKENZIE said he utterly denied having violated the law regarding contracts. As to the reproach that there had been deficits, he had explained that twenty times, and he need not do it again. If there had been a deficit in the revenue, it was because there had been a deficit in the pockets of the people. If it was wrong for the late Government to have a deficit, how much more so was it for the hon. gentleman to have a deficit five times the amount in five years. The late Government had a deficit because they declined to tax the people in any way. The hon. gentleman assumed that, because he (Mr. Mackenzie) invited tenders for one line, he was bound to proceed with no other line. That by no means followed. They might proceed with a dozen, provided they obtained money for the purpose, and, besides, they had power under the contract, as the hon. gentleman knew, to stop any contractor at any moment.

MR. TUPPER: No; the Statute says the reverse of that.

MR. MACKENZIE said the Statute said that the Governor in Council should have the power at any time to suspend work until the next meeting of Parliament, and that provision was in the contracts themselves, if he mistook not. He knew it was in the contracts for canal works, and it seemed to him that there was the same proviso in railway contracts, that the Government could stop the work whenever they pleased. The contracts provided specifically that, when the money voted by Parliament was expended, the work must stop, and there could be no claim for damages in such cases. As to the solemn binding engagement of the Carnarvon terms, from his recollection of the despatch of 17th September, 1874, agreeing to the terms proposed by Lord Carnarvon, he was of opinion that such action as that by the late Government could be taken without any violation of any enactment or Parliamentary resolution. In another despatch, in 1876, it was stated that that engagement was predicated upon, and subject to the conditions embodied in the law.

MR. TUPPER: It is not in the terms.

MR. MACKENZIE said there were no terms signed by two parties as in a contract; there was simply the Minutes of Council. The Minister of Public Works complained that the late Government had not carried out the Terms of Union which said that the railway should be built as a condition of Union upon certain terms therein mentioned. The Government which preceded his had already violated the terms as to the accomplishment of certain work on the Pacific Railway; when his Government took office, two years had passed without work being done. He had always understood that the execution of the terms made with Lord Carnarvon was subject to Canada's ability to proceed with the work, subject to the Act they passed themselves, without any amendment having been proposed by the hon. gentlemen opposite, or any serious opposition to it from them.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Was not the Carnarvon arrangement between Canada and British Columbia and the British Government, just as binding and conclusive as to the road being finished in 1890, as the original engagement?

MR. MACKENZIE: It was qualified by the terms of our Act.

MR. TUPPER said that on or before the 1st September, 1890, the railway was to be completed and opened for traffic, and so forth. Those were the terms, and the hon. member for Lambton had told the House, having, in the recess of Parliament, made a compact with the British Government and British Columbia that, by 1890, 2,000 miles of railway should be completed, in answer to Mr. Blake's question as to what authority the hon. gentleman proposed to take from Parliament to sanction that enormous engagement, that, instead of $1,500,000 the Government proposed to spend $2,000,000 a year within British Columbia, and finish the railway connections within that Province, and downward to the point indicated, before 1890; and that they had nothing to ask from Parliament. So he had power to make a solemn binding engagement, reardless altogether of the financial condition of the country, and complete those 2,000 miles in eleven years. The terms were sealed, and all Parliament had to do was to vote him the money; and yet they had these captious objections made to a proposition that involved no expenditure, no additional burden, which they believed was calculated to relieve the country from the enormous obligations already contracted.

MR. MACKENZIE said he wished to say, in answer to a remark about an Order in Council of the late Government, rescinding or giving up lands on Vancouver Island, that that did not affect the Pacific road, but only the railway from Nanaimo to Esquimalt. It was agreed they should give that quantity of land if they built the road, and when they found themselves unable to proceed with it, they gave up the land as a matter of course.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there was no record of any promise by the Government of British Columbia to give that land.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman will not find on record that a single acre was to be given except as a portion of the road.

MR. MILLS said that, with regard to the Carnarvon terms, it was declared and formally agreed that their execution was not to be inconsistent with the law. The Act of 1874 was still upon the Statute-book, and the Government of the day had no authority to set it at defiance, or declare that the rate of taxation should be inconsistent with it. When the hon. member for Lambton invited him (Mr. Mills) to join his Administration, he spoke to him on the subject, reminding him that the rate of taxation was not to be increased under the Act of 1874, in constructing the railway, when the hon. gentleman assured him that the Carnarvon terms were to be construed as he (Mr. Mills) understood them—that they were intended to be so understood in dealing with the Colonial Secretary.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said, that that might have been the understanding of the late Government, but the resolutions were absolute in their terms—the promise to finish the railway by 1890 was absolute; and they could only judge, and British Columbia would hold England and Canada to the promise, not only implied but expressed, that in 1890 it should be built.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he distinctly contradicted the argument of the First Minister from the Carnarvon terms. British Columbia was bound to take cognisance of the Act of 1874, and so was the British Secretary of State, and their never having asked for its repeal, showed they knew they were to be bound by it, and they had a right to hold that there was an understanding that there was no intention to vary the Act of 1874. If they had expected it to be varied, it was their duty to insist on its repeal. An Act of the Parliament of the Dominion affected every part, and British Columbia was a part, and neither Lord Carnarvon nor anybody else could expect that they were going to look beyond that.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman says that, although the Carnarvon terms are specific and peremptory in language, although there is a positive engagement to finish the road in 1890, yet both England and British Columbia are bound to take notice of the previous legislation.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I do say so.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: What has been the stock-in-trade of the Opposition, with regard to the original terms with British Columbia? When we agreed to commence the road in two and finish it in ten years, there was a cry made throughout the country that this was a foolish and absurd bargain, but an obligation that must be carried out, when, in the same Session, there was passed a resolution, with the consent of the British Columbia delegates, and the whole continent, that there should be no increased taxation, and that the road should only be built by private enterprise. It has been cried through the country, and even in the present debate, that we made a foolish binding obligation that could not be got rid of, and yet the British Columbia delegates were here and agreed to it as did England also, but still, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, we were bound to finish the railway in ten years; and, though they made an equally binding obligation to finish the road in 1890, there was no meaning in that; it must be read through the spectacles of hon. gentlemen opposite, that all these engagements are not to increase the obligations of the country. The Finance Minister of the late Government acknowledged that they construed the Carnarvon terms simply by the light of the surrounding circumstances, while their predecessors made an improvident irreversible bargain. The Government preceding the last made no agreement as they did—agreed to finish the road in ten years, they agreeing to finish it in 1890. The member for Centre Huron (Mr. Cartwright) says this must be read in connection with all the surrounding circumstances; the present Government say that British Columbia agreed there should be no increase of taxation, and that the road should be commenced and finished with the assistance of private enterprise, and not by the Government.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I objected most decidedly to the hon. gentleman's terms, because he put them without any qualification or modification whatever in an Imperial Act, or in resolutions which were to have the force of one, and, because he deliberately voted down, by his then majority, a proposition of myself and Sir A. T. Galt, to introduce modifying terms. Had he not done that, his case would, to some extent, have been parallel to ours. What I always accused hon. gentlemen opposite of, was their deliberate and repeated ignoring of every proposition to limit the liability of Canada. We do not act in that way.

MR. TUPPER said, as to the observation of the hon. gentleman, that the Governments of England and British Columbia were bound to take notice of the Act of 1874, limiting the financial obligations of Canada in regard to the construction of the railway by 1890, he wanted to ask this question: If that were true, if that Act left no room for doubt, why was it that, when he (Mr. Tupper) called the attention of the House to the fact that the late Government had entered into that obligation, regardless of any qualification, their colleague (Mr. Blake) drafted a resolution to reaffirm the proposition that it should be subject to the financial condition of the country, and put it in the hands of the member for West Middlesex to move?

MR. CARON said that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. LaRue) had voted, though he had paired with the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Perreault). He (Mr. Caron) held the proof of the fact in the initials of one of the Liberal whips.

MR. TROW said that such was the case.

MR. LARUE said he had not paired with anyone, and, if the whips had paired him against his knowledge, he did not think that he should be bound by it. He insisted on his right to vote.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it rested with the hon. member to say whether his vote should remain on the record or not. If he chose to have his name recorded, it was for him to say so. Every member in the House, if called upon, was compelled to vote, and, even if a gentleman got up and stated that he had paired, the House could compel him to vote, because, if he had paired, he must leave the House before the vote was taken. This was English practice. Therefore, if the hon. member for Bellechasse chose to have his name recorded on the paper, he had a right to do so, and no man had a right to make any objection to it.

On Resolution 12,

MR. MACKENZIE said it was quite impossible for him to vote for that resolution; he therefore moved in amendment, to leave out all the words after "that," and insert the following instead thereof:

"The route by the Thompson and Lower Frazer Rivers was recommended by Mr. Sandford Fleming, Chief Engineer of the Canada Pacific Railway; that this route possesses the most favourable grades of any route through British Columbia; that it is the shortest and cheapest to the side waters of the Pacific Ocean; that it reaches a capacious and safe harbour of easy access from the sea; that it passes through a country partially settled, possessing a good road on the proposed line of the railway and some navigable waters, thus offering many advantages over the Bute Inlet route."

MR. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman had told part of the truth, but not all. It was affirmed in this resolution that this road was recommended by Mr. Fleming; but it was only just to state that Mr. Fleming, at the same time, put on record his opinion that the selection of the route was premature. The hon. gentleman ought to have embodied in his amendment the fact that Mr. Fleming recommended further examination.

MR. MACKENZIE: There is no doubt, as against the Bute Inlet route, he did recommend it without any qualification, and I put it as against Bute Inlet. With regard to the vote, I am content to take the same vote that the House has just given.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government had promised to state this evening to the House what steps he proposed to take regarding the violation of the privileges of the House which he (Mr. Mackenzie) had brought up in the afternoon.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that he had looked into the practice, and he had come to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman should formulate in writing the statement he had made, in order to get it on the Journals of the House. That was the practice followed in reference to the Pacific Railway in 1873, and the same practice should be adopted now. As soon as that was done, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) would move that Mr. John Macdonell be summoned to the bar of the House at the next sitting.

MR. MACKENZIE stated that, when he made his statement, he did so for the purpose of having it entered on the Journals of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: The procedure in such a case is this: The motion is made, then the letter complained of is read by the Clerk, and then a motion is made to bring the person accused to the bar of the House.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) said there was a marked distinction between any of the authorities published and the present case. In all the precedents he had been able to find in cases of letters written to members of the House in regard to their course, conduct, votes, or language on the floor of the House, he did not find a case in which a letter written to a member of the House about the personal or private conduct, or private character of a member, outside of the House, had been treated as a breach of the privileges of Parliament. Before a man was condemned, he should be heard, and there was no evidence that the letter in question had been written by the person by whom it purported to be signed. He held that the question should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to enquire as to these points.

MR. MACKENZIE said the writing of the letter was not the only offence. The hon. member for Shefford had complained that this person called him a swindler, and some other opprobrious epithet. This person had also offended in other ways. The attention of Mr. Speaker had been called to it, and there could be no doubt that the letter was written by the party mentioned. The letter was only an aggravation of the offence. If the letter had not been written, the offence could not be overlooked by any Parliament having the slightest regard for its own dignity.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) said that the explanation of the hon. member for Lambton showed the necessity of a charge being formulated.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. member for Lambton had stated the case correctly. He had made the charge, as he had repeated to-day, that this gentleman or person insulted a member of this House, and afterwards came in at another door, and entered the House a third time. This the hon. gentleman stated before, and he said the aggravation of the offence was that he wrote a certain paper, which he (Sir John A. Macdonald) asked him to place on the table of the House. It was quite true that what the hon. gentleman said was a repetition of what he stated before, but it only showed that the request which he (Sir John A. Macdonald) made, that the charge should be formulated, should be carried out. He thought that the hon. gentleman had better, before the House adjourned, place in writing the statement which he had made, in order that the House might see exactly what the charge was, and in what respect the privileges of this House had been offended against.

MR. HOLTON said Mr. Macdonell should have been arrested at once. In this case, the letter would have formed no element of the charge. It was very much to be regretted that the course which he instanced had not been taken.

MR. MACKENZIE rose in his place and stated :

"That on Saturday last, a person named John A. Macdonell, while sitting inside the House, made offensive remarks towards a member of this House, namely the member for Shefford, who, at the time was sitting in his place in the House, viz. : That the said member was a cheat and a swindler ; that the offending person was ordered by the Speaker to withdraw from the House, but that he nevertheless again returned, when he was again expelled by the Sergeant-at-Arms. That immediately afterwards a letter was received by the member for Shefford in the following terms, presumably written by this same person :—

"To the Hon. L. S. Huntington, M.P. :—

"Sir.—I desire to state out of the House, what I stated in it. You are a cheat and a swindler.

"J. A. MACDONELL."

MR. WHITE (East Hastings) : It is not very complimentary to the member for Shefford.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Order, order.

MR. MACKENZIE : That remark is not very complimentary to the member who makes it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : This is a very serious matter, and ought to be treated seriously, and I have no doubt the House will so treat it. The fact of language being used on the floor of the House against a member, and, I suppose, within his hearing, is an offence that ought to be treated seriously by the House. The statements of the motion of the hon. member for Lambton must be taken to be true, so far as the hon. gentleman knows them. The hon. member for Lambton, having taken the responsibility of proposing this motion, I have no hesitation in moving that John A. Macdonell, the person named, be summoned to attend at the bar of the House, at the next sitting of the House.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) moved in amendment that the matter be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, for an investigation and report to the House thereon.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he hoped the amendment would not carry, but that the main motion would. The statement respecting an insult to a member was made by a leading member of the House, and must be followed up at once. He had no doubt the accused party would have every opportunity of being heard at the right time, and in the proper way. Meantime, the privileges of members of Parliament ought to be protected, and he hoped his hon. friend would not press his motion to a division.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) said that his sole desire was that they should not establish a wrong precedent. The most material part of the motion contained the word "presumably ;" the author did not state the fact as of his own knowledge, and, when a statement of this kind was made, and a party was put on trial, he (Mr. Cameron) believed it was in accordance with precedent, as well as with the principles of law, that the matter ought to be investigated.

MR. HOLTON : Investigated at the bar.

MR. CAMERON : When a man is brought to the bar, he is brought as a criminal, and put on trial. If a party was reported in flagrante delictu, it would be proper to bring him to account promptly ; but it should be different with a case brought up a few days afterwards, and resting merely on information, belief, or presumptive evidence only. But, as he understood such an experienced Parliamentarian as the Premier to say that his motion was strictly in accordance with the precedents of Parliament, he would yield to the right hon. gentleman's suggestion, and withdraw his amendment.

PRAYERS.

REMISSION OF FEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. McCUAIG moved that the fees, less the cost of printing, on Bill (No. 49) to amend so much of the Act 33 Vict., chap. 46, as relates to the collection of dues and tolls upon logs, timber, cedar, pine, and railway ties, passing down the Moira River, through the port of Belleville, be refunded, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

MR. HOLTON said the House should understand the proposition now submitted to it. This Bill was introduced as a Private Bill, founded on petition, and had passed through both Houses. The proposal now was that the fees should be remitted, on the ground that it was not so much a Private Bill as a Local Bill. Now, the scale of fees contemplated both Private and Local Bills. This was, undoubtedly, a Local Bill, promoted by private parties. The very exception made by the report of the Committee, that the printing should be paid for by these parties, maintained its Private Bill character. It related also to the city of Belleville, imposing certain obligations upon it; it was, therefore, a mixed Private and Local Bill.

MR. McCUAIG said he had been requested to present this Bill by two large lumbering firms, having a large amount of property passing through the port of Belleville. He had no personal interest in the matter, and was sure the promoters of this Bill had no desire to infringe any rule of the House. But the Bill itself was a Public Bill, it was a tax upon property passing through the River Moira to the port of Belleville. The Clerk of the Private Bills Committee had stated to him that it was not usual to exact fees on a Bill of this character.

MR. TILLEY said it appeared, from the statement of the Committee, that it would be an exceptional proceeding, but, the Committee having considered the matter carefully, he thought there was no such objection to it as his hon. friend opposite had presented.

MR. HOLTON said he made no objection, he merely pointed out that the consequences would be to enfranchise all that class of Private Bills which partook of a local character, as contradistinguished from those affecting merely private individuals.

MR. SCRIVER said, as a member of the Committee, he would state that the recommendation of the Committee was based on the representation that the Act was really a Public Act.

Motion agreed to.

VICE-CHANCELLOR BLAKE.

MR. McCUAIG said he wished to draw the attention of the House to a very important matter. Through the public press, charges had been preferred against one of our most distinguished Judges occupying a high position in the Chancery Court, the charge being insulting a witness while in the witness-box. He would read from a newspaper what these charges were :

"When his Grace Archbishop Lynch had testified before the Vice-Chancellor on a question of fact which arose in the Mercer case, his testimony was received by the learned Judge in terms so improper as to have been open to suspicion of an intention to throw discredit on statements made by his Grace under oath. And on another occasion, when a Mother Superior of the Ladies of St. Joseph appeared before Mr. Blake as a witness in a case in which she had no interest whatever, and when giving her name, she, as was both natural and proper, gave her name in religion, the Vice-Chancellor, with a coarse brutality which would have done little credit to a street rough in the excitement of a faction fight, remarked, 'that it was one of those fine Italian names employed in such cases as a disguise for a Bridget Maloney!'

"In Osgoode Hall general opinion declares that Vice-Chancellor Blake discriminates in his manner, if not in his judgments, against counsel and suitors who are Catholics. Catholic lawyers accept that opinion so fully that, rather than prejudice the interests of their clients, they endeavour to have their cases brought before some other Judge, or, when brought before Vice-Chancellor Blake, to hand their briefs to Protestant Counsel."

He knew nothing whatever about the facts; but he contended, as a Protestant, that, if Catholic ladies went before a Court of Justice, the Judge had nothing to do with their religious opinions or belief, and they should be treated with courtesy, consideration, and kindness. There were safeguards thrown around Judges of the Courts of Great Britain and this country, for the purpose of securing an independent judgment in all matters of this kind.

MR. HOLTON said he rose to a point of order. He would ask whether his hon. friend proposed to conclude with a motion.

MR. McCUAIG: No, Sir, I do not; but I wish the Judges to understand that there is a public opinion in this country, and I wish them to respect it.

MR. HOLTON said he heard his hon. friend referring to Judges and so forth, matters which would be quite irregular to refer to unless speaking to a motion, and therefore he inquired whether the hon. gentleman intended to conclude with a motion; when he (Mr. McCuaig) said he did not, the matter should end.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: When a member gets up and addresses the House on a matter, it is always supposed the hon. gentleman is going to conclude with a motion, but any hon. member has a right to interrupt for the purpose of asking him if he is going to conclude with a motion. But, if no one interrupts him, and the speaking goes on, it is supposed he is going to conclude with a motion.

MR. COSTIGAN said he desired to call the attention of the House to a matter which had been referred to some time ago.

MR. HOLTON: Is the hon. gentleman going to conclude with a motion?

MR. COSTIGAN: Yes.

MR. HOLTON: The hon. gentleman says he intends to conclude with a motion. I now ask if it is a motion of which notice was given? I find no notice of a motion that can be reached at this stage of the proceedings on a Government day.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think that, when "motions" are called, the hon. member can rise and propose a motion, and, when he says he is going to conclude with a motion, the House is obliged to listen to the hon. member. When he makes a motion, and it is a motion which requires notice, then, and not before, can objection be taken.

MR. HOLTON: Then the right hon. gentleman holds that members may trifle with the time and Rules of this House. No gentleman can speak to a motion of which notice has not been given, if that notice be insisted on by any member.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I would like to have the question decided. I believe, when an hon. member states he is going to conclude with a motion, the

MR. McCUAIG.

House must listen to him until he presents his motion. When he presents his motion, any member can object that he is out of order.

MR. HOLTON: The right hon. gentleman has a great habit of improvising Parliamentary Rules to suit himself. The inconvenience to which that practice to which he adverts would lead must be obvious to everyone. There would be nothing to prevent any hon. member making a speech of two or three hours in length, at any moment, however inopportune, to thwart any business, however important, by simply rising and saying: I propose to conclude with a motion. It is the very essence of orderly discussion, that, when a gentleman speaks to a motion, the House should be seized with the nature of that motion, even when it is proposed to move that the House do adjourn. The House must not be trifled with by an evasion of the rules, of which the right hon. gentleman indicates a feasible and facile method on any day of the week, and against which, if it were put in practice, he would be the first to protest.

MR. SPEAKER: The practice is this: Before the Orders of the Day are called, very often some hon. member rises in his place, and expresses himself on some question, or calls the attention of the House to some matter. This is allowed by the practice of the House. Any hon. member may object, and put the question whether the hon. member addressing the House intends to finish with a motion. That question had been put to the hon. member for Victoria, N. B., (Mr. Costigan), and he stated in reply that he would conclude with a motion. I have the motion in my hands. I cannot say whether it has a notice or not, but the proper time to call the attention of the Chair to the question whether a notice of it has been given or not is before putting the question to the House.

MR. COSTIGAN said that, had he been allowed to proceed when he first rose, the discussion would have been over by this time. He had stated that, when he brought the question up before, he did so merely in order to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to what he believed to be a very serious charge that had been preferred against a gentleman holding a high judicial position. His object was to obtain from some prominent members of this House an expression, if not in condemnation of that gentleman, at least in condemnation of the language supposed to have been used by him, and of the course said to have been pursued by him in the discharge of his duties as a Judge in this country. He referred to this, not to find fault with the Minister of Justice for having taken the ground he did on that occasion. Had he known what the Minister of Justice's duty was then, he would have placed himself in a position to speak as one of the members of this House, and afford to other hon. gentlemen an opportunity for doing the same. The charges to which he (Mr. Costigan) alluded were very serious ones, and he now took this opportunity of referring to them and to the fact that they had never been contradicted, and, in his mind, they were worthy the consideration of the Government. He was not disposed to point out a particular line of duty to the Government in this case, but he had a right, as a representative, to express his views upon it. In the first place, that hon. gentleman Vice-Chancellor Blake had been charged with having made use of language at a certain meeting in Toronto, which was unwise, uncharitable, unworthy of any gentleman holding the position he held. He (Mr. Costigan) alluded to the occasion where he expressed the hope that the different Protestant elements in this country would unite and put down Popery. Such an expression from a Judge was uncalled-for, and unworthy of his position. He had been told that he had no right to refer to this language, because it was not used on the Bench, that the hon. gentleman might be a good Judge, and was perfectly entitled to speak as he thought fit on other occasions. He (Mr. Costigan) might be wrong, but he entertained a very different idea from that. His opinion was that a gentleman holding the position of Judge must not forget, even though he were off the Bench, that he occupied the position of Judge. It would be quite reasonable for anyone to come to the conclusion that an hon. gentleman who held the position of Judge, and made such an exhibition of fanaticism and bigotry off the Bench, would lead those who looked for justice at his hands, to believe that, when on the Bench, he would be actuated by the same spirit. This appeared to be reason, and he had a right to refer to it as a duty. He must not forget that, when he was on the Bench, he was called upon to measure out even-handed justice to the people of this country. Now, there was another serious charge against that hon. gentleman. He was not here to say that these charges were true. He was here to say the charges had been made before the public, and no one had contradicted them. It was charged that he was actuated by so severe a feeling of hostility to the Catholic element, that Catholics did not feel justified in appealing to him. If that were true, it was their duty to remove him. He did not believe it was trifling with the House to call the attention of the representatives of the people to these charges. They had the charge of an uncalled-for insult to a lady summoned to appear before that Judge. This had been published in most of the leading newspapers. We, in this country, entertained different religious beliefs, and considered that all ought to receive even-handed justice. It was not only a discredit to the hon. gentleman himself, but it was a discredit to the country, that a gentleman holding Vice-Chancellor Blake's position should so far forget himself as to make use of the language he was charged with using, and to pursue the course he was charged with pursuing. He trusted the Government would not allow this matter to be passed over.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had pledged his honour that he would conclude with a motion, and he had not done so.

MR. COSTIGAN : I move the adjournment of the House.

MR. MILLS said that was not a motion at all. The hon. gentleman had made a speech which he had no right to make, and which he had been allowed to make upon the supposition that he was prepared to make a motion. The hon. gentleman made a violent and unjust attack upon a Judge, and he made a statement which, either in the press or anywhere else—

MR. RYKERT: I rise to a point of order.

MR. COSTIGAN: I rise to ask a question.

MR. MILLS: I do not propose to be questioned by the hon. gentleman. His course is highly censurable, and he has practiced a deception upon the House.

MR. McCALLUM: I rise to a point of order.

MR. SPEAKER: The motion is to adjourn the House.

MR. MILLS said the hon. gentleman had made a slanderous speech without giving the House an opportunity of discussing what was said.

Several Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. COSTIGAN: I move that all the papers and correspondence touching this matter, in the hands of the Government, be brought down.

MR. MACKENZIE: That requires notice.

MR. COSTIGAN: Then I move that an Order of the House do issue for all papers and correspondence relating to any charges against Vice-Chancellor Blake to be brought to the House.

MR. MACKENZIE said that, in the first place, there had been no notice of that motion, and, in the second place, they were not in the habit of allowing a fishing motion to be passed. If the hon. gentleman could specify the charges moved for, he would not object to a motion for the papers concerning those charges. The hon. gentleman had made a speech based wholly on rumour. He had seen something stated in a newspaper, and he gave his own fiat to that statement. The hon. gentleman assumed that Judge Blake had done something wrong. He (Mr. Mackenzie) did not believe Judge Blake had done anything wrong. He did not believe Judge Blake had insulted, or was capable of insulting, any religious denomination. The hon. gentleman's speech was to him (Mr. Mackenzie) one of the most wanton attacks he ever heard made on a Judge since he had been in Parliament. It was a serious thing to attack a Judge. There was no man more free from party spirit—there was no more benevolent or kind man on the Bench than Judge Blake. Every one that knew him knew that he never, by word or deed, would do anything that could be construed into an insult to any religious denomination. He (Mr. Mackenzie) protested against any such motion.

MR. SPEAKER: The motion is of a character which requires two days' notice, and I do not think that a debate ought to be allowed upon it.

MR. COSTIGAN: I rise for the purpose—

Several Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. COSTIGAN: I do not rise to question your ruling, only I would like to call attention to this fact—

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is entirely out of order.

MR. SPEAKER: The debate is over.

MR. COUGHLIN moved the adjournment of the House. He said he was of opinion that, if the Hon. Vice-Chancellor Blake was guilty, it was right that he should be exposed. As far as he was concerned, he had received several letters both from Catholics and Protestants respecting Judge Blake.

MR. McCUAIG said he was one of those who believed a Judge was responsible to public opinion and to the House. He wished particularly to call attention to the salaries of Judges. The Act of Confederation distinctly provided that the Dominion Government should pay the salaries of the Judges. Now, in consequence of the opinion that they were insufficiently paid, the Government of Ontario introduced some motion by which they increased their Judges' salaries $1,000 a year. This was an illegal act, and the Judges knew it was illegal, and he would ask what respect could they have for a Bench that would accept that pay. When they took that into consideration in connection with the charge of respectable journals, he thought it was high time members of this House should pronounce upon it. He had great reluctance in referring to another matter in connection with this. A few short months' after his ascent to the Bench, Mr. Blake made a most gross attack upon the character of the late John Hillyard Cameron. He put his signature to a paper, accusing that gentleman of a gross injustice and wrong, when he might be called upon to try an election case in which the late Mr. Cameron might be interested. He (Mr. McCuaig) maintained that he was justified in bringing this matter before the House, and in insisting that Judges should discharge their duties impartially. Judges had no right to comment upon a man's religious or political opinions. In the county where he resided, they had many Catholics and Orangemen, between whom there was no difficulty whatever. The course he (Mr. McCuaig) had taken was in the interest of the people. He hoped that, by addressing the Judges on this matter, and calling the attention of Parliament to it, a stop would be put to such conduct as that under consideration.

Mr. RYAN (Montreal Centre) said he desired to make a few remarks in reply to the member for Lambton. He certainly thought that any question which occupied the attention of the public press, and concerned a large minority of the people of Canada, might well be considered in the House, and could not be termed trivial or unimportant. This was not purely a Catholic question, and it was not a Catholic who brought it up to-day, but the member for Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig), who felt that this Judge had exceeded his duty. If the charges brought against that Judge were true, he was unworthy to fill the position of Vice-Chancellor. The remark that this charge had only appeared in the Catholic press was not correct; a long article was published in the National, in Toronto, reiterating the charge, and up to this moment he (Mr. Ryan) was not aware that either the Vice-Chancellor or any other gentleman had denied it, though Mr. Blake was apt to rush into print and defend himself when he could do so. He had no desire to do anything but protest against the language of the members for Lambton and Chateaugay, from whom he expected better, having looked upon the hon. member for Chateaugay as straightforward and honourable. He had hoped that hon. gentleman would not have taken advantage of points of order to rule an hon. gentleman out of order in calling attention to an insult to more than a million and a half of the people.

Mr. RYKERT said he regretted the conduct of the Judges should be called in question in the House. There were occasions when Judges went beyond legitimate bounds and brought their conduct under notice of the House. When they found a Judge insulting a large portion of their fellow countrymen, they were bound, as members of the House, to defend them, and see whether the charges had any foundation. If they had any it was their bounden duty to ask the House or Government to investigate them. The House had power to impeach the Judges, and it was the duty of the Government to see that something was done in regard to such charges. He (Mr. Rykert) thought that the only fault or great mistake he could point to in the course of the Premier was his appointment of Mr. Blake to the Bench. A more petulant, technical, prejudiced Judge never sat on the Bench, for which he was totally unfit. In his (Mr. Rykert's) professional experience of twenty-five years he had never found a man but him lose his temper on the Bench. When he found him mixing in all kinds of controversies, one day with hotel keepers about tavern licenses, and the next in discussions at prayer meetings and synods, he could judge of his character. Was it proper to find a Judge violating the Dunkin Act in the county of Grey; was he in his proper place? When he was found in an assailable position like that, the Government ought to take action. He was sorry to impugn the character of a Judge, but, as a professional man, he must take issue with the statement that Judge Blake was an honest, upright man. His conduct as a Judge, on several occasions brought before the notice of the country, showed conclusively that he was most petulant and prejudiced.

MR. BOULTBEE said that he thought this discussion had been dragged to an improper length. There was nothing of greater importance than the respect due to the Bench, which a debate like this was calculated to militate against. He must confess that he thought the proceeding this afternoon had been pushed too far, and, as an English subject and a man, he thought it was cowardly to strike at a man who could not be here to answer. All who knew him (Mr. Boulton) were aware that his political relations had been antagonistic to the Messrs. Blake; but he was proud to confess that, from his personal experience, he was able to say that the Vice-Chancellor had always conducted himself as a Judge ought, and with extra consideration towards himself, for which he felt obliged. He believed it was an unfortunate and unhappy thing that discussions of this kind should arise in the House.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) said he entirely agreed with what the last speaker had said, and he felt it was only right that, as the article in the Irish Canadian had been referred to, he should state that, within a few days, when in Toronto, he had been informed by a gentleman practicing in the Court of Chancery that Mr. Blake had not made use of the language attributed to him. The mere fact that it was questionable whether he did or not, showed that this House was scarcely the arena in which to discuss the question whether a Judge, on a particular occasion, said a particular thing, or not; and, considering the position in which the Judges stood, he was not prepared to accede to the doctrine that every Judge was immediately compelled to contradict every untrue statement that happened to be made about him. He did not think it was desirable that professional gentlemen should express their opinions in the House pro or con. as to the excellence or impartiality of any Judge on the Bench. He thought it was not desirable they should do so. If the learned Judges did wrong, they were liable to impeachment, and he thought that unofficial discussions as to the conduct or language of Judges on the Bench were to be deprecated. At the same time, he (Mr. Cameron) quite sympathised with his hon. friend who had referred to that subject, and he was bound to admit that, if any Judge had pursued conduct or used expressions that placed him in hostility to a very large class of Her Majesty's subjects, he had shown his unfitness for the judicial position. It had been said that Mr. Blake had done so; that a tavern-keeper, a Roman Catholic, or high churchman of the Church of England would not expect from him impartial justice, which opinion was stated to have originated from the fact that the learned Judge had taken a very active and prominent part in extrajudicial discussions, involving opinions hostile to theirs. It was deeply to be regretted that any Judge should place himself in a position of antagonism to the opinions of large classes among whom he officiated. He (Mr. Cameron) did not say that this Judge had done so; but, as that had been alleged, he must say that it was contrary to the idea of the proper administration of justice for a Judge to place himself in a position in which any suitor might doubt his impartiality. He did not think this Judge should be condemned without satisfactory evidence. He (Mr. Cameron) felt bound to say that he heard the principal charge against him contradicted by a gentleman who, he thought, had an excellent opportunity of knowing whether it was well founded or not.

MR. MILLS said he never supposed that a Judge ceased to be a member of a particular denomination on ascending the Bench. How far he might express his views or theological opinions, was a matter of taste, of which he alone might be considered the judge. He (Mr. Mills) did not suppose that a member of the Bar, who had taken a certain part in proceedings outside the profession, should cease to do so on attaining the Bench. The only way in a country like Canada, where they were so much divided, was to allow every man to entertain what opinions he pleased, and defend them as he thought best, so long as he did not intrude them upon people in his official capacity. They had men of various denominations on the Bench, and, if they said to them: You must leave your religion behind you, and no more go near a Church synod or conference, because all who hold differences of opinion would be offended at your conduct—what would be thought? They knew that this discussion was suggested by the hon. the leader of the House; that there were elections taking place in Ontario, and, although it would be a bad principle, attended with mischievous effects, to attack the Bench on the religious opinions of the Judges, before the House, it was necessary to defeat the Mowat Administration in the interest of Mr. Meredith and those who followed him. These considerations were undoubtedly paramount with the hon. gentleman. The confidence of the people in the administration of justice was a secondary matter. It was of consequence, however, that one gentleman after another should rise in the House, and attack a gentleman on the Bench, an eminent member of the Court of Equity. It was because this gentleman was a brother of a gentleman occupying a prominent position in the country, who had taken an active part in the administration of affairs, and for whom hon. gentlemen opposite had no great admiration or affection, that these hon. gentlemen thought they would wound the feelings of that distinguished gentleman, and by doing so influence the elections, and the Catholic people of Ontario, by the course which they had taken towards Judge Blake; but the opinions expressed by Father Stafford showed that these views were not very likely to be shared by many of that denomination in the Province of Ontario, who were not likely to be misled by the cries of hon. gentleman opposite. He apprehended that, when these elections had taken place, hon. gentlemen opposite would find that, although they might have degraded the Bench, and caused the people to distrust the uprightness of the Judges, and the fairness with which justice was administered, they would not obtain much politically by the course they had seen proper to adopt here this afternoon, or accomplish the results which were being aimed at.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman had ventured to make the statement that this debate was brought up and initiated by himself (Sir John A. Macdonald). He would ask the hon. gentleman, as a man of honour, and as a member of Parliament, what ground he had for making such an allegation?

MR. MILLS said that the hon. gentleman was leader of the House, he had seen proper to assist the hon. gentleman (Mr. Costigan), in bringing forward this question for discussion, and he must have known that the hon. gentleman could not conclude with a motion which was proper for the consideration of the House, and yet friends of the hon. gentleman's, in the last days of the Session, had seen proper, one after another, to rise and attack Vice-Chancellor Blake, and the object of the attack was well understood by the House. There could be no doubt on this point.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he had asked the hon. gentleman a plain question—what right, what authority, what evidence he had that he (Sir John A. Macdonald) had initiated or encouraged this motion, or the bringing up of this question at all? The hon. gentleman said it was because he assisted his hon. friend in being heard. When a member made a statement of this kind, so gross a statement of this kind, he was bound to prove it, and if he could not prove it he was bound to retract; and, if he did not retract, he must be held up to be a man wanting in veracity, and as a calumniator; and he was obliged to brand the hon. gentleman as being untruthful in this respect, and as a calumniator.

MR. MILLS: The hon. gentleman has assisted members here in calumniating.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD appealed to the member for the county of Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig) and his hon. friend from New Brunswick (Mr. Costigan) if there was any communication, directly or indirectly, on this subject by them with him—if their action was prompted by or known to him. He declared, upon his honour as a gentleman, and in his place as a member of Parliament, that there had been no communication, directly or indirectly, with him upon this subject, and the hon. gentleman had ventured to make this statement which was untrue in fact, and which he could not suppose to be true. No man had a right to suppose or assert such a thing unless he had evidence for it. It was untrue, it was false, it was unvarnished, and the hon. gentleman would be stamped hereafter in this House and out of the House as a man who got up for party motives and made unjust and unwarrantable and false assertions. It was quite true that, when this matter was brought up, he saw there was an evident attempt to put down some young members, and it was his duty to give them fair play. He had laid down a correct principle with respect to motions, and Mr. Speaker had upheld the opinion he ventured to express with respect to the practice of Parliament, and there could be no doubt of the accuracy of Mr. Speaker's judgment, and of his ruling on this point. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) had made an unfounded and unwarrantable attack on him, as having got up this scene. The hon. gentleman should not measure other people by his own bushel, for a man who charged others with unworthy motives, was capable of acting unworthily himself. There was not a shadow of foundation for the hon. gentleman's charge. The subject was divided into two branches, the duty of the House and the duty of the Government. It was quite true that Judges held almost sacred positions, and that their dignity should be maintained. Their characters should be defended, their positions should not be degraded, all the moral weight that Parliament could give should be given to the Judges undoubtedly, but, at the same time, Parliament had authority which governed and guided the country. If a Judge was unworthy of his office, this should be brought before Parliament in a constitutional way, and the Judge should have an opportunity to defend himself. On a joint address to the Crown, if Parliament thought proper, he could be removed, but the Government had no right to make any fishing investigation, or on mere rumour to try and get up evidence against a Judge. Satisfactory evidence must be laid before the Government before they could bring it before Parliament; but a Judge who had exhibited improper traits of temper, or indolence, or habits of procrastination, or who, from other causes, was not so efficient as he ought to be, was liable to be censured or warned by a discussion in Parliament. Such complaints had been often made in the British House of Commons, and, in the case of Baron Smith, an actual adverse vote was taken on account of his political bias and hasty temperament, though this did not involve the Baron's removal. Sir Robert Peel subsequently informed the House that, while it was quite right that such complaints should be aired before the House, and that Judges should be warned that they were not infallible, and that the great public opinion stood over them, there should be no conclusive vote against a Judge unless he had a fair opportunity of being heard, and the House of Commons rescinded their vote. All through the English Hansard were strewn matters brought up, not involving the seat of the Judge, but letting him know that, in some way or other, he had failed in his duty, and calling his attention to the necessity of mending his ways. This discussion, he took it, was brought up in this spirit. They must and did read the newspapers. These charges were spread through the country. He did not know whether they were true, but there was no reason in the world why the attention of Parliament should not be drawn to them. If, in an unguarded moment, Judge Blake, or any other Judge, had used unseemly expressions, it was well that he should be warned of it so that he might not commit a like error again. It was useful that Judges should be occasionally informed that they were neither infallible nor immortal. An hon. member had disapproved of the appointment. Mr. Blake did not belong, and never did, to the same party as himself. He was quite aware of this fact when, in his capacity of Minister of Justice, he recommended him. He did so because he believed that Mr. Blake was a good equity lawyer, and would make a good equity Judge, and he was not ashamed of the recommendation. He thought that the course of Mr. Blake was, on the whole—he was, of course, fallible, like other men—such as to justify the recommendation and appointment by the Crown. He had no hesitation in saying it. If the expression mentioned had been really used by Mr. Blake, it was an unseemly remark, and there could be no objection, when unseemly remarks were made by Judges, that they should be spoken of not only in the press, but in the great council of the nation. He believed from what he could learn, he could not speak at all from personal acquaintance himself, that Mr. Blake's demeanour and conduct and capacity on the Bench were worthy of praise. He found, from talking with leading members of the profession that they considered this gentleman on the whole a worthy and good Judge, and no disgrace to the Bench of Ontario.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant) said no rebuke to the gentlemen who had been participating in the charges against Vice-Chancellor Blake had been equal to that administered by the Prime Minister. That hon. gentleman, in order to clear his skirts of this matter, had found it necessary to describe the person who had brought it up as a calumniator, and as a man whose word was not to be taken outside of the House or in it. How despicable must be the position of the hon. gentlemen who were described by their leader in such terms. Was it right or proper that an hon. Judge's name should be brought before this House by a member who was not prepared to formulate any charge or to take any steps that would result in anything? His action was based on mere newspaper rumours, and he had reason to believe that they were without foundation. With reference to the motion itself, no one would deny any right or any measure of justice to the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Costigan), but was it proper that an honourable Judge of this country should have his name brought before this House on mere newspaper rumours, a member rising, and not prepared to formulate any charge against him, and whose motion, when it appeared before the House, was only to the effect that certain rumours were going about in the newspapers? And yet these very rumours, according to the testimony of a political friend of the hon. gentleman himself, were without foundation.

MR. COSTIGAN said there had been bonâ fide charges made in writing by responsible parties, and the names of witnesses given who could prove those charges. He was not resting his claim upon mere charges as they appeared in the newspapers.

MR. PATERSON said it could not be denied that the hon. gentleman saw fit to bring it up at a time when a regular motion could not be made, and that he received the countenance of the First Minister in doing so.

MR. HAY said he had known Vice-Chancellor Blake for twenty-five years, and knew that he was totally incapable of insulting any class of the community. He would say, further, that there was no gentleman in Toronto who stood higher in the esteem of the people than did that gentleman.

MR. WALLACE (South Norfolk) said the hon. member for South Brant had misapprehended the tenor of the remarks of the Premier, as regarded the member for Bothwell. The charge of calumny was not in the statement that was brought forward by the member for Victoria, but it was based upon the motive imputed to the hon. the Premier for allowing that motion to be brought forward. The hon. member for Bothwell charged the hon. the Premier with having invited his followers to bring forward this motion, that he might influence the election in Ontario. That charge the Premier designated as a calumny, and the originator of it as a calumniator.

MR. MCCARTHY said he regretted very much the painful discussion they had listened to. He regretted it because it tended to degrade the Bench, in the stability, and in the honour and integrity of which every member of this House and of the community was interested. He felt that, when a charge of this kind was made, the gentleman who made it ought to put it in a more formal shape than the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Costigan) had done. He did not suppose the hon. gentleman had brought it up without believing that it was his duty to do so. He felt some delicacy in attempting to pass an opinion regarding the conduct of that learned Judge, because he had to practise before him from time to time, but, his conduct as a Judge having been impugned, he felt it would be unworthy of him to sit here and not say that, so far as he was acquainted with him, he was not open to the imputations which had been made against him on the floor of the House.

He knew, and he thought he expressed the general opinion of the Bar in Ontario, that, whatever his faults might be—and, like every other man, no doubt he had his faults—he endeavoured to discharge, and did discharge, his duty to the satisfaction of the Bar and the public generally. Now, with regard to the opinion that the Vice-Chancellor formed with regard to a witness who was examined before him, and who happened to have been Archbishop Lynch of Toronto, he (Mr. McCarthy) did not know what right any hon. gentleman had to question the right of a Judge to form an opinion regarding any witness who was examined before him. A Judge was sworn to discharge his duty, and to discharge it impartially, irrespective of persons, and, if he did, on this particular occasion, form a judgment which did not exactly square with the evidence given by the Archbishop, he did not know that the hon. Judge ought to be called to account by that particular reason. Another charge that had been made, if it was true—and he was glad to hear the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) say that he had the best reason to think it was not true—was one that would be painful if it were true, because a lady, having been brought before the learned Judge as a witness, ought to have been protected and not insulted, as it was alleged she had been insulted. He never heard that charge until it was mentioned in the newspapers, and it appeared it had happened several years ago. He felt satisfied the charge could not be true—he trusted, at all events, it was not true. Having said so much, he had only to add that he thought the hon. member for Bothwell had made a most grave and unfair charge against the Premier. There was no desire—and the action taken by a number of gentlemen on that side of the House showed in the plainest way there was no possible desire—to influence the pending elections, by allowing this matter to be brought up. There could have been no such intention, and he was sorry his hon. friend had not the good taste to withdraw the charge thus made.

MR. COSTIGAN said the hon. the leader of the Government had appealed to him with regard to the charge made by the hon. member for Bothwell. He wished to inform this House that the hon. member for Bothwell himself had as much to do with his action in this matter as the right hon. gentleman. The right hon. gentleman knew no more that he was to rise at all than the hon. member for Bothwell. He was to have taken a minor part in this debate, but, finding that the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig) was blocked by the hon. member for Chateauguay, he then came to his assistance. With the permission of the House, he would ask leave to withdraw the motion.

MR. MCCUAIG : I have had no communication with any member of the Government whatever.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

House resumed the further consideration of Resolution 88, Pacific Railway, British Columbia, $600,000, reported from Committee of Supply (April 30th).

MR. MACKENZIE said he objected to this resolution because the money was to be expended in some place not defined ; but there was no use attempting to discuss an amendment in such a small House at this period of the Session.

Resolution read the first and second times, and agreed to, on a division.

RIVIÈRE DU LOUP BRANCH PURCHASE BILL.

(Mr. Tupper.)

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Order for House to consider certain resolutions authorising arrangements for the purchase by the Government from the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, of their line of railway from Rivière du Loup to Hadlow, read.

MR. TUPPER said he regretted exceedingly that a measure of such importance as this should have been postponed to so late a period. It was not his fault, nor could he say it was the fault of any person. He took up this question where it was left by his predecessor, who had it under his consideration, and subsequently the Government decided that, if they could obtain the ownership of that portion of the Grand Trunk Railway between the Chaudière Junction and Rivière du Loup, and the connection with Quebec Harbour at Point Lévis, it would be very desirable to do so. He then communicated to the manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, Mr. Hickson, that the Government were prepared to receive an offer for the purchase of that portion of the road; in reply to which, that gentleman informed him that he would take an early opportunity to submit a formal offer to the Government. In the meantime that gentleman met with a very severe accident, which prevented his coming here to discuss the question before a very short time ago. From the moment he had been able to come here, no time had been lost in bringing the matter to its present point, and in putting the House in possession of it. The necessity for the purchase of that portion of the Grand Trunk Railway was evident on several grounds. In the first instance, the Act of Union provided that the Intercolonial Railway should be built to connect the waters of the Gulf of the St. Lawrence with the ocean at Halifax. That, practically, could not be carried out in the spirit of the Act without obtaining this connection at Quebec. Then, again, the Grand Trunk Railway had not been enabled to keep up this portion of their railway at all in the condition in which the rest of the Intercolonial Railway was and a great obstruction on the latter railway arose from that fact. It was, he believed, the only portion of the Grand Trunk Railway that had not been relaid with steel rails. It only, therefore, became necessary that they should provide, in the present condition of that company, the means of putting this road in a proper condition; but the fact also was not unimportant in pressing the immediate necessity of carrying out this project that the Grand Trunk Railway had experienced a good deal of difficulty in protecting their trade and maintaining their connection with the West, and the Government had reason to believe that it was at present almost essential in Canadian interests that they should have the means of securing a connection upon which their western trade would considerably depend. Under these circumstances the Government arrived at the conclusion that it was desirable they should obtain the ownership of a railway from Rivière du Loup not only to the Chaudière Junction, but also to Quebec Harbour. They thought that a fair mode of arriving at the price was to look at what expenditure the Government would be obliged to make, provided that road was not in existence. They addressed themselves to that consideration, and those who looked at the papers would see that the road was obtained from Rivière du Loup to the Chaudière Junction, the old iron rails not being purchased, but merely retained until they could relay the road with steel rails very cheaply, at a cost of about $13,000, or a little under, per mile. Mr. Schreiber had examined this road in 1876, and was instructed to give the Government an estimate of what it would cost to build a similar road. Mr. Schreiber came to the conclusion that it would cost $1,859,256 to build the road from Rivière du Loup to Chaudière Junction, 119 miles, in the same condition as the Intercolonial. He then estimated the cost of relaying the track with steel rails, and putting it in the same condition as the Intercolonial, at $356,280, which would leave $1,502,976, as the lowest sum for which they could obtain a road in the same condition as the Intercolonial. The road from the Chaudière Junction was a very expensive one. The heavy cuttings, and everything else connected with it, would involve a very much greater expenditure than the other portions of the road. They required also to have a terminus at Quebec harbour, and, in order to obtain that, it was necessary to run up six and a quarter miles from Chaudière Junction to Hadlow, a property on which the Grand Trunk Railway, at this moment, with their wharves, engine-house, shops, etc., were paying on an assessment of $120,000 a year. The 6½ miles with the Hadlow property furnishing them with an independent means of access to the harbour, were put down at $200,000, which was a very low price, and which brought the total amount, at Mr. Schrieber's estimate, to $1,700,000 for this property as a very low sum at which they could hope to provide it. It was thought desirable that they should not only have running powers, but that the Government should have actually fee simple, including the terminal property at Hadlow, with a view to being entirely independent of the Grand Trunk connection at Point Lévis. Although the Government did not wish to acquire the valuable station property at Hadlow, the Government arranged that the Grand Trunk Company should have free running powers over the line from the Chaudière Junction to Hadlow, and that they should have free running powers through their station, only paying the actual expense of moving their traffic. These were the propositions, but the Government felt that, although their own engineer had arrived at the conclusion that it was the very lowest estimate he could put on this property, yet, inasmuch as the property was an unprofitable one to the Grand Trunk, that company should not expect to receive the full amount at the hands of the Government, and they, therefore, made a proposition that the highest they could give for the whole of this property was $1,500,000. The receipts of the line at present exceeded the working expenses by about $28,000 per annum.

MR. MACKENZIE: Surely not.

MR. TUPPER said he was informed upon good authority, that the receipts during the past year, which was not a profitable one, exceeded the working expenses of the line by about $28,000. The Government deemed, in a matter of such importance, that it would not be unwise to have additional information, and, although they had carefully scrutinised and verified Mr. Schrieber's statements, so as to leave no doubt that he had made a very low estimate, they sent his report to Mr. Shanly, with a request that he would favour the Government with his opinion on it. Among the papers submitted would be found a letter from Mr. Shanly, in which he estimated the 119 miles, in the property the Government had purchased, exclusive of the old iron rails, at a value of $1,758,000, and Mr. Shanly assured him (Mr. Tupper), in the most emphatic terms, that, even with the low price of labour and steel rails, and the favourable time for railway construction, if the ground was clear he did not believe it would be possible to build a road in the same condition for that amount of money. To that he added, for the 6½ miles with the Hadlow property, $300,000, or a total of $2,100,000, which was the value Mr. Shanly placed upon the property. He had already stated that their offer to the Grand Trunk was over $200,000 below Mr. Schrieber's estimate, and $600,000 below Mr. Shanly's estimate. The House could see that the Government had attached a good deal of importance to the object for which this money was to be used by the Grand Trunk Railway, and they had, in the resolutions, made provision for the retention of power in their hands, which would enable them to see that this money was expended in a way that they believed would eminently conduce to promote the trade and business interests of Canada.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is, expended on the railway.

MR. TUPPER said no, it was to be expended in securing the Western connections of the Grand Trunk Railway, not the existing line. When the subject was brought to the attention of Parliament, last year, he then, as he had always done, regarded it as of the greatest importance. He drew the attention of the then First Minister and Minister of Public Works, to the importance of securing, in the negotiations with the Grand Trunk, in regard to the Rivière du Loup line, bonds by which the Intercolonial would be secure against any desire or interest, on the part of the Grand Trunk, to divert the trade to Portland. They had provided for that here.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not understand that it is provided for.

MR. TUPPER said he thought they were effectually secured against the contingency to which he drew attention. There was, of course, the additional advantage that, by securing the ownership of the harbour of Quebec, they would be in connection with the railway on the North Shore, and would not be so entirely dependent on the Grand Trunk for all their traffic as they were before the construction of that line. That would be an additional guarantee to the country; a guarantee that they would always obtain from the Grand Trunk most favourable rates as an inducement to continue the connection of trade and business as it previously and now existed. He thought hon. gentlemen would find that they had made arrangements, which, if ratified by the House, would enable them to obtain possession of the property at a reasonable rate, and upon terms which would thoroughly secure the interests of Canada in relation to its purchase.

MR. MACKENZIE said that, when he gave notice last year, he gave it simply for the purpose of obtaining the sanction of Parliament before acting. The matter had occupied his attention for more than two years before, because he found trains were seriously delayed on the Intercolonial. On the other hand, he was extremely anxious to avoid purchasing any more railroads. He believed no railroads should be purchased by the State, and he believed they were only making them until some arrangement could be made to transfer them to private companies. He was, therefore, indisposed to purchase it at almost any rate. Another thing naturally occurred to him, which must have occurred to hon. gentlemen opposite, and that was, that the commercial value of the road was nothing compared with the actual value of the road. The Grand Trunk invariably complained that they had lost a large sum in operating it up to the time the Intercolonial was opened, and he understood that, even up to the end of last year, there was a loss. It was, therefore, desirable for the Grand Trunk, at almost any price, to get rid of the burden of maintaining this road. He must recal to the House the fact that they had already a very large interest in the road. There was 864 miles altogether of the Grand Trunk Railway in Canada, and upon that the Government of Canada had advanced a sum considerably in excess of $15,000,000, or something over $17,000 per mile. So if they took the $4,500,000 applied on the Victoria bridge, which cost a large sum of money, there would still remain an amount of over $10,000 per mile which the old Province of Canada had paid for the purpose of constructing the Grand Trunk Railway. He felt that, whatever price they might pay for this branch, if they paid it at all, they were buying back a road which had been constructed with Government money to a great extent. He felt that branch was of practically little value to anyone and of much less value to Canada than anyone else. There was nothing in the Terms of Union which compelled them to keep up a communication with Quebec. They reached the connecting link long before they reached Rivière du Loup, but, as a commercial enterprise, it was undoubtedly necessary to maintain connection with Quebec. In some way they must have control of the Rivière du Loup Branch, but he would have preferred that control to have been by lease. The objection to extend their railway proprietorship was what led him to this conclusion. But there was another thing of serious import, and that was, if the Grand Trunk Railroad had its line terminating at Point Lévis there would be a direct temptation to send traffic to Portland. The hon. Minister of Public Works thought he had done what would prevent that by Order in Council. That simply provided that the charges should be pro rata on both lines. The hon. gentleman would see something more than that was required. He (Mr. Mackenzie) discussed that matter with the railroad authorities several times, and he was never able to obtain satisfaction upon that point. The Grand Trunk had about 120 more miles of railroad to Portland than they had to the junction of the Government road at Point Lévis. Although the rate was the same they would naturally desire to send more of their traffic where they had the larger mileage. He would like to see something more provided in order to insure the Western traffic over their road. He would not blame the Grand Trunk authorities if they sent the bulk of their traffic over the road that paid them best, but he desired to point out that there was a direct temptation in every way to send the bulk of their freight to Portland. He knew the hon. gentleman would get his resolutions through the House, but he (Mr. Mackenzie) would point out this danger to him in the expectation that he would yet be able to make some more stringent arrangement that would secure the passage of the traffic over our own road.

MR. TUPPER: If the hon. gentleman will give me any suggestion, it is not too late to offer it.

MR. MACKENZIE said he quite admitted the difficulty. All that took place between himself and the railroad authorities was an assurance from them that they would be prepared to enter into any arrangement that would be made to secure the Government against the anticipated loss of traffic. If the papers had come down sooner, so that they could have had them printed, and had some preliminary discussion two or three weeks ago, they might have suggested some ideas which it would have been advisable to utilise. As it was, he had only to mention that as serious objection to acquiring the proprietorship. By having only a lease of the road, and the Grand Trunk Company still interested as proprietor, they would have a hold on them, and it was for that reason, chiefly, with the other, a dislike of acquiring any further railroad property, that he had almost concluded that the leasing of the road, even if they should advance some money or guarantee a certain amount of bonds, instead of an annual rent, would have been the preferable plan. But he quite admitted there were difficulties in the way of carrying it out. But he saw very clearly that the actual purchase of the road put us out of the field in competing with them when they had an Atlantic terminus so much nearer than ours. Mr. Schrieber's valuation was, as nearly as he (Mr. Mackenzie) could ascertain, correct, as a valuation of property, but it was not correct as a valuation of it as a commercial property. Its value, in that respect, was extremely small. They could not have taken traffic over it another winter. It would have become absolutely necessary to have had the road relaid with new rails. As the matter stood, he could only express his regret that something of that kind was not done, rather than the purchase of the road.

MR. TUPPER said that he had in his hands a statement of receipts and expenditures for the last two years. For the year ending 30th June, 1877, the receipts were $176,998, expenditures, $156,892.14, or a surplus of $25,605.86.

MR. MACKENZIE: Does that embrace the usual repairs to locomotives, cars, and everything of that kind?

MR. TUPPER said it covered everything usually charged against revenue. For the year ending June 30th, 1878, the receipts were $221,220, and expenditure $192,649.18, or a surplus of $28,670.82. He wanted to ask the hon. gentleman if he did not recognise the advantage of purchasing instead of leasing that road, in connection with the other feature to which he had adverted, the aid it would afford the Grand Trunk at a crisis in its history, in the struggle in which it was engaged for the purpose of retaining Canadian trade, and maintaining the Grand Trunk as a great through route for Canada. The acquisition of that branch would give a degree of assistance to the Grand Trunk that, in the interest of Canada, was not undesirable.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was no doubt about that, as stated by the Minister of Public Works, being a very serious matter. His (Mr. Mackenzie's) own attention was directed to it more than a year ago—to the connection of the Canadian railroads with the West. The knowledge of what our two great railroads had done for the development of the country would induce him to go a great way in giving such aid as the Government might reasonably and properly afford. But, on the other hand, this scheme amounted to giving $2,000,000 to a road largely aided before, though he did not say too largely aided, in view of its benefits to Canada. Still, for those $2,000,000 they would receive very little. He admitted that if the thing was properly done, and the money wisely disposed of, it would produce, in a general way, some little return in benefits to trade and increased traffic through the country.

MR. PLUMB said that, as the member for Lambton had observed, the Grand Trunk had laid out a vast amount of money in Canada, and the Government of Canada had advanced a large amount for the purpose of aiding the Grand Trunk to build its line. But it must be remembered that the Government of Canada had given up its lien upon the Grand Trunk, and to say that they were buying back their own road was certainly a fallacy. The Grand Trunk, staggering under an enormous debt, without the means of extending its line, was encountering an opposition which would utterly destroy it and take away its traffic, if not in some way protected by legislation in Canada. If they wanted in any way to protect their Canadian system, over which they could send their freight, and travel with any kind of safety, they must regard the conditions by which the Grand Trunk was connected with the traffic towards Halifax. Everyone knew that the Rivière du Loup Branch was an excrescence and tax upon the Grand Trunk; but it was a mistake to say it had no value. The bondholders paid for it, giving Canada that accommodation which Canadians did not half appreciate; and it was in the interest of the bondholders that he hoped that the Parliament of Canada would, in every case of this kind, remember their sacrifices, and deal with them not in a captious, but in a liberal spirit. He believed that what the Government proposed was a perfectly legitimate thing for Parliament to do. He thought it was in the interest of the country to acquire that road and put it in repair. While the negotiations proceeded, the line had been allowed to run down. The price named was far below the actual cost of the line, as estimated by Mr. Shanly. There could be no bargain, or such a thing, in this matter. They would be possessing themselves of a property necessary for the establishment of a through line from the west to the east in the public interests of Canada; and, in order to make that line perfect, they could not ask the bondholders, or others interested, to put that piece of the road into repair, or in as good condition as the line to the west and east of it. If they leased the line they could not control the repairs. This scheme seemed to be a practical necessity. It seemed to be a business matter, which, he thought, commended itself to the judgment of everyone who had heard the statements on the subject made in the House.

MR. DOMVILLE said he would throw the responsibility for this scheme on Mr. Schreiber, and other engineers, who had advocated this purchase. The Minister of Public Works said it was Messrs. Schreiber and Shanly. If the scheme was a good one, it would stand for itself. Considering the discouragement he (Mr. Domville) had met with the other night, in the advocacy of the rights of New Brunswick, he felt he had a right to demand that, if that railroad were purchased, the Lower Provinces should receive some guarantee that they were to receive better service, and be relieved of the difficulty they were informed of the other night, in regard to through freights. If they were to make that large expenditure, it should be for the benefit of the whole country. The representatives of the Lower Provinces had a right to demand that, while they experienced the odium of a large expenditure of money on the railroad to Halifax, they should receive concurrent advantages. He would say nothing in regard to the purchase of the railroad, because he believed the Minister of Public Works had taken the advice of the engineers. It was something that he would be able to inform his constituents that the late and the present Ministers of Public Works had worked hand-in-hand for that purchase, which consequently must be right.

MR. ANGLIN said there must be some considerations to induce the country to purchase that road at so large a price beyond its actual and productive value. True, it had been in very poor condition for some years. He supposed they might take it for granted that the company were not willing or able to expend a very large amount to keep it in proper condition. While it remained in its present condition, the carrying of freight and passengers over it must be unsatisfactory. The other consideration for the purchase and the payment of so large a price, that it would enable the Grand Trunk to meet its connections in the far West, was a consideration that ought to have much weight with the Government and Parliament, although it was directly contrary to the consideration which the Minister of Public Works asked them to give way to when determining whether they should build the Pacific Railway to Burrard Inlet or not. It was considered a strong objection to the Burrard Inlet route that they should have any connection with the United States railway system. On this side of the Rocky Mountains it was of very great importance that their connections with the American system should be as complete as possible, so that they might bring in and carry over Canadian railroads all possible American traffic. But the Minister of Public Works did not perceive the inconsistency of his arguments and course with regard to those two subjects. He trusted that, as that hon. gentleman attached so much importance to completing the connection of the Grand Trunk in the west with the American system, he would be similarly influenced in determining the selection of the route, in the far West, which would regard the probability of connection with the Oregon system of railroads in a proper light. He thought the hon. gentleman had made a mistake in saying it was an objection to the Burrard Inlet route that it would be possible to connect with the American system of railroads. He (Mr. Anglin) had felt himself, for a long time, that the Dominion, having built the rest of the railroad, should also own that portion between Rivière du Loup and Quebec, that the original idea of connecting Halifax and Quebec by a great public railway should be fully carried out. He had always attached much importance to that, and yet he admitted that, if they did carry it out, they would have to pay a very large price for what, after all, was very little more than sentiment in the matter. It mattered very little to the public whether flour went over the Grand Trunk, or over the Government railway, but it mattered very much to the company who owned this branch at present if they got rid of it on favourable terms. The expense of maintaining this road would be very heavy, and a very large additional burden would be imposed on the people of this country thereby. There could be no doubt that the Grand Trunk Railway Company were making a splendid bargain. The Government were going to pay for this property very much more than it was worth, in a commercial point of view,—he would not say an excessive price, in view of the opinions of Messrs. Schreiber and Shanly; nevertheless, it was a very handsome price to pay for it.

Mr. HOLTON said there could be no doubt that the purchase of the property, so far as commercial purposes were concerned, however necessary it might be as a connecting link between the Grand Trunk above and the Intercolonial below, was equivalent to a grant of money directly to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. It might be judicious to make that grant for the reasons stated, but it would be infinitely preferable to make that grant direct, with certain clearly defined stipulations as to the use to be made of the money, and let them keep the road, because they could operate it more economically than the Government. It was a great misfortune that the Government of this country should be placed in the position of being obliged to operate a great many hundreds of miles of railway, and it was a great objection to this scheme that it proposed to add to these hundreds of miles of railway a line already in existence, while it was the obvious interest of this country to diminish this railway responsibility, so long as the proper service of the country could be performed through private agencies. He thought there was a great deal in the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), as to the inducement which the company would have by the diminution of their interest in the direction of this line, to take freight by way of Portland. If they continued to hold this branch, they would have a much more lively interest in attracting traffic to the public railway, than if they were deprived of this 125 miles of road. His (Mr. Holton's) view would be to let the Grand Trunk Railway Company keep this line of railroad and operate it, which they could do more advantageously than the Government could. The Government might aid the company in obtaining the traffic from the extreme west to the extreme east, and extending its western connections. He preferred that the Government should aid them directly by a money grant than that there should be any more losses. There was another point to which he wished to call attention. It was the habit, in discussing the partition of public works paid for by the Dominion, to compute the expenditure in the various Provinces, and the first effect of the proposition now before the House would be computed as an expenditure in the Province of Quebec, where $2,000,000, was about being paid for a road which the Province did not want, and for that reason alone the expenditure would not be received with much pleasure by the people of that Province.

MR. HUNTINGTON said that, after hearing the proposition discussed on its merits, he was not disposed to assume any responsibility, but he left that on the shoulders of the Government. Hon. gentlemen would recollect that, whenever the predecessor of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), quoted the opinion of his engineers, as he was always ready to take their advice, and be guided by their professional knowledge and experience, he used to be a good deal laughed at; but, after listening to this discussion, he (Mr. Huntington) wished to know if the hon. the Minister of Public Works had not come round to the advisability of adopting such a course himself. The hon. gentleman had himself assumed the mantle worn by the hon. member for Lambton, and found that he too must take advantage of the knowledge of the engineers by whom he was surrounded, although he had laughed at his predecessor for doing the same thing.

Resolutions read the first and second times, and agreed to, on a division.

MR. TUPPER introduced a Bill (No. 119) For the acquisition by the Dominion of a certain portion of the Grand Trunk Railway, to be made part of the Intercolonial Railway.

Bill read the first time.

MR. TUPPER moved the second reading of the Bill.

MR. MACKENZIE asked what was meant by these words in the 1st section: "Interest shall be paid on the value of such rails as may not be taken up or delivered to the company, according to agreement?"

MR. TUPPER said the agreement would provide that they should have free use of the rails for a year and-a-half, to give them an opportunity to relay the track with steel rails, and, if they were not ready to do so, they would pay a rate of six per cent. interest on the portion they were still using, until they were delivered.

MR. MACKENZIE: What are the terms of the agreement as to the payment?

MR. TUPPER: That whenever the road is handed over under the agreement, they will be entitled to their money.

MR. MACKENZIE: How does this sale of the road by the company, and its purchase by the Government, affect the position of the bondholders of the company, because I fear that the Company are parting with rights which are not theirs to sell?

MR. TUPPER: They must acquire them before they can sell them.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: They must give a good title before they can get the money.

MR. MACKENZIE said he feared if the company parted with two millions' worth of that road, we would have demands made upon us by the English bondholders to recoup them.

MR. TUPPER said he was instructed that the bondholders had the same right to vote as the other members of the company, and, therefore, no sale could be effected until they were all committed to it. At all events, he could say to the hon. gentleman, that care would be taken that no money would be paid until an undefeasible title to the property was obtained.

MR. HOLTON asked if the sale should not be made subject to the approval of the various classes of security-holders who had a right to vote. He knew that in some Grand Trunk Acts which had been before the House in past years, a reservation was inserted, subject to the approval of the shareholders of the various classes, naming them, if it were necessary, as the security-holders, the shareholders and the bondholders. He mentioned that in conversation a few days ago with a gentleman representing the Grand Trunk, who told him that that would be done.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he believed, as a matter of fact, all the holders of securities, whether preferential or original bondholders, had a right to vote, and, therefore, he thought that under this clause that matter would be settled. If it were not, he should have deemed it inadvisable to put in a clause in this Bill which might be held to recognise a lien or mortgage of these various classes of bondholders. It was no affair of the Government what the various claims, or the moral or equitable considerations of these people might be; all they had to do was to see that in any case the titles were good.

MR. HOLTON said the position of all these classes of security-holders was defined by Canadian Statute at this moment in force. It seemed to him that, in any legislation that ensued, they ought to be consistent with themselves.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, according to his recollection of transactions with the Grand Trunk, he did not think the bonds were made specific mortgages. He did not think that these bonds were specific liens or mortgages on any square inch of the Grand Trunk. They were claims against the assets of the Grand Trunk, and nothing more; and, it would be a great mistake if they were, by legislative enactment, to declare that these people had a mortgage or lien. All the Crown had to do was to take the best legal advice, and, if it appeared that there was a clear legal and equitable title, conveyed by the Grand Trunk to the Government, the money would be paid, and not before. It would be infinitely better to leave it in that way. But, if they put a clause in, recognising directly, or indirectly, in any way the different classes, they would be doing what the bondholders had no right to ask from them. They had no right to ask any additional legislation, or to get any new recognition of their various interests under this Act. It was better to leave it as it stood for the protection of the interest of the Dominion, and for the quiet and early settlement of this title.

MR. HOLTON suggested that it would be better to allow it to stand until tomorrow, and, the Government, in the meantime, could look into the question. Of course, the Bill would pass in five minutes, if the Government satisfied the House that it was prudent to pass it as it was.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that in a Bill carried through some years ago, under the auspices of Mr. Brydges, an agent of the Grand Trunk, by Mr. Dorion, Minister of Justice, all the bonds were made into stock, and the bondholders were made shareholders, except in the equipment bonds, and they were principally charged on the rolling stock, so that there would be no difficulty really in making a good title. It was of great consequence that Parliament should not, directly or indirectly, by any legislation, alter, amend, or improve, or affect in any way the condition of the old bondholders. Whatever their rights were, they were there by law; they could be ascertained by legal men, and it must be seen that all equitable or legal claims of bondholders were fully swept off before a clear and marketable title was made and the money paid over. He thought it would be safe to leave it as it was, as in an ordinary case of expropriation for any Government purpose whatever.

MR. HOLTON said, if the right hon. gentleman, after looking at the Statute, thought so, they would all be of that opinion too, but he really thought a more recent Statute, at all events, ought to be examined before the Bill went any further, especially as no time would be lost. The line recommended by the right hon. gentleman might be a true line, but they were adopting it ignorantly. In a matter of this sort they ought to look at the Statutes. They did not want to hamper the Grand Trunk Railway in any way, but they did not want to put it into the power of a certain class of bondholders to say that they were legislating away their rights. At all events, they ought to see they were not doing it.

SIR JOHN. A. MACDONALD said he could understand that his hon. friend was a Conservative in all these matters; he wished he was a Conservative in another higher and better sense. In this sense his hon. friend was a great protector of vested rights, and as such was one of the most valuable members of this House. But, really, they had got very little time before them, and he would like to see some progress made. He would be glad to go with his hon. friend to-morrow and look into the Statutes. If they found they had made a mistake in this legislation, they could easily get the Senate to correct it. In the meanwhile, it would be a great thing to get through the Bill to-night.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he noticed, in the second section of this Act, that the payment of the purchase money was made absolute in cash. Now, he could understand there might be necessary reasons for doing that, but he should have thought it would have been more expedient to have taken the option of paying in bonds at a certain rate. They were about to require to raise a very large sum of money; $10,000,000 at least were asked for on capital account in the Estimates of the next year. There was also a very large sum of money falling due in England, and it did appear to him that it was exposing them to the gravest inconvenience to stipulate absolutely for the payment of the sum of $1,500,000 in cash. It would have been more prudent to have reserved, at any rate, the option of handing over the bonds at some fixed rate, or paying cash, as might be found most convenient.

MR. TILLEY said there was some difficulty in handing over bonds to individuals, especially as the Government might be in the market at the same time. It might affect the Government to have $1,500,000 in the hands of the Grand Trunk Company, disposing of them at the same time the Government were placing securities on the market.

Bill read the second and third times, and passed.

SUPPLY.—CONCURRENCE.

Resolutions 294 to 296, reported from Committee of Supply (May 12th), read the first and second times, and agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and means.

(In the Committee.)

The following Resolutions were agreed to, and ordered to be reported:—

"1. Resolved, That, towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty for the financial year ending 30th June, 1879, the sum of $1,003,370.24 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

"2. Resolved, That, towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty for the financial year ending 30th June, 1880, the sum of $23,612,455.31 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada."

House resumed.

Resolutions reported.

MR. TILLEY moved concurrence in the resolutions.

MR. MACKENZIE said the House had yet to get the information concerning the Letellier matter. He spoke on behalf the of hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) and the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), neither of whom was in his place. He could not let this opportunity pass without getting the information in their absence.

MR. HOLTON said he supposed the right hon. gentleman would come to an agreement that the matter should be taken up on the second reading of the Supply Bill, to-morrow, as the House had been promised an opportunity to discuss the matter. It would be in the last degree improper that Parliament should rise without the fullest information in the possession of the Government being placed before them.

MR. TUPPER said that matters must reach a certain stage before they could be submitted to Parliament. An old Parliamentarian like his hon. friend from Châteauguay would attach no great importance to procedure and form to insist that a matter of this kind should be laid before Parliament before it had reached its full development.

MR. HOLTON said that the Government, on their responsibility, announced to Parliament that a leading member of their Administration had been despatched on an important mission to the Court of St. James. That gentleman was now at sea, and, in a matter of such importance, the Government might hold Parliament until his return, which they were assured would be very speedy. At all events, the House was entitled to the fullest information which the Government could give in regard to the whole matter.

MR. MILLS said it had always been the practice in England, in fact it was by that that the authority of the House of Commons grew up, that all grounds of complaint should receive consideration, and be redressed when the supplies were under consideration, as a condition under which these supplies were obtained. The hon. gentleman at the head of the Government had informed the House that His Excellency had not seen proper to accept their advice, and had referred this question to England. Therefore, a supporter of the Administration put a notice on the paper, intended as an attack on His Excellency, and an exculpation of the Administration. The notice declared, in effect, that the reference of these affairs to England was an unconstitutional proceeding. The speech of the hon. the Premier, in answer to the hon. member who had complained of this reference, invited the motion which that hon. gentleman put on the notice paper. The press of Quebec, which supported the Administration, had indulged in violent attacks upon His Excellency from that hour down to the present. Those hon. gentlemen, members of the Administration, it was true, came down afterwards and informed the House that they were responsible for this reference to England, but they had previously informed the House that they regretted it had been made. In fact, they intimated to Parliament that the advice they had given had not been acted on, and it was with reference to the conduct of His Excellency, as distinguished from the advice given by the Government, that the motion was made. Had the Government regarded this notice as a vote of want of confidence, they would have insisted on the motion being dealt with; but the motion, having been intended to extenuate their conduct, and to aim at that of His Excellency, a wholly different course had been adopted. The Government had taken every step necessary to complete the business of the Session, yet had allowed the motion to stand for weeks on the paper, and were prepared to allow the House to rise without the question being dealt with.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said hon. gentlemen opposite would settle among themselves what the meaning of this motion of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) was. The other day the hon. member for Châteauguay (Mr. Holton) said this was a distinct vote of want of confidence in the present Administration. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) did not agree with the great Parliamentary authority, his friend from Châteauguay, and said it was not a vote of want of confidence.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. member for Bothwell said a good follower of the Government had been incited to bring on this motion for the purpose of throwing blame on the Governor-General, and getting the Government out of the scrape. Both cannot be true.

MR. MACKENZIE: Which is true?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said neither was true. It was not a vote of want of confidence, it was not a censure on the Governor-General. The hon. gentleman made a proposition that the reference to England, a thing which had been of annual occurrence since Canada had a Constitution, that the continuance of that practice was subversive of responsible government. He thought they could fairly afford to discuss the abstract constitutional question, but he did not see the sense of making the motion as it had been made. However, as he said the other day, when discussing this motion, he hoped to have another opportunity of discussing it, but he might be disappointed.

MR. MACKENZIE : What do you think ?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, happily, in these days they had means of speedy communication with England, and he would be delighted to be able to give such information regarding the decision of Her Majesty's Ministers as would satisfy hon. gentlemen. The moment the question was decided, Parliament would be able to take it up and deal with it. Our privileges and our rights were safe in the hands of Her Majesty's advisers, whether they were Liberals or Conservatives. Therefore, they could keep their souls in patience and carry the Supply Bill. They knew that no privileges, or rights, or freedom, would be invaded in any way whatever.

MR. HOLTON said the hon. gentleman raised the bugbear of stoppage of supplies. It was not a question of that. They were quite willing to allow the resolutions to be read a second and third time that night, but they wanted it understood that the fulfilment of the promise of the hon. gentlemen, with regard to the Letellier matter, should take place on the second reading of the Supply Bill. These explanations were eminently fit and proper, and he did not think the House should rise without them.

MR. SPEAKER : I put the question.

MR. HOLTON : No ; I want an understanding on this point.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I have stated all I intend to state to-night. I make no agreement at all about it.

Several Hon. MEMBERS : Carried.

MR. HOLTON : Hon. gentlemen may save themselves the trouble of crying "carried" ; it cannot be carried to-night.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : All right. If the hon. gentleman chooses to take the responsibility of objecting, he can do so. It will cost the country $100,000 more, that is all.

MR. HOLTON : The hon. gentleman throws menaces across the House.

MR. RYAN (Montreal Centre) : I rise to a point of order.

MR. SPEAKER : I declare concurrence to be taken to-morrow.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

[BILL 94.]

(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

SENATE AMENDMENTS AGREED TO.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the House agree to the amendments made by the Senate to the Bill.

MR. MILLS said there was a large number of Indians at Selkirk, half-breeds, who were embraced within the treaty. They were no more entitled to be within the treaty than the people of Ottawa. Some of them were three-fourths white. He was of opinion that it would be better to induce these people to withdraw from the treaty arrangements. It would be better they should come under the regulation with regard to half-breeds, and receive a certain allotment of lands, for they were perfectly competent to take care of themselves and their interests. It was unfortunate that they were embraced in the treaty, but the effect of it would be to keep them in it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that that was the main principle of the Bill—that any half-breeds admitted under the treaty might be allowed to withdraw on refunding all the moneys received under it. There could be no objection to that, for half-breeds who had come under the treaty, and had received money, wished to be treated as half-breeds or whites, rather than as Indians, and, if they paid the money back, there could be no objection.

MR. MILLS said they could withdraw under any circumstances. The only effect of this would be the preventing of their becoming residents or taking up land as settlers, under the Homestead Law. The effect would be to keep them Indians, if they paid them the money, instead of encouraging them to withdraw from that state. A large number of them were capable of taking care of themselves, and it was for the interest of the country to get rid of them as wards, as soon as possible.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the law already provided that a person claiming to be an Indian should be so considered. This provision enabled him to free himself of that character, and become a half-breed, on paying back the money received. He would move the adoption of the amendment.

MR. RYAN (Marquette) said that the amendment of the Senate was in the direction of that desired by the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), though not to the full extent. It was to the effect that the recipient should account for what money he had received; in other words, if a half-breed, he should receive more than if an Indian.

Senate amendments agreed to.

[BILL 99.]

(Mr. Macdougall.)

THIRD READING.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on Mr. Macdougall's motion for the third reading of the Bill, and Mr. Mills's motion in amendment thereto (May 9th) read.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he had asked for the adjournment of this motion in order that he might say a few words with respect to it. Though the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill had shown that he had thoroughly studied the subject, and though his opinion as an expert was worthy of all consideration, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) was not at all convinced by the argument of that hon. gentleman. He thought that his Bill was ultra vires, that they had no right to pass such a Bill, and that it would be of no value as a Statute. The line between the powers of the Local and General Legislatures was easily marked. The division was so clear that there could be little or no hesitation as to deciding where the power to deal with the subject rested. If it rested anywhere, it was with the Provincial Legislatures, and not with the Dominion Parliament. It was true, they were told that the Statute providing for all matters relating to marriage and divorce, was to be reserved exclusively for the Dominion Parliament. Obviously it meant it had the sole control of the legislation respecting the formation and dissolution of the marriage tie, and there was no other power given it by the Statute. Now, a divorce a mensâ et thoro, a judicial separation, although commonly called a divorce, was not a divorce or breach of the marriage tie; it did not relieve the woman from being a wife, or the man from being a husband, and, therefore, the separation which this Bill contemplated was not a divorce in the sense of the power given in the Statute. Consequently, this House had no right to deal with it. Had the Bill been a Divorce Bill in all its sense and substance, a severance a vinculo matrimonii, it would have been distinctly within their power; that was what the Imperial Parliament intended to confer. It did not intend they should deal with the question of husband and wife so long as they were so. That came under the provision that Local Legislatures should have the exclusive right of dealing with all matters of property and civil rights; and unless some question arose, which, ex necessitate, was connected with some of the general powers given to the general Parliament, they must belong to the Local. That was his opinion. He believed that the Act would be utterly worthless, and must vote against it. Then, again, he thought it exceedingly inexpedient to mingle, when it could be avoided, the judicial and legislative power. He thought it was very unfortunate when the Legislature interfered with the ordinary tribunals of the country. He did not wish to say a single word as to the merits of this case—as to the guilt or innocence of this woman, or whether it was a conspiracy or not. But they knew there had been an action for criminal conversation brought by the husband against the man, and a verdict found against him, which had been upheld by the Court. An application was made to the Court of Chancery for alimony, which was dismissed, the Judge giving, as his reasons for it, his belief that the evidence criminated the woman. There was an action for defamation of character brought by the woman against one of the witnesses against her. He pleaded a justification. True, she got a verdict from a jury, but the Court set it aside, as being contrary to the evidence. Under those circumstances, it seemed to him that, if they allowed this Bill to pass, parties, after being defeated, or failing to attain their object by the tribunals, would convert Parliament into a Court for the trial of causes, which would be a blow to the whole of our judicial system; it would make this assembly, which was the best means of legislation, and was believed, by the Constitution, to be well adapted for legislation, a tribunal, though about the worst tribunal possible for such trials. For those reasons he would vote against the Bill.

MR. MACDOUGALL said he was very sorry to be obliged to say a word in opposition to the legal opinion of the right hon. gentleman, for whose opinion no hon. gentleman had a greater regard than himself. But, in the course of twenty years parliamentary service, and in a considerable period of association with the right hon. gentleman, he had had occasion sometimes to differ with him as strongly as now, and sometimes successfully. As he (Mr. Macdougall) read the Constitution, this Parliament had exclusive jurisdiction in the matter now before it. There were two kinds of divorce—the greater and the lesser. The hon. gentleman admitted that this Parliament had jurisdiction over the greater, and, by a parity of reasoning, he (Mr. Macdougall) thought the lesser was included. The only power given to the Local Legislature was to decide as to the mode of solemnising marriage. A large committee of able and experienced men in the other branch of the Legislature, some of whom were lawyers, and one or two of them very distinguished lawyers, heard the whole of this evidence, through a long examination, saw the demeanour of the witnesses, knew how much credence to give them; and they came deliberately to the conclusion that the charge against this woman was the result of a conspiracy. And, when a case of this kind came before Parliament—the only tribunal that could deal with it—it was not too much to expect that Parliament should exercise its power, and do justice in this case. If the law should turn out to be ultra vires, there was the ordinary mode of dealing with it. They had a tribunal established for the purpose of determining just such questions. Let this case then go to that tribunal, where it could be argued, and the power of Parliament in this matter determined upon. He contended they had the power to pass this Bill. This Parliament had the power of making laws with respect to the property of insolvents, then why should not it have the same power in this case?

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) said that, after much consideration, he had come to the conclusion that this Parliament had power to pass this Bill. The Court of Chancery of Ontario had power to give Mrs. Campbell alimony, but it could not grant those separate rights, such as were obtained by a woman who had been granted judicial separation, and the Local Legislature could not do so without interference with the subject of marriage and divorce, jurisdiction in which, he (Mr. Cameron) contended, was vested in this Parliament. Therefore, he would vote for the Bill.

MR. MILLS said he would move the three months' hoist. He was of opinion that this Parliament ought not to claim a jurisdiction that did not belong to it. He had looked into the question with some care since the Bill was introduced, and he was very strongly of the opinion that this Parliament had not the jurisdiction, and that it would be very unwise to pass this Bill. If they wished to find a correct interpretation of the word divorce, as used in the British North America Act, they were obliged to look to what the English Government, in dealing with the colonies, spoke of as divorce. It was also necessary to see what was the practice in the English Courts, and the policy of the English Government, at the time when the subject of divorce was dealt with by the Colonial Office. When they did that, they found that, at one time, in England, the jurisdiction in matters of divorce from bed and board was vested in the Ecclesiastical Courts, but, after the Reformation, divorce from the marriage bond was granted by the Legislature. It was with reference to divorce from the marriage bond that the Colonial Office spoke in the instructions to the Governors of Canada. In the instructions given to Lord Dufferin, and to all his predecessors, there was an express provision that all Bills relating to the subject of divorce should be reserved for Her Majesty's approval. Now, obviously, that meant divorce from the marriage bond, and not from bed and board. In fact, divorce from bed and board, in the earlier works of civilians, was never spoken of as divorce, it was simply judicial separation. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdougall) said the British North America Act showed that the subject of the solemnisation of marriage was carved out of the subject of marriage and divorce, and conferred on the Local Legislatures, and he inferred that that power was to be strictly construed; leaving the larger question of marriage and divorce to this Parliament with all the incidents attending it. There was another provision of the Act they must look at if they were to take a proper view of the question, and that was that the Local Legislatures had control over property and civil rights. Now, what was meant by that? It embraced all the civil relations, domestic and commercial, that could interest a people or community, and it would embrace marriage and divorce if there was no qualification or exception of those terms. Now, when they carved the subject of marriage and divorce out of the subject of civil rights, they were strictly to construe the power of marriage and divorce, leaving the large power of property and civil rights to operate in its full extent, apart from this particular provision. Now, if the hon. gentleman who moved this Bill was correct, all the domestic relations would be under the control of this Legislature, for all the domestic relations were incidents of marriage. Whether a child should obtain his or her majority at eighteen or twenty-one or twenty-five years of age, would be for the Legislature to say; whether property should descend to the eldest son or be distributed among all the children, would be for the Legislature to say; who should be the guardians of children; whether a child should be under the control of the father or the mother—all these questions would be under the control of this Legislature. When they legislated in the various Provinces with regard to these subjects, we were interfering with the subject of marriage in the sense used by the mover of this Bill, because they were dealing with the incidents of marriage. Whether a woman should hold her property independently of her husband, or whether his consent should be necessary in all cases where she sold or encumbered it; whether it should be subject to the debts of the husband; whether the husband should be subjected to an unlimited liability for his wife's debts, prior to marriage, were subjects which, according to the hon. gentleman's views, were all vested in this Legislature. In Ontario, they had legislated as to the rights of married women over property, and all these things which related to the subject of property were the direct subject of property and of civil rights, not incidents of marriage, as the term was used in our Constitution. He was perfectly satisfied of the accuracy of this opinion. He had no doubt the hon. gentleman was equally convinced of the correctness of his own view, but he thought the hon. gentleman had been largely influenced in his conclusions by the fact of his having dealt with the case as counsel, and they all knew to what an extent that relation to the party interested biased one's judgment. He (Mr. Mills) had no motive for refusing to consider the merits of the Bill, if they had jurisdiction, but he was strongly convinced that jurisdiction was vested elsewhere. It would certainly lead to much confusion if they took the view of the hon. gentleman. Take the case of the Province of Quebec, which had a code dealing with the subject according to her own views. If the hon. gentleman was right, as far as Quebec legislation related to the subjects of judicial separation, the rights of a married woman, and her right to a share of her husband's property in case she was cruelly or harshly dealt with by her husband—all these questions should be dealt with here and not in the Legislature of Quebec. They could alter and amend this code in all these particulars; in fact they could, under this construction, take from the Local Legislatures a large portion of the jurisdiction with which they were supposed to be vested. But there had been a general concurrence of opinion as to where the jurisdiction lay. They found that all the Legislatures of the Provinces in the Dominion had taken a common view on this question, and he had no doubt, whatever, that the Courts would confirm that view. It would be unfortunate if they were, by their action here to affirm the principle which the hon. gentleman had laid down. The hon. gentleman had referred to the question of insolvency. The question of insolvency, in its very nature, dealt with the property of the insolvent. It could not deal with less. They did not deal with property but as the subject-matter of insolvency. There was no analogy between that case and the case of marriage and divorce. His position was that divorce in the British North America Act, simply meant the dissolution of the marriage contract. All the other matters to which the hon. gentleman referred were embraced in the term property and civil rights; they were the express subjects of the grant, and applied to the husband, the wife, and the children of the marriage, as much as to partners in business; and, that being the case, could not be by implication embraced in the power to deal with marriage or with divorce.

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier) said, as a member of the Private Bills Committee who reported in favour of this Bill, and also as a representative of the Province of Quebec, he desired to make a few remarks on this subject. He had listened very attentively to the arguments presented against the adoption of this Bill, and more especially those made the other night by the hon. the Minister of Justice, and this evening by the right hon. the leader of the Government, and he must say that their reasoning had not convinced him that the opinion he expressed the other day before the Private Bills Committee was wrong.

As to the question of jurisdiction, it seemed to him somewhat of a nice point. They assuredly did not lack English precedents on the point. The Parliament of Great Britain before the establishment of a Divorce Court had not, it was true, pronounced only on the question of judicial separation from bed and board, for the reason that in England there was then, and was still, an Ecclesiastical Court which took cognisance of such matters. But he understood that in Ontario there was no such Ecclesiastical Court, and no Court at all, which could pronounce, not a divorce, but merely a separation between husband and wife. It seemed to him, therefore, that they ought to give this petitioner the relief which she could not obtain from the Courts of her own Province. It had been contended this evening that the word "marriage" used in the 91st section of the British North America Act, meant the marriage tie and nothing else. It seemed to him evident that the moment power was given to the Provincial Legislature to pass laws for the solemnisation of marriage only, its power extended no further, and that all other matters relating to this subject belonged exclusively to the Dominion Parliament, in accordance with paragraph 29 of section 91 of the British North America Act. The hon. member for Bothwell said that the Governor-General of the Dominion was instructed to reserve Divorce Bills for Her Majesty's sanction, but that did not prove that this Parliament had no jurisdiction; they might reasonably infer from these Royal Instructions that other Bills concerning marriage might be sanctioned by the Governor-General. The Bill now before the House merely provided for the separation, not the divorce, of a husband and wife, and could, therefore, be sanctioned by the Governor-General, without consulting Her Majesty. Then, finding that there was no Court in Ontario that could relieve this lady, he held that, believing they had jurisdiction, it was the duty of this Parliament to come to her relief. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) had stated that if they had jurisdiction over this matter, this Parliament might also alter the Civil Code of the Province of Quebec in this respect. He (Mr. Girouard) was of opinion that this Parliament had jurisdiction to alter the Code of Quebec, and particularly in matters of marriage, solemnisation of marriage being excepted. This Code was passed before Confederation, and since that time no other Legislature had jurisdiction over matters of marriage and divorce but this Parliament. It must be borne in mind that the present was not a divorce case; if it was, he (Mr. Girouard) would be bound to vote against it; it was purely and simply a case of separation between man and wife, and the parties would still remain husband and wife. The judicial separation would not dissolve, but only suspend, that tie to a certain extent, as it would in Quebec; the wife would have the right to live separate from her husband, to be supplied with the necessary means to maintain herself and one of her children, but she would have no right to marry again. If this case should come before a Court in the Province of Quebec, what would be the duty of the Judge? He considered they were here performing the duties of a Judge of the Superior Court of Quebec, in a case of separation de corps et de biens, and this Parliament was the only tribunal which could grant such relief to parties living in Ontario. In the preamble of this Bill they did find the grossest insult that could be addressed to any woman, and especially to a lady of fine feelings. They saw, by the preamble of this Bill, that this husband had accused his wife of adultery. They had, therefore, proof that this lady had been insulted by her husband to such a degree as entitled her to separation. But there was another ground for separation—the refusal of the husband to receive his wife, and to furnish her with the necessaries of life, according to their rank in society. The husband admitted, before the Committee, that he had refused to give his wife the means of procuring the necessaries of life, and that alone was sufficient to entitle her to separation. It had been proved before the Committee that Mr. Campbell was worth $25,000 or $30,000, and was, therefore, abundantly able to allow her an alimentary pension. In a case like this, Mrs. Campbell would be entitled to get control, and be intrusted with the care, of all her children, yet the Senate had granted to her the care of only one child, the youngest. For all these reasons he, as a member from Quebec, was satisfied we ought to grant this lady the relief which any woman in Quebec would be entitled to. It was not a divorce case, if it was he should vote against it, as he had already stated, but it was merely a case of separation as to bed and board, une separation de corps.

MR. MOUSSEAU said this Bill originated this year in the Senate, and those old and venerable gentlemen thought proper to accept it, though but by a small majority, and this House was now asked to give its sanction to it. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) contended that many members of the Senate were men of high legal standing, and that others were of great consequence, and that they should bow down to their judgment. He (Mr. Mousseau) did not feel so much respect for that venerable House as to accept unhesitatingly their decision in this matter, when, in a previous case, the repeal of the Insolvency Law, they yielded to outside pressure, and, by a very small majority, rejected a Bill for its repeal, which had been passed almost unanimously in this House. Under what shape and circumstances was this Bill before the House. There had been litigation both in the Senate and the Courts of Ontario, and special application for alimony had been made by Mrs. Campbell to the Court of Chancery. The reasons given for alimony in Ontario were the same as those which had been given here. These reasons were cruel treatment, ousting from domicile, and refusal to take her back; and the answer of the husband was, of course, that she had been put out on account of misbehaviour, and that, owing to her misbehaviour, she was not entitled to alimony. They found that evidence had been taken, and a Judge of that Court, against whom nothing could be insinuated, dismissed the demand. Well, she might have appealed from that decision before three Judges of the same Court. She did not go to appeal, but came to this Parliament to get virtually a reverse of the judgment of a Provincial Court. That was, in fact, the whole case. Her advocates tried to conceal the circumstances, by stating that they took some of the clauses of the Civil Code of Quebec to obtain for her separation of bed and board. This was proof under false pretences. Now he (Mr. Mousseau) came to another point. He had listened with much pleasure to the observations of the leader of the Government, who was one of the fathers of Confederation, and one of the masters of Constitutional Law; and, when such a man rose against his own friends to hit them forcibly, they were mistaken. Young members, like the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), ought to have more modesty than to assert the opposite opinion. When the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) heard the common sense views enunciated by the right hon. the leader of the Government, he began to hesitate, and did not dare enter into a discussion of the merits of the question, but left them to understand that, having been engaged, he would stick to his opinion, and vote. With regard to the question of jurisdiction, the hon. member for Halton said that this Parliament had the exclusive right, on what he called the subject-matter of marriage. Let them examine that proposition. In the section of the Imperial Act relating to the subject-matters on which they had a right to legislate were included marriage and divorce. These two words were well explained by the right hon. gentleman to relate to the tie and its dissolution, and that everything which went beyond those fell under the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures. On the one side it was said that these words implied a right on the part of this Parliament to legislate on everything that related to the subject-matter of marriage. What conclusion would that proposition lead to? There was another section in the Imperial Act which related to the subject-matters in which the Local Legislatures would have to legislate, and among those were property and civil rights. Civil rights and property were acquired, first, by purchase, and, at other times, by prescription, but the most usual manner was by succession. Well, succession flowed from marriage, and the rights and properties got from succession were got from marriage. Therefore, marriage and divorce only meant the formation of the tie and its dissolution, but, as to all the rights which flowed from marriage, the civil status of the children, their standing in society, their rights to succession, all these consequences fell under the heads of property and civil rights, which were exclusively to be dealt with in our Provincial Legislatures. By following all the consequences of the principle laid down by the hon. members for Halton and Jacques Cartier, they would reach the absurd. Under these circumstances he felt bound to vote against the Bill.

MR. McCUAIG said that Mr. Campbell had applied to the Senate for relief, and that body, in which were men of influence, men of ability and uninfluenced by public opinion, passed the Bill. He intended to give his vote in favour of the Bill and allow the woman the benefit of the doubt. If any question of constitutional law came up, let Mr. Campbell bring it before the Supreme Court.

MR. COURSOL said they were not bound to take the opinion of the Senate in all cases, especially where there was so much doubt, and when the question was so much controverted. This Bill had been declared by the proper officers for the administration of justice to be unconstitutional. Was the House, for the mere pleasure of having the case decided in the Supreme Court, and having another repetition of this case, to solemnly declare that this would be the law of the land? It would be a dangerous precedent. It would open the doors of this House to a lot of cases of a similar nature. It was true that in Quebec there was a law by which the woman could have the right of separation, and have the alimony granted at once; and, if the other Provinces had not the same law, the sooner they adopted it the better. Was this Parliament to interfere in the judgments of Courts in the Provinces. Was the House of Commons to settle all the questions that had been settled already by the Courts in the different Provinces? Were they to constitute themselves a Court of Appeal, to decide all these cases? They had laws to prevent the publication of and the entry into this country of immoral literature. But, in this case, they had the most revolting scenes published and printed by order of the Senate, as a standing document, which might fall into the hands of thousands of parties. He had not a word to say against the character of the woman, nor did he wish to interfere with the merits of the case. He only spoke as to the general course the House should adopt. If the Bill were allowed to become law, a precedent would be established which they would regret hereafter.

MR. GEOFFRION said he would not have addressed the House on this question, had it not been for the declaration of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier that it was within the province of this House. It was not within their jurisdiction. The Constitution said that the question of marriage and divorce was to be dealt with by this Parliament. Well, the case of divorce had been settled. This was a Bill to take away the property of a man and give it to another party—a stranger to him, which party was at one time his wife, but, by the law of the Province, had no right to his property, so that they were dealing with a question of property, and not with a question of marriage or divorce. He maintained that they had no such right. It was a Bill to take away the property of a man, and give it to a stranger. He regarded the Bill as outside their jurisdiction, and for that reason he would vote against it. It was all very well to say the matter had been discussed in Committee. Hon. gentlemen might sympathise with a woman in this woman's circumstances, but, regarding the Bill from a constitutional standpoint, he would vote against it.

MR. MACMILLAN said he regretted this matter had been brought before the House, because he had always thought that matters of judicial separation should not be intruded upon the House. He had watched this case pretty closely from the time that it first came into the Courts, and it seemed to him that the case was left in a very doubtful manner at the present time, and it was for them to judge from the evidence that was given, not only before the Courts, but before the Committee of the Senate. His hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) had stated that this Bill had been defeated before. But it had never come before the House of Commons before, and it was for them to say whether they should grant this amount asked for. The Senate had taken the matter into their careful consideration, and recommended a certain amount should be granted for the maintenance of Mrs. Campbell and her children. He thought they ought to have a Court established to deal with questions of this kind, and the sooner they got a Court of that kind the better. He intended to vote for the petitioner.

MR. LANE said he did not see any reason why he should change his legal views upon this matter. So far as the legal matter was concerned, they had the opinion of very eminent legal gentlemen on both sides. They knew that lawyers and Judges differed. If they, upon that occasion, acted wrongly, the Supreme Court would probably set the matter right. The constitutional question could be tried there, and he thought it would be best to have it tried. On the merits of the case, he had come to the conclusion that Mrs. Campbell was not guilty of the charge made against her. Having come to that conclusion, he thought she had made out a case for alimony, consequently he would vote in favour of the Bill, as he did in the Committee.

MR. FARROW moved in amendment to the amendment :

"That the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend section 3, by inserting $300 instead of $500; and that section 5 be amended, by inserting $100 instead of $200."

ONTARIO BOUNDARY ARBITRATION.

QUESTION AND REMARKS.

MR. MACKENZIE asked if the Government had decided not to introduce an Act to confirm the Ontario boundary award this Session.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE said the recent difficulties with the men working on the Pacific Railway showed the necessity of providing means for maintaining the administration of justice in the North-West district. He wished to know if the hon. gentleman had any objection to state what was the intention of the Government with respect to that matter.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : The intention of the Government is to take the matter into consideration during recess.

WAYS AND MEANS.—CONCURRENCE.

Resolutions reported from Committee of Ways and Means (May 13th) read the first and second times, and agreed to.

SUPPLY BILL.

(Mr. Tilley.)

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

MR. TILLEY introduced a Bill (No. 118) For granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the public service, for the financial years, ending, respectively, the 30th June, 1879, and the 30th June, 1880 ; and for other purposes relating to the public service.

Bill read the first and second times.

MR. TILLEY moved the third reading of the Bill.

MR. MACKENZIE said, before that motion was adopted, he would like to ask the hon. the leader of the Government if he intended to convey any information to the House upon the subject mentioned yesterday, as one that would probably be spoken of to-day.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was not in a position to convey any information to the House respecting the Letellier matter, for the simple reason that he had no information to give. He had expected that, in all probability, before the prorogation of Parliament, he would be enabled to inform the House of what the decision of Her Majesty was. No such information had arrived yet, and, therefore, he could not convey any to the House. There would be no object in his addressing the House in any way whatever, because he could only speak after receiving information. The hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) spoke about bringing down the instructions, and so on. He thought it would be in the highest degree inadvisable to do so until the matter had been decided in one way or the other. It would be unprecedented.

MR. HOLTON: The whole thing is unprecedented.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he did not know that it was. They were not discussing that just now. It would be unprecedented to bring down any papers in the incomplete form in which that question now stood. But he might say that the hon. gentleman would, in all probability, have an opportunity of hearing the information very soon, because he believed that as soon as Her Majesty's decision had been arrived at, those papers would be laid before the House of Commons in England, and, of course, would be open to the world.

MR. MACKENZIE said he felt indisposed to discuss the subject during the period in which it might fairly be said to be in process of solution. When the hon. gentleman had to meet the resolution moved by the hon. member for Bagot, early in the Session, he did not choose, nor did any of his colleagues choose to say anything regarding that motion, but on a subsequent occasion, on pressure from behind, when the hon. gentleman was compelled to take some step or other in the matter, he came down to the House and made the following statement:—

"Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to make a statement to the House, with reference to the resolution come to by the Senate last Session and by this House some little time ago, with regard to the conduct of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier. I have to state that I waited on His Excellency the Governor-General and informed him that, after the resolution of the Senate of last Parliament, and the resolution of the House of Commons, during the present Session, it was the opinion of his advisers that the usefulness of Mr. Letellier the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec was gone."

This was the state of the case as presented by the hon. gentleman on that occasion. The hon. gentleman, in the very brief discussion that took place in regard to this matter, further expressed his regret that the advice that had been tendered to His Excellency had not been at once acted upon. He also expressed the pleasure it would have given him to have had that done. In the first place, he thought it was an objectionable course for Ministers, having tendered advice to the Crown, to come to Parliament, and make known that advice, without having any ultimate conclusion arrived at, either by themselves or the Crown. The usual course was, when advice was offered, that that advice must either be accepted by the Crown, or the Ministry must retire or acquiesce in the decision arrived at by the Crown. These were the three modes of arranging the difficulty. He had not been able to find any instance where a Minister had come down to Parliament and made known the advice that had been tendered, admitting, at the same time, that action upon such advice had either been refused or postponed. Further, on the third of April, the hon. gentleman made the following remarks:—

"He, the representative of the Sovereign, says that he will ask for specific instructions from his own Sovereign. There is nothing unconstitutional in it. I would have been pleased, gratified, and I think it would have been well had our advice been at once accepted. We unanimously thought that it would be for the interest of the country that Mr. Letellier should be dismissed. That advice has not been refused or rejected but the representative of the Queen, of the First Estate in the land, states that he would like to submit the matter to the First Estate, and ascertain what the action of the Sovereign is."

He need not say anything further with regard to what passed on that day. On April 7, there was a little conversation again in connection with this subject, when the hon. gentleman said:

"I beg leave to state, in reply to the hon. member, that the hon. the Postmaster-General will leave by the next Canadian steamer with the consent of the Governor-General, for the purpose of supporting the advice given by the Government for the removal of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier. He may, perhaps, be ac-accompanied by another gentleman. At all events he goes next Saturday. I need scarcely say, that the fact of our holding the positions we do at this moment shows that the Governor-General did not make that reference against our advice, and the fact of our remaining in office also shows that we hold ourselves responsible for the action of the Governor-General."

This statement was made four days after the last statement, a statement which was understood by almost every member of the House as reflecting upon the action of the Governor-General, and as laying the blame of the non-removal of Lieut.-Governor Letellier upon his shoulders. That expression found vent in the principal newspaper organs of hon. gentlemen opposite, and the very strongest and most offensive language was used consistent with reasonable propriety of discussion, by certain newspapers in the interest of hon. gentlemen opposite, in characterising the conduct of the Governor-General. He would not quote the language of the journals, because he did not desire to give them a place in the Debates of the House; but he had no doubt that every member of the House had read the expressions used by Ministerial journals in regard to His Excellency. The hon. gentleman subsequently found it necessary to qualify the statements made, and they had, on that occasion, the further remarkable statement made, that not merely was a member of the Cabinet sent home to lay before the Crown in Britain the views held by the Ministry on this particular transaction, but that a gentleman, who had not even a seat in Parliament, was sent with the Postmaster-General, in order that he also might appear before the Crown and plead in regard to this matter. It would be an entirely novel thing in the history of constitutional government to find a Minister giving advice and then employing counsel to appear before the Crown and enforce the wisdom of his advice. This was precisely what had been done in sending Mr. Abbott with the Postmaster-General to plead before the Crown in Great Britain on a subject which was clearly, by the Constitution of the country, within the province of the constitutional authorities of this country to dispose of. Having said so much in regard to what he conceived to be the constitutional errors which had been committed in this matter, he might recapitulate them briefly. In the first place, he did not think the Ministry ought to have come down to the House, and informed the House of the advice tendered by the Ministers to the Crown, until a definite conclusion had been arrived at by the Ministers or the Crown. When the hon. member brought this subject up last year, he (Mr. Mackenzie) took the ground that it was not a matter in which they ought to interfere. Had the Government of the day believed that Lieutenant-Governor Letellier had acted beyond his powers, and outraged constitutional usage, it would have been the duty of the Government to have acted upon such consideration, and to have informed that gentleman of their views of the position he occupied, and take such action, if necessary, as the Constitution pointed out, submitting reasons therefor to Parliament afterwards. The hon. gentleman, at the time he gave his notice, evidently appeared to take a stronger view of the case than he did when he brought his notice before the consideration of Parliament. In the interval of time between giving the notice and moving the resolution, he appeared to have come to the conclusion that, whatever might be thought by partisans of the conduct of Mr. Letellier, that there was nothing in that conduct which would justify him in giving as a reason for his dismissal that he had acted beyond the powers of his office. That was quite evident from the tone of the hon. gentleman's speech on that occasion, a very large portion of which no one could possibly find fault with. The speech was an able summary of what might be characterised as the principal features of responsible government under a viceroy of the King, but, at the same time, the speech itself neither vindicated or declared that the course taken by the Lieutenant-Governor was unconstitutional; nor did the resolution itself so declare the opinion of the hon. member, and of those who acted with him. It simply declared that, in acting as he did, he had acted unwisely, and that his action was subversive of the position of his advisers in the Ministry. A mere truism, and one that scarcely required to be stated, as it was quite manifest that any dismissal of a Ministry was subversive of their positions as advisers of the Crown. Then the House of Commons, by a large majority, decided against the assumption that he had even acted unwisely, and so the case stood. In the meantime the general elections had taken place, before the matter was brought before the notice of the public. In that general election the party then in power was defeated, and the administration which had to take cognisance of the action of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, had resigned, and the hon. gentleman, with his colleagues, came into office about the middle of October, last year. If they believed, as was insinuated, rather than declared, that the Lieutenant-Governor had acted unconstitutionally, it was the duty of the Government to have assumed the responsibility of dismissing the Lieutenant-Governor, prepared reasons why he should be dismissed, and submitted those to the Lieutenant-Governor, as provided in the Constitution, which reasons would afterwards be submitted to Parliament, within a certain time after his removal. This action was not taken, and no other assumption could be made but that the new Administration took precisely the same view of the case as the late Administration did, and that, whatever might be the personal views of the Government as to the wisdom or propriety of the course taken by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, they, at all events, were not warranted in declaring that that action was against the powers confided to him by the law of the land. Parliament met, and the Government still made no sign. An independent member of Parliament, not in the Administration, or connected with it, moved the same resolution, word for word, that had been moved by the hon. leader of the Government in the previous Parliament. This was carried—the Ministers voting for it—by a large majority of the House. Some time afterwards the hon. gentleman and his colleagues—for he took care to tell them that they unanimously agreed, though the information was not necessary; but as if to give emphasis to the declaration he told them that his colleagues unanimously concurred in the advice given—tendered certain advice to His Excellency. What was the advice given? That Lieutenant-Governor Letellier had acted unconstitutionally, and should be dismissed? No, but His Excellency was advised that Lieutenant-Governor Letellier's usefulness was gone because this House had passed certain resolutions. This House might do what it pleased within the sanction of its own prerogative, of its own powers, but that action could not be pleaded for the dismissal of the Lieutenant-Governor. He (Mr. Mackenzie) was not prepared to say what the Government would be required to do in the event of both Houses of Parliament joining in an Address to the Crown, demanding that certain steps should be taken in such a case. The voice of Parliament was omnipotent where the letter of the Constitution—and they had the letter as well as the spirit—did not prevent that action. Even the voice of this Parliament, however, could not set aside the Constitution, because it was not a creation of this Parliament. It was the creation of the Imperial authority, and they only derived such powers in their deliberative and executive action in this country, as had been confided to them by the Imperial authority which framed their Constitution. Then, if there had been an Address from both Houses requiring and stating the reasons for the requirement, that the Lieutenant-Governor should be dismissed, it would have been a matter, at all events, for serious consideration, that action should be taken. No such Address was passed. True, the Senate passed a resolution last Session, but the late House of Commons declined to pass a similar resolution, and the previous Government declined to take the views of the majority of the Senate and the minority of the Commons on the subject, and so the matter, so far as proper constitutional usage was concerned, ended. Then the hon. gentleman, at once to gratify his friends in the Lower House, and take such action as he believed would restore some political equilibrium in the Province of Quebec, advised His Excellency that the usefulness of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier had departed, that he should be dismissed from his Government, and another Lieutenant-Governor appointed. Well, the usefulness of a man was a very broad subject. It might be the opinion of the hon. the Premier that the usefulness of many persons was gone. He was pleased to state a few days ago, though not in those precise words, that his (Mr. Mackenzie's) own usefulness was gone, and that it would be a great mercy to the country if he were removed.

STR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I did not say that.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman might think so, but other people might not. He was merely taking this as an illustration of one of the latest utterances of the hon. the Premier himself. There were other Lieutenant-Governors about whose action gentlemen had strongly differed; but were hon. members or Ministers to declare, whenever they found fault with the political action of a Lieutenant-Governor—whenever that action was adverse to the views of the majority of this House—to His Excellency that the usefulness of that Lieutenant-Governor was gone, and advise that he should be dismissed. He (Mr. Mackenzie) thought that that was one of the most serious questions we had to face in this country, and that there was nothing more important to our system of Government than the maintenance of the autonomy of the Provinces. He believed, and said, after mature deliberation, apart from any prospect of political advantage being gained from it, that it was one of those questions extremely dangerous to the existence of the Confederation, if the Constitution was to be interpreted as the hon. gentlemen opposite thought. The Premier occupied the position of the guardian of our Constitution, of the rights of the Provinces, as much as of the rights of the Dominion, and no wise Minister would think for a moment of interfering with the rights of the Lieutenant-Governors, and the rights of the Governments of the Provinces. Such a system as the hon. gentleman had inaugurated by his action in this case was the most direct blow that could be administered to the independence of the Provinces. It was the first step towards a centralisation of authority, that was not consistent with the Federal compact; and he, therefore, felt it was a subject upon which they ought to deliberate in some way, and endeavour to record their opinion before the House was formally prorogued. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had hoped that the motion of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) would come up for discussion. He supposed the hon. gentleman was in earnest when he placed that notice on the paper, and that the Premier would have taken an early opportunity of informing the House fully on a subject of which he had made it partly cognisant. He (Mr. Mackenzie) supposed that, if Ministers had chosen to give hon. members the early portion of their advice in regard to Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, they should have been informed also of the subsequent steps on the subject. Therefore, he considered that the instructions given the Postmaster-General, and his legal colleague, Mr. Abbott, should have been laid before the House. If they were to be informed, they should be fully informed in the matter. If the Government had assumed the responsibility of their action in another way, this question would not have arisen in the precise shape in which it was now presented. But, by having committed themselves by stating what advice they had given His Excellency, and stated their views of His Excellency's conduct in such a manner as led their own partisans and newspapers to believe the Governor-General was guilty of a serious dereliction of duty in his office—having done all that, the matter ought not to stop there, they ought to have brought the matter in this broad manner before the House, recapitulating, as he trusted had been done, fairly, with a desire to act fairly, the various events that had taken place in connection with it. In his (Mr. Mackenzie's) opinion the whole business had been sadly mismanaged. After the late Administration had declined to take action on the advice of the majority of the Senate, having a large majority in the Commons in support of that view, the case was closed. If not closed by such a train of circumstances and facts, what would close it? Was a man to be tried, politically, twice for the same offence, if it was an offence? It was contrary to the principles of justice and law, and, in his opinion, the Government had no right whatever to take that action, especially in view of what had occurred in the meantime. It was quite time that, in a sense, they had just as little to do with what the electorate of Quebec might do, as with what its Ministers might do, so long as they were within the sphere of their own competency. But, when Mr. Letellier dismissed his Ministers, that being the offence with which he was charged, he summoned other Ministers to his aid, who expressly assumed the responsibility of that dismissal. It was not necessary they should have assumed it, because, according to constitutional usage in the Province, as in the Dominion and the Mother Country, the Ministry necessarily became responsible for such acts without any voluntary assumption of responsibility. Mr. Joly, the Premier, no doubt, simply wished to give emphasis to the acceptance of the usual constitutional usage in declaring that his Government did accept the responsibility for the action of the Lieutenant-Governor. He (Mr. Mackenzie) conceived at the time that the inevitable conclusion must be a general election, and was glad to find, by the action of the Quebec Government, that they entertained the same view. An appeal was made to the country, which sustained the new Administration. So far, therefore, all constitutional proprieties were carried out, and there remained nothing to be done by this House or Government except the action taken here, which he considered a wanton interference with the independence of Provincial action, in attacking the conduct of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier in connection with the administration of affairs in his Province. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had nothing further to remark, as he desired, at that period of the Session, not to waste one word upon useless debate, and not to say one word which could necessarily provoke anything but a calm discussion of the constitutional question involved in the case from beginning to end.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have nothing to object to as regards the tone in which the hon. member for Lambton has brought up this subject again. I quite concede that he is moving within his constitutional right as a member of Parliament in making the remarks we have heard. However, he might as well refrain from allusion to some matters which ought not to affect our consideration of this question. When he spoke about the attacks made by the organs of the hon. gentlemen opposite on the Governor-General, he should have remembered that parties were generally supposed to have organs; that is to say, they are known to have papers sympathising with them in their political principles, and advocating them. He said the country was pained when it read the attacks of some of the Conservative papers of Quebec upon His Excellency. Well, I need not repeat what the hon. gentleman so often reiterated when he held my place on the Treasury benches, that the Government were responsible for their own conduct, acts and expressed opinions, but could not hold themselves responsible, in any way, for the occasional action or continuous remarks of the press supporting the Government. The very fact that the hon. gentleman's alluding at this moment, without any necessity, to that real or supposed attack on the Governor-General invites us, of necessity, to look back and remember the attacks made upon His Excellency's predecessor, Lord Dufferin, by the organs of the hon. gentlemen opposite on a celebrated occasion. I have no doubt he was infinitely pained himself, and his whole party in the House and out of it, at the continuous and abusive attacks made on Lord Dufferin on that memorable occasion. The fact is, it does no good; it is, on the contrary, prejudicial to calm discussion to drag in the utterances or the language of the press on either side of the question sometimes dealt with in Parliament. The fourth estate have their own responsibility as well as the third; they are responsible to public opinion, pecuniarily, in cases of private assault or wrong. It does no good, whatever, to bring in, as an element in a discussion of this kind, what a newspaper, Reform or Conservative, Rouge, Grit, or Ultramontane, may choose to express on its responsibility, on a great political question. Here we are, the Ministry of the day, responsible for its acts, and the majority is responsible for its legislation, and the minority is also responsible, if it does not expose before the country the short-comings, failures, or errors, either of the majority in Parliament or the Administration. The member for Lambton says that our conduct is unprecedented; that, after having tendered advice that was not accepted, we ought to have resigned. But he was promptly corrected by the superior constitutional knowledge of the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), who said that our advice must be accepted, or we must yield to the conclusions of the Sovereign or her representative. Of course, we all know that the Sovereign is not a mere nonentity, but a person possessing power and influence. In this case, the country should be fully informed, the hon. gentlemen opposite says, of what has taken place, or it was wrong we should have made those communications to the House. It is the bounden duty of the Government, if they desire to retain the confidence of the representatives of the people, to have as few secrets from them as possible, and to confide to them as much as possible, not only their course of conduct, but reasons for it. What did the Government do? They said, after the overwhelming vote of this House, censuring Mr. Letellier, that his usefulness was gone. It is true there was not a new vote this Session in the Senate on the subject, and the reason is obvious. The Senate is a permanent body. A deliberate expression by a body like the Senate must be held to be a continuous expression till reversed.

MR. HOLTON : Or till circumstances have changed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : Yes, circumstances must have changed, but they did not in this instance. We considered that we were acting constitutionally and properly, after a vote of this House the present Session, and a vote of the Senate last Session, in the course we took. It is a great thing when this House declares that the conduct of a Lieutenant-Governor, a public servant, was unwise and subversive of those principles by which the Governor ought to govern his action. This House took that responsibility, after mature consideration and full debate ; and, when the two branches solemnly declared that that official's usefulness was gone—that his conduct was unwise,—there was only one conclusion open to the Government, which was merely a Committee of both Houses, for the administration of the affairs of the country, according to the well-understood wishes of the people. What could the Government do but give effect to the deliberately expressed wishes and opinions of both branches of the Legislature? That was considered sound and true constitutional doctrine. But, oh, says the hon. member for Lambton, in the first place, is it right to try a man twice? It is quite true there was a vote of the last House of Commons against the motion to censure the Lieutenant-Governor, which was adopted by this House—quite true, the motion was rejected by the last Parliament. I may say that, as any Bill passed by one Parliament may be repealed or amended by the next Parliament, so any resolution passed by the House of Commons in one Session may be reversed, or amended, or annulled, or disapproved of, by a succeeding Parliament or a succeeding Session. And you must remember that, at the time the discussion on my motion was brought up, the hon. member for Lambton did not attempt to defend Mr. Letellier, or to justify his conduct. He could not. I believe that, in his heart, and in his own personal opinion, he disapproved of Mr. Letellier's conduct. I believe that, as far as he himself was concerned—and if there had not been influences that he was not aware of, perhaps—Mr. Letellier would never had ventured to act as he did, and, I believe also, that if the hon. gentleman had been left to his own honest conviction of what was right or wrong, he would have declared that, in his opinion, as a statesman, and public man, Mr. Letellier had acted improperly and unconstitutionally. But he did not. Look back at the Hansard of last year, at the careful, guarded speech of the hon. gentleman, and you will not find one word in justification of Mr. Letellier's conduct. He could not, holding the responsible position he then held, and with great ability, conscientiously have said that he would have acted as Mr. Letellier did, had he been Lieutenant-Governor at the time. No man having a respect for himself could have acted as Mr. Letellier acted on that occasion. But he took the ground principally that Mr. Letellier had formed a new Government, and that he was about to go to the country, or had gone to the country, and that it would be wrong for the House to interfere at that time. The hon. gentleman, while he could not defend Mr. Letellier's conduct in words, still stood by his own colleagues. But the House that refused to censure Mr. Letellier was elected by the people before the question arose. The people of the Dominion had never had the question of the conduct of Mr. Letellier before them. It arose suddenly. The people of Canada, who, after all, are the ultimate source of power, had had no opportunity of expressing their opinion on that matter. But, on the 17th September, they pronounced their decision. The question was brought before them. I was, I may say without egotism, not an unimportant member of the last Parliament. I was the leader, perhaps an unworthy and incapable leader, of Her Majesty's Opposition at that time, but I was leader of my party, and I took the responsibility, last Session, of moving a resolution which declared that the conduct of Mr. Letellier was unwise and subversive of the principle under which we had been governed since responsible government was granted. That, and the other resolutions that were proposed by the Opposition during the last Parliament, with many other causes of complaint against the Government of the hon. gentlemen opposite, went to the country, and there was not a single hustings or election meeting where the matter was not discussed. I can speak for most of Ontario, and we know we can speak for all of Quebec, and we know that the conduct of Mr. Letellier, the resolution which I had proposed censuring him, and the conduct of the Government of the day in maintaining him in his office, were elements of discussion, and were one of the many reasons which caused the country to withdraw their confidence from the hon. gentlemen opposite. There can be no doubt about that. But the hon. gentlemen now say that Mr. Letellier's conduct was approved. But see what the country did, and look especially at what took place in Quebec. Because Mr. Letellier dismissed Mr. DeBoucherville and appointed Mr. Joly, and Mr. Joly appealed to the country, the hon. gentleman argues that as one reason why Mr. Letellier should escape the censure of this House during the present Session, and because Mr. Joly had been maintained in power ever since. The question at the Local elections was not between Mr. Letellier and the Dominion Government, but between the merits of the DeBoucherville and the Joly Administrations, the question was whether the policy of Mr. DeBoucherville was the correct one, or whether the policy announced by Mr. Joly, as the leader of the Opposition and the head of the new Government, was preferable. These were the questions that went to the country, and the question of Mr. Letellier's conduct was one with which the local electors had nothing to do in the world, which they had no affair or concern in, it was not a matter of theirs at all. The question was simply whether the railway policy, the taxation policy, the general policy of the DeBoucherville Government should be maintained, or whether the professions and promises of Mr. Joly were entitled to most confidence. And see the difference. When the appeal was made by the Local Government to the country, the parties were nearly a tie; Mr. Joly did not succeed in getting a majority at all events. The majority that formerly supported Mr. DeBoucherville was greatly reduced, and the parties were nearly on an equality. Now, we must remember that the constituencies in Quebec are the same, the electorate is the same, and the electors who, by diminishing Mr. DeBoucherville's majority, showed that he was becoming unpopular, the same electors, the very voters who voted to support the Joly Administration, by an overwhelming majority on the 17th September, returned a majority to this House of 48 to 17, pledged to vote for the censure of Mr. Letellier. There we had the voice of the Province of Quebec. Now, when I say that the Local elections had nothing to do with the question of the removal or appointment of Mr. Letellier, I can support that by ordinary constitutional analogy. What have we got to do with the Governor-General sent to us? We loyally, and frankly, and gladly, accept any nobleman or gentleman who may be the choice of Her Majesty to govern us. We have no word to say about their appointments, and we have no right to complain if a Governor-General is recalled by Her Majesty the day after he arrives here. All we have got to do is to see that the Representative of the Sovereign, whoever may be the distinguished individual who is entrusted by Her Majesty with this great charge, shall carry out the principles of government here according to British principles, and shall be governed by his advisers enjoying the confidence of Parliament, and shall act constitutionally. Everybody knows how justly popular the last Governor-General was; everybody knows the whole country regretted and grieved that the Earl of Dufferin resigned, and went to other scenes of usefulness; everybody in Canada would have been glad if his term of office had been renewed for five years more, and it may be that we would have been justified if we had passed an Address to Her Majesty, stating that we wanted her to continue the Earl of Dufferin five years more, but it would have been travelling out of our record, going beyond our power, and exceeding our authority. We grieved that he went, but we gladly and readily accepted the successor Her Majesty chose. So, if, from any cause whatever, Her Majesty chose to recall her son-in-law the Marquis of Lorne to-morrow, we have no right to interfere. The principle is precisely the same. It is a matter of no consequence to the electorate of Quebec, or to the Local Legislature, what Lieutenant-Governor is sent there by the Representative of the Sovereign. The Representative of the Sovereign in the choice of the Lieutenant-Governors of our different Provinces, stands in precisely the same position as the Queen stands with respect to Colonial Governors. They may be recalled, or they may be appointed, and therefore the appeal to the electorate in the Local elections had no reference, and could have no reference to the presence of Mr. Letellier or anybody else—just as the men who were elected to support Mr. Joly at the Local election had no right to ask questions. They had no right, it was not their business. The Lieutenant-Governor, whoever he might be for the time being, should maintain the privileges of the Province, should carry out the true principles of the Constitution in the Province, and, if Mr. Letellier died to-morrow, or resigned to-morrow, and if a man of directly opposite politics chosen by the present Administration were placed in his stead, that successor must carry the out principles of responsible government, as Mr. Letellier was bound to do, and, if he went there to-morrow and found Mr. Joly at the head of the Government, he would be obliged constitutionally to support him, and to give him his confidence to the fullest extent, until the Local Legislature withdrew their confidence from him. Now, we know that, while we cannot interfere, that we cannot even express an opinion about the propriety of the Sovereign recalling the Governor-General, the power must rest somewhere, and the responsibility must rest somewhere. The responsibility rests with Her Majesty's Government to recall a Colonial Governor, and it is the Parliament of England that must censure the Government of the day, if they improperly treat a Colonial Governor, just as it rests with the Dominion Parliament to deal with the question whether our Provincial Governments were improperly treated or scurvily treated, or were unduly favoured. It rests here with this House, just as the question of the proper treatment, or the improper conduct, of a Colonial Governor is a matter to be dealt with by the Imperial Parliament. And we know that they have considered that subject and acted upon it, and have dealt with it in no niggard manner. We see the continuous attacks that are, at this moment, made in the House of Commons against the policy and conduct of Sir Bartle Frere; we see that, in the House of Commons, Sir George Bowen has been censured with respect to his conduct in Victoria, and we see that the Government of the day, while they did not condemn Sir George Bowen, and did not censure him because his usefulness was gone, because, from all appearances, he had set against him the two branches of the Legislature, and a very considerable portion of the people of Victoria, did not dismiss him, because they have the means of removing an erring or unfortunate Governor to other scenes of action, and they removed Sir George Bowen.

MR. MILLS: Three years after the event.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: After the event? Why, at this moment that question is not settled; at this moment representatives from Victoria are in England pressing the continuation and support of the policy of Sir George Bowen, he having been already removed and sent to the Mauritius.

MR. MILLS: He had served his time.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He had not served his time; he was removed because his usefulness was gone. And so with Pope Hennessy—Pope Hennessy, who, rightly or wrongly, was believed by Her Majesty's Government obnoxious to a portion of the people of Barbadoes, and was censured in the mild way in which the Imperial Government censures a man, by removing him and sending another man, with more discretion and prudence, and who could hold his tongue better than Pope Hennessy did. And then there was the removal of Sir Harry Smith, a great soldier and a capable administrator. That gentleman, when he was Governor of the Cape, was a personal and almost bosom friend of Lord Grey, who was then Colonial Minister; and, because, with military abruptness, and, perhaps, with military want of civil caution, he had diminished, in the opinion of Lord Grey, his usefulness, he was removed, and, if there is anything more instructive with respect to constitutional principles than another, it will be the correspondence between Lord Grey and Sir Harry Smith upon that matter. Their friendly relations were not changed, but a sense of public duty made Lord Grey consider that it was for the interest of the colony that he should be removed to some other sphere of action, and Sir Harry Smith went home, not in the slightest degree offended or annoyed, and their friendship continued to the last moment. Sir Harry Smith felt that Lord Grey was acting from public motives, and not from personal motives, but Lord Grey removed him although he retained the highest estimation of his character and the highest admiration of the heroic gallantry and ability he had displayed in many fields of warfare. Sir Harry Smith admitted that the Colonial Minister could not do any less if he believed that his usefulness was in any degree impaired. The Colonies are not made for the Governors, but the Governors are made for them. It is for the peace, the good government, the contentment of the people, that Governors are sent; and, even if the Governor were possessed of the best intentions, even if you look at his conduct, and there could be no charge against his moral or his personal, or even his political course; if any unhappy accident for which, perhaps, he might not be personally blameable; if by any unhappy accident any step taken by a Governor causes real and substantial dissatisfaction in the Colony, that Governor ought to be removed, because the first object must be to secure, beyond all other things, not only the good government of the country but the satisfaction of the people with their government. The satisfaction, the peace and the contentment of the country must go hand-in-hand with good government, and, whether it be by misfortune, or by the fault, by the poor judgment, or by an obliquity of mind, a Governor fails to satisfy a majority of the people and his remaining is a cause of dissatisfaction and heartburning, then, in the cause of good government, that man ought to be removed. Of course, he ought to be treated well, and every consideration, should be given to his feelings, and his honour and reputation should be protected, if he had not committed anything which had impugned his honour or reputation. But, whether he were the most honourable man or the most dishonourable one, the moment a feeling of discontent or dissatisfaction set in amongst a majority of the people against a Governor, that Governor must go, and it would be the duty of the removing power to reasonably compensate him in every way in their power to prevent his feelings being unduly wounded. The course of the Government, in recommending the removal of Mr. Letellier, was guided by the principles which he (Sir John A. Macdonald) had attempted to lay down. The Government believed that, after the representatives of the people, by an enormous majority, in which there was a majority from every Province, except New Brunswick, and a vote of forty-eight to seventeen from Quebec, had declared in favour of the motion of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), when this Parliament, which was the selector of the Governor, had declared as they had done—even if the Government of the day thought hard measure was dealt out to Mr. Letellier, and that he might well have been spared—that they, as a Committee, chosen by Parliament—they, who were elected by the voice of Parliament to give effect to the decision of Parliament, would be unworthy of their duty and position, and would be declared to have forfeited their claim to the confidence of Parliament, if they did not give effect to its solemn decision—the decision of a Legislature composed of representatives coming fresh from the people, with the sound of the electorate still ringing in their ears, and fully aware of the opinions of their constituents. This House would have failed in their duty to their constituents, if they had not carried out the decision at the polls, and the Government would have been unworthy of leading the affairs of the country if they had not given full force and effect to the decision of this House, supported, as it was, by the vast majority of the people of Canada.

MR. MILLS said the hon. gentleman had made a speech that was distinguished rather for its vigour than for its logic. The hon. gentleman had laid down a number of contradictory propositions. The hon. gentleman told the House, in the first place, that the people of Quebec, at the Provincial elections, had nothing whatever to do with this matter.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I did not say that.

MR. MILLS : That, although the Government of Mr. DeBoucherville was dismissed, and another Government constituted, which was ready to assume the responsibility of the conduct of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, and notwithstanding that the course of Mr. Letellier offended, as they were told, the friends of the DeBoucherville Government, this did not form any part of the issue in the Local elections. But the hon. gentleman said that it was the issue at the general elections—where the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor was not put in issue, where the question of the National Policy was put in issue, where the question involved was, as the hon. the Minister of Public Works had told the House an evening or two ago, the question of the Pacific Railway Scandal—and not at the Local elections, where the Administration that assumed the responsibility of this act appealed to the country. He (Mr. Mills) thought the hon. gentleman would find some difficulty in reconciling those contradictory propositions. If the hon. gentleman would look at the newspapers of the period, he would find the facts against him. The hon. gentleman also made a statement with regard to Sir George Bowen that was not borne out by the facts. Sir George Bowen was appointed Governor of Victoria on January 23rd, 1873. He served something more than the full period of time, and there was no evidence that the majority of the people of Victoria or the Imperial Government in any way disapproved of his conduct. In his (Mr. Mills's) opinion, they did not. The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) had referred to Mr. Pope Hennesy, of Barbadoes, and Mr. Smith, of South Africa. It was rather unfortunate for the hon. gentleman that in neither of these cases did parliamentary government exist. The hon. gentleman must know that responsible government did not exist at the Cape at the time of the removal of Mr. Smith.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I did not say it did exist.

MR. MILLS said then the cases were not in point. As Governors of Crown Colonies, Ministers in England were responsible for their acts, as the acts of the Crown. The proper place to challenge the conduct, or misconduct, of a Colonial Governor, as the place of last resort, no matter whether under responsible government or not, was in the Parliament of England. If the hon. gentleman took the trouble to consider the question, he would see that there was no applicability in the analogy he undertook to show. The Imperial Government claimed a sovereign and supervisory authority, and this Government did not. The Imperial Government exercised plenary authority over the entire domain of administrative action, so far as the Crown Colonies were concerned. It recognised the legislative and executive authority as being a trust from the Crown, and, that being the case, it held itself responsible in every particular for the conduct of the Governors within the limits of those Colonies. That was not the position of this Parliament with regard to the various Provinces. The Imperial Government could remove a Governor at any time. Could this Government do so? What was the meaning of that section of the British North America Act which provided that, when a Lieutenant-Governor was removed, a reason must be assigned, that he must be informed of the fact, and an opportunity given him to defend his action, that the action must be reported to Parliament, and he could only be removed for cause? The Imperial Government had their authority wholly unrestrained. The Governor-General here was restricted by the Constitution by which Parliament was governed and guided. The authority at Westminster was not liable to be abused in matters of this kind. The reason for the limitation of our authority was obvious. The Imperial Government was supposed to be an impartial judge in these matters. The people of the various colonies were not represented in the Imperial Parliament. The party passions and party contests in a colony, where the conduct of a Governor might be called into question or censured, were not brought in to influence parties in the Imperial Parliament. They occupied an impartial, because an isolated, position. They were uninfluenced by the passions which surrounded the people in the colony. Therefore, there was no motive for restraining Executive action or authority, or limiting Parliamentary interference. The fact that the same constituencies that sent members to the Local Legislature, over which the Lieutenant-Governor presided, sent representatives to this Parliament, induced the framers of the Constitution to provide checks. It was to restrain this Legislature from doing the very thing which hon. gentlemen were now undertaking to do, that these restraining provisions, to which he had referred, had been put in the British North America Act. He (Mr. Mills) would like to know if hon. gentlemen were prepared to accept the doctrine laid down by the First Minister that, if this House, without any reason being assigned, chose arbitrarily to recommend the removal of a Lieutenant-Governor, the Administration were bound to recommend His Excellency the Governor-General to remove that Lieutenant-Governor, law or no law, whether his conduct were meritorious or justly open to censure?

MR. MILLS.

That was not the doctrine contained in this Act, by which the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches had sworn to be guided. In the face of the declaration in this Act that, when a Lieutenant-Governor was to be removed some cause must be assigned, the hon. gentleman stated that, whether the Lieutenant-Governor's conduct were wise or unwise, capable of defence or deserving of censure, if a majority of this Parliament, under any circumstances, declared he should be removed, that it was the bounden duty of the Administration to recommend his removal. That was a doctrine to which he (Mr. Mills) could not subscribe, and which he was inclined to believe many hon. gentlemen in this House—and, he might say, on the Treasury benches—would not be found to defend and uphold. When they examined the conduct of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, he thought it would be found that hon. gentlemen were acting in a way that was wholly incapable of a rational defence. In the first place, the present Government did not, when formerly in power, nor did the late Government, who succeeded them, issue to the Lieutenant-Governor any instructions; and, if they did not instruct him in regard to the policy which was to govern him in the discharge of his constitutional duties, then he was seized of all the powers possessed by Her Majesty with reference to the appointment and dismissal of Ministers. The doctrine had been laid down by an hon. gentleman on a former occasion, in discussing this question, that the Lieutenant-Governor had not the power of Her Majesty. He (Mr. Mills) maintained that, so far as the powers were necessary to the proper discharge of his duty, the Lieutenant-Governor stood in exactly the same position as Her Majesty. By law, he appointed whom he pleased and dismissed them when he pleased. That was the literal construction of the law. This country was governed by the constitutional usage and practice that prevailed in Great Britain. If these did not furnish a rule, then the Lieutenant-Governor was wholly unrestrained under the provision of the Act. It was only the constitutional usage and practice that had grown up and become part of our system of government in the Mother Country that could afford any ground for restraining the action of the Lieutenant-Governor at all. Now, he maintained that, if the Lieutenant-Governor acted unwisely, improperly, or arbitrarily, in the exercise of a power which he undoubtedly possessed, that was ground for still instructing him. It might have been a ground for the late Government censuring him. They might have said: "We do not concur in the policy you pursue; we think you ought to have acted differently." He did not deny the power of the late Government to have said that; but, as the conduct complained of took place under a former régime, and as the subsequent Administration which Mr. Letellier called to his assistance was sustained on the appeal to the country, he (Mr. Mills) contended that this Parliament had no right to demand the dismissal of the Lieutenant-Governor. The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) said that Mr. Letellier was an officer of this Parliament, and that the Government were the trustees for the people in making the appointment. He (Mr. Mills) contended that, in no such sense, was the Lieutenant-Governor an officer of this Parliament or this Government. Under the British North America Act he was vested with the authority of an independent Chief Magistrate, for the very reason of preventing this Parliament interfering in the administration of the affairs of the Province. The Lieutenant-Governor was appointed for the purpose of carrying on the Government within the Province—for the administration of those affairs which were exclusively within the Province—and, therefore, he was a Provincial officer. He was surrounded by an Administration which he himself called into office, and, if that Administration did not coincide in opinion with the Lieutenant-Governor, he could, under the discretionary power given by this Act, if he saw proper, exercise the prerogative of the Crown, or he might rather say a power similar in kind, and dismiss his advisers. Certainly, it was not a prerogative that had been exercised, but there were cases on record where it had been exercised in England by George III, William IV, and also by Her Majesty Queen Victoria in the case of Lord Palmerston. Our theory of government was that, if the Chief Magistrate in removing his ministers could find others to accept the responsibility of the dismissal, and who could carry on the government of the country, he undoubtedly had the power to make that removal; but, if those persons were unable to carry on the government, then he must take back his first Ministers and be guided by their advice. The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) laid down a doctrine to-day that utterly swept away from beneath his feet the ground upon which he attacked the position of Mr. Letellier. The hon. gentleman, when speaking upon this subject last year, quoted Bagehot, and cited Earl Grey, to show that the Crown was, in the efficient government of the country, a nonentity; that it possessed no real power; that it was simply a cypher; and that the real head was the Administration for the time being. That was the position taken by the right hon. gentleman twelve months ago. Now, the fact that the hon. gentleman advised His Excellency to dismiss, at once, Mr. Letellier, and His Excellency declined, showed that the term cypher did not apply to the Governor-General who, for the time being, declined to act on the advice of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. In his (Mr. Mills's) opinion those hon. gentlemen very improperly advised the reference of this question to England. The hon. gentleman came down to the House, and stated that, although the mind of the Governor-General, with regard to the ultimate action, was in suspense, they disapproved of this reference.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I never said anything of the kind.

MR. MILLS: I think I can satisfy the House that that is the effect of what the hon. gentleman said.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I never said anything of the kind. You may argue from what I did say, but I never said that.

MR. MILLS said the hon. gentleman said that it was the unanimous advice of himself and his colleagues to the Governor-General, that the Lieutenant-Governor ought to be removed, and that His Excellency did not conceive it proper to act upon that advice.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I never used those words. Look at the Hansard. You must be accurate literally.

MR. MILLS said he recollected the hon. gentleman's words as they were reported in the Mail newspaper.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : There is the Hansard.

MR. MILLS said he did know how far the Hansard gave the exact words of the hon. gentleman. There were some things there which the hon. gentleman might regard as a calumny to be held responsible for. The words the hon. gentleman was reported as using were these :

"He, the representative of the Sovereign, says he will ask for specific instructions from his and our Sovereign. There is nothing unconstitutional in it. I would have been pleased and gratified, and I think it would have been well, had our advice been at once accepted."

What was the advice of the hon. gentleman that was not accepted? Was it not that Mr. Letellier should be at once removed? Did His Excellency act on this advice? Did not the hon. gentleman tell His Excellency that, because, forsooth, a majority in this House, who had no control over the acts of a Lieutenant-Governor; that could, by their good or bad opinion, neither contribute to his efficiency or to his inefficiency, had voted that Mr. Letellier was censurable for what he did; therefore, his usefulness was gone, and he ought to be removed? The Governor-General saw proper to take a different view, and the hon. gentleman was placed in this position: that he had either to resign or to yield to the opinion of His Excellency. The hon. gentleman preferred to save his own skin, and yielded. If he had not yielded he would have been forced out of the Administration, out of the position of adviser to His Excellency, by the action of the Governor-General himself. What had Mr. Letellier done more than what the Governor-General had done, and, according to the hon. gentleman, in exercise of his undoubted authority? How could the hon. gentleman reconcile the action of the Governor-General with the theory of the Constitution by which he proposed to test the conduct of Mr. Letellier?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : The hon. gentleman says that Lieutenant-Governor Letellier did exactly what the Governor-General did. Did Mr. De Boucherville advise that he himself should be dismissed? He was turned out of office.

MR. MILLS said His Excellency took a line which was not the one that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues were pleased to advise, and which they desired him to follow. The hon. gentleman saw a difficulty where none existed. The Crown was continuous in its existence. The Administration might change, but it did not matter whether the action of the Lieutenant-Governor was supported by Mr. DeBoucherville's Administration or by the Administration that took their place. Mr. Joly and his colleagues assumed the responsibility of what the Lieutenant-Governor did, and, having assumed the responsibility, they were for that purpose the Ministers of the Crown, advising the removal of Mr. DeBoucherville just as Sir Robert Peel, although away in Italy at the time of the removal of Lord Melbourne, on his return to England accepting office, sometime after the dismissal took place, and having, with the Duke of Wellington, assumed the responsibility of forming an Administration, was held responsible for the removal of Lord Melbourne, although he came into office subsequent to that event. That was a fiction of our Constitution, which was just as applicable to this particular case, as it was to the case of Lord Melbourne and his Administration. The hon. gentleman had said that Lieutenant-Governor Letellier's usefulness was gone. What did that mean? He did not undertake to show in what way the usefulness of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier was gone.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : No man under permanent censure of Parliament can be useful.

MR. MILLS said he denied that proposition. In the first place, there was no permanent censure of Parliament. Last year the House of Commons refused to censure. The hon. gentleman assumed that the censure passed in the Senate last year was continuous. That censure in the Senate was before the people of Quebec had approved of Mr. Letellier's action, and he had reason to believe that the Senate would have declined to censure Mr. Letellier again, after the Administration which had assumed the responsibility of his acts was sustained by the people of Quebec. The Constitution said the Lieutenant-Governor was to be removed only for cause; that that cause was to be reported to Parliament. That cause must be his bad conduct, not their bad opinion. The hon. gentleman laid down the doctrine that it mattered not how well the Lieutenant-Governor might act—if this House disapproved of his conduct, he must go. Whereas the very provisions of the British North America Act upon the subject were inserted to prevent the possibility of such a policy being carried out. He (Mr. Mills) would say again that there was no analogy between the position of a Lieutenant-Governor in Canada and a Governor in one of the Colonies. The latter was far removed from the Parliament that might censure his act, whereas the Governor of any one of the Provinces of this Dominion was often a gentleman who had been prominent in this House, on the one side or the other, and might have made political enemies here. He must be a person from one side or the other, or, at all events, regarded so by many people, however fairly he might act when he became Governor. The advice of the hon. gentleman meant that the principle—"To the victors belong the spoils"—must extend to the office of Lieutenant-Governor, as to every other office in the country. Whether Mr. Letellier had acted arbitrarily or improperly—and he (Mr. Mills) had never expressed any opinion on the merits of his act; he would take an opportunity after the question was disposed of to give his views on the whole question—this was unquestionably the fact, that he found an Administration willing to assume the responsibility of his act, which obtained a majority in the Province to sustain them. The hon. gentleman had said that in this particular case the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor was highly unconstitutional and improper; but he did not descend to particulars; he did not point out in what respects it was unconstitutional and improper. The Lieutenant-Governor objected to his Administration acting in important public matters without consulting him, and using his name without reference to him. The Administration undertook to assume the functions of the judiciary; they undertook to take away arbitrarily the rights of some of the most important municipalities in Quebec. Upon these questions the Lieutenant-Governor differed widely from his advisers. He said they were surrounded by rings which rendered them powerless to serve the public wisely and well. That being the case, according to the doctrine laid down by the hon. gentleman to-day, Mr. Letellier had unquestionably the power to do what he did.

MR. OUMET: He had the power, but not the right.

MR. MILLS said that was a matter of judgment, and it was the business of Mr. Letellier to exercise his judgment and not that of hon. gentlemen opposite; and, upon reference to the people of the Province, they concurred in his judgment.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Including Mr. Turcotte.

MR. MILLS: Certainly, including Mr. Turcotte. He was not sitting in judgment on Mr. Turcotte. Mr. Turcotte was elected to the Legislature of Quebec. He was not an officer of this Government, and was not responsible to this House; and it seemed to him to be rather an extreme course for the hon. gentleman to adopt to base his attack on Mr. Letellier upon the motives which he inferred governed the conduct of Mr. Turcotte. The hon. gentleman had no right to intimate that a member of the Quebec Legislature was corruptly purchased by the Government of Quebec, when that member had not an opportunity of defending himself before this House. Those who made this charge here might be what the hon. gentleman called unvarnished calumniators. The hon. gentleman had not only laid down contradictory propositions upon this particular question, but had taken a very unparliamentary course with regard to this whole question. If he thought the conduct of Mr. Letellier was improper, he should have acted. The initiative was with the Governor-General and his advisers. If he thought he had a right to act, after what had been done by the Government that preceded him, if he thought he had a right to drag from its tomb a settled question, as the Restorationists did the bones of Cromwell, he ought to have assumed the responsibility of doing it, and left this House to approve or disapprove of his conduct, instead of inviting the House to assume the responsibility of what he ought himself to have advised the Crown to do. He not only did that, but he informed the House that he differed from the Governor-General on this question; that the Governor declined to act on his advice; that the Governor wanted to consult other parties who were in no way responsible to the people of this country for the advice they gave to His Excellency through Her Majesty. The hon. gentleman employed a gentleman, in no way connected with this House or with the Government, to press on the Crown the advice of the Administration. That was the function of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, and of nobody else. It was his duty to have seen that the advice he tendered was acted on in this country. It related to a matter, according to his own showing, with which the Imperial Government had no concern; which concerned this House only. Then, knowing that the course ultimately advised would dissatisfy the Conservative representatives from Quebec, because great expectations had been raised that a system of general slaughter was going to be inaugurated, and that Mr. Letellier was going to be one of the decapitated, he could not afford to disappoint his followers too much at once. The ultimate failure must be reached by gradual stages, and so the House was informed that the Administration regretted that His Excellency did not see proper to act on that advice.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I deny that. I said I would have been pleased and gratified if he had.

MR. MILLS.

MR. MILLS: The hon. gentleman was not pleased, and was not gratified. His advice was not accepted. Did he not regret that that advice, which, if accepted, would have pleased and gratified him, was not accepted? Was the hon. gentleman left in a neutral position, without gratification and without regret? What was the effect of that failure? The indignation of the hon. gentleman's followers from Quebec was let loose on the Governor-General. The hon. gentleman informed the House that he was not responsible for the course the press took. He did not inspire the press. But he knew what course the press of Quebec would take. If not, why did he come down and disclose the advice given to His Excellency before it was finally acted on? The reason was patent. He turned away the indignation that would have fallen upon himself and his colleagues upon His Excellency the Governor-General. He thought it better His Excellency should suffer than that his advisers should. No doubt, in this particular, the policy of the Administration was eminently successful, for the course taken did direct the shafts of obloquy away from the hon. gentleman to the Governor-General from that hour to this. He did not think, when the question was finally disposed of, however this might be done, that the course taken by the hon. gentleman would show that he possessed that superior wisdom and statesmanship which he had, with so much becoming modesty, claimed for himself, and which he had, with so much frankness, and with so much candour, denied to those who preceded him in office.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MR. MOUSSEAU said that, inasmuch as he had been connected with this matter, he felt that he was bound to say something in regard to it. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), as leader of the Opposition, had thought proper to bring this matter before the House before prorogation. He (Mr. Mousseau) was glad that he did so in the forcible manner in which he had introduced the subject. He was sorry to say that this was, perhaps, the only compliment he would have to pay to the hon. gentleman in the course of his remarks. The hon. gentleman complained of the language they had used in reference to this matter. He thought, however, that they did not exceed the license taken by hon. gentlemen in 1873. Their papers then indulged in the greatest abuse of Lord Dufferin, whose only crime was that he followed the advice of Ministers who commanded a majority in the House. The speeches of hon. gentlemen, of which he gave quotations on the 1st of March last, were a sufficient proof of this. None of them had gone so far as hon. gentlemen opposite had done on that occasion. Among the speakers on that occasion were the Hon. Mr. Laflamme, the hon. member for Shefford, and others. He desired to state that he had been misrepresented in the press in regard to the words he uttered on the evening of the announcement to which he alluded. He could not quote from Hansard to verify the exact words, because he had discovered that they had not been reported—why, he did not know. But, as these words had been impeached, and as he had always the courage to verify what he had said, he would repeat them. He had said that they had got a new Lord Metcalfe, and he had been taught a lesson. Those were his words, which were reported in papers supporting the hon. gentlemen opposite, and in American journals. When he used those words he had not time to verify or qualify them, or describe the occasion which impelled him to pronounce them. He had not had the time to tell the House that he knew the history of Lord Metcalfe thoroughly, and was a great admirer of his, and that his career in Canada was marked by errors which came only from his entourage or surroundings—from the minority that got hold of him, and tried to persuade him that the French majority could not be trusted, and could not administer responsible government properly. He was strongly convinced of the excellency of British institutions, and they saw, by his letters to the Colonial office and his friends the struggles of his conscience. On the one hand, he was firmly convinced that the full measure of responsible government ought to be established here, while, on the other, having listened to the bad advice of the Ministry, he was always fighting against his principles and neglecting the opportunity of their application. His career in other countries was admirable; he was highly educated, and possessed critical taste and a sound judgment. When, therefore, he (Mr. Mousseau) had compared Lord Lorne with Lord Metcalfe, it was with no intention to be unjust, unfair, or insulting to the Governor-General. His constitutional sincerity, in wishing to refer the case to England was, in his (Mr. Mousseau's) opinion, erroneous. He had compared the two noble Lords to show the similarity of their circumstances—that the one might have yielded, as had the other, to bad advice. He had been accused of a want of courage in not bringing forward his motion earlier. What the leader of the Government said to-day, and the member for Lambton had admitted, entirely proved the wisdom of his (Mr. Mousseau's) course. When he submitted his motion there was only one declaration, nothing being said of the intended mission to England, as asserted to by the Marquis of Lorne, the object of which was to maintain the course of his Ministers. In face of the earnestness of the Government, and of His Excellency, and with good tidings from England, as to the good disposition of the English Government, he thought it better to delay his motion, to await the course of events. The hon. member for Lambton stated that, in his motion of March last, and in his observations, he (Mr. Mousseau) had not gone so far as to say the course of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier was unconstitutional, in dismissing his Ministers in March, 1878. He maintained that those words of his motion: "Subversive of all responsible government," were strong enough to imply the violation of that principle. He had cited cases on constitutional law to establish that point. He had established the other point—that in many instances the Imperial Government had thought it proper and wise to recall Governors, or revoke their commissions, because their course had been unwise or antagonistic to the colonial majorities. He might cite the recall of Sir Charles Dalling in 1866, and in a despatch signed Cardwell, in which he spoke of the good relations which should exist between the Government and both parties in the House, he said: "I regret to say, in the first instance, you have rendered this impossible. It must be evident to yourself that you occupy a position of personal antagonism towards all those whose antecedents pointed them out as likely to be available to you in the event of any change of Ministry." In this instance, as in that of Lord Metcalfe, and that of Mr. Letellier, it had been the misfortune of the Governor to put himself in direct antagonism to the majority of the Assembly. The only effect of this antagonism was to render peace impossible, so the Imperial authorities thought proper to recal the offending Governors. What had they got here? As soon as Mr. Letellier was appointed, he undertook to play the part of the bitterest opponent of the Conservative party; not only did he bind himself to be the mere tool of the late Federal Administration, but, in order to help them in their Federal elections, he set himself to put down the Conservative Administration in Quebec. He began his operations in December, 1877, or January, 1878, when the election in Kamouraska took place; he hired a box-car in order to conceal himself in his expedition to that county to carry out his object, which was to canvass for the election of Mr. Pelletier, his successor. He (Mr. Mousseau) would pass over the famous occurrences indicated in his letters to Mr. DeBoucherville, on the face of which appeared the grossest partisanship, and the fact that all was arranged to take advantage of the good faith of his advisers, and oust them from office. The member for Lambton had spoken of the April elections in Quebec. He (Mr. Mousseau) had spent thirty or or thirty-five days in the campaign, and never knew or read of elections being carried by such means as were employed by the supporters of the Joly Government. Those means consisted of lies, misrepresentations and calumnies, and nothing else. There was no discussing the constitutional question of Mr. Letellier's dismissal of his Ministers. The Conservatives found it impossible to speak of that question, being stifled at all times with the cry of taxation by their opponents, who incessantly denounced them as the party of taxation, as if they themselves did not belong to the party of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who had imposed millions of taxation on the country. That was the cry used and course pursued in all the counties in Quebec, except a few. Sometimes that mode of canvassing took the character of perfect demagoguism, with exaggeration of the tax-paying obligations of the people in every way. That was the way the Joly Cabinet carried the elections. The member for Lambton said the whole management of the Letellier matter was bungled. He thought they ought to have proceeded by impeachment. He (Mr. Mousseau) also was half of that opinion. He did not say that the Government had mismanaged the affair, but they might have done better. His opinion would have been in favour of impeachment; but, through a feeling of delicacy towards Mr. Letellier, and pride and patriotism as regarded his race, he (Mr. Mousseau) had not taken that course. Hon. members had spoken of the June Session in Quebec, and it had been said that the verdict of the Province had entirely cleansed that personification of all the virtues of a Lieutenant-Governor. He was about to make some very serious charges; he might be reproached for bringing them late, but it was not his fault. He would have spoken in reply, in the debate on this question, some weeks ago, had he not been anxious to save time. In the June Session of the Local Legislature, the Joly Government thought proper to purchase a Speaker from their ranks. They did so at the urgent request, at the demand of Mr. Letellier. The bargain was passed in his own presence at Spencer Wood. At the beginning of the Session they were met by a vote of censure on the constitutional question. Any decent Cabinet would have resigned after that, and any decent Lieutenant-Governor would have dismissed such a Cabinet. He was sure, if the hon. gentleman from Lambton had known that, he would not have ventured to defend Mr. Letellier, because he was too upright, and had done too much to raise the standard of public morality to have ventured to speak in favour of Mr. Letellier. They went on, and Mr. Letellier was always afraid that his purchased vote might escape him, and so he tried to purchase somebody else. He installed himself in the room of the Speaker of the Legislative Council, and in the room of the Speaker of the other House. He was there every day the House sat, not only a few minutes, but the whole length of the sitting, and he sent for Conservative members, offered them drinks, and tried to induce them to vote for his Government. But that was not sufficient, they wanted new blood. There was in the hands of Mr. Letellier a letter, signed by the late Minister of Justice, offering a Judgeship to advocates who would consent to go over to the other side. He knew that every word he uttered was true. He (Mr. Mousseau) spoke in all seriousness. It was too late now to appoint a Committee, but, next Session, if his hon. friends on the other side were ready, he would move for a Committee, and, if he did not prove any of those charges, he would leave the House in disgrace. He agreed with the hon. member for Lambton that they ought to have proceeded by impeachment, for, if they had done so, he was sure that Mr. Letellier would already have been dismissed and disgraced for ever. Mr. Joly's majority was so strong that, when Mr. Bachand died in October last, he was not replaced. The necessary formalities were filed, the proper documents were sent to the Speaker, but they had never seen the writ. At last, however, Mr. Mercier was appointed Solicitor-General, and, curiously enough, his appointment coincided exactly with a remarkable judgment of Judge Sicotte, of St. Hyacinthe, who was, at the same time, a brother-in-law of one of those Ministers. He did not want to speak disrespectfully of a Judge, but he was bound to do his duty, and to say that the appointment of Mr. Mercier coincided with a most wonderful judgment of Judge Sicotte. He had already given two judgments on the electoral list of that county, one last year, and one a few months ago. In these cases an appeal was refused—he did not know why. The judgments were rendered against the Conservatives, but they made no complaint. He gave another judgment last week, when Mr. Mercier was sworn in. By that judgment he struck off the list of St. Denis eighty-two names of those presumed to be Conservative electors. He (Mr. Mousseau) was bound to say this was a most scandalous judgment, and by this judgment Mr. Joly's friend expected to carry St. Hyacinthe. It might be well to recal the historical fact that Judge Sicotte, in 1863, did what Mr. Turcotte did in 1878, so that we had now, in the political dictionary, two more words, Sicottage and Turcottage. Judge Sicotte hoped to send, by his judgment, a new member to Quebec to support a Ministry of which his brother-in-law was a member. So much for that famous Joly Government which the hon. member for Lambton had very modestly eulogised this afternoon.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had pronounced no eulogy on anyone; he dealt simply with the constitutional question, without touching the Ministry in any shape.

MR. MOUSSEAU said he considered Mr. Mackenzie had pronounced upon the Joly Government what they called in French, their oraison funèbre. He was sure that Government would not live long, and that it would be beaten early in the next Session. He was sure that, if the people of Quebec could have another chance of expressing their opinion, the Liberal party would be beaten by a majority of at least 48 out of 65. The Liberals first wanted to obtain power in Quebec in order to help the Mackenzie Administration in the last election. They now wanted to retain office through greed of the spoils, but they saw their power escaping, and they resorted to other schemes. Mr. Mercier was hardly sworn in when he telegraphed to Montreal, to the Prothonotary's office, ordering the suspension of one of the employés, one of the best and most trustworthy employés. This employé happened to be in his parish during the election contest in April, 1878, and was suspected of having been there as a politician. It was true that he was not, but the Joly Government wanted places for their friends before they went out of office.

MR. HOLTON said he was sorry his hon. friend had not felt it due to himself to explain rather more fully the course he had taken during the present Session, and especially since the announcement made by the Government a few weeks ago. It was that which they had to do with to-night, rather than with the events in Quebec last year, and certainly a good deal more than with the recital of events, by the hon. gentleman, which had not been placed on record at all in the dispute between the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec and his former advisers. They might be true, or they might not, but they had no relevancy whatever to the subject-matter in dispute. The hon. gentleman and his friends did not include any new charges whatever as the basis of their motion of censure this year, they limited themselves to the events of last year, events which had gone into history and had been passed upon by the people of Quebec. A general election had taken place in the Province of Quebec, the result of which was to enable the new Government to pass through the fiery ordeal of a Session of Parliament, and to hold the reins of Government down to the present day. What had they to do with these petty stories of election manoeuvres? Were they never heard of before? What bearing had they upon the great issue as to the constitutional conduct of the Governor-General? That Mr. Joly, or his Ministers, should make efforts to sustain themselves by dealing with the electors, or by proclaiming, as the issue, something that the hon. gentleman denied to be such—it was trifling with the House to bring up stories of that kind as having any bearing upon the question. The hon. gentleman had not explained his own conduct during this Session, but it was that they were waiting to hear about with great anxiety. He tried now to soften that angry mood of his which he displayed five or six weeks ago; he meant only to praise the Governor-General, not to abuse him, in comparing him with Lord Metcalfe, the great and good Lord Metcalfe of the East Indian Administration, and not at all the tyrant that he had been called in a great controversy respecting responsible government in this country. But to-day Lord Metcalfe was a fine character, and there could be no offence in comparing the Governor-General to Lord Metcalfe. The hon. gentleman had changed his mood; he had not then been told that the Government were going to send an embassy to London, he had not then heard the good news he had since heard, and that induced him to allow his motion to stand. That being the case, why did he not withdraw his motion, and give his reasons to the House? But they had just been told by the head of the Government that he had no news whatever that he could communicate to Parliament. Could he have communicated privately to the hon. gentleman, who had given him notice of attack upon him, and induced him to allow the notice to stand? Could the head of the Government have given information to the hon. gentleman privately and secretly, which he now declared he could not give to the House, having, in fact, no information to give. Really his hon. friend must see that, in the line he had taken to-night, instead of vindicating his sincerity, and explaining to his friends outside and inside of the House how it was that this motion had been so misconstrued, and himself misrepresented during the last few weeks, it now turned out that the hon. gentleman had been perfectly satisfied with the conduct of his leaders during all this time. He (Mr. Holton) regretted exceedingly that the hon. gentleman had not explained his conduct, because he regarded him as one of the rising men of the Province of Quebec, on whichever side of the House he happened to sit. He was not going to follow the hon. gentleman through his references to the current politics of the Province of Quebec, which had no relevance whatever to the matter now before the House. He felt that the conduct of Mr. Letellier in Quebec last year was of infinitely little concern to the House now. It was not Mr. Letellier who was on his trial; he might be dismissed by the means taken to bring about the result, or he might not. He (Mr. Holton) was not going to speculate upon that result. But the party they were now trying was not the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. It was another public functionary, who was directly responsible to this House—he meant the First Minister. This debate ought to have reference, and had reference, so far as the members of the Opposition were concerned, not to the merits or the demerits of Mr. Letellier, but to the conduct of the First Minister, in reference to this transaction. The charge the Opposition made against that hon. gentleman was, substantially, that he gave improper advice to the Governor-General with respect to this matter; that he gave advice, which was probably illegal, or, to say the least, of doubtful legality; but there was no doubt as to the unwisdom of that advice, unwise and improper, because it proposed to invade and destroy, so far as his action could bear upon that result, the right of self-government in the Province of Quebec. It was of doubtful legality, because the hon. gentleman did not give, as the ground of his advice, that the Lieutenant-Governor should be dismissed for some such alleged course as was in the contemplation in the Union Act. No Lieutenant-Governor could be dismissed during his period of office—five years—except for cause, and no hon. gentleman had maintained or shown, in this debate, that any such cause had been alleged as these words conveyed to any lawyer. He (Mr. Holton) was not a lawyer, still he had read some treatises on law and logic, and he asked his hon. friend the Minister of Justice whether he would say or maintain that there was any allegation of cause in the sense which this Act contemplated to convey. He contended there was not. Therefore, the advice was of doubtful legality. Even if the Governor-General were in perfect harmony with all his Ministers, he had no right to dismiss the Lieutenant-Governor, except for cause. There might be some allegations, of course, concealed in the archives of the Administration, but accompanying the statement of the advice given to the Governor-General, there had been no such specification of cause as met the requirement of the case. These were his two points: First, it was an unwise act to tender that advice to the Governor-General, because it was a direct invasion upon the right of self-government in the Province of Quebec, and, secondly, it was of, at least, doubtful legality. Then what followed? The extraordinary procedure of bringing down to the House, and making public, a divergency of opinion between the Representative of the Crown and his advisers. That was entirely at variance with the theory and practice of responsible government. The House had no right to know, neither had the world, that the Governor-General and his constitutional advisers were at variance, for one instant of time, upon any possible subject. The moment an irreconcilable difference arose between the advisers of the Crown and the Crown itself, there must be a resignation, or there must be an acquiescence on the part of the advisers in the views of the Governor-General. Never should it go out to the world that there was, or had ever been, any difference of opinion between the Representative of the Crown and the advisers of the Crown, until it had reached the point at which the two must separate, when the cause of difference must be explained to Parliament, and the responsibility assumed by the retiring Ministry. This was an important invasion, on the part of the First Minister, on the whole system of responsible government. It was an Act utterly subversive of the principles of responsible government and sound constitutional usage. But what followed upon that? It was the creation of suspicion, at all events, that the Governor-General himself was hostile to the wishes of those among the supporters of the Government who most desired the decapitation of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, and language had been used in reference to that distinguished nobleman which he (Mr. Holton) was sure his hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) sincerely regretted to-day, and which every man of right feeling must regret. But there was no doubt that the effect produced by this improper act on the part of the head of the Government was to submit the Governor-General to unjust suspicion, amounting, in many instances, to positive odium. It was very important, in order to avoid results of such a regrettable character, that they should adhere strictly to those nice provisions, usages and distinctions which had grown up under their constitutional system. In the next place—to proceed a little further in his (Mr. Holton's) indictment against the First Minister—the right hon. gentleman denied to the House information which it was entitled to have. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) considered it to be his duty to bring down this information inopportunistically, he (Mr. Holton) thought, improperly, and submit it to the House. His hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) said he had heard good news as to the progress of this prosecution of the Lieutenant-Governor on behalf of the Government of this Dominion before the Court of St. James. Now, he (Mr. Holton) thought the House had before it now a series of admitted facts which placed not Lieutenant-Governor Letellier upon his trial, but the head of this Government. The House must hold the head of this Government, and the whole of the Government to the strictest account for their management of this business. It was of little consequence to the House what might become of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, or whether he were right or wrong in the course he pursued; but it was of infinite consequence to them that the gentleman placed at the head of a great party and controlling the Government of this country, supported by an overwhelming majority for the moment, should not be allowed to subvert in Parliament those institutions they had striven so long to obtain, and which it was the duty of the House, beyond any other duty they had to fulfil, to do all in their power to maintain in their integrity. His (Mr. Holton's) chief purpose in addressing the House was to express his profound regret at the position which his hon. friend (Mr. Mousseau) had assumed to-night.

MR. MOUSSEAU: I thank you very much for your sympathy.

MR. HOLTON: In view of the line of conduct which he had followed during the last five or six weeks.

MR. OUMET said that he had no authority to speak on the part of his hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Mousseau); but, as he had something to do with this question, on which he had been d'accord with that hon. gentleman, he thought it would be but just to himself and to that hon. gentleman that he should give some explanation respecting this matter, and that he should respond to the sympathy sent across the floor of the House by their Nestor from the Province of Quebec—the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton). That hon. gentleman seemed to be very much surprised at what had been termed the row they had raised in this House, on account of the reference of this question to England. It was not because they had changed their opinions. As for himself, he was still of the same opinion as he was when the question was first raised. He disapproved then, and still disapproved, of the reference to England of a question which seemed to him to be purely a local matter. He had disapproved of the conduct of His Excellency the Governor-General, who deemed it proper to refer the question to England. He disapproved, at the same time, of the course followed by the Government in acquiescing in, and assuming the responsibility of that reference. He was still of the same opinion, and the members from the Province of Quebec) had availed themselves of every opportunity given them to protest against that course. They had made their protest, notwithstanding that the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) had characterised their proceedings in the House as noisy. After having entered their protest, after having filed their exception—and their protest and exception were still on record—and as steps had been taken to have the question brought to an issue, they were waiting patiently and quietly, as became respectable citizens, as became members of this House, until an answer could be received from England, and, if the question was decided against them, their protest would be there on record. They would still be in the same position as a pleader who had filed his exception to the jurisdiction of the tribunal. They had not abandoned the hope that, at some future day, if justice were not done to them, they would do what they thought was their duty to do. They would not only protest, but, when the question was discussed again in the House, they would certainly put a motion or proposition before this House, which, though it might be voted down by the Opposition, would most certainly be upheld by the great majority of the Conservative party. On the other hand, he still hoped that the question would be solved in their favour. He still hoped that the Secretary for the Colonies, Sir Michael Hicks Beach, would give the same answer to this question, as was given on the 28th February,

MR. HOLTON.

1878, to the then Governor of the Colony of Victoria, in a despatch, in which it was laid down that it was the duty of any Governor to follow the advice of his Ministers—his constitutional advisers. In this despatch it was stated: "The main question at issue appears to be one connected with the internal affairs of the colony, and to lie altogether within the jurisdiction of your Government, and for these reasons I cannot give any opinion, but the Governor must solve the question and his legal advisers must take the responsibility of the solution." Well, he (Mr. Ouimet) hoped that the right hon. gentleman who had written these instructions in this despatch to the Governor of the Colony of Victoria would give the same opinion in the Letellier matter. If he did not, for one reason or the other, it would be their duty then to affirm the principle which was affirmed in the motion of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), and which, unfortunately, he, in common with many hon. gentlemen on his side of the House—not on the other side—had not an opportunity of supporting. But what was the use of bringing up this question? How could the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) claim that he regretted so much that the question had not come up?

MR. HOLTON: It is on the hon. gentlemen's account, and more particularly on account of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), whose reputation in the county required absolutely that he should put that motion that I regret it was not put.

MR. MOUSSEAU: I am most thankful to the hon. member, who regrets keenly that I did not play his game.

MR. OUIMET said there was another interest in this question. He, for one, had great respect for the hon. member for Bagot, quite as much friendship for him as had the hon. member for Chateauguay, but there was something else in that motion than the personality of the hon. member for Bagot. There was a great constitutional principle to be upheld, and, under the circumstances, the hon. member for Bagot could not expose his motion to the possibility of being voted down, and a principle affirmed which the hon. member for Chateauguay would have regretted should be affirmed, even by his own vote. But he might now ask what was the object of the hon. member in bringing up this question? And what was the object of the hon. member for Lambton? It was certainly not brought up for the sake of the Constitution, or for the sake of the Government, of whose course, in this matter, they complained so much. He (Mr. Ouimet) might characterise the action of those hon. members as what the French called un petit bout de cour, to court the favour of a very important personage outside this House. But the supporters of the motion had not the same interest. They had not courted that distinguished personage. They had freely expressed their opinion before this House—not to consult this distinguished personage, but to vindicate what they thought were the rights of the people; not for party purposes, not to gain a personal triumph; but only to vindicate what they thought was the proper course to be followed. And, when they saw that they were quite alone, even abandoned by their Nestor, by one who claimed to be a father of the Constitution, they said to themselves it would be just as well to stick to their friends, who might be of some use to them in the future, and to the very cause they were now upholding. They had stuck to their friends, and this might be one of the causes of the deep regret expressed by the hon. member for Chateauguay. He again asked what was the object of this discussion? They could not discuss the proposition, the principle that had been opposed by so large a majority in this House on the 23rd of March last because it was a chose jugée. It could not be discussed again without reflecting on the decision of the great majority of this House, although the hon. member for Lambton and his confreere, the hon. member for Bothwell, thought fit to pronounce strong orations against that judgment given by this House, that the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec was unwise and subversive of the principles of responsible government. Could they now discuss the advice that had been tendered by the Government? Not at all. The advice of the Government had been given on the very verdict of this House. They were bound to give that advice after the House had pronounced. The House had declared itself, and the Government had to act upon that declaration, and they had rightly done so in advising the Governor-General that, Lieutenant-Governor Letellier having been condemned by a great majority of this House, his usefulness was gone, and he ought to be removed. The Government could not be blamed because they had chosen to make that announcement to the House. The House had a right to know what they had done in the matter, and they were authorised by His Excellency to make the announcement. Now, when the dismissal came, if it did come, and the hon. members claimed that it could not take place except for cause, the papers would be put before them, and then the cause would appear, and, if there was no cause, the hon. member or his leader would have to censure the Government for having given an unwise, a wrong and illogical advice, as the hon. member for Chateauguay said had been given. The reference to England, as he had said, might be discussed, but, if this question was to be discussed, the supporters of the motion would be alone to blame the Government, as he had already stated. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not blame His Excellency for having referred the question to England, but they said: Your friends are not satisfied with that, and you are therefore to be blamed. Whom could they blame? He had just mentioned that the advice was wrongly given. The Government had said, in a very cool way: "We shall accept the judgment of an arbitrator, and the arbitrator will be Her Majesty's Government. He (Mr. Ouimet) believed the Government were wrong. It might happen that in the end they would see that they were right, because, if the very solution arrived which they expected from the other side, that the Governor-General must submit to the advice of his Ministers, that England had given to Canada responsible government, and the very essence of responsible government was that, in all matters of internal administration, they were their own masters, they would then be satisfied, and could, without being ashamed, say that, after all, the Government were right, though, constitutionally, they were right at the time, and were still right, as it would be proclaimed by the Government. The question would be settled for ever to the satisfaction of all lovers of their country and responsible government. Let the consequences be what they might, they could say at the end that they had done their duty, and might still reproach their hon. Nestor from the Province of Quebec for not having led them in that constitutional way which he boasted having followed so closely and so faithfully.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he was afraid the Province of Quebec would be somewhat disheartened by the capitulation which had been made by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), of whom he (Mr. Huntington) would not have felt it his duty to speak so much had they not been neighbours.

MR. MOUSSEAU: But we do not visit often.

MR. HUNTINGTON said they did not bother each other. When he returned home he would be asked by a lot of Conservatives in his county how it was that Mr. Mousseau did not go on with his motion, and he would be obliged to tell them that he was afraid the right hon. the leader of the Government had a power over him which he (Mr. Huntington) could not explain, any more than he could explain those unseen mysterious influences by which the spirit land conveyed its views to certain peculiarly constituted temperaments. The hon. member for Bagot had led the House to suppose he would fight a great battle for the Province of Quebec. He had not fought it. He must take the consequences of having placed himself in a position to fight a great battle for a certain interest in the Province of Quebec and of not having fought it, because he had been overawed or overcome, or for some other reason had been influenced by the old power. For years they had heard that there was to spring up a certain influence in this country, headed by the young men of the country, which was to discard the old party influences and to bring good influences and true doctrines to the front, by the fervour and devotion with which the young men were to display their powers in this sense. His hon. friend was a young man compared to himself (Mr. Huntington); the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) was a young man. This House listened, and thought it heard the first boom of the cannon—the young men were to fire. The hon. gentleman's speech was something alarming. Nothing was ever heard in this country like the fervour with which the hon. gentleman assailed the Crown, but it all ended in mild deprecation of the course taken. He remembered the days when the Trent affair occurred; there was a very impressive cartoon upon it, representing Britain looking across the waters for the release of the Trent prisoners, with an expression which indicated the title given to the cartoon: "Britain waits an answer;" and the poem went on to say: Britain awaits an answer, stern and sad. And so he could have told his people that Mr. Mousseau awaited an answer, stern and sad, but the capitulation had been made beforehand, and it was understood that, whatever might be the answer, the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) and the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet), would still be pliant supporters of the right hon. gentleman, whom they should have denounced instead of denouncing the Governor-General.

Bill read the third time and passed.

PACIFIC RAILWAY ROUTE IN MANITOBA.

REMARKS.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) said he was pleased to hear the Government had determined to have the Pacific Railway pass to the south of Lake Manitoba instead of the north, but the other conditions were not equally satisfactory. It was a great mistake to lop off such a very large quantity of land from settlement. It would be more in the interest of the North-West were the same policy pursued there as was pursued by the Americans. At this moment, in the States, it was allowable for any settler to take up a homestead as well on the lands reserved as on those not reserved for railways. If 100,000,000 acres in the North-West were to be shut out, for settlements were not to be had except for $2 per acre, a great portion of those settlers who would otherwise come here would go to the American States, where there was a large quantity of lands more accessible than those of the Dominion. The present tariff would also operate against the settlement of the North-West. It would not only be a graceful act, but an act of justice on the part of this Government, to exempt the people of the North-West from this tariff, until they had thorough communication with the country by Lake Superior. With a tariff so high as this, they could not say to those who desired to go into the North-West: You are going into a very cheap country. The article of tea, for instance, which was the most refreshing beverage the working man could possibly have, should be admitted free of duty, as was done on the American side. He trusted the Government would see proper to relieve the wants of that country by excluding it from the operation of the present tariff.

MR. RYAN (Marquette) said he was happy to hear the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith) was at last of the same opinion as himself (Mr. Ryan), and that he now thought the Government did right in locating the main line of the Canada Pacific Railway south of Lake Manitoba. He could not help regretting, however, that this change had occurred so late.

MR. SMITH: I was always of that opinion.

MR. RYAN said if it was his opinion, it was plainly his duty, as a representative of Manitoba, to take the same ground on the floor of the House as the hon. member for Lisgar and himself had last year. The hon. gentleman regretted that the policy of the Government would require the locking up of such an enormous quantity of land. If he (Mr. Ryan) was correctly informed, the present Government policy did not require the locking up of any greater quantity of land than was intended from the first. Under the original Pacific Railway scheme, 50,000,000 acres were to be given to a company, and an equal quantity was to be retained by the Government. The resolution now propounded reserved the same quantity. Outside these 100,000,000 acres, the homestead system would obtain, as it had always done in the past. The hon. gentleman chose to draw the attention of the House to the large quantity of good lands which the Americans had in the markets to the south of us. No doubt the hon. gentleman was a good authority as to their value, as he was one of the proprietors of those lands himself. The hon. gentleman referred to the number of Canadians in the United States. Had he followed the debates for the past two or three years, he would have known that gentlemen who had taken an active interest in the affairs of the country had constantly deplored the exodus of Canadians to the United States, and, to remedy that, the great change was introduced in our fiscal policy. If there were so many Canadians settled in Dakota, it was not because their lands were superior to ours, but because the railway policy of the late Administration did not confer that ready access to our lands which the Americans gave to their people. Of course, in this matter they were competing with the Americans for settlers, and must be prepared to do as they did, or they would not attract any considerable amount of immigration. They must not only have lands as good as the Americans, but afford the settlers nearly equal railway facilities. Anyone who considered the railway policy of the late Government, the last four or five years, must have reached the conclusion of four-fifths of the people of Manitoba, that, till they had some change of Government or policy, they could not hope for a railway through the prairies, to compete with the Americans, and must submit to see the bulk of the emigration pouring to the south of them. He was happy to see that, with the new Administration, this policy had been changed for what they, in Manitoba, always believed the railway policy ought to be, a vigorous one. He heartily approved of it, and knew he was thus expressing the sentiments of the settlers generally in Manitoba. This policy had produced great benefit to it, and he doubted not that, before many years, it would accomplish magnificent results. The sympathy shown for Manitoba by hon. gentlemen opposite, in discussing the tariff, in saying it would double her taxation, did not characterise them in dealing with the railway question. They spoke as if they considered the present Government were doing too much for that country. Therefore, he was inclined to doubt their sincerity, their sentiment, or affection on the tariff question. Quite true, as they had, in Manitoba, no manufactures, they might prefer a Free-trade tariff; but they preferred even Protection, and higher duties, with a vigorous railway policy, to the late tariff and railway policy, or want of policy of the last Government.

AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 74].

(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

SENATE AMENDMENTS AGREED TO.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) moved that the amendments made by the Senate to the Bill be agreed to.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) said there was a very serious objection to the time of the sitting of that Court. He would ask that the House should not concur in the amendment of the Senate, fixing the days of its terms. The second term in the year had been changed from June to May, and the practitioners and public generally felt that there was not a proper interval between the February session of the Court and the May session. As to the February term, it would be the end of March before the business would be concluded, leaving only a month for the preparation of the cases for the coming Court, which was an insufficient period, by the practice of the Court. There would be no time for the Court to prepare their judgments, or the practitioners their cases, and one term would be, in the end, lost to the people who attended the Court. The June term was fixed by common consent, and should be restored.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said the observations of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockburn) simply demonstrated the difficulty of pleasing everybody. The Judges had recommended that the term should be fixed as at present. When the Bill went to the Senate, the term had been fixed as he (Mr. McDonald) desired, in May. The Judges had considered the whole matter, their time at present and requirements. There were many interests to serve, including those of solicitors, barristers, and suitors; but he thought the greatest was the interest of the Court. He thought the Judges were the parties best qualified to determine in what manner they could most efficiently perform their duties, and the fixing of the terms at the times which would best enable them to perform their work was what the House ought to aim at. He had laboured to meet the views of all, solicitors or suitors, and thought that the dates now fixed were those which, in the opinion of the Court, were most suitable, and which the House ought to sustain.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) said he was inclined to think that, so far as the profession in Ontario was concerned, the fixing of the first week in May would prove extremely inconvenient. There was a great deal of force in the observation of the member for West Northumberland (Mr. Cockburn) as to the too great nearness of the February and May terms. There was also much force in the remark of the Minister of Justice that the wish of the Court ought to be consulted; but he (Mr. Cameron) was not prepared to agree with him that that was the primary consideration, which was the convenience and wants of the suitors. Both the Bench and Bar ought to sink all their private considerations before the good of the suitors. There had been an amendment made in the Senate of very much greater importance than that, however,—he meant the addition to the clause in reference to the right of appeal in preliminary objections to election petitions. As he understood that added clause, it would prevent any appeal in those cases in which, within the last few days, judgment had been given by the Courts in New Brunswick, possibly in view of the effect of the contemplated legislation as to the right of appeal in preliminary objections in the cases now proceeding. The Senate had added a clause that practically prohibited an appeal on a great and leading question that had been raised on a preliminary objection as to the constitutionality of the Court to try election petitions. He totally dissented from that alteration or addition by the Senate. He thought that an appeal ought to be allowed to the Supreme Court, and that that question of the constitutionality of the Court created by the Controverted Elections Act, ought to be tested—an opportunity ought to be given to test it before the Supreme Court. Within the last few days, judgments had been given in two or three cases in New Brunswick, which, under the Bill, as amended by the Senate, would become final and unappealable. It seemed to him the right of appeal ought to be allowed, but, since, by these judgments, the petitions had been dismissed and appeal could not be entered, the right of the petitioners to have the election scrutinised was at an end. It was proposed, as he understood, to dissent from these amendments in the Senate, and he regretted the late period of the Session would prohibit that. If it were at all possible to take the sense of the House as to whether that important point of the constitutionality of the Controverted Elections Act would be appealed to the Supreme Court to have it judicially settled, he thought it was their duty to allow it. And if, without any injury to the Bill as a whole, that amendment could be dissented from, this House ought to dissent from it.

MR. PLUMB said the Election Act of 1874 thoroughly proved the lack of constitutional knowledge on the part of the hon. gentlemen who now sat on the Opposition benches. They had left the important question open as to whether Parliament had the right to decide on the manner in which it should try the election cases of its own members. The 101st section of the British North America Act, provided that Parliament might establish a General Court of Appeal for the settlement of constitutional questions. It provided, also, that it could establish any additional Courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada. The Controverted Elections Act of 1874, failing to declare that it established a Court under the provision of the 101st section of the British North America Act, although it doubtless intended to do so, had left open the question of jurisdiction for the decision of any Judge, before whom an election trial was brought. He saw that in Ontario, upon a preliminary objection, upon his (Mr. Plumb's) petition, which had also been made in other cases in Ontario, the Courts of Queen's Bench, Chancery, and Common Pleas, had decided that they had jurisdiction. In the Province of Quebec, Judge Mondelet, when the law was first put on the Statute-book, refused to try a case under it, on the ground that it was not in the power of the Parliament of Canada to compel Judges having other particular functions and jurisdiction in the Provincial Courts to try election cases, and that a separate Court was not created by it under the Elections Act. That was warning enough for the hon. gentlemen then controlling legislation, but they had not heeded it. He did not hesitate to say that the wholesome force of the Election Law had been relaxed in almost every provision by the amendments which had been made to it since the beginning of the Parliament of 1874 until this time. It seemed as if everything that had been done by the gentlemen on the opposite side, in respect to election trials, had been done with some secret knowledge, and with a view to the corruption of the electorate. The trial of election petitions had been left in such a way that at this moment the Judges of the several higher Courts in Canada were not agreed as to the powers conferred upon them by Parliament. In Ontario they had said that they had jurisdiction, and a right to try these cases. They said that Parliament, having a right to pronounce on the qualification of its own members, had a consequent right to relegate that power to any person, whom it might, in its own wisdom, select. In New Brunswick there had been a decision, apparently hurried on by the impending passage of the Bill now under discussion, the effect of which decision would be to confirm certain prominent gentlemen of the Opposition in their seats, and to quash the petitions against them. That decision was against the constitutionality of the Court, which the Act of 1874 attempted to create. There was a difference of opinion among the Judges of the Courts of Quebec, in regard to it, and he (Mr. Plumb) believed that there was also doubt as to the constitutionality among the learned Judges of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentlemen opposite must have known that the question would arise, for Sir John A. Macdonald, whose Act of 1873 made the necessary declaration, warned the Ministry, in 1874, of the omission in the Act passed by them which repealed his Act except as to trials relating to the elections of January, 1874. No such disturbing question was mooted in those trials, in which an enormous amount of bribery among the Government candidates was disclosed, and it seemed as if it was intended by legislation to relax the wholesome stringency of the law, and to make corruption easy and unpunishable, and Ontario was disgraced by even worse legislation in the same foul direction, in the desire to relieve the Barbers and the Neelons. They had seen public contractors sitting in this House and controlling legislation, and not only were they sitting there with impunity, but they were protected by virtue of legislation which prevented the trial of a petition while Parliament was in Session, and forbade Judges from sitting during term, and by virtue of legislation which whitewashed them of pain and penalties when their misdeeds were disclosed.

MR. HOLTON: Order.

MR. PLUMB said he contended that he was speaking to the question, and that his argument was perfectly logical and in order, and that his hon. friend from Chateaugay (Mr. Holton) knew he was telling the truth. It was a sad day for Canada, when the corporal's guard, the baker's dozen, the gentlemen shrinking—according to the eloquent words of the ex-member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake)—shrinking behind the member for Kingston, were not able to prevent, although they strongly opposed, the kind of legislation which had brought about the corruption he (Mr. Plumb) was speaking of. And he referred to it in unmistakable language of condemnation, because it was pertinent to the discussion of a special clause of the Bill before them, and because he knew that the destinies of Canada depended upon the purity of this Legislature, upon whether the members who sat in this House were independent of, or servile to, the Government of the day. He thanked God that the hon. gentlemen on the

MR. PLUMB.

Government side of the House were a body who could not be corrupted, and that we had a Senate which the hon. member for Bothwell had not abolished. He had heard a good deal of bribing manufacturers, of corrupting farmers in respect to the National Policy, which its enemies asserted falsely promised to give everybody everything. But he maintained that no legislation ever passed in this House had been so productive of corruption as the legislation which made it possible for any man to sit in the House of Commons of Canada with a contract in his pocket; even to sit—though he did not say any man had done so—whilst it was certainly possible that he could—in the Speaker's chair. They might imagine the humiliation of the late Government, upon hearing one of the foremost lawyers of Canada, the late member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake), rise in his place and say there was no harm in a member of Parliament taking a contract with the Government, because, the very instant he entered into such a contract, he ceased to be a member of Parliament. Consequently, a Speaker, who was the arbiter between the two great contending parties in the House, the man who held the scales of justice, who sat in his robes of State, giving decisions which might affect the destinies and the liberties of this country, who was supposed to see neither side, but to be blind to the fact as to whether his decisions would affect one side or the other, might sit in the Speaker's chair for four years deriving emolument from a contract which he might have been proved to have corruptly enjoyed, might escape punishment through a Bill passed by a vote of the party which elected him, and might be adjudged to have been neither a duly qualified Speaker entitled to give decisions, nor, in fact, a member of Parliament at all, certainly not in any sense entitled to hold the honourable position of Speaker of this House, for, according to Mr. Blake, the Speaker from 1874 to 1878 was not a member of Parliament. But he resigned—he was re-elected to the House after a thorough whitewashing, and was re-elected Speaker by his friends. The legislation of the late Government, with reference to the qualification of members, which was, he (Mr. Plumb) believed, corrupt, must have been initiated for the purpose of allowing a man to sit and vote in this House who never had a right to do so. It was tainted throughout by the same wicked design. He (Mr. Plumb) had no desire to bring up these matters before the House, but he was compelled now to do so by the course taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, who had, within the last two days, the temerity to bring an exploded charge against the leader of the Government, an insult to whom was received by every man who sat behind that hon. gentleman as a threat and insult to himself. When they looked back at the disclosures affecting Walker, Cook, M. C. Cameron, Laflamme, Jodoin, Morris, the McLeods, the Anglins, and other purists, whose name was legion—when they looked back at the men who lately held the reins of Government, they might well question the character and intention of any legislation enacted by those gentlemen. He had heard a great deal from the gentlemen opposite, and from their leading newspapers of the corruption and jobbery of their predecessors in office, and of the purity of the party now in the minority. It had been claimed by the leader of that party, in the House, that no money had been spent to secure the return of his friends to Parliament in 1872, or in 1874. Such brazen assertions, and the hypocritical, pharasaical pretension to be holier in party warfare than their opponents, had disgusted him and many others who had been constant readers of the great party organ. If it had required anything to make him (Mr. Plumb) a strong Conservative—his opponents might say, perhaps, a Tory—it would have been the sham morality preached by men who knew that the corruptions they had to hide were rank and smelt to heaven. The party of the hon. gentlemen opposite, which professed to be so pure, was really the party of corruption. Why had they started the cry of the Pacific scandal in 1874, and why did they repeat it whenever they were pinned to the wall? It was to cover up their own offences; it was because they had bought elections, and because, in 1874, they intended to spend large sums of money on the elections. The hon. member for Centre Huron said that it was an old dodge, when men were guilty of offences to charge offences of a similar kind against those who had detected them. He pointed to the disclosures of the corrupt appeal of the Big Push Purists, to the North Simcoe election trial, respecting the immaculate standard elevator H. H. Cook, and to the Chambly election trial, where it was proved that the firm of Huntington, Laflamme & Huntington subscribed $9,000 towards the election of Mr. Jodoin, who was, after all, unseated and disqualified, and gave place to a good Conservative (Mr. Benoit), who was re-elected in September last. Look at the shining, the lustrous example of Mr. Walker, whose friend, John Madiver, came along to put down corruption, and at whose election bribery of the foulest kind flooded the slums of London. $25,000, it was said, the elevation cost in that lovely instance, and the disqualified Walker sat in a place of honour at picnic gatherings, beside the leader of his party, and was the nominee of that party at the last election.

MR. MILLS: There was a case in Niagara in which it was proved that more per capita was spent than in London.

MR. PLUMB said he spent no money at all, and Judge Hagarty was in great doubt as to whether or not he would unseat him. The learned Judge himself said that decision turned upon a very severe interpretation of the law of agency in election cases as defined up to that time, by which he (Mr. Plumb) must be unseated. The case of agency was one three times removed. $120 only was proved to have been improperly spent. His (Mr. Plumb's) counsel refused to throw up the sponge, notwithstanding the suggestions of the counsel for the petitioner. He insisted that the case against him (Mr. Plumb) should be exhausted. There were many witnesses for the petitioner in Court; but the petitioner did not call them, and went no further, after proving bribery to the extent named, notwithstanding the challenge. The learned Judge, in his report, fully acquitted him (Mr. Plumb) of any consent to or knowledge of the bribery. The learned Judge administered the law in its full severity, although there had been but few election trials, and the English decisions upon which his judgment was based were not generally known in this country, nor had candidates the warning they now had. Another learned Judge, in the Province of Quebec, tempered his judgment in the election case of a respondent, who was at the time Minister of Justice in the Government of his standard-elevating friend from Lambton, with greater mercy, and did not even unseat the man who many persons thought owed more to mercy than to justice for his escape. The St. Ann's sideboard, alas, showed that lessons were lost on some people. But there was another election trial in Niagara, which had lately terminated, to which the attention of members had been called by the member for Bothwell. An irrepressible gentleman came from Toronto, last summer, to contest the constituency with him (Mr. Plumb). He stated that he was specially commissioned to run in the Grit interest by the hon. member for Lambton, and by the great Panjandrum himself, the Hon. Mr. Brown, the leader's leader. The last named hon. gentleman, it was said, was heard to assert that a man had been found to beat him (Mr. Plumb), and that he (Mr. Plumb) was doomed. The resident Grits had offered the nomination to three or four of the most available men in the constituency, but they had exhibited the better part of valour, and one and all had declined the honour. Mr. Hughes came upon the stage, and appealed to his co-religionists for support. The influential Catholics advised him to go back to Toronto, and assured him he could not win by fair means. He was egged on, however, by designing men, to whom he foolishly bragged of the depth of his purse, and he was returned by a majority of two. His agents in the work of a corruption which was unparalleled in the history of elections in Canada, were two brothers-in-law from Rochester, two of their American friends, and a few notorious men in the constituency whose hands were against every man, or in every man's pocket who appeared there as a candidate, and would permit himself to be robbed by them. Some of the money that was openly paid for the purchase of votes was handed over to the other side by the recipients when the poll closed, and within a few hours overwhelming evidence was in their hands, under which the emissary and chosen candidate of Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Brown could not escape unseating and disqualification. Proceedings were taken immediately upon the return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and the Niagara petition was the first one filed. Owing to the defect in the Controverted Election Act, which was affected by the section of the Supreme Court Act under discussion, the counsel for the respondent obtained a hearing upon a preliminary objection as to the constitutionality of the Court for election trials. Delays were consequent. The decision was against the objection. The trial was held late in January—four months after the filing of the petition. Several cases of bribery were proved; the respondent's election was set aside; he was disqualified, but, before the scrutiny of votes which would seat him (Mr. Plumb) could be gone into, the learned Judge was compelled, under a clause in the Election Act, to which he (Mr. Plumb) had already referred, to adjourn the Court until the 11th of March, in order, meanwhile, to sit in term and give judgment. The respondent desired to prevent a further prosecution of the case, which had scarcely begun, except as to bribery by the respondent personally. The Court met at Niagara on the 11th March. A sufficient number of votes were struck off from the respondent's list to give him (Mr. Plumb) a majority. His counsel stated to the Court that, having obtained all he petitioned for, namely, the unseating and disqualifying of the respondent, with all costs, and the seating of the petitioner, he thought it unnecessary to proceed further. The respondent's counsel withdrew all charges against him (Mr. Plumb), and stated that the case on his side would not be proceeded with. Mr. John Currie, a former opponent of his (Mr. Plumb), made an attempt to substitute one Bissell for Mr. Hughes. His (Mr. Plumb's) counsel offered him every facility, and proposed to wait till Mr. Hughes' consent could be obtained, which the Judge thought necessary, but Bissell did not appear, and the matter was dropped. He (Mr. Plumb) had heard that his opponent acknowledged that he spent $10,000 in the election. Of course, but a small part of this enormous sum ever went out of the possession of the professional election jobbers and hungry buzzards, who had extracted it from him by playing upon his ignorance and his vanity, both of which were egregious. It was also stated that Mr. Hughes admitted having paid the large sum of $14,000 to prevent the attendance of witnesses at the Court, and for other purposes, which it would not be proper to name. One man asserted that he had been paid $700 to go across the Niagara River and stay there till the case was over. He was found in good quarters at a first-class hotel with two other suspected persons, who also modestly shrunk from the publicity of the witness box. Thus ended the case which might justly be called a cause celebre. There was no further resistance to the seating of the petitioner, and no appeal.

MR. MILLS: Why?

MR. PLUMB: Because there were no grounds upon which to attack him, or upon which to appeal, the constitutional objection having been disposed of by the Ontario Judges almost unanimously. He would suggest to his hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, two cartoons, to be hung up in the halls of the party of Reform, or to be exhibited in their party processions as symbolisms of the purity of their principles. The one should represent the Walker election of 1874, as the illustration of their advent to power, and the companion picture should be that of the triumph of the party, in the person of the hon. gentleman's chosen candidate, Mr. Hughes, in Niagara, in September, 1878, which as emphatically and truly illustrated that they, of the party of purity, still clung to the same human devices which had purchased their rise, and which precipitated their downfall. There could not be found canvas enough on which to depict all the frightful warnings of their career, but these would suffice as hints, and serve as a useful lesson for the rising generation. And these were the men who dared to talk about the sale of a railway charter. The right hon. the leader of the Government had challenged the Opposition to discussion, and dared them to the proof of that foul, stale, evil-smelling slander which some of the hon. members opposite had lately referred to, in a manner characteristic of each. The hon. member for Centre Huron had truculently introduced it into an argument against certain propositions for procuring aid from the home Government for a Pacific Railway scheme. It had been reiterated in a still more offensive way by the purist of Shefford, who had been hoist with his own petard, and upon whom an inquest ought properly to have been held immediately afterwards. With a meanness of insinuation, peculiar to certain persons who durst not say openly what they sought to convey covertly—stabbers in the dark—it was hinted furtively by the member for Bothwell, who had especially distinguished himself by the style of his attack, and the disingenuousness of his postulates during the present Session. The whole scandal had been fabricated for the purpose of leading off on a false scent—for the purpose of drawing public attention from the iniquity of the party of purity, who, from the grand old Reformer down to—he would not call names—were double-dyed in electoral and Parliamentary corruption, either by their own deeds, or by shielding others. A salutary lesson had been taught the country by the career of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and, as the discussion was going on, it was perfectly legitimate, and strictly in order, to refer to matters bearing upon the effect of a change in the Supreme Court Act, by which appeal could be taken to that Court upon preliminary objections in election trials, an appeal which was shut off by the repeal of certain clauses in the Controverted Elections Act of 1874, and the substitution therefor, of a clause in the Supreme Court Act of 1875. The clause of the Act now under discussion seriously affected the position of parties to an election trial, and that position was rendered most uncertain by the different views taken by Judges, in respect to the constitutionality of the Controverted Elections Act. He (Mr. Plumb) held that, for this complication, as well as others, gentlemen opposite were entirely responsible. A stringent Election Law, and swift and certain punishment for its violation, was most desirable in the interest of all those who desired to see the halls of State purged of the shame which humiliated all who witnessed it in 1877, and no better note of the honesty and purity of a party could be found than in its legislation on that paramount subject. He (Mr. Plumb) had been called to order by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), who had brought himself down and attenuated his naturally vigorous mind, until he was nothing broader than a point of order, who could never address this House on anything larger or more worthy a statesman than a point of order. He (Mr. Plumb) was in order when he asserted that it was made very difficult by the legislation of the Reform Government since 1874, to unseat any member, however unworthy he might be, and that was the legacy which was left the present Parliament by the great so-called Party of Purity.

MR. COCKBURN (West Northumberland) said the first amendment to this Bill affected existing cases, and took away the right of appeal. Respecting the election in Montmorenci, there were two appeals, at this moment, pending in the Supreme Court against the decisions of Judges on preliminary objections, and it was a question whether that right of appeal existed or not. In order to remove any doubt, this Act provided that henceforth there should be such appeals, and there could be no question but that there should, because an election petition well founded, complaining of an undue election, might be disposed of upon a preliminary point by a Judge on a very arbitrary, and, he might be allowed to say, perhaps an ill-founded decision. To get the right of appeal against such decisions, this clause was inserted in the Bill. Now, this amendment provided that following should be inserted "Provided also that no appeals shall be allowed under this section in cases of litigation now pending." There were cases now pending in which that question was yet to be decided by the Supreme Court, and this amendment would take away the right of appeal, and those cases would be turned out of Court by this legislation which, he thought, had been proposed without due consideration by the other Chamber. The responsibility would rest on the Government, and he felt it his duty to warn the Minister of Justice as to the effect of this amendment.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said no person could deprecate more strongly than himself the amendment proposed by the Senate. He thought it was uncalled for, and, instead of promoting the interests of justice, would tend directly in the contrary direction. But, inasmuch as the Bill gave appeal on questions where there was no appeal before, or where it was doubtful that there was any appeal, he thought it more desirable to retain the Bill than to send it back to the Senate, at the risk of losing the whole Bill, leaving election cases just where they were before this Act was proposed, and losing the benefit derivable from it on other questions of great importance.

MR. COCKBURN said if, under the proposed amendments, the election cases were left as they were under the old Act, he would not say another word ; but, unfortunately, the particular amendment to which he referred went much further. It made a law which cut out those appeals altogether.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) said he was not aware of any cases pending ; but his hon. friend would see that it only raised the question that would probably be raised in some incidental election before another general election. The old Supreme Court of New Brunswick and the Court of the Province of Quebec had held that the Election Court, as established under the present Election Law, was ultra vires, and the result was that petitions in those Provinces had been dismissed, while the Supreme Courts of Ontario and Nova Scotia had held directly the contrary ; so that they had the judicial power of the Dominion divided on this all-important question. If he (Mr. McDonald) thought that injustice could possibly be done by the clause as it stood, and he was not aware that any questions were pending in the Court that could possibly be affected by it, he would almost sacrifice the Bill rather than be a party to doing injustice to anyone on either side. The Bill was a very important one. There were clauses in it that it was desirable should become law, and he did not think he could accede to the request and imperil the Bill by rejecting the amendment.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria) said that clause was prepared with a good deal of care, by himself with the assistance of another gentleman in the House, and was submitted to a very learned Judge of the Supreme Court. The very wording of it was most carefully considered, and, unfortunately, the amendment made by the Senate certainly deprived the clause of its chief value. The object of it was to allow an appeal to the Supreme Court on that general question of constitutionality, under the Controverted Elections Act. It was thought there should be an appeal upon it, and that the rights of any petitioner should not be entirely jeopardised by a judgment on that particular point. The effect of a petition on that ground was the petitioner was drawn before the Court, had no right to appeal, and, on the judgment of a single Judge, the right of a member to sit was decided. It was only on those preliminary objections where the decision involved the entire fate of the petition, or the right of the hon. member to sit in this House that any appeal was allowed. It was not proposed to allow an appeal on a preliminary objection of a technical character, but only on one dismissing the petition, only on a preliminary objection going to the merits of the whole case. If the petition was dismissed, the petitioner was out of Court for ever, and the member petitioned against was confirmed in his seat ; and an hon. member might sit in this House who had obtained his seat by improper means. A great wrong would be done if the appeal were departed from. They ought not, by any legislation, determine that the right of a member to sit in this House should not be subject to the scrutiny of a higher Court, and that any member who happened to obtain a favourable judgment on this particular point should be confirmed in his seat without any possibility of appeal.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou) moved, in amendment to insert after the words, " And provided also that no appeals shall be allowed under this section in cases in litigation and now pending " the following words : " Except cases where the appeal has been allowed, and duly filed."

Amendment agreed to.

House adjourned at Half-past Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 15th May, 1879.

The Speaker took the Chair at fifteen minutes before Two o'clock.

PRIVILEGE OF THE HOUSE.

REMARKS.

Order for Mr. John A. Macdonell to attend at the Bar of the House read.

MR. SPEAKER read the following letter :—

“TORONTO, 14th May, 1879.

“A. PATRICK, Esq.,

“Clerk,

“House of Commons,

“Ottawa.

“SIR,—

“Re Macdonell.

“On enquiry at the office of Mr. Macdonell, I was informed by a clerk that he had not returned to the office from Ottawa, and that it was probable he had remained over at his home (Glengarry) on the way up.

“On his arrival I will serve him, and notify you to that effect.

“Yours truly,

“H. VINCENT GREENE.”

MR. McLENNAN said the young gentleman whose name was before the House in this unpleasant position happened to be one of his constituents, and he felt it his duty to say a word for him here. He was very sorry he was not here to speak for himself. He was sure that no one could regret more than he would, and more than he did, the unpleasant scene which occurred on Saturday night. He thought that gentlemen in this House who had come to years of discretion, and whose blood was cool, and whose heads were sobered, must sympathise with younger men, under circumstances of great excitement, and he (Mr. McLennan) ventured to say that no man possessed a higher sense of honour than Mr. Macdonell. He (Mr. McLennan) regretted exceedingly to have heard that young gentleman's name mentioned in this House under circumstances which, on the face of them, appeared to be very much against him. He was sure no man would be more ready than he would be to apologise to this House, and to Mr. Speaker, for the indiscretion he committed under circumstances of great excitement. Of course, it was an open question as to the offence. He believed Mr. Macdonell was sitting beside the Speaker in a seat to which he had been introduced by Mr. Speaker's permission, and, if he made a remark which appeared to be offensive to a member of this House, he thought hon. members might extend to him a feeling of charity. What Mr. Macdonell believed to be strong language was applied to a right hon. gentleman upon whom he looked with the veneration which he properly felt towards the gentleman who had been his protector and friend, and to whom he felt the strong fidelity of his ardent nature. He (Mr. McLennan) had not the least hesitation in saying that Mr. Macdonell was indiscreet. He would, however, have no opportunity of clearing himself for a long interval, in fact, not until the next Session. His appointments had made it necessary that he should leave for the county of Glengarry on Monday, but he (Mr. McLennan) was willing to pledge all the weight of any responsibility that he might have that Mr. Macdonell would be the first, if he were here, to apologise for the indiscretion he had committed in very hot blood. Allusion had been made to Mr. Macdonell having sent a paper into this House, and he thought it was very unfairly stated that that was sent in cold blood. A young gentleman, in that state of excitement, who simply crossed the corridor, was not in cold blood, and his sending that in writing could not be regarded as a repetition of his offence in cold blood. He made this explanation as one which he owed to a young gentleman of whom he had the very highest opinion, and to whose indiscretion he was inclined to extend an amount of charity, in which he believed the Speaker and every member of the House would agree with him.

MR. HOLTON said he was very sorry, indeed, to hear the excuse made by his hon. friend from Glengarry for a perfectly inexcusable offence against the dignity and privileges of the House. That the young gentleman referred to should have been led by circumstances to the committal of the great indiscretion of which he was guilty was very much to be regretted, but it could only be atoned for by an apology, not only to the House, but to the hon. gentleman against whom the offence was committed. This hon. gentleman was a representative of the people, and as such, should be respected by all who came within the precincts of the House. This gentleman was introduced as a matter of privilege on the floor of the House, and had no right to accept that compliment, that favour, to become, as it were, the guest of the hon. member for Shefford, unless he was prepared to treat him with the decorum and respect to which the hon. gentleman's position as a member of the House entitled him. The hon. member for Glengarry had stated that the young gentleman had too hot blood. Why should he have hot blood? Had he anything to do with the debates of the House? Had he any right to interfere in the discussions taking place in the House? His hon. friend took a position which was not creditable to himself in apologising for such an outrage. This young gentleman must have known—he did know as a fact—that the initial steps had been taken to call him to the Bar of the House.

MR. McLENNAN: No, he did not.

MR. HOLTON said he left with a full knowledge of what was to be done. He had not responded to the order, and his hon. friend now put in a plea in extenuation. It was not becoming in his hon. friend, and it was not what his duty to the dignity of this House required at his hands. This young gentleman—he desired to speak of him as a young gentleman; he knew him; he had known his lamented father very well; he did not believe that he was accustomed to perform acts unworthy of a gentleman—had fallen into a grievous error, to say the least of it, in this case, and it was due to the House, to himself, to his position, and to the hon. member for Shefford that he should tender to the House, and to the hon. member for Shefford, a complete and comprehensive apology for the error, if error it were, into which he had fallen; and yet that young gentleman allowed this Session of the House to close with the stigma fastened upon him for the next nine months of having insulted this House, of having insulted a member of this House, personally, when availing himself of the kindness and courtesy of Mr. Speaker to obtain a seat on the floor. If he had consulted his own personal dignity, if he had reflected on the flagrancy of the offence he had committed, he would have appeared in spite of every obstacle in response to the order of the House, and would have tendered such an apology as would have been called for by the occasion, which, he was sure, the whole House, including the hon. member for Shefford, would gladly have accepted, and would thus have relieved himself of a stigma that must stand fixed to him during his whole future career. He (Mr. Holton), during his twenty-five years' service in Parliament, had never known so flagrant an offence against the dignity and privileges of the House as the young gentleman referred to had confessedly been guilty of on this occasion. Of course, the time remaining to them forbade any ulterior proceedings being taken. Obviously, advantage had been taken of the advanced stage of the Session, and the impossibility of Parliament taking any steps to vindicate its privileges during the Session; but he did say that this young gentleman had placed himself in a position that his friends ought to mourn over, instead of excusing, and which rendered it the duty of the leaders of the House at the next Session to call him to a rigorous account for. It was not by stopping out of the way, and by evading the issue this Session, that Mr. Macdonell would clear himself of the contempt of Parliament under which he now sat, and the leaders of the House would utterly fail to do their duty if they failed to take next Session such steps as would assert the dignity and privileges of Parliament in respect to this matter. This young gentleman had committed a most flagrant assault, not merely on the privileges of the House, but on the proprieties of life. A more disgraceful exhibition was never made within the precincts of Parliament than was made by this young gentleman on the night of Saturday last. He would not have expressed himself thus warmly, he would probably not have said anything at all, if his hon. friend from Glengarry had not conceived it consistent with his duty, because of his personal relations to this young gentleman, to lay down doctrines which could not be entertained, to enter pleas of extenuation or justification which could not for one moment be entertained, and which were utterly repugnant to any doctrine that had ever before been proclaimed with regard to what was right and proper under the circumstances.

MR. SPEAKER: Mr. Macdonell came to me the other day to apologise. Of course I did not mention it to the House, because I considered the offence of such a grave and public character that I thought his apology ought to have been publicly.

MR. HOLTON said he thought Mr. Speaker was quite right. No doubt, his conception of the gravity of the offence committed was the correct one. Mr. Macdonell was not only bound to apologise publicly to the House, but he was bound to apologise publicly to the hon. member for Shefford.

MR. McLENNAN said his young friend left at three o'clock on Monday, before the meeting of the House. He would have been an intruder to come and apologise without being called here.

MR. HOLTON: He knew he had committed a flagrant offence.

MR. McLENNAN: He did not know he was to be called to the Bar of the House.

MR. HOLTON: He did not leave at three o'clock. He left at night, so I am informed. But there can be no doubt the apology was due to the individual member whom he had outraged, within hearing, within less than two yards of his seat.

A Message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:—

To this Bill the Royal Assent was signified in the following words :—

"In Her Majesty's name His Excellency the Governor-General thanks Her loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this Bill."

His Excellency the Governor-General was then pleased to address the two Houses in the following speech :—

"Hon. Gentlemen of the Senate :

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

"I desire to thank you for the diligence and care with which you have discharged your duties during this laborious and protracted Session.

"The reorganisation of the important Department of Public Works and the division of its duties, will, I doubt not, greatly add to the efficiency of the public service.

"The consolidation and amendment of the Statutes relating to the lands of the Dominion will present to the large number of settlers now wending their way to the North-West Territories a compendious and well-considered system.

"I hope that the Bill relating to Weights and Measures, while it relaxes the stringency of previous legislation, will not decrease the efficiency of that important measure.

"The provision made for telegraphy by cable between the mainland, Anticosti, and the Magdalen Islands, will facilitate and aid our commerce and navigation, and especially the development of our fisheries.

"The measures adopted for the vigorous prosecution of the Canadian Pacific Railway hold out a prospect of the early completion of that great undertaking; and the proposed purchase from the Grand Trunk Railway Company of the line from Rivière du Loup to Quebec, when concluded, will at last complete the engagement entered into at the time of Confederation, to connect, by an Intercolonial Railway, the St. Lawrence with the Atlantic ocean at Halifax.

"I congratulate you on the other measures affecting the public interests which have been passed.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

"In Her Majesty's name I thank you for the supplies you have so readily granted. They will be expended with all due regard to economy.

"Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

"The readjustment of the tariff which had been effected by the legislation of this Session will, I trust, by increasing the revenue, restore the equilibrium between revenue and expenditure, while it will, at the same time, aid in the development of our various industries, and tend to remove the long continued financial and commercial depression which has so greatly retarded the progress of Canada.

"I bid you, now, farewell; and desire to express my earnest hope when Parliament again assembles, that we shall find the country enjoying the state of peace which now happily exists within its borders, together with a great addition to the national prosperity."

The Parliament of the Dominion of Canada was then prorogued to Tuesday, the 24th June next.

ORDER:—
Vote of mover of previous Ques. challenged as necessarily negative (Mr. Anglin); discussion, difference of Canadian practice defined (Mr. Speaker) 408.

ORDER, PRIVILEGE, ETC.—Con.

Reports, Engineers', communication of, confidentially, to Leader of Opposition, offered by Min. of P. W.; objected to (Messrs. Holton and Macdougall); Report tabled, 1080-83.

Precedence of Tariff Debate, on private day, without formal notice of M., objected to (Mr. Mackenzie); objection sustained (Mr. Speaker) 650.

Cabinet Proceedings. On Res. for Cor. respecting dismissals, &c. (Mr. Ross, W. Middx.) the Premier declined to bring down anything of a Cabinet nature, 491. Upon the Premier's statement (p. 944) that, certain advice having been offered, H. E. had referred the case to England, Messrs. Mackenzie & Holton pressed for copy of the O. C. and more precise information; the Premier declined, it being a matter not of "Council," but of the Cabinet, 1026.

Com. of W. (Marine Telegraphs B.) order into being read, and Mr. Holton suggesting reference of B. to Ry. Com., instead, Mr. McCarthy objected that the H. had already ordered itself into Com. of W. Mr. Speaker ruled the propriety of Amt. or discharge of that order if desired, 1572.—See also "PROCED." on this B.

Amt., for absolute Repeal, to M. for 2° of a B. for provisional Repeal (of Insolvent Laws) ruled in order by Mr. Speaker, 1610.

Amts., in Com. of W., to Mr. Béchard's B. for absolute Repeal of Insolvency Laws, objected to (English practice being quoted) as virtually destroying the B., which had passed 2°; ruled (Mr. Chairman) the Amt. not irrelevant to the B., 1769-75.

Objection to progress of a B. (the B. not being printed in French) over-ruled by Mr. Speaker, being raised too late, 1620.

Petition for dismissal of Judge Polette, Three Rivers, ruled out of order, 1755.

M. for Res., implying Want of Confidence. Mr. Holton objected to such being allowed to "stand"; but Mr. Speaker said it came within an agreement of the House, 1762.

Discussion to previous Debate objected to; and checked by Mr. Speaker, 1824.

Language, unparliamentary, 1938..

PROCEDURE:—

Private B., Selkirk Ry. (Mr. Rykert). Introduction opposed (Mr. Schultz) length of notice in Gazette being insufficient. The Com. on Standing Orders having passed the B., that decision concurred in and B. 1°, 71-3.

Private B., affecting Crown rights (Intercol. Ry., Mr. Cockburn, West Northumberland) introduction opposed (Mr. Mackenzie) 138; B. withdn., 139; introduction allowed, 156.

Sel. Com. on Priv. and Elections.—Reference to, of Petition respecting South Grenville Election (M. of Mr. McCarthy for Address; Amt., Mr. Holton) 237.

ORDER, PRIVILEGE, ETC.—Con.

- B.* respecting N. Sydney Harbour, overruled by Mr. Speaker, not being based on Res.; B. withdn., 649.

- B.*, Que. Geographical Society Incorp. On 1°, Mr. Casgrain objected that the Legislation should have been obtained from Provincial Parlt., which had full powers, 741. On 2°, Mr. Anglin and others raised same objection; but the Premier maintained that the B., though local in name, was general in nature, 826.

On "hoist" Amt. to 2° being lost, Opposition claimed their right (quoting English authorities) to oppose Bills at any stage, and held that members voting for 2° on div. committed themselves to general principle of B. The Govt. claimed that B. should go to 2°, and have its merits then discussed, 1376-9. See also page 1586 for a similar point.
- B.*, Marine Telegraphs Act Repeal (Mr. McCarthy). Reference to Ry. Com. recommended by Mr. Mackenzie; ruled not necessary, unless desired by mover of B. Referred to Com. of W., 1285. Again objected, by Mr. Holton, that the B. affected private rights, and should be referred to Ry. Com. for examination; also, by Mr. Anglin, that Govt. should assume responsibility for such a measure. But B. was passed in Com. of W. and by H., 1572-5. See also Q. of Ord. on this B.
- B.*, Defendants' costs in Crown suits (Mr. MacDonnell). The Premier objected that the B. affected Prerogative, and declined to obtain Assent; B. withdn., 1578-81.
