been only the secret and insidious means of levying enormous taxation upon the people of this country for the sake of retaining themselves in power, and placing themselves in a position where they could gratify their friends, and gratify that lust for power and office which has always characterized that party. I maintain that under the guise of a protective tariff they had a high taxation policy, which has taken enormous sums of money out of the people of this country, and which really did not have the effect they themselves profess to have in view, as the figures I have given to the House will show. Another election came on in 1882, and the Conservative party again went to the country under a false issue, and with false promises, The Governor and falsehoods in their mouths. General was made to say that he dissolved Parliament because large amounts of capital were awaiting investment in the Dominion of Canada as the result of the verdict of the people as to whether the National Policy should stand. Leading members of the Administration, and the leaders of the press supporting that party, even went so far as to give the figures; and Sir Charles Tupper, or, at all events, one of the prominent leaders of the party, stated that $200,000,000 of foreign capital were waiting investment in the Dominion of Canada if the protective policy was upheld. Large numbers of thoughtless people were carried away by these statements, and that, in addition to the undue influences of which we have always complained, resulted in a large degree in keeping the party in power. Where did the $200,000,000 come from? I venture to say that not $100,000 of that imaginary $200,000,000 of foreign capital ever came into the Dominion of Canada as the result of the protective policy. There may have been some foreign capital come in, to assist in buying out institutions already in existence in the country, by way of combines, but even of that we have very little evidence. However, our friends opposite came into power, and after another brief period they dissolved Parliament before its time had expired, upon the false pleas that have been already exposed in this House. The Premier dissolved Parliament on the plea that overtures had been made to the Government by the Government of the United States for a reciprocity treaty, a plea which is now known to be a brazen falsehood in the face of the world, and a statement which is a disgrace to the Administration, and a disgrace to the men who used it. Sir Charles Tupper has been obliged to go virtually on his knees, like Uriah Heap, before the Secretary of State of the United States, and apologize to him for having made that statement. I say that no proud Canadian can read the interview described by Sir Charles Tupper himself with Secretary of State Blaine without being mortified and humiliated at the abject prostration of the man when the subject of these negotiations was discussed between them. We have the repudiation of the American Secretary of State, and the apology of the high-minded embassador from England, as regards the conduct of the Canadian statesmen in this matter. At any rate, the Government went to the country under a false plea that an overture had been made to them for a reciprocity treaty with the United States, and the Premier, in his eloquent card to the electors, stated he was about appealing as a British subject to the good care to go to the country on old lists. took mighty good care to exclude the young hope of the country from the polls. He was afraid that a moribund Parliament would not be qualified to deal with the subject of reciprocity, but he had no fear of moribund voters' lists. And so, what with the old voters' lists, and what with the revising officersappointed by the Government, and what with the contributions of the "Red Parlour," and what with the money wrung from public contractors, and what with other undue influences, the Government again secured a small majority in this House. Well, the hon, member for Westmoreland and other hon, members have endeavoured to place the hon. member for South Oxford in a false position in regard to something he wrote in a letter about the outlying provinces; and that letter has been read so many times to the House, and such false accounts have been given of it, that I would like to make a few comments upon it. The words quoted were that the majority in this House was made up of shreds and patches from divers outlying provinces. The hon, member did not apply the phrase "shreds and patches" to those provinces. If it was a reflection on anybody at all it was on hon, gentlemen opposite, who were elected from those provinces to support the Government; and I, as one from the Maritime Provinces, am prepared to say, so far as I have any responsibility for the Province of Nova Scotia, that the statement of the hon, member for South Oxford was perfectly correct. I say that the influences made use of in the lower provinces were such as do not redound to the credit of any statesman or any party claiming to govern on high-minded principles. The statement of the hon, member for South Oxford that majorities were obtained in many counties by promises of Government favours is satisfactorily borne out by abundance of facts which could be produced in this House. make a quotation directly confirmative of the statement made by the hon, member for South Oxford, as showing the view held by one When member of the party opposite. my hon, friend, whom I esteem very highly his many excellent qualities, was elected for Cumberland County, I believe he was ill and was not present at the election; and the High Commissioner, who swung around at the bidding of the Government, and left his palatial residence in London, and, like a howling dervish, went up and down this country attacking the leaders of the Liberal party, made a speech at Amherst on the result of the elections on the day of declaration; and how did he treat this subject on that occasion? What relation did he hold the representatives of the outlying provinces to occupy towards the present Government of the Dominion? I will read his remarks, and if they are open to any other interpretation than that given to them by the hon, member for South Oxford and myself, I will ask any hon. gentleman opposite to explain what it is. High Commissioner was reported in the Amherst Gazette of the 12th of March, 1891, as follows:

"To-day we see the parties in Ontario and Quebec nearly balanced, and the other provinces not only holding the balance of power, but in a position to claim the first consideration for the noble manner in which they had supported the Government."

I would like to ask what the hon. High Commissioner meant by claiming the first consideration the Government. Will some hon, gentleman opposite explain that phrase before the close of this debate, if it does not mean that they had a right to claim favours from the Government which they would otherwise not have the right to claim?

"Another fortnight would have considerably increased our majority in Ontario, but after his thirty-six years of experience he preferred a majority of forty to one of eighty."

And he must be intensely satisfied with a majority of twenty, for the following reason, which he gave at the time :-

"The Government had not so many people to provide for with the lesser number.

So it seems, according to the views of this man of the world, this experienced statesman, that the question of a Government majority simply resolves itself into how many they have to provide for, and what means they have at their disposal to provide So that the majority of 20 in for the number. this House may hold themselves entitled to very high hopes, owing to the noble stand their constituents have taken in electing them to this House:

"He dared say Mr. Dickey would tell us he occasionally gets a hint from some person that he wants a certain piece of work done by the Government."

Is not the whole story given away in these words? Do we not know that underlying these words is a declaration of the policy of the Government, which has been observed with regard to the elections in the lower provinces, at any rate, for the last twelve years? Scarcely an election has been held there during that time but the public press supporting the Government has boldly and openly announced that it would be no use for any county to send here a representative supporting the Opposition and expect to get anything for the needs of the county. I know it was said to me that when Yarmouth came to ask the Government for anything the fact that its representative was in opposition would injure its claims. But I believe that the people I represent, and the people of many other counties, would sooner take up a subscription to build their own public works than to receive Government assistance at the expense of the principles they believe in. While reading this quotation from the speech of the High Commissioner, I may perhaps refer to another subject which does not strictly come in here; but as the quotation is before me I will give it. Hon. gentlemen opposite, whenever they want a reciprocity treaty, pose as the great friends of the American people; and Sir Charles Tupper, in his interview with Mr. Blaine, undertook to prove to him that of all people in the Dominion of Canada he was the man who went furthest in the interest of reciprocity and in his desire to bind together in brotherly love the people of Canada and the United States. he did not talk in that strain in the general election; and even after the election was over, in the speech to which I have referred, he spoke of our American neighbours in these terms:

"He did not forget the enormous influence of this 65,000,000 of Americans. We had not only beaten our opponents here, but the 65,000,000 to the south of us."

According to the view of the hon. High Commissioner, the result of the last election was to defeat the schemes and machinations of 65,000,000 of people to the south of us to land us into the American union. Now, the question before the House more for the noble manner in which they had supported particularly appertains to the two motions made, one by the hon. Minister of Finance and the other by the hon, member for South Oxford. In regard to the Budget brought down by the hon. Minister of Finance, I am not disposed to be very critical. I think upon the whole the Budget is fairly satisfactory; but I do not think the hon. Finance Minister's friends ought to plume themselves with such a great amount of enthusiasm upon the very great feat of reducing the duty upon the lower grades of sugar coming into Canada, when it is apparent, on the face of it, that no other course was possible to them. When almost every man in the country knew, for the last ten or cleven months, at any rate, that some such course as this must be followed, considering the attitude taken by the Government of the United States in the same connection, we can only express our regret that while the duties were being taken off the still higher grades of raw sugar were not dealt with. The amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford asked:

"That the Government should forthwith reduce all duties on articles of prime necessity, and more particularly on those most generally consumed by artizans, miners, and fishermen and farmers: and further, that the negotiations which the House has been informed are to open at Washington in October next should be conducted upon the basis of the most extended reciprocal freedom of trade between Canada and the United States, in manufactured as well as natural products."

Now, this has brought before the House, of course, the whole question of reciprocity in natural products alone, as contrasted with reciprocity which may include manufactured products. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), in his criticism of the Budget speech, referred as follows to the question of sugar:—

"I congratulate the Finance Minister upon having had the courage, I may say the self-denial, to take off $3,500,000 from sugar."

I think the hon. gentleman's congratulations might have been somewhat modified when he considers the fact that no other course was open to the Finance Minister under the circumstances. But the hon, gentleman went on to say that the taking off of $3,500,000 from sugar was really, when one looked into the matter, a reduction of taxation or measure of relief to the people amounting to $5,000,000; in which statement he supported the views always held by the Opposition, namely, that the duty placed upon these sugars really inflicted a burden upon the people of a far larger amount than the tax itself collected by the Government, and we have the gratifying announcement made by other gentlemen who followed, that the immediate result of the reduction was a fall in price of sugar This, probably, in Montreal and other centres. was perfectly true; but is it not a peculiar feature in connection with the sugar trade, that whenever the Minister of Finance of a Conservative Government makes a change in the duty, whether that change be an increase or a reduction, simultaneously the price of sugar goes down in Montreal. It looks as if there was a secret wire between the office of the Finance Minister and the office of the Redpath sugar refinery in Montreal. As far back as 1879, Sir Leonard Tilley, in referring to his addition to the sugar duties in order to give better protection, said, on the 23rd of April, in reply to a very severe criticism by the hon, member for South Oxford—a criticism which would read very well and would apply to many other matters in connection with the Government tariff to-day-as follows:

"As to the reduction in the price of sugar, he could state, as a fact, that the price of sugar had gone down half a cent a pound in Montreal since these resolutions were submitted to the House."

Exactly the same thing took place when Sir Leonard Tilley placed the increased duty on sugar, as when the Finance Minister of to-day took the duty off. Another hon. member, the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron), then a member of the House, denied the statement that sugar had risen, and said he had bought sugar in Montreal and the price had since increased. Mr. Desjardins, who is not now a member of this House, supported the Finance Minister of that day, and said:

"Redpath was now selling refined sugar at 8½ cents per pound, while, before this tariff was proposed, they sold this same sugar at 8½ cents per pound."

The Hon. Mr. Anglin asked whether the hon. Minister of Finance seriously pretended that the imposition of duties or the increase of duties would reduce the price of sugar. But Sir Leanord Tilley insisted that it did, and I will quote his words:

"The hon. gentleman from Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) asked if it was possible that the Finance Minister could stand up here and say the imposition of duty could possibly cheapen the article to the consumer. Why, they knew it was argued here last night that the imposition of a 50 cent duty on coal, if it led to the output of 300,000 tons of coal more in Nova Scotia, would result in coal being supplied cheaper to the people of the other provinces than it was to-day. If they looked at the experience of the United States they would find beyond a question that the imposition of high duties had decreased the price of the article to the consumer."

He was followed by Sir Charles Tupper, who stated that the market had fallen just as they said it would. As soon as it was known that the Minister of Finance had determined to protect the industry of Canadian sugar refining the market had in consequence declined. The hon, member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) moved a resolution for the purpose of reducing this great burden on the people. Mr. Farrow asked him:

"Is not sugar cheaper now than it was before?"

Mr. White (Cardwell) argued that the effect of the duty had been to make sugar cheaper. He said:

"We have secured for the people of Canada as cheapaye, cheaper—sugar than if we had not refineries in Canada at all."

So we see that the congratulations of the hon. member for Albert are entirely in the same vein as those which were lavished on Sir Leonard Tilley, when he increased the duties on sugar, although the subject-matter in each case is opposed to the other. It will be of no particular advantage at the present day to go into the history of the sugar duties, but we know that in Great Britain, where there are no duties on sugar, either raw or refined, the prices fluctuate very rapidly, year after year, owing to circumstances which no tariff could control. The price in 1878 was 29:25 shillings per quarter; in 1884 it had fallen to 20:89. In 1886-87 it had fallen to 15 63 shillings, showing that the decrease in the price of sugar had been caused by other considerations, such as the supply of raw sugar from the East and West Indies, the supply of beet root sugar in the European markets, and other We find also that sugar has fallen in the United States as well as in the Dominion, and the decline there is due to other causes than that which is claimed to have produced the decline in this

Mr. FLINT.

The hon, member for Albert also country. attacked the hon, member for South Oxford for the gloom and despondency of his opinions with regard to the Dominion of Canada, but as this point has almost been treated ad nauseam, I will not dwell upon it; but the hon, gentleman went on to say that:

"Trade had gone down by leaps and bounds, and when the Conservative party came into power the tide turned, and trade has steadily gone up by some forty millions. That the hon, gentleman should have had the courage to remind this House of a decline in our foreign trade of from forty-one to forty-two millions, which occurred during the four or five years when he was Finance Minister, is almost passing belief."

The hon, member for Albert, however, had the candour subsequently to state that these changes were due to great economic causes, entirely beyond the control of Finance Minis-Yet, hon, gentlemen opposite will calmly go on and compare the trade of the country during the Liberal régime with its trade during the Conservative régime, as if the decline and the increase had been caused by the policy of either party. Now, one of the great arguments made in favour of a protective tariff, as all will recollect when this policy was initiated, was the argument of the balance of trade. Sir Leonard Tilley declared that one of his objects in introducing a protective tariff was to change the balance of trade, and Sir Charles Tupper and the late Premier were never tired of pointing out that the balance of trade was against Canada, and that this was a disaster which must be cured. In order to show the views of the Government and the party supporting them, when this policy was introduced, here is what Sir Leonard Tilley said as to what would be the result of the adoption of the policy in this particular. In 1879, on the 14th March, in this House, he observed:

"There are other difficulties, the volume of imports has not been materially reduced. I look upon the large imports, ever since the Dominion was organized, showing a large volume of trade against it, as one of the causes of the troubles with which we have to contend—one of the difficulties which it is our duty to remedy—they have been decreasing to a certain extent, but are still very large, showing distinctly and clearly, in my judgment, that they ought to be still further diminished.

"Under these circumstances it appears to me we should turn our attention to the best means of reducing the turn our attention to the best means of reducing the volume of our imports from all parts of the world."

Now, the Government, actuated by these noble impulses, proceeded to place upon the Statute-book the high tariff and protective policy under which we have laboured since. From 1868 to 1873, before the Liberal Government took office, we had a balance of trade against Canada on an average of $19,000,000 a year. From 1874 to 1878, inclusive, the average balance of trade against Canada was $26,699,000, and it was this terrible average balance of trade against Canada which it was said was the necessity for changing the fiscal policy of the country. It was $38,000,000 in 1874, and ran down to $10,000,000 in 1879, but it was with this that the new Government was determined to grapple and which was to be reversed by the adoption of a protective policy which would thus place Canada in a proud and prosperous condition. From 1881 to 1885, the average balance of trade against Canada was over $20,000,000. Whereas during the last years of the Mackenzie regime, the balance was only $10,000,000 against Canada, in the year 1875 it was only $19,000,000, and in 1883, it was of reducing the volume of our imports; but what 534,000,000. But the average balance against Canada has been greater since that. During the last five years, the balance of trade against us, which the protective policy was to reverse, has been nearly $23,000,000. and last year it was $25,000,000, showing that the Finance Minister of that day had not the first conception of what the effect of his tariff policy would be as to its result in regard to the balance of trade or in regard to trade generally. He was supported by all the leaders of the opposite party in his contention that this adverse balance of trade would be turned in favour of Canada by the adoption of a protective policy, and yet there has been only one year since the adoption of that policy when the balance of trade has been in favour of Canada. The total balance against us for the last five years has been over $113,000,000. The hon, member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) commenting upon the trade under the régime of the Liberal Minister of Finance, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). stated that during his time the trade of the country had gone down by leaps and bounds. I had the curiosity to look into the statistics, and I found that the average trade during the first seven years of Confederation was $174,000,000 a year. The average during the Mackenzie régime of five years was $175,000,000, showing that on an average trade had about held its own, notwithstanding the great depression which existed throughout the world. Our hon, friends opposite then came into power with their new policy which was to improve and change the whole face of nature, and the average volume of trade increased from $175,000,000 to $207,000,000 showing an average increase of $32,000,000. During the last five years this has fallen about $5,000,000 a year. It might be asked, if the National Policy had been the great success in this particular which was predicted and boasted of, why was this increase not continued; why, with the increasing population and wealth and enterprise of this great Dominion, has the trade fallen off by $5,000,000 a year instead of increasing, as it ought, by from $10,000,-000 to $12,000,000 a year. But let us look at the points in which the trade increased or decreased. From 1875 to 1879, the exports averaged $77,000,-000 per annum, and the imports averaged $98,000,-000. The increase during the next five years in the exports brought them up to an average of $95,500,-000, while the imports reached $112,000,000. During the next five years the exports averaged $90,000,000 and the imports remained at an average of $112,000,000. What does this show as to the effect of the National Policy? It certainly has never been contended by any candid speaker that the National Policy would have an effect upon our exports, which are in the main of raw material, and the volume of our exports is to a large degree fixed by the price and by the demand in the great markets of the world, Our exports increased from an average of $77,000,000 during the Mackenzie regime to an average of $95,000,000 during the next five years, and then fell off to $90,000,000 in the last five years, but the National Policy could have had very little effect upon that. But what has been its effect upon the volume of our imports? One would imagine that a high protective policy would have a tendency, as it was intended to have, according to the statements made at the time, are the facts? The imports during the Mackenzie régime amounted to a total of $490,000,000, or an average of $98,000,000. The high tariff came into force, which, according to Sir Leonard Tilley, was to reduce the volume of imports and compel our people to manufacture what they required at home, and the imports rose from a total of $490,000,000 to $560,000,000 and during the last five years to $674,000,000, showing a steady increase in the volume of our imports. It is evident that the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), had not seen the inconsistency in which he was involved, because the effect of the National Policy has been to increase our imports, and, of course, to increase the burden on the people of the country who have to pay the enhanced duty on the imports. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), in defending the National Policy, descended to particulars. He followed the hon, member for Queen's, New Brunswick, who had enlarged upon the effects of the National Policy in regard to certain industries in the Province of New Brunswick, but there is one portion of the speech of the member for Westmoreland which I will take the liberty of quoting, and I would like to hear at some future time some comments of the members from New Bruswick upon the figures which I will give. The hon. member said:

"In one particular, at any rate, the trade of the port of St. John, N.B., had increased 25 per cent, in the last ten years, and is to-day greater than the trade of any other seaport between New York and Eastport, except Boston."

Now, this was a bold statement, it was a captivating statement for the representatives from the neighbourhood of the port of St. John; but at the same time it was a misleading statement, much more misleading, I believe, than the hon. member had any intention of making, for I believe him to be in the main a very straightforward and upright representative, who would not make any statement for the purpose of misleading. He stated that the trade of the city of St. John was greater than that of any seaport between New York and Eastport except Boston. The fact is there is no other seaport except Boston that amounts to anything at all, so that he makes an apparently enthusiastic statement that really amounts to nothing. St. John has a larger population than Portland, and it has the noble River St. John running to the sea through it, a river which taps a magnificent territory through the whole length of the Province of New Brunswick, one of the richest territories of its size, perhaps, in the whole Dominion of Canada, and the seaport of St. John covers the trade of that whole rich region, and transmits it through its channels as a distributing centre; consequently, it would not be fair to compare even Portland with St. John as a distributing centre. But let us look at the effect of the National Policy upon the trade of St. John, and I would be happy to have an explanation of the figures I shall give from the representatives from that city and county. Now, the total trade of the port of St John in 1879, the last year of the Muckenzie régime, was $7,174,577. The of the Mackenzie regime, was $7,174,577. The total trade of the port of St. John as far back as 1872, was $11,184,278. The total trade of the port of St. John during the five years of the Liberal regime was $46,602,829, making an average of $9,320,565 per annum. If the trade of the port of St. John had increased at the ratio stated by the Halifax. Mr. FLINT.

member for Westmoreland, we ought to have some larger figures than these to show for it; but the facts are that during the last five years, from 1885 to 1890, the aggregate trade of St John, imports and exports together, amounted to $39,702,281, showing a falling off during the whole period of over $6,000,000. There was an average trade of trade of $7,940,000 during the last five years as against $9,320,000 during the nine years of Liberal policy. I am not going so far as to say that this falling off is the effect of the National Policy, because I am not prepared to go that far without further investigation of figures. But I am prepared to say this, that the boast of the hon. member for Westmoreland is not carried out by the trade returns. Now, here is another peculiarity in connection with these figures: The exports of the trade of St. John during the five years of the Liberal régime, were $16,319,000; during the last five years the exports were $19,466,000. Now, no one claims that the National Policy has any great effect or can have, upon the export trade of a port like the city of St. John; but there was a falling off in the import trade of $10,000,000; it was $30,000,000, during the Liberal regime and $20,000,000 during the last The $30,000,000 of imports before the introduction of the National Policy, an average of $6,000,000, paid $970,000 in duty per year. average of $4,275,000 of imports during the last eleven years, paid $876,000 in duty; in other words, the average duty upon imports in the port of St. John during the period previous to the introduction of the National Policy, was about 14 per cent., while the average duty upon goods during the existence of the National Policy, was over 20 per cent.; in other words, the trade of the port had actually decreased, while the burden upon the people of St. John, or the purchasers of those goods that came to St. John, was vastly increased. While I was looking up the trade of St. John in order to see if the statements made by the hon, member for Westmoreland would be verified—and I regret to find they were not verified—I thought I would look at the trade tables for the capital of Nova Scotia, and I found the following to be the result of the National Policy upon the volume of trade at Halifax. It was not quite so had as in the case of the sister city of St. John, but still it was not sufficient to induce the representatives of that city and that county to make any great boasts as to the effects of the National Policy upon their trade. From 1875 to 1879 the total trade of Halifax, during the Liberal regime, was $51,378,481; during the last five years the total trade had increased to $55,065,733, a very small and very insignificant increase, only amounting to about $3,000,000, between the two periods. Surely if the National Policy was to produce any very appreciable benefits upon the total volume of trade, for a port like Halifax it ought to have increased a great deal more. But let us analyze the nature of this increase. The whole of this increase is represented by exports and not by imports. export trade of Halifax had increased about $4,-000,000, representing the whole amount of the increase of the total trade, while the imports But here is another had remained stationary. peculiar feature which is worthy of attention, as showing the burden upon the consumers of those goods that had to be imported for the benefit of the people coming to the port at It is strange that the amount of imports during the Liberal régime was substantially the same as it was during the last five years, $31,632,333, which paid in duties $4,917,145. During the last five years almost the same quantity of goods were imported, amounting to $31,393,584, which paid a duty of $7,921,659; in other words, upon the same importations the ultimate purchasers of those goods had paid an increase of duty of something over $3,000,000. This is extraordinary, and a peculiar commentary upon the benefits of the National Policy on these two ports and upon the people who purchased the goods which come through those ports. Now, Sir, the alternative policy which has been offered to this House by the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford, is that of a fuller and freer reciprocal trade with the United States. I would like to call the attention of the House to this peculiar fact, that with the exception of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), and, I think, the hon. member who spoke just before him, almost every representative on that side of the House admits a state of unrest, they admit that something must be done for the kenefit of the people of this country, if it is going on to prosper as we desire to see it do. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), who is properly esteemed as one of the most honourable, fair-minded, and straightforward members in this House, was kind enough to admit that, in his opinion, with the exception of some unimportant details, the present situation was fairly satisfactory; but in that opinion he was scarcely seconded by any representative on that side of the House, and certainly not seconded by any hon member But both sides of the House have pratically admitted that there must be some change in the direction of trade reform in connection with our neighbours across the line if this country is to reach the high destiny marked out for it by the fathers of Confederation. The great question is how is this unrest to be satisfied; how are these aspirations to be fulfilled? We say that a large degree of prosperity will be promoted by accepting the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). And here we are met at the outset by the criticism that we do not agree upon a policy, and hon. gentlemen roam back and forth over all literature of the last seven or eight years to find opposing statements to full and free commercial relations with the United States. I am willing to admit that they may find declarations that are inconsistent, and that the party to day does not stand precisely and in every particular on the same platform and basis in every detail as it did during the first nebulous stage of this agitation. When the question was first up there was large latitude of opinion, opinion was in process of formation, while outside of the House, not inside of the House, a large number of prominent Liberals thought commercial union was the sole solution, but subsequently the majority of them, I believe the whole of them, have come to the conclusion that unrestricted reciprocity is the safe solution of the question. To the cry that commercial union was the policy of the party on this side of the House, I would in reply ask hon. gentlemen opposite who may speak on this subject to point to one resolution moved in this House, to one official declaration from the leader of the Lib-which presents the scheme of commercial union as the proper solution of this question. It has never been accepted by the Liberal party, and is not today part of the platform of the party. The scheme of unrestricted reciprocity itself is susceptible of modifications and changes, and so is any scheme of reciprocity, because there are two parties to the bargain, and there must be a certain amount of elasticity permitted in carrying on the negotiations. But the main and essential principle, and it is the only distinction I can find between the parties, is whether manufactured goods to a greater or less extent shall be admitted or entirely excluded under a reciprocity treaty.

Mr. DAVIN. If any modification is permitted, how can it be unrestricted reciprocity?

Mr. FLINT. The Liberal party are perfectly in favour of going as far as the Americans are willing to go in order to obtain a reciprocity treaty, and they are willing to arrange their tariff and financial arrangements with respect to the nature of a treaty which can be secured from the people of the United States. But it is an entire assumption on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite that the Liberal party in office would give up the power of enacting such a tariff and raising such taxation as the expenditure of the country requires. All these matters in connection with levying taxation and reserving to ourselves power of levying such taxation, are matters which must be considered and adjusted during the progress of any treaty negotiations. I can easily understand, although we may agree upon the principle of a policy of absolute free trade with the United States, that there are means of raising a revenue which would not be open to objection. Hon. gentlemen here attack the principle and insist that we must have direct taxation. I for one am not at all adverse to the principle of direct taxation. I think it is a principle which might be feasible in case it were properly applied to the circumstances of the country, but at the same time it is not a practical question at present, because the people have not been inculcated with the idea, and it would take a long period to readjust our relations in financial matters to bring about direct taxationand so raise our revenue. Direct taxation in England was severely attacked the other day by hon, gentlemen opposite; but I would like to ask hon, gentlemen opposite to take their arguments against direct taxation as practised in the mother country, and present them before any intelligent audience there, and they would find how much acceptance they would meet I admit that the question of direct taxation is not a practical question in the politics of this country; but, as an abstract principle, direct taxation, if it can be enforced with the hearty concurrence of the people, is much more honest, fair and equitable than the present system under which this country is governed. The great argument presented against a reciprocity treaty is that we cannot obtain it from the United States. We have ample evidence that we are more likely to obtain a reciprocity treaty which will admit manufactured goods from one country to another than that hon. gentlemen opposite can obtain a reciprocity treaty in natural products only. The evidence from the other side of the line is overwhelming that the American people will not listen for one moment to any eral party, made as leader of the Liberal party, scheme for a reciprocity treaty which will embrace natural products only. I am in favour of unrestricted reciprocity between the United States and Canada, because all the physical conditions of the country point in that direction. We have now unnatural and arbitrary barriers to trade between the peoples of the two countries. We are spending enormous sums upon our canals, upon our railways, upon subventions, upon steamship lines, and at the same time we are carrying out a policy which tends to restrict and hamper the trade which those railways and other facilities were calculated Strike down those barriers, and we will find that every interest we have subsidized in these directions will at once become prosperous and open wide fields of industry and enterprise. The boundary line of this country extends some 3,500 miles. Near British Columbia we have Cali-3,500 miles. fornia, Washington and Oregon. Opposite Manitoba we have Dakota and Montana. Opposite the great Province of Ontario and the district of Algoma, we have the great and populous states of Minnesota and Wisconsin, Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York. Near the great Province of Quebec we have the whole of the New England States; also very convenient to them by water are the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. The people of the United States require in great abundance all the commodities we can produce. The great outcry of the people of this country is for a larger market for their pro-The population of the Dominion is small, while its resources are practically unlimited, and if we are to confine the products of these practically unlimited resources of the soil, the mine, and the water, to the small population of the Dominion we certainly are hampering the industry, the trade and the development of the people. As an alternative policy we have sketched out to us by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) and by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) and by some other hon, members, a policy to be inaugurated in the mother country by which she will discriminate in favour of colonial produce, and they have some hope, admitting the unrest and the unsatisfactory state of trade at the present time, that the mother country will be disposed within a short period to place the products of the colonies on a more favourable footing in the English markets than are the products of other countries. this is an illusion, an idle expectation, it is scarcely necessary to point out. The mother country has always proceeded on the broad principle of granting no favours in matters of trade; her colonies have no advantage in the markets of the mother country over the United States, or any of the nations of Europe or of the world. If she should change that policy, she would change her whole relations with the rest of the world. What is the trade of the mother country with the world? In 1888 the export of domestic products from England, to foreign countries, was in round numbers £150,000,000 sterling, and the export to all her possessions, was £84,000,000 sterling, showing a difference in favour of the outside world of about £66,000,000. Can it be supposed that England is going to imperil her trade relations with the other countries of the world, for the sake of her colonies; when the only result would be to place herself in a worse position than she is to-day? It has been contended that the mother country is finding certain shown that Germany and France have become protective countries, and that the United States and other countries are also protected to the disadvantage of England. Is she going to enlarge the area of attack upon herself by creating discrimination in favour of her own possessions, when her trade with the rest of the world is so much more important to her? While upon this subject of the trade of Great Britain with the colonies, let me call the attention of the House to the position assumed by a great many gentlemen on the other side, with regard to the effect of a discrimination by us upon Great Britain. They say that unrestricted reciprocity will discriminate against Great Britain, and that this will lessen the bonds of amity and friendship between us and the mother land, and tend to bring about annexation, so that to that extent it is disloyal. I believe that in all probability, under a large and broad reciprocity treaty with the United States, there will a certain amount of discrimination against the mother country, and I am perfectly prepared to vote for any policy which will benefit the people of this country, no matter what its effect may be upon the people of the mother country. I say we are not here to legislate in the interest of the people of Great Britain; we are here to legislate in the interest of the people who sent us here, and if we can prove that it is to the interest of our people, that there should be even a certain amount of discrimination against Great Britain, I believe that by adopting this policy we will be sustained by the people of this country, and sustained and applauded by the people of the mother country as well. Do gentlemen imagine that because we may for a temporary period only, possibly diminish the volume of exports from Great Britain to Canada, that the people of the mother country are so foolish, as not to see at a glance, that if this country becomes the great prosperous country as we predict it will become, then in a very short time their trade relations, and financial relations, and international relations with us will be placed on a much more satisfactory basis, and that in the vulgar matter of trade alone, we will be far better off under unrestricted reciprocity with the United States than we are at the present time? The total amount of exports from Great Britain, in 1889, was £249,000,000, of which she sent to the Dominion of Canada £7,798,000 sterling; a mere nothing in comparison with the large volume of her trade with the outside world. Suppose the profit to British manufacturers upon the exports to Canada amounted to £1,000,000 sterling, can it be supposed that, for the sake of that profit, even though the whole of this trade were lost, that Great Britain would imperil the harmony that now exists between the mother country and the people of Canada? Having once conceded to us the right to settle our own trade relations, having once squarely abandoned all control over our trade policy and our trade system, can it be imagined that the mother country would, for the sake of a million pounds sterling, disturb the relations existing between us, and produce an ill-feeling among the people of this country? We have abundant evidence to prove that British statesmen would applaud a system of interchange between this country and the United States, even at the expense of a temporary discrimination against the mother markets in the world closed to her; it has been country, if that policy would redound to the ultimate prosperity and advantage of the people of Canada, and the people of Great Britain as well. Reciprocity will wonderfully benefit the iron trade this country. It is admitted upon all hands, that in the matter of mineral resources, the Dominion of Canada is daily giving evidence of possessing remarkable capacities. We have in possessing remarkable capacities. Nova Scotia coal and iron lying side by side; we have iron mines of almost unlimited extent in the Province of Ontario, and throughout the newer territories of the North-West and of British Columbia; and every day, and almost every week, brings to lightnew resources in various portions of the country. Therefore any policy which will tend to develop these great resources, must do more for the Dominion of Canada than almost the mind of man can conceive. But, Sir, unfortunately, while we have beneath the soil these rich and extensive deposits, we have not an opportunity of making use of them, even if we had the capital to develop them. is this? It is because the population of our country is limited, and because the requirements of the country are also limited. We imported in 1890 over $10,000,000 of iron and steel, and manufactures of iron and steel, upon which the country paid a This vast amount of duty duty of $2,927,776. enters into the expenses of almost every man in the country, and affects his welfare. Our people in almost every relation of life, in every trade, in every art, and in every enterprise in the country are beholden to the iron and steel trade for some measure of their prosperity and success. If it could be so managed by any legislative machinery that we could produce from our mines and manufacture into iron and steel all the products of these mines that the people of this country required, it would be a great achievement; but we know that it is beyond the power of man and beyond the power of any legislation to enable us to do so profitably. But the Government of this country, in undertaking to maintain a protective tariff which should develop dustry, has made most extraordinary efforts; yet we found that, notwithstanding the high duties always levied on iron and steel and their manufactures which were required for revenue purposes in this country, and which were to a certain extent protective, the production of ore and pig iron has been always very limited. But in order to stimulate this industry, as late as 1887, the Finance Minister of that day placed still higher protective duties upon these manufactures and upon pig iron, and also gave a bounty to the existing industries of that nature. Now, I will read some of the predictions held out to the country by the Finance Minister at the time of the increase in these iron duties, and I will ask how these predictions have been fulfilled, and what has been the result of that tariff legisla-Sir Charles Tupper said:

"What I propose to ask this House to do, in adopting the policy of vitalizing this great industry for Canada—is to take the duty off anthracite coal and make it free." Now, the duties levied on the people of this country by means of those coal duties amounted to a great many millions of dollars, the object of which was to compel the people of Ontario and the other upper provinces to buy and use the bituminous coal of the lower provinces. Up to that time it did not seem to have dawned upon the capacious mind of the Minister of Finance that he was doing great injury to other industries in the upper provinces. At all events, after the people these industries to be about 390. In other words, had paid many millions on their coal, he concluded suddenly that another policy was necessary; and in order to reconcile the people generally to the heavy duties on iron and steel, he struck off the duty on anthracite coal, very much to the benefit and satisfaction of the people of the upper provinces. He said:

'The moment that is done, we shall have blast furnaces at Cobourg, Weller's Bay and Kingston, at all events, served by anthracite coal, making that description of anthracite iron which is so highly valued."

I appeal to my hon, friends behind me, and to my hon, friends in front of me, to say whether they know of the existence of these furnaces at Cobourg, Weller's Bay and Kingston. Three or four yearshave passed since that prediction was made, and we find it still unfulfilled, and not likely to be fulfilled for a long time to come.

"We shall have settled the problem that nothing shall be easier than to establish blast furnaces in the Province of Quebec, and in the Province of Ontario, by which you can not only manufacture unlimited quantities of charcoal iron, but manufacture the iron by the use of anthracite coal. * * * All it requires is the adoption of this

One would have supposed that by this time there would have been some such result from the adoption of that policy, something to show for the exaggerated promises of the Finance Minister. fact is that none of these promises have been redeemed. There are in existence in the Dominion of Canada only four small furnaces, one in British Columbia, the Londonderry Iron and Steel Works in Nova Scotia, and one or two in other portions of the country. As far back as 1879, shortly after this Government came into power, we had the promise of the Finance Minister who preceded Sir Charles Tupper, with regard to the iron industry. He said:

It may safely be said that it is the basis of every other industry. It is true we have not developed it to a great extent yet. We have an establishment in Nova Scotia. There is no reason why we should not supply the whole trade in time."

These were the views and the reasons which actuated the Government in placing these enormous duties on iron and steel, and taking the duty off anthracite coal. What has been the result? The result has been that whereas our imports of iron and steel have reached an enormous sum, though fluctuating to a certain degree, the actual production of iron in the country has increased but slightly. The value of the imports of pig iron has increased from $566,000 in 1885, to $1,120,000 in 1889; showing that although we have placed these enormous duties upon iron and steel and their manufactures, and upon pig iron, yet the importations continue to increase in quantity and value to an enormous extent, taking an immense amount of money out of the pockets of the people, while the value of iron produced in the Dominion only increased from $127,000 in 1886, to $155,300 in 1890. The number of men which the Finance Minister predicted would be employed in the production of iron ore and pig iron and in the running of the blast furnaces under his policy was about 20,000, but the latest returns show the total number of men employed in people of the country to promote the manufacture of pig iron, and while the production has scarcely increased the importations have largely increased, and we have lost the whole opportunity of selling our ores in the outside markets of the world. But give us the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, let us induce the people of the United States to strike off their enormous duties on iron ore and pig iron, and then every acre of mining land in this country will at once increase in value, and possibilities of great brilliancy will open up in every portion of the Dominion of Canada, because then we shall have an enormous market for the sale of these products. It is a market that the people require in order to develop these industries; and the opening up of a large market for our Canadian iron ore and Canadian pig iron will be of almost incalculable benefit to every man, woman and child in the country. Now, there was no subject upon which, during the period of the Liberal régime, the critics of the Opposition were more delighted to taunt the Government than upon the effect their policy was supposed to have upon the shipping industry. There was a certain decline in shipping, in some particulars, during that regime, and it was predicted that the National Policy would have a great benefit upon the shipping industry of this country. Well, I am not prepared to go so far as to say that the National Policy has injured the shipping industry to the extent to which it has been injured, but, I make no doubt whatever that the National Policy is responsible for a fair proportion of it. has shut off, or tended to shut off our trade with the United States; it has prevented, to a large degree, the growth of the shipping industry which would be engaged in carrying our goods and American goods back and forth between the two countries. But give us unrestricted reciprocity, with all that implies, open the coasting trade of the United States to our vessels, and you will at once give a great impetus to our shipping inclus-But in order to show how the National Policy has failed to benefit the shipping industry of the Dominion, I will call your attention to a few of the statistics in connection with that The tonnage built in 1874 amounted to 174,000; the tonnage registered in that year amounted to 163,000. The average tonnage built from 1868 to 1874 was about 116,000 tons per year, and the average tonnage registered during that period was about 131,000. It increased during the regime of the Mackenzie Administration from 116,000 to 138,000, and the tonnage registered increased on an average from 130,000 to 134,000 tons. Then we had the National Policy, which was to do great things for the country, and was in particular to do great things for the shipping At any rate, it was to do it no harm. But the average tonnage built since 1878 instead of being 138,000 tons, which it was during the Liberal regime, only amounted to 52,000 tons for the last eleven years. The total tonnage of Canada from 1873 to 1879 stood as follows:-

		••••••
1875		 	1,205,565
1876		 	1,260,893
1877		 	1.310.468
1878		 	1.333.015

showing an increase of 258,000 tons from 1873 all through the North-West, and in the waters Mr. Flint.

we have had an enormous burden placed on the to 1879, which, valued at $30 per ton, shows an increase in the value of the shipping of the Dominion, from 1873 to 1879, of $8,750,000--a very substantional increase to the wealth of the people. But the National Policy came in, and following it came a falling off in our shipping. Whereas in 1880 we had 1,311,218 tons of shipping in Canada, the amount fell off yearly, until in 1890 we only had 1,024,974 tons, showing a decrease of 307,000 tons, representing a decrease in the value of shipping alone of $9,213,600; but the difference between the two periods represents a change to the people of Canada of something like $18,000,000. Now, whatever the National Policy may have done, it is quite apparent that it has failed to benefit in any way or to influence for the good of the people the shipping industry of the country. But we are answered: the shipping industry has been injured by causes outside the National Policy. Whenever there is any falling off hon. gentlemen opposite are only too anxious to shift the burden somewhere else, and pretend that the National Policy is not to blame: but when they can point out to any apparent advantage in any particular, they hold up both hands and say the National Policy is entitled to all the But when we compare the position of the Dominion in shipping with the position of other nations-let us look to Great Britain, a free trade country, which cultivates a commercial policy that tends to develop the shipping industry—we find that whereas in 1880 Great Britain had a tonnage of 6,579,772, in 1889 she had a tonnage of 7.724,149, or an increase of 1,204,377, representing an increase of wealth to the people of free trade Great Britain of $36,000,000, at the same time when, under the National Policy, our shipping showed a falling off amounting to a decrease in our wealth of $9,000,000, thus proving that the National Policy has not benefited the shipping interests of this country, while the free trade policy of England has benefited her shipping to the extent of $36,-000,000. There has been an increase of tonnage since 1880, not only in Great Britain, but in Norway, Hamburg, the German Empire, Belgium and France. In fact, Canada is one of the few countries in which the shipping industry has gone down. Now, Sir, if the National Policy was to be of any benefit, I do not see why the shipping industry should not share in it. Give us unrestricted reciprocity, give us the coasting trade of the United States, which we would obtain under a fair treaty of unrestricted reciprocity, and we will find every ship-yard throughout the coasts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick busy building vessels. We will find a great impetus given to the coasting trade and the ship-building business of the country, and we will find all over the great lakes and throughout the vast water-stretches between the United States and the Dominion the shipping industry would be vastly promoted. In the matter of fisheries, what would be the effect of a treaty of reciprocity with the United States? Can any man calculate the great advantages which would accrue to the fishing industries of the Dominion by the opening up of free trade relations with the United States. Why, Sir, the fishery wealth of the Dominion is past calculation. There is no wealth, not the mining wealth of the country, not the agricultural wealth of the country, not the forest wealth of the country, which can compare with the fishing wealth in our great lakes along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and these interests of peace. She, therefore, desires that all sources of wealth can only be cultivated and developed to their full extent through the means of reciprocity with the United States. Notwithstanding the hampering restrictions to our trade with the United States, our exports to that country are about one-third of all our exports of fish. Give us free trade, and we will obtain access to an unlimited market, and we will have opened up to our hardy fishermen in every province, and particularly in the Maritime Provinces, a vast source of wealth. Now, in the United States the returns of fish sold to the United States are as follows:-

	1886	2,500,040
	1887	2.717,000
	1888	3,163,000

while to all other British possessions we sold about the same quantity. The United States returns show that our returns are substantially correct. The value of dutiable fish we sent to the United States in 1890 was $1,519,315, on which we paid, as far as I can gather from the American statistics, a duty of about $500,000. That, upon our limited trade, was a direct loss to the fishermen, mostly of the Maritime Provinces, because had the fish been free the price would not have been affected, and this half million of dollars would have gone into the pockets of the fishermen of Canada. this connection let me relate a curious incident which took place during the late election. I was canvassing the captain of a fishing vessel, a particularly intelligent man, and I spoke to him of the benefits of reciprocity in regard to the fishing industry. To my surprise, he expressed himself as being entirely opposed to fish entering the United States free. I was amazed. I said: Are you not in favour of our fish going into the United States free? He said: No. said: Why? He said: I am captain of a Gloucester fishing vessel, and I do not want Nova Scotia fish to go into Gloucester free, and to compete with the fish which I catch on my own boat. Here was the peculiar spectacle of a Nova Scotian, who was the captain of a Gloucester fishing vessel, voting against reciprocity because it would interfere with his trade. Of course, I laughed heartily when I heard his reasons; but it shows that those fisher-men who sail from United States ports are opposed to the interests of their own brethren in the Dominion of Canada, because they are afraid of the fish that might go in in Canadian bottoms. But give us free trade, and the fishing industry of the lower provinces and of the whole Dominion will at once obtain prosperity, and so will every other industry. Let us take higher considerations, those which should actuate us in desiring to establish harmonious relations with the people of the United States. Not only are we interested in this matter for the sake of our own prosperity, or the prosperity of the people of the United States, but the whole of the British Empire is interested in the peaceful solution of these questions in the interests of the empire. England sits on the other side of the ocean peculiarly surrounded by great and warlike nations, and she is interested in acting as peacemaker and harmoniser among those nations and in seeking to prevent a Euporean war, and to bring the great force of her wealth, her influence and her military and naval power to bear upon them in the Bill which was carried through the Senate last year, these difficulties between the United States and Canada shall be amicably settled. In addition to being actuated by the great trade question, let us unite to cultivate the fullest and most harmonious relations with the people of the United States, marching forward together in the cause of progress, in the cause of humanity, to the benefit of all the nations of the earth; and then, instead of having taunts thrown against a people who live alongside us for 3,000 miles, of being an alien people, of seeking to wrest us as one of the jewels from the British Crown, we will find harmony and peace, and we will find our mother country blessing us with both hands, and thanking us for the part we are taking not only in advancing our material interests but in promoting peace and harmony in the world.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 22nd July, 1891.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock. PRAYERS.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. SPROULE moved:

That all accounts for salaries and extra services or otherwise with the Post Office Department in regard to the following persons, namely:—J. G. Poston, A. C. McDonald, M. P. Wright, E. A. LeSueur, Miss Kate E. Falconer, Miss J. Craig. Miss A. Graham, and A. E. Meghen, together with all cheques given in payment of such accounts, and any and all cheques, vouchers, receipts and other papers in any way relating to their respective services, for the fiscal years 1887-88 and 1888-89; and all the cheques, accounts and receipts for payments of every kind in connection with the Emerson, Deloraine and Gretna Immigration Stations in the North-West, for the financial years 1886, 1887, 1888 and 1889, be produced forthwith for the use of the Public Accounts Committee.

Motion agreed to.

INSPECTION OF SHIPS.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 149) respecting the Inspection of Ships. He said: This is the measure in reference to which there has been considerable discussion in the country on the part of sailors in regard to the insecurity of At present we have no means of regulating tackle. the tackle or equipment of ships, our Inspection Act having special reference to the hulls of vessels. This Bill proposes no new tackle on shipping, but it gives the officers of the Marine Department additional powers, so as to secure the inspection of the equipment and tackle of ships as well as the hulls.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In this connection I desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister to a and which is germane to the object of the present Bill. It was introduced into the Senate by Mr. Power, and is entitled an Act for the better secur-That Bill ing of the safety of certain fishermen. came down to this House last year, after having passed the Senate unanimously; but owing, I think, to the late period at which it reached the House, and owing to the intimation which the hon. gentleman gave that he would take the subject into his consideration, it was not pressed. This year it has again passed the Senate unanimously, I believe, and I have taken charge of it so far as to move the first reading. It is now on the Order paper, and it is perfectly plain that there is very little chance of reaching it this session unless it receives the attention and approval of the hon. gentleman, and is taken charge of by him. I would like to ask if his attention has been called to it, if he will give it the consideration which he promised last year, and if he will adopt it and see that it is carried through this session?

Mr. TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman is somewhat mistaken as to what was promised last session. I may say that I have given careful attention to the subject. I have discussed the Bill in all its phases with the hon. gentleman who took charge of it in the other House, and I have also had the benefit of very full reports upon it from the officers of the Marine Department. Just previously to the Bill coming before the House, I was called away, and was away for most of the session, as the hon. gentleman will recollect. Mr. Colby, who was then acting for me, expressed quite fully the views of the Marine Department, which induced the Government to come to the conclusion that the Bill should not become law, and the Bill was defeated. I do not think it is possible that Mr. Colby on that occasion held out any undertaking or promise to further consider the measure, as he was then in possession of the fullest evidence, that while the Bill was philanthropic in intent and had a good object in view, namely, the safety of the fishermen, it was, from the fishermen's standpoint, a Bill interfering with operations that had been left, so far as statutory legislation is concerned, exceedingly free in the past. It was my intention, if the Bill came up during the present session, to oppose it in every possible way on that ground, because, instead of assisting or benefiting the fishermen, I think it would inconvenience

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I shall take the earliest opportunity of inviting the opinion of the House on the measure.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

HARBOUR OF PICTOU.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 150) to amend the Acts respecting the harbour of Pictou, in Nova Scotia. He said: At present the harbour is managed by four or five officials appointed by Order of the Governor in Council, and this Bill is to create the Harbour Commissioners a body corporate and to give them power to borrow for the purposes of harbour improvements.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS.

The state of the s

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that Government Orders have precedence on Mondays for the remainder of the session.

Mr. LAURIER. This is a motion which is generally made when prorogation is within sight, and as far as I can see we have not yet reached that period. We have a good deal of business on the Order paper yet to be discharged, and certainly, even with every endeavour to abridge it. the session must last yet several weeks. Therefore, I think this motion is premature and should not now be pressed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The object is to hasten the work of the House. Of course there is a good deal of private business on the Notice paper, but the hon, gentleman must have seen that during the last two or three sittings, the work done, with regard to private measures, has not been very Last Monday we discussed but one measure, and under the circumstances if we were to give Mondays for the purpose of hastening the work of the House I think we would be doing the proper I thought the hon, gentleman would have suggested that next Monday might not be interfered with, and that this motion would take effect for the Monday following.

Mr. LAURIER. I thought of taking next Monday and leaving the following Mondays to the Government, but I think it is premature to make this motion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. On the Mondays after that, the questions by members might be heard first.

Mr. LAURIER. I would suggest that the motion be not proceeded with until we see what progress can be made on Monday next.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In that case I would say, let the motion remain on the Notice paper.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It seems to me it is a pity that the Government have departed from the proper rule which was practically established a good while ago, that when a notice of motion was reached, unless there was some very important reason to the contrary, that notice should be proceeded with. I have observed during this session that the Government have asked that notices of motion be allowed to stand, not once, but a score of times, and without, it appears to me, any sufficient reason. I think that should not have been done, and it is a pity the rule is not more regularly enforced.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not see any reason why the notice should not remain on the Notice paper.

Motion withdrawn.

IRON BOUNTIES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to enquire of the hon. Minister of Finance, if he has looked into the matter touching the necessity of bringing down the reports about iron bounties to which I called his attention the other day?

Mr. FOSTER. I believe that comes within the department of the hon. Minister of Customs, and I handed a note to him about it. I think the returns are made necessary by the Act.

COMMISSIONER HERCHMER.

Mr. DAVIN. I would ask the hon. Minister of Justice when the report of Mr. Comptroller White into the conduct of Commissioner Herchmer will be laid on the Table?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The report was finished and handed to the head of the department during last week, and I will get it in a day or two.

WAYS AND MEANS-THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on proposed motion of Mr. Foster: "That the Resolutions adopted in Committee of Ways and Means on Tuesday last, the 23rd June, be read a second time;" and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). In the few observations I intend to make on this matter, I will endeavour to be as brief as possible and to confine my remarks to the amendment to the resolution now before the House. The discussion has assumed a very wide range, and while very much has been said, and eloquently said, on both sides of the House, which is interesting and instructive, I cannot help thinking that very much which has emanated from the other side of the House might have been more properly addressed to the Congress of the United States during the discussion on the McKinley Bill. While I do not imagine for a single moment that the woes and troubles of our fellow-countrymen, which have been so pathetically portrayed by the hon gentlemen opposite, would have had any effect upon the determination of our American cousins, it might be said that these arguments were addressed to a legislative body who had power to deal with their difficulties and who might have struck off the duties these gentle-men groan under. I humbly suggest that this fallacy runs through the speeches of very many hon, gentlemen opposite. They act and speak as if we had some control over the United States Congress, and as if we could affect the legislation which they have the power to adopt. course, needs no argument to refute. Hon. gentlemen opposite would at once admit the absurdity of such a contention, and would repudiate it; and yet, day after day, and hour after hour, these hon. gentlemen have not only endeavoured to make us believe how much more our people would be able to obtain from the people of the United States under altered circumstances, but they have been vehemently blaming this Government because these duties were not taken off. The first portion of this amendment of the hon member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has, to a great extent, been lost sight of in this discussion, and hon. gentlemen opposite have said very little on the subject, though, if the proposal is feasible and can be practically carried out, it requires our very careful consideration. The first portion of the amendment to which I desire to call your attention at the present time, is as follows:

"That the situation of the country requires that the Government should forthwith reduce all duties on articles of prime necessity, and more particularly on those most generally consumed by artizans, miners, fishermen and farmers."

This point ought not to be slighted. This proposal, if it be practicable, comes home to our whole population, and I think the hon, gentleman who propounded it should give us all the details in connection with it so that we might form a just judgment on the subject, but I ask the House how much wiser are we after all the discussions we have heard on that subject? Has any one told us what the total amount of the reduction is to be, or whether there is to be any reduction at all? Has anybody intimated upon what articles the reduction is to be made, or upon what other articles the duty is to be increased? No doubt the resolution will sound very well when read on the public platform. It may be a matter with which hon, gentlemen opposite may successfully conjure at some of the by-elections, as it appeals to all portions of our population, and the hon. gentleman has named the classes of the population who he says are affected and to whom he appeals, though he has not named the articles on which he proposes to reduce the duty. The ambiguity of this amendment will enable hon. gentlemen to pose in their respective constituencies in opposition to any duty which may be unpopular there, leaving their colleagues to take the opposite course and the opposite argument in other constituencies. What are the articles upon which the duties are to be reduced? The hon. member for King's—a solitary figure, it is true-was bold enough to mention flour, but after all that has been said and admitted on that subject surely that article need not be discussed now. I prefer to leave that to be dealt with by my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron), who no doubt will do the necessary catechising of the hon, gentlemen opposite, who seemed to be very much afraid of him during the debate. Nearly all the necessaries of life are now free or moderately taxed. Hon, members on this side have shown the favourable position of the farmers and artizans, and the great privileges they enjoy. Passing by the farmers and the artizans, and leaving the miners to be dealt with by those gentlemen who represent mining constituencies, and are therefore more conversant with their wants than any one else can be, what about the fishermen? Well, the fishermen have not only in common with all their fellow-subjects a free breakfast-table, but their fishing gear, their provisions and fishing supplies are free of duty, they get a considerable drawback on the materials they use in the construction of their vessels, and $160,000 bounty is distributed promptly and satisfactorily amongst them. No one feels more than they do that their industry has been support-ed and developed by the Government from day to day, and they know that they are indebted for this to the National Policy and the care the Government has shown in regard to their interest in the prosecution of their arduous and perilous undertaking. Look at the figures. Our revenue amounts to $31,500,000. We raise from liquors, tobacco and the better class of woollens, cottons and hardware, which the fishermen do not generally consume, $23,500,000, leaving a balance of $8,000,000. This year $3,000,000 have been taken from that by the reduction of taxation, leaving a balance of $5,000,-000, or a little more than $1 per head of the population. An amount of 80 cents a head is paid to the Local Government to enable it to defray the expenses for roads and bridges and education, saving that much of direct taxation. Deduct from that the $160,000 bounty paid to the fishermen, and I would like to know if we are in a position to say that the fishermen are not fairly dealt with, and taking the cost of the protective service and the expense of keeping up the various fish hatcheries, if we should say that the fishermen are in such a position that efforts should be made at once to reduce the duties on articles of prime necessity in their interest? I do not wonder that this part of the amendment has not had a prominent place in the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite. In fact, their speeches have shown a total absence of any definite scheme for a reduction of the duty. Some gentlemen have said it was impossible to formulate a definite scheme. It may be impossible in regard to a reciprocity treaty, because that is a matter of negotiation with the American Government, but I think, when hon, gentlemen put before us a resolution of this kind, stating that duties are to be reduced on articles of prime necessity, they are bound to give us some details of what they propose, and not, as a fisherman would say, to give them-selves so much leeway. They should state where the reduction would be made and upon what articles they would make that reduction. Now, Sir, if it is not out of place, I think it would be very well to say-perhaps, with bated breath and whispered humbleness-that such a thing as a revenue is necessary in this country, and we cannot get on very well without it. The interest on the debt must be paid, the necessary expenses of the Government must be met, the subsidies to provinces provided for, and we are not at all opposed to public works. I, for one, heartily approve of the Government aiding and assisting in the construction of public works, and I know, Sir, that very many members on the opposite side of the House are equally in favour of it. But while I am ready to aid and assist in the construction of railways in different parts of the Dominion, I also ask, and I know that my Liberal friend from Queen's, N.S. (Mr. Forbes) will join me in that request, that we should have Government assistance in building a railway in the isolated Counties of Queen's and Shelburne. I would ask, how are these things to be provided for if the revenue is to be reduced and the duties taken off? Perhaps I cannot better close the remarks I have to make on this portion of the subject than by reading an extract from one of the speeches of the Hon. Edward Blake, made at a time when hon, gentle-men opposite had not only the benefit of his sympathetic eye, but when he was actually their leader, and it was their pleasure to follow him. Now, Mr. Blake said:

"No man, I care not how convinced an advocate of absolutely free trade in Canada he may be, has yet suggested, no man. I believe, can suggest, a practicable plan whereby our great revenue needs can be met otherwise than by the continued imposition of very high duties on goods similar to those we make, or can make, within our bounds; or on the raw materials. I invite the most ardent free-trader in public life to present a plausible solution of this problem; and I contend that he is bound to do so before he talks of free trade as practicable in Canada. I have not believed it soluble in my day; and any chance of its solubility, if any chance there was, has been destroyed by the vast increase of our yearly charge and by the other conditions which have been created. The thing is removed from the domain of practical politics." is removed from the domain of practical politics.

Now, Sir, the second part of this amendment, I think, is equally vague. The Toronto Mail the other day very properly characterized it as being adroitly worded. What is this unrestricted resubject:

ciprocity? It has gone by a great many names; we have heard it called a Customs union, commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity, continental free trade, and some hon, gentlemen on the other side of the House the other day wanted to make out that instead of being unrestricted reciprocity, it was restricted reciprocity. Why, Sir, the very fact that they have felt themselves obliged to give so many names to this political bantling is a very peculiar circumstance in itself. But however the views of hon. gentlemen may now vary, I take it that the signification we are to give to unrestricted reciprocity is to be derived not only from the name itself, but from the explanations that have been given to it during the last campaign, upon various platforms and in the press of the country. Sir, what did Sir Richard Cartwright say about it in Boston:

"Briefly. Sir, it this project can be carried out, it will mean for you the addition of half a continent for commercial purposes, and the creation of a new tier of Northern States, with an enormous area of unoccupied land, with very great mineral resources, with a present population of 5,000,000, but with a capacity of maintaining 50,000,000. ing 50,000,000. The advantages of your (Boston's) position for securing a very large part of our trade, are great. You own, as I have said, much of our mineral wealth. Many of our chief trade routes centre here. You are the natural shipping port especially in winter, for very large sections of our territory. You lie within easy distance of our cities, and of the most populous portions of our Dominion. In one word, given free trade with Canada and you rise at one stride from the position, in some respects, of a frontier city, with no great extent of trade territory secured you, to that of a central entrepot, with a practical monopoly of a great region behind you whose commerce no man can take from you."

Or listen to Mr. Longley, a gentleman who occupies the position of Attorney General in the Local House of Assembly of Nova Scotia. He has been associated with the hon, member for South Oxford in this enterprise and others, and with their colleagues, Mr. Wiman, Mr. Hitt, Mr. Murray and Here is what Mr. Longley says: their supporters.

"There has been introduced into the Congress of the United States by one of the most influential members of that body, Mr. Butterworth, of Ohio, a measure of the most comprehensive character. In two or three clauses he proposes to settle the whole difficulty by striking down the Custom-houses between Canada and the United States. The measure he proposes is a treaty of the most absolutely free and unrestricted commercial intercourse. He proposes that there shall not be a Custom-house between the United States and Canada. A line of Custom-houses between the United States and Canada is the most unnatural and unphilosophical thing that can be imagined. If the people of the United States were a nation of Patagonians or savages, there might be some reason for our not having intercourse with them, but the people of the United States are a nation speaking the same language that we do; they sprang from the same race that we do; they have a common fatherhood with us in the English-speaking race, and to-day nothing but an imag-"There has been introduced into the Congress of the English-speaking race, and to-day nothing but an imaginary line separates the two peoples. It is true that $8,000,000 of the revenue we collect is derived from imports from the United States, but a commercial union implies more than the absence of Custom-houses, t implies the establishment of a common tariff against It implies the establishment of a common tariff against the rest of the world; and therefore the commercial union proposed by Mr. Butterworth implies a common tariff against the rest of the world. That tariff, of course, will be adjusted by commissioners representing the two Governments; but it is unnecessary for me to say that the American tariff in such a case would largely prevail, and that we in Canada would be practically under the American tariff against the rest of the world."

Now, Sir, Mr. Longley most certainly was in favour of a common tariff, and he was in favour of striking down all the Custom-houses between the two countries of discrimination against Great Britain. Now, let us see what Mr. Wiman says upon the "Unrestricted reciprocity between the United States and Canada would be practically the same kind of reciprocity that now exists between the states of the Union or between the provinces of the Dominion. There would be no taxation, no restriction, or let or hindrance to the freest and fullest exchange of everything each country produces, whether natural or manufactured. True, it is proposed to keep up the Castom-houses along the border in order that smuggling from outside should not be permitted, and especially that Canada should not be the back door by which foreign goods could be brought into the United States free of duty. But the tariff of Canada must necessarily be as high as that of this country, against the outside world, for by the free admission of American goods (even now with a heavy duty on half her imports) the revenue from Customs would be so reduced that as against foreign goods the rates must continue fully as high as those in the United States. Indeed this condition of equality of tariff must always prevail, else there would be no safety for the revenue of either country.

The Customs line that now cuts the continent in two will be lifted up and placed right around the continent."

Now, let us see what Mr. Longley says with regard to the question of fish. Speaking in Boston, he said this:

"Please take home with you this fact, that the Liberal party of Canada has adopted unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, as the chief and supreme plank of its political platform. Upon every platform and upon every hustings, from now until the day when the next general election is over, that will be the one supreme question discussed. The success of such a policy means an end in fishery squabbles and an end to bond squabbles. Under such a policy as that, American fishermen may enter Canadian waters at will and take all they can find. Under such a policy they can enter Canadian ports for bait and supply, and send all the fish they require to markets at home."

This is what unrestricted reciprocity is. the hon, gentlemen opposite desire to get away from this construction of those two words, I think it would be utterly impossible to do so after they have put their views on record. The hon, member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), who addressed the House last night, informed us among other things that the policy of the Opposition, the policy expressed by this resolution of the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) does not tend to annexation. Well, Sir, I should like to know what view any one would take on that point after reading the remarks made by Mr. Wiman, by the hon, member for South Oxford and by other hon, gentlemen? If we need anything more than that, let us see what Mr. Blaine says about it. need not read his words in full as they have been quoted already, but he virtually said that the only reciprocity that he will accept, that is worth considering, is a reciprocity which gives the United States entire control of the tariff, and which must eventually end in annexation. I should like to ask what view it was that Mr. Blake took of this matter? Did he not think that this policy would lead to annexation? Was that not the very reason he refused to run at the last general election and gave up the leadership of the Liberal party? I am free to say, as other hon, gentlemen on this side of the House have said, that I am strongly in favour of reciprocal trade arrangements with the United States, but, of course, those arrangements must be based on a solid and just foundation. I believe that reciprocal trade relations would be very beneficial to this country and more especially to many parts of it. Take, for instance, the fishing indus-The fresh fish industry, particularly, is growtry. ing and increasing daily. The only market for our mackerel is the market of the United States, and, therefore, it is that the fishermen as a class are very anxious, indeed, to have reciprocal trade relations with the United States. But they are not willing, and their representative is not willing, to pay too much for those trade arrangements. If we see that it places our country in the hands of the United States, if we have to give up control of our tariff and allow them to regulate it to suit themselves, if we have to let the Americans come in and use our inshore fisheries, I believe the occupation of the fishermen would very soon come to an end. The policy of allowing the American fishermen to come into our inshore fisheries and, as Mr. Longley says, do as they please, would not only ruin the business in a very few years, but while it was being ruined, it would make competition so great in the United States that the price of fish would come down to a mere nothing. hon, gentlemen opposite have changed their views very much about reciprocity. They tell us we have no definite policy, they intimate to us that we have shifted our ground from time to time; but, if we look at the history of reciprocity, we will find that in making that charge they are judging us by themselves and it is they who have been shift-ing their ground and now advocate a principle very different from that which they urged some time ago. I think we may answer them their own speeches. I can turn up an address made by the hon, member for South Oxford. in which he expressed himself as opposed to reciprocity, or at all events to the view now taken by hon, gentlemen opposite on this question. That hon, gentleman said:

"They say we must have reciprocity and cannot live without it as a Dominion. I take exception to that statement. While reciprocity is desirable, we are not in such a state of subjection to the United States that we cannot live without it. We have men and ships and will carry the war into Africa. We will find new markets for ourselves and cut them out. There is nothing better calculated to prevent the bringing about of reciprocity than to tell the Americans we cannot live without them. It would induce them to believe that they had the power to drive us to their own terms."

What did Mr. Jones, a former representative in this House, say in 1878? He said:

"These men who tell you that it is impossible to exist as a commercial people unless you have reciprocity, might as well tell the United States that if they want to drive you into the Union all they have to do is to refuse you reciprocity for a certain number of years longer, which is the very best way that can be adopted of inducing the American people to enter into commercial relations with us. For my part, I will deny that we are dependent on them, one way or another. No Canadian statesman can do a worse service than to spread that idea among a great number of his fellow countrymen."

Again, the hon, gentleman said in 1872:

"He felt, as a representative of Nova Scotia, that however anxious he might be for the establishment of improved trade relations with the United States on fair terms, he was not willing to give the United States everything that we had to offer as an inducement for reciprocity. If we gave them permission to fish in our waters, we put them in competition with our own fishermen and reduce the value of their fish. He stood here not to represent one county or one province, but the whole interests of the Dominion, and in that capacity he would feel it his duty to vote against the ratification of the treaty."

And again:

"We would lose more by the competition of these Americans than we would gain by the reduction of the duty."

We have been told notwithstanding the express announcement of their policy that the Government are not sincere in their desire for reciprocity, and that they have never been in favour of it. I think they have always been the most successful advocates of it. The first treaty, that in 1854, was negotiated under their direction. The Washington Treaty of 1871 was obtained in a great measure through our late; leader, Sir John A. Macdonald, and he was bitterly attacked by the Liberals of that day for selling the country by the provisions of that treaty. Then, again, the Treaty of 1878 was negotiated by the party in power, and efforts have been made from time to time—it is true they were made in vainbut still efforts have been made, and everything has been done that could be done honourably and fairly to obtain equitable reciprocal relations in trade with the United States. I have said that were we to follow the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, it would be ruinous to our fishing industry; and if we were to do as Mr. Longley suggested, namely, open our inshore fisheries to the Americans, it would result most disastrously to us. I have, Sir, a few details here which I would like to submit, to prove my statement. Since the fishery clauses of the Washington Treaty were abrogated by the United States in 1885, and the Americans kept out of our fishing grounds, the catch of mackerel by the United States fishermen has fallen from 478,000 barrels in 1884 to 19,042 in 1890, and their catch of codfish has fallen from 1,001,303 quintals in 1884 to 436,650 quintals in 1890, clearly showing that we have the supply and therefore virtually fix the price. In 1879 the price of "No. 1" mackerel in the Boston market (as stated in the report of the Boston Fish Bureau) was from $7 to $15 per barrel; the price of "No. 2" mackerel, from $3 to $8 per barrel; the price of "No. 3 large," from $3 to $7.50 per barrel, and the price of "unculled," from $2.50 to $9. In 1889 the prices of mackerel, according to the same authority, were as follows:—

"No. 1," from $22 to $35 per barrel; "No. 2," from $16 to $24 per barrel; "No. 3 large," from $12 to $19 per barrel, and "unculled," from $13 to $33 per barrel. This shows conclusively that, since the repeal of the Washington Treaty, and the consequent exclusion of the United States fishermen from our fishing privileges, the United States fisheries have declined enormously, while Canadian fisheries have greatly increased, and the prices of fish are much larger now than they were before that period. Now, Sir, the hon, member for Yarmouth has said that the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces, or the fishermen of the Dominion I should rather say, have paid some $500,000 duty on the fish they sent into the United States. It may be that, in the first instance, when they delivered their fish in that market, they actually paid the duty: but, Sir, we must remember that the price of fish has very largely increased in the American market. If the inshore fisheries were open to the Americans a very much larger quantity of fish caught by the Americans themselves would go into the market, and the price would immediately come down; so that virtually, after all, it is the consumer in the United States who pays the duty, because he pays a much larger price for the article in consequence of the limited Now, Sir, I can cite an authority on that supply. subject which hon, gentlemen on the other side of the House will hardly dispute. The hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), when Minister of the Interior in the Mackenzie Administration, discussing the question of who pass the duty, gives this statement:

"It is an incontrovertible fact that the duties imposed by the American Congress upon the produce of Canada do not fall upon the people of Canada but are paid by the consumers of these articles in the United States."

And as a further proof of that, we find that Mr. Ed. Atkinson, of Boston, Chairman of the Commercial Union Committee in New York, made the following statement four years ago:—

"Last year the imports of fish into the United States were valued at two and a quarter million dollars. We taxed the fish $500,000. Who pays it? Mainly the working people of New England, who need the fish most, and who have the least wherewith to pay it. We imported last year $650,000 worth of potatoes; we taxed them $292,000. A few years ago when the crop of potatoes in New England was very short, the people paid in that year a tax on Canadian and Irish potatoes, of over $1,250,000. All these taxes on fish, potatoes, meats and other provisions which Canada provides for us, enter directly into the cost of the manufacturing and mechanical arts in the United States."

So, Sir, according to the dictum of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and also of Mr. Atkinson, the Chairman of the Commercial Union Committee of New York, we find that both these gentlemen agree that the people of the United States actually paid this $500,000 duty on the fish, and that the fishermen of Canada did not pay it. I am glad to find that the hon member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) was somewhat candid last night, when he was discussing the question, as to where the revenue was to come from; and when it had been suggested that direct taxation would be the only result of the Liberal policy, he was candid enough to say that direct taxation was not objectionable; and in that respect I believe he only reiterates the principle which has been suggested by the hon, member, the mover of this resolution, (Sir Richard Cartwright). I believe, Sir, that direct taxation is the only outcome of the reduction of these duties and of an arrangement such as is proposed by hon, gentlemen opposite with the United States, and that the sooner the people of this country know this fact the better. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), after stating that the policy of the Opposition did not lead or tend to annexation, bestowed a good deal of time and labour in explaining away the utterances of the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) at the celebrated Boston dinner party. Although none of us were there on that occasion, we have read their speeches, and there was a gentleman there who took in the situation, and who made his comment upon what passed, and the conclusion that he came to was: that the proper way for obtaining what Mr. Wiman, and what Mr. Hitt, and what Mr. Murray desired, was to make the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) Senator for Ontario. It reminds me, Sir, very much of the remarks that that hon, gentleman made himself, when he was told that his policy was not a definite one, and when he was asked what his policy was, he replied: Put me in power and on the other side of the House and then I will tell you. The answer of these gentlemen at the Boston dinner party is: If you want unrestricted reciprocity, make the hon. gentleman Senator for Ontario. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that their policy does not lead to annexation, but it is a very peculiar thing, that it is difficult to tell, who exactly is the father of this very amendment of the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) which we are now asked to consider. It is true, that the hon, gentleman from South Oxford moves that resolution in the House at this present time, but it has been foreshadowed ever since April, 1889. Why, Sir, Mr. Hitt said at that time:

"There is some logic in what Mr. Farrer says of not making two bites of a cherry, but going for annexation at once, but I think he is misled on that point in a way that often occurs. Where a man is thinking much on a point and discussing it, he is liable to narrow his horizon to those within his reach; and his own mind, and, perhaps, those he meets, having passed on by discussion to distant results, he takes it for granted that the wide world, which is so wonderfull slow, has kept up with him, and has the same results in sight. We must be very patient with the slow-moving popular mind. If the Canadian public of farmers, artizans, lumbermen, miners and fishermen—

The very people who are mentioned in this resolution——

-"can be in three years argued up to the point of voting commercial union, and giving sanction to the movement in Parliament, it will be great progress."

Well, Sir, I presume that we are going through that progress now. This is certainly the resolution which was foreshadowed by Mr. Hitt. Whether the hon, gentleman has taken his inspiration from Mr. Hitt and accordingly framed and proposed this resolution, is best known to himself; but at all events the two utterances are extremely alike. The hon, member for Yarmouth grew very eloquent over the State of Dakota. He felt almost as its representative that he was bound to stand up for it in this House, and he undertook to dispute the fact that a large body of immigrants are coming into this country from Dakota. But, Sir, does he not know that the statement about a train load of immigrants coming into this country was made by the agent of Mr. Greenway, the present Liberal Premier of Manitoba, whom I suppose he would look upon as a good authority? Yes, Sir, he could stand up for Dakota, but he had not a word to say in favour of Nova Scotia. He did not resent the insult offered to Nova Scotia and its people by the hon. member for South Oxford; but he justified that hon, gentleman's remarks, while he felt it incumbent upon him to stand up for Dakota, and contradict the well-founded statement which was made with respect to that Now, Sir, we were told by the hon. member for Yarmouth that the Conservative party had made an offer of unrestricted reciprocity to the people of the United States—that in fact we had made an offer which went further than he was prepared to go; and he cited the Hon. George Brown as But, in the researches which his an authority. curiosity led him to make I think he must have discovered that that was contradicted. He must have known that Sir Francis Hincks, Sir John A. Macdonald and other persons stated that no such thing as that had happened at all. The matter was brought up, I think, by Mr. Huntington, and Sir Francis Hincks stated:

"Hon. Sir Francis Hincks said most distinctly the hon gentleman had been totally misinformed. All communications that passed between Messrs. Thornton, Rose and Fish were of a strictly confidential character, but not because it was so desired by the Government of this country."

Sir John A. Macdonald on the same occasion said:

"He thought the hon, gentleman was carrying this matter beyond parliamentary propriety. The hon, Finance Minister had informed the House that communications were altogether of an official and confidential character, and this has been said last week, and the hon, gentleman in reiterating his statement was discourteous, though he had disavowed such an intention."

The statement made by the hon, member for Yarmouth was nothing more than a reiteration of the charges made by Mr. Huntington. If he had looked farther, he would have seen that the leaders of the Conservative party not only denied that any such offer had been made, but they were opposed to what was called a Customs union. Sir George E. Cartier said:

"He pointed to the United States, and they could not expect a Customs union without collecting an equal tariff with theirs to the exclusion of all toreign goods."

He also said:

"By committing ourselves to commercial union with the United States, the result of the hon. member's plan would be to commit us to a political union. There was somuch in the resolutions that he was forced to vote against them all, good or bad."

And the Hon. Joseph Howe, of whom the hon. gentleman spoke so highly, and who, as he has truly said, was one of the greatest statesmen Nova Scotia has ever produced, said:

"We could not enter into a zollverein with the United States without raising our duties so high above what they are now that our country would be borne down by taxation. And besides that, we would be called on to do that which would be a stain upon our legislation, namely, to give advantages to our neighbours across the line at the expense of England. I will not discuss this matter from a sentimental point of view. I pass over all reference to the old flag, to the old sentiments and associations. I put everything aside with what we have been accustomed to stir each others' hearts, and I will speak of this question only as a question of interest. I consider it evident that a zollverein could only be maintained at the cost of our connection with the British Empire."

So that, not content with only repudiating the statement made by Mr. Huntington, and repeated last night by the hon. member for Yarmouth, the leaders of the Conservative party combatted the very views that they were charged with holding, and showed that they were not in favour of commercial union. The hon, gentleman also had a great deal to say about taxation. He said that we had been deceived—that those who had proposed the National Policy in the first instance had told us that the taxation was not to be increased, whereas instead of that it was now nearly double what it had been. He gave us some figures to prove this; but the figures he gave with regard to the Mackenzie régime were not at all correct, for the reason that he took no account of deficits. He only told us what the taxation was upon the revenue collected, but he did not add what ought to have been collected. He did not increase the percentage by taking into account the deficits which were rolling up every year. Now, Sir, it is a fact that our taxation has increased about 68 cents a head since that time. In 1879 the taxation was $5.32 a head, and in 1890 it was about But what have we got for the additional 68 cents a head? Not deficits; but we have develop-Look at the railways that have ed the country. been built; look at the Canadian Pacific Railway; look at the public works, the lighthouses and breakwaters which have been constructed since that time. We have given increased subsidies to the provinces and financially aided the fisheries and other industries. Why, Sir, there is no comparison between the state of the country to-day and what it was in 1876. Does the hon, gentleman suppose for a single moment that the country should remain at a standstill? He actually complained that the expenses of the Customs and Post Office Departments had increased. Surely, Sir, he would not be opposed to the location of new post routes and new post offices. He must have expected that, with a very much larger revenue and a material development of trade, the expenses of the Customs would greatly increase. The hon. gentleman, in winding up his speech, grew eloquent on the imaginary benefits that would arise from this scheme of unrestricted reciprocity. told us, among other things, that our shipbuilding would greatly improve. Well, it is a rather singular conclusion what has become of the merchant marine of the United States. Suppose we go to the State of Maine and see what has become of the shipping of that State. It does not appear to me that uniting ourselves with a country like that would be very apt to increase our shipbuilding industry. But we have not been standing still Take the figures for Nova Scotia: by any means.

Then take our fishing industry. In 1882 there were 11,972 claims for fishing bounty, and these claims were paid to 20,932 fishermen. In 1889 there were 17,098 claims paid to 38,343 fishermen, an increase of 5,106 claims and 8,411 fishermen. During the eight years since 1882 the average number of vessels that claimed bounty was 837, representing a tonnage of nearly 32,000 tons and the average number of boats 13,493, and of fishermen 27,000. The number of men employed in the fisheries in 1879 was in vessels 8,818 men, and in boats 52,577 men, making all together 61,395 men employed in the fisheries. In 1889 the number of men employed in vessels was 9,621, and in boats 55,382, making a total of 65,003. The value of the fisheries in 1879 was $13,529,284, and in 1889 $17,655,256, showing a steady increase from 1879 to 1889. I think, therefore, it cannot be said that our fishing industry or shipbuilding industry has suffered, or that they would be very much benefited if we were associated with the people of the United States, whose fisheries and merchant marine are both going down. The hon, gentleman, following the example of many others on that side, also found it necessary to have a fling at Sir Charles Tupper with reference to the remarks which Sir Charles made at Amherst just after the elections. All I can say is that I was astonished to hear an attack of the kind coming from the hon. gentleman, and to hear him desiring to make this House believe that Sir Charles Tupper and the Government of the day only took into consideration the constituencies which supported them. Why, Sir, there is not a constituency in the Province of Nova Scotia, perhaps, which has received more benefits from the public treasury than the County of Yarmouth, although that county, as we all know, is not only essentially Liberal, but perhaps the strongest Liberal county in Nova Scotia. Only lately Only lately some $600,000 have been paid out for the Western Counties Railway, which is of great benefit to the County of Yarmouth, and to the very town where the hon, gentleman lives. We find that large subsidies have been given to the Yarmouth steamboats, and that dredges are sent to that harbour to Mr. WHITE (Shelburne).

that, at this time, applications are being made for surveys and works in that very place. Considering, Sir, all the circumstances, considering the liberal manner in which the Government have dealt with the County of Yarmouth, they afford really the very best answer to the charge made by that hon, gentleman, as well as by others in this House. I am sorry, Sir, that I have occupied so much time, and thanking you, Sir, and the House for the kind attention you have given me, I will gladly make way for the next speaker.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) My intention is not to discuss at length the whole fiscal policy of the Government, to show its strong and its weak points; to point out in what respect it has helped or retarded the development of public or individual prosperity during the last twelve years. The census, which must be finished, will enlighten us on the subject, and I fear that the waking of the confident sleepers may be painful. I will not touch the question of reciprocity either. I have already had the occasion of treating it in 1888. The arguments which I then made have now acquired a new force. I have therefore nothing to add to, nor to withdraw from, what I said then. My only object is to draw the attention of the House and of the Government to the result, the certain, inevitable, fatal, result of the measure just adopted concerning sugar. The hon. Minister of Finance thought he could secure a cheap popularity in allowing the free importation of raw sugars intended for refining, while keeping a duty of 18 cents per 100 lbs. on imported refined sugar. At last, does he say we are going to have a free breakfast-table, the so much desired free breakfast; for there is no longer any taxes on tea, on coffee nor on sugar. I need not point out the fallacy of this expression. For breakfast does not consist only of tea or coffee, sweetened with brown sugar; but also includes bread, butter, cheese, meat, potatoes and white sugar, all of which are taxed, and even heavily taxed. I understand that is one of those metaphores, one of those hollow but sonorous phrases of which the hon. Minister has the secret, and of which he sometimes makes a veritable abuse. The abolition of the duties on raw sugar is not due to a desire on the part of the Government to make the breakfast free, nor to reduce the public burden. It has its origin in the pressure exercised by the refiners, the monopoly of profits of whom were threatened by the American policy. Everybody knows that last year the American Congress abolished the duty on sugar; that this measure was followed by a drop of 2 cents per pound in the United States, and that it had become a profitable practice to snuggle sugar into Canada. In a few months the Canadian refiners had experienced a shrinkage of 25,000,000 lbs. in their Moreover the fact of sugar selling at 5 in the United States and 7 cents in Canada, was not of a nature to render the Government's policy popular. The Minister of Finance had to yield to this double pressure. He abolished the duties on sugar intended for refining purposes; but maintained them on refined sugar, with this double result: first, that the Canadian refiners have regained the monopoly of the market while losing nothing of their excessive profits; second, that the treasury has lost three millions and a half make it fit to receive the steamers subsidized, and of dollars per year, which had to be partly made up by additional taxes on whiskey, beer and tobacco. The hon. Minister of Finance stopped too soon in his imitation of the United States. The American Government by opening their market to the foreign article, by reducing the price of sugar for the general consumer, did not mean thereby to bring on the ruin of the home producer. It maintained him in his position by granting him a premium equal to the duty abolished. In short, the American Government, by the McKinley Bill, grants for the fifteen years which are to end on the 30th June, 1905, a premium of 2 cents per pound on all the home produced sugar intended for refining, be it maple, cane, beet, sorghum or any other sugar. It allows, besides, the free entrance, for two years and a-half, of all the machinery intended for the production of beet-root sugar. The Canadian Government has no such concerns for the farming When these are concerned, the protection principles have no application. They are ready enough to tax the importation of refined sugar at a rate of 80 cents per 100 lbs. in order to protect the four or five refining establishments in existence in Canada, and secure them the monopoly of the Canadian market, but they see nothing to be done for the protection of hundreds of thousands of Canadian farmers whose hopes are to be ruined by the free import of the foreign sugars. For it is very evident, and no one knows it better than the hon. Minister of Finance, that the abolition of the duty on raw sugar, without a compensation for the Canadian producer, is the ruin irretrievable and complete of all the attempts, of all the sacrifices, which have been made to establish in this country the cultivation of the sugar beet and the manufacture of beet-root sugar, which it was hoped would make up for reciprocity and partly repair the losses due to the McKinley Bill. Is it necessary to go back once more to the past. and show that before the treaty of reciprocity of 1854, our agriculture was suffering, our population was emigrating, and that the country was in distress? That under the régime of reciprocity, from 1854 to 1866, Canada enjoyed an era of prosperity without example in its annals; that agriculture specially took an extraordinary development; that wealth and population increased at an unprecedented rate? That from 1866, the date when reciprocity came to an end, until 1890, the farming interests became impoverished, the farmers got into debt, the farms were mortgaged, then abandoned: hundreds of thousands of Canadians emigrated to the United States; the prices of all the farm products having lowered, the price of land lowered all overthecountry? That in 1890, the American duties on the products on the products of the farm were almost doubled; that, as a consequence, the American market, which was already hard to reach, was practically closed to us; and that a part of the last crop has not been sold yet. That vain attempts have been made, and are still made, to find a substitute to the American market for a great part of the products of our agriculture. That of our farm products, England buys only wheat, cattle, butter and cheese, in large quantities, while the United States take almost all our horses, our hay, our eggs, our vegetables, our barley, our potatoes, our wool; that, in short, the Americans are the best, and, for many, the only buyers of the farm products of Canada. The following table, taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns for the year ended of Canada. 30th June, 1890, will superabundantly prove it :--

So that, of a list of eighteen farm products exported to the value of $13,584,397, the United States bought for $12,656,278; England for $657,917; and the rest of the world only $271,202. It is, therefore, true to say that for these eighteen articles, the American market is the only one where they can be profitably disposed of. Again, is it necessary to recall the striking results which followed the inauguration of reciprocity in 1854, and its repeal in 1866? In 1853 the total exports of farm produce to the United States from Ontario and Quebec were figured at $4,247,288. In 1866, after twelve years of reciprocity, they reached a total of $24,482,749, showing an increase under re-ciprocity of $20,235,461. The very year, 1867, which followed the repeal of the treaty of recipro-city, these exports fell to $14,871,418, showing a decrease of nearly $10,000,000 in a single year. What is more, in 1890 the export of animals and agricultural products to the United States, for the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, were only $11,-966,432, or nearly twelve and a-half millions less than in 1866; and that after twelve years of the national policy and an expenditure of a hundred and fifty millions for the construction of railways and canals. The future is still darker. For let us not forget that the figures which I have just quoted are previous to the operation of the McKinley Bill. The last report of the Customs Department only goes to 30th June, 1890, and the McKinley Bill One needs came into operation in October, 1890. to be no prophet to foresee that the year 1891 will show results still more disastrous, and that these will still be outdone by those of the fiscal year 1891, which shall have been passed in entirety under the McKinley regime. The falling off in the sale of our agricultural produce will be figured by millions. These facts are known by all of the Government as well as by the Opposition. And it is because they clearly foresaw the future, that the Ministers went before the people with the platform of reciprocity for agricultural products, a year before the date fixed by law, in spite of the pledge given this hon-ourable House. They did not want to wait until the results of the McKinley Bill should have time to be felt. For several years already the most clear-sighted and the most patriotic men have seen the necessity of a change in our agricultural production, if reciprocity with the United States must be longer refused to us. Knowing that the cultivation of the sugar beet and the manufacture of beet-root sugar, at first established at the cost of the greatest public sacrifices, has become one of the best sources of wealth of France, Germany, Belgium and Russia, their attention naturally turned in the direction of that industry. Specialists invited to visit the Province of Quebec found its soil and climate favourable. They found that the sugar heet yielded well, that its quality was excellent, and its sugar yield satisfactory. On the strength of such information, the Quebec Legislature voted, in 1874, a subsidy of $5,000 per annum for five years to any one who would establish a beet-root sugar manufacture in the province. The next year this grant was increased to $7,000 per year for ten years. This liberal offer decided several French and Canadian capitalists to try the undertaking. Three companies were formed and erected important manufactures at Berthier, West Farnham and Coaticooke. a million and a half of dollars were spent in the building and plant of these three manufactures, the estalishment of which was greeted with enthusiasm by the whole population. The farmers turned to the raising of the sugar beet with Unfortunately, the administrasuccess. tion of these establishments fell into either incompetent or dishonest hands. The sugar beet was either spoiled, or unpaid for; the farmers ceased contracting with people in whom they had lost confidence, and, naturally, the factories had to suspend their operations. However, the attempt made was not altogether lost. The trial had proved that our soil and climate are favourable to the raising of the sugar beet, that its yield is abundant, that it is of good quality and of a satisfactory richness. After having fully satisfied themselves with these facts, a new group of French capitalists undertook, in 1890, to resume the suspended operations. The Farnham factory was rented, the cultivation of the sugar beet encouraged, and the cultural and industrial results were so satisfactory that the syndicate took measures to continue their operations in 1891. These facts were brought to the knowledge of the hon. Minister of Finance in June last, by Mr. Alfred Musy, manager of the Farnham factory, in a memorial, of which the House will allow me to read the following extract :-

"Fortunately, our group of French capitalists, who had caused all the questions relating to this industry in Canada to be thoroughly studied during two years, did not hesitate to take up the Farnham sugar factory in 189), and to work it in October with the sugar beet obtained with difficulty and at a high price from the farmers, and those which they raised themselves on more than 200 acres under cultivation."

The year 1890-91 closed, not by a financial success impossible to be obtained under the conditions at hand, but by an undeniable cultural and industrial success, notwithstanding the exceptionally bad weather of the spring of 1890, and the deteriorated state in which the Farnham factory was found on resuming its operation. Feeling sure that the Federal Government would at the proper time take steps to secure for this industry the protection which it deserves, the French capitalists immediately decided to run a new season which is now promising well. After the trial of 1890, the French authorities on this matter:

capitalists had arrived at this conclusion: That the beet-root sugar industry would undoubtedly succeed, if the quantity of sugar beets brought to the factory was sufficient to run it. It was now but a question of inducing the farmers to extend their operation. The matter was therefore taken before the Committee on Agriculture of the Legislature of Quebec, which after a thorough investigation, recommended a grant of 50 cents per ton on sugar beets brought to the factory. This recommendation was adopted unanimously by both sides of the House without distinction of parties, with the proviso that the factories should not pay less than $4.50 to the farmers for their sugar beets, the minimum price of which was thereby fixed at $5 a ton. Now, as the mean yield is fifteen tons an acre, this would give a result of $75 per acre, which is certainly better than can be realized from grain or hay. Moreover, the House ordered a special commission to Europe to study the best means of cultivation, in view of teaching our farmers and permitting them to get from their land the greatest possible yield. This judicious policy was already beginning to bear its fruit. The cultivation had considerably increased last spring and excellent results were expected, when the resolution offered by the hon. Minister of Finance came to render useless all the sacrifices of the past and destroy all the hopes of the future. For there is not a sensible man who will contend that beet-root sugar may be produced, especially at the outset, at a rate of 21/2 cents a pound, which is the price at which the raw sugar from the West Indies, the United States, or Cuba, is delivered in Montreal. And yet, Mr. Speaker, it is on the growing of the sugar beet and on its sale to the factories that the farmers had a right to depend to meet the disasters of the McKinley Bill, replacing by the national market the American market which the policy of the Government closed for them. Canada imports annually 225,000,000lbs. of raw sugar for refining. It means, in round figures, $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 which go abroad for an article which could as well be supplied by our agriculture. Why do the Government, who pride themselves on their so-called National Policy, who claim to keep the Canadian market for the Canadian producer, content themselves to work the fortune of the manufacturers, and deprive agriculture of all advantages and protection? The farmers are taxed for all they consume. Their natural market is closed for them, and when they make an effort and find a way to their former prosperity, the Government wrest away from them this their last Why two weights and two measures? Is the farming community only good to be ground down? Is it not the most numerous and the most important of our population? Is it not the basis of our society—the most solid stratum of the nation? Should the raising of the sugar beet become established in this country, not only would it create a new industry, make up for the American market which we are losing, give a natural outlet, permanent and advantageous for our agriculture, but it would powerfully contribute to the improvement of the soil and of the cattle, and to the development of the production of all the cereals. Such is the experience of the European countries which have tried it. I may be allowed to quote with regard to this from the words of Mr. Déhérain, one of the

"There exists in the north of France a certain number of counties which have attained the maximum of agricultural production. When the season is favourable, localities are found in the Nord, in Pas-de-Calais, in Aisne (of 514 beet-root sugar factories which France possessed at that time, 354 were in these three departments), which yielded to the hectare 40 hectolitres of wheat (37 bushels per acre), 60,000 kilogrammes (22 tons to the acre) of sugar beet, 350 to 400 hectolitres (325 to 370 bushels to the acre) of potatoes, and we do not think much more could be done. What it this admirable prosperity to be attributed to? In certain localities, to the use of the Flemish fertilizer, which the farmers of the Nord have been utilizing for hundreds of years; in others, where this fertilizer is not used, to the cultivation of the sugar beet. It has been repeated in all manners, it will never be repeated enough, repeated in all manners, it will never be repeated enough, the cultivation of the beet is that which has the most contributed to the agricultural progress accomplished."

Mr. Max Leconte, a deputy to the Legislative Assembly for the Nord, the richest department of France, in industry and agriculture, uses language quite as strong. Taking for a basis the present figure of the importation of raw sugar in Canada, and supposing that our agriculture should supply our refining establishments with the same amount of raw material, Mr. Télesphore Bean, a distinguished agriculturist and manufacturer of the town of Berthier, spoke as follows last year before the Committee on Agriculture of the Quebec House:—

"In order to supply the present consumption of the country, it would take 60 factories of the importance of those of Berthier and Farnham; their consumption would be every year 1,125,000 tons of sugar beets, which would represent the mean crop of 94,000 acres of land; they would from the beginning of October to the end of March, give employment to at least 8,000 people, and they would burn about 350,000 tons of coal. In other terms, they would pay the farmers over five millions of dollars; for labour, and at the season when work is the scarcest, nearly a million and a half; to the coal mines, about one million. They would every year cause the opening of nearly 100,000 acres of land, and would furnish to agriculture, at a nominal price, a volume of pulp representing the fattening feed of 90,000 heads of cattle, and the production of more than 60,000,000 lbs. of meat."

Would not this result be marvellous, and would it not be worth some sacrifice? For it is evident that Canada cannot escape the common law to which all the other countries have submitted. A new industry such as that of the beet-root sugar cannot from the outset be implanted without it be given help proportionate to its importance, especially when the same industry outside of the country enjoys natural or legislative advantages such as are pos-sessed by our rivals. The cultivation of the sugar beet is still in its infancy; our soil is not prepared, our farmers have not the experience, labour is much dearer, and it will be several years before we can reach the degree of perfection which will allow us to meet foreign competition on an equal footing: Before our farmers will turn to it generally, years of success will be necessary and the assurance of a lasting policy. What must then be done to secure such a desirable result? Just what I said before, that is, to follow to its limit the policy of the American Government, which the hon. Minister of Finance has only copied It is as the consequence of the United States abolishing the duties on raw sugar, that the Minister of Finance decided to abolish them also But, in taking such a step, the American Government did not mean, on its part, to make the position of the American producer worse; it did not leave them defenceless to face the free competition from abroad; it gave them a com-pensation equal to the import luties which it abolished, in granting a premium of 2 cents per pound for all sugar of home production, and that, not only for one year, but for a period of fifteen years. Moreover, it allowed for two years and a-half the fre importation of machinery for the manufacture of beet-root sugar. Here are the words of the American law:

"That on and after 1st July, 1891, and until 1st July. 1905, there shall be paid to the producer of sugar testing not less than 90 degrees by the polariscope, from beets, sorghum, or sugar cane grown within the United States, or from maple sap produced within the United States a bounty of 2 cents per pound: and upon such sugar testing less than 90 degrees by the polariscope and not less than 80 degrees a bounty of one and three-fourths cents per pound.

pound. "Provided, further, that all machinery purchased abroad and erected in a beet sugar factory and used in the production of raw sugar in the United States from beets produced therein shall be admitted duty free until 1st July, above described machinery purchased abroad and imported into the United States for the uses above indicated since 1st January, 1890, shall be refunded."

Such is the position of the American producer. Can we hope to be able to compete with him without being put on the same footing as he is? If it wants to be in acmere idea of it is absurd. cordance with its principles, the Government should not fall behind. But, perhaps, it means to prevent forever the creation in Canada of an industry which would ensure the independence of the country as to one of the principal articles of its consumption, and would at the same time give to our agriculture the prosperity which it is so sadly in need of. The hon. Minister of Finance will no doubt have two objections to offer. first, the danger of introducing in our economical system the principle of premiums which may extend very far. The second, the considerable expenditure which such a policy would entail. The first objection could not be serious. The principle of premiums is already in existence; it has been introduced by the present Government. not a sum of $150,000 annually been given as premiums to fishermen, and this for several years? Is not the Minister of Fisheries proposing to raise the amount to $160,000 per Does not the Government grant to the producers of Canadian iron a premium of $2 a ton on the iron manufactured from Canadian If in both cases this is in the interest of a great industry, of which it is important to ensure the development and prosperity, with how much more force does not that reason apply to the pro-The second objection duction of beet-root sugar? is not serious either, and cannot become so for many In 1890 about 6,000 tons of beets were In 1891 the quantity will delivered to factories. scarcely reach 10,000 tons. The beet yields about 10 per cent. of sugar. The production will not exceed 2,000,000 lbs. This would mean, at the rate of 2 cents a pound, a total premium of $40,000. It is not such a sum that can embarrass a budget of $36,000,000. No doubt the sum would gradually increase according as the industry would develop; but it would take several years of prosperity, and the establishment of absolute confidence in the future, before other capitalists would put up other factories. But even were the treasury to be somewhat burdened, is it not, after all, the farmers who pay the bulk of the taxes, and is it not fair that the Government should hand

Minister of Finance and the Government cannot hesitate nor stop in the course in which they Speaker, I say that in the absence of reciprocity with the United States our agriculture pines away for the lack of an advantageous market for the surplus of its products; that, as a consequence, land diminishes in value, the people emigrate, our rural districts become depopulated, and it is urgent to find a remedy for this alarming state of things. That the farming methods are to be changed, since grain and hay will no longer sufficiently remunerate the farmer for his labour. That the cultivation of the sugar beet, and the manufacture of beet-root sugar, would partly make up for reciprocity, would create a permanent and profitable market for our farmers. That in presence of the difficulty of creating such a vast industry, a diffi-culty made still greater by the legislation of the countries which are competing with our agriculture, it is the duty of the Government to take measures and put our producers on a footing of equality with their competitors. That to this effect it is essential to give our sugar producers a compensation equal to that granted to the American producers, namely, 2 cents per pound on sugars manufactured from maple, sorghum or beet root. That this premium should be granted for a number of years, so as to permit cultivation, and to the manufacturer of sugar to establish themselves on solid basis, to develop themselves, and hold out against foreign competition. That the agricultural interest, which bears the heaviest burdens, which is taxed for all that it consumes, has a right to her share of the millions which it yearly pours into the public treasury. And I will add that the Government cannot refuse it this justice and remain consistent with the principles which they make a show of, as well as with their conduct towards all the other interests. The hon. Minister of Finance cannot at once be flesh and fish; he cannot be flesh to the sugar manufacturers, whom he protects to the extent of 80 cents per 100 lbs., and to the coiton, print and woollen manufacturers, to whom he gives an extravagant protection, and be fish to the agriculturist, whom he leaves at the mercy of a foreign competitor, who is not only free from taxes, but also helped by Government premiums. The Government must put our farmers in a position to hold out against the competition of the American farmers if they want to be a protective Government in fact as in name, unless they want to make a show of their contempt and scorn for the agricultural classes.

Mr. SPROULE. In continuing the debate on this question, I trust I may be pardoned if I refer for a short time to some of the arguments advanced by those hon, gentlemen who have spoken on the question. In starting, I must congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance upon the plain, practical statement he was enabled to make to this House and the country regarding its financial affairs in the past and the hopeful outlook for the future. It must be admitted, whatever may be said of the the people were raising more at home than was Mr. BEAUSOLEIL.

In concluding, Mr. time has verified the accuracy of his judgment and he is entitled to the congratulations of this House When the National Policy was and the country. introduced in 1878, what were the objections taken to it? The first was, I think, by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who said it would not be successful in raising the revenue required. I need hardly tell the House that previous to that time the exertions of the Finance Minister, under the late Liberal régime, had been directed towards raising sufficient revenue to carry on the affairs of the country, and year after year he was obliged to come back to the House and admit that his efforts had been unavailing. Year after year he was compelled to make changes in the tariff in order to raise more money, and each change was invariably found unsuccessful in accomplishing its object. The old tariff was raised from 15 to 17½ per cent., and the then Finance Minister told the House that this increase would give ample revenue for all requirements. But after a year's experience, it was found there was still a large deficie to be provided for. At last, in 1878, he was obliged to tell the House that he was afraid another addition to the tariff of the country would not be successful in raising revenue, that the failure in the revenue was due to the hard times which prevailed, not only in this but in every other country, and we would be obliged to wait until good times would come around to have an increase of revenue. It was then that the leader of the Opposition in those days, who afterwards so ably directed this Government, announced to the country that if he were entrusted with the administration of its affairs, he could by a readjustment of the tariff, not only raise sufficient revenue, but also incidentally protect the waning manufacturers of this country and bring about a prosperous condition of things. It is for us to ascertain whether that has been effected or At that time it was announced, by the hon. member for South Oxford, that the National Policy, if introduced, must prove a failure in raising revenue; but when we went back to the country in 1882 that hon, gentleman was obliged to admit that the National Policy had been successful in that respect, for it not only had raised the revenue, but it did more—it protected the interests of our people and gave them home markets. It was also said that, if the National Policy was introduced, it would not raise a revenue, but I need not turn to the Trade and Navigation Reports to show that it did raise ample revenue for the wants of the country. But it was said that it would not keep the markets of Canada for the Canadian people. Now, I have here a statement showing the returns for several years of the importations of foreign goods needed for home consumption, and I take the ten years before the introduction of the National Policy and the ten years after its introduction, and what do I find? I find that, in the ten years previous to the introduction of the National Policy, there had been imported into Canada for home consumption, though required to supply the wants of their own people, of wheat and flour no less than $78,261,616 worth. All other breadstuffs in that ten years amounted to something over $40,000,000. We had the National Policy in force in the following ten years, and I will give the figures in order to show that the National Policy kept the Canadian market for the Canadian farmer. The wheat and flour entered for home consumption, which amounted in the preceding ten years to $78,000,000, amounted in the following ten years to only $12,000,000, or a saving in favour of the home market of $66,000,000. Will any hon, gentleman state that the National Policy was not instrumental in keeping the Canadian market for the Canadian farmer? Why are we told to-day that it has not enhanced the price of the products of the Canadian farmers? I need give no better argument to the House, or to the country, or to the Canadian farmer, to whom I am more directly addressing myself, than the fact that we saved that large market of $66,000,000 worth of wheat and flour and $21,000,000 worth of other breadstuffs under the National Policy. No doubt, an ample revenue was derived under the National Policy to pay the needs of the country, to continue the public works, while at the same time it saved the home market for the Canadian farmers. has accomplished that, why should it be said that it has been a failure, or why do we want any other change in our fiscal policy, as hon, gentlemen say we do?

Mr. MacDONALD (Huron). You, yourself, say you do. How are you going to Washington in a month or two if you do not want a change?

Mr. SPROULE. I will not talk about Washington at present. I will give the hon, gentleman later some of his own literature in regard to the matter. It is said that we want to have unrestricted reciprocity. I would like to say a few words as to the changes which have been made in the resolutions which have been introduced from time to time by hon, gentlemen opposite. In 1879, in 1882, and up to 1885, we were told that the National Policy was a failure and that it resulted in increasing the prices of everything that the Canadian consumer used. I want to draw a close distinction between that and the arguments which are used to-day, because there is a change which has come over the spirit of the dream of hon. gentlemen opposite. We were told that the National Policy had caused an increase in the price of factory cotton, denims, tea, sugar and coffee, the price of which they said was increased by the amount of the duty. We are able to draw a comparison between the prices of those articles in the past and in the present, and it is plain that a substantial reduction has been taking place in the commodities and the necessaries of life, which became so apparent that hon, gentlemen opposite who made that contention at first gave it up. What was the device which they adopted in order to convince the Canadian farmer that we wanted unrestricted reciprocity? We were not told that we required unrestricted reciprocity until 1886, when, for the first time, the member for Prince Edward County introduced a resolution in favour of commercial union, and he gave as a reason that we had not the market we should have for the various products of our country. At that time the hon. across the line, which is the very best market for member and his friends could not say that the us—that is the reason that is given. Now, to National Policy was a failure, because it was clearly a success, and so clearly that the then leader of the Opposition had to state that we were committed to a system of protection to native industries, but that what we wanted was a broader and more comprehensive market, and therefore we required commercial union with the United States in 1887. This was reiterated, but in 1888 it was changed to unrestricted reciprocity, because it was found that commercial union was the same as the commercial zollverein which was proposed by Horace Greeley many years before, but which was found, after discussion, to be unsuited to the two countries. So it was found that the cry of commercial union was unpopular, and therefore that was changed, and they said that we did not want commercial union but that we wanted unrestricted reciprocity. That was the suggestion of Mr. Wiman, Mr. Hitt and the other friends of the hon. gentlemen in this House, and it was after consultation with those gentlemen that they found out that they wanted unrestricted reciprocity. That was the ground upon which, to a large extent, the election was fought out in 1887; but the people said they did not want unrestricted reciprocity, and the Conservative party were returned again to power. In 1879 it was said by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and his friends that the people were misled and deluded. The same statement was made in 1882, and again in 1887 we were told that the people were in darkness and ignorance, and we find that the same statement is made to-day by the hon, member for South Oxford. It is not very complimentary to the ability of these hon, gentlemen who have been trying to educate the people to the great changes in the fiscal policy which they say are required in the interests of the people that, if they have been so intelligent as they believe and as they profess to be, if they are as able teachers as they suppose they are, they should have left the people in the darkness and ignorance which the hon member for South Oxford speaks We are now told that we require a change. Are we told that we want commercial union? No; but unrestricted reciprocity. If the duties were taken off, those hon, gentlemen leave out of sight the fact that we must raise a revenue, that we are living as neighbours with a people twelve times as numerous as we are, a people more wealthy than we are, and who have had the benefit of a protective tariff for many years to enable them to build up a trade. Yet they want us to take down the barriers and let our goods go there free and allow the American goods to come in here free in return. Do they tell the people what the results of competition in that case will be? They forget to tell the people that it is important to raise a revenue, that we must raise a revenue, and that is the easiest way to raise a revenue that has ever yet been devised; they forget to tell the people that if that scheme was adopted we would not have control of the raising of our own revenue, and we would practically be put in subordination to the 60,000,000 of people whose markets we are so anxious to get into. Weare told the Government are endeavouring to find a market in various parts of the world, that they have failed to get a market in other countries, and therefore they are trying to get the market across the line, which is the very best market for substantiate that, they say: We want continental free trade, or we want unrestricted reciprocity. The hon, member for South Oxford and the hon. member for North Norfolk, before the last election, said: We have nailed our colours to the mast, and we stand or fall by unrestricted reciprocity. Well, I need not tell the hon, gentleman and the country that they went to the country with those colours nailed to the mast, and they fell, not like men, with faces to the foe, but like many others, with their backs to the foe; and they come back here, if not with a reduced number, at least in a sufficient minority to keep them in the cold shades of Opposition for the next five years, I believe. Now, then, to-day what do they say with regard to that? The hon, member for South Oxford comes back and tells us that the people have been misled, that they are in ignorance, and for fear I should be accused of using words that he did not utter, I will use his own words. Speaking of the Minister of Finance, who has given a financial statement that ought to be a credit to him and a credit to his party and the country, he says:

"Hon, gentlemen on the Government side of the House are in ignorance of the condition of the people of this country; and I tell them that they do not know our actual condition of things in Canada."

He says one out of every three Canadians born in the country have been obliged to leave Canada on account of hard times; that we have very hard times in every part of this country. But did he try to prove it? Did he prove it by showing that the banking institutions of our country were doing less business than they did a few years ago? Did he prove it by showing that the people were in a worse condition? I have here a return giving the bank stocks in February, 1878, and in February, 1891, and what do they show? Do they show that the country is poorer because the bank stocks are less valuable? I will read the table:

Bank Stocks.	1888.	1891.
Bank of Montreal	160	225
Bank of Commerce	116	128
Merchants Bank	. 66	142
Bank of British North America	106	156
Bank of Toronto	. 140	218
The Molson's Bank	. 100	160
Imperial Bank	. 102	152
Dominion Bank	. 121	233
Bank of Hamilton	. 100	153
Ontario Bank	94	114

I need not go over all the banks, as I have given enough to indicate that the stocks have all gone up largely, and I say that in the case of every single bank substantial progress has taken place from the previous date up to the present time. Then, again, I find that the circulation of the banks in 1877 was $21,000,000, which was a sufficient sum to carry on the commerce of the country at that time, but in 1890 it required $35,000,000. 1877 the public deposits in the banks were $63,-966,000; to day they are $134,000,000. Does that bespeak the abject poverty of the country? If I know anything about the condition of this country these figures bespeak employment and remunerative labour. Now, I have given you these figures as an evidence that the country is not so much impoverished as these gentlemen say, because money is much more plentiful, and it requires money to carry on the commerce of the country. In 1877 the discounts amounted to $125,000,000; to day horses, irrespective of who pays that duty, instead they amount to $188,000,000. Now, then, I say of being $546,000 was only $336,000, or $230,000 Mr. Sproule.

the evidence goes to show that the hon. member for South Oxford, instead of attributing ignorance to the Finance Minister in not understanding the condition of the country, was himself in ignorance of the condition of the country. I hold the bank statistics are a good test of the wealth of the country. If the hon, gentleman does understand it, he has been ingenious enough to hide his knowledge from the people of this country. Now, in every one of these lines there is a substantial improvement. Then, it was said that the people of the country want unrestricted reciprocity because everything that the consumer uses is dearer. Now, I need not go over that argument. I have before me a list of goods in almost every line that represents the necessities of life, and I find, as I said before, that they are very much cheaper than they were in In 1886 another change took place, and they propounded a new policy to the House. What was that policy? From 1879 to 1886 they held that everything that the consumer used was made dearer by the duty that was placed upon it, or, in other words, that the consumer paid the It was found, however, that such was not the case. We showed in several instances that it was not the case, and some hon. gentlemen here have given us the very best proof that it is not the case. We said that the National Policy would not increase the price to the farmers in those lines; the Opposition held that it would, and that the farmers had to pay more. We said that foreigners wishing to sell their goods in the Canadian market will very often make their invoices of prices lower to the Canadians than they would to the people of their own country, and in that way the difference on the reduced article was more than the tariff that was put on. Now, then, the hon. gentleman wished to show that we wanted unrestricted reciprocity, and to prove that the member for North Norfolk propounded the theory that it is not the consumer who pays the duty but the producer who pays it; therefore, he says that the Canadian farmer pays the duty upon every dollar's worth of his goods that goes to a foreign market. That is not so. He does not say that it makes any difference whether the Canadian farmer sends it there, or whether the foreigner comes to Canada and buys it, but he says it is made dearer by reason of the duty, and that the Canadian larmer pays the duty. Now, this is the very reverse of the logic and of the reasoning that was adopted up to that time. And why is it adopted? It is adopted for the purpose of making the Canadian farmer believe that he réquires a market where there is no tariff barrier, so that it will give him a larger return for his labour; therefore, he is told that he pays the duty upon every one of those lines. Now, the hon, member for South Oxford says that we have here in Canada somewhere about a million horses. He says that last year we sent 17,000 horses into the United States, upon which the Canadian farmers paid $546,000 to get those horses If the hon. geninto the American market. tlemen was correct in his reasoning and figures, there might be some force in the argument. To satisfy myself, I took the Trade and Navigation Returns of the United States, and I found that all the duty collected upon Canadian less than the amount given by the hon. member for South Oxford. Now, the hon. member for South Oxford is perhaps quite as near right on this point as he generally is when he deals with this question; he jumps at it in a haphazard way, not by fair reasoning nor by correct figures, but according to the feeling that dominates him at the time. He goes on further to say:

"We have one million horses in Canada to-day, and every one of those horses would be increased in value by at least $30 if we had unrestricted reciprocity."

The hon, gentleman forgets that about one-third of all these horses are not over a year old, and that horses under a year old can generally be bought in Canada for from $30 to $50; but he argues as if all these horses were of full age and that the Canadian farmer had a market for every one of them in the United States. How does the hon, gentleman arrive at that conclusion? It is argued from the other side of the House that if we were sending horses to the United States and had a good market for them there, and if the duties were swept away, there would be an advance in price of $30 for each horse. Do we find that this is the case when horses are purchased in this country for the American market? No. Does the breeder realize the price obtained for his horses in Rochester or Buffalo or other American cities, less the amount of duty? No. The American buyer purchases them for the lowest amount possible in the locality he buys, and takes his chances of disposing of them in a good market, he Here is where the important paying the duty. difference between hon, gentlemen on this side of the House and hon, gentlemen opposite comes in. If a buyer comes here he purchases horses, if he buys at all, at the price obtainable in the home market, irrespective of what they will sell for abroad. A very good example of this is seen in the case of potatoes. The hon, member for the case of potatoes. The hon. m Wellington (Mr. McMullen) spoke point, and said we lost 25 cents per bushel for lack of reciprocity with the United States. January last there were in our village buying potatoes a buyer from Buffalo, one from Cleveland and one from Brooklyn. They were paying from 35 to 40 cents per bag, while the price in Brooklyn was $1.12 per bushel. According to hon, gentlemen opposite, the Canadian farmer should have obtained the Brooklyn price, less the 25 cents per bushel. Did the Canadian farmer get that price? No. The dealer paid 45 cents per bag, which is equal to 30 cents per bushel, and they retained the difference between 30 cents per bushel and $1.12 per bushel, the price at which they were sold in Brooklyn. If we had unrestricted reciprocity we would not obtain the highest price of the American markets, nor do we get it to day less the duty. And it is the same with respect to barley and grains. When an American buyer comes here he pays the market price ruling in the locality and he takes his purchase to the best market on the other side. stated that potatoes were selling at $1.12 in Brooklyn while they were selling in our village at about 30 cents; but competition commenced between American and Canadian buyers, and the prices ran up as high a $1.05 per bag. One farmer sold 500 bags at the rate of $1.05 per bag, and these were taken to the United States and sold afterwards at a profit in Cleveland. What better evidence is required now be equally willing to negotiate treaties, not that, even if we had unrestricted reciprocity, our only with the United States, but with other farmers would obtain not the highest price of the American market, but the market price in the district. We are told that the Conservative party does not want reciprocity and is not in earnest in this regard. I ask hon gentlemen opposite, who negotiated all the reciprocity treaties that have ever been in existence between the United States and Canada? During the last election we heard people declare that the electorate were being misled, that the Government would not obtain reciprocity, and would not even make an effort to get it. I would again ask the House and the country, who negotiated the reciprocity treaties between Canada and the United States? The first that I will refer to is that made in 1850 by Sir Francis Hincks, who was then associated with Sir John A. Macdonald and the Conservative party. That treaty went into effect in 1854. It was the first treaty negotiated, and it was negotiated by the Conservative party. We had that treaty in existence from 1854 to 1866. Notice to abrogate it was given in 1865, and an effort was made by the Conservative party to obtain its renewal, but the attempt failed. We had next the Customs Act of 1868, which made an offer to allow certain products of the United States to come in free when a similar concession would be extended to Canada. This proposition was not accepted. In 1869 Sir John Rose, with Sir Edward Thornton, British Minister at Washington, endeavoured to negotiate a treaty at Washington, but the attempt proved a failure. In 1871, when the Washington treaty was negotiated, an attempt was made not only to settle the difficulties covered by that treaty, but to obtain a renewal of the commercial treaty. This proposition was refused, and again the attempt was made by the Conservative party. The first and only attempt made to obtain a reciprocity treaty by hon, gentlemen opposite was in 1874. The Hon, George Brown with Sir Edward Thornton, the British Minister at Washington, attempted to negotiate a treaty, and although this Parliament carried out their part of the bargain the treaty was not ratified by the United States. In 1879 an offer was made in the provisions of the Customs Act for a basis on which to negotiate a treaty with the United States, but although it remained in the Customs Act from that year up to last year no effort was made by the Americans to meet us half way and negotiate a treaty. In 1887 Sir Charles Tupper attempted for the last time to negotiate a treaty to settle all disputes respecting the fisheries question on the line of extended trade relations between the two countries, but it was a failure. So, every one of those efforts, from 1850 to 1890, and they were numerous, have been made by the Conservative party, with one exception; and the only treaties ever successfully negotiated were negotiated by the Conservative party. Are hon, gentlemen opposite justified in saying that the Conservative party is not sincere, or that its members do not want a reciprocity treaty or trade relations with the United States, provided we could get it on fair terms; moreover, that we were not honest, and misled the people when we advocated reciprocity with the United States? We cannot have better evidence than I have given that the Conservative party alone have negotiated reciprocity treaties; and the people have a right to assume that we will countries on equitable terms. We were told at the late election that the question was fought out fairly and on the lines of the tariff. I have here a pamphlet that hon, gentlemen opposite used at the last elections, and it tells a different tale. rather amusing to see the line of argument hon. gentlemen opposite adopted when they went to the people on the last occasion. What were the instructions given by the leaders of the party to their friends? We are told in those instructions that the Government were seeking to secure victory by an unfair Franchise Act, by gerrymandering, by misleading the people, by deceiving them, by using voters' lists that were in favour of the Conservative party; but when speaking to their friends respecting dissolution, they said it was not objectionable on party grounds, as the voters' list had been attended to by their friends, and was, therefore, more favourable to them than it was for the Con-Are we told that to-day? told now that they had not a fair chance when they went to the people of the country? They say one thing in this House, and another thing in the They tell us here that they were handicountry. capped in the election because they had not a fair voters' list, and they tell in another place that they had the best chance in the election, because their friends had attended to the voters' lists and the Conservative had not. Then they go on further in this document, and they say: Point out to the

"That the practical effect of the dissolution of Parliament has been to disfranchise 116,000 young men between ment has been to disfranchise 116,000 young men between twenty-one and twenty-three years of age, computed on the basis of the census of 1871 and 1881, or about one-eighth of the voting population of Canada, and that of this number there are 55,000 in the Province of Ontario, nearly two-thirds of whom are farmers' sons: although the professed reason for dissolving Parliament is one in which the young men of the country, and farmers' sons in particular, are most deeply interested. Point out how this accords with the statement in Sir John Macdonald's address to the electors of Canada, that the destinies of the future rest with the young hope of the country."

Then they go on to say:

"Tell the people that, above all things else, dissolution was decided upon in order to delude the rural population with a sham offer of reciprocity; that the Government in making this offer have been warned beforehand by the most distinguithed leaders of the Republican and Democratic parties in the United States; and that neither the Government or the Congress of that country will listen to anything short of absolute and unrestricted reciprocity." After these manifest false statements they go on to "Take up the language of Lord Stanley's despatch to show how utterly useless it is to attempt to extract any clear idea of the policy of the Government from its terms, and to intimate that the only construction to be put upon this document is that Sir John Macdonald desires to secure, the money of the manufacturers first and betray them or the farmers of Canada afterwards, as may suit his purpose. Compare the Governor General's despatch with the address of Sir John Macdonald to the Canadian electors, and direct attention to the fact that the address does not contain a word of reference to a joint commission does not contain a word of reference to a joint commission or reciprocity negotiations."

Tell the people:

"That the intention of the Government was fraudulent, their manifest object being to appeal to the people on a false issue, and to prevent the wide divergence of opinion between the members of the Cabinet becoming known. That is the reason they assign for the dissolution. Then they refer to what they call the prevarications of the Government. They say:

ation, as evidenced by the contemptuous manner in which they are alluded to in Mr. Blaine's letter quoted above, and that Canada can have unrestricted reciprocity or none at all. Point out, also, the exceeding impolicy of the Government towards the United States if they desired to secure reciprocity."

As to the trade policy of the Liberal party, they say :

"Impress upon your audiences in the strongest manner to get unrestricted reciprothat the Liberal party mean to get unrestricted reciprocity, and can get it, and that they have received positive assurances from the most distinguished men of both parties that the Government and Congress of the United States are abundantly willing to treat with Canada on the terms which the Liberal party has indicated by its motions in Parliament."

They say here that the Canadian people should be told that the Reform party are sure to get reciprocity, and that they have been assured of this by the most prominent men representing both political parties in the United States. Is not this the best evidence we can possibly have to show that they were carrying on secret negotiations in the United States through their friend, Wiman, and Farrer, and Hitt, and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who went down picnicing there? Is their own statement not the best evidence in the world that they had secret negotiations going on with the United States? They told the people that they meant to get unrestricted reciprocity, that they would get it if they were returned to power, and that they were assured of this by the ablest men of both parties in the United States. Is that not good evidence, I ask, that there were secret negotiations going on by the party opposite, represented by the gentlemen who went to Washington, and that the object of these negotiations was to hand over Canada to foreigners? Are we not justified in saying that there are indications of disloyalty in the ranks of the party opposite when we find them secretly negotiating with foreigners to destroy the industries of our country, to subordinate our country to the Americans, and virtually to put us in bondage to a foreign

After Recess.

Mr. SPROULE. When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the allegations of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the people had been deceived by the Conservative party in their appeal to the country; not only in the last election, but in previous elections since 1878, that they had placed before the people of the country unfair election cries, that they had made misrepresentations, that they were dishonest in what they undertook to carry out, and therefore the people were deluded. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in endeavouring to prove this, adopted certain arguments that were not in keeping with the pamphlet that they issued to their own supporters in the country, who were expected to go on the platform throughout the country and educate the people. In the first place, they told the people: "We are handicapped in this contest on account of the defective voters' lists;" but they told their own friends privately. "You can look with confidence on the situation; we are not afraid of dissolution now, because we have an advantage in the voters' lists, "Point out that the proposals of the Canadian Government will be looked upon in the United States as mere impudent prevarications, unworthy of serious considerdifferent story from what they told here. The next thing they do is to tell the people wherein the Conservative party were endeavouring to mislead the people:

"An appeal on a false issue. That the intention of the Government was fraudulent, their manifest object being to appeal to the people on a false issue, and to prevent the wide divergence of opinion between the members of the Cabinet becoming known."

And to prove that, what do they give? A portion of the speech made by the Hon. Mr. Colby when he said in this House a few years ago that, in his opinion, it would not be in the interest of the Canadian farmer to have unrestricted reciprocity, because the products of the American farm coming into competition with his would be injurious to That is the ground they give for that state-They go still further, and point out how the Conservative party are not in accord with themselves; that the offer of reciprocity is a sham offer; that it is not an honest one; that it is never intended and is never expected. Then they go further, and say:

"Impress upon your audiences in the strongest manner that the Liberal party mean to get unrestricted reciprocity, and can get it, and that they have received positive assurances from the most distinguished men of both parties that the Government and Congress of the United States are abundantly willing to treat with Canada on the terms which the Liberal party has indicated by its motions in Parliament."

And yet, when we mention about disloyalty on that side of the House or about intriguing with prominent men to sell Canada to a foreign country we are told that it is not found in the Liberal party; we are told that they have no alliance with men on the other side; that Erastus Wiman is running on his own line, and is not responsible to the Liberal party here; that Farrer, in telling prominent men in the United States how they can best coerce Canada, is not speaking the voice of the Liberal party; that the Liberal party are standing on their own platform and on their own representations. In the meantime, numbers of prominent members of the Liberal party go to Washington and hold conferences with those prominent men; and I say, in view of that fact, and in view of this information which is given to them privately, are we not justi-fied in supposing that they are in some sort of alliance or intrigue with prominent men in the United States? Then they give a few extracts from resolutions moved in this House by the Liberal party to show that they are anxious to get unrestricted After that they go on to talk about reciprocity. the gravity of the situation:

"Dwell strongly upon the gravity of the relations subsisting between Canada and the United States during recent years, on the frequent efforts made by the Liberal party in Parliament to permanently settle all differences between the two countries upon fair and honourable terms, and the persistent opposition given by the Government to such settlement."

Is that the experience of the hon. gentlemen in this House, that the Opposition, an irresponsible body, who are not entitled to speak on behalf of the country, are the parties who are carrying on negotiations, while the Government, who are the only responsible advisers of the Crown, are opposing them in every possible way? Is that consistent with the situation of the two parties in this House, and with the efforts made by these two parties to settle these difficulties? I gave you before six settle these difficulties? I gave you before six o'clock a history of the efforts made by the Liberal party to secure reciprocity with the United States, into this pamphlet, "that Canadians would sneer and I told you that only once did that party attempt to get reciprocity. That was in 1874. But from 1854 up to 1890 the Conservative party have carried They negotiated the Washon these negotiations. ington Treaty and the old Reciprocity Treaty of 1854. They have two or three other times brought the negotiations almost to the verge of completion, and they would have been completed had the United States carried out bond jide the arrangements which had been entered into. And are the Reform party justified in saying: "We have been endeavouring to negotiate a reciprocity treaty in the interest of Canada, and our efforts have been frustrated by the Conservative party?" I say they are not. Then they give their proposals for reciprocity. After that they go on to show that the action of the Conservative party was rather insulting to our neighbours than otherwise, and was calculated to make them retaliate :

"By the deliberate challenge to the United States to retaliate, through the imposition of heavy duties on many articles of farm produce under the Foster tariff of 1890, which became law fully six months before the McKinley tariff had passed the Senate or received the sanction of the President."

These hon, gentlemen very conveniently forgot to tell the Canadian people that the provisions of that McKinley tariff had been arranged and introduced into Congress long before the Minister of Finance had introduced his financial policy here, or announced to the Canadian people his intention of increasing the duties on certain articles. hon, gentlemen opposite desire to deal fairly with the Canadian people, as they profess to do, you would expect that in all fairness they would not delude the people of Canada into the belief that the American people had been exasperated by the proposals of the Minister of Finance to increase the duties here, and had, as a result of that exasperation, introduced the McKinley Bill. Then they go on to say, under the heading of "Insulting our neighbours:"

"Show that not only have the subsidized press and many supporters of the Government given utterance to uncalled-for insults to the United States, but that Sir John Macdonald himself, no longer ago than last October, speaking to a great audience in Halifax, had the effortery to declare that the Canadians would sneer at the struggles of the fierce democracy of the United States, and would sit by and laugh to see that neighbour country torn by revolution. Comment upon the obvious fact that such language, in addition to its wickedness, was an action of incredible folly, certain to bring the speaker into the worst possible odour with the Government of the United States, and to explain that contemptuous language with the United States was caused and justified by the language used by the Canadian Premier at Halifax."

Now. I want particularly to draw the attention Now, I want particularly to draw the attention of the House to a couple of sentences in this portion of the instructions. They say that Sir John Macdonald "had the effrontery to declare that the Canadians would sneer at the struggles of the fierce democracy of the United States, and would sit and laugh to see that neighbour country torn by revolution. Now, in the report of the speech of Sir John Macdonald taken from the Halifax Herald, I find that his actual words were:

"They will have revolution, while we can sit calmly and quietly under the British flag and look with philosophy upon the struggles of a fierce democracy."

Is there any similarity between that language, "we can sit calmly and quietly under the British at the struggles of the fierce democracy, and would sit by and laugh to see that neighbour country torn by revolution?" One is offensive; the other is a fair and moderate explanation of the situation. The one is intended to be offensive. It is intended to prove to the Canadian people that the late Premier was not disposed to use conciliation in any question between the United States and Canada or to speak fairly regarding the situation. They endeavour to delude the people and convince the electorate that there was a disposition on the part of the Government and the late First Minister to exasperate the people of the United States rather than endeavour to negotiate with them on fair terms. Then the pamphlet writer goes on to say:

"Call attention to the gross corruption so prevalent at Ottawa."

He then enters into a great deal of elaborate state-

He then enters into a great deal of elaborate statements that are not justified by the facts or the information in his possession:

"Tell the people that the extravagance of the Government is ruining this country. Contrast the periods from 1867 to 1874, from 1874 to 1878, and from 1878 to 1890, and emphasize the fact that if there be any financial difficulty in obtaining unrestricted reciprocity it is solely due to the Tory Government's own deliberate extravagance. Point out the effect of that extravagance, which would never have been caused had Mr. Mackenzie been retained in office: and point out the fact that whereas the total annual expenditure of the United States, when it had a population of 20,000,000, was only $23,000,000, that of Canada, with a population of 5,000,000, is $35,000,000."

I would like to ask how contlement that is a feir

I would like to ask hon, gentlemen if that is a fair comparison regarding either the taxation or the state of affairs in Canada. I say it is intended to deliberately mislead the people, and this was given to men who were expected to go out and instruct the people; so that the promoters of this pamphlet were corrupting the fountain head in order that they might then delude the people. We are asked to believe that Sir John Macdonald and his party, in appealing to the Canadian people, were endeavouring to mislead them. Leaving that subject, they take up another, and talk about the effects of the McKinley tariff:

"Illustrate the operation of the McKinley tariff, upon Canadian farm products hitherto chiefly exported to the United States, and compare the outlook for the Canadian farmer under that tariff on the one side and unrestricted reciprocity on the other.

"A COMPARATIVE STATEMENT.

"The following table, taken from the Commerce Report of the United States for the year ending June, 1889, gives the quantities and values of the principal agricultural imports of the United States from Canada in that fiscal year, together with the duties levied upon them under the then existing tariff:

"The first column in the following table shows what these values would be under free trade, the second column shows what the amount of duties levied upon them would be under the operation of the McKinley tariff, and the third column (being the values in free market, less the duties imposed by the McKinley tariff) shows what the Canadian farmers would realize upon their products in the United States under the new tariff, computed on the basis of exports for the year ending June, 1889."

Then he gives a table to show that in 1889 the cattle exported to the United States amounted to $551,251 in value, and that the duties on the same cattle under the new tariff would amount to $699,744, or $148,796 more than the cattle sold for. Did ever any one see logic or reasoning carried to a greater absurdity? They actually tell the Canadian people that the amount of cattle they exported, and which realized $550,251 in 1889, if exported to the United States to-day would be all absorbed, and $148,000 besides, by the McKinley tariff, to pay the duty. Is it not a wonder that men of experience and intelligence should think for a moment that the Canadian electorate would be so dull or simple as to believe any such contention? What is the ultimate conclusion? It is that the Canadian farmer, if he wants to reach the American market, must not only sacrifice the full price he receives for his cattle, but pay in addition $148,000 for the privilege of going into the American market. They have taken cattle, horses, sheep, barley, wheat, beans, potatoes and other articles, and compared them on the same line. They then go on to say:

"At those prices it would take the whole value of the cattle and $148,493 besides to pay the duties under the new tariff."

I give that to show that it is not my calculations but their own figures which lead to this result. These are the figures with which they would delude the Canadian farmers. Then they go on to say:

"Show how our farmers are fleeced by the National Policy tariff and combines, and give list of extortions extracted from them under these two agencies. Show also that the tariff is the parent of combines, Instance the ruinous effect of the system of high taxation and artificial prices by the loss of rural population in Ontario."

Then they go on to show that in every county there is a decrease in population:

"The following table gives the rural population of Ontario by counties for the years 1879 and 1890, as enumerated by the ownership assessors."

I find my own county is reported to have had, in 1879, 56,263, and in 1890 only 52,789, or a reduction of 6,000; but I notice that in my county, as the townships send deputy reeves to the county council in proportion to their numbers, they are increasing the number of deputy reeves, thereby showing that the voters' lists contain a larger number of voters this year than in previous years. Where they got their figures and how they worked them out I do not know; but no doubt the calculation was made in the hope that it would be accepted by the people as correct without examination. find the same condition of things existing in their other lists, showing that the country is being depressed, that lands are going down in value, that the farms are diminishing-all for want of unrestricted reciprocity. Then they go on to say:

"Point out the iniquity of the Gerrymander Act and the Franchise Act, in defeating a free and honest expression of public opinion."

And yet, in the beginning of that same pamphlet, they tell their friends that by the Franchise Act they have an advantage in the situation to-day, and are not afraid to appeal to the people, because they have more men on the lists than the Conservatives have:

"Show how the farmers of Canada are pinched by the policy of high tariffs, and direct attention to the returns of chattel mortgages recently made by clerks of the county courts in Ontario to the Minister of Agriculture at Toronto, a number of which are presented on the following pages. The figures have been obtained from 28 out of 44 counties, and they show an increase of more than 1,000 in the number of instruments recorded last year. Assuming that there are as many bills of sale as of chattel mortgages registered in the province, and doubtless there are, it follows that more than 20,000 farmers in Ontario, or an average of 500 in each county, are practically in the hands of the sheriff. For this state of things, reciprocity with the United States is the only remedy. One year of the McKinley tariff means irretrievable ruin to thousands of Canadian farmers."

Which realized $550,251 in 1889, if exported to the They give a list of those counties; but while they United States to-day would be all absorbed, and recite 48 counties, they only mention 28 where the $148,000 besides, by the McKinley tariff, to pay the figures seem to show something in their favour.

would like to refer the House to the statistics given the other night by my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague), who showed clearly that the chattel mortgages and the mortgages upon farms in Ontario only amounted to 15 per cent, of the value of the land and chattles. Is that an evidence of bankruptcy or of being in that deplorable condition which the hon, gentleman says the Canadian farmers are in? It is unnecessary to go further with this pamphlet, which is filled with inaccuracies, is untruthful, misleading, dishonest and disingenuous; and this is sent out to the country by the people who are to instruct the electorate, and who tried to do so at the last election. Is it a credit to hon gentlemen who call themselves statesmen, and who desire to be looked upon as able men of the world, to publish such statements We have the answer made by the hon. member for South Oxford to the speech of the Finance Minister, and it is the same doleful song applied to the same old tune and ground out by the same organ that the people of Canada are so We have heard up and down familiar with. the country the same mournful wail, and we have heard the same tune played. In Ontario the hon. gentleman says the distress is amongst the people of the Maritime Provinces, or the North-West, or British Columbia. In the Maritime Provinces the distress is amongst the farmers in Ontario, and there, he says, that not one out of two is without a mortgage on his farm. Has the hon, gentleman travelled extensively through Ontario? I know that, when I go amongst the farmers of that province—and the farmers are the class that hon, gentlemen are especially trying to delude—I can get a good substantial meal and find them supplied with the necessaries of life, and I see healthy children around the farm house, and no sign of poverty or starvation. I see that they are fairly well clothed; I see the reapers and mowers and other implements on the farm, and this shows that they are not in such an impoverished condition as is represented by the hon, gentleman. I do not see any of the evidences of starvation and poverty which we so often hear of, and in Ontario especially you can find in the rural districts or among the farming population no such evidences of want of which we hear so much in this House. The hon, member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) gave us a doleful picture of the state of things in his riding, and I live in the hon. gentleman's constituency. It was not long ago that an agricultural implement agent met me in the town in which I live, in the township of Artemisia. I asked him: How do you find collections this year? He said: Very good indeed; I am handing in the last instalment upon the goods I have supplied in this township or in the south riding of Grey. Here were the obligations of the farmers met, not one being obliged to ask for time or to renew his note. Is that an evidence of want? It is the very reverse; and that is only a fair sample of what might be found in every part of our western country. The hon, member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) said the best farmers in his part of the country found at the end of the year that they had not one 5 cent piece to rub upon another. understand that part of the country pretty well, and not long ago I attended an old patient of his,

in her part of the country they were all well-to-do, and were not so poor as they were in the County of Grey, and therefore Huron was a much better county to live in. How does that accord with the statement of the hon, gentleman as to the poverty which prevails in the County of Huron? I think if he were to tell the farmers of Huron that he would insult them, and they would soon call him to time. The hon, member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) said we wanted reciprocity because we required free corn in order to feed our cattle, and he went on to show how much we had paid in duty on corn last year. In speaking on the corn question before, I said there was a great diference between the interests of the hon, gentleman and those of his constituents. The ordinary farmer lives by selling his coarse grains, and then he sells his cattle, but he does not make a business of fattening cattle generally. He will sell a few cattle, whether they are good for the English market or are only good for stockers. He does not depend on the beef solely. Not one man in a hundred of our farmers turns his attention to feeding cattle for sale, as the hon, member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) does. I admit it would be to the advantage of that one man in a hundred to have his corn admitted free, but he would buy that corn from the Americans and would send his oats and his pease and other coarse grain to England, or wherever he could get a market for them. Any one in the position of the hon, gentleman is antagonistic to the ordinary farmer in the respect to which I have alluded. The hon, gentleman told us last year that he was feeding a hundred head of cattle, and this year he tells us that he shipped a hundred head of cattle. Free corn would be to his advantage, but it would not be to the advantage of the ordinary Canadian farmer. The hon, member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) said practically the same thing, but I do not know any one in South Grey who would be benefited by the free admission of corn. Their coarse grains are what they look to for a return, and for their profit. If you admit American corn free you reduce the price of oats and barley here, and that is not for the benefit of the Canadian farmer. If he was feeding cattle for export, no doubt it would be for his advantage; but so long as the Canadian farmer is a raiser of coarse grains, and of general produce, so long is he interested in keeping up the present duty. Now, it is said that the National Policy did no good. Well, at any rate it did this much good, that the last year before we had the National Policy we brought; into Canada over 7,000,000 bushels of corn. How much did we bring in the next year? A little over 3,000,000 bushels. We brought in over 2,000,000 bushels of oats that took the place of Canadian oats that were exported to foreign countries. After the National Policy was introduced we brought in only 232,000 bushels, and the next year 68,000 bushels. Did the National Policy do no good to the Canadian farmer? Did it not give him his own market? Then we are told that we raised the duty on pork, but that it did the Canadian farmer no good. The hon member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) says that whatever benefit we receive from the National Policy it is the manufacturer that gets it, and not the Canadian farmer. He says the manufacand she told me that the difference between the county of Grey and the County of Huron was that been entirely neglected. Is that a fact? Only a few years ago, when we found that pork and fresh meat were coming in to feed the Canadian people to the extent of 29,722,000 pounds in one year, we raised the duty upon these articles of food; we raised the duty upon pork, not as high as the farmers wished it to be raised, but we raised it to some extent, and we wished that we could raise it a little higher, because we wanted to make clear what the duty would accom-Before that we had fresh meat coming in from Chicago and being laid down every week in London, Woodstock, Hamilton, Toronto, Kingston and Montreal, to feed the people of those great cities, whereas they ought to have been fed by the Canadian farmers. Consignments were coming in every week, and being taken out of the cars to feed the people of those cities to the extent of 29,000,000 lbs. in one year, and in this way the market was taken away from the Canadian farmer. We said: It is time that the Government should step in and do something to preserve the market of Canada for the Canadian farmer; and they did do it, and what was the result? During the very first year—and the operations did not extend over a full year—we kept out 14,470,000 pounds of that meat, and we shut up those American stalls. I do not believe there is one of them to-day to be found in those towns or cities throughout Ontario, and the Canadian farmer is feeding the Canadian labourer to-day, the Canadian manufacturer, and the Canadian artizan. Now, then, in the face of these facts hon, gentlemen still dare to tell the Canadian farmer that the National Policy is of no use to him—that it may do some good to the manufacturer, but it is no use to him; it has only been a delusion to him. Then, again, we know that wheat and flour were coming in here in large quantities, and a duty was put upon flour. Did it keep out that flour? I say it did, to a very large extent. I have here a return showing how much of it was kept out in one year. I find that the last year before we put on the duty the imports of wheat for home consumption was 133,883 bushels, and the imports of flour amounted to 45,876 barrels. Now, we find that in the year following, in 1890, there were only $169,000 worth brought in altogether; or, in other words, we shut out nearly three-fourths of previous importations by raising the duty on flour 25 cents per barrel. Yet we are told that it did the Canadian farmer no good, that he receives no benefit from the National Policy, and we are asked to give the Canadian farmer unrestricted reciprocity. are asked to open up our markets to the American people and allow them to flood our country with the produce of the Yankee farmer, which would take the place of the produce of the Canadian farmer in our own country. The member for North Wellington went on to say that the Canadian farmer was handicapped, because everything he bought was dearer by virtue of the National Policy. But did he attempt to prove that? He attempted to prove that the Canadian farmer would be benefited by unrestricted reciprocity, because, he says, if we had no duty we could get goods from the other side much cheaper than we are getting them to-day. He goes on to give the price of those goods; he goes on to show that in the town of Ann Arbor there is a large manufactory of ploughs, and when they send farmer $18. They sell the Advance plough to the American farmer for $8, whereas they sell it to the Canadian farmer for $4. Then he gives the price of a mower, which is sent over to Canada and sold for $40, whereas it is sold to Americans for $65; horse rakes are sold to Canadians for $17 and to Americans for $25; and so on, he goes over the list. What does he prove? He proves exactly what we said years ago, that if you put on that duty the Americans will pay that duty, and more than that duty, to get into the Canadian market. Do you want any better evidence than the figures the hon. gentleman has given? I say you want no better evidence. The Canadian farmer is benefited by virtue of the National Policy because he gets his plough $8 cheaper, according to the figures of the hon, member for North Wellington, than the Yankee farmer gets it over in Ann Arbor; and I may tell him that I am pretty well acquainted with that manufactory. I take his own figures, and they substantiate the argument that have used from time to time in this House, that the value of the manufactured product will not be increased to the consumer here to the full extent of that tariff, because American manufacturers will pay more than the duty to get their goods into our country, and he showed himself by these figures that that is what they are doing. Then, he tells the Canadian farmer that he wants the duty taken off because he could then get his goods at the same price as the Yankee farmer. Then, if he did, he would pay more for them. Now, that is the logic of the hon. gentleman. goes on to say:

"My hon, friend from North Grey (Mr. Masson) claims that he made a very good point. He shows that the increased price of the product is equal to the duty imposed upon it."

He says virtually the consumer pays the duty. Now, he forgets that in the beginning of his speech he tried to prove to the Canadian farmer that it is the American producer who pays the duty to get into the Canadian market; but when he deals with the other part of the subject, and wants to prove that the Canadian farmer is injured by the National Policy, he tells him that he pays more for everything that he uses, because the price of the article is increased to the consumer in proportion to the duty that is imposed upon it. The hon, gentleman is not consistent in his arguments, and the two parts of his speech do not hold together. I say that his argument is inconsistent, and it is illogical and very unfair. The hon, member for Huron did the same thing. You may go over his speech from one end to the other, and you will find that he contradicts himself in four different places, so that if you believe one part of his speech you must discard the others; and he depends upon the short memory of the reader to be able to induce him to believe that unrestricted reciprocity is a panacea for all ills that the Canadian farmer is heir to. Now, I said in the earlier part of my speech that from 1878 to 1885 we had the principle laid down, as we were told, according to Adam Smith and John Stuart Mill, and all the great writers on political economy, that the consumer paid the duty, that the duty was added to the price of the article and the consumer paid it. 1885 down to the present time we find that a new a plough over to the Canadian farmer they sell it political economy has been preached in this House; to him for $9, whereas they charge the American and who is the author of it? It is the hon. member for North Norfolk, who has gone all around the compass on all these questions—who is one thing to-day and another thing to-morrow; one thing this year and another thing next year; a free trader this year and a protectionist next year; a reciprocity man this year and a commercial unionist next year; an unrestricted reciprocity man this year and a continental free trader next year. Then he lays down the principle that because everything the Canadian farmer has to sell in the American market is so small in proportion to the amount of that same line of goods on the American side that therefore our exports do not disturb the American market, and consequently the Canadian farmer has got to bear the cost of taking his goods to that market, and the duty. Now, Isaid before, and I repeat it again, that if the Canadian farmer starts here with a load of wheat and goes across the line to sell it in New York he has got to pay the duty when he gets to that line; but if he does that, remember he gets the full benefit of the American market whenever he reaches there, whatever that may be. But a man was buying potatoes in my village only last winter at 30 cents per bushel, when he took them across the line and paid 25 cents a bushel duty. That brought down the price of his potatoes to 55 cents, but when he reached the American market he got $1.12} per bushel. I, therefore, say he would have had to pay the duty; but would be have got the full benefit of the market when his products reached the market? On the other hand, when the American purchaser comes to buy potatoes in Canada he does not pay any farmer what the Brooklyn market affords, less the duty and the cost of freight to take them there. He bought them for 30 cents per bushel, paid the freight himself, went into that market, and got the full benefit of it. I have thus given instances in which the producer pays the duty, and in which the consumer pays the duty. As the price of our articles is regulated principally from Europe, they can often be purchased here cheaper than in the United States, and the buyer can take them over the line, pay the duty, and still have a profit. was so with our barley this year. Notwithstanding the McKinley tariff, Americans bought our barley and took it over the line, and our farmers received as much for the barley as before that tariff was It is not, therefore, true to say that because the McKinley tariff is in force the value of our products has fallen to such an extent that it takes all the money a beast will realize to pay the duty, as is shown in the very suggestive pamphlet issued by the Liberal party.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Will the hon. gentleman give the reason why barley fell 20 cents per bushel in Canada during one day?

Mr. SPROULE. I am not aware of it. The barley purchased in my own village did not fall 5 cents during the week after the adoption of the McKinley tariff. If the hon. gentleman disbelieves it, I have here the prices paid by McKay Bros., of Toronto: 9th February, 1890, 44 cents; 9th February, 1891, 53 cents; barley No. 2, 5th February, 1890, 40 cents; 8th February, 1891, 50 cents. Does that show that barley fell 10 cents a bushel in consequence of the McKinley tariff?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to tell us the price of barley 8th September and 8th October?

Mr. SPROULE. If I had the prices I would give them to the hon. gentleman, and they would bear out the statement I have made. I now take barley, No. 3, February 8, 1890, 36.8 cents; February 9, 1891, 45 cents. These figures show in every instance that after the McKinley tariff was in operation the Canadian farmer obtained more for his barley, as shown by the purchases of McKay Bros., of Toronto. If the hon. gentleman disputes the figures he can appeal to buyers in Toronto, who will justify these statements. Thus, hon. gentlemen opposite are not justified in telling the people that they require unrestricted reciprocity because the McKinley tariff causes a reduction in the price of their products. Hon, gentlemen opposite also went on to prove that every Canadian farmer who raised an acre of barley, oats or wheat did so at a loss. Is it not a wonder that a farmer having nothing to start with should lose money year by year, and yet be able to hang on and appear to be well-fed and clothed. It is a wonderful kind of logic which brings out this result. Surely the Canadian farmer cannot believe it. I have been carrying on a farm, only 400 acres, for a number of years, and I have been running it at a profit, and can continue to do so, notwithstanding the McKinley tariff, and in fact I am equally as well able to do it to-day as before that tariff was enacted. This is, no doubt, the experience of many farmers in this Hon. gentlemen opposite say: We want the tariff taken off because we seek a wider market. The hon, member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) said that last year he exported a hundred head of cattle, and when his son came back he reported that the difference between American cattle and Canadian cattle in the English market was only $2 or $3. Will the hon, gentleman be kind enough to tell the Canadian people he was taking finished beef cattle, and not stockers?

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I said I had a son who came home last week, and he stated that in the market the difference between Canadian cattle was only 10 shillings; and further, that a good many of the cattle sold there were Canadian cattle shipped from Boston, the Americans foregoing the benefit of Canadian cattle not being slaughtered at the port of arrival.

Mr. SPROULE. Is not that exactly what I am saying? It makes little difference, as regards the finished beef, whether the cattle are shipped from the United States or from Canada. Those American buyers referred to bought Canadian cattle to ship from Boston because they were ready to be killed on arrival in England. Of the entire number shipped last year, how many were finished cattle? We shipped over 90,000 animals that were not ready to be killed, and each of these would have been reduced in value atleast $10 if the shippers had been obliged to kill them on arrival in Eng-In giving his figures the hon, member for Huron was innocent enough not to inform the House that this comparison was drawn between finished cattle shipped from the Un ted States and from Canada.

Mr. McMILLAN. I took beef cattle in both cases.

Mr. SPROULE. Did the hon. gentleman say they were beef cattle? Every head shipped from Boston was finished cattle. Canadians are buying stock and shipping them to the old country in large numbers, and I claim they save $10 per head because they are allowed to finish them in that country instead of killing them on landing. restricted reciprocity would kill out that trade. When the hon, gentleman goes among the farmers and endeavours to convince them that there is not the difference I have stated in value between Canadian and American cattle, and tells them that the difference is only 10 shillings per head, he had better state that it is not a proper comparison. It matters little whether the Americans buy a few thousand cattle and ship them from Montreal or from Boston, if they are to be slaughtered at the port of landing. It is not so, however, with respect to that important trade out of which Canadian farmers obtainso much. Of stockers we shipped last year 123,000 head, and this year we will probably ship 140,000 or 150,000 head. Therefore, it is important for the Canadian farmers that we have the full advantage of the market without being scheduled, and that we have not unrestricted reciprocity, under which this privilege would be denied us in England. I say it is misleading our Canadian farmers, and it is unfair and deplorable that a man who professes to understand the wants of the Canadian farmers, and who is connected with farming himself, should make such statements.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Mr. Speaker—Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; sit down.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to tell the hon. gentleman that during the time he was speaking—

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I wish to say, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order; sit down.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I raise this point of order: he is misquoting my figures.

Mr. SPROULE. I am not talking about the hon. gentleman's figures at all. I am talking about the Trade and Navigation Returns, which are something more accurate than the hon. gentleman's figures.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order; sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to point out to hon. gentlemen that this constant interruption is entirely out of order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). He is misrepresenting me.

Mr. SPEAKER. The rule is, that no member can interrupt another, except on a point of order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Well, when he is misrepresenting me—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; sit down.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I am in order.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon, gentleman from Huron (Mr. Macdonald) entertained this House for about two hours with what he pleased to call facts and figures, and any hon, gentleman in this House could have contradicted his statements every fifteen minutes, and shown him that he was inaccurate in his reasoning. No person took the trouble to do so, and I sat through the whole of it, and made no interruption; but when the hon, gentleman now Mr. Sproule.

sees that his arguments are proven to be wrong he gets very restless under it. He is like a boy taking unpalatable medicine. I would like him to sit still and take his medicine like a little man. has administered many a bitter pill himself, and he is getting one of his own now. I say that the hon. member who made the comparison in reference to the price of cattle made a mistake, and it comes with worse grace from him, because he professes to be a farmer, and therefore I will deal with his argument more particularly than I did with the argument of the other hon. gentleman. If time would permit me I could show him that his arguments were just as fallacious, his reasoning as incorrect, and his figures as inaccurate, as those of the other gentleman, and if they were addressed to the Canadian farmer they would only mislead him.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; sit down.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). The hon. gentleman says—

Some hon. MEMBERS. You are out of order. Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER. I trust the House will sustain me in endeavouring to maintain order.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). Mr. Speaker-

Mr. SPEAKER. Is the hon, gentleman raising a point of order. I have already intimated to the House that when a member is speaking another can only interrupt on a point of order.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I rise to a point of order, and it is this: When the gentleman refers to the Trade and Navigation Returns that there were 122,000 cattle—

Some hon. MEMBERS. That is not a point of order. Sit down.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron)—he is not correct.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is no point of order, that I can see, in what the hon. gentleman is stating.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon, gentlemen opposite are getting very impatient. They do not like to hear these things, because they come too close to They do not like to get a rehearsal of what they have been saying in the country during the last campaign, nor do they like to hear facts and figures, and therefore they become restless and try to interrupt. I may now refer for a few moments to the arguments of the hon, member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin). He said, at first, that he would endeavour to give the House some information upon the question under discussion, but he did nothing of the kind. His first argument was something about inconsistency in the Conservative party; his next argument was upon the temperance question and my friend the Minister of Finance, and he wasted about half an hour reading extracts-I don't know where he got them-to show there was some inconsistency. He then struck another attitude of recklessness and facetiousness and he then endeavoured to show want of harmony in the ranks of the Conservative party. He went on from that, and he suddenly brought out something about passing down the halls of memory, and the Conservative party. Then he gave a lurch purported to be the facts as an evidence that the from side to side, and the Regina Leader, and Ontario farmer was unfairly treated. Although the hon, member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) came in for a portion of his extensive knowledge. He left that on a sudden, and he went back to Haldimand and the Indians, and something about 9 cents a gallon on the Canadian side; and then he a speech that was made out there, and a circular which was sent to the Indians. Then he eulogized the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie and Sir Richard Cartwright for a short time, and he swept on to taxation, and he talked about the Canadian Pacific Railway. He said: We, the Canadian people, built that road; but he says that the Government which built it made it pass through a corner of the State of Maine, and that they had cut the throat of the Intercolonial Railway by building a competing road. He said: We, the Canadian people, built it; and his argument was in effect that if there was any éclat to be derived from that work the Liberal party should share in it, but if there was any wrong the Government must be responsible for the whole of Then the member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) talked about the member for Halifax, and he suddenly drifted away to the Ottawa River, and something about steamboats and tugs on that river. After all this, he said he would come to the question, and he dwelt for exactly two and a-half minutes on the question. I kept the time closely. He gave us a strong eulogy on the Mackenzie Government and he dropped down in his seat exhausted, but he never gave us a single argument on the question at issue. I suppose the hon, gentleman thinks that after all this he was enlightening the Canadian people on this question. No doubt that is what he calls logic, and argument, and reason, and he will no doubt go home and tell the electors: I raised my voice on behalf of the Canadian farmer; I have talked until I was exhausted on behalf of the Canadian farmer, but the Government were obdurate, and they will do nothing, and you will have to suffer; they throw the money into the Red Parlour at Toronto; they give millions to the manufacturers, but they will let you remain in poverty and they will do nothing for you. I have no doubt that he will tell that to the people when he goes home, but I hardly think they will believe him. The hon member for London (Mr. Hyman) professed that he was going to give a dissertation on the financial aspect of this country, but what did he do? He started out to tell us about petroleum and coal oil, and he quoted the price of the American and Canadian oil to try to show that the hon, member (Mr. Moncrieff) who spoke on this side of the House had been misleading the people. The hon, member for London (Mr. Hyman) gave us the quotation of the price of American oil in Oswego, but he gave the quotation of the prices of wine gallons there, as against the prices of the imperial gallons in this country. Was that a fair or just argument for any gentleman in this House to use. I have no doubt that any farmer reading that would not understand that the quotations were quoted for different kinds of gallons of oil, but hon. gentlemen sitting in this House knew very well the difference. That hon: gentle-man would like to stand well before this House and this country as an honourable man, as a man of integrity and honesty. He impugned the truthful-taken off. Does the consumer not get the benefit ness and veracity of the hon. members on this side of of that? When you can get twenty pounds for a the House and the honest had been side of the consumer not get the benefit when you can get twenty pounds for a the House, and then he turned around and gave what dollar to-day, where you could only get twelve he knew that the wine gallon was one-sixth less than the Imperial gallon, he said that the coal oil was 6 cents a gallon on the American side and said: Look at the difference. Then the hon, member for East Lambton told us that there was so much money invested in land, in plant, and in the operations in coal oil, and the hon, member for London said: "I find that the assessment of the whole place is less than a million dollars all told." The hon. member for East Lambton, in speaking of that, took the trouble to tell the House, very fairly, I thought, that the assessed value is no criterion of the actual value of the property, because under the assessment law mining lands are allowed to be assessed as ordinary farm lands; therefore, although they have been sold at $4,000 an acre, they are only assessed at the price of the farm lands around them, and poor lands at that. The average price of these coal oil lands, I am told, is $400 an acre, although they have been sold at as high as $4,000 The hon, gentleman was justified in the an acre. figures he gave, and the hon. member for London did an injustice to his own part of the country in crying down one of the leading industries there and endeavouring to convince the Canadian people that the manufacturers of coal oil were becoming millionaires on account of the duty, and that if that duty were taken off the Canadian farmer would get his coal oil cheaper. Was that fair in the hon, member for London? I say it was most unfair. It was not reasonable in a man representing an important city like London to make such statements to this House, and I hope he will be more careful in the use of such arguments in the future. I will now leave that question. I believe, as I said before, that we are entitled to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance. For what? Because the National Policy is a success. It is a success because it raises a revenue. It gave us enough money to carry on the public works of the country, to build railways and develop the country, without to day increasing the taxes one dollar; and we have reached that stage of development that our national debt is not running up any more. What more did it do? It kept the Canadian market for the Canadian farmer and manufacturer. What more did it do? It gave us the markets of the old country for some of the more important lines of Canadian farm produce. What more did it do? It enabled the Finance Minister to take the duty off those lines that represent the urgent necessaries of life. We are able to take the duty off tea and coffee, and off sugar, almost entirely. We are able, by taking off that $3,500,000, of taxation, to give the people that which is one of the necessaries of life much cheaper than they had it before. The hon member for North Wellington said that taking off this duty is of no use to the Canadian consumer, because it goes into the pockets of the manufacturers; and yet the market reports show that on the very day, or two or three days after that duty was taken off, granulated sugar fell 17 cents a pound in the Montreal market, and it is over 2 cents a pound cheaper to day than it was before the duty was pounds before the duty was taken off, will any man have the audacity to stand up in this House and tell the Canadian farmer that he receives no benefit from the removal of this taxation? Then the National Policy enables you to reduce the tariff on the necessaries of life. What more does it do? It enables you to raise the duties on spirits and tobacco, which are not necessaries of life. What more does it do? It in a large measure advances temperance sentiment and principles, which are so important in this country. say the Finance Minister is entitled to credit, because in the readjustment of the tariff he has put duties on these things, and endeavoured as much as possible to break up the drinking customs of the people, and to stop the use of those things which are not necessaries of life, but rather contribute to obnoxious habits—the use of tobacco, snuff, cigars and liquor. Is that not in the interest of the Canadian people? I say it is; and as long as the Finance Minister is able to do this I am sure the country will appreciate him, and be grateful to him, and feel that he is the right man in the right place. Now, I say that we do not want unrestricted reciprocity. What is the amendment which has been moved in this debate? Is it unrestricted reciprocity? No; it is that we want reciprocity. I have told you that in 1885 they first proposed commercial union, but that was unpalatable. Then they called it commercial reciprocity; but the people still rebelled. Then it was continental free After that they called it unrestricted reciprocity, and went to the country with their colours nailed to the mast. And now they come here and say, not that we want unrestricted reciprocity, although the whole tenor of their arguments is in that direction, but that we want reciprocity, and we want the duties reduced—not all the duties, but the duties on the prime necessaries of life. Is not that what the Finance Minister has done? If it is a fair reciprocity treaty that they want, we have always been willing to give that to the Canadian people, and I am sure the Government are still willing to have it, if they can get it on fair and equitable terms. But they do not intend to go further than that; they do not intend to go down on their knees and beg for what the Canadian farmer is able to do without. I have no doubt that in the by-elections these hon, gentlemen will go and tell the Canadian farmer that they want reciprocity, and they will turn up this resolution and point out that it does not say unrestricted reciprocity, but says reciprocity, reduction of duties on the prime necessaries of life, and a wider market. But the whole tenor of their speeches has been in favour of unrestricted reciprocity; and if their arguments mean anything, they lead to this conclusion, that unrestricted reciprocity, and unrestricted reciprocity only, is the remedy for the condition of this country to-day. Now, this is a very important question: What is reciis a very important question: What is reciprocity? It is a commercial question which always been willing to deal with. Now, this we have always been willing to deal with. What is unrestricted reciprocity? It is a national question, a political question and a commercial question. Why do I say it is a national question? Because it would be destructive of our national life; because it would subordinate us to the United States; because it would cut the connection that unites us with the mother country; because it discriminates against that country which has always much larger majority. I shall not take up the time stood by us, and which has given us the most important market we have been enjoying for years for some of our most important lines of production. Then we are told that we are preaching disloyalty because we say that the policy of unrestricted reciprocity leads to annexation. What do the reciprocity leads to annexation. What do the Canadian Reformers say? That it would not lead to annexation, but that it would remove the discontent which exists to-day, and satisfy the people, and do away with annexation sentiment. But they told the people in that notable pamphlet from which I have read: Go and tell the electors that we can give them unrestricted reciprocity, that we have the assurances of both parties in the United States that we can get it. If so, they must have entered into some compact with them. Now, what do the prominent men of the United States say about unrestricted reciprocity? They say: We will give it, because it would lead to political union and annexation. And there is not a prominent public man in the United States who has expressed himself on that question in the last five years but has said the same thing. Now, if they give it, what do they give it for? They give it, believing that it will surely lead to political union. I ask: Are we going to discriminate against the mother country? Are we going to sink our own nationality? Are we going to subordinate ourselves to the United States for the purpose of getting free admission into a market where they will compete against us in every line? We are told that we would get it, because England would not rebel against it. Is that the dispatch which Lord Knutsford sent out the other day? If I read it aright, that dispatch was to the effect that whatever negotiations might take place it was to be presumed there would be no discrimination against the mother country. Was not that an intimation that England would consider, if we discriminated against her, that we intended to cut the connection? Are we prepared to ne-gotiate unrestricted reciprocity? I say we are not. What did Erastus Wiman say? He said, that provided we got unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, if Canada then refused political union it would lead to another Boston tea We would be then in their trap and could not draw back. In the face of such disclosures, are we not entitled to hold that it is disloyal to preach unrestricted reciprocity, that it is disloyal to the mother country and would lead to political union with the United States. I say it would be a sorry day for the Canadians when we got unrestricted reciprocity, because on that day we would sink our national independence and blot out from British North America that colony which is the brightest gem of the British Empire. In view of those things, I am prepared to vote against the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford. I am satisfied that when the Canadian people know, as know they will in time, the situation, they will vote against it. Why is it that during the last election, toward the end of the campaign, every day saw hundreds of the electors coming over to our side, because as soon as the question was fairly before them and they had time to consider it they ranged themselves in our ranks, and if that election had been postponed ten or fifteen days longer the Conservatives would have come back with a much larger majority. I shall not take up the time displace for the first the second part of the first time of the second displacement is considered and displacement of the second displacement of the second of the House any longer. I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will not endeavour to put out another secret pamphlet to prove such absurdities as are found in the one I have just read, and then proceed to prove something eise in this House. They to prove something else in this House. They atanother thing when they are in this House. attempt to prove one thing in Boston and a different thing on Canadian soil; and as long as they do that they will find themselves in the cold shades of opposition. When they come back fresh from the people they accuse the electorate of being ignorant, stupid and deluded, and not knowing their business; but at any rate the electorate know sufficient to keep these hon, gentlemen where they have been for the last twelve years, and where I believe they are destined long to remain.

Mr. LAVERGNE. I wish to make a few remarks, Sir, on this question, since very few of my hon, friends from Quebec have so far taken any part in the discussion, and since the province from which I come is, I believe, the one which is, perhaps, the most interested in this question, and the one which has suffered, and is suffering, the most from the actual condition of affairs. We have had the pleasure of hearing my hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins), who gave us, I must say, a fairsized speech. It is true, Sir, that his oration was finally merged into still-born resolutions, but that accident did not impair the merits of his long effort, and he surely deserves some credit for it. We have also heard from my hon. friend the member from Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives). He promised us that he would deal only with a few points, and that very briefly; but, to my great pleasure, he did not keep his word, and in length was second to none. I must do the hon. gentleman the justice, however, of saying that, from his own standpoint, he certainly did very well. Now, Sir, these gentlemen do not represent the majority of the Province of Quebec. It has been a favourite argument with our friends opposite, one which has been very often repeated by them, that every victory meant that they were right in all their pretensions. If this argument is as strong in our mouth, I might say that the Province of Quebec this time has shown that she does There is one point upon which we not believe so. all agree, and that is, that a change in our fiscal policy has become necessary, but where we differ is as to the nature of the change. Some hon. gentlemen place their hopes in the fiscal policy of the British Islands. For instance, my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) told us:

"Further, I am proud to say there is on the English horizon a cloud the size of a man's hands, indicating a change of policy to our advantage. That may not afford our hon. friends opposite as much pleasure as it does us, but it excites in some of us the hope that, before we are many years older, we may, by means of new political adjustments, find in the old country, for the products of our farms, a larger market than we have hitherto found. A very small difference of duty, a duty of 5 or 7 per cent. in the English market in favour of our wheat, and our barley, and beef, and our mutton, and our poultry, and our eggs, and our lumber, would guarantee the very rapid building up of this country. of this country.

A little further on he said:

"Let hon, gentlemen read the speeches in the English Hansard of 1842-44 against this repeal, and then turn to the Hansard of 1846, and they will find that too much attention cannot be gaid to these declarations of Mr.

that very same year, 1842, there was a reduction made in the import duties on 750 articles, and four years previous the Anti-Corn Law Association was organized in Manchester, and that movement in favour of free trade dates as far back as 1830. is certainly a great delusion in the mind of the hon. gentleman if he thinks that the English people are going to re-enact the corn laws. I am sure that if the hon, gentleman advocated such a policy at any public meeting in England he would not only be sneered at, but might possibly be stoned. Now, other gentlemen want reciprocity in natural products. That is a very fine thing, and I admit I would be in favour of it, but it is only a half measure; and not only is it a half measure, but it makes me think these hon. gentlemen are not very sincere when they say they will take reciprocity in natural products and in nothing else, because we are told, and I think we are perfectly well informed now, that it is impossible to have it. The only utterance which we have received from American statesmen is that it is useless for us to try to negotiate with them except upon the basis of unrestricted reciprocity. Now, we understand that hon. gentlemen are ready for an indefinite policy in regard to reciprocity in order to retain themselves in power. On this side of the House we are unanimous in favour of the only policy which can be realized, and that is unrestricted reciprocity, which would also be of the greatest benefit to the people of Canada generally. is no doubt that we are all agreed that a change in our fiscal policy is necessary. We find that in the manifesto published after the dissolution of Parliament and also in the message sent by His Excellency the Governor General to the Secretary of State for the Colonies. This message has been often repeated in this debate, but you will allow me to read a few lines of it for the sake of the point I am making:

"1. Renewal of the reciprocity treaty of 1854 with the modifications required by the altered circumstances of both countries and with the extensions deemed by the commission to be in the interest of Canada and the United States."

It was then the desire of the Government to consult the people on that question of reciprocity. lution took place, and, in all agricultural constituencies, wherever this issue was prominently put before the people, wherever the attention of the people was not diverted from the question of reciprocity, I believe I am right in saying that the people gave no uncertain utterance of their wishes in this regard. As far as I am concerned, the only issue submitted to the electors of my constituency was the question of reciprocity, and it is no boast to say that they have given no equivocal opinion on that question. The hon, gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Sproule) boasted in reference to the good results of the policy adopted by the party now in power, and I will say a few words on the situation of the country and more especially of the Province of Quebec at the present time. We have several means of ascertaining in what condition we now are, but allow me to read you a few words which I take from the record of the failures during the last six months:

the Hansard of 1846, and they will find that too much attention cannot be paid to these declarations of Mr. Gladstone and others.

The hon. gentleman might have told us that, if these men have changed their minds in a few years, in period of last year, an increase of about 20 per cent. Every province but Ontario shows a slight increase in the number of failures, but by far the greatest increase has been in the Province of Quebec, where the number has increased 53 per cent, and the amount of liabilities is 50 per cent greater." per cent. greater.'

Does this show a state of prosperity? We have other signs by which we may judge of our pros-Let us take the rate of interest. Speaking of the section where I live, at all events, we used until last year to have money lent on mortgages on farms at 6 and 7 per cent.; now it cannot be obtained for less than 8 per cent. Hon. gentlemen may say this is not true in all sections of the country, but I speak of the district where I live and the surrounding counties, and I say that the interest now charged on mortgages is at least 8 per cent. I know that gentlemen who are accustomed to deal with financial business will support me in this, that creditors are not to-day suing or foreclosing mortgages, because they are afraid they will have to buy in the properties. The Credit Foncier in Montreal and in Quebec have taken out a large number of judgments, but they will not execute them, because they know that they cannot sell these They believe they would be obliged to properties. buy them in if they executed their judgments, and would have to keep them idle. In our townships all the farms that are valued at, say, $1,000, have decreased in value by one-half. Half of them are for sale. I have personal experience of this. few years ago we could buy farms of that kind, speculate upon them, and sell them again at a fair profit. Now half of them are for sale and there is no demand for them. If hon. gentlemen in Ontario are more fortunate than we are I am very glad of it. Now, what is our position as to emigration. Never, I believe, was the exodus so great as it was last spring. Never have I seen so many carloads of people going away from the Province of Quebec every day to the United States. I was asked, why did they go? Is it not that they want to work in the factories? That is very true; but it is you who had promised to provide industries, to provide a home market, to provide work for all hands, cannot furnish work for these hands, or even a home market, and they have to go away in order to avoid starvation. My hon, friend who preceded me spoke of the great benefits of protection for the farmers, and my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) said that the farmers had been greatly benefited by this policy, that they sold in the market where it was dear to sell and bought in the market where it was cheap They buy cheaper everything they wish to buy, they raise their own food, they raise their own wheat, and they have very cheap labour. Well, Sir, I believe that my hon. friend knows a little better when he says that the farmers of Quebec-and he was speaking from a Quebec standpoint—raise their own wheat. I can tell my hon. friend from Sherbrooke that not 20 per cent. of the farmers of the Province of Quebec raise their own wheat; in some townships there are not 10 per cent.; in some townships there are not 5 per cent., and in my own county, which is not the poorest in that province, in some parishes there is not a single farmer who raises enough for his own consumption. Now, what have they done to favour the farmer? What have they done to give him cheap bread? They have taxed flour 50 cents a barrel; and not content with that, in 1889 informed by a hay buyer who lives in my county, Mr. LAVERGNE.

they put an additional 25 cents on every barrel of Now, they say we do not buy any taxed Well, I do not know that we buy a large flour. flour. quantity; still, we do buy some, and the most of it is bought by the Province of Quebec. Last year we bought 167,000 barrels of flour, valued at $597,000, on which we paid a duty of $88,000, and more than half of that amount was paid by the farmers of the Province of Quebec, surely the most numerous class, and they all buy flour. Then the numerous class, and they all buy flour. Then the people of the Province of Quebec were beginning to buy corn, and to favour that province, I suppose, the Government taxed corn. Last year we imported 3,342,000 bushels, on which we paid a duty of $243,000. Now, what else did they do to favour the farmers of Quebec and Canada generally? They put a tax on cotton and woollen cloth; they also put a tax on agricultural implements, and they have put a tax on every article that the farmers buy in that line. Now, it may be said that these taxes do not apply only to the farmers, and let me read you a short statement to show how this taxation is distributed. In 1878 the average tax on cotton cloth was 17½ per cent., in 1880 the average was 30 per cent., and in 1889 it was 35 per cent. On agricultural implements the average in 1879 was 25 per cent., and in 1889 it was 35 per cent. The tax on stoneware, used by people of small means, is 35 per cent.; on china, 30 per cent.; on silver and gold plate, 20 per cent. The tax on spades and shovels is 46 per cent. : on forks and hoes, 53 per cent.; while jewellery is taxed only 20 per cent. Now, these figures give an idea of the love of hon. gentlemen for the farmers of Canada, and for the Province of Quebec especially. But it is not only in the way of making everything dear that the farmer buys that we have been ill-treated by this policy. It has brought retaliation from our neighbours, and now I may say that onehalf at least of all the articles we have to sell have been so highly taxed that the farming industry is almost ruined. I will mention a few of the items. For instance, of horses last year we sold 16,000 to the United States, and of this number the Province of Quebec alone sold 7,691. Now, can we go on in this way? Since the imposition of the Mc-Kinley tariff a diminution in the value of horses of at least 25 per cent. has taken place, and when I say that it is not an idle state-No longer than a month ago that statement. ment was given to me under oath. A man sued a railway company for the value of a horse killed on the track. People came to give evidence as to the value of that horse, and they declared that last year $120 had been refused for the animal, but the price of horses having decreased, they did not consider that he could be sold now for more than $90. These people did not explain the reason of the lower price, but they all knew perfectly well that the price of horses had decreased about 25 per cent. Now, I say that the farmers of Quebec have no inducement to continue to raise horses. The same thing may be said in regard to hay. Last year we sold a large quantity of hay to the United States, of which the largest part went from the Province of Quebec, which province alone sold 85,674 tons. Now, what was the price of hay last year? Even then the price was low, and it was selling at $10 a ton just before the new crop of 1890 was put in. Now, I am credibly and who last year bought about $100,000 worth of hay for the United States market from the farmers of my county and from the Counties of Bagot and Yanıaska — this gentleman informs me that this year he has not shipped half that quantity, although the farmers' barns are full of hay. The price was $8 a ton about three weeks ago, before the farmers began to cut their new crop, whereas at the same date last year it was $10 a ton. What is the reason of that? The price of hay has not fallen in the United States market, but the lower price in Canada is caused by the effect of the McKinley tariff of $2 additional duty a ton. Now, these traders have to pay $4 a ton duty; they pay $3 freight, and $1.50 for pressing the hay; that brings the hay up to $8.50; they sell it in the United States for $18, which leaves them a margin of $1.50 as profit, commission and incidental expenses. Now we understand why the price of hay has come down so low, and why the demand for it is so small. I may use the same argument in respect to cattle and potatoes, and almost every article that the farmer sells. Now, these gentlemen want us to believe that they have done the Canadian people a great favour by reducing the duty on sugar. Well, I confess it is a step in the right direction, but it is only a half measure. I remember the time in 1882 when the hon. member who represented the constituency which I have now the honour to represent was fighting his election battle. Speaking on this question, he told us that the duty on sugar was for the purpose of protecting the maple sugar manufacturers, that it was for the purpose of helping our farmers, and that it enabled them to sell their sugar two or three cents per pound higher than they could obtain except for that duty. We did not allow ourselves to be deceived on that point by that plea; and we can now see clearly who were the parties protected by that policy, and who were the parties to be mided when that duty was imposed. We to be aided when that duty was imposed. know well that hon, gentlemen opposite never trouble themselves to assist the farmers. We see that the taxes are imposed for the purpose of favouring a few millionaires, and perhaps a few hundreds of workingmen. As this is the case, we had better remove the tax altogether. we have a surplus, give the farmers who manufacture maple sugar a bounty, instead of levying a duty to benefit five or six millionaires and 600 or 700 workmen. Such a bounty as I have mentioned would favour about 20,000 farmers who manufacture large quantities of maple sugar every year. In my own constituency perhaps one out of every two farmers makes sugar to the value of about $100 every year, and they do this work in a season during which they have nothing else to do. This would be more patriotic and more valuable to the farmers, of whom hon, gentlemen opposite profess to be such great friends, if they would thus favour that industry and also favour the industry which the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) has mentioned and so well explained this afternoon. I am glad this tax has been removed; but if we are to keep part of it we ought to place a tax also on the raw material and favour the people who deserve to be favoured, and do that which will most benefit the country generally and the largest number of its people. Hon. gentlemen opposite always tell us that since the inauguration of the present tariff they have always obtained a majority at the elections, and the same amount of taxes that they pay to-day.

obtained the support of the people. I believe the causes which have kept hon, gentlemen in their seats are the same as some years ago; but perhaps we know them a little better. We might name them in a very few words: gerrymander, Franchise Act, appointing revising barristers and returning officers, railway subsidies, selling contracts, taking the peeple's money to purchase their support, retailand wholesale bribery, bribing railway corporations, and finally raising the loyalty cry. I desire to say a few words in order to give my testimony as to the condition of the farmers in the section of the country in which I live. I say we are far from being prosperous; that we have never been so badly off as we are now. What is the remedy-for what do we look? We believe that protection has killed half of our trade, and has at the same time increased the price of everything we have to buy. The remedy for these evils will be found in the adoption of the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and in negotiating, according to the terms of that amendment, a treaty of unrestricted reciprocity with the United What is the objection urged? The crv of loyalty is a childish one. It is one you may put before the people, but it is perfectly useless and childish to repeat that cry in this House. main objection is the decrease that would occur in our revenue. We are asked how we would provide for that decrease in our revenue on account the removal of taxes on American goods. Hon. gentlemen opposite have asked for an answer to that question. If hon. gentlemen will look at the expenditure in 1878, when the honest and economical Government of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was in office, they will find the expenditure was $24,000,000, while this year it is $36,000,000, or an increase of $12,000,000. is just the amount which hon, gentlemen think we will have to provide. I do not say that we could reduce our expenditure to $24,000,000, but I believe we could cut it down half way, or by at least $6,000,-Why should we expend any more to-day for militia and mounted police than we did in 1878? We spend to-day $2,000,000 for militia and mounted police. The increase on that item, far from doing any good, if it has not brought civil war on the country, at least it has not prevented it. There is in that item alone a saving of one million dollars to be made. While I do not propose to enumerate every department, I am satisfied that in the aggregate a saving of $6,000,000 might be effected. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has answered in a very effective manner the objections of hon. members opposite. No doubt the volume of our business would be considerably increased if we had reciprocity with the United States, and the amount of our purchases from other countries would also be increased, and this necessarily would produce an increase of income. But, Sir, suppose that we have to provide for that decrease of revenue in another way, there is a very simple mode, and that is to put the tax on some-thing else. When we will be doing an extensive business, when we will be making money, when the farmers of Canada will have a good market, when they sell their products at fair prices, when the tax of $4 a ton is taken from hay, when the tax on their sheep, and lambs, and horses, is removed, then, Sir, they will be better able to pay

Whether they pay it on goods which come from the United States or upon goods which come from other foreign countries, it is no matter to them at all. I say, Sir, that the answer, and the only answer, is this one: If we take away that tax we will put another tax on some other goods. The solution is as simple as that, and in addition we would have the advantage of this large trade with our neighbours. I will now close my remarks. I believe that anyone who is really desirous of the welfare of the farmers of this country, the largest class in our community, should support the motion of my hon, friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright).

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I will not imitate most of the hon, gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate. I have noticed that the plan pursued in this discussion—if indeed discussion be the proper word to describe it—has been, that one hon. gentleman has risen after another, and having said a few words about what his opponent, or predecessor in occupation of the floor had said, he then went into a long essay on the Trade and Navigation Returns. In fact, I had the pleasure of listening to one hon, gentleman who only failed to have commenced with Noah descending from the ark, for he went back to the remotest history, and took us over a large tract of country. Sir, I will follow the hon, member from Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) as closely as I can, in regard to all that portion of his speech which I think he might claim worthy of consideration at the hands of this House. He said that he came to give his testimony as to what was the condition of things in his own county, and how the policy of the Government affected the people in his county, and during his remarks he frequently used the phrase: "I am informed." Well, Sir, I am informed that the hon, gentleman is a distinguished lawyer, and he must know very well that even in political matters hearsay evidence is not very valuable. I should have much preferred had he given us exactly what he had seen himself, so that we might have had his direct testimony as to the dolorous effect of the policy of the Government in the part of the country to which he belongs. The hon, gentleman commenced by talking of "a cloud no bigger than a man's hand;" a phrase used by my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon), and he went on to refer to the Corn Laws, and he declared that the feeling in England to-day was very much the same as it was at the time of the Corn Laws, and that any attempt to ask England to modify her fiscal policy so as to meet the desires of her colonies in general, and this colony in particular, was utterly futile. Is the hon. gentleman aware of the tone held by the Times newspaper, the leading organ of public opinion in England? Is the hon gentleman aware of the tone held by such a paper as the Economist, probably the greatest journalistic organ on fiscal matters in the world? Is the hon, gentleman aware that there is a great change of feeling in England, and that, in fact, that deification of Richard Cobden that once existed there has passed away, and that the general feeling prevails, as though Carlyle's estimate of him was the correct estimate, when he said in his humorous way, that he regarded Richard Cobden as an inspired bag-man who believed in a calico millenium. Now, Mr. Speaker, I happen to have here an estimate by a distinguished financial authority.

Mr. LAVERGNE.

Mr. AMYOT. That is hearsay evidence.

Mr. DAVIN. If my hon, friend will spare me his suggestions I shall be very glad, because I am sure neither light nor sweetness come from these. I have here, Mr. Speaker, a suggestion made by a distinguished financial authority, and it is a suggestion that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, or whoever representing the Government may go down to Washington, will do well to bear in mind. He is dealing with the McKinley Bill, and he points out cogently and powerfully how England ought to deal with the United States with regard to that All he says bears on the very question raised in the first sentence of the speech of my hon. and learned friend from Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne). He regards the McKinley Bill as a retaliatory measure, and, en passant, he points out that it enables Brazil to favour the United States against England. He declares that the McKinley Bill is a retaliatory measure, and that England is bound to retaliate. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to commit myself to the proposition that I would, under any circumstances, favour retaliatory legisla-I am not dealing with that point; I am discussing the point raised by my hon, friend when he said there was no change in opinion in England with regard to this matter, and as to whether we may or may not expect that England would modify her tariff in another direction than the free trade direction, with a view to affect other tariffs, such as that of the United States. I may say here, that I was perfectly astonished to hear from the hon, gentleman who so ably represents South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) the statement that the Government of Canada, with bated breath and whispered humbleness, had to come down the moment a change took place in the tariff of the country to the south of the line. We konw very well, Sir, that the incidence of commerce is so delicate that if any nation on the continent of Europe were to modify its tariff in any given way it would be for any contiguous nation to consider whether it should not modify its tariff, too. There are some staples that we import from the United States that if we were to deal with in the spirit of this McKinley Bill it would be a matter for the Secretary of State of the United States to consider whether he would not in turn deal with the tariff on such article in an equitable way, corresponding with the change that had taken place in the contiguous country. Here let me pause to call attention to the closing sentence in the speech of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson). I will speak in the spirit of that sentence, and I will ask that for the remainder of this debate hon, gentlemen on my own side of the House—and it is a very Irish position, because it is the other side—as well as hon, gentlemen on this side, will speak and act and vote in the spirit of these words. I will try to vote in their spirit myself; and if the hon, member for South Oxford were here I would ask him to analyse his resolution for me, to show me that the two parts of that resolution hang together, and then that the whole will be beneficial, and if he did that he might find me voting with him.

Mr. LAURIER. You are boasting.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon, friend is too egotistical to suppose that it would be boasting on my part to speak of voting on his side. This is what the hon, member for South Brant said:

"While I may not have convinced him. I trust that by examining each other's views from our different points of view, we may both find our minds enlarged, and may endeavour to promote legislation in this House which shall be for the best interests of the people of Canada." No nobler words were ever spoken in any legislative assembly-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad hon, gentlemen cheer, and would to God men on both sides of the House would go into the debate in that spirit. Then we should not have the kind of debate which we constantly witness. I do not conceal—it may be impertinent on my part not to conceal it—that I utterly disapprove of the character of the debate. We should have a mutual discussion among ourselves as to what will be the best, instead of discussing a definite financial issue with all the heated passions of partisans. Every year we have a discussion on this financial issue, and it reminds me of the etymology of the word "debate." As the hon. leader of the Opposition knows, it is derived from the French word debattre, which in turn is derived from the old French word battre, which means to beat, to lay on; and it is in that meaning that we apply the word here, instead of in that proper meaning which now holds-to interchange opinions, to cross swords in argument, to fight out issues, and then come to conclusions. But what has happened here? There has been no joining of issues whatever, no swords crossed; but in fact we have been beating the air and talking wildly. Now, to show my hon. friend that it is possible that England might change, Mr. William J. Harris proposes retaliation, a tax on the corn and provisions of the United States; and he shows pretty clearly in the Economist of the 14th of March last, that this need not and probably would not cause the cry of dear bread to be raised; and we know that in the main free trade means cheap bread. Hon, gentlemen speak of England being a free trade country, as if everything came into England We know that that is not the case; that free trade there meant not the abolition, but rather the modification of the laws dealing with breadstuffs. Take wheat. England requires about 17,500,000 quarters, or 140,000,000 bushels annually. The wheat exporting power of the world, leaving out the United States, is 224,800,000 bushels. export from Canada is about 5,000,000 bushels, and that from Argentine 8,000,000 bushels; and the output from both these countries is likely to increase enormously. Give Russia with her export of 96,000,000 bushels, and the other exporting countries preferential terms in the English markets, and they would prefer to direct their supplies to Great Britain rather than to Italy, Spain, Germany or France, all of which impose duties varying from 184 cents to 25 cents a bushel. But, as a fact, England might soon rely on her own possessions. India exporting 32,000,000 bushels, Australia 12,000,000 bushels, and Canada 5,000,000, or Australia 49,000,000 bushels out of the 140,000,000 bushels required by England. Anyway it is clear that action on the part of England, challenged by the McKinley Bill, would deprive the United States farmers of the English market. How serious a thing this would be may be gathered from the fact that in 1889 the United States exported to England 36 69 per cent. of the 140,000,000 bushels she required, and in 1887 61 45 per cent. It would be England—it is not at all unlikely that England necessary, of course, to place an import duty on wheat and flour imported from Holland, in order to make the retaliation complete. With regard to maize and meat, of which last Great Britain is almost the sole importer, she would be still more Roumania, Turkey, Russia and independent. Argentine can grow maize quite as cheaply as the United States. Canadians would find a better market than they have even now in England, and we send six and a-half millions worth there. American agriculturists would either have to keep maize and meat at home, or else compete in the English market with other countries on unequal terms. What a row there would be then in the United States! You would have the United States farmer pretty well discontented with McKinley Bills and the authors of them. England, then, is now in a I do not say that she will position to retaliate. retaliate; but she could without raising the cry of dear bread—and it is the cry of dear bread that Lord Salisbury is afraid of—effectively do so. Mark these figures. England requires $477,500,000 worth of farm produce and manufactures; take from this the raw materials of manufacture, such as wool and cotton, amounting to $167,500,000, and you have $310,000,000 worth of imports, on which, without doing the British people the least injury, an import duty could be imposed. Look at the other side. $151,500,000 is all that Great Britain exports to the United States, and this goes in over a tariff wall so high that it may be fairly described as prohibitive. England, therefore, has a fourfold power of retaliation if she wishes to use it; and the sooner, probably, she menaces the use of it the better, for the moment she menaced the use of it I believe the Americans would come down; because, after all, if I were negotiating with American diplomatists I would remember the American character; I would remember that it is a commercial character; that it is a character without the fighting quality or without the point of honour that belongs to a people partly military and partly commercial. Where you have a purely commercial community, you have some virtues that will not flourish in a military community. You will have a wide humanity, you will have the domestic virtues very strong, but the sentiment of honour will be weak, and chivalry will be at a discount; and you will find that the moment you point to their selfinterest, the moment you show them they are likely, in any way, to suffer in the pocket, that moment they will come round to your views. hon, friend beside me whispers that I am becoming too philosophical. If I have soared too high for my hop. friend, I will now come down to his understanding. The great Selden, when he used to go down to the old Builey to defend a man, always took a half gallon of porter, in order, as he would say, to bring down his understanding to the level of the jury. And, Sir, whatever assembly a man is addressing he ought to bring down his understanding to the level of that assembly. Now, my hon. friend from Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) will see that, when you find a man of the distinction of Mr. Harris and the Economist of London discussing the question, it is not at all such an unlikely thing that England, and it will be remembered that during the time of Napoleon we had a war of com-mercial devices between America, France and will take it into her head to retaliate, and she might menace retaliation with the utmost safety. If she did, the result would be that our negotiators, when they go down next autumn to Washington, would have a very easy course indeed. My hon. friend from Arthabaska, unfortunately for the value of his speech in this House, dealt with what he supposed to be facts. He told us something about the indebtedness of Quebec in general and his own county in particular. He told us something about the mortgages on farms and the men who are afraid to close mortgages, and he said the Crédit-Foncier was in a difficulty in consequence. Now, I happen to have, luckily for the value of the debate and luckily also lest the speech to which we have just listened might have carried away hon, gentlemen who may, during the course of this discussion, have been converted to the views of the Government—I happen to have here the Crédit-Foncier reports for 1891; and I find that the number given of those in arrears, against whom suits had to be taken, is 21, and of these 14 paid up before the execution of judgment, so that only 7 remained behind in meeting their engagements, and that on an amount of loans reaching a sum of over $6,600,000. If the rest of the hon, gentleman's facts are as shaky as those with regard to the Crédit-Foncier, the value of his testimony is very small indeed. My hon, friend went on to speak of the exodus. I am not going to deal with that subject. We hear so much of it, the dolefulness of it is such that even my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson), who lately has become more cheerful, is sometimes tempted to fall back on it in order to be in proper tune with his party. It has lain so heavily on the soul of the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) whom I do not see here, that he is probably confined to his room for a few days. We hear this doleful story about the exodus and the condition of Canada, year after year, while, as a fact, we know that Canada is progressing, and no man who goes through the country can fail to know that it is progressing; no man whose eyes are not wilfully closed can fail to see that its productions are increasing and that the comforts of life are more diffused, as may be seen by the amount of raw cotton imported to-day compared with ten years ago, and the small prices at which cotton sells as compared with ten years ago. hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives), other evening, went over the figures in regard to these matters, figures similar to those I had myself from an independent source, and there cannot be the least doubt that we are progressing. these hon. gentlemen remind me of is a story which those of us who have classical reminiscences will remember. I refer to the old Greek story of how Perseus sets out to get the head of the Gorgon, and he has to go to hyperborean regions, behind the north wind, to see the three grey sisters and ask from them where he shall find the Gorgon. And he finds the three grey sisters. There they are, beneath the moon, sitting on ice. They have only one eye among the three and one tooth, and they sing a doleful song of how the old days were better than the present, and they hate the sun and the presence of this young, energetic Greek, half divine, and of a heroism never surpassed—this Perseus who was bound on a most dangerous task, to get the head of that Medusa, which, once looked ship as it is in regard to lawyers and others—ne Mr. DAVIN.

on, would turn the onlooker into stone. sight of this energetic being angers them like the sight of the sun, and they sing the same monotonous wail of how the old times were better than the present, and how they hate the sun and the adventurous hero. When Perseus intrudes on them one wants the eye that she may see him, and the other wants the tooth that she may bite him, and they pass the eye from the one to the other, and they pass the tooth from the one to the other, just as our friends do here. The tooth which our friends pass round is the exodus, and the eye was made in a Yankee workshop and can only see ruin in anything Canadian. They hate the sun, the sun of Canada's prosperity, which at the present hour, is shining above them bright and clear-aye, bright and clear and in, as nations go, an unclouded sky-and the sun of the future may be felt by any man of prophetic vision, any man of prophetic temperament, so to speak; but they hate it all, and they sing the same doleful song of how the old times of deficits were better than these days. Sir, these men are political fanatics who believe in a Yankee millenium and regard the city of Washington as the New Jerusalem. The hon. gentleman spoke about hay, and horses, and eggs. He knows more about civil law than he knows about tariffs on horses. The case he mentions is evidently one in which he was himself engaged, and the witness he examined was probably a witness in his own case, and as we sometimes have found—because I am a lawyer myself and have examined a few witness in my time-witnesses, although extremely conscientious, will lean a little to their own interests, somewhat like the witness that Daniel O'Connell examined. He asked the witness, of what profession are you? The man did not understand; so at last O'Connell said: "I believe you sell milk?" "Yes," he replied; and, then beneath his breath, he added, "and water too." Now, here is my hon friend's calculation about horses. He says that 16,000 were sold to the United States, of which 7,000 were sold from the Province of Quebec. And he asks can we go on? And I am bound to say—I do not wish to be offensive, but when a man is speaking from a pessimistic point of view, it is a great advantage to him to have been furnished by nature with a certain dolefulness of personality—and, I am bound to say that personality added tremendously to the effect, when the hon. gentleman said: Can we go on—the McKinley tariff causes a diminution of 25 per cent. in value? Then the hon. gentleman brings forward this veracious witness whom he put into the box and who says that he could have got, before the McKinley Bill became law, $120 for the horse for which he could only now get $90. Under the McKinley tariff, horses up to $150 are charged $30 per head, so that when you take off $30 from $120, that leaves $90. But before the McKinley Bill, there was a duty of 20 per cent. charged. That would be $24. The difference between $24 and $30 is $6, so what you would have to take off the $120 is $6, and that would give you $114, and not the $90 that this witness, after the pattern that O'Connell has immortalized, was imposing on my friend or some other counsel. My hon. friend, no doubt, is a very good lawyer, but he does not understand much political economy, and it is as true in statesman-

With your permission, I will ask the House to bear with me while I look at this resolu-It has been read several times, so I will not read it again, but there are two parts to it. There is the first part which says it is necessary to reduce the duty on all the prime necessaries of life, and the next part is that we should have the most extended trade relations in manufactures as well as in natural products with the United States. I am not going to be a carping critic about words, but I may say that a man with the great experience of the hon. member for South Oxford might, I think, have used more scientific phraseology than "the most extended trade relations." Why, in one phrase he could have given us the statement that what we want is absolute free trade with the United States. Remember, the most extended trade relations—however, that is mere hypercriticism, and I never descend to To begin with I object, as I believe others before have objected in this debate, that that language is vague. He says we should reduce the How far? By 1 per cent.? By 5 of 1 per By 20 per cent.? By how much? Surely duties. in a resolution of this kind, which is to go before the country, which is intended to influence the people and to be a text on platform after platform, you should have given the people something definite? But the main necessaries of life—what are these? Why not mention them? They cannot be many. But it is the main necessaries of life for the farmer, the artizan, the fisherman and the Visions of fish-hooks, of iron, of agricultural implements, of bread, cheese, bacon, a whole lot of things come before you. On what does the hon. gentleman want the reduction? Is it on bread? He cannot suppose that we want cheap bread in this country when we export so much Is it iron? My hon. friend from Addington (Mr. Dawson) spoke of iron. It sat upon the hon, gentleman's soul that the duty on iron was not reduced, or that it was not let in absolutely free. Suppose we take iron. Are you going to reduce the duty on that? Very well. Then we Very well. Then we You want to reduce reduce the duty on that? come to the second part. the duty on iron, and then you vote on the resolution that you want the most extended trade relations with the United States? What does that mean? Will anyone dare to say that you will not have to build up a wall against the importation of iron on the seaboard side exactly equal to that which they have in the United They want unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. But the leaders in that country have declared: "Do you suppose we are fools to allow you Canucks, and the Britishers, through you Canucks, to deluge our country with goods from Birmingham and Sheffield? No; you must have a tariff like our own." Then, what does the hon. member for Addington and what do all the rest of We have now a duty of $4 a ton. What will they have to pay when this wall is raised? They will have to pay a duty of $6 a ton. reasoning applies to other articles protanto. under which king? I interrupted last night, I think not offensively, the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) by asking him, how can you do this and have unrestricted reciprocity? One after the other has spoken on that side, but not one has explained how you are going to have these duties reduced and then go into a trade partnership with the United States—for that is what it amounts to.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DAVIN. No? I see that some hon, gentlemen can make a cucko cry over those benches, but not one of them, when challenged, can dare to show how they are going to do it. The leader of the Opposition is there. He is an experienced politician, he is a distinguished lawyer, he is a man of subtle intellect. I defy him to show us how he is going to do it, and I say to him that, if he can show how it can be done, I will vote for his motion.

Mr. LAURIER. I told you you were boasting a few minutes ago.

Mr. DAVIN. You are not boasting now, because you are evading the challenge. Show me how you can have unrestricted reciprocity with the states without affecting your tariff on the seaboard. You ought to have shown it, and the member for South Oxford ought to have shown it when he tabled that resolution. But when we challenged him, what did he say? He said, in his peculiarly effective manner: I have not been called in as a physician, but when I am called in, then I will prescribe. The hon. gentleman is not in that position. A physician who is not called in is a physician who does not speak about the case of the patient; the physician who is not called in has nothing to do with it. But what has the hon. gentleman done? He has thrust himself into the patient's room, he has declared that he knew the disease, and he has prescribed. But I will come to the difference, if there is any, between what he has exactly done and what he has not done. I will tell you what he has done. He has done precisely what is done by any doctor who, when asked what are the ingredients of his pills against earthquakes, refuses to tell, and for the best reason in the world—that he does not know. But these doctors are usually quack doctors. In fact the hon. gentleman reminds me of a doctor we have up somewhere near Regina. He has a very peculiar notion about persons suffering from various diseases. Well, there was a young lady who was supposed to be suffering a little from constipation, and he prescribed that she should swallow a living frog. Well, it was impossible to get over the aversion of the patient, and equally impossible—supposing that aversion could be got over—that she could swallow the frog, because her larynx is not extraordinarily large, and the doctor never explained how that could be done. But he went about saying that she must swallow a live frog or she would die. The young lady trips round, and the freshness of her complexion, the brightness of her eye, and the quickness of her step, show that she has a good appetite, is well fed, has a good digestion, &c., &c., and her name is Miss Canada. What does the member for South Cxford say further? He gives you an array of duty paid on this duty, of duty paid on the other, and all coming out of the pockets of the tax-payers, every penny of it, he says. I admit, he says, I have never denied it, that these taxes are paid by the consumer; but, he says, they are paid by the producer too. So that we have here a series of taxes, and you have this peculiar phenomenon in political economy——

Mr. McMULLEN. Finish your frog story.

Mr. DAVIN. Don't you croak too much. In 1882, when I was sitting next to my hon. friend the Minister of Customs, and the hon. member for South Oxford who was replying to Sir Charles | dies and railways as money spent, but this sum of a Tupper, said: "I have never denied, and I admit it and declare it, that the consumer pays the duty just as often as the earth goes round the sun, and the producer pays the duty just as often as the sun goes round the earth." But now he has advanced in his astronomy. He was a disciple of Gallileo when he declared that, but now he declares that not only does the earth go round the sun, but that the sun goes round the earth, that is to say, that the consumer pays the duty and the producer pays the duty too, which, in the colloquial language I used to hear in other days, is "consumedly" absurd. Now, I will not go into the question of how much the farmer would be affected, supposing it possible-

Mr. McMULLEN. Tell us the frog story again. Mr. DAVIN. My hon, friend wants me to finish the frog story; but you see, Mr. Speaker, that not only has the hon, member for South Oxford, in the process of evolution, gone from the astronomical theory that the earth goes round the sun, but he now has got so far as to say that the sun goes round the earth as well, but my hon, friend from North Wellington is also in a process of evolution. The other night he was a tadpole; a few minutes ago you heard from his peculiar croak that he was just on the bridge between the tadpole stage and the frog stage, and now we find from the sound of the last croak that the full grown toad stage has been reached. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon member for South Oxford makes the same statement again and again about the North-West. It has been made by others, I do not think it has ever yet been properly answered. He says in his speech that in one way and another we have spent at least a hundred millions of public money in the North-West.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that there is so able and distinguished a supporter of the member for South Oxford here, when I am about to arraign his calculation. The member for South Oxford makes the statement, but he never gives us the least proof. He goes about the country in the same way; he comes here and he never gives us the least proof. He comes out with bundles of papers, he hovers around the question, he pumps up the most violent epithets he can possibly find in the deep recesses of his abysmal hatred of everything Tory. He goes on in that style, then he pours out lamentations about the safety of the country, and he does not give you the least proof. The most delightful thing about it is this, that his followers take him au sérieux, think him a great statesman (!) and he himself has not the least suspicion of the thoroughly ridiculous character of his position. Now, Sir, what did the Canadian Pacific Railway cost us? Some $55,000, 000, as my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Ross) very properly pointed out yesterday. How does the hon, gentleman get $100,000,000, then for the North-West alone? It must be by adding on the land, the land, that is to say, that has come wholly from the North-West. Suppose I concede to him, for argument's sake, that he has a right to say that $100,000,000 have been spent in the North-West, then I will show him that he has not one Mr. DAVIN.

hundred millions, if it is to be admitted as correct, has given us a return. From Red River to the foot of the Rockies, that is in the North-West proper, the Canadian Pacific Railway has cost to construct $15,767,419, as the hon, member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross) pointed out very properly yesterday. The land subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway was 18,206,986 acres, which at $2 per acre would amount to $36,413,972. Deduct the $15,767,419 it cost in construction, and you will find a balance of $20,646,553, which is what the North-West gave towards the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the older provinces, as was yester-day correctly pointed out by the hon. member for Lisgar. The value of the new towns and villages in the North-West brought into existence by the Canadian Pacific Railway, may be safely placed at $80,000,000. It is more than that, but I put it at $80,000,000. I am in a position to prove by actuarial estimates that that is correct. A railway is said to affect land 20 miles on each side. The railway mileage of the North-West is 2,318 miles. Take $1 per acre as the value added to the land affected by this mileage, and we have an additional value of $59,-340,800. Admitting the figures of the hon. member for South Oxford, what do we have? The accounts stand: To public money sunk in North-West, according to the hon, member for South Oxford, $100,000,000. By balance of land subsidy given by the North-West Territories towards construction of Canadian Pacific Railway in older provinces $20,646,553. Value of new towns created by Canadian Pacific Pailway in the North-West, $80,000,000. Additional value of $1 per acre, to lands affected by railways in the North-West, $59,340,800, or a total of $159,986,353. To this must be added the new wealth created by railroads in the North-West, other than the Canadian Pacific Railway, the increase in the value of property in the older provinces, caused by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the benefits direct, and indirect, of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the whole Dominion, none of which can be put into figures, but it is safe to say that for the outlay of $100,000,000, the country has received a return of over 200 per cent. The hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) goes on to say:

"Have we not got our own North-West census returns taken 4 or 5 years ago, which show that we have succeeded in placing perhaps 9,000 families in the North-West and Manitoba in five years?"

I look at the North-West census, and what do I find? That our North-West census returns show that there was an increase of 72,600 souls, or, at 5 to a family, 14,520 families. However, 3 to a family is too large a proportion for a new country, and the number of families was certainly much Besides that, we have to deplore, and I deplore I have not tried to mend it by example, a large bachelor immigration. But I remember, at the hospitable board of Mr. Manning, of Toronto, some years ago, telling a witty young lady of the poet Goethe, how in his old age, when on the verge of the grave, he was as attractive to the fair sex as in his youth, and I said to her: "The flowers of love inch of ground to stand upon in saying that the North-West has been a burden to Canada. "Ah," she said, "Mr. Davin, the frost, I think, would go hard with those flowers." The frost goes hard with life in the North-West, as I can testify from observation, where levely woman is not found. I have been in many homes, sometimes in bachelors' homes, sometimes in homes where there are families and where woman is, and you can have no idea of the difference. But women are now coming. Men are going east and bringing back wives, and the North-West, in defiance of the breeze and blizzards, when lovely woman once appears, homes happy, contented and prosperous, spring up as beautiful and bright as are to be found in the world. Then the hon, member for South Oxford claims an annual expenditure—and again I call the attention of the House to this—of $7,000,000 on the North-West, of which $4,000,000 is interest on the alleged outlay of $100,000,000. It has been shown that that outlay has returned $200,000,000, in which case the $4,000,000 becomes interest received instead of paid. Now, let me read some tables I have prepared to show the annual revenue and expenditure for 11 years for the North-West. The postal revenue and expenditure I place in a separate table, as no sane man would expect the one to cover the other, or to return anything. Now, Sir, here is the revenue derived from Manitoba and the North-West Territories from 1880 to 1890 inclusive:

That is not bad from a country which was without any railway communication with the outer world until the close of 1878, when the corduroy railway of the hon, member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) went bumping into Winnipeg. What was the expenditure in Manitoba and the North-West during the ten years from 1880 to 1890? I will not go into details, but I will give it in a lump sum. had an expenditure for Indians of $10,467,634; and you may remember that we are not chargeable with that, for these Indians are the wards of the whole Dominion of Canada, and if you never got a cent return for that expenditure, you could not treat these people with neglect. For Mounted Police we spent $6,776,007 in these ten years, and for the Dominion Lands $1,696,394, a total of $18,940,035. deduct the revenue from that, we have $2,038,511 left as a loss—if the hon, gentleman wishes to call it so—but, as I have shown, it is amply met by other considerations. Now, Sir, with such a showing as that, what are you to think of the hon. gentleman who perpetually talks of Manitoba and the North-West as if it were a dead loss upon the hands of the Dominion, and in fact, when epoch; and when you come to our last little we first came down here we used to be told: "We bought you; you are our possession, we purchased you." As a matter of fact, Sir, if you could get all the statistics of the value that the North-West is to Canada, you would find that at the present moment we are paying our way pretty well. But the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in the manner in which he deals with the North-West is like an exacting father who has a prosperous and successful son, and who yet is never content with the way things go on. Now, Sir, the total postal revenue in the North-West and Manitoba for these ten years I have referred to, was $1,212,000, and the total postal expenditure was $2,241,202; leaving a loss in that respect of $828,980. Nobody supposes that that is a serious matter in dealing with the postal service, for I believe there are parts of Canada long settled, where the postal service does not pay; and we must remember that the postal service in any part of Canada cannot be properly considered a mere local service. In order to have the postal service complete you must reach every civilized part of the country, or otherwise your postal service in the more thickly settled part of the country would not be effective. Therefore, you can never take a profit and loss estimate of this service in any given part of the country. That is a point which I particularly wish to impress upon the attention of the I do not think that I have had an opportunity before of showing how absurd were the figures of the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), but the least analysis of the situation shows that his figures and his calculations are utterly absurd. Mr. Speaker, I do hope that when gentlemen come to speak of that great country in the North-West, which is bound up with the future of Canada more than any other part of the whole Dominion, because it has put back-bone into this Dominion; I do hope that they will escape their sense of despair, that they will forget their feelings of gloom, and that they will separate themselves from those pessimistic views they have been accustomed to; that they will allow the light of hope and of confidence to break in upon them. It is not in the partizan manner in which this discussion has been conducted, that we should talk at this hour, when we stand on a height of prosperity that thirty years ago could never have been anticipated, a height of prosperity, from which we can see farther heights, peak rising above peak, on which the light of suns that we may not enjoy are already beaming. I say, Sir, that the proper way would be to approach the great problems that are before us, as brethren engaged in the great task of building up this young That is the proper feeling to have. We should remember that after all, we tread a land that has been trodden from the very first by heroes. This is a young country, but it has an historic past. The men who first explored it were as truly heroes as any men who ever lived in any country, and from Jacques Cartier down, there has been no age in which we have not had men worthy of historical position. When you come to the time when there was a contest as to what race would predominate heroes fought and fell on each side. When you come to the war of 1812, you have for so small a war a larger number of distinguished figures than has ever graced the history of a similar struggle on the banks of the Saskatchewan, it was not merely the fight, but it was that in the depths of winter our young men, mere youths, men unused to arms, marched there in the face of great difficulties over hundreds of miles of ice and snow, because they wanted to build up a na-Would to Heaven that we might discuss the issues in this House in the same spirit, as I hope any of us would go, taking our lives in our hands, into battle for the country in which we live. I remember, Mr. Speaker, in 1870, when I went to Paris to go to the front with McMahon. Just before the last regiments left for the front, there was exhibited in one of the windows a splendid painting representing on the right the armies of the Empire crossing the Rhine at Ehrenbreitztein, and on the left of the canvas you saw, rising before them from their bloody repose, ghosts of the triumphant republicans of the Napoleonic era, beckoning their descendants to cross that river, and to advance to battle-fields, and to win victories where they had won them. But, Sir, that army did not win victories, and why? It was not because they were not of the same heroic race. No; they had become luxurious; they had lost their faith; and therefore they were beaten. I hope that here in Canada, amongst our politicians, there will be the same faith that was shown amongst the young soldiers of our country to whom I have referred. If we have faith in the future of Canada, we can advance with confidence against any difficulty that may be before us, and there is no blessing of a free country; no art in which any people ever excelled, and no height of excellence to which any nation ever climbed, that we may not ambition, and without the least presumption or boastfulness aspire to, and with certainty attain.

Mr. SEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of satisfaction to the hon, member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) who is always very jovial, and who speaks in a manner to command attention, and I might say also, that when he does speak he always speaks in favour of something for Manitoba and the North-West. However, I have never heard any of these gentlemen coming from that country return thanks for what they have received. I would just mention three items of Manitoba and North-West expenditure—the $62,000,000 expended in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Mounted Police looking after the Indians and keeping them from being troublesome, interest would be $2,400,000 a year; $1,000,000 for Indians, and $750,000 for Mounted Police for keeping Indians under control, which together added make something over $4,000,000 spent annually on that country besides other favours they received. My hon. friend very ingeniously endeavours to show the growth of the towns and villages in the North-West Territories, as if they were assets and could be disposed of or turned into cash by the Dominion Government. That is not the case. All we shall derive from them is simply the revenue derived from what duties may be collected on the goods they consume, or from Inland Revenue. The land was sold to these individuals, they made their improvements, and if their lands have increased in value, so much the better for them; but although that is the fact the Dominion of Canada has nothing to do with that. In Ontario we know from sad experience that the increase in the value of lands in Mani-because in the village where I live there is an oat-Mr. Davin.

toba and the North-West, the great debt we have incurred in making up the prosperity of that country, has resulted in a great reduction in the value of property in the province of Ontario; so that while Manitoba and the North-West has gained, the farmers we in Ontario have lost money through the operation. We wish the North-West well, but we hope the members from the new and distant provinces will not make such large applications in future. Immense sums have been spent on immigration, and last season a bonus was given to get people to settle in the North-West, so that I do not know what more they can want, inasmuch as everything has been done for them. They have no need to talk about blue ruin in that country, because some at least, such as fortunate speculators and journalists knew where towns were going to be built, became rich in consequence of their influence with the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway and securing land in desirable localities, but all the people out there are not rich. I know one gentleman who went there and sold a carload of horses, and all he received in cash was $70, the balance of the horses were sold on credit. So that all are not well off, but I do not say that by way of disparagement. My hon, friend has also said that there might be a remote probability of his voting on this question as the Opposition members of this House would wish he should. Well, I think it is very remote, because I remember on one occasion in this House he wrote out a resolution as well as it could be done in the English language, for he is a thorough master of the English language, and I was prepared to vote for that resolution, but I found my hon, friend himself voting against it. Now, I will also say a few words in regard to some remarks made by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). That hon, gentleman, although practising for the most part the healing art, is also engaged in farming; and as he is now the chairman of the Committee of Agriculture and Colonization, it may be justly supposed that he can speak with authority from the farmers' standpoint. He has told you that before the time the National Policy was introduced, there was a market in Canada for the produce raised by Canadian farmers; and we have been told very often that there was no market until after the National Policy was introduced, because the manufacturers were then given a start and made the market for what farmers had to sell. It is therefore apparent the one statement contradiets the other. At all events, in 1881, our population was something like 4,300,000, and we know that at that time the country raised a large amount of wheat, which was then a staple article and was exported largely. Now, Sir, I contend that, suppose the Dominion had a surplus of five or six million bushels of wheat to export after having sufficient for home consumption, and suppose 100,000,000 bushels were imported into this country and exported afterwards to another country, the effect on this country would only be the gain or loss in handling that large quantity of grain; it would not, as contended, flood or destroy the Canadian market. The same principle applies to barley, oats or any other grain or produce raised and sold in this country. It has been stated that we have our own market, because oats do not come into this country. I know this is not correct, meal mill, and I know that the proprietors of that mill buy oats in the United States, and grind them in bond and ship them out again; and this does not injure the Canadian farmer because these oats come in early from Detroit, St. Louis and Chicago, and affords labour to the men employed and does not injure the Canadian market. I never knew oats to be as low in price as 25 cents a bushel before the National Policy came into force. I remember that wheat was $1.50 per bushel oftentimes, both during the period we had reciprocity and afterwards, but I have never known that price or near it paid during the 12 years of the National Policy; and the late leader of the Government, Sir John Macdonald, after the reciprocity had been in force six years, when speaking at Caledonia, in 1860, said that if there was one thing that benefited the farmers of this country more than another it was the reciprocity treaty of 1854, and in saying that he spoke correctly. Now, in regard to what has been said about the hon. Finance Minister taking the duty off sugar, I certainly agree with that step, and that is what the Liberal party has always been contending for, and is just what the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford asks for. We contend for a reduction of the duties on the articles of prime necessity used by the people; therefore we are satisfied with that reduction on raw sugar, and I give the Finance Minister credit as far as he goes. it is different with the Conservative party. have told us repeatedly that by putting duties on articles which are consumed by the people, does not raise the price, and now they tell us that taking the duty off sugar reduces the price. They must have experienced a change of heart in this matter. I venture to say that if any of them goes to buy a dollar's worth of sugar and gets five or six pounds more for a dollar than he did before, he will see that our view is correct. They are coming to our way of thinking, and I am very glad to know that that is the case. Now, Sir, it was not very long ago that a committee was appointed at the instance of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) to investigate the combines, monopolies and trusts, and that committee found that these evils did exist in the country to a very They found that every article, from large extent. that used by the infant in the cradle to the time when man came to the last scene in life and the undertaker had to perform the last sad rite, were taxed, and sold at exorbitant prices by the combines which the National Policy fostered. It is the high duties which give these combines life, vigour and power; and without these duties they could not exist, or if so for a short time and to a limited extent, one year was sufficient for the oatmeal combine to exist. It is no wonder then that the Bill was a dead letter. It was said that the Senate had, by changing a few words, destroyed its usefulness; but that was not the case. It was the National Policy that killed it, and the hon. gentleman who was the parent of the Bill and also a supporter of the National Policy, was one of the executioners who helped to strangle the measure for the restraint We have heard of many whom the National Policy has benefited. No doubt, some people have made themselves rich by its operations, and are put forward as examples of its good influence. I remember an instance of a gentleman who had been so well treated by the National Policy that he could afford to speak very favourably of it at a stand the reasons why they sent so many members.

meeting which he was addressing, but, after he had finished, a farmer, who was an intelligent man, who had been battling with life for a number of years and had got the worst of it, the high duties he had to pay having gradually reduced his means until he. had very little left, came on the platform; and his appearance, voice and surrounding seemed to indicate that what he said would spring from the bottom of his heart. He said to the audience: "Behold an example of the National Policy." There was another incident of which I was informed, during the late election, when, close to some of the cartoons of Government supporters, illustrating the old flag, the old policy and the old leader, was a bill advertising a bailiff's sale, showing that some poor farmer had gone under and was helped down under the operations of the National Policy. The farming interest is the largest in the Dominion, and, therefore, should receive the best As far as we know from the consideration. returns, the value of farm lands in Ontario amounts to $640,480,801; the value of farm buildings amounts to $188,293,226; the value of farm implements amounts to $49,754,832, and of live stock $102,839,235, making a total of $961,367,-This is the value according to the return of Mr. Blue. It is hard to say what the actual value is, but this is the most reliable that can be had. However, it is more like the asking than the selling price, for it is only when a farm comes to be sold that the real value can be obtained. people are asked the value of their land for the purpose of statistics, they do not care to say that its value is low, and it is only when there is a forced sale that it is known the value is 25 to 30 per cent. less than it was twelve years ago, another matter to which I wish to call attention, and that is the unjust and impartial expenditure of public money, caused by the National Policy. A return was brought down showing how much money has been expended by the Dominion Government in each province since Confederation in subsidies and railways built, other than the main line of the Intercolonial Railway. In 1881, Nova Scotia, with a population of 440,572, had received subsidies to the extent of $26,138, and railways built by the Dominion to the value of $7,821,-070, making a total of $7,847,208. New Brunswick, with a population of 321,233, received in subsidies $888,731, and railways were built in that province by the Dominion costing $3,371,854, making a total of $4,259,585. Then the Province of Quebec, with a population of 1,359,027, has received subsidies to the amount of $2,428,344, and railways built by the Dominion to the extent of $5,520,323; total $7,948,667. The population of the Province of Ontario in 1881 was 1,923,228. There were no railways built by the Dominion, but subsidies were received from the Dominion amounting to $3,061,901. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, with a population of 761,905, received $12,106,793, while Ontario with a population of 1,923,228 received only $3,061,901. So, Sir, you see there has been a great discrimination, and I am told that in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick there have been favoured spots, and that there are some constituencies which have not received any consideration whatever, simply because they do not support the Government; and when we see the large amounts given to these provinces, we under-to support the present Government. There is un- received $745,140; Nova Scotia, 71, and received fair and unjust discrimination against Ontario, and we remember very well the large and influential Manitoba, 88, and received $22,811; British Codeputation which came to this House, on the 21st May, to interview the Minister of Railways and Canals who was at the head of the Government. The deputation consisted of representatives chosen from 150 municipalities. The delegates said: We have spent our money, and taxed ourselves to a large extent in granting bonuses to railways in the counties where we live and represent and have received nothing from the Dominion Government, and now that the Dominion Government is entering on a policy of subsidizing railways in different parts of the Dominion, we want to receive remuneration to a certain extent, and it would only be just and fair these railways should receive $3,000 per mile and that amount should be returned to the municipalities that have received nothing from the Dominion Government in order to put them on an equal footing with other portions of the Dominion that have received so much in the past notwithstanding the large amount we have expended. It was said to them: We do not know whether the members of the other provinces will be willing to give you anything or not. But what, Sir, do we see this session, $80,000 voted yearly for twenty years to a wild-cat scheme in Hudson's Bay, and the just rights of the people in Wellington Grey, Perth, Bruce and Simcoe are disregarded. And I believe the representatives of Ontario, if they would stand true to their own interests, would not be treated in this way; but I am sorry to say that partyism is so strong that they will not look after their own interests. We saw that the other day when the question came up to take the duty off binding twine. Although only a few of the manufacturers are interested in keeping on the duty the large body of the farmers are interested in having it taken off, and many of them have been discussing whether it would not be better to bind as formerly with the hand and use the old reaper rather than pay the extra cost of twine. So we know there was no relief given to them; it is the manufacturers' interests that are looked after. mers' small request was refused. It has been said that the United States is no market for us and that Great Britain is the only market. It is true that what the hon, member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) said, the United States was the market for our horses, barley, eggs and some other articles, but I shall show positively that that is the case by referring to the Trade and Navigation Returns. The produce which has been most beneficial to us in the past has found a market in the United States. It has been pointed out that some of the farmers in the United States are poor and do not get along as well as we do, and I do not doubt that is true, we do not expect to sell our grain and produce to those poor farmers. It is sufficient for us to know that there is a market there which we have had in the past and which we might have now. In regard to horses, according to the last return, which is only up to the 30th June, 1890, we shipped horses to Great Britain as follows:— Ontario, 24 horses, value $3,400; Quebec, 99 horses, value $14,275; Nova Scotia, 2 horses, value

Mr. SEMPLE.

$7,817; New Brunswick, 724, and received $84,147; lumbia, 4, and received $575; Prince Edward Island, 167, and received $19,420; so that, while there were sold from the whole Dominion of Canada 125 horses to Great Britain, for which we received $17,925, we shipped to the United States 16,118 horses, and received a total of $1,887,895, and that was $225,875 less than the value of what was shipped the previous year. That settles the contention that the United States is the market for horses. Before passing from that subject, I might show in an intelligent, common-sense way, who pays the duty on those horses. We know that there were three markets for our horses. First, there was the market in Canada where the seller could sell to a neighbour or in cities, towns and villages for use in this country. There was short freight and no duty to pay. Then, there was the market in Great Britain. There was a long carriage and the cost of freight was high, but no duty to pay. Then, there was the market in the United States, where there was 20 per cent. to pay, or $20 on each horse worth $100. If the buyer purchased a horse in this country, he calculated upon the 20 per cent. being paid before he got to the United States market, and paid the farmer so much less for the horse than if there was no toll or duty in reaching that market; and returns show that the United States is the only place worthy to be called a market for horses. We have been told that free and unrestricted trade would injure the price of wheat. Ten years ago, wheat was a commodity which we exported to a large extent, but now it is of secondary importance to the farmer, who makes his calculations on other articles of produce. Undoubtedly most of our wheat goes to Great Britain. The amount of wheat shipped to Great Britain, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, was 410,796 bushels, and the cash received for that was $379,893. The wheat which we shipped to the United States was 6,723 bushels, of the value of $6,589. Thus, all the wheat we shipped to the United States and Great Britain amounted to 417,519 bushels, of the value of $386,482. Consequently, you will see that wheat is of comparatively small importance. Pease is also a crop upon which we do not calculate much in shipping to the United States, but it is worth while to see the difference in the price of pease exported to Great Britain and the United States. We sent to Great Britain 1,857,970 bushels of pease, and received therefor $1,190,836. To the United States, we sent 437,775 bushels, and received $371,332. While the pease which were shipped to Great Britain realized 64 cents a bushel, those which were sent to the United States, after paying 10 cents a bushel duty, brought 84 cents to the seller in this country. In fact he received 20 cents a bushel more than he would have received if he had been forced to send those pease with the other pease that were sent to Great Britain. Another article which is very beneficial to the farmer to produce is barley. Of barley, we sent to Great Britain from Ontario 11,096 bushels and received $4,493, and from Quebec 16,036 and received $7,524, $250; making in all 125 horses from the Dominion, at a total value of $17,925. Turning to the United States, we find that Ontario shipped 7,373 horses, and received $1,007,985; Quebec, 7,691 horses, and which we received $4,566,702, and from Quebec

androden and the second of the 31,378 bushels, which realized $15,860. The $1,793,104. That was a decrease from the Dominion shipped to the United States a total of vious year of $363,000, and there can be no other cause for this except the fact that when the Mcis exported to and that the only profitable market is in the United States. It is all very well for hon, gentlemen to tell us to try the two-rowed barley, that it will fill the place of the six-rowed. I think it will not suit this country. I sowed a small portion of the two-rowed barley last season along with the six-rowed barley, giving both the same treatment—sown at the same time, in the same field, under the same conditions. rowed barley was about three weeks later in ripening, and I think, from the appearance, so far as I could judge by the eye, that there was twice as large a crop of the common variety grown in this country as of the two-rowed barley, and we know the common variety of barley has been profitable to the farmers in the past; at best the two-rowed English barley is only an experiment. Now, I will explain the opinions and actions of the people of this country about the time the McKinley Bill came into effect. That Bill went into force on the 6th day of October last year, and Conservatives and Reformers all through the country were trying to get threshing machines to threshout their barley as early as possible in order that they might get it across the line, and the buyers were urging them on so that they might get it shipped before the duty was put on. So much was this the case that I was informed that over them on so that they might get it 4,000,000 bushels were shipped to the United States before the 6th of October, when the Mc-Kinley tariff went into effect. They knew full well it would reduce the price, and before I get through I shall read a quotation from the Toronto Empire to show that the price of barley was reduced to the full extent of the 20 cents a bushel additional imposed by the McKinley tariff. I consider that barley is one of the most profitable crops we raise in this country, but so far as I can see in the region of country I travel through in going home, a very small quantity was sown this year; the people believe it will not be profitable and that this additional duty will shut it out of the United States market, which is our only market. Now, it has been mentioned that last spring barley went up. What was the cause of it? The cause was the scarcity of grain. I remember well that last year people were using barley as a substitute for oats, which were selling for 50 cents per bushel, and pease went up to 75 and 80 cents a bushel, and that is the only reason barley went up in the spring of last year, as barley was used as a substi-tute for pease and oats. Now, there is another article that goes largely into the United States, that is eggs. I will read from the Trade and Navigation Returns to show where the eggs are marketed that we produce in this country. I find that in the return I quoted from, there were only 3,600 dozen went from this country to Great Britain, realizing the sum of $820. But Ontario shipped the same year to the United States 9,328,182 dozen, realizing $1,322,986; Quebec shipped 721,119 dozen, realizing $121,422; Nova Scotia sold 488,654 dozen, realizing $58,042; New Brunswick sold 450,443 dozen, realizing Nova Scotia sold 488,654 dozen, realizing $58,042;

New Brunswick sold 450,443 dozen, realizing $54,598; Manitoba sold 30 dozen, realizing $4;
Prince Edward Island sold 1,834,307 dozen, realizing $236,052. Altogether Canada exported 12,825,735 dozen to the United States, realizing the Northern at 45 cents."

"Barley was unsettled, the weaker outside markets making buyers less anxious to take hold; at the same time sellers steadily maintained former quotations, offerings were rather larger. A sale of 13,000 bushels by sample was made at equal to 48 cents Port Perry, but the quality going hardly a No. 3 Extra. A lot of No. 3 was offered on the Northern at 45 cents."

Kinley Bill was before Congress the people were expecting its effect and were getting ready for it. The spring before the McKinley Bill came into force, a large dealer in the village of Fergus, Mr. Wilson, who always buys a large quantity of eggs, and his agent informed me: We are paying 8 cents per dozen for eggs because we expect the McKinley tariff in force in the fall, and a year ago we paid 13 cents per dozen. That may be the reason there was $363,621 less realized from eggs this year than last year. I will read you the remarks of Professor Shaw in regard to this matter. He touches on the barley and egg business. He is one of the professors of the Guelph Agricultural College, and knows whereof he speaks; he understands his business very well, and he speaks with authority. This is what Professor Shaw says:

"To any man who is free to think candidly and clearly, and to any man who wishes to do himself the justice of knowing the truth, there can be no room for doubt as to the immense damage done to the agricultural interests of this country by the McKinley Bill. Next year will see the poultry and egg trade of Canada almost annihilated. We managed to forestall the closing of the American market by shipping our eggs and barley across the border earlier than usual last season, but we cannot do that next year. With regard to the possibility of the European or British trade, Prof. Shaw said the prices there are purely problematical. If the old country market for eggs should prove better than or equal to that of the United States, private traders would soon discover that fact without any special board of commissioners finding it out for them. The wonder was that the egg merchants had not learned that "To any man who is free to think candidly and clearly board of commissioners finding it out for them. The wonder was that the egg merchants had not learned that they could make money in the transatlantic trade before this late day. The simple truth Prof. Shaw has ascertained to be, that Canada will lose by the McKinley Bill $500,000 in the egg business alone; that is, if our farmers continue to produce as many eggs at the greatly reduced prices of the future as they have produced in the past. But the chances are that the falling off in the production will occasion enormously greater loss. The great decline however will be in the barley trade. About duction will occasion enormously greater loss. The great decline, however, will be in the barley trade. About 9,000,000 bushels of this grain has been annually exported, and if this volume of trade is kept up next year, the loss will be pretty nearly $1,800,000, or the full extent of the duty. When asked about the prospect of two-rowed barley coming into general cultivation and thus compensating for the increased duties, Prof. Shaw replied that there was nothing to indicate such a change."

This is no doubt correct. The hon, member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) tried hard to show the McKinley tariff had not and would not injure the barley market. I bought a certain quantity last season at 42½ cents a bushel, and I was told by the farmer I bought it from he could have got 65 cents per bushel for it before the McKinley tariff came into force. This is only one instance in many I could name where the farmers lost 20 cents per bushel, being the difference between the old duty and the McKinley tariff, and I think the figures I have here will corroborate that statement. This report was taken from the Empire of 30th January, 1891, two or three months after the McKinley tariff had come into force. It shows the difference of the prices in Toronto and Buffalo, the highest price in Toronto was $1 per bushel for wheat as against $1.10 in Buffalo. With respect to barley the following is the report of the Toronto market:-

The following is the report of prices in Buffalo the same day :-

"Barley—3 offerings; maltsters are figuring on large trade, but hold back for a break to meet their views. Quotations: No. 2 Canada, at 88 to 90 cents; No. 3 Extra, 85 cents; No. 3, 82 to 83 cents."

These prices are not for the first class barley we raise in Canada, but for barley like American barley, and while that barley was sold for 45 cents in Canada it realized 83 cents in Buffalo on the same day according to the report of the Empire. I was also informed, because I obtained the railway freight, that in my section where barley at that time was selling at from 45 to 48 cents per bushel, it could be taken to Buffalo for 5 cents per bushel; also that the freight to Buffalo was only one cent The freight to Montreal, more than to Toronto. however, was 9 cents more than to Buffalo. With respect to oats the following report appears on the same date:

"Toronto—Market dull and easy to-day on spot, there being three sellers at 45 cents on track. In the west a few cars changed bands at 41 cents for white and 40 and 40½ cents for mixed."

"Buffalo—Oats scarce; higher. No. 1 white, 51 cents per bushel of 32 lbs., or 54 cents per bushel of 34 lbs., being 10 cents per bushel higher in Buffalo than in Toronto after freight is paid."

So there is a difference of 10 cents per bushel on oats. An hon, gentleman opposite has spoken about our potatoes being sold for about 30 cents per bushel. In the quotations appearing in this newspaper, potatoes appear as selling at $1 per bushel in Buffalo. The highest price paid in my section was $1 per bag, or less than 70 cents per bushel. From these quotations appearing in the Empire, which no doubt told the truth on this occasion, the Canadian farmer did lose the duty on those potatoes and would have received that much more if there had been no duty. Knowing this fact, it is no wonderthat the farming community are very anxious to have free trade with the United States. I estimate that, on an ordinary 100-acre farm, the gain to the farmer, if we had free trade with the United States, would be about $200 a year as follows:—10 acres, 250 bushels barley, at 30 cents duty, $75; 10 acres, 300 bushels oats, at 10 cents duty, $30; 7 acres, 150 bushels pease, at 10 cents more per bushel, $15; 20 lambs, $15; one horse, $30; one acre, 100 bushels potatoes, $25; egg duty, $10. That is a reasonable calculation, without exaggeration. The people have not felt the effect of the McKinley tariff up to the present time, but when they find it will bear so heavily upon them, they will think all the worse of it. It has been said by hon, gentlemen opposite that we cannot prevent the McKinley tariff being imposed by the United States. But if the Government have the opportunity of making a reciprocal treaty in natural and manufactured products and fail to do so, the people will hold hon, gentlemen opposite guilty for having failed to do their duty. Hon, gentlemen opposite when they dissolved the last Parliament declared they did so because they wished the question of reciprocity to be discussed by the people, and a new Parliament to be elected to deal with it. I doubt whether it is ground for satisfaction to hon, gentlemen opposite that the majority of the members returned by the two large provinces of Ontario and Quebec are in favour of unrestricted reciprocity. Hon. gentlemen favour of unrestricted reciprocity. Hon, gentlemen do nothing but ask what we are going to do and find fault generally. It is easy to do so, and indeed it is that—silly because they expressly accuse the American Mr. SEMPLE.

the business of lawyers to find fault. But with all their ingenuity they cannot deceive the people, who are thoroughly alive to the great advantages to be derived from unrestricted reciprocity and are prepared to carry out that policy. Many quotations have been made by hon, gentlemen opposite from American journals at different times, and I will follow their example and read a few extracts. The New York Tribune of 6th March, said:

"If the Liberal party lose they can but be obstructed, not permanently put down, for their cause as far as Canada is concerned is the cause of progress, safety and wealth. The Government on the other hand winning, can enjoy but a brief and inglorious triumph; its success can be continued only as a delegative of indicating the same of the continued only as a delegative of indicating the continued on strued only as a declaration of industrial war against the United States, its leaders with droll audaeity have left us no option but to shut our doors against and to hold them hostile if not dangerous neighbours, there can only be one result of methods os self hurtful. The resources of Clanada, as they are any part page type to destruct the destruction. vast and rich as they are, can only postpone the destruc-tion of a Government wedded to profligacy, monopoly, debt and disorder."

On 6th March, Secretary Blaine, speaking of the Canadian elections, said:

"As a matter of fact the Administration is utterly in-different as to the result, none of the members of the Cabi-net took any interest in the matter and cared less about it than Canadians usually do about our elections.

An American from Rochester told me a similar story. He said that one would imagine from the reports of Canadian politicians that the people of the United States felt a warm interest in the country, and wanted to gobble up Canada; but really the American people care less about the Dominion elections than about the return of a trustee in a school section. I will now quote some article, from American newspapers to show what the people of the United States think of the assertion frequently made in this House and in the country that there is a combination to bring about annexation. Let me remark that the journalists of the United States keep themselves well informed on what transpires here; they are not in the dark as to what we do, and I shall read this to show what It says: their view is.

"Not much that is new has been added to what was already known concerning the progress of the trade negotia-tions between our Government and that of the Dominion by the despatches given out yesterday at Ottawa. They show simply that cordial relations were established at Washington by the Canadian Commissioners, and that the negotiations will be resumed in October in a spirit that Washington by the Canadian Commissioners, and that the negotiations will be resumed in October in a spirit that indicates a desire on both sides to come to an agreement. All the correspondence in Canada's possession that has a real value to the public was withheld from yesterday's publication. The missing papers undoubtedly were those wherein Secretary Blaine expressed the terms on which the negotiation must be based. We can well understand the indisposition of the Dominion Government to give out these letters just now. They would show, we suspect, that Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper have already committed themselves to a measure of reciprocity much larger and broader than they defined as their police during the late electoral campaign. That they would be obliged to do this if they really desired to perfect a treaty was plainly put in Mr. Blaine's published letter to Congressman Baker, and when the time comes they will learn that the length to which they must go is about as far as the commercial unionists have all along prescribed. This is an appropriate opportunity for some plain speaking to our Canadian friends. They know, or ought to know, that the American people without party distinctions carnestly desire to be on the friendliest terms with them. Their character as a highly moral, intelligent, industrious, law-respecting, progressive and enterprising people is perfectly well known to us, and by us much esteemed."

Another article from the New York Tribune says:

Another article from the New York Tribune says:

people as a whole of scheming with the Canadian Liberals to bring about the annexation of the Dominion; worse, because their inevitable effect, coming from so prominent a politician, is to create a harmful prejudice against the United States in the minds of vast numbers of Canadians. Good reputation, to nations as to individuals, is a right, and for the responsible and representative official of one nation to speak slanders of another is to commit an offensive act. Mr. Tupper ought to be ashamed of himself. It is given out that he is to be one of the commissioners whom Sir John Macdonald intends to send to Washington presently, a fact, if it be a fact, which renders his talk the more indecent. Indeed, it is only fair to say that his appointment, in view of these speeches and others made during the campaign, would create a disagreeable impression in this country, if it did not raise a painful question at the White House."

At a recent meeting in Cleveland (Ohio) the platform adopted by the State Democratic Convention contains the following plank:—

"We favour closer commercial relations with Canada and the removal of the embarrassing and annoying restrictions which only vex our people without yielding any substantial revenue to the Government. Speaking before the convention upon reciprocity Mr. Thurman said the time is near when the people will express their belief in complete and not restricted reciprocity. If reciprocity, which has always been a Democratic, not a Republican doctrine, is a good thing with South America, why would it not be a better thing in Canada and Europe, with which our trade is a hundredfold greater than it is with South America? The time has also come when the people will say to the powers that be, that the honest workingman shall no longer be compelled by law to contribute a part of his hard-earned savings to help maintain those who, under the forms of law, have robbed him for over a quarter of a century; when they will no longer sustain any party which levies and collects one dollar of taxes over and above that which is required to wisely and economically administer the affairs of the Government: when they will give due notice that infant industries that have been nursed for 100 years have arrived at the age when they must take care of themselves; when they will brand a protective tariff as stealing, its advocates as beggars, and demand that we must have a tariff for revenue only."

Another meeting was held in the same state, and they made the following deliverance:—

"We demand the reduction of tariff taxes, and will continue the battle for tariff reform until the cause of the people is triumphant. All money taken by law from the people shall go into the public treasury. Tariff taxes shall be for revenue only. All so-called protective tariff taxes are dishonest, wasteful and corrupting. They plunder the masses to enrich the few. They have crippled agriculture, retarded manufacturing, created trusts, destroyed commerce and corrupted our law-makers. Therefore we are opposed to the McKinley Tariff Bill now pending in Congress."

The State of Michigan also spoke on this subject, and they said:

"We denounce and condemn the high tariff policy of the present Administration, and demand that our tariff and internal revenue taxes shall not be higher than to maintain the Government economically administered. We especially condemn the McKinley Tariff Bill, which still further restricts the market for American products, while it increases the burden of taxation. We denounce it, because it has not a section or a line that will open a new market for a single bushel of wheat or a single barrel of pork, and also because it still further restricts our market and limits our trade with the world—a policy that must more and more depress American agriculture, lessen the value of American farms, and increase the cost of living to the American people."

That is the fact. They view things in the United States just in the same light as we view them here. It is a thought worthy for the people of Outario to contemplate that the value of farm lands in Ontario is $640,000,000 in round numbers. The net debt of this country is $237,000,000, and when we consider the fact that if a farmer starts at Windsor and comes down by Ottawa to the County of Soulanges; then starts from Toronto and goes back to Owen Sound or Southampton, and starts at

Hamilton and goes to Hog's Bay, Barrie and Collingwood, that the national debt is a good deal higher than one-third of the value of all that land he has travelled over or can contemplate in the journey. When we hear gentlemen on the other side of the House talk about the prosperity of the country, we must remember that there are about ten or eleven million dollars a year of the money of this country which goes to the English capitalists to pay the interest on our debt, and for which we never receive any return. That is one of the reasons of the reduced value of farms and property; because there is no doubt that if you put high taxes on farms or villages or upon anything else, in all cases the taxes reduce the value of that property. I hope that the Government will now call a halt, and consider the situation of the country. They talk about the country being prosperous, but we know that when people are borrowing money on a farm from a loan company they are happy because they can put their hand on a five dollar bill, but by-and-bye, their money leaves them and they have to pay interest for the money which they receive. In a short time they borrow a little more; then a little later the farm is gone; and although we do not believe that this country will go this way, it is putting the country in a position that we do not like to see. However, there is a confiscation of the property of farmers gradually, but surely going on caused by the indebtedness of this country after the expenditure of over $100,-Farmers cannot realize any more for We remember very the expenditure but less. well that in the early settlement of Canada people who came had very little and they denied themselves the necessaries of life in order that they might become independent and have a home in their old age. And now we see that there is a debt of $48 on each person comprising the population of this country, and that it is increasing; and what the end will be it is hard to say. Many men with fat government offices and men with large contracts have hope in the country, and they have reason for it; and we have hope in the country, that have neither government positions nor contracts that, while it enriches the individual, impoverishes the country to a certain extent. we want a change, and I have no doubt that if we could have unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, it would increase the value of farm property 25 per cent., which on $640,000,-000 would mean an increase of $160,000,000. hope this policy will be carried out. I hope that the good sense of the people in this country and in the United States will result in the negotiation of a treaty that will bring wealth and prosperity to this country and be beneficial to the United States and honourable to Great Britain. We know very well that the rulers of Great Britain wants nothing more or better than to see people in this country contented, happy and prosperous. We have heard about Farrer being in league with people across the This is only because they have nothing better They cannot show a single sentence in the Globe, and it is assumed Farrer is a writer for that journal, which is disloyal to Canada or Great Britain. But another journal, once the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, and Farrer, the chief writer, made the remark that if the tariff interferes with British connection, so much the worse for British connec-sense bargain with the United States that will be acceptable to all parties and be greatly beneficial to the farmers of the whole Dominion.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. ADAMS. In claiming the indulgence of this House, I assure you, Sir, that I shall be as concise as possible in dealing with some of the points raised by the various speakers who have taken part in this We have had, during this discussion on the resolution of the hon. Finance Minister and the amendment thereto of the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), all sorts of ques-All the matters in connection with recitions raised. procity, and in connection with the National Policy, and in connection with the administration of the country by this Government, have been discussed in detail from every point of view. Each speaker has treated the subject in his own peculiar way, some dealing with it as it suited their own localities and their own provinces, while others have taken broad and general ground and discussed it from the national standpoint. In view of the various manners in which the different speakers from the east to the west have dealt with the subject under discussion, I desire to submit to the House, as best I can, matters which, to my mind, demand most the attention and consideration of this Parliament. We hear to-day the same old cries hurled against this side of the House, that the Government have been negligent in their administration of our public affairs, and that they have neglected public business to such an extent that a vote of condemnation should be passed upon them. Hon. gentlemen opposite urge that the Government of to-day is just as responsible as was the Government between 1867 and 1873, and ought to be similarly dealt with. The same policy, the same cries, the same crude criticism are used by the Opposition against the Government to-day as were used between 1867 and 1873. When we come to consider the questions of the past, when we come to dered by their late leader, but it is evident, looking Mr. SEMPLE.

give to them that fair and honest consideration and criticism which the importance of the questions then before Parliament demanded, it is only just and right that we should bring to bear, in our criticisms and judgment upon the acts of the Administration, that fair-play and honest dealing to which the Government are entitled, recognizing the great responsibilities that rest upon them, either in case of failure or success. Why, is it possible to-day that we sitting here should be told that the old Government, from 1867 to 1873, were negligent in their conduct of the affairs of the country? We are told that if they had acted prudently and wisely, the Treaty of 1854 which continued to 1866 would have been renewed. What is the use of talking such nonsense as that, and bringing up these old issues, when those same men who sat on the other side from 1867 to 1873 hurled the same denunciations against the Treasury benches of that time which they are now hurling against the Government? They said then as they say now that if they were to occupy the Treasury benches they would solve the problem, that indefinite problem and that uncertain policy which they initiated at the last election. When they got into power before, with all their promises of what they would accomplish they ignominiously failed in obtaining a renewal of that reciprocity treaty. I propose to quote utterances from some of the best men in the Liberal party on this subject, men who governed and controlled the country at that time; and to show that they were unable to succeed in this matter as well as the Administration that they followed. Let me cite an authority which will, no doubt, carry weight, though it may have been quoted before in this House, the testimony of the late Hon. George Brown in reference to this ques-He says:

"But be this as it might, it was not for the people of Canada to be influenced by any such anticipation. They had shown their ability to open new markets for themselves when the American market was closed against them, and the clear path for them was to follow with redoubled energy and perseverance the policy on which they had entered. * Let them seek to develop their great natural industries, and especially the agricultural, shipping, fishing and lumber industries. Let them open up new markets adapted to their traffic, and let the Canadian flag be found floating on every sea."

These are the words of wisdom that fell from the lips of the Hon. George Brown, and this was the legacy he left to his Liberal friends. He was unable and his party were unable to succeed in what they desired, and this brought to the mind of Mr. Brown the fact that Canada must do something for herself, that she no longer could depend with any hope upon a renewal of that treaty, and he advised that the policy he mapped out should be adopted, that the views he submitted for their guidance should be followed, and then that success would Within the boundaries of this little nation of ours, we are able, if we have fair-play, to compete with the rest of the world. Only give us the chance, let us avail ourselves of what we have, and we will secure Reading between the lines of the words I have quoted from the late Hon. George Brown, it appears that he marked out to the Liberal party, that the only security for Canada was to adopt a national policy. He laid the foundation and gave the advice that the time was not far distant when they must adopt a trade policy for themselves as against the United States. My hon. friends on the other side do not see fit to follow the advice tenbackward and observing the words which were uttered then, the people were told to look to the development of our own country and to develop its resources, and that in that way only would we meet with success. As another illustration, let me quote the words of wisdom which fell from another hon, gentleman who occupies a seat in this House to-day—I refer to the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, late Premier of Canada. He said:

"I deprecate the idea of cringing to the Americans." Is that the policy of the Liberal party to-day? Do they demand that we shall not cringe to the United States? Is it not their policy that we shall try to negotiate with the United States in such a way that the control of our fiscal policy will be taken from Canadians and placed in the hands of the United States? Later on I will prove that their policy of unrestricted reciprocity must mean political union—there is no other solution. Mr. Mackenzie says:

"I deprecate the idea of cringing to the Americans. I fully appreciate the benefits of reciprocity, but I do not think it becomes us, under present circumstances, to make any efforts for its renewal. I believe that we should pursue our trade policy without regard to reciprocity."

What words of encouragement do we need more than those? There should be no cringing to the Americans, he believes, but that we should pursue our own trade policy without regard to reciprocity. He tells us to depend upon ourselves, to test our own strength, and that the country can provide for its own wants, and, if the old member would speak again, I believe he would repeat the same words: "Let us not cringe to the Americans but have hope in ourselves." And it must be remembered that these are words coming from hon. gentlemen of the opposite party, who differ from us, who oppose us, and who charge the Administration of to-day with gross mismanagement of public business. Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to another authority, the authority of the hon. gentleman who has moved the amendment to the resolution, the member for South Oxford. If I take him as an authority, hon. gentlemen opposite must consider him a good one. Now, surely the words that have fallen from his lips must have some influence with the men of this country. The hon, gentleman, in 1878, spoke in the constituency of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), and speaking with all the responsibility of a Cabinet Minister, when addressing the people of that place in reference to the question of reciprocity with the United States and the failure on the part of his Government and of the preceding Government to obtain a further continuation of it, what advice did he give to the people of the Island? He said:

"If you say you are going to frighten the United States into reciprocity by imposing certain duties on articles now coming in from that country, all I have to say is this, that the men who tell you that reciprocity with the United States is essential to your existence are, in my opinion, playing a most unwise and unpatriotic part."

I wonder if that is the advice he would give to-day to the people of Charlottetown in addressing them. Will he tell them to-day that by that course they are pursuing a most unwise and unpatriotic line of conduct? He goes on to say:

"I don't deny the advantages of a free and fair exchange with the United States, but I say that Canada is not so dependent as these men would have us suppose, on the markets of the United States; that we are able to hold our own with the United States in any market that is equally open to the competition of us both."

What better policy do the Conservative party of this country want than that? What other platform does the Conservative party of this country want than that which was submitted by the hon, member for South Oxford to the people of Charlottetown in 1878? To what better policy need the Conservative party nail their flag than the policy propounded by the hon. gentleman for South Oxford, when he says that we are "able to compete and hold our own with the United States in any market that is equally open to the competition of us both." Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have a right to assume that the result of that speech, the result of that policy as propounded, the result of that doctrine as submitted by him, the result of that discussion on the Island in 1878, when he was so ably assisted by the pearl from Queen's County, the hon. gentleman who represents the Island, had its effect in bringing to the Parliament of Canada a united Liberal deputation from that Island. And, Sir, when we come to think of it to-day, we find that the Conservative party are denounced from one end to the other of this Dominion: they are attacked on every platform; they are taunted here as being too independent of the United States. If we sit down and take statement after statement that has been made here to that effect, we find that the very policy, the very advice which were so tendered to us, came from such men as I have quoted here for the consideration of this Parliament. Let me say further in this connection that if there was one thing in the world that would influence any person, if there was one problem submitted to the consideration of the people more than another likely to influence them, it was such statements coming from such gentlemen of world-wide reputation, known all over the Dominion from one end to the other, and that caused the Conservative party to consider what they said, to give their words due consideration, and I believe it was by their influence that the National Policy was submitted to the people for their judgment in 1878. When we come to consider that in the wisdom of our late leader, after looking at the history of the country from 1873 to 1878, after giving careful consideration to the statements made by these hon, gentlemen while in opposition, after looking at the history of their Administration for the five years they had governed and controlled the country, and that he found it absolutely necessary, he found it an imperative duty to submit to the Dominion Parliament in 1878 a resolution embodying all previous resolutions that had been moved by him and supported by the Conservative party. Now, Sir, let us turn for a moment to this tariff, and in addressing myself to this subject I am free to confess that I have listened with a great deal more than ordinary attention to the statements made by hon, gentlemen opposite in reference to the results of the National Policy. I have observed the other side hon. gentlemen say that on National Policy means ruin, National Policy means no wages, National Policy means dear goods, National Policy means bankruptcy; and on this side of the House I hear from my friends that the National Policy has created trade, the National Policy has given labour, the National Policy or protection has opened up new industries, the National Policy or protection has given to our manufacturers that which they did not enjoy between 1873 and 1878. Between these two parties, then, I have looked for means of forming a judgment, and I felt I would like to get an opinion from some person entirely independent of both sides of the House. Now, in view of this, I turn to an authority, a gentleman who occupied a very prominent position in this Parliament, who for years and years guided the Liberal party, who for years and years was recognized as an authority on all matters, on all subjects, which came before this Parliament for decision. Now, I know that his words have been cited before by hon. gentlemen, and I can understand that the reading of them again is not likely to prove interesting, yet I will venture to quote once more the words of Mr. Blake, when he says:

"No man, I care not how convinced an advocate of free trade for Canada he may be, has yet suggested—no man, I believe, can suggest—a practicable plan whereby our great revenue needs can be met otherwise than by the continued imposition of very high duties on goods similar to thuse we make, or can make, within our bounds, or on the raw materials. I invite the most ardent free-trader in public life to present a plausible solution of this problem; and I contend that he is bound to do so before he talks of free trade as practicable in Canada, I have not believed it soluble in my day; and any chance of its solu-bility, if chance there were, has been destroyed by the vast increase of our yearly charge and by the other conditions increase of our yearly charge and by the other conditions which have been created. The thing is removed from the domain of practical politics."

Well, Sir, if this did not mean that the National Policy was approved by the Liberal party, if it did not mean that the National Policy had received the baptism of the whole people of the country and would be adopted by them in the future, then I know not what is the meaning of these words. I find that that is the policy they had been fighting against in the past, and I find that the criticisms and animadversions passed upon their conduct by the people of this country, have convinced the Liberal party that they were mistaken, and I tell the Liberal party throughout the Dominion that no party can be successful in the future, no party can hope to obtain the confidence of the people, no party can win success, no party has any chance of obtaining success, while the National Policy stands and by which we have found that the people are in accord with us otherwise than by supporting it. Well, Sir, the National Policy has been confirmed at no less than three elections, in 1878, 1882 and 1887, and yet, during the last two or three weeks, members of this House have been engaged in discussing this issue, as well as other dead issues. been occupied in discussing this question that has already been settled by the great jury of the land, in discussing a policy that has come to stay, a policy upon which the people pronounced with no uncertain sound; and, in their cooler moments and on their solemn responsibility, the electors justified the acts of the Administration and sanctioned the policy of the Government as enunciated, and established the Conservative party in office, by virtue of their ballots, in order to carry out that policy, to carefully guard and direct the interests of the country, and to fulfil and carry on successfully this great policy. This decision has been affirmed time and time again at the elections, time and time again the people have spoken, when this policy has been the subject of discussion and criticism. The hon. member for Queen's, N.B. (Mr. King), the other evening, took occasion to state to the House that if we had to run again in New Brunswick, if we had to ask again a declaration of public opinion, and if we arising from protection. It is: Mr. Adams.

were compelled to return to the people, who in March last elected us, sweeping, practically, the province from one end to the other, practically sweeping away every vestige of the Liberal party from the St. Croix to the Restigouche, if we were to return again to the people asking for a verdict, that, in view of the change that has taken place in public opinion since March last, the Liberal party would win along the whole line in that province. Is it possible that the hon member for Queen's can believe in such a dream as Is it possible for him to believe that public opinion in New Brunswick is so quickly changed? Is it possible for that hon, gentleman to believe in an approaching change, when permanence is one of the principal attributes of the National Policy? Not only did the hon, gentleman make that declaration but he challenged the supporters of the Government to meet and dispute his proposition that a protective tariff means increased prices to the consumers of the country. If that be so, then the whole policy of protection is gone. I have not in my philosophy the view that a protective tariff means increased prices to the consumer. the very reverse to be the case. Protection rests upon the producers in the land. Give us the producers and we will find the consumers. That is the correct principle governing protection or the National Policy. Look out for the producers, for that is the true essence and meaning of the National Policy. If that be the true test of the National Policy, if the National Policy rests upon the interests of the producers, then I guarantee the difficulty is solved; immediately the wages are assured to the people and the consumers get cheaper goods. I will submit to my hon. friend from Queen's for his consideration, four propositions, which I have taken from the works of an eminent writer, against the hon. gentleman's position. This writer, Professor Sheldon, speaking on "What protection rests upon," says:

"But protection as known to our policy rests not upon the shifting, temporary, evanescent interests of political managers, however gifted and astute, but upon the most solid foundation. It has most excellent reasons for exist-ing and it will not be soon or lightly abandoned in its essential principles."

The whole philosophy of protection is embodied in these points: let abundance be produced, little wasted in the profits of middlemen and transportation, and trust to home competition for cheapness. Cobden, in advocating free trade, said: "Take care of your customers; your producers will take care of themselves." Free trade is for the traders. Protection is for the producers and workers. imposition of a duty upon goods imported into this country always means an advantage and helps the producer and worker at home. I now submit the first proposition of this writer:

1. By inducing persons producing goods elsewhere to come and produce them here, to employ persons who would otherwise find employment with difficulty, and make two employers seek for one workman and bid up wages to get him, rather than leave two workmen to seek one job, and so bid down wages against each other to get employment." "1. By inducing persons producing goods elsewhere to

This is the first proposition which the writer lays The producers of goods are invited to come here and produce them; and we are thus inviting capitalists from foreign countries to invest here. The second proposition deals with the benefits

"2. It tends to develop through the rise of wages and prices, general intelligence, inventiveness in people who already invent with some facility, and in so large a way and in an endless variety it tends to substitute the powers of nature for the powers of man in production and distribution, and thus reaches ultimate cheapness through temporary and evanescent dearness. It seeks cheapness of this solven when the proposition and the state of the same of the sa

This is the second proposition submitted by this writer for the consideration of free traders and of those who argue that protection is an evil instead of a benefit to the great consuming population. His third proposition is this:

"3. It tends to keep money the very tool of trade—what has been aptly called the instrument of human association—in the country for other uses, so that even temporary absence of it may not illegitimately and unjustly increase the burden of time contracts and debts, and so break down, by temporary stress, manufacturing and other establishments, and so again illegitimately reduce wages and prices."

This is the third proposition submitted by the writer for the consideration of all free traders, for the consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite who desire to wipe out this National Policy and adopt a free trade system, which we believe will be injurious to our people. He then says in the fourth proposition:

"4. It tends to prevent merchants and manufacturers abroad from breaking down our establishments, by the advantage of that cheapness which they gain by the quantity of goods made and sold."

If this be the character of the results which follow protection, as laid down in the four propositions of this writer which I have read, then I think we are justified in saying that we have ample security. We are safe in saying that labour is sufficiently guaranteed to the working people of the country, and that we have a better means of obtaining the investment of capital, by which we can give employment and produce goods for the market. I cite the opinions of this writer, in view of the discussions which have been going on in this House and in the country, and if his contentions be correct, as I believe they are, then I claim that protection is necessary and essential to the manufacture of goods cheaply, and that it confers equal benefits on the labourer and on the employer. It secures the labourer employment at good wages, and it gives to the employer of labour a fair and just return for his capital. By protection we become strong within ourselves, we become courageous to go on and work; we are filled with hope and not with despair; we feel confident that every dollar we put in this and that enterprise will give us some return, and that our surplus cash will find an investment which will redound to the benefit of our own people. Under protection we become known as competitors for the trade of the world, it gives us a national name and makes our country independent. This writer sums up his conclusions in the following words:

"Protection, then, does not exclude but does include such regulations of trade as are truly reciprocal; trade not in too flagrantly unequal conditions; trade not too outrageously detrimental to those not immediately concerned in it. It makes as the first great condition of trade equality as against inequality; peace, absolute and abiding; peace, as against war and the preparations and threats of war."

This is the general summing up of this writer in reference to the effect of protection. In view of the twelve years which we have had, and during which we have enjoyed the benefits of the National Policy, surely hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House cannot truly state that the people of the country are dissatisfied with the protective policy inaugurated in 1878, and successfully adopted and approved of from that time down to the present hour. Now, when the Liberal party had found it was useless to oppose further the National Policy, they turned quickly around and pronounced for commercial union with the United States. They abandoned their own platform and their own policy as laid down by Messrs. Brown, Cartwright and Blake, and they felt it necessary to introduce to the people some new fad by which they thought they could obtain their votes and confidence. They created a new policy of commercial union, and for a time the people were treated to speeches all over the country as to the benefits of commercial union, but they soon shrunk from popular discussion on that question, and they again sought a policy upon which to appeal to the people, introducing it under a new name—unrestricted reciprocity. I am doubtful as to whether commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity are not one and the same thing, and that is not a doubt peculiar to my own mind, but it is a doubt which has been shared in by the whole electorate of Canada. I rather believe, indeed, that the members of the Liberal party themselves do not know whether there is any difference or not between commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity. At one place you will hear a Liberal speaker give one version of it, and at another place you will hear another version. One man claims that commercial union is not unrestricted reciprocity, and another claims that unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union are practically the same. When we come to look into the opinions expressed by hon, gentlemen on the other side of the House, we find that they have grave doubts amongst themselves as to what their policy really means. I hold in my hand a speech delivered by Mr. Davies, the member for Queen's, before the Board of Trade at Charlottetown. He is the "pearl" of the Island, a gentleman whose opinions are entitled to weight and consideration; he is known as the leader of the Liberal party in the Lower Provinces, and he commands more personal influence as an individual than any other public man in the Lower Provinces belonging to his party. Speaking before the Board of Trade at Charlottetown the hon. gentleman said:

"Judging by what he read in the newspapers, he had no communication with the projectors of commercial union.

Oh, no; my friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) had no communication with the projectors of commercial union. So innocent was the hon, gentleman when discussing this question before the Board of Trade, that indeed he did not know what his friends of his own party had in view, and he was not called into the councils of the party. He treated the Board of Trade in this innocent way, and he told them: Oh no; I am speaking to you as a representative of the Island, independent and outside of the party with which I am associated. You can trust me and have confidence in what I say, when I speak in that way. It is the individual opinion of the menber for Queen's that I submit to your consideration; and then the hon. gentleman goes on to say:

the two countries, each country would retain the right to frame its own tariff as against the rest of the world. Canada, for instance, might have a 25 per cent. tariff, while that of the United States might be one of 35 per cent."

That was the doctrine that my hon, friend from Queen's laid down-unrestricted reciprocity would differ from commercial union inasmuch as that under commercial union we would have a uniform tariff, but under unrestricted reciprocity we would have our own tariff. Then he said:

"The immediate consequence would be, that imports to the United States, instead of being carried to the great ports of the United States, would be taken to the States by way of Montreal.

He objected to that, and he went on to say:

"To this the States, whose people are not arrant fools, would never consent, and unrestricted reciprocity—although it would suit us as well as commercial union—was, though it would suit us as well as commercial union—was, therefore, impracticable. In discussing commercial union we should, he thought, regard it from both the Canadian and provincial point of view, and in a broad and generous spirit. Its importance was the more pressing from the fact that if the relations of the two countries are not improved, if some settlement is not arrived at the Americans may, before twelve months have clapsed, put into operation the Retaliation Bill, under which our trade with the United States will be interdicted, and we might suffer a stagnation of trade. We are not in favour of selling our fisheries, as before, for a lump of money, neither are the Americans in favour of buying the use of them for money. The one sensible thing to do is to settle the difficulty, and to make the fisheries the basis of our negotiations for improved commercial relations."

This was the policy of the hon, gentleman at

This was the policy of the hon, gentleman at Charlottetown. The declaration he made to the Board of Trade then was: That unrestricted reciprocity was impracticable; and that the only solution of the difficulty was, to make the fisheries the basis of a treaty between the Dominion and the United States, and, as a matter of fact, addressing himself to his own people, and moving them as he knows how to do on the platform, he was careful to avoid discussing the very question that he submitted to the people in March, 1891. In this discussion, the member for Queen's reminds me of my countryman Sheridan's description of Dundas, when he said that "he employed his fancy for his narrative and keeps his recollections for his When we call upon hon, gentlemen opposite to tell the country what they meant by unrestricted reciprocity, when from every platform in the land one universal voice went out to the leaders of the Liberal party, saying to them: Explain to us what you mean; if you men possess the secrets of reciprocity—if you possess the terms which you say you do by virtue of the negotiations which you say you had with influential and responsible representatives of the United States then your bounden duty is to submit to the people every detail of the agreement you have made. When we say to them here on the hustings: No secrecy; take the people into your confidence as to what arrangement you have made, the parties with whom you had the negotiations, the time and place, all the conditions and details, so that an honest and fair verdict may be given by the people of the country upon what you have done they are silent. Then, Sir, when we asked our friends on the other side, how they would make up the loss of revenue, resulting from their policy, the answer on the platform was: We will determine that when we get into power; we will not give you any information as to the tain extent, while they felt sure that on Mr. Adams.

tariff to be mutually agreed upon by the two countries comprised in the union. Unrestricted reciprocity' would differ from commercial union in this respect, that while under it there would be perfectly free trade between secret—had they or have they any?—but we will for such a contingency; we refuse to give you the secret-had they or have they any?-but we will make up the revenue in such a way as may suit our party should we come into power. That was not fair treatment; that was not fair-play; that was not the course that should be pursued by a responsible party. Every word that falls from the lips of the hon, gentlemen opposite as leaders of a great party, carries the weight of responsibility as much as the words which fall from the lips of the First Minister of the Crown when he announces the policy of his Government. They are as much bound by every obligation-bound by fealty to their party, bound by every principle that governs and controls and moves a party, bound by what they owe to the rank and file of their party, the men who fight the battles and deposit their votes—to state their policy clearly and distinctly, so that the people may vote intelligently upon it. Where is the policy of the Liberal party to-day—the policy that any man can place his hand upon, outside of the general term unrestricted reciprocity? Ask them what it means? Does it mean that we shall jump from a 30 per cent, tariff to a 60 per cent, tariff, adopting that of the United States? Does it mean that we shall have the right to frame our own tariff as against the Americans—that we shall have ours and they shall have theirs? Does it mean discrimination against the mother land? If so, the people should know it. Then the people will be able to discuss it intelligently, and deal with it in such a manner as to guarantee their safety and security. the people will be able to judge in an intelligent way just what unrestricted reciprocity means. It is indefinite now; it is uncertain. I admit that for the last two or three years, while hon, gentlemen on the other side of the House were discussing this question in a general way, our people to a certain extent were caught by it. Our people fancied that with it they would pick up gold in the street; they understood that they would have to work no longer; they believed that once unrestricted reciprocity were obtained, they could practically live in idle ness. All this time the Opposition, in almost every portion of the Dominion, had things pretty much their own way; they were not met by the Conservative party; they were allowed to go on with their discussion without being met and opposed; and the result was, that in 1891, when we appealed to the people, unrestricted reciprocity had an advanced position in the minds of the people, and, therefore, harder and more earnest work was demanded from the Liberal-Conservative party to explain the meaning of that policy to the Why, Sir, it was only within the last people. two or three weeks of that great battle that the people were aroused from their mystical sleep, and became alarmed that there was something wrong in this question. It was only then that they discovered that the leaders on the other side had not taken them into their confidence—had not treated them in as frank and fair a way as the Liberal Conservative party did and always have done. The Liberal-Conservative party with boldness declared their principles; they issued their manifesto to the electors of the country; and, Sir, when the people did become fully awakened in the last two or three weeks of the election, while the Opposition were successful to a cer-

the 5th of March the Government of the country would be defeated and they would take the Treasury benches—although they had two years' start upon the Conservative party in the discussion of the question, during which they met with little or no opposition, yet, when the people were awakened to a realization that there was danger ahead—danger to the institutions of the country and to their business interests—the result was that when the smoke of battle cleared away on the night of the 5th of March the Government were found to have been sustained by a majority of between twenty and twenty-five. So that, after all, the people spoke well. After all, the people recognized that they had a party who were not afraid to announce their policy, as against a party who were afraid to give them any indication of what the details of their policy were. The Government of the country were frank with the electorate; and an essential distinction between the two parties has always been that the hon. gentlemen who occupy the seats on the other side of the House have imagined that they and they alone are the possessors of a policy; whereas the Conservative party are in close touch with the people; they are in sympathy with the bread-winners of the land, and are willing to trust their case to them, and each appeal the Conservatives have made to the people has resulted in the approval of the Administration to-day in power. The voice of the people, on the 5th March last, decided against hon, gentlemen opposite. We are asked to-day by this amendment to reverse the vote the people then gave, and we are told by the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that the amendment means unrestricted reciprocity and nothing else:

"The amendment of the hon, member for South Oxford, he said, is unrestricted reciprocity in its truest sense." Either the statement of the hon, gentleman is true or it is not; and if this amendment means unrestricted reciprocity, let us see what unrestricted reciprocity means. The only way we can determine that is by reference to the views of the Administration in the neighbouring republic and of the organs which support that Administration. article on Canadian reciprocity, published in the New Englander and Yale Review, the Hon. Joseph Sheldon says:

"We are ready, and the Canadians know it, to grant them trade at any time on terms honourable and just, on terms of absolute equality and reciprocity, the same that New York enjoys with Massachusetts, the same that the late Confederate States now enjoy with the States never in rebellion.

If that does not mean political union, I would like to know what else can it mean? If unrestricted reciprocity means a union between Canada and the United States as close as that which exists between New York and Massachusetts, and between the late Confederate States and the States of the North, then the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite can only mean political union with the United States, and the stand which the Conservative party took at the last elections is fully justified. But we are told by hon, gentlemen opposite that the opinion of one of their leaders, expressed in addressing the people at any particular place, does not govern the whole Liberal party; we are told that the Liberal party is not bound down to the statements made in this House by the hon, member for North Norfolk; and we are told nothing policy, and became alarmed when deficit that the opportune time to discover what the policy of the Liberal party really means will be when they will have reached the Treasury benches. They wish to secure a verdict in advance by deluding the people with vague and indefinite proposals. But, not being agreed as to what their policy means, not having a fixed policy, or not daring to reveal its true purpose, I am confident that the people will continue, as they have done in the past, to leave these gentlemen where they are—in Oppo-We are told by hon, gentlemen opposite, day in and day out, that the record of this Government, in its administration of public affairs, is not of such a character as to entitle them to the confidence of the people in the future.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. ADAMS. "Hear, hear," says my hon. friend on the other side. I would ask the hon, gentleman to make a comparison between the history of the present Government and that of the Mackenzie Administration from 1873 to 1878. Was the record of the Mackenzie Administration of such a character as to entitle it to the future confidence of the country? I think not. Looking over the record, I find that under Conservative rule, from 1869 to 1873, the income of the Dominion was $90,755,241 and the expenditure $80,770,789, leaving a surplus of $9,984,452 for that period. Surely that is not a record any one can honestly condemn. But look to the record between 1873 and 1878, and it will be found that that period was the era of deficits. Hon, gentlemen opposite had a deficit of $6,426,958, and added $40,513,617 to the public debt during the short time they held power. What further? Shortly after the ex-Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) took office, his first act was to impose an additional tax of something like $3,000,000. In imposing this tax, he said:

"As far as it it possible to form a calculation, I am in hopes, if a sufficient amount of taxation is now laid on, we may be able not only to meet the requirements of the current year, with a small margin over, but to dispense with the necessity for additional taxation for a considerable period."

That statement was not only misleading but deceiving; and when the hon. gentleman who uttered it, and whose prediction was so utterly falsified, charges this Government with going from bad to worse, he must imagine that our people have a very short memory indeed. It does not come with very good grace from that hon, gentleman to make such statements. I find that the revenue between 1873 and 1878, instead of being only $18,000,000 per year, as it was under the Conservative Government, had increased to $23,000,000 a year, or an excess of $5,000,000 yearly. My hon, friends opposite had the benefit of the great savings which they say were effected between 1873 and 1878, and also of the broad and wide policy which they submitted, a policy the results of which only the future could determine, and yet they increased the expenditure by $6,000,000 over revenue. Why was it that the country was alarmed? During those five years, not only in reference to their general policy, but also in regard to the non-fulfilment of their promises, the people became aroused. The people demanded that the Government should fulfil their promises which they had made when they were in Opposition, and the result was that in the absence of such fulfilment they became dissatisfied with their do-after deficit was rolled up, and came to the conclusion that the Liberals were unable to make revenue and expenditure meet, when they had a deficit of practically $1,600,000 a year for every year they were in power. No one can seriously be surprised that our friends on the other side of the House held office for such a short time, and that the member for South Oxford, when, in 1878, he delivered his Budget speech, had to declare that he was disappointed in his hopes, and had to declare—using his own words—that the trade and commerce of Canada had been reduced by nearly $50,000,000; that the revenue in Customs alone showed a decrease of $3,000,000, and our trade and commerce collectively had been reduced from $218,000,000 to $168,000,000. We need not discuss now how the $40,000,000 of debt was made up, but the books show that in 1874 there was an increase over 1873 of $8,476,503; in 1875 over 1874, $7,683,413; 1876 over 1875, $8,543,136; 1877 over 1876, $8,683,795; and in 1878 over 1877, $7,126,760, a grand total of $40,513,617 which was added to the public debt in the five years of Liberal rule. We are told that, in view of this, we should again entrust the Government of the country to the hands of those hon, gentlemen. We are told that the Liberal-Conservative party having been in power since 1878, the country should again give an opportunity to those hon, gentlemen opposite to administer executive affairs. Can the people trust you and place confidence in your ability, judging by your record between 1873 and 1878? I need not go much further in showing the Housewhat the Conservative party has achieved in the interests of this Dominion. Every reader knows it. Great railways have been built, the country has generally prospered, and recognizes the benefit of the present policy of the Government, and is willing to leave their future interests in their hands. Our revenue to-day is running up to $38,000,000, but we need not touch that question, nor treat of the expansion of our exports and imports—showing an increase of $87,000,000 over 1868—or the large amount of railway construction which has taken place, or the passenger and freight earnings which are increasing every year, or the other matters which have occurred throughout this period to the credit of the Govern-Notwithstanding the advanced ment of the day. position we have in these matters, we have only added to the national debt a gross amount of $190,-000,000, or a net addition of $150,000,000. We are told that Canada is not progressing, that there is more poverty existing in this land to-day than there was between 1873 and 1878, that the legislalation of this Parliament has done nothing to advance the interest of the people or to increase the wealth of the country, that the taxes are higher than they were, and that the lands are mortgaged to such an extent that the people are unable to pay the interest thereon, and that, instead of the National Policy being of the character we claim it is, it has placed the country in a much worse position than it was in before its adoption. I will read you a few words from a volume, "Wiman on Canada," which is the first work he issued in reference to Canada, and that will give you an idea of his opinion in regard to this country then. admit that he has changed that opinion since. His second volume, I admit, differs from his first, but I assume, when he was speaking in 1887, recognizing as we do that he is a man of ability, Mr. Adams.

a keen, sharp critic and writer, possessed of great information, that what he then said in reference to this country, which is now being held up by hon, gentlemen opposite as a country which is not fit to live in, is worthy of consideration. We are told that we ought to go across the boundary line, that that is the promised land; and in regard to our own country we hear wails of despair, and miscreres are sung by those gentlemen over our decayed position, and that Canada is of no use to its population, that you cannot get this and you cannot get that in this Dominion: but here you have the statement of Mr. Wiman, who says that:

"In the splendour of her cities, in the magnitude of her public works, in the perfection of her means of communication, in the completeness of her educational institutions, in the intelligence of her people, and, indeed, in all that goes to make up the greatness of a nation, Canada to-day occupies a position of proud pre-eminence."

That is the authority of the gentleman they cite to-day in favour of unrestricted reciprocity. That was his opinion at a time when he was not actuated by selfish and unpatriotic motives, as he is to-day. That was his opinion given in cold blood. What a grand name he gave to this Canada of ours. What further have we? Mr. Wiman is in close communication with the newspaper which is closest to the ears of the Washington Administration, and announces its policy, that is, the New York Tribune Let us see what it says:

"Canada to-day is a great country. In its judicial system, its military organization, its superior ocean carrying trade, its excellent civil service, its municipal home rule, its efficient post office, its admirable election laws, and its beneficent system of public charities, Canada is second to no community in the civilized world."

That is the opinion of the New York Tribune, that is the opinion of an American writer as against the opinion of our own Canadian statesman—the opinion from a foreign land by one of the most prominent papers of the United States to-day; and when we can obtain such opinions as the foregoing from our American neighbours, does it not come with $the {\color{blue} worst possible grace} from {\color{blue} one of our own states} men$ to use disparaging language? Should our people not be indignant at our Liberal friends, who are seeking to shape our legislation, trying to mould the policy of this country, to control public opinion, and instead of holding such an exalted notion of this Canada of ours, they leave it to Mr. Wiman to appreciate our interests and to the American press to testify to our national greatness and our national wealth. And, passing from that subject, I need not go through the increased produce of our mines, and of our forests, of our fisheries, the increase in export of animals and agricultural products, to prove that in Canada there is no such gloom as our friends opposite declare to exist. We find, on the contrary, that there is a spirit of universal confidence, buoyancy, hope and faith in the young men who love this Canada of ours, and if we possess more of such confidence than hon, gentlemen opposite it is simply because the party with which we are associated have been great factors in mapping out this great work that has been performed, it is because our policy has been in close sympathy and union with the leaders, the men of thought—not the dreamers, not the men who denounce this and denounce that, who have pronounced against every important question that has been submitted to Parliament from 1878 to the present hour, every important question that has involved the life of this Dominion and which practically meant life or death to our people from end to end of it. We find that hon, gentlemen opposite have been beaten and battered and driven from one position to another position, they have receded from one point to another, and I am glad to believe that the people will demand from them that they turn their attention to the improvement of Canada instead of belittling her; they will demand of them to devote their ability to working out the glorious destiny of this country; they will demand of them their hearty co-operation and assistance in working shoulder to shoulder with the Conservative party, instead of raising the cry of alarm; they will demand of them to give a helping hand to the men who are struggling to advance the country's inter-Instead of despair, let us have hope; instead of disparaging words concerning the future of this country, let us have words of wisdom, words of cheer, words of comfort, words of advice with the true words of loyalty and the ring of love for Canada. I need go no further into this subject, except to refer to one statement that I was amazed to hear made by the hon, member for South Oxford in discussing the trade relations of this country with foreign powers. He, standing as the representative of a great party, a man of great ability and distinction, responsible, as I hold him responsible, for every word he utters—because he is in a great measure associated closely with the leader of the Opposition -I find that that hon, gentleman, when reading from the Trade and Navigation Returns and making a comparison between the export trade of this country in 1873 and our trade in 1890, only read the figures giving the trade of seven countries, instead of reading the trade of fourteen countries that were to be found on the same page of the returns; and comparing our trade figures of 1873 with those of 1890, he omitted the enormous diminution in our export trade under his own régime. Why, Sir, it cannot be supposed for a moment that we who sit here desirous to listen to the hon. gentleman, having an anxiety to pay that attention to him which his ability and his position demand—we cannot feel otherwise than astonished when we see him take up the records of the country and use the books submitted to Parliament, from which we call our information and obtain our knowledge, and giving from those books a statement which is not true. claim that it is practically wicked on the part of the hou, gentleman, it is wilful wickedness for the hon. member for South Oxford tomake such a statement as that, and allow it to go abroad from his lips, the people accepting it as true, when the very record itself stamped it as being a dishonest culling from the records, when, if the truth had been stated, our export had increased by over \$11,000,000 between 1873 and 1890. Now, Sir, in this connection I will turn to my hon, friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), whom I have mentioned before. We have him telling the leader of the Opposition that he has the utmost confidence in him; that that amendment suits him and his party; that they are united, and he bears testimony to the character, to the uprightness of the leader of the Opposition, for whom I, sitting in this Parliament for the first time, have as warm and deep admiration as that of any hon, gentleman on the other side of the House. I say the hon, member for North Norfolk states dence; with hands outstretched he seeks his friendship; yet it strikes me that the hon, gentleman ought to have remembered that it was not a very long time ago that he hurled words through this country that were not so complimentary to that leader. If his character, if his ability, if his leadership, if his wisdom, if his prudence in debate, if his firmness in contesting point after point with the Government, call for admiration on this side of the House, surely the hon, gentleman for North Norfolk, who had recognized his abilities in the past, should never have made the statement he did make, that he could see no hope in the future for the success of his party because a Frenchman and a Catholic happened to be leader. I thought to myself that I would like to say to the leader of the Opposition: "Don't let him embrace you too closely, because underneath his vest there is a breast-plate of ice that will freeze you to death." Let the hon, gentleman also beware of the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who, only the other day, was particular to brand him throughout the country as a man unfit to lead a great party on account of his nationality and religious belief. In regard to the amendment of the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), what does the New York Tribune say? I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that the Tribune has been watching our public affairs in view of the negotiations that are to be proceeded with on 12th of October next. welfare of the country would have been promoted, in my opinion, if the Government had been left free and untrammelled to enter into negotiations respecting trade matters, and if hon, gentlemen opposite had said to the Government: "In regard to your general policy, we will attack you as severely as we know how, we will fight you in every legitimate and honourable way; but as regards the negotiations with the United States, as we might do something to injure or embarrass you, no resolution or amendment will be moved in Parliament which you can possibly say will trammel you." The Tribune says:

"Sir Richard Cartwright now comes forward with a proposition demanding the reduction of all duties on articles of prime necessity, and particularly on those most generally consumed by artizans, miners, fishermen and farmers." The obvious answer to this is, that the Government has already sacrificed 12 per cent. of its revenues, and in such a way as to lessen the burdens of life to every class in every province. To do more would imperil administration. The Government can say, in other words, that it has voluntarily and already adopted Sir Richard's resolution, and he will find himself hard pushed for an answer."

While the American people can see that the reduction of $3,000,000 of the burdens on the people in regard to the sugar duties will be advantageous to our people, yet hon, gentlemen opposite tell us, day in and day out, that our sugar is not any cheaper than it was prior to the removal of the duties. The Tribune goes on to say:

have him telling the leader of the Opposition that he has the utmost confidence in him; that that amendment suits him and his party; that they are united, and he bears testimony to the character, to the uprightness of the leader of the Opposition, for whom I, sitting in this Parliament for the first time, have as warm and deep admiration as that of any hon, gentleman on the other side of the House. I say the hon, member for North Norfolk states that he has the utmost confidence in the leader of the Opposition. He gives him unlimited confiassuming that further discussion at Washington was a waste of time. But in connecting this demand with a general call for the reduction of duties the Liberals will drive away from their support all Canadian protectionists who favour the National Policy, but who still want a wide reciprocity treaty. reciprocity treaty.

This proves that hon, gentlemen opposite would, in the opinion of the press, have acted more wisely had they, in view of the early period at which our representatives will meet the representatives of the United States, not moved the amendment submitted by the hon, member for South Oxford, Coming as I do from the lower provinces, I was sorry to hear the hon. member for South Oxford declare that Ontario is to-day practically bankrupt, that real estate is mortgaged to such an amount that that province is poorer to-day than it was ten or twenty I was amazed to think that Ontario, of which I have heard so much, and has been spoken of in such warm terms as the garden of the Dominion, is mortgaged so completely that it is impossible for the citizens to pay the interest on the same. The hon, gentleman has failed again, lacked that element which is necessary to success, and in consequence of the absence of which men will always feel that confidence cannot be placed in his words, and which we would like to give them. Why did not the hon, gentleman, when he urged the House to adopt his motion and endeavour to secure a market of 63,000,000 people, mention that there stood to-day registered in the United States nine million mortgages on the properties of the people. Then the hon. gentleman argued that the abolition of the sugar duty was practically of no benefit. That, how-ever, should be left to the people to determine. Why need we argue out the question. Let that be left to the people themselves, and let them determine what the reduction amounts to. I guarantee that when the bread-winners of this country consider the question with their clear and sober thoughts they will determine exactly the benefit of the action of the Minister of Finance, whether 12 pounds or 20 pounds of sugar are obtained for $1, and whether more is obtained now for the same money than was obtained a couple of months ago. If a housekeeper finds she is able to get 6 pounds more, the question may fairly be considered settled. In regard to the hon member for North Norfolk, I would be doing an injustice to my province if I allowed a statement made by him the other day to go unchallenged. In speaking of the Intercolonial - Railway he said :

"The Intercolonial Railway, which was run last year at a loss of $553,000, and the Prince Edward Island Railway, which was run at a loss of $105,000. We can either make those roads pay their running expenses or we can shut them up altogether."

That is the policy of the Liberal party. That is the policy that one of its leaders announces to its supporters in Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. He says, in effect: If I have power, weight and influence enough in the party to which I belong, should I be fortunate enough to become a member of the Administration when we do get into power, no matter when that time may be, I announce now that a part of the platform and policy of the Liberal party is, and the first action during my tenure of office as a Minister will be, the closing up of the Inter-by the people of the Maritime Provinces and the people of Canada at the time of Confederation. Let me ask, Is that honest dealing with the people of the Lower Provinces? Let me ask, Will we allow any Government to violate such a solemn agreement? I had thought that we would receive fair consideration from the hon, gentleman, and that he would be anxious to aid and assist us, as a part of the Dominion: but instead of that he demands that, notwithstanding all that the Maritime Provinces have done in the past, notwithstanding our self-denial and sacrifices, notwithstanding that we have supported a policy in many cases for the general benefit of Canada, which did not help us in the Lower Provinces, notwithstanding all that, we are told by the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that when his party gets into power they will close up this highway given to us by the terms of Confederation. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in dealing with that deficit of $553,000 on the Intercolonial Railway and $105,000 on the Prince Edward Island Railway, told us that the loss sustained by the Intercolonial Railway is a "brilliant proof of aiding cut-throat lines" to injure the Intercolonial Railway." the doctrine of the hon gentleman from Oxford. Speaking on behalf of the Liberal party, he says that no more subsidies for provincial roads shall be given by the Federal Government. Are we to give our adhesion to that doctrine? Are we to support that policy of cutting off all subsidies from provincial railways in the Lower Provinces? The hon, gentleman tells us that this deficit is only a brilliant proof of aiding When I heard the hon, gentlecut-throat roads. man state that, I wondered if he had any recollection of his record when he was a Minister in the Government from 1873 to 1878. I wondered to myself if he was anxious to keep the eye of public criticism from the official acts of the various Ministers in the Mackenzic Government, of which he was one. He had no cut-throat roads to subsidize between 1873 and 1878. Their policy was not to subsidize local lines throughout the Dominion when they were in power. The Intercolonial Railway had then no competitor; and let us see what the deficit on that railway between 1874 and 1879. In 1874 the deficit on the Intercolonial Railway was $598,091.78. To-day that road is competing with the Short Line Railway, which takes a portion of the carrying trade away from it; and yet, Sir, the deficit last year was not equal to the deficit in 1874, when there was no competitor with the Intercolonial Railway. In 1875 the deficit on the Intercolonial Railway was $281,563.99; in 1876 the deficit was $243,912.87: in 1877 the deficit rolled up to $507,-228.26; in 1878 the deficit was $432,326.78; and in 1879, so anxious were the hon. gentlemen opposite to increase on the previous years' showings, so that a man with closed eyes would have to tumble over it, the deficit of the Intercolonial was rolled up to $716,088.53. That is the record of the Liberal party when they managed the Intercolonial Railway; that is their record from 1873 to 1879, when they did not subsidize any other railways, and when they had no competitor with as a Minister will be, the closing up of the Inter-the Intercolonial Railway. Last year the deficiency colonial Railway, which was given us by virtue on the Intercolonial Railway was $553,000, and of a compact and solemn agreement entered into notwithstanding that, it was less than when they were in power. We are told by the hon, gentleman opposite: That the question should be taken into consideration as to what we should do with this line of railway. I know it is said, in reference to the Intercolonial Railway, that a proposal is made that this railway should go into the hands of a commission, while others suggest that it should be taken over by a company; but, Sir, speaking for myself and the county which I represent, and by virtue of the solemn agreement entered into between the Lower Provinces and the rest of Canada at Confederation, I hope that no policy in regard to that road shall be adopted unless the people have a full and frank knowledge of every matter in connection with any transfer of that road which may be If the Intercolonial Railway is handed over to a commission, or to a company, it must be stipulated and provided that we shall not have an inferior road to what we have to-day, and that we shall not have an inferior train accommodation. We cannot submit to any proposition which would not leave us in at least the same position with regard to that road. Let me ask, in view of the statements made in this House by leaders of the Liberal party, what party can we turn to with such confidence and such hope as the Conservative party, who have fought the battles of life and death in the interest of this country? I will read an extract from the London Quarterly Review of April, 1891, because it contains statements which every member of this Parliament and every man in this country should take to heart. This article says:

"The two political parties in Canada since 1867, the year of Confederation, have been avowedly in favour of reciprocity with the United States, and the differences of opinion which have grown up between these parties since 1879, when the present Government adopted a so-called National Policy or system of protection, have been as to the extent to which a new treaty with the United States should go—whether it should be, generally speaking, on the basis of the Treaty of 1854, or a complete measure of unrestricted reciprocity, or, in other words, free trade in the manufactured as well as in the natural products of the two countries. This issue was formally raised at the general election which took place on the 5th of March last. The result of the contest, after some weeks of heated controversy, has been, so far as we can judge from the data before us, to give Sir John Macdonald's Ministry a majority over the whole Dominion of over thirty, in a House of two hundred and fifteen members, against an average majority of fifty in the last Parliament."

They knew the result of the election then and they took a deep interest therein. It is important that the Conservative party shall not be negligent; but that they must be industrious, they must keep moving forward, they must push ahead their work and their policy to a successful end. The reviewer says further:

"The gravity of the political situation for some time to come must be intensified by the fact that, while the party of unrestricted reciprocity has been defeated in the Dominion as a whole, it has developed strength in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, where the total representation of one hundred and fifty-seven is nearly divided between the Government and the Opposition, and it is obvious that the contest between the two commercial policies has just commenced. Looking at the question from the point of view of an impartial observer, we can see that Canada is entering upon a very critical period in her history. She has reached that stage when all the antagonistic elements, arising from those differences of nationality, geographical situation and commercial interests, that exist in a dominion stretching for three thousand five hundred miles between the oceans, must complicate its questions of government and require a careful, sagacious and steady hand at the helm. Canadians are now practically the masters of their own destiny. From this time forward they have to face political, financial and commercial problems, which will require extraordinary statesmanship to solve wisely, and which must test to the very utmost their patriotism, their fidelity to an old and cherished connection, and their ability to preserve their political autonomy on the continent, and build up a great and prosperous nation, always in close alliance, we trust, with England."

That, Sir, is the opinion of this writer in the London Quarterly Review-that the present time demands from the people of Canada that they should be thoughtful, careful and prudent. We have. then, as I claim, in the Conservative party, a party that does not trifle with the sacred interests of We have the party that has proved true to her interests; we have the party whose policy has been broad, generous and liberal, as against a narrow and uncertain policy set up by the other We cannot, Mr. Speaker, be deterred by the threats and epithets which have been hurled at us from the other side of the House on account of scandals of which we have heard so much. hon, gentleman the other evening told us that because these scandals have been revealed, therefore the whole Conservative party must abandon the ship and the flag. Such is not the policy of the Conservative party. But our policy is to go forward with a firm and steady hand, true to the great principles to which we are attached, and strong in the faith that in future—as we have a right to be, from the popular confidence we have enjoyed in the past—that party will continue to earry on and conduct the affairs of the country ably and well. Though we may be shocked now and then at some scandal arising here and there-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. ADAMS. Have you not had scandals on the other side? You love scandals; you live on scandals. They are the breath of your nostrils. The only time you gained the public confidence was by a scandal. The only time you occupied the Treasury benches was by virtue of such.

An hon. MEMBER. We will do it again by another scandal.

Well, my hon. friend is probably Hr. ADAMS. congratulating himself. Hon. gentlemen opposite would probably have preferred that these scandals should not be probed to the very bottom. They doubtless imagined that the Government would retard the investigation. They hugged to themselves the hope that the Administration would not act against the officers who are employed in the departments, because such was their own history. this Government are different. They are determined to probe the scandals to the bottom -no withholding of anything; no whitewashing. Why, Sir, when hon, gentlemen opposite talk of scandals and their hope of success following them, they have time and again deceived the people and led them astray; the blizzard has struck them in every election and torn their principles and their policy up by the roots, and laid them and their leaders on the "cold marble of the morgue." On the grea-public question before the country they have been uncertain and unsuccessful. They have had doubts, where we have had no fears. You gentlemen of the Opposition have held back with minds filled with dread, where we walked along with buoyant heart, with confidence and hope in the future, and called upon you to come and join and help us. But, Sir, if the scandals are great, as our friends opposite seem to imagine they are, and who gloat over the same, be patient yet awhile. Sir, the power that is to-day carrying on and controlling the investigation, to examine and condemn, has the power to purify. If the Government in what they are doing are in earnest, as I believe they are, and if they can find wrong-doing, they will punish the offenders, and then the true principles of the Conservative party must live, and will not be buried by small sins. As Tennyson says:

"That man's the best Conservative Who lops the mouldering branch away."

That is the position of the great Conservative party as it exists in this Parliament to-day: it will lop the mouldering branch away, but the old tree will stand. Although hon, gentlemen opposite think that the wisdom of the country is centered within the golden band of their line, yet outside of that there are thinking people who will tell you that the great principles which the Conservative party have advocated and fought for, in which they live and in which they will die, as against some little scandal or other, that these are the great things which the people watch and value, and about which the great interests of the country revolve. And having that confidence in the Conservative party in this House, I believe they will vote down the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford.

Mr. DEVLIN. I do not hope to add much to the fund of information and explanation which has been given to the House on the subject under discussion. But perhaps I shall be permitted to express my gratification at the reduction of taxation on an important article of consumption, the only inconvenience of which found so far has been that by being made cheaper sugar has been made sweeter. I may be permitted also to express my sincere regret that a larger portion of the high wall was not torn down, and that the breach was not made sufficiently wide to show our neighbours living in the great country to the south of us that on this side of the line there exists an earnest determination to open the door of international trade and friendship. In the course of the few remarks I propose to make I will deal with some of the statements made by the hon, gentleman who has just resumed his seat, and I intend endeavouring to justify the vote I propose giving in favour of the amendment moved by the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), an amendment which, in my opinion, contains a principle fully in accord with the best interests of the country, an amendment embodying the policy which will certainly meet the most pressing needs and remove the serious difficulties with which we are face to face to-day, embodying a policy, which, if carried out, will place on a firm basis the harmony that should exist between the people of Canada and the people of the United States, and develop our trade in a manner mutually satisfactory and advantageous. With regard to the speech made by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), much of what he said was true, especially that portion repeated by my hon. friend who has just sat down, namely, that we should conduct our discussion calmly and quietly. Beyond that, as well as I can remember, the hon. member for West Assiniboia spoke eloquently and brilliantly on the subject of tadpoles, expiring frogs, and milk and water. My Mr. Adams.

quoted an article from the New York Tribune in order to show that the opinions of the Opposition in this House do not hold good in certain quarters, and tried to make capital against us; but if he had taken up the same journal of a few days ago he would have found another article which-if the hon, gentleman pius his faith to it, as he has done to the article quoted by my hon. friend-would surely strike terror into his patriotic soul. In the New York Tribune of 21st July I find the follow-

"It cannot be expected that our Government will not take these facts into consideration in determining whether it is desirable to open trade negotiations next October. What possible profit can come from such discussions with a discredited Government, existing under conditions that momentarily betoken its fall?"

Whatever comfort the hon, gentleman may find in the columns of the New York Daily Tribune, I would strongly commend to his careful consideration the article from which I have taken this extract. I have listened patiently to the present debate, and I am forced to admit that it has displayed one unfortunate feature, and that is the tone adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite in their references to the people of the United States. Fortunately, no law of man or nature, no law, supernatural or written, compels us to place confidence in the utterances of hon, gentlemen opposite or in the conclusions at which, by peculiar methods, they have arrived. If we are to believe them, the farmers of the United States are in a most deplorable condition; if we are to believe them, it is the duty of every loyal Canadian to belittle the American people, their institutions and customs, and everything they hold dear. Upon what grounds can such attacks be justified? What is the cause of such misrepresentation? Is it the policy of the Government to try and destroy all prospect of ever obtaining a treaty of reciprocity with the United States, or has there been an understanding between the Government and their masters of supplies that this method will be adopted in order, if possible, to court refusal at Washington and thus prevent further negotiations tending to reciprocal trade? It looks like it. The hon. Minister of Finance will remember the result of his mission to Washington in March last. Can be to-day, armed with the utterances of his followers, say that he is in a better position to meet the representatives of the American Government in October next than he was be-fore the elections? If he is perfectly sincere in his professions with regard to his mission in October next, then, Sir, no man can have greater reason to exclaim: Save me from my friends. Throughout the debate, particularly during the course of the speech delivered by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) last evening, and that delivered by my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Adams), the Liberal party has been subjected to insults. Yet we are not discouraged, and have still reason to cherish and cling to our convictions. Yet our policy is growing largely in favour and popularity, and, to use a sentence well known: Its sun is rising when theirs is about to set." Our enthusiasm has in no way been chilled by the attacks and even reverses to which we have been subjected for some years. We have at our head a leader in whom we have the fullest confidence and whom we regard with the greatest respect, esteem and veneration. We have a policy which is cerhon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Adams) tainly a sound one—the policy of unrestricted reciprocity—and which is about to triumph over the ignoble attacks and assaults of the army of sham loyalists. It may indeed be a disagreable admission to make, but nevertheless it is true that the cry of loyalty, backed by that pernicious system so well known to our hon. friends on the other side, of a lavish distribution of royalty, is among the most powerful factors of the elements employed by them to retain power. We know that they have found this cry of loyalty a good one, and one with which they are slow to part. Even during this debate they have been profuse in their expressions of loyal attachment to England; they have proclaimed it to the four corners of the country, and the climax was only reached the other day when the hon, member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins), in a moment of frantic delight, and verily jumping in his seat, exclaimed that he was a British subject, that he was born a British subject and that he hoped to die a British subject. I hope he will not die just yet; I hope he will live many a long day, and that, unlike many of his brother Conservatives, he will not, after indulging in such strong expressions of loyalty, emigrate to the United States. But does the hon. gentleman occupy an exceptional position in having been born a British subject? Why, this House, gallery, city and country are full of British subjects; and if the hon. gentleman will only take the trouble to go down the street he will find the poor labourer, with a pick in hand, earning a pittance of a dollar a day as the reward of his labour, under a burning sun, is just as good, perhaps a better British subject; because if an insult be ever cast upon the ensign of proud Britain it is the blood of that poor labourer which will be shed on the battlefield to wipe out the insult, while our declaimers on the opposite side will be found in their Cabinet quietly and fearlessly writing learned essays on the subject of loyalty, and proclaiming that they were born British subjects and British subjects they were bound to die. Nevertheless, the hon. gentleman, who has an excellent memory, forgot to tell us whether he was prepared to accept all the conclusions and statements made in the very eloquent speech of my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague). I wonder if he agreed with all that hon, gentleman said with regard to the policy of his party. I wonder, for instance, if he places any faith in the policy of Imperial federation. They claim to be a united family on the other side, and I am simply pointing out that there may be some divisions in that united The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) spoke in favour of Imperial federation. I challenge the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins) to say now whether he is in favour of Imperial federation, as his brother member for Haldimand is, or whether he is not. By keeping his seat he admits that disunion is in the heart of their family. I wonder is it creeping into the bosom of the hon: member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), or is it consuming the breast of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins). When the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), in his in-imitable style, drew attention to the lack of harmony on the other side, he might have gone into the reading room and found from the organs of hon. gentlemen opposite how the lack of harmony exists in that party up to the present day. He might have quoted the opinions expressed by the ex-President of the Council, Mr. Colby, and by the claimed that the expenditure should not exceed the Secretary of State, and he would not have found that there was any great similarity between the two speeches on the question of reciprocity, but, perhaps, that was so small a matter that it was a "loyal delusion." Doubtless he could have pointed to the warfare which has been going on between the organs of the Minister of Public Works and the Secretary of State: but, perhaps, they are merely "loyal delusions." He might have gone further, and might have quoted from the Evening Journal, which demands the head of one of the Ministers opposite. Or he might have read Le Canada, and the severe denunciations of hon. gentlemen opposite which are contained in that paper. He might even have gone further, and referred to the dispute in reference to the portfolio of Railways and Canals: but, perhaps, we should not mention these cases, because they may be only "loyal delusions." He might have gone further, and referred to the divisions which exist on his side of the House, but we must not mention them, because a cloak of loyalty is thrown over those hon. gentlemen; and because they have always been loyal to No. 1, all must be forgotten and forgiven. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, in order to justify his position and the position of his party—and he did not deny that there were scandals in existence—went back to the Government which had charge of the affairs of the country from 1873 to 1878. Let us travel back with him. The Premier who was then at the head of affairs still occupies a seat in this House, and, further, he occupies a warm place in the affections of his party and the country. stainless record—and can we say the same of those who have been in possession of the Government benches since ?-commands the admiration of all Canadians to-day. I will take up the comparison, and I say that when the hon, gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) assumed the reins of office, he closed the door against political corruption and against scandals; and when his successors, the heroes of the Pacific scandal, to which the hon. gentleman opposite, unfortunately for himself and his party, made a reference to-day, entered again into the possession of power, we soon found that they were at their old work, so that to-day we can hardly form committees enough to investigate the mischief, the scandals, and the maladministration that have been going on, and that to such an extent that the country stands shocked and appalled by the revelations which have already been made. When the lations which have already been made. hon, member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was in office he kept the expenditure within $24,000,-000, while his successors have brought it up to about $40,000,000. When he was in office peace prevailed throughout the whole of this about $40,000,000. country; but hardly had his successors come into power when the country was plunged into the horrors of civil war, in consequence of the cruel and callous neglect of which we have heard that it cost the country 200 lives, $10,000,000 and incal-culable misery. Will hon, gentlemen point to that record with pride? Some portion of it is daily coming to light in a committee room not far from where we are sitting. From day to day it is being given to the country. I will refer to another portion of that record. In 1878 hon, gentlemen were returned to power, and again in 1882, on the strength of certain well-defined pledges, when they sum of $22,000,000, and yet they have brought it up to over $40,000,000. They promised to reduce the national debt, and how have they kept that pledge? They have reduced the national debt by increasing it by more than $100,000,000. promised that they would not have any defi-They said we had more than $6,000,000 of deficits, and yet in one year they piled up more than that amount. Further than that: they said they would build the Canadian Pacific Railway without its costing a dollar to the people of this country, and how have they kept that pledge? They have impoverished the country in building that line. They promised economy in the public service, and we have only to travel upstairs and call the civil servants to find how they carried out that promise.

Mr. LANDERKIN. But still they are loyal.

Mr. DEVLIN. They are loyal, but it is another yal delusion. They promised retrenchment in loyal delusion. printing and in immigration, and in both they have nearly doubled the expenditure. They promised a reduction in the ranks of the Civil Service. doubt there is a rapid reduction going on now, and we may have the gratification of seeing before long that those gentlemen who ought to go will have gone, in addition to those whom they have sent away. I was very much amused, while listening to the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Adams), when he made some statement in which the word "catholic" was used. On that ground he referred to the hon, member for North Norfolk. Well, he is in bad company over there anyway, but the company, it appears, has disappeared. Of course, they spoke of side issues. The hon, member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins) was very eloquent the other day on the subject of side issues. was candid enough to admit that side issues were used during the last campaign. Well, I certainly thought at the time that they were used by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I do not think that I can present them in a better light than by quoting from an address which was issued to the electors of the Eastern Townships by the hon, member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives), a gentleman who stands, or rather sits, on the very verge of the Cabinet, a position in which he can conveniently draw inspiration. I hope the hon, gentleman will pardon me if I make some mistakes in translating this address, because it was published in French for the French electors. The address is: "To the electors of the Eastern Townships," and it is signed—I do not think we can mistake the gentleman-"W. B. Ives, President of the Conservative Association of the Eastern Townships." He begins:

"Gentlemen, Electors, you will be invited to pronounce upon certain questions of the highest importance at the coming general election. Animated with the desire"—

The hon, gentleman was "animated."- -"Animated with the desire of being useful to you, I come most respectfully to submit certain important points for your consideration. (1.) Unrestricted reciprocity is the policy of the Liberals."

That is about the only truthful point in the whole eral party, have a hundred times over declared them-selves friendly towards unlimited reciprocity."

Now, these were the words of the address—and you will see some curious conclusions drawn-

He speaks of Mr. Butterworth and several others. He also refers in this address to an eminent prelate of the Roman Catholic Church, Mgr. O'Brien, of Halifax. Now, just imagine the hon, member for Sherbrooke coming along with his address, just imagine this new defender of the faith rising to quote a pastoral from the Archbishop of Halifax. Still he quotes it at length, and he goes on to say:

"Annexation signifies for the French Canadians several things. The abolition of the French language.

Is not that a side issue?--

"Louisiana was at one time a French colony." He did not speak of Texas.

"It was sold by the Emperor Napoleon I to the United States. Despite all the efforts made, they could not secure the preservation of the French language. The policy of the United States from that time to this has always had the tendency of destroying the French language in that State. Its use is not even permitted in the Legislature. Annexation also signifies the education of the children by the state."

That is not a side issue. -

"The education of your children could no longer be confided to your Church."

Just imagine. Isn't this rich, coming from the hon member for Sherbrooke? Why, he ought to be canonized at once-

-" even in cases where the Church would wish to do the work of its own accord and gratuitously. The whole system of separate schools would disappear for ever."

But that is not a side isssue. Was not the hon. member for L'Islet very unfortunate in referring to side issues?

"Annexation also signifies the wiping out of all the constitutional laws guaranteed to the French Canadians"— This is for the French-Canadians. -

-" the use of their laws and their customs."

And he goes on—at all events, he winds up by saying:

"The policy of the Liberals is, Canada for the Yankees." I would strongly advise the Minister of Finance to take this document with him when he goes to make his treaty of reciprocity next October and send it in as his card.

"Canada for the Yankees."

That is the expression.—

"A discriminating tariff against all other countries, a "A discriminating tariff against all other countries, a direct tax of $40 per year on every family of ten persons. The right accorded to the Congress of the United States to impose whatever burdens they may please upon the back of Canada without Canada being permitted to say one word in the matter. The monopoly of the business of Canada to fall into the hands of the people of Boston and New York. That is what Sir Richard Cartwright himself stated to the citizens of Boston fifteen days ago. The destruction of all the guarantees given by Great Britain for the preservation of French customs; and finally, the wiping out of Canada.—W. B. Ives."

There was another side issue, and I would not have referred to it were it not for the remarks addressed to the hon, member for North Norfolk by my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Adams), who quoted some of that gentleman's accusations against "Mr. Laurier, speaking in Toronto in the month of October last, said that there should be a uniformity of tariff between the two countries. In 1889 he preached the doctrine of entire and unlimited reciprocity. Sir Richard Cartwright, Mr. Charlton and other chieftains of the Lib-Mr. Devlin.

spirit, the kindly spirit, of the party opposite. The hon, member for one of the divisions of York, who, I believe, is grand sovereign of an order to which he belongs, was speaking in the city of Toronto on the 12th of July, or the day afterwards -at all events, it was the celebration of the 12th. Now, this gentleman is a member of the Canadian House of Commons; this gentleman knows the responsibility which attaches to his utterances; this gentleman also occupies a seat directly on the brink or the verge of the Cabinet, and, consequently, ought to be very careful with regard to what he may say, because he is supposed to be one of the mouthpieces of the Conservative party. This gentleman, speaking in the city of Toronto on this date, only a week ago, said: "He hoped that never would a Catholic occupy the position of mayor of the city of Toronto." the remarks quoted in a Frenchpaper of Montreal. I was afraid that, perhaps, he had been misreported, so I took up a newspaper of the city of Toronto, the Mail, and I found there exactly the same remarks. That is the party of loyalty, of course; that is the party which does not use side issues; that is the party which travels straight upon the trade question. Again, another bit of side issue gives an illustration of their loyalty. It was only the other evening that a dinner was given in the basement of this House. I was not invited to it, and I cannot tell all that transpired there, but I believe that another important member of the order to which the hon, member from West York (Mr. Wallace) belongs was being dined by that hon, gen-I believe, furthermore, he is grand sovereign of the universe, and came all the way from Ballykillbeg, and that this gentleman was treated right royally downstairs. But were they loval in doing so? I believe it was the same gentleman who a short time ago, on an important occasion in Ireland, exclaimed: "We will kick the Queen's Crown into the Boyne." No doubt they were celebrating that. Bad as I am, I do not entertain any such sentiments, and I would feel more disposed to kick that gentleman who would undertake to kick the Queen's Crown into the Boyne; and Canadians despise such sentiments. No reference is necessary, of course, to the side issue we have heard on all occasions, "Support the Government and share the spoils." No reference is necessary to that famous side issue, "Now is the golden opportunity of the Maritime Provinces." I have merely presented the side issues of abuse of the American people, misrepresentation of the policy and intentions of the But, notwithstanding all that, I Liberal party. think we have reason to think those hon, gentlemen are shameless when they come here and talk of side issues. We are opposed to the National Policy I will quote an extract which for many reasons. will give a pretty good idea of the opposition we offer to it, in the words of an eminent Canadian:

"I claim that the policy of Sir John Macdonald is a policy of creating interprovincial trade and sustaining a national sentiment in Canada. That is the true meaning of the National Policy. It means more than mere protection of commercial interests, but a national sentiment as well. That policy would be sound, and ought to be supported by all parties, if our geographical position was such that it was possible. But, unfortunately, the configuration of Canada is such that there can be no healthy interprovincial trade. After twenty years' experience in Confederation, with absolute freedom of trade between the several provinces, with enormous expenditures on railroads, specially designed to promote this trade, there is practically to-day no healthy interprovincial trade. The Maritime Provinces are compelled, under the existing arrangements, to purchase very largely their manufactured goods from Montreal and other cities of the other provinces, but they are compelled to pay for them in cash. Scarcely a single product of the soil, the forest or the sea from the Maritime Provinces ever seeks or finds a market in the Upper Provinces. Some articles are sent from Nova Scotia to these provinces. Some coal is sent to Montreal (only about 240,000 tons), which is but a small factor in the coal industry of Nova Scotia. It is true that we send some manufactured cotton and refined sugar to the Upper Provinces, but this would scarcely involve the labour of 500 citizens. The products of the great natural industries of the provinces are compelled to seek a market elsewhere. This is the chief cause of the widespread feeling of discontent which prevails. The same principles are applicable to all the provinces. Ontario's trade is not with the Maritime Provinces, but with New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan and Illinois. Manitoba's trade is not with Ontario and Quebec, but with St. Paul and Minneapolis, and the railway problem which is now agitating Manitoba is simply the outcome of a universal want on the part of the people of that province of trade with the United States. The trade of British Columbia is almost entirely with California. Montreal, while gaining certain advantages from her present trade with the Maritime Provinces, would, from her position, secure a hundred-fold greater advantages by obtaining a share of the enormous trade of the States surrounding her."

Again, it will be well to call the attention of the House to a resolution passed by a very important body, the interprovincial conference at Quebec, at which Conservative delegates were present. The resolution to which I refer reads as follows:—

"That having reference to the agitation on the subject of the trade relations between the Dominion and the United States, this interprovincial conference, consisting of representatives of all political parties, desires to record its opinion that unrestricted reciprocity would be of advantage to all the provinces of the Dominion; that this conference and the people it represents cherish fervent loyalty to Her Majesty the Queen and warm attachment to British connection; that this conference is of opinion that a fair measure, providing, under proper conditions, for unrestricted reciprocal trade relations between the Dominion and the United States, would not lessen these sentiments on the part of our people, and, on the contrary, may even serve to increase them, and would at the same time, in connection with an adjustment of the fishery dispute, tend to happily settle grave difficulties which have from time to time arisen between the mother country and the United States."

It has been stated that, so far as we are concerned, the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty which existed from 1854 to 1865 was a good thing for Canada. If I mistake not, that is the contention of the Minister of Finance in 1891. It may not be uninteresting to quote the opinion of Sir John A. Macdonald on the same subject. He said:

"It would be impossible to express in figures, with any approach to accuracy, the extent to which the facilities of commercial intercourse created by the reciprocity treaty have contributed to the wealth and prosperity of this province; and it would be difficult to exaggerate the importance which the people of Canada attach to the continued enjoyment of these facilities."

He went on to say:

"Under the beneficent operation of the system of self-government, which the latter policy of the mother country has accorded to Canada, in common with other colonies possessing representative institutions, combined with the advantages secured by the reciprocity treaty, of an unrestricted commerce with our nearest neighbours in the natural productions of the two countries, all agitation for organic changes have ceased—all dissatisfaction with the existing political relations of the province has wholly disappeared."

He also points to this as one of the reasons for putting an end to the political discontent which existed in view of the troubles which had taken place some time before, and which had taken the form of an annexation movement. I believe the movement referred to is the one with which our present Prime Minister was connected; but the cloak of loyalty is thrown over his shoulders, and his sentiments must be forgotten. With respect to the statement made by the hon, member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) the other day, that all the treaties of reciprocity had been obtained by Conservative Administrations, it might be well to remind that hon, gentleman that such was not the case; that the treaty of reciprocity we enjoyed was obtained by the Hincks Administration, and if he considers that a Conservative Administration I only trust that he himself will become one of the same. While referring to that hon. gentleman, I may say that he also spoke of the great confidence which the farmers possess in the policy advocated by the Government. He forgot, however, to tell the House that he escaped at the last election by the skin of his teeth; that at a previous election he was elected by a majority of 545, whereas at the last election, notwithstanding the fact that he had election lists suitable and all the advantages of Government support, his large majority was reduced to 19 votes. am afraid that next time he will bid us good-bye altogether. There are many other quotations I could offer in support of the policy advocated by the Liberal party. I do not desire to detain the House longer, as many other speakers will follow; but I think the most severe denunciation ever uttered against the present policy of the Dominion Government is to be found in an article which appeared in the Toronto Empire of 30th June. This article was an editorial utterance, and was never intended as a reflection on the policy of the Government, but it was intended rather to denounce one of the great railways of the country, a railway which has not received justice from the Government. It was in pursuance of that policy adopted by the present Government, that they should run down the Grand Trunk Railway, decry this magnificent road, and make little of its management. The Empire—and remember the Empire is a loyal paper, which finds fault with everything American, and of course finds everything English good—goes on to say, that the policies of the two roads are very different; that the Grand Trunk Railway pursued an English policy, and the Canadian Pacific Railway pursued an entirely different policy, and one that almost invariably obtains in American railways. I wonder if that is loyal? Now, what fault does the Empire find with the Grand Trunk? The fault is, that the Grand Trunk Railway is a large manufacturing company, that it has established extensive factories to build their own cars, to make their own wheels, and to manufacture everything required for the road. The Empire condemns the Grand Trunk Railway while it upholds the Canadian Pacific Railway, which adopts the American policy. which is different. These gentlemen on the other side of the House talk about us calling out blue ruin; but what have they done during the last election? They have been decrying this great company; they have been running it down; they say its receipts are small; they make little of the road in every possible way, and they give us an fraud in the full sense of the word: it is lifeless, example of how they can cry out blue ruin. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, out of their own mouth comes their own condemnation. Another question which remains to be settled in connection with the discussion before us is this: Are all the manufacturers some rich, but it has made the masses of our people of the country opposed to the policy of unrestricted reciprocity? We know, Sir, and we have evidence, that many manufacturers carrying on business of great importance in this country are in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, and they have given us very good reasons to show that they are as well able to compete with the Americans as the manufacturers of any other nation. We believe that they are able to hold their own, and that they are not afraid of unrestricted reciprocity. Now, Sir, the question remains, and it is a question easily settled, for we have only got to look around to find how true it is; Is the country really as prosperous as hon, gentle-men opposite make out that it is? They have told us, for instance, to look at the tall chimneys and to listen to the busy hum of industry. Well, we can look around and we will certainly see tall chimneys, but do you observe the fire of life in them, and where is the busy hum of industry, and why is it silent? Cross the river to the manufacturing city of Hull; that is a manufacturing city which has wonderful opportunities, and which has great advantages. Ask the manufacturers of that city if they enjoy to-day the degree of prosperity to which they are entitled, by reason of the magnificent advantages which are placed within their reach. Why, Sir, we know that not only in Hull, but here in this city of Ottawa, and in the city of Toronto, and in every other city of this country, there are to-day hundreds and thousands of unemployed men seeking for employment. Yet, we are told that there is a great deal of prosperity in the country. Prosperity, indeed! Is the presence of over a million Canadians in the United States Why have they been evidence of prosperity? exiled from their country? Is it because their Canadian home is no longer dear to them; because of an unnatural desire to sever the ties which should bind them to the soil which is theirs; or are they driven out of this country by necessity, the very first cause of which is the high tariff existing between the two countries? Now, Sir, what is the result of the evidence which has been placed before this House during this debate, and before the country during the last few years, if it is not that the pulse of the commercial artery, while depending for its life-giving power upon the National Policy, beats feebly and irregularly; indebted at times to happy and extraordinary circumstances it may possess some tone, but that is soon followed by a period of lengthened and prolonged depression. And, Sir, it is sad to be obliged to admit, and to the Canadian anxious to see his country take its place among the nations, it is humilitating to be forced to confess that the future is not bright. This is due to the unpatriotic manner in which the people of Canada have been deceived by those, the responsibility of whose office, and the elevation of whose position ought to have made them candid; and because they were blinded by those who should have led in the path of light and of We have been told that the National honesty. Policy has been a success, but it has been a huge national fraud, and that cannot be denied. It has been a dispossessed of its million limbs, and unfit for use, unfit to be looked upon, patched up in a hundred ways-in fact, yawning for the very grave which

It is a policy in which the speculator, the briber and the jobber may find a fortune, but it is every day impoverishing the farmer, and the lumberman and the miner. Let it be removed now: let it not be said that, in its name, the intelligence of this country shall continue to be insulted, and that for its unnecessary sustenance the life-blood of the nation shall continue to be drawn.

After Recess.

Mr. DESJARDINS (Hochelaga). Mr. Speaker, I suppose I shall be believed if I tell you that I am anxious to be as short as possible at this late period of the debate. My object in rising now is not to go over ground which has been already well covered, but only to answer a few points, which I think require an answer, regarding some interests which have been discussed yesterday and to-day. First, I should like to say a few words in reply to my hon, friend the member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin), although I suppose I shall not be expected to follow him through his whole speech. That hon, member has spoken much of side issues brought into the debate, and he would evidently wish people to believe that all the side issues have been raised on our side. But looking at what is now going on, I ask any candid man to say which party are raising the side issues. While we are now engaged in this Chamber in such an important debate we see hon. gentlemen opposite and their press trying if possible to drown the arguments and to weaken the strength of the speeches which have been made on our side by occupying public attention with small, petty scandals, in order to prevent the people, who have already pronounced on the financial issue, from taking the stand they wish to take, and in order to bring back the old time when, by means of side issues, the Liberal party were able to reach the Ministerial benches. Well, Sir, even on the question of side issues, and of scandals, we are not afraid to meet them; and it ill-becomes the Quebec members sitting on the left side of the Speaker to speak of scandals here, and to accuse our party of being corrupt, if they look upon their own record in the Legislative Assembly of Quebec. We may well compare our position here with their sat Quebec, where they have been brought face to face with their own scandals and corruption. We remember very well that during last session, when we were obliged to vote against one of our friends, not one member of our side of the House refused to do what he believed the interests of justice required. But what has taken place at Quebec in the case of the scandals there? A committee was appointed to investigate one of those scandals—the Pacaud-Whelan scandal, if I remember rightly—and what happened? Witnesses were called before that committee, but they refused to answer the questions that were put to them; and the chairman of the committee, who was an honest man, voted with the minority, and forced a report to be made to the House denouncing the witnesses who refused to answer. But what was the position taken by those who now denounce us as countenancing scandals and corruption?
Mr. Mercier, now His Excellency the Count Mercier, who is being serenaded and promenaded very weil that there are banking institutions and drummed and fifed to-night, rose in his seat in his district; he knows very well that there are and said to the majority: No; you must not order these witnesses to answer the committee, but protect them against its authority. sequence of this, one member of the Opposition, answering the accusations brought against the Conservative party in the Province of Quebec, was able to say on the hustings: Well, the difference between us and you is, that when people on our side are convicted of corruption we condemn them and force them out, while you conceal them, when you do not share the spoils with them. So much for the question of side issues raised by my hon. friend from Cttawa County. Now, Mr. Speaker, I beg to refer to the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne). That hon. member had a very doleful story to relate to the House. If we were to believe him, everything is desolation, poverty and failure in our province—so much so, that even creditors who have been cautious enough to lend their money on mortgage only to the extent of 50 per cent. of the value of the properties do not dare to take action against those who are in arrears for fear that the properties upon which mortgages have been created fall into their possession; and we are told that the authority to sustain that statement is that scarcely any suits are to be found in the courts to show that the Crédit Foncier, for instance, has taken action against its debtors. There is good reason, Mr. Speaker, why suits have not been entered, and that is, that every obligation has been fulfilled according to the terms. My hon, friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) gave some figures on this point yesterday, but I think it is very important that I, also, should put on record some figures to show how groundless was the statement made by my hon. friend from Arthabaska about the poverty and desolation existing among the farming classes in our province. I happen to have the report of that same Crédit Foncier institution for the year ending December last, and what do I find? I find that its loans in the Province of Quebec amount to nearly $5,000,000, and that its aggregate loans in the Provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Prince Edward Island and Manitoba, amount to $6,668,000; and the whole of the properties in the hands of the company held by execution of judgments at the end of last year amounted to Further, I find that although the poor, $49,000. poverty-stricken borrowers of whom the hon, member has spoken had to meet for interest and sinking fund for the last six months $445,971, they were in arrear only to the amount of $88,000. immediately that amount was reduced to $67,000, and by April last, that is to say, during the winter, which is the worst time for people to raise money and pay their obligations, it was further reduced to $27,000. And that is the position of these poor people who the hon, member would have us believe are in a condition of such Of course, his object is to decry the policy of the Government; that is natural. Of course, if the hon. gentleman could prove that our people are in such a reduced position that they cannot meet their obligations, that their creditors are afraid to close on them lest the properties they hold as security would remain in their hands, that would go in support of his case; but what is the position? The hon. member knows industries and trade in agricultural products in his district; and I could show him reports which would inform him that, strange to say, amongst all those failures, amongst all that poverty that he has seen-dreamed of, rather-the deposits in our banks, the savings of his own people out of their earnings, have been increasing, instead of decreasing, during the last three years. Whilst commerce has been depressed, according to the hon. gentleman in those localities, the reports show that the number of notes under protest have been less; thus, no loss has been made on the operations of last year by those banking institutions; yet this gentleman is so well informed and takes so much interest in his district that he comes here and weeps over the poverty and failures and the exodus of our co-citizens. I should like to know by what process he could show us that, whilst the deposits in our banks are increasing the population is decreasing, and everybody is leaving home because he cannot find enough on his land to provide for the wants of his family. That is the way in which hon, gentlemen opposite try to deceive public opinion as to the actual position of the country. They seek, by discrediting their own friends and neighbours, to prove that the McKinley Bill, with which this Government have nothing to do, has reduced us to a miserable state of affairs, that our Government are the guilty and responsible parties, so long as they do not consent to throw us into the arms of those who have concocted that policy against us, and that so long as they are on the left side of the Speaker famine and exodus must prevail. I had much pleasure in listening to another speech yesterday, one which gave me more pleasure, I must say, than that of my hou. friend from Arthabaska. I refer to the speech made by the hon, member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil). That hon, gentleman is a staunch friend of the Opposition and a faithful follower of the leader of the Opposition, but his old principles and the strength of the position of the Government compelled him to make yesterday one of the most powerful speeches in favour of the National Policy. I was glad to hear, especially from my hon. friend, the old principles and arguments used by him when we stood together and fought the same bat-We were then protectionists; we were then anxious to see the policy of protection prevail in the councils of the Dominion. Well, when I heard my hon. friend talk in the way he did, when I heard him advocate so eloquently and forcibly a policy which is but the logical consequence of the policy the Government has maintained for the past twelve years, I thought he might be expected to become another advocate, and one of the most powerful advocates we shall have during the next fight before the people; because his arguments will bear in our favour, not only in the special points he has taken, but in all the points covered by the policy as upheld by my hon, friend the Finance Minister. What does the hon, member for Berthier say? He said, speaking of the beetroot sugar industry:

"Qu'en présence de la difficulté de créer une si vaste industrie, difficulté qui est encore augmentée par la législation des pays qui viennent en concurrence avec notre agriculture, c'est le devoir du gouvernement d'intervenir et de placer nos producteurs sur un pied d'égalité avec leurs concurrents."

In this sentence we find the whole gist of the National Policy, and I am not surprised to find that, on a point which is most interesting to our farmers, the hon, member for Berthier, with his reminiscences of what he has written on protection, has found such a strong point, and an argument which will cover, not only the ground I want to cover with him, but the whole National Policy. His words, translated into English, are as follows:—

"In the face of the difficulty of creating so vast an industry, a difficulty which is increased by the legislation of countries which compete with us in agriculture, it is the duty of the Government to interfere and put our producers on a footing of equality with their competitors."

That is our policy. That is what we have always contended for; and without which we would be at the mercy of our neighbours, without recourse, and would be compelled to close our manufactories and become mere dependents on the United States. Now, I am glad to believe with him in the importance of that industry the hon, gentleman wants to protect. I am very happy to be able to endorse the principle he laid down with regard to that special industry, which is in thorough accord with the National Policy. As the hon, the Minister of Finance has shown in his expose of the financial position of the country when he was giving us the welcome news that he had decided to remove the duty from raw sugar, and thus to grant to the consumers the boon of the reduced price on that staple article, he was aware at the same time that by doing so he was striking at its roots an industry which, though not successful so far financially, has been the object of great studies, great anxiety and great sacrifices in our Province-I allude to the beet-root industry. Taking away 2 cents from the raw sugar was taking away the incidental protection which had been given so far to the beet sugar industry. The promotors of that industry, and with them both the Federal and Local Governments, had felt that unless we could secure to the farmers that protection we had already secured to the manufacturers by the National Policy we might at any moment, by the caprice of the party exigencies or some other interest amongst our American neighbours, see the makets of their country closed to us, and our farmers left without any sufficient market to which to sends their goods. In prevision of that, we were anxious to build up alongside of those manufactures which were being created by the National Policy another market, where the farmers would be sure to obtain fair prices and ready prices We have for other produce from their farms. succeeded to a certain extent in creating good markets in large centres like Montreal, St. Hyacinthe, and other places in the Dominion, by encouraging such industries, for instance, as the refining industry, which my hon, friend thought fit to denounce yesterday, such industries which have secured work for thousands of labouring men, have given a ready market for thousands of tons of coal from our own mines, and have aided the shipping and other transport interest to a, large extent by the amount of freight brought to and delivered from those refineries. We say that, if we could join with that the production of our own sugar we would have all the benefit of the immense consumption of that article amongst ourselves, and that would be in the interest of the producers in this country. The importation for three years has been over 100,000,000 pounds a year, and it has cost the country over $5,000,000. In 1889 it amounted to $5,500,000. If we add to that the amount of $3,- 500,000 which was collected by the Government in the Customs duty, it would show that the amount expended and going out of the pockets of the consumers was nearly $9,000,000 a year. Through the liberality of the policy proposed by the Government this year we are being saved $3,500,000 a year, but we have still to face the amount of over $5,000,000 which goes out of the country every year for that amount of raw sugar which is imported. If we could introduce that industry, which would benefit the farmers, the labourers and the people who would be called upon to produce that raw article, we could save to the country the large amount of $5,000,000, which would thus promote the well-being of our people. I think that is a question which demands full consideration, and I am glad to see that it has not entirely escaped the attention of the Government; because, while they have taken off the 2 cents duty which was considered the necessary protection to help that new industry to become a national industry, they have provided for the protection for one year of the beet root which will be But my hon. friend from Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) was right though in saying that this was not going far enough. The United States, having in view the important results obtained in Europe by the protection given to the industry in Germany, France, Russia, Austria and other countries, where the beet has been cultivated, have by the McKinley Bill given 2 cents a pound for all produce from the soil in the United States up to a certain degree polariscope, and that for the term of 15 years. I know, and the information derived from all the papers in the United States which take an interest in the sugar industry will show, that the people there have taken all the steps necessary to take advantage of that bonus—so much so, that in Louisiana alone the reports already sent in show that the Government of the United States will be called upon to pay the enormous sum of $9,000,000 to cover the bonus of 2 cents a pound on sugar which the farmers there will produce from the cane or the beet-The United States have not been afraid to follow in the steps of the European countries. And so we should do likewise, when we consider the great benefits that have been derived from the encouragement given in those countries to the beet-root in-The reports show that previous to 1860 the cultivation of the beet-root in France, Germany and Russia produced scarcely enough sugar to meet the wants of the consumers within those countries; but since the system of giving a bounty has been inaugurated, we find the result while in 1861 only has been that in Austria, while in 1861 only 54,000 tons were produced, in 1879-80 the farmers had increased their production to the amount of 498,000 tons, which amount has gradually risen, until last year it was 750,000 tons. Germany, which in this respect heads all the countries of Europe, we find that in 1861 the farmers only produced 125,000 tons, whereas in 1875, when the bounty had just been given upon exportations—because they already had put an excise duty on the raw produce, so as to secure an income for the Government—in 1875 they increased their production to 500,000 tons; and at the present moment it exceeds 1,200,000 tons. In 1875 France see the same result in France. produced 462,000 tons; under the reduced bounties this production, in 1880, reached only 500,000 tons; but now, owing to a change in the policy of the French Government, the production amounts to 750,000 tons. In Russia, in 1885, they could not produce enough for their own consumption; but under a bounty system they are not only able to supply the wants of the population of Russia, but they are now exporting a large amount. In Germany, I know for a fact that they are actually coming to this country and selling raw sugarfrom the beet-root and competing with the cane sugar of the United States, despite the distance and the rates of insurance and shipping that they have to pay. have seen thousands of tons imported from that country and refined in our Montreal re-These facts show that after a certain fineries. time, when a reasonable protection has been given to that industry, when the farmers have been educated to cultivate the beet in such a way as to obtain from the soil the greatest possible crop, they will produce such a quantity of beets as will ensure the manufacturer a fair return for his outlay. With a proper soil, with a favourable climate, a climate as well adapted to that industry here as in the countries which I have mentioned, I see every reason for hoping that that industry will ultimately succeed in Canada, as it has already in some part of the United States, and has obtained in countries which were considered less favourable with respect to soil and climate than our own. On this point we have the testimony of men who ought to be believed, because they have paid for their experience, they have invested money in the enterprise, without having so far obtained any return; and yet they are so well satisfied that they are willing to risk their money again if they are only put in the same position as they were before that duty on raw sugar was taken off the tariff.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What has been the rate of production per acre in Canada?

Mr. DESJARDINS (Hochelaga). In our province the experience has been that when the crop has been properly put in and well attended to, the yield has been from 10 to 12 and 15 tons per acre. When you remember that the manufacturers are willing to pay $4.50 a ton, that the Local Government has offered 50 cents a ton so as to raise the price to $5 a ton, we see that a very fair profit may be realized. Past experiments show that when the beet is properly cultivated it contains from 10 to 12, and even 15 per cent. of sugar. At that rate, when the general average of cultivation has reached such a point there is no doubt that it would become a self-sustaining industry. It is for that reason that we are anxious to see the Government extending some assistance—if you do not wish to call it a bounty, call it an indemnity—and grant 2 cents for this year, and keep it on. There is another reason for taking this course, if they want the indemnity offered to be of any value to the farmers. This year the farmers, if I am truly informed, have consented to grow beets to a larger extent. Last year was another year of experiment. New men had come into the field; being aware of the faults and deficiencies of the past, they wanted to engage in the cultivation of the beet on a scientific basis, on a better-reasoned plan. Well, they have gone to work, and the result has been considered by them satisfactory, as regards the amount of beet obtained from the crop as well as the percentage of sugar obtained from the beet; but they have not obtained enough to cover the expenses of their enterprise, so they want to try another year, just as soon as the tariff will warrant them in going But if the Government insist on refusing to grant further aid the result will be that the manufacturers will not run any risk this year, because they are not sure that the earnings derivable from that campaign would still cover their expenses. They want to make more experiments, and while they are producting the sugar, and before it has reached the market, when they will be able then to realize their loss or their gain, the time for making new contracts with the farmers will have arrived, and unless they have a guarantee that the Government is ready to give them another year they will refuse to renew their contracts with the farmers for another year. They are sure that if they are not protected by this Government, if the 2 cents which were granted to them incidentally are not maintained, they must find themselves in presence of an actual loss for next year, thus rendering useless the purchase from the farmers of the crop of So the grant that is being made now this year. under the resolution proposed by the Minister of Finance would be illusory; it could not be made use of. Under these circumstances, I think the Government would do well to reconsider the matter, and see what they can do in the way of extending the grant-let them call it an indemnity if they like, if they do not want to admit that it is a bounty. But I think we should face We should be able the question immediately. to do here what has been done in the United States, France, Germany and Russia, and encourage that industry which, if it should prove successful, would became one of the main industries of the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Not only have experiments been made in the Province of Quebec, but experiments have been carried out in Ontario, and the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Dryden, stated in the Local Legislature that the beet crop in that province produced 10 to 12 tons and, in some instances, 15 and 18 tons to the acre, and that the percentage obtained was from 12 to 14 per cent. of saccharine matter in the beet, the average being over 13 per cent. That is a result which should satisfy a new country, for it would satisfy growers in the old countries, where the cultivation of the beet is better known. This goes to show that the industry when successfully carried on in that province, as well as in Quebec, would furnish an immediate market for the farmers and add to their wealth. It would prove important, not only from a local standpoint, but in the general interest of the whole. We must not forget that the economic position of the older provinces has changed since the opening of the North-West Territories, that we have very powerful competitors there in the growing of grain, and unless we find new markets for the products from our farms, and new markets that will furnish a ready demand, our position may remain as critical as it has been described to have been during the last three or four years. The position of the farmers has been carefully considered by the United States authorities. Their condition is not better than the position of our own farmers. According to official reports, and not merely from hearsay, it appears that many states show an exodus of agriculturists, that farms are being abandoned, that rural properties have Mr. DESJARDINS (Hochelaga).

adopted the McKinley tariff, which gives protection to the beet-root industry and offers inducements to the farmers as well as to manufacturers to establish beet-root industries. The figures adduced here in connection with this subject are very eloquent. The Minister of Finance told us that our importations of raw sugar were 223,000,000 lbs. in 1889, which means it would have required at least 1,100,000 tons of beet root to produce it, and 50 to 60 beet-root factories required to convert that quantity into sugar, and from that estimate it is easy to see the large amount of work that must be given to the people.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the actual cost of producing a pound of sugar from the beet?

Mr. DESJARDINS (Hochelaga). The difficulty has been this, that the quantity here produced has not been sufficient to cover the necessary expenses outside of the actual cost of the beet and It is expected when 10,000 tons its fabrications. can be obtained for each establishment it will afford a sufficient percentage to cover the ex-But you must produce at penses, and more. first the beet-root of the required quality, and then you have to work it. Take, for instance, the beet as it is purchased from the farmer. It is paid for at the rate of $4.50 per ton, and it is supposed to produce 200, 250, or 300 lbs. of sugar, according to quality. The richer it is the cheaper it will This material is next taken to the factory and worked. The sugar may cost 4 cents or 5 cents per pound now, but the cost might be reduced. Experience has shown that the beet sugar produced in the factories at Berthier and Farnham has averaged about 90 per cent., and has reached 95. evident that the cost of refining is not very great, and I am satisfied that not many years would elapse before this industry will be able to sustain itself; and then, if it should attain the success achieved in France and Germany, it would become, not only a source of wealth to the farmers, but a source of revenue to the Government. Under any circumstances, the Government would not run great risk in assisting this industry. Capitalists outside this Dominion are desirous of risking their own money in the enterprise, and the least the Government should do would be to grant them such help as would encourage them to work two, three or four If they did not succeed, the underyears more. taking would not have cost much to the Government. If they do succeed, I think it will be money well invested, and, as my hon. friend from Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) said, it will be sure to bring in a return to the treasury in some other form. I have dealt at greater length on this question than I intended to, but I thought it necessary to insist on the question at issue, when we saw that, although we had not to face that kind of a blockade which Napoleon created during the war against the introduction into continental Europe of the produce from England and the colonies, yet we have another kind of an attempt to blockade, in the shape of the McKinley Bill. Let me point out, though, that the McKinley Bill has not succeeded in preventing us from selling our hay, and I am glad to be able to inform my hon. friend from Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne), who complained about the hay question, that that produce, which was depreciated in value. It was undoubtedly one sold at such a low price last fall, has now reached of the reasons why the Congress at Washington such a fair price on the market of Toronto as to be quoted to-day as selling at $12.50 per ton. hon, member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) had to give some solace to his friends while he advocated the National Policy, and he was obliged, of course, to make them feel that he had not abandoned them entirely. He wanted to show that he was still in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, and in order to justify that opinion he informs us that upon 18 articles of export, he had found that the United States was a better market than England for our farm produce; but I have gone through the Trade and Navigation returns and the hon. gentleman must have been obliged to make big jumps in order to avoid items there which would strike the eye of anyone, and which proved, to the contrary, that our better market was in England, not in the United States. The hon, gentleman, for instance, did not mention cheese. I think that is a product of the farm, and I find that we shipped to England to the extent of nearly $9,000,000 worth of cheese last year, as against $31,473 into the United States. Neither did the hon, gentleman mention cattle, which have been shipped to England to the extent of $4,992,161, as against $488,266 to the United States; butter, which was shipped from Canada to England to the extent of $174,000 worth, against $7,000 to the United States; meats have been shipped from Canada to England to the extent of $359,921 worth, as against $83 to the United States; and of canned meats we exported $28,841 to England, as against $756 worth to the United States. Apples, the produce of Canada, were shipped to England to the value of $1,277,577, as against $233,000 worth sent to the United States; and when we come to see the total value of the exports shipped from Canada to England, as compared with the total value shipped to the United States, we will see that my hon, friend did not do justice to the Instead of exporting only English market. $2,000,000 worth to England and $12,000,000 to the United States, as my hon. friend said, we find that our actual exports to England amounted to $41,499,149, as against $33,291,207 worth to the United States. I am sure that all the arguments of my hon. friend in favour of unrestricted reciprocity were made to try and induce his friends to forgive him, to support the National Policy, and to induce them to support the Government in giving the necessary help and relief to an industry which is now in danger. I shall not detain the House further than to mention that I have received a letter from a gentleman who has taken a great deal of interest in the beet sugar industry, and he says that it will require five years of the continuation of the policy announced by the Finance Minister to secure a full opportunity to the manufacturers of that commodity to test the possibilities of Canada as a field for that enterprise. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the kindness with which you have listened to my remarks.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, as regards the Budget speech of the hon. Finance Minister, there has been a good deal of discussion on both sides of the House, and I shall not weary hon. gentlemen with any extensive remarks on this subject. I am pleased that the Government has thought it wise to lighten the burdens of the people, by removing from one of the necessities of life the heavy taxation to which it was subject; but I would have been much more pleased had they left us in a position whereby a combination of the sugar manufacturers could not have deprived us of much of the benefits that might accrue to us from this reduction in the sugar duties. As the Government were following the steps of the United States in this matter, if they had placed the duty on refined sugar at five-tenths of a cent per pound, as in the neighbouring Republic, instead of a teight-tenths of a cent, it would have left our people in a more favourable position-and not only that, but the Government would have received a considerable amount of revenue from the importation of the better qualities of West Indian sugar. It would also have placed our West Indian importers more on a par with the sugar manufacturers, and would allow some pecuniary profits to those who are engaged in that business. Many consumers prefer the higher grades of Porto Rico, Barbadoes, and other West Indian sugars, to the refined yellows, as they deem, whether rightly or not, that they contain more saccharine matter. Why should not the ship-owners of Halifax, St. John, Lunenburg, Yarmouth, and other sea-ports, have an opportunity, under this revision of the tariff, to supply the people of Canada with a good article of sugar at a cheap rate, instead of, as at present, having all the benefits that can be derived from the trade placed in the hands of the manufacturers? The hon. Finance Minister may say that he has placed sugar No. 14 Dutch standard and under on the free list, and that this is good enough for his table; but while I should not like to doubt the veracity of the hon. gentleman, I would venture to remark that when he comes to put that sugar on his table his better half will have something to say on the subject. Under the present arrangement in the tariff the importation of sugar will undoubtedly lead to litigation and trouble, and the genial and smiling countenance of the hon. Minister of Customs will. I am sure, be clouded, in trying to render an impartial decision in cases where, if the decision is against the importer, it simply means ruin to him. As regards the adding of 5 cents per pound to the Excise duty on tobacco, it is a doubtful factor towards procuring a larger amount of revenue. The Excise duty in the United States, if I understand aright, is 6 cents per pound, and the enormous difference between their Excise and ours will contribute, I fear, to a large amount of smuggling along our border. Customs and Excise duties, it is generally conceded, if carried beyond a certain limit, cease to produce additional revenue. Importation is almost prohibited on the one hand, and production curtailed on the other. I would also ask the hon. Minister of Finance why, in increasing his taxes, he did not increase those on the rich man's cigars as well as on the tobacco used by the labouring man. I was also in hope that the article of cornneal, which is used so largely by the farmers in the Maritime Provinces for their cattle, would attract the attention of the Government this session. Many farmers in our province use annually from ten to thirty barrels for feeding purposes. As the duty is a direct tax upon them, and the article of corn is one which does not need much protection, owing to our soil and climate not being peculiarly adapted to its growth, I am sure that there is no trade, it was deemed best, in the interests of the manufacturers of Halifax, Montreal and St. John, to tax the many thousands of fishermen all over the Dominion in order that the owners of these factories might become wealthy. This, it was claimed, would so build up these industries that in a short time they would, in competing for trade, be able to sell cordage at a lower rate than we could purchase it from abroad. Therefore the Government placed a duty on all cordage of about $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound, when, lo! instead of competing with one another they entered into a combination, and kept prices at a figure far beyond a reasonable profit on production. In fact, Mr. Speaker, if I am rightly informed, the agents of the factory at Halifax actually sold manila yarns and cordage last season to the fishermen of St. Pierre, Miquelon and Newfoundland for 2 cents per pound less than they disposed of it to the people of our own province. For my own part, I purchase mostly American cordage, as it is better in quality and can be obtained at a price not much greater than the inferior home article, notwithstanding the duty and freight of nearly 3 cents a pound. But I suppose they will all be American factories after this, as I understand that American capitalists have purchased all such industries throughout the Dominion. The following which I have copied from a New York paper exhibits the whole thing :-

"The despatch from St. John, N.B., to the effect that the National Cordage Company of New York has purchased all the cordage companies in Canada that were some time ago organized under the general designation of the Canadian Cordage Company conveys information that has been quietly current in Wall street for some weeks. The price paid is said to have been $2,000,000, and it was paid straight out of the treasury of the New York company. The statement is made that it will add $500,000 to the company's annual receipts. The acquirement of the Canadian companies removes a formidable competitor for the purchase of hemp from the markets of the world and enables the New York people to control the price of the raw material more successfully than heretofore."

This, Mr. Speaker, simply means that every consumer of cordage in the Dominion of Canada must pay the exorbitant prices demanded by this combination, and also, that this combination is sustained by the Canadian tariff, which, prevents outside competition. But as these factories will hereafter be worked by foreign capital, the Government, having no further incentive to protect these industries, will, I suppose, take steps to enable our fishermen in the near future to import their cordage free of duty. As I notice the hon, junior member for Halifax in his seat, I would like to ask him what the wholesale price of manila cordage at the Halifax factory is at the present time.

Mr. STAIRS. I cannot say.

Mr. BOWERS. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think it is somewhere in the vicinity of 12 cents a pound, and American cordage can be purchased for 9½ cents, with 1½ cents discount, 30 days. Hon. gentlemen opposite may prate of their loyalty, and of the advantages of the old policy; but when I travel through my own county, and witness the vacant houses and abandoned farms to be found there, I cannot but perceive that a policy that brings such | result? It would be as follows:-Mr. Bowers.

article of manila cordage for the use of the a blight upon our people and forces them to emitisheries. For many years we were allowed to import this article free of duty, but after the an absurd and a bad one. There are districts which, inception of the National Policy, of obstructing within the last ten years, have lost by emigration from 10 to 15 per cent. of their population. I have in my mind a district within twenty miles of my own home that only a few years ago had shipyards, where vessels were built, whose white sails were to be seen sailing to West India ports, to the ports of Boston and St. John, and to many other foreign countries. That was not more than twelve or fifteen years ago. At the present time, Mr. Speaker, you may judge of how much trade there is when I tell you that, a Customs officer dying at that port since I came to this meeting of Parliament, I called the attention of the Minister of Customs to the fact, and asked him to appoint a successor, when he informed me that the receipts at that office in 1889 were only $10, and in 1890 only $1.50; and you can also have some idea of what has taken place in that district when I tell you that from 50 to 75 families have moved from there to the United States within the last ten years. A policy, Mr. Speaker, which hampers trade, and which, like a two-edged sword, cuts both ways, must be a vicious one. As the hon, member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) the other night gave us an example of how this policy affected the farmer, I will give you an example of how the fishermen thrive upon it. Leaving a balance to the shipper of $1,052 00

Thus, Sir, you see at the present time, under our glorious old policy, the shipper has coming to him $6.10, while under extended reciprocal trade he would only realize $1,052. Still you will find people, even among our labouring classes, supporting a policy so inimical to their own interests. The ing a policy so inimical to their own interests. policy that supports one class of the community at the expense of another is a bad one, and should not receive the sympathy and support of our traders, farmers, labourers, mechanics or fisher-Now, that is not the worst showing I can make on the subject. I will just give you another little calculation to show how prejudicially to our interests the National Policy works. In the fishing settlements we also manufacture heavy salted pollock, and I will show you how this industry is injured by the National Policy. C sent to Boston 1,250 quintals of salt pollock, which were sold, clear of freight, at $2 per quintal, or a total of $2,500. After paying the American duty of 84 cents per quintal, amounting to $672, he had $1,828 left, which amount was invested in kerosene oil, as follows:-

lon amounting to	794	88
Duty on the same. 207 barrels at $1.50 each	596 310
Testing at 30 cents each		10 10
Total

Leaving a balance of $2.26 to the shipper.

Under reciprocal trade he would have 1,250 quintals of fish at $2.00, equal to $2,500, from which he would have to deduct:

207 barrels of oil at 8 cents per gallon	794 310 62	8S 50 10
Total	,167	48

Which, taken from $2,500, would leave him the magnificent sum of $1,332.52. Thus, you see he pays to the two Governments over 53 per cent. of the whole amount. The hon, member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) admits that blankets are 40 per cent, cheaper here than in the United States. He also says that the price of tweeds in Canada are from 20 to 25 per cent, less than in the United States. He adds:

"If he wants proof of that let him go to any seaboard town and watch seamen landing from a vessel. What do the crews do when they come ashore? Immediately each man buys a suit of tweed, some underwear and coarse boots, for they know where they can buy them the cheapest."

If that is so why should the hon, gentleman and will and peace toward men. Therefore, I shall his compatriots not require free trade with the United States? Why can we not send in those goods and others and make money out of the Americans? I cannot see why our manufacturers cannot compete with the people of the United States. Again he goes on to take a line somewhat different. He says:

"The best we can hope to do by the National Policy is to keep the price relatively high and that is all we have ever promised to do, and that promise we have absolutely fulfilled."

I grant this without contradiction. trouble, and we wish on this side of the House a policy that, instead of keeping the price high, will lower the price of his living to the workingman of this country. One of the other hon, gentlemen who spoke, I think the hon, member for East Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff) said, in speaking of pork, that our farmers would not get so good a price for their pork under reciprocity as they do now. Yet. at the same time we keep out corn lest American corn would come in and take the place of Canadian pease. But if corn can be brought in and sold to our farmers for feeding hogs, why should they not be able to raise as cheap pork as the United States' farmers. The hon, gentleman also forgets that when pork is high the lumbermen, and the fishermen, and the people in the Maritime Provinces We are interested in having cheap have to suffer. pork and beef as well as the farmers are interested in obtaining high prices for these articles. Allow corn to come in free of duty and our farmers will be able to raise pork and beef and sell just as cheap as the Americans. But the aim of the National Policy as the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) says:

"The best we can hope to do by the National Policy is to keep the price relatively high, and that is all we have ever promised to do, and that promise we have absolutely fulfilled."

Now, is that something to take credit for? Can any hon, gentleman on the other side take credit for a policy which keeps everything high? they can have all the credit they wish. I am in sympathy with all means that will give us more extended reciprocal trade with all nations. believe in doing away with all obstacles that will hinder a man from purchasing in the cheapest market, and from selling in that market where he can obtain the best results of his labour. In short I am averse to forcing any individual by the means of restrictive legislation to purchase goods whereby his hard earnings are only levers to advance the interests of pap-fed cormorants whom like the daughters of the Horse Leech of Scripture, as told us by the Wise Teacher, are continually crying: "Give, give." If people wish to call me a free trader I shall not quarrel with them, but, as a Canadian, loyal to his country and to whatever I think will conduce to its benefit, I shall take pride in pointing across the water, where the greatest nation on earth has built up its immense commerce by simply allowing the natural laws of supply and demand to prevail in unrestricted trade. True happiness and prosperity will come to the nations of the earth, when, instead of building up walls to coerce and irritate each other, they shall reach out and grasp each hands in free and friendly trade, striking off the shackles that now encumber commerce and trying to do all in their power to promote goodhave to vote for the amended motion as read by the hon, member for South Oxford.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria, N.S.) I think, Sir, judging by the way the speeches are gradually becoming shorter, that we are coming within a measurable distance of the end of this debate; and I shall not trouble the House at any length with the remarks I have to make, but shall confine myself to the charge of inconsistency made by hon. gentlemen opposite against hon, members supporting the Government. If those hon, gentlemen who have made this charge had read the speeches of some of their hon. friends who preceded them on their own side, they would have found a complete answer to the arguments they made. I find that the hon. member for Huron has completely, to his own satisfaction, proved that the duties upon wheat and flour have not increased the prices of these articles, and he occupied two or three pages of Hansard in showing that since these duties were imposed, the prices ruling in Toronto were 10 and 12 and sometimes 16 cents lower than those ruling in Buffalo and other cities of the United States at the same time. In a great many articles you will find that, when the charges are made by one who does not represent an agricultural district, a member for an agricultural district reverses that statement, and proves that the duty put on agricultural products is keeping the prices down in Canada. If any argument were needed to convince the people in the Maritime Provinces that the duties on wheat and flour are keeping down the prices, I have no better evidence to use than those of the hon. member for Huron. I find that the hon, gentleman who proposed this resolution has been in this House for some time. On the 13th December, 1867, Hon. Mr. Fisher, who was then representing the County of York, N.B., when the House was about to concur in the tariff brought in for the first time in that year, moved in amendment:

"That the said resolution be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to a Committee of the Whole on Ways and Means, for the purpose of reducing the duty proposed to be put on molasses, tea and several other articles which enter into the consumption of the whole people of the Dominion, and of admitting flour, meal and corn free.

Amongst those who voted against that motion I find the name of Cartwright, who, I presume, is the hon. member for South Oxford. I find that on the 18th May, 1868, Mr. Blake moved:

"That the said amendment be not now concurred in, but that the Bill be referred back to a Committee of the Whole, with an instruction to strike rice out of the 15 per cent. list and to insert it in the free list.

And I find preceding the name of Carling, in opposition to that motion, the name of Cartwright. Also, on the 18th May, 1868, Mr. Oliver moved a similar resolution:

"That the amendment be not now read a second time, but that the Bill be referred back to a Committee of the Whole for the purpose of adding the following animals to the special exemption list:—Horses, horned cattle, swine and sheep, when imported for agricultural purposes by agricultural societies."

And again I find the name of Cartwright amongst those who voted against it. In 1869 or 1870, I am not sure which, Mr. Dorion moved a resolution similar in effect to the second part of the resolution we have now before us, and I also find the name of Mr. Cartwright amongst those who voted against that resolution. So that, when hon. Mr. Bowers.

House with inconsistency or difference of opinion, I think they will find quite as much, if not more, on their side of the House. In regard to this resolution, I propose first to deal with that part of it which refers to reciprocity. I do not think that hon, gentlemen on the other side are so much in favour of reciprocity as they would lead us to believe, because, if they were in favour of reciprocity, they would not attempt at this stage to weaken the hands of the Government when they are proposing to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States. In 1874, when the Liberal party were in power, Sir John Macdonald said that they should have the most extended relations with the United States, and, if they could not get as good a treaty as they desired, and could not include as many articles in the free list as were included in 1854, they should take as much as they could get. Mr. George Brown, who was then the representative at Washington, declared that that was weakening their hands and was brought up against them when they went to Washington to negotiate a treaty. I am sure that hon. gentlemen opposite cannot charge the Conservative party with being opposed to a fair reciprocity with the United States. It is true that the negotiations for the old reciprocity treaty of 1854 were commenced by the Liberal Government, but they were completed by the Conservative Government which came into power before the negotiations were ended. When these negotiations were about expiring, a Conservative Government was in power in Nova Scotia and it sent a representative to Washington. A Conservative Government was in power in Upper Canada and it also sent a representative to Washington, and endeavoured to renew the treaty of 1854. 1869, the same thing was done, and the Government tried to negotiate a new treaty. In 1872 the Government negotiated the Treaty of Washington. Then the Liberals came into power and tried to negotiate a treaty in 1874. The Conservatives came again into power, and, in 1888, they tried to negotiate a treaty on the basis of the treaty of 1854. In this they failed. In 1866, as Mr. Brown stated in the Senate on his return from Washington in 1874, the Conservative Government went so far in giving away everything we had here, according to his views, that he himself refused to be any longer a member of that Government. Sir Alexander Galt, who was the plenipotentiary of the Government at Washington in 1865, also stated in this House that they offered every inducement to the United States to negotiate a treaty in 1865 or 1866, and that they In fact, he said the only declined to do so. thing they would admit into the United States from Canada free of duty was grindstones, but they proposed so high a duty on other products that it was impossible to negotiate a treaty with them, and he believed it was their object to embarrass the British Government on this continent, and not that they thought the treaty would be disadvantageous to them. In 1874, Mr. Brown was sent to Washington, and, in a paper which he prepared with his coplenipotentiary at that time, he made out his case as strong as it possibly could be made, showing that the treaty of 1854 was more advantageous to the United States than it was to Canada. He went back to 1821 and gentlemen opposite charge us on this side of the showed that between 1821 and 1832, during thirteen years, the United States sent to the British North American Provinces $30,997,417 of home products and $403,909 of foreign products, or a total of $31,401,326, while the entire imports of the United States in the same period from the provinces, including Newfoundland, only amounted to $7,684,559, leaving a balance of trade in favour of the United States of no less than $23,716,767. Again, from 1833 to 1845 the United States sent to the British provinces $54,082,537 of home products, and of foreign products $4,640,332; and all that we sent there was $23,356,275, leaving a balance in favour of the United States in those 12 years of $35,366,594. Then taking the next period of eight 835,366,594. years, which is more remarkable still, he shows that the United States sent us $55,072,260 of home products, and $22,020,254 of foreign products, and all we sent them was $36,753,592, leaving a balance in favour of the United States of $40,338.822. addition to that they had a large portion of our carrying trade which is not shown here at all. Then under the treaty of 1854 he says that in 13 years, according to the United States returns, they sent us $346,180,264 and they took from the provinces $325,726,520, leaving a balance in favour of the United States of $20,454,246. He shows that during the time of this treaty the balance was largely in favour of the United States, that they had also the carrying trade of the country from one province to another, along their canals and railways, which must have amounted to a considerable further sum, as in very heavy articles the cost of transit is about 100 per cent., and in the finest merchandise it amounts to two or three, and some times as high as eight per cent. During the treaty, in addition to the advantage they had in the way of trade, they also had the use of our fisheries free. Now, at that time Mr. Brown made various offers to the United States. He proposed that they should have a treaty based on the same terms as the treaty of 1854; this the Americans declined. He also agreed that manufactures should be added and other fall. be added, and asked them to say what they really did want; the Americans declined. In fact he proposed a treaty, a draft of which was drawn out, in which he proposed to give away everything we had, and I am sure that any Canadian reading the treaty must be thankful to the Americans that it was not accepted. He was giving away our fisheries, allowing them to bring in manufactured articles, while their products and everything they had, were admitted free, except for one or two years. They proposed that the clause in the Fishery Treaty, by which the value of the fisheries were to be arbitrated upon, should be wiped out also, and these fisheries were valued at $5,000,000 for the eleven years during which the Americans had enjoyed them. Now, if the Government at the present time are negotiating with the United States, what would be the use for us to cut off all the duties from articles coming in from the United States to-day? What would we have to offer in return? Why, we would have nothing; the Americans would simply tell us that they had everything now and they wanted nothing further. But the Liberal party a few years ago were not so strongly in favour of reciprocity as they are to-day. I find that Mr. Dorion, in moving his resolution, very similar to the one we have now, except that it was somewhat longer, set forth at some length the advantages of trade with the United States. The resolution was opwith the United States.

posed by Mr. Mackenzie. who declared that he would not cringe to the Americans, that the Americans were not in favour of a treaty, as the party of protection had got hold of the politics across the border, and he deprecated any cringing to the Americans at that time. Mr. Joly also positively declared that however willing the Americans might be to come forward, he was only prepared to go half way to meet them. Mr. Blake also voted against it, and declared that it was of no use, that we had made several propositions, and that it was cringing to them now to ask for reciprocity again. When the Treaty of Washington was nogotiated it was of some benefit, our fishermen found it to be of some benefit to them, and the country found it also to be of some benefit, particularly in the receipt of the $5,000,000. We find that the Liberal party, then, were opposed to that treaty. They took very strong grounds against it, and perhaps there was no person who took stronger ground against the treaty than the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Here is what he said in 1872:

"This treaty proposes that at one fell swoop we should blight and perhaps destroy the prospects of this country. A hundred years ago, after the assassination of John Duke of Burgundy, a Carthusian monk held up to the King of France the skull of the murdered nobleman, and showing the hole made by the battle axe of the assassin, said: This is the hole through which the English entered France and took Paris.' "He (Mr. Mills) then holding up the treaty in his hands, said: Gentlemen, here is the hole which the American people will use to gain possession of Canada.' (Hear, hear, from the Opposition). 'This is the hole through which they are to be admitted into this country to destroy our union with the British Empire.' Empire.

A few years afterwards a motion was made in this House by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., looking to a renewal of this treaty. Perhaps there was no person more severe upon this treaty than the then hon, member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron); he said:

"The Premier did not oppose this; he might have given the matter away altogether in order to please Great Britain. Reciprocal coasting regulations were proposed by the British Commissioners. The American Commis-sioners declined the proposition. The British Commis-sioners proposed reciprocal negotiations in vessels, a most important interest in which Canada was deeply interested, but the Americana respectfully declined it and nothing important interest in which Canada was deeply interested, but the Americans respectfully declined it, and nothing further was heard of it. The British Commissioners proposed to settle the Fenian raid, but this did not commend itself to the Americans. Then the British Commissioners proposed a modification of the reciprocity treaty, but the Americans respectfully declined. The British Commissioners proposed a modification of the tariff with our canals and the St. Lawrence River, but the Americans most respectfully declined.

"He believed that if we gave up the fisheries now we gave them up forever. Because it was a mistake to suppose (as had been stated) that the Imperial Government had promised to give notice of a termination of that treaty in ten years. The hon, gentlemen who thought that the treaty would terminate in twelve years were deluding themselves into a belief that the British Government had promised to give the notice.

deluding themselves into a belief that the British Government had promised to give the notice.

"He looked upon the treaty so defective that he thought it better to wipe it out and begin de noro.

"The hon, gentlemen declare that the whole press of Canada was first against it and the whole press of America for it. He cited the New York Tribune as saying that Canada had surrendered the fisheries which were more valuable than the whole of the rest of Canada.

"Why, says he, what was true of the Americans fiftyeight years ago is true of them to-day. Concession only whets their appetites.

whet, their appetites.

"All the American papers looked upon the treaty as a step towards annexation.

"The only thing now to do was to summon the British flag off the continent. The early victories over Baden were nothing compare do the diplomatic victories. The reading of the treaty was to take place 17th June. The anniversary of Bunker Hill and the ratification on the 4th July, Independence Day.

So far as the second part of this resolution is conconcerned, I propose to vote against it, upon the ground that the Government are now in negotiation with the Government of the United States in respect to a treaty; and even if they were not, I do not believe a resolution of this House would in any way facilitate the obtaining of a reciprocity treaty with the American people. The hon, member for Digby (Mr. Bowers) is certainly a free trader. He objects to a duty upon anything. He blames this Government for the duties that Americans place on articles which go into their country. I should like to know how hon, gentlemen can accuse this Government for any duties the Americans are pleased to place on articles entering the United States. The hon, gentleman contends that the people of this country are paying the duties which the Americans place upon their articles and are also paying the duties which this Government places upon articles coming from the States. If the balance of trade has been so largely in favour of the UnitedStates it would appear I think that the United States ought to be looking more for a market in this country than we should be looking for a market in the United States. great deal has been said with regard to the debt of Canada and the large amount collected as revenue, and we are constantly referred to Great Britain. But, I find that in the United Kingdom they collect as revenue $11.32 per head; Gibraltar, $16.62 per head; Malta, $7.09, and in Canada we collect $6.54. If we turn to the Australian colonies we find the following:—New South Wales, $39.18; Victoria, $33.94; South Australia, $41.23; Western Australia, $41.23; Queensland, $39.91; New Zealand, $32.93. I know some hon, gentleman may point out that a large amount of revenue in Australia is derived from public works, but this is altogether aside from public works. Our debt in this Dominion has largely been contracted by the admission of the various provinces, our debt at the time of Confederation being about $60,000,000. No less than $115,000,000 have been expended on railways and $32,000,000 on canals. We have also assumed a large amount in the shape of debts belonging to the various provinces, and that way the debt has increased. Has not this Government been doing all that is possible to reduce the taxes on the necessaries of life? If the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite was enforced to-day, we would be paying on tea alone over $1,000,000 and on coffee a very large amount and yet a proposition is now before the House that the taxes should be reduced further than the $3,000,000 that have just been remitted, and I consider this is not a proper time to pass a resolution to further reduce the taxes. In the counties with which I am acquainted the Government is constantly found fault with because it does not expend more money in subsidizing railways and constructing public works. I should like to know how much money the Government of Nova Scotia would have to expend on roads and bridges if the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite were now in vogue. now take the coal trade and show how the policy pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite affected it. In 1873 the sales of coal in Nova Scotia amounted to last year in which hon, gentlemen opposite were in power. When we consider that 8 or 9 cents of royalty is levied on every ton of coal sold in the province, making the total amount received by the Local Government equal to about $160,000, I think that the Liberals who come from that province, who know the value of the amount of revenue received by the Local Government in assisting them to secure their seats here, should not strike a blow at that great industry of the province. This is the fifth session I have been a member of this House. I have heard the same arguments, the same facts, the same figures given, and the same epithets applied to this side of the House; but the people of the country have weighed the matter, and they have decided to send a majority to sustain this Government. When, for the fourth time, hon. gentlemen opposite find the voice and sentiment of the people against them, they will adopt some new policy. Up to 1886 their policy was in regard to taxation, but that year the policy was changed, and commercial union, or free trade, or reciprocity with the United States, has been their policy since.

Mr. BECHARD. Mr. Speaker, at this advanced period of the debate, and after the long and elaborate speeches which have been delivered by hon. members on both sides of the House, I presume we. all realize with a certain degree of satisfaction that the time has come for short speeches, which may receive as fair a hearing, and are about as efficient as orations of two or three hours duration, to complete the conversion of our hon, friends on the opposite side of the House, to the policy of unrestricted reciprocity. Being an old stager, of nearly 20 years upon the Opposition benches, I am not supposed to shower congratulations upon the Government, and especially upon the head of the Finance Minister, for the policy which he has announced in making his financial statement. It is, on the whole, Sir, the same old policy which was inaugurated in 1878, and which after having been modified about as often as an old maid, determined upon pleasing some fellow, modifies her dress, has become the mother of two illegitimate children, bearing the names of "Combine" and "Monopoly." But I do not propose to discuss the principle, and the details of that policy, upon this occasion; it is a work which I have already done in previous sessions, and it has been done again by some of my hon. friends during this debate. I want. Sir, to refer to the statement made by the Finance Minister when he said, that he determined to give to the workingman, what he has called, a free breakfast table, by allowing him to get his sugar free, as he can already get his tea and coffee free of duty. When the Finance Minister gave that information to the House, I regretted that he did not find it proper to give to the working-man, in addition to free sugar, free tea and free coffee, also free bread. If it is thought that no duty should be levied upon sugar, tea and coffee, because they are considered as necessaries of life, I think that there are still greater reasons to allow flour to be admitted duty free, because bread ought to be regarded as one of the most important articles among the necessaries of life. Sir, in my humble 811,106 tons, in 1878, 693,511 tons, in 1890, 1,786,111 tons, in 1889, 1,555,107 tons. The output is or coffee, or sugar, among those articles of food at present almost three times that of 1878-79, the which contribute to the sustenance of human life, judgment, bread occupies a higher rank than tea, or coffee, or sugar, among those articles of food and must of necessity supply the table of not only the workingman, but of every man. I do not know what is exactly the state of public opinion throughout other parts of the Dominion respecting this question, but let the Finance Minister visit the great Province of Quebec, and I venture to say that he will meet there thousands and tens of thousands of people, farmers, artizans, and workingmen of all descriptions, who will tell him that, in their opinion, bread is a far more important article than tea or coffee. They will tell him that it would be better for them, and more profitable for the Government, if duty was imposed upon tea, which is cheap, and flour admitted free of duty. They will tell him that they would prefer to pay a duty of four, or even five, cents per pound on tea than the 75 cents duty which, under the present tariff, they are compelled to pay upon every barrel of flour which they consume. We import a considerable quantity of flour into this country. 1 see by the Trade and Navigation Returns that last year we imported for home consumption 169,869 barrels of flour, for which we paid $612,953, and upon which a Customs duty was paid of $89,771.23. But, Sir, there is no doubt that a much larger sum has been extracted from the pockets of the consumers to go into the pockets of the mill owners, because of the advanced price of the home manufactured flour, resulting from the duty imposed on the imported article. Last night my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) said that we paid no taxation upon flour, because we exported a large quantity of it. I do not share his opinion. His assertion is based upon a principle which, as a general rule, is a correct one, but there are exceptions to some rules, and this case is an exception. If we pay no taxation on flour, why the duty? This duty on flour has been placed there, either to protect some people, or otherwise it has been placed there to blind and deceive some people. It is one or other of the two. We do not import flour into this country because of the scarcity of the article, but there is no doubt whatever that the flour imported into Canada, is purchased at a lower price than the home manufactured flour, or otherwise there would be no reason for the importation. Mr. Speaker, this duty upon flour weighs heavily upon the people of the Province of Quebec. And I see by Quebec consume about one-third of the whole importation of flour into this country. As has been $37,000,000 a year? They speak of deficits under truly asserted by my hon, friend from Arthathe Mackenzie Administration. Well, Sir, there baska (Mr. Lavergne) last night the farmers of were deficits. The Liberal Administration had ber of them who sow wheat, and that only to the extent of a few bushels a year, because they is levied upon an article of food which in their opinion holds the most important place among the necessities of life. I tell the Finance Minister that made by the Minister of Finance, that he would But, Sir, the cause of those deficits was beyond relieve the burdens of the people of the country to the amount of $2,000,000 a year. I frankly and willingly admit that that is a sound policy. It is a policy which has been praised and recommended by all statesmen who have been regarded as great financiers. It is easy indeed for anyone to conceive that a Minister of Finance, having in his possession a surplus of nearly $4,000,000, has nothing better to do, at least under ordinary circumstances, than to reduce the burden of taxation. But, Sir, if the hon, gentlemen opposite think that they may feel enthusiastic over this change, we on this side of the House have no reason to complain of it. On the contrary, we rejoice over the event, because this change is in accordance with the policy of the Liberal party; and there is not a Liberal in the country, I am sure, who is not satisfied with this change, and does not regard it as a triumph of the policy of the Liberals in this respect. I have noticed, Sir, during this session, as well as in previous sessions, that hon, gentlemen opposite, when they discuss the fiscal question, never miss the opportunity of attacking the Mackenzie Administration. Prominent among those who have done so on this occasion was the hon, member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins), who I am sorry is not at present in his seat. That hon, member, after perambulating over a vast field of figures, concluded by telling us an old story, which had been already repeated more than a thousand times in this House, that the Liberals had increased the taxation, that they had spent too much money, that their administration had been characterized by deficits. Well, Sir, it is true that the Mackenzie Administration did raise the taxation, but everyone knows that they were compelled to do so by the actions of their predecessors. When they assumed office, they soon found that they had accepted a mortgaged estate, and they saw that with the revenues in hand it was impossible for them to meet the obligations imposed on the country by those who had preceded them in office. So they were compelled to raise the tariff from 15 to 171 per cent. But, Sir, can this increase of 2½ per cent. be denounced by hon. gentlemen opposite as oppressive or onerous, when we know that on reassuming power they increased the tariff from 17½ per cent. to 35 per cent.? Can they denounce as extravagant the annual expenditure of the Mackenzie Adthe official returns that the people of the Province of ministration, which averaged $23,500,000, when they have carried it to $36,000,000 and even $37,000,000 a year? They speak of deficits under the Province of Quebec are not largely producers of wheat. There is a very small number of the other years they were met by deficits; but everyone knows, and every fair-minded man to-day admits, that those deficits were not the result of know it is a very uncertain crop; they prefer extravagance in the expenditure of public money, to sow other grain and buy their flour. I repeat but that they were caused by a great commercial extravagance in the expenditure of public money, that this duty on flour is regarded as oppressive crisis which lasted for years, not only in this by the people of the Province of Quebec, because it country, but in the United States, in England, is levied upon an article of food which in their and all over the civilized world. Owing to that crisis our imports decreased, and there was consequently a diminution in the Customs revenue so long as he has not removed that odious duty on alone of $3,000,000. That revenue, which was flour, he has no justification for claiming that he $15,000,000, in 1875-76 fell to $12,000,000. There has given the workingman a free breakfast table. is the reason for these deficits, and bear in Now, Mr. Speaker, our hon, friends opposite have mind that not a single one of those deficits received with enthusiastic cheers the statement equalled the diminution of Customs revenue alone.

there was a remedy, and that remedy would debate, that we are a happy people—a very happy have been an increase of taxation. But, Sir, the Government thought, and properly thought, that better than that of the Indians or of the negroes an increase of taxation in the circumstances of discontinuous and disc stagnation of business consequent on the continuation of such a policy as an increase of taxation at be only adding general oppression to general depression. They preferred to wait for the return of better times, fully persuaded that the surpluses of future years would be more than sufficient to cover and remain satisfied with the present and neglect the deficits of past years. Hon, gentlemen on the the future. As a whole, we may be a happy people, other side know all these facts as well as we know; but there is no doubt that there are, in the midst them; but when they speak of these deficits, they of that happy people, a large number of persons carefully avoid to mention the circumstances which whose wants cannot be met and whose hopes caused them. Sir, let me say without offence to cannot be encouraged by the actual con-anybody that in this respect they place themselves dition of the country. We are a happy in the position of witnesses who tell the truth, but people, but from the midst of this happy people not the whole truth. Before these hon gentlemen indulge in any repetition of their attacks upon ling their native land to cross the frontier and live the Mackenzie Administration, it may perhaps be good for them to look at the Public Accounts. where they would find something that should The Public Accounts show that edify them. hon, gentlemen opposite, since they assumed power, although they have collected an immense revenue! compared with that of the Mackenzie Administration, have suffered more from deficits. show that in 1884-85 they had a deficit of $2,240,-058.90, that in 1885-86 they had a deficit of $5,834,-571.85, and that in 1887-88 they had another deficit of $810.031.16. Sir, these hon, gentlemen have Perhaps he shares the opinion of those, who in the not to justify or excuse these deficits the same reasons which could excuse the deficits which occurred under the Mackenzie Government, because they have occurred in years of prosperity and when these hon, gentlemen commanded a very large ple from the Eastern States of America leave them revenue. Sir, as one who American goes from the east to the west, but gave that Government his humble support, I am happy to be able to say that I conscientiously believe that the Mackenzie Administration was the most honest and economical Government that ever administered the affairs of this Dominion. God. Sir, to the eternal honour of that Government, under their rule the ears of the people were not soiled. The public mind was not disturbed and the public conscience was not saddened or shocked by reports and evidences that had taken place in any of the public departments of corrupt and scandalous transactions. Let me add here, that it affords deep gratification to his friends in this House and to the people of this country, to see the venerable statesman who was then at the head of the Government, though crippled and disabled by cruel sickness, still occupying his seat in this Housethis House, which has witnessed his hard labours, his great efforts, his warm patriotism, where he has worn out the best years of his life and completely ruined his health in the service of his country, with no other reward than the personal satisfaction of having left behind him a political record which laws of nature, it is most beneficial for us to trade will ever be, in the estimation of his friends at with—the United States. Well, I am sure that our condition is better than that of the Indians or of the negroes of Africa. What inducement attracts them hither? They do not leave their own home to satisfy a fanciful taste for travelling. No, it is a sacrifice for every man to leave his country, his relatives and friends: those people go, pressed by necessity and because they hope to find in the neighbouring republic a prosperity which cannot be found in Canada. The hon, member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) said last night that he would not speak of the exodus, and judging from his tone, he appeared to consider that subject not worth while discussing. course of this debate, have stated that there was nothing strange in the exodus, because people in England and Scotland leave the rural districts to go to the great centres, and because peoto go to the Western States. But those people, American goes from the east to the west, but keeps within the United States. That is not the case with our people. They leave Canada for the United States, true, with the hope of returning home, but experience has proved that the greater part of them never return. But the hon. Finance Minister, it appears, has found a remedy to cure the evil of emigration. He proposes to increase our trade with Great Britain, and make that country a very accessible market for the sale of our poultry and eggs. He proposes to develop our trade with the West Indies. This is, if I remember aright, the second time he has made that promise. He made the same promise during last session, and, from all appearances, his journey to those countries, last fall. does not seem to have been crowned with much success. Sir, the hon, gentleman will develop our trade with the West Indies, which, according to his own statement, have the enormous aggregate trade of $4,000,000 a year. He will develop our trade with South America, Australia, China and Japan, in fact with every country he can imagine, except that great country, which, according to the laws of nature, it is most beneficial for us to trade gentleman, when he made his budget speech, tell this House that the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 had been a boon to Canada! Did we not hear, during last session, another hon, gentleman, then a Minister of the Crown, tell this House that reciprocity in agricultural products between the United States and Canada would be ruinous to the Canadian farmers. Sir, in view of those disclosures, emanating from two gentlemen, both Ministers of the Crown, and one of them the Finance Minister, I ask how can our people be hopeful or confident that these hon. gentlemen seriously desire to negotiate any reciprocity treaty at all with the United States. As a general rule, when a man wants something, when a representative of the people wants to see a certain policy adopted, he alleges all the reasons he can find and all the arguments he can make in support of that policy. But, on the other hand, when he wants to prevent the adoption of any doctrine, he utters all the reasons and makes all the arguments he can think of which militate against it. But we have been witnesses to a strange spectacle in this House. We have seen hon, gentlemen opposite attempting to reverse that rule; we have heard them, while professing to be in favour of reciprocity—of what kind we do not know-argue all the time against it. Take all their speeches, and one after the other, from be-Take all ginning to end, was an argument against recipro-They took the trouble to tell us that this kind of grain and that other kind of grain was selling at higher prices in Canada than in the United States, that agricultural products in the United States are similar to ours, that the markets of the United States are overstocked with their own products, of which the Americans are compelled to ship a large surplus to foreign markets; and they exclaimed if our markets were thrown open to American products they would be deluged by those products. What is the logical inference to be drawn from such statements? No other than the following:—If the condition of things is such as represented by those hon, gentlemen, reciprocity, under any form, would not be desirable or profitable, but, on the contrary, would be detrimental to Canadian interests. If hon, gentlemen opposite want some kind of reciprocity, why do they not say openly what they want? They tell us they want a fair and just treaty, and that is all; but let me say that a policy defined in such vague terms does not mean much. It does not mean as much as reciprocity in natural products. In my humble judgment it means nothing. After the declaration of the Finance Minister and the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, I am at a loss to know what has induced the Finance Minister and his colleagues to go to Washington last spring, and to intend to return there next fall to negotiate commercial reciprocity with the United States. But they made promises to the people during the last election. They told the people that they had dissolved Parliament for the purpose of consulting them on this great question of reciprocity, and the fact is that they are now compelled to go to Washington by the pressure of public opinion. My hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins) told us that the Liberals had brought side issues into the election, and that, if we had discussed this question of reciprocity alone, we would not have returned to this House with a corporal's guard. I do not know what was wishing for the American markets: that is the

the topic of discussion in the County of L'Islet at the last election, but I do know that in almost every constituency throughout the country the question of reciprocity was the great topic of discussion. The Liberals preached unrestricted reciprocity as they had done before, and the Conservative candidates professed also to be in favour of reciprocity, but of a limited reciprocity confined to natural products. They told the people that, if the present Government remained in power, they would negotiate a treaty which would benefit the farming interest, the mining interest, the lumbering interest and the fishing interest, and permit them to continue protection to the manufacturing interest. If they had not preached that doctrine, I do not say, like my hon friend, they would not have been returned with a corporal's guard, but I sincerely believe they would have been defeated. They preached a policy which saved them at the last election, and I must admit that, if they could succeed in negotiating a treaty which would satisfy the farming interest, the mining interest, the lumbering interest and the fishing interest, the country would be satisfied. But here the question arises, can they succeed? When we look at the experience of past years, the prospect in not encouraging. We all know that the Canadian Government after the abrogation of the treaty of 1854, made attempts on different occasions to have that treaty renewed or to obtain a treaty on the same basis. They never could succeed. A treaty was negotiated by the Mackenzie Administration through the agency of the late George Brown, but the American Senate rejected that treaty as being too favourable to Canadian interests. We have before us the recent declarations of American statesmen, of Mr. Blaine, Mr. Carlisle, and other leaders of the two great parties who divide public opinion in that country, and they all state that no kind of reciprocity will be entertained except on the basis of the freest commercial intercourse between the two countries. Surely this does not mean reciprocity limited to natural products, but it means unre-stricted reciprocity such as is preached by the Liberal party. Hon. gentlemen opposite may call it commercial union if they please, but any such measure would have to be such a measure of reciprocity as would be acceptable to the Canadian people. The lessons of the past are not lost for the Liberals. In presence of the numerous but vain attempts which have been made by our Governments to obtain reciprocity limited to natural products, and in presence of the recent declarations of American statesmen, the Liberal party have thought that no reciprocity could be obtained be-tween Canada and the United States unless it comprises the free admission on both sides reciprocally of all products being the respective produce of the two countries. The Liberal party have adopted that policy and have preached it to the people, being convinced that it would promote the interests of our country by a rapid development of its great natural resources, by securing a market for the farming, the lumbering, the fishing and the mining interests and such other interests as might be created by the development of our resources and the expansion of our trade. We believe that all those interests would be satisfied by the adoption of unrestricted reciprocity. there is an element of our people who is ardently farming class. Our farmers want reciprocity, and they are bound to have it. They form the most populous class in our community; they are the backbone of the country, and they have the power to impose their will. It is that vigorous class which at the last election nearly succeeded in upsetting the Government of this country, and it is that class that will change the Government if satisfaction is not given to it when another occasion arises. Our farmers know the importance of our trade with the United States. They know that from year to year that trade has been increasing and that within the last few years it has exceeded our trade with Great Britain. To-day our trade with the United States is nearly 50 per cent. of our trade with the whole world, notwithstanding the obstacles in the way by the existence of a tariff wall on both sides of the frontier. Our farmers know well that, when they want to sell their surplus of horses, they depend entirely on the American market, and there is no other foreign market for them. They know that when they want to sell their surplus of sheep and of wool they have there their best market. They know that, when they want to sell their surplus of barley, poultry and eggs, there is the only market in which they can sell with profit. They know that, when they want to sell their surplus of hay, there is no other foreign market of any consequence than the American That is a commodity of the greatest importance to the farmers of the Province of Quebec. Hon, gentlemen opposite have insinuated that the farmers of that province are wrong in raising so much hay, that they would do much better if they fattened cattle and raised stock with that hay, our fishing grounds. My hon, friend from L'Islet Let me tell those hon, gentlemen that the farmers also told us that when we speak of reciprocity, we of the Province of Quebec are not prepared to receive their lesson. They know what they are about: they know what is to their interest; they know what is best for them as well as they know when they are losing money in an enterprise of any kind, and they are as intelligent as any group of population living, no matter where, on the continent of They are the owners of lands which are well fitted for the production of hay, and the cost of that crop is almost nothing. They have raised hay in large quantities since they have found a market in the United States, and they have realized large sums of money by that trade. They know that the New England States are separated from us by only a short distance, that they are within a few hours of us, and that all our products can reach them to-day sconer than can the products of the Western By the geographical position of the New England States, they constitute for us one of the best markets which is to be found for a very large portion of the products of the Canadian farmer. Now, Sir, let me add that our farmers have been educated, not by theories respecting this question, but by facts. The facts are there, obvious, staring them in the face, and they speak louder and more eloquently than the fanciful calculations and vain declamations of politicians who do not want to Sir, I will take the liberty to tell my heed them. hon friend from L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins), that he filled with soldiers. criminating against England in favour of a country that in return would discriminate in our favour against the rest of the world, he will never succeed in persuading them that they would be guilty of disloyalty against the mother country. They hold that every country has a natural right to entertain with other countries just such commercial relations as can best agree with its own interests. They are a loyal people, but they are not prepared to sacrifice their own interests and the future prosperity of their families to uphold a very respectable but merely sentimental interest. They are a loyal people, Sir, and while they would not raise their arms to strike a parricidal blow at the mother country, they yet feel in their souls, that their intelligence and their hearts, their devotedness and their lives, are due first, second and all the time, to Canada, the home of themselves and their children. Sir, in upholding those sentiments they play the part of good Canadians and true patriots. My hon, friend from L'Islet has told us that the Liberals are prepared, in order to secure reciprocity with the Americans, to concede to them everything without compensation. Let me tell the hon, gentleman that we are prepared to concede to the Americans just as much as they would be prepared to concede to us, nothing more and nothing less. It has not been the practice of the Liberal party to make concessions to the Americans for nothing. When I remember the career of the Conservative party, I find that by the Washington Treaty they have conceded in the past to the Americans, without any compensation whatever, the navigation of the St. Lawrence River, and the use of speak of it in such terms as if our entire prosperity depended upon the adoption of that policy, and believing that he had found an irresistible argument, he exclaimed: "Why, look at the continental nations of Europe. They do not speak of reciprocity between neighbouring nations, and if it is such a good policy as is represented by the Liberals of Canada, why do not the European nations adopt it?" Sir, I shall not undertake to repeat all the reasons which may prevent reciprocity or free trade being adopted among the continental nations of Europe. But I will tell my hon, friend he ought to know that the continental nations of Europe send their surplus to the great British market, which is free to the whole world, and that if England chose to adopt a policy of protection such as they have themselves, they would, perhaps, soon find it to be necessary to make a modification of their protective policy in the interest of their subjects. We know, moreover, that some of those countries are ruled by monarchs who constantly dream of extending the limits of their empires, while other countries are busy in preparing the means of defence against foreign invasion. They must raise immense revenue in order to maintain those enormous standing armies which seem to have made of Europe, during the last twenty years, nothing but an immense barracks revenues, and under such circumstances it is likely difficult for those European governments to agree to any measure of free trade among themselves. But if those nations were situated as we are in Canada, with only a few volunteer troops and withadopting free trade with the United States, by dis- out a military navy, if they were situated as are the

Canada has exhibited in recent years." This progress, which Lord Salisbury described as a marvel-lous, and greater than the progress of any other dominion of the British Crown, has been achieved under the National Policy. The hon, gentleman asks us to tear up the National Policy by the roots, and he admits, as he is forced to admit, that that implies the loss of many millions of our revenue: and in fact an entire reconstruction of our fiscal policy. In other words, the hon, gentleman asks the people of this country, at a time of marvellous prosperity, to go in for a fiscal and commercial revolution of an enormous kind, and he asks the people to do so. on the strength of an alternative policy which he says he advocates. But he refuses to disclose to the people what that alternative policy is. The hon. gentleman was asked by my hon, friend, the member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), who I venture to think made one of the finest speeches which have ever been made in this House on this question; in the course of his remarks he asked the hon, gentleman to say, whether the policy which he advocated, implied commercial union with the United States if the people of the United States refused to accept the so-called unrestricted reciprocity, that we are supposed to be discussing in this House: though no one seriously supposes that we are discussing any such question. The hon, gentleman was asked to state whether or not he would accept commercial union if the people of the United States refused his unrestricted reciprocity, and what did the hon. gentleman answer ? He said : When I get on that side of the House I will tell you and tell the In other people what I will do. the hon, gentleman said: I appeal to the people of Canada to support my policy: I have a policy which I maintain will bring greater prosperity to this country than the policy under which she is now prospering; but do you suppose I am such a fool as to state to the people what that policy is. Let me into such a position that I can work my own sweet will for a while in spite of the people, and then I will let you know, and I will let the people know, what I will do: but until then they shall not know from me. Mr. Speaker, I have heard a great many rather masterful utterances from the hon. gentleman since I have had the pleasure and honour of a seat in this House, but I must say, that I never yet heard an utterance from him, which in good, solid, sturdy-well. I was almost going to say insolence to the people of this country-exceeded that. At all events, it was as studied an affront to the people of this country as the hon. gentleman even could very well have managed to offer.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What kind of reciprocity was put in issue before the country by the Government at the last election? We are all anxious to know that.

Mr. McNEILL. I understood that the policy put before the country by the Government, was a policy as nearly as possible on the lines of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854. That is what I have always understood. I do not know whether that is what the hon, gentleman understood, but I thought there never was any misunderstanding with regard to that.

As by Mr. example.

Mr. McNEILL Here was a simple question asked the hon, gentleman, as to whether he was in favour of commercial union or not, as to whether he was prepared to accept commercial union or not, and he refused to answer that simple question, and he in fact told the people of the country, that they would find it out, if they were foolish enough to put him in power, but not until then. the position in which we stand with regard to that matter. I must say, that so far as my judgment goes, the course which the hon, gentleman has pursued in that matter is utterly indefensible. the hon, gentleman had been asked to give a statement as to the details of this policy, he would have been perfectly justified in refusing to do so; but when the hon, gentleman is asked to state what are the fundamental principles which underlie his policy, and he refuses to do so, then I say that his course is perfectly indefensible. It is of the utmost importance that the people of this country, who are asked to east their votes upon this question, a question which is fraught with the most serious possible results to them, should know exactly, and squarely, and distinctly, what the policy is which the hon, gentleman pretends to advocate. I say that if the hon, gentleman still refuses to state what his policy is-I can hardly conceive that he will refuse to do so-but if he does refuse, he must consent to be written down in the pages of Canadian history, as no better than a political bandit, or political wrecker, who regardless of consequences, regardless of the suffering and the loss and the misery that it will entail, is prepared to obstruct the triumphal car of his country's progress, and to overset it if he can, in the hope that he may be able perhaps, to snatch some paltry benefit to himself out of the destruction that he has succeeded in bringing about. That is the position in which the hon, gentleman stands in my eyes; it may not be so in the eyes of those who sit on the same side of the House with the hon. gentleman himself. I am quite satisfied that the course he has adopted is not the course his leader would have adopted, had he been allowed to follow his own wishes and instincts. But, Sir, the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) tells us that the Conservative party were altogether regardless of British interests when they introduced the National Policy, and that the National Policy has discriminated against British sales in Canadian markets. Now, I do not know where the hon. gentleman got his facts and figures, but I think they will not bear much investigation. I happened to be present on the occasion when the National Policy was introduced into this House. I had not the honour of a seat in this House at that time, but I happened to be present on the floor, and I remember very well that Sir Leonard Tilley on that occasion stated distinctly that the Government, in framing that policy, had been specially regardful of the interests of England, and that they believed that, comparatively speaking, that policy would be beneficial to English trade in Canada. That statement was received with tempests of applause from this side of the House, and yet the hon, member for South Oxford states that the Conservative party had no regard for British interests in that matter. He says that the National Policy discriminated against British sales in Canadian markets. I say that the statement the hon, gentleman makes is utterly void of founda- assault. The hon, gentleman, Sir, goes through the tion, and I can demonstrate that to the satisfaction country, telling the people of Canada that the United of every hon, member in this House in three minutes by that clock.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do it.

Mr. McNEILL. I will do it, just to please the hon, gentleman who asks me to do it. I say that British sales in Canadian markets, when the hon. gentlemen came into power in 1873, amounted to $18.000,000; the hon, gentlemen operated for five years, and at the expiration of that time British sales in Canada had fallen to the almost incredible amount of $37,000,000. If the hon, gentlemen had had an opportunity for five or six years more and had been equally successful. I do not know but the name of Great Britain would have disappeared from our financial returns altogether. But it may be said that the cause of this was that there was a depression of trade at that time, and that if we look to the sales of the United States in our markets we shall find a similar falling away. Well, what are the facts? The facts are that the American sales in our markets during the same time did not fall away at all; but on the contrary they slightly but appreciably increased to the extent of $1,000,000 at the same time that the hon, gentleman had reduced British sales by $31,000,000. Now, Sir, what was the case under the National Policy ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I). You have failed to tell us how he reduced the British sales.

to explain that, it is not for me to explain. The year 1879 I leave out of consideration, because the greater part of that year was under the policy of the hon, gentlemen opposite. The National Policy did not come into operation until almost the close of the fiscal year. If I counted the year 1879; against the hon, gentlemen, as I ought to do, it would show an additional falling away of $7,000,000 in British sales. But now let us look at the operation of the National Policy, which the hon, gentleman says discriminated against British, that $14,000,000 worth of timber to Great Britain sales in Canadian markets, as compared with his last year, we earned in Canadian vessels alone own policy. The National Policy began to make $7,000,000; so that you must add that $7,000,000 itself felt in 1880, and what do we find? Do we worth of freight to the $14,000,000 worth of lumber find that British sales had fallen away still more? that we sold to Great Britain in order to at all No. Sir; we find that British sales had increased in appreciate the value of the market we have in that year from $30,000,000 to $34,000,000, and England as compared with the market in the never again during the whole course of the time that the National policy has been in force have British sales come within $2,000,000 of the low figure to which they were reduced under the operathey had increased to $42,000,000 and last year to $43,000,000. In other words under the operation of the National Policy British sales had increased glory in our national development, rather than 40 per cent., while United States sales increased selling our timber to people on the other side of at the same time only 20 per cent. And yet the line who are jealous of and envy our prosperity, hon, gentleman says that the National Policy has discriminated against British sales in Canadian markets. Why, Sir, when I came into the House, the other night, and heard the hon gentleman, in his stentorian tones, with those figures in his possession, inveighing against discrimination against young Dominion of ours is already the fourth or Great Britain under the National Policy, I could lifth maritime nation on the face of the earth. not help being forcibly reminded of the herbivorous champion of another arena, who, we are told, will not at all regret, that those who most invariably tightly shuts his eyes before he makes his directly benefit by this $7,000,000 were the

States market is the only market in which they ought to sell their goods. He says that, for almost every article the farmer has to sell, his best market is in the United States. He tells us that it is the great market for the products of our mines, the products of our forests and the products of our tisheries. Well, I join issue with the hon, gentleman. It is true that it is the best market for the products of our mines. It is not true that it is the best market for the products of our fisheries. It is true that last year we sold in the United States $2,850,000 worth of fish, and in the English market, $2,700,000 worth, showing a slight advantage in favour of the American market, but we find that, while the United States were buying from us nearly $3,000,329 worth of fish, they were cutting us out of the English market to the extent of over $4,000,000—acting as our middlemen, and pocketing the profits which our people ought to have. In the products of our forests it is absolutely incorrect to say that the United States are the best customers we have, because last year, while they bought $10,500,000 worth of the products of our forests, we sold in England $14,000,000 worth, and what do we find by a little investigation of these figures? Just as we found in regard to the fisheries, that while they are taking from us these $10.500,000 worth of our lumber, they are cutting us out again in the English market to the extent of exactly $10.(MM).(MM); they are selling there almost exactly ' Mr. McNEILL I will allow the hon, gentleman the same amount of lumber that we sell to themsquare and sawn fir and hardwoods, just the same kind of timber that we sell. They either sold the timber that they got from us or they sold an equivalent amount of their own timber, and thus got the benefit of handling our timber and the freight upon it. And while I am speaking of freight I wish to call attention to a point of very great importance which I owe to the kindness of my hon, friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon), who called my attention to it, that is, that in selling United States. And yet the hon, gentleman tells us that the United States is the best market for the products of our forests. I must confess that for my own part I do not greatly regret the fact tion of the hon, gentlemen. The year before last that we gained that additional $7,000,000 by selling our $14,000,000 worth of lumber to our friends in England, who rejoice in of our prosperity and who even if they are not, as Mr. Mowat says they are, positively hostile to this country. Further, I do not very greatly regret that this $7,000,000 went to the sailors of the Maritime Provinces, the men who enable us to make the proud boast that this

I think the North-West Territories is rather a big patch: but we are not here to consider size, but worth, and, for my part. I venture to say that if we are to judge the Maritime Provinces by the intellectual stature of the men they send forth. they are the peers, if not the superiors, of any other province in the Dominion, and Prince Edward Island, though it may be small, is past expression rich and beautiful, glowing, as it does, like a costly jewel in the fair bosom of the Dominion. But them, thus reducing the trade down to S. MA. (MA). Sir, I say that there is here no question of size. or worth, or patches or parts at all, but we are here, in Parliament assembled, to deal with one whole indivisible Dominion, bound together by bands of steel and iron, and by loving, kindred hearts, and by considerations of mutual material benefits. And I say further that any member of this House who expresses himself in this regard, as the hon, gentleman has done, is not only unworthy of the support of the people of this country, but is deserving of the censure of the Canadian House of Commons, Now, as I have said, the hon, gentleman tells the farmers that the Yankee market is the best market for his products. I cannot go into this question as I would like to do, for the House is sufficiently weary of the debate, and no doubt sufficiently weary of my remarks, but this I will, say, that while the Americans took from us of farm products last year $13,000,000 worth, the people of England took from us 22,000,000 worth; and before you can fairly compare that $13,000,000 worth, which we sold to the Americans, with the (MM),(MM) we sold the people of the mother country, you must apply to it the same principle we have applied to the fish and lumber. You must substract from that $13,000,000 worth, the $5,500,000 worth by which our Canadian farmers were deprived of their own markets by Americans. In opening up a market for our stockers in the mother other words, while the Americans bought from us country within the last few years. The hon, gen-$13.000,000 worth of farm products, they sold to tleman knows, I suppose, that the whole market us, over the heads of our own farmers, in pork and for live stock and Canadian beef in the mother other products, $5,500,000 worth. If you deduct country was opened up by the enterprise of one that $5,500,000 from the $13,000,000, you will find you have $7.500,000 worth left to be compared; with the $2,000,000 worth that the people of England bought from us. In other words the farmers of Canada sold to Great Britain $3 worth of products for $1 worth they sold to the United States.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Would it not be an advantage to stop this trade with the United States altogether:

Mr. McNEILL. My hon, friend knows perfectly well the value of the argument I am addressing at this moment to this House, and he knows perfectly well that the remark he is making is a little wide of the mark.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understood the hon. gentleman to say that this was an evil.

Mr. McNEILL What was?

The hon gentleman knows very well what the value of the argument is.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand the hon. gentleman to argue that $13,000,000 was sold by us to the United States, but that we must not estimate that as a basis on which to form any conclusion as to the value of our trade, because we must deduct from that the $5,000,000 which we bought from

Mr. McNEILL I have said that before you can fairly compare the value to the Canadian farmer of the market for $13,000,000 worth, which he has in the United States, with the value of the English market, you must decliner the $5,500,000 worth of American produce which exclude his goods from his own market.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL I am glad the hon, gentleman understands that now. As I have said, our farmers, for every dollar's worth that they sold in the United States, have practically sold 33 worth in the markets of England. I do not think it would be fair to leave the argument there, because it is true that there are certain products of the farm for which we have a large market in the United States, and for which we had no other outlet in the past. They are very important products of the farm, and it was very valuable to the farmers of Canada to have had this outlet, but I say that for every one of these products, with the exception perhaps of hay and lambs, we have reason to believe that we have a better market in the mother country.

An hon, MEMBER. Why do you not use it?

Mr. McNEILL We are using it. We are rapidly opening up that market. We have been rapidly man, who got some quarters of beef from Slattery, of Ottawa, and took them to Liverpool. He then invited some people to a dinner at an hotel, and circulated through England, by means of the press, the fact that we could produce good beef in Canada, and from that small beginning this $7,-(80),000 of trade has grown up in a few years. Yet the hon, gentleman talks as if it were not possible to open up markets for our other products in the mother country. Perhaps he has heard that the other day we shipped forty horses to England. We have heard from that side of the House that we could not find a market for our horses in England. Yet the shipment I have mentioned averaged £72 or $300 per horse in the English market. Among them was one which had been offered to a Yankee dealer for $175 and refused, but was sold in the English market for £100 sterling, in round figures $500. Therefore, I think we have some reason to believe that we have a market in England for our horses, and I tell you, Sir, that the Our trade with the market for sheep, which has been falling away in the United States during the last three years to the extent of 25 per cent., has been increased in England to the extent of 150 per cent. during the same period. The hon. gentleman is drawing me into a discussion which I did not intend to enter upon, but, I may say, that the most important of the products we have sold to the United States in the past was barley. The year before last that export amounted to $6,500,000 out of a total of $13,000,000, or one-half of the whole. Now, we have every reason to believe, unfortunately, that we are going to lose that market for our barley. Last year, the export was only $4,500,000, as compared with $6,500,000 the year before, and this year it will be much less. Not owing merely to the operation of the McKinley Bill, but by reason of natural causes, by reason of the greater production of barley in the Western States, and also from the fact that the brewers are using corn instead of barley in the manufacture of beer, we are going to lose our market for barley there. I have in my possession a letter which was written to the director of the Experimental Farm by one of the principal barley experts in the Province of Ontario, in which he points out how uncertain the United States market is for our barley, and how important it is that we should grow tworowed barley for the English market, and we have the best reason to know that Canada can grow the best two-rowed barley in the world, and we have an unlimited market for that in England. Mr. Saunders reports that the experiments have resulted in showing 3½ bushels an acre more from that two-rowed barley than from the six-rowed barley. I ask my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) if he does not think that, in view of these facts, there is reasonable ground to think that we shall have a good market in England for our two-rowed barley?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon gentleman know that we sell to the United States 4,000 horses a year more than they buy from all the rest of the world?

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am not mistaken. Mr. McNEILL. How many do they buy from the rest of the world?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). About 13,000.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentlemen is wrong. Our principal competitor is Ireland, and instead of buying 13,000 horses for England last year, they bought 40,000 horses. The hon. gentleman has not got the return from Ireland at all. Our principal competitor is Ireland.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not at all.

Mr. McNEHLL. I will ask the hon. gentleman to read the returns from Ireland, and I will sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You had better not cheer an inaccurate statement

Mr. McNEILL. Read the return from Ireland.
Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have the return from the United Kingdom.

Mr. McNEILL. That does not show the number imported from Ireland at all. I told the hon. gentlemen that our principal competitor would be Ireland, and he said "not at all." However, the hon. gentleman has drawn me very wide afield, and has and that the only reciprocity which we are discussing lend, and he said "not at all." However, the hon. and that the only reciprocity which will be entertaken me away on ground that I did not intend to occupy to-night. But now that I am on this subject, I may point out to the hon, gentleman that even in the matter of potatoes, if he takes the returns he has there, he will find that the people of England paid 90 cents a bushel for potatoes last year; and if he takes our own trade and navigation returns for the year ending June, 1890, he will find that we only got 30 cents a bushel for potatoes in the United States. There is a good margin for an enterprising man to work upon, and yet the hon, gentleman says that, because this trade has not been opened up in the past, it cannot be opened up at all, which is a strange argument for a philosopher.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why do you not go in and make a fortune by shipping potatoes to England?

Mr. McNEILL. I may. I have not said I would not. I only made the discovery the other day. Now, this United States market is the market to gain which we are asked to make all the sacrifices which are demanded of us. not reiterate what has already been said, and what I said myself here three or four years ago, as to the effect of such policy upon the agriculturists of Canada, that they would be flooded with American coarse grains, with their scrub cattle from Texas, with their oleomargarine and butterine which hon. gentlemen opposite were assisting us a short time ago to keep out of Canadian markets. That branch of the subject has been pretty well threshed out, but I will make one remark further. In addition to the destruction one by one of our manufacturers by the unfair competition of rings which would be made for the purpose of crushing them out, in addition to the loss of $16,000,000 of revenue which would have to be made up by direct taxation (which the hon. member for South Oxford said was a good thing on the whole, but which the hon. member who spoke last said he would never support), this policy which the hon. member for South Huron asks us to adopt calls upon us to discriminate against British goods in our markets. The hon. gentleman told us when he addressed us first on the subject that this was of the essence of his policy. There certainly has been some misunderstanding on that subject in the Province of Ontario. A good many gentlemen on the other side denied that it was the intention to discriminate against British goods, and I know that in my own riding it was stoutly denied that such was the intention, but the other day the hon. gentleman told us this was involved in his policy. Lord Lansdowne said on the last occasion he addressed a public assembly in Canada, that such a policy would be a moral affront to England. Mr. Chamberlain says that this would absolve England from any obligation to come to our assistance in case of necessity. Mr. Wiman says it would probably involve what he calls another Boston tea party, and the kicking the British Crown out of Canada. We need no one to tell us that this would mean peril to our connection with the empire of which we form a part. For the sake of the American market, we are asked to go in for this policy. Hon, gentlemen know that they cannot stop there. They know that the so-called unrestricted reciprocity which we are discussing will not be entertained on the other side of the line. and that the only reciprocity which will be enter-

North Norfolk was, I believe, quietly advocating members of the British House of Commons, I beduring the last campaign, and which the hon. lieve at the present time—it had some 60 or 70 member for South Oxford has refused to repudiate and that is commercial union. That means that we are to place ourselves at the mercy of a nation which regards us with envy if not with enmity. We are asked to forego all we have gained in order to arrive at that result; we are asked, as I said, to cast ourselves utterly at the mercy of that country -not to cast ourselves into their arms, but to cast ourselves under her feet, and to discriminate in our markets against the country by whose support alone we have been able to maintain ourselves as an independent people on this continent. We are asked to discriminate against her in our markets, we are asked to offer her what we have been told by one of her leading statesmen would be a moral affront, and we are asked to east ourselves under the feet of the country which has endeavoured to deprive us of our fishing privileges on the Atlantic, and which has not scrupled, on the Pacific, to seize our peaceful shipping on the high seas, to confiscate them, to pillage them, and to carry them off captives into American ports. This is what we are asked to do, and I want to ask if there is one sensible man, or any man with one generous impulse in his breast, who will consent to accept such a policy as that when it is understood? I say it is a policy that is unworthy of any country which has one particle of self-respect. But there is a policy which we might adopt with advantage, and that is a policy, not of going on our knees for the eleventh or twelfth time to the United States, and begging for something which they tell us they will not give us, but it is to offer to the mother country discrimination in our markets in favour of her goods and asking her to give us discrimination in her markets in favour of our goods. That is the true policy for Canada to pursue at the present time, and, Sir, I say that that policy is one which, if we only addressed ourselves to it with one-half the energy that has been employed to obtain unrestricted reciprocity, or whatever else you choose to call it, with the United States, we could obtain and carry into effect. There has been such a change in English public opinion during the last few years in reference to this question and kindred questions, as is simply marvellous to any one who knows, as I know from a residence in England of some thirty years, what the feeling in England was some years ago. Why, Sir, a few years ago any man who ventured to get up upon a public platform and advocate preferential duties in the English markets for colonial goods, would have been regarded as poor Malvolio was, a man tainted in But what do we find to-day? We find his wits. to-day that that policy is advocated on platform after platform all through England; we find that it is advocated in Sheffield, in Birmingham, in London in Leeds, in Liverpool, in Manchester, in every other centre of British industry, and it is not received with derision, but it is received with tempests of applause. And, Sir, not only so, but we find that the press are beginning to support that policy, we find many of the leading organs of public opinion in England, notably the London Times, endorsing that policy, and we find that within the last few days almost, within the last few weeks at least, a society has actually been organized in Eng-Mr. McNeill.

lieve at the present time—it had some 60 or 70 members of the House of Commons the last time I heard of it, but the number has since increased, I believe, to 100 members of the British House of Commons who are advocating that policy. further that this society appears to have been formed in consequence of a statement made in the House of Commons by no less an authority than the Imperial Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. MULOCK. What did Lord Salisbury say upon the question?

Mr. McNEILL. I will tell you in a few moments what he said. But what did Mr. Goschen say which induced those gentlemen to set about forming this society to advocate this policy? Mr. Goschen said:

"He protested against the view that under no circumstances could we make fiscal arrangements with our colonies without endangering other portions of the trade,"

And he added:

"What chance or hope have the colonies held out to us that they are ready to move in this direction?

Now, I think that is an invitation to the colonies that is plain enough, and that invitation is endorsed by a subsequent invitation made in the columns of the London Times, in which, I think, that journal says that the Canadians have time and again offered better trade relations to the United States, but never once to England, and they invite us to do Now, Sir, I do not think it is necessary for me to argue the point that this would be a good policy for Canada to adopt. That, I think, will be admitted by every gentleman in this House, and I think it is sufficient to say that there is good reason to believe that if we only made a strenuous demand for such a policy, we would get it. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) asked me what Lord Salisbury said. Lord Salisbury received the deputation in such a manner that they were so thoroughly encouraged by what he said that they set about at once starting an agitation in England.

Mr. MULOCK. They are very easily encouraged. Mr. McNEILL. Have you read what Lord Salisbury said?

Mr. MULOCK. I have read the report of it that appeared in the papers.

Mr. McNEILL. How did you get your report? By cable, I suppose.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, I suppose it was the cable report.

Mr. McNEILL. Yes, that is the Yaukee version of it. Read what Lord Salisbury said, as reported in full in the London Times.

Mr. MULOCK. The report I read was published in the Empire.

Mr. McNEILL. I believe it came by cable through American sources. I consider Lord Salisbury's views most favourable, at least as favourable as any Minister in Lord Salisbury's position could possibly be expected to express them under the circumstances. Now, in my opinion what we ought to do is to say plainly that we will give Great Britain an advantage of 10 per cent. in our markets, we will reduce our tariff to that extent as against the foreign goods, if she will give us an advantage of 10 per cent. in her markets. I venture to think that if such a policy as that land, comprising among its members one hundred | were adopted, even hon. gentlemen opposite would have to admit that Canada had become a prosperous country; I think there would be such an increase of prosperity in all the channels of trade in this country, that we would all be astonished at the result in a very short time. For my part I cannot understand how any man who is a British subject can refuse to apply to Great Britain to grant us such terms as those we have asked from the United States, not half a dozen times, but a dozen times, in order to get access to their markets. Why should we not ask the United Kingdom once to give us better terms in her markets? We have been told that she will never do it because the volume of colonial trade is so very small as compared with the volume of Britain's trade the world over. I will conclude my remarks by reading, in reply to that argument, what Lord Salisbury himself said on the 10th of November, last year:

"We know that every bit of the world's surface that is not under the English flag is a country which may be and probably will be closed to us by a hostile tariff, and therefore it is that we are anxious above all things to conserve, to unify, to strengthen the empire of the Queen, because it is to the trade that is carried on within the empire of the Queen that we look for the vital force of the commerce of this country." of this country.

That is a sufficient answer to those who say that this will never be granted because the people of England regard colonial trade as a matter of comparatively small importance.

Mr. EDWARDS. We have listened to such a speech as we might expect to hear from an Imperial Federationist.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman ill allow me to speak for a moment. We do not will allow me to speak for a moment. seem to be within measurable distance of the end of this debate, if that measurable distance is to be found within the small hours of the present morning. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier), if he thinks it possible for his side to close the debate by 3 o'clock; if it is not possible for him to do that, whether we cannot come to an arrangement by which the debate may be closed on Tuesday, at an early hour.

Mr. LAURIER. I can say to the hon, gentleman that it is not possible to close the debate by 3 o'clock, or at any reasonable hour during the present sitting. Several hon. gentlemen on this side are prepared and anxious to speak on this question, which is a very important one, as hon. gentlemen know, and we have not yet given up the hope of converting hon. gentlemen opposite, or at least some of them. I think, however, we can agree to take a division on Tuesday, at as early an hour as possible.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I think the hon. gentleman had better move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. EDWARDS. I will not detain the House I began my remarks by saying that we had just listened to such a speech as we might expect to hear from an Imperial Federationist. Some years ago, before Confederation, I believe, the Province of New Brunswick in its tariff arrangements discriminated against the United States, and passed a Bill to that effect. I understand that Bill was disallowed by the Hone Government. The same principle that prevailed in England then, cheaply as possible, in order that her manufacturers may prosper, and in order that she may compete with and send her manufactured products to even such highly protected countries as the United States. I do not believe at all in this Imperial federation

Mr. DENISON. You do not understand it.

Mr. EDWARDS. Perhaps I do not understand it, but I think I do understand it; and I will show that the hon, gentleman that has just spoken does not understand the interests of the farmers of this country or of the great producers of the natural resources of this country. In the course of his remarks the hon, member for North Bruce (Mr. In the course of his re-McNeill) referred to the question of horses, and I will settle that question just here. He said that England imported more horses than we sold to the United States. What is the fact? We sold last year to the United States 16,000 horses, while the total number imported by Great Britain was 12,000. In the course of the hon, gentleman's remarks he also stated that we had introduced the sale of our beef "stockers" into the English market. Before I close my remarks I will show that it is to the interest of the farmers of Canada to feed their cattle here and then send them to England, instead of sending cattle over there and sending over the material to fatten them, the English farmer not only having the profit on the fattening of the animal but also the manure. The hon, gentleman began his remarks by referring to the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The ministerial side of the House seem to have a special delight in abusing that hon, gentleman. They seem to have but one policy—the retention of office at all cost, and the abuse of the hon. member for South I heard the hon, member for Albert Oxford. (Mr. Weldon) speak the other day, and I understood him to ask: How will you raise the revenue? I do not remember him saying anything about commercial union; perhaps he did so. The hon: member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said: I will show you when we get there. I do not think it is his business to tell hon, gentlemen opposite how he will manage public affairs, but I am satisfied he will manage them in such a way as to promote the best interests of the country. He will aid in giving this country honest government, and he will act in such a manner that we will not have such disclosures as we are now having every We have always maintained that this country has been corruptly governed, governed by purchase, and the facts are now coming to the surface. The party now in office will soon go out of power in a far more ignominious way than they did at the time of the Pacific scandal. The hon, member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) next referred to the sale of British goods in this country during the time of the Mackenzie Administration. policy of hon, gentlemen opposite would have averted the commercial depression that then existed, then if there is one thing for which the Tory party should be held responsible more than another it is that they did not introduce their great National Policy four years sooner and have saved the country from the great depres-sion which prevailed. I understand that previous to the time when the Mackenzie Administration prevails to-day. England purchases from the na- went out of power great pressure was brought tons of the world the food for her people as to bear on them to raise the tariff. I understand that hon, gentlemen opposite, who were he would make the Canadian lumberman eat Canathen sitting on this side of the House, watched very carefully the course of events, and it was their intention, if the tariff had been raised, to adopt the policy we are now advocating, and leading speeches were prepared for delivery; and if they had been delivered, and if that policy had been adopted, the very hon, gentleman who has just spoken would be here to-day advocating the policy we now present. Above all things, how-ever, that a Tory member knows is to have no mind of his own but to follow his leader. The hon. gentleman next referred to our forest products, and said our exports to Great Britain last year were of the value of $14,000,000, while the receipts from our vessels for the carrying of same were $7,000,000. That would make the cost of exporting our goods to England one-half of the total value. Such is not the case, and I may say that a very small portion indeed of the products of our forests go from Quebec or the St. Lawrence in Canadian vessels. I am sorry to say so, but it is the truth. The hon. gentleman also stated that the English market was the best market for the products of our forest. I happen to know something about this particular question, and I say that the American is a far more reliable market for the product of our forests than is the English market. In the English market the products of almost the entire world centre. It is a flickle market, while the United States is a far more uniform market for our products, and in a general way it is a far more satisfactory market. The hon, gentleman said it was true that we had in the United States a better market for our hay and lambs; but for no other article of farm produce. I think, before I get through, that I will prove conclusively that there are other products of the Canadian farmer which find a better market in the United States than in England. I am a lumberman, but I represent a farming constituency; there was a time when a great deal of lumbering was carried on in that constituency, but to-day there is very little lumbering, and while I feel it my duty to advocate the interests of all our industries which are natural to the country, I feel it my duty, above all, to advocate the interest of the great farming industry. Every hon, gentleman in the House knows that we require only to look at the table of our exports, in order to ascertain that the farming industry is the most extensive which we have in this country. exports of the farming industry are more than double that of the lumber industry, and the remarks which I will address to the House will be more in advocacy of the farming industry than of our other indus-While I admit at once that England is the largest market for our farm products, at the same time I contend very strongly that the United States is also a very important market in this respect, and that the United States buy from us products of the farm, which England buys to a very limited extent indeed. I will begin by taking that very product of the farm to which my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) referred. We exported from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) referred. We exported last year to the United States, 16,118 horses, and only 125 horses to England. I have not the returns for last year, but in 1889, the total import of horses from all countries into Great Britain, was 12,456. This proves conclusively that the United States is the market for the surplus horses of Canada. Now, the hon member for West Hastings (Mr. Corby), in Mr. EDWARDS.

dian pork, and on the same principle I presume he would make the Canadian farmer sell all his horses to Canadian lumbermen. I think, however, there is a good deal better market for our horses than that. In Canada, we always have a large surplus of horses for sale. The United States is our only market outside of the home market; and the United States market being debarred from the Canadian farmer he has simply to sell his horses at such a price in this country as the purchaser is willing to pay for them, for the reason that there is no competition. Situated as we are on the northern portion of this continent, we will always be large producers of horses, because we produce the cereals which are best adapted for feeding and growing horses. Such is not the case in the country to the south of us. As the southern states of the union develop, the demand for horses in the United States must increase. The corn raised in the United States, on which they feed their horses, is a fat producing material, while the oats and other cereals which we grow in Canada produce bone and muscle, and therefore we will always have the best horses on this continent. These are evidences that, in the American market, we have the very best market for our surplus horses. My hon. friend admitted that the United States market was the best market for our lambs. He could not very well deny it, from the fact that we sold last year, to the American market, some 251,640 sheep, while we sold in the English market only 57,000. It may be argued that the United States also sends sheep and horses to Great Britain, but that argument will hardly hold to any extent, when the statistics are enquired into. Last year the United States sold only 236 horses, and 6,464 sheep to Great Bri-Let me ask why is this? It is for the reason I have given before; that a large portion of the American union has a warm climate in which sheep and horse raising will never be profitable, while in this northern clime we can grow them profitably. As that country fills up, and as we develop, as I hope we shall develop, that demand will increase, and naturally we will always have a demand for our sheep in the American market. Now, let us take the question of barley. I am dealing chiefly with the articles which we sell largely to the United States, and which we do not sell largely to England. We sold last year 9,939,745 bushels of barley to the United States, and we sold 27,132 bushels to England, while the United States sold only 987,000 bushels of barley to Great Britain. Here is another article which we produce, and for which the United States is our only market. It may be said: Oh, we we can grow barley that will be used in England. An attempt is being made to do that, and so far as I am aware, up to the present it is a failure. The particular barley we raise in this country, is the kind the United States require; and England does not require and does not buy it. I understand that there is a very small portion of the United States in which that particular kind of barley is grown. Here, then, is an article for which the United States must continue to be our customer. Now, take the article of hay. Last year we sold 101,713 tons of hay to the United States and 10,408 tons to England. Now, I will admit at once that I regret that so much of our hay is being sold out of the country. I think it is desirable that our hay should be used the course of his remarks the other night, said that in the country; but, Mr. Speaker, as you are very well aware, there are many new portions of this country where the farmer has nothing to sell but his hay. The settler, in the early period of his settlement, when he clears up the land, finds that hay is the easiest crop he can raise, and the crop from which he can most directly realize and under the condition of things that exists to-day he has either to content himself with such a price as he can obtain in this country, or pay $4 a ton of duty for the privilege of shipping his hay to the United States. Take potatoes. We sold last year to the United States 1,053,230 bushels, and to England Take potatoes. We sold last year to the only 724 bushels. A very considerable portion of this country, right about us here, sells largely of its potatoes; and if hon. gentlemen opposite do not believe that it is in the interest of the farmers of this country to have a free market in the United States in which to sell their potatoes, there is one thing certain, that the farmers themselves thoroughly believe it, because last autumn they suffered very considerably for they had a large quantity to export, and they severely felt the enhanced duty upon them. Now, it is argued by hon, gentlemen opposite that England is the great market for all our products. I think I have shown that there is at least a large list of agricultural products which we sell in the United States and do not sell in Great Britain. Hon. gentlemen who refer to the Trade and Navigation Returns will see that our large exports to Great Britain are in cheese and in beef. In those articles the United States is also a large exporter to Great Britain—in beef many times larger than we are, in cheese not quite so large. Those articles I do not claim very much for; they do not come into the argument to the extent the other articles do, for the United States is a competitor with us in those articles in the English market. But, Sir, I want now to show you how the hon, gentleman who has just taken his seat desires ducts of the labour of one country for the surplus to encourage the Canadian farmer. He referred to the fact that we sold our stockers to Great Britain, that is, the animals to be fattened, and he seemed to glory in the fact. We on this side of House advocate free corn, and why? We advocate free corn because the English buyer buys corn in Chicago, freights it to Liverpool, and lays it down perfectly loyal man. In my estimation he is a there at a lower price than we can get it for in this country, paying the duty on it. The result is that for the masses and not for the classes of this counhe is able to fatten the lean animals he gets from Canada with corn purchased from the American producer, and in that way entirely beats the Canadian farmer. Is that justice to the Canadian farmer? The Canadian farmer who understands the subject best will say no. It is argued on the other side of this House that if the condition of things we desire to bring about is introduced, the productions of American farmers will pour into this country, and the Canadian farmer will be swamped. I deny the statement. Last year we sold to the Americans $11,219,000 worth of agricultural products, while we imported, all told, $5,343,000 worth. If the United States market is made a free market to us for those materials that we already sell to them, we shall sell them manifold more, and our trade in that direction will be very largely increased instead of diminished. The argument regarding the beef applies in exactly the same way to our dairy products. We are to-day proud of the fact that we are larger exporters of cheese to Great Britain than ensure the continuance of that connection by havis the United States. We desire to increase our ing such arrangements between ourselves and the butter export in the same ratio; and if we are to ac- United States as will not lead to friction and difficomplish that end, on the same ground we desire to have American corn free-why? Because it is one of the best materials on which to feed dairy stock. But the hon, member for West Hastings (Mr. Corby), I suppose, would force the Canadian farmer to raise corn in this country, whether he can or not. I suppose he would make the farmers in some of the northern parts of the Province of Quebec grow corn. He would force us to raise cotton in this country, and I suppose he would force the south to grow icebergs. There is one thing, Mr. Speaker, we cannot get over; we cannot get over geographical conditions or climatic conditions. We on this North American continent have a variety of climates, and also a variety of products. The south produces materials which we require, and we produce materials which the south requires. Commerce is nothing more nor less than the interchange of the surplus products of labour. It is against reason and against nature that the producer of materials in the north and the producer of materials in the south should meet at a certain line and be told that past that you shall not go to exchange the surplus products of your labour. Mr. Speaker, I am in principle an out-and-out free trader. I look upon a protective tariff as nothing more nor less than a robber's tariff. I say that under a protective tariff the labourer does not enjoy the fruits of his labour. Under a protective tariff, a large portion of the earnings of the labouring man goes into the pockets of the monopolists and those for whom this tariff was framed. We are told that if we entered into such an arrangement as will enable the producer of natural products to exchange his products for the materials he desires from the more southern portion of the continent, such an act would be disloyal. Well, I have yet to learn that a fair exchange of the surplus proproducts of the labour of another is disloyal, but I am very glad to say that we who, for the last four years, have been described as a lot of disloyal men, now find that hon. gentlemen opposite can only discover one disloyal man in our midst; and in a few days too he will no doubt be proclaimed a perfectly loyal man, because he desires to legislate A comparison is made between the trade of this country with the United States and its trade with Great Britain, but the cases are very dis-We border nearly four thousand miles on the American union, while Great Britain is three thousand miles away; and while every true Canadian desires to develop trade with Great Britain to as great an extent as possible, he also desires to develop trade with the United States. The great difficulties of the tariff as between the two countries are these: The products of the different portions of the country east and west, are different. The requirements of the people are different, and a tariff that suits British Columbia does not suit the lower provinces. This country, ever since the introduction of this policy, has been governed with great difficulty, because it is perfectly impossible to frame a tariff satisfactory to the whole, and while we all carnestly desire to remain a portion of the great British Empire, we are far more likely to culties between the two countries. If we are to inter-state trade. difficulties can exist. But we are told that if we introduce this policy, if we obtain reciprocity with the United States, the result will be political union with that country. I do not believe any such do. statement. I believe, as I stated before, that the way we can best avoid that contingency is to obtain reciprocal trade relations with the United States. The last speaker referred to the question of commercial union. I will say at once that, so far as I am individually concerned, much as I desire and much as I believe it is in the interests of this country to have reciprocal trade relations with the United States, if such can only be obtained on the basis of commercial union, I am opposed to it, and I will tell you why. Because if we should have a commercial treaty with the United States whereby we would be obliged to adopt their tariff, and if their tariff is maintained as high as it is to-day, I claim the farmer, the lumberman, the fisherman and the miner would be placed in a very detrimental position indeed. I would be opposed to any such scheme, but the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for South Oxford is exactly in accordance with my views. This question of reciprocity is one question but we have another great question. The people of this country have been burdened for years by an unjust and infamous tariff, a tariff opposed to the producing masses of the country and in We have manufavour of a few manufacturers. facturers in this country who do not require any such protection, and there is no manufactory existing that ought to exist where any such protec-tion is necessary; and I say it is in the highest interests of the country that those burdens should be removed, and that we should return to a revenue instead of a protective tariff. We are asked on the other side: how we are going to raise a revenue? I reply that the present tariff is not a revenue-producing tariff. It produces a revenue for a few manufacturers, but not the revenue it should for the treasury of this country. The best policy we can adopt is a policy which will enable the people of this country to purchase in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest. The population of any country, and the population of every country, are best employed in producing those resources which are natural to the country, and exchanging their surplus products for the surplus products of other countries which are natural to them. That is the natural course of trade, and any artificial means which hinders that condition of things is a policy which is detrimental to the best interests of any country. What is the condition of the United States to-day? Are not the people there waking up to the fact that they have been living under a system of tyranny for Are they not now shaking off many years? that system? Yes, they are shaking it off, and they will shake it off; and, when that becomes a low tariff country instead of a high tariff country, it will take a place among the commercial nations of the world. What is that

It has no foreign commerce. make this country the country we all desire it It pays its foreign debts with raw produce shall be, we must have a contented people. We must not have in the west a people who are discontented because of conditions that suit the people in the east, and rice versa. Under reciprocity, such as we desire to bring about, no such similar policy. We are told time and again that we cannot get reciprocal trade relations with the United States. If we cannot obtain reciprocal trade relations, there is one thing which we can We can skake off the fetters which to-day are crushing to the earth our farmers and others, and afterwards we can endeavour to obtain the next greatest boon, and that is the free interchange of products with the great American nation to the south of us. In speaking strongly as I do about my own desire to remain a British subject, I do not for a moment reflect upon the country to the south. I have the greatest admiration for the people of the United States and for their grand country, but I believe and have always believed, since I have been able to think upon such subjects, that it is desirable in the interests of both countries that the two systems of government should continue to exist upon this continent. That is a very large and populous country. There can be no doubt that within a few years the United States will have difficulties to encounter. They have a great diversity of climate. They have the great north and the great south. In this country we have only the great north. We are a homogeneous people. For my part, I do not desire political union with that country, and I do not think it is involved in any discussions that have taken place on this side of the House, but give us the conditions we desire, that is, remove this high and infamous protective tariff which we have, and, if then we can get a fair treaty with the United States, we, a vigorous people, as we are—and the people of the north are always more vigorous than the people of the south-will compete in the markets of the world with any country in existence. I for one believe that, if we had been a little more favourably geographically constructed, it would have been better for us. We have a very great length and we have not very much breadth. That is against us in some respects. But, even with those disadvantages, give us a fair field and no favour, and we are afraid of nobody. I do not think I will take up the time of the House much longer. I have been dealing with the agricultural industry, and I will refer for a short time to the lumber industry. I was very much surprised to hear the hon, member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) and the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) say that the National Policy had been helpful to the lumberman of this country. If taxing everything that a man buys, everything that a producer uses in the course of his business is helpful, then it is helpful. What is the position of the Canadian lumberman?

> Mr. MASSON. Wealthy.

Mr. EDWARDS. If it were possible for you, Mr. Speaker, to take part in this discussion, I am sure country to-day? It is simply a country with an trade is not in a very prosperous condition, when Mr. Edwards. half the lumber mills in the Ottawa district are not running. There is a large mill that produced about 50,000,000 feet a year, that shut down last fall and is not running now, and I do not know if it ever will Then a large mill was burned down last winter and is not going to be rebuilt, so I under-The lumber trade is in this position in Canada: It has to compete in England with all the producers of the world, and in the American Union it has to compete with the products of that country. The use of the American southern pine has been gradually marching northward until some of it is now used even in Canada. If there is one industry, next to the agricultural industry, in whose interests reciprocity would be beneficial, it certainly is the lumber trade. The member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), in discussing the lumber trade a few days ago, pointed out some of the difficulties that in his opinion existed, but he did not point out any remedy, but left that to the Ministry. That is the question of the export duty on logs. This question of the export duty on logs is thoroughly well understood. The duty on lumber going into the United States used to be 82 a When the export duty on logs was thousand. taken off, the duty on pine lumber was reduced to $1 a thousand. Should the export duty on logs be reimposed, the duty on lumber going into the United States would be raised to $3 a thousand. Of course, the member for Muskoka is a protectionist and I am a free trader. In my opinion the export duty on logs should never have existed and should not be reinstated. In his view, being a protectionist, I have no doubt he thinks that it should be; but what will be the consequence if it is? I will simply say this to the Government -- as I may not have another opportunity of saying it-that the conditions of the lumber trade are such that if the duty were reimposed, and if the $3 duty were charged on lumber going into the United States, every single saw mill, at least on the Ottawa River, would have to be shut down. I sincerely hope that the Government will not reinstate that duty: I do not believe they will. If it was in the interest of this country, if it would benefit the whole people to reimpose that duty, then I would say: Put it on. But I do not believe it would be beneficial. An hon, gentleman opposite said the other day that the lumbermen were all rich. I will tell you how rich they are. They are rich to this extent, that they have gone to the public sales of the different provinces and bought limits at very high prices; they have constructed dams and slides and river improvements, that have cost large amounts of money; they have constructed mills that have cost large amounts of money, and their total wealth, if they have any, consists in those materials. What are the conditions now? The trade is taxed, as I say, on every article of import that is used by the lumbermen. The Provincial Governments are taxlumbermen. The Provincial Governments are taxing them highly, both on the direct product and in the way of an annual rental on their holdings. There is another great enemy to the interests of the lumbermen, and it is a great enemy indeed. I think, Mr. Speaker, you will agree with me in the statement that three times as much lumber has been destroyed by fire this very year as has been produced in one year by the lumber trade. That is a matter of very great con-sequence. If the forests could be preserved, as many believe they can be preserved, I would go begun to feel the impelling force of the development in heartily for any means necessary to that end. But if the pine timber of this country is not cut by the lumberman, it will, in a very few years, be destroyed by fire. If the Government re-enact the export duty on logs, the effect would be that the lumber would not be cut and sold as it is now, bringing in, as the House is aware, a large revenue to this country, but the timber would be destroyed by fire. I think it is the duty of the Provincial Governments to do everything they can to preserve the lumber of our forests, and it is the duty of the lumbermen who have the licenses to do everything they can in the same direction. But if the trade is hampered, as it would be hampered under the conditions that the non, member for Muskoka desires to exist, the result would be a very serious joss indeed to this country.

WAYS AND MEANS-THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster: "That the resolutions adopted in Committee of Ways and Means on Tuesday, the 23rd ultimo, be read a second time;" and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. KENNY. Mr. Speaker, I have great pleasure in joining with many hon, members who have preceded me in this debate in offering my congratulations to my friend, the hon. Minister of Finance, upon the eminently satisfactory statement of the financial condition of the country which he placed before Parliament in his Budget speech. I have still greater pleasure in joining with many hon, gentlemen who preceded me also, in the statement that the announcement which he then made of the financial condition of Canada and the removal of the duties on raw sugar, amounting to $3,500,000 annually, which he then accomplished, not only gratified, but satisfied the great mass of the people of Canada. From my native province down by the sea, the fairest of the fair provinces of our glorious Dominion, from the sister Maritime Provinces of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, from the great Province of Quebec, and from the large and wealthy Province of Ontario of which we are all so proud, and in whose prosperity we believe, notwithstanding the lugubrious utterances of disappointed politicians, to the contrary, from the great Province of Manitoba and from the North-West Territories, from our great prairie lands which we hope may soon become the happy home of millions of prosperous Canadians, from our Pacific province which has just Atlantic system of railways, from all Canada have The Minister of Finance explained that the sudden gone out loud and long, cheerful and triumphant death of Mr. Bryce Douglas had interrupted congratulations to the Government upon the financial condition of the country and the fiscal policy which has been initiated in this Budget speech. The shouts of exultation by which the speech was greeted by the supporters of the Government in this House found a responsive echo in the hearts of the people of Canada. The refrain was taken up in every province and found a welcome in every home. Budget speech of 1891 was delivered under the shadow of the great loss which Canada had suffered in the death of her most distinguished son, who had been for so many years the leader of the Liberal-Conservative party of this country, the party which is in this Legislature and in this country to-day the dominant party. The Budget speech of 1891 is the most positive and satisfactory evidence that can be given that the Liberal-Conservative party of this Dominion to-day, as in the past, is ever true to its policy, that policy which always seeks the greatest good of the greatest number of the Canadian people. The policy of the Liberal-Conservative party is primarily, essentially and continuously a Canadian policy. It is a policy progressive, comprehensive and enduring. It ignores all narrow and sectional issues. The Liberal-Conservative party of this country is ceaseless in its efforts to secure the general wellbeing of the people of Canada, the development of the resources of Canada, the increase of the productive forces of Canada and the extension of the commerce of Canada. The Liberal-Conservative party desires the laws which Canadians have made for the Government of Canada, and will never consent to the surrender of Canada's right to regulate her tiscal policy, as may best suit her own people, free from all foreign influences. The Liberal-Conservative party desires tostrengthen that tie which binds us, as in a love-knot, to the mother country, and to retain our place in the greatest empire the world has ever seen. In marked contrast to this cheerful, this hopeful policy of the Liberal-Conservative party, is the policy of the hon, gentlemen opposite—a policy of dreary, doleful, melancholy pessimism, a policy anti-Canadian and anti-British, which is incorporated in this resolution for commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity or whatever you like to call it, which is foreign in its conception and hostile to Canada in its intention. I may repeat here what I have said before, that the masses of the people of Canada are loyal to the institutions of their country. And, therefore, I say that the squalid and loathsome history of the treasonable intrigue and conspiracy which, it has been made public, existed between Mr. Farrer, of the Toronto Globe, and prominent American politicians, some of whom have been named here by hon. gentlemen opposite as representing their views and wishes, is painful to every true-minded Canadian. I was glad to hear from the Minister of Finance, early in his speech, a reference to our improvement of the trans-Atlantic mail service. heard from the hon. Minister that the delay which had unfortunately occurred in this matter was due in part to the very sad and unexpected death of the presiding genius of the Barrow Company, the gentleman who had visited Canada for the purpose of conferring with the Govern-ment, in the expectation that he would be able to make satisfactory arrangements to carry out | (Sir Richard Cartwright) during the course of his Mr. KENNY.

those arrangements, and also that the condition of the London money market was so unsatisfactory at that date that a company contemplating such an enterprise would have found it very difficult to then place its stock on the London market. Sir, as regards the London money market, we all know that there is a very decided improve-ment, and that to-day money is lower in Lon-don than it has ruled for many months; and while the condition of that market is exceedingly sensitive, and although money is cheap it is not easily borrowed unless most satisfactory credentials accompany the loan, at the same time that difficulty of the high price of money is very largely removed. It has been recognized that to secure for Canada a mail service to Australia and Eastern Asia, it was absolutely necessary that we should have an efficient service on both oceans. The service of the Pacific Ocean has been most satisfactorily established, and it is very much to be regretted that to-day, after the generous vote of Parliament, we have not been able to establish an equally satisfactory trans-Atlantic mail service. I hope that the matter will be earnestly taken up by the Government during recess. I may here repeat what I said before in this Parliament, that I think it should be our object to establish as good a service as there is on the north Atlantic, and that to accomplish that it would be eminently desirable, in my judg-ment, if the port of departure on the other side of the Atlantic was not a tidal port. I hold the opinion that it would be better if the service was started from some port in the Bristol Channel; but that is a matter in which I quite recognize that the contractors, whoever they may be, will have much to say. But this I do say, that looking to the Canadian terminus of this service, I hold strengly to the opinion that we should go to one port all the year round. At present it is contemplated that we should go for six months of the year to Quebec and six months to Halifax. Now, Mr. Speaker, there are great disadvantages in this arrangement; regularity of departure and arrival is essential to the success of the route, and this cannot be obtained with two disconnected terminal ports; and, therefore, I offer the suggestion to this House, that it would be eminently desirable if these steamers went all the year round to Halifax. The voyage to Halifax could be accomplished in 30 to 40 hours hours less than to New York. Passengers viâ Halifax could be landed in Montreal or in Ottawa before a steamer of like speed leaving Liverpool, or leaving the same port of departure in Great Britain, could reach New York. I know that there will be objections from the cities on the St. Lawrence to these suggestions of mine. The idea is not entirely original; I have heard it from gentlemen who have given this matter very great attention, and who are not identified with the Parliament of the country, but who are much interested in seeing an efficient service carried out. I think it would be wise for us in Canada to utilize that port which nature has placed at our disposal, and which is eminently fitted for such a service. I was also glad to hear from the Minister of Finance that he intended making ample provision for our West India service. The hon. member for South Oxford speech, stated that our West India trade had fallen offtothe extent of $1,000,000 between 1873 and 1890. I think that is due, to a great extent, to the fact that $3,123,294; Intercolonial and Prince Edward Issome of the goods which we then shipped by sailing vessels have since gone by way of New York, Boston and other ports, by steamers, and that the Territories, $870,069; these different expenditures diminution of our West India trade is largely due on capital account from 1878 to 1890 amounted to to the fact that we have not had sufficient steam $107,757,312. Therefore, whilst the net debt has service between Canada and the West India Islands; tonly increased $97,000,000, we have actually exand I am, therefore, glad to hear that provisions have been made for carrying on that service efficiently. It is gratifying to notice, Mr. Speaker, that in the matter of land transportation great reached, and that the per capita increase progress has been made in Canada during the past of interest since 1879 was only 6 cents on the ten or twelve years. It is stated that in 1878 the number of miles of railway in operation in Canada was 6,143, and that in 1890 the number had increased to 12,998. Now, at the risk of being accused of advocating a cut-throat railway policy, I must express my opinion that I think it would be in the interest of Canada if the Grand Trunk Railway system was extended to the Maritime Provinces. I know very well that I shall lay myself open to attacks from hon, gentlemen opposite, for making this bold assertion, but I would say to the Government to disregard the announcement which had been made from the other side of this House that those hon, gentlemen are entirely opposed to subsidizing railways. I hold that it is in the interest of Canada that the Government should aid the extension of our railways to such an extent as the varying condition of our finances may warrant. Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite, in their attempts to induce the people of Canada to believe that their country is retrograding and is retrogressive, are constantly referring to the public debt, and making what they suppose to be, and what they hope will be, alarming statements upon the condition of our country in that respect. Thave taken the trouble to examine myself into the condition of the debt of Canada from Confederation down to the present day, and I have sub-divided it into three periods. I find that in 1867 we commenced with a net debt of $75,728,-641, and that in 1873 it had increased to $99,848,-461, or an increase of $24,119,820, being an average increase under the Conservative Government of $4,019,803. In 1873 the debt was $99,848,461, and in 1878 it was $140,362,069, or an increase under the administration of the hon, member it is not fair to institute a comparison between the for South Oxford of $40,513,607, showing an annual increase of $8,102,721. Now, Sir, in 1878 the net debt was $140,362,069, and in 1890 it was $237,533,211, or an increase of $97,171,142 under the Conservative Government, or an average annual increase of $8,097,595. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this statement shows conclusively that the average increase of the debt under the Liberal Government, when the hon member for South important services, we have nothing to deplore or Oxford—who is always so very eloquent in regret or to be alarmed at with respect to the attacking the Government for the large increase increase of the net debt of Canada. In order to in the debt—when that gentleman administered the finances of this country, the average annual increase was greater than it has been under any Conservative Administration. That was under the Radical Government, or if the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) will allow me to use a term which is a favourite expression of his, that was under a "radically corrupt "Radical Government. I find also that since 1878 the expenditure on capital account the gross balance of trade against Canada was has been as follows:—On the Canadian Pacific $133,469,558, or an annual balance of trade against Railway, $51,736,629; canals, $19,906,594; debts allowed to provinces, $10,291,252; Dominion lands. land railways, $17,735,038: other public works and public buildings, $4,094,634; North-West pended on capital account during the same period $107,000,000. I find also that the net rate of interest in 1889-90 was $2.99 lower than it ever But, Mr. Speaker, in order to institute a comparison between the increase of debt under the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite and under the present Government, let us examine the increase of debt from 1875 to 1878 and compare it with the increase during the past four years. It will be found, on referring to the Public Accounts, that the increase from 1875 to 1878 was $32,037,033, and from 1887 to 1890, $14,373,108. But it must not be forgotten that this increase of the debt of Canada from 1875 to 1878 had been largely incurred to make up the deficit between the income and expenditure from 1876 to 1879. During those years there were deficits to the extent of $6,500,000; in fact, so miserably was the financial business of this country conducted, so inaccurately were estimates made as to the expenditure of the country, that in each of the years 1876-77-78 and 1879 there was a growing deficit. Is it any wonder that in those days the credit of Canada fell lower on the English market than ever it was before, or that we were obliged to make loans on most unfavourable terms? Call that policy the "fly on the wheel" policy, or as my hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins) epigrammatically expressed it, "the slumbering fly on the halted wheel;" that is a most unfair description of the hon, member for South Oxford, for as regards staying the car of progress, he was a perfect giant, and his administration of this country was so eminently unsatisfactory that I think the people of Canada will be very loath to reinstate him in that position. Let us look for one moment at the relative increase of the debt of other important colonies of the Empire, because expenditure of a young and growing country like Canada and that of older countries. It will be found that in 1880 the Australasian debt was $431,095,099, and in 1890 it had increased to over $858,000,000, or had positively doubled. think that, considering the expenditure on capital account we made during the past 12 years, the outlay which we have made on capals, on railways and other make a point against the Dominion Government, the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), when replying to the Minister of Finance, pointed out that the balance of trade is this year $25,000,000 against us. Hearing that statement from a financial critic, I took the trouble to investigate as to the condition of trade when that hon, gentleman was guiding the finances of the Dominion, and I found that from 1874 to 1878 us during those five years of $26,693,911; or actually for every year in which that hon, gentleman administered the finances, the average balance of trade was $1.583,911 more than during last year, showing that the balance of trade against Canada was actually greater under his administration After all, if we are going to than it is to-day. institute a comparison between the conditions of trade from 1874 to 1879, as the hon, member for South Oxford undertook to do, we must examine the whole trade of the country, because every business man knows that at one period there may be a depression in one province or locality, and that, to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion as to the condition of trade generally it is absolutely necessary to examine into the aggregate trade of the country. I was sorry to hear from the hon, member for South Oxford that our commerce with certain countries which he named was less than it was some years ago. I was particularly sorry to hear that such was the case with the Island of Newfoundland; but I am disposed to believe that many of the exports of Canada to that country find their way viâ Boston and New York, and are not, therefore, recorded in the exports of Canada, and that to a great extent will explain away the disparity which exists. I hold strongly to the opinion that we should make every effort to retain our hold of the trade of the sister But, Sir, I find that the aggregate trade of Canada from 1874 to 1878 was $940,000,000, and from 1886 to 1890 it was $1,016,000,000; and I am happy to say, that for the past year the aggregate trade of Canada was $218,607,390, or the largest for any year since the provinces have been I think that this is a more confederated. satisfactory way of coming at a fair clusion than by jumping at the balance of trade which happens to exist last year. These hon, gentlemen opposite, one would infer from their arguments, endeavour to show that our trade with the United States has decreased; whereas, as a matter of fact, an examination of the Trade and Navigation Returns will show that our aggregate trade with the United States amounted to, from 1874 to 1878, $400,209,706, and from 1886 to 1890 it had increased to $442,113,613; showing a very satisfactory increase. hon, gentlemen opposite are never so happy as when they are trying to explain to Parliament and to the country the unsatisfactory condition of the trade of the country generally. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) told us that the bulk of the people of Canada were poorer to-day than at any other period in the history of Canada. Sir, I must question the accuracy of that statement. I think that the hon. gentleman was suffering from a special attack of pessimism when he made that statement. I find that one of the most prominent bankers in Canada, —a gentleman who, I believe, is not a supporter of the present Dominion Government-Mr. Cox, the resident manager of the Bank of Commerce, at the annual meeting of his shareholders, announced that the condition of the trade of Canada generally, and of the farming population of the Province of Ontario, was satisfactory. I find that Mr. Hague, general manager of the Merchants Bank of Canada, the second largest monetary institution in our annual meeting of the shareholders of that bank. Mr. Hague said :

"And, as then are concerned just now about the posi-tion of the country. I may say that it is thirty-five years since I first entered a Canadian bank. Thirty-five years since I first entered a Canadian bank. Thirty-five years is not a long time in the history of a country, but during this short period I have seen the deposits of Canada grow from fifteen millions to two hundred and twenty millions. This fact speaks volumes. In view of such a result in so short a time, one would be pessimistic, indeed, to have any doubts about the future."

Mr. Speaker, I consider Mr. Hague a better authority on this question, and I say it with all due respect, than the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Let us look at the one item of deposits in the banks of the country, and compare these figures now with the condition of the country in this respect in 1878. If the bulk of the people of Canada are poorer to-day than they were in 1878, will the hon. member for South Oxford have the goodness to explain to us how it is that the deposits of our people in the banks of Canada have increased by $108,900,000 since 1878 : A reference has been made also to the general commercial conditions of the country, and the effect which this depression, which the hon, gentlemen opposite allege to exist so universally, has had upon the commerce of Canada. As late as 11th July, I find the following in the Toronto Globe:

"The feeling throughout the country reported by travellers who have returned to the city this week is one of hopefulness. Country merchants, encouraged by the prospect of a good average harvest of grain in this province, anticipate a prosperous autumn trade, and with a realization of these hopes the cities—the basis of supplies—will of course benefit from any improvement in the situation. The recent showers greatly benefited the crops."

Now, this, taken from the Globe, I accept as a better authority upon the condition of the commerce of the Province of Ontario than the statement of the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright); and it must be remembered that this is from a paper which is edited by Mr. Edward Farrer, who has been known and is recognized as the fidus Achates of the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I am very much afraid that this cheerful announcement made by the Toronto Globe on the condition of the commerce of the country will be a great disappointment to the hon. gentlemen opposite; but I accept it as the truth, because these hon, gentlemen apparently were relying upon the depression which they contend exists in this country to help them in the by elections; and if they rely solely upon that they will, I believe, be doomed to very bitter disappoint-Mr. Speaker, in reviewing the conditions of the trade of the country, let me draw the attention of the House to just a few important items. I find that the raw material imported into Canada in 1879 amounted to $5,000,000, and in 1890 it had increased to $16,000,000; but I must not forget that hon, gentlemen opposite have told us that they have no faith in the manufacturing future of The hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Canada. Richard Cartwright) stated in Parliament, I think it was in the session of 1889, that he thought it was impossible for Canada to ever become a manufacturing country on a large scale. Well, Sir, certainly nothing could be more unfortunate for the manufacturers of Canada than that, by any accident, the financial affairs of this country should drift under his management; for I have no doubt Dominion, made the following statement at the that, if such an accident should happen, he will, as he did before, do all that is in his power to destroy just one word about the examination of those blue-the manufactures of Canada. Take the article of books. I recommend hon, gentlemen on both sides sugar alone. I find that in 1878 we imported only of the House to examine for themselves the that, under the removal of those duties which has confirming one's belief in the policy which guides recently taken place, the amount of our importations will be still further increased. This dition, as shown by the Trade Returns of 1878, and increase in our importation of sugar is also those unfortunate years for Canada when hon, gencountry are better off to-day than they were in condition to-day. I find that there has been 1878, and, instead of following the advice which a great increase in our exports of cheese, cattle, the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard sheep and coal products, in the note circulation Cartwright) then tendered the people of Canada, which was, that they should work harder and eat which point to an improvement in the condition of less, the fact is, that to-day the people of Canada the general population. are eating more and are much better off, and, consequently, there is an increase in the importations of the rural population; in fact, they seem to lay of sugar. Mr. Speaker, there is no man in this great stress upon the farmer's vote. Nearly every House who is at all familiar with the condition appeal which I have heard has been directed to of the people of Canada, who will believe for one the farmers, and they endeavour to show moment that the mass of the people are not infin- the farmers of Canada that their condition itely better off than they were in 1878. I say, is not as good as it was, and that the change is speaking of my own province and of the eastern owing to the National Policy. Now, hon, gentlesection of this Dominion, that the people are to-day men opposite really know better. They know, for better housed, better clothed and better fed, that various reasons, which it is not necessary to their children are better educated than ever they delay the House to explain, and which have been perfect horror of the days of 1878 and the wretched rural population is eminently unsatisfactory. For policy which was then in force in this country. example, let us take that which most concerns us Take, for instance, the article of raw cotton. In living at the eastern end of the Dominion, we find 1878 we only imported 7,000,000 lbs.; in 1889 we imported 35,000,000 lbs. Mr. Speaker, hon, gentlemen opposite endeavour occasionally to show, from a decrease in the imports of Canada, 1,500; and in the State of Massachusetts, 1,400. that the general trade of our country in retrograd-In cotton and cotton manufactured goods, you will find, by referring to the Trade Returns, that in 1878 we imported manufactured, bleached and unbleached, cotton sheeting to the value of $12.-700,000, and in 1889 we imported only $1,300,000 worth of these goods. These goods are now manu-factured in the Dominion of Canada; and even if full possession of what hon, gentlemen opposite are those who have their capital invested in the various joint stock companies producing these goods received little or no return from their investment. at all events Canadian labour got the full benefit accruing from their manufacture in the country; and that is a strong point in favour of the National Policy. But, Mr. Speaker, the National Policy requires no defenders in this House. In 1879 it was adopted by the Parliament of Canada; in fact, it was the issue before the people of Canada at the general election in 1878; again in 1882 and also in 1887, and in 1891; the people showed their appreciation of the National Policy; and whatever hon, gentle-men opposite may say about the blessings of free trade, I contend that the adoption of a protective tariff whereby we were enabled to start and develop manufacturing industries within our own country has been eminently beneficial to the people of Canada. Let us look at a few of our exports; and I know that these figures are uninteresting, and I almost ought to apologize to the House for taking up its time in referring to them. But if one is to arrive at a correct idea of the condition of the trade of the country, it is essential that we should examine into these figures, because, unfortunately, we cannot accept those of the United States. I think it is only fair to the placed before us by hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, hon. member for North Norfolk that I should cor-

108,000,000 lbs. of sugar, while in 1889 we Public Accounts and the Trade and Navigation imported 222,000,000 lbs.; and I have no doubt Returns of Canada; and I know no better way of largely due to the fact that the people of this tlemen opposite governed this country, with our sheep and coal products, in the note circulation and bank deposits, and in all the other items Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen opposite have referred to the condition were before, and that Canadians who have taken thrashed out during the course of this debate, that the trouble to examine into these affairs, have a in the neighbouring republic the condition of the that among our neighbours in the State of Maine there are 3,300 abandoned farms; in the State of New Hampshire, 1,400: in the State of Vermont, I am happy to say that no such condition of things exists in the eastern end of the Dominion; and judging from what I have heard from hon. gentlemen from the Province of Ontario, I know very well that no such condition of things exists in that wealthy province. That is the condition of the farming population in those states, which is in pleased to call the 65,000,000 market. I cannot understand, Mr. Speaker, how the farming population of Ontario are to be benefited by being placed in competition with this impoverished farming population of the neighbouring republic. The hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has stated that he does not wish to institute a comparison—that is, if I understood him correctly between the farming population of these Northern States and that of the Dominion of Canada; but what he desires is to secure for the farming population of Canada the market of 65,000,000 people in the cities of the United States. Sir, surely the people who reside in the states which I have named are just as near those cities as our farming population would be; so that I cannot see any force in that argument, and I am surprised that a gentleman of his ability and knowledge should use it; because there is no one who understands this question better than that hon, gentleman. He is the only one of the Canadian statesmen who has ever been quoted in the Congress of the United States, and my hon. friend from King's, N.S. (Mr. Borden) made a mistake when he said that the hon. gentleman had not been mentioned in the Congress

rect that error and say that the hon, member for in this Legislature and praise the country in which North Norfolk has been mentioned in the Compression sional Record of the United States.

I said that Mr. McKinley did Mr. BORDEN. not quote from the hon, member for North Norfolk in the speech with which he introduced his Bill.

Mr. KENNY. I think the hon, member for King's was referring to the hon, member for Westmoreland.

Mr. BORDEN. Yes.

Mr. KENNY. With all due deference to my hon, friend, I must admit I have not taken the trouble to examine into the matter myself, but I am informed that he is mistaken. But be that as it may, the name of the hon, member for North Norfolk does figure in the Congressional Record of the United States, and I do not see why it should not, for we have heard in this House the leader of the opposition referring to Mr. Sherman and to Mr. Hitt as exponents of their views; and if the hon. party in a certain debate, tells the Legislature of Canada that if we want to find out what the views of hon, gentlemen opposite are we will see them reflected in Mr. Hitt's resolution, if these hon. gentlemen are so fond of naming American statesmen, why should not American statesmen be privileged to name Canadian statesmen? I must say, after my experience of the past four years, having listened to the annual panegyric of the United Fourth of July celebrations and listened to Fourth There is evidently a division hon. gentleman. of labour among hon, gentlemen opposite which reminds me of a sketch in Punch. The older members of this House and the hon, member for North Norfolk himself can remember the time when John Leach was the favourite caricaturist of Punch, and one of his famous sketches depicted a dinner at a regimental mess table. One could substantiate his very remarkable theory. been called in who were new to the work. One of them, who, like my progenitors, evidently came from the Emerald Isle, was in the act of serving a gentleman with some vegetables, when one of the military entertainers said to the impromptu servant: "Hand this gentleman the potatoes." But Pat, with that strong sense of duty which is characteristic of our race, immediately replied, "Please, sir, I am told off to the cabbage." Having listened, as we have been condemned to do in this House, for the past four or five years I have had the honour of a seat here, to the hon member for extracts with reference to the rural population of South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), belittling Great Britain. The report says: and disparaging his own country, and to the hon. member for North Norfolk always following with a panegyric upon the United States, I am

I was born, than, like the hon, member for South Oxford, traduce my native land. But to come back for a minute to the condition of the rural population in the neighbouring republic, I find that in the great State of New York, which is so near the 65,000,000 population, so much nearer than any portion of the Dominion, the farm land in fourteen counties visited by the officials of the Government had depreciated in value. State Assessor Wood said that in a few decades there will be few or none but tenant farmers in the state, and year by year the value of farm land is depreciating. Will not the farmers of Canada, the farmers of Ontario, when the speeches we have had in this Legislature from hon, gentlemen on this side of the House are scattered among them, realize the benefit of a home market? And when it is explained to the farmers of Ontario that what hon, gentlemen opposite desire to accomplish can only be obtained by the destruction of the distrimember for South Oxford, when leading the Liberal buting trade of the cities of Canada-Toronto, Hamilton, Quebec, Montreal, Halifax, St. John, Winnipeg—and all the other distributing points throughout the country, do you not think they will understand that the market which these growing cities offer to the farmers of our different provinces will be of more value to them than the distant markets of New York and other States? I will not now refer to the condition of the farmers in the Western States; but I was States delivered by the hon, member for North rather amused at the hon, member for South Oxford, Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), although I have attended who is very bold in assertion but seems to have great difficulty in finding any accurate case to place of July spread eagle speakers. I have never before Parliament to verify his traducement of the listened to greater eulogies of the United States farming population of Canada, appealing to one of than these I have heard in this House from the stantiate the statement that a decent man who had emigrated to the Western States from Prince Edward Island wrote to friends there that he would return if he could get a decent farm at a decent price and if there was a decent chance of obtaining unrestricted reciprocity. That is really the only case he was able to submit to Parliament to recognize, at a glance, that the ordinary resources regards the farming population of our country, I of the mess had been very much overtaxed by a fear very much that, owing to the same causes large influx of guests, and that several waiters had which exist in the United States and which also prevail on this side of the border, that population may also decrease; but let us glance for one minute at the condition of the farming population of the British Empire, because hon, gentlemen opposite are very fond of telling us that this unfortunate condition of affairs of the farming population of the United States is solely due to the fact that in that country they have a protective system. I have in my hand the final report of the Royal Commission appointed to enquire into the depression of trade and industry, and I will read a few

"And first of agriculture. This primary industry, the most important in the kingdom, not only on account of its nature but by reason also of the numbers engaged in always reminded of this picture in Punch, because evidently one of these gentlemen is told off to the potatoes and another to the cabbage. I will say in justice to the hon, member for North Norfolk, that if, by any unfortunate combination of circumstances, it should ever be my lot to fill the role of either of these hon, gentlemen, I would much sooner stand up generally, there is scarcely a farmer in this country who, by reason of the reduction in the value of animals and stock in general, is not, taking his capital into account, stock in general, is not, taking his capital into account, 40 per cent, poorer than he was twelve years ago. At present, as we are told, the tenants are not making anything but are losing. The capital of the farmer is gradually going from him, his stock, eattle, and horses diminishing and the cultivation of the land deteriorating.

But in Ireland the state of things is even worse; for in that country where agriculture is the only great industry, the whole community being in fact dependent mean it the depression of agriculture is specially dent upon it, the depression of agriculture is specially severe. And as the majority of the small farmers in Ireland cannot be said to farm for profit, but only for bare subsistence, the depression is far more keenly felt among that class than in the corresponding class in Great Britain.

It is with very sincere regret that I refer to this lamentable condition of the rural population of the mother country or in the United States of America: but I read these statements to show that the allegation of hon, gentlemen opposite that the depression? which prevails among the rural population of Canada is exceptional, is not borne out, when we compare it with the condition of the rural population because the Americans were selling their goods in in the veighbouring republic or in the mother Canada at lower prices than they were selling them country. It is very well known that, since the protective policy was adopted in Canada, there has been a very great increase and development in our manufacturing industries. Those of us who are London to be sold at a low price; and so it was here. engaged in commerce must recognize the fact that, not only has there been a great increase numerically, but also a great improvement in all classes of as the Swiss are doing in England. Hon. gentlegoods which are produced in this country. Within my own recollection, and I have been engaged in the importing business for many years, many of us found it advantageous to have our business represented by resident partners or associates in the city of Manchester. At that day the cotton goods which went into common use in Canada came from Lancashire, and the woollen. goods from the neighbouring County of Yorkshire. and we found it convenient to have our representatives in Manchester. Very soon after the change of Government in 1879 and the adoption of the policy of protecting our manufacturers, we discovered that we were manufacturing in Canada all these goods, and that it was not necessary to maintain a resident buyer or partner in Manchester, and, therefore, we moved our representatives to London. I mention this simply to show the entire change which has taken place in this respect within a few years. I am only surprised that the imports of this country have been sustained as well as they have been. considering the great displacement of imported goods by home manufactured goods which has taken place. This is a matter which is engaging the attention of merchants in the mother country. and it is known there under the name of "Fair When I was in England a few months Trade. ago, I went into the city of London and was shown (Mr. Paterson) dealt with the question more were sold ten or twenty years ago. I expressed was receiving 30 cents per 100 lbs. more my surprise that Yorkshire could produce anything than the refiner in New York, which, he so cheap. I was told that these were not produced said, would make a difference of summer. Customs duties these goods had paid on coming the member for South Oxford and the member for into England. I was told that they were free and there was no duty paid. I asked what would be the rate of duty if the Yorkshiremen retaliated and I admit that he did so frankly and fairly—told and south their model. and sent their goods into Switzerland, and I was us that on the day on which he quoted the price, informed that they would be met with a duty of granulated sugar was $4.20 per 100 lbs. in New 20 or 25 per cent. I said I thought that was very York. I have taken the trouble to find what unfair to the Yorkshiremen. That is an instance of similar transactions which occurred in Canada before our duties were increased, when Canada was made a slaughter market by American manufacturers. At that time we had a duty of 174 per cent., and yet we all know what took place. In looking over some back numbers of the Hansard, I think in 1876, I found that Mr. Thomas Workman, who then represented Montreal West in this Parliament, called the attention of the Government to the fact that their tariff was so regulated that the manufacturers of the United States used Canada as a slaughter market to the detriment of our own manufacturers. While Mr. Workman was supporting the Government of the day, in which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was Finance Minister, he told them that, if they did not change their policy and give a fair protection to the Canadian manufacturer, the Canadian manufacturer could not live against the unfair competition he had to meet from the United States, intheir own country. They were doing exactly what the Swiss merchant does in England. When he has a surplus at the end of the season, he sends it to The American manufacturers were sending their surplus products here and slaughtering them, just men opposite tell us that if we did away with the barriers that now protect the manufacturers in this country our trade would be enlarged, and we could compete with the American manufacturer. We are not yet in a position to compete with the manufacturers of the United States. We were much later in starting our manufactures, our capital is less, and, until we have our manufactures more developed, we will not be in a position to compete with them. It would not be fair competition. Every one who remembers the condition of Canadian manufactories in 1878, will understand that the slaughter market now would be infinitely worse if hon, gentlemen opposite had their way. Hon, gentlemen opposite are hostile to all manufacturing industries, and, therefore, the manufacturers of Canada cannot expect much sympathy or help from them. We had an instance of this when my hon, friend the Minister of Finance removed the duty from raw sugar. He was told, when he retained the duty of eight-tenths of a cent on refined sugar, that he was putting that amount into the pockets of the manufacturers. The hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) estimated it at $2,000,000, but that was simply a bold assertion without anything to prove it. The hon, member for South Brant was the price in Halifax on that day, and it was $4.25. It is contended that the granulated sugar that we manufacture is some 10 cents per 100 lbs, better than that which is manufactured in the United States. On that I do not express any decided opinion, but it is evident that the difference in price was very trifling.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Did the hon, gentleman look for the price in Montreal at that date?

Mr. KENNY. I did not, and for a reason which I will explain. I happen to be what hon, gentlemen opposite call a monopolist: I am interested in the refinery at Halifax, my relations are more intimate with it than with the refiners of Montreal, and I asked the question there. Now, one word as regards these unfortunate sugar monopolists. Our experience in Halifax, where we have two sugar refineries, has been that to be a shareholder in a sugar refinery is not a lucrative position. may say of the two refineries that are now at Halifax, one on the eastern side and one on the western side of the harbour, that unfortunately the pioneers in these enterprises lost every dollar of capital they put into them, and, therefore, the position has not been a remunerative one. I applied to Halifax for the reason that I could obtain immediately the information which I required: but my hon, friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) must remember that the cost of transportation from Halifax to Montreal per 100 lbs., is 20 I do not know what the cost of transportation may be from the city of New York: but if I understood the hon, member for Brant correctly, I think he laid down-the axiom that he only objected to the system of protection when it largely exceeded the amount of Canadian labour required to produce the article. I say candidly that I have not read the hon, gentleman's speech: I always listen to him with a great deal of attention, and as the words fell from his lips I thought I took them down accurately. desire to point out one fact to the hon, gentleman, who seems to be labouring under the impression that: these sugar refiners have been making such enormous profits at the cost of the people of Canada. I do not know whether he really believes that as a business man or not, but I desire to place some figures before him. They have been used once before in the House, but I think that my hon, colleague made use of them when the hon. gentleman was not in his place. My hon, colleague took the trouble to ascertain from one of the sugar refiners in Halifax what the average cost of raw sugar had been during the past two years, and he found that in 1889 and in 1890 it averaged 5:14 cents, and that the average price at which refined sugar was sold was $5.74, or a difference of 60 cents per 100 When the hon. for the manufacturer. gentleman considers the cost of turning raw sugar into the refined sugar, I think he will recognize that there is not a great deal of profit in the transaction, not more than a fair and reasonable living profit. But, Mr. Speaker, I was not surprised when hon. gentlemen in this House sitting opposite rose in their places, one after another, and assailed the refining industry of Canada. It is the pet aversion of hon, gentlemen opposite. It must be remembered that Mr. Wiman, the inventor of the policy of hon, gentlemen opposite, in January last, went to Boston from New York. The hon, member for Senators and dinner parties across the border, that Mr. KENNY.

South Oxford also went to Boston from Toronto. It is true they did not meet, so far as I know; they were not at the same dinner party, and it is very remarkable that in all these numerous social gatherings the hon, member for South Oxford and Mr. Wiman do not chance to meet at public entertainments. But Mr. Wiman was at a dinner in Boston which took place about January 22 or January 23, 1891, one week before the hon, member for South Oxford was entertained there, and at that dinner Mr. Wiman went on to explain that formerly refined sugar was largely imported from Scotland into Canada, but under the protective system refineries had been established in Canada, and Mr. Wiman informed his American audience that by unrestricted reciprocity instead of buying all their sugar in Canada the Liberals proposed now to buy it in New York and in Boston. Those hon, gentlemen stand up here, one after another, and assail the refining industry of their own country in order that the words of Mr. Wiman may be verified, and that we may be compelled to buy our sugar in Boston and in New York. Now. Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen talk of subserviency to the Americans; have we ever noticed such an instance of subserviency as this? Mr. Wiman made no secret of it, Mr. Wiman spoke with confidence, Mr. Wiman was in intimate intercourse, 23 doubt, with some of these hon, gentlemen, and Mr. Wiman spoke with confidence on this question, because he knew that his friend from South Oxford, when he had the opportunity before, had closed the refining industry in Canada, and that he would do it again if ever he had the opportunity. Now, Sir, those hon. gentlemen are so much alarmed at the duty of # of a cent per pound on refined sugar, when they had an opportunity of benefiting the poor man, and the artizan, and the fisherman, and the miner of Canada, what did they do? Why, Sir, they put 5 and 6 cents a pound on his tea, and 2 cents a pound on his coffee, and 23 cents a pound or thereabouts on his sugar, yet these are the hon, gentlemen who stand up in their place and endeavour to persuade the labouring classes of Canada that they are being imposed upon by this Government which has removed the entire duty from tea, the entire duty from coffee, and has left only a small duty on refined sugar, simply to preserve the Canadian market to Canadian labour. Now, Mr. Speaker, I was rather amused at a reference which was made early in this session by the hon, the leader of the Opposition, to Mr. Sherman and to Mr. Hitt. This hon, gentleman stated that the terms of unrestricted reciprocity, or commercial union, for which they are contending, had met the approval of these two distinguished American statesmen. Sir, I have taken some trouble to inform myself as to what Mr. Sherman had stated and made public on this question. I desire to speak with all due respect of Mr. Sherman. I fancy Mr. Sherman would be accepted as an intelligent man, and an honest man, on both sides of the border, and in that respect he would be the rara aris in terra which the hon, member for South Oxford is looking for, because he seems anxious to find an honest and intelligent protectionist. Well, I would refer him to the Senator from the Province of Ontario-I beg pardon, from the State of Ohio; we are liable to get mixed up when we speak so often of the we forget to distinguish those from this side of the line from those on the other side. But I mean the Senator from Ohio. Mr. Sherman is an exceedingly prominent member of the Congress of the United States, and his name has been introduced here by the leader of the Opposition. He is, therefore, what the member for South Oxford is looking for. But now it is said by the leader of the Opposition that Mr. Sherman represents their views. Let me state what Senator Sherman's views are. On 4th January, 1888, Senator Sherman made a speech in the Senate of the United States, in which he used this language:

"I prefer that policy which looks to the interest of our own people rather than those of foreign nations. I prefer the policy of reducing prices by home competition rather than by foreign competition, of cheapening raw materials, by increased production and the improvement of our rivers and harbours, and the competition of our railways. In other words, I prefer the development, increase and growth of the productions and employments of our own countrymen, by the aid of our revenue laws, without respect to the policy, or theories, or interests of other nations."

There are the views of the Hon. John Sherman; and what consolation or comfort can hon. gentlemen opposite draw from them? Later on, in the same speech, he said, referring to what protection has accomplished in the United States:

"It has so increased and diversified our domestic manufactures that they have grown to the enormous sum of $7,000,000,000, including every article of necessity or desire, and yet in every stage of its growth has reduced the cost to the consumer more and more."

Then he makes a reference to Great Britain and Canada. He says:

"Great Britain alone pursues the policy of free trade, only because by centuries of protection she has so established her manufactures that she can compete with all the nations of the world. Even now we can, if we will, by wise commercial regulations with Canada and Mexico, and the South American States, extend the market for our home manufactures over vast regions, exchanging tools and implements, cotton goods and furniture, for sugar and coffee and other tropical productions in the south, and lumber, timber and furns in the north."

Now, Mr. Speaker, where is the consolation which hon, gentlemen opposite derive from a perusal of Senator Sherman's speech. He says he is anxious to extend the market—he does not use the words commercial union or unrestricted reciprocityhe is anxious to increase intercourse with Canada for American manufactures, and he says we can send them in return lumber, timber and furs. This is the authority quoted by the leader of the Opposition as representing their senti-But I find, further, that on ments and ideas. 18th September, 1888, and it must be borne in mind that this was 5 or 6 months after the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) had introduced his first resolution favouring commercial union: that subsequently, of course by arrangement and by a mutual understanding and an interchange of ideas, which has merited for Senator Sherman the references which the leader of the Opposition had made to him in this House. in fulfilment of all these arrangements Senator Sherman on that date introduced a resolution in the Senate of the United States, as follows:

"Resolved, that the Committee on Foreign Relations be directed to enquire into and report at the next session of Congress the state of the relations of the United States with Great Britain and the Dominion of Canada, with such measures as are expedient to promote friendly commercial and political intercourse between these two countries and the United States; and for that purpose to have leave to sit during recess of Congress.

Is that what hon, gentlemen opposite desire? Is that the reason the Senator for Ohio has been mentioned here by the leader of the Opposition, because he is an advocate of greater commercial and political intercourse between the two countries? But we cannot judge of those gentlemen by the resolutions, because they are willing to change a resolution at every session of Congress or every session of this Parliament. We must judge of them by their utterances, and I find that during the speech which Senator Sherman then delivered he made use of this language:

With a firm conviction that this consummation, most devoutly to be wished, is within the womb of destiny, and believing that it is our duty to hasten its coming, I am not willing, for one, to vote for any measure not demanded by national honour, that will tend to postpone the good time coming, when the American flag will be the signal and sign of the union of all the English-speaking people of one continent, from the Rio Grande to the Arctic Ocean."

Was that the reason Senator Sherman is selected as an exponent of the views of the leader of the Opposition and his followers, because he desires that the American flag shall alone float over this continent from the Rio Grande to the Arctic Ocean? But it is somewhat singular that this speech, made in the Senate of the United States, should have been made subsequent to the resolution which was introduced here by the hon, member for South Oxford, and which clearly contemplated commercial union only. It is well known that in September, 1890, Senator Sherman changed his resolution and introduced another resolution in the Senate of the United States, in which the words commercial union are omitted. It was a very great departure on the part of Senator Sherman from all his previous declaration; and if I am correctly informed, and I have taken the trouble to examine the Compressional Record, he did not deliver a speech but simply introduced his resolution with very few remarks. He spoke pretty much to this effect:

"There can be no question that better trade relations ought to be had between Canada and the United States. While they produce largely the same articles and are competitors for the market, their trade with each other is larger than with any other nations. Canada consumes more of our food than we consume of theirs. The amendment I introduce looks to such a conference, and I believe will be productive of advantage, not only in cultivating friendly feeling, but in increasing trade and commerce."

What was the fate of this resolution? It was so coldly received by the other members of the Senate that Senator Sherman was afraid to divide the House upon it. It was opposed by Senators Evarts, Edmunds, Morgan. Fry and others, and I will read a quotation from Senator Spooner, who seems to have voiced the feelings and views of the other members of the Senate when he said:

"I hope to see the day when the American flag will fly over Canada and when the British flag will be gone. Commercial union will come with political union, and not until then."

Yet Senator Sherman has been quoted here by the leader of the Opposition, and his views have been commended for our serious consideration. Is it any wonder, when one is advised by the leader of a party to examine into what Senator Sherman had stated, and when another hon, gentleman told us that a reflection of the views of the party opposite can be found in the resolution introduced by Mr. Hitt, that one becomes alarmed at the positical of affairs in this country, especially when one findsa great political party urging their fellow countrymen to look to the Americans for the sign by which they will conquer, and when, on a closer examination, we find those gentlemen, no matter how much they may change their resolutions, evidently, from the first, never intending anything but commercial union and only advocating that because they believed it would result in annexation. Take Mr. Hitt's resolution; and we must not disassociate Mr. Hitt's resolution from his own utterances. Mr. Hitt, who has been quoted in the House this session by the leader of the Opposition, is on record as having over his own signature declared:

"It is better not to make two bites of a cherry but to go at once for annexation.

Mr. McMULLEN. Give us a rest.

Mr. KENNY. You cannot hear it too often. We never tire of discussing this question in the Maritime Provinces. We believe that Canadian nationality and Canadian autonomy are imperilled in this ques-We believe it is the most important question ever before the Parliament of Canada, and if the hon, gentleman wants an authority for that opinion, I will refer him to his friend Mr. Goldwin Smith and to the early pages of the introduction to the Manual on Commercial Union, and he will find it recorded there, that the question now consideration by the people of Canada, and which is now being debated in this Legislature, is the most have ever had to important they consider I only dissent from that since Confederation. expression, to this extent, that, in my mind, this question is infinitely more important than the question of Confederation. I was not in the House when my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) made some reference to the trade of Halifax, and I desire now to refer in a very few words to the remarks which he made. I regret exceedingly that my hon, friend could not make his argument without referring to the state of the trade and commerce of Halifax in a manner which I think that city does not deserve at his hands. It seemed that the hon. gentleman from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), after he had indulged in a panegyric upon Dakota, attempted to decry the commerce of the cities of St. John and Halifax; but I must not forget that the hon, gentleman, when he did so, had previously expressed his approval of the utterances of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) at Boston, in which that gentleman stated that Boston was to become the entrepot for the commerce of Canada, and especially during the winter months. If these are the views of my hon, friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), I am not surprised, that, in order to make a point against the condition of the country, he should even attempt to decry the commerce of the city of Halifax and of the city of St. John. The hon, gentleman was pleased to say, that, so far as the trade of Halifax was concerned, the only increase in that trade has been in the exports. Sir, I think I have shown during the remarks I have made this afternoon, that it is exceedingly difficult to arrive at the condition of the general commerce of any one port in Canada, by judging of the imports; and especially so of any port in the Maritime Provinces, for the reason that many of the goods which are consumed in the Maritime Provinces which are consumed in the Maritime Provinces goes on in the neighbouring city of Portland, paid duties in the cities of Montreal, Toronto and Maine. Portland, Maine, is much nearer to Mr. KENNY.

other distributing points. Therefore, there has been a displacement of imports. I also desire to point out, as I mentioned earlier in my address, that in Canada to-day we are manufacturing our own cotton and woollen goods, as well as the goods into the manufacture of which iron enters, and numerous other articles; and which goods formerly paid duty. Therefore, it is difficult to estimate the trade of a port like Halifax or St. John solely by its imports. My hon, friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) should also have remembered that in the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia during the years from 1875 to 1878, wooden shipbuilding was exceedingly active, and during that period we put affoat from those Provinces, shipping to the value of some $20,000,000. goods connected with the building of these vessels paid duty in St. John and in Halifax, but to a great extent that trade has left us, and I am afraid that wooden shipbuilding can hardly be again revived. We have attempted to find employment for many of the people who were formerly engaged in this industry by starting cotton and woollen manufactories; and even in the good city of Yarmouthand I would be sorry to say one word to disparage Yarmouth, because I have passed many pleasant days there and have many warm friends in that in that good city, when wooden shipbuilding ceased to be remunerative, the people there, under the wise protection which is afforded by the National Policy, started, as I am informed, a woollen mill, and also a cotton mill where cotton duck is manufactured. Before I leave this subject, however, I also wish to point out to my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) that in 1877 there was a very sad and serious loss of property in St. John, N.B., by fire, and that one consequence of that was to contribute very largely to the importations, in order to replace the goods which were consumed by the fire. Referring to the trade of Halifax, I desire to point out to the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) that while the sea-going tonnage of Halifax in 1878 was only 423,423 tons, and the coasting tomage was only 185,314 tons, making a total of 608,737 tons, in 1890 the sea-going tomage of Halifax had increased to 682,408 tons, and the coasting tonnage to 278,764 tons, total tonnage 961,172 tons, or nearly 60 per cent. of an increase over 1878. Let me do the city of Yarmouth the justice which the hon. gentleman himself did not do it, and let me point out to my hon. friend what the tonnage of Yarmouth was, in 1878, as compared with the tonnage in 1890. I find from the Trade and Navigation Returns, that the sea-going and coasting tonnage of Yarmouth in 1878 was only 40,000 tons; and that in 1890 it had increased to 168,693 tons, or something like 400 per cent. If the hon, gentle-man had told us of the increase in the trade of Yarmouth, he would have been doing his cause more good than by trying to decry the trade of the cities of Halifax and St. John. These hon. gentlemen opposite contend that it would be eminently in the interest of Halifax and St. John that we should have unrestricted reciprocity the United States of America, and the citizens of St. John and of Halifax, in order to test accurately what would likely be their fate under such a condition of things, have only to look at what the market of 65,000,000 people which hon. gentlemen say is going to be such a boon to us than either Halifax or St. John; and I find that, from 1888 to 1890, the imports into Portland, in the State of Maine—which it must be borne in mind is much nearer to the 65,000,000 market than Halifax is—amounted to $2,808,957, while the imports of Halifax for the same period amounted to $17,710,850, or something like six times as great as the trade of Portland was. Yet hon, gentlemen opposite attempt to make the argument that we would benefited by a change which would place us in a relatively worse position as regards the 65,000,000 market than Portland occupies. Let us look again at the population of the two cities. I find that in 1860 the population of Portland, Maine, was something like 26,342, and that in 1890 it had increased to 36,426. Now, in 1861 the population of Halifax was only 25,000, and in 1891 I am fairly entitled to assume it will be at least 40,000. Therefore, there cannot be much comfort to hon. gentlemen opposite in an investigation of these figures, and I regret exceedingly that my hon. friend from Yarmouth could not make good his case without making those disparaging remarks about the capital of his own province and about the city of St. John, with which good place his own town has so large a commerce. I suppose it is only part of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite to assail in this way the distributing centres of the Dominion. Now, if my hon. friend from Yarmouth had taken the trouble to look at the progress that Nova Scotia has made in her general trade and commerce, he would, I think, have found it to be satisfactory. would have found, for instance, among other items, that under the National Policy the amount of sugar entered in Nova Scotia for home consumption in 1878 was only 7,000,000 lbs, whereas it has increased in 1889 to 50,000,000 lbs. He would have found also that in 1878 we only entered 5,000 lbs. of raw cotton, whereas in 1889 we entered 3,000,000 lbs.; and our labouring labouring people had the benefit which accrued to them from converting these raw products into manufactured goods. He would also have found that in the article of wool in 1878 we only imported 8,440 lbs., whereas in 1889 we imported 37,000 lbs.; and of this wool, I have no doubt, unless I have been misinformed—for I have not been in Yarmouth for some years—that a considerable quantity has been manufactured into a very good class of goods in my hon. friend's own good town. As regards the resolution before the House, I am not going, at this late stage of this prolonged debate, to say more than that I was sent here by my constituents especially to vote against unrestricted reciprocity, and I owe the large majority which I received to the fact that I was opposed to that policy. Why, Sir, the majority in the city of Halifax could never have been increased to such an extent as it was on an ordinary party issue. Any one who remembers the complexion of the representation of Halifax in the last Parliament and sees what it is to-day, must recognize that some great change has come over that constituency. The hon, gentleman who represented Halifax on the other side of the House, and who was the senior member for that city in the last Parliament, was should have spent two hours in enlightening this and is a man of undoubted ability and influence House and through it this country, when he said and the large majority which was recorded against him was due to the fact that the people of that community, as the people of the Province of Nova Scotia generally, are opposed to the policy of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity, knowing as they do that in it is involved the annexation of Canada to the United States of America. It means a common tariff, in the framing of which Mr. Hitt has told us naturally 65,000,000 people would have more to say than 5,000,000. Mr. Hitt has plainly and candidly expressed that opinion to the people of Canada. Itmeans, further, that in order to gratify hon, gentlemen opposite we must have direct taxation. An hon. gentleman opposite, I think it was the hon, member for South Oxford, spoke of a black flag. I assume that hon, gentlemen opposite are the black flaggers. They are very much in the habit of laughing at us as the old flaggers. Well, Mr. Speaker, I would very much sooner be an old flagger than a black flagger; and I think if they would inscribe on their black flag in white the letters d.t., which might represent direct treason or direct taxation or delirium tremens, they would get such a fit of the d.t.'s before they would get through with this question, that they would be very glad to change their policy and their tactics. Speaker, I think that our record of twenty-four years of Canadian unity should rather inspire us with confidence in the future than alarm us as to the present condition of the country. There is no country in the world, as we all know and must admit, which has made the progress that Canada has made during the past twenty-four years; and one must regret to see a party in this country obliged to have recourse to a policy of belittling, vilifying and falsifying the condition of their own country in order to make political capital. Sir, if the lamp of faith in our country should be extinguished, dark and dreary would be the future of our people, for history tells us, that whenever a people have been untrue to the common dictates of patriotism, they have become mere vassals in the service of a foreign state-that their commerce and their husbandry have left them, and the very implements of their handicraft have fallen from the hands of their own Sir, I have said before, and I repeat, that we have reached a crisis in the history of Canada—that the question now before us is the most important one on which we have ever had to express an opinion; and I believe, Sir, that the increasing hostility which is evident in the public mind of Canada towards this policy of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity is simply evidence that it has come to be better understood, and that its concomitant, annexation, is repulsive to the people of Canada. I believe, Sir, that the people of Canada are loyal to their country and their Queen, and they proudly proclaim that "Canada is not for sale."

Mr. FRASER. One is somewhat surprised that it requires so much time and energy to make the people of this country understand how disloyal we are on this side of the House, and how well understood are the treasonable utterances and the treasonable conduct of gentlemen on this side; and that the hon. gentleman who has just sat down both here and in the community in which he resides; that the country understood the matter so well. It was, indeed, an edifying sight to see a gentleman, without any thought of himself-to see a monopolist as he called himself, a sugar refinergetting up to teach this House and the people of this country, in his own bland manner, taking the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and all the other members of the Opposition under the shadow of his wing, patting them betimes before he stabbed them, to make them understand that he, with no motive except his heart-burning love for his country, with no stock in a sugar refinery, with nothing at all of that sort, could see a vision of a bright future for this country if it would continue to legislate as it has done in the past, in the interest of the few as against themany. Surely it was a spectacle to make the angels weep to see how little he had in himself to dictate the speech that he made. And then there was a crisis. Of course, there is a crisis. There is always a crisis with all these men who are engaged in manufacturing whenever you propose anything that is going to affect them. When the hon, gentleman spoke about the danger to this country, and when the hon, member for York (Mr. Wallace) spoke in the same way, I was reminded of a picture which appeared in Punch depicting a criminal in gaol holding a conversation with a drunken man outside the window. The hon, gentlemen opposite will, of course, understand that I make no reference to them. But they were talking of the danger to their country and of the violent character of the Opposition. "Our country is in danger," hiccupped the drunken man outside, and the prisoner, who was ready, perhaps, for execution, said: "Oh, dear me, our liberty is in danger." "I do not care so much," said the other, "for that, but what I am concerned about is our glorious religion." These hon, gentlemen opposite have about the same amount of reason and feel the same concern when they speak of the danger to this country from the Opposition policy. Whoever heard men, whom this country undertook to legislate into wealth, speak otherwise than in favour of the policy by which they benefited? The hon, gentleman said that the Opposition were speaking for the farmers. So we are; and because we are speaking for 60 per cent. of the population of this Dominion, while they are speaking for only a small fraction, are we to be charged with being disloyal? Is there anything dishonourable in that? Is it not more loyal and more honourable that we should speak in favour of the fisherman, the farmer and the artizan, who have been hoodwinked by hon, gentlemen opposite into thinking that protection would make them rich, than it is for hon, gentlemen who have come here and legislated to make themselves wealthy to charge those who raise their voices in behalf of a deceived and plundered people with being disloyal? The men who speak in favour of the farmers are speaking in favour of the men who need protectors in this Parliament. Too long has legislation been directed in the one groove. hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) has told us that he was sent here to vote against reciprocity. I tell the hon, gentleman that I know something about Nova Scotia, and if it was not that the Government adopted partial reciprocity as their platform in the last election, few of their supporters would have been returned from that province. Their whole argument in the city of Halifax and or that, this prosperity or the other, which is built elsewhere, used by the supporters of the Govern- up at the expense of the people. I rejoice in every Mr. FRASER.

ment, was this: We are just as sound on the question of reciprocity as our opponents, and we have the Government and can get it for you much better than the Opposition. Had it not been for that prospect held out to the people, not even a corporal's guard would have been returned from Nova Scotia to support the Government. were returned to power because they promised reciprocity. They told the people that the anxiety of Sir John Macdonald and his colleagues for reciprocity, in the interests of Canada, was such, that they could not wait for the regular time to bring it about, but appealed to the people to strengthen them with their mandate at once. I tell the hon, gentleman now, who may be making, with many others, his plea to the people, that, in the Province of Nova Scotia, no man who is not in favour of the fullest reciprocity possible with the United States, consistent with our own dignity, consistent with everything that is good in our own country, can hope to obtain the suffrages of the people. The hon, member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) found fault with my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), because he gave a true picture of the trade of Halifax. I notice, however, that the hon, gentleman did not attempt to answer the figures of my hon, friend, but said it is very difficult to find the facts. Whenever, Sir, we find a protectionist cornered, he will contrive to wriggle out in some other way. He will say there is prosperity here and there, and then he will leave prosperity for a moment to dilate on the glorious National Policy, and in another moment he will be away up in the clouds. The farmer, he will say, is getting more for his grain here than he could there; he will take the markets of one side and contrast it with a market somewhere else, and he will make out that the farmers are getting such high prices that it is a wonder every one of them does not become a capitalist. In listening to hon. gentlemen opposite, I am reminded of the story of a grocer, a coloured man, who himself delivered the eggshe sold, and had too keen an eye for business to be particular in giving the full number. One of his customers, a good wife, thought she would count the eggs herself. lest there might be some mistake on the part of the servant. The grocer began to count as he delivered the eggs, one, two, three, &c., and then stopped to ask where was her little boy. He is in school, replied the old lady. Why, said he, that small boy in school; he can't be seven. Oh, said she, he is thirteen. Well, said the other, he is the smartest little boy of his age I ever saw. I would not take him for thirteen; and then he resumed his counting, fourteen, fifteen, sixteen, and so on. Then he asked about the age of the daughter and the old lady's age, whom he flattered by making her out to be much younger than she was, and in the end the old lady paid for four dozen of eggs when she only got two dozen, but she was so much flattered and pleased that she really had not the heart, afterwards, when she discovered how she had been swindled, to complain. Now, the difference between those who are in favour of better trade relations with the United States, those who are in favour of absolute free trade, which is bound to come some day, and those who support the National Policy, is this, that all the free traders have to do is to stand on principle, and they need not go round and point out this success man becoming prosperous, but I do not believe in this country has a right to the same protection any man becoming wealthy except on conditions that will enable every other man in the Dominion to become wealthy in the same way. No other law will do in this country or in any other country. I do wish those hon. gentlemen would buy a primer on political economy, for I have heard in this House more unadulterated ignorance given expression to on the question of political economy than I thought could exist in any representative body. It will be a matter of considerable surprise to the historian of the future, when he reads over these debates, to find that in this age, which boasted so much of its enlightenment, so many representative men at a loss—either through design or ignorance—to understand the first principles of political economy.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). What are they?
Mr. FRASER. Let the hon, gentleman buy Henry George's work on political economy for ten cents, and let him read it, and he will not then stand up in this House and proclaim himself anything else than a free trader, unless he does violence to his conscience.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER. Hon. gentlemen may say "oh, oh" as much as they please; but let them mention any authorities of any repute who have written in favour of protection except Cary, who was a Southerner, and Horace Greeley, who was a journalist. Let these hon. gentlemen go to any college in the Dominion or in the United States, and find me a first-class man who is anything else but a free trader?

Mr. KENNY. Senator Sherman.

Mr. FRASER. Senator Sherman? Is he a professor in a college? It suits him to be a protectionist, as it suits the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) to be a protectionist, because he is making money out of it. I would like to know the name of a professor in a college who has ever given his opinion in favour of the system of protection?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). The people of Canada have given their opinion.

Mr. FRASER. Part of the people of Canada have expressed their opinion, but the people in general are not protectionists. Do not those hon. gentlemen opposite know as well as we on this side know that there are numbers of people who have voted for the sake of their party who, in their heart of hearts, are aware that protection is a bad thing? If you meet hon, gentlemen opposite alone, if you meet them outside of this House, they will tell you quietly, I am a free trader in principle, as if a man can be a free trader in principle and a protectionist in practice. They can only be that when they are making money out of it. They say we must have protection because. if we do not, somebody else is going to get the better of us. I lay down the principle, and it is a primary principle of political committy, and I propound it here for the benefit of my hon. friend at the rear who asks for some information in regard to political economy, that if one man gets protection for the manufacture of hats, the man who make shoes for the man who makes hats has a right also to get protection, and the man who supplies him with meat has a right to protection, and the man who supplies him with clothes has also a right to protection, and every man who works or gives anything which enriches | manufactures as if he had to produce his work because he has to pay out of his own pocket for the benefit of the one man who is protected. When we go back to first principles, what do we find? We find the principles established by the Creator Himself, no protection to any one but a fair field and no favour. I ask if any man should get by law the right to receive one cent from his fellow: man unless the money so received finds its way back to the pockets of the man who pays him. Is it right that any man who manufactures sugar should get anything from the people by law unless he pays it back to them in another way? The whole thing is a system of legalized robbery. The whole thing was begotten in America after if was forgotten in England, and it was begotten in America for selfish ends, but even in the United States, as in this country, the people are beginning to understand that those who cry most lustily protection are those who make money out of it, and that protection has no other design than that a few should be enriched at the loss of the many. I am not in favour of aristocracy, but I very much prefer an aristocracy by birth to a plutocracy by wealth, because with an aristocracy by birth at all events we would have education. These men boast that the National Policy has enriched a few. They point to this industry and that industry and the other as having been greatly developed, and they say protection is a great thing. Not at all. You may take a town in a county prosperous by protection, but you do it at the expense of all the other parts of the county. I might go over to the other side of the House and might get assistance and might fasten the hands of those hon, gentlemen and take their money out of their pockets. If I do that, it is true that I am wealthier than I was before and I might say so, but is that of any benefit to those from whom I have taken the money? The same is true in regard to protection, when it lays a heavy burden on those who get no advantage from it. The only wealth which is good for us to have is the wealth which is free as the air and which shines like the sun, the wealth in which every man can participate, the wealth that gives every man, no matter what his standing is, the opportunity of entering into the markets of the world and testing his skill and brains in the markets of this country and of the whole world. That is true political economy. What is the system of hon, gentlemen opposite? Their system is that this country must be a manufacturing country, and they contend that, because neither the capital nor the brains of those who engage in manufacturing is sufficient to build up our manufacturers, the Government must lay a contribution on all the other people of the country in order to build up those manufactures. I like to see manufactures increase in this country, and I know that manufacturing will increase in Canada, but if it depends upon a contribution levied on all the people by law, then I say let us rather remain as we are than take money out of the pockets of the others in order to build up our manufactures, because you will find that where assistance is given the work is not so well done. Every hon, gentleman know that if a man is manufacturing hats or shoes and the Government give him aid in order to do that, he will not be so careful about the fabric that he unaided and compete with others. What is the reason why the goods of Great Britain are made better than in any other part of the world? It is simply because the Scotch and English and Irish artizans know that they go into competition with the rest of the world and that they have to make the best article they can, because they know that the only thing which succeeds in the markets of the world That is the reason why English is good goods. goods have made their name in every country in the world. If you go to the United States and ask for good clothing, will-they show you American cloth? No: they will show you Scotch tweed or English goods. I was amused to hear the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) state that when he was in London he found Swiss goods being sold there cheaper than English goods. He did not say what goods they were, but of course they were watches.

Mr. KENNY. No; they were not watches. They were textile goods.

Mr. FRASER. Every one knows that the Swiss produce very cheap watches, and they manufacture a small quantity of textile goods. Switzerland is a small country. Can any one imagine that Switzerland was going to swamp the produce of Great Britain in textile goods? the hon, gentleman goes to London next and walks along Piccadilly or any of the other streets of that metropolis, he had better keep his eyes open, because the merchants there will fool him every time if he imagines that the trade of Great Britain is going to be swamped by the production of a small country like Switzerland. The English artizans do not fear because they know that they can beat off any competition brought against them, and, as those who buy goods are in the majority always, it is a good thing always to get cheap goods. Is not plenty a good thing? Here is another principle in political economy for my hon. friend in the rear who asked for information and is learning something now that he did not know before. gentlemen opposite say that plenty is not a good thing, but that scarcity is a good thing. They say that we ought to manufacture a small number of articles, that we ought to shut ourselves up by a wall of protection, and manufacture only a small quantity of various articles. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) gave us an idea of protectection—a cross-eyed view of protection—and expressed the opinion that Great Britain would eventually become protectionist. In the cycles of the ages which are coming, I think I can see the offspring of the hon. gentleman holding the brush and the palette for the New Zealander sitting on the ruins of London bridge, and at that time, and then only, protection will be again adopted as the policy of Great Britain. There are only a few cranks in England who preach protection, and perhaps there are a few cranks who come from England or elsewhere to this country and The hon. gentleman may be looking preach it here. down from a higher sphere on his progeny, but not until London is in ruins will the people of Great Britain lay aside the policy which has made a history for them and put them above all others in their competition in the markets of the world; not until then will they go back to the dirty ragged shreds of an effete protectionism. You might as well expect that the member for Halifax could rise and by They won't come together, and these hon. gentle-Mr. FRASER.

his might turn the sun backwards, as to expect that England would ever go back to protection. this is the kind of thing that is told to the electorate of Canada, and their loyalty is called into doubt by saying that England is learning of us and she is going back to protection. Is it not surprising? But there is another thing that the hon, member for Halifax said which I will notice before I come to the general question. Speaking about the year mentioned by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) he says that the hon. gentleman should remember that 1875 was a great year in Halifax because shipbuilding was brisk. These were the doleful years the hon. gentleman referred to in this House. is true our shipping at that time was on every sea, and the hon. gentleman had to get evidence from hon, gentlemen opposite that this was the year when the imports and exports of Halifax were great, because our ships were being built and sailed, and I thank him very much for unwittingly giving us this point of relief to the background which he says we are painting on this side of the House. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to enter fully into the remarks made by the hon. gentleman on the various subjects, because it would take hours to review them, and they have already been discussed. One cause of complaint against gentlemen on this side was, that a certain hon, gentleman on this side had been mentioned in the American Senate. Now, I do not think that is a disgrace. I am sure that when the Government, if they go to Washington, if they have any honest intention of going to Washington, they will find that the name of the member for Halifax is mentioned there: I am sure that his speech will be read to them there, and the commissioners will be asked: Are these the kind of supporters you have? Are these the people who want reciprocity? Hon. gentlemen opposite are divided into a number of classes. I want first to state that it seems to me that there is no argument in this case except that which we make, namely, that we want reciprocity with our neighbours across the border, and the only answer we get from hon. gentlemen opposite is that they want no reciprocity at all. I think Mr. Colby was the only man on that side of the House who had brains enough to see the issue at that time. He boldly said: I am not in favour of reciprocity, even in natural products, I am in favour of no reciprocity at all; and he is followed by no less distinguished a gentleman on the other side than the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron), who is not in favour of reciprocity of any kind, even in natural products.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Who is your authority?

Mr. FRASER. Yourself.

An hon. MEMBER. That is mighty poor authority.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. White) is in favour of reciprocity of a certain Now, Mr. Speaker, it does appear to me that that is the proper ground for the hon. gentle-man to take, namely: You are in favour of reciprocity; weareinfavour of no reciprocity. Itellhim that reciprocity with our neighbours across the border means so much free trade; and you might as well try to make oil and water mingle as try to unite reciprocity and protection. You cannot do it.

men know that. What has been the whole burden of the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite? Well, in the first place we had a glorification of the National Policy, and we had that ad nauseam. I never heard from any equal number of gentlemen so much glorification of the National Policy. course, the hon, member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) was not in favour of reciprocity at all. The hon, member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) was LAl-The hon. legro of the debate; he tripped the light fantastic toe; he gathered up a little scrap here and a little scrap there, in favour of that policy. If the hon. member for Haldimand was L'Allegro, the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins) was Il Penseroso of the debate. He says he is in favour of a little of it; and we see that in the resolution that he attempted to bring into the House. That resolution was a kind of a double-barrel gun, part of it was in favour of the Government, where it told of all the glorious things that they had done, and the other part of it looked toward reciprocity. Well, I say, Mr. Speaker, that those hon gentlemen, to be consistent, must oppose reciprocity altogether. I can understand them saying that Canada is big enough for the Canadians, and all the people that can get into it, or, on the other hand, we can close out the whole world, and we That was the cry of can live within ourselves. protectionists in the United States, and it is the only consistent thing that they can say, namely, that this country is big enough, and we can make this country big enough without any outside help. In the United States they said: the United States for the Americans, while they say here, Canada for the Canadians, not Canada for any other nation, not Canada for any other people; no, they want Canada for the Canadians, and that alone. I can understand them saying: We can live within ourselves, and we will live within ourselves; we want no assistance from any other person outside; we want nothing to do with any other nation, but we want to live here alone. But if these hon, gentlemen believe all they have said in glorification of the National Policy, at the same time they themselves must admit that in many parts of the country, at least in the Province of Nova Scotia and in many parts of the Province of New Bruswick—as I have learned from people living there, if the evidence of some of the inhabitants of those provinces is to be taken as good—affairs in those parts of Canada are not of so bright a colour as hon. gentlemen pretend they are. The hon. member for Halifax had to depend on a little report in the Globe; he built up an argument upon it, because the Globe said that travellers coming home were encouraged by the prospects of a good harvest; and that there were good times coming for the country. Now, if the hon, gentleman had thought a moment about what he was reading, he would have seen that the report indicated that the times were not good now, and that the people depended on a good harvest to have good times. But the hon. gentleman, like those with whom he is surrounded, is one of the prisoners of hope, and they have to depend upon a good harvest or something else to tide them over the difficulty. And why? Because the very touchstone of the whole question is that this country could not exist only for the farmers. It is all very well for them to say we are taking the side of the farmers and they are taking the side of the manufacturers.

perity means the prosperity of every man in Canada, and if he does not prosper there will be no Canada. Talk about our prosperity, talk about our greatness, is it not all due to the farmers? Hon, gentlemen opposite tell us to look across the border where the farmers are poor; they can raise nothing, according to those hon. gentlemen. They want to make us believe that the United States are so poor that their farms are actually lying without owners; that there is no person living on them. Surely those people who have left those farms and are living in cities will want something to eat, and cannot we send them something to eat when their farms are so poor that they cannot raise their own food? In one breath they say the United States are so poor, that their farms are so run down, that wedonot want to make any treaty with them; their farms are deserted and they are notable to buy anything from us. Well, hon, gentlemen opposite must take either one horn or the other of the dilemma. That state of affairs has been brought about in the United States by protection. I believe that state of affairs does exist to a certain extent in some of the older states, but I want to say that the same evil which exists in that country is manifesting itself in this country, and in both cases it is due to protection. I want to tell the hon, member for Halifax, who stated that England and Scotland and Ireland were in a distressed condition, that he forgot to tell the real cause of it, and that is, that. they have no free farms there. I want to tell him that if the landlords in Ireland did not rack-rent the farmer, the land that he tills, the Irish farmer would be well off to-day. I tell him that if the tenants of England, the crofters of Scotland, were not subject to the landlords there, who use their power to impoverish them by rack-rent, just as the protectionists of Canada have the power of making the people of Canada support them, they would be wealthy and prosperous. He should have stated the conditions fairly. To compare farms in England, Scotland and Ireland with those in Canada is to compare things that The hon. gentleman should have considiffer. dered the underlying differences before bringing them into contrast. I say this: Given the condition that our farmer can buy what he wants as cheap as possible in Canada, given the condition that in the race of life he is not hampered to support bloated monopolies, given the condition that his position is such that not only can he buy everything as cheap as possible but he can sell his products on as favourable terms as possible, he cares not and fears not the competition of the American farmer or any other. Why? Because our land is, acre for acre, as good, and we can suc-But surely, hon. gentlemen opposite forget that in 1878 we were promised that the National Policy would make our farmers rich, and even the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) had to admit before sitting down that the condition of the farmers in Nova Scotia and of Canada as a whole was not very prosperous. Then the hon. gentleman went on to show that the condition of the farmers was not satisfactory elsewhere. Truly, it is great consolation to know when you are poor that some one else is poor likewise. How happy the farmer here who is taxed on an average 20 or 30 per cent. on every and they are taking the side of the manuthing he buys; how he must return thanks to the I stand by the farmer, because his prosegood Government that permits him to purchase everything he requires at 20 or 30 per cent. duty, and at the same time to know that some farmer across the border is also poor. With what satisfaction he will sleep, and how he will love the Government that has brought about such a state of things, and to know that there is a farmer as poor as he across the border. It is something for which he should not only be gratified, but he should also The next thing we had was a misstatement by hon, gentlemen opposite of the position of their opponents. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that running through all the speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite there is the same line of argument. No doubt it was agreed No hon, gentleman seems to have made his speech without consulting some person. There was a misstatement of the position of the Opposition, a misstatement so far as their view of the laws of their country was concerned, there was a misstatement so far as the principles they were advocating were concerned. We say it is a good thing to exchange the products of the sea, the mine, the forest and the farm, which we can manufacture on the ground where they are produced, withour American friends across the border; the same privilege being given to them. But how are hon, gentlemen opposite going to proceed? They wait to obtain a statement from us of the whole case. But that From the first to the last of this will not do. •debate there has not been a hint as to what they are going to do when they visit Washington. They are waiting to get information here, they want to find information here, and as they adopted in part the policy of the party on this side of the House, so now they want to adopt also the explanation of that policy in order that they may go there equipped, because they know that the people are at the back of the movement in favour of freer and better trade relations with the people across the border. Do they give us any light? Not the least. I submit that a free statement of the case as between the two parties ought to be given. I submit that the Government should engage to give a free statement, before they go to Washington, as to the conditions prevailing in this country. They will have strange views of the question if they go to Washington entertaining the views expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite. I think I see hon. gentlemen go, for example, to the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), and the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) and ask: What kind of a treaty would you make? If the speeches of hon, gentlemen afford any index of their feelings, and I think no hon. gentleman speaks his mind more freely, and I think there is no hon. gentleman in whom there exists more latent honesty than in the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien)-

Mr. O'BRIEN. "Latent" it is.

Mr. FRASER. Latent honesty.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Nothing but "latent honesty?"

Mr. FRASER. I judge latent honesty is there, for the hon, gentleman expresses his honesty, and I think back of the whole there must be a tremendous amount of latent energy and latent honesty. If hon, gentlemen opposite consult him he will say:

No reciprocity in anything. If the Government go to the hon, member for Shelburne (Mr. White) he will say: We must have reciprocity. What a perfect fiend in human form he must be! The hon, member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) spent are they going to do with the speeches of hon, gentlemen opposite? How are they going to re concile these speeches, and how are they going to come back here, even if they make a treaty, with the expressions of opinion made by hon, gentlemen opposite standing on record? I think, if I judge the Government aright-I did think they wanted reciprocity, but I rather think, if the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite afford any information, the Government do not believe in reciprocity, and do not want a reciprocity treaty—they will not have reciprocity, and they will come back next winter, if the Government exists so long, and they will declare that their friends did not want reciprocity. What do they mean? Hon, gentlemen talk about disunion; but I never saw such disunion as is displayed by the party opposite, disunion among members from the various provinces as to what kind of reciprocity they want. Some, indeed, want reciprocity, and some want no reciprocity. Some want reciprocity in natural products, some want reciprocity in coal, and the hon, member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) said that was one of the articles he wanted to see on the free list.

Mr. O'BRIEN. What I said was, that reciprocity was a misleading term, because exchange is made under the name of reciprocity when there is no reciprocity; but it does not prevent us from taking from the United States anything that it would be to our advantage to take. I mentioned coal, because coal is an article we both buy and sell, and, therefore, the term reciprocity could fairly be applied to it, but it cannot fairly be applied to articles we do not buy or sell.

Mr. FRASER. Quite so. I commend the hon. gentleman to the tender mercies of the hon. Minister of Marine, who stated in Pictou that there could be no reciprocity in regard to coal, and that the duty must be maintained. Then other hon. gentlemen opposite are in favour of reciprocity in a few articles, but there is no consensus of opinion among them to-day. We have some hon. gentlemen favouring the adoption of a partial reciprocity, if it can be obtained on our own terms. I was surprised when hon, gentlemen said they wished reciprocity, if they obtained what we wanted. Did you, Mr. Speaker, ever hear of such a bargain being made? Do hon. gentlemen think the Americans are fools, that all we have to do is to state what we want and they will give it to us? Not at all. When hon, gentlemen go over there they will have to enter into discussion with the Americans in seeking to negotiate a treaty, and in order to effect a bargain it must be one that is in the interests of both parties. We have a hope expressed to that effect, even by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), whose bowels of mercy for the Government were opened, and he hoped they would obtain a reciprocity treaty. It is strange that if reciprocity is not a good thing, hon. gentlemen opposite want it. Why do they not say at once: It is not a good thing and we do not desire it. Why should hon. gentlemen opposite in their speeches constantly denounce the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)? He must possess a good nature in order to stand it. The whole burden of the song of hon. gentlemen opposite was centred on the actions of the hon. member for South Oxford. What a perfect fiend in human form he must be! The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) spent half his time in criticizing that hon. gentleman, and understand that an hon, gentleman of his geniality and good nature could become so bitter against the hon. member for South Oxford, and his example Kenny), the people of Canada have "infinitely" was followed by all the smaller speakers, until the more respect for the hon, member for South Oxford hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) fairly forced himself into a rage. The hon. gentleman looked over to the seat of the hon, member for South Oxford, but he was not present; he fairly foamed with rage, and he declared that the hon, gentleman was the darkest man on this side of the House and in the country. Why all this? Is not this the highest tribute that could be paid to the hon, member for South Oxford? Do they not in effect declare that the very man they seek to vilify, and who must be shot at by every cannon and every small gun on the other side, is a bright man, and are they not making him, if he is not great, great indeed? I can fancy the manner in which he accepts these attacks. I have seen on a stormy night on the Atlantic coast a lighthouse placed on a granite rock. The waves dash against it, the gulls scream over it, and the ocean threatens to engulf it; but the storm passes, the waves cease to beat against it, the gulls go to sleep, and the light still shines over the sea. surprised that hon, gentlemen opposite deem it to be their duty to hurl all their epithets at the hon. member for South Oxford, for of all the destroyers of their pet schemes, he is indeed the chief.

Mr. DAVIN. Was there a revolving light?

Mr. FRASER. No. The prairie is the place for wandering light. I was going to say this: that if there was a man in this House or in Canada, that they felt ought to be killed, if they could do it, it was the hon member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He has been attempting to teach, and has succeeded in teaching, the people of this country what the true principles of political economy are for the last twenty years. It took Wilberforce more than twenty years to teach the Christian people of Great Britain that slavery was a bad thing, and it may take the hon. member for South Oxford and his friends on this side of the House more than twenty years to teach the halfcivilized people of Canada that protection is a bad

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER. Yes, and no loyal men on the other side can say may to it; because they are placing Great Britain all the time as an example to us, and I am only putting ourselves as being in the position of being not as cultured as Great Britain, and they, at least, cannot say a word to me. After the hon, member for South Oxford has been doing what I have said, for the last twenty years, no wonder that you on the other side would like to kill him. Yet, one of the strongest tributes I have ever heard paid to the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was, when a member on the Conservative side said in this House, that if the hon. gentleman had adopted protection in 1878 he would be in power to-day. There could be no stronger tribute to the hon. gentleman than that; because the hon. gentleman, from conviction, and without regard to his retaining power, felt that in this country, as in all countries, the only thing that would make us great and good was free trade. Rather than throw aside his principles he clung to them, and I believe that the people of Canada to-day have infinitely more respect for him for so doing. I say, to use the rather doubtful term of the hon, member for Halifax (Mr. to-day than if he had then changed his principles for any principle flying around in order to retain him in power, as the hon, gentlemen opposite will do and have been doing. The people of the country, I repeat, have more respect for him than if he changed his principles to suit whatever circumstances may arise, just as hon. gentlemen opposite do, who are in the habit of throwing their principles away as easily as a man casts off his garments. These hon, gentlemen opposite know that they have other methods of bringing their supporters to book:

They cast off their friends. as a hound would his pack. For they know, when they like, they can whistle them back."

The hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) stood firmly by his principles in 1878; he stood by the sound principles of political economy, rather than cast them aside to suit the whim of the hour, and hence the rage of the Conservative party; hence the attempt to belittle him; while all honest men should admit that nothing could be more in his favour than his stern adhesion to the principles which he believed in. As the hon, gentleman sat there listening to all these remarks of members opposite, and impervious to their little shafts, I could not help but think that the very charges which they brought against the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) were the very things which, in my opinion, constitute the reasons why he should be spplauded. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up the time of this House longer, for I shall conclude before you leave the Chair at six o clock. I think that perhaps in this discussion we have had speeches which were nearly long enough, to say the least of them. I want to say, that so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, the condition of things down there is not all as the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) says. I happen to know something, in my practice, of our farming community, and I tell the hon. gentleman that in the Counties of Pictou, Antigonish and Guysborough, the farmers are not as well off to-day as they were fifteen years ago.

An hon. MEMBER. That is so.

Mr. FRASER. I tell the hon, gentleman that, and he himself says it is true.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I do not believe it.

Mr. FRASER. The hon, member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) says it is true, and yet you do not believe it.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). In fact, I know it is not true.

Mr. FRASER. You have got your choice, but I will take the opinion of the hon. member for Halifax in preference to yours.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I can prove from the farmers themselves, from the reports of their agricultural societies, and other reliable information, that it is not true.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman cannot do it.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I can do it.

than three days ago, the largest petition ever presented to the Canadian Parliament-a petition signed by fifteen thousand farmers, came into this Parliament asking that a reduction should be made on the prime necessities of life, and stating that farming was not in as good a position as it had been. Does the hon, member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) think that he knows as much about farming as these fifteen thousand farmers do? I have no doubt that he is as wise, in his own conceit, as these fifteen thousand farmers are; but notwithstanding that, I still believe that these fifteen thousand farmers know more than he does; and when they penned their names to this petition, I will take their opinion before his, be he ever so wise. I submit that the condition of the farmers of these three counties I have mentioned is not so good as it was, and I have got the assent of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) that it is not.

Mr. KENNY. I desire to make a personal explanation, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to interrupt my hon, friend, further than to say that my opinion is that the rural population of Nova Scotia is amenable to the same influences which affect the rural population of the United States and other countries.

Mr. FRASER. Ah, that is his reason.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Under protection.

Mr. KENNY. And in free trade England.

Mr. FRASER. I ventured to think that the hon. gentleman would not come back to that argument again, after I have shown that the question of high rents was the question which affected the farmers in England. Does he think that the farmer in Canada who owns his own farm, and who pays no rent, should be in as bad a position as the farmer in England who has to pay a high rent? If the hon, gentleman knows anything about the farmers in Great Britain and Ireland, he knows that the question of high rents is the very foundation of all the grievances they suffer under, and he must know very well that in Ireland there is very little left for the farmer when the rent is paid.

Mr. DENISON. I beg to correct the hon, gentle-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FRASER. I will answer whatever the hon: gentleman has to state.

Mr. DENISON. I wish to state that the rents in the County of York, where I live, are higher than they are in Ireland.

They are not higher in the part Mr. EDGAR. of the County of York that I represent.

An hon. MEMBER. You don't represent York.

Mr. FRASER. You see how very easy it is to show where the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Denison) is wrong. He thought he had the whole thing to himself, but here comes an answer to the hon. gentleman's declaration. Mr. Speaker, another thing I will tell you is that the fishermen of the Province of Nova Scotia are not so well off as they were before. And here comes a point, and a point I wish to bring before the attention of this House, and that is, that of all the cruel things in Mr. FRASER.

Mr. FRASER. Yet, Mr. Speaker, not later fishermen by this Government is the most cruel. The farmer has to take his chances on bad crops and bad weather and other conditions of nature, but this Government never took that into account, while they knew that the manufacturer has to take none of these chances. The farmer must be fed and clothed, whether it rains or shines, and his success or failure often depends upon the natural conditions I have referred to. It is the same way with the fisherman. He enters his tiny boat and sets out on his work, and, if a kind Providence does not send him fish, he has to come home and be at the loss; yet, notwithstanding this, you lay upon him the heavy burdens of buying every article he uses, and placing heavy taxes on these articles in order to swell the pockets of the monopolists who give him no advantage. I tell the Government that the only way to give a fair chance to those classes of our community, is to make the conditions of life so easy that even if they occasionally meet with losses, because nature has not been kind to their industry, they should at least not be burthened so badly as they are at present. Hon, gentlemen opposite tell us that the country is very prosperous, but I know in a county in the Province of Nova Scotia a professional man, a great friend of the present party in power, a present member of Parliament, and the condition of things in his county were so bad that actually, poor fellow, he had to swear himself out of gaol for less than $200; and yet I am told that the conditions of life in Canada are all favourable.

An hon. MEMBER. He was a politician.

Mr. FRASER. He is a politician, but is every politician in that condition? I know certain men that are not in that position since they came to Parliament, and it is just because they are in Parliament. That remark might apply to a gentleman on this side of the House, but it certainly would not apply to a gentleman on the other side of the House, or else he is not in the secret of certain matters that are now being enquired about and explained before a committee of this House. Mr. Speaker, when I was coming to Ottawa, I came from Yarmouth to Boston on the steamer Yarmouth, and the captain of that steamer gave me this fact . That from the 11th day of March in this year, until the 11th April, by that steamer alone, 300 persons more than in the same month of the previous year, went to the United States. member that is in this year, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite say that there is no exodus. I am not going to blame the National Policy for all this. I would not do that; but I am going to say this, that the National Policy has much to do with it, and the fact that our people have to leave this country is the best proof that the conditions of life are not asfavourable here as they ought to be. Need I tell you in this House, that any country where an honest man cannot get all the work he wants, is not in a prosperous condition. The proper condition of life is, that every man who is willing and able to work should be able to get work every day at a fair day's wages. That is not the case in this country, and I maintain, Sir, that until such a time as we have a change in our policy such will not be the case. In spite of this we are to a certain extent as this world the treatment of the farmers and the prosperous as the Americans are. Why, Sir, there is enough land and there are enough workingmen in this country to prevent even this vile system of protection making people poor. Do hon, gentlemen opposite take great glory to themselves because we are living—because we do not find ourselves all beggars? Is it a great thing that we live, and live so as to get enough to eat? We ought to live better, and we ought to be happier. I tell you that if the conditions of life were easier, if our people had not to bear all this heavy burden of taxation, things would be very different with our farmers and artizans and fishermen; and it is on behalf of these people that I want to raise my voice; and despite the fact that the hon, member for Halifax has proclaimed himself to be a monopolist, I wish to say that if you want to make this country great, you can only do it by improving the conditions of the poor-by making life easier for the men who toil in the shop, in the fields or on the seas. The rich can take care of themselves; they need no help from Parliament, because they have the help within themselves; but it is the men who have to work, who have to give blow after blow for every dollar they receive whom this House ought to legislate for, by breaking off the shackles, and giving them the best conditions possible under which to live. I believe that this amendment should pass, because I believe that our Government when they go to Washington to negotiate should go there with the knowledge that the farmers, the artizans, the fishermen and the labourers want to get their goods as cheaply as possible; they should go to teach the people across the border who have such incorrect ideas of political economy that we have truer ideas in Canada. I also support this resolution because it strengthens the hands of the Government to make a treaty, and I want to strengthen their hands.

An hon. MEMBER. That is as true as the rest of it.

Mr. FRASER. Hon. gentlemen may laugh; but it is because I want to assist the Government, it is because I want them to go there strengthened, it is because I want to help the labouring people of this country, that I support this resolution. think it ought to pass first of all to relieve the persons mentioned in it. I think it ought to pass in the interest of Canada. I think it ought to pass in the interest of Great Britain, to show the United States that this colony, instead of following in their footsteps, is following in the footsteps of the mother country. You may say that there is no feeling in this country in favour of reciprocity. Why, Sir, I tell you that the woman with a mop trying to drive back the Atlantic waves, is no more ridiculous than hon, gentlemen opposite who say that they are going to drive back the sentiment in favour of reciprocity by proclaiming that there exists a prosperity which does not exist; and neither this country nor any other country can ever be made great by a system conceived in the interest of the rich and against the poor, a system for pilfering the poor for the benefit of the rich, and making this country a laughing stock in the eyes of England and the world. We never can and never will. And it is in order to strengthen the hands of the Government when they go to going to vote for the resolution of the hon, member for South Oxford.

INVERNESS RAILWAY AND MINING COMPANY.

Mr. WILMOT moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 136) to incorporate the Inverness Railway and Mining Company.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few observations in reference to this Bill. During the last session of this Parliament, a Bill was introduced for the purpose of incorporating a railway company in the County of Inverness, which I vigorously opposed, on the ground that it was only multiplying railway charters on ground already occupied by three railway companies. That Bill embodied incorporators whose names were Messrs. Paint, Hyndman and Small. Considerable discussion occurred in the Railway Committee on that Bill, and it was rejected, as I assumed, on the ground that this Parliament should not interfere in a matter of rival local charters. But this Bill embodies the names of incorporators who have a local charter over the same ground, so that the main objection which applied to the Bill of last year does not apply to this Bill, because its passage will not multiply railway companies over that ground. It simply incorporates the charter for members of another company which has been incorporated by the Local Legislature by a Bill entitled an Act to incorporate the Inverness and Victoria Railway Company. In the Railway Committee the promoters of this Bill consented to have the name changed to that of the local charter, and also to have the same persons incorporated as had been incorporated by the local charter, with other amendments. Therefore, I think that the situation will not be materially affected if this Bill is allowed to pass. I still hold the same objection to the incorporation of several companies over the same ground. I feel now, as I have always felt, that the granting of several charters over the same ground by the Dominion Parliament or the Local Legislature is the best course possible to pursue in order to destroy the prospects of building a railway. I regret that in the east of Nova Scotia as well as in the west, companies have been chartered by the Local Legislature to such an extent as to destroy the prospects of building railways in that province. There were four railway branches built in Nova Scotia since 1877, but in no one of these cases were there two companies chartered over the same ground. If there had been two or three railway companies chartered over either of the grounds on which these lines have been built, I am satisfied that there would not have been built the Cornwallis Valley, the Oxford and Pugwash, the Joggins, or the Stewiacke and Lansdowne Valley They were successful, not because railway lines. a subsidy amounting to $3,200 a mile was voted by this Parliament, and because of the lobster clause 5 of the Act of the Local Legislature of 1886, but it was negotiate a treaty, and in order that our people due to the fact that the Local Government was may receive the benefits of reciprocity, that I am friendly to these lines, and prevented more than one charter being granted over either ground. The Hants Central Railway has not been so fortunate, because arivalry has been created onthat line by rival charters. The Queen's, Annapolis and Shelburne lines have also been unfortunate, because rival charters have been granted over these lines, with, I believe, a member of the Local Government as charter member, so that he can prevent at pleasure the construction of a line in that part of the province. And in Inverness, I am sorry to say, the prospect of building a railway has been blasted for years to come by the fact that three companies have been chartered for the construction of a railway over that very important ground which requires railway facilities for the development of the mineral resources on the north-west coast of In view of that fact, I do now, as I the Island. formerly did, express the hope that the Government will undertake the construction of branch lines to the Intercolonial Railway. This is the policy pursued by all railway corporations in their own interest. It is the policy pursued by the Canadian Pacific Railway and by the Grand Trunk Railway, and I do not see why a policy which is advantageous to these great corporations should not also prove beneficial to the Government, which practically is the corporation that runs the Intercolonial Railway. If the Intercolonial Railway does not pay, it is, in my opinion, simply because the Government have not pursued the same policy which the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway have pursued. I withdraw my opposition to the Bill, simply on the ground that it does not multiply railway charters over a ground which is covered by three local charters, and because it only gives a Dominion charter to one of those companies. I have no hesitation in saying that this Dominion charter is not as advantageous to a company as a local charter. There are various reasons why that is so. One great reason is that, under a Dominion charter, a company must purchase the right of way, whereas, under a local charter, it can negotiate for the purpose of acquiring the right of way from the municipalities, and the municipalities are always willing to give that right. There are also various other reasons why a local charter is more advantageous to a company than a Dominion charter. It seems to me, however, there is no harm in this Bill. will please the promoters, and though I firmly believe no company will ever be organized under the charter we are about to pass, yet, as it is a consolation to the promoters and will not likely hurt anybody else, I withdraw my objection.

Bill considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed, under the title: "An Act to incorporate the Inverness and Victoria Railway and Mining Company."

IN COMMITTEE-THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 135) further to amend the Act respecting the London Life Insurance Company.—(Mr. Moncrieff.)

WAYS AND MEANS-THE TARIFF.

House resumed debate on proposed motion of Mr. Foster and amendment of Sir Richard Cartwright.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness).

Mr. SKINNER. I must apologize, Sir, for venturing to address the House at this late stage of the debate. I shall endeavour to restrict myself as closely as possible to the resolution under discussion, but we have drifted in this discussion so far from the subjects covered by it, that it will be a difficult matter to keep strictly within the limits and avoid following the example set by hon, gentlemen opposite. The resolution as introduced to the House had a twofold aspect. One was that duties should be taken off all goods used by artizans, farmers, fishermen and miners. I presume those four classes of people were introduced into the resolution with the view that the discussion might possibly affect them for election purposes rather than with any sincere desire to legislate for their benefit any more that of any other class in the I think it is unfortunate at any than for country. time, and especially in a discussion of this kind, that we should introduce any class distinctions in a country where all classes are equal before the law, and that we shall say that there shall be one style of legislation for one class and another style for another class. According to my knowledge, and I think it is the knowledge of other hon, gentlemen, the farmers, miners, fishermen and artizans are as well looked after as any other class in the community, and, when we are asked to take off the duties on these goods these persons use, what is the answer to be given when I ask if these people do not now get a large majority of their goods entirely free of duty? would be the answer when I ask, do this class of people not get their goods as cheap in this country as in any other country of which we have any particular knowledge? Are not those goods cheaper to them here than they are in the United States?

Some hon, MEMBERS. No.

Mr. SKINNER. Some hon, gentlemen say "no." If any hon, gentleman says "no," I do not think he can maintain the negative. If we had the same tariff as the United States, I think a louder complaint could be made in reference to the prices of those goods than that which was made by the gentleman who last addressed the House. Take the article of flour. Will any man say, except for the purposes of argument and in places where he cannot be contradicted, that flour is any higher in price in Canada on account of the duties than it would be if there were no duty upon it? All that the duty on flour does in this country is to keep our own market for our own people. If you look at the price of flour in the United States, you will see that the price here is no higher than it is there, and, if we had free trade with that country to-morrow, the price of flour would remain the same. Take meats, take everything that this country produces, and you will find that the farmer and the artizan have everything of that kind as cheaply as they would under a complete system of free trade. Take tea and coffee, which are used by these persons, and you will find that they are cheaper than they would be able to get them in the United States. Take sugar. Can it be said that free trade would make sugar cheaper than it is now?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. SKINNER. It would be the case if we had free trade, each country having its own tariff, but, if we had free trade such as is now spoken of, the price must be the same in both countries.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SKINNER. The argument might proceed in regard to all the classes of persons who are referred to in this resolution, and it could be shown that they would not get their goods any cheaper than they do now if this system were carried out. The second proposition is, that in the negotiations which may take place with the United States in October, the Government should press for free trade, or, in other words, unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union. Having disposed of the first part of the resolution, I shall refer more particularly to the arguments of the hon, gentleman who last addressed the House (Mr. Fraser), and shall intertwine what I have to say generally on these propositions with what I have to say in reply to motive, by saying that he would not be in favour of a protective policy if he were not a sugar refiner. I think hon, gentlemen opposite are too fond, while they are praising the farmer and some other portions of the community and think they can get votes from them by pursuing that kind of policy, of throwing out innuendoes and maligning the great manufacturing industries of the country. Every manufacturer is called a monopolist because they know the word "monopolist "has a bad sound in the country. the manufacturers in Canada are entitled to be called monopolists, what are the manufacturers in the United States entitled to be called, and, if we had reciprocity with the United States, would not the same argument of those hon, gentlemen be thundered forth against the manufacturers in the United States with greater force than it is now against the manufacturers in Canada! But it is untrue—speaking in a parliamentary sense—that the manufacturers are monopolists. There is no country in the world where the manufacturing interest is being carried on with less monopoly than it is in Canada, no matter whether those countries are free trade countries or protectionist countries. The term "monopoly" will extend to England as well as to the United States or to Canada. Monopoly is as old as the history of commerce, and the most extensive trade monopolies have existed in the past in England and other European countries. When hon, gentlemen use the term "monopolists" as a term of abuse, they are maligning those to whom they refer when they imagine they are stating a proposition which has an element of truth. If the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) is a sugar refiner, is that a disgrace? Should not Canada be proud to be able to refine its own sugar? Was it able to do that from 1873 to 1878, when the refining interest ceased in this country? Hon. gentlemen may say that it should cease, and I understand that is their ground, but, world, and during the five years I have referred to, the sugar refiners were not able to maintain themselves against the rest of the world. The pro-statesmen thought she was going to lead the trade tective policy has given Canada the refining of its of the world. They thought that other nations own sugar. In doing that, industries are built up, would see that the policy of free trade was so and I hope money is made. But I think it will be beneficial to her that they would follow in found that the sugar refiners of the country have not made more money than any other class of men engaged in business with a similar amount of capital and a similar amount of risk. Therefore, instead of being a term of disgrace, it is a term of honour that was flung across the House at the hon. member for Halifax, along with the insinuation that he only spoke as he did because he was a sugar refiner. I say it is well that the manufacturing interests should be represented in this House. say the manufacturing interests of Canada are a glory to the country: they tell the story of its progress, its development and its independence in the commercial arena. I say that all that has been done has not increased the cost of those productions, substantially, to the country. Take the great cotton interest of Canada. Will hon, gentlemen opposite say that the cotton goods of this country cost any more now than they would cost under a free trade policy? Everything in the world the tariff has done for Canada, so far as that interest is concerned, is to him. He started out by imputing to my hon, give our own people the manufacturing of our own friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny) an interested cotton, and instead of importing the manufactured material, we now import the raw material and then make into fabrics to be used by the people of the country. So one may go on with reference to that part of the hon, gentleman's speech in which he had flings at the manufacturers, but I will not enlarge upon that to any greater extent just now. No man, he said, is a protectionist unless from selfinterest. Well, Sir, self-interest is a good thing in a sense. The man who does the best for himself is doing the best for the country in which he lives, because the country is composed of an aggregate of units, and if the units are making themselves prosperous, although from a motive of self-interest, the country is growing prosperous at the same time. But it is a mistake to put it in the sense in which the hon. gentleman did, because there are thousands and thousands of our people who are in favour of protection because they think it would build up the country generally, and if it were left only to the few that are directly interested, such as the manufacturers themselves, do you believe for a single moment that such a policy could be sustained in this country for the length of time it has? The hon, gentleman anticipated a thought of that kind when he said: But those outside the manufacturing industries who sustain protection do so because they want to sustain their party, and, therefore, they vote against their consciences and against their ideas in reference to those propositions. We who know the opinions of the people of this country, and have heard the voice of the electors from time to time, know that that is not the case. The people of this country who sustain protection do so from a motive of patriotism, from an idea of wishing the country well and advancing its interest, and for no other view or motive in the world. Then the hon. gentleman laughed at the idea of England ever going back to protection. Perhaps it never will; he does not know. England has changed her policy many unless the sugar is refined here, competition and many a time, and will probably change it cannot be maintained against the rest of the many and many a time again. But a few words world, and during the five years I have referred upon the history of English free trade. When England embraced free trade as a policy, her her track and become free trade countries as because they think it is best for their own interest, well. But what is the result? The United States, and for no other reason in the world. Well, then, one of the greatest of modern nations, has become if that be the case, and the United States Governthe greatest protectionist country that the world ment thinks that Canada requires free trade with has yet seen. Germany is a protectionist country, them in order to be prosperous, they will not give France is largely a protectionist country, Austria it to us: as I said, they will always follow their is a protectionist country, and so on. In very own interest. But I believe, as time goes on, the many of the nations we find that the protection. United States will see that it is to their interest to idea is increasing in force, in intensity and in have freer trade relations with Canada, and I bebreadth, all the time, and it may very well be that lieve we will get them. But I do not think we in England after a while, if she finds herself shut will accomplish the purpose we have in view by out of the markets of the world, may turn her continually making our policy turn upon what the attention to this proposition, and ask herself what | United States are willing or are not willing to do she had better do with reference to her trade, for us. For one, whilst I would like to have freer England is free trade now, but a large number of trade relations with the United States, I believe the people are taking up the idea that England that Canada can live and flourish and become a should at least have a protectionist policy so far as great country, and have an enormous trade, even the outlying portions of the British Empire are under the policy of an absolutely prohibitory concerned. Hon, gentlemen opposite will sing tariff between Canada and the United States, out: Oh, that is the Imperial federation fad, or I believe our policy should be that of to-day, yet something of that kind. I am not rising here tonight to make any remarks about Imperial federation, but I will say that I believe a policy will grow up in these British countries of drawing more closely together, rather than of drawing apart. Whether you make it Imperial federation or give it another name, makes no matter; that will be the tendency in the years to come-mark what I say upon that point. On the question of whether England is becoming protectionist, we are not going to be guided by her policy, but we are going to do that which will be best for our own interests. But I do think, and I believe I speak the sentiments of a majority of the people of this country, when I say that if we would pay a little more attention to cultivating trade between us and the mother country, and talk less of trade between us and the United States, we would go ahead much faster than we do now. Mind you, I am in favour of freer trade relations with the United States, but I believe the way to get freer trade relations with the United States is to talk less about it. The United States will never give away one inch in our behalf for any love they have for us. The United States Government is the most selfish government in the world to-day: the personal element enters less into the United States Government than in any other Government on earth. I do not say that in any disparagement of the people of the United States, but because I believe that the form of government existing in the United States is a vast corporation, and a corporation, as it is said, has no soul; therefore the United States Government does not move by favour, or any sentiment of that kind, in its relations with foreign nations, but it moves along a line of abstract selfishness, doing the best it can for that people, utterly regardless of what the result may be to other countries, no matter how they are situated or what their circumstances may be. We know that it is the policy of the United States never to interfere in reference If the nation to which to other countries. we belong had adopted and carried out such a policy in the centuries that have passed, all civilization would have been swept from the world. It is because of what Great Britain has done outside of those three kingdoms that progress has in carrying the political car round the country. visited all the nations of the earth. I say it is necessary to understand that feature of the United cause they are placed in an entirely false position, States Government, and then we shall understand and the whole story is not told. The commerce of that whatever is got from that country is given St. John is greater to-day than it ever was. Mr. SKINNER.

at the same time we should be ever ready to go on and meet the people of the United States as things develop, and increase our trade with them and do the best we can, and not make it appear all the time as if we were dependent upon them for our very existence. The hon, gentleman who last spoke referred to the decline in shipping. Surely he does not think that decline arose from any legislation of any nature or kind in Canada : Shipbuilding declined in this country, as we all know, because of the development of iron shipbuilding. And in this connection let me make reference to the place from which I come. Two hon, gentlemen who recently addressed the House, the hon. member for Queen's, N.B. (Mr. King), and the hon, member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), spoke with respect to the decay of trade in New Brunswick, and, of course, incidentally, to the decline of shipping. The port of St. John before the decline of shipping was one of the largest ship owning ports in Canada, and, in addition to that, it was one of the principal ports for building and exporting ships, it exporting a great number of ships yearly. All that shipbuilding passed without reference to our legislation. awav. In addition, St. John, as is well known, suffered greatly from the disastrous fire that occurred 12 or 13 years ago, and the line of trade altered to a great extent in certain other things. The development of the railway system for a certain time dispersed a portion of the trade that centred in St. John, and other conditions had to arise by which other trade should take its place. Therefore, if any hon, gentleman would honestly discuss the trade of St. John, he should not only look at the dry figures, which can be made to lie more than any man can lie if placed in certain positions, and if used for that diabolical purpose, but he should look at the environment and all the surrounding circumstances before he comes to a conclusion. The array of figures used by the hon, member for Yarmouth are of the class of figures that have been running through one of the Opposition papers of St. John for two or three years. The people down there almost know these figures by their ear-marks, and they have been trotted out to do duty as backs They know that these figures are entirely false, be-

Under that did not affect Great Britain at all; it was only with now claiming to sit. The arguments which the hon. reference to the raw materials of these two countries. But what did the movement promoted by the Liberal party last winter show? It showed on the part of the party led by the hon, gentlemen opposite, a national movement in favour of carrying this country into a general proposition, of not only unrestricted reciprocity, but in favour of raising up a barrier tariff wall, and discriminating against the mother country. It was a noticeit will be an historical notice—it was a great public notice from this country to Great Britain, that we were taking the first step in Canada to recede from our connection with the mother country. I am not saying now whether that would be right or wrong: I merely ask what would be the result of the policy announced by the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)? I could understand that there was some reason in it, if the resolution that we are discussing to-night was in favour of free trade generally. The hon, member who last spoke (Mr. Fraser) simply spoke as a disciple of Henry George. He gave out, so to speak, that he had imbibed and absorbed and assimilated the principles laid down by that writer, and these are the principles of absolute and utter It may be that these principles are free trade. better than the principles of protection, but I am not discussing that now. We might go on for weeks and weeks, either in the theoretical sense which he did, or in the practical sense in which business men would, discussing this question of protection and free trade. It cannot be that all the people that are in favour of protection, are what the hon, gentleman intimated they were, namely, cranks, and such things as that. I think when he comes to reflect that so many nations have adopted the principles of protection, he will see that his little pop-gun, shooting terms of that character against the statesmen of the influential nations which have decided on the policy of protection, will have very little effect upon the policy pursued by the empires to which he referred. Protection and free trade have been discussed, and will be discussed, and those who argue on either side need be neither fools nor cranks. There will be good and able men discussing both sides of that question, probably, for many years to come. I could understand if the hon, member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), being a disciple of Mr. George, had advocated free trade; but he did not. The hon, gentleman who moved this resolution and the resolution itself, is not in favour of a general free trade. If hon, gentlemen opposite want to attack the National Policy, why do they not come out and attack it squarely, and say: We will have free trade instead of the National Policy. they did that, we could get in these goods from the United States which they speak about; then our fishermen and the other classes of the community which they speak of, would have all these goods coming into them free; but that is not the policy were at any time under the Reciprocity Treaty of trade with the United States; and there they leave it. Now, then, Mr. Speaker, suppose we could get free trade with the United States as they advocate, some other party in Canada, had done a similar and still have this enormously protective barrier thing when they agreed to the Reciprocity Treaty against the United Kingdom, how powerful would of 1854; but there is a fallacy contained in that which I am attempting to reply to, with reference treaty, we were only providing for a few things that to the protection under the shadows of which he is gentleman made this afternoon, have been made in Boston and New York a thousand times, and yet, notwithstanding, the United States is the greatest protective country in the world; and, if we were to have this tariff wall thrown around us, we would simply pass under the arms—or, as he would have it, under the curses—of protection to a greater extent than we are now. Therefore, so far as this position is concerned, I think the hon. gentleman has neither logic nor evidence to support his arguments. I think he has made his speech with the idea that these fallacies will reach a certain class of men who will be influenced by them, and that he imagines his statements will have the effect of misleading the country. However, that was the policy of the Liberal party in the contest. The contention of the Conservative party was this: We are in favour of freer trade relations, but in that connection we have two ideas before us and before the country. One is, to preserve, as far as may be, the National Policy, as it is called, and, at the same time, preserving the independence of Canada in a commercial sense, so that Canada should not lose the control of her own tariff, that she should not cease to be empowered to pass whatever laws she might please, in reference to revenue and matters of that kind. The result of that is, that, if the United States are willing to-day to meet us, and in the first place take up the question of an interchange of raw material, we will meet them. But, say the hon. gentlemen opposite, the United States will never do that. That is not our fault. Are we to be blamed for what the United States may do? But then, the hon. gentlemen opposite say: You can have something more. Well, we are willing to do that, and the question comes up: How much ought we to give them more than they give us, in order to get that. Now, we have our fisheries in the Maritime Provinces, and our fisheries on the inland waters as well, but I speak especially of the sea fisheries, and we are willing, and have been willing, and have said to the United States: Make a reciprocity treaty such as I am now referring to, and we will allow you to come in and fish with our fishermen within our own fishing limits, as freely as our people do. Would not that be a great thing to throw in, when we are making a treaty of this kind? The hon. gentleman opposite who last spoke said we wanted protection for the fishermen. I know, from having conversed with the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces, that they are of opinion that they are better off now, with the fishermen of the United States kept out of their fisheries, than they would be under reciprocity, if the United States fishermen came in to fish with them. There never was a time in the history of Canada when our fish were as valuable in the markets of the world as they are to-day. At the present time our codfish are worth about a dollar a quintal more than they which they adopt. They say: We want to have free 1854. All the more valuable fish of the Maritime Provinces, such as the salmon and the mackerel, the United States have to take; and the United States consumers have to pay the duty on them. Therefore, there never was a time in the history of Canada when those very fisheries were more valuable to our fishermen than they are to-day. If there were any argument on that point, it would be with reference to the prices our fishermen have to pay for what they consume; but we know that the material which goes into the nets of the fishermen and other things which they use comes in entirely free. So that any hon, gentleman who gets up and propounds this argument about the fishermen of the country, is not doing it on a solid basis of fact. Then, this Government has expressed its willingness to enter into negotiations with the United States for the purpose of arranging a reciprocity treaty. That, surely, ought to be enough. But hon, gentlemen opposite say that that will not do it. If not, it is because the great party of hon, gentlemen opposite have said to the United States: Do not do it, and if you do When treaties are not, we will give you more. discussed between the nations of the earth, they are discussed in private; but hon, gentlemen opposite, as we say in law, are giving our whole case away by telling the United States that they ought to demand everything, and that if they do they will finally get everything. I say that is a bad policy. The Conservative party and those who have the best interests of Canada in view, will never consent to that, but will, I believe, say to the United States: We will negotiate with you a reciprocity treaty if you will do it on terms that will be just to our people, and along the lines which we have indicated; but we will never surrender the interests of our country to any foreign power. Then the exodus was referred to by the hon, gen-This exodus has played almost as great a part in the history of Canada as the ancient exodus played in the history of the Jews. We cannot have a Budget debate without hearing this question brought up. Why, there is nothing in this exodus to cause any fear to Canadians at all. We belong to a race of exotics. Our forefathers came across the sea and landed in this country. We have the spirit of enterprise, the spirit of pressing forward, the spirit of independence, the spirit of subduing the world. If the exodus feeling had never existed in Great Britain, this continent would never have been settled. If the exodus feeling had never existed in France, those valiant men who came up the valley of the St. Lawrence would never have done the great work they did for civilization. exodus spirit belongs to humanity and the progress of the world, and therefore we have no fear of this exodus. I saw statistics some time ago showing that during the last twenty-five years over 1,600,000 people had gone out of the State of New York away to the far West-had exuded, so to speak, out of that great State. If the pessimistic argument had been applied in that case, the State of New York ought to be a most unprosperous country. matter whether you have tariff walls or a reciprocity treaty, you never can eliminate from the great people to which we belong that spirit of eternally pressing forward along the lines of the nations with which we are connected. But one thing we have done in connection with this great and magnificent union that we have established in Canada: we have the Canadian Pacific Railway, provided a western country to which our people can go, and have gone, and to which they will continue to go during the years to come, building up and developing this Therefore, when this question of the exodus is brought up, it is only as it were a scarecrow in a cornfield with which the crows have become acquainted, and it ceases to scare any I have some sympathy for the hon, gentleman who last spoke, for that terrible intelligence which he received on that steamer going from Yarmouth to Boston, that 300 persons more had gone-within a certain time to the United States-I suppose he meant more than had gone last year in the same length of time. He did not say how many returned. He could not see any returning; his glasses were so green, or his political eyesight so much blurred over, that if he saw any coming back, he would think they were only going backward and did not intend to come to Canada at all. Why, I saw it stated in a newspaper that something like 1,000 persons had returned to Yarmouth in those steamers in a short time. In the Maritime Provinces there is a continual flux or reflux of population during the year. It has so grown up that during the summer time quite a large number of our people go to the United States and man the fishing fleets and work there, and return to their homes again in the autumn. it is for the good of the country or not I need not stop here to argue. But I can say this of the Maritime Provinces, taking the Island of Prince Edward, for instance, that notwithstanding the people who have gone from there to the United States, you will not find a country of equal size where there are more men of means, a greater proportion of happy homes or of successful people, than you will find there. It may be that because the country is small the people have an inclination to move. Then, in connection with this exodus, another thing must be taken into consideration. There is a great rising up among all the people of these countries. There is more education given to the masses now than was given to the few a century ago, and what is the effect of that education upon the young people of the farm? When they have become educated, they have caught as it were a glimpse of the world; a knowledge of history, geography and mathematics have been poured into them; a picture of the whole world, as it were, has been revealed to them; and their first impulse is to go abroad and see the world; and after a while when they have seen it, and found they are a portion of the whole rather than of a part, they will come back again and rehabilitate what they have left, and we will not lose our people at all. That has not been con-sidered in connection with the exodus at all; and instead of it being regarded as an argument against the country, when it is considered in the historical and philosophical sense, it only shows the great prosperity of our country; it shows that we are able to throw off so many people as we do, and yet retain our position and prestige, and carry forward the great work we have undertaken, which ought to fill the souls of hon. gentlemen opposite with joy rather than to darken their dreams with grief. With reference to the exodus we need have no I have attempted to answer the arguments. of the hon. gentleman, and I do not propose to address the House further. Whether we are to first by purchase, and then by the construction of have free trade or protection will remain for the people of Canada to decide. I heard an hon, gentleman say last night that the Opposition expected to come into power on what he called scandals. hope, if they should come into power, they will do so on some policy. It will be better for them and for the country that they should come into power on some well-defined policy, so that the country may know where they are. And that, I believe, is also the opinion of the electors. I do not believe that the electorate of this great country who are in favour of sustaining the dignity and the integrity of this country along the lines I have indicated, will, because a few scandals have arisen, drive the ship question too thoroughly to be so led away. reason why the people in the constituency I have the honour to represent changed their votes to such an enormous majority against unrestricted reciprocity was this: The history of the coast cities of North America was there spread before them. They saw how the city of New York had eaten up such a large proportion of the foreign trade of Boston; they saw how the cities of New York and Boston together had absorbed nearly the entire foreign trade of the city of Portland. That city, which used to have a large import business, last year imported very much less than $1,000,000 worth; and the people of St. John reason in this way. They said: If New York, under commercial union, has absorbed the foreign trade of Portland, what is going to become of the foreign trade of St. John; and like sensible men they voted against the policy which would ruin our cities. If the hon, gentleman who spoke last were here, he might say that, in so voting, he acted from a selfish standpoint, but I hold he acted from a patriotic standpoint. Men who had been opposed to the Conservative party all their lives, came by the hundreds and went to the ballot box, saying: We will support no such policy as that; we want to keep the trade of our country. What has Canada done? Canada has put $100,-000,000 into her railroads and built up her commerce on the idea that it should flow through these great lines of railway; but hon. gentlemen opposite wish to come in with a policy which will put a stop to our internal commerce and ruin our railways. To that policy we are opposed. We have stood by the Union, we have made many sacrifices to build up the Union, and we are going to continue standing We are going to do nothing that will preent the trade of the West flowing down to the East and our trade going up to the West. To-day in the Maritime Provinces we substantially use no flour save Canadian flour, and are proud of it; and before the Union largely all the flour we used came from the United States. We are becoming Canadians, we are becoming cemented together more strongly every day; and our nationality has gained a strength in this short time we could hardly have anticipated twenty-five years ago when forming Confederation. Down by the sea, we look with hope to our trade with the western provinces. know the history of the cheese development of Ontario, and that industry may be taken as an indication of the development we may expect with reference to our other productions. Will any gentleman opposite say that the United States will be the natural or any other kind of market for our cheese, but the markets on the other side are ever open for those products. That is the view we take; it was on that ground we were elected; and we will stand by the Union and protection so long as our present development continues, and we will be prepared to enter into free trade relations with the United States as soon as the United States are willing to make a satisfactory treaty with us, always keeping in view the integrity of Canada and our connection with the great Empire to which we belong.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, although this debate has now lasted for several of Canada away from its true course along the sittings, and there probably remains no one to be waves of history. The people understand the whole converted in this House, you will allow me to say One a few words in the name of the County of Napierville, which, of the whole Dominion, is the only county where the opinion in favour of unrestricted reciprocity is so strong and universal that the two campaigns which lately took place in the county were both between supporters of that policy. There is not, that I know, one single protectionist in the whole County of Napierville. I am, therefore, sure that if my words do not meet the approval of the Conservative party in this House they will meet the views of the Conservative party in the County of Napierville. I believe that such a circumstance is so rare for a member that I must not lose the opportunity of giving this satisfaction to the Conservatives of the county which I have the honour to represent. Before dealing directly with this question of reciprocity I wish, Mr. Speaker, to give a moment of attention to an argument used by the hon, member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) in answer to my hon. friend, the member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin). The hon. member for Ottawa complained last night that the present Administration was a little too noted by its scandals. The hon. member for Hochelaga thought he gave him a satisfactory answer in saying that we, the Liberals of the Province of Quebec, had no right to complain of scandals here, when in the Province of Quebec there was against us what we termed the Pacaud-Whelan scandal. The position of the hon. member is doubly false, Mr. Speaker. We do not sit here for the Province of Quebec, but for the whole Dominion, and we must merge our nationality with that of the other provinces, as we must confound the name of our province with those of the other We sit here with a spirit of justice, provinces. and it is as such that we enquire into all the scan-dals of the present Administration. It is with this spirit of justice, and not as members from Quebec, that we criticize your scandals when we have found them out. Well, Mr. Speaker, where would such reasoning lead the hon. member for Hochelaga? The Conservative party was not driven away from power for its good deeds. It was turned out of office for its scandals, I believe. We remember their scandals, from that of the North Shore Railway to that of their man Gale. Now, when we are in power, how will the hon. member for Hochelaga be able to criticize the Liberal Administration, for I hope we are soon to have a Liberal Administration in the country? How, do I say, will he be able to criticize the Liberal Administration, should any abuses then reveal themselves; he, a Conservative, and coming from Quebec, where so many Conservative scandals have taken place? The falsity of the argument is so evident that I need or butter, or other products of this country? No; not answer it any further, and I hasten to come back to the question of unrestricted reciprocity. I was much surprised, Mr. Speaker, to hear in this House Government orators attacking with so much violence the scheme of unrestricted reciprocity, when barely six months ago, in the County of Napierville, where I had the honour of being the Liberal candidate, the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Chapleau), one of the most important members of the Cabinet, followed by the hon. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Bergeron), and by four or five members of this House, as well as by a crowd of picked canvassers, came into the county to fight the battle of a free trader, who did not content himself to say on the hustings, in the very presence of the hon. Secretary of State, that he was in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, but declared himself even one of the warmest partisans of free trade. There naturally remained one answer to the Secretary of State to explain his course: it was to say to this House, and to his friends, that he had gone and carried on that campaign in favour of a personal friend; that as the fight was between two candidates who did not share his opinions, he could take part in this election as a personal friend of Mr. Paradis. But now, after his speech of Monday last, the hon. Secretary of State can no longer make this answer. For, in answer to my little bit of a speech, as the hon. Secretary of State was good enough to call it, on Monday last, he gave us the little bit of an answer which I am going to read. Here is what he said:

"He did not miss the opportunity of saying that the Government, which had been represented in this campaign by many of its friends and by one of its members, had answered requests which had been made in the county for a public work."

Then the hon. Secretary of State was representing the Government in this election campaign; then it is the Government which came into the County of Napierville to advocate the election of my opponent, Mr. Paradis, who was publicly declaring in favour of unrestricted reciprocity and even free trade. Have I not a right of concluding, Mr. Speaker, that unrestricted reciprocity cannot be as repugnant to the hon, members of the right as they wish it to be believed; that it cannot be such a detestable and disloyal scheme, when barely six months ago such a scheme was openly supported, as I have said, in the County of Napierville. Besides, Mr. Speaker, what are the real reasons given on the other side of the House against unrestricted reciprocity and in favour of protection? Your present programme, we are told, is in contradiction to your programme of the past. The American farmers are in a deplorable state, and why should we be initiated to this deplorable state of things by unrestricted reciprocity? Lastly, how are we to make up for Customs duties, which are to give way to unrestricted reciprocity, without recourse to direct taxation? Mr. Speaker, the first of these points was made by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), who, in order to show that our present programme is in conflict with our past, read speeches of Liberal chiefs for the last fifteen years. I understand that on a husting the hon, member for Haldimand might have of-fered such an argument, which takes with electors of any county. But when he addressed the House of Commons he might have done us the honour of thinking that we reason a little more seriously. The question of unrestricted reciprocity and the question of protection are commercial questions, available in election times, you give the preference which affect in no way the immutable principles on which the Liberal party rests. It is a question the pro and con of which change with the different phases and the different circumstances through which a country passes. I may well have been in favour of protection ten years ago, and yet consistently be in favour of unrestricted reciprocity to-Human perfectibility is only possible on the condition of there being men intelligent enough to profit by the lessons of the past and to modify their opinions in accordance with the results of experience. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the hon, member for Haldimand, who has dwelt the most on this point, what he thinks of Sir Robert Peel, who, after having been the pillar of protection in England, became later on the champion of Surely, the hon, member will not unfree trade. dertake to pull down the statues which free trade has erected to this great man of England. he tells me that this example is not sufficient to prove that he is wrong, I will recall to his mind the contradictions of his friends in this House. Has the hon. Minister of Finance not been one of the strong advocates of the prohibition of intoxicating liquors, and is he not against prohibition today? And yet it seems to be that in these questions of morals the matter of principle is somewhat more important than in a commercial question, and I believe that it does not behoove one to change one's mind so soon when one wants to retain a little personal dignity. This example is surely as notable as the would-be inconsistencies mentioned by the hon, member for Haldimand, and I hope he will take note of this inconsistency of the hon. Minister of Finance along with the others. The second argument brought against unrestricted reciprocity is the deplorable condition of the American farmer. I remember that when the hon, member for Haldimand dealt with this question the hon. leader of the Opposition smiled. The hon, member for Haldimand, anxious to find evil even in the smile of a Liberal, immediately asked for an explanation from the leader of the Opposition. The hon, gentleman answered him that he smiled because, while the speaker was depicting the deplorable condition of the American farmer, the Conservative party was trying to initiate us to that condition in wanting to give us agricultural reciprocity. The hon, member must have realized that it was an imprudent thing to question the smile of an intelligent man; for if he weighed the answer of the hon. leader of the Opposition he must have seen that it destroyed his laborious display in this respect. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, either the American farmers are prosperous or they are not. If they are not in a prosperous position, then why wish to assimilate us to them? Why say that agricultural reciprocity will be a remedy to the present evils from which the country is suffering? If they are in a condition of prosperity, why refuse giving us unrestricted reciprocity? It is because, do you say, we do not want to sacrifice the manufacturers and combinesters interest. then understand that the only difference between you and us is this: You put in one of the basins of your balance the interests of the farming community, and in the other basin the interests of the manufacturers. And for the reason that the load of this second basin, that of the contractors and manufacturers, finds a way to melt into money to this second basin, and not to the one which I believe this is holds the interests of the farmers. the only point on which we differ. We have in view the interest of the agricultural classes, andfor it we are ready to sacrifice even the interests of those influential manufacturers who make your strength We are ready to declare in favour of in elections. the agricultural community rather than in favour of the manufacturing class. You finally say: How will you make up for the lack of revenue which will follow the abolition of the tariff, without direct taxation? I, for one, am not in favour of direct taxation. But, I ask, what is the tax which the farmer does not pay to-day? What is the tax which the consumer does not pay? It is true we can drink tea, and even sweetened tea, without paying duty: but what do we eat, and what can we wear, upon which we do not pay a tax? The very flimsiest of flannels the farmer pays a tax on. He pays taxes even on his daily bread, and the light he uses at The present system of tariff seems, then, to my mind, the heaviest taxation which we could enact; and it would be better to have a direct tax, proportionate to the different classes of society, which every one would pay, according to his riches, rather than the present system. But I believe that we can sufficiently reduce our expenses to meet the wants of the country without direct taxation. is my opinion, and it is that which my neighbour, the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) expessed the other day in this House. But you answer us: The country is very prosperous; why make a change? Every one of the speeches of the hon. gentlemen on the right side of the House gave us a striking picture of the prosperity of the country. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins)—and he is a consummate statistician—tells us that in the Province of Quebec the value of land has not diminished. Well, I do not know if there be one member coming from the Province of Quebec who would say in all sincerity that property has not diminished by at least 25 per cent. Is there one member, somewhat mindful of what is going on in his parish or in his county, who has not been struck by such a fact, that, as with us, there were last year more that 200 public sales at the church doors, while there used to be ten or fifteen per year? Farmers were obliged to sell at paltry figures their farming implements in order to emigrate to a foreign This is a state of things which the hon. member for L'Islet must have witnessed like others. For my part, I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the people of the country is as prosperous as we are told it is by the hon, gentlemen on the other to understand the Ministers who govern it, the manufacturers and the contractors, or the departmental heads, who know how to sow contracts and extras to reap jewels and diamonds. For me, the The people of the country is the agricultural community. while you rejoice over the state of the country, the agricultural class bemoans. This class economizes on the heads of wheat to pay for your wild expenditures. It gave you a warning at the last elèc-tions; it will seal your fate at the next, which I hope will not be slow to come.

this debate, I understand that it would be impossible for me at this stage of it to develop any new proposition. But, being here the representative of a county almost exclusively composed of farmers, it seems to me that I could not be justified, under the circumstances, were I to content myself with giving a silent vote. I believe it to be my duty on the contrary to impress my view on the great and important question of commercial reciprocity, a question which has been so much discussed since the last general elections. If I judge from the speeches which we have heard from the other side of the House, it seems to me that hon. gentlemen opposite have greatly modified their opinions since that time. We then met on the different hustings of the country, the Conservative candidates or their friends; we heard them declare with more or less force in favour of commercial reciprocity. According as the circumstances wanted, according as the audiences they addressed were more or less strongly in favour of commercial reciprocity, these gentlemen would more or less strongly advocate this measure. Some were even met with who went as far as championing unrestricted reciprocity. That is to say, that in a great number of counties, the programme of the Conservative candidates was so like that of the Liberal candidates, that a great number of electors, taking them to be sincere friends of reciprocity, allowed themselves to be deceived, and gave their votes for "the old chief and the old party." Evidently these candidates had been authorized to say nothing of "the old flag," for it was not the old flag they were upholding then. at that time, Mr. Speaker, the same language had been used before the electors as is used since the beginning of this debate; if the friends and representatives of the Conservative party had argued that the condition of the United States farmers is inferior to that of our own; if, in short, all possible arguments against commercial reciprocity had then been arrayed by the Conservative party before the constituencies, I believe that it is not the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald that would have been returned, it is not the Government of Hon. Mr. Abbott that would to-day be at the head of affairs, but, on the contrary, we would to-day see the honourable and distinguished leader of the Opposition preside over the destinies of the country. However, Mr. Speaker, with an inconsistency not at all surprising with the hon. gentlemen opposite, after having depicted in such sombre colours the situation of the American farmers; after having represented by all means at their disposal that there is no advantage for us side, unless by the people of the country we be in a treaty of reciprocity with the United States, they turn and tell us: In the month of October next we shall be ready, and we will send delegates who will endeavour to establish commercial relations with the United States. This contradictory attitude on the part of our hon. friends of the right does not surprise us, for enough of them have committed themselves on the question of commercial reciprocity during the last election, that the Government should now think proper to make at least a show of wanting to conclude a treaty with the United States. They will send delegates to the United States in October next, but I fear their trip will not be much longer than that of the delehumanly possible to do, but how can we help it, the United States do not want to make a treaty of reciprocity with Canada? And they think the trick will be played. Well, I can tell these gen-Canadian people has been so often deceived that he has his eyes on you, he watches all your movements and you shall pay with your heads if you do not fulfil the promises which you made at the last elections; that is, if you do not obtain this treaty which was, according to you, to bring prosperity to the farmers. A certain number of members of the right spoke with much force on the prosperous situation of our country. They made a brilliant picture of it; they represented it under such attractive colours, that under the charm of their words we would for a moment have been tempted to believe that we were the most happy and the most prosperous people in the world, had we not unfortunately every day under our eyes the most evident proof to the contrary. If I thought that the hon, gentlemen who spoke so were sincere, I would ask them to come down from the heights they have climbed, and to visit the rural districts, to question the farmers; to ask them if they are better off to-day than they were ten years ago; if property has really more value than it had ten years ago; and they would be answered that the position is worse than ever; that real estate has decreased 30 or 40 per cent. If you are not satisfied with this answer, enter, on your way, the country store. Ask the merchant if the terms of credit are shorter, if he is better paid by his debtors. He will answer you that never were the terms of credit longer nor collections harder. If yet you have not evidence enough, go to the registrar's office, and when you have found how heavy are the mortgages which burden our farmers, I believe that you will agree with us in saying that the situation is not as brilliant as you have been pleased to represent it. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that one need go this length to find that we are really not in a very prosperous condition. We have only to refer to recent emigration reports, and if you admit, as you contended in 1878, that emigration is the thermometer by which the prosperity of nations can be gauged, I believe that you will acknowledge that there exists in the country a great uneasiness, that there exists a great fever which threatens to become an epidemic. It is useless then, Mr. Speaker, to delude ourselves, when, on all sides of us, hundreds and thousands of voices lament to us every day that their position is worse than ever, when real estate has lost about a third of its value, and when emigration has taken such alarming propor-Then it must be acknowledged that something is going wrong somewhere. It must be admitted that the evils which were complained of in 1878, far from having been remedied, far from would have to pay a duty, half the value of each having been removed, are, on the contrary, worse than ever. It must be admitted that the great remedy, that the policy which was to be the in-fallible panacea that was to cure all evils, did not produce the results that were expected from it. on the other side of the House understood it produce the results that were expected from it. when a wise and prudent physician has used a although we had a right to doubt their sincerity remedy and finds that the same has not produced they thought proper to adopt a flesh and fish policy unsuccessful remedy a better one. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that under the circumstances we should urge "pon the Government to do the same. We have the proof that the great remedy of protection which we have been treated with for the last twelve years or so has not produced the results which were expected from it. With protection, according to the hon. gentlemen of the right in 1878, all was to flourish in the country. Hundreds of manufactories were to rise in all parts of the country. There was to be work for all the hands. The farmer was to have a market at his door. In short we were to be a happy and prosperous nation. Unfortunately this result was not attained. I will, therefore, urge upon the Government to change its remedy. But what remedy is there to apply to the situation? This remedy, Mr. Speaker, we shall find it in the policy of the hon, leader of the Opposition and his friends. We shall find it in commercial reciprocity with our neighbours. The speakers who preceded me and who spoke in favour of reciprocity, have shown us the immense advantages which would result therefrom to the Canadian people. They have shown us with official documents in hand that the United States were our natural market; that, notwithstanding the taxes which we are obliged to pay at the American frontier on our goods, we still export into that country about 50 per cent. of our total exports. They have shown us that with unrestricted reciprocity, while on one hand the Canadian buyer could realize a great saving on his imports, the Canadian farmer on the other hand would get more remunerative prices for his produce. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that these two propositions are evident. It seems to me that if we abolish the taxes which we have to pay at the boundary line, on the American goods, these goods will cost us less. I believe that the hon, members on the other side of the House have had quite recently an example of this. When the hon. Minister of Finance abolished the tax on sugar we immediately saw the price of sugar drop 2 cents a pound all over the country. It would be the same thing I believe on other articles. If the 75 cents duty on flour were removed, the consumer would be that much the gainer. As to the improvement in the prices of the produce which our farmers have for sale, I believe the thing is equally evident. been established from the beginning of this debate, that about two-thirds of the produce from our farms has no other market than that of the United State. Therefore, the moment this market is closed to us. the farmers are forced to keep their produce in their barns, or in their houses, or else to sell it at low figures. Our farmers understand it perfectly They know that under the operation of the McKinley tariff, it is impossible for them to send their horses to the other side of the line, for they horse. They can no longer send their hay there, for it is taxed at the rate of $4 a ton. And What remains then for us to do? Mr. Speaker, so well also, that at the last general elections the effect he expected therefrom, what does he do? in order to capture the vote. I shall not insist He studies his case more carefully, he goes back to any longer on this point, by putting before the the causes of the disease, and substitutes for the House long columns of figures, for this has been done by others more able than I. But I cannot conclude without giving a little attention to certain objections that have been made to our policy of unrestricted reciprocity. With unrestricted reciprocity, the hon. gentlemen opposite say, we shall immediately lose the enormous revenue which we now derive from our Customs offices along the American line. How, they ask, are you going to make up this shrinkage? You have no other means than direct taxation. It is undeniable, Mr. Speaker, that with unrestricted reciprocity we shall lose seven or eight million dollars from that source a year, but I do not believe there is anything in that that should frighten us. The other day, Mr. Speaker, in the debate on the famous question of prohibition the hon. Minister of Finance stated, if I remember well, that, for the greatest good of the people, he would not be afraid of losing the revenue derived from liquors. this revenue is almost equal to that which we derive from American goods. Besides, it seems to me, we could easily practise economy, which would help much towards making up the amount that we would lose. It seems to me that in certain departments-and this appears every day more and more evident — considerable savings could be realized. And if, after having realized all possible savings, we could not cover the deficiency, we could do then what the hon. gentlemen of the right do now, we could tax other articles. They boast to-day of having remitted a tax of three millions and a-half on sugar, but they found, nevertheless, means of taxing whiskey and other articles, Well, if we had a deficiency we would also tax whiskey a little. Another objection which is made, Mr. Speaker, is that if we establish unrestricted reciprocity, we shall ruin our manufactures, and hundreds and thousands of workmen will find themselves in the street, without work and without bread. I think we have a perfect right to differ in opinion from the hon, gentlemen on this question, when the manufacturers themselves differ in opinion with each other. There is a certain class, among the manufacturers, who prefer a restricted market of which they are the masters. They prefer to quietly eat the good things which the Government serves them every year, oblivious of the sufferings which result to the poor. They remind me of the spoilt children for whom their parents can never make enough sacrifices. Their courage and energy never develop; as soon as they will be left to themselves they must necessarily fail. But by the side of this class, there true manufacturers. And, what do they ask? A market. Give us, they say, the great market of the neighbouring republic, and we will treble our establishments. That is what the true manufacturer says. He does not fear competition. On the contrary, he sees it come with pleasure. Besides, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the day we have a great market we will see foreign capital invested in our industries. It recurs to me, if my memory is not at fault, that not long ago great English capitalists invested immense capital in manufactures among our neigh-Why? Because the United States had an bours. immense market to offer. Therefore, if we had the advantage of an immense market we would equally have the advantage of capital. Far from ruining our manufacturers, reciprocity would be the means there is another objection more dreadful still, which was hawked about on all the husting iduring the last campaign. It has also been held up to us from the beginning of this debate. We have heard the hon. gentlemen's doleful tones, in whichand I believe that had we been nearer them we would have seen tears drop from their eyes-in which, I say, they preferred that dreadful accusation of disloyalty which has been brought up against the Liberal party before the country and before the House. This accusation does not surprise us. It is as old as the world. And in the past, when our fathers, the Reformers, were doing all in their power to secure for us the free institutions which we now enjoy, there were, as there are to-day, a certain class of people who had not the courage of imitating them, and who entrenched themselves behind the screen of loyalty. We have loyalty, but it is not of the kind which parades on the hustings and the public squares. It is the loyalty of the heart, and we keep it in our hearts. As to that of our hon. friends opposite, we know what it is worth. It is worth about what drunkard's promises are worth; what the bravery of the soldier is worth, who dreads no enemy in time of peace, but who hastens to the other side of the boundary in time of war. Mr. Speaker, I will not continue the debate any further. I consider that during the last two or three weeks enough has been said on the subject. I am so fully convinced that the policy of unrestricted reciprocity is advantageous to the country in general, and the farmer in particular, that I will vote with pleasure for the amendment of the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright).

Mr. BROWN (Chateauguay). I think it my duty to my constituents as well as myself, that I should not allow the motion of the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to pass, without saying a few words in favour thereof. We have heard from the Minister of Finance as well as from other hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, that the monetary and financial institutions of this country were in a healthy and prosperous condition, and, in a word, everything that you could either ask or expect them to be. When we pause and examine those statements and compare them with statements made by other gentlemen--men holding high positions of trust, men in whom the country have confidence, men capable of judgingwe find that their statements do not agree; as, for instance, at a recent meeting held in Montreal, at which the general manager of the Merchants Bank of Montreal declared that the number of failures in Canada were a disgrace to the country, and quoting from the Trade Review, published by the Montreal Gazette, under date 4th July, 1891—and I am sure that that journal would not print "blue ruin"—in which they state that the number of business failures in the Dominion--including those for Newfoundland-increased 121, or 14 per cent., in six months of 1891 over 1890, while the increase of liabilities was $1,478,282, or 20 per cent. gret to state that those statements are not sopleasing as those uttered by hon. gentlemen opposite. have heard from the hon. gentlemen opposite that the McKinley Bill was not hurtful to and that it did not affect the trade of the Dominion of Canada. Sir, I claim that the McKinley Bill is so framed of giving them a new impulse, a new life. But that it is hurtful to the trade of Canada in many respects. In regard to the horse trade, one of the features of the Bill is so calculated as to draw away our best class of horses. For instance, an American horse buyer coming into Canada upon finding out that he has to pay the same amount of duties he will naturally buy a horse of the better quality, thus leaving with the farmers of this country the inferior animals, which will in a very short time evidently injure stock-raising as the country the inferior animals, which will in a very short time evidently injure stock-raising as the country the inferior animals, which will in a very short time evidently injure stock-raising as the country that the United States." on a medium or low-priced horse as upon a horse short time evidently injure stock-raising, as the county applauded him for his expressions on this stock raised from inferior animals will not bear out occasion, and, knowing the feeling that exists in for Canada the name she has so justly acquired of that and the adjoining county in regard to refor Canada the name she has so justly acquired of producing the best horses on record. We have heard from the hon, member for Leeds that eggs could be shipped to Great Britain or the mother country at a profit. This statement is almost as plausible to me as the shipping of coals to Newcastle at a profit. I will make the statement here, and that from personal knowledge, that the average farmer sells or markets his eggs every ten or twelve days, the general country storekeeper or country merchant making regular shipments weekly-one week in collecting and repacking at shipping points, thus involving four weeks' time. Now, the egg of hens feeding on grass is never full, and handling and rehandling during four weeks in warm weather makes them almost worthless. Admitting that they are placed in cold storage on board of the ship, if they are stale or almost rotten it is a difficult task to make them fresh, and I venture to say that stale eggs as far as my judment goes are poor property on any market. We have heard from the hon, gentlemen opposite that the prices of eggs were just as good here in Canada as before the McKinley Bill came into force, and that Americans would come into Canada and buy our eggs, in spite of the McKinley Bill, with its 5 cents per dozen duty. Now, compare April, 1891, with April, 1890. According to the trade returns of the United States only 24,892 dozens of eggs were imported from Canada during the month of April, 1891, as compared with 450,623 dozens in April of last year-1890. The hon, gentlemen opposite will say: Where have those eggs gone? They have not found a market in Britain nor in the United States. They have gone into local consumption and produced no money. What is the effect of to-day? Go into the city of Montreal, what do we find? We find such men this We find such men and as Messrs. Laing & Sons, Masterman, others, peddling their produce, and we hear them nearly 4 tons per inhabitant in 1890. In shipping, complaining of some firm in the city of Ottawa shipping a consignment of hams to Montreal and ing trade and in the transport of our exports and causing them to be sold on that market at 6 cents per pound; whereas previously, hams were shipped to Ottawa from Montreal, and this condition arises from the fact that the farmers get no cash for their eggs to-day and cannot afford to purchase meat, hence the fall in price. This information I received from parties engaged in the trade. Mr. Speaker, we who are the loyal Opposition have heard much reached $3,997,521. In 1890 the value of exported in favour of and much against reciprocity with the United States. Still, there remains one hon. Minister whose utterances, no doubt, this House, as well as myself, would like to hear on this most important issue. That is the hon. Minister of amounted to $1,152,334, and of sheep to $699,337. Marine and Fisheries. If we, who are in the In 1890 the exports of cattle reached the value of Opposition, could impress upon that hon. Minister, and that the hon. Minister should be only one-$1,234,347, an increase of $535,010. The growth ciprocity with the United States, should the hon. Minister be instrumental in obtaining such reciprocity with the United States, on his next visit to that county the people there, I assure the hon. Minister, will doubly applaud him.

Mr. RYCKMAN. I will ask the indulgence of the House for a short time as a young member. I have listened earnestly and patiently to the speeches of the hon, gentlemen opposite, and I must say that those speeches would be discouraging to one who thought of coming to this country to settle here. If I were a young man, after reading one of those speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite in a foreign land, I would say that Canada is no country for I would feel discouraged. They say that our farming lands are depreciated in value, that our farms are mortgaged, that our Government is bad, and that everything we have is going to destruc-I do not agree with them in that respect. Next, we find them attacking the National Policy. Well, in the city I have the honour to represent we had 63 manufacturing establishments in 1878, and in 1891 we have 178. In 1878 we had about 7,000 workingmen and mechanics, and in 1891 we have 13,800 workingmen in our city. These workingmen are the backbone and sinew of this country. We have a good country at the back of us, we have farmers who bring in their produce, and as long as we have the working population in the cities we must benefit the farmers by buying their produce. The various towns and cities in this country all show a great increase in the population and in the number and extent of the manufacturing industries. The increase in railway mileage shows the progress the country is making. In 1878 we had 6,143 miles of railway; in 1890 we had 13,988 miles, an increase of 7,845 miles. The tons of freight carried have and increased from 13 tons per inhabitant in 1876 to in 1878 we employed 23,102,551 tons in the coastimports by sea and on the great lakes. In 1890, in the same service, we employed 41,243,215 tons of shipping, being an increase of 18,140,664 tons. am sure that in view of this increase hon gentlemen opposite cannot say that our country is going backwards. Take cheese. In 1868 the export of cheese from Canada was valued at only $620,000. In 1878 it cheese was $9,372,212, the highest in any single year, and greater than that of the United States, as it had been for the three previous years. Take cattle exports. In 1878 the exports of cattle $6,949,417, an increase of $5,797,083; and of sheep, half as enthusiastic on the question of reciprocity of this trade will be better appreciated when I state that in 1868 the total export of Canadian cattle to Great Britain was less than $500,000 worth. the products of the mines. Since Confederation Canada has exported about $82,000,000 of products of the mine, an average of $3,500,000 per year. In the first year of the union the export was about $1,500,000. Now, take the products of the forest. We exported during the past twenty-four years about $540,000,000, an average of $22,500,000. In 1890 the exports of home manufactures, including sawn lumber, staves, shingles, box-shooks, &c., were $25,530,003. I would call the special attention to this item of the hon, member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), who spoke upon this question last night. The progress of Canada may be noted in many other ways. For instance, take the bank deposits. 1878 the deposits in the chartered banks and in the various savings banks were $88,995,126. In 1890 they amounted to $197,895,452, an increase of $108,900,326. In 1878 the money orders received and sent out by the money order branch of the Post Office Department amounted to $7,130,000; in 1890 they amounted to $11,907,862; increase, 84,777,862. In 1878 the letters and post cards carried by the Post Office Department numbered 50,840,000. In 1890 they numbered 116,000,000; increase, 65,160. In 1878 the business of the country required a note circulation of $29,786,805: in 1890 it required a note circulation of $47,417,-071; increase, $17,630,266. In 1878 the 4 per cent. bonds of Canada were 6 below par; in the beginning of January, 1891, the quotations showed them to be 9 above par, a difference of 15 per cent. The production of coal in 1868 was 623,000 tons. In 1887 it was 2,387,000 tons, an increase of 1,764,-000. Next, take animals and their products. exports of animals and their products in 1870 were $11,700,000, of which two-thirds were to Great Britain; in 1890 they were over 24,000,000, of which $18,578,722 were to Britain. The total exports of farm products in 1878 were $30,607,752, of which $19,147,608 were to Britain. In 1890 the total was $35,726,275, of which $22,240,548 were to Britain. The increase amounted to $5,118,523 in value. Now, in the face of all these facts, considering the enormous increase that has taken place in our products of cheese, cattle, the mines, the forests, and the increase in the bank deposits, in money orders, in the business of the post office, in the note circulation and Canadian bonds, &c., I am satisfied that when hon, gentlemen opposite still insist that our country is not progressing they must base their arguments on some lines of produce which I have not discovered. I say that the policy of the present Government is one which should be sustained. Government have fostered the industries of this country; they have likewise, to a great extent, legislated in favour of our agricultural interests, and have taken pains to make this country known to the markets of the world. As long as our farmers raise products of a good quality they will always be sure of an increasing market for all time to come. I am satisfied that I can convince hon. gentlemen opposite by facts and figures that our country is in a prosperous condition, and that the National Policy has been one of the greatest legislative blessings that this country has enjoyed. We have also one of the greatest railways in the world, and I am sure this Government deserves the credit for having initiated that undertaking.

Mr. RYCKMAN.

Mr. FORBES. Mr. Speaker, in a discussion on this important question it is not right that I should remain entirely silent, coming, as I do, from a Maritime Province which, at the last election, sent but five representatives to support the grand cause of reciprocity. I, therefore, would ask the attention of the House and the indulgence of yourself, Mr. Speaker, while I waste, perhaps, some little time. First, let me say the issue before us in the debate this evening, as it has been for the last three or four weeks, if reduced down to its proper basis and stated in plain English is, whether we in Canada are willing to obtain a treaty of reciprocity or whether we are not? I do not hesitate to say that if the Government were honest in their intentions a treaty of reciprocity could be obtained; but so long as the National Policy, with the results that flow from that policy continue, so long will we be further and further away from securing the end desired, I take it, by the people of the country. The truth is, that this policy was forced upon the country in a form so as to deceive the people in its inception. It was first called a readjustment of the tariff. Next, we were told that it was a tariff which would bring reciprocity, and force the Americans to give us what has been our long-desired boon. the end we had the results of the so-called National Policy, and I want to direct attention to them. First, we had the unnatural growth of manufactures; then we had the tottering of the weak ones; then we had the combinations of the strong ones to root out the weak ones; then we had the rise of prices, so that those manufacturers might stand firmly on their feet and reap a profit : and finally—and this I do not hesitate to affirm we have the fact that these monopolists and combinesters, when they once get the people educated to that height, control the Government and retain it in their control. As a proof of my argument I refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague). In his speech that hon. gentleman took great pains to refer to the injurious effects of reciprocity or of any treaty with the Americans. He outlined the glories of the National Policy and told what it had done for this country, and what it would do for any country similarly situated; and speaking of the amendment moved by the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and also speaking of the remarks offered by the hon, member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), he said:

"These two gentlemen, by far the ablest in the ranks of their party in this House, meet the financial statement of the Minister of Finance, I submit, more in compliment than in criticism, and passing by the changes which were made in the tariff, though unreadily and unwillingly, they are forced to admit that this Government has had its finger upon the purse of this country, and that this Government is anxious to meet the wishes of those whose interests they are placed here to manage and discharge."

Those are the statements of the hon, member for Haldimand as they appear in the original Hansard. I do the hon, member the justice to state that he may have misused the word, but I take it that it is an apt phrase, and bears out most distinctly the true result of the working out of the National Policy. When the monopolies get their hands on the throat of the country, or on the purse of the country, they will undoubtedly hold power, unless the people rise in their might and are able to discover the means by which this grip is fastened upon come here and support a Government which upthem. In regard to the remarks offered by the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. White), I cannot give him the credit of having the honesty of his convictions, because I know that he would never have sat as a representative of the Maritime Provinces unless the people had believed that in his view reciprocity was not only the best measure for the country, but that he would do his best to secure it. Were he to return to his own county and tell the people that he was not in favour of reciprocity, and that such a measure would not benefit the Dominion, he would not stand a chance of coming to this House as a Conservative member. I, therefore, request the hon, gentleman to give the matter his serious consideration before he records his vote on this question. The hon, gentleman, in fact, made several statements which I take it will not only belie his own action but which are not entirely borne out by the evidence. He said:

"Well, the fishermen have not only, in common with all their fellow-subjects, a free breakfast table, but their fishing gear, their provisions and their fishing tackle are free of duty."

He forgot to tell us the articles which are free from taxation, nor did he name those articles which are taxed? As a matter of fact, only nets, lines and hooks are free from taxation, being articles the fishermen use, under the National Policy. All the other articles used, such as canvas, hawsers, leads, swivels, knives, flour, pork, beef and all groceries used-except pork and beef-for deep-sea and bank fisheries, if bought in bond, are liable to taxation. That policy pursued by the Government is, therefore, adverse to the interests of the people, and it will continue to be adverse to those engaged in that business so long as those hon, gentlemen who come from the Maritime Provinces, pledged to their constituents to support reduction of taxation and all efforts to obtain a policy which will benefit them, support in this House a Government which is directly opposed to those interests. The hon. gentleman further said:

"Now, Sir, the hon, member for Yarmouth has said that the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces, or the fishermen of the Dominion, I should rather say, have paid some $500,-000 duty on the fish they sent into the United States. It may be that, in the first instance, when they delivered their fish in that market, they actually paid the duty; but, Sir, we must remember that the price of fish has very largely increased in the American market."

Let us analyze that statement for a moment, and see where it will land us. There were, according to the official report, about 40,000 fishermen in Canada in 1890. Each man, therefore, will pay of the $500,000 imposed on the fishing interests of Canada $12.50. They get back 80 cents per head, and $160,000 bonus, which is divided among 40,000 fishermen, gives $4 per head, making a total to the credit of each fisherman of $4.80 per head, which, taken from the $12.50, leaves a deficit of $7.70 against each fisherman in the Dominion. The fishermen have to bear that tax, according to the hon, member for Shelburne (Mr. White) and other members from the Maritime Provinces who support that policy which imposes such burdens on the fishermen. There are 27,684 fishermen in Nova Scotia, and the total tax therefore paid in 1890 by them on their fish exports amounted to $213,656. I hold that members from the Maritime Provinces who advocate a reciprocity treaty with the United States when before their constituents should not pose a fair duty for the purposes of revenue.

holds a policy adverse to the fishing interests. it is adverse to the fishing interests of Nova Scotia it is equally adverse to the fishing interests of the whole of Canada. The hon, member for Victoria (Mr. McDonald) is similarly situated as regards not being able to vote as I believe his honest convictions would lead him to vote. Somehow or other those gentlemen are outspoken in certain districts in favour of reciprocity, but when they come to this House they declare they believe that the reciprocity treaty of 1854 was more advanta-geous to the United States than it was to Canada, and they put that forward as an argument against obtaining another treaty of reciprocity. The hon. member for Victoria said: The treaty of 1854 was more advantageous to the United States than to Why did he say that, unless he was preparing to hedge? He said, further, that the Washington Treaty was of some advantage to fishermen and farmers, and the Liberals opposed it. Still, he says that all the advantages were in favour of the Americans. He says, further: The British commissioners proposed reciprocity in various forms and the Americans were unwilling. did not pretend to give us the outlines of the proposal, nor why it was not accepted I cite these bits from the speech of the hon, gentleman who has placed himself in opposition to reciprocity. He further said the Americans should look for a market here, and not we for a market with them. Then, he further states that the Conservative party are going to adopt it, and that he will support any Government that obtains a reciprocity which he believes will be beneficial to Canada. I would like to know what we have been discussing for a number of weeks in this House, if the gentlemen opposite tell us that they are ready to adopt such a policy as that; because that is the policy which we have been advocating on this side of the House. Mr. Speaker, I cite those comparatively trivial matters, but I would not do so were it not that the gentlemen who use these arguments come from the Maritime Provinces; and in order that I may show that I am opposed to them on the principles of their policy, I want to show how it is that they are not able to cast their vote here as they should cast it, if we are to judge by their arguments. question, from another aspect, is a direct issue between the National Policy and free trade, with this limitation, that the Liberal party desires that free trade principles should obtain between this country only and the United States. The only arguments emphasized by the opposite side as against that are, first of all: that it is disloyal to England and will lead to discrimination against British manufacturers, and, secondly, that we cannot obtain a revenue under this policy. As far as the obtaining of a revenue is concerned, we have only to look to England, an absolute free trade country, which imposes a duty on some articles, solely and purely for the purpose of revenue, and which carries on the vast business of the Empire upon a revenue obtained in that way. There is nothing in the world to prevent Canada from carrying on the business of the country just by the same manner of obtaining a revenue as England does, if she There are a number of articles in the wishes. catalogue of the importations into this country, on which it would be perfectly justifiable for us to imMr. CAMERON (Inverness). Name them.

Mr. FORBES. Tea is one, and coffee is an-We could impose a duty upon those articles without danger, as the duty would go into the treasury, not into the pockets of monopolists, and there are several other articles upon! which we could also impose a duty. Above all things, we could exercise a policy of economy in the administration of our public affairs, and from these and other resources I do not hesitate to say that all the revenue we desire could be raised for the necessary expenses of the country. expenditures for public works, and for the further extension of the industries of this country, might easily be raised on capital account. That, I know, would be as favourably accepted by the people as the policy adopted by the Government to-day. The Minister of Finance has told us that he raised $2,000,000 of a surplus last year, and that he borrowed, in addition to that, $3,000,000, and expended the whole $5,000,000 on capital account. I ask him if it is wise for the Government to take $2,000,000 revenue more than is necessary, by taxes on the people, and expend it on capital account? Is it a wise thing to tax the people of the country for $2,000,000 more than is required for the expenses of running the government of the country? I believe it is not a wise policy, and I believe, further, that it is an unnecessary imposi-tion upon the industries of the country. There is tion upon the industries of the country. another way in which the revenue of the country could be largely increased. The United States today raise nearly three times the revenue per capita that we do, and they expend more than three times as much per capita as we do. They have a tariff of from 50 to 55 per cent., while our tariff is from 20 to 35 per cent. I may say here, Mr. Speaker, that it is an acknowledged fact that the secret of the great manufacturing power in England is the cheapness of the cost of living there. Let us keep down the cost of living in Canada from any increase beyond what it now is and I do not hesitate to say that the statement made by the hon, member for London (Mr. Hyman) will be borne out in a few years to a wonderful extent. That statement was, that the manufacturers from the United States and the capitalists from England would come in here, and make Canada the great manufacturing centre for North America. Then the statement by the hon, member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) would become true: that Canada would become the entrepot for the imports of the raw material which could be distributed from Montreal and from other manufacturing centres in Canada. We would thus raise a large revenue from the imports into Canada of the raw. material; as a slight tax discrimination in favour of Canada, as against the tax on the same raw material coming into the United States could possibly be imposed. That could be done, for it is done to-day between the United States and some of those other nations with which she has a treaty. There are a thousand ways in which the revenue could be raised to supply the running expenses of this country. Then, again, if this policy were adopted we would increase the prosperity of the country by increasing the manufacturing industries in the manner I have pointed out, and you would also increase the prosperity of products there in abundance—the products of the the country by causing an influx of the people into mine, the forest and the fisheries; but all these Mr. FORBES.

the country, by holding the people which we have in the country already and by enlarging and expanding every interest which we have in Canada, I may point out, Mr. Speaker, that in Canada we do not consume nearly as much per capita as we might do, or as they do in the United States; and the moment the people are placed in such a position that they can enjoy the necessaries and some of the luxuries of life to a greater extent than they do to-day I do not hesitate to say that the revenue of the country will increase largely. The Americans are to-day a prosperous and progressive people; they consume as much as they can, and if they find that they import cheaper from England than they can buy in the United States they do not hesitate to do so. If we adopt a policy of reciprocity, which would encourage the coming into this country of large amounts of capital, and which would tend to promote our manufactures to a greater extent than they are to-day, we should at once adopt this policy of unrestricted reciprocity. The Minister of Finance, in his speech, took great credit to himself for giving a free breakfast-table to the workingman, but the hon, member for King's, N. S. (Mr. Borden) showed that that statement was not well founded, and that every article on the breakfast-table is taxed. I am sure that the Minister of Finance himself, when he made that statement, must have known that he did so in order to tickle the ears of the country. He did not mean it; he could not have meant it, and I will give him credit for that; because every single thing is taxed that is used on the breakfast-table. The table itself is taxed 35 per cent.; the cloth is taxed, the ironware is taxed, the delf is taxed, the sugar itself is taxed, the bread is taxed, the corn and the meal are taxed, and everything that is used is taxed. There is another matter to which I would like to draw the attention of the House—that is, the effect of the fiscal policy of the Government on interprovincial trade. On that subject I would like to place on record a section of a speech delivered by Mr. Blake at Simcoe. He said:

"On many occasions have I called attention to the necessity of considering the real interests of the Maritime Provinces in the framing of our policy and the failure of the Tory Government to give that consideration. In Nova Scotia for a large part of their staple products—as coal, potatoes, fish and other articles—the natural market is in the neighbouring country. For stating that I have been denounced in the House of Commons and throughout Ontario. I have been called a traitor, but I tell you now what I said was absolutely correct. (Cheers). A wise man has said that he fights a difficult battle who fights against has said that he fights a difficult battle who fights against geography, and if you look at the map you will see that Nova Scotia's natural trade for many of her staples is Nova Scotia's natural trade for many of her staples is with the neighbouring country, and that the attempt to force them up into the upper provinces is a fight against geography, which has failed. The proximity of the people, the facility of sea transport; the numerous harbours; the opportunity for small vessels taking Nova Scotia products to the neighbouring states and bringing back cargoes of flour and other articles; gives rise to a natural and therefore a profitable trade, and reciprocity, important as it is to all of us, is most important to them."

Now, there is no doubt that these statements are absolutely correct, and they are not only accepted as the view of every man who lives in the Maritime Provinces, but should be accepted by every maritime representative in this House. You cannot force the trade of Nova Scotia or any of the Maritime Provinces up to Ontario. We have natural things are yet undeveloped. The mines to-day are developed to a limited extent by capital from the United States. Every dollar invested in a gold mine in the Maritime Provinces is American capital; and I venture to say that a large amount of the capital invested in the coal mines is also American One-third of the exports of fish from Nova Scotia goes to the United States. Our lumber trade is entirely with the United States and the West Indies. A certain amount of timber is sent from New Brunswick to England; but that will continue to go in any case. I do not think hon, gentlemen opposite are right in saying that if we get reciprocity with the United States, and deal very largely with them, we shall lose the English market. Not at all. The English market will always be open to us, and we shall always be glad to trade with the English people, and they But to-day will always be good customers. our best market is in the American Republic, and it is of great advantage to the Maritime Provinces that we should have that market. As a further argument to show that that market is valuable to us, let us look at the condition of the steamboat We have the Finance Minister bonusing to the extent of $107,000 two lines of steamers to the West Indies, when not a single dollar of public money is given to encourage the lines sailing to the United States. We have a line called the Nova Scotia Steamship Company making four trips a week from Yarmouth to Boston with two steamers, and the stock of that company is nearly all Nova We have the Canada Atlantic Scotia capital. Company, running a fine steamboat from the city of Halifax, another line running from Annapolis, the International line running from St. John, the Boston line with two steamers running from Halifax, and a line running direct between Halifax and All these lines stand on their own New York. bottom, receiving no subsidies from the Federal chest; and yet hon, gentlemen opposite tell us that that trade is not worth encouraging. I think it would be more justifiable for us to ask Parliament for a subsidy for those lines than for the lines to the West Indies, because the results warrant the expenditure. Would it not be a more profitable expenditure to encourage our people to trade in those channels in which we know they will get a fair return than to try to foster new channels of trade, which we know are only tentative at the best? But it is only by the second argument that hon, gentlemen are trying to salve their consciences - that for us to attempt to improve our trade relations with the United States means annexation. They tell us we should encourage trade with the West Indies, with Hayti, with Cuba, with South America, with the Cape of Good Hope and with Australia, rather than with our cousins and brothers in the United States. I fail to understand that policy at all. Where the channels of trade are the most easy, where trade of itself finds out those channels, and where the greatest profit can be derived by the people of Canada, there I take it to be the duty of the Government to foster trade. All those steamboat lines of which I have spoken are not only self-sustaining, but they tend to show that in spite of barriers and obstacles which have to that with Ontario or the other parts of the average tonnage, according to the Trade and Navi-Dominion, or with England. Therefore, it is right gation Returns of ship-building in Canada, was that the members from the Maritime Provinces should put themselves in a true position before their constituents, and not simply say, as several of them have said, that they favour reciprocity, provided it can be got. Now, the second ground urged by hon, gentlemen opposite why we should not have reciprocity with the United States is that it would be anti-English, or that it would involve discrimination in favour of the United States and against England. Now, that argument arises entirely from the disloyalty cry. I will not deal with it at this stage of the debate, because it has been already threshed out, and in discussing it further I should only be wasting time. Now, the foreign markets to which we have had our attention turned by the action of the Government in the last few years have proved an utter failure. We have had the Finance Minister taking several trips to the West Indies, for which the country paid his expenses. We have had a trade with Spain, Portugal, Germany, France, Italy and Holland amounting to almost nothing. -We had a trade with Newfoundland amounting to $2,800,000 in 1873, and last year to only $1,185,000. Now, that is a loss of trade to the great ports of Nova Scotia, and it is entirely due to the policy of hon, gentlemen opposite. Our trade with Holland in 1873 was $13,000; in 1890 it fell to $1,000. Our trade with Spain shows a slight increase, with Portugal a slight increase, and with Italy a large decrease; and hon, gentlemen opposite tell us that these are the countries with which we must deal, while it is an acknowledged fact that 45 per cent. of the whole trade of Canada is with the American Republic. I cite these facts to show how utterly absurd it is to expect Nova Scotia to prosper as she should prosper, with all these disadvantages. The aggregate trade between Canada and the United States has also been commented upon, and I wish to put it on record to show that we are solid on this side in our arguments. I wish to show that in spite of all the encouragement given to trade with Great Britain, we can never have as prosperous a trade with that country as compared with the United States. In 1873 our aggregate trade with Great Britain amounted to $107,000,000 and with the United States to $89,000,000. In 1882 our aggregate trade with Great Britain amounted to $95,000,000 and with the United States to $96,000,000; and in 1890 it amounted to $91,000,000 with Great Britain and $92,000,000 with the United States. In 1890 we imported from Great Britain to the extent of $43,000,000 and from the United States $52,000,-000. On our imports from Great Britain we paid a duty of $9,500,000 and on those from the United States we paid a duty of $8,200,000. These show conclusively that the natural market for Canada is the United States, and that we should encourage the sending of our products to the United States in preference to Great Britain, because the former trade is more profitable. Now, the policy of restriction of trade, which is the more appropriate title for the National Policy, tends in the Maritime Provinces to decrease shipping, because it contracts the foreign and does not expand the home trade. Our foreign trade can only go in our shipping bottoms, and if it shows a decrease year been put in the way of that trade a large trade has by year that decrease can only be attributable to been built up; and we cannot create a trade similar the National Policy. From 1868 to 1874 the 115,969 per year; from 1875 to 1879, when the Liberal party were in power, the average ship-building rose to 138,193 tons. Take the next ten years, from 1880 to 1890, and it fell away to an average of 51,637 tons per year. These figures show conclusively that the policy of the Government is tending, day by day, to restrict one of the greatest industries of Nova Scotia—the ship-building The tonnage I have quoted is not the aggregate tonnage, inward and outward, but the ship-building tonnage. Let me call your attention, Sir, for a few moments, to the statistics of the fishing industry. The total value of exports of fish to the United States from Canada last year was $2,671,503, and the total value of the same export to all countries was $8,524,508, so that we send altogether nearly one-third of our fish exports to the United States. Reciprocity would enlarge that trade to an enormous extent. If it would not make a complete success in the first year I take it that, under the encouragement given by reciprocity, the fishing industry of Nova Scotia alone would so much increase that it would be one of the most powerful factors of the revenue-producing elements of this country. The duties imposed upon our fish exports to-day amount to about $500,000. That amount would be saved to the people of Canada, for the simple reason that the duty is always paid by the people who send goods to a market not their If we have a surplus and desire to seek a market where we can dispose of it, and are met in that market by the imposition of a duty, we must pay that duty. On the other hand, if a purchaser wants an article and comes to us to buy it he pays the price in our markets, and must pay the duty when he takes it across the line. Therefore, our surplus of fish, and lumber, and agricultural products, to a certain extent, have to bear the duties, and it is our exporters who pay. The hon, member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) ought to be a competent authority on the question of reciprocity, as he has put himself on record in favour of reciprocity or even free trade. In 1888 he said in this House:

"While I am to a certain extent at least a supporter of it here (of the National Policy), I say that I support it on the understanding that it is not to be forever, so to speak, established among us, that it is not to be considered as one of the permanent institutions of the country, but as the strong hand of the people for the time to guard the manufacturers of the country until they shall, by the tariff, have sufficient power of themselves to compete with other nations. If they are not then willing to accept the National Policy, then in my opinion it would be better that we had never had it. Passing from that branch of the subject as to permanency of the tariff, I say this, that if we can get free trade with the United States I am in favour of having it."

The hon, gentleman could only have meant that he supported the National Policy because we could not But can he put himself on record get reciprocity. as having made an honest effort to get reciprocity? Neither he nor his party can put themselves on record as having made an honest effort in that direction. Have they ever told us that they are willing to concede to the Americans the right to export freely to us any manufactures in return for the right to be given us by them of exporting to them our products of the farm, and the mine, and our fish, and of the sea? That is where the wreck of the attempts of hon, gentlemen opposite takes place every time. They are in the grasp of the manufacturers, and if they were willing to concede that point to the Mr. FORBES.

"I am in favour of reciprocal trade with the United States. I am in favour of meeting the United States, as it were, step by step, as they may hold out their hands towards us, but I am not in favour of cringing to them: I am not in favour of decrying my own country, and asking them to give us free trade because we are poor. Gentlemen, poverty is no more honourable in a nation than it is in an individual. The individual who is poor is powerless as still water. So it is with a nation, and so it would be with a Dominion like this. In my opinion, if we want the respect of the United States, and if we want the respect of the world, it is our duty to stand upon the greatness of our country, and whilst we say to the United States: "We want to trade with you." we should also say: "We do not want to trade with you because we are poor, but we want to trade with you because we are rich, because we are capable of giving you as much as you can give us, and we can make our relations reciprocal and to the interest of both of us."

Precisely so. We are a great deal richer to-day than when the hon, gentleman made that state-We know how much greater resources we have to-day than we then had. Why should we not give up some of the riches we have in order to obtain greater riches from the United States. we have riches undeveloped in our mines, if our farmers have riches undeveloped in their acres, if our forests have riches yet undeveloped, why cannot we sell these and purchase in return other things the Dominion wants? If the Government were sincere I do not hesitate to say that we could get reciprocity to-morrow. The hon, member for Shelburne (Mr. White) endeavoured to make a point, that reciprocity could not be obtained except by the concession of our inshore fisheries. and said he was averse to giving up those inshore If he looks back to the time of the fisheries. treaty of 1854, or the Elgin Treaty, he will find that the inshore fisheries were given up. By the Elgin Treaty of 1854 the American fishermen gained the right to fish in British waters and to cure their catch on Canadian shores, rights Which were conceded similarly to Canadian fishermen in American waters north of latitude 36. The treaty provided also for the free interchange of the natural products of the two countries, and that Canadians should enjoy the free navigation of Lake Michigan and the use of the state canals in return for the free navigation by Americans of the St. Lawrence and the use of the Canadian canals in like manner. That is the treaty of 1854 which gave up the inshore fisheries, and which the Government of to-day tried to impress upon the people they were going again to have accepted by the people of the United States. The manifesto which was published just before the late elections specifies:

"Renewal of the reciprocity of 1854, with the modifica-tions required by the altered circumstances of both countries, and with the extension deemed by the Commis-sion to be in the interests of Canada and the United States."

There the hon, member for Shelburne (Mr. White) will find that the Government are prepared to give up the inshore fisheries. I do not suppose they meant to give them up for nothing; they would probably get some concession from the United States; but if they were prepared to do that, why would it not be advisable for the successors of the present Government to do it? The inshore fisheries are a matter of substantial importance to the people of Nova Scotia, and they do not intend to United States I dare say the hon, gentleman would give them up without receiving a substantial consideration; and then it must be provided that all and who said that he believed that the Nova persons who use those fisheries shall be subject to Scotians would have a fair and honourable arranthe most stringent regulations of our own Governthe Treaty of Washington in 1871, by which the inshore fisheries were again given up, and again, in 1888, Sir Charles Tupper and Mr. Chamberlain negotiated a treaty by which they virtually gave up the inshore fisheries, though not in express The line of delimitation was fixed by the treaty of 1818 at 3 miles from a line drawn from headland to headland, but it was changed to a line 3 miles from the shores of bays and indentations, so that in the proposed treaty of 1888, the inshore fisheries were practically given up, because the necessaries of that industry, such as pork and 3-mile limit was brought closer in shore, and that was given up without any compensation. How do we claim any compensation to-day? We have the modus virendi, which has been granted to the Americans by this Government at the dictation of Sir Charles Tupper, in order to prevent a commercial war, because the Government refused to make; reasonable concessions to the United States. Why did they refuse ! They refused because the manufacturers of this country would not allow them to make those concessions. They adopted a modus vicendi by which the licensing of foreign vessels was authorized on the payment of $1.50 a ton into plied out of those stores and paid for by the labour the federal treasury. Under this, American fishing of the father or the brother working in the woods vessels are permitted to enter Canadian ports for the purchase of bait, ice, seines, lines, and all back the increased cost that this flour, meal, &c., other supplies and outfits, and the transmision of have been to him. Then it becomes a double catch and shipping of crews. These two concessions as to the transhipment of cargoes and crews are first, it is a tax upon the humberman himwhat the Americans have always fought for, and these we give up for the paltry sum of $1.50 a next, it is a tax upon the labourers, who do ton paid by the American fishermen. They have the work; therefore, it is not only an unjust the right to come into the ports of Nova Scotia to but it is an unfair tax. I fail to see why it is day to hire men, to buy bait and ice and other kept on. Now, Mr. Speaker, in closing I would things, concessions which we claim as most valua-like to ask hon, gentlemen opposite why they do ble, almost, I might say, as a heritage in our provenot ask Parliament for permission, or why they do ince, and on which we hoped to get further con- not take permission, to offer to the United States cessions from the United States; but that has been reciprocity in manufactured articles? They have given up for the paltry sum of $1.50 a ton paid to the Federal Government. How can it be expected that Nova Scotia would feel otherwise than that her interests are slighted? This amount is not spent; for the benefit of Nova Scotia at all. Then it is evident that from 1866 to the present day the Conservative Government of Canada has given up the inshore fisheries without any considera-tion or with very small concessions. We Liberals say that we have valuable rights in those fisheries, that those fisheries are yet in their infancy and are undeveloped, and we only ask the right to encourage them by opening up markets, which we cannot do under the restricted policy of the Government to-day. The interest of the ship-building trade in regard to fishing vessels is not encouraged as it should be, because our fishermen find that their products are met with a large duty wherever they send them abroad. The fishing industry of Nova Scotia, as well as the mining and lumbering industries, is in its infancy. There is another industry off shore which is participated in by the Americans. but they cannot do that successfully unless they gement with the Americans if they had free access The Conservative Government also made to the American markets. What they want is not to take away our young men, but to ship them on their vessels, which they would build in our ports much more cheaply than they can in their own, and we would sell our fish in their markets, because we do not consume more than a small fraction of our eatch in Nova Scotia. Another advantage which a reciprocity treaty would be to Nova Scotians is in regard to the lumber trade. policy of the Government to-day tends largely to hamper that industry. The taxes upon the meal are very obnoxious to the lumbermen. The commeal tax is borne and paid largely by the lumbermen. The relate allowed for the import of corn for consumption is not of any service to the lumbermen, because the corn is consumed largely by the cattle in the woods, and, when a lumbermen sends one hundred men to the woods and has to pay the duty on pork and on meal, he loses it and cannot get it back. He has to sustain one or two hundred men in the woods, and here is where the hardship comes in. He has those stores on hand, and when families are suphe increases the prices to the family in order to get tax upon the lumber industry in Nova Scotia: self who sends in men and cuts the timber; known ever since 1884 that upon no other terms can they get it. Why, then, do they postpone action? In 1884 the Right Hon. Sir John A. Mac-Why, then, do they postpone donald, then leader of the Government, was well aware of the value that a reciprocity treaty would be to Canadians. A resolution was moved in the House by the hon, member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), and seconded by the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). In brief, the resolution asked the Government to enter into negotiations for a new treaty, providing for the citizens of Canada and the United States the reciprocal privileges of fishing, and freedom from duties now enjoyed, together with additional reciprocal freedom in the trade relations of the two countries. On this motion Sir John A. Macdonald

"I do not know any reason why the hon, gentleman who moved this, or the seconder, laid before the House these elaborate statements to show the value of reciprocal trade or trade of any kind with the United States. That is admitted. That goes without saying. We all admit that it would be well that we had a large trade with the United States rather than a small one. but they cannot do that successfully unless they have the benefit of our harbours. The best men in their boats are Nova Scotians who have gone over there, and most of their captains come from our province. In the last election I was assisted by an Americanized blue-nose who helped me most nobly,

Further on he says:

"I believe that the feeling which then exists still exists: and that you will never get a treaty between the United States and Canada for reciprocal trade in the natural products of the two countries, and unless the United States will come at some time or other to a conclusion that they would be willing to enter upon a reciprocity treaty, not only for our natural productions, but for our manufactures as well as our natural products, but for our mandactives as well as our natural products, we will never have a treaty. I am quite satisfied the United States will not agree, the country will not agree, the voice of the country will be against a repetition of the treaty of 1854. Now, with a knowledge of all this before them, I ask why is it that the Government cannot treat this question fairly and honestly? The Liberal party to-day are just as anxious to see the Government get it as they would be to get it themselves. The hon, members in this House from British Columbia are a unit in favour of reciprocity, and I believe that the members from the Maritime Provinces are all really in favour of it; but there is not one among them on the Conservative side that has had the courage of his own convictions and who has dared to stand up here and say that he will vote for it against his own party. They know very well that the Maritime Provinces cannot trade successfully with the other provinces of While we can deal with them in certain Canada. articles when the country is prosperous, we can trade much more to our own advantage with the United States. I say it is impossible for the people of Nova Scotia to come to any conclusion but that no treaty can be beneficial to them but one which embraces not only natural products, but also manufactures, and if the leaders of the Conservative party cannot obtain such a treaty except by giving away our manufacturing interests to the United States they should be willing that the Government Why do hon, gentlemen decry us for wanting to give up our manufacturing interests, when their own leaders have put themselves on record as favourable to giving up our manufactures to the United States if they cannot get equal concessions otherwise from that country? It is simply a question of whether we are going to have trade or not with the United States. The only objection that the Government can urge to such a policy is the question of revenue, but I will not deal with that now. I claim, Mr. Speaker, that the Government have treated the people of the Maritime Provinces in a dishonest manner; I will not use the word "hypocrisy," but I will say that when they put forth that last circular to the people previous to the election they led the people of the Maritime Provinces to believe that they intended to give them reciprocity. They told them from every hustings in the constituency I have the honour to represent that they were going to get reciprocity, and we all know what effect that had upon the people of the Maritime Provinces, and I believe upon the people of Ontario and Quebec. Now, then, we know that it cannot be obtained except upon certain terms. Why, then, do not the Government tell us frankly, so that this debate can be ended at once, that they are willing to grant those terms to the Americans? I fail to see where the dishonour comes in. If we are willing to give up the fisheries to a certain extent, if we are willing to give up the trade in natural products Mr. Forbes.

since the manufacturers themselves are willing to do so? Reciprocity must be had; we have got to have a treaty; better trade relations must be had, and there is only one way in which they can be got, and I fail to see why the Government should treat the country in this manner. Canada has within her borders industries that are yet in their infancy. We have a class of people in Nova Scotia, as we have all over Canada, than whom there are none in the world more intelligent and energetic, more devoted to their own institutions, and more desirous for the prosperity of their country. Give us trade, give us a chance to extend and develop it, and I an sure that the country will advance in prosperity to such an extent as will surprise the most ardent protectionist that ever lived. All we want is the opportunity. Give it to us, and we shall show you what can be done under a reciprocity treaty. We do not claim that the time has come for free trade. The hon, member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) made a most excellent speech to-day on free trade, and with his principles I can cordially agree; but I do not think the time has yet come for Canada to declare openly in favour of unlimited free trade with the world. But I do not hesitate to say that I shall be in favour of it just as soon as the time arrives when we can adopt it with a certainty of benefiting ourselves. At present we must turn our attention to obtaining reciprocity, and to expanding and developing our trade; and if it is conceded that it is beneficial, all we ask the Government to do is honestly to turn their attention to it, and give the people an opportunity of trying it.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Mr. Speaker, at this late hour and at this late stage of the debate it would be unseemly on my part if I should prolong the discussion to any great extent. However, coming from one of the "shreds and patches" of this Dominion, I think it is due to the constituency which I represent and to the "patch" of this Dominion from which I come to say a few words in answer to my hon, friend from Queen's, N.S. In 1867 I had the honour of a scat in this Parliament. I would only see to-night on the floor of this House, even if all of us were together, four representatives from Ontario, five from Quebec, one from New Brunswick, and myself from Nova Scotia, who have been here at that time, all the other representatives having been elected since. distinctly recollect that questions of trade were frequently discussed in the first Parliament of this Dominion. I also recollect that the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) occupied a position very near to the position I now occupy in this House, and then he was an ardent and strong supporter of the Liberal-Conservative party. In 1869, I believe, shortly after Confederation, on account of a change in the Minister of Finance of this Dominion, he notably became disaffected, as he is now, in regard to his position in this House. However, he did not kick over the traces until a year afterwards, when a second Minister of Finance was selected by the late lamented Sir John A. Macdonald, and then gradually but surely he left the Conservative party. I notice that a large number of the Liberal leaders to a certain extent—and all these things, it is conceded, are beneficial to Canada—why is it that affected, and who gradually but surely left the they are not equally willing to give up the manuparty, not because the policy of the party was not facturing interests to a certain extent, especially in the best interests of the Dominion, but simply because their own personal feelings or personal to defend themselves by duties on imports as respects interests were not gratified. The question of unique goods from other countries than Canada." interests were not gratified. The question of unrestricted reciprocity is not very generally understood, and I regret to say that after the long discussion to which we have listened in this House I am just as unable to define that policy as I would in this Dominion with a head on his shoulders who have been before the discussion commenced. restricted reciprocity, commercial union, unrestricted free t.ade with the United States, and various other definitious have been given which are just as vague to me as they would have been before the discussion commenced. In the Maritime Provinces, however, we have a very high authority on political questions, and unrestricted reciprocity was very clearly defined so far as it applies to Nova Scotia. The Halifax Morning Chronicle is the organ of the Liberal party in that province, and in its issue of 18th November, 1890, while answering an article in the Halifax Critic in reference to party politics, it fully defined unrestricted reciprocity as it was understood by the Liberal party in the Dominion, and particularly as it was discussed in the Province of Nova Scotia. It said:

"The policy of the Liberal party of the Dominion is deliberately and maliciously misrepresented in a manner not at all unworthy of the most contemptible party back in the pay of the Government. The Tories are credited at the same time with aims and purposes which none of its leaders have avowed. We challenge the Critic to give its authority for the statement that the Liberal party its authority for the statement that the Liberal party 'appears to have adopted at length a platform in which the chief plank is the practical assimilation of the fiscal system of that of the most intensely protectionist of civilized nations.' This is a mere travesty of the Liberal policy. That party wants unrestricted reciprocity or free trade with the United States, leaving each country to have any protective tariff it pleases against the rest of the world. It does not propose an assimilation of tariffs; on the contrary, it distinctly repudiates that idea."

This is the definition given in the Halifax Morning Chronicle of unrestricted reciprocity. It is not commercial union; that has been repudiated by the party. It is not anything else than such a policy as will enable the United States to have their own tariff and permit Canada to have its own tariff. To this definition of the policy of the Liberal party of this Dominion the New York Tribune, the organ of Secretary Blaine, on 12th February last expressed its opinion in such a way as to have practically chilled that policy in this Dominion. It said:

"This nation has not the slightest notion of allowing Canada to open a back door as wide as it may please while tariff enactments by the United States are closing the front door against sundry importations at New York and Boston. If anybody is silly enough to suppose that such a plan is entertained by Americans he does not live in this country. All such representations may as well be put aside as utterly and wildly at variance with anything that Americans can possibly be brought to adopt. For that would simply mean this: The United States might impose what duties it pleased upon foreign imports, but any goods what duties it pleased upon foreign imports, but any goods could come in free of duty across the Canadian border if the Canadian Government should see fit to admit them free of duty. The United States does not want Canadian reciprocity very passionately at any price or on any terms, but on such terms as these there is probably not a sane man in this country who would assent to reciprocity.

"The one thing which may as well be accepted by all parties concerned as the only possible basis of any commercial arrangement between this nation and Canada is that the people of the United States shall decide on what terms goods from Europe can be brought into this country. Differences of opinion there may be about the admission of this or that product of Canadian industry in exchange of this or that product of Canadian industry in exchange for reciprocal facilities on the other side, but no one would for a moment entertain a proposition which would take away from the industries of this country the power

This is the declaration of the New York Tribune. This is the declaration of every sensible American on the other side of the border. There is no man would look after the interests of his country if he were living in the United States but who would express the same opinion. How silly it would be for the United States to permit unrestricted reciprocity on the basis that Canada might have a 20-per cent. tariff while the United States had a 40-per cent. tariff. That would be to cause the imports from foreign countries to flow into the United States through Canadian ports, and not a dollar's worth would be imported into the United States through American ports. On the other hand, there is no one in this Dominion who would permit the United States to have a tariff of 20 per cent. on importations from foreign countries while we ourselves would have a tariff of 40 per cent.; because, in that case, all the importations from Europe which would be required for consumption in Canada would come through American ports into this Dominion. Therefore, any person not biassed by political prejudice must admit that no unrestricted reciprocity can be obtained from the United States except on the basis of the same tariff as against the rest of the world, which Commercial union would mean commercial union. has been repudiated by the Liberal party; reciprocal free trade with the United States is absurd on the face of it, and I would be astonished to ever hear a sensible man advocate it in this Parliament, or any intelligent community in this Dominion. My hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) expressed that opinion of it when it was first launched into the political arena in this Dominion. friend the leader of the Opposition expressed the same opinion of it, and I do not see any reason why the Opposition would adopt it as a policy, unless for the purpose of deluding public opinion on this question. I cannot for a moment believe that there is any person on the other side of the House who has any idea that this policy is a practicable one, and in fact they have abandoned it. They have absolutely abandoned it. It does not make any difference what they say in this House, because we were told last session by the then member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) that members of Parliament never speak in House for the pursose of gaining the ear of the House, but that they always speak for the purpose of giving their views to their constitu-I am sorry to say that this is the case with a great many who have spoken on this question, but I can assure my hon. friends that it never has been the case with myself, and I hope it I would much rather discuss never shall be. this question before the constituency which I represent; and I never fear the result of a fair and honest discussion of it there. I will discuss it here in the hope that my views will have weight with the Opposition, but I fancy my hope will be a vain one. The Opposition abandoned the policy of unrestricted reciprocity. Is advisedly, and I have reason to say so. Opposition, through one of their leaders, has placed on record a resolution which practically abandons unrestricted reciprocity; it abandons commercial union; and, if it is examined carefully,

I must say that if I am a judge of what it desires to convey it is practically on the lines of the policy which has been adopted in 1879, and successfully carried out ever since in this Dominion by the Liberal-Conservative party. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), and my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Forbes), delivered speeches in this House which were to a certain extent amusing, but to no extent instructive. My hon, friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), who I am sorry to see is not in his seat just now, has delivered an eloquent declamation on the principles of free trade; but he never gave one single reason why free trade should be adopted by the Dominion of Canada. He was asked for the reasons, but he failed to give us any. He offered, I believe, to purchase a small pamphlet which has been issued by Henry George, a socialist, and I am almost sorry to say that he stated that Henry George might have a disciple here. That is the only information the hon, gentleman could give us on that question. Well, we do not propose to follow Henry George on his trade policy, or in his socialistic pro-The member for Queen's (Mr. Forbes) seemed to me to be appealing to a very peculiar constituency, for I know that if he delivered the speech which he delivered in this House in the County of Inverness he would not get a baker's dozen of votes. My hon, friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) delivered a speech somewhat similar to that which I was accustomed to listen to in Inverness, but the opponent who delivered such a speech in the County of Inverness had the courage of his convictions, and he had no hesitation in saying that he was an annexationist. If the policy of the Opposition is not an annexationist policy, I submit that all the arguments which they use in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, or commercial union, or unlimited free trade with the United States, and all the reasoning which they use for the adoption of that policy in this House, are from beginning to end only stronger reasons why we should become annexed to the United States. If they continue but for a short time their arguments in favour of commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity on the same lines that they have been pursuing for a number of years; if we have had no annexationists in this Dominion, we will soon have plenty of them; because no one can give credit to that policy as advocated by these gentlemen without coming to the conclusion that there is no hope for this Dominion except by annexation. Unrestricted reciprocity we cannot have; free trade with the United States on any other terms is impossible; and it does not require the quoting of authorities to convince any intelligent person that the only way in which unrestricted reciprocity can be acquired is by annexa-Apart from the policy which they declared to be unrestricted reciprocity, and the reasoning which they applied to the obtaining of it, there is no other conclusion to which I could come except this: If they convince me that unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union is so essential to the interest of this Dominion I shall begin to weigh it seriously in the balance, and consider whether the sentimental ties which bind Canada to England are to be severed. I would be sorry to believe that they themselves have any idea that their arguments lead to this conclusion. But I am sorry to say that in some parts of this Dominion it has had this effect; and if it is continued much longer the tendency | declared that if I was in the House and the same Mr. CAMERON (Inverness).

unquestionably will be to encourage an annexation feeling in this country. I would be indeed very loth to believe that annexation with the United States is essential to our prosperity. On the contrary, I believe that under the fostering care of the National Policy, which we have enjoyed in this Dominion since 1878, the Dominion of Canada will prosper in such a way that no one who has any desire to live in comfort and peace will ever wish to be annexed to the United States on the I will now refer for but a side of the line. short time to the policy of my hon. friends from Queen's (Mr. Forbes) and Guysborough (Mr. Fraser). They were outspoken in favour of free A great many seem to make declarations in favour of free trade, and they point to the policy of Great Britain, which is the only free trade country on the face of the globe, as an example worthy of our imitation. Now, I tell those hon, gentlemen that I for one would be very sorry indeed to adopt any such policy as that for the Dominion of Canada, although it would be a more reasonable policy to adopt than the policy of free trade between Canada and the United States, while building a tariff wall in common with the United States against Europe. We were told in Inverness that the people of England were allowed to buy in the cheapest country and sell in the dearest. My hon. friend from Guysborough seemed desirous to mislead this House, and particularly his constituents, to believe that we could get along fairly well without a revenue at all that we could buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest, irrespective of a revenue to carry on the affairs of the country. But, after all, the very first consideration, as every intelligent gentleman in this House must know, is to raise a revenue in the manner which will bear most lightly on the consumers of this Dominion for the purpose of carrying on the public works and defraying the legitimate expenses of the country. In England that is necessary as well as in Canada, and I may be permitted to quote from Whitaker's Almanac for 1890, which is a good authority, the amounts collected from various sources for the purpose of a revenue in Great Britain. The gross amount of revenue collected in the year ending 31st March, 1889, was £92,781,323 sterling—in round numbers, about \$500,000,000. We do not require as large a revenue in proportion to population; yet I hold that we require a revenue of at least \$40,000,000 a year from all sources in order to enable us to carry on the affairs of this Dominion with profit to the Reducing the revenue below that figure will, I hold, necessitate curtailing expenditures in this Dominion which are absolutely necessary for the development of the vast resources of this We require a revenue for the country of ours. purpose of subsidizing railroads, for the construction of railroads, for the improvement of harbours, piers and public works, which are necessary for the distribution of the products of the soil, the forest, the sea and the mine. From the very first day that I had the honour of occupying a seat in this House I never opposed the granting of a railway subsidy in any portion of this Dominion. 1872 I voted for a large subsidy for the Canadian Pacific Railway, in a Bill which passed this Parlia-I was defeated in 1872 on account of that vote; but I had the courage of my conviction. At every election since that time I have publicly question came up again I would vete for a subsidy which should be sufficient to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. I never cast a vote in this House for which I am prouder than that .vote, and I think no money was ever expended in this Dominion which resulted to the advantage of the country to the same extent as the vote which was granted for the Canadian Pacific Rail-But reverting to the resources of revenue in Great Britain, I beg now to state the figures. net revenue for 1889 was: Excise, £25,600,000 sterling; Customs, £20,067,000; income tax, £12,70 $\overline{0}$,000; stamps, £12,270,000; post office, £9,700,000; house tax, £1,940,000; telegraphs, £2,080,000; land tax, £1,000,000; stamps in lieu of fees, £796,973; interest on Suez Canal shares, on advances, &c., and miscellaneous, over £2,500,000. These are the sources of revenue in Great Britain; and I would like to know who is the Liberal in this House who would advocate the collecting of a revenue from the same sources in Canada to the amount of \$40,000,000, which is absolutely necessary for the purpose of carrying on the affairs of this Dominion? We have been talking very much of a free breakfast-table. part of this resolution, which is a practical abandonment of unrestricted reciprocity, I repeat, is an appeal to the prejudices of the poor farmers, the poor miners, the poor fishermen, the poor artizans, and the poorer classes generally. But under free trade, as in vogue in England, they would have to pay a duty of 12 cents per pound on tea, which the National Policy gives them free; they would have to pay an average of \$1 a pound on tobacco, which is sufficiently taxed, it is true, under the National Policy. On coffee they would have to pay 4 cents per pound; on spirits from \$2.50 to \$4 per gallon; and on all the luxuries of the poor man they have to contribute in proportion. Now, if we adopt the policy of free trade, and follow the example of the only free trade country in the world, we must follow it in its entirety, and there is not a Liberal in this Dominion who would dare face any constituency and advocate a similar policy. this is the policy which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Forbes) and the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) advocate. If there is any person so silly as to believe that the rate-payers of this Dominion can buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market he must be very silly indeed, just as silly as the New York Tribune represented any Canadian to be who would believe that the Americans would allow their front door to be closed against imports from all the rest of the world while the back door of Canada was open, through which these goods could go into the United States free. I beg to call your attention, Sir, to the fact that we have, after all, a free breakfast-table. We have been told that we pay a duty of 75 cents a barrel on flour. The hon. member for Kent, Out. (Mr. Campbell) is not in his place, but I know he would differ very widely from any person who would make such an assertion as that. Flour is produced in Canada far beyond the requirements of this Dominion, and it will be in the near future produced to a greater extent beyond consumption in that country, a duty of \$5 per barrel on flour there would not affect the price to the extent of 1 cent. Mr. Jones, of Halifax, is an authority on that point; and if that be true as regards the United States, it is equally true with regard to Canada, and I think I can prove that from the figures quoted by some of my In 1889 we imported into hon. friends opposite. Canada 200,000 barrels of flour. Well, at 75 cents per barrel, the duty would be \$150,000. Is there any person in this Dominion who knows anything of the way in which that American flour finds its way to the Canadian market who will believe we pay 75 cents a barrel on flour? The hon, member for Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) informed us that in the Province of Quebec alone we imported 167,000 barrels in 1889, costing \$599,000. Now, Sir, I desire to call your attention to this fact. I have taken the figures as given by the hon. gentleman, and, assuming they are correct, 167,000 barrels, costing \$597,000, would be \$3.58½ per I would ask any reasonable person on the other side if the Canadian importer paid the duty on that flour?

Mr. WATSON. What is the quality of the flour? Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). That was the average price of all the flour imported. I think my hon, friend will agree with me that the average quality of the flour produced in this Dominion would be cheap at $3.58½ par barrel.

Mr. WATSON. What is the quantity of the different grades that were imported into the Province of Quebec?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). That is not necessary for the argument at all. It is an average figure, and you cannot sell flour in the several portions of this Dominion at a lower figure than $3.58½, and I know that the same quality and grades of flour are not sold at that figure on the other side of the line.

Mr. WATSON. The low grades are imported into Quebec.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I presume the people of Quebec are very much like their brethren by the sea; and if there are any people in the province from which I come who are determined to have the best quality of flour it is the French-Canadians, because they know from experience that it is the cheapest grade of flour in the end. If, as our hon. friends opposite allege, the duty was paid by the people of Quebec, then the cost of even the average grades of flour would be reduced to $2.83½ per barrel. Is there any person in this Dominion who will believe that flour is sold at $2.83½ in the markets of the United States? This proves conclusively that, as Mr. Jones, of Halifax, said in this House last year, even if we double the duty on flour it would not affect the price to the extent of one cent. During the discussion of the tariff, on all occasions the position was taken by hon, gentlemen opposite last session that the duty on flour was a barbarous, unnecessary tax, because the revenue did not require the increase. Now, it did not require very much learning in political economy to know that the higher the duty on flour the necessities of the country. We have very the less would be imported and the less revenue high authorities in this Dominion who hold to the position that while the United States produce more flour than is required for home importation into Canada will not exceed 60,000 barrels, and on that 60,000 barrels the producer and the middleman on the other side must divide the loss between them of the 75 cents duty, and must place the flour in the Canadian market at a figure that will compete with the Canadian pro-Therefore, I hold that flour is free to the poor farmers of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, to the miners, the fishermen and all the poorer classes. If no other authority would convince me, we have that of Mr. Jones, of Halifax, the late leader of the Liberal party of this Dominion, Mr. Mackenzie, and my hon. friend from Kent, Ont. (Mr. Campbell). But I feel that every intelligent person on the Liberal side concurs with those gentlemen, and they only make use of what they call this barbarous tax for the purpose of appealing to the prejudices of the poorer classes of this Dominion. The poor artizans, then, get their flour free. They get their meal free, because the tariff is now so regulated that for human food meal is imported free into Canada. They have their tea free, they have their coffee free, they have their sugar free, and they have their molasses free.

Mr. WATSON. No; sugar is not free.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). My hon. friend and I differ on that question. I hold that if you impose a duty for the purpose of protection on sugar or any other article which is useful and necessary for home consumption, and thus encourage the manufacture of it in this Dominion and create home competition as well as competition with the foreign product imported into Canada, you lower the price far below what it otherwise would be in our markets, and it is my firm conviction that if you took that slight protection from the sugar manufacturers in this Dominion the result would be a collapse in the manufacturing industry of sugar, and in a short time the sugar would be imported from the United States through the middlemen who would handle it, it would be sold at a higher price than now, when we have sugar refined in this country. The same thing is true in regard to cotton. You can buy cotton now from 20 to 40 per cent. lower than you could before the National Policy was adopted. That result has been caused by the multiplication of the manufactories, and by the increase in the different lines of cottons made in this Dominion. That creates a competition amongst the Canadian manufacturers and a competition as well with foreign-manufactured goods, and in this way the price of cotton has been reduced from 20 to 40 per cent. in our markets. The same argument may be applied to boots and shoes, to flannels, to all woollen goods which are consumed by the poor artizans, fishermen, miners and farmers, and the poorer classes generally. Abolish the National Policy, abolish incidental protection to those industries, which even the late leader of the Opposition, Mr. Blake, would never consent to, and the result would be that all these factories would go down, that home competition would not exist, and that the monopolists and the combinesters from the other side of the line would have control of our markets, and then the price of these articles would go up. It is only a few years ago that the duty was taken off anthracite coal. The consumers in Ontario and Quebec, and also in the Maritime Provinces, were led to believe that the taking off of that duty of 50 cents a ton would place that coal in the market at given me. Mr. CAMERON (Inverness).

a lower figure; but I think experience must have convinced them that since the duty was taken off, the American producer, the carrier and the middleman have raised the price, not only by 50 cents, but by an additional 10 cents, in order to make up for the loss they sustained during the time the 50 cents duty was imposed upon them; and this would be the result in every line of goods which is useful or necessary for the poorer classes of this Dominion. Besides the free breakfast-table which is given to the poor farmer, and to the miner, and to the artizan, and to the poorer classes of this Dominion generally, the fisherman has other advantages. He has his fishing gear free, he has his hooks and lines free; in fact, he has everything that is necessary for the prosecution of his industry admitted free. So that the first part of this resolution should be eliminated from it altogether, because it is absolutely on the lines of the National Policy, and in no other way can what is useful or necessary for the poorer classes of people be placed in their hands so cheaply as under the National Policy. It is certain that in the United States the fishermen, the farmers, the miners and the mechanics cannot obtain what is necessary for them as cheaply as they do on this side of the line. It is not very long since, when in conversation with one of them, he declared that the feeling against the McKinley toviff in the United States was so strong that in a short time, in his opinion, it would be repealed. The argument of our hon. friendson the other side would lead the country to believe that we would have unrestricted reciprocity but for the policy of the Dominion Government. Since 1879 we have had on our statutes a provision by which we could have reciprocity in the natural products of the soil, the mine, the sea and the forest, but the Americans would not adopt any such policy; and, if we can judge reasonably of the feeling on the other side of the line, they have no intention of doing anything of the kind. So it is not the fault of this Government, but it is the fault of the American Government; and, as it has been well said by some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House already, all the arguments which have been used in favour of unrestricted reciprocity should have been used in Congress and not on the floor of this Parliament. The object of the National Policy is well fulfilled in securing a sufficient amount of revenue for all the requirements of the Dominion Government. The National Policy so taxes the people that one-half of the amount of revenue collected is on what is neither useful nor necessary. It is a tax which is voluntarily paid by the people. At least another third is collected from articles which are not consumed by the poor farmer, the poor fisherman, the poor miners or the poor artizans of this Dominion. They are consumed by persons who are able and willing to pay for them as articles of comfort or luxury; therefore, it is only a very small portion indeed of the taxes of this Dominion which is paid by the individuals in the Dominion, to whose prejudices is directed the first part of the resolution which has been tabled by the actual leader of the Opposition in this House. I did not intend to prolong the discussion till this late hour, but as it is my custom when I get started, I hardly know when to stop. I beg to thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. members of this House, for the patient hearing they have

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.30 a.m. (Saturday).

Motion agreed to.

ONTARIO EXPRESS AND TRANSPORTA-TION COMPANY.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved that all Rules and Orders of the House be suspended so as to permit the introduction of a private Bill entitled an Act respecting the Ontario Express and Transportation Company. He said: This company was organized under a charter granted in 1878, and had been doing business for seven years, and was reorganized again in 1890. During that time the records and papers were lost by fire, and the object of this Bill is to render legal the transactions of this company under this charter.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved that Bill (No. 151) respecting the Ontario Express and Transportation Company be read the first time.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SAULT STE. MARIE WHARF-RECEIPTS.

Mr. LISTER asked, What arrangement, if any, is there between the Government and Mr. Plummer respecting the receipts of the Sault Ste. Marie Does Mr. Plummer get any portion of the receipts? If so, how much? Is the wharf kept in repair by the Government? If so, what amount was spent for repairs up to the 1st July, 1891?

Mr. TUPPER. The arrangement with Mr. Plummer under the Order in Council appointing him is, that he is to act in the usual way as a wharfinger' for all receipts connected under the orhe is to be paid as his salary $100 yearly out of the culture.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved the adjournment receipts. The property in the wharf has been transferred to the Government, as the hon, gentleman has already been informed. The wharf is kept in repair by the Government. The sum of $1,269.31 was expended to repair Sault Ste. Marie wharf in 1889-90.

PAYMENTS TO CIVIL SERVICE OFFICERS

Mr. TROW (for Mr. McMullen) asked, Was it not the rule of some or all of the departments some years ago that pay-sheets had to be executed by each Civil Service officer, whether temporary or permanent, in payment of salary? When was that system abolished? On whose recommendation? And what were the reasons given for such abolition? Does the Government intend to reintroduce this system, in face of the developments which have taken place before the Public Accounts

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose that what my hon. friend refers to is the system of payments in vogue before the inception of the Audit Office, when both temporary and permanent clerks were paid by cash sums. At that time, of course, they receipted each for his appropriation on the pay-sheet. At the inception of the Audit Office that was changed. the permanent clerks and part of the temporary clerks are now paid by cheques, and these cheques, being payable to the order or endorsement of the person to whom they are made out, are sufficient receipt. It is not the intention to make any change in the arrangement, it being considered satisfactory.

MEDICAL INSPECTION OF TRANSATLAN-TIC STEAMERS.

Mr. LAVERGNE (for Mr. LANGELIER) asked, 1. Whether the mails from England are being landed at Rimouski during this season of navigation? 2. Whether the trans-Atlantic steamers carrying the mails, or other steamers, are visited at Rimouski by a medical man in the service of the Government? 3. Whether Dr. P. A. Gau-vreau, of Rimouski, has, in his capacity as a physician, under instructions from the Government, visited any steamers at Rimouski since the beginning of the present season of navigation? Is the said Dr. P. A. Gauvreau now in the pay of the Government, and is he to receive pay or emolument if he does not visit any steamer during the present season; if so, what is to be his pay or remuneration during this season?

Mr. HAGGART. The answer to the first question is, no; to the second, no; to the third, no. In reply to the fourth question I beg to say: Before the opening of navigation this year and before it was known that new arrangements would have to be made for carrying the English mails, the Minister of Agriculture agreed with Dr. Gauvreau that he was to continue his professional services at Rimouski the same as the previous year, at the rate of $700 per annum. Dr. Gauvreau now claims the yearly salary, notwithstanding the non-calling of the steamer, in his quality of quarantine officer. The question, in view of the altered circumstances, of what amount, if any, should be paid to him, is dinary tariff of tolls at Sault Ste. Marie wharf, and now being considered by the Minister of Agri-

PAYMENTS FOR LEGAL SERVICES.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. TRUAX) asked, Did Shaw & Shaw, of Walkerton, receive from the Government $183 last year? If so, what services did they render for it, and in what cases did they act?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Messrs. Shaw & Shaw, of Walkerton, received from the department, in 1889-90, $183.79, as follows:—Defending three Indians in the Allenford shooting case: Solomon, $57.85; Johnston, $42.62; Paul, $39.60. Selling liquor to Indians: Samuel Wahbeger, $17.72; Seman Laird, Thomas McVeitty and James White, $26. Total, $183.79.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. Truax) asked, Did Mr. A. B. Klein, of Walkerton, receive from the Government, last year, $319? If so, what services did he render for it, and in what cases did he act?

Mr. DEWDNEY. A. B. Klein received during the same period $318.96: Regina vs. Paul (Allenford shooting case), $283.84; Regina rs. Colclough & Young (selling liquor to Indians), $35.12. Total, $318.96.

EEL-FISHERY AT RIMOUSKI.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, By what authority are the Government about to order the destruction of an eel-fishery (brush weir) constructed on the property of F. F. Rouleau, Esq., advocate, of Rimouski, which said property has been held for nearly a century with right of hunting and fishing?

Mr. TUPPER. I shall have to object to the question being put in its present form, as it is contrary to the rules and to the practice of the House in these cases. The hon, gentleman has a motion on the Paper which will probably be reached to-day, on which he can raise the question. The hon, gentleman on reading the question will see that it begs certain points in dispute and contains statements of facts.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. What is the reason given by the hon. gentleman?

Mr. TUPPER. If the hon, gentleman will put his question in proper form I will answer him.

THE CASE OF LEDA LAMONTAGNE.

Mr. LAURIER asked, Whether the Government have granted or rejected the prayer of the petition recently presented, asking for the discharge of Leda Lamontagne, now detained in the gaol for the district of St. Francis?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The petition was received on 15th July. The usual enquiries were made, and the report of the judge was only received on the 20th instant. The petition has not been reported on yet; probably it will be in a day or two.

Mr. LAURIER asked, 1. Has there been any correspondence between the Government at Washington and the Canadian Government with reference to the detention of Léda Lamontagne in the gaol for the district of St. Francis, in the Province of Quebec, and to the delay in bringing her to trial Mr. HAGGART.

it the intention of the Government to lay it before the House?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There has been correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Government at Washington. That correspondence has just been commenced, and as soon as it is complete it will be laid on the Table, if any one wants to see it.

SYSTEM OF PENSIONS.

Mr. McLENNAN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a measure to provide a system of pensions for the district staff and the officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the permanent corps?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The question of introducing a measure to provide a system of pensions for the district staff, and the officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the permanent corps, during this session, is now receiving the consideration of the Government.

VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. WALLACE (for Mr. Fréchette) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to extend the limit of time for the completion of preliminary lists, in view of final revision of the voters' lists?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is a Bill before the House with that object in view, and I hope it will be considered by the House to-morrow. question does not refer to the limit of time for the completion of the list. The Bill provides for an extension from 1st to 15th August.

JUDGES IN DISTRICT OF MONTREAL.

Mr. WALLACE (for Mr. Lépine) asked, How many judges of the several courts held in the district of Montreal obtained leave of absence on account of sickness or for any other cause during the past three years, the duration of such leave, the cause in each case, and the names of the judges to whom leave was granted? 2. How many judges were appointed judges ad hoc to replace temporarily those to whom leave was granted, the number and duration of all commissions granted for that purpose and for any and what other reasons, during the last three years, and for what courts such judges ad hoc were appointed? 3. The number of judges appointed within the past ten years in the district of Montreal, and to what court such appointments were made, the number who have held or now hold, concurrently with their judicial duties, official positions or missions with the consent or authority of the Government? 4. How many applications, verbal or written, have been made to the Government, within the past five years, by or in favour of any judge of any court in the Province of Quebec, or any other province of the Dominion, with a view to secure an increase of salary of such judge; how many judges tendered their resignation; how many were called upon or asked to resign, the dates when such resignations were tendered or called for in each case where pensions were granted? 5. How many Acts have been passed with a view to the creation of additional on the charge of incendiarism, the charge upon courts of justice, or the appointment of new judges which the American Government granted her ex- in the Province of Quebec, and in the other Protradition? 2. If such correspondence exists, is vinces of the Dominion, within the past ten years, and how many such Acts were forwarded to the Government for sanction or disallowance, according to law? 6. Are the Government aware that an Act was passed by the Legislature of Quebec, at its last session, authorizing the appointment of two additional judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, having special jurisdiction in criminal matters in the district of Montreal? Is the said Act now in force, and has the said appointment of two additional judges been made, or is it the intention of the Government to make the said appointment at an early day, and if not, why has the said appointment not been made? 7. Is there any correspondence, memorandum or other paper or document, other than the official reports already published, as between the Government and any of the Local Governments of the Dominion, or between the Government and any of the judges of the several courts of the Dominion, had within the past five years, in relation to any subject, matter or thing referred to in the foregoing questions or to the administration of justice generally, or to any judge of any such court; and what is the nature of said correspondence or document? 8. Have the Government received within the past three years any petition, complaint or information, whether verbal or written, with reference to the administration of justice, from any judge of the Province of Quebec, in the district of Montreal, and the other districts What is the nature of the comof that province. plaints embodied in such petitions, and is it the intention of the Government to give prompt attention thereto?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The question asks a good deal of information which will have to be moved for as a return, but as regards information that can be given in answer to the question I am glad to give it. To the first question my reply is: In 1888 Judge Papineau had six months leave of absence on account of illness. It was extended four months, and was afterwards extended two months. Judge Baby was absent two months on urgent In 1889 no leave of absence was granted. business. In 1890 Judge Church was absent for seven months on account of illness. My answer My answer to the second question is as follows: Hon. Martin Doherty was appointed assistantjudge of Queen's Bench for courts beginning May, 1888, to replace Judge Monk; for courts commencing 1st September, 1888; 15th September, 1888; 1st October, 1888; 16th November, 1888; 1st December, 1888; 15th January, 1889; 1st February, 1889; 1st March, 1889; 15th March, 1889, to replace Judge Baby; for courts opening 15th March, 1890; 1st May, 1890; 15th September, 1890; 1st October, 1890; 15th November, 1890; 1st December, 1890, to replace Judge Church. Queen's Bench: (1) Mr. Justice Baby, appointed 29th April, 1881; (2) Mr. Justice Church, appointed 25th January, 1887. Superior Court: (3) Sir F. Johnston, appointed 9th March, 1885: (4) Mr. Justice Loranger, appointed 5th August, 1882; (5) Mr. Justice Doherty, transferred from St. Francis district 17th October, 1882; (6) Mr. Justice Mathieu, transferred from Joliette 23rd June, 1883; (7) Mr. Justice Gill, appointed 12th April, 1886; (8) Mr. Justice Davidson, 10th June, 1887; (9) Mr. Justice Taschereau, Montreal and Terrebonne, residence transferred to Montreal, 1st derer, and was his the lowest tender? 3. Who else December, 1887; (10) Mr. Justice Wurtele, trans-tendered, and for what amounts? 4. Has the conferred from Ottawa 20th September, 1888; (11) Mr. Justice Pagnuelo, appointed 5th June, 1889; (12) Mr. Justice Tait, transferred from Bedford 5th July, 1889. Mr. Justice Mathieu was appointed revising officer for Montreal on the 26th October, and still holds that office. So far as my department is aware, no Montreal judge has been charged with any mission by Government within ten years. Mr. Justice de Lorimier is the revising officer for Joliette. 4. It is impossible forme to state the number of verbal and written applications. I am not aware of anything that could be called, on the part of a judge, a verbal or written application for an increase of salary, except formal applications by some of the County Court judges. In other respects requests have been implied, from conversations in which the judges have set forward from time to time, or in documents in which they have presented from time to time information which they thought should be in possession of the Ministry in dealing with the question of salaries. The following are the list of resignations:—Queen's Bench: Mr. Justice Monk resigned 20th September, 1888. Superior Court: Sir W. Meredith resigned 29th September, 1884; Sir A. Stewart resigned 23rd November, 1889; Mr. Justice Rainville resigned 12th April, 1886; Mr. Justice Papineau resigned 7th May, 1889; Mr. Justice Sicotte resigned 7th November, 1887; Mr. Justice Chagnon resigned 12th November, 1887; Mr. Justice Buchanan resigned 18th January, 1887. 5. Chapter 7 of 49-50 Victoria (1886), Quebec, increases the number of Superior Court judges from 27 to 28. Chapter 11 of 50 Victoria (1887), Quebec, increases the number of judges of the Superior Court from 28 to 30. These Acts were forwarded to the Government of Canada. Chapter 21 of 54 Victoria (1890) increases the number of the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench from 6 to 8. These three Acts are Acts of the Province of Quebec. 6. We are aware that the Act was passed by the Quebec Legislature last session to appoint two additional judges to the Court of Queen's Bench, having special jurisdiction in criminal cases in the district of Montreal. Act is not now in force, and therefore the appointment of two additional judges has not been made. It is too soon to state whether the Government will make the appointment or not, as the Act has not been proclaimed. I think that the other information asked for in the remainder of the question will have to be moved by way of motion.

TOTAL NUMBER OF VOTERS—QUEBEC.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked. What was the number of votes given generally, in the Province of Quebec, at election of 5th March last? The number of votes given in each county for each candidate?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The report of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery will give the information. The report has not yet been distributed, because of certain irregularities, but it will be before the House in a short time.

PORT GEORGE PIER.

Mr. BORDEN asked, 1. Was the work of constructing the pier at Port George let by tender and contract? 2. If so, who was the successful tentractor made any claim for extras? 5. If so, how much and on what grounds?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. 1. Yes. Tenders were called for by public advertisement and a contract was entered into for the work in Quebec. 2. Frederick Toms, of Ottawa, whose tender was the lowest, viz., $9,447. 3. One other tender was received, viz., from Ansley Elliott, of Port George, for $9,500. 4. The contractor has made a claim for extras to the Chief Engineer. 5. The claim is for $3,007.37, as follows: (a.) To close gap of thirty feet between inner end of contract work and existing structure, $1,800. (b.) To close further gap, eleven feet in length, at $66.67, $733.37. (c.) Clearing away old work for above eleven feet, $150. (d.) Stringers, flooring, bolts, &c., in repairing outer end of old wharf, exclusive of above eleven feet, $50. (e.) 800 lineal feet of close sheeting on inner face, with bolts, &c, at 18 cents, $144. 150 feet twelve-inch longitudinal timber, at 20 cents, $30. (g.) Five additional mooring posts in place, $20-$100. Total, $3,007.37. Of the above claim the sum of $2,540 has been allowed, made up of the following: (a.) $1,800—to close gap of thirty feet made by a storm between the time of receipt of tenders and awarding of contracts. This work was done by special agreement between the contractor and the department, under date 12th August, 1890. (b.) $540 allowed to close a second gap nine feet in length, actual measurement, caused by storm after contract was awarded. (c.) $50 allowed on this item as a fair and reasonable price. (d.) Item allowed, $50-work was done. Items (e) and (f) not allowed. (g.) Ordered by Engineer and placed in work. Price, $100—fair and reasonable.

RAILWAYS IN INVERNESS COUNTY.

Mr. FRASER asked, Was the subsidy voted at the last session of Parliament to the Inverness and Richmond Railway for the purpose of relieving the County of Inverness from the municipal aid promised to the company by the said county? Does the Government propose to grant an additional subsidy to the said line of railway during the present session or at any other time? If so, what amount? Does the Government propose to build a branch railway from Orangedale to Broad Cove Mines, in the County of Inverness? Have the Government at any time promised to build said railway? Was such promise made by the Government, or any person on their behalf, previous to the 5th of March last?

Mr. HAGGART. The subsidy was granted in accordance with an agreement between the company for the first 50 miles of its line of railway and the municipality of Inverness, and as the Act provides it shall be paid on the completion of each 10mile section, in accordance, as nearly as practicable, with the agreement between the company and municipality of Inverness, and with section 4 of the Act of the Legislature of Nova Scotia (1890), intituled: "An Act to enable the County of Inverness to borrow money." The question of an additional subsidy is still under consideration. In answer to the second part of the question, I say that the application to that effect was made by Dr. Cameron, member for the county. Without promising to build this branch, the First Minister | quired to keep his office open as late as 9 p.m. in Mr. BORDEN.

promised to have a careful investigation made as to the probable cost of the line and the volume of trade, and this is being done.

QUEBEC BBIDGE.

Mr. FREMONT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to initiate, this session, any measure calculated to assist in the construction of a bridge over the River St. Lawrence at or in the vicinity of the city of Quebec?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not the intention this session.

DUTY ON PLATE PRESENTED TO THE MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. FORBES (for Mr. Davidson) asked, What amount was paid as duty on the plate presented to the Minister of Public Works in March, 1889? Who paid such duty? In whose name was said plate imported?

Mr. HAGGART. The amount of duty paid on plate mentioned is $329.30. The importation was made through A. Rosenthal, jeweller, Sparksstreet, Ottawa.

REVISION OF VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. BRODEUR asked, Whether the Government have instructed the revising officers to prolong the preliminary revision up to the 15th August? If not, is it their intention so to do?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The answer I gave earlier to day.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (for Mr. Monette) asked, Whether tenders were called for, for the supply of leather and boot and shoe-making findings for the penitentiary of St. Vincent de Paul during the year 1891? If so, how many tenders were received; what was the amount of each tender and the name of the tenderer: was the lowest tender accepted, and if not, why not?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Tenders were called Three tenders were received, namely, Louis Chevalier, $1,915.60; S. S. Hubbell, $1,918; Alexis Chouinard, $2,121.30. The lowest tender was not accepted. The second tender, $3.15 higher, was accepted, because the tenderer, who was the old contractor, had supplied articles called for under his former contract of the very best quality, and it was considered in the public interest that his contract should be renewed.

HOURS OF RURAL POST OFFICES.

Mr. LAURIER asked, What are the regulations concerning the opening and closing hours of rural post offices?

Mr. HAGGART. The regulations on the subject of the opening and closing are as follows:-Post offices are understood to be kept open during the ordinary business hours of the locality; and, as a matter of fact, most country offices are open from 7 to 7.30 in the morning till 7.30 to 8 in the evening. If the principal mail of the day arrives in the evening a postmaster will sometimes be reorder that letters may be delivered the same day. If no objection is raised by the people of the neighbourhood, the postmaster is allowed to close his office during half an hour to one hour at meal Except in the Province of Quebec, no post office is required to be kept open on Sunday. the Province of Quebec post offices are kept open for a hour, either before or after divine service. On statutory holidays post offices are allowed to be closed for the greater part of the day, the postmasters notifying the public beforehand of the hours during which correspondence will be received and delivered.

FISHERY RIGHTS AT RIMOUSKI.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, By what authority are the Government about to order the destruction of an eel-fishery (brush-weir) constructed on the property of F. F. Rouleau, Esq., advocate, of Rimouski, which said property has been held for nearly a century with right of hunting and fishing?

Under the authority of the Mr. TUPPER. general fishery regulations of the Province of Quebec, which prohibit fishing by means of nets or other apparatus without license or permission, the Department of Fisheries gave such instructions.

COMMANDER OF THE ALERT.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether Captain Ls. Honorius Lachance underwent an examination as a candidate for the position of commander of the Alert? If so, what was the result of the examination, and why was he not appointed commander of the Alert?

Mr. TUPPER. Captain Lachance was examined by Captain McElhinney for the position of master of the Alert. The result was that the record of service as given by Captain Lachance and the testimonials produced, although very good, were not so satisfactory as those furnished by others. not appointed because the examination of another person who has been placed in temporary charge was more satisfactory than that of Captain Lachance.

SETTLEMENT OF THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. DAVIN. In withdrawing the motion of which I have given notice:

That, whereas notwithstanding the liberal policy of the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald pursued in regard to the North-West Territories, and the well-established fact of the great fertility of the country, their settlement has not reached the proportions expected, this House is of opinion that a policy can be devised which will more rapidly people those territories;

I may say that I intended at first to lay a scheme before the House embracing the North-West affairs generally and bearing upon the direction of population to those territories, but if I were to place that before the House now, it would take too long to discuss it, and so I will drop the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

COMMISSIONER HERCHMER, NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. DAVIN moved:

Police, generally, from the date he became Commissioner to the present time, and especially with reference to his conduct during the last election in Western Assiniboia, and also into the conduct of the officers and the men of the Force in the said constituency during that election.

He said: Last year when I brought before the House the conduct of Col. Herchmer as Commissioner of the North-West Mounted Police, there was a discussion in which Mr. Blake and the hon. member for Saskatchewan and some other hon. gentlemen took part, and as a result of the discussion, a departmental enquiry was instituted. Mr. Comptroller White, who made the enquiry, had no authority to examine witnesses under oath, and I need hardly say that he had no power to call witnesses before him. The enquiry must, therefore, have been ineffective and unsatisfactory, and particularly when we remember that the officers who might have been examined must necessarily be subject to the interference of Commissioner Herehmer who was the person involved, and that they were, moreover, to be examined in a matter in regard to which the Superintendent General had spoken very strongly in Col. Herchmer's favour. Thus the non-commissioned officers and men who should be called to give evidence against the Commissioner would naturally feel like going to law with the devil in the court of hell. The consequence of this was that an enquiry was made which did not command the confidence of the people of the North-West Territories or of the body of the North-West Mounted Police Force, and I cannot hope that a report based upon such an enquiry would be such as to lead the Government to take the action required in the interest of the North-West Mounted Police and is called for by the peo-ple of the North-West Territories. When an officer occupying the position of Commissioner Herchmer, commanding about 1,000 men in such a territory as the North-West, is proven to be detested by his men and to be utterly detested from one end of that territory to the other—and Mr. White, the comptroller, will not attempt to say anything to the contraryit is not enough to say that he is severe. Other commanders have been severe. That is not sufficient, because a man can be a strict disciplinarian and yet be so much in touch with his men as to command their confidence and their respect. I will not go over the charges which I made against Commissioner Herchmer last year. Those charges remain, and we can substantiate them, if we get a proper enquiry, and I have other charges even graver in their nature than those which I have I may say, in passing, that, although the Commissioner is, in my opinion, quite unfit for the office he occupies, the result of my bringing these charges before the House has been that which such action always has, of improving matters. It is a feeling that astonishes me, brought up, as I have been, in England and watching the course of political events there, that here it is considered better, if you can, not to ventilate any matter of this kind in the House of Commons. Why, the best thing for a member of Parliament, whether he happens to be, as I am, a supporter of the Government, or whether he happens to be an opponent of the Government, if he cannot secure a remedy from the Government itself, That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that he will be pleased to cause an enquiry to be made into the conduct of Lawrence W. Herchmer, Commissioner of the North-West Mounted try, it is the grand inquest of the nation, and this is the place in which to bring up any grievance, whether it be a small grievance concerning an individual, or a grievance of the greatest magnitude. Just before the late elections, I received a letter from one of the ablest officers of the North-West Mounted Police, in which, after complimenting me on what I had accomplished for that force, he says:

"1. As to the officers, we are no longer treated like dogs.

"2. Grievances of officers and men have been brought before the public.

"3. Big sentences of twelve or six months for trivial offences are now never heard of in general orders.

"4. Whenever a case of any consequence comes up it receives due attention.

"5. That punishment is never awarded before the evidence is heard."

A case occurred, however, just before I left Regina where sentence was awarded before evidence was heard. The man was not heard at all and was sentenced right off. -

"6. That the need of a Pension Bill had been pressed on the attention of the Government and the public.

"7. That since the matter was brought up in Parliament, the police had obtained a better reputation.

"8. That the men had not left the force in such numbers as they used to do."

Well, Sir, if we have accomplished that by ventilating these matters in Parliament, we have accomplished a good deal. But though that has been accomplished, as I will show you, Commissioner Herchmer is utterly unfit for the position. Sir, on the very day that I received a telegram from Ottawa stating that Parliament had been dissolved, I received a letter from Commissioner Herchmer-I was not accustomed to speak to him then, and I am not accustomed to speak to him now-asking me for an interview. I at once sent word that I would give him the interview. said: "My dear Sir, -will you give me an interview in a matter of importance to the public interest." I gave him the interview; I did not know of what character it was likely to be. When he came to my office I bowed him into a chair, and he then told me that he came to make an appeal to me. said: "The police force is utterly demoralized." I said: "That is a most extraordinary statement for you to make to me. What have I to do with that?" "Oh," he said, "you are a public man, and you ought to be interested in the welfare of such a force as this." "Well," I said, "how is it demoralized?" He said: "The officers do not care any more for me; Mr. Fred. White does not care any more for me." I said to him: "What officers do not care any more for you?" He said: "Major Steele and Captain Deane." "Well," I said to him, "I may tell you this, that one word viva voce, or written ever passed between Major Steele and myself, or between myself and Captain Deane. "Well," he said, "they know they have a strong man fighting against me in you, and that they have a Cabinet Minister behind them." I did not know whom he meant, I did not ask him whom he meant, and he did not mention the name, but they knew they had a Cabinet Minister behind them. Now, Sir, I mention that fact, it can be taken quantum valeat. His letter was not marked private, he did not tell me the conversation was private. I say the commander of that force came Mr. DAVIN.

an appeal to you." He was good enough to say that he believed me to be a manly man; he said I had fought him openly, as he had fought me. He had come to make an appeal to me, and the appeal was this: That I would not allow him to be driven from that force without having a sworn enquiry into his conduct. He said: "You are not going to let me be driven from the force without an enquiry under oath." I said to him: "Col. Herchmer, I have fought you strongly, but if I see that the least wrong is about to be done to you, I will defend you as far as my poor influence goes, and I will insist on having a sworn enquiry into your con-After that I bowed him out of the room, and he left. I should add, however, that he "Of course you are going to be said to me: elected by acclamation; I always knew you would. I may say I knew very well that some months before he was threatening that when the election came on he with his policemen would "let me Well, Sir, the election came on, and what did this gentleman do? I found that he was working against me. I telegraphed to Sir John A. Macdonald and to Mr. White that Col. Herehmer Mr. White telegraphed was working against me. to him: "Mr. Davin telegraphs to the Premier that you are working against him. You must not do this, you must not interfere." I ought to tell do this, you must not interfere." the House that a Conservative was running against me, so that from the point of view of voting it did not matter to the Government which of us got in.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You were the better

Mr. DAVIN. I do not say anything of that sort; but I do say that I had rendered services to the party and the man I was fighting against, had rendered no services. Let me say this: that when two men are running, belonging to the same party, one of whom has never done anything for the party, and the other man has fought for the party-I do not say it is not a fair law of political morality to let them fight it out amongst themselves, but I say that if I were the leader myself I would depart from that political morality, and I certainly would support the man that had been prominent in supporting me. Now, Commissioner Herchmer gets directions that he must not interfere. Remember, he gets directions from his head the Superintendent General that he must not interfere; he gets directions from the Prime Minister of Canada that he must not interfere. How did he obey? How did this military man obey the command of his superior? He wrote a letter to be read to the police at each division in my constituency: "The police are at liberty to vote how they like, but I am in favour of Tweed." Now, you know what the Quaker said when he told the mob not to nail a man's ear to the pump—he meant that they should nail it. What was the result in this case? The result was that the officers and men, who up to that time were in my favour and were determined to vote for me, when the election came round voted against me, and one of them at Maple Creek went so far as to keep in men that were friends of mine. I happen to know how the voting stood at Maple Creek. Before this letter of Herchmer's was read the voting stood: Davin 17, Tweed 4. The day after it was read the voting stood: Tweed 16, Davin to me and made that statement. Well, then, he none. I happened to be at Maple Creek on the further stated to me: "Now I have come to make day of the voting. Major Jarvis was previously in my favour himself, but I saw him drive down two carriages full of men to vote straight against me.

Mr. WATSON. Government carriages?

Mr. DAVIN. Government carriages, and I can prove, if an enquiry is given, as I hope it will be, that Constables Forbes, Grinton, Brodie and Mc Donald would not vote against their convictions, that is, they would not vote against me, and they were not allowed to leave the barracks. Another, Van Pityus, would not vote against me, and he was given stable duty, and although one of the men, who subsequently drove down with Major Jarvis, volunteered to take the stable duty in his stead, he was not allowed to do so. I, myself, saw Major Jarvis drive down with his two traps full of men to register their votes against me. I said to him: "This is a nice state of things. The police ought to be disfranchised." He said that they ought not to be The police ought to be allowed to vote. I will tell you, moreover, what happened there. I gave directions to my friends there that the two hotels, which were in my favour-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Wait a little, and the laugh will be on the other side of your mouth. I asked the proprietors of those hotels to keep their bars closed during the day of the election, as they were known to be friends of mine, and I can aver that, as far as I saw, they carried out the instructions to the letter, and they also obeyed the law which requires such places to be closed. I am told that they did the same after I left. It was one o'clock when I left, and during the time I was there, what did I see? My opponent had the bar of one of the houses open, that is to say, the back door was It was one of those saloons, and the halfbreeds were taken in there, and something like seventy or eighty of them, I think, got a glass or two of whiskey, and then they were marched up and voted against me. Friends of mine there said to me: "Do you not see those fellows: they are hanging off, getting liquor; cannot you stop it? I said, that of course I could stop it, but I would not stop it. I could not conscientiously have done so. I could easily have stopped the men going and voting against me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. How?

Mr. DAVIN. I said: "I know very well how it can be done, but I am not going to do it, for two reasons. In the first place, I am conscientiously opposed to breaking down the self-respect of any voter, be he half-breed or otherwise. In the next place, because it is unnecessary, for I can win this election by 300 majority." The answer I received was: "Are you sure? Look at the people there against you." I replied: "You may bet $500 to a cent that I will have a majority of 300." He said: "If you are sure of having a majority, all right." I said: "Very well, let the whole vote go.

Mr. WATSON. How would you get it?

Mr. DAVIN. The friend of mine who spoke to me about it, told me how I could get the vote. What he said to me I am not going to tell to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), because I do not want to give him a wrinkle in election matters that would be perfectly new to him, and

Regina the very first man to vote was Commissioner Herchmer himself. Then he at once sent his own carriage over to the sergeants' mess to take down a body of men to vote against me, and he declared that he would weed them out—that he would weed out those fellows who had the audacity to vote for me. Well, Sir, he at once began to persecute the men. A man named Flindt, who is one of the most respectable men holding any Government position in Canada, a man who stood high in the favour of the Commissioner up to that day, became the subject of his disapproval. The next day there were nothing but frowns for him. A man named Harvey, in the office, happened to send a letter by post instead of having it sent by an orderly, whereupon Flindt, who was at the head of the office, and who was a sergeant of the staff, was brought before Commissioner Herchmer, who spoke very angrily to him, and told him on account of this man's laches, that of sending a letter by post instead of by orderly, that if he was brought before him again he would be reduced to the ranks. Another man named Thompson, of Wood Mountain, was at once told that he was dismissed. I need hardly say that I communicated to the authorities in reference to these matters, and we have stopped most, in fact all, the persecutions that we can get at. I need hardly say that it is as pervasive as the atmosphere. C. A. Corneil, a constable and a saddler, had before the election given great satisfaction, according to Quartermaster Allan. On Wednesday following, March 5th, he went to the store, and Captain Allan said he was up in orders for promotion. That night another constable, senior to him by three weeks, was put in charge of the shop. His name is Corporal Hollister. Allan asked Corneil; "Who is senior, you have been satisfactory, you take charge of the shop." Allan further said to him: "I will put you in orders for promotion." But the other man got the promotion, although there was no complaint against Corneil. Allan recommended his stepson, James Clair, for promotion, and it was to take place after the election. He was immediately sent for by the Commissioner-this being after the election-who said to him: "Here are a number of men who voted for Davin, among them your pets." Allan replied: "Here is your own private secretary, Flindt, who has also voted the same way.

Mr. O'BRIEN. How do you know how these men voted?

Mr. DAVIN. It is an open vote. I promised Mr. Blake last year that if he would make a motion to introduce the ballot into the North-West, I would support it. I have always been opposed to the ballot, but in view of my experience at the last election, I have come to be converted to believe in it. The Commissioner appointed a man named Currier, as acting Quartermaster. Captain Allan refused to be responsible, but the man still continued to perform duties. The Commissioner did not even reply to Allan's letters. Special Constable Waldron, who was a good officer, right after the election was discharged. A constable named Pitts, immediately after the election, was also persecuted. Constable Moffatt went to Dr. Dodd, who voted for me—I did not hear this from the doctor, but from an independent authority—and especially as he might possibly not have the virtue the doctor, but from an independent authority—and to resist, as I had. On the day of election in he was told: "You will get hell for voting for

 $92\frac{1}{3}$

I rather think the persecutions have been in which returns to the Orders of the House are pretty well stopped, because I at once communicated with Sir John Macdonald and with Mr. White. I received an autograph letter from Sir John Macdonald saying a rigid enquiry would be made into Commissioner Herchmer's conduct, and he spoke to me on the subject when I came here. One of the last letters he wrote to me, a few days before his lamented death, was giving me an apfortunately, that appointment never came off. So there is the case made have with which I am not going to weary the House, and this case now of his interfering with the election of a member of Parliament, as he did, and not only interfering with the election but acting contrary to the express orders of the Prime Minister, who was not only the Prime Minister, but was his superior officer, a fact which adds greatly to the weight of the charge against him.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The resolution, I presume, is based on the charges which the hon, gentleman made last session. I presume it is to those charges he refers when he alludes in his resolution to the conduct of Commissioner Herchmer, and it is necessary, in order that the House may understand the position of the question, that I should remind it of what took place during the debates of last year. The hon, member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) made a number of specific charges against Commissioner Herchmer, on which he based a resolution which formed the subject of a debate during a whole afternoon. The resolution was negatived on a division, but, in the course of the debate I think I am correct in saying, the First Minister promised that a departmental enquiry would take place into the charges which the hon, member had made in his place. The hon, gentleman's view of the case for an enquiry was sustained by other members of the House, one of them the hon, member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), who, I think, himself suggested that ad epartmental enquiry should be made with a view to ascertaining whether at a subsequent period a fuller enquiry under oath should follow. Later in the year, notwithstanding that this resolution was negatived, the Superintendent of Mounted Police was instructed by the Minister who had charge of that force to proceed to the North-West and to make an enquiry into the charges which the hon, gentleman had made here. Mr. White, in pursuance of that instruction, went to the North-West, and made a careful enquiry into all these charges; and not only that, but he caused likewise public notification to be given, that he was there for the purpose of investigating any complaints which might be brought forward against Col. Herchmer; because the lion, gentleman for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) had not only made specific charges, but had made general charges also, which it was understood could be brought forward and substantiated if an opportunity were afforded. The result of these proceedings has been, as I informed the House on the question of the hon. gentleman himself not many days ago, that Mr. White prepared a very elaborate and full report, as to the result of his investigation into these charges. That report would have been on the Table of the House to-day but for an accident. It was sent by the head of the department to the Department of the Secretary of State, to be forwarded here, in the manner reason to say that this side of the House has ever Mr. DAVIN.

furnished; but this report had not, in point of fact, been called for by an Order of the House, or by an Address, and in consequence of that slight irregularity it has not yet reached me. I will probably have it in the course of the day, and I will lay it on the Table for the hon, gentleman's information. beg to say, with regard to that report, and in advance of its coming here, that it will contain simply the departmental answer, in so far as it can be obtained, to the charges the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) made in the House last session. Although it is a very full and elaborate document, it will not profess to deal exhaustively with either the specific or general charges which were then made. In consequence of circumstances which I need not go into, it was not possible for the Commissioner to make a thorough investigation at that time of year, such an investigation, under oath, as it would have been desirable to make before the charges could be considered as having been entirely disposed of. On his return from the North-West, Mr. White was instructed by the First Minister to proceed, in the month of November next, to the North-West, when the troops would be at their quarters and when a fuller investigation could be made. Notwithstanding that, the réport will contain a good deal of information, disposing of a good many of the charges which the hon, gentleman referred to last year. The report, as I told the House last week, was only completed a few days ago, and that will account for the delay in bringing it down. I have now to say to the hon, gentleman, that, in consequence of what I have stated, the report could not be a very complete one. it is desirable that an investigation under oath should follow the enquiry which Mr. White made, it is intended by the head of the department, who is the First Minister, that an enquiry shall be made into the charges which were preferred during last session; into any charges that have been prepared to-day, and into any other charges that may be brought forward; I may say that it is the wish of Colonel Herchmer that that enquiry should be conducted under oath, and should be more formal and more ample than the enquiry which has already taken place. I am in a position to state to the hon, gentleman that it is the intention to make that enquiry, as a result of the departmental investigation which I have already referred to, and which was itself a fulfilment of the promise made last year. Under these circumstances, I think the hon, gentleman will see that it is not necessary to press the resolution for an Address to accomplish what has already been determined on.

Mr. LAURIER. I must take exception to one or two remarks which fell from the lips of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) while introducing this motion. If I understood the hon, gentleman aright, he stated that there was in this country a sentiment quite the reverse of what the sentiment in England is, inasmuch as that there seems to be here, amongst politicians of all shades and opinions, a general disinclination to have grievances ventilated. I cannot say but that this remark I cannot say but that this remark might very well refer to the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs, but certainly that remark cannot apply to this side of the House. He has no been disinclined to ventilate grievances. But, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the hon, gentleman himself is not at all free from the charge which he makes against others. I would think that he does not seem to be very much inclined to ventilate these grievances, for although he has made these charges on the floor of the House on one, two, three, or four occasions, he never took the right step to have these grievances properly investigated. The hon, gentleman stared himself, and stated very truly, that Parliament is the great court of enquiry of the nation. Why, then, did he not ask that these grievances should be investigated by this court of enquiry? This is the place to have these grievances investigated, and if the hon, gentleman, instead of asking as he now asks, a Royal Commission, or as he asked last year, simply a departmental investigation, if he had asked a committee of the House to investigate these grievances, it would have led to an investigation in which, he certainly must admit, there would be a better chance of arriving at the truth than if the investi-That is the way gation were conducted by others. in which the hon, gentleman should have proceeded, in my judgment, in order to have that justice for which he is now seeking. What has taken place in reference to this matter? Last year, the hon. gentleman made very serious charges against an officer of the Department of the Interior; he was promised a departmental investigation; he is now told by the Minister of Justice that this investigation is not thorough; that it has been at best superficial; and therefore he cannot expect to have very much satisfaction from it. Now he is promised another investigation. Has he any reason to believe that the investigation to be made next fall will be any more thorough than the investigation made last fall? Has he any reason to believe that he will have more justice done to him, and to the public which he represents in the section of the country from which he comes, from this investigation, than was done him by the previous investigation? I agree with him, that Parliament is the great court of enquiry. In this young nation it is the place to ventilate such grievances, and if the hon, gentleman were to move for a committee of the House to investigate the very grave charges which he made against Colonel Herehmer, that would, in my opinion, have been the best method The hon. to arrive at the truth in this matter. gentleman has also complained—and I am not sorry for that-of the interference of public officers in elections. I am very glad to see that we shall have the sympathy of a prominent member of the Conservative party upon that question. sorry that the hon, gentleman has had the interference of public officers against him in his election. I am very glad to see him elected since the issue in that constituency was between two Conservatives, but if it were between a Liberal and a Conservative, I would not say so much. The issue was between two Conservatives, and I am glad to see the hon, gentleman elected, but I am not sorry that in his election he had to fight against the interference of public officers. The hon. gentleman will see that the interference of public officers in elections is not at all to be tolerated in this country, and I suppose that henceforth we on this side shall have his support when we bring that question before the House.

Mr. AMYOT. I am very glad that the Government have decided to grant an enquiry, for it shows that the hon, member for Assimboia (Mr. Davin) was perfectly justified last year, when he protested on behalf of the country, against the conduct of Colonel Herchmer. When I was in the North-West myself, I happened to hear something about one of the Herchmers, but I will not go into these details. I am sorry that the Government have hesitated so long to grant the request for an enquiry. because, during the year and a-half since the Gov-ernment have been put in possession of the facts, they have left Herehmer omnipotent in the North-We know what an amount of harm the misconduct of commanding officers of a large force like this may do. I believe the enquiry would be much better held by this Parliament; but at all events it would be good to have one. The enquiry is necessary, not only for the force that may suffer, but for the officers themselves, who cannot remain at the head of the force if the charges made against them are not completely disproved. I will take the liberty to quote here accusations which have been spread broadcast in the press of this country against the officers of this force. I take this extract from a paper which usually supports the Government, L'Etendard, of Montreal. It is translated by the McLeod Gazette, and is as follows:-

"Last autumn, at the time of the Governor General's visit to the North-West, W. W. Herchmer, Assistant Commissioner and tyrant No. 2, ordered Major Steele, superintendent of the force at McLeod, to retire Inspector Courtland Starnes, the French-Canadian officer from Montreal, from the command of the escort of police, which was to form part of the guard of honour of the Governor General at Lethbridge, saying to Major Steele: The orders of the commissioner (tyrant No. 1) are that not one of those d—n French-Canadians is to be given a place on the escort or allowed to distinguish himself in any way." The result was that an Englishman replaced Starnes. The following evening the same W. W. Herchmer, in the course of social reunion, said to Starnes that all French-Canadians were b—ds, sons of b—s, and sons of w—s; and all this can be corroborated by evidence; the veracity of which cannot be called in question for a moment. The whole has been reported, word for word, to the department at Ottawa, in the handwriting of officers who were witnesses of the affair, and at the request of the comptroller, Mr. Fred. White. Another charge is that the Commissioner, L. W. Herchmer, not long since ordered that a French-Canadian officer should be stationed at a far distant post for several months without being relieved, in order that he might be prevented from seeing his panele, a French-Canadian lady, in the hope of seeing the engagement broken, and the marriage in question prevented. Officers McDonnell and Howe and Major Steele can prove this. Major Steele received the order, handed it over on leaving to Howe, who in his turn handed it over on leaving to Howe, who in his turn handed it over on leaving to Howe, who in his turn handed it over on leaving to Howe, who in his turn handed it over on leaving to Howe, who in his turn handed it over on leaving to Howe, who in his turn handed it over on leaving the mass faithfully carried out, and while English officers were relieved every month, the unfortunate French-Canadian was compell

This gives an idea of tyranny and bigotry on the part of these officers which calls for an immediate investigation by the Government. I cannot suppose for one moment that there is one amongst the Ministers, who, having good reason to believe the truthfulness of these charges, would hesitate for one moment to have an immediate enquiry instituted, and to see that these gross wrongs be not repeated. The paper goes on:

"Still another. French-Canadians have not received their share of promotion, and they do not want them to enter the Mounted Police although applications on their part are numerous, and they make excellent soldiers. The reason given by our tyrants is that the French-Canadians are not tall enough, which is veritable libel."

These are the specific charges, and I might go on reading further. I see by the McLeod Gazette of the month of June last that the condition of officers is not overrated, but that the harm still goes on. We have, of course, no power on this side of the House to enforce anything; but I hope that there will be no undue delay in the organization of the commission of enquiry. If it is true that Colonel Herchmer has been guilty of the thing charged against him—that in fact. as the papers put it, discipline has been maintained in spite of his bad conduct, his injustice and his tyranny-it is in the interest of society at large that it should be put a stop to at once. I read these facts to this honourable House so as to inform the members of the Govermnent, and I hope that when they are so informed they will see the commission is issued at once and that the enquiry shall be of a serious nature, so that the wrong-doing which has been going for so long a time will be speedily put a stop to.

Mr. DAVIN. I beg to withdraw the motion.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Before the motion is withdrawn I wish to say one word with regard to the paper which the hon, member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) has read. Of course no officer could remain in the service of the Government an hour who had used such language as the hon, member has read from that paper. I did not understand Colonel Herchmer had ever been charged with using that language. I understood that the charge had applied to another officer of the same name, who not only emphatically denies it, but tenders his oath in denying it. As to Colonel Herchmer, although I understood that the charge was not made against him, he is ready to testify under oath before any tribunal that he never used that language.

Mr. AMYOT. Has the other officer who used that language been discharged?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am not aware what officer used it or that any officer did; but the officer charged with using it denied, and was ready to deny under oath, ever having used it.

Mr. DAVIN. Perhaps I may be allowed to say, in answer to the remarks made by the hon. leader of the Opposition, that I watched closely the enquiry made by Mr. White, and I happen to know that it was made as thoroughly as under the circumstances it could be made; and now that the Government are ready to have an enquiry made under oath, I have the fullest confidence that it will be thorough.

Motion withdrawn.

VETERANS OF 1837-38.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the Government should bestow some mark of recognition upon the veterans of 1837-38 for their services to the country at that time.

He said: I desire to call the attention of the House entail much sacrifice of the public funds, to comand the Government to the claim for recognition of pensate in some measure their self-sacrifice. But Mr. Amyor.

a large number of old men throughout the country who served their country well and faithfully, in 1837 and 1838, under very trying circumstances. It will be in the recollection of some of the members of this House-and if they do not remember the circumstances, they have been taught them in their schools--that fifty or sixty years ago an agitation was commenced in this country by some men who believed there were wrongs to be righted, and injustices and inequalities to be remedied. agitation which they started threatened to overthrow the constituted Government by force, and they were aided and assisted in their efforts by foreign sympathisers who desired to wrest this country from the British Crown. When this agitation took form, an armed body marched upon Toronto with the intention of seizing the Government and the public archives, in order to constitute another Government. Then a little band of the loyal men of Canada were roused, and voluntered in hundreds and thousands to defend their Government and drive the foreign invader from our country's shores. These men left their homes, their families, and their farms in midwinter, and travelled many miles to their different places of rendezvous, and were formed into militia corps and served in the ranks for many months. Some of them served under fire, and distinguished themselves. Many of these old men allege most distinctly that they were promised for their services grants of land, but this promise, if made, was never carried out. Most of these loyal men who served their country then have passed away, but some remain, and many of them toand in distressed day are poor, destitute circumstances, and they have held public meetings all over the country and asked for some recognition for their services. Our volunteers who, during the last rebellion, performed no greater services than were performed by these men in 1837 and 1838, who endured no greater privations, have been rewarded by the country for their public services with grants of land in the North-West and decorations; and these old men, whose cause I plead today, ask, with some justice and with confidence, that their services should be rewarded, or, at all events, recognized, but their request has as yet not met with a favourable answer. They point to the fact that the men who served their country in 1812-15 were rewarded, about twelve or fifteen years ago, by a grant of money. It is true, the pension given them was small, $25 or $30 a year, but it was some recognition for their services, and it pleased the men who got it. In the same way, if some small recognition should be made to these men of 1837 and 1838, it would be satisfactory to them, and would be an encouragement to our young men in the future to serve their country in times of public difficulty, when called on to do so. Such recognition would satisfy these veterans, who feel that they saved their country from a great disaster, and secured to it, in a great measure, the high position it holds among the colonies of Great Britain. In bringing their claims before the House, I know I am but a very feeble spokesman for them; but their claims, I am sure, speak loudly for themselves. These men are scattered through the country and are not very numerous, and it would be a gracious act on the part of this Parliament, and one which would not entail much sacrifice of the public funds, to combetween 2,000 or 3,000 still survive; if their services could be recognized, they would feel greatly pleased and would go down to their graves satisfied that their services had been in some measure appre-Even if a grant of land or a pension cannot be given them, some small recognition should be made which would be satisfactory to them and their

Mr. ALLISON. I am pleased to find that the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) has brought this matter before the House. Some five or six weeks ago I placed upon the Notice paper a question asking whether it is the intention of the Government to make a grant of land to each of the survivors of the volunteers who assisted in suppressing the rebellion in Canada in 1837 and 1838. In answer to my question, the hon. Minister of Militia said it was not the intention of the Government to do so, and the reason he gave was that the services of these men, who took part in suppressing that rebellion, were rendered previous to Confederation, and that consequently it was a matter belonging exclusively to the old Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I am glad to-day to find upon the Notice paper the motion of the hon. member for Frontenac:

Now, I fully concur in the sentiments contained in this resolution, and believe that this Parliament should grant some recognition for the services so rendered. I believe that that recognition should be a valuable one, say a grant of 160 acres of land to each survivor. We have large areas of land in the North-West, in Manitoba and in British Columbia; and we find, Sir, individuals, companies and organizations constantly knocking at the door of this Parliament to obtain the withdrawal of these lands from the market in order that they may be placed in their hands for speculation. These men who are asking for these lands have done no service to this country in any respect, and I think it would be greatly to the credit of this House and this Government to grant a certain quantity of these lands to each of these survivors of the men who helped to suppress that rebellion, instead of granting them to men who never rendered any service to their country. It would not draw very heavily upon our land resources to grant this request. A very large number of those old men have passed over to the majority, and only a few comparatively are living to-day. the United States it has been the common custom, wherever the militia have been called on to service to protect their country, to recognize their services by grants of land warrants. Now, Sir, I do not wish to base a reason for this land being granted on any example gathered from the United States. I would place it upon a higher plane. I would place it upon the ground of the old flag which we all revere. That flag has floated over this country ever since the pioneers came from the old land and used their axes in cutting down the forest and since then have contended with the hardships which are attendant upon settlement in a new country. When the rebellion broke out, the sons of those pioneers went to the front and defended this country when it was assailed, so I think it is only right to grant them a portion of oppression of the old "family compact." I say, this land which they so nobly defended. Minister of Militia has said that this belongs to the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, but if the people of those provinces had not prevented this rebellion being successful, we would probably not have had a Dominion of Canada to-day, and, instead of the British flag floating over us, the Stars and Stripes might have been floating over this country. We all form part of the Dominion from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific, and I think all should feel an interest in showing some recognition of the services of those who fought in our behalf. I have great pleasure in supporting the motion of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick).

Mr. TISDALE. I propose to say a few words as to the practical part of this subject. I agree with the two gentlemen who have preceded me, and, though I am not in favour of any large measures of pensions being granted in this country, there may be circumstances to justify the granting of pensions. The fact has been referred to that no pensions have been granted by the provinces which, before the Dominion was formed, had entire control of this matter. There is a great deal to be said, no doubt, as to the provinces being the proper tribunal to deal with this case, but they have not acted; and my support of this motion is based on the ground that these are old men, they are not very numerous, and though they are, perhaps, not of the class that nations sometimes give pensions to, still because they were not wounded or disabled in the war, that is no reason why they should not be considered. They are old men, many of them are needy men, and, whether they were provincial men then or not, they helped to lay the foundations of a pation which tions of a nation which we hope to see established here. I know that many of these men need assistance, and deserve a recognition from the Government. Otherwise I think it would be an exceptional expenditure. The question of whether money or land grant should be given would be for the consideration of the Government, but, if the Government do not feel themselves in a position to make such a grant, at all events they can give some recognition, some mark of appreciation of the services of these men, which I am sure many of them would be proud of, in the shape of medals or something of that kind. The men out of whom the right sort of soldiers are made, and their descendants, recognize this sort of appreciation as being even higher than a money grant. I hope the Government will be able to grant them some assistance in a pecuniary way or in land, and I would like to see something further given in the way of medals.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. This question was up a little time ago, and I took the ground then that it was not advisable for the Government to make any recognition of those who took part in the troubles of 1837-38 unless the services of both parties were taken into consideration. Are we to reward those men who endeavoured to put down the struggle for freedom, and to ignore those who were instrumental in securing to Upper and Lower Canada the justice which we demanded and in obtaining the foundation for the civil and religious liberties we enjoy to-day; for, if it had not been for the action of the rebels in 1837-38, it is possible that we might still have been living under the iron heel of that all honour is due to William Lyon Mackenzie and Papineau and the rest of those who took part in that struggle, and their names should be more revered in Ontario and Quebec than the names of those who went out and fought against them when they were fighting in the cause of freedom. If we are honouring those who did good at that time, we must honour the rebels. Why, on the west side of this very parliamentary building, we have a monument erected to one of those rebels, and this Parliament voted $10,000 for a statue to the memory of George E. Cartier. And now we are asked to give a testimonial to the men who fought against the rebels who were in insurrection for the cause of liberty in this country. Lord Durham reported to the British Government that that rebellion was justifiable, and, if we have the Imperial authority for that, why is it proposed to reward those men who fought against the rebels? If any reward is due, it is to the men who stood up for civil and religious liberty and fought for the people and the people's rights, and obtained that measure of liberty which we have now. I hope no one who has any respect for the liberties we now enjoy will do any injustice to the memory of those who tried to uphold their rights and to put down the tyranny and oppression of the "family compact" which ruled the country at that time.

Mr. SPROULE. I will not attempt to answer the argument of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville), which seems to be that it is the duty of the Government to support and reward rebellion. I speak on this question because I have some of those old veterans in my riding. They have communicated with me on this subject, and I have had some conversation with some of them about it. I think the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) is entitled to the thanks of this House and the country for making this motion. It is the only instance in the Canadian history where men who have defended the flag and have endeavoured to put down rebellion, have not been compensated or recognized in any way for so doing. It is true that this took place before the union of Ontario and Quebec, but the fact that a substantial recognition of their services was not made before the union of these two provinces, and before they came into the Dominion of Canada, I do not think is a strong argument why we should not recognize the services of these men. The Dominion of Canada is composed largely of these two provinces in which the field of strife was. those men are living yet, and, as was stated by the member for Frontenac, and by some hon, gentlemen opposite, many of them are, comparatively speaking, dependent upon charity to-day for their living. They were useful in their time; they assisted in defending the constituted authority of the day and supported the flag under which they lived, maintaining what they believed to be law and order in the country; therefore, I say they are entitled not only to respect but to some greater recognition at the hands of the country. Now, many of them, as I said be-fore, are in comparative poverty, they are depen-dent upon charity, and if anything can be done to support them in their old age I think it would be to the credit of this country that it be done. There are others who are not dependent, but by whom some memento of the past would be cherished and would them, to bring about reform. I may say that be recognized as an evidence that the country still while I have in my constituency a few of those old Mr. Somerville.

remembered their virtuous conduct, and appreciated it, even at this late date. I think it would not require a large sum to remunerate them, and keep them above want in their old age. We have recognized the principle of giving land to those volunteers and others who took part in suppressing the rebellion in the North-West. Why should we not also give our recognition to those who defended law and order in 1837? As I said, we have recognized the principle by giving a land subsidy to every one who took part in suppressing the North-West rebellion, not only to those who were actually engaged in fight, but to those who were under arms at that time and who went west of Lake Superior. In this instance the parties who assisted in suppressing that rebellion got little or nothing in return. Now, as the hon, gentleman stated who introduced this motion, not many of them are living, therefore, it would not require much. They are passing down the decline of life, and have reached old age when infirmity prevents them from being able to earn a proper livelihood for themselves. I know one of them who unfortunately lost one of his limbs, and he would be very glad to receive something. I think it is unfortunate that these men who stood by the flag of their country and defended law and order and the integrity of the country, should be found in this dependent condition to-day, when they have passed the time of life that they can hope to be able to earn anything for themselves. I think it is time that we did something for them. Notwithstanding the fact that there is a union between these two provinces, I do not think that is a justifiable reason why we should do nothing for them. Many old questions have been settled from time to time by Parliament, and the events that took place in 1837 are not by any means so old that we should not recognize the services of the men who took part in them on the side of the Government. I know these men look forward to the time when the Government will do something for them, many hope that their services will be recognized, and I sincerely trust that this House will express the opinion that the Government should do something for these old men, and not only assist them in their infirmity, but also recognize the services which they rendered to the country at that time, and by so doing the Government will give a lesson to future generations as well as to the present genera-

Mr. SCRIVER. I think my hon, friend who sits behind me (Mr. Somerville) went a little too far when he asserted that the report of Lord Durham, with regard to the troubles of 1837-38, justified the rebellion which took place at that time. I do not think, according to my recollections of that report—which was certainly a very able one, and led to the adoption in this country of many important constitutional reforms, and to the disappearance of many of the abuses which existed prior to that time—I do not think the report went so far as to justify the resort to arms on the part of those who rebelled at that time. It is true that the report alleged, and alleged justly, that great abuses existed at that period, abuses which certainly justified the most determined constitutional endeavours on the part of those who suffered from veterans, my reasons for supporting the motion of the hon. member for Frontenac are rather of a personal character, more so, perhaps, than the reasons which influence other hon. members of this House. I may say that I am the son of a man who took up arms on that occasion. Although he was a Liberal all his life, and although he sympathized to a great extent with the views of those who went further than he did, yet, when armed rebellion broke out, he arrayed himself on the side of the constituted authorities, and believed it to be his duty to do all in his power to maintain the connection between this country and the mother We must not forget that those who rebelled at that time were aiming not so much at the correction of the abuses which existed then, as at the actual dissolution of the connection between this country and the mother country. The leaders of the rebellion, or most of them at all events, were in favour, if not of bringing about a union with the United States, at least of establishing a republican government in this country. We must not forget that those who, like my neighbours and my father, saw it to be their duty to take up arms and march a considerable distance to assist their neighbours whose territory was invaded, had to fight against, not merely their fellow-countrymen in rebellion, but a good many invaders who had joined them from the United States, and on that occasion several of my fellow-townsmen lost ther lives. They left widows and children behind them, who would actually have suffered had it not been for private charity. The Government of that day did did not see it to be their duty to come to the relief of those widows and orphans, and so an appeal was made to the benevolence of the people of the country, and a considerable fund was raised which was called the widows' and orphans' fund, and which was administered for the benefit and the support of the widows and orphans of whom I have spoken. I was very young at that time, but I can still remember the alacrity with which my neighbours sprang to arms and marched many miles through mud and snow. Though were a raw militia, they showed their courage and devotion by meeting the invaders and driving them back over the boundary line, those invaders at that time being in camp very near the boundary line and being armed with American muskets, and having, at least, one American cannon which was captured by the loyal volunteers. There are, as one or two hon. members have said, but very few of those old men now living. say that any of them in my constituency are suffering from actual want, but they do feel, and feel with a good deal of bitterness, that the services which they rendered on that occasion have not been properly recognized; and I think, Mr. Speaker, they have some reason to entertain this feeling. have never been satisfied with the excuse which has been alleged from time to time when a similar motion to the one brought forward by the hon. member for Frontenac has been presented to this House. The excuse which was made by a member of the Government, speaking on behalf of the Government on a previous occasion, was not a sufficient one. I cannot myself see now, and I never could see, why it would not be a graceful, a proper and a legitimate step for the Government to take, to recognize the services which those old men very important to the best interest of this country, by giving them at least a small grant of land.

Mr. DENISON. I did not intend to address the House on this question, but the extraordinary remarks that have fallen from the hon, member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) induced me to get on my feet. He enunciates the doctrine that men who rebel should be rewarded, as well as those who defend the constitution, provided that, in their opinion, the rebels were right. Well, he evidently believes that the men who rebelled in 1837-38 were right and justified in their rebellion. I certainly do not admit anything of the kind. There is a constitutional way by which men may redress their grievances. In 1837 they attempted this constitutional means, and, because they ignominiously failed, resorted to rebellion. They were led by Mr. William Lyon Mackenzie to take up arms in open rebellion. In the Province of Ontario, from which I come and for which I can better speak, the number of Canadians who took part in the rebellion was very small indeed, but they were indorsed and supported by what they called "Hunters' Lodges "-lodges organized, in the neighbouring states, with the object of subverting our constitution, of declaring Canada a republic, and of doing away with British power on this continent. They failed, and, as is always the case, the majority ruled; and even supposing they had never gone so far as they did, as the majority rules, when they were defeated at the polls they should have been satisfied and not have attempted to take up arms. They still had the recourse of keeping up their agitation of repeating at future elections the expressions they had uttered, and proclaiming their views, and that was the only constitutional way they could further push their grievances. I should like the hon. gentleman, if he has not already read Mr. Dent's book on the rebellion of 1837-38, to read it, because probably his opinion of William Lyon Mackenzie will be somewhat changed after reading it. The hon, member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) instanced the case of Sir George E. Cartier, a man for whose memory we all have the highest respect. At the time of 1837, Sir George E. Cartier, I understand, was a lad of about 18 years, and as he grew older he freely admitted that he was entirely wrong when he took up arms on that occasion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. DENISON. I am so informed. At any rate, what was the result in Sir George Cartier's case? He became a good subject of Her Majesty, and received one of the highest honours that can be given to a Canadian. He was made a baronet, and he deserved it. He has a statue on Parliament Hill, and he deserved it. But it was not erected because he took part in the rebellion of 1837, but on account of the great services he rendered to Canada, and I hope that any man, whether he is one who took part in the rebellion or not, if he renders good service to this country and regrets the course he may have taken when a young man, may be treated in the same way. If the doctrine stated by the hon member for North Brant were allowed to have any influence, what would be the case on the other side of the line? There they had a great rebellion lasting four years. The Southerners contended that they had a perfect right to rebel; rendered on an occasion very trying to them, and and from our standpoint, looking on the issue im-partially as outsiders, we think, I will say for myself, that I think, at all events, that constitutionally they had a ground for rebelling on account of state rights. But does any one suppose that when the Northern people took up the question of granting pensions to their soldiers who served during the war in suppressing the rebellion, they would consider the question of rewarding the men who had failed? Such an idea is highly absurd. Such a proposition would be laughed out of Congress. Yet that is a similar case to the present. In our case they fought only for a few weeks, but in the case of the Southerners they fought during a war that lasted four long years. They failed, and they had to take the consequences. Such an idea as recognizing rebels I never heard of before; it originates with the hon, member for North Brant. It has been suggested that as these events occurred before Confederation, the subject should not be taken up by this House. I think that is beyond the question, for this reason: that the men who turned out in 1837 were Canadians and they are Canadians to-day. They turned out then and did their duty to Canada, and if they earned any recognition at that time and it has not been granted them, surely this House will now, if they are entitled to recognition, do them justice. I think there will be no opposition from members from the Maritime Provinces and British Columbia to doing these men justice, and in the same manner there would be no objection offered on the part of Ontario and Quebec, as the older provinces, if a similar case occurred in the Maritime Provinces or British Columbia. I might also add that when this matter was brought before the attention of the Ontario Legislature, Mr. Mowat declared that it was a question not within the province of the Local Legislature, but one wholly to be dealt with by the Dominion Parliament. Mr. Mowat is. no mean authority on these questions. He is a very good constitutional lawyer, and on this question I am quite ready to take his opinion and agree with him that this is the proper House to deal with it. I should be glad to see it dealt with in a satisfactory manner. We have a precedent, as has been mentioned by the mover of the resolution, in the case of the veterans of 1812. A number of men in 1812 turned out to defend this country, both in Upper and Lower Canada, and those veterans are now enjoying a small pension, and I only wish it were more. This, however, furnishes a precedent which can be followed by the House If we were justified in granting pensions to the men who turned out in 1812 in defence of their country, which pensions are now being paid in other provinces than the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, surely we have the same right to do justice to the men who turned out in 1837-38. No doubt it , would be well to restrict the granting of it as closely as possible, but the number could be easily ascertained, because only those men who turned out in 1837-38 and appear on the rolls either as officers or men would be eligible, and these rolls are no doubt among the archives of Parliament. So there would be no difficulty in finding out who turned out, and the number of pensioners would no doubt be very small. I am very glad to have the opportunity of supporting the resolution.

Mr. McLENNAN. I have great pleasure in supporting the motion. I would say in the first lature had nothing to do with this matter, and then place, that I will be happy to support any motion he made a grant of $4,000 out of the public funds Mr. Denison.

which has for its object the granting of compensation to the volunteers of 1837-38, or which will insure some recognition for the services of those veterans. Hon, gentlemen on the other side of the House have referred to William Lyon Mackenzie, and if they will look at the history of the life of that gentleman, they will find a letter written by him to Earl Grey in 1849, which contains the following:

"A course of careful observation during the last twelve years has fully satisfied me that had the violent movements in which I and many others were engaged, on both sides of the Niagara, proved successful, that success would have deeply injured the people of Canada, whom I then believed I was serving at great risks. I have long been sensible of the errors committed during that period. No punishment that power could inflict or nature sustain, would have equalled the regrets I have felt on account of much that I did, said, wrote and published."

These are the remarks of William Lyon Mackenzie, to whom the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) refers. As this question has been already fully discussed in this House I shall deal briefly with it on the present occasion. I wish, however, to pronounce myself strongly infavour of compensation being given to the volunteers of 1837-38, and at any time I will be glad to support their claims whether in this House or elsewhere. The subject was before this House on a previous occasion, and it was then said that this was not the proper place to deal with it. When the matter was brought up in the Legislature of Ontario, the Hon. Mr. Mowat stated that the Legislature had nothing to do with it, and he gave his opinion in these words:

"It is quite true that the Dominion Government has chosen to throw off themselves the burden on the provinces, but surely the whole spirit of the British North America Act is that all matters of national concern are to be dealt with by the Dominion and not by the provinces, and if there is any matter that is of national and not of provincial concern, it is surely a subject such as this that the resolution deals with, namely, that the claims of the veterans of 1837-38 should be recognized."

Although Mr. Mowat made this statement, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that in the Legislature of Ontario, on the 10th of March, 1873, Mr. Boultbee moved for a Select Committee to enquire into the case of the widow and daughters of the late Colonel Baldwin and report thereon to the House, such committee to be composed of Messrs. Wood (Victoria), Cameron, Fraser, Meredith, Rykert and the mover. (Journals Legislative Assembly, Ontario, page 219.) On the 14th of March, 1873, Mr. Boultbee presented the report of the Select Committee on the On the 22nd March, the late Colonel Baldwin. General Mowat delivered Attorney the Speaker a Message from His Excellency, Lieutenant Governor Howland, which was read to the House (Journals, Legislative Assembly, Ontario, pages 309 and 310), transmitting the Estimates for that year and in the Supplementary Estimates mates is found at item 15:

"In full claim of the late Colonel Baldwin on late Province of Upper Canada, $4,000."

This was for being instrumental in raising and equipping a corps for the defence of this country, and through the fraud and misconduct of the contractor for the clothing of such corps, Colonel Baldwin became liable for such clothing to the extent of $2,000, and Mr. Mowat paid $4,000. We will here see the inconsistency of Mr. Mowat. He stated, in the first place, that the Local Legislature had nothing to do with this matter, and then he made a grant of $4,000 out of the public funds

I will give you another case in order to show the inconsistency of Mr. Mowat in this This was a case of John Montgomery. On page 244 Journals, Legislative Assembly, Ontario, for 1873, will be found that it was resolved that a Select Committee, consisting of the Honourable Messrs. Richards and Wood, and Messrs. Crosby, Fraser, Patterson, Prince, Farewell and Boultbee be appointed to enquire into the case of John Montgomery and report to this House. On the 26th March, 1873, it was reported from the Select Committee to which was referred the petition of John Montgomery, as follows:

"That this Committee have examined and report that property to the value of $1,589 belonging to the petitioner was taken from him and destroyed."

On 19th March, 1874, the hon. Attorney General Mowat delivered to the Speaker a Message from His Excellency Lieutenant Governor Crawford, transmitting the Estimates for that year, and in the Supplementary Estimates is found at item

"John Montgomery, compensation for claim against the Province of Upper Canada, $3,000." (Journals, Legislative Assembly, Ontario, 1874, p. 332.)

I may mention that John Montgomery, of the Township of York, innkeeper, whose tavern was the headquarters of the rebels, and from which was fired the shot that killed Colonel Moodie, was arrested on the 11th December, 1837, tried at a special court, found guilty of treason, and sentenced to death, which sentence was subsequently commuted to transportation, and that he escaped from Fort Henry, Kingston—while en route to Quebec to Watertown, in the State of New York. have seen, Mr. Mowat gave him his pension of $3,000 on the 19th March, 1874. Now, Mr. Speaker, if Mr. Mowat was right in what he said: That the Local Legislature was not the proper authority to deal with this question, then he should not have spent $7,000 of the money of the people of the province in that way. The volunteers of 1837-38 are not a great deal interested in whether the Local Legislatures or the Dominion Parliamentshould grant the compensation; but there is one thing certain, and that is that some legislative body in this country should give them compensation, or some recognition for their services. I cannot see why the hon. members in this House from any province in the Dominion can object to compensation being given to these men who took their lives in their hands to defend the constitution of this country. I trust that this Parliament of Canada will do something, and if they cannot give these veterans compensation, they should at least make some recognition of their services in the shape of a medal. Whatever grant may be made to these brave men will not in any way embarrass the country, and I am quite sure that hon. gentlemen from Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and British Columbia, will not object to a grant for these brave men who fought in the interests of the country, and who believed they were doing right. It is a good thing, in my opinion, to encourage a spirit of patriotism in the country, and if we do not encourage our military men in Canada as they are encouraged in other countries, we cannot expect that our people will have the same spirit of patriotism and loyalty. If you go to England you will find in politics and obtain a seat in the Government. It was St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey because Sir George E. Cartier was a rebel that he was monuments and tablets to the memory of the men who fought and died in their country's service, occupying the most prominent position. makes the people of that country proud of her heroes, and the descendants of those men proud that they had ancestors who fought in the interests of the country. I trust that this Parliament will grant some recognition to the brave volunteers of 1837-38; and if this question comes to a division, I should like to have an opportunity of voting for such a grant.

Mr. CASEY. I confess that I am a little astonished to hear the speech we have just heard from my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. Me-Lennan); a speech in praise of those who took arms to put down rebels, and in blame of the rebels. A speech such as that, Sir, coming from a gentlemanwho gave us to understand the other day that he was a Jacobite, does not seem to me to be consistent with his personal views or ancestral connec-But, Sir, considering the matter seriously, I think the course of this debate has proven the correctness of the old Roman rule, that no general should be granted a triumphal entry into Rome for a victory in civil war, that no monument should be erected to commemorate any such victory, and that all traces of civil conflict should be removed as soon as possible after the conflict is over. The very motion which has been made to-day, has stirred up discussion on the issue of 1837-38, a discussion which can do no practical good at the present time, and which may tend to excite bitterness in the minds of some. I do not wish to contribute to that bitterness by any partisan remarks on the events of that time. I must, however, refer to the question of the patriotic standing of the rebels of that day, in as moderate words as I possibly can. We have heard the question discussed how far Lord Durham's report vindicated the action of the rebels on that occasion. I do not remember that report sufficiently to say how far it did vindicate their action; but I say that their action was justified by the result of the rebellion—that having been successful in its main object, that of obtaining constitutional government in this country, the rebels became patriots, and were accepted as such by all parties in the country. Many of them sat in this House; one of them, who has already been referred to, became a member of the Cabinet, and some of his colleagues are still living and are still in the Cabinet. If the loyal members of the Conservative Government, which included Sir George E. Cartier, had not considered that the rebellion was a dead issue, and that his conduct at that time was no bar to his sitting among loyal men in a loyal Government, they would never have had him as their colleague. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I must say, in rebuttal of some remarks made by my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Denison), that if Sir George E. Cartier had not been a rebel in 1837-38, he would probably never have been a member of that Tory Government or any other Government. The fact that he then put himself in accord with the liberal and constitutional aspiration of our French fellow-citizens, his gallant conduct during the rebellion, and the consequent influence he obtained over his fellow-citizens were what enabled him to take a prominent place in afterwards a Conservative Minister. He earned his spurs in politics by earning them first on the field; and his colleagues of both races and both creeds honoured him for it in the past, as they still honour his memory. My hon, friend from Toronto said that those who became rebels had constitutional means at their disposal to right their wrongs, but that they had tried those constitutional means and ignominiously failed in securing redress by them. My hon, friend is correct so far, and it was just because they ignominiously failed to obtain their rights by constitutional means that they were compelled to obtain them by force of arms; it was just because the "Tory family compact" of that day refused them their constitutional rights that they had to take up arms. The hon, gentleman said, that the rebellion was against the majority On the contrary, it was because of the rebellion that the majority became able to rule. Previous to the rebellion the majority could not rule, the minority acting in defiance of and perverting the constitutional majority. The work those men did remains to us. Whether they should be paid a pecuniary reward or not, I do not know; but I think they have a sufficient award in the re-The procollection of their fellow-countrymen. vinces directly interested, the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, have had thirty years in which to consider the question of rewarding those men, and wisely decided not to confer upon them any special mark of distinction; and I think that this House would be exceedingly unwise to depart from that course and to take upon ourselves the responsibility of doing what this motion proposes.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. STAIRS. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to make a personal explanation in reference to the statement I made a few evenings ago in reply to the hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Bain). He stated that there was no blue ribbon twine made this year, and I replied that there was. I found out afterwards that I was mistaken; and, in justice to the hon. gentleman, I take the first opportunity, after the fact has come to my knowledge, to correct my statement, and to tell the House that there has been no blue ribbon twine made this year.

ELECTION ACT AMENDMENTS.

Bill (No. 45) to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act:

Elections Act Bill (No. 54) to further amend the Dominion Elections ct: and Bill (No. 59) to amend the Electoral Franchise Act (as amended by Special Committee).

Motion agreed to, and Orders discharged.

LORD'S DAY OBSERVANCE.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 2) to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day. -(Mr. Charlton.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CHARLTON. The special committee to which this Bill was referred decided to strike out the first six sections of the Bill, in accordance with the opinion expressed by the hon. Minister of Justice when the Bill was under discussion. position was taken that the offences covered by these six sections came properly under provincial jurisdiction, and they were, consequently, struck out and the seventh retained as the first section. This clause has reference to the publishing of Sunday newspapers. It was held by some members that this section also would come more properly under provincial jurisdiction than under the jurisdiction of this Parliament. It was held, on the other hand, that this Parliament has control of copyright, of matters pertaining to the publication of books, of the postal service, and of the importation of newspapers and other kinds of literature, and should properly exercise control in the matter of publishing Sunday newspapers. It was held to be a matter of very great importance now, when we have no Sunday newspapers published in the Dominion, with the exception of one or two in British Columbia, that this great evil, as it has been demonstrated to have grown in the United States, should not be allowed to obtain a foothold here, and consequently the special committee determined to retain this section, which reads as follows:—

"1. Whosoever shall on the Lord's Day, either as proprietor, publisher or manager, engage in the printing, publication or delivery of a newspaper, journal or periodical, and whoever shall on the Lord's Day engage in the sale, distribution or circulation of any newspaper, journal or periodical printing published on that day, shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanour; provided, however, that the necessary office work may be performed after 9 o'clock in the evening of the Lord's Day, for the purpose of facilitating the publication of the Monday morning issue of any daily newspaper."

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I quite agree in the principle of the Bill, but I think if printers be allowed to work at all on the Sabbath the hour for beginning work should be changed to 8 o'clock instead of 9, as otherwise the proposed law would be a great inconvenience to the publishers of daily newspapers.

Mr. CHARLTON. We were informed by the publishers of newspapers in Toronto that the compositors went to their offices at 9 o'clock. Our desire was to meet the views of the publishers and make such a provision as would facilitate the doing of work absolutely necessary in bringing out their Monday morning issues. If it is absolutely necessary the hour will be changed to 8, but it was made 9 o'clock to enable the printers to attend the evening services.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. The printers never work on Saturday evening, and they set the local matter at 8 o'clock on Sunday evening, and then the telegraphic matter comes in.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is a good while since I set type, and my experience was that all the matter except the telegraphic dispatches may be set any time after Saturday, and that from 9 o'clock there would be ample time to get the papers to press by 3 o'clock Monday morning.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. Under the rules of the union now, printers do not work on Saturday night on any paper in Canada unless on a special occasion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This clause certainly goes a very long way in making what has been regarded all over the world a mere police regulation, a misdemeanour; and I am rather surprised the hon. Minister of Justice should have consented to a mere matter of police regulation, which clearly is within the municipal jurisdiction of the Local Legislature, being made a crime by the law of the Dominion. Then, again, by this Bill you are expressly abolishing for one class of the community what many people regard as the proper observance of the Sunday. You are putting them upon a wholly different footing from any other portion of the community. You are saying, so far as the newspaper men are concerned, that they are not required to observe the Sunday after 9 o'clock Sunday evening, although no such exemption applies to other people. You may prevent any other man from working on the Sunday evening, you may You may prevent any other man declare it a misdemeanour to do so, but you except This law, if it is considered of universal obligation on religious grounds, is not to apply to this particular class. I think we ought not to this particular class. I think we ought not to legislate in that way. It is right and proper that we should seek to give every person in the public service of the Dominion an opportunity of keeping the Sun- and to give the Government employes a day of rest; day in the way most binding upon his conscience. We have no right to insist that parties shall act as public officials attending the locks and so on, on the canals except where a case of clear necessity can be made out, and the rule of necessity is regarded, at all events from the ordinary Christian standpoint, as a rule of humanity. You do not want to interfere with any person in the preservation of his property if it is exposed to destruction. I think that that rule, at all events, is clearly laid down; but I think, when my hon. friend proposes to expressly legislate that a certain class may go to work on Sunday evening at nine o'clock, that they may enforce their contracts for work done after that hour, he is asking us to legislate in a way the very reverse of the general spirit and principle of the whole measure. You are recognizing a right to abolish the Sunday with regard to a particular class of labour under particular circumstances. It might be very well urged by one who holds to the strict observance of the Sunday that it is not a matter of absolute necessity that a newspaper should be got out at 3 o'clock in the morning, and that, therefore, you should not legislate, with regard to those who are working upon that newspaper, in a wholly different way from the rest of the community. It would have been more satisfactory and more in accordance with the principles of our consti-tution, if that matter, which is purely a matter of police, should have been left to the Local Legislature. We have the right to legislate with regard to commerce and those matters which are under general control. We have the right to legislate that the Government shall not impose duties upon their employés which will compel them to disregard their religious convictions on that day; but, when you undertake to interfere with the ordinary relations of life, you are assuming that the legislative bodies upon whom the constitution has imposed the duty of legislating on these subjects, as far as legislation is required, will not discharge that duty. Now, whether a man shall work in a shop, a mill, a newspaper office, or a grocery at the corner of some street, on Sunday or not, is a matter for the Local Legislatures to decide. They derive their powers from the people, just as we do, and the law of the constitution says that civil rights are under the control of that Legislature. How do we undertake to reach, beyond the jurisdiction assigned us, and lay our hands upon the subject-matter which comes within local control, by declaring it to be a crime, by declaring that, which everywhere else on the globe is made a police regulation, is a matter of criminalty. It is impossible, on any social grounds, to distinguish between working in a shop and working in a newspaper office after 9 o clock on Sunday. They stand on exactly the same footing in that respect, as far as social order or social disturbance is concerned. So far as our power to legislate criminally is concerned, they are exactly alike, but, in regard to matters of police, which are under local control, I think that there can be no doubt that the particular subject of my hon. friend's Bill belongs clearly to the Local Legislatures and not to this We have a right to close the canals, to regulate traffic on the interprovincial railways, to close the post offices, to close the departments under the control of this Government on Sunday, but, having done that, I think we have done all we have the power to do constitutionally, and if we go further, I think we are going beyond our powers.

Mr. MARA. I understand the object of clause I to be the closing of newspaper offices on Sunday in order to allow the employes a day of rest. of the leading journals in British Columbia are published on Sunday. The Colonist in Victoria has been published on Sunday for thirty years, and the Advertiser in Vancouver has been published on Sunday from the birth of that city. The publishers of those newspapers contend that by publishing them on Sunday they give their employes a day of rest, whereas, if they published on Monday, the reporters, printers, proof-readers and pressmen, would have to work almost the whole of Sunday: the mechanical work would have to be done on Sunday. By publishing on Sunday they give their employes a day of rest, they enable them to attend divine worship morning and evening and to pass the rest of the day with their families.

Mr. CASEY. Do they not publish on Mondays? Mr. MARA. They do not. They publish only six days in the week, and they publish on Sunday in order to allow their employes a day of rest on I understood from the introducer of the Bill that he said the mechanical portion of the work could be done on Sunday. I prefer to take the practical opinion of men who have been working on newspapers for thirty years to the theoretical opinion of the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). But a still more practical view is that taken by the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that this is within the powers of the Provincial Legislatures. Certainly the Provincial Legislatures are more in touch with the people in matters of moral reforms or sentiment than this Parliament can possibly be, and, when they have not legislated on this question, I think we may take it for granted that they have not found any evil exists. In Victoria, for instance, though the Colonist newspaper, which is the principal newspaper there, has published on Sunday for thirty years, and though several Sabbath Observance Bills have been brought before the Local Legislature, not one has attempted to deal with the publication of a newspaper on Sunday. It is clear that the leading paper of the community must have received the financial support of the majority of the people, and, therefore, the majority of the people must be in favour of the publication on Sunday. If the people in Victoria or Vancouver were a lawless people, there might be some reason for such legislation, but I think the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) will agree with me that they are as law-abiding a people as any in Ontario. They have as many and as large church edifices as we find here, they attend church regularly, the Sabbath schoolsare largely attended; they are as God-fearing a people as we find in Ottawa, and I think there is no reason why the people of Victoria should be specially legislated against as is apparently proposed to be done by this clause. I move that clause I be struck out.

Mr. TROW. I would ask the Postmaster Gen eral as to how the postal arrangements would be affected by this Bill? I understood him to say today, in answer to a question, that certain officers in cities and towns were allowed to open the post

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

In the case of this Bill passing, will that be changed, and will it also apply to telegraphing or telephoning on that day? Parties may be suddenly taken ill and may require the attendance of a medical man.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is struck out. is no provision in reference to the postal service.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) referred to me in terms of surprise at my acquiescing in the passage of this Bill through the Committee in its present form.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In regard to this clause.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have not changed the opinion which I expressed on the second reading of this Bill, and I agree to a large extent with the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that this is a subject upon which the Local Legislatures can make enactments, without, however, disputing our right to do the same. There are many matters of police regulation in regard to which we have powers under the criminal law. same time, it is a matter for the consideration of this Parliament whether these subjects cannot sufficiently be regulated under the powers possessed by the Local Legislatures in regard to police, and, for myself, I still hold the same opinion as I did on the second reading, that under the Local Legislatures this matter and matters of the same kind not only can be but have been efficiently regulated down to the The hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. present time. Mills) was, perhaps, right in presuming that I had acquiesced in the passage of the Bill in the special Committee, because I had not objected to its passage there. I must, however, ask to be exempted, during the present session, from any such presumption in consequence of being, as he knows, compelled to pay unremitting attendance at meetings of another I have found it impossible to be precommittee. sent at the meetings of this committee as of other committees of greater importance, because the investigation proceeding before the Privileges and Elections Committee, of which I am a member, requires all the time which could be given to Under ordinary circumstances I would have been reluctant to oppose the Bill at this stage, but I hope that, under the circumstances, the House will consider that I am free to present my views at the present stage. I feel, therefore, that I can express the view which I did at the second reading of the Bill, namely, that this whole subject has been sufficiently and amply dealt with by the Provincial Legislatures. The hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who has the Bill in charge, and who represents, in regard to the provisions of this Bill, a great section of the community of Canada who are entitled to the greatest respect for their views on this question, will agree with me, I think, that the first clause of the Bill, the one under discussion, is not an improvement on the law. In seizing this subject by virtue of our powers over the criminal law, we are not making a step in advance in favour of Sunday observance; on the contrary, by nearly all the provincial statutes Sunday labour, even on newspapers, is prohibited, certainly in my own province and perhaps in the Province of Ontario, servile labour of all kinds is prohibited. Now, I assume that the provisions of this clause are intended to prevent Sunday work upon a newspaper except after the hour of 9 o'clock, offices on the Sabbath for the benefit of the public. and for the necessary purposes of a Monday morning paper. If we leave that to the Provincial Legislatures, as I have stated, in most of the provinces we have a prohibitory enactment going even further. As the hon, member from British Columbia (Mr. Mara) has pointed out just now, the Legislature of his province is not only competent, but is the best qualified to deal with the circumthat we have reached that stage when the hon, gentleman really must be brought to consider that we have reached legislation on this subject Sabbath observance is as strict and as well cared for as in any other portion of Canada, they think proper to exempt persons from prosecution who are engaged in publishing a Sunday paper, I really think that the Legislature of that province is better qualified to judge of the whole matter than is this Parliament. But if the hon, gentleman will turn his attention to the language of the clause itself, he will find that if it is intended, as I assume it to be honestly intended, to exempt persons who are engaged in the necessary work of publishing a Monday morning paper—and I think the disposition of the House will certainly be to exempt that from any criminalty-it is hardly sufficient for that purpose; because he will see that it only exempts those who are engaged in the necessary office Let him contrast that with the enactment of the Provincial Legislature, by which all persons are prohibited from engaging in scrvile labour, including, I think, the typesetters, certainly the persons working in the engine room, and the person who lights the fire in the engine room; and he will see that he exempts only the accountants in the office and those engaged in the editors' room, but does not exempt the typesetters and the others I have mentioned from prosecution for misdemeanour. Now, in view of the provisions of the whole Bill, and considering the great changes that have been made in it, and considering again, as the hon. gentleman has no doubt had an opportunity of doing, the suitability for this purpose of the provincial enactments on this subject, I would commend this view to the consideration of the hon, member for North Norfolk, representing, as I have said before, and as I know he does, a portion of the Christian community who are deeply in earnest in this subject-I would commend to his consideration whether it is wise for him to proceed with the Bill in its present form this session. The great objects which he had in view in bringing the Bill forward this year was to affect those branches of the public service which are now under our control, more especially the railway service and the canal service, and what do we find the provisions of the Bill to be with regard to these? The provisions in regard to canal service are to legalize the system which we have now in force. The provisions, as regards that service, now are that no canal belonging to Canada shall be operated on Sunday except at certain seasons of the year, and those are the seasons of the year when the canals operated by Canada are operated now; so that the Bill in that regard will not operate at all The provisions regarding as a new provision. the operation of railways are very materially altered since the hon, gentleman introduced his Bill; the provisions in regard to excursions are very materially altered, and as to that it seems to me the provincial enactments on the subject completely cover the case. Now, the hon. gentleman has modified his Bill—in what not taking a step in advance in this Bill in regard view? Clearly in view of the adequacy of the to the prohibition of Sunday labour. Whether we provincial legislation to deal with this subject, and secondly, in view of the reasonableness of apparent infractions of Sunday observance which is adequate, I question whether it is not wise that he should defer further consideration of the subject until he sees whether the provisions as reported by the Committee, I presume with his own acquiescence, are not sufficient to convince the class of people whose views he represents so worthily upon this subject, that their views can sufficiently be met by provincial enactments which as the member for British Coloumbia has said, are practically adaptable to the necessities of the community with regard to which they apply. I move that the Committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again. I prefer that motion to the motion that the Committee rise, because I have no object to serve in treating the hon, gentleman or the Bill which represents his views, and the views of those for whom he speaks, with any discourtesy, but I wish to give an opportunity for fuller consideration with the view of enabling the hon, member to see, as he is bound to do, if the views of the people behind him will be met by leaving the subject in the hands of the Provincial Legislatures.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Minister of Justice says that on certain clauses I have modified my views of this subject, in view of the adequacy of provincial legislation. I have modified my views to a certain extent in view of the desirability of getting some legislation. I have views with respect to this matter, that are not fully met by this Bill; but when this Bill was referred to Committee for consideration, I waived all views regarding this matter which I thought stood in the way for the sake of the success of this Bill, and I believe the Bill reported is one worthy of the consideration of this House. The clause under consideration, clause 1, I admit, is a clause dealing with a subject that might be dealt with by provincial legislation, but I consider the matter one of vast importance as regards the well-being of this Dominion. I do not believe there is any means of demoralization so potent and so lamentable as the publishing of Sunday newspapers in the United States, and I look with dread upon the introduction of that abuse into this country, and for that reason I believe that it is proper for the Dominion of Canada to pass an enactment which will prevent the introduction of that system. We control copyright, the post office system, the transmission of newspaper matter through the mails, we have the power to prohibit the introduction of obscene literature, we have power over publication in this country, and having that power, I believe it is proper and legitimate to exercise it. I believe it is proper and legitimate to pass a law which would prevent the introduction of the Sunday newspaper nuisance into this Dominion, and the Committee thought so too, and this section was framed. It was asserted by the Minister of Justice that we were were or not, the hours of Sunday labour necessary to bring out a Mondy morning newspaper are set out in the Bill. On examination it was found that a certain amount of work was required to be performed, and this was classed in the Bill under the heading of "works of necessity," and whatever work was necessary must be done after 9 o'clock, not the kind of office work referred to by the Minister, but office work meaning all work required in a newspaper office for the purpose of publishing the newspaper on Monday morning. It was true with respect to the canals that the provision is not a new one. But it is equally true that the provision with respect to the canals may at any moment be changed; the Government may at its pleasure, by Order in Council, enact that the canals shall be kept open all day Sunday. It may be held that the Bill surrenders a principle by allowing that the canals shall be open from 12 o'clock Saturday night till 6 o'clock Sunday morning, and again after 10 o'clock Sunday night. It may be held, I say, that that is the surrender of a principle; but we believe, in considering this question, that anything which kept the canals closed during the day, which prevented the traffic from interfering with the quiet of that day, which gave the employés on the canals an opportunity to attend both morning and evening service was, if not all we wanted, at least a great step in the direction of right, and it was better to secure this than to go without Of course it may be said, and it may be taken, that this is in some measure a compromise, but whether a compromise or not, to secure quiet on the Sabbath on the canals, to secure for every employé the privilege of attending morning and evening service, means the partial, if not the entire removal of the objectionable features of traffic on the canals. With respect to the provision to keep open the canals after the 15th October, it is one that anyone familiar with the transportation business can readily understand. It may be of absolute necessity at the end of the season to keep the canals open for two or three weeks towards the close of navigation.

The clause of the Bill with respect to railway traffic has been modified to some extent, although not materially. The modifications made in the Bill were found to be absolutely necessary on an examination of the transportation question. old clause provided that only two passenger trains shall pass each way over a railway line on Sunday. That contemplated the propriety of allowing each two through trains to make American connections by steamboat and railway; but when we took into consideration the facts, we found that the Canadian Pacific Railway, with one through train started each way from west and east on Sunday, would have ten trains in motion on some part of its line and the restriction to two trains would prevent the company operating its line. So the change was made allowing the running of through trains on Sunday. No other change was made with respect to this matter, except to class live stock as perishable freight, and to permit the moving of trains carrying live stock. With these exceptions the provisions stand as before. Sub-section 2 provides:

That is a provision which looks at the possibility, not the probability I am sorry to say, of legislation in the United States with respect to through traffic. As regards that through traffic business we are powerless to regulate it unless corresponding Acts are passed in the United States, and by enacting this clause we place our law in the right position when American legislation, if it ever does occur, takes place.

The section with respect to excursions is not changed. It is as it was in the old Bill, and it is as it stands on the Statute-book of Ontario at the present time. I was sorry to see the position taken by the hon, gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I believe that hon, gentleman is a church member: I believe he professes to be in favour of Sunday observance, and the objection taken by the gentleman to the clause prohibiting the publishing of Sunday newspapers is one I regret. I do not see why he should be such a stickler for the observance of provincial rights in regard to this matter. I believe there is no clause in this Bill of such paramount importance as this clause in respect to Sunday newspapers. There is no danger to religion, no danger to morals or the wellbeing of the community so great as the danger from the introduction of the American system of Sunday newspapers, with their special trains and special steamboats, and an army of newspaper sellers, and the conversion of Sunday into an ordinary week day, with the addition of an extra commotion caused by the circulation of these newspapers, whose circulation is larger than that of the week-day issues. I believe it is strictly in the power of this Parliament and proper for it to exercise the power it possesses to place on the Statute-book a law which will render the introduction of that nuisance an impossibility in this country. The hon, member for Yale (Mr. Mara) says they have this system in his province, and there it is not considered to be an evil. I presume it does not operate in British Columbia as it does in eastern cities, where the newspapers have larger circulation. I suppose they have no special trains to carry the newspapers, no special steamers, and no special newsboys to turn the Sabbath into bedlam by crying the newspapers up and down the streets. The truth is, that in British Columbia, with no publication of the newspaper on Monday morning, they have the evil in a mitigated form.

Mr. MARA. You would make this a misdemeanour punishable by fine and imprisonment?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes; I would put a stop to it. As against the view of the hon, member for Yale (Mr. Mara), and the views of his friends from British Columbia, and I have had correspondence with one of the editors in British Columbia, I have to place the views of an editor publishing a newspaper in Windsor, opposite Detroit. He writes that the bringing over of the American Sunday morning newspapers into Canada is an unmitigated nuisance. He says the Detroit newspapers are hawked up and down Windsor on Sunday, and he asks as a protection to his business, and for the purpose of securing the quiet of the Sabbath, that "At such time as the laws of the United States shall make corresponding provision, no through freight in transit from one point on the frontier of the United States to some other point on the said frontier, shall be allowed to pass Mr. Charlton."

purpose or securing the quiet of the Sabbath, that the introduction and sale of Sunday newspapers shall be prohibited. Although the evil may be a slight one in British Columbia, yet if it is allowed to obtain a foothold in Toronto, Montreal, Quebec, Hamilton, Halifax, St. John, and other large Canadian cities we will introduce an evil the magnitude of which we fail to comprehend, and when that evil is thoroughly and fully saddled upon us we will regret we did not adopt this precautionary measure the Bill proposes as a remedy.

An hon. MEMBER. Free trade.

Mr. CHARLTON. But there may be free trade in alcohol, free trade in opium; free trade can be carried too far, and it may be proper to restrict free trade or rather restrict license. am perfectly willing to accept the suggestion of the hon, member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh), who is a practical printer, if he says the hours from 9 p.m. do not allow sufficient time. Perhaps the object of the Bill will be better served by giving the newspapers 8 to 12 instead of 9 to 12. I am perfectly willing to accept his suggestion in that matter, if it is the will of the House. I do not feel able and I do not see it is my duty on this occasion to accept the suggestions of the Minister of Justice. I should prefer to have this Bill considered by the Committee upon its merits. not think that I am required to withdraw this I do not expect to carry it, but I once urged Bill. a Bill in this House for several sessions before it got on the Statute-books, and the Minister of Justice to-day is in favour of the provisions of that Bill, although the majority of the House and the majority of the Government were against it when I first introduced it. I have the honour now to present a Bill of infinitely greater importance than that Bill was; I have the honour to present a Bill in which the entire Christian sentiment of this country is interested. I present a Bill now that is of great importance to this country, and I do not feel disposed to withdraw it, because I do not believe there has been a more important Bill placed before the House this session than the one we are now discussing. I shall abide by the decision of the House to-night, but I shall not voluntarily withdraw the Bill.

Mr. CHRISTIE. It gave me great pleasure when the hon, member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) introduced this Bill. I believe this is a question of very great importance, a question which is very closely connected with the prosperity and well-being of this whole Dominion, and I should be very sorry indeed if the hon, gentleman would withdraw his I believe this legislation is necessary and opportune. I do not care where we look, we see that there is a great deai of Sabbath desceration. It is true we have had a great deal of provincial legislation on this question, and I suppose that it is the policy of the present Administration to secure Sabbath observance, as it has been the policy of past Administrations. I believe that; but notwithstanding all that has been done in this direction it is a fact that cannot be denied that wherever you look, whether to our railways, our canals or our post office service, you see a great deal of Sabbath desecration, and a great deal of unnecessary Sunday labour-labour that I believe might be dispensed with, not only without detriment to the public service, but with very great advantage to the public interest. It is quite true that the provisions of the Bill we are now discussing do not quite come up to my desire, for I would have been glad if they had gone a step the whole Sabbath day observed. I was not fully convinced that it was necessary for printers to begin their work at 8 o'clock; it may be that is the case, but I was not convinced of it, and I think that the printers require the whole Sabbath's rest. the boatmen on our canals. Notwithstanding that this Bill is not as ample as I should wish it. I believe it is a long step in the right direction, and I will be glad to give it my warm and hearty support. I believe that the aim of this Bill is simply to secure that physical rest which is necessary for the recuperation of work people. It would be a great boon to tens of thousands of employes who are now robbed of their Sabbath rest, and who are denied the privilege of attending Divine worship and receiving that moral and religious instruction which they should receive. It may be that it is a work of necessity for printers to go to their offices at 8 o'clock on Sunday evening, and if it is absolutely necessary I will, for one, not object to it; but I am not sufficiently acquainted with the printing business to say whether it is or not. I would rather be in favour of observing the entire integrity of the twenty-four hours of the Sabbath. As I said before, this Bill does not aim at compelling any man to observe the Sabbath, nor yet to compel him to go to church. It simply aims at securing rest for the weary, so that they may recuperate their exhausted and wasted powers, and be better fitted for discharging their duties on the other six days of the week. I am not convinced that there would be any pecuniary loss entailed in this, because I believe that the man who strictly observes the Sabbath will have better health, will be able to accomplish more labour, and will be a happier and a better man than the man who works seven days in the week. I, therefore, have great pleasure in supporting the Bill as it is now before the House, although I would be glad if it had gone a step further.

Mr. CASEY. I cannot agree with my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that the present Bill which he has before the House is of infinitely greater importance than the other one to which he has referred, and which he so ably urged in this Parliament and finally carried through to legislation. I admit that the subject of Sabbath observance, in itself, is one of the most important that could be discussed in this House; but we are not discussing now the general question of Sabbath observance, but the propriety of going on with this I cannot understand that a Bill particular Bill. which only touches upon four points connected with Sabbath observance should be of greater importance than a Bill intended to preserve the good fame and character of the young women of this country, as was the former Bill introduced by my friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). Speaking of the present Bill on general terms, I think, in the first place, that it deals with a matter with which we have no business to interfere, as it comes very properly under the control of the Provincial Legislatures. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Yale (Mr. Mara) that it is more proper for the Local Legislatures to consider this question, even if it were not so undoubtedly under their exclusive jurisdiction according to our constitution. It cannot be supposed that in this Parliament we can make a law equally suitable to the citizens of further. I would like to have seen the integrity of | the Province of Quebec and the Province of Ontario.

in regard to Sabbath observance, even if we had the right to do so, which I think we have not. is not to be supposed that we could suit equally the people of Vancouver Island and the people of Cape Breton in regard to Sabbath observance, even if we had the right to do so. I agree with my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that we have not equitable right to interfere with these matters, although we have the power undoubtedly, as the Minister of Justice pointed out. But the power does not necessarily involve the moral or equitable We have the power to interfere with these questions only by making crimes out of actions which were previously matters of police regulation. I do not see that it is necessary to make crimes out of such infractions of the Sabbath as are here aimed I think they can be suppressed without our reaching out a grasping hand, and, by a subterfuge, taking possession of a power which the constitution did not mean to confer on this House. I do not think it is necessary, or proper, or decent, that we should do so. As to the Bill itself, what is the necessity for forcing it on now, when, according to my hon. friend's (Mr. Charlton) own statement this Bill really makes no change in the present practice.

Mr. CHARLTON. Oh, yes; it does.

Mr. CASEY. Well, from what I have been able to understand during this debate, I have not been able to find what change it makes.

Mr. CHARLTON. Read the Bill.

Mr. CASEY. I have read and studied the Bill. My hon, friend may have read a meaning which I cannot see in it. The Bill is probably charged with the greatness of his own views on the subject, but I cannot see in it these sweeping changes of that enormous importance which its father seems to find in it. Naturally, looking upon it as his own child, it may appear something more to him than to the rest of us. I find nothing in this Bill to change existing practices except in regard to the case of one or two newspapers published in British Columbia. This first section of the Bill is directed against the printing or publishing of newspapers on We are informed by the hon, member for Yale (Mr. Mara) that there are two papers published on that day in British Columbia. I had never before heard of any Canadian papers being published on Sunday, and I do not know that there are any others. At all events, there is no crying demand for legislation arising out of the publication in Canada of papers on Sunday; and I must say that I think the practice in British Columbia is much more sensible, and much more likely to conduce to Sunday rest for the employés of newspapers, than the clause proposed by my hon. friend from North Norfolk, because it certainly leaves free to them what we may call the sacred and social part of Sunday, the time from early morning till late at night; whereas this clause does not. It is not a clause to enforce Sabbath observance in newspaper offices, but rather a clause to legalize Sabbath desecration in newspaper offices, and is directly opposite to what my hon. friend's supporters wished to get done when they asked him to take charge of this measure. Those who have an earnest and fervent reverence for the Sabbath, which possesses many people throughout Canada, and who asked my hon. friend from North Norfolk to take charge of this Bill, did not suppose that he would attempt to carry through a measure which legalizes necessity for our meddling in the matter. Mr. CASEY.

in one branch of industry that desecration of the Sabbath which they so much abhor. I do not see how the publication of a Monday newspaper can be in any sense a greater work of necessity and mercy than the running of a freight train or the passage of schooner through a canal. If it is necessary to have a paper published on Monday morning it is equally necessary that freight and passengers should be allowed to move from place to place on the railways or through the canals on Sunday; and if the exemption of the hours after 9 o'clock is right and moral in the case of a newspaper office it would be equally right and moral in the case of those other industries, and my hon. friend has now expressed his willingness to go a little further. He has chopped one-eighth of the Sabbath by the clause as it stands, and he is willing to chop another piece off and make it one-sixth, at the request of the hon, member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh), whose request he says he considers reasonable. In the second clause we come to something with which I think we have undoubtedly a right to deal in one We have a right to say that employés of the Government on canals shall not work for longer hours than we prescribe; we have a right to prescribe holidays for our own employés; and that is the only part of the Bill which is not going beyond our equitable powers in regard to this subject. But even as regards the canals, I believe the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature comes in. Even if we allow our employés to work for longer hours than those which my hon, friend has prescribed in his Bill, the Local Legislature could restrain them from working if they saw fit. This clause I believe might be annulled by an Act of the Local Legislature saying that no man should work on the canals, opening a lock-gate or otherwise facilitating the passage of a vessel, during the whole twenty-four hours which compose Sunday. The Local Legislatures are quite competent to deal with the question of Sabbath observance on the canals as well as elsewhere; and as this clause practically embodies the existing practice I do not see that there is any great reason for special legislation upon the subject at the present time. As to railway traffic and excursions, some remarks will apply. In fact, my hon. friend from Norfolk himself stated that the clause in this Bill regarding excursions is the same clause as the clause in the Ontario Act. My hon. friend now says that the local authorities do not enforce it—because they have not the jurisdiction. He says, I am not aware that the courts have held that the Local Legislatures have not the juris-It has been admitted in this House by the hon. Minister of Justice that they have jurisdiction to pass such an Act, and to enforce it. Another hon, friend says that the law in Ontario is more strict than this. For these various reasons I must agree with the motion of the hon. Minister of Justice on this occasion. I yield to no one in my desire that those who may be called upon to labour unnecessarily on the Sabbath day, by the greed of their employers, should be protected from that greed, and should enjoy the right which every man in this country possesses to have one day of rest out of seven. But I consider, with the hon. Minister of Justice, that this Bill is largely beyond our equitable powers, and that so far as it is within our equitable powers its objects are provided for by local legislation, so that there seems to be no

Bill will probably lead, not to the object which my hon. friend undoubtedly wishes to secure, a better observance of the Sabbath, but to a slacker observance of the Sabbath. I am not against the strictest possible observance of the Sabbath consistent with reasonable personal liberty: but I do consider that this Bill, in its present chopped-up shape, is not a contribution to the observance of the Sabbath. It is, I say, a boomerang, legalizing the desecration of the Sabbath in some cases where it did not exist before, and adds nothing to the strictness of existing legislation in other respects. My hon. friend from Norfolk thinks that my hon. friend from Bothwell should not be a stickler for provincial rights in regards to this matter, because it is of such great importance, He says that this subject is of infinite importance. and that we should not be too nice about how we enforce a law which we believe to be right. very fact that it is a question of importance, of vital and tremendous importance, should make us sticklers on the question of Dominion or provincial rights. It it just because it is important that we should not rashly meddle with things that do not concern us; and my hon. friend's logic, that because this legislation is, in his opinion, proper to be enforced, we should not care particularly whether we have a right to enforce it or not, will not, I think, impress the House. That is the only deduction to be drawn from his remarks on the subject.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I just rise to say that in his comment on the remarks of the hon, member for Bothwell I think the hon, member for North Norfolk was scarcely fair. He expressed his sorrow that one whom he termed a member of the Christian church, and therefore bound to be in favour of Sabbath observance, should have made the observations he did. Now, I just wish to point out to the Committee that the hon. member for Bothwell did not raise the question of Sabbath observance at all; he did not say what his views on Sabbath observance were; he simply raised the constitutional question, whether that clause of the Bill was or was not within the competence of this House. In his opinion, it is not within the competence of this House, but within the authority of the Local Legislatures. That is the view he took, and he never expressed any opinion on the merits of the Bill at all.

Mr. BARRON. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in his desire to have a regular Sunday observance. I am sure all of us are in sympathy with him in that respect; but, like the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), some of us think that the Bill now before the House will not attain the object the hon, member has in view. I agree with my hon. friend who has just spoken that it was a little unfair for the hon, member for North Norfolk to attribute to the hon. member for Bothwell that he was not in favour of Sunday observ-I do not think anyone can say that of the He simply raised the constituhon. gentleman. tional point that the Bill was more within provincial rights than the jurisdiction of this House; and that such is the case is evident from the fact that many of the clauses of the Bill, as originally introduced, have been dropped, because it was considered they were within the jurisdiction of the it is open at present.

several provinces. If the hon, member for North Norfolk is so anxious, as no doubt he is, that we should have regular Sunday observance, he should drop his first clause and leave the law in regard thereto as it is under provincial legislation, which goes much further than his particular clause. Why, Sir, the hon, gentleman allows Sunday desecration to printers to the extent of three hours, from 9 to 12 p.m., whereas the law of Ontario allows no such thing. That law, which, I take it, is the same law as the laws in most of the other provinces, makes it unlawful for any merchant, tradesman, artificer, mechanic, workman, labourer, or other person whatsoever, on the Lord's Day, to sell, or publicly show or expose or offer for sale or to purchase any goods, chattels, or other personal property, or any real estate whatsoever, or to do or exercise any work, labour, business or work of his ordinary calling on the Sabbath day. Now, the ordinary calling of a printer, of course, is doing that work which the hon. member for North Norfolk says, in his Bill, he may do between 9 and 12 on Sunday night, but which the Provincial Legislature says he must not do at all on that day. The hon. gentleman is, in fact, proposing to introduce a conflict of laws; and the workman who may be summoned for a breach of the provincial law may answer that he is doing what he has a right to do under the Dominion law. At once, therefore, you have a conflict of laws; and I would say to the hon. gentleman, as he is sincerely anxious that we should have a better observance of the Lord's Day, that he should drop this particular clause, which will defeat the very object he has in view, by legalizing Sabbath desecration, so far as the Dominion is concerned, contrary to the provincial law. Then, the clause relating to Sunday excursions is in almost identical language with that of the provincial law, and there is, therefore, no necessity for introducing it here. No doubt, so far as the departmental work this Government is concerned, it is strictly within the jurisdiction of this Parliament to pass a law regarding Sunday observance, but outside of that I submit, with the hon, member for Bothwell, that we should leave the matter entirely to the Provincial Legislature.

Mr. INGRAM. I have decided objection to that portion of section 3, line 30, which reads: "except one mail train each way." As a practical railway man, I know of no mail trains being run on any railway in the Dominion on Sunday, as at present the closed mails are carried upon the expresses; and if this section were to become law each railway company could start out mail trains as they That would amount to. are run on week days now. for instance in the city I have the honour to represent, four or five railway trains per Sunday, provided the railway companies choose to take advantage of this portion of section 3. I also find in line 37 these words: "or for other acts of necessity and mercy." I have known of cases where trains were made up on Sunday for the purpose of conveying persons to funerals in other sections of the country, and if this became law the companies would be debarred from that right as well as the people from that privilege. In my opinion, this section would open the door wider to Sabbath desecration than

North Norfolk has expressed his surprise that I should have been opposed to this first section of his Bill, and he seems to think that, somehow or other, the question of jurisdiction is a question of religion. I do not admit that at all. I do not admit that the question as to whether this Legislature or the Provincial Legislatures should deal with the subject referred to in the first section of the Bill is a question of religion. It is a question of politics altogether; and in my opinion it is much better left where it belongs, and that is to the Local Legislature. Even according to the opinion of the hon. member for North Norfolk, it is clear by the provision he makes for the enforcement of this particular section, because he proposes to make its infraction a misdemeanour. Why does he do so? Simply to give this Legislature jurisdiction over an offence which has hitherto, in this country and everywhere else, been regarded as a police regulation. Does the hon, gentleman suppose that the enforcement of this by the ordinary police powers possessed by the Local Governments is not sufficient? Will he argue that this matter has become so great an evil that the police powers possessed by the local authorities are no longer adequate to deal with it? Or does he maintain that unless it is declared to be a misdemeanour and made a crime we are neglecting Christian duty? I do not take that view, and I do not think it is proper for this Legislature to assume jurisdiction over the subject by declaring it a crime, when, without such a declaration, it is clear we have no jurisdiction. Then, when you look at the fourth section of the Bill, excursions on the Lord's Day are prohibited and declared to be a misdemeanour. Now, how are those dealt with at present? Under the municipal law of Ontario all the various municipalities have the power to deal with them. I know that, in the city of London, we have a by-law upon the subject, and the steamboat proprietors are forbidden under that by-law to run their steamboats on the Sunday down to Springbank and other places of pleasure resort. The by-law is adequate. There is no possibility, as long as the public opinion is what it is, of their disregarding the provisions of that by-law. Every other city in the province has the same power. Why, then, should we undertake to declare it a crime? Is it because the hon, gentleman desires to legislate on the subject, and to this end that he desires that we should declare it a crime, that he wishes to insist that this House shall take extraordinary powers to deal with this subject, which otherwise it could not deal with at all? I am satisfied to leave the Local Legislatures to deal with the subject. They are amenable to public opinion, and if the laws in regard to the Sabbath or the Sunday are not enforced, if provisions are not made for the observance of good order and decency on that day, the public opinion, the Christian public opinion of this country, will place the responsibility upon those who have the duty of dealing with the subject and who neglect to discharge it. It is not necessary that we should exercise a meddlesome oversight with which the law has not entrusted us. Then, as to other matters, it seems to me that these provisions relating to railways and canals, to the post office and the telegraphs, those matters with which we should deal as far as our own public servants are concerned, are not adequately dealt with by the

Mr. INGRAM.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon, member for most serious consideration to these matters in order to see how far we can deal with them, how far we can give to those in the public service of Canada the rest and quiet which they require, but beyond that I say we have not the right to go, and, no matter what may be your views with regard to Sunday observance, whether they are attitudinarian, or latitudinarian, or platitudinarian, they will not be adequately dealt with by this Bill. We should exercise the powers that belong to us, and in doing that we will do our duty, and it is not our duty when we undertake to go beyond that. I remember a few years ago arguing upon a question somewhat similar to this, the question of the licensing system, a question which it was said ought to be dealt with more efficiently than it had been by the Local Legislatures; but my answer was, that to the Local Legislatures and not to us belonged the duty of dealing with that question, that it was simply diverting the public attention from those upon whom the duty devolved if we legislated upon it. That is precisely the position here. There are some provisions of this Bill which are within our jurisdiction, and there are others that are not within our jurisdition, and it was those which are not within our jurisdiction that I was discussing before, when I invited the attention of the Minister of Justice to provisions which I thought ought not to be in a Bill carried in this House.

> Mr. CHARLTON. The question as to whether the Committee shall rise is one that I think had better be first considered. It is a question whether there is anything at all in the Bill for the Committee to consider.

An hon. MEMBER. Nothing.

Mr. CHARLTON. Then we will understand that it is so taken. The serious objection taken to the Bill, as I understand, is in relation to the first section. It is that the first section infringes upon provincial jurisdiction, but it is not that the second section or the third section infringes upon provincial jurisdiction. I think, therefore, that it is not giving fair treatment to the Bill by voting that the Committee shall rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, and practically killing the Bill, because it is tantamount to saying that there is nothing in the Bill worthy of the consideration of the House. I want this to be understood. I want all who are going to vote on this Bill to understand that if they vote that the Committee rise they are affirming that there is no provision in it which the House is to consider at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Not at all.

laws in regard to the Sabbath or the Sunday are not enforced, if provisions are not made for the observance of good order and decency on that day, the public opinion, the Christian public opinion of this country, will place the responsibility upon those who have the duty of dealing with the subject and who neglect to discharge it. It is not necessary that we should exercise a meddlesome oversight with which the law has not entrusted us. Then, as to other matters, it seems to me that these provisions relating to railways and canals, to the post office and the telegraphs, those matters with which we should deal as far as our own public servants are concerned, are not adequately dealt with by the Bill as it now stands. I am prepared to give the of Justice says the House possesses. It is not a the hon, gentleman, how unjust it was, and of how question so much of religion, but it is a question of the public welfare and of public morality, and of whether we shall take steps to prevent the introduction into this country of a great evil which exists on the other side, the momentous results of which are before our eyes. We may be told that we have a right to deal with this matter under the provincial and municipal regulations, but that has nothing to do with the question. I say we have the power and the right to deal with it here, and there rests upon us the necessity of doing this if we desire to discharge our It is asked why we should legislate in regard to excursions. They use the railways and the shipping of this Dominion, both of which are within the jurisdiction of this Legislature, and it is right that we should exercise our power in this Parliament. My hon, friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says that Christian public opinion will see that this question is legislated upon. Christian public sentiment in this country demands that this Parliament should legislate upon this subject. It is useless to trifle with this question.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I object to having words put into my mouth which I did not utter. I said that the Christian public opinion of this country would demand the proper legislation from the parties who were competent and who had the right to legislate.

Mr. CHARLTON. I accept the statement of my hon. friend, and I say that the Christian public sentiment demands legislation upon that part of this question which is in the hands of this Parliament. This Bill does not ask this Legislature to exceed the powers we have. The Minister of Justice says this House has the right to pass this section and every section of the Bill, and I repeat that the question to be voted upon is whether or not there is anything contained in this Bill which is worthy of the consideration of the House, and I allege that anyone who votes that the Committee rise votes that there is no one principle or sentiment or section in this Bill worthy of the consideration of this Par-

Mr. HAZEN. I regret exceedingly that the hon, gentleman who has introduced this Bill, in the remarks he has just made to the House, has not clearly exhibited that Christian spirit that we would naturally expect from a gentleman who is seeking to enforce Sabbath observance in this country, and to promote morality in every form, because it is clearly not the exhibition of a Christian spirit for him to attempt to enforce his own views on the House by misrepresenting the statements; made by the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in his legitimate criticism of this Bill. I listened with a good deal of regret to the threats which the hon, gentleman cast across the House, and turning round towards his own political associates, he threatened them, that they were flying in the face of public opinion, and would be held responsible if they voted for the resolution moved by the Minister of Justice, and responsible to this country as men who are not desirous of promoting the moral wellbeing of the country, and as men who were putting themselves on record as opposed to Sabbath observ ance. I think every hon, gentleman in this House must see how unfair was that course on the part of question was not put.

great a misrepresentation of the facts he was guilty by making such a charge and by hurling such a threat against hon, gentlemen on both sides of the House. Now, it has been clearly established in this debate that the law, as at present in force in the different provinces, amply provides for such an observance of the Lord's Day as is in line with the public opinion of these provinces. Speaking of the Province of New Brunswick, I may say that we have all the laws we desire for the observance of the Sabbath, and I further say that if this law and five hundred other laws were passed to hedge around the people all sorts of penalties the Lord's Day would not be observed any better than it is at the present time. I do not think it is desirable, in the interest of the moral well-being of the country, that we should surround the people with all sorts of cast-iron laws. I am one of those who do not think that people are made moral or made Christians by legislation. I believe in a matter of this sort that you must appeal to the sentiments of the people, you must influence them by moral suasion, you must lead them to see that it is right and proper that the Sabbath should be observed, and unless they adopt that opinion for themselves, unless they observe the Lord's Day in the way in which it should be observed, then I say that hedging it about with cast-iron laws, such as the hon. gentleman has introduced, will not tend to promote that end, an end which all good citizens have in view; because I think there is no man in this country, no matter what his religious belief may be, who does not think it desirable, in the interest of morality, and of Christianity, and the happiness of the people, that the Sabbath day should be observed as a day of rest, and observed in a lawful and proper manner, as the people of this country do observe the Lord's Day. If the hon, gentleman's Bill prevails the Sabbath day, instead of being a day of rest, would be a day of gloom and unhappiness and portification. When I was down in the City of Montreal the other day, on a bright and sunny afternoon, I ascended the mountain and saw small groups of people scattered about under the trees, families and friends taking their luncheons and having little picnics to themselves. They had ascended the mountain by means of the railway which was run by the employment of menial labour, and the thought occurred to me that these people, sitting there under the trees on that beautiful Sabbath day, were enjoying themselves in a quiet and legitimate manner, and were much more religious and in a much happier frame of mind-for the terms are, to a certain extent, synonymous—than they would have been had they been cooped up in the city, and unable to enjoy these privileges. I said before, I think the observation of the Sabbath must be left to the people themselves; their better judgment will prevail, and I for one take the full responsibility of voting against the Bill the hon. gentleman has introduced, not only from a belief that it is unnecessary in consequence of existing provincial laws, but also from the conviction that legislation of that sort is not calculated to promote the end which the hon. gentleman and those whom he represents have in view.

The CHAIRMAN. Carried.

The Mr. CHARLTON. We want a vote.

Mr. MARA. The question you put was that the Committee rise, and the motion moved was that the Committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes; but we have a right to vote on it. I want the chance to stand up and vote against it.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been carried twice.

Mr. CHARLTON. I demand a vote.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Those in favour of the motion will please rise.

Motion agreed to ; Yeas 63, Nays 18.

EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved Second reading of Bill (No, 11) further to amend the law of evidence in criminal cases. He said: This Bill, the second reading of which I now propose to move, has been before Parliament on various occasions and with various fortunes. an Act to enable an accused person to give evidence in his own behalf. In the session of 1882 I introduced a Bill on the same subject, in which the accused person was not only made competent to testify in his own behalf, but was compelled to give evidence for or against himself. That Bill received a second reading, and it received a second reading with the assent of the then First Minister. In the session of 1883 I introduced the Bill a second time; the Bill was then read the second time with the assent of the then First Minister. It was referred to a Select Committee; the Select Committee reported in favour of the Bill. The Bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and the Committee rose without reporting it. In the session of 1884 I introduced the Bill again, extending it to all cases of misdemeanour and felony, making the accused competent to give evidence on his behalf. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee, which reported in favour of the Bill. The Bill received its second reading, but in the Committee of the Whole the Committee rose the second time without reporting it. In 1885 I introduced a Bill similar to the Bill introduced by Lord Bramwell in the English House of Lords, extending its provisions to all cases both of misdemeanour and felony. That Bill received its second reading by a majority of 32, it passed through all the stages in this House and was sent to the Senate, where it was defeated. In the session of 1886 I introduced the same Bill in precisely the same language. The principle of the Bill received the assent of the then and now Minister of Justice, but the Minister declared that as the questions was being discussed in the English House of Commons and House of Lords, and as the Bill had not finally passed there, its passage in this House had better be postponed for future conside-I venture for the sixth time to submit this Bill for the consideration of Parliament. It is practically the same Bill that received the assent of the House of Commons in 1885, and which was defeated only in the other House. I pointed out on that occasion, and I desire now to point out very shortly to hon. gentlemen who were not in the old Parliament, that the great current of public opinion among the leading men of England was infavour of the principle of the Bill. I pointed out that the leading law- the opinions of some leading law journals, lawyers, Mr. HAZEN.

yers at the British bar were in favour of the Bill, that the most eminent judges on the bench had pronounced in favour of a similar Bill, and I pointed out in 1886 that the Parliament of Canada had on four different occasions ratified the principle of the Bill, and now I ask the assent of Parliament for the fifth time to We know perfectly well that the old rule that prevailed in Canada and prevailed in England, that the mouth of an accused shall be absolutely closed, has been intrenched upon in various instances. cases of assault an accused person can give evidence in his own behalf. In cases of assault and battery, in cases of offences under the Canadian election law, in many cases of offences against females, in some cases of misdemeanour, and I believe in some cases of felony, the accused person is allowed to give evidence in his own behalf. In England, for offences under the Plimsoll Act, where the owner of the vessel has sent the vessel to sea in an unseaworthy condition, whereby lives have been endangered, the accused person has been able to give evidence in his own behalf. For offences under the English Explosives Act, for offences under the election law Act, the accused is allowed to give evidence in his own behalf, and also in many cases under the Act respecting the protection of females. The principle of the Bill having been recognized by the British House of Commons and the House of Lords, having been recognized in the Canadian House of Commons, I ask the Parliament of Canada to go a step further, and say that the law may be enacted and applied to every case. There can be no sensible reason, no logical reason, why the mouth of one accused person in one class of crimes should be absolutely sealed, while the mouth of another person in another class of crimes should be open and able to tell his own story. The law ought to be logical as well as reasonable. At present, the law is neither logical nor reasonable. A person accused of a crime desires to give evidence in his own behalf. He desires to place his own oath against the oath of the prosecutor. He desires to explain the special circumstances that tell against him, and he desires to corroborate it by the evidence of his wife. The answer of common sense, reason and justice is that he should be able to do so. The answer of the law is that he cannot do so; his mouth must be closed; he cannot say a word. I say that position is neither reasonable, nor is it logical, and it should not prevail. The prosecutor goes into the witness box and tells his story. He details the circumstances under which the transaction took place. Sometimes he exaggerates; sometimes he lies. The accused person can say nothing. He cannot explain the suspicious circumstances; he cannot expose the suspicious circumstances. His wife can say nothing. I say that state of things is not reasonable, it certainly is not just and it certainly is not logical. I have pointed out that it is unfair, unreasonable and unjust. I have shown that the old rule has been intrenched upon both in England and in Canada. I have pointed out, as I have pointed out before, that the opinion of leading journalists and leading public men, leading lawyers, and judges in England, have pronounced strongly in favour of the Bill. To confirm my position, especially as regards those hon, gentlemen who were not in Parliament when this Bill was before the House on former occasions, I will venture to quote and judges. One English law journal writing on this subject not long ago said:

"The primary object of a criminal prosecution is to elicit the whole truth about a crime. If a prisoner is innocent it can do him no harm to be examined; it cannot diminish his chances of escape: and, if guilty, it is good that those chances should be diminished."

On the same subject the Pall Mall Gazette observes:

"Innocence, as a rule, has more to gain than to lose, as guilt has certainly more to lose than to gain, by telling its own story, and having that story sifted by direct interrogation; and the cause of truth would undoubtedly gain by allowing in both cases the story to be told."

The necessity for this legislation is referred to briefly and tersely by a distinguished writer on the law of evidence. Taylor says:

"That in all judicial investigations the object to be attained is the discovery of the truth, and no species of evidence ought to be excluded which can materially aid in that discovery; the rules of evidence, so far as practicable, ought to be the same in civil and in criminal proceedings." ceedings.'

Why, I recollect well, Mr. Speaker, and you recollect, too, when a change was made in the Province of Ontario, enabling the defendant and plaintiff in civil actions to give evidence in their own behalf, precisely the same objections were made as are made now, when a Bill is introduced into Parliament for the purpose of enabling an accused person to give evidence on his own behalf. It was then said that it would lead to perjury; it was said that no man would be safe; it was said that no man's rights would be safe; and yet, after having that law in force for many years, nobody would dream of going back to the old system that formerly prevailed. Sir Joseph Napier, a distinguished Irish lawyer and judge, says:

"There are cases in which no one but the accused could expose the falsity of the accusation, and there are cases also in which the accusation would not have been cases also in which the accusation would not have been made, perhaps not even contemplated, but for the very rule which may screen it from exposure. The accusation indeed should always be sustained by independent evidence, but for this very reason it should be open to the accused to meet such evidence by his account of what alone he may be able to testify; and, moreover, as whatever the accused may state would naturally be received with jealous suspicion, he should be allowed to submit his testimony to cross-examination, that its value may be tested."

When Lord Bramwell introduced his Bill into the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor of the Conservative Government of that day spoke very strongly in favour of the Bill; one or two of the ex-Lord Chancellors also spoke favourably of it, and I could quote their remarks from the Hansard; but I will not detain the House to do so at this late hour. Looking at the question in every aspect, there does not appear to me any reasonable grounds why this amendment should not be made in the criminal law. As I have said a moment ago, to certain classes of offence against females the accused person has the right to go into the witness box and to tell his own story of the transaction, while in another class of offence against females the accused person cannot do so. Take, for instance, the case of rape, which is occasionally, though fortunately not very often, brought up in the courts of justice. Certain of our judges have said, and I have heard it stated from the bench over and over again, that this is a charge which is very easily made but most difficult to answer, and most difficult to disprove. The female goes into the witness corroborate her, because this sort of offence is not as nearly all the authorities now do in England, committed on the highways nor within the view of other persons. The unfortunate accused can say nothing; his mouth is absolutely closed; his lips are absolutely sealed: he can say no word, he can say nothing to relieve himself from the effect of the evidence which has been given against him. Now, I would like to know if the Minister of Justice could on any ground justify the exclusion of the evidence of an accused person in cases of Without taking up the time of the that kind. House, and as I believe the principle of the Bill will commend itself to the Minister of Justice and to the majority of this House, I move the second reading of this Bill.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon, gentleman is right in saying that when I had an opportunity at first, which was in 1886, of discussing this Bill, I agreed in the principle of it. I may say that my own views upon this subject are in advance even of the principles of this Bill. I regard the pro-hibition which this Bill seeks to remove as one not founded on sound principles as regards the administration of justice. It is a remnant of the system by which interest was considered as a disqualification to testify in a court of justice. The greater part of that prohibition, bearing on civil cases, has been repealed many years ago, in spite of the resistance of some of the most eminent legal minds in ancient and even in modern times. But, I for one, have come to realize in connection with this prohibition that we have something more to consider in administering justice than the mere danger, temptation or tendency to commit perjury on account of interest, and that the paramount consideration of all is the arrival at truth in the investigation of facts. As I have said, with regard to civil cases the prohibition was abolished. The tendency in modern times, as the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) has stated, has been to allow interested persons to testify, even as regards We have seen a long catalogue of criminal cases. cases, beginning with common assault and extending upwards to much more grievous offences, in respect to which an accused person is Moreover, there mitted by statute to testify. has been a great modification of judicial opinion in the mother country as to the extent to which an accused person, although strictly forbidden to enter the witness-box, is entitled to be heard in his Some judges have allowed him, own defence. even when he is defended by counsel, to make a statement to the jury of all the facts connected with the crime, in so far as that may be within his knowledge, including an assertion of his innocence. Other judges have contended, and have ruled, that it was only admissible for the counsel of the accused to state what the circumstances are, as he has heard them from the accused person. And so, out of that conflict of judicial opinion there has grown up a strong and, I think, a healthy sentiment in favour of admitting, as one of the aids to the administration of justice, the testimony of the accused person himself and of his wife. However, as I brought to the notice of the House in 1886, there has been a strong difference of opinion, among those who are best qualified in the mother country to decide upon that question, as to the safeguards by which that system should be surbox; she tells her own story; she can get no one to rounded, if a change should be made. Agreeing, that the testimony of an accused person should be admitted, there are differences of opinion, for example, as to whether the wife should be allowed to testify as well; as to whether the accused person should be compellable to testify, as to whether should be compellable to testify, as to whether the testimony should be subject to cross-examination; and, likewise, as to whether it should be a subject of comment, and a subject of contradicting testimony, brought in rebuttal. to all these points of detail and restriction, we still find legal opinion in a very doubtful state in the mother country; and in 1886, considering that the Bill of the hon, member proposed to change a system which had been in force for centuries in the mother country, I was very anxious that we should wait, even if we delayed adopting a principle on which we could agree, and see what safeguards should be suggested by the best thought which could be brought to bear on the subject in the mother country; more especially, as we must all admit that it is most desirable, in the interest of truth and the correct administration of justice, that we should have all the aids we can get from all the testimony available on the subject. We all know that the difficulties surrounding the administration of the new principle would be great, in consequence of, it may be, the incapacity of juries to weigh and make due allowance for the different shades of interest which enter into testimony. There are already in this country, in the opinion of a great many people, too many opportunies for the escape of criminals from conviction. There is perhaps two much tendency on the part of jurors, in the investigation of criminal cases, to consider that all that is uttered in the witness-box as of equal weight, whether it comes from witnesses who are interested or witnesses who are disinterested; and those views added to my desire in 1886, when the hon, gentleman's Bill was last before this House, that we should hasten slowly with regard to a great change of this kind, even though I regarded it as a very considerable reform. The subject has not ceased to engage the attention of legal minds in the mother country; and as the hon, member for West Huron has stated, during the present year a similar measure has been brought before the House of Lords and has received the unanimous approval of all who are worthy of respect in judicial matters in that great body; though it has not passed its final stage, but is still under consideration as regards the safeguards by which it should be surrounded. Now, I say to the hon, member, as I said in 1886, that I am in favour of the principle of the Bill. I say to him more than I said then, that on every theory connected with the administration of justice I am willing to go farther: I speak my personal views when I say that I am disposed to adopt the principle of this Bill without restriction. I am in favour of making the accused person, and his wife also, not only competent, but compellable to testify, in order that-due weight may be given at all times to the measure to which interest may affect the creditability of the testimony—those connected with the administration of justice may have every means of ascertaining the truth. I am, therefore, disposed to concur in the second reading of the Bill to-night; and I shall ask the hon. member, in view of what I have urged, not to press the Bill to discuss the Bill I beyond that stage in the present session, more not a right to do so. Sir John Thompson.

especially in view of the fact that I have offered for the consideration of the House an extensive measure covering the whole criminal law, which is now on the Order Paper. I stated when I introduced that measure, as long ago as the 12th of May, that I would not press it beyond the second reading in the present session, but that I desired to distribute it to all persons connected with the administration of justice in Canada, so as to obtain their views, and so as to have a very full consideration of the measure on the part of members of this House before another session, and then I propose to refer it to the deliberation of a large Committee of the House. That Bill has been printed, and although it is not yet distributed officially it will be in the hands of hon, members within a few days; and a large edition has been struck off for distribution among judges, attorneys-general, members of the bar who desire to consider it, members of both branches of Parliament, and other persons who take an interest in the improvement of the criminal law. I propose to pursue the same course with regard to the hon. member's Bill after its second reading, that it shall be distributed along with the Criminal Code, and the comments of the legal profession invited upon it. I have every reason to believe, from the intercourse I have had with the profession, that the opinion of the public and of the profession is tending in the direction in which the hon, gentleman proposes to legislate; and unless good reasons can be given, which do not present themselves to my mind to-night, I would certainly be in favour of incorporating the provision which the hon. gentleman seeks to have adopted in the Criminal Code which I shall offer to the House. In the meantime, I am disposed to support the second reading of the Bill, for the reasons I have given, and I hope the hon, gentleman will concur with me not to press an important amendment like this to the criminal law when we have tacitly made up our minds to defer making any fundamental changes until the whole subject can be considered in connection with the code which is to be presented to the House.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). There is no doubt a good deal in what the hon. Minister of Justice says on the subject. There would be a good deal more in it if this were the first time that this Bill had been presented to Parliament. But it will be remembered that this measure received the assent of the late First Minister in 1882, 1883, 1884 and 1885, and that the principle of the Bill was assented to by the hon. Minister of Justice in 1886, although it was defeated on the second reading. The hon. Minister has had five years since 1886 further to consider the principle of the Bill. If the measure has been acknowledged for nine years as one that ought to become law by a large majority of Parliament, as I assume it is by a large majority of the present Parliament, there is surely no reason why it should be delayed. The only reason the hon. Minister of Justice gives is that he is codifying the criminal law, and that it should form part of the codification. Well, it could form part of the coditication just as well if it passed the present Parliament as it could if it were allowed to stand over.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon, gentleman is going to discuss the Bill I would remind him that he has not a right to do so.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I have a right to reply.

Mr. SPEAKER. No; the hon, gentleman is mistaken. It is an Order of the Day, and not a substantive motion, on which the mover has a right of reply.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). But surely if I move the second reading of this Bill, that is a substantive motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. No; it is not a substantive motion. It is an order of the House for the second reading of this Bill, and the hon. mover of the Bill has not a right to speak a second time.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I was only going to say, and I think the hon. Minister of Justice will be willing to hear me, that if the principle of the Bill is a sound one the hon. Minister ought to let it pass. Before the next Parliament meets there will be a large number of accused persons on trial, and it would not be satisfactory if some of these were improperly found guilty because they had not the right to give evidence on their own behalf. I submit that the hon. Minister of Justice, having affirmed the principle of the Bill, ought to take charge of it and allow it to become law.

Mr. LAURIER. I submit to my hon. friend that he ought to be quite satisfied with the declaration of the hon. Minister of Justice. It is quite a point gained on this most important measure, that the authority of the Minister of Justice should be so emphatically pronounced, as it had been, in its favour. My hon. friend knows that public opinion is slow to move, and I am not sure, though I have always supported the Bill, that public opinion would have supported it at the time. With the weight of the opinion of the hon. Minister of Justice and the declaration he has already made, I think my hon. friend ought to be satisfied that he has gained a victory, if I may so call it, in favour of legislation on this subject, and next year he will have the chance of seeing this Bill become law.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Yes; but some poor man will go the penitentiary in the meantime.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time. Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. LARIVIÈRE moved:

That as the time for the reception of reports of the Committee on Private Bills expires to-day, the same be extended to Tuesday, 4th August next, and that the time fixed for the posting of Private Bills, under Rule 60, be reduced to one day, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the fourth report of the Private Bills Committee.

Motion agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WALLACE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish formally to bring before the House an article that appeared in the Toronto Mail of July 13, in regard to some remarks I made. In winding up it closes with the statement, "He expressed the hope that the city would always have a Protestant mayor," referring to the city of Toronto.

Mr. CHARLTON. How is this a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker? The words referred to were not expressed in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. It would be better for honmembers to wait and hear what the hon, gentleman has to say.

Some hon, MEMBERS. We cannot hear.

Mr. WALLACE. Hon. gentlemen need not be alarmed. I think I know the Rules of the House fairly well, and I intend to abide by them. Mr. Speaker, I addressed the Orangemen on 11th July in Toronto, and a brief report appears in the Toronto Mail newspaper. I wish to make this explanation, because the statement I made on that occasion did not convey any such impression as is there conveyed. I was complimenting the speaker before me, the Mayor of Toronto, and I was referring to the fact that he was an Orangeman and that objection had been taken to his election.

Mr. SPEAKER. As the hon, gentlemen is not referring to any incorrect report of his remarks made in the House, I think he is not in order.

Mr. WALLACE. I have not referred directly or indirectly to any speech made in this House. I was referring to a report in the Mail newspaper.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon, gentleman is referring to, or making any explanation of, or making any denial of an incorrect report of a speech made by him in this House, he is in order. If he is referring to an incorrect report of a speech made outside of this House, I must rule that the hon, gentleman is not in order.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. Let me say to the hon, gentleman that he cannot make any statement that is not in order on a motion to adjourn the House.

Mr. WALLACE. I was referring to a report, an incorrect report, which appeared in a certain newspaper, when I was interrupted by hon, gentlemen opposite. I said the report was incorrect and did me an injustice. I, therefore, ask leave of the House to explain.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must again call the hon. gentleman to order. The hon. gentleman is not in order if he is referring to an incorrect report of a speech made in another place and not in this House. It does not reflect on the privileges of the hon. gentleman as a member of this House.

Mr. WALLACE. Suppose this speech was quoted in this House by an hon. gentleman, how would it stand then?

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon, gentleman cannot possibly put himself in order by referring to a previous debate.

Mr. WALLACE. If you, Mr. Speaker, rule that any reference to this matter is out of order, I will take another occasion and another opportunity of setting myself right before the House and before the country on this matter. I am very sorry to hear hon, gentlemen-

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon, gentleman is out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not feel like withdrawing my motion-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TAYLOR. If hon, members want to burk enquiry by hon, members on this side of the House by adopting these tactics we will apply the same rule when some hon, gentleman on that side of the House wants to make some explanation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Spoken.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has exhausted his right to speak by moving the adjournment of the House and not speaking to the motion

Mr. TAYLOR. I have now said all I wanted to say.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. The question is this. I think the other day the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) quoted a remark said to have been made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace):

"This gentleman, speaking in the city of Toronto on this date only a week ago"—

Mr. LAURIER. Order.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I am speaking to the question of order, as to whether the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) has a right to correct a statement made in this House. He is not referring to a previous debate for the purpose of discussing it, but for the purpose of correcting a statement. I am now asking Mr. Speaker to consider the matter. The hon. member for Ottawa County said:

"He hoped that never would a Catholic occupy the position of Mayor of the city of Toronto.

Mr. DEVLIN. It was not the statement of the hon. member for Ottawa County.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It was a remark quoted by the hon. member for Ottawa County and appeared in Hansard:

"I saw the remarks quoted in a French paper of Montreal. I was afraid that, perhaps, he had been misreported, so I took up a newspaper of the city of Toronto, the Mail, and I found there exactly the same remarks." Now, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is in order for the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) to say that he was incorrectly reported on that occasion. As a matter of courtesy it should be allowed to any member in this House to correct such a statement, if it is not true.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Has he changed his conviction?

Mr. SPEAKER. I would be glad if I were able to rule that the hon. member had a right to correct a report of his speech made in another place, but I find on examining the authority that it is laid down

They may make these explanations in reference to an in-accurate report of their speeches in the official record, or in the newspapers."

I take it that this has reference only to speeches delivered in this House.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. But he wants to say he was incorrectly reported.

An hon. MEMBER. That would be a matter of reply.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It is a matter of correcting a wrong report of his speech.

Mr. SPEAKER. I was incorrect in ruling that the hon, member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) had not the right to speak again. The motion to adjourn the House was not a motion in amendment, but a substantive motion, and, therefore, he has a right to speak.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me to make one suggestion: I think the motion to adjourn had better be withdrawn. hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) will have an opportunity, and has a right, to make a personal explanation on this subject before the debate is

Mr. TAYLOR. I withdraw the motion. Motion to adjourn withdrawn.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster: "That the resolutions adopted in Committee of Ways and Means on Tuesday, the 23rd ultimo, be read a second time;" and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, I wish now to rise to make a personal explanation. I say that the report which appeared in the Mail newspaper—

Some hon. MEMBERS. spoken." Order. You have

Mr. SPEAKER. Has the hon. gentleman a personal explanation to make?

Mr. WALLACE. I wish to make a personal explanation, and that is the whole object of my What I said was not what was reported rising. in the Mail newspaper. In referring to the Mayor of Toronto, I said that objection had been taken to him because he was an Orangeman, and that by his conduct as Mayor he had earned the right to say that Toronto never need be ashamed of having had her Orange Mayor. That was the statement I With reference to another statement made in this House, to the effect that myself and other members of this House had asked a gentleman (Mr. Johnston, of Ballykilbeg, M.P.) to dine with us in the restaurant of the House of Commons, who had stated that he would tear Victoria's Crown off her head and toss it into the River Boyne: I may say that this House does not need to have an emphatic denial made by me of the remarks attributed to him. I wrote a letter to that gentleman immediately I returned to Ottawa, and after the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) had made these remarks in the House, and this was the reply I received:

"It is a common practice for members of both Houses to make personal explanations, or to ask questions of the Government before the Orders of the Day are taken up.

"It is absolutely false that I ever made any such statement as alleged. Conybeare, M.P., uttered the same falsehood in South Africa and had to withdraw it in writing, which I have. In Ireland years ago the late Rev. John Flanagan spoke of King James the Second's crown having been kicked into the Boyne, and has attributed to me the disloyal sentiment condemning the Queen, God save her.

" WILLIAM JOHNSTON."

That is all I need say on that question, Mr. Speaker. I thank those hon, gentlemen on the other side who have been so exceedingly courteous as to give me the opportunity of making this explanation, and I hope the member for Ottawa County will withdraw the statement he made to this House reflecting on Mr. Johnston.

Mr. DEVLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have a personal explanation to make also, with respect to the report, a reference to which has just been made by the hon, gentleman. I must say that I read the report of his speech first in La Patrie, of Montreal, and entertaining some doubt, because I had hardly thought it possible that any hon, member of this House could give utterance to such dangerous sentiments, and I certainly felt very strongly at the time upon the subject. I then went to the Toronto Mail, which I consider the fountain of truth, in so far as that hon, gentleman might be concerned, and supposed to contain accurate reports, and especially upon an occasion such as that in question. I took up the Toronto Mail, and I found the sentiment attributed to the hon. gentleman was reported to have been uttered by him, and I availed myself of the occasion, the other day, to protest against it as strongly as possible. never saw a correction on his part, from the date that this report appeared in the newspaper until this moment. I protested against it then. I am glad, however, to hear from the hon. gentleman himself that he entertains no such sentiments, and his repudiation shows that he is taking a step in the right direction.

Mr. WALLACE. Let the hon, gentleman withdraw what he stated about Mr. Johnston.

Mr. DEVLIN. I cannot possibly withdraw it, and I will not withdraw it.

An hon. MEMBER. Do it.

Mr. DEVLIN. I will not withdraw it. It is well known.

Mr. AMYOT. Is Johnston a member of this House?

Mr. COATSWORTH. He is a member of the Imperial House of Commons.

Mr. DEVLIN. I will not withdraw it, because I am convinced he used the expression.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). In resuming the debate upon the motion in amendment, submitted by the wright), I cannot hope to introduce to the House much new matter, if any at all, in the way of instruction or of interest. But I do claim the indugence of the House, partly upon the ground of the importance of the question now in debate, and partly because I do not often trouble the House with observations on questions which come before it. At the outset, I have to enter my protest against the character of the criticism offered to this House by the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in his speech delivered some days ago. I had supposed that the hon gentleman, in addressing this House, would have at least not ventured to travel beyond the lines of decent and reasonable accuracy, and that in his criticism he would have presented a fair statement to the House for the consideration of members. I confess, that upon reading the speech of the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who is an old parliamentarian, and who is exceedingly well versed in the public affairs of the country, I had expected to find that he would confine himself within the bounds-I shall not say of truth-but within the bounds of reasonable criticism. Yet, what do I find? He introduced a subject which is popularly called chestnutty; that is to say, the administration of the Government which he supported from the years 1874 to 1878; and he introduced a comparison of the result of the financial administration of that Government with the result of the financial administration of the Government which now holds office, and which has held office since 1878. Now, nobody could object to a comparison of that kind, provided always that it is based upon a fair and candid presentation of the actual facts as affecting the administration of the two parties; but so far from the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) taking a course of that kind, he began by comparing the taxation in Canada with the taxation in the United States; and what was the statement which he submitted to Parliament? It was this: That the revenue derived from Customs in the United States amounted to $229,000,000 odd; that the revenue derived from Customs in Canada amounted to nearly $24,000,000; that the taxation per capita in the United States was $3.66 per head, and in Canada $4.80 per head of the population; and he left the inference to be drawn by the House and by the country that by reason of that state of affairs, which he said represented the actual facts of the case, we were overburdened by taxation in Canada as compared with the United States. Now, why did he omit the taxation arising out of excise? Is not that taxation equally with the taxation arising out of Customs? If he had included that item, he would have found that the just and actual comparison would have been this - that in the United States they derived, from all sources of taxation in the last fiscal year, $372,000,000, or $5.90 per head, whereas we in Canada derived $31,500,000, or $6.07 per head. I grant you, that on the face of the figures there is an apparent difference of 17 cents a head against Canada as compared with the United States. But if you take into account one single item, that of provincial subsidies, which does not apply to the case of the United States, you not only eliminate absolutely this difference, but you have a credit in favour of Canada in point of taxation of something like 60 cents a head. Another complaint I have to make in respect of the speech of the hon, member for North Norfolk is, that in dealing with the question of expenditure under the Mackenzie Government and under the present Government he began with the year 1875 and ended with the year 1878. Although that Government which the hon, gentleman supported had been in office for a full five years, he struck out altogether from the account two full years, and submitted for the consideration of this House as a fair basis of comparison three years of administration on the part of our friends opposite as against twelve years administration on the part of gentlemen on this side of the House. If the hon, gentleman had taken a fair and candid review of the actual conhe would have found that instead of a decrease in the expenditure under the Mackenzie Government, as he claimed, of $1,048,000 between the year 1875 and the year 1878, the actual result was, that beginning with 1873, just before those hon, gentlemen assumed office, the total expenditure was $19,000,000 -less the items of interest and sinking fund, which he himself deducted, amounting to nearly $6,000,000 -leaving $13,000,000 as the total expenditure, exclusive of those two items; and that when they left office—I take the year ending 30th June, 1878 —the total expenditure was $23,500,000, less interest and sinking fund of $8,186,000, leaving a balance chargeable to them of $15,316,000; or an increase in the expenditure, outside of interest and sinking fund, during their five years' administration, of over $2,000,000, instead of a decrease of $1,048,-000, as claimed by the hon member for North Norfolk, a decrease which he was able to make out only by eliminating two years of the administration of these hon, gentlemen. So, in the matter of the debt, the hon, gentleman claimed that during the Mackenzie Administration it had increased only $27,000,000; but in order to arrive at the result he had to begin with the year 1875, nearly eighteen months after those hon, gentlemen assumed office. If he had begun with the year ending 30th June, 1874, and had carried the figures on for the five years during which those hon. gentlemenheld office, he would have found that during those five years the average annual increment in the public debt amounted to $6,933,000, whereas from the 30th June, 1879, down to 30th June, 1891, average annual increase of the public debt under Conservative administration was $7,888,-000-I grant you, an increase of about $900,000 a year as compared with the period during which hon, gentlemen opposite held office: but in that period we have built the Pacific Railway, we have made immense expenditures towards the enlargement of the canal system, we have contributed liberally towards the subsidizing of railways throughout this country, and we incurred other engagements looking to the promotion of our commercial prosperity But why was not the hon, gentleman candid enough to say this? If we compare the five years of the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite with the last five years of the Conservative Government, the period since the close of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, what do we find? We find that the average annual increment in the public debt during the five years from 1886 to 1891 amounted to $2,898,000, as against an averageannual increase in the five years of Liberal rule of $6,933,000. That is to say, during these last five years the Conservative party has governed Canada and carried on its public works, while adding to the debt less than $3,000,000 a year, as against an increase of nearly $7,000,000 a year during the time hop, gentlemen opposite held office. Now, Sir, as I understand it, the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is evolved principally from the idea that the condition of the rural population in Canada to-day is one of comparatively abject poverty, and that the trade of the country is in a condition of lamentable depres-What I contend is this, that it is not enough for these hon, gentlemen to say that the condition of agriculture in Canada is in a state of depression. ernment. In order to support that contention, these hon, gentlemen must show that the condition of agriculture in Canada is, relatively to the condition of the same industry in the United States or in Great Britain, in a state of depression: and unless they can do so their whole case falls to the ground. Everybody understands that for some years past, owing to the increased production of cereal products, as compared with the increase in the demand, the price of agricultural products has declined; and unless hon, gentlemen opposite can establish that the decline in prices and the resulting hardships upon the farmers have been greater in Canada than elsewhere they have no case on which to base their claim that unrestricted reciprocity will cure the evils of which they complain. without going too much into detail or into statistics, let me quote for the information of the House a statement derived from the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture of the United States, showing the value per acre of the cereal products of that country in the years 1869 and 1889. I find, for instance, that the value per acre of the corn crop in the United States was $17.75 in 1869, and that it had declined to $7.63 in 1889: that the value of wheat, that is to say, the product of wheat per acre, has fallen from $12.76 in 1869 to $8.98 in 1889; in oats the same value has fallen from $14.50 in 1869 to $6.26 in 1889; in barley it had fallen from $22.80 in 1869 to $12.57 in 1889; and rye from $13.20 in 1869 to $7.07 in 1889. Take these principal cereal products, their value in the market per acre in 1889 was less than one-third what it was in 1869; and I have no doubt that the same condition of things will, to a large extent, have prevailed in Canada, and that if there does exist to-day any depression among the agriculturists of this country, if their position is a less favourable one than it was ten, fifteen or twenty years ago, the reason is to be found in the worldwide and universal rule over which no tariff or no Government had any influence whatever. Why, Sir, if you take the value of farm animals you find the same results have been brought about—that is to say, that in respect of horses, cows, other cattle, pigs and sheep, between 1884 and 1890, a much more recent period than as between 1869 and 1889, there was a large and material decline in the average value of farm animals in the United States. Horses declined in value during that period about $6 per head; cows declined about $9 per head; other cattle about $8 per head; pigs about $1 per head; and sheep about 28 cents per head. the House has been fully informed, in the course of this debate, of the state of agriculture in the United States, and I do not propose to quote a single author or make a single statement on that point, nor do I intend to cite any authority showing that the prices of farm lands, that the value of cereal products, that the value of animals in Great Britain, have similarly declined as in the United States and Canada. I take it there is no gentleman in this House, I take it there is no intelligent reading man in Canada, who is not familiar with that fact; and, therefore, I let the fact speak for itself. But what I do say again is this, that hon. gentlemen opposite, when they speak of depression in Canada in order to create a case, must establish the fact, if they are able to do so—and I am satisfied they are not-that Canada, relatively to the tion of disadvantage and inferiority in respect of its productions. We have heard something its productions. about the immense mortgages that are said to have been placed upon the farms of Ontario. It so happens that since this debate began the annual report of the loan societies of Canada has been published, and that we are able to derive some information from it as to the position of the agriculturists of this country in respect of mort-The comparison, it seems to me, is one of considerable interest. I find, for instance, that the amount of principal and interest overdue and in default on mortgages held by the loan companies of this country was, in the year 1880--which was not a very prosperous year, because the depression existing from 1875 to 1879 had overlapped to some extent into 1880—$4,130,000; whereas, in 1890, on the 31st of December, it was only $2,055,000, or less than one-half of the amount overdue in the year We will go on another step. We will take the amount of mortgages upon which compulsory proceedings have been taken during the year, the amount of mortgages in respect of which the people have been so poverty-stricken that they were unable to meet the interest. In 1880 the amount was $2,096,000; in 1890 it was $2,062,000—not a great deal less, it is true, but still the position of the farmers, as set forth in the last return of the loan companies of Canada, has certainly not gone from bad to worse as regards the amount of mortgages on which compulsory proceedings were taken, while it is infinitely better as regards the aggregate amount of interest and principal in default. Take the total value of real estate under mortgages as disclosed in this return, and you will find, Sir, that on the 31st of December last it was $216,-770,000, a pretty large sum it is true, but the amount overdue was only $2,055,000, or less than l per cent. of the total amount of mortgages held. I go a step further, and I contend that farm mortgages are, in a large sense, equivalent to bank discounts. A farmer has not the same banking facilities as a merchant, and if he wants to buy other land, if he wants to extend the area of his operations, if he desires to purchase live stock or erect new farm buildings, what other means can he take? He has not the banking facilities of the merchant to procure money in order to extend his operations, except by means of mortgages; and I contend that it is an utter fallacy to assume, without positive knowledge of the fact and only upon the bare statement, that because the amount of mortgages has increased therefore the condition of the farmer is worse. On the contrary, I say there is a fair argument, I say there is as good an argument immediately behind the return in favour of the view that the increase of mortgages is as good a test of increasing prosperity among the farming population as the increase of banking discounts is a test of the expansion of trade among the mercantile community, provided, as my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Chapleau) says, there is nothing in default in the way of interest due, and I have quoted figures to show that there is no increase in that respect. Now, I take it that as good judges as we have in Canada of the condition, not merely of the mercantile, but of the agricultural classes, are the bankers of Canada. true that they do not loan money to the fariners direct, but they are in daily intercourse and in constant dealings with the merchants who are in close touch with the agricultural community and are in a position to report as to their condition. What do I find on that point? The evidence of Mr. George Hague, general manager of the Merchants Bank of Canada, I believe, has been already quoted, but I may be permitted to refer to it once more; and he said, at the annual meeting of the Merchants Bank of Canada, held in June last:

"I cannot share in the opinion held by some that the farmers of Canada, as a whole, are suffering. They are undoubtedly having a trying experience in some districts, but in many others they have done well and are prospering. Bank deposits are a plain proof of that. The manner in which farmers live is another proof of it. The continuous increase in cattle, horses, sheep, and all the appliances of prosperous farming, is apparent in many parts of the country."

And again, in the course of the same address, Mr. Hague, referring to the effects of the McKinley tariff upon the farmers of Canada, said:

tariff upon the farmers of Canada, said:

"There are some certainties and some uncertainties respecting the operation of the McKinley tariff. What is certain is that it stimulated our export of barley last fall at an increased price. It is certain also that barley has generally maintained an average price since, and that eggs fetched nearly as much this year as they did last. What is uncertain is, whether consumers in the United States will not after all pay the increased duties imposed on Canadian farm products. I am inclined to think they will. But, if not, I am inclined to think that if one market closes another can be opened, and that if our farmers cannot profitably grow one kind of grain they can another. I do not think the export of hay from this province in such large quantities has been an unmixed benefit by any means. With intelligence and self-reliance, the farmers of Canada can meet any tariff disadvantages of this kind, if they will bestir themselves to do it."

Which opinion, I, for my own part, entirely concurin. Let me cite another gentleman on this subject. Mr. B. E. Walker, the general manager of the Bank of Commerce, a gentleman who is in close touch with the trade of Ontario at all events, and at the last meeting of the bank, which took place within the last four or five weeks, he said:

"During the past year the Ontario farmers paid their implement notes and interest and mortgage instalments quite as promptly as in former years, in many districts much better than for many seasons."

And he goes on to say:

"Regarding eggs, whether we eventually, as I think we will, establish a satisfactory market in England or not, down to date no one has suffered from the McKinley Bill' but the consumer of eggs in the Eastern States."

venture to say that the testimony Walker, who is a practical man, who speaks without party bias of any kind, a gentleman whose means of information are not open to the members of this House, is more worthy of credence than the statements made on the other side of the House in another sense altogether. In dealing with this question, I am glad to be in a position to submit testimony which I suppose will command the attention, and it ought to command the confidence of gentlemen on the other side of the House, because I assume that there is no one who has a a greater claim upon their confidence than the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cart-There was a time when that hon, genwright). tleman occupied the position of Finance Minister, and when he dealt with the affairs of the country in a manner which may have been pleasant to him but was exceedingly disadvantageous to the people of Canada. He stated then, what I believe to be true, that there were certain tests by which we could arrive at the condition of affairs in this country. Let me quote what he said in his speech in 1877:

"I find that the general increase in various matters which are usually considered reliable signs of the advancement of the population in wealth have been very marked. For instance, it is very well known that the amount of the circulation of a country, at different periods, affords a very tolerable indication of the volume of business done therein; and I find, that whereas on 1st January, 1868, our total circulation amounted to barely $14,000,000, at the same period of the year 1877 that circulation (deducting in each case the Government notes held by the banks), had increased to as nearly as possible culation (deducting in each case the Government notes held by the banks), had increased to as nearly as possible $26,000,000, an increase of nearly 100 per cent. Similarly, within the same period, the bank deposits in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, for which alone we have returns, have increased from $29,689,000 to a no less sum than $70,450,000, the absolute increase in that case being 130 per cent.: and the deposits in Government saving banks from $1,686,000 to $7,178,030, an increase of fully 400 per cent.. which is specially valuable as showing the growth of habits of thrift and frugality among our population. And although I have not accurate statistics on the subject of life insurance. I believe I am correct in saying that within the past five or six years the gross amount of policies of life insurance outstanding in Canada has increased from about $35,000,000 to about $85,000,000."

Now, that is the test which the hon, member gives, the circulation, the deposits in banks, and life insur-Let us see how the position then compares with the present condition of affairs; because, if I can show that a large and substantial improvement has occurred we will have the best evidence that can be given, according to the hon, gentleman's own statement, of the prosperity of the people. What are the facts to-day? In respect of the deposits in Government savings banks, between 1879 and 1890 we find that there was an increase from $9,207,700 to $41,012,000, or an increase of 450 per cent., showing, according to the hon. gentleman, the growth of habits of thrift and frugality among the people at large. Then, in the chartered banks there was an increase of deposits from May 31, 1879, to the same date in 1891, from $71,954,500 to $152,196,500, or an increase of 110 per cent. In the loan companies—because almost every loan company receives deposits and pays interest upon them, and I must, therefore, consider them—the amount has increased from $9,246,000 in 1889 to $17,893,000 in 1890, or an increase of nearly In the aggregate the increase in 100 per cent. the deposited wealth, in the surplus earnings of the people, has been in twelve years, from 1879 to 1890, from $90,408,200 to $211,101,500, or 130 per cent.; and I submit that, according to the test laid down by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in this respect, the condition of the people is better than at any time in the past. Then take the test of the note circulation, and what do we find? The circulation of the banks, excluding therefrom the Dominion notes held as reserves in banks, but including the smaller. Dominion notes used in the transaction of the everyday business of the country, amounted on the 1st January, 1879, to $25,329,600, while on the 1st January, 1891, it amounted to $42,553,800, or an increase of 67 per cent. I would call attention to this fact, that the more the banking facilities of a country are extended the less money is likely to be in actual circulation. Those who are familiar with the working of a banking system will understand that cheques to a large extent are used in the conduct of business and that they take the place of notes, so that the increase of the domestic trade of the country measured by the bank circulation is really very much greater than the figures make it and ought to be valuable and held in esteem by appear, because of the extension of the bank hon gentlemen opposite. In the course of the facilities to which I have referred. The last test Budget debate of 1877 the hon, gentleman spoke Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

submitted by the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)—and I do not desire to go beyond the subjects treated of by him in his speech in 1877—was the question of life insurance. I do not myself attach very much importance to that, but it is evident that the hon. gentleman did at that time, and we have this result: Between 1879 and 1890 the amount of life insurance in force in Canada has increased from $86,-273,000 to $248,327,000, an increase of nearly 300 per cent. As I say, for my own part, these insurance figures may be illusory as a test of prosperity, but at any rate they were perfectly satisfactory to the hon, member for South Oxford when he submitted them to the House; and I insist and maintain that in respect of bank deposits, and more especially of bank circulation, which is far the most accurate test you can obtain as to the volume of the business of a country, the condition of Canada as measured in this way is infinitely more prosperous to-day than it has been at any time since Confederation. Now, I want to take up a somewhat debated, but, as it seems to me, a very interesting point, that is, the question of who pays the duty; because it must be obvious to every member on this side, at any rate, that practically the whole basis of the argument of hon, gentlemen opposite is founded upon the idea that the American duties upon our farm products come out of the pockets of the producers of this country. Well, now, the other night my hon. friend from Centre Wellington (Mr. Semple), who is a good political neighbour, dealt to some extent with this point, and he thought that it did not make much difference as to the item of wheat, as we only exported about 500,000 bushels a year, therefore it did not make much difference whether we removed the protective duty upon wheat or not. He forgot altogether that by reason of that protective duty we preserved the home market for so much of our wheat as is consumed in Canada, and that practically is all we produce in the country. Moving on to barley, he thought that because the price of barley on a recent date—and he quoted a very recent date-was only about 47 cents or 48 cents at Port Perry, whereas it was 85 cents or thereabouts at Buffalo, therefore the Canadian producer of barley lost the difference between the price at Port Perry and the price at Buffalo. The same with eggs; and he applied the same argument to potatoes. Now, with the permission of the House, I desire for a moment to go into that question of who pays the duty. And again it is my privilege and pleasure to submit to the consideration of hon, gentlemen opposite an authority whose validity they will scarcely venture to question, the authority of a gentleman in this House whom I greatly respect, possessed, as I think, of as logical a mind and of as vast a fund of information as any one who sits in the House-Irefer to the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who spoke on this subject in 1877, and demonstrated, to his satisfaction, at any rate, and demonstrated, I presume, to the satisfaction of hon. gentlemen opposite, that every copper of the duty imposed upon Canadian products by the people of the United States came out of the consumers in that country. quote from his testimony, because while it is not particularly valuable to us it must be valuable, on this point, and although it is now fourteen years ago, yet the principles then enunciated, if they are sound principles—and I presume they are, from his point of view, at any rate—must survive and be as potent and applicable to-day as when they were uttered by him. Now, what does he say?

"The doctrine laid down in England was that taxation imposed on imports was paid by the consumers of these imports; and if that was the case, the taxes imposed by the Government of the United States on Canadian products was paid by the consumers of these articles in the United States; and if a tax was imposed upon articles entering into consumption in this country imported from the United States it would be paid by the people of Canada."

You see he was perfectly consistent. He says that the importers in both cases pay the duty. He goes on:

"How is the farming population to be made prosperous by increasing the price of such articles? How are farmers to benefit by such a policy? In 1875 we sold to the United States 5,400,000 bushels of barley for $5,359,000. This barley was taxed by the American Government 20 cents per hundred pounds. Who paid this tax? The brewers of the United States or the farmers of Canada?"

There is a pertinent question, and applies as much to-day as it did fourteen years ago.—

—"Beyond question it was paid by the American brewers. The very object of imposing this tax was to increase the price of barley produced in the United States, and how did it increase the price, except by generally increasing the price not only of what was grown at home, but also of that which was imported from abroad? This was the object in view."

Well, now I would like to know—and I regret that the hon. gentleman is not now in his seat—I would like to know whether the hon. member for Bothwell still adheres to that doctrine. If not, I would like to know—and remember he believes this to be a doctrine that is bound to survive under any condition—I would like to know if that principle does not equally apply to a tax of 30 cents a bushel which the American Government has imposed upon Canadian barley? But the hon, gentleman was not satisfied with the general proposition; he proposed to apply it to a distinct case, and he proceeded in these words:

case, and he proceeded in these words:

"We had sold to the United States 100,000 bushels of wheat for $109,000; and the tax levied on it only increased the price to the American consumer. It made no difference to the Canadian exporter. We sold to Great Britain, in 1875, 2,247,000 bushels of pease for $2,128,675, and we sold to the United States 579,000 bushels of pease for $502,176, and we got to a cent from the American purchaser the price we received from the English producer. Pease entered free into England, and they were taxed 15 cents in the United States. Who paid the duty? If the duty was paid by Canadians, then pease would be 15 cents lower when sold to Americans than when sold to England. It was the consumer and not the producer who paid taxation."

Well, now, hon, gentlemen will remember that in the course of this debate reference has been made occasionally—and, perhaps, inferentially rather that directly—to the question of Imperial Federation, more especially in the trade sense, and what has been the answer of our friends opposite, not merely in this House, but in their journals throughout the country? They have answered that it was an utter fallacy, a mere Utopian dream, to expect the people of Great Britain to consent to a scheme involving discrimination in favour of colonial products, because the tax required in that case would fall upon the consumers in Great Britain. Now, if that be so, how does it lie in the mouths of those same hon, gentlemen to turn around and in the same breath proclaim that a tax imposed by Great Britain upon foreign products will increase the price of the cereal productions, of live stock and provisions of all kinds, going from Canada into Great Britain, while they maintain that the tax imposed by the United States against foreign products does not increase the price of the articles in that country, but is paid by the exporters? Surely there is a glaring inconsistency in their attitude in the two cases. If you argue it down to a nicety, if you say that the duty is paid by the consumer in cases where the country imposing the tax cannot produce enough for its own consumption, then I say the argument applies equally in the case of the United States as respects those articles which we have been exporting to them for the last fifteen or twenty years, such as barley, horses, eggs, &c. That is to say, that whenever their home supply is short the consumer in that country pays the duty, and not the exporter from Canada. But before I leave this branch of the question, it will be within the recollection of hon. gentlemen that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) ventured to claim that if we had free trade with the United States, that if we had unrestricted reciprocity, which he so anxiously desires, the value of every horse in Canada would be increased by $30 per head. Why $30? Because that is the measure of the taxation imposed by the United States on horses imported from Canada. not help thinking what a pity it was that the American Congress in 1890 had not imposed a duty of $100 per head on horses, so that when we came to have unrestricted reciprocity, as hon, gentlemen opposite expected, the value of every horse in Canada might be increased by $100. Surely if the argument is good that the duty of $30 per head will increase the value of each horse by that amount, then a duty of $100 or even $500, given unrestricted reciprocity, would increase the value of each horse by that amount. The simple statement of such a case shows the utter fallacy and absurdity of the hon, gentleman's contentions. But I want to be as fair with the House as possible. I do not propose to argue against the principle of reciprocity. On the contrary, I believe that it is possible, if the Americans will consent, to frame a treaty of reciprocity between the two countries that will inure and conduce to the advantage of both. dissent from the view that the duty imposed by the Americans is taken out of the pockets of the people of this country, no matter whether that duty be high or low, and I want to cite an illustration of the practical working of the American tariff on the products of this country. I will refer to the case cited by the hon member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Semple) some days ago. That hon gentleman said that barley sold at Port Perry at 47 or 48 cents, while on the same day it sold in Buffalo at 80 and 85 cents. Give us free trade between the two countries, he said, and the price of barley in Canada will be increased to 85 cents per bushel. What is the basis of that argument? Is it not just as fair to assume that the price of barley in Buffalo was increased 30 cents per bushel by reason of the increased taxation under the McKinley tariff? Let us see how it practically works. The duty on barley before the McKinley tariff came into operation was 10 cents per bushel. At one time, some years ago, it was 15 cents per bushel, but it has been

September last—I take that period because it is a fair one—the price of barley in Buffalo was, for No. 1, 85 cents; No. 2, 80 to 82 cents; and No. 3 extra, 77 to 80 cents per bushel. Let hon, gentlemen remember that this was under the old tariff in the United States of 10 cents per bushel. In Toronto, on the same date, barley was 62 to 65 cents for No. 2, and 58 to 62 cents for No. 3. There was a difference under the old order of things between the price of barley in Toronto and Buffalo of something over 18 cents per bushel. We will not disand 8 cents representing transportation from Toronto to Buffalo. 1 will take a month later, 22nd October, after the McKinley tariff had gone into operation. What do we find? That the price of barley had increased to 95 cents for No. 1, 92 cents for No. 2, 88 to 90 cents for No. 3 extra; whereas the prices in Toronto—I do not disguise the fact—had declined to 57 cents for No. 2, and 53 cents for No. 3 extra. What was the operation of the increased tariff on barley? Was it, as hon, gentlemen opposite contend, to reduce the price of barley in Canada by 30 cents per bushel? On the contrary, as the market quotations-and I have taken the prices from the Globe-show, the effect of the increased duty in the United States was to increase the price of Canadian barley in Buffalo by 10 cents per bushel and reduce the price of Canadian barley in Canada by 5 to 8 cents per bushel. At the very worst, and it is the utmost they can claim, the effect of the increased duty of 20 cents per bushel was to decrease the price in Canada from 5 to 8 cents, and not, as hon, gentlemen opposite have contended, by 20 cents per bushel. Suppose we had unrestricted reciprocity to-morrow, or suppose we were able to bring about a restricted reciprocity under which Canadian barley would enter the United States free of duty, is any man insane enough to believe that Canadian barley would increase in price 20 cents per bushel? The moment the duty was removed! the price would decline, and Canadian farmers, instead of being benefited to the extent of 30 cents per bushel, would be exceedingly fortunate if they obtained 10 cents per bushel. I did intend to refer briefly to the operations of the Treaty of 1854, but I do not now propose to go into that matter, as I am detaining the House at some length. What I would say is this: It is undoubtedly a fact that under the operation of that treaty, or rather during its operation, the condition of the agricultural class in this country was one of extreme in this country was one of extreme pros-perity. I go further, and I say this: If you can restore the condition of the markets of the world during the operation of that treaty the condition of our farmers would again be one of prosperity, reciprocity or no reciprocity. Take the United States itself. What an enormous change has come over that country since 1854. In that year they had in that whole country only 16,720 miles of railway: to-day they have 180,000 miles, and what that means in the way of material development every hon, gentleman understands without going into it. The mileage has increased since 1854 more than ten-fold. The population has increased 11-fold—that is 150 per cent. Take cereal production. What was the product in 1854, compared with the present? As regards corn, wheat, Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

cereals, the aggregate in 1854 was 844,167,000 bushels; in 1888, the latest return I have been able to obtain, the aggregate was 3,165,393,000 bushels—an increase in population of 150 per cent, and an increase in cereal production of 400 per cent. Does it commend itself to the intelligence of any sane man to say that if we had unrestricted reciprocity or free trade, restricted or unrestricted, with the Americans, we would occupy as good a position of vantage as we occupied under the operations of the Treaty of 1854? Every item cuss whether the duty was paid by Canadians or I have mentioned shows the fallacy of the view Americans; there was 10 cents representing duty presented by hon, gentlemen opposite. Take one more point, and I will mention only one, as to the conditions then existing. During the operation of that treaty pork sold as high as $35,25 per barrel, butter 45 cents per pound, corn $1.95 per bushel, flour $10 per barrel, oats $1.03 per bushel, and wheat $2.57 per bushel. Why? Was it because we had a treaty? There is no man in the House who can truly state that, who has a knowledge of the facts. Was the price of wheat in the United States increased to $2.57 a bushel during the period between 1854 and 1866 because we had a treaty? No. It was because, outside of that treaty, there were conditions which cannot be restored, which it is out of the power of man to restore, and I maintain this: that until you can restore the conditions which existed during the operation of that treaty it is utter nonsense to pretend that unrestricted reciprocity will bring back the prices of farm produce to the same rates as prevailed during that time. I do not intend to deal with more than one point further, and it is one which seems to me to lie at the very root of the whole question. We had a general election in Canada not many months ago; we had one party in Canada going over the country from one end to the other, telling the people that if they were returned to power they would bring about unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. I want to know what warrant they have for a statement of that kind? I want to know what evidence they have submitted to this House, from the opening of this debate to this present time, to substantiate their claim that they can obtain reciprocity with the United States. They tell us that it is an absurd and utter fallacy for members and supporters of the Government, for ministerialists, to pretend that they can obtain a treaty covering only natural products—that they can obtain a limited reciprocity treaty; and whom do they quote in support of that view? Is it not Mr. Jas. G. Blaine, is it not Mr. Hitt of Illinois, is it not Mr. Butterworth, is it not Mr. Baker, is it not Mr. Erastus Wiman, and is it not the Republican leaders of the United States, whom they quote in support of their views, that it is an utter fallacy and simple nonsense to contend that we can obtain a limited measure of reciprocity with the United States? Well, now, I insist upon this: That if these gentlemen in the United States are good and credible authorities upon one point they are equally good and credible authorities on the other point, and that hon, gentlemen opposite must show as a reason for the faith that is in them; they must show us, as a ground for the claim they set up for the confidence of the people of this country, that they have assurances from the United States of some tangible character. They must show us from the speeches in Congress, and from the jouroats and barley, and I take only those four principal | nals of the United States, that if the clive branch is extended to them, that if an offer of unrestricted reciprocity is made, it will be accepted and availed of by the people on the other side. What is the Why, this question of unrestricted reciprocity, this question of fuller and freer trade relation with Canada, has been discussed in the Congress of the United States, not once, but two or three times Has any gentleman opposite ventured to cite a single quotation from the speeches made in Congress in support of their claim? No, they dare not do it, and why? It is because they cannot find from beginning to end of the Congressional Record of 1888, or 1889, or 1890, or even of the current year, for the short session which closed in Washington on the 4th March last; they cannot find one single statement which will bear out the view they are attempting to impose on the people of Canada, that we could have free trade with the United States and at the same time retain control of our own I propose, with the consent of the House, just as briefly as may be, to quote the statements, and the only statements that have been made in Congress, upon these points. On the 1st March, 1889, the question was debated in Congress. Hitt, in introducing his resolution in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, instigated thereto, I have no doubt, for it is a matter of common notorietyinstigated thereto by Mr. Erastus Wiman and the gentlemen who have been behind him in this country, made a statement, and in that statement he took the pains to explain to Congress what he meant by that resolution. It was a commercial union resolution, it is true, but it was the only resolution to which this gentleman would commit himself. It was the only resolution to which this gentleman would invite the support of Congress, and he said this:

"Commercial union is, in substance, a proposition to extend our tariff system over Canada; to remove the Custom-houses of both Governments from the frontier and put them along the line of the sea, to have our protection system include the continent from the Gulf of Mexico months to give to our manufactures and other products as north; to give to our manufactures and other products as free access to the markets of Canada, and allow the Canadians to sell and buy here as freely. Undoubtedly they, in being subjected to the same tariff with us, would in all fairness be consulted as to its provisions, but we, sixty millions, would in all fairness generally have the prevailing voice in determining what the rates should be.

Now, that is the view of Mr. Hitt, but he said more in the course of the same debate, and I will give you another quotation from his remarks, which are somewhat on the same lines. He said:

"What is commercial union with Canada? It means, as set out in this resolution, the adoption by both countries of precisely the same tariff of duties, or taxes, to be levied on goods coming from abroad, abolishing altogether our line of Custom-houses on the north by which we collect tariff duties on goods coming from Canada, abolishing their Custom-houses along the same line by which they collect duties on goods we send into Canada, and leaving intercourse as unrestricted between this country and Canada, as it is between the States. The line of Custom-houses would follow the sea and include both countries. The proceeds of taxation thus collected would be equitably divided, and the fairest way would seem to be in proportion to population."

That is the American view of this policy as propounded by one of its prime authors, and one of its principal exponents. But a little debate arose in Congress upon the proposition which Mr. Hitt submitted; a debate which did not last very long, which did not evoke many speeches, and which did not seen: to arouse much enthusiasm; but there is one singular fact in connection with that debate to

That is: That of the few speeches made, every one of them was precisely on the lines laid down by Mr. Hitt. I will quote to you, as fully as is necessary, because the citations cover the whole ground, from the speeches made in support of this proposition in Congress. And mind you, gentlemen, these are speeches delivered in the Congress of the United States, which are just as important on this question as speeches made in the Parliament of Canada, because it requires two parties to go into this bargain, and whatever our views may be, even though we were unanimous on it on both sides of the House, we cannot move one iota towards the consummation of the project, without the consent of the authorities on the other side of the line. Mr. O. L. Jackson, of Pennsylvania, made this statement in Congress:

"If this resolution tends to anything it is to governmental union with Canada. It means in the future what is popularly termed annexation of Canada to the United

That is the interpretation made by a gentleman sitting in Congress, without any special sympathy for the resolution, but taking simply the commonsense view of the matter as it appeared to him, as a plain business man. Mr. Ben. Butterworth of Ohio, whose name is somewhat familiar in Canada, although he is not now a member of Congress, said on that occasion:

"I have advocated removing every barrier and hindrance to full and free trade between Canada and the United States. I have believed, and do now, that such unhampered trade relations would lead to political union."

That is the view of Mr. Butterworth. One other gentleman, and one other only, spoke in the course of that debate—Mr. Baker, the member for one of the districts of New York, whose name has become somewhat familiar to the people of Canada, because it was Mr. Baker who addressed to Mr. Blaine in the month of February last that letter asking him whether he had committed himself to the opening of negotiations with Canada. Mr. Baker appears to be somewhat of a fervid orator, and this is what he said:

"I remember, Mr. Speaker, that when in the dark days of rebellion our call went forth to the brave men of the North to volunteer in defence of the Union, over 46,000 Canadians enrolled themselves among its defenders. The time is coming when they will be in the Union themselves, a part of us, they and their children, and their lands. God speed the day! I am hoping to see the day of Canada's richest blessing when she becomes a part of our Confederation. 'Commercial union' we will not favour, except as a means to a speedy end.'

It is of the highest consequence to us, in deciding this question, to consider the view of it taken in the United States; and I again ask, what warrant have these hon, gentlemen, what evidence have they to submit to the Parliament of Canada, to show that, if they were in office to-morrow, they could carry out their scheme of unrestricted reciprocity on any other conditions than such as would be humiliating and abhorrent to the national sentiment of the people of this country? But it may be said that, though that was the case in 1879, yet, owing to the missionary work performed by hon. gentlemen opposite since then, a different view has come to prevail, and that the Congress of the United States are now coming to join hand-in-hand with the Opposition party in Canada. Now, let us see how the case really stands. Those who read the Toronto Globe, as I do with a great deal of care which I draw the attention of hon. gentlemen. levery day, will remember that, during the whole time the McKinley Bill was under discussion, there was a daily correspondence in that paper from Washington, promising that a resolution in favour of unrestricted reciprocity would be submitted in the Congress of the United States, and assuring the people of Canada that it would receive a large and generous support, intimating, indeed, that it would be adopted by that body. Now, there was this much warrant, and this much only, for those statements—that a resolution was introduced into the Senate of the United States by the Hon. John Sherman, the distinguished Senator from Ohio; and the moment the terms of that resolution were made known in Canada, it commanded the unanimous support of the Conservative press in this country, because they saw that it was a fair resolution such as the Government of Canada could reasonably and properly accept, and could join hands with the Congress of the United States in carrying into effect. Let me read that resolution; and I venture to say that there is not a gentleman sitting on this side of the House who will not agree that it was a fair one. Here it is—introduced by Mr. Sherman on the 2nd day of September, 1890:

"And whenever it shall be duly certified to the President of the United States that the Government of the Dominion of Canada has declared a desire to enter into such commercial arrangements with the United States as will result in the complete or partial removal of duties upon trade between Canada and the United States, he shall appoint three commissioners to meet those who may be designated to represent the Government of Canada, to consider the best method of extending the trade relations between Canada and the United States, and to ascertain on what terms greater freedom of intercourse between the two countries can best be secured."

I say that is a reasonable proposition, which the Government of Canada could properly accept, and upon which I think they would be glad to proceed in the negotiation of a treaty. If there was, as hon, gentlemen opposite contend, a disposition on the part of the leading men in the neighbouring country to accept overtures from Canada looking to broader and freer trade relations between the two countries, surely it would have been shown by the adoption of a proposition of that kind, with regard to which Mr. Sherman said:

"I think these two measures would open the door to reciprocal relations between the two countries as far as we ought to go now. If the commissioners should report any proposition that meets the favour of Congress, well and good, no harm is done."

This was a proposition which, whether a man was favourable to it or not he committed himself to nothing by accepting-colourless in one sense, yet full of practical consequence in another. what was the reception of that resolution in the Senate of the United States? Mr. Sherman's voice was the only one raised on its behalf, and it was not even pressed to a vote, because Mr. Sherman knew that it would be overwhelmingly and ignominiously defeated. Now, in the course of the debate on the McKinley tariff in the Senate of the United States, speeches were made pro and con upon almost every item that affected the trade relations of the United States with Canada; and while it is true that in respect of lumber, iron ore, and one or two other items, the Democratic party were favourable to freer commercial intercourse between the two countries, yet on the broad pro-Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

gentlemen who took part in the tariff debate in the United States Senate, no less than sixteen were utterly opposed to any measure of reciprocity with Canada, either partial or unrestricted, while only nine were favourable to any kind of reciprocity with Canada; and of these nine only one, Mr. John Sherman, was favourable to going the length of even considering so broad a measure as hon. gentlemen opposite have submitted to the consideration of this House. Now, I do not intend to quote from the organs of the Government of the United States, though I might quote the opinions of such journals as the New York Tribune recent opinions, expressed since this debate begun; I might also quote the opinion of the New York Press, a paper established by the Republican party on the eve of the last presidential election, with the view of influencing opinion in the State of New York, and which may be considered as voicing the opinion of the President of the United States him-Both of these journals are absolutely and unqualifiedly opposed to any measure of reciprocity with Canada except that of commercial union, with the understanding, implied if not expressed, that its consequence shall be the political absorption of this country by the United States. Now, as I understand the position of the Conservative party on this question, it is this-that they are favourable to as large a measure of reciprocity with the United States as is consistent with Canadian interests, as is consistent with the control by Canada of its own tariff, and as will avoid discrimination against the mother country. If hon, gentlemen opposite adopt the same view, if they adhere to the principle that we must retain control of our own tariff, if they adhere to the principle, as they have done repeatedly in the past, down to three years ago, that there must be no discrimination against the mother country, then we are at one, and when the commissioners go to Washington in the coming month of October, their duty will be to find a basis, if a basis can be found, for negotiating a treaty, always subject to these limitations, which limitations—I only speak for myself—I will insist upon in any treaty which may be made with the United States. Now, what of the future? If we are to have a trade arrangement with the United States, there must be two parties to it. What is the position in the United States to-day? It is not what it was in 1888, when this agitation began, and when, on the 1st of July in that year, Messrs. Wiman and Butterworth, and some of their friends made speeches at Dufferin Lake. Then the Republicans had control of both Houses of Congress, but that control has since passed from them. Instead of a majority of eighteen in the House of Representatives, as they had in 1888, they are to-day in a minority of about 140. The tidal wave which swept over that country last October buried them so deep that the about 140. day of resurrection has been postponed, for goodness knows how long. How do they stand in the Senate? They have to-day in the Senate of the United States a majority not more than eight, which is quite as apt—I think more so—to disappear within two years as it is to increase in number. What follows then? As every man who has ever read an American newspaper, as every man who has even a smattering knowledge of American politics, knows the free trade party of position not one single man raised his voice in that country, as it is termed, is the Demo-favour of it except Mr. Sherman. Among the cratic party; and if that party comes into office, as it is just as apt to do as the Republicans, it will, until it obtains control of both branches of Congress as well as of the Executive, be a moral as well as a physical impossibility to effect any treaty arrangement. And if the Democratic party should obtain control of both branches of the Legislature and the Executive, what will be the consequence? We will have the enactment of a Bill somewhat on the lines of the Mills Bill. The duty on Canadian products will be struck off-not to benefit Canadians, not because hon, gentlemen opposite say Canadians pay the duty-but because the Democrats and the majority of the people of the United States believe that these duties fall upon the consumer in the United States. And if we should have the Mills Bill enacted to-morrow, so far as our trade relations with the United States are concerned, we will have secured everything that any man can desire, everything that is necessary to conduce to the advancement and prosperity of this country, and we will have secured that without surrendering one iota of control over our own tariff and without having set up a wall to the extent of one inch against the mother country, under whose. ægis we have so long lived and so greatly prospered.

Mr. ALLAN. At this late period of the discussion, I have no desire to prolong the debate. I feel, however, it will be my duty to say at least a few words upon a question in which my constituents are deeply interested and to which I owe my seat in this House. I can scarcely hope, after the very many able speeches delivered by hon, gentlemen on both sides, to say much or even anything that will throw additional light on the great question now engaging our attention, and the subject having been pretty well exhausted, it is not my intention to travel over the broad field traversed by previous speakers, but to confine my remarks, as far as possible, to the question before the House. The hon, gentleman who has just taken his seat, has devoted an hour and a half to prove that the treaty which the Government are trying to negotiate will be of no value if negotiated. His whole argument has been to show that a commercial treaty with the United States, covering the natural products of the two countries, will be valueless to this country. In that contention, he has only followed the line taken by all the hon. gentlemen who preceded him on that side of the House. One thing has been established in this debate, and that is, that hon, gentlemen opposite are really not in favour of any treaty, whether of unrestricted reciprocity or not. I think, has been clearly proven in this debate, and the whole argument of the last speaker has been to show that if we succeeded in negotiating any such treaty it would be of no value to us. He has even gone so far as to contend that, in the case of a product like barley, the Americans pay the duty, and that in every other line the Americans are affected by the imposition of the duty and not the Canadians. Except when he alluded to a few figures comparing the Administration of Mr. Mackenzie with that of this Government, the hon. gentleman took up his whole time in endeavouring to prove that a reciprocity treaty, on which the Government appealed to the country, if we succeeded in getting it, would be of no use to the country. I ask then, why did inconvenient season? I will read the reason given by Sir John Macdonald for holding the election when he did. The reasons, as published in the Government organs of the 5th of February last, are as follows :-

"Sir John Macdonald's Government, not long ago, made a definite proposal to the Washington authorities for the settlement of all existing differences between the two countries. It involves partial reciprocity, the enumerated articles to include quite a number of natural products. But the proposition discards any idea of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity. Moreover, these propositions were invited and suggested by the Washington authorities. Commissioners from Canada and Great Britain will start for Washington on 4th March, the date of the opening of the new Congress."

Here we have it stated that the proposition for reciprocity was initiated by the Secretary of State of the United States; and yet we have the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) devoting at least fifteen minutes of the last part of his speech to show that it would be utterly impossible to get any treaty whatever from the people of the United States. Well, I would ask the hon. gentleman why the country was plunged into the turmoil of a general election last March, and why we are assembled here at this inconvenient season of the year? The avowed purpose was, as stated by the paragraph I have read, to take the feeling of the country upon this question of reciprocity. I admit that very little time was given to the people of Canada for the consideration of that question. The election, for certain reasons which no doubt are well understood on the other side, was hastily held, and it was impossible to get an intelligent opinion from the electorate on that question. However, the reason I have mentioned was that given for holding the election at that time, namely, to obtain the opinion of the people as to reciprocity, which, as the Government stated, was desired by the Secretary of State of the United States. Yet we are told by the hon, member for Cardwell that we have no chance whatever of getting a treaty with the United States, and that if we did get it, even in articles of barley and other things of that kind, in which we, on this side of the House, think it would be a great advantage to our farmers to have reciprocity, it would be of no use to us because the duties are paid by the Americans. I regret I am unable to join in the congratulations of hon. gentlemen opposite as to the present condition of affairs in this country. I would be glad to know that I was in error as to the depression that now exists. I would be glad to know that I was entirely astray as to the condition of our agriculturists, manufacturers and others; but I am convinced that, with the exception of a few pampered manufacturers, there is a widespread depression in every department of business throughout the country. Representing a riding which, as an agricultural riding, is second to none, coming as I do from the County of Essex, for which nature has done so much, I must say, speaking from the point of view of the farmers and under very favourable circumstances, that they as well as others have suffered from this depression. Now, I propose to call attention to the sugar duties, on which very little has been said since the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) gave a full exposition of them in this House. I am well aware that some hon. gentlemen have attempted to answer his statement. the Government then appeal to the people? I ask, But, with the exception of a few carping criticisms why is this Parliament assembled at this very the statement which he made in reference to the sugar question has not been answered. I propose to show that this policy, for which the Minister of Finance has received the congratulations of gentlemen on that side of the House at the present time. does take out of the pockets of the people of this country a very large amount of money. Credit is given to the Finance Minister for removing the duty on sugar. If the duty had been removed several years ago I think credit would be due. has been the view of the party on this side of the House that too much money has been taken out of the pockets of the people and that all unnecessary taxation should have long ago been removed. fact that the Finance Minister was able to take off the sugar duty now only proves that it should have been taken off before, according to the contentions of hon, gentlemen on this side. As to the policy of taking the duty off sugar, I believe it was understood by every retail dealer in the country, and certainly by every wholesale merchant, and it was evident that no other course could be pursued by the Government. The fact that the stocks of sugar, as far as the distributors of that article were concerned, had run down to the smallest point shows that it was understood that this duty could not be maintained in view of the fact that the Americans had removed the duty. When sugar was selling 12 lbs. for $1 in Canada compared with 23 pounds and 24 pounds in Detroit, it was evident that the duty could not be mainnot be maintained, and if the removal of this duty under these circumstances is an evidence of statesmanship on the part of the Finance Minister, then every retail merchant in this country is a statesman, because every one of them expected the removal of the duty and acted accordingly. I propose to show by correspondence which I have on this question that the refiners are taking a very large amount of money out of the pockets of the people over and above the price of sugars in New York, which is in a protected country, and, if a comparison is made with the markets of England, I believe it can be shown that the refiners of Canada to-day are taking almost the full amount of the duty. The figures I have were obtained on the markets on the 8th July. The price of granulated sugar in Montreal on that date was 45, less 25 per cent., or $4.51 net per 100 lbs., while in New York the price was 41, less 1 per cent., making $4.21 net, or a difference of 30 cents per 100 lbs. in favour of the Canadian refiner. Bright or extra C sugars, as they are called, were quoted in New York at the same date at from $3.56 to $3.94, less I per cent., and without actual samples it is difficult to make a comparison in this grade, but it would be fair to take the average of $3.75, or, even if we take the outsides figure $3.94, it can be seen how much higher the prices are here, when I state that such sugars could not be bought under 41 to 41 in Montreal at that date. For example, take the New York average price, $3.75, less 1 per cent., equal to $3.71 net; as against the lowest price in Montreal, 4½, less 2½ per cent., equal to $4.02½ net, or a difference of 31½ cents in favour of the Canadian refiner. Or again, take the highest New York price, $3.94, less 1 per cent., equal to $3.90 net, against the Montreal price of 41, less 21 per cent., equal to $4.14, and there is a difference of 24 cents per 100 lbs. in favour of the New York sugars. Yellows are quoted in New York at 27, less Mr. ALLAN.

per cent., or net in Montreal $3.65, or a difference of 80½ cents per 100 lbs. in favour of the Canadian refiner, that is, if the quality is the same, and there is certainly very little difference. In a letter that I have, the results of some actual tests that have been made as to the value of sugars in New York and in Montreal are given. This letter is from one of the largest dealers in Ontario, and he says:

"On comparing sample number six, quoted at $3.75, less 1 per cent., say $3.71 net. I find it equal to a sugar just bought by us in Montreal at $4.25, less 2½, say $4.14, or a difference of 43 cents per 100 lbs. And sample number twelve, at $3.31, less 1 per cent., say $3.28, cannot be matched in Montreal under $3.75 to $3.87½; and taking even the inside figure, at which we cannot to-day secure anything, say $3.75, less 2½—$3.65, you have a difference of 37 cents. In other words, Canadian refiners are getting from § to ½ a cent per 100 lbs. more for yellow sugars than refiners in New York."

These comparisons are made between New York and Montreal, comparing Canada with a highly protective country where they have a protection of half a cent, and even then, we find that Canadian refiners are taking money out of the pockets of the people of this country to the extent of at least \$1,000,000 a year. I have here a circular from a prominent Liverpool firm dated 20th June, 1891, and I want to compare the price of English sugars with ours. This is what I find. Brown sugar at 12s. per cwt., or \$2.61, duty 80 cents, freight 12s. 6d., exchange on the basis of 110 $\frac{1}{10}$, and 10 per cent, for primage, I per cent. brokerage and I per cent. bank commission, and insurance, say 1 per cent., and we have the total cost of English sugar laid down in Montreal at \$3.623. The refiners' price in Montreal even at the average of \$3.75, less 21 per cent., would be \$3.65, and in this calculation no allowance has been made for discount in Liverpool which used to be 21 per cent. There has been very little importation of sugars for some time from Liverpool, and in regard to this point of discount I was not able to obtain information, but it is supposed that the same rate of discount exists to-day. Even without that, the prices of sugar from England, according to this comparison, are less than the prices of the Montreal refiners. In any case, the fact is established that our refiners are taking from 30 cents to 43 cents per 100 lbs. out of the people of Canada over the prices which obtain in New York, and almost, if not altogether, to the full extent of the duty, namely, 80 cents per 100 lbs., as compared with the English sugars. I will continue the comparison. Bright sugars were quoted at 14s. 6d. in Liverpool; add the duty, freight, brokerage, commission and insurance, and they would be laid down in Montreal at \$4.20, while the Montreal price was \$4.25, less 2½ per cent., or \$4.14. this calculation is without the discount. with reference to granulated sugar, the figures show a difference of about 49 cents between the price of the granulated in England at the present time; these figures have been supplied to me by a large importing house, or a house that handles a large quantity of sugar. The prices they have given are the prices received on the 8th of July, and upon comparing samples, there has been found to exist a difference between the two markets of Montreal and New York of 43 cents per 100 lbs. This, I think, establishes the statement that has been made by the hon, member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), that the refiners at the present time are 1 per cent., or \$2.84½ net, against \$3.75, less 2½ taking, as he stated, 31 cents per 100 lbs.

out of the pockets of the people of Canada. matter of fact, they are taking much more, if they are taking that amount, over and above the prices in New York, and nearly the full amount of duty, when compared with the English prices. In dealing with this question, the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), spoke about sugar, claiming a reduction of $5,000,000. In this calculation he stated that it would be proper to take off about 25 per cent. for the retailers' profit. Mr. Speaker, any one who knows anything about the sugar trade of this country knows that so far as the retailers are concerned, sugar is, and has been, handled at cost price, or with a very slight fraction of profit, if any, in order to cover shrinkage, and in this calculation he states that $1,500,000, I think he said, should be deducted for the retailers' profit. So, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the calculations the hon, gentleman has made in reference to sugar are altogether wrong, and he will find that such is the case by consulting any merchant in the House, or out of it, because every one understands that sugar is a commodity which the retail dealer handles at cost, or if there is any advance, it is merely a fraction to cover the shrinkage in weight, in addition to the freight charge. The hon, member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) thought that he had answered the argument of the hon, member for Brant in reference to sugar. Speaking of the hon. member for Brant, he said:

"He told us that he found the lowest average price of granulated to be 65 cents a pound, but he made the average price of granulated and yellow together 6.64 cents per 100 lbs., or one cent and a-half more than the price of granulated. This is evidently a mere error in calculation, for the hon, gentleman sees that the average price of the two could not be higher than the price of the highest, the granulated sugar."

Well, that would be all right provided the statement was correct. If that hon, gentleman had taken the pains to hunt up the Journal of Commerce in which the hon. member for Brant obtained the figures which he submitted to the House, he would have found that 62 cents was not the highest price of granulated, that frequently during the year quoted it had gone up to the high price of 8 cents. After referring to the quantity of granulated sugar, and so on, he says that this calculation of the hon. member for Brant is about $2,000,000 out of the way. The fact is, the calculation of the hon. member for Brant has not been dealt with at all, there was no error in it, as hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavoured to show. The quotations submitted to this House were taken from the Journal of Commerce the first day of every month for one whole year, and the hon, member for Brant took the lowest quotations, and in this way, I believe, the hon, member for Westmoreland made his mistake. He confused his figures in reference to this 65 cents per pound, and left himself in error on this sugar question to the extent of $2,000,000. The 65 cents alluded to the quotation of a single day. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), in the remarks he made about sugar, stated that under the tariff at present, 14 Dutch standard, a very large quantity of sugar suitable for use would be introduced and used in the Lower Provinces. Now, I wish to read a letter in reference to that point, which states:

"Of sugar under 14 Dutch standard, very little, if any, will be brought into this country."

I am not prepared to say that it is all on account of the statement made by an importer. the tariff; but what I do say is, that when this

Every one in Ontario that has any idea of sugar and qualities, knows that this quality will not be used, and the fact that the tariff has been reduced to the low standard of 14 will prevent any quantity of sugar being brought in that will be of any value to the consumers of this country. By lowering the standard of sugar below that of the Americans, which is 16, the Government will destroy our prospects of developing the trade that we expected to build up with Jamaica. We have been at great expense in showing our exhibits in the Island of Jamaica with the view of making a treaty of reciprocity with that country, but the way that this sugar tariff has been arranged will now prevent us from making a treaty of that kind with that Island. The 80 cents will effectually prevent any of that sugar being brought in, because it is a quality much above 14 Dutch standard, and I fear that this action of the Government will throw the trade of that Island largely into the hands of the United States, who are offering terms of reciprocity in raw sugars and other things. I think, Sir, that I have shown that under this tariff the people of this country suffer to the extent of from one to two million dollars annually on sugar alone. With the exception of a few industries like this that are permitted to prey on the people of this country, who are allowed to keep their hands in the pockets of the people, there is very little prosperity among our manufacturing industries generally. Our cotton mills are not prosperous. They have reached a stage of their existence under this tariff when combinations are beginning to form. It has been well known for some time that our cotton mills are running upon part time, and by combination have been paying for idle looms. In almost every department, with the exception of the indus-tries that have been benefited by the tariff, the manufacturers are anxious for wider trade arrangements. Almost all other manufactures are in a state of dulness and depression. Now, in reference to the farmers of this country, the hon. gentleman devoted some little time to endeavour to show that their position had been improved in respect to mortgages. The statement that has been already made in this House showing that the number of mortgages and chattel mortgages in Ontario had been vastly increased during the last few years, and I will not occupy the time by repeating it, proves that a large number of the farmers of this country are practically in the hands of the sheriffs, because the very last thing a farmer will do is to raise money on a chattel mort-In regard to the prices of commodities, the hon, member for Cardwell (Mr. White) has rendered it unnecessary for me to go into an elaborate argument to show that the prices are lower, because he admits the fact. Every one, he says, knows that prices have been lower. The hon, member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) did not know it, because he entered into an elaborate argument, which will be found in his speech, to show that the prices were somewhat higher in 1890 than in 1879, and it has been the line of argument pursued by a great many hon, gentlemen opposite. But, as a matter of fact, I think every one at all conversant with the prices of grain in this country must know that agricultural produce has averaged much lower since the introduction of the present tariff than before.

tariff was advocated in 1878, the position taken by the supporters of the new policy was that the prices of farm produce would be increased, and that a home market would be established all over the country. What is the fact? Where is the home market to-day? As a matter of fact, from all the evidence at hand, the population of the country has not increased to any considerable extent, has not increased to the same extent it did under the old policy. It is to be regretted that the census returns are not down, but from the data we have I think it is shown that the rural population has been decreasing for some time. I will quote the figures for a few of the old counties. The popula-tion in 1879, in the County of Norfolk, was 18,540; in 1890, 16,283; Welland, 1879, 19,109; 1890, 16,934; Lambton, 1879, 30,659; 1890, 33,909; Huron, 1879, 51,592; 1890, 46.815; Bruce, 1879, 45,176; 1890, 40,859.

Mr. ALLAN. The table is one compiled from returns of the township assessors of Ontario.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I thought so.

Mr. ALLAN. They form the only data we have. They are the only figures before us.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). If you wait a week you will get the correct figures.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). How do you know?

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I believe so.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). We will hold you to that.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). You will be only sorry for it when they come.

Mr. ALLAN. What has been the result of this policy? What has happened since the introduction of this policy in 1879? We have added to the public debt nearly $100,000,000, the tariff taxation has been increased over 50 per cent., and the trade of the country has not increased to any very great extent. I have here statistics to show that the trade of the country under a revenue tariff during a period of three years was larger than under a protective tariff during the three years ending 1890. The total revenue under a revenue tariff was in 1873. $217,304,616; in 1874, $216,756,097; in 1875, $195,505,636, or a total of $629,560,249. The total trade under a protective tariff in 1888 was $193,050,100; in 1889, $198,802,614; in 1890, $209,414,733, or a total of $601,427,000, being less than the trade of the country during a similar period twenty years ago under a revenue tariff. For all these sacrifices we have not received corresponding advantages. The taxation has increased from something over $24,000,000 in 1879, to $37,000,000 in 1889, or $12,000,000 more annually taken out of the pockets of the people. In regard to the public debt, to which allusion has been made by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), I was not prepared to have the old hackneyed figures brought up again; but my recollection of a comparison of public debts between the two Governments is, that any slight increase in the public debt under the Mackenzie Administration, was due to works laid out or under construction by the previous Government. It may be said that a large portion of our debt is due to the construction gentlemen opposite tell the people that public lands in the North-West would be sold to recoup the older provinces for the immense outlay made in regard to that great work? We were told that by 1890 the large sum of $69,000,000 would be returned to the people from sales of land in the North-West; but, as a matter of fact, there has been no return whatever from that source, or a very slight one. I believe the first year there was something brought into the treasury over and above the expenses of conducting the department, but during the last few years there has been no return from the sales of our lands in the North-West. promises made by hon, gentlemen opposite have not been carried out, and if you divide the burden involved by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it will be found that the proportion to be borne by the people of the south riding of Essex is no less than $400,000. The result of all that has been, for I do not think the depression in the value of land is due altogether to the National Policy, partially to depress the value of land in Essex and elsewhere. If hon, gentlemen opposite could show that our market had been increased, that our farmers had obtained a home market as promised, that our population had increased, that the tall chimneys promised to be raised all over the country had been erected, then they could claim some reason for the large amount of taxation to which the people of this country have been subjected. But, Sir, in no case have they attempted to show that, unless, indeed, we take the argument of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), who has stated that his constituency has increased very materially in the last ten years. However, inasmuch as part of his constituency forms a part of the city of Toronto, I think, or at any rate a portion of Parkdale, for I am not sure whether it is incorporated in the city or not, that is not to be wondered at. I say, that with that exception, and with the exception of a few counties immediately adjoining the cities, the home market has not been increased, and the farmers have not received better prices for what they had to sell. this side of the House are to-day advocating the extension of the home market. We believe, Sir, that with unrestricted reciprocity, we can get the best home market that we have ever seen in this country; we believe that we would have, all along the line, a home market equal, and better than that of the home market enjoyed by West York. We would have the markets of Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, Philadelphia and all those large cities. Give us a treaty of reciprocity, and I believe that there will be ushered in an era of prosperity never before known or experienced in this country. We have evidence that what we say in this respect will become true; we have evidence of the wonderful increase of trade resulting from the reciprocity treaty of 1854, for the year prior to that treaty, the trade of the country amounted to only $23,000,000, and that in the last year of that treaty, our trade amounted to the large sum of $84,000,000. And, Sir, I believe that if we had unrestricted reciprocity now, our trade would quadruple; it would increase at once with leaps and bounds. I believe that this policy of unrestricted reciprocity would advance the price of everything that the farmer has to sell, and cheapen the price of everything that he has to buy. At the of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But did not hon. same time, I believe, that if this policy is adopted, it would benefit a very large class of our manufacturers who want a more extensive field for that which they have to sell. It would cheapen production, and in no other way could prosperity be secured to this country to the same extent as by a treaty of unrestricted reciprocity. I think, Sir, that when the American Secretary of State, according to the announcement made to the electors of Canada, invited us to confer in negotiating a reciprocity treaty, that it is not altogether hopeless to expect that such a treaty will be negotiated. I am satisfied that if the Government can get a treaty in natural products, that we, certainly, ought to be able to get a more extended treaty. At any rate, I believe that it should be the policy of both sides of this House to get the very best treaty that we possibly can from the American people. That is the policy on this side of the House; but, so far as hon. gentlemen opposite are concerned, all their speeches, with only one or two exceptions, and you can hardly except them, have been directed against reciprocity, even in natural products. They have argued that it would impoverish the farmers of this country and that it would not give us better prices. We are told that, as the Americans pay the duty on barley, what does it matter to us about the imposition of that duty? That was the argument of the hon, gentleman who spoke last on the other side of the House, and I now propose to give an authority upon the question of "who pays the duty," which, I think, he will be bound to receive. Sir John A. Macdonald, speaking upon this matter,

"I find that the farmers of West Canada and East Canada could not understand there was anything in their barley, for instance, being obliged to pay a duty of 15 per cent. going into the United States, whereas the produce of the American farmers was allowed to be brought into this country free. It is said that the consumers pay the duty, and that the farmer does not suffer anything. That is the statement, but when I put a simple case, which I have done frequently, I can get no answer. I put a case in the Eastern Townships of a man upon the imaginary line which was between this country and the United States. Suppose a man has 100 acres on the Canadian side of the line and 100 acres on the American side of the line. Suppose he grows 1,000 bushels of barley on each of his farms. He takes his 1,000 American bushels to the American market and gets $1 a bushel for it. He takes and gets but 85 cents per bushel, because he has to pay 15 per cent, for taking it across the imaginary line. How can it in this case be said that the consumer pays the duty? It comes out of the pockets of the Canadian farmers."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Who said that?

Mr. ALLAN. Sir John A. Macdonald. Even if that speech were not made, I think that those who have any knowledge of the barley trade in this country are aware that the Canadian farmers do lose the amount of the duty, and do pay the duty on barley. The very fact that the Americans produce a very large quantity of barley, almost as much as they want, and our barley having no other market, necessitates and obliges the people of this country to pay that duty. If we had another market for Canadian barley the argument of the hon, gentleman might be good, but as a matter of fact we have no market for barley except that of the United States. The statistics of the trade of this country prove that. An hon, gentleman on the other side, who addressed the House the other night, held out great hopes in reference to the cultivation in this country of the heavy English barley. He said that the two-rowed barley was suited to this country, and that we would soon be able to ship our barley to England. Now, I have made enquiries on this subject. I have talked with maltsters and others in reference to two-rowed barley and obtained their opinion. I have particularly spoken on this matter to a maltster in Detroit, who was formerly a resident of Chatham, and who has been engaged in the barley trade all his life; his opinion is the opinion of a practical man on this subject, and he states that it would be impossible to grow "two-rowed barley" in this country for any length of time, and to maintain the weight necessary to suit the British market.

An hon. MEMBER. At a profit.

Mr. ALLAN. They will not be able to grow it at all, because year after year, owing to the warm climate we have in Canada, the weight will gradually grow lighter. At any rate, at the present time the duty of 30 cents upon barley is a very great blow to our farmers. They will find this fall that they will have to pay the duty upon barley. As a matter of fact, I could read the quotations of the prices of barley between Canada and the United States which will show the immense difference in the price in the two countries, because of this duty. I will take the quotations from the Toronto Empire, after the imposition of the duty on barley last fall. The price of barley "No. 3 Extra" on 14th November, 1890, in Toronto was 53 cents, and in Buffalo the same grade sold from 86 to 88 cents. On 19th November the price in Toronto was 53 cents, and in Buffalo 88 cents. On 22nd November the price of barley in Toronto was 53 cents, and in Buffalo 90 cents. I think the hon, member for Cardwell did not dispute that barley was higher in the United States, he admitted that in his argument; but when hon gentlemen look at the fact that the Americans produce so much barley, and that we have no other market than the United States for our barley, it must be evident to every one who wishes to look at this question in a candid light, that the Canadian farmers pay the duty on barley. I will quote an authority as to who pays the duty on horses, which I think hon. gentlemen opposite will also be bound to respect. Sir David Macpherson, speaking at Walkerton in 1878, made use of the following language:-

"If we produce that which our neighbours have not, and which they must buy from us, we can put our own price upon it, and leave them to pay the duty imposed by their Government. In that case the consumer unquestionably pays the duty. But our neighbours and ourselves produce similar commodities, and producers have to compete with their producers. On their way to the American market our producers have to pass through the American Customhouse and pay the American duty, and when they reach the market they can obtain no more for their commodities than the American producer who pays no duty.

Suppose a farmer in this country takes five horses valued at $100 each to Detroit to sell. The duty on horses in the United States is 20 per cent., which the Canadian farmer must pay before he can enter the Detroit market. That is, he must pay $20 for each horse, and on his five horses $100, or the value of one horse at the United States Customhouse, before he can take them to the market. Then he will get no more than a Michigan farmer will get for five equally good horses. Suppose that he and a Michigan farmer each sell five horses—each gets $500 for his horses. The American takes his $500 home in his pocket; while the Canadian takes homes only $400."

I think, Sir. that argument is very clearly put-

I think, Sir, that argument is very clearly put-The very fact that we are shipping horses into the United States, where, it is estimated, there are 13,000,000 horses, and that we have no other market for our horses, makes it quite evident, to my mind at any rate, that the Canadian farmer pays the duty on every horse which he sends to the United States. The duty spoken of here is the old tariff rate of 20 per cent.; but the duty now is 30 per cent., or $30 on horses under a value of $100, which would make the duty, in some cases, more than 30 per cent. Now, the number of horses we send to other countries is so small that the United States is practically our only market. In the county which I come from, it is estimated there are 16,000 horses; and it is apparent to people living along the border, who pays the duty, because horses are higher on the United States side, by the amount of the duty, than they are on the Canada side. With this duty removed, our people could add $30 each to the value of their horses, which would mean an increase in the value of the horses in that county alone of nearly $500,000. is impossible for us to get any other market for our horses. There is no demand in England for the kind of horses we raise, while there is a large demand in the United States, and, if the duty were removed, that demand would increase very rapidly and very largely. Why, Sir, if our farmers had the opportunity to raise horses for the United States, I believe we could drive the American farmers almost out of the market. It is true, some localities in the United States produce almost the same kind of horses that we do; but it is well known that the Canadian horse is more sought after and more highly valued by the American people; and if the duty were removed there would be a very large trade in horses, which at the present time are practically unsaleable. It is to-day almost impossible to sell an ordinary common horse; but give us free trade in horses and it will benefit this country to an enormous extent. Give us free trade in barley, and the farmers of this country will continue the cultivation of a crop which has proved more profitable to them than anything else. regard to eggs, hon. gentlemen opposite claim that it is possible to ship them to England. and in this debate they have given us some evidence on that subject. But in a very short time the absurdity of attempting to ship eggs to England, at any rate during the hot season, will be demonstrated. In yesterday's paper I find a letter regarding that matter which I will read.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). What paper 5

Mr. ALLAN. It is the Globe.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoria). I thought so.

Mr. ALLAN. The letter states:

"Very sorry to say the goods arrived in bad condition. The cases are very much broken. The waste will be something enormous, and, as every case wants turning out, it is impossible for me to know the waste before next week. The eggs look apparently fresh and all my customers were very glad to get them. They are not quite so large as those I got from you last winter, but looking bright and fresh they were easily disposed of, but they all have come back. Customers report them musty, but friend Butcher sticks to them and will try and let you out with as little loss as possible. Your eggs have been good stock when you packed them, but they have suffered in transit immensely. In fact all Canadian eggs arriving seem to run all in bad condition. F—'s eggs arrived here last week, also W—'s, in worse condition than yours, and doubt if we can sell them at over 3s. per 120. No use, this hot weather is too much for so long a journey for Canada eggs, and I don't think it will be a success no matter what other dealers say. I give you my honest opinion."

Such is the opinion of a commission house in the short supplies of wheat in Canada. The very fact old country in regard to the egg trade. People that the Manitoba yield promises to be not less Mr. Allan.

who have any knowledge of the egg trade in the western part of Ontario know that American buyers have been in the habit of sending their teams through the country daily, or at any rate three times a week, to pick up all the eggs they can find in the villages and in the country stores; and these eggs are shipped so that they can be placed upon the tables of the American people and consumed within a few days after they have been laid. That is the market we have hitherto had for our eggs; but to-day, as a result of the McKinley Bill, the price of eggs in the United States is 5 cents or more a dozen higher than it is in Canada. Now, we have shipped 13,000,000 or 14.000,000 dozen of eggs a year to the United States. well known that the prices in New York and in other American cities average as high as they do in England; and I hold that it will be simply impossible for us to export eggs to England with any degree of success in the I venture to say that the men summer time. who are now shipping eggs to the old country will find in some cases that there will be an almost total loss of their consignment. I have noticed such cases in the shipment of other perishable articles. For instance, I have known a consignment of apples to be sent to the old country, when charges were actually made against the party shipping them, not enough having been realized to pay for the barrels. In an article like eggs, which should be consumed within a few days after they are laid, it must be evident that our best market is that of the United States, and it is a home market. In reference to the poultry trade, that may be considered a very small matter; but before the McKinley Bill was put in force hucksters could be found on every concession and side line in the County of Essex, daily picking up all the live chickens they could buy. That trade has now amount ceased. You will not see a rig once a week where there used to be scores of rigs passing through that and other counties. Now, this is a matter of some importance, in the poultry trade, the egg trade, the barley trade, the horse trade; and in the matter of wheat, I believe the time is coming when the American market will be an important market for wheat. It is true this last year or two, owing to deficient crops, prices have been perhaps a little higher in Canada than in the United States, but the best commercial writers on the other side say that the Américan people have reached their maximum of exportation, that they will never again export the quantity of wheat they have exported, and it is estimated by some that in a very few estimated by some very years the Americans will be importers of wheat, Though we have the English markets for our wheat, it very frequently occurs that the price is better in the United States, and those conversant with the trade will understand the importance of having a market they can sell in at all times. The Americans offer us that market. Buyers of wheat along our railways would always be able, if we had access to the United States, to sell futures, when quotations suited, if they did not want to ship, and save a matter of three or four cents in storage. In a very few years the prospects are that the market for wheat in the United States will be a very great advantage to us in Canada. It is altogether very likely that we have reached the last of than 20,000,000 bushels, and that we have some 900,000 acres or something like that under cultivation, shows that, with the increase which must continue in this country, we will have a very large quantity of wheat to export, and you will never see our prices higher than the markets of the world. We in all probability will never see a short supply of wheat in this country, and though we have the English market, if we had the American market as well, very frequently a far better price could be obtained there.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Name a time when it was better in the United States?

Mr. ALLAN. That has occurred very often. The hon, member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) gave figures showing that New York was considerably higher at one period. This very often happens, apart from supply and demand. The hon. gentleman who, I believe, is in the wheat trade, knows that speculative prices sometimes rule in that country, and that we would benefit by those prices if we had free access to their markets. hon, gentleman will remember the great corner in Chicago wheat, when, if we had had reciprocity, we would have obtained the full price of the Chicago corner for wheat that The same remark applies to New for shipment. Take the quotations for May. Our wheat lying in the elevators at home in the fall, we could sell for May delivery in the American market, which is perfectly legitimate and proper, and free from loss or danger in any way. It would inure to the advantage of the farmers, and the dealers would be in a position to pay the farmers very often several cents more per bushel. The home market for wheat may be of some service in years of scarcity, but as the area in Manitoba increases, and the production must increase, in all probability we shall never see a short supply in this country again, and if we had a free market in the United States there would be a very large demand for seed wheat. I presume we could sell about half of what we would have to spare for seed wheat. With reference to the other products of the farm, there are hay and sheep and many other articles which would seek an outlet in the United States. Take the question of hay. In one case, in the riding of my hon. friend who sits to my right, last year during the election one party in that riding had three hundred tons of hay. The market price at that place was only $3 a ton less than right across the river. On that hav alone this gentleman figured up a loss of over $1,000. He had also been a believer in the National Policy and supported the party of hon. gentlemen opposite; but when he saw how his interests were affected, when he saw that the farmers were deprived of their natural markets-forthey are our natural markets-and that he was losing to that extent, he became a supporter of the policy advocated by the Liberal party. Inthe matter of beans, every one knows that the United States is the market that fixes the price. There has been a duty of 40 cents a bushel imposed upon beans, also a heavy duty on potatoes, barley, hay and other articles under the McKinley Bill, and, on the basis of our shipments in 1889, we would have to pay on these articles $5,820,000, whereas under the old tariff the duty amounted to $2,980,550. Now, the United States is would negotiate a reciprocity treaty, but would our market for these things, if we get access to leave out dressed hogs. We have found that,

Take the County of Essex. I ventheir markets. ture to say that the land there would increase at least 50 per cent. at once if we had the markets of the great cities of Detroit and right along the lakes through Toledo, Cleveland, Buffalo, Philadelphia and New York, containing a population amounting to something like 8,000,000 or 10,000,000, and which are within a day's access of this country and furnish a home market for everything. With regard to horses, if the bars were taken down between this country and the United States we would have dealers over here every day buying horses, as it is much more convenient for them to go to Ontario and Quebec than it would be to Illinois and other states, and the trade in horses We would have a good would vastly increase. market for barley, which is now imperilled and which we will lose. I maintain that in almost every article of agriculture, perhaps, except Indian corn and pork, the farmer would be benefited: but in the matter of hog products, to which hon. gentlemen opposite often allude, we had protection on dressed hogs before the National Policy was in-We also had protection on cheese and troduced. on many other articles, and it is not at all due to the National Policy that we have a duty on hogs. With the solitary exception of pork and corn, I say it is impossible to protect the farmers of this country; and in the matter of dressed hogs, if any one will look at the increase which is going on in the production of that article, he will see that in a very short time we will have a surplus and the prices will come down to the level of the markets of the world.

After Recess.

Mr. ALLAN. The constituency which I have the honour to represent produces four or five times as many dressed hogs as any other portion of the country. The County of Essex is the great county for the production of dressed hogs. Hon. gentlemen opposite propose to go to Washington in October, and to deal with reciprocity in agricultural products only; they propose to give reciprocity in dressed hogs and in corn, and in all other agricultural articles that have been named. So far as the question of unrestricted reciprocity is concerned, the whole County of Essex, if they can secure cheaper markets to buy in, will very willingly relinquish the advantage they have in the duty which is imposed on dressed hogs. The policy of the party opposite, if they have any policy, is to have reciprocity in natural products only, and they have on the Statute-book an offer, which I believe has since been repealed, offering reciprocity in-"Any of the following articles: that is to say, animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bean seeds of all kinds, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots), plants, trees and shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, pease and beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat and all other grain, flour of wheat and flour of rye, Indian meal and oatmeal, and flour or meal of any other grain, butter, cheese, fish (salt or smoked)."

Now, in dealing with this question, I have found the same difficulty in the county whence I come as is found in this House. During the last contest, the candidate who opposed me stated that the commissioners, when they went to Washington, wherever this question is dealt with, the same inconsistency is apparent. They have one policy for one part of the country and another policy for another part. In Essex they will leave out dressed hogs, in Lambton they will leave out coal oil, in Nova Scotia they will leave out coal, and if you go over the whole country you will be unable to find from any one of their speakers, as you will in this House from any hon, gentleman on the other side, what their policy is. We on this side have a distinct policy, and that is to secure the broadest possible reciprocity treaty with the United That can be easily understood, but hon, gentlemen opposite are all things to all men. hon, member for North Grev (Mr. Masson) the other day stated that that party had always been consistent. I contend that ever since the inception of the National Policy they have been inconsistent. In 1874, their chief financial spokesman denounced the increase of duties as being an attempt to enter the thin edge of the wedge of protection. he was opposed to the increase of duties, and when the National Policy was proposed, it was impossible to know what the policy meant, except that it was a policy of aliases in order to suit every province. In one province it was a readjustment of the tariff, in another province it was an increase in the tariff. If any man had been going around with as many names as the Conservative party had for their policy at that time, which was alias National Policy, alias protection, alias readjustment of the tariff, he would have brought up in the penitentiary; and I contend that to day, if their speeches mean anything, they mean that they are opposed to any system of reciprocity, and yet we have to look at the spectacle of our High Commissioner going into the presence of Mr. Blaine and trailing the honour of Canada in the dust, we see him going, as I may say, on all fours, before that American statesman. I contend that the people of Canada were humiliated by the spectacle of the High Commissioner going to Washington in that way. When the reasons were given for the dissolution of Parliament, and an appeal was made to the country, the Government were arraigned for uttering a false-hood. It was believed by their opponents that they had no intention of negotiating a treaty, and that Mr. Blaine told the truth when he said that he had not initiated that negotiation, and we had his denial in the letter which was published addressed by him to Mr. Baker. When the 4th March came round and our commissioners went to Washington and had that short interview with Mr. Blaine, what do we find? At the very outset we find the utterances of our High Commissioner as follows:

"I told Mr. Blaine that I wished, in the outset, to recognize the accuracy of the statement contained in his letter to Sir Julian Pauncefote which I have seen in reference to the invitation of the negotiations regarding reciprocal trade arrangements between the two countries, that I believe it arose from the negotiations which had recently taken place between the United States and Newfoundland, and that more that being communicated. Newfoundland, and that, upon that being communicated to him by Sir Julian Pauncefote, he had expressed his willingness to open negotiations for reciprocal trade relations between Canada and the United States."

There is a confession that the Government of this country, in appealing to the electorate, uttered falsehoods throughout in order to deceive the

Mr. ALLAN.

States, and we have the further spectacle of the High Commissioner going to Washington to ask for a treaty which they say will be no good, we have him trailing the honour of this country in the He says: dust.

I then told Mr. Blaine that I wished to remove the "I then told Mr. Blaine that I wished to remove the idea, if he entertained it, which has been promulgated in Canada and the United States, that the present Government of the Dominion was not warmly in favour of the most friendly relations with the United States. In an article which I had recently sent over my own signature to the North American Review. I had undertaken to give conclusive evidence upon that point, and that I need further only refer them to the fact that when Sir John Macdonald, who was one of Her Majesty's Joint High Commissioners, submitted to Parliament for approval the questions between Canada and the United States, he was hercely denounced by the leaders and press of the Liberal hercely denounced by the leaders and press of the Liberal party for having basely sacrificed the interests of Canada party for having basely sacrificed the interests of Canada in his endeavours to promote friendly relations between Canada and the United States. I added that I had experienced the same treatment from the same party when I submitted, for the approval of Parliament, the Treaty of Washington of 1888. I was then charged by the leader and press of that party with having conceded everything to the United States and obtained nothing in return, so great was my anxiety to remove all causes of dissension between the two countries."

Here I maintain we have the humiliating spectacle of our High Commissioner, who went with the other commissioners of this country to Washington, going into the presence of the Secretary of State of the United States, and confessing that they had uttered falsehoods here in regard to this matter, and acting in the interest of party politics and traducing their opponents in this country. trust that if ever the party on this side of the House send delegates to Washington or anywhere else, they will comport themselves with more dignity, and that the party opposite will not be ashamed of the steps they will take. Now, I do not think it necessary to go further into the trade question. I have touched upon the effects of the tariff as applied to the farmers of this country: I have pointed out the advantages of getting access to the markets of the United States, the very best of home markets: I have pointed out the enormous trade that has already taken place between these two countries under the high duties that have existed, a trade which, during the 12 years the National Policy has been force, has reached over one thousand millions of dollars. I have not referred to the tariff and itseffects upon the lumber interest, that has been dealt with; but I did intend to deal with that, and with the marine interest, the mining interest, and all these other interests, but feel that I would be trespassing upon the time of the House intaking up these questions. I wish now, Sir, to advert to the loyalty question which has been raised by the hon, member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), a gentleman who poses as a statesman, and who thinks it the proper thing to throw across the floor the chargeof disloyalty against this party. I can very well understand a gentleman taking the position that a certain policy may lead to annexa-tion, but his utterances were that the member for South Oxford knew that his policy would lead to annexation. Now, did the hon gentleman think what that really implied? Why, Sir, if the hon. member for South Oxford is disloyal, then the gentlemen that sit behind him are also disloyal, and the people who sent us here are disloyal, for they are firm supporters of the policy of reciprocity with electors when they stated that the initiation of the the United States. And on what grounds are movement for reciprocity was taken by the United charges of this kind made? Why, Sir, we have the opinion of a statesman quite as great as the hon. member for Albert, and I will read a letter that was written on this very question by the Hon. John Bright to the President of the Board of Trade at Detroit, which was read at that great convention in 1865 when Nova Scotia's greatest son so distinguished himself. The great English statesman gives his opinion as to whether the freest possible intercourse between these two countries would be disloyal to the old land, or would necessarily lead to annexation, and I put against the opinion of any hon, gentleman opposite the opinion of that great statesman whose whole unselfish life has been devoted to the strengthening of British interest, and the cause if humanity everywhere. Bright wrote:

"The project of your convention gives me great pleasure. I hope it will lead to a renewal of commercial intercourse with the British North American provinces, for it will be a miserable thing if because they are in connection with the British Crown, and you acknowledge as your chief magistrate your President at Washington, there should not be a commercial intercourse between them and you as free as if you were one meanle moder one them and you as free as if you were one people under one Government.

Now, that is the utterance of John Bright, a man who devoted at least fifty years of his life to the promotion of British interests, and whose name will go down to posterity as an honoured name. That is the position that we take on this side of the We are here to represent Canadian interests, and we do not believe that free trade with the United States would result in annexation. I believe, Sir, that anything that would give prosperity to this country, that will develop our resources, that will keep our young men at home, that will build up our own northern half of this continent, will have the effect rather of preventing annexation. I believe if we can secure unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, any annexation feeling that may exist in this country will entirely disappear. It is stated that we are the annexation party, and charges of that kind have been hurled across the House. The name of Mr. Farrer has been mentioned, a journalist of prominence in this country, whose life has been chiefly devoted to writing editorials on Tory newspapers. This party is not responsible for his articles, although the most of them were written when he was upon the Mail and other Tory papers. Now, I state that there is no Reformer in this country, no representative man, against whom the charge of disloyalty would lay; I say there is no leading politician on our side who is entitled to be considered representative in any way, against whom you can bring that charge. But can you say the same thing of the Conservative party? Why, Sir, the fact is that there is a prominent member of the Conservative party who is an avowed annexationist, and who is known to be such, and yet he was returned to the Legislature of Ontario and holds a prominent position in that Legislature, a man who lives in the county which I have the honour to represent—I refer to Mr. Solomon White. That gentleman is an avowed annexationist, and after giving expression to his views, he was elected by the Conservative party to the Local Legislature as one of the leaders of that party, only second in command to Mr. Meredith. I say that this charge of disloyalty can fairly be brought against one member, at least, of the Conservative party; but what a howl would go up if the Reformers of this coun try were to return an annexationist to Parliament? that such was the case, for while there were a few sympa-

Why, Sir, we would never hear the last of it. They tried to make us responsible for what Mr. Farrer said, a newspaper writer who is responsible only to himself; but here is a gentleman returned to the Local Legislature who stumped the greater part of the Province of Ontario, four or five years ago, in company with his leader. Mr. Meredith, now the chief of the Conservative party in Ontario-he is an annexationist, and no one on the other side of the House can deny it. This Mr. White, member of the Local Legislature for North Essex, when we had the henour of a visit from the High Commissioner at Windsor, was on the platform with Sir Charles Tupper. He has always taken a prominent position at any Conservative meeting, and is recognized in western Ontario as one of the most prominent Conservatives. I shall prove the charge that I have made against him, because I believe it is a serious charge. I presume a gentleman has a right to advocate annexation to the United States if he wants to do so, but having taken the oath of allegiance as a member of the Legislature. I think it is an improper thing for him to advocate annexation. I have in my hand a fly-sheet, being an advertisement issued in the city of Toledo, announcing a The fly-sheet reads as follows:lecture.

ANYEXATION OF CANADA.—An interesting, instructive and thoroughly descriptive reading on the Dominion of Canada, by Captain 'Mac,' with a lively and entertaining lecture by the Hon. Sol. White, ex-M.P., the gifted, eloquent and able native American orator, exmember of the Canadian Parliament, who has had the courage of his convictions, and become publicly outspoken on this absorbing and 'tuture great' question, A committee of prominent citizens will occupy the platform. At Memorial Hall, Sunday, March 14, at 8 p.m. Doors open at 7 p.m. Admission, 25 cents, A few reserved seats at 50 cents."

There is the advertisement. This gentleman formerly held a seat in this House, and now has a seat in the Local Legislature, and he, a prominent Conservative, went to a neighbouring city and advocated annexation to the United States. I propose to read newspaper comments on that lecture. Among them are the following:-

" ANNEXATION OF CANADA.

"Hon, Sol. White and Capt. Mac at Memorial Hall.

"There was but a slim attendance at Memorial Hall last night, to hear what was advertised as a lecture upon the annexation of Canada, by the Hon. Sol. White, ex-member of the Canadian Parliament. It would have been more appropriate to have announced it as readings of the history of Canada from the time of settlement by the Jesuit-Fathers, by Captain Mac. The captain's discourse, or rather readings, occupied more than one hour, without one word about annexation, unless the terms are such as to annex the States to them, rather than Canada to the States.

"When Mr. White came forward he said that he did not intend to deliver a lecture, but simply to have a short conversation with his hearers. He spoke of political union as a panacea for the ills which at present exist and which interfers with the friendly relations existing bewhich interfere with the friendly relations existing be-tween the two countries. He paid a tribute to the admir-able manner in which the laws were administered in Canada, which he averred were in many respects superior to their administration in the United States, but it is evident that a political change must take place some time, and whether or not this may be deemed a fitting time for its discussion, he thought that the best change possible will be political union with this country.

"He was glad that leading statesmen in the United States, like Senator Sherman, were discussing the subject, for it would tend to bring the people of both countries more together, and so cultivate a more friendly feeling. Mr. White spoke of the reciprocity treaty which he believed was ended by the United States Government in a spirit of pique, because it was thought that the Canadians favoured the south in the war of the rebellion. He denied thisers, the majority was favourable to the north. Then the Government of the United States adopted a tariff which discriminated against Canada, and which the latter had for fifteen years endeavoured to get mitigated, and struggled along with a law against a high tariff, until in self defence it had to enact a retaliatory measure. At the present time Canada is entirely free from any dictation by England, and Canadians are contented. They pay no taxes to the English Government, and although the lieutaxes to the English Government, and although the lieutenant-governor is appointed and receives his salary from the revenue, it is the only item of expense, and he is but a mere figurehead. No administration can exist in Canada without the consent of a majority of the representatives, and herein the power of the people is more manifest then in this country.

"It will, he said, be a glorious consummation if the union of Canada and the United States can be harmoniously accomplished, and so as to leave no sting; neither does he think that England would oppose such union, for she has given to her colonies perfect freedom.

neither does he think that England would oppose such union, for she has given to her colonies perfect freedom. There need be no change in the laws, for they are similar in both countries, and both are derived from the common law of England. Canada he maintained is at this time one of the best customers of the United States, for her purchases are greater than from England; but so long as the remains a deprendance of a Furnasan agree; the conshe remains a dependence of a European power, she cannot avail herself of the tide of European emigration, whose preindices are unfavourable to settle in a country under European domination.

"Capt. McAdam is busy making preparation for the lecture of the Hon. Sol. White, to be given at Memorial Hall next Thurday. The subject, 'Annexation of Canada,' is growing in interest, and will continue to grow, until the question is solved. The ball which the Hon. Ben. Butterworth sat in motion, has increased prodigiously, and with our Canadian neighbours, has east all other political issues into the shade. With Americans the question is somewhat mixed, and those who would study it understandingly should attend the lecture on Thursday evening. ingly, should attend the lecture on Thursday evening. The captain is going to make it interesting by providing a band of music which will discourse national and patriotic airs.-Toledo Blade. 11th March, 1899.

"The Hon, Sol. White, ex-M. P. Several prominent citizens will be on the platform.—Toledo Bee, 14th March, 1889.

was hard to understand what bearing the matter had on the question.

"Hon. Sol. White is an easy and interesting talker. All arguments being considered he thought the times pointed to a speedy union of the two countries. Their common parentage, their similarity of laws, their manner of living, no less than the principles upon which the two governments are built, freedom and equality, point to a union as the ultimate result.—Toledo Bee, 15th March, 1888."

Here are tickets of admission to the lecture on annexation by a Conservative member of Parliament. The ticket reads:

"Annexation of Canada. Entertaining and instructive lecture by Hon. Sol. White, ex-M.P. Admit one. Memmorial Hall, March 14, 1889."

platform, and as the High Commissioner was hoarse the Hon, Sol. White, as he is called, took a very prominent part in the meeting. A very laughable incident occurred. It seems the High Commissioner was about to attack the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and Mr. Farrer, and Mr. Sol. White, the annexationist, was put up to read the article, and this was enjoyed immensely by the vast audience present. You now have the evidence that a prominent Conservative only two years ago advocated annexation to the United States and has since been returned by the Conservative party to Parliament. I have here Detroit papers which contain speeches delivered by Mr. Sol. White. The Detroit Journal reports Mr. White as saying,

"England could do nothing to increase Canada's pros-perity, and the only course to that end lay through annexa-tion. He looked forward to the day when there would be one grand country on this continent."

The Detroit Suu reports $\mathbf{Mr}.$ Sol. White as follows :

"A revolution in polities is expected to occur within a short time in Canada as a large majority of its people fa-your unrestricted commercial trade with this country. Mr. White put the finishing touches on his speech by saying 'We should unite upon fair terms and become one grand country on this continent.'

I have here attidavits from a number of reporters of the press and a number of people at Windsor who have heard Mr. White advocating annexation, so that it is utterly useless for him or any one else to deny that he is an annexationist. Here are some of these athidavits:

It is well known in our part of the country that Sol. White advocates annexation. hold is this, that the party which is so loyal, that the party which is constantly talking and preaching loyalty and throwing insimuations across the House that the members on this side are not loyal, has returned to Parliament as a representative of the people a man who is an avowed annexationist. There is a man returned in a representative capacity, while, as regards Mr. Farrer and others, the Liberal party cannot be held responsible for their ntterances, any more than the Conservatives could be held responsible when he wrote articles when on the Mail, and especially so, seeing that Mr. Fairer, during nearly the whole of his life, has been a prominent editorial writer on Conservative newspapers in this country. This charge of disloyalty is not a patriotic charge, and hon, gentlemen, if they were the patriots they pretend to be, would not be continually hurling this charge across the floor of this House. I will give the hon, member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) an opinion of the present loyal Government, not written or found in the Liberal press of this country, but in an independent Conservative journal. The Toronto Telleggram says, in reference to these very points:

"Honesty and purity are the watchwords of true patriotism. A Ministry cursed by members whose lives are unclean, whose pockets are filled with the country's money, cannot match our ideal. The old flag never floats over a pirate ship, and genuine patriotism is not the business sign of a robber's cave."

These are the utterances to be found to-day in the independent Conservative press of this country, and in view of these facts, and in view of the record of the present Government in general, I think, Mr. Speaker, that the least hon, gentlemen opposite say upon the question of loyalty the better. These gentlemen very often read in this House extracts from the American papers, to give their opinion that a portion of the Canadian people are disloyal. Why, Sir, it would be almost impossible to think that the Americans could have any other opinion, in view of the fact that these gentlemen opposite are themselve; continuously stating that the party on this side of the House is a disloyal party. If the Americans did not believe it, of the country, and these interests as affected by why it would be tantamount to saying that the McKinley Bill in its operations. Before doing the gentlemen on the other side House are uttering falsehoods, because the whole burthen of their song, and I have heard it on a hundred platforms and from almost every speaker that has risen on the other side of the House, is, that they are a loyal party, and that the party on is being depopulated, because of the policy of the

this side of the House are a disloyal party, and then they quote extracts from the American press which are the result of the very charges they have made themselves. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up any further time. I have spoken on this question at a much greater length than I expected to, and I thank the House for the very kind manner in which they have listened, to this, which I may call my first speech in this Parliament, for although I have spoken on motions, this is really the first speech I have made to the House, and I thank hom, sentlemen for the very kind attention and consideration which they always extend to young members.

Mr. SPOHN. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention at this late hour, and at this late stage of the debate, to occupy very much time in the remarks I have to make to this House. The questions before this House have been discussed from various standpoints, and in almost every conceivable light, but there is a great industry in this country which has not received the attention during this debate that its importance demands We have listened to speeches on behalf of the different combines and combinations which have representatives and advocates in this House, and I propose, for a few moments, to compare the industry I speak of with some of these combines, and to try, if possible, to correct the fallacies that their special pleaders intended to produce. After the agricultural industry of the country, this industry to which I refer is the most important we have. It employs more men and has more capital invested in it, and consequently tends more to promote the prosperity of this country than any other. Its operations also tend to enhance the value and to give a market to a farming produce, but there is a critical period in the history of this industry, and at the present time it is giving the Government a good deal of trouble, and about which they are very much concerned. I refer. Sir, to the hunber industry of this country, and the effect which the lumber industry has on the country at large. is an historical fact that the Government of this country, in its anxiety to look after the interests of the Red Parlour, put on a hostile tariff for the protection of the combinesters of the Red Parlour, which was detrimental to the agricultural and other industries of this country. result of this, the United States Government retaliated and brought forth the McKinley Bill, and realizing the two great industries of the country which could be most easily reached and injured, this Bill was practically framed to strike a blow at the lumbering and agricultural industries of Canada. Now, I do not propose to discuss the effects of the McKinley Bill on the agricultural industries of this Dominion. That subject has been ably treated by the member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) and others who are so well capable of discussing it from the farmers' standpoint, and I propose to discuss simply the hunbering interests so, I propose to quote from the remarks of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). He sees trouble ahead for the Government, and he has appealed to the Government for relief. His remarks go to show that the northern part of our country

Government in reference to the lumbering interests. The hon, gentleman said:

"It will be in the recollection of the House that, shortly after the passage of the McKinley Bill, when the American import duty on lumber was reduced, the Government evidently after a good deal of hesitation, decided to abolish the export duty on saw-logs. I want to call the attention of the House to the very unsatisfactory condition in which our lumber trade is placed under the present explicitors and I do that in the hope that when the sent conditions, and I do that in the hope that, when the Government consider this matter with the United States Government, they may be able to place this on a more satisfactory footing. I refer to this as a matter which affects a very important element in our future national interests. The Government of this country, as I have said affects a grand double flooristic and added in deference. affects a very important element in our rade.

interests. The Government of this country, as I have said, after a good deal of hesitation, decided, in deference to the wishes of the lumber trade, to abolish the export duty on saw-logs. That has brought us into this condition, that at the present moment there is going on from a large part of the timber country of the Dominion, and especially in the Province of Ontario, and especially from that portion of the province which I represent and in which I feel the most interest, a two-fold diminution of our timber property. In the first place we have a very large quantity of the raw material being exported to the other side, there to be manufactured into lumber. This other side, there to be manufactured into lumber. This has already grown to such proportions that I am assured upon excellent authority that during the next season the export of saw-logs will amount to a quantity variously estimated at from 89,000,000 to 140,000,000 feet. That means a very large diminution in the employment of labour and capital upon our side of the line, and it means a corresponding benefit to the saw-mill owners upon Lake a corresponding benefit to the saw-mill owners upon Lake Michigan and elsewhere on the American coast. • • • I admit that the subject is a very difficult one. It would be Michigan and elsewhere on the American coast.

I admit that the subject is a very difficult one. It would be exceedingly injurious to the present owners of saw-mills to at once reimpose the export duty, because that would subject them to a duty of $3 a thousand feet upon their produce going to the other side, whereas at present I am told by lumbermen who are largely engaged in the trade that the reduction of the duty has enabled them to dispose of a large quantity of inferior lumber which was previously unsaleable in the American market.

There is the small town of Midland in the riding represented by my hon, friend from East Simcoc, and the trade there is paralyzed. Three or four saw-mills are shut up in consequence of this export. In Parry Sound, the saw-mill is shut up because an American firm has purchased in consequence of this export. In Parry Sound, the saw-mill is shut up because an American firm has purchased the mill and all the limits, and, undoubtedly, if any of the lumber is cut at all, it will be cut in quantities not worth exporting, but the whole of that stuff, hundreds of millions of feet will be sent across the line and will be lost to us. The same thing is true in regard to various portions of the Georgian Bay, and will apply to all the waters running into the Georgian Bay and extending to the headwaters of the Ottawa, so that the result will be more serious even than I have mentioned. I hope the Government will take this matter into their serious consideration. Everyone will admit that the difficulties are great, but it is the business of the Government to meet difficulties. That is what they are there for, and I trust they will find some means of meeting this difficulty in such a way that if we are compelled to dispose of our lumber, it will be disposed of to the best interests of the people of this country, and that we will not be reduced to the conthis country, and that we will not be reduced to the condition of mere exporters of the raw material when we should use it ourselves to the best advantage."

I am glad to see, Sir, that the member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) recognizes the extent of this trouble, and if we take his own figures into consideration, we will find that in the matter of labour alone, the Georgian Bay district will lose over $250,000 by this exportation of logs. The State of Michigan gets the benefit of this, and the money that should be spent in manufacturing the lumber in Canada is spent in the United States. The lumbermen, with their families, are obliged to follow the logs, and the result is that we lose our population. The member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) turns to the Government and asks for relief; but, Sir, the Government can grant no relief; there is no relief in their policy; the only relief is in the policy of the Opposition, the only relief is in reciprocity with the United States. I said that the object of the McKinley Bill was to strike a blow at the two most | when the proposition is made that the farmers Mr. SPOHN.

vulnerable points in the trade of Canada; and how well it has succeeded the member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has set forth in part. Now, the McKinley Bill put a duty on lumber of $3 per thousand; and what was the immediate result of that? The immediate result was to bring the members of the Government to their knees. The Government Government to their knees. The Government cried peccari. The Government asked for pardon and forgiveness of its sins, and took off the export duty on logs. But here the trouble just commences. The effect of taking off the export duty on logs was that many of the saw-mills on the Georgian Bay were closed up; and the lumber that used to be exported to the United States is now being sent there in the log. The northern part of Ontario, as the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) is forced to admit, is becoming depopulated, and the money that should be legitimately spent in manufacturing saw-logs at the different ports of the Georgian Bay, is spent in Michigan. Now, the hon, member for Muskoka-I am sorry he is not in his place tonight—became alarmed, and properly so, because he saw what was going to happen, and he called on the Government for relief. But, as I said before, they could afford no relief; they are between the devil and the deep sea. If the $1 a thousand duty on lumber continues, many of the mills on the Georgian Bay district will remain closed; and if the Government reimpose the duty on logs, we will have to pay $3 a thousand duty on lumber, and the saw-mills on the Georgian Bay that are still running, as well as those in the Ottawa Valley, will be closed; the lumber interest of this country will be paralyzed and ruined; and before I get through, and show you the extent of the lumber interest of this country, you will be able to realize the harm that will be accomplished. Now, there is nothing left but reciprocity. There is no other ray of hope, Why, my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) the other day funcied that he saw a little cloud rising in the east no larger than a man's hand, and this cloud was to be a panacea for all the ills that have overtaken our misgoverned coun-But the hon, gentleman was mistaken. That cloud is fast disappearing. It could not withstand the penetrating rays of the sun of reason, and is dissolving into thin air; and all that remains is its image as a pleasant fancy in the minds of some few dreamers. But, Sir, my hon. friend from Albert did not go back far enough in his search for scriptural knowledge. Had he gone back far enough he would have found another cloud. There is another cloud hovering about us which the rays of light and reason only tend to brighten; and as it hovers and brightens it is hailed with delight by the people of this country and the members on this side of the House. But, like that other cloud of other days, it is a cloud of darkness and dismay to the Egyptians; but, Sir, that bright cloud of reciprocity, although viewed with dread and consternation by hon. gentlemen opposite, will reach the zenith of its glory as sure as to-morrow's rising sun shall reach his in our natural heavens. Now, Sir, I said that we have in this House the representatives of the different combines in the country; and that those representatives have made their influence felt with the Government is quite evident. First, we have the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Corby) who so ably represents the whiskey interests of this country. Now, that hon, gentleman is horrified should have their corn free of duty to fatten their cattle and hogs; but in his long and tedious speech he forgot to tell us that he has free corn to And when we remake whiskey for exportation. mind the hon, gentlemen opposite that the farming interests of this country are declining, when we show them that the value of farm land is declining day by day, they tell us that we do not understand farming properly, and that we must change our mode of farming—that we must raise stock for exportation. But, Sir, if we are compelled by the policy of the Government to raise stock for exportation, why have we not as much right to have free corn to fatten our cattle and hogs as the whiskey rings of this country to have free corn to make whiskey for exportation? And although the whiskey millionaires in this country and their representatives in this House have so much influence with the Government, what have they done for the country, and how much labour do they employ? Well, Sir, I propose to show, and in my calculations I will take the figures of the census of 1881, because we have no later reliable figures, although we are told that we shall have the report next week. The distillers of the Dominion employ 285 men, and they pay in wages $116,000 a year, while the saw-mills of this country employ 44.474 hands and pay in wages $8,357,000 a year. Why, the brewers employ more men and pay more wages than the distillers; they employ 1,411 men and pay yearly wages to the amount of $567,000. Still, the the Government in their wisdom increased the duty on malt 100 per cent. and the duty on whiskey but 20 per cent. Well, Sir, next to this important whiskey representative, we have the gentleman who represents the binder twine combination, or, in other words, the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs). Now, he gets indignant to think the farmers should require binding twine free, and he even goes so far as to argue that it is in the interest of the farmers that the combination should be allowed to tax them for their benefit. Of course, he has great influence with the Government, and he shows his influence, because at his dictation the Government have refused to take off this duty on binder twine. It is all right from his point of view that the Government should tax the farmers a quarter of a million dollars a year to make a little fortune for him, and to enable him to contribute his quota to the Red Parlour; but in his speech he forgot to tell us all. To show you the hollowness of his argument and the insincerity of his statements, he forgot to tell us that when a binder twine factory was started in Toronto-that refused to join the binder twine combine - that could make a binder twine for 9 cents a pound, the combination with which he is connected took out an injunction against the Toronto company to hamper them, and at the present time there is a law suit pending to prevent the Toronto com-pany manufacturing binder twine so as to relieve the farmers of the country to some ex-Then, after the binder twine monopoly, we have our smooth and oily friend from East Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff). He proposes that he should be allowed to tax this country to the tune of $935,000 a year, and for what? For the privilege of allowing us to buy our coal oil from the coal oil combination; and his particularly profitable industry employs only 490 men and pays only $190,000 a year in competent government, when we will have a wages. And, Sir, last but not least, we have that government directed by a leader who has not sweet-tongued son of Nova Scotia, who represents the great sugar combination of this country as well as the City of Halifax (Mr. Kenny). That industry employs 723 men and in return taxes the Dominion $2,000,000 a year, and contributes its quota to the Red Parlour. Well, Sir, it strikes me as being very suspicious that the hon, member for this great sugar combine and the hon, member for the binder twine combine should both come from the same riding. It almost leads one to conclude that they have a sort of little local Red Parlour down there of their own. I do not propose to take up any more time with reference to the combines; but I propose now to speak purely of the lumber interest. Of course, that interest has, in the course of the last ten years, greatly increased, as the lumbermen employ better machinery they can consequently turn out more lumber. However, in 1880, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, the export amounted to $16,530,000, and in 1890 it amounted to $26,071,000. Taking that same ratio, we find that the lumber trade in 1891 will put out something like $50,000,000 worth of lumber and be worth over $600,000,000. In 1881 the mills used up, according to the census returns, in raw material, $21,134,000 worth, and the output was $39,326,000 worth, and they paid in yearly wages $8,347,000, and the total value of the lumber trade was in 1881, $471,912,000. Now, I have a table here which I will not take up the time of the House in reading, but will merely hand into Hansard with the permission of this House:

		3	ತಿ	$
Brewers	. 1,411	2,282,000	4,768,000	567,000
Distillers	. 285	1.092,000	1,790,000	116,000
Oil refiners	490	2.241,000	4,049,000	190,000
Sugar refiners.		6.100.000	6,800,000	363,000
Foundries an		-,,	,000,00	0.0,007

blind		2,692,000	4,872,000	997,000
Saw-mills		21,134,000		8,356,000

These figures I have given do not include the number of men employed in the woods nor the great number of men employed in the manufacture of square timber, rafting and so forth, but they give some idea of the great magnitude of this industry; and instead of the people being taxed to keep up this industry, as they are in the case of the binding twine, sugar, oil and whiskey combines, it is a blessing to the country, gives employment to thousands of families, makes money more pletiful, and would do much more for us if we were not hampered by the miserable retrograde policy of a Rip Van Winkle Government. The lumber interest employs 61 times as many hands as all the sugar refineries, 156 times as many as all the distilleries, 234 times as many as oil refineries, and the binder twine combine is simply nowhere. These combines are supported by the people's taxes, and the same policy which fosters them compels the lumber interests of this country to pay taxes to the United States. I will show you, Sir, what this wise policy of our Government with reference to the lumber trade is doing for the country, and what it will continue to do, and I will conclude by showing you what can be done and will be done when we pass under the guidance of an honest and touched the unclean thing, whom all respect, his party adore, who stands out in hold relief, in spotless purity, both in private life and as a public man, and who in these dark days of political immorality, remains a grand example of "the noblest work of God, an honest man." In the County of Simeoe we do a large lumber trade. There a in the three ridings of Simcoe. There are 150 saw-mills One firm cuts 75,000,000 feet a year, another 18,000,000 feet per year and another 17,000,000 feet per year, and In the town of Midland, not such a small town as you might infer it to be from the remarks of the hon, member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), but an important town, the terminus of the Midland system of the Grand Trunk Railway, a town with one of the finest harbours on the inland waters, a town which has extensive docks and lumber mills and rolling mill-in fact a town which is destined to become the shipping port for the grain from the North-West, unless the policy of this Government destroys it-well, of the many saw-mills in Midland there is but one running to-day. the others are closed. One of the mills which had been closed up started a few weeks ago to cut a few logs left over after the fire at Sturgeon Bay. Now, Sir, one of these mills which is closed, cut last year nearly 18,000,000 feet of lumber, and employed, in its different departments, 380 hands.

Why were they closed up? Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. SPOHN. Simply because this Government, in refusing to have reciprocity, allow a duty of $1 a thousand feet to remain on lumber exported to the United States, and have taken off the dollar duty per thousand on the logs exported, so that the owners make more money by taking the logs to the United States instead of cutting them here.

Mr. SPROULE. That is correct. The Govern. ment were wrong in taking the export duty off logs.

Mr. SPOHN. By the time I am through I hope my hon. friend, if he is open to conviction, will be turned from the evil tenor of his ways. Well, that mill has been shut down, and the logs, which would otherwise have been cut in Midland, are now cut in Michigan, and these 380 hands and their families have been compelled to follow the logs, thus depriving Canada of many good citizens, and the town of Midland is thus becoming depopulated and is losing the advantage it would gain by the expenditure of this large sum of money, were the logs cut there as they should be. But this is not an isolated case. The hon, member for Muskoka says the town of Parry Sound is in exactly the same condition. dollar of duty on lumber induced the mill-owners to take their logs into the United and manufacture them there; and I want to remind the hon, member for East Grey (Mr.) Sproule) that the men who are taking these logs to Michigan to-day used not to have their logs cut by the thousand in Midland but owned one of the finest mills in this country, in Midland, and rather than cut their logs there they have taken them to Michigan simply because they can make money by But the trouble does not stop here. Midso doing. land, at one time, did a large grain trade with Chicago, but to-day vessels cannot carry grain to Midland as they are unable to get any return cargoes, while at present grain is being carried from Duluth and Chicago to Buffalo for 11 cents a bushel, for the simple reason that return cargoes can be had of

has one of the finest harbours in the world, a harbour in which the Great Eastern could sail with safety, and notwithstanding her extensive docks, she never will advance and never will amount to anything as long as the present Government is in power. But if we had reciprocity with the United States and the duty of $1 a thousand taken off lumber, which must follow as a matter of course, these logs which are being towed to Michigan and cut up for the benefit of the people of Michigan would again be cut up in Midland and there would be no logs sent to Michigan from the Georgian Bay. Thus you see that reciprocity is not only good for the farmer but for the lumber trade and for every other trade of importance in this country. If we had reciprocity with the United States, our lumber, instead of being shipped in the rough would be planed here, and the lower grades of lumber would be manufactured here. Then vessels could bring grain to Midland and get a return cargo, so that they could afford to bring grain from Chicago and Duluth to Midland for one-half the rate for which they carry it to Buffalo. The result would be a great expenditure of money in this country, and the whole country would feel the benefit of the capital and labour which would be thus expended. affects Midland affects all the lumbering towns and cities in Ontario. For instance, the town of Gravenhurst should be the manufacturing centre for the Muskoka Lakes, but this affects that town as it does every other town and city in Canada. I have been speaking of the effect of the McKinley Bill on the lumber trade as it affects us on the Georgian Bay, but now I propose to come nearer home to some of you. Some people think that, because the logs cannot be towed from the Ottawa valley, this does not affect the Ottawa valley, but I will show you that it does affect the lumber trade of the Ottawa valley as it affects the trade of the Georgian Bay. I am informed that you had a box factory in Ottawa which was run by E. H. Barnes & Co. and employed 150 hands, but when the United States put a 35 per cent. duty on boxes, that box factory shut down; but that is not the whole history of your box factory, E. H. Barnes & Co. took the machinery out of the Ottawa box factory and carried it to Rouse's Point on the other side of the line, and they are there now manufacturing boxes for the American market, and the people of Ottawa lost the factory and the 150 hands and their families, and the United States gained. Thus you see the result of the policy of this loyal Government at your own doors. Further, E. B. Eddy had a box factory, but, like E. H. Barnes & Co., it was compelled to shut down. Having given these examples to show the state of things in the east and in the west of the province, I have no doubt that the same state of things exists more or less over the whole country. Still further, the effects of reciprocity would be more beneficial to the country because there would be a great variety of wood manufactures started at In the west, a planing mill is considered a necessary adjunct to every saw-mill. They do not ship their lumber in the rough from the saw-mills in Michigan, as we do here, but the lumber is planed and then shipped to all parts of the United States. Our lumber could be planed in the same way and manufactured, and this would give employment to a great number of men. We know that it does not pay to ship the lower grades of lumber to the United coal; and notwithstanding the fact that Midland States, because the duty is the same on all grades.

Whether we have lumber worth $25 a thousand or only worth $7 a thousand, the same duty of $1 has to be paid, so it hardly pays to ship the lower grades of lumber to the United States. We could manufacture the lower grades of lumber here. Everyone who knows anything about the lumber trade is aware that there is an immense market in the Eastern States for the Ottawa valley lumber, and a larger market in the Western and Central States for the lumber manufactured on the Georgian Bay. Why is not a great portion of that planed and manufactured here? Why do we not manufacture the lower grades of lumber here? Simply because this glorious, old, antediluvian National Policy, which hon, gentlemen opposite swear by, prevents it. Our people are leaving us, our country is becoming dead and dormant, simply because we are cursed with a moribund Government, but once give us a live and honest Government, that will look after the interests of the country instead of the interests of Uncle Thomas—and themselves—then we will have prosperity in the land and all will be happy. See what is taking place at your own doors in addition to what I have told you. Some of your largest lumbermen own or have interests in planing mills in the United States, simply because if they planed their lumber in Canada they would be compelled to pay $2 per thousand duty upon it. James McLaren, J. R. Booth, Bronson & Weston and John Charlton, all own or are part owners of planing mills in the United States. Would it not be better for you if they were to take advantage of the facilities with which the Almighty has blessed you at your own doors, a water power which costs little or nothing; would it not be better, particularly for the city of Ottawa, if all this lumber, instead of being shipped away in the rough, could be planed here? It is almost impossible to estimate the benefit it would be to the city of Ottawa, and yet we have the members for Ottawa supporting the Government. Now, Sir, I want to make this matter so plain that all, whether they want to understand it or not, must understand it. I want to go so far even as to make the hon, member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) understand it, so I will therefore trouble you with a few figures in reference to the planing and manufacture of lumber, to show how much could be saved to the country, in hopes that the hon. member for East Grey will see the advantage of it.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. He is the leader of the Government now.

Mr. SPOHN. If he is the leader of the Government, and we succeed in convincing him, we will convince the whole Government. Lumber is cut 1 inch, and $\frac{1}{12}$ of an inch in thickness. When green, it weighs about 4,000 lbs. per 1,000 feet, partly dry from 3,000 to 3,500 lbs., and dry 2,500 lbs. per 1,000 feet. An average carload weighs 30,000 lbs., so that a car can carry 8,000 feet green, 10,000 feet partly dry and 12,000 feet green, 10,000 feet partly dry and 12,000 feet of dry lumber. Lumber is generally shipped partly dry, that is, from two to four months after being cut. The freight varies with the distance and the lumber is graded differently in different localities. For the calculations I am going to make I intend to take the grading on the Georgian Bay, and also the freight from the Georgian Bay to Buffalo. At the present time, rough or unplaned lumber has to pay a duty of \$1 a thousand, and planed lumber \$2 a thousand, and planed tongued and grooved \$2.50 a thousand, and lumber manufactured or partly manufactured 35 per cent. Thus the duty on planed and manufactured lumber virtually prohibits its exportation. To be properly planed the lumber must be dry, so that a car that carries 10,000 feet partly dry, as it is generally shipped, could carry 15,000 feet dry and planed, because we not only gain by reduced weight but by reduced thickness also. Lumber is planed on both sides to \$ of an inch thick for the Eastern trade. Lumber in the rough is ## of an inch in thickness, while after being planed it is only $\frac{2}{3}\frac{2}{5}$ of an inch, thus losing $\frac{1}{5}$ of an inch in thickness, and consequently $\frac{1}{5}$ in weight. So, you will see that a car that can carry 10,000 feet partly dry will carry 15,000 feet planed and dried. The freight to Buffalo is \$33 a car, so that if we had reciprocity with the United States the lumbermen would save from \$7 to \$8 a car in freight alone, besides the duty of from \$2 to \$2.50 a thousand, which is a saving on the average of at least from \$32 to \$35 on every car we ship over and above the present profit, whatever that may be. Now, you can imagine what this would do for the city of Ottawa. Just fancy the lumbermen being able to save \$32 to \$35 on every car they ship over and above what they save to-day. They could afford to give better wages, to employ more hands. It is not necessary for me to tell you that not only Ottawa, but every town and every place in the Dominion of Canada where lumber is manufactured, would flourish. Now, part of the lumber that is shipped from Georgian Bay is shipped to Buffalo and Tonawanda. The latter town has been built up by the lumber trade; in fact, Tonawanda has been called the city of planing mills. A large portion of the Georgian Bay lumber is shipped there in the rough, and is planed and reshipped to different parts of the United States. I was in Tonawanda not a great while ago, and while there the proprietor of a planing mill told me that he could plane lumber and ship it to Kansas and sell it cheaper than he could sell the same quality of lumber in the rough, simply on account of the extra freight on the rough lumber. In Tonawanda they employ 5,000 hands in planing and handling lumber. Just fancy the boom that would take place in our Canadian towns if these hands with their families could be distributed among them in working up this lumber. Of course, you know Ottawa lumber does not go to Tonawanda, but is shipped in a different direction; but the Georgian Bay lumber goes, a portion of it, to Tonawanda, and if the towns and lumber districts of the west that shipped this lumber to Tonawanda could have the advantage of the residence among them of 5,000 hands, with their families, you can imagine what prosperity that would bring. There are thousands of dollars paid yearly on Canadian lumber, in duty, in the town of Tonawanda. It is not necessary for me to discuss the question of who pays the duty on lumber, because we all know that the lumbermen of this country pay the duty on every foot of lumber they send to the United States. Now, in speaking of reciprocity with Canada, this proprietor of a planing mill in Tonawanda told me that if they had reciprocity between Canada and the United States he would be compelled to move his planing on sawdust and shavings would be to him a little fortune. I am sure you are all satisfied that had I wish to refer very briefly to our tanneries. we reciprocity with the United States Mr. Booth, affects the tanneries of this country in the same Mr. McLaren, Mr. Bronson and Mr. Charlton, who | manner. We export to the United States thousands own planing mills in the United States, or are of dollars' worth of tanbark every year. It is interested in these manufactures in the United States, would move their planing mills here, where they could be under their own supervision, and consequently we would be benefited to the extent of the labour and capital employed. Now, I propose to give you just one or two examples before I close. I will try to be brief, because 1 know there are a number of gentlemen who wish to speak after me, and I do not want to take up more time than is absolutely necessary. Every lumberman knows that it does not pay to ship the lower grades of lumber to the United States. These low grades of lumber could just as well be manufactured here as in the United States if we had not to pay this prohibitory duty. Although the hon, member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) laughsat the idea of our sending lumber to the United States, I can assure that hon, gentleman that for certain grades of lumber we have no other market. Now, shipping culls, Georgian Bay grade, are worth \$7 a thousand at the mill; 1,000 shipping culls cut up and planed would make at least 500 feet of wainscotting; it would make a little more than 500 feet, but I wish to be on the safe side, and I will say 500 feet, although, as a matter of fact, it makes some 600 feet. Wainscotting is worth in Buffalo \$40 a thousand. The labour for making wainscotting costs \$1 a thousand. It takes 24,000 feet of culls to make 12,000 feet of wainscotting, worth at the mill \$168; cost of making, \$12. Now, the freight to Buffalo is \$33, the total amounts to \$213; 12,000 feet of wainscotting at Buffalo, at \$40 a thousand, would be worth \$480, so there would be a return for the shipper over the price of lumber and labour of \$267 a car. Now, then, take the article of doors. The ordinary four-panel stock doors are made out of what we call cut-ups and better, worth at the mill \$22. These doors are worth here \$1.50 wholesale, they are worth in Buffalo \$2.20 each; 1,000 feet of cut-ups and better will make thirty-six four-panel stock doors; 12,000 feet will make 432 doors, or a carload; 432 doors in Canada at \$1.50 each would be worth \$648; 432 doors in Buffalo at \$2.20 each would be worth \$950. Now, if we want to ship a carload of doors to Buffalo we pay freight \$44 a car. I have in my calculation quoted freight at \$33 a car, but in shipping doors and manufactured lumber the freight is \$44 a car. Now, the duty on \$950 at 35 per cent. would be \$332.64, clearance paper \$3, total expenditure of shipment, \$379.64. This, added to the \$648, the cost of the doors in Canada, makes \$1,027.24 as the total cost of delivering doors in Buffalo. But doors in Buffalo are only worth \$950, so that the shipper actually loses \$77.24 on every carload of doors shipped to Buffalo. If we had reciprocity with the United States the shipper would get a return of \$273 on every carload over the cost of the doors and freight. For sometime doors were being manufactured in Canada and shipped to Buffalo at a period when they charged a duty on the price in Canada. But like my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, they soon changed this, and did as he did in reference to binding twine last year, they charged a duty, not on the price of doors in Canada, but on the price of doors in Buffalo, and the hon. gentleman will only get 1,000 copies of Mr. Spohn.

the consequence was that the duty was prohibitory. worth here about $3.50 a cord, while in Chicago its value is $8.50. The freight on a carload of tanbark to Buffalo costs $33. The freight on dry hides from New York to Georgian Bay is 25 cents per 100, and the amount of hides a carload of bark would tan would cost for freight only $3 from New York to Georgian Bay. So the tanner saves $570 on every carload of hides by taking the hides to the tanbark than by taking the tanbark to the hides, whether we ship the tanbark to New York State or Chicago or Milwaukee. If we had reciprocity, instead of shipping tanbark to the United States, hides from the United States would be brought to the tanbark, and the result would be that we would manufacture leather for the United We have at Penetanguishene one of the largest tanneries in the country, and there are large tanneries also at Orillia and in Muskoka, and I am told by men who thoroughly understand their business that they can manufacture and deliver leather at Chicago, Detroit and Buffalo 24 cents per pound cheaper than it can possibly be produced in the United States. But the duty on leather entering the United States ranges from 2 cents to 5 cents per pound, and so the exportation of leather there is practically prohibited. This summer a tanner from the United States in passing through the northern part of Canada made this remark: that if we had reciprocity he would build a tannery near the tanbark district which would employ 300 men; and Mr. Miller, of Orillia, assured me he would employ five times the number of men he does to-day if we More than this. While we tohad reciprocity. day could deliver leather at Detroit, Chicago and Buffalo for 2½ cents cheaper than it could be manufactured in the United States, if the Government removed the duty on stearine, which is not made in Canada, but which is used in leather manufacture, leather could be manufactured here 3 cents per pound cheaper than it can be in the United States. So, not in one article but in many articles the Government are interfering against the manufactures of this country. From these facts it is clear that reciprocity with the United States would enrich this Dominion by millions of dollars More than that: it would give a better market for our farmers. In regard to the remarks of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who spoke of giving a better home market to our farmers, I should like to ask him if this would not be better than to send a great quantity of our raw material across the line. I desire to refer to an unfortunate remark made by the hon, gentleman in closing his speech the other day. He said the electors knew where to keep the Opposition, and that had the election contest continued two weeks longer there would have been few members on this side of the House. I should like to ask if it was the efforts of the farmers of Grey in this direction which reduced his majority from 500 to 19. If, in a contest lasting three weeks, his majority was reduced nearly 500, where would he be to-day had it lasted two weeks longer? I am not surprised that such a change took place in his riding, and if his speech made the other night printed and circulated through the riding, so that the farmers can digest it, that address will prove his valedictory to his constituents. I wish to direct attention briefly to the remarks made by the hon, member for Cardwell (Mr. White) in regard to the farmers' position and the number of mortgages. I will merely quote from a letter sent by the registrar of the County of Simcoe in respect to mortgages in that county, and in doing so I may say he speaks of the three richest townships in the county. The registrar writes as follows:

"COUNTY OF SIMCOE REGISTRY OFFICE,

" BARRIE, February 25, 1891.

"Barrie, February 25, 1891.

"The mortgages range from $300 to $7,000 or $8,000; the probable average would be $1,000.

"The three townships selected are the richest and most prosperous in the three ridings of the county, and are almost wholly settled and owned by resident farmers.

"The books of this office show:—

"(1) That the Township of Tecumseh is divided into about 647 parcels or lots, as held under patents from the Crown. Of these 647 lots 432 are mortgaged and 215 are unencumbered, or 67 per cent, mortgage.

"(2) That the Township of Nottawasaga is divided into about 623 patented parcels. Of these 490 are mortgaged and 133 are not mortgaged, or 78 per cent, mortgage.

"(3) That the Township of Oro is divided into about 569 patented lots. Of these 399 are mortgaged and 170 are not mortgaged, or 70 per cent, under mortgaged.

I wish to submit for the information and enlightenment of hon. gentlemen opposite the closing remarks made by Principal Grant when he welcomed the teachers to Toronto the other day. I have no doubt when he made these remarks he had such members as the hon, member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) in his mind. Principal Grant said

"Count those men as enemies of the race who seek to erect or strive to maintain barriers between the British commonwealth and the United States or who teach that it is a good thing for neighbours to have no intercourse with each other. Join hands and never forget that we at least are children of the light."

I have shown the advantages that would arise had we reciprocity with the United States. not continue my remarks further; but for these reasons, and I believe they are sufficient reasons, I intend to vote for the amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am sure at this late stage of the debate that brief speeches will be acceptable to the House. The subject that has been brought to our attention by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has been debated I think from all standpoints, and it would be difficult indeed, more particularly for a new member, to bring before the House anything new, any arguments that have not been turned over and over bearing on this question. However, I hope before I sit down that I will be able to emphasize some of the arguments that have been advanced to show why the amendment proposed by the hon, member should not receive the The policy of the Liberalsanction of this House. Conservative party has always been what it is now, a policy of Canada for the Canadians. Our true desire has been to make a home market for our own people and to retain that home market for our own people, but continuously endeavouring to extend our trade with other countries in such a way as we can, always on fair terms to Canada. may say that the policy of the Liberal-Conserva-show that we were desirous of living on tertive party has always been a policy of friendli-amity with them, and desirous of trading ness with our neighbours to the South of us, because we cannot expect to obtain anything from that country which would be of advantage to Canada unless we continue to live on friendly terms with the people of the United States. looking back even forty years, I find that in 1849, when there was a differential tariff against the United States, that was removed, and one tariff was raised and the other lowered, so as to make the tariff against the United States and Great Britain the same, and thus we showed a disposition to live on friendly terms with our neighbours to the south In the same year our first statutory offer was made to place on the free list products coming into this country from the United States as soon admitted similar products into their And in 1854, in order to settle the difficountry. culties that then existed between the two countries, a reciprocity treaty was negotiated. been claimed by hon, members on the other side of the House that this treaty was not negotiated by the Conservative party; but I may here remark that an hon, gentleman who had much to do with the bringing of that treaty into operation was afterwards closely identified with the Liberal-Conservative party in this country. That is a circumstance that is well known, because we all remember that the advent of that hon, gentleman to power, under the leadership of the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, marked at the same time the departure of the hon, gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) from the Conservative party. This treaty of 1854 remained in force for some twelve years. It was abrogated, not with the desire of the Canadian people, but at the whim of the American people, who thought, perhaps, that we had not fairly dealt with them during the time of their unfortunate In 1868 again, to show that we are disposed to live on terms of friendliness with the American people, we re-enacted the statutory offer, and in 1869 we solicited again the treaty of 1854. In 1871 the treaty of Washington was negotiated—a treaty that remained in force until the year 1885, when it was abrogated, as in the case of the former treaty, not by the desire of the people of Canada, but by the action of the people of the United States; and in order to show our desire to continue our friendly relations between the two countries, the late Government allowed the fishery articles of that treaty to remain in force some six months after the treaty had been abrogated, hoping that the treaty might be restored, and that the difficulties which existed in connection with our Atlantic fisheries might be set aside. In 1878 our statutory offer was again re-enacted, and in 1888 another treaty was negotiated by the Liberal-Conservative party in power in this country. That treaty was negotiated in the interests of the people of Canada. Our representative on that occasion was Sir Charles Tupper, and although that treaty did not receive the ratification of the American people yet we realized that it was in the interest of the people of Canada, because it received the sanction of this House, and it possibly would have received the sanction of the Senate of the United States had not polititical reasons prevented it. At that time, again, to show our good-will towards the people of the United States, and in order to show that we were desirous of living on terms of them on such terms as would be reasonable and fair to the people of this country, and at the same time fair to the people of the United States, Sir Charles Tupper made another offer to settle the difficulties that existed at that time, and in the direction of broader trade relations. The words which he used and which were inserted in the report are as follows:

"That with the view of removing all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries, it is proposed by Her Majesty's Plenipotentiaries that the fishermen of both countries shall have all the privileges enjoyed during the existence of the Fisheries Articles of the Treaty of Washington, in consideration of a mutual arrangement providing for greater freedom of commercial intercourse between ing for greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada and Newfoundland."

Then, Sir. again in 1890 and 1891, still desirous of perpetuating this good-feeling between the two countries, still again desirous of taking advantage of every opportunity to bring about such better trade relations between the two countries as could be obtained, taking advantage of communications which were going on between the American Government and the Government of Newfoundland, our Canadian Government, ever alive to the best interests of this country, intervened, and desired to be included in those negotiations. And we remember that a submission was made that a new treaty might be negotiated on the basis so submitted, and a basis was then submitted upon which this new treaty might be negotiated. That basis was a renewal of the treaty of 1854, with such modifications as the altered circumstance of the two countries would call forth—the reconstruction of the treaty of 1888, the protection of our mackerel fishery, the relaxation of our coasting laws on the sea coast and also on the inland waters, as well as some other minor matters that would be taken into consideration, and one broad treaty negotiated, not only settling all the differences and difficulties that existed between the two countries at that time, but on the basis of widening the trade relations between the two coun-We know the result of this. that negotiations are to come up in the month of October next, when possibly this matter can again be satisfactorily arranged. I make this statement, Mr. Speaker, in order to show that while the Government of this country appealed on the 5th March on the lines that we then set out, and that while our rallying cry was the old flag, the old policy and the old leader, that cry was strictly correct. The old leader has left us; but we are still under the old flag, and we still pursue the old policy—a policy of obtaining for Canada, as we persistently have been attempting to do from time to time, as wedid in 1854, as we endeavoured to do in 1866, as we did in 1871, and again in 1878, and in 1888-we are still endeavouring to obtain for Canada the best possible terms in our trade relations that can be obtained for this country. Now, Sir, what does our policy mean? We say that we desire to uphold these good relations that exist between the two countries. We are willing to extend our trade with the United States, but only on terms that would be fair to the people of this country. We believe that we have something substantial to offer to the people of the United States without sacrificing our interests. Under the treaty of 1854 the advantages were in favour of the United States. They sent into the Provinces of British North America some $95,000,-000 more of products than we sent into the United | were to sell only one-half of their oat crop they Mr. HENDERSON.

States. They had no reason, therefore, to complain that that treaty was unfair to them, nor would they possibly have abrogated it, or terminated it, had it not been for a jealousy at the time which we say was not well founded. However, we are not prepared to go the whole length of renewing the treaty of 1854. For my part, I consider that it would not be in the interest of this country that such a treaty should be negotiated, and I think it was well that the submission that was made was worded in the way in which it was, when it stated that such modifications should be made in the treaty of 1854 as the altered circumstances of the two countries called for. Now, Sir, during the time between 1854 and 1866 the great American west had not been opened up. These great wheat fields were not in existence, and the result was that the United States, instead of being such large exporters of wheat as they now are, were really purchasers of wheat from Canada. The matter is now reversed, and it would not be in the interest of the people of Canada to-day that we should have free trade in wheat and flour between the United States and Canada. In the matter of pork we may say something of the same kind. In the years between 1854 and 1866 pork was shipped from this country to the States. The great city of Chicago had not its existence then as a pork market, and we would not desire at the present time, nor would it be in the interest of the people of this country, that we should have a renewal of a reciprocity treaty which would embody free trade in hogs and hog products. I say that would not be now in the interest of the people of this country. When we look at the reports of the Ontario Government furnished by Mr. Archibald Blue, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, we find, by a special report that was given in November last, owing to the increased impetus that was given to the raising of hogs because of the duty that had been previously placed on hogs and hog products by the Government of Canada, an increase in the number of hogs raised in the year 1890 equal to 36 per cent. of the number raised in the previous year; and these, valued at $8 each, would amount to a sum to the farmers of the Province of Ontario alone equal to $2,444,000, without taking into consideration the other parts of the Dominion. So that, whatever should be included in a reciprocity treaty with the United States, the article of pork or hog products should not be included. The same remark applies to oats. From 1854 to 1866 oats were shipped largely from this country to the United States; but the case is reversed at the present time. They produce in the United States large quantities of oats at a lower price than we do in Canada; and were the gates open they would ship large quantities of oats to this country, to the detriment of our farmers; so that we could not afford to have free trade in that cereal. If we compare the market prices of oats in the different months from July to December, in the five years from 1885 to 1889, we will find a difference in the average price in Chicago, as compared with the price in Ontario, of 8 cents a bushel. Now, the crop of 1890 was equal to about 52,000,-000 bushels; a year or two previous it reached 65,000,000; but taking it at 52,000,000, I assume without taking into consideration the large crops of oats in the Province of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces—that if the farmers of Ontario alone would lose under reciprocity, on the basis of the products of the farm, the factory and the mine of Chicago prices, over $2,000,000. Therefore, it the United States. Now, Sir. that is an evidence Chicago prices, over $2,000,000. Therefore, it the United States. Now, Sir, that is an evidence would not be in the interest of the people of this that the people of the United States are willing to country to have free trade in that article. But, Sir, though there are certain articles in which we cannot afford to free-trade with the United States, yet I believe we have something substantial which we can offer to the people of the United States in States a reasonable treaty of reciprocity, such as return for such a measure of free trade as will be fairly in the interest of the people of this country. I read the other day an account of a meeting of the United States Senate Committee on the relations historic language of the hon, member for South with Canada, held in Boston, on September, 1889. Oxford, which has been quoted over and over again It was then stated in evidence by Mr. S. F. Dutts, in this House: of Boston, as follows:-

"All the fishing interests of Boston had always been in favour of reciprocity. Canada had much to give in return. as 99 per cent. of the fish brought to American ports by American vessels were stolen from within the three-mile limit, and American fishermen must have Canadian bait."

Now, this is a strange confession to be made by an American, if it is true. But even if it is only half true, that indicates something substantial which we would have to offer to the people of the United States as a compensation for the admission of articles from Canada which it would be in the interest of Canada to have admitted free into the United States. We remember also that the American people paid us the large sum of $5,000,000 for certain privileges which they enjoyed from 1871 to Now, I presume that they do not desire to repeat that payment, and they would rather be prepared to grant us some trade privileges in place of such a large amount of money. There may be other concessions which we can offer them. Therefore, I say that we have something substantial to offer to the people of the United States in order to procure from them free trade in such articles as it would be in the interest of this country to include in a treaty. It has been asserted, however, and repeated on the floor of this House by some hon. gentlemen opposite, that the United States would not be willing to negotiate a treaty which would not include manufactured articles. I have listened carefully to the arguments which have been advanced in support of that statement, and the only evidence which I have heard presented in support of it was a letter said to have been written by the Hon. J. G. Blaine to a Mr. Baker, somewhere in the State of New York, in which he said that the people of the United States would not negotiate any treaty in natural products alone. I beg here to draw attention to the fact that the Government of Canada have never proposed to the people of the United States to negotiate a treaty in natural products alone; so that Mr. Blaine was quite correct when he made that statement. The American Government have shown their willingness on other occasions to negotiate partial reciprocity treaties, and therefore we have some reason to hope that they will also agree to negotiate a partial or limited reciprocity treaty with Canada. We have an instance of this in the case of Brazil. The people of Brazil could not afford to free-trade with the people of the United States, because they could not afford to sacrifice their revenue. But the people of the United States met them half way, and proposed that the operation of the McKinley Bill as against their coffee, sugar and hides should be suspended, if the people of Brazil would admit at a reduced rate of duty the tain? These advantages are various and noticeable.

Canada cannot obtain from the people of the United will be in the interest of this country, and not a jug-handled arrangement in their favour, then I say we had better remain as we are; and in the

"We have men and ships, and we will carry the war into Africa. While reciprocity is desirable, we are not in such a state of subjection to the United States that we cannot live without it. We will find new markets for ourselves, and cut them out."

Unrestricted reciprocity, such as has been defined in this House, such as we on this side understand it, and such as I believe is generally understood in the country, would compel Canada to relinquish the control of its tariff. That is something that would be very objectionable indeed to the people of this country. The name unrestricted reciprocity implies that such would be the nature of the treaty. It implies that the utmost freedom must exist; that the Custom-houses between Canada and the United States must be removed; that the imports into this country by way of the St. Lawrence, Halifax or Vancouver would pass into the United States, where no tariff or Custom-houses would prevent them. I remember that a short time ago the hon. member for Kent, Ont. (Mr. Campbell), I think, in addressing the House, said that under unrestricted reciprocity the natural products and the manufactured goods of this country ought to pass or would pass as freely between the two countries as the waters of the great lakes. read the report of a speech delivered by the hon. leader of the Opposition at Abbottsford, in his own province, some time last autumn, and which appeared in the Globe on the 9th of October, in which the hon, gentleman is reported to have said that the Custom-houses would have to be removed. True, the hon, gentleman has told us that there was no French reporter prethat there was no French reporter present on that occasion; but I believe it is not contended that the report is not substantially a correct one. Unrestricted reciprocity, I hold, would mean discrimination against Great Britain. It means that Canada must ask Great Britain to negotiate a treaty with the United States, which will absolutely prohibit the manufactures of Great Britain coming into this country, while we will grant at the same time free trade to the people of the United States. Is it reasonable, I ask, that the people of this country should go to Great Britain and do what hon, gentlemen opposite, had they succeeded on the 5th of March last, would have had to do? It would have been their bounden duty to proceed at once to Great Britain and ask her consent or assistance to negotiate a treaty which would raise a high tariff wall against the manufactures of Great Britain and give free admission to those of the United States. If we should insist on such a condition, could we expect England's protection, could we expect to retain the advantages: we enjoy by reason of our connection with Great Bri-

I may mention one or two which have been referred to, from time to time, but I desire to emphasize these, because they are matters in which the people of Ontario and the other provinces take a deep interest. Reference has been made to the cattle trade, which is a large and increasing trade of great importance to our farmers. Now, Sir, if we allowed the cattle of the United States to come into this country and pass over our own railways, and be exported by vessels sailing from Montreal and Quebec to Great Britain, along with Canadian cattle known to be free from all kinds of contagious diseases, could we expect that, under those circumstances, Great Britain would continue the privileges she has granted in favour of Canadian cattle? Such an expectation would be unreasonable, and in a short time the farmers of this country would loose all the privileges and advantages they now enjoy in this matter. The same remark will apply to the question of cheese, another product of great interest to our people. Were we to permit, as we would be obliged to do under free trade. American cheese to come freely into this country and be exported with our own, in a very short time the market in England for Canadian cheese would be destroyed, as it would be impossible to distinguish between American and Canadian, and the great advantage we have of selling our cheese as Canadian cheese would be lost to us, and we would suffer financially in consequence. read an extract from the writing of an hon, gentleman who, I believe, is well known to many members of this House. I refer to the Hon. James Young, a man whose authority in Ontario has long been accepted, a man whose advice has always been accepted as the words of wisdom, a Liberal of the Liberals, and a member of the Reform party. The Hon. James Young says:

"What Canadian statesman, unless he had lost all regard for British connection, could seriously propose to Great Britain to negotiate a treaty, or even consent to legislation, discriminating against her own commerce and building up that of a rival?"

But we need not rely on such authorities to ascertain what is truly the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. We can go to the father of this policy, because it had not its birthplace in this country, but is a child of foreign birth. Erastus Wiman what he says about it, and he is the man who organized the policy and framed its details. He spoke at Louisville, Kentucky, in February last, and made a very plain statement indeed with reference to this matter. He said:

"The Liberal party propose unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, which will carry in its train a perfect settlement of the fishery trouble, opening up every advantage along five thousand miles of coast line every advantage along ave thousand miles of coast line fisheries. It will agree to admit American manufactures free of duty to all parts of Canada, in return for the free admission into the United States of all her products. Meantime, it proposes that a duty shall be maintained against foreign goods, including those from Great Britain, as high as those that now prevail in the United States."

That, I think, is sufficient evidence as to what the meaning of this policy is; but if more evidence were necessary we might quote indeed from a Canadian authority. We have the writing of Mr. R. W. Phipps, Forestry Clerk of the Ontario Government, who, in a letter of the 19th February last, made this statement, and I may say that being an officer of the Ontario Government gives him on Mr. HENDERSON.

who in this House moved the amendment we are now discussing:

"Next, with regard to discrimination in favour of the States. Let us take the plain truth. The States neither will nor can grant reciprocity in manufactures to Canada unless Canada makes her tariff against the rest of the world as high as that of the States, for doing otherwise would allow the cheap manufactures of the world to enter through the back door of Canada."

Unrestricted reciprocity, again we say, means direct taxation for revenue purposes. If we admit from the United States goods on which we have heretofore collected a revenue, that would at once result in a loss of $7,500,000 to the revenues of this country. But that would not be the only loss. If we are to have free trade with the people of the United States, and to have a tariff wall as high as that now around the United States around the Dominion of Canada, we cannot expect the continuance of our trade with Great Britain, France and Germany, and other countries; but nearly all the goods that come into this country would come by way of the United States, the result of which would be that we would lose in revenue on goods now coming from other countries equally as much as on those coming from the United States. It would mean, instead of a loss of $7,500,000, an absolute loss of at least $15,000,000 to the revenue each year, or $3 per head, or $15 per family, if equally distributed; but I do not believe it would be equally distributed. If this amount has to be raised by direct taxation I believe the largest proportion would fall upon our farmers. It has been alleged, with regard to the Province of Ontarioand I will speak more particularly of that province, as it is my native province—it has been alleged over and over again, although I think the estimate is too large, but it is the estimate of hon. gentlemen opposite- that the people of Ontario pay three fourths of the revenue of this country. Now, if such be the case, and such is the allegations of hon. gentlemen opposite—and I base my argument upon their assertions—the people of Ontario would be called upon to pay about $11,-000,000 loss of revenue. If that were put upon the farmers of Ontario—and they would have to bear the greater part of the burden-it would be equivalent to about $50 on every farm of 100 acres. I hold that the people of the Province of Ontario are not prepared for any such measure. not believe in any such policy. No policy would be acceptable to them which would carry in its train direct taxation. However, we are told by hon, gentlemen opposite, and in the country this is the statement made to the people, that they are going to economize, that by their economy they will be able to carry on the affairs of the country without resorting to direct taxation. Let us look at their history in regard to economy. In a matter of this kind it is a good thing that they have a In the Province of Quebec I assume that history. hon, gentlemen are not able to show where their friends are economizing, and if we look in that direction we shall have very little hope that such economy would be exercised in carrying on the affairs of this Dominion without direct taxation, if we had free trade with the United States. We may look also to the rich Province of Ontario, a province which obtains a large subsidy from this Dominion, a province which has this question a right to speak for hon. gentlemen vast resources from woods and forests, a province opposite, because they are in sympathy with those which derives large revenues from the sale of public lands, and also from the operation of the license system, and yet that province, which has been under the benign rule of the Reform party for 18 years, is unable to carry on its affairs without borrowing millions of money. Again, let us look at the condition of affairs under the regime of hon. gentlemen in the Dominion from 1874 to 1878, and let us see if there is any hope, if we had free trade with the United States and the consequent loss of revenue, that they would so economize as to be able to carry on the affairs of the country without resorting to direct taxation. What is that history? Deficit after deficit, year after year, piled up one after the other. I think there would be no hope there to induce us to entrust those gentlemen with carrying out such a policy. But unrestricted reciprocity means not only that we should relinquish the control of our own tariff, it not only means a discrimination against Great Britain, it not only means direct taxation on the people of this country, but it means something worse. It would mean the destruction of our National Policy, by which the industries of our country have been built up and a home market has been established and enlarged. I will give you a statement from one whom I consider an excellent authority on a matter of this kind. Mr. Cobden, the author of free trade, once said:

"The farmers' interest is the interest of the whole community, and is not a partial interest: and you cannot injure the farmer more than when you injure the manufacturers, his customers."

If we destroy the home market of this country, we destroy the best interests of the farmers, who sell their goods to the manufacturers. Our trade makes a very favourable comparison with that of the United States, and I think it behooves the people of this country to be very careful how they disturb their relations, either with the United States or with any other country. Comparing our exports and imports with those of the United States, it may be surprising to some hon, gentleman to learn the great excess of the Dominion of Canada over the United States. In 1889 the Canadian imports amounted to $22.70 per head, while the United States imports amounted to only $11.46 per head, Canada of $11.24. The exports of Canada, in the same year, amounted to $17.57, while those of the United States amounted to $11.44, or an excess in favour of Canada of $6.13 The total for Canada was $40.27, and for the United States $22.68, or a difference again in favour of Canada of $17.59. Now, there is something else still which I desire to say unrestricted reciprocity means. It not only means the relinquishing of the control of our own tariff, discrimination against British goods, direct taxation on our people and the destruction of our National Policy, but we are told, and I think it has been stated by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that it means for the American people the transfer of the trade and commerce of this country to the cities of the United States, or, in the historic words of the hon. gentleman, it means a monopoly for the Americans of the regions beyond, whose trade and commerce, if once transferred to the people on the other side of the line, no man would be able to take away from them. Why should we transfer the trade and commerce of this country to the cities of Boston and New York? Why should we build up American cities such as Buffalo, Cleveland and our country. That the home market is the best

Detroit, and other American cities, whose names have been rung in our ears from day to day? Why should we transfer to these cities the trade and commerce which has done so much to build up our own Canadiancities and to build up a home market at our own doors? Have we ever taken into consideration the actual value to the country of a city like Montreal or like Toronto? It has been estimated, in fact I may say it is well known, that the products of the farms of the Dominion of Canada are yearly of the value of about $350,000,000. These figures are accepted as being as nearly correct as possible, and from them we can arrive at a conclusion as to the value of a city such as Montreal or Toronto. In 1889 we exported $35,000,000 of the products of the farm, $22,000,000 to Great Britain and $13,000,000 to the United States, leaving $315,000,000 of the products of our farms to be consumed by our people in the Dominion of Canada. If five million people consume $315,000,000 worth of the products of the farms, it is easy to see that a city of 200,000 would consume nearly thirteen million dollars worth of the products of the farm; so that a city like Toronto actually consumes more of the products of our farm than the whole of our exports of those products to the United States. Shall we transfer the trade of cities like Montreal, Toronto, Halifax, St. John and Vancouver, and the other growing cities in this country, to New York and Boston? we break down those cities and destroy their trade and commerce in order to build up the trade and commerce of another country? It is claimed, however, that unrestricted reciprocity will give us a market of 60,000,000. This matter was well referred to the other day by the hon, member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives), and I only desire to emphasize in passing what he then so well said. Let us be careful in considering this matter. Are we going to trade with 60,000,000 of people, or are we only going to trade, under such circumstances, with a few border states? Would we in this country expect, under free trade, to send wheat all the way to California? Would we expect to send flour to Minneapolis? Would we expect to send pork to Chicago? Would we expect to send corn to Kansas? Would we expect to send cattle to Texas? Would we expect to send horses to Kentucky, or flowers to Florida? Such, I say, would be unreasonable. This sufficiently illustrates to my mind, and I believe the mind of every hon. gentleman, that we cannot expect, under such circumstances, to trade with every state in the Union, and that instead of having a market of 60,000,000 of people it would be minimized to that of a few border states. We must remember, at the same time, that if we are to have additional privileges in the way of a larger market, if we are to have a market of 60,000,000, we are also to have 60,000,-000 of competitors for our own market; that is to say, they have 12 times the population we have; every cotton factory in this country would have to compete against the product of 12 cotton factories in the United States; every woollen factory in this country would require to compete against the products of 12 woollen factories in the United States; and every tannery in this country would require to compete against the products of 12 tanneries in the United States; and so with the manufacture of boots and shoes, with the manufacture of gloves-in fact, with every kind of manufacture in for the people of Canada is a question, I believe. beyond dispute. It takes the largest part of our tion, that in respect to three-fourths of the mortgaproducts and pays the best prices for them. Great? Canada, and the United States simply classes as the third consumer of the products of the farms of this country, taking only about 3 per cent. of the products of the farms of this country. Now, why sacrifice the greater markets for even the fancied advantage that we might gain by a more intimate connection with the United States? Hon, gentlemen state, however, that owing to the high American tariff our farmers are hard up. We have heard this day after day, and I think, Mr. Speaker, if there is one class of people in this country who have been abused, and severely abused, over and over again by hon gentlemen House in reference to the farmers. I believe the opposite, it is the farmers. I pity those farmers. I am the son of a farmer, and I sympathize with those men in the west who are abused day after day by hon, gentlemen who sit within the precincts of this House, and who talk in such a manner of carefully tabulated calculation which he had made, the financial standing of a large class of intelli-in the articles of fall wheat, spring wheat, barley, gent people who are not permitted to come into this House to defend themselves: I say I sympathize with these people, and I trust I shall not make any remarks detrimental to their interest. I feel it a pleasure to stand up and speak on their behalf. They tell us they are hard up, but I say to hon, gentlemen, let anyone of us go to the United States—you may go, if you please, to the empire state of the Union, you may go to the best part of that state, in the Genesee Valley, you may drive through the finest counties you can find there, and I do not believe, and I have never yet found a man who discovered, that the people even in that favoured part of the United States could compare in their horses, in their barns, in their fences, in their carriages, and in all their farming accoutrements, with many portions of the Province of Ontario. They tell us the farms are all mortgaged. Well, now, Mr. Speaker, business men mortgage their property when they desire to raise money, when they desire to furnish ways and means for the purpose of carrying on their business, and they have a perfect right to do it, and if the farmer chooses to borrow money to enable him to buy another-farm I say he has a perfect right to do it. I have had some experience in connection with mortgages in this way, having been an officer in a registry office in one of the western counties for a considerable number of years, so that I speak from practical knowledge of the purposes for which the farmers usually give mortgages. Whether they are given to cover indebtness, whether they are given to assist the members of the family to establish themselves, or whether they are given for the purpose of improving the lands, or for the purpose of acquiring other farms, I say without hesitation that I believe four mortgages out of five, at any rate, two-thirds of the mortgages in that county, were given for the purpose of acquiring other farms. How often this occurs. A farm comes in for sale adjoining another farm owned by a well-to-do farmer. However, he has not sufficent money available to purchase that farm, and he mortgages the two farms and secures, we will say, an additional 100 acres of land. In the course of a few years he pays off the mortgage, and the result is that he has 200 acres of land instead of only 100 that he had I say, is just an instance of the kind of statements before. I say, without fear of satisfactory contradicges throughout the county that I have reference Britain is the next best market for the products of to, show me a man who has a mortgage on his farm and I will show you a man who is prosperous. These are the men who are making money, these are the men who are using their property for the purpose for which it ought to be used: they are using it as a security for the purpose of enabling them to buy other farms and to increase their wealth, and I know to my own knowledge that these men acquire land and become better off in the course of years than those who do not undertake to mortgage their farms in order to acquire additional lands. Now, I desire before I sit down to make reference to one other statement which I heard made in this statement was made by the hon, member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) a few days ago when addressing this House. He stated that the farmers of the Province of Ontario, in accordance with a oats and pease, had lost the sum of $70,000,000 during eight years—that is to say, that during a period of eight years the farmers of Ontario-I repeat it, because I consider it was a monstrous statement—the farmers of Ontario in eight years lost the large sum of $70,000,000 in growing pease and oats, barley, fall and spring wheat. Now, I I took his statement, I took the same report to which he refers, and I made a little calculation also. However, I discovered that the hon. gentleman had charged the land with everything that he could possibly charge against it. He assumed that the farmer sat down quietly in his house on a rented farm: he charges the land with the rent of the farm, he charges it with the taxes, and he charges it with the seed grain, and he charges it with the manure that is placed upon the land. I will not take exception to any of those charges. allow the hon, gentleman to charge every acre of land with all these items, but I do take exception to his charging the land with the cost of the ploughing, the cultivating, the sowing and drilling. fitting the land or cultivation, and putting in the crop, I take exception to his charging the land with the cutting of the crop, with storing it in the barns, with the threshing and with the marketing. In order to make this calculation as strong as possible against the farmers, he assumes that every item of expenditure, that every piece of work that is done on the farm, is paid for; that not only the manual labour, but the horses are hired, and the machinery is hired, to do this work, and is paid for by the farmer. We know, Mr. Speaker, that is not the system on which farming is carried on in this country. The farmers go upon their farms, they do a portion of the work, and they hire the balance of it, and what they make out of the sale of their grain is the profit accruing to their labour, just the same as the profit in another man's business is that which accrues to his labour; and what do we find as a result? That, instead of a loss of $70,000,000 during those eight years, we find that the farmers of Ontario, in the growing of these crops alone, after making due allowance for every possible loss the hon, gentleman has claimed, would actually have a clear gain of $200,000,000 as consideration for the labour they had expended on their farms. This, sent broadcast in depreciation of the farmers. I will assume that the farmer did not do all the work on the farm, but actually paid for one-half of the labour, and in that case the farmers would still have a clear gain of $100,000,000 accruing to them as profit for their labour during those eight years. I observe also, on comparing Mr. A. Blue's statement with respect to the value of farms, farm implements, buildings and live stock, in 1882, with that in 1889, that the increase in the value of farm property was raised from $882,624,610, in 1882, to $982,210,664 in 1889, or an increase in the value of farm property of $100,000,000, they tell us the farmers are poor. I desire to say a few words with respect to the allimportant question of duty, and I do intend at any length to discuss the question. hon, member for Essex (Mr. Allan) declared that the duty on barley shipped from this country to the United States was paid by the Canadian producers, and he gave as his opinion a speech delivered by the late Sir John A. Macdonald. I remember have ing read that speechover and over again. Sir John Macdonald said: Take two farmers having each a farm, one on each side of the imaginary line in the eastern townships, and he spoke of barley raised on one farm and then on the other farm. Sir John Macdonald said in that case (and allow me to draw particular attention to the language used) the Canadian farmer paid the duty. But he did not insist for one moment that in every other case he did so, but it was only in that particular case where the barley on one side of the imaginary line was of equal value with that of the farmer on the other about side. Although in that case the Canadian producer; did pay the duty, yet that was no opinion on the part of the late Sir John A. Macdonald that Canadian producers paid the duty on barley grown in my own county, the County of Halton, or in Prince Edward, or in any other county in Ontario. But if we do wish to know who does pay the duty on barley, or on horses, or on other articles exported to the United States, I am willing to leave it to hon, gentlemen opposite. The hon, member for Cardwell (Mr. White) referred to a speech delivered some time ago by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)—a speech delivered, I think, in this I had not the pleasure of hearing it ; I am not aware I ever read it; but there was another speech delivered by that hon, gentleman that I have read, and I remember very well the day on which it was delivered. I believe it was delivered in the riding of Centre Wellington at a beautiful spot a short distance from Fergus, on a beautiful Saturday afternoon. Mr. Mills, according to a report in the Globe of 16th July, 1877, said:

"The Americans put a tax on our pease, while England admits them free. We received as much per bushel from the American buyer as we did from the British. The Americans put a tax of fifteen cents on each bushel of oats they imported, and yet we got as much from the United States as from England. Who paid the American tax? From 1854 to 1866 there was free trade in horses, and the average price received was given as follows:—

		1862
		1863
1858	79.07	1864	78.46
1859	84.77	1865	79.61

"Then reciprocity was repealed and a gradual increasing duty was imposed by the United States Government, with the following result:—

1866	$92.70	1871	$ 93.96
1867		1872	101.38
1868	82.11	1873	105.01
1869	82.97	1874	107.44
1870	87.97	1875	104.62

Mr. Mills concludes by observing that his figures establish:

"The incontrovertible fact that the duties imposed by the American Congress upon the produce of Canada do not fall upon the people of Canada, but are paid by the consumers of these articles in the United States."

He further said:

"Now, if the 20 per cent, duty on horses had been paid by the Canadian farmer he would have received smaller prices during the years protection was in force than he did during the years of reciprocity, but the fact was he received higher prices."

I feel it is unnecessary to dwell further on that subject, for such an opinion will receive weight in this House, and be of value to us in any action we may take with respect to reciprocity with the United States. I referred to the Hon. Jas. Young a short time ago, and I desire now to give his opinion. In 1877, in a letter to the Globe, Mr. Young said:

"It is fallacious to assume that the Canadian farmer pays all the duties on the horses, eattle, barley, &c., which are exported across the lines. For forty years the Liberal party has been taught differently, and demonstrations of Adam Smith, confirmed by all great living political economists, as well as by practical experience, clearly prove the contrary."

I leave this question, then, with hon, gentlemen, and I will proceed to touch on another matter which has been referred to-the subject of eggs. J find that in 1890 we exported to the United States 14,000,000 dozen of eggs. Under the McKinley Bill there is a duty of 5 cents a dozen, and we are told that it will be a great injury to our people. During the elections we were told that Canadian hens would have to give up laying, for it would be impossible to export eggs to the United States under the new tariff. But it is very remarkable that the price of eggs refuses to go down in this country, and we cannot to-day for our own table buy a single dozen at any lower price than 12 months ago. Where will the Americans obtain 14,000,000 dozen of eggs except from the people of this country? There is no doubt that the Americans prefer eggs coming from a northern climate, because they are of a better quality; they will give more for eggs from Canada because they receive a better article. Are the Americans going to do without eggs simply because a duty of 5 cents has been imposed? No; they will eat as many eggs as before and they will purchase them from somewhere. We were told that they would procure them from the Western States, but there is a difficulty in this, because in a new section of the country, where you have to go long distances from one village to another, where the settlements are sparse and the farms large, it would cost possibly 4 or 5 cents a dozen to collect eggs for shipment to a place like New York, whereas in the Province of Ontario, with our thickly-settled country, and our villages close to one another, as a matter of fact, and I know it from practical experience, eggs can be gathered for 1 cent a dozen for the purposes of shipment to the United States. Therefore, the difference in the cost of collecting eggs for the purpose of shipment to the United States between a thicklysettled province like Ontario and a thinly-settled country like the western states is equal to the whole duty. Hence, we need not be surprised at all that the price of eggs is equally as high to-day as References have been at twelve months ago. made in this House to a certain gentleman in the County of Huron: I need not mention his name, for it has been referred to different times, but I am well acquainted with that gentleman, and he is familiarly known as the egg king of Canada. I know that he does handle a very large quantity of eggs indeed, and his opinion at all times, when given candidly, would be valuable; but knowing that this same gentleman is a shrewd business man, it does not appear to me that after going to England, and spending three months enquiring into this matter of shipping eggs to Great Britain, he would come back and tell the people of this country, without discrimination and without hesitation, all the information that he had procural with reference to that industry. I am more inclined to the opinion that he would reserve that knowledge to himself, and that he would make the best use of it he possibly could in his own interest. But, Sir, I need not discuss this question further, because I can quote an opinion which an hon, gentleman on the other side of the House told us this afternoon was an invaluable opinion. That hon, gentleman gave us some quotations regarding eggs from the Globenewspaper, and he gave it as being a thoroughly reliable report, and something that should be accepted as evidence.

An hon, MEMBER, Hear, hear,

Mr. HENDERSON. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I shall give him some more of his own medicine. I shall give him a little more of his own evidence, and perhaps the hon, gentleman will again say "hear hear." In the Toronto Globe of the 7th October I read the following from its Washington correspondent :-

"This is the story that comes from northern New York: Canadian eggs have of late years found a ready market, and now that a duty of 5 cents per dozen is put on them the consumers are that much out without the slightest benefit to New York State producers. The consumers feel that the McKinley tariff is a little less than robbery, while the farmers who a few years ago thought such a measure would benefit them have been educated up to a point where they see that it is no benefit at all."

That is the opinion of the Globe newspaper with regard to the egg trade; that is the opinion that the hon, gentleman valued so much. The same article in the Globe newspaper contains the following reference to potatoes:

"Canadian potatoes would be a great boon to the people here if they could get them without paying a duty of 25 cents per bushel."

"For several days past Canadian-grown potatoes have been coming across the river at Ogdensburg, Morristown and Cape Vincent for use here. The price paid for them by the consumers is from 70 to 80 cents per bushel. Within a week it is predicted by the dealers the price will go up to 31 per bushel, and perhaps higher." to 31 per bushel, and perhaps higher.

This is the story that comes from northern New York, says the Globe correspondent. Hence the difference between the 70 and the 80 cents, and the $1 per bushel, is just the addition that will be made by reason of the additional tariff that had been imposed. In another part of this article it furnishes the same kind of evidence, and the writer in the Globe says:

"The big seed houses in Jefferson County have been doing their best to get in this season's crop of pease and beans before the new tariff wiped out the larger part of the profit of the business. For these concerns Canadian pease and beans are a necessity, because the varieties they cultivate and handle cannot be grown to advantage in New York State."

Mr. HENDERSON.

Here we see that they wanted potatoes in New York State, and that they had to bring them in from this country, and hence, as the Globe newspaper says, they were compelled to pay the duty upon them. I do not wish to detain the House at any greater length discussing these matters. I would just desire to say that under the National Policy the Government has been able to accomplish a great leal in the interest of the people of this country. They in the interest of the people of this country. have been able to strike off altogether the duties on many of the articles which are considered as the prime necessities of life. We remember years ago when the stamp duty was removed—a duty which was at least vexations to this country. Since then the Juty has been removed from tea, the duty has been removed from coffee, and the duty has been removed from sugar.

An hon, MEMBER. No.

Mr. HENDERSON. The hon, gentleman says "No," but he understands quite well that the duty has been absolutely taken off raw sugar; that sugar from No. 14 Dutch Standard and under is admitted absolutely free of duty. Raw cotton is free, wool is free, hides are free, and the duty on salt has been greatly reduced; so that I may say that every article which can be considered as one of the prime necessaries of life is admitted into this country to-day absolutely free of duty. What duty does the farmer pay on necessaries for his table, or on what he wears? What duty does he pay on his breakfast table, or dinner table, or supper table? His coffee is free, his tea is free, his sugar is free, his flour is free.

Some hon, MEMBERS.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, it is free, because he produces it himself from wheat grown on his own His beef is free because he produces it on his own farm, his pork is absolutely free-yes, and his eggs are free, for he does not require to pay 5 cents per dozen duty on them. His poultry is free, his potatoes are free, and his apples are free. What is it that the Canadian farmer requires upon which he has to pay a duty? Let us take the article of clothing, which would be regarded as among the prime necessities of life. For his ordinary wear of Canadian tweeds he has his clothing absolutely free, because the wool from which that clothing is made comes into this country free of duty. The clothing is made in Canadian factories. is manufactured by Canadian workmen, and the Canadian workmen buy the produce of the Canadian farmers, which is entirely free of duty. I say, again, that the Canadian tweed, if the Canadian farmer chooses to wear it, is absolutely free of duty. If farmers, as they can afford to do, desire to buy either broadcloth or foreign tweeds, then, like others, they pay the duty upon these goods; but the cotton goods of the farmer are free, his underwear is free of duty, his hat is free of duty, his boots and shoes are free of duty, because the raw hides are brought into this country free of duty; they are tanned by the Canadian tanners, the boots are made up by Canadians who live upon the products of the Canadian farmers, and wears the product of Canadian looms, all free of duty His carpets are free, unless he chooses to buy the better article; and so on. I contend that of the better article; and so on. prominent necessaries of life there is very little indeed that is not absolutely free to the great consuming classes of this country. But, Sir, as to the condition of the people of this country, I desire to close these remarks by citing one or two opinions. One of these is the opinion of the Hon. James Young, a Liberal of the Liberals, now, as he has always been, a Reformer, who, writing in the Globe newspaper in 1887, said:

"I do not believe that in the most favoured parts of the Union the masses of the people are wealthier, healthier or happier than in our noble Province of Ontario, whilst in the majority of states and territories their position is quite inferior to ours in almost every respect."

But I desire also to add another testimony which I know will be accepted by every hon, gentleman on the other side of the House. On the 1st of July last the Globe newspaper put on its holiday attire, and for one day at least it was able to speak well of this country, and this is what it said:

' If the fathers of Confederation could meet to-day and "If the fathers of Confederation could meet to-day and take stock of what has been accomplished they would find that the country has enjoyed a very considerable measure of material progress. A large railroad mileage has been built. The North-West has been opened for settlement. The scattered provinces are joined by two great political highways. The average of comfort among the people is higher than it was, and the individual wealth greater. The Dominion has successfully resisted some of the ailments which attack young countries. Most of those who cut a figure in 1867 have passed away, but there is no scarcity of light and leading. This and much else that is satisfactory might fairly be dilated upon by the artificers if they could return and see." by the artificers if they could return and see.

I think, Sir, that this opinion is sufficient to settle the question as to whether the people of this country are in better circumstances to-day than they were in past years. Now, just one word about the exodus, and I desire to be very briefbriefer than I intended to be. The New England States of Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut, are as favourably situated as are the older provinces of Canada—Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. They have their seaport towns, and they have equal facilities with this country for increasing their population by immigration; but what do we find? The census of 1890 shows that the State of Maine has only increased in the last ten years 175 per cent., the State of Vermont '02 per cent., and the State of New Hampshire 8:31 per cent. I also find that the rate of increase in other states during the past ten years has fallen short of the rate of increase in the previous ten years: in Ohio from 20 to 15 per cent., in Indiana from 18 to 11 per cent., in Iowa from 36 to 17 per cent., in Missouri from 26 to 23 per cent., in Michigan from 38 to 28 per cent., and in Illinois, Chicago not being included, from 15 to 15\frac{1}{2} per cent.; and the chief census commissioner of the United States attributes all this decrease to the decline in agriculture. The increase in the whole United States during the last ten years was simply 24 per cent. Now, I was surprised to find the hon, member for North Norfolk, in a speech delivered, I think, on the 6th of January last, in the city of Toronto, before the Young Men's Liberal Club, stating, and to hear him repeat the statement on the floor of this House, that had it not been for the exodus from this country to the United States the Dominion of Canada to-day ought to have a population of $,000,000 instead of The hon, gentleman could not have been aware that for this country to have a population of 8,000,000 would have necessitated our population increasing between 1880 and 1890 at the been heard of in any country; and why should we expect the population of the Dominion of Canada to increase at the rate of 80 per cent, when the population of the United States, during the same period, only increased at the rate of 24 per Now, I have made a comparison to show the relative increase in population which has taken place in the New England States and in the older provinces of Canada in the last fifty years. I find that fifty years ago the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut, had a population of 1,954,000; in 1890, according to the last census, their population had increased to 4,695,000, an increase of 2,739,000, equivalent to 140 per cent. Now, fifty years ago the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island had a population of 1,065,000; whereas to-day, making due allowance for the new provinces to the west, they have a population of 4.765,000, an increase of over 3.700,000, or 340 per cent., against an increase in the New England States of only 140 per cent. In other words, the old provinces of Canada, fifty years ago, had I.MM. (MM) less population than the New England States, and to-day they have 100,000 more, think that is a satisfactory showing for the Dominion of Canada as far as population is concerned. And now, Mr. Speaker, I desire not to detain this House any longer. In closing, let me say that Canada is a noble country. Canada has produced one of the greatest ornaments of the stage, Albani: Canada has produced one of the greatest scientists of our age, Sir William Dawson; Canada has produced one of the greatest statesmen of the 19th century, the Right Hon, Sir John A. Macdonald; Canada has a healthy climate: Canada produces hardy men and lovely women-you see them all around you; Canada has the largest territory of any country on the face of the globe; Canada has the longest rivers of any country on the face of the globe: Canada has the broadest expanse of fresh waters of any country on the face of the globe; Canada has the longest continuous line of railway of any country in the world; Canada has the largest wheat areas of any country in the world; Canada has the richest forests of timber of any country in the world; Canada has the richest mines of coal, iron, nickel, gold and silver-yes, and the most valuable fisheries of any country on the face of the globe; Canada has some of the best educational systems that are to be found in any country in the world; Canada belongs to the greatest empire on the face of the globe or that has ever existed; and Canada is ruled over by the most virtuous queen that has ever graced a throne. Who would not be a Canadian! Who would say ill of such a country?

Mr. MURRAY. After the prolonged discussion that has taken place on the Budget debate, I do not intend to weary the House by speaking at any great length. The hon, gentlemen who have spoken from this side have dealt so fully and ably with the subjects of the National Policy and unrestricted reciprocity that, indeed, I do not think there is anything left for me to say; but still, as one of the new members, representing an important constituency, I consider I would be derelief in my duty if I were to remain silent. So far as the rate of 80 per cent., an increase which has never question of reciprocity is concerned. I think that the arguments have been very well exhausted, and that, if I did nothing more than heartily endorse the opinions and sentiments which have been expressed so clearly on this side, and which have shown so conclusively the pernicious effects of the National Policy and the beneficial results that would follow unrestricted reciprocity, that would be quite sufficient. Those speeches have been so very convincing that they ought to carry conviction even to some of the ultra-Conservatives, the extreme party men on the other side; and, on the other hand, they ought certainly to win over to our side those hon. gentlemen opposite who are independent—and I should hope that some of them are independent, and that they are not at all slaves to party or feeders at the National Policy crib. Now I have listened attentively to the speeches of hon, gentlemen opposite, speeches which they prepared at great length and with which they occupied the time of the House for an hour, two hours, and three hours, and I have failed to see, in any of their arguments, why the people of this country were called upon at the last election to pronounce upon the policy of the Government. I failed to understand then, and have not discovered since, on what pretext the Government went to the country. I was led to believe, and the constituency I have the honour to represent was led to believe, that the Government were anxious for a treaty and disposed to effect a treaty, so far as the natural products of both countries are concerned; but I find, judging by the tenor of the speeches we have heard during this debate from hon, gentlemen opposite, that they are all directly opposed to any such treaty. Yet the gentleman who opposed me —that is, the Government candidate—stated clearly above board that the Government were negotiating a treaty of that kind and only appealed to the country to ascertain the sentiments of the people. He stated that the Government and their supporters were prepared to effect a treaty, so far as the natural products of both countries were concerned. I hold, Sir, that a great many gentlemen on the Government benches have been elected on that plea. I hold they have been elected because the people believed they were disposed to favour reciprocity in natural products, and I contend that the Government, in advising the Governor General to dissolve Parliament, did so prematurely and under false pretenses, since they are not now disposed, as far as we can judge, to enter into any treaty for reciprocity. There were three candidates in the field during my election-an independent and a Government candidate and myself. The independent candidate was in favour of closer trade relations with the United States. Now, if either of these hon, gentlemen had been elected instead of your humble servant he would have been bound to support a policy of closer trade relations with our neighbours; and I repeat, the Government, in asking His Excellency to dissolve Parliament, did so prematurely and I would like to know why on false pretenses. the House was dissolved? Can any hon. gentleman in this House tell, from the explanations given by the Government and their supporters, what the reason was for dissolving the House and calling us to sit here three or four months in the heat of summer? What could have been the object of the Government? It may be that these gentlemen well knew what was coming. Whether it was they dreaded that the tide was setting in favour of the Liberal policy or whether they dreaded the pointed out a little smokestack with half a dozen Mr. MURRAY.

revelations that have since taken place I cannot tell, but they appealed to the people and obtained a verdict on false pretenses. We have heard a great deal said about the National Policy and the great benefits done to the country by that policy. We have seen hon, gentlemen get up, one after the other, and endeavour to make it appear to this House and the country that the farmers are largely benefited by that policy. I represent a farming constituency, and I represent also lumbering interests. I have been connected with the various interests of the country, the lumbering, the farming, and other interests, for the last thirty years, having been a business man in the Ottawa section for the last thirty years, and having good opportunities for knowing the position of the farmers in that district. In 1878 I was a candidate for a seat in this House. Prior to that, we heard something about the National Policy, 1877, when the question was brought up in the then Parliament; but who ever heard of the National Policy before Confederation? Who ever heard anything of it during the first Parliament of Canada? What gave it birth? Is it not true that when the Mackenzie Government came into office they did so under adverse circumstances, and that general depression prevailed, not only in Canada but all over the world? And is it not true that the few manufacturers who approached the Government and wanted an increase of duty were told plainly by the Government of the day that that could not be done? Speaking on the question of duty, what was the case under the Mackenzie Government? The duty on imported goods was 15 per cent., and they raised it to 17½ per cent. Did not Sir Charles Tupper oppose that increase? Was he or the Conservative party then in favour of the National Policy? Nothing of the But the Conservative party, when they were undergoing sentence of punishment for their criminal conduct, conceived, with that ingenuity only criminals possess, this policy. They said: We will take advantage of the situation; we will go to the people and say we have a policy to protect the manufactures of the country. We will say to them: tax yourselves to support our manufacturers, and you will create home markets and make yourselves rich. The hon, member for Simcoe (Mr. Spohn) alluded to the promises then made, that manufactures would be created all over the country, that smokestacks would appear everywhere. Why, Sir, in the County of Pontiac, when I was a candidate, that was the argument used by our opponents. They said: Vote for the National Policy, go in for protection, and you will have home markets right at your doors, and smoke-stacks will take the place of your pine stumps. That was the plea on which they went to the farmers of the country; but have these pro-I say the National Policy mises been fulfilled? has not created the home markets which these gentlemen pretended. I have seen no evidence of it in the Ottawa valley. At the last election I appealed to the people again, and I was more fortunate than I was in 1878, when I went down with the dead men. Still, I was satisfied that the time would come when these men who succeeded then would be hurled out of office, and that time is fast approaching. I asked the people at the last election: Where are the smokestacks that were promised. They were nowhere to be seen. I logs around it, and I asked if that was an evidence no logical reasoning in that. of the beneficial results of the National Policy. I said: Compare your present condition with all you have done, with all the work you have given, man, woman and child, and is your position to-day relatively better than it was in 1878? I am sorry to say no great difference could be seen. The people of Canada were deceived, they were humbuggedif I may use the word—and to say that the farmer is benefited by this National Policy appears to me to be the grossest absurdity. The hon, gentleman who has just made an eloquent and able speech says that the very fact of the farmer having his land mortgaged is an evidence of prosperity. The thing is absurd. As a business man, if I hear that any of my customers has his land mortgaged I say: Good bye; your land is gone. Instead of the National Policy having been a benefit to the farmer it has been a curse. In 1878 I said to the farmers: If these gentlemen can show you that, by exacting from your pockets $1 in order to protect the manufacturer, you will get $1 back, or even a percentage of it, you may be right to vote for the National Policy. But what is the object of protecting the manufacturers? It is in order that these men may keep power, and the manufacturing interests are those that have helped to keep them in power. The National Policy has created monopolists and combinesters, who have made themselves wealthy at the expense of the country. I might go on at great length and show this House the effect of the National Policy; if I thought it necessary, I could show that this policy has been of no benefit whatever to the farmers, and that property has depreciated in value; no matter to what cause you may attribute it—there is the fact. The hon, gentleman who preceded me said that Canada was a great country, and he spoke of her lovely women, and so on. We will admit all that, but Canada has not prospered commensurately with the increase of our annual expenditure and our national debt. It has not prospered in the same proportion either in population or in wealth. I think we ought to see more evidence of general prosperity than we do if the country is such as we are requested to believe; but, as a business man and a merchant of over thirty years' standing, I must say that I never saw trade more stagnant than it is to-day, or the farming community in a worse condition. If we have all those advantages to which the hon, gentleman has referred, and if the National Policy has brought about these blessings, I say we should have greater evidence of prosperity than we now enjoy. The hon, gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to unrestricted reciprocity have charged the Liberals with being annexationists. When they have nothing else to say their newspaper organs charge us with being annexationists. I do not remember when any of our leaders signed an annexation manifesto or expressed annexation sentiments. We favour unrestricted reciprocity because we believe it would be in the best interests of both countries. We advocate that policy in the interests of the country, not in the interests of a party. Have we anything to gain as a party by being annexed to the United

We favour unrestricted reciprocity because we believe it will be beneficial to the country, and I think we have given sufficient reasons to show that. If we believed that annexation would benefit the country we would not hesitate to say so. Whenever we think annexation to the States will benefit this country morally, socially, financially, and in every other way, we will not hesitate to say so, but we like this country, we like the system of government under which we live, if we had only an honest Government, a Government which would carry on the affairs of the country economically. Hon. gentlemen say: If you had unrestricted reciprocity, where would you get revenue? Well, we will not require somuch revenue. I think the government of this country can be carried on very much more economically. We are over-governed altogether. For my own part, I think we should get rid of the Senate business, or have that body elected in some other way. I think it is a useless piece of Government machinery; it is the fifth wheel to a coach—a lot of gentlemen appointed for life simply because they are supporters of a political party. I do not care whether it is the Conservative party or the Reform party. They are appointed in many cases because the people refuse to elect them. I believe it is a wrong thing to have any of these gentlemen in the Government. Look at our Premier. He is not personally responsible to the people. The present Government had to take the Premier out of the Senate, and he has no responsibility to the people. I say that we could dispense with that institution. I say we could do away with half of the Civil Service. If we had unrestricted reciprocity we could remove many Customhouse officers, and we would only spend money on such public improvements as are actually required for the benefit of the country. Then we would not require the revenue which is now collected from the people on that account. Sir, we would do away with many other things. Look at the Franchise The Government have taken hundreds of thousands of dollars out of the pockets of the people to operate that most infamous Act. Was there any necessity for that Act? Did the people of this country ask for it? Did they petition for it? No, That Act was another piece of rascality, if it is not unparliamentary for me to say so; it was a most infamous and rascally act on the part of the Government, that cost the people of this country hundreds of thousands of dollars. Then we would do away with many other things; the Mounted Police have been mentioned, and many other large and unnecessary expenditures could be saved to the country. But, Sir, these gentlemen are in office, and want to keep an army of their friends employed at the expense of the people. Mr. Speaker, I contend that the record of the Conservative party, from what I know of it, is a bad record. I know something of the record of the Conservative party in 1872. I remember when the Hon. Edward Blake proposed to amend the Controverted Election Acts; he desired to make the election law as stringent as possible in regard to bribery, and I remember that the Government States? Hon, gentlemen opposite say that unrestricted reciprocity will lead to political union, and they say we will be gobbled up by the United Sir Hugh Allan's money to carry the elections, by States, as we are only a handful of people. If that is the case, what will we be as a party? There is been a candidate too often for my own interest. know how the Conservative party conducted elections at that time. I know that in the county I ran for they used money wholesale to bribe the electors; and not only that, but in some Conservative strongholds they actually took possession of the polls, and they voted everybody that was on the list, all absentees, living or dead-I was going to say men, women and children, and I might as well say it, because in one township where there were 668 voters the Conservative party polled 666. Well, Sir, I protested the election; I appealed to the House for fair play, and my petition was thrown out on a technicality. The partner of my opponent who defeated me was Speaker of the House, and he was the gentleman that threw out my petition. I said then that if the Conservative party were disposed to resort to such practices and to do such gross acts of injustice they were a party not worthy the confidence of the people of this country. Sir, look at the efforts of the Liberal party to adopt the ballot system. Did the Conservatives ever treat their opponents fairly and squarely in any election? I say they did not, unless they hoped to enjoy some undue advantage. Then they adopted their gerrymandering tactics, and the practice of "hiving the Grits," as Sir John A. Macdonald used to say, they did it in order to get the advantage of their opponents. Then they came to the Franchise Act, and then to this huge gigantic swindle, the National Policy, and they have been patching that up ever since. They tell us time and again that it has been endorsed by the people. I say it has not been endorsed by the people; I say the people have been unduly influenced by other means, but they have never endorsed the National Policy. If the Conservative party had faith in that National Policy, why resort to these other methods? Why not meet their opponents fairly and squarely on the merits of the question, on the merits of the National Policy? In one of my elections what did they do? The people of the town of Pembroke gave to the Canada Central Railway Company a bonus of $75,000, and they afterwards petitioned this Government to get relieved from the payment of that sum. They pleaded with the Government for three or four years, but the Government would pay no attention or entertain the petition, as we were informed on good authority. But on the eve of an election, I think it was in 1882, when I was a candidate for Parliament, Sir Charles Tupper sent a telegram to the Government candidate which was read at the first political meeting, and he said:

Now, Sir, was not that a piece of wholesale bribery? Could you call it anything else? I say if the Government had any faith in their National Policy, why endeavour thus unduly to influence the people at that particular time? Was it not most disgraceful? If they had any shame in them, would not they be ashamed? Would they not say: This is too glaring? Would they not say: We had better wait until after the election? No, Sir, they were afraid; they were afraid of their shadow, and they came to the rescue of the town of Pembroke. We do not thank the Government for coming to the relief of Pembroke. True, I, as a ratepayer in the town of Pembroke, benefited to a certain extent, and I was very glad of it. It was simply an act of justice, Mr. Murray.

but if it was just why did not the Government do it before? Why did they leave it to that particu-I say that such is the record of the lar time? Conservative party all through; this act was in keeping with their whole record. They may talk about the population of this country increasing. Why, Sir, hundreds of people have been leaving the country. On one occasion I saw on a train of the Pontiac and Pacific Junction Railway several families on board going to Minnesota. I asked them what they were leaving for; they said they could not make a living, they could not get cash for their products, they could not get anything to do, and so they were obliged to leave. I asked them where they were going; they said they were going to Minnesota. I said: "Do you expect to better your condition there?" They said "Yes," and pointing to another man on the train they said: "There is the gentleman we are going with; he is going to give us employment when we get there." These are facts that came under my own observation. I went to this gentleman and I said: "Are you taking these people to Minnesota with you?" I supposed they were voters; I did not know where they were going, and I had an idea of soliciting their votes, and I think I would have got them if they had remained. But unfortunately I found they were going to leave the country, and I lost their votes. This gentleman told me that he was going to give them all employment on his farm; he said he had employment for 15 or 20 hands and sometimes 25, for the whole year round. I said to him: "What kind of a farm have you got?" He said: "I have got a good farm." I asked: "What is land worth there per acre?" He said his land was worth $60 an acre. I asked him what he raised. He said he raised flax. I said: "Is flax profitable?" He said: "Yes; we grow flax very profitably." "But," I said: "How are these people going to get along?" "Well," he says, 'they can settle on land later on; they can get land always from $4 to $5 and $7 an acre." "Even then, how are they going to pay for these lands?" He said: "One or two good seasons of flax will pay for the land." Now, Sir, there is a fact that came under my own observation. I say, with regret, that our people are leaving us too rapidly, and we have not sufficient inducements held out to them

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Would the hon. gentleman give me the name of the party that was taking them away?

Mr. MURRAY. The hon, gentleman asks me the names of the parties?

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). No; I asked the name of the party that was taking them away, upon whose lands they were going to work. And afterwards, will he tell me where they were to be settled on land?

Mr. MURRAY. Does the hon. gentleman doubt my word?

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I do, most decidedly.

Mr. MURRAY. Does the hon, gentleman doubt my veracity? I think the hon, member for Algoma is personally acquainted with me. He knows a little of my history as a public man, and I do not think he has ever known me to tell a direct falsehood.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Not at all.

Mr. MURRAY. I think that is what he charges and do them simple justice. me with. I was giving a fact that came under my personal observation, where farmers in the Township of Leslie

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Give me thename of the individual that took these men away. I have known the hon, gentleman for many years. I asked the name of the individual.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that

I have riled the hon. gentleman. Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). No; you have not-Mr. MURRAY. I am very sorry that he doubted my statement. I am also very sorry that I cannot | give him the particular names of those people. can assure the hon, gentleman that I am prepared to back up my statement with further evidence. I can assure the hon, member for Algonia (Mr. Macdonell) I have no object in belittling my country, that I am as good a Canadian as he is. I am a native Canadian, and brought up in Canada as well as born in it. I have the honour to stand within 20 miles of where I was born; I am standing in my native County of Carleton, and I would not say one word to belittle my country. I have given as much evidence as has the hon, gentleman of my faith in the future of my country. Anyone who knows my history as a business man in the Ottawa valley knows that I have shown as much faith as he or any other hon, gentleman in the future of this country. I have given substantial evidence of my faith. I have endeavoured to develop the trade and resources of the country, and I have spent every dollar I have made in this country. am a Canadian pure and simple, in every sense of Not only have I spent here every the word. dollar I could make, but I have risked my credit. I feel, therefore, all the worse to see the country in its present position. I feel for my country and formy countrymen. I know that we have a healthy climate, rich resources in forests, minerals and fisheries and fur-bearing animals, and that our agricultural resources are very great indeed. But I contend that agriculture and every industry is taxed to death. I say that this country is neglected. Many portions of Ontario and Quebec are neglected and do not receive aid for railways, while large amounts of money are given to wild-cat railways and to building canals that are for the benefit of favourites and supporters. There is a great deal of money wasted in that way by the Government of the day. There was money wasted in my On the Culbute Canal $500,000 own county. were sunk, which might as well have been thrown into the river. The canal was projected to help a Government supporter, and money has been thrown away. This is the case there as well as throughout the Dominion. The credit of the country was given a few evenings ago to a railway that may be very deserving, but is not deserving compared to other railways. Take the County of Pontiac. We have the Pontiac and Pacific Junction Railway, unfinished, as is known, that got a small Dominion subsidy; besides people have had to tax themselves over $100,000, or, including interest, $160,000. A deputation came here to interview the Government on the subject and ask the Government to relieve the county under the circumstances, and the late Premier, here associated with our old leader, the Hon. Sir John Macdonald, said the matter would be Alexander Mackenzie. I am sorry to say that fairly considered. I trust the Government will through physical debility he is not as he used to be,

If they to the relief of that road, then we will say they are doing the right thing, especially at this moment, when justice should be done to the county. I trust the Government will not overlook such an enterprise as that, but will give further aid to that very deserving enterprise. In doing that they would help to keep the people in the county who are now leaving it. We have a large territory in the county yet undeveloped, and it would afford a stimulus if we obtained a little assistance to help to construct the road as far west as possible. There is another enterprise that I think should be assisted in order to keep the people in Ontario and Quebec. There is a large section undeveloped between Mattawa, North Bay and Sudbury, and north to Nippissing towards James' Bay. We have the Nipissing and James' Bay Railway, which has obtained a bonus form the Ontario Government for the first 50 miles of $150,000. believe they have applied here for a subsidy to carry the road to Temiscamingue. It is perhaps the best wooded country in the Dominion, being rich in pine, birch and hemlock. The hon, member for Simcoe (Mr. Spohn) referred to tanneries, being established where there is hemlock. There is room there for hundreds of tanneries and for factories of different kinds to manufacture the raw material of the lumber into doors and other articles. We have some of the best belts of land in the province, and the reports of the surveyors show we have a large tract at the head of Lake Temiscamingue that is capable of settling millions of people. That country is altogether overlooked, and unfortunately we see train-loads of people pass near it every day. The trains from Boston to Sault Ste. Marie carry hundreds of immigrants through here to settle in the United States. If they were going to settle in some part of Canada or in the North-West it would be all right; but these people who pass through might be kept here, for this country would meet their requirements—but the Government overlook it. Are they waiting until that country is made an electoral district and sends a supporter? If they are going to wait that long I think they will fail. speaking of the agriculture of Ontario and Quebec, what is the position of those provinces in this House at the present time? Do we not stand here with a majority from the two great agricultural provinces of the Dominion?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Yes. I challenge the hon. gen-Mr. MURRAY. tlemen to look at the very first vote given, and they will find that the united vote of Ontario and Quebec gave a majority in favour of the policy of the Liberal party. I think we had a majority of three or four votes. What does that go to show? It shows that the great agricultural provinces of Canada are in favour of unrestricted reciprocity. I will say, in conclusion, that I am glad to be here to have an opportunity of meeting my opponents, and to be with my friends in advocating the policy. which they believe will tend to the best interests of the people. I am proud, Sir, to be here to be a supporter of the Liberal party; I am proud to be here associated with our old leader, the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. I am sorry to say that yet fairly consider the position of the county but notwithstanding that, we honour and revere him, and the people of the constituency which sends him here are a credit to their country. I am proud to see associated with him some of his old colleagues -for instance, his Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright), perhaps one of the best-abused men in Why is it that the other side abuse that Canada. hon, gentleman? Has he committed any political crime; is it because there is a single blemish on his character? No, Sir, but it is because they know well he is an able man. They say, because he has gone to Boston and attended a board of trade banquet there, and met very distinguished men, that he is an annexationist and supports annexation. Have we seen anything in his utterances to that effect? No, Sir, we have not. Conservative and Reformer alike, in this country, ought to be proud that we have in Canada a man who can go there and be spoken of as the Americans speak of him, a man on whom the press of the United States have conferred the highest eulogiums. I am glad, too, that we have the Hon. Mr. Laurier as our leader to-day. We did not object to the Hon. Alex Mackenzie because of his nationality or religious views: we stuck to him as true Liberals, because he was an honest man: we stuck to him on account of his honesty of purpose, and because he was a patriot and a man who loved his country, and tried to do the best for her. That is the reason we were loyal to Hon. Alex. Mackenzie, and for the same reason we will stand loyally by the Hon. Wilfred Laurier. We admire our leader as a Canadian, irrespective of whether he is a Frenchman or an Irishman or a Scotchman. We are proud of him as a Canadian, and I hope the day is not far distant when he will be the Premier of this country, and when he will have his hon. friend to his left as Finance Minister, and other able men around him in his Cabinet. When the day comes that the Hon. Wilfred Laurier is Premier, confidence will be renewed among the people of this country; they will take fresh courage, they will have something to live for and to hope for; but at present, even the friends of the Government in power are ashamed of their own leaders. They know very well that they cannot redeem themselves; they may stick to one another here; they may stick to the huge white elephant of the National Policy as long as he has a limb to stand on, but if we, the Liberals, were today in their position-no, we would not like to be in their position; I would rather be in the position which we occupy ourselves—I say that if we, the Liberals, were in the position in which the Government is to-day we could not hold together for twenty-four hours, because there would not be a man with the slightest sense of honour who would stand by us; and we would not expect them to do it in the face of the revelations that have been But, Sir, what is to come? That is stion. Now, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I the question. have been a little harsh, and perhaps I have spoken with too much feeling, but, Sir, I could not help it. I think that these gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches have been imposing upon the people of the country too long; they have burthened and taxed the people of this country, and the people are awakening to the sad condition of affairs. We wish that the people of Canada should be educated as to the true situation, and I think they are getting pretty well educated, to their cost. These gentlemen have said that if they had ten days longer before the election we are chosen, Sir, as a balance wheel to the somewhat Mr. MURRAY.

would not have a corporal's guard. We know that the last ten days is the time when the Tories get in their work; they go around to the electors and wake them up at night; that is the time they use the boodle; we know very well how they do it, but I challenge them to go to the country now.

An hon, MEMBER. We will do it in good time.

Mr. MURRAY. Why did you not wait until after the census; why did you not wait for the regular life of Parliament; why did you not wait until you had a proper voters' list; why did you not wait until the people of Canada had an opportunity of pronouncing on your National Policy? You were afraid to do so, and you prematurely dissolved Parliament and snatched a verdict from the people at a time which you thought was best suited to yourselves. I must apologize to the House for speaking so long.

Some bon. MEMBERS. Not at all; go on.

Mr. MURRAY. I do not think it would be fair to hon, gentlemen who want to follow me. It is nearly twelve o'clock, and I believe there will be I believe that we are all a division to-night. anxious now to have a vote taken as early as possible, and I shall say nothing further than to thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House, for the kindness with which you have listened to my address.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Mr. Speaker, the hon, gentleman who has just taken his seat is undoubtedly an old friend of mine, and when we begin to talk politics in the constituency that he lives in, and the constituency that he at present represents, it brings back to my mind some very peculiar reminiscences for the last fifteen or twenty-, five years. Now, Sir, the first attack that I notice by the hon. gentleman from Pontiac (Mr. Murray) made was one on the honesty of the Government. It is not for me to stand here and defend the Government, because the hon. gentlemen who compose the Ministry are perfectly able and willing to take care of themselves; but when that debate comes up in this House we will have an opportunity to show that greater scandals existed among the party to which the hon. member for Pontiac now belongs. We will show, Sir, that when their Government was in power-

An hon. MEMBER. You will, in your mind.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). We will show you in your mind, and we will show you practically as well, that scandals generated in the Liberal party. We will show you that scandals generated during your five years of power, and they were scandals that could not be allayed even by members of the Government; and we will show you, further, that very many members of your Government were implicated in these scandals. That is a debate that is going to come up in this House later. It is not for me to defend the Government now against the accusations made by the hon, member for Pontiac (Mr. Murray), but we will discuss the whole thing later on, and show you where you were wrong. Now, Sir, the Senate is attacked. Well, as I always understood, the Senate is a very respectable congregation of individuals—gentlemen in the country who are chosen not only for their intellectual, but for their financial standing. They erratic legislation that is liable to take place in organization and become efficient soldiers. this House. We have an example, and a very good brought that matter to the notice of the hon. example indeed. The House of Lords in England Minister of Militia, and he would have been may remedy the hasty legislation of the House of very glad to meet my views if he could; but, Commons, and if it is not wise and judicious, unfortunately, this honourable House, both sides those older and more experienced gentlemen of it—the other side was worse than this side who compose that House, quietly put their big feet down and stop it. Now, Sir, the Franchise amount of money for that purpose. But I do Act has been attacked by my hon, friend from not think anything would be gained to this coun-Pontiac. Fortunately for him he lives in or rather! represents a Quebec constituency. If he lived in Ontario as I do, he never would say one word against the Franchise Act, because a greater iniquity was never perpetrated on the people of Ontario, than the Provincial Franchise Act that we have in force there. The Dominion Franchise Act is the fairest occasion to deal with some of the gentlemen on the that ever existed in Ontario. I have spoken other side who belong to the volunteer force, and before on this subject, and what I have said has not been contradicted, even by the very fluent themen who wear a sword and swagger in the member from the adjoining county to that of my Queen's uniform. Now, Sir, when I interrupted my member from the adjoining county to that of my hon, friend from Pontiac. What I say is that so many electors are disfranchised by the Ontario Franchise Act that the Dominion Act qualifies the voters to vote in the unorganized districts.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). You can say "hear, hear," but I am proud to reiterate the statement questioned by the hon, gentleman who has assumed so many facial changes in this House since I came here, that I did not know him when he moved from his seat in the corner and came over here. Sir, the Dominion Franchise Act enables men to vote in the unorganized districts of Algoma, and no doubt also in the unorganized districts in Quebec, who could not possibly have a vote otherwise, and, consequently, I say it is a good Act. Now, it has been said that the railway vote in my district can elect any man who is set up to be elected for the Dominion House. Sir, I repudiate with scorn any such assertion. My friend of the facial changes laughs, but I can laugh because I am the winner; you are the loser; and I can say that only for the Dominion Franchise Act not one of these men in the unorganized districts of Algona would have had an opportunity to cast his vote at the last election; and, Sir, they did it intelligently. whom do you suppose they cast their votes? For a good Tory, and more than that, their votes accumulated to such an extent that that Tory came down to this House with a majority of nearly 450, a respectable majority too, a majority not to be despised. When the Franchise Act is attacked, it is like going into my own house and there with a club: seeking to "lambaste" me all around my own house. Now, Sir, my hon. friend from Pontiac has suggested that we might cut down the expenditure on the militia by nearly one-half. That is not an origi-nal idea of his. I have heard the same suggestion from the hon, member for North Norfolk in one of his campaign speeches, when he was suggesting the means for remedying the deficiency in the revenue that was going to result from unrestricted reciprocity. When the hon, gentleman mentioned that to-night I was reminded of a circumstance that occurred a short time ago in my own district. There the volunteers, scattered over an extent of country probably 1,500 miles in length, wanted to be brought into camp—not the Grit camp, as represented on the left side of the Speaker, but brought into camp where they would perfect their drill and here. Sir, under the Dominion system, the ballot

Minister of Militia, and he would have been amount of money for that purpose. But I do not think anything would be gained to this country by depriving the volunteers, the defenders of this country, of the necessary amount of money to enable them to perfect themselves in the exercise of the evolutions, and the drill, and the parade, that they should have to make them good soldiers. But, Sir, before I get through to-night I will have I will show wherein consists the loyalty of the genhon, friend from Pontiac, I did so conscientiously and honestly in order to specify an individual who told him a certain thing. As I understand debate in this House, when an individual makes a statement an hon, gentleman may take exception to it. It is not that I take exception to the broad statement; but I, as a plain individual, accustomed to deal with people who state straightforwardly and honestly what they believe, asked the hon. gentleman to give me the name of the party who told him that those people were passing by the doors and flocking away from the constituency he belonged to, and going off to another land. think that I was perfectly justified in asking for the name of the individual. The hon, gentleman did not give me the name of the individual, but he simply asked if I doubted his state-Well, as he is a railway contractor, like myself, I am inclined to take his statement cum grano salis. The hon, member for Pontiae (Mr. Murray), and I am sorry to be obliged to score an old chum, because, if my recollection serves me aright, at one time he belonged to the same party to which I have now the honour to belong, but there is this difference, that I did not change, whereas he did. I find in after years, as the tide of life flowed in upon the hon. gentleman, that he sought greater distinction that we in the old days dreamed of. He became the sheriff of the county. He occupied that very high position where it is incumbent on any individual to put the noose around the neck of the criminal. I never attained that dignity. I cannot hope to attain that dignity as long as the Mowat Government is in office in On-But the hon, gentleman did more than tario. He found, during the last contest, that very many influences were brought to work to elect members in different parts of the Do-minion. Among others, our hon, friend who has just spoken, levanted; he flitted, as it were, from the county to which he belonged, and he meandered across the Ottawa River and sought election at the hands of a strange electorate. Now, the ballot system has been scored-by the hon. gen-Well, the ballot system in the Dominion is certainly an honest system, and I really wonder that the hon, gentleman, who has been a member of the Local House in Ontario, and who knows the iniquities that are perpetrated under the Ontario system, should have ever mentioned the matter is secret, as it was intended originally it should beand as it always will be, unless the law should be changed; and, as we are advancing, not backward, but forward, the ballot system cannot retrograde. A man can step to-day into the booth and cast his ballot for the candidate, and the deputy returning officer or poll clerk or scrutineer cannot know how he voted. I will not detain the House with explaining how the hon, gentleman was elected in Ontario: but it is a most iniquitous system, the iniquity of which has been pointed out to the Ontario Government often, but has not been remedied to this day. I maintain, without fear of contradiction, that the system of the ballot in the Dominion is a better system than that which exists in Ontario to-day. The hon, gentleman has laid himself open to many criticisms, and I feel sorry to be obliged to score him, because, leaving his politics out of the question, the hon, gentleman is a very decent fellow to meet, and all that, for the harmony of the thing and with jolly good fellows; but with regard to the increase of population, I can only say that in the district I have the honour to represent, if the population has not doubled in the last ten years, I am prepared to resign my seat in this House and go back to the electorate and ask for their vindication of it. But instead of the district I have the honour to represent decreasing in population, it has doubled, and I hope as a good, loyal, true and honest Canadian that it has trebled in population in the last ten years, and I venture to say when the returns are brought in, if it has not trebled, at least it ought to be doubled. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman to give us the name of the individual who was so fresh as to state to him in his constituency where all these people were going. He did not do that, and, consequently, I can have very little more to say on that subject, but will draw the attention of the House to a subject intimately connected with the hon, member for Pontiac, and not only for Ponctiac, but the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) who has so eloquently discoursed on the iniquities of the individuals who took part in the Dominion elections. Sir, there is a most peculiar fact connected with our elections in Ontario as well as those in the counties of Quebec adjoining Ontario or the sparsely settled counties. There is a fund there which is called the Government roads fund. A verv peculiar feature of this fund is that to this day in the district I have the honour to represent no individual has been able to find out how that money was expended. But we have an idea, and a very good idea, and I trust in time we will be able to get to the bottom of this system. The idea expressed by certain individuals is this, that if $1,000 is to be expended in a certain part of the district, at least $500 of this has to go into the pouche of the individual manipulating the grant. The result is that certain men are employed and certain individuals are paid for their time, and the consequence is that in almost every portion of the unorganized part of Ontario, instead of the money going to improve the roads, as intended by the electorate, it goes into the hands of individuals who have been convicted of the most outrageous bribery and corruption. Within the last few days I have had occasion to read the evidence in regard to the East Algoma election petition, a petition which was must be probably a country storekeeper, and when brought against the return of a member for the he undertook to dilate upon the duties taken off Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma).

Ontario Legislature. Certain individuals say that local politics have nothing to do with us here. They are all one party, and I think that has a great deal to do with us here. It shows the bribery and corruption which exists among those officials whereby at times they can corrupt the electorate and subvert their wishes and return a member here as well as for Ontario who is not the choice of the honest electors. I find that an election took place on the 5th June, 1890, in the district I have the honour to represent in this House. At that election the honest electorate returned to the Legislative Assembly in Toronto a gentleman who was above reproach. The election was immediately protested, and by whom do you suppose it was protested? Was it by the honest electorate of the district? No, it was by the Ontario Government officials, and one of them swore that he had mortgaged-not his own farm, he did not own anything-but his wife's farm, for $500, in order to put it up as part of the deposit. The license inspector and the license commissioners also went down with money in their pockets to make up the $1,000 necessary for the protest. The case came to trial. Mr. Justice Osler and Mr. Justice Ferguson met there a few weeks ago, heard all the charges made in regard to that election, and then they complimented the boodling Conservative, the boodling Tory, upon the purity of the election which took place in Eastern Algoma. The judges then proceeded to investigate the charges against the boodling Grit candidate in Western Algoma, and their decision is reserved till the 5th September, with what result the House will probably see if our friends opposite will not draw a short bow and let us go away from here, and will not indulge in such terribly long speeches.

Mr. CASEY. What are you doing now?

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I am speaking to a question. I am not like a gentleman opposite who rejoices in the sobriquet of "Ananias" or another gentleman who has the sobriquet of "the Scavenger," and I am determined that I will make my voice heard in this House, no matter what hon. gentlemen may say. It afflicts my heart to hear them talking that way. I have a soft spot for the gentleman who has just asked me what I am doing, and he will hear from me later. This debate has assumed a very wide range.

Mr. MULOCK. I should say so.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). What is that you say, Mr. North York? I will give you a dose the first thing you know.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Order.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I do not want anyone to post me, Mr. North Brant. This subject has assumed a very wide range, but before proceeding to discuss the question itself, I wish to refer to what the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Allan) has said.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Give us facts.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). We will give you facts, all you want, before we get through with you, and you will be sorry you asked for them. the hon, member referred to this sugar question, I supposed he was a great sugar refiner. I thought he must be a little more than a candy baker, but before he concluded I thought the hon. gentleman from sugar by the Finance Minister and the present Government, I thought the hon. gentleman was in very deep water. And there is no doubt he was, because that is a subject which requires very careful handling and very careful consideration. I find hon, gentlemen will discuss any tion at all, whether they understand it or ducts and the manufactured articles of the two countnot. The sugar duties are matters of very great importance to the country and require a great deal of consideration, but, being an humble individual in the ranks of this party. I would never take upon myself the responsibility of dilating upon the sugar I find it is a fact, and it is one acceptable duties. to the country, that the Government have reduced the duty on sugars by three millions and a-half, and that is sufficient for me and for my people whom I have the honour to represent in this House. The hon, gentleman went further and made a bold statement which lacks truth. You say you cannot call in this House an individual, or what you call an hon, gentleman, a falsifier, or say that he does not tell the truth. I have been accustomed to use the plain unvarnished English, and when a man states what you know is not the truth, you simply call him a l-i-a-r. When you find an hon, gentleman who preceded the member for Pontiac (Mr. Murray), who came I think from one of the Essexes, stating that the cotton mills are partially shut down-

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Some of them are shut up altogether.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algonia)--I say he is stating what is not true.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I rise to a point of order. The hon, gentleman says I am stating what is not true. I say that one of the largest cotton mills in Canada to-day, in the town where I live, is closed up.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). The hon. gentleman who has just spoken was not the individual -I was going to say the hon. gentleman-but he is not the individual who made the assertion. Well, Sir, yesterday I came from a town where the cotton mills are in full blast, and I saw on the streets of that town the boys and the girls who were working in that mill, parading the streets in the evening, well dressed, respectable and wellto-do, and these factories are running, not half time, but full time. Now, after dealing with the frivolous arguments that have been presented by the other side, let us come down to the solid arguments of this debate. Now, what are they? hon, gentleman from South Oxford has moved an amendment. What does that amendment contain? Sir, it appears to me a good deal like an old friend rigged up in new clothes; it appears to me a good deal like what we understood during the late political contest to be the policy of the opposite side of the House; it appears to me to be this: That the National Policy, according to their idea of things, was a failure, and the hon. gentleman has moved a catch amendment to it. in the district I have the honour to represent. We have vast industries; we have all the industries that the hon, gentleman from South Oxford spoke about in his amendment. We have the mining industry, we have the agricultural industry, we have the fishing industry, and we have the labouring classes. Now, what is the object of the amendment? The object appears to be to enable the party opposite to go forth to the country and say to the bear with me, because every individual knows electorate that the present Dominion Government was not prepared to reduce the duties upon articles used by these agricultural classes. It goes a little further than that: it provides that the freest interchange shall take place between the Dominion of Canada and the United States in the natural prories. Now, Sir, that brings us to the old question, that brings us to the discussion that took place upon the hustings of the Dominion of Canada, by the two parties previous to the 5th of March, and what was the result after the discussion took place? The result was that to this House was returned a majority sufficient to carry on the affairs of the country. and not only that, but a majority larger than the great Liberal-Conservative party had when they were returned to power in 1887. Now, when we look at the resolution before the House, we can only consider what the electorate of Canada is pre-Well, I will pared to say to that resolution: speak of my own district, a very large one, the greater Ontario, if I may so call it-because the other is the lesser Ontario-a district that is at least 1,200 miles in extent, a district that has natural facilities for hundreds of thousands of honest and willing labouring men, a district capable of receiving the exodus that has been pointed out by hon, gentlemen opposite; and if they were honest in their contention they would say, whenever that exodus comes up, that we have a district large enough to absorb all that exodus. We have a district therecomposed of lumbermen, of miners, of agriculturists, of railway men and fishermen. Sir, the fishing industry is probably one of the largest in that whole vast district. We have there a district capable of absorbing all the surplus population of the Dominion of Canada, where they can find good wages, and where, if they have come with an honest purpose and with the intention of settling, there is not a man who need go away without having made money, and done what is right by himself and the people that have sent him there. Sir, we have in that district probably the finest agricultural land that lies outdoors in this great Dominion of Canada. That district, I am sorry to say, is not sufficiently known, it ought to be better known, and for that reason it requires my voice to be raised in the halls of the nation to plead to the gentlemen on the other side of the House not to send their surplus population to the United States, but to let them come to us and we will take care of them and we will do well by them. In the eastern part of that district there is a vast Island 100 miles long by 40 miles wide. A short time ago it was described in one of the geographies of the Ontario Government, authorized to be used by the children of Ontario, and what do you suppose was the description of that vast district? Sir, that is a district in itself larger than half a dozen counties in the Province of Ontario. How do you suppose that the Education Department of Ontario described that vast district? It says: The Manitoulin Island is 16 miles long, principally inhabited by Indians. That was the statement, the broad statement, that went forth to the children of the Province of Ontario who are living east of that vast district. Well, Sir, that Island, instead of being about 16 miles long and principally inhabited by Indians—and if I weary the House with a little explanation of this kind, I trust they will that to the heart of a man who has made a certain country his own, that country is dear, and consequently he can but say what he believes to be best in the interest of that country. That country is my home. The more settlers that come in there, the greater my prosperity; and which to run the province. Their resources are the greater the prosperity of every individual limited, but out of our mines they exact an inwho has the courage, and the manliness, and the creased amount of money from every acre of land hardihood to leave his home in the east and come which has been taken up there, and, in the next to make a home for himself in the west. Now, Sir, that Island is possessed of land that I would venture to say-as I have had an opportunity to travel over it—it is such as that any farmer in the Province of Ontario will be glad to go and cultivate. I have known there farmers who have raised crops that would astonish the old farmers in Ontario; I have known them to raise crops that would astonish the best agriculturists in the Province of Quebec. Although the wheat-fields lie to the west of us, we have a heritage that is not to The hon, member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) be despised, we have a heritage there that is second spoke in regard to the fisheries of that to none in this great Dominion of Canada, as I will district. proceed to show a little later on. If we cannot of the raise wheat such as Manitoba raises, we can raise at least other products that bring the very highest prices in the markets of the land; and why should we shout for unrestricted reciprocity? Adjoining that vast Island that has the greatest capabilities, we have along the shore of Lake Huron a country not to be despised. We have pleasant We have pleasant valleys and running brooks, the very best agricultural land it is possible to find under the sun. We have a country settled by a prosperous and happy people. We have a people there that has not yet recognized the "blue ruin" tirade preached through the lesser Ontario. The "blue ruin" was to a certain extent preached there, but it was ineffectual, because our people are happy, prosperous and well-to-do and satisfied with their lot. But we have vast districts of land there, and all we require are settlers to come in and settle our agricultural and arable land and make it a grand fertile country, and I venture to say that this will be equal to any county in Ontario. It is not only the agricultural land on which our people depend for a living. We have there the greatest gift that the Lord in his bounty has bestowed on mankind. We have in the hills that adjoin that agricultural district the greatest deposit of minerals that can be found in Canada, and not only in Canada, in North America but in the world. I see the hon, member for Pontiac (Mr. Murray) laughs, but he is one of the individuals who has benefited by being a speculator in that district. This is a very common thing to laugh at the expressions of those who have the welfare, prosperity, and happiness, and well-being of their people at heart, but it is another thing to accomplish beneficial results. Hon, gentlemen may laugh, but many have been glad to benefit by a small investment that has returned them more than a hundred fold. From Sudbury west to Port Arthur, and even west of that, the mineral portion of our country lies. We have there minerals that the Lord has deposited in the hills.

day. We have vast deposits of iron that by the expenditure of a small sum any individual may take up, notwithstanding the obnoxious mining law of the Ontario Government, that contemptible law by which the mileh cow has to furnish the money with place, they exact from all mines, under this Mining Act, a royalty. The consequence is that the capitalists, not from the United States, to which hon, gentlemen opposite would wish us to look, but the solid capitalists that send their money here for permanent investment become scared. They say, how do we know that Mowat is not going to do as Mercier did? These two men, without doubt, have influenced the mining capital of the world and have prevented them coming here to develop our mines. No hon, gentleman has any idea fisheries of the district to which I belong. We have a lake coast of 1,500 miles. The Minister of Marine has taken every precaution that good and judicious administration could devise in preserving those fisheries, not for the present fishermen so much as for future generations. But if the fisheries of Lake Superior, Lake Huron and the Georgian Bay are going to become a permanent industry, a complete revolution should take place in the administration as it exists at present. The fishermen who come from the constituency of the hon, member for Lambton are prepared to deplete our fisheries when they have an opportunity. They come there temporarily, and as soon as the fisheries are depleted they take up their nets and go away. The experience heretofore has been this. In Lake Ontario the fisheries today are practically depleted; in Lake Huron and Georgian Bay the fisheries are to a great extent depleted, but to-day we have the finest fisheries on the continent of North America in Lake Superior, and those fisheries should be, and they are being, protected by the wise and judicious administration of the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I have spoken of the mining, fishing and agricultural advantages of the district I have the honour to represent. If I went with a hypocritical tear in my eye to the agriculturists of that district and asked them to send me to this House as their representative, I would have failed. I do not know exactly whose supporter I was going to The leader of the Opposition was ostensibly the leader, but there was another perambulating the Province of Ontario, the "blue ruin" knight from South Oxford; he went through the country and had a good deal to say about the fad that was being discussed by the electors at that time. If I had gone to those people with a hypocritical tear in my eye, as gentlemen did in other parts of Ontario, I doubt very much if I could have got a corporal's guard, and I am satisfied I would not have had the honour to stand on this floor and address those who have listened to the rambling words that fell from the lips of a Western Highlander. There are a few things to be discussed Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Hon. members with reference to the fad proposed by gentlemen may laugh, but they go there to make money when they fail in the east. We have gold, silver, nickel, member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) is smiling, and he

I am just on the hunt for game of that kind, but I stituency of South Essex, it was represented to the will not say anything if he keeps quiet. I did not farmers that just as soon as the election was over, go to my constituency with a hypocritical tear in just as soon as it was decided that the Reform my eye, as many hon, gentlemen opposite did to the party was in power, all the farmers had to do was agricultural communities in their constituencies, to cross over to Detroit and sell their products free I have explained that my constituency is a vast of duty. To such an extent did that absurdity go, and varied one, the productions are as vast and that on the 6th March last, a day fatal to the various as the soil and climate, and I represent party that sits to your left, Mr. Speaker, some of people of different nationalities, different tastes the farmers in that constituency loaded their and different pursuits. Hon, gentlemen on the waggons and started to sell their hay until they other side represent themselves as friends of the were overtaken by the Customs officers in the farmers. I only know of one hon, gentleman in streets of Detroit. They believed what they were this House who invaded my district, and I think he only addressed a mining community, but he did not say one word to them about the Mining Act passed by the Ontario Government. However, he said in this House, that if it were not for that law I probably would not have got a majority in Sudbury. Let me tell that hon, gentleman that in going through that vast district of over 10,500 miles, and during three months of a canvass, I never once attacked the Ontario Mining Act. have yet to hear from the opposite side of the House a definition of their policy of unrestricted reciprocity, which is our old friend commercial union arrayed in new clothing. I have yet to hear a definition of that policy from the so-called leader of the Opposition. He has sat there in his seat during this discussion from the 23rd of June until the present day, and he has never given us a detail of his policy. We, on this side of the House, are in favour of a fair measure of reciprocity; but, Sir, unrestricted reciprocity, such as gentlemen on the other side of the House seem to understand it, the country wants none of it; and for this reason. the district that I represent, the farmers produce beef and pork, and I have seen them receive on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway $5.50 per hundred weight for pork, and $6 for beef. When you talk unrestricted reciprocity to these hard-headed farmers, they simply say that it means taking off the duty on beef and pork, and letting in the beef free of duty from the prairies of Montana and Ohio to undersell them in the Canadian They do not want the rattle-snake pork from the west to come into their district and compete with them. It might suit some of the lumbermen, it might suit the member for Pontiac (Mr. Murray) or the member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), but it does not suit the people whom I represent, and they are too sensible to be carried away by an absurdity of that kind. Now, Sir, during the contest in my district, unrestricted reciprocity was placed very unfairly before the people; it was placed just as unfairly before them as it was placed before the people of Ontario, and, Sir, I will say this: Had the people of Ontario been educated up to the absurdity of the fad, you would have found a very different verdict from these people when the elections took place on the 5th of March. found the plumed knight from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) parading this country from one end to the other, and preaching to the people sectional prejudices. The hon member for South Middlesex (Mr. Allan) addressed the House to-day on what would accrue to a certain portion of the agricultural community, provided that unrestricted reciprocity were adopted; and that reminds me of a story which I heard it is a Highland Scotchman, that is, a true Scotch-from a very reliable authority, and it was to the following effect:—During the election in the con-who are descended from David, King of Israel, told by the hon, gentlemen opposite, that, as soon as the election took place, they could go over there and sell their produce and they would have to pay no duty upon it. The people of the district I represent could not be deluded by the Liberal platform speakers, who tried to deceive them in that way. They said: Vote for us and you will have free trade. Well, free trade as I understand it, was not an issue in the late election at all. It was only a onesided jug-handled free trade that they proposed between the Dominion of Canada and the United States. They said: Vote for us, and you will have closer trade relations with the United States. Well, Sir, I do not understand yet that that was an issue in the country. They said: Vote for us and you will have reciprocity. A political opponent even went so far as to place on his bills: "Vote for the advocate of reciprocity." But reciprocity did not enter into the contest that took place on the 5th of March at all. Reciprocity as I under-stand it was only a side issue. The pure and simple issue between the parties of this country was the National Policy rersus Unrestricted Reciprocity. Now, Sir, we can look back with pride to the time the National Policy was inaugurated. The time at my disposal to-night is too limited to enable me to go into the subject thoroughly; but, Sir, I venture to say, and I am prepared here with facts to prove, that since the National Policy was inaugu-rated by that grand old chieftain who led the Conservative party so many times to victory, the farmers have got better prices for their produce and they have paid less for everything they have been obliged to consume. Now, Sir, there are other reasons why unrestricted reciprocity should not be adopted by the electors. Has one hon, gentleman opposite been able to explain how they are going to make up the deficiency in the revenue which is involved in unrestricted reciprocity? There is one thing that the farmers of Canada object to, and that is direct taxation. The hon, member for North Norfolk proposes that one-half of the militia expenditure should be cut off. I am here working to get a part of that expenditure for a battalion in my district; a greater and worthier battalion does not exist in the Dominion of Canada, and the only thing it lacks is that esprit de corps which comes from men being associated together, and performing those evolutions which it is absolutely necessary every battalion should undergo. There are other objections to the fad that was propounded by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I am only sorry that I have not time to discuss them fully to-night. Now, I want to say a word in reference to a remark of the hon, member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) during the course of his speech. If there is a man I like, because we look back with pride to that ancestor as the progenitor of the race to which we belong. use of these words:

"There were three classes who were attempted to be caught by this loyalty ery. One class were those who were really loyal.

I hope I belong to that class: I hope that my friends belong to that class. --

"The class who believe that the institutions in this country are the best in the world."

We all believe that: we would not change them for any institutions that would follow the adoption of unrestricted reciprocity, which would incur the annexation of this country to a foreign land.-

"The second class consists of those who are anxious to leave the Conservative party, but are standing off and saying, we cannot leave that party, because it states that the other party is disloyal. The third class were the chapper little gentlemen"

I do not see the hon, member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot); I am sorry he is not here.-

"who appear on certain days in the uniform of Her Majesty, and are never heard except when they say they are willing to lay down their lives for their country when there is no battle to be fought."

Well, Sir, the hon, member for Guysborough reminds me a good deal of the story of the individual who was drafted as a conscript in the American war, and who said: "You can take all my wife's relations, every one of them, but leave me at Now, Sir, loyalty, when it comes to be discussed in this House, has to me almost a sacred Loyalty, Sir, conveys to my breast the feeling that existed in my ancestors when they left the Mohawk Valley over a hundred years ago and came across to Canada and settled in the wilds of this country; and I doubt if there is any other hon, gentleman who can look back to a record such as I have the honour to look back to. Sir, those men left good homes in a fertile valley, and they came to Canada—for what ? You may say it was a sentiment, but it was more than that. It was because they would not live under a disunited em-That to my mind is loyalty, and that is a loyalty which I hope will exist in the breasts of all good, honest Canadians, who have the welfare of their country at heart, and who will repudiate with scorn any idea that the machinations of a party on your right or on your left should ever lead the country to a fate that we should deplore.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) My intention is not to make a speech nor long to occupy the attention of the House at this late hour of the night, especially as the debate on this question has lasted for over a month. However, I think it to be my duty, under the circumstances, owing to the gravity of the question raised by the motion before you, to do more than support it with my vote; I think it my duty to make known, not only by my vote, but by my voice, the views of the electors of the county which I have the honour to represent. Before discussing the main question embodied in the motion now under consideration I must take up a few statements which unfortunately were, but should not have been, made in this House. The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), in a speech which he delivered last week, made certain assertions which were not accurate and which deserve to be corrected. The hon, member had the courage to speak of and protest the innocence of his party. means of such accusations. Did he think he was Mr. MACDONELL (Algonia).

He went even further, and he accused the members on this side of the House of attempting to divert I find that the hon, member for Guysborough made the attention of the electors of the country with what he called paltry and insignificant scandals, My intention is not to discuss what he called paltry and insignificant scandals. Time will come later on to deal with that. Let me only say now that these paltry and insignificant scandals monopolize at present the attention of the electors of the Dominion of Canada. Is there a man in this House and in the country who is ignorant of the revelations which have been made before the committees since the beginning of the session? Is there a man who can believe that the hon. member for Hochelaga was sincere when he said that these revelations were paltry and insignificant scandals? Let us open the newspapers—I will not say the Opposition newspapers, but many of the papers which have always given the Government a cordial supportlet us open La Presse, for instance, and we will read articles where the acts which were revealed before the investigation committees of this House are strongly censured. Let us open the Star of the 22nd and of the 24th instant, and in these two numbers articles will be found denouncing the Government scandals. Let us open Le Canada of the 10th of this month: let us glance at the same paper of the 24th instant, and we can see what that paper thinks of the situation : we can see with what severity it speaks of the facts which are now brought to light before the committees. And it will not be argued that those papers are opposed to the Government. Even the Evening Journal of this city, of the 26th instant, branded the different acts of the Administration now revealed before the committees. Under the circumstances, I think the hon. member for Hochelaga would have done infinitely better in not speaking of scandals. But what was his object? He wanted to divert the attention of the public, if not that of the members of this House, by mentioning would-be scandals which he says were revealed in the Parliament of Quebec. This is not the time to discuss the matters which came before the Parliament of Quebec. We have not the documents, nor is this an occasion for discussing these matters; but let me by the way repudiate what the hon, member said. He told House that a committee had been formed in the Parliament of Quebec to hold an investigation on what our opponents have called the Whelan-Pacaud scandal. I regret to say that the hon. member is mistaken. There was no committee appointed to hold an investigation into this matter. There was not one member to be found in the whole House of Quebec who would take the responsibility of bringing forth an accusation; but it was the Government who appointed a Royal Commission which made an investigation. The hon, member said the Government prevented the witnesses from testifying. Such is not the truth. The witnesses were not prevented from answering the questions put to them, but on the refusal of some of them it was contended that the commission had overreached its powers; a brief of prohibition was taken against it, and the question has become a matter for the courts to deal with. Such are the facts as they occurred. The hon, member must have been very short of arguments: he must have considered his position very unsound to try to divert public opinion from the scandals in Ottawa by

He outdid the member for There is another point which the hon. member for Hochelaga has unfortunately touched, strong on figures. He also contended that the I refer to what he said of Hon. Mr. Mercier. He policy of the party in power was a policy calculated said:

" Now, His Excellency the Count Mercier, who is being se renaded and promenaded, and drummed and fifed to-night, arose in his seat and said to the majority: No. you must not order these witnesses to answer the committee; but we must conceal those who refuse to answer.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that a member of this House, and especially the member for Hochelaga, should exercise his irony on the marks of distinction given by the Pope to a Catholic of the country. If a Protestant had risen and said such things we would have been right in thinking them unseemly; but when we see a Catholic, who particularly poses as such—I wonder he did not go as far as a certain Montreal newspaper, and mention the white breeches; no doubt he did not think of it, and willingness was not what failed him-when we see a Catholic member, I say, speak ironically of such decorations and honours, I believe it is the duty of some member of this House to protest against such impropriety, and I am sure that in protesting as I do now I reflect the opinion of the Catholics of Canada in general, and of the Province of Quebec in particular. Now, I will only say a few words on the question of reciprocity. Everybody, doubtless, remembers that the last general elections took place at the time they did under the pretext that the Government wanted to better their position for concluding a treaty of commerce with the United States. Notwithstanding the long dissertations which we were treated to by the members of the Ministerial party, each in his particular line, the one saying that it was not possible to make a treaty with the United States, others contending that it would be advantageous to make a treaty restricted to farm produce only, and others again asserting that it would be altogether against the interest of the country to make a treaty of commerce with the United States, that we have nothing to envy anyone-notwithstanding these dissertations, I say, I have no doubt that I reflect the opinion of the electors of my county in saying that they are in favour of reciprocity with the And in order to prove that they United States. are favourable to the idea of reciprocity I will mention under what circumstances the last election took place. To give an idea of the ground on which the battle was fought in my county I will read a few short extracts from the manifesto published by my opponent, Dr. Coulombe, during that This gentleman, in order to frighten the electors of the county, and to induce them to vote against the policy of the Opposition, which was reciprocity, said, in his manifesto:

"Unrestricted reciprocity means annexation."

A little further on he explained what annexation is:

—"Annexation means for the French Canadians the abolition of the French language. Annexation means also the education of the children by the state. The education of the children could no longer be entrusted to the church, even should the latter want to do the work gratuitously. Annexation also signifies the breaking up of all our constitutional laws. Annexation also means the direct taxation of the people."

He reached the total L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins), and yet he is pretty to bring about the free admission of the natural products of Canada into the United States, and he would then exclaim:

"The policy of the Liberals means Canada for the Yankees, a differential tariff against the mother country, direct taxation to the amount of forty dollars per year for a family of ten persons.'

I wonder why he did not say it meant war? In my county, as in all the counties of the district of Three Rivers, political affairs are not the only things you have to deal with. Your opponents always work prejudices for all they are worth, in preaching in all styles and manners that Liberalism is condemned, and insinuating that the party of the Opposition in this House, styled the Liberal party, is imbued with the errors of the Liberalism which is condemned in Europe. This prejudice has been so carefully nurtured during the last twenty-five years, always to the benefit of the would-be Conservative party, that for a great number of electors the word Conservatism is the synonym for religion, and the word Liberalism is the synonym for infidelity. Dr. Coulombe did not content himself with what I have mentioned above. He took upon himself to invoke the name of a religious authority. He inserted in his programme a passage from the writings of Bishop O'Brien, of Halifax. If only a man were content to quote correctly the opinion of these eminent prelates. But he extracts, from documents taken I know not where, sentences that in no way render their thought; and it is such that have been presented The County of to the voters at the last elections. Maskinongé has always elected members supporting the Conservative Government, and so strong was the sentiment for unrestricted reciprocity in the county that notwithstanding all the means employed in favour of the Conservative candidate the county returned a man favourable to that policy; and I will add that the majority which was given me at the last election is such as has not been given to anyone for a long time in the county. When in 1878 the so-called National Policy was inaugurated, what were the reasons given for the adoption of this policy? It was pracin all styles and manners; it was tised the hustings, and the papers said all friendly to the party spread it everywhere, that with protection we would see a change in the state of things then in existence; that we would see an end to the emigration of our countrymen to the United States; that with protection we would see manufactories arising everywhere; that with protection the people would become more prosperous; that our labouring classes would find work everywhere, and that consequently all would go well and happily. These theories were so fine that the people believed in that prosperity which was promised them; but after twelve or thirteen years of experience, what have we seen? We have seen emigration double and become a plague for the country. We have seen no manufactories building up. On the contrary, we have seen here and there a few manufactories come down. We have not seen the people finding work and bread here, but we are we in need of ! We need a market in which to have seen the farming community giving way, so to dispose of our goods. Let the doors of the Amerispeak, under the burden of taxes which it had to ean market be opened to us, the market of that counpay upon the goods it was in need of, while it was try of sixty to seventy millions people, and we shall impoverished by the losses sustained on the pro- see prosperity once more all over our Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, since we continue mentioning other counties of the district have reached a point where we can say that the experience of the past has superabundantly established attention of the hon. There he will see, on the St. Maurice River, what is perhaps the finest water power in the world, a water power capable of running all kinds of manufactories with as much advantage as, and even more advantage, than in any other part of America. A company has already spent more than a million market to dispose of its goods it cannot expand as it might if a large market was open to it. Let us come back to the city of Three Rivers, which is represented by the Minister of Public Works. Let me mention just here that the city has already given and still offers considerable bounties to manufacturers, besides the divers geographical advantages it affords. Will the Minister of Public Works point out to me the manufactories which the policy of his Government caused to be established in Three Rivers? There is a manufactory of water pipes which was established some years ago. The principal manager of the firm was telling me the other day that the National Policy is of no use to him. There is a shoe factory, which is considerable. It is now recognized that the National Policy gives no protection to the shoe manufacture. I find a proof of it in the city of Quebec itself, with which the hon. Minister of Public Works is very well acquainted. Far from being useful to the shoe manufacture, I am not afraid to say, from the testimony of men engaged in that industry, that the National Policy is mischievous to it. In the city of Quebec are to be found the largest shoe factories of the country. One of the managers of these factories said lately—and I have it from a reliable source—that he could compete advantageously with the United States if he had no duties to pay on his goods at the entrance of the American market; he added that his trade would double if he could find an adequate market for his products. How could it be otherwise? Leather does not cost here any more than in the United States. Labour is cheaper. Are we to grant our own people less intelligence and less ability than those who live on the American territory? Then, why could not our products compete with the products of the neighbouring country? Because they cannot enter the market. We have in this country the finest railways in the tion. Mr. DESAULNIERS. (Translation.) I will call the hon, member's attention to the fact that this woollen factory of Yamachiche failed three times under the Mackenzie Government, and that it is now prosperous under protection.

(Translation.) The statement of Mr. LEGRIS. the hon, member proves nothing. It is rather hard to believe that if this manufactory failed three times in four years it was the fault of the Government. In one of the parishes of my county there were iron works turning out different wares; this establishment was born with the régime of protection, and through dollars on this water power, but it only uses it to a strange coincidence it just failed as the régime is This water power can be utilized for going to die. There was, at St. Ursule, a tannery: a number of things; but as that company has no it has been closed for two or three years. We have another tannery at Louiseville; I am told it is going There to wind up. At any rate, it is very slow. is a great saw-mill in the County of Maskinongé. Hon, members of the left, especially the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Spohn), have shown what would be the advantages to saw-mill owners and lumber manufacturers in having access to the American markets. In the parish of St. Ursule there is a manufactory of pulp, which only runs at intervals and without profit for its owners, because it cannot sell its goods in the United States. In the County of Berthier is a large leather manufactory. In a conversation with its manager a few days ago I was told by him that it would be infinitely better for him if we had commercial reciprocity with the United States. I think it my duty to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to these facts. I think he ought to east his eyes on the district which he represents, and ask himself if protection has been for us the boon it was promised to be, if it has bettered our position or has not rather lead us to poverty. I do not believe that there is a man in this House who can contend that land has not depreciated in value all over the Province of Quebec; and the same thing may be said of the other provinces, judging from the reports of the hon, members who represent them. The National Policy is one of the causes of this depression. It is time that a protest should be entered against the present state of things. Why make a privileged class of individuals in this country? Why a policy which is wholly in the interest of one class -the industrial class—to the detriment of another class-the agricultural community? We have a right, and it is our duty to lay bare our grievances. I hope that the Government of the day, if they have time to do so, will see to bettering the situaworld; we have immense water powers; we have discuss the opportuneness of a treaty with the transport facilities by rail and water. What, then, United States, I believe that to answer and refute the objections which they brought forward I can-{country, to give utterance to the opinions of those not do better than to quote the words of a man in who think with me on the subject under discussion. whom they have had entire confidence, and who We were put to the inconvenience of a dissolution has been dear to their party. Here is what Sir of this House before Parliament had run its natural John A. Macdonald said in a speech delivered in term, and despite the declaration of the Governthis House on 28th March, 1884:

So do not discuss the opportuneness of a recipro- how public opinion stood in favour of reciprocity city treaty with the United States. Sir John tells in natural products. Hon, gentlemen opposite you that it is so evident that it goes without saying-that all admit it. The contention of the hon, members of the right, that we have nothing to envy our neighbours, and that there would be no advantage in making a treaty with the United! States, is therefore contradicted by the very chief! of these gentlemen. I do not fear to state here that a great number of Ministerial members of this House were elected on the platform of reciprocity with the United States. They declared that it was necessary, and that the Government meant that this reciprocity should be limited to natural products. Now, Sir John tells them that we can never hope for a treaty of commerce with the United States for the natural products alone. Here are his words :

"I believe that the feeling that then existed still exists, and that you will never get a treaty between the United States and Canada for reciprocal trade in the natural productions of the two countries."

A little further on he adds:

"That feeling, I believe, still exists, and unless the United States will come at some time or other to a conclusion that they would be willing to enter upon a reciprocity treaty, not only for our natural productions, but for our manufactures as well as for our natural products, we will never have a treaty. I am quite satisfied the United States will not agree, the country will not agree, the voice of the country will be against a repetition of the treaty of 1854."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that I have thoroughly refuted, with the words of the former chief of the Government, the objections offered by those who contend that we can have, and that the Government will give us, a treaty of reciprocity with the United States for our natural products only. not fear to say here that in the district of Three Rivers my hon. friend, the member for St. Maurice (Mr. Desaulniers), won his election through promising to the electors that the Government would give commercial reciprocity in natural products. In the County of Champlain the same course was followed. Now, the electors of the rural counties being determined upon a change in the present state of things, the two hon, gentlemen were elected. It is upon the strength of these promises that their constituents voted for the Ministerial candidates. Therefore, these hon, members will find it their duty to represent the views of their constituents, and it seems to me they must vote in favour of the resolution now before the House.

Mr. WATSON. At this late stage of the debate and at this late hour, I would not take up the time of the House were it not that, as some of the members coming from the district west of Lake Superior and who support the Government, have expressed their views on this subject, I think it is my duty, as a solitary supporter of the Opposition from that ment that a dissolution would not take place at "I do not know any reason why the hon, gentleman who moved this, or the seconder, laid before the House these elaborate statements to show the value of reciprocal trade, or trade of any kind, with the United States. That is admitted. That goes without saying. We all admit that it would be well that we had a large trade with the United States rather than a small one." the time it did. The election was held at a very that he might be able to form an opinion as to told us during the campaign that the Conservatives were in favour of reciprocal trade in natural products, but what have we heard from them during this debate? I need not here dwell on the visit of the deputation to Washington, because all that it did was to go there and return, without initiating, much less accomplishing, anything, and in this debate that question has been carefully avoided by hon, gentlemen opposite. Their whole argument has been restricted to a defence of the old National Policy. The Government appealed to the people and came back a great deal weaker than they went, and I am satisfied that, had time been given for a fair discussion of the reciprocal trade question, had the elections not been sprung upon the people unawares, hon, gentlemen opposite would not be in power to-day. I am satisfied, from what I have learned of the means used to carry the constituencies by hon, gentlemen opposite, that the Liberal party had the majority of the popular, honest vote recorded on the 5th March last. have had the hon, member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and the hon, member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross) addressing this House, and they are the only two representatives of the North-West who have so far spoken in this debate. The hon, member for Assiniboia said he would not discuss the trade question at all, and he did not discuss it. The hon, member for Lisgar referred but very briefly to the trade question, contenting himself with making a few broad statements without giving any good reasons for coming to the conclusions at which he arrived. A considerable portion of his remarks were taken up with a eulogy of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Well, Sir, he has done that before. He spoke also in the highest possible terms of Manitoba and the North-West, and in this respect I fully endorse all he said. But I must say that if Manitoba and the North-West are prosperous, they are prosperous despite the manner in which their progress has been retarded by the policy of hon, gentlemen opposite. No hetter proof, Sir, could be given that the country is a good one than the fact that it has made such progress under such unfavourable circumstances. The hon, gentleman then went on to speak of the last elections, and indulged in considerable glorification over the large representation returned to support the Government west of Lake Superior. In this connection let me quote his own words:

unrestricted reciprocity being the policy of the Opposition, in fact it was more largely owing to that circumstance than anything else. The self-complacent member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) never would have been here had it not been for the enormous amount of support given him by the most powerful paper in the province, the Manitoba Free Press."

I may here say that the Free Press, if I am not greatly mistaken, supported all the members who were returned to this House. So far as the hon. member for Lisgar is personally concerned, I am not aware that he discussed the public questions on the public platform at all, but carried his election by a still hunt. He carried it by the usual means which I believe are resorted to by hon, gentlemen opposite. In speaking of the Liberal party, the hon, gentleman took occasion to have a fling at that party. He is one of those peculiar individuals who always like to support the powers that be, and if there should be a change I have not the least doubt but that we would find him supporting hon. gentlemen who are on this side of the House to-day. He said, speaking of the leader of the Opposition:

"I believe that the hon, gentleman thinks himself to be the man of destiny, but he may rest assured that so long as unrestricted reciprocity is the main plank in his plat-form, the Heavens will not reveal his political destiny." Now, speaking of the leader of the Opposition, one of the great reasons urged by hon, gentlemen opposite why he should not be returned as leader of the Government was the fact that he is a French Canadian; and I am glad to be able to set up in opposition to that ground an authority to which we are all disposed, I think, to give more credence than to the hon, member for Lisgar and his friends. I find that the Canada Presbyterian, speaking of the leader of the Opposition, says:

"No statesman in Canada is rising faster than Mr. Laurier. His clean record, pure character, conciliatory manner, and lofty eloquence are giving him a stronghold on the esteem and confidence of the people without distinction of creed or party. He fights fairly and is always a gentleman. Canada needs first-class men on both sides, and the people, as a rule, are beginning to see that patriotic, statesmanlike qualities should be appreciated wherever they appear." they appear.

That opinion, coming from a paper, which perhaps represents a greater number of Protestants, of strong Protestant feeling, than any paper in the Dominion, must have great weight; and when we find a religious paper of that class giving expression to such strong sentiments in favour of our leader, we have reason to be proud that we have such a man at our head. On this side of the House, we do not care for a man's creed or religion, but support him because of the policy he advocates. Now, there are several reasons why the North-West returned so many members to support the Government. So far as the territory is concerned, it is hardly necessary for me to give any reason for the election of Government supporters, as the hon. member for West Assiniboia gave sufficiently strong evidence the other day to show the peculiar way in which elections are carried in the territories; and if there is one economy in Government expenditure which it would be an easy matter to carry out, it would be the saving of that portion of the election fund destined for use in the territories, for as long as you have open voting there, the Government might as well nominate a candidate and declare him elected as go through the farce of an election. In Manitoba strong influence was brought to bear, that of personal interests and corporations, which outweighed the trade question altogether, and in fact the trade question had no a free homestead to every actual settler, were the Mr. Watson.

influence in the return of the members at all. had there a member of the Tupper family, who happens to be the solicisor of the Manitoba and North-West Railway, and who, I suppose, felt, for the time being, that he was in Nova Scotia trying to coerce the employes of the Intercolonial That gentleman called the employés Railway. of the Manitoba and North-West Railway together in a station house, into which he would not allow a friend of mine to enter, at the time, unless he happened to be an employe of the road, and there in that meeting he gave those present to understand that it would be greatly in their interests to vote for the Tory candidate. We also had the influence of that mighty and great corporation, the Canadian Pacific Railway, a railway of which, I say as a Canadian, we ought to be proud, a railway which is well equipped and is one of the finest railways in the world, but, when they lend their influence to elect a candidate or candidates in a province where there is no other railway corporation to resist them, they have a mighty influence and no one knows that better than myself. We had the president, Mr. Van Horne, writing a long letter in the press in support of hon, gentlemen He believed in protection and thought it was in the interest of the country, and as a business man, working in the interests of his road, perhaps he was right. He believes in protection, his road is protected, and so long as he is protected against competition from the south, so long will he be able to carry trade between the different provinces at a greater rate than if we had reciprocal trade with our neighbours to the south. I believe that reciprocal trade would encourage competition in railways. It would cause a diversion of trade in different directions, and it might injure the Canadian Pacific Railway temporarily, but it would be a great benefit to the people by giving us greater railway facilities. The member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross) is a Tory of very He used to be a strong Liberal, and recent date. I believe he felt the downfall of the Mackenzie Administration in 1878 so badly that he actually cried. But he has seen new light. I do not blame any man for changing if he has good cause. He may think he has, but I do not. The greater portion of his time was taken up in showing how poorly off the people of the United States are. It seems to me that no better argument could be used in favour of hon, gentlemen on this side of the House than that the people of the United States are poor, and we have to admit that we are getting poor ourselves, and no doubt, if we had half the term of protection which they have had on the other side, we would be poorer than we are, so we should take warning by their example and stop before we get worse. The hon, gentleman said:

"It therefore cannot be said we are suffering in Manitoba to any extent on account of the National Policy. The farmers of that province are doing much better than those in Dakota."

I believe they are, but the reason is that we have better natural resources in Manitoba than they have in Dakota. Then that hon, gentleman went on to criticize the land regulations of the Mackenzie Administration. I lived in Manitoba when those regulations were in force—I went there in 1876—and I say that the land regulations of the Mackenzie Administration, which gave 160 acres of best regulations which were ever in force in Mani- both ways. I claim that you can lay down no toba or the North-West. We found that hon, gentle- hard and fast rule as to who pays the duty, men opposite, when we had a rush of immigration. It depends entirely on the effect that the article into the North-West for a few years, changed their which is imported or exported has in the market regulations from day to day, and those regulations in which it is sold. I take the view that so far were so obnoxious that the people left the country, as beef and wheat are concerned they are not They changed the homestead from 160 acres to 80 affected to any great extent by protection, either acres. Large reservations were made, and frequent in Canada or the United States. Both countries changes were made in the regulations. During the export those articles to Great Britain, and there years 1882 and 1883 a large tract in Southern Manitoba might have been occupied by actual! settlers, but all of that country south of the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway was altogether reserved from settlement, so that thousands of people left that country simply because at that time, between the colonization companies and the reserves to the south of the Canadian Pacific Railway there was hardly an acre of land available for homester d settlement in Manitoba. The hon, gentleman said our regulations were much better than those in D.kota. In those years of which I speak, when the Government were only giving 80 acres of homestead and 80 acres of pre-emption, and were reserving all the lands south of the Canadian Pacific Railway from settlement, in Dakota a homestead was given free after five years' residence, or after one year's residence at $1.25 per acre. Pre-emption was given after six months' residence for $1.25 per acre, and a tree claim on condition of 10 acres of trees growing at the end of five years. I know that settlers went to Dakota and availed themselves of the privileges they could obtain there in preference to staying in Manitoba or the North-West. I agree with the member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross), when he said that what we wanted in Manitoba and the North-West was people. We want settlers. That country is not worth anything to the Dominion of Canada unless we have We should encourage immigrants to go there, and we are finding that, notwithstanding the circumstances in which we are placed to-day, the natural advantages of Manitoba and the North-West are proving so much superior to those of Dakota that numbers of people are coming in from the south. But what is the Government doing to encourage them? We have again the Customs officer in the way, and we find that a settler who is coming in from Dakota and is bringing his household effects with him, has to bind himself that he about the difference in the prices of barley, say will not dispose of any of his effects, no matter what in Toronto and Oswego, for the last ten years: they may be, for two years. I say the Government Toronto. Oswego. should lift that embargo from the settlers who come in from Dakota and should allow them to bring their goods in free. There has been a large improvement made in Manitoba and the North-West during the last year. I find by the bulletin published by the Manitoba Government that we have this year 1,312,136 acres in grain cropped to be bound with a binder. We have under wheat 916,664 acres, against 746,058 in 1890; under oats we have 305,644, against 235,534 acres in 1890; of barley we have 89,828 acres, against 66,035 in 1890; of pease we have 555 acres, potatoes 12,705, and roots of other kinds 9,301 These figures show that we have a large We find that in 1890 there were in Manitoba 13,807 farms, and in 1891 that number has increased to 18,935 farms. That is encouraging, notwithstanding the disadvantages under which we are placed. In speaking of the tariff question, some gentlemen think it is not logical to say that the people in any country will have to pay the duty hou, gentleman and his friends gave us to under-they find a free market. Consequently, in discussing this question I think we can fairly leave these articles out of the discussion altogether. Where do we find our great trade? Our great trade, outside of beef and breadstuffs, which cannot be affected, as I have said, by the tariff, it is in the United States market. I will not, at this late hour, and at this stage of the debate, go into all the different lines of articles in which we trade; but there is one article in particular, one grain crop, to which I wish briefly to refer, and that is the barley crop. In Manitoba we have been experimenting to find some crop that will mature early, so as to escape the occasional early fall frost. Now, there is no crop so profitable for a farmer to grow as barley, so easy on the soil, a crop that is so safe in Manitoba, as it matures in a short season. I am in hopes we will find a variety of wheat which we can raise without danger in any year in any portion of Manitoba. At present the Experimental Farms are trying to find some quality of wheat that will mature earlier than the Red Fife wheat. Now, where do we find a market for our barley -- the sixrowed barley-but in the United States? We are trying to encourage the growth of two-rowed bar-That barley has just the same disadvantage as wheat; it takes longer to mature than the sixrowed barley, and we have to find a market for that barley in England. I find, in looking over the markets for different years, that barley is a grain upon which I claim the Canadian producer has to pay every cent of duty when it is exported, simply because all the barley we export to the United States does not affect the price in that market, and the duty is simply the toll we have to pay to get it into that market. I have here a table which clearly demonstrates that the duty and freight are just

In 1891 there is practically none exported on account of the McKinley tariff. Now, I wish to consider this matter from the standpoint of what I believe to be the greatest industry in Canada—the farming industry. On barley, as a great many other of our products, I claim that we pay the whole duty when we export it to the United against any trade whatever with the United States; and from the indications we have, they do not wish to send a delegation to Washington for that purpose. It seems to me they occupy a posi-tion a good deal like a man who was looking for work and praying to God that he might not find it. If they go to Washington it will not be because as they do in the United States. I have taken the trouble to inform myself on this question, and I court contradiction from any hon, gentleman who sees fit to contradict me. I will give comparative prices. I find that in Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, on 11th July, and in Bradley, Dakota, on 5th July, these are the prices of machines and different articles sold to the farmer. They are sold by the agent to the consumer, and it is the consumer's price I am going to give you. has been stated that these implements and other articles required by the farmers can be purchased such articles can be purchased as cheaply or cheaper now than they could previously to the National Policy being inaugurated. I ask hon, gentlemen to compare the prices to-day in both countries. It is no argument to say that these articles are as cheap now as they should be because they are cheaper than they were ten or twelve years ago. Everybody knows that the improved modes of manufacturing machines has lessened the price and the cost to the consumer. I find that in Bradley, Dakota, during this month, the price at which wire was sold was $4.50 per barbed and in Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, it $6.50 per 100 lbs., a difference of just lbs., and in was Now, if we make a calculation as to what that costs the farmer, if we consider the amount that is received in duties and the amount that I claim it costs the consumer on account of this iniquitous tariff, I find that if a farmer wants to fence a quarter section of land, 480 rods, of threestrand fence, he requires 1,440 lbs. of barbed wire, for which he has to pay 2 cents a pound more than his neighbour across the line -- that is to say, $28.80—not of duty, because the amount of duty received is very small; but I claim that in every instance the manufacturer in Canada puts the price right up to the top notch, and charges all he can. I take the prices in Dakota and the prices in Manitoba, and I make a comparison. These are the These are the prices at which these articles are sold to the consumer. I will take the article of binders. I must say that the men who handle American binders in Manitoba must have large profits, but I will give the figures I have received from reliable sources at which these machines are sold. The McCormick or Deering binders sold in Dakota, 5-foot, for $110; in Manitoba, $183; 6-foot binders, $115 in Dakota and $190 in Manitoba; 7-foot binders, $120 in Dakota, $195 in Manitoba. These are given Mr. WATSON.

to me as the cash prices in both markets. our Canadian binders are sold at a what less figure than American binders. But the American binders are sold in Manitoba, and it is Mr. WATSON. I would like to ask the hon. not for me to reflect on the good judgment of the gentleman if he can find any consolation from the farmers as to their choice of binders. They fact that nearly all the members on that side of the pay their money and they take their choice: House who have spoken have strongly protested Brantford binders, 6-ft., $155; 7-ft., $160. Frost & Wood, $150 and $160. Massey's, 5-ft., $140; 6-ft., $145; 7-ft., $150. I am satisfied these are the accurate figures for these machines, sold both in Dakota and Manitoba; and it is important to the people of Canada, because these prices must affect the people of other provinces as they do the people of Manitoba. We had they want to go. Now, a broad statement has a discussion on another commodity which is used been made that we buy all the necessaries we largely by farmers throughout Canada—that is, require to carry on agriculture in Canada as cheaply binding twine. I gave the figures in job lots on that binding twine. I gave the figures in job lots on that occasion during the debate. Those were contradicted, and I have taken the trouble to inform myself of the prices at which binding twine is sold to the farmer. I found the prices on the dates I mentioned, during the early part of this month, in Bradley, Dakota, and Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, as follows:-Standard manila in Dakota, 91 cents; in Manitoba, 14 cents, or a difference of 5 cents per pound. Sisal in Dakota, 9 cents; in Manitoba, 13½ cents, or a difference of 4½ cents per pound. Jute in Dakota, 7 cents; in Manitoba, 93 cents, or a difference of 2½ cents per pound. Pure manila in Daas cheaply in Canada as they can in the United kota, 13 cents; in Manitoba, 16½ cents, or an average States. It is held by hon, gentlemen opposite that difference of 3½ cents per pound. If you will take 2½ lbs. per acre, and I am glad to say there is a prospect of an abundant crop during this year in Manitoba, and no doubt it will take at least 24 lbs. of binding twine to bind every acre in that province—but if you take 2½ lbs. per acre and the price at 3½ cents as the difference, the sum will be a very large one. We have in Manitoba alone, not including the North-West, 1,312,000 acres of grain to be cut with binders this year. If you average that up at the price I have given you will be convinced that I am right in stating that the total extra cost of the binding twine for 1,312,000 acres is $124,640, or on 19,000 farms, which is the number of farms we possess, an annual cost to the average farmer of $6.56. What do we derive in revenue on account of the tax? The sum of $1,277.76. That is the revenue we received last year from the whole Dominion, and the figures I have given of the quantity of binding twine to be used this year are for the Province of Manitoba alone. I have received a letter from a constituent of the hon, member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly), and he addresses me thus:

"CLEARWATER, 11th July, 1891.

"R. Watson, Esq.

"Dear Sir,—I have just seen the debate on the binding twine tax, and am surprised that the duty was not removed or lowered. The Americans have compelled the removed or lowered. In a Americans have compelled the Government to lower the tax on sugar, and to be consistent it should also be on twine. In this part of Mr. Daly's constituency we have a strong farmers' league formed—not a political alliance, but merely for protection in our commercial interests to endeavour to stem the action of combines and monopolies that are sucking the life-blood combines and monopolies that are sucking the life-blood out of the farmers, cutting us off at both ends, giving us the smallest possible price for what we have for sale and charging us the highest price for what we buy; and binding twine is one of the articles we are specially taxed on. After corresponding with and getting offers from different firms, both in the Dominion and States, we have ordered from Robert Rogers, of Clearwater, who is agent for the McCornick firm, of Chicago; he supplies us the best standard or mixed manila twine at 14 cents; we think it a better twine and more feet to the pound than the machine men here are selling at 17 cents; the order is for about 35,000 lbs., which is a saving of $1,000 from the prices asked here, but we have to pay the duty, which is 2½ cents per pound, which on 30,000 lbs. is $750, and as you know that the farmers here have not eash to pay for twine till after harvest, or we could have done a good deal better, as I know some parties across the line who have bought their twine at 11 cents—that is, for what is called manila; but I fail to find pure manila on either side. So that if it were not for the duty we could have our twine for 11½ cents laid down in Clearwater, which would be to farmers in this small district, say about a quarter of one municipality, a saving of about $1,700 from the price asked by the dealers here, and this is only a sample of many other necessaries we are compelled to pay enormous prices for. Take coal oil: we have had to pay 35 cents per gallon for a miserable Canadian oil, and 45 cents for American oil, when our neighbours across the line get their 5-gallon can for $1. We as farmers hope the day is not far distant when the tariff will be either wholly abolished or put down to a rate that we will be able to get the necessaries at something like values, and not be taxed to keep up combines and millionaires.

"I see our Tory Manitoba representatives are quite satisfied with the Government policy towards this country, but I fail to find any Tories here but are just of the same opinion as I am as regards the duties, only at voting time, and they would smuggle a dollar's worth of sugar or a can of coal oil when they can, and think it no sin."

Robt. Rogers is president of the Conservative Association in Manitoba. Still, he does not think it is disloyal to deal in American binding twine and implements, and to be able to sell to the farmers cheaper than they are able to buy from the Canadian manufacturers. That is a letter which certainly should have weight in this House, as it gives the actual experience of a farmer in Southern Manitoba.

Mr. DALY. Give us the name.

Mr. WATSON. James Laidlaw.

Mr. DALY. A good Grit like yourself.

Mr. WATSON. Yes, and an honest man, he expresses, no doubt, the opinion of all the farmers, irrespective of politics, in the section in which he lives. He buys his binding twine from the president of the Conservative Association in Manitoba, who handles American twine and American implements. I think another article which shows the benefit which must arise from reciprocal trade is coal. Our geographical position prevents our people trading with each other as conveniently as they can with their neighbours across the line. Our coal is mainly at the ends of the Dominion, in British Columbia and Nova Scotia. The people of Nova Scotia have greater facilities for taking their coal to the United States than to central Canada. We also know that British Columbia has greater facilities for taking their coal into the United States than to Manitoba or Ontario. I claim that with reciprocial trade the people who operate the coal mines would be benefited, if not to the full amount of the duty, to almost the full amount. Ifeel satisfied that the people of Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba, will be benefited to almost the full amount of the duty on coal coming into our country. On account of our geographical position it is impossible for Nova Scotia coal to come far west, and I do not believe there is a ton of Nova Scotia coal shipped west of Montreal; and not a great quantity is shipped to Montreal, even, as people prefer to buy the American coal and to pay the duty, rather than pay the long haul and extra freight on the coal from the Eastern Provinces. In speaking of coal, I may say that we have a small importation of coal from the masses of the people of Canada can consume, Great Britain which amounts to almost nothing. I namely, a good light-brown sugar of "No. 16 find according to the last Trade and Navigation Returns that we exported to the United States 574,856 tons of coal, at an average price of $3.68 per ton, at a total value of $2,126,000. I claim that this, to the producers of coal in Canada, if my contention is right that they would benefit to the extent of the duty of 75 cents per ton, the duty collected going into the United States would be the extra price of 75 cents per ton, or $431,142 of an extra price to the producers. On the other hand, we import into Canada from the United States 1,346,678 tons of coal, at an average of $2.52 per ton, making a total value of $3,387,611. Now, I claim according to my argument, we would save the whole duty to the consumer of 60 cents per ton, which would amount to $808,000. So, Mr. Speaker, the total saving to the coal industry, and to the consumers of coal in Canada, by reciprocal trade in coal between Canada and the United States, would have amounted to $1,239,142 last year, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns. We have large coal fields in the North-West Territories, and we have some coal in Manitoba; but what has been the policy of this Government in respect to those coal fields? The policy of this Government in pretending to open up these coal mines in the interest of the people, who should have the benefit of them, has been to place that coal in the hands of a monopoly. Against the wishes of the members on this side of the House, the Government has subsidized a railway for the Lethbridge Coal Company, without compelling them to carry coal for anybody except themselves, and consequently the Government gave them a monopoly. All we have to do to prove that the statment that I now make is correct is to point to the fact that the further you go west of Winnipeg on the Canadian Pacific Railway the dearer the coal becomes. The nearer you come to the coal fields the higher the price of coal, which shows clearly that the price is regulated only by the competition of American coal. Coal is sold in Winnipeg for $3 per ton less than it is sold in Calgary, within a short distance of the coal mines, and this shows that there is a monopoly in that article, and a monopoly which does act injuriously to our people in Manitoba and the North-West Territories. policy of the present Government is not to give us cheap coal in the North-West, but to give the friends of the Government a monopoly of the coal fields, and to subsidize railways for the purpose of making the coal dear to us, because they have given these railwaysacharter to the boundary line, and this monopoly company find it more profitable to ship their coal to Montana and the western states than to ship it east to Manitoba. I shall say a few words in reference to the commission which we sent to Jamaica looking for trade, and in reference to the commission which is to be sent to Washington to try and negotiate a treaty. We have sent a commission to Jamaica for the purpose of encouraging trade with Canada, but if the Government act with as little judgment in sending their delegation to Washington as they are acting with the delegation to Jamaica, we may expect the same sorry results. If we are to have any trade at all with Jamaica, the return which we must get in trade for the natural products which we send them, will be sugar. But we find that the sugar which Dutch Standard," is prohibited from coming into Canada free of duty, and nothing but the darker sugars, which are supposed to be refined before being fit for use, are allowed to come in free, again legislating in favour of the retiners. The Americans have allowed sugar of "No. 16 Dutch Standard" to come in free to the United States, and consequently we have destroyed any chance we had of the West Indies dealing with us. They are allowed to send there better grades of sugar duty-free into the United States, and they will buy their goods in that country which they are allowed to import their products into. The Minister of Finance, by this change which he has made in the sugar duties, has utterly destroyed any chance we ever had of trading with the West India Islands; and he has destroyed entirely any benefits which might result from that commission to Jamaica. Now, Mr. Speaker. I will give you the list of farm implements which are necessary to the farmers of Manitoba, and I will show you the excessive price we have to pay for the implements, on account of the protection that is placed on these goods. The following statement will explain this:-

Name.	No.	Value.	Duty.
Fanning mills Horse powers Portable steam engines Separators Parts above machinery Sewing machines Harrows Binders Seed drills. Mowing machines Ploughs	347 6 54	1,289 8,205 12,729 7,972 6,952 104 6,167 3,713 1,910	$ 1,848 451 2,871 4,455 2,790 2,431 36 2,158 1,290 668 7,396 26,403

We see by this that there were 54 binders and 1,064 ploughs imported from the United States into Manitoba last year. The farmers of Manitoba certainly know what kind of implements they want, and notwithstanding that these implements are manufactured in Canada, they buy them in the United States and pay the duty upon them; and the Government by another twist of their Customs management increases the duty on these articles above what it should be. There were 54 binders imported last year into Manitoba, and the average price on which the Government compelled the importer to pay duty on was $114 each, and which, at 35 per cent., amounts to $39.90. That amount is collected on every binder that goes into Manitoba from the United States. Now, binders can be bought wholesale for $75 each, and I claim that the wholesale price is the price at which they should be entered at the Cus-The duty on a binder, the price of which is $75, at 35 per cent., would be $26.25, so that by that peculiar turn of the Customs law by the Minister of Customshe compels the farmers of Manitoba who wish to use American binders to pay an extra duty of $13.65 above what they should in all justice pay. There were 1,064 ploughs imported into Manitoba last year, the total value of which was $21,496. These ploughs are also valued by the Customs at $20 apiece, which is much above Mr. Watson.

the wholesale price. The duty on $20 at 35 per cent, would be $7. Now, Mr. Speaker, according to the reports of the Legislature of the Province of Manitoba—and I venture to say these reports will not be contradicted, as they were very carefully prepared—from 1890 to 1891 there was an increase in the number of farmers in Manitoba of 5,060. Now, each farmer will require at least one plough, at an increased cost of $7; so that for the 5,060 farmers this would amount to the enormous sum of $35,420 which the farmers have to pay, in one year only, more for their ploughs than they would have to pay if we had unrestricted reciprocity. The amount of duty collected on the number of ploughs imported into Manitoba from the United States last year was Now, I will give an illustration to show who pays the duty. Last year we exported a large quantity of potatoes from Manitoba, as they were in good demand in the States, and we imported ploughs, so that we simply exchanged our potatoes for ploughs, and let us see what the results were. You can buy a plough in Chicago for $16; allow for freight and profit on the plough $4, and the plough should be sold in Manitoba to the consumer for $20. But you have to add to the price $7 of duty, so that the plough really costs the consumer $27 with the duty, as against $20 without the duty. Now, potatoes were worth last fall 50 cents a bushel before the McKinley tariff of 25 cents a bushel was imposed upon them, and after that they were sold for 35 cents a bushel, showing clearly that the amount of the duty was simply deducted from the price. Remove that duty altogether, and what do we find? We find that with a plough at $20 and potatoes at 50 cents a bushel, 40 bushels of potatoes would buy a plough; but with the plough at $27 and the potatoes at 25 cents a bushel, it costs the Manitoba farmer 108 bushels of potatoes to buy the plough. That is a fair illustration of how the duty affects the farmers in Manitoba. We have nothing to protect in Manitoba. In some districts of Ontario there may some reason for protection; but I defy any gentleman in this House or out of it to show wherein we in Manitoba can be benefited by it. On a great many articles which we import the duties collected are very small, so that the loss of revenue resulting from their removal would be trifling compared with the benefits which would be derived from reciprocal trade, and I think we certainly ought to use every exertion to secure it, even at the expense of those few industries which the change might force to the wall. Now, the following figures show the large extra cost to the farmers of Manitoba on the four articles which I have selected from the list, compared with the small amount of duty collected on them :-

ARTICLES.	Extra Cost to Consumer.	Duty Collected.	Loss to Consumer over Duty Collected.

Now, we have heard certain reasons given in the course of this debate why some hon, gentlemen have been returned to this House. I can assure you, from my knowledge of the elections, that the trade question was not discussed at any length whatever by the supporters of hon, gentlemen opposite. Their great stock-in-trade, when I had the opportunity of meeting them, was the loyalty cry. Now, I would like to ask this House and the country who are the loyal people of Canada?

An hon. MEMBER. The Conservatives.

Mr. WATSON. Well, from their acts I have grave doubts of it. They are not true Canadians, at any rate, because we find them taking up with Imperial Federation fads and with annexation. Why, Mr. Speaker, we had it demonstrated this afternoon that a leading Conservative, the second in command in Ontario, is a pronounced annexationist; and we can see to-night, from the number of white shirt-fronts on the other side of the House, that there are a large number of Imperial Federationists among the hon, gentlemen opposite. believe that all loyal Canadians should stand by Canada; and all that we on this side of the House ask-and I think we are loyal in doing so-is a fair field and no favour. With that I believe we have nothing to fear from the United States or from any other nation in the world. I believe that we can surpass any other nation in the world in the production of those things for which the country is naturally adapted. But this attempt to foster industries which are not natural to the country at the expense of the masses of the people ought not to be tolerated; and the men who are building up a few manufactories at the expense of the masses of the Canadian people are not patriots to Canada, and are causing the people to be dissatisfied, and driving them out of the country. I believe that with reciprocal trade Canada, instead of having the paltry population which she has to day, would increase rapidly. I believe that our natural resources are greater than those of any other country in the world. We have fertile plains, minerals, fisheries, timber, and we have a people who, I believe, are not surpassed in the world.

Mr. FOSTER. All right.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. Minister of Finance says all right, and I hope he will agree with me. If there is any one man who is more responsible than another for this protective policy, though he is only carrying out the wishes of his party, it is the Finance Minister, who imposes obnoxious duties, which tend to drive our people out of the country. I am not one of those who say that all the manufacturers of Canada are bloated monopolists. have some knowledge whereof I speak, and I regret to say that the manufactures of Canada are not in a healthy condition. That is much to be regretted; but how could we expect otherwise? They have been encouraged togo on and increase their establishments, and then they find that they have not sufficient consumers to use their goods. Now, Sir, what we want is more people, and how are we going to get them under the present system? The manufacturers to-day are taxed the same as the farmers are They are taxed in almost every article taxed. that goes into their manufactured goods. manufacturers of agricultural implements are sufering to-day, and with the exception of two or three there is not among them a solvent firm in of the House for the few remarks I desire to offer.

Canada. Why is this so? It is on account of the tariff. You tax their iron, their bolts, their labour, and everything that goes into the goods they sell. The manufacturers of 1883 did not ask for a 35 per cent. tariff on manufactured goods, but simply asked that the duty should be taken off raw material. The Government refused, and said they would retain the duty on raw material, and add 10 per cent. to manufactured goods. I believe our manufacturers do not require protection, but can compete with all the world. Why, as proof of this, we need only look at Canadians abroad, and we will find that wherever they go they are appreciated, and particularly in the United States, where they are even given the preference over the native Americans. I will have to omit a good deal of what I intended to say to-night, owing to the lateness of the hour, and will conclude with saying that one great want of the North-West is more people, and one of the greatest boons to the North-West would be to remove those vexatious taxes which are imposed on the articles required by the farmers to cultivate the soil. A man coming to that country has to lay out a certain amount of money, and if we could enable him to establish a farm at less annual cost than is required to-day we would be doing a great deal to encourage emigration. I hope that hon, gentlemen opposite who support the Government, I hope that the members from Manitoba and North-West who support the Government, will insist on the Government spending at least the vote which Parliament gives for the purposes of immigration. Last year we found that the report was spread abroad that the members from Manitoba had succeeded in getting the Government to increase the grant for immigration, but the Government apparently have not nerve enough to spend the amount voted for that purpose, thereby showing they are not alive to the necessities of the North-West, or of Canada as a whole, because there is not a portion of the Do-minion in which the future of Canada is bound up so much as in the North-West. I believe that our great wheat-fields will not only produce the amount we intend to export this year—and we intend to ship over 20,000,000 bushels—but we will be able to export the full amount of 70,000,000 bushels of grain, which the Minister of Railways predicted would be our output in the very near future, if you give us such legislation as will encourage the settlement of our great fertile plains. It is in the interests of the Government and the country to endeavour to secure, by means of reciprocity, that trade which is necessary to build up our country. Let me tell the few hon, gentlemen opposite, who are seeking to interrupt my remarks by scraping their desks, that I take their action as an indication that I am saying something which does not agree with them, and in that I find matter for congratulation, as no doubt our future Minister of Finance, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has found cause for congratulation, in the abuse which has been so lavishly dealt out to him this session by the ultra-Tories and protectionists. Thanking the House for their kind attention, I shall now resume my seat.

Mr. FRECHETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, as this is the first time I have had the honour of taking the floor, I beg the indulgence of both sides

I think were I to keep silent on this important question I would not be doing what is right towards my constituents, who elected me during my absence in Italy. I will begin by saying a few words in answer to the hon, member for Maskinongé (Mr. Legris). According to him, protection should have built up manufactories in his county, because that would have been a good thing for the hon, member. He also spoke of railways. I must say that if we have great railways in the country we owe them to the Conservative party. The Liberal party was always opposed to the building of these railways as well as to all the great national enterprises. Mr. Speaker, we have already discussed for a month the great question of the Budget. It is a very important question, and one which deserves to be discussed. The hon. Minister of Finance has announced this year a surplus of more than $3,000,000. is just what riles our opponents. If we had had a deficit they would have been satisfied. The programme of the Liberals is to find fault with what is well. In the last twelve years we have had 24 millions of surplus, and we have to congratulate the Government on such a result. It was said, Mr. Speaker, that the expenditure had increased. It is true that the expenditure has increased by some millions of dollars; but we have something to show for them. Under the Administration of Hon. Mr. Mackenzie the expenditure increased also, but there were deficits of a couple of millions yearly. I am in business, and as a business man I consider it is better to spend 36 millions and have a surplus than to spend 24 millions and have a deficit. That is my policy. Mr. Speaker, for more than a month we have been talked to about protection. I can tell this House that protection has saved the country. It is said that protection never gave any one his dinner, but protection has given many the means of making money. I remember, Mr. Speaker-I was a young man then-I remember days, weeks, months and years of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie's Administration, from 1873 to 1878. I was then beginning my career in business, and I can speak with full knowledge of those times. The workman was without work; there was no market for the farmer; flour was $8 to $10 a barrel. Money was very scarce, and commanded 8 and 12 per cent. of interest. My hon, friend the member for Arthabaska said the other day that money is dear. He ought to remember that in 1878, in his own county, money was at 15 and 20 per cent. on notes, and one had to take off one's cap to get it. Well, if to-day you can get it for much less, so much the better. Mr. Speaker, I want to be short. I am a new member in this House, and I do not want to take time at this late hour of the night. However, I must tell you that I am a merchant, a manufacturer and a farmer at the same time. I can prove to this House and to the country that in 1878 the farmers paid dearer for wheat they bought for their daily needs and for their table. I was a merchant at the time, and I remember that from 1873 to 1878 we sold Japan tea for 55 cents a pound, and now I sell the same tea for 45 cents. We then sold sugar, brown sugar

An hon. MEMBER. (Translation.) What is brown sugar?

Mr. FRÉCHETTE. It is sugar to sweeten your of the House to find fault with. Much noise is tea. We sold in 1875 for 10 cents a pound, and until a few days ago the present price of it was 7 the McKinley Bill has not had altogether the result Mr. Fréchette.

Now that the duties are abolished we sell cents. it for 5 cents. Dried apples were selling for 12 cents a pound; they are now 9 cents. Flour was $7 and $8 a barrel; now it is $5 and $6. I can prove that. My knowledge of business is not only from theory but from practice. Should any one on the other side of the House deny my statement I am ready to produce my bills. Cotton warp, which farmers buy every day to make flannel, sold for 45 cents per pound in 1878; it sells to-day for 35 cents per pound. It is protection which has done White cotton used to sell for 14 cents, we sell it to-day for 10 cents. Shirting sold for 16 cents: it now sells for 12 cents. Print sold for 16 cents; it now sells for 12 cents. Canadian tweed, which is an article of importance for our farmers, is now satisfactorily manufactured. My clothes are of that tweed, and I am proud to wear them. That tweed, which sold for $1.20 in 1878, sells now for 90 cents or $1. Waggous sold for $75; we sell Ploughs sold for $9; we sell them now for $50. them to-day for $7. Scythes sold for $1.20; they are now $1. Mowers were $80; they are now $50. Nails, which the farmers need for building, sold in 1878 for $5; they now sell for $3.50. Axes which we sold for $1.15 we now sell for 90 cents. Coal oil, of which so much has been said, used to sell for 50 cents in 1873, and we sell it now for 20 to 25 cents, Imperial measure. - Woollen - underware, which sold at 75 cents, are now sold at 50 cents, Wincey, which sold for 16 cents, now sells for 10 cents. Pianos and harmoniums, which then sold at $200 and $250, are now 40 per cent. cheaper, because they are manufactured in the country. The tariff is therefore in favour of the farmer, and I will prove to you later that the farmers' products sell higher to-day than they did in 1878. The hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) spoke of the tax on flour. It is a great cry in the Province of Quebec, which is sounded very high during elec-The hon, member says that the Province of Quebec imported 167,000 barrels of flour, representing a value of $597,000, and that the farmer paid $88,000 on that flour. I regret to say that the hon, member is not well informed. I am a flour merchant, and I sold as many as 36 car loads of flour a year, and I must say that I never bought a car load of American flour. Therefore, I paid no duty, and the farmers who bought it paid no duty. As a proof that we pay no duty, I will say that flour sells at $6.50 in the United States and we sell it for $6. Perhaps some of the provinces pay duty on flour, but I know that the Province of Quebec pays none, because we buy no flour from the United But supposing that the Province of Quebec should suffer from this, revenues are needed to carry on a Government, and if we had not such a protection Manitoba would not grow wheat in such large quantities, and we would have to apply to the United States for it. Mr. Speaker, during the last election campaign I heard clamourings on all the hustings against the tax on sugar and on flour. It was the programme of the The hon. Minister of Finance has just Liberals. abolished the whole duty on raw sugar. If he had removed the tax on flour the Government would still be criticized. Well, there must be something for the hon, gentlemen on the other side of the House to find fault with. Much noise is made about the McKinley Bill. I must say that which the Liberals were hoping for. Although they claim to be in favour of the people, they would have liked to see the McKinley Bill kill the farmers of the Province of Quebec. Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, all the articles reached by the McKinley Bill sell higher to-day than last year, and I must say this is not pleasing to our opponents. Potatoes, eggs, hay and sheep sell higher this year than they did last year. The only article upon which the Bill is detrimental to the Province of Quebec, is horses. I must say that it is not the McKinley Bill which interferes with the sale of our horses, but it is the use of electricity which decreases the demand for It is not the protective tariff which prevents the sale of horses, but the lack of demand in The hon, member for Arthabaska has said that the Province of Quebec is a very poor province. I believe that the hon, member did not think of his country when he said that. He said that land had decreased in value by half, and was so depreciated that those who held mortgages did not dare enforce the sale, because they feared they could not realize the amount of their debt. hon, member refers to the Credit-Foncier. been inspector of this company, and I have made loans whenever the opportunity presented itself. It is a company that makes no loans when it is not sure to recover its funds, and it makes a great number of loans. The company is not obliged to sue the farmers in order to be paid; they pay without that, and, while paying, still make money.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Their means of making money is to go to the United States.

Mr. FRECHETTE. (Translation). I believe there are many in the United States who would rather not be there. I think it is very bad to depreciate one's country, through prejudice and party spirit. happy to say in support of my position that the Province of Quebec is not so poor as the hon. member for Arthabaska has said; that in my county one-fourth of the farmers loan money, and three-fourths live in easy circumstances. People are well off; they have good stock and good land. Their lands are not mortgaged to their creditors to the extent we are told. I would like to see the hon, member for Arthabaska go into the district of Megantic; he would see that three-fourths of the farms are not mortgaged; many are mortgaged for a good reason. A father of a family has a good farm; he wants to establish his son; he must naturally borrow $500, $600, or $1,000, and he has to give a mortgage. do not call this a mortgage, when he borrows in order to buy property. Our farmers are well off. You can enter any house in the townships of my county and you will see a good table, as at a seigneur's, and a piano or a harmonium, in threefourths of the houses. Our farmers have good vehicles, good horses. Our people are not poor.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) They are gentlemen.

Mr. FRECHETTE. (Translation.) All gentlemen It is said that the population decreases in my county, and that people are so poor they are obliged to go to the United States. Well, since the last census population has increased over three thousand. This does not signify that we are growing poorer or that the population is going to the United States. They have spoken long and often on the other side of the House on the subject of economy during the last month.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) A word about Bancroft.

Mr. FRÉCHETTE. (Translation.) I will speak of Mr. Mercier; it is as good. They speak of economy; they ought to speak of the Province of Quebec, where the expenses are over one million more that they were before. That is the economy of the great party that was to save the province, and which increased the expenditure by over a million a year. If we had two or three Governments like that we would have to take the road to the United States.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) I challenge the hon, member to prove this.

Mr. FRECHETTE. (Translation.) It is said on the hustings that it is the Liberal party which works for the bread of the poor. We have a I say that such is not the truth. sample of that policy at Quebec. If there is an extravagant Government it is the Province of Quebec which has it. Mr. Speaker, this great Liberal party which claims to give bread to the poor is trying to get to power by all kinds of means. In order to reach it, it hunts up scan-True, they cannot reach it otherwise than by scandals. We all know this great Liberal party which, once in power, is to work in the interest of the farmers; once there, all their policy is to borrow and spend. The hon, member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) said the other day in his speech that we have no other market for our sheep than that of the United States. Well, our best market is England. The hon, member was perfectly right as to lambs; but for old sheep the market is England. They sell there from $6 to $10 a head; while in the United States they only bring from $4 to $6. England at one time found itself in the same position as we do ourselves to-day. It did not produce enough for its consumption. England did not say: We must annex ourselves to the United States, to Germany, or to Denmark. It said: We must produce as much as we spend, and it did.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I call the gentlemen on the right to order. There is no hearing what is being said for the noise.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon, gentlemen should not throw paper; besides being unseemly, it is dangerous.

Mr. FRECHETTE. (Translation.) I must say, Mr. Speaker, that we have a fine country, and when it is said that the country is poor, I say that is not the truth. When we have in the savings bank an increase of $1,700,000 in a single year, I say that our country is not poor. Mr. Speaker, I must give my constituents my political programme; I must say that I have always been a Liberal-Conservative, and that I am glad of being so. I approve the course of the present Government in looking to an agreement with the American Government for a treaty of agricultural reciprocity, without giving a single inch of ground. If articles are allowed to pass on fair exchange, well and good. I must say that I have in my county an important industry. I refer to the asbestus mining. Last year this industry paid $36,000 per month in salaries, or $360,000 for ten months. More than $1,000,000 worth of asbestus was sold. There was paid besides $3,700 to Sherbrooke firms for supplies. From $25,000 to $50,000 were spent for machinery. This industry employs 1,500 men, who are paid $1 a day. It consumes 200 tons of coal a month, amounting to $1,000, besides 200 cords of wood a month, amounting to $500. I say that this industry gives a considerable market to the farmers. What did the charitable Quebec Government do? This Government, which was to give to the country all possible protection, and favour all interests when it should get into power! Well, it imposed a tax of $3 per $100 on the asbestus quarried. This of $3 per $100 on the asbestus quarried. Government which was to give bread to the poor, in imposing such a tax, exposes him to the risk of having the mines closed. I, myself, sold a mine, and when in England I met the persons to whom I had sold it. They told me I had not deceived them, that the mine was as represented, but that if the thing was to be done over again they would not buy, because the Quebec Government had imposed that tax; and, they added, if only the matter was to stop there, but who can say that the Government next year will not impose an additional tax of $3. I say that this is not what the Quebec Government had promised to do. industry is still in its infancy, and instead of imposing this tax it ought rather to have given a premium per ton in order to help its development. I say that the Government of the Province of Quebec should give a premium of $1 per ton, not to the mines already opened and in full operation, but to those that are being opened. But more than this, Mr. Speaker: this same Government of the Province of Quebec imposes a tax of $150 on the companies for the privilege of keeping powder on the ground. This is arbitrary, and contrary to the interests of the province. Conservative Government had imposed a tax of $50, and never collected it. The Liberal party imposed a tax of $150, and collects it. Such is the party which is to save the country. I must say now that the farmer is protected enough. I proved a moment ago that what he consumes to-day he can buy cheaper than in 1873 and 1878. I will now establish that for what he has to sell the prices are higher than there were in 1873 and 1878. When I went home last week I met a farmer who told me he had sold his pork for $8 a hundred weight. I was astonished at this high price for pork, and asked him where he had sold it, and he answered that he had sold it at the mine. current prices for farmers' produce are the following: Pork, $7 to $8 per 100 lbs.; butter, 15c. to 20c. per pound; potatoes, 50c. to 60c. per bushel; oats, 50c. to 60c. per bushel; hay, $8 to $10 per ton.

An hon. MEMBER. (Translation). You don't spare the miners.

Mr. FRECHETTE. (Translation). Well, it is the farmers who sell, but if the miner had no work the half of those prices would still be too high. This tax on the mines has done immense harm to the Province of Quebec in paralyzing capital. It has prevented English capitalists from coming and putting money into the mines of the country. They are afraid of new taxes. Forsooth, nothing assures us that next year the taxes will not be \$10 per 100. We have a good country. I have had the pleasure of travelling over a part of the United States last year-New England-Ireland, England, France, Italy, and I must say that Canada is as has better laws than ours. We have good educational institutions, and yet some want to unite us to the United States. That country is represented to us as very prosperous. Well, there are more failures in the United States than in Canada; therefore, affairs are worse there. There were last year, in the city of New York alone, more than 60,000 persons working for 60 cents a day, and working fifteen hours a day. Here, in Canada, the workman is not treated in that way. His days are ten hours, and there is a movement to reduce it to nine. It is said that land in our country is covered with mortgages. I visited the United States, and I can say that in that country land is mortgaged for $\frac{8}{10}$. In the Province of Quebec the figure is only $\frac{2}{10}$. There are 23,000 persons in New York and I for the Province of States. York who were evicted for having no money to pay their rent. Do we see such a state of things in the Province of Quebec? Surely not. I am in favour of the policy of railways. The more railways we build the more prosperous the country will be. Such is the country to which we are wanted to unite our destinies. Well, Mr. Speaker, I pray to Providence that the Conservative party may remain many years yet in power, so that our children may grow—for I remember too well the years from 1873 to 1878. I conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by thanking the hon, members on both sides of the House. Perhaps I have taken a little too much time, but I have done so in the interest of my county. I am in favour of protection for all classes and especially for the farmers, such as is given them by the Government; and if I was a farmer on a large scale I would ask to continue protection and to increase it. I hope that the National Policy of Sir John Macdonald will be continued for many years yet. We will all be faithful to the Conservative flag, and to the policy which insures the future of the country.

Mr. PROULX. (Translation.) At this late hour of the night I will not be long, for I perceive from the last speech which was delivered, and which no one could follow, that the hon. members are tired of this debate. I consider it my duty to express my views on the question which has been debated before the House for the last month, in order to show what motives will have determined my vote, and to prove to my county, which is an essentially agricultural county, my solicitude for its interests. It is with pleasure that I rise to support the motion for the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), which proposes a modification of the policy advocated by the hon. This policy, as many have members opposite. observed, which was intended to favour everybody, has done no good at all, and has reduced the country to a degree of poverty from which it will be hard for it to rise. Mr. Speaker, which is the class the most indispensable to the needs of the country? Is it not the farming class, which made the country what it is, and which every day brings forth life by cultivating the soil and in making it fruitful? The needs the most to be cared for are those of agriculture, which sustains life and produces our daily bread. His Excellency the Governor General said, at the opening of the session of 1878, that he saw with pleasure that the times had not been as bad in this country as they had in prosperous as any of those countries. Our constitution gives us great liberties. No country in the world tural than manufacturing, that was the reason why Mr. Frechette.

it had yielded enough to feed its population. This is a proof that our country is essentially agricultural, and in order to promote the progress of the country, it is absolutely necessary to protect this class indispensable to its prosperity. I say indispensable, for if agriculture is not successful, if it is not favoured, if it does not get justice, the country will suffer. I contend, Mr. Speaker, country will suffer. that the policy advocated and carried out by the hon, gentlemen opposite, and followed by Parliament since 1878, is detrimental to the interests of the country in general, detrimental to the agricultural community, to those which it ought to favour and treat with justice as being a class indispensable for the country's progress, in order to put a stop to emigration which is becoming alarming. Is the policy of the hon, gentlemen opposite calculated to remedy the evil? Is it calculated to foster industry, agriculture? Is that policy calculated to cure the disease which thins out our ranks, and makes us weaker every day? Mr. Speaker, during the last elections, what did we hear preached everywhere? In the County of Prescott, the electors were told: Mind the Liberals! Beware of annexation! They want to annex you to the United States! Mr. Speaker, I believe that should annexation come, the cause of it would be the policy inaugurated by the Conservative party, because it forces the Canadians to emigrate to the United States. They are forced by necessity and their wants to abandon their goods and their houses and go to the United States. Poverty is what forces them to go; because they cannot sell their produce at its proper value, and therefore cannot meet their obligations and pay their debts. Such is the reason why we see so many thousand Canadians go to the United States. It is not because they do not like the country that they leave it. The proof is that as soon as they have earned a little money they like to come back and see the natal village. I am of opinion, Mr. Speaker, that the policy followed by the Government since 1878, is the cause of the emigration from which we suffer, and the cause of this, that before long we will all be gradually annexing There is to-day but a comparatively small number of Canadians in the United States, but before long, perhaps, it is my opinion, all the Canadians will have gone to the United States, forced by the circumstances. Mr. Speaker, where is the best market for Canada? I have here a very remerkable article on the position of the farmer, which I find in La Sentinelle, of Montmagny. Here is an extract of that article:

"Generally the farmer does not think enough of the nobility and importance of the position which he holds in society. Unfortunately it is to be owned that, until recent times, our rulers contributed by their inaction to inspire him with this discouragement which may become a cause of ruin for the agricultural industry. Counted until now as an inferior class of society, left without means of vivifying their minds by a sound and practical education, put thereby out of the way of protecting their interests in the councils of the nation, deprived then of the share of advantages enjoyed by the other classes of society, the farmers had come to despise a calling so little appreciated.

"This is what explains this unfortunate emigration which has already, to such a deplorable extent, thinned out our rural population. Man may do anything when hopes of victory or glory stimulate his ardour, but he also becomes powerless if he does not expect a success proportionate to the vigour of his efforts.

"Fortunately a government conscious of the all powerful influence of the farmer on the destinies of French Canada, has taken the reins of power. During the short space of four years, the Mercier Government has given a 971 considerable impulse to agriculture, in calling the agriculturist to a participation of the public inonours, in decorating the laureates of labour with the palms of merit. The rights and hopes of the settlers are protected by the laws which govern the Crown lands; rules of equal justice for all have taken the place of the frauds which used to be committed by those entrusted with the distribution of colonization funds. Communication has become easier, and less costly, owing to the improvement of the roads, and the construction of iron bridges; education is given gratuitously to all classes of society, finally the attention of the foreigner is drawn to our forest, mining and agricultural resources, by all the means at the disposal of an intelligent Administration, anxious to promote public inintelligent Administration, anxious to promote public in-intelligent Administration, anxious to promote public interest.

"This recognition, tardy, but all the more creditable to those who show it now, of the merit of agriculture is the secret of the preservation of our nationality, our institutions, our customs, our laws shall be safely guarded where the French Canadian people is proud of its position in the political world, when it prides itself upon the role it is called upon to play in society, when it cherishes the country which its arduous labour shall have made fruitful, and when it is attached to the land of its birth, where rest all its hopes of a happy future."

where rest all its hopes of a happy future.

Now you see, Mr. Speaker, that this newspaper, which is an authority, agrees with me in what I believe to be the cause of the emigration of our people to the United States. During the last federal elections I was somewhat struck the fact that the friends of the Conservative party came into the County of Prescott, which I have the honour to represent, and promised restricted reciprocity. That is to say, they came and said to us, since 1878 until to-day we have had a policy which we thought was favourable to the farmers and the country in general, we have thought this policy was acceptable and calculated to favour all classes of society. But to day we come and say we were mistaken. We come and tell you that the policy of the Government which has been adopted in 1878 is not the one which should have been followed and accepted as we have caused it to be accepted. Now, when the elections are over, we will give you restricted reciprocity, we promise you that a new treaty will be made between the Government and the United States, and you shall have the facility of disposing of your natural products. Now, Mr. Speaker, if it is necessary to-day that we should have the American market for the disposal of our natural products, it was just as necessary we should have had it since 1878 as to-day. Therefore, we have suffered through the adoption of the National Policy, the would-be aim of which was to promote our interests. If the American market is necessary for the disposal of our natural products, if the interests of agriculture require it, then we must have been suffering for the want of it. But will that promise be redeemed? After the fruitless trip of last spring, will another trip in the fall be productive of more good? I do not think so. The answer given by the Secretary of State of the United States is sufficient to make me believe that the promise made during the elections will not be any more realized in the month of October than it was just after the elections. Then, Mr. Speaker, we have a right to say that the policy of protection extolled and carried out by the Conservative party did not have even the confidence of that party, since they went back on it during the elections, promising to the people a treaty that they had already cried down. The Conservative party could not then have been sincere in what they had said; they could not have had any confidence in the policy which they had pretended was to be so good for the country. Mr. Speaker, as a proof that our neighbours' market would be advantageous to the Canadian farmers, I made a comparative table of our farm exports to the United States and to England for 1890. These figures show that there would be much more sense in opening a market for our products in the United States than in going to Europe or China for such. I repeat it, and it is easy to understand, it is only common sense, that a market with our neighbours is preferable to a market several thousand leagues away. Here are the figures:

Exported horses, United States, in	ı 1890	16,118
" England		. 125
Exported sheep, United States		251,640
" England	46

" England		27,132

United States in 1890		11,219,043
Total imports from United States	into Canada.	5,343,120

Difference..... $5,875,923

Well, Mr. Speaker, these figures show the importance of the American market. They show that the greatest part of our agricultural exports go to the United States. If we consider now the duties paid on our exports to the United States in 1890, we come to the following figures:—

Horses at $30 per head$	483,540
Sheep	62,910
Barley.	149,091
Hav	406.852
Potatoes	263,307
Total$1	,365,700

This sum was paid by our shippers and went into the American treasury. If such a state of things is calculated to do us good, if, having to pay such high duties is calculated to enrich us, I understand nothing about it. It is for me an unfathomable mystery. I heard the hon, member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins) and many other hon, members on the right, try to convince us that neither the consumer nor the shipper was affected by these duties; that it is a system that enriches everybody, while no one is the worse for it. Well, then, how is it that they tell us: If you accept free trade, you will be forced to accept direct taxation, seeing that, according to these hon, gentlemen, neither the consumer nor the shipper pays any duty? Now, Mr. Speaker, whatever is paid on our exports to the United States, and whatever is paid on the American exports into Canada, must surely be paid by somebody. What we pay every year on our exports, is so much that the American Government is richer by. The hon. gentlemen opposite pretend that such a policy is beneficial. It is surely an extraordinary pretension. The hon, member for L'Islet (Mr. Desjardins) tried to make us believe that the value of land has not I remember that fourteen years ago, properties which are next to mine, in my county and township, were worth from $7,000 to $8,000, and this year $2,000 could not be had for them. No price will be offered. What is the reason? It is because property does not pay. Go where you please, and you will see the finest farms, farms which cost $6,000 or $7,000, selling for half their throughout the country. Mr. PROULX.

Why? It is because agriculture will not pay. Well, what can you expect? When hay sells at $4 a ton, when the stables are full of horses eating up the produce of the land, do you think that the man who has a family to support, and payments to meet, can easily do so? Such is the reasons you see so many Canadians leaving for the United States. If you should travel over the County of Prescott, as I did during the last election, you would find from a-quarter to a-half of the houses closed, doors nailed up. Where have the owners gone? They have taken the road to the United States. It is deplorable to see such a state of things, Mr. Speaker; but after all an honest man forced by circumstances, and under the necessity of earning a few dollars to pay his debts, has to emi-Now, Mr. Speaker, if one can find in the grate. Now, Mr. Speaker, if one can find in the United States such opportunities to earn money which he will afterwards come to spend in his own country and meet his obligations honourably with, there must also be money there to pay for our produce, to help us cultivate our lands, to fertilize them, to re-people them, and give bread to a number of families that are in need. Now, Mr. Speaker, when the prospects of a crop are good, when land is ready to yield, joy fills the heart of everybody, travellers, merchants, professional men; because the harvest promises enough to meet the wants of our families. Therefore prosperity depends upon agriculture, since the appearance of a good crop insures easy times to the merchant; good crops mean that the merchant will be able to collect, mean that the farmer will have money with which to meet his obligations; contentment is with everyone and it is expected that the coming year will be one of ease and comfort. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the prosperity of the country depends largely upon agriculture, and I contend that the policy followed by the hon. gentlemen opposite is not such as to meet the requirements of the great agricultural family, whose prosperity is so necessary to the progress of the country. The hon. members on the right think that they can be unjust to and ill-treat a certain class of society to the benefit of another; these hon, members think that the farmers do not understand their policy; they believe that the ignorance of the farmers of this country will not allow them to understand the injustice done them. Well; the last elections have been sufficient to show how much there is in that. They have shown that they understand more than is thought, and at the next elections they will know how to reverse the situation, they will know how to recompense by their vote those who will have worked in their interest. Well, Mr. Speaker, I said when I began that I would not be long, and I will conclude these few remarks. I have given the reasons which will make me support the motion of the hon, member for South Oxford. that as long as intrigue will be rampant amongst the hon, members on the right, as long as undue speculations will be carried on for personal profit and party advantages, as long as an honest and open policy is not adopted by men entrusted with the government of the country, the country will remain as it is to-day, poor, depressed and hopeless of prosperity. Such are the reasons why I support the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford, and the policy of the hon leader of the Opposition, whose talents and honesty inspire confidence House divided on amendment of Sir Richard Cartwright:

That all the words after the word "That" be left out and the following inserted instead thereof:—" the situation of the country requires that the Government should forthwith reduce all duties on articles of prime necessity, and more particularly on those most generally consumed by artizans, miners, fishermen and farmers, and further, that the negotiations which the House has been informed are to open at Washington in October next should be conducted upon the basis of the most extended reciprocal freedom of trade between Canada and the United States, in manufactured as well as natural products.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 29th July, 1891.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 145) to further amend the Electoral Franchise Act.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2.

Mr. CHARLTON. Would the Minister of Justice explain this section?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The object is to give until the 15th August, instead of until the 1st August, for completing the preliminary revision.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would that apply to the revision this year?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

On section 3.

Mr. BORDEN. I am informed that some of the revising barristers take the view that names that are on the old list shall be left off the new list. For instance, the names of farmers' sons are left off, unless they appear on the assessment roll for proper qualification. It seems to me that this would be manifestly wrong, and, as I have already spoken privately to the Minister of Justice about it, I would like now to get an expression of opinion on the subject.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand the hon, member for King's (Mr. Borden) to state that the revising officers are not disposed to allow the qualification of farmers' sons, unless their names appear with a sufficient qualification in their own right on the assessment roll. Of course if they did not so appear, that would prevent them getting on the list at all.

Mr. BORDEN. I refer to the names which are on the old list.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They ought not to be struck off if the father has a qualification.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As the hon, gentleman states to me, and as the newspapers of the county he represents allege, the point is, that the revising officer is now striking off, and has struck off, the names of all farmers' sons in the district who do not appear on the assessment roll. The revising officers compel a special application to be made to retain the name already on the list. If the revising officer chooses to be a very technical man there seems some ground for this action in the first clause of the Act to amend the Revised Statutes, chapter 5, respecting the Electoral Franchise, passed in 1890. The revising officers argue from this clause, that a special application is necessary to retain the name on the lists, as well as to put it on in the first instance. My own impression is that this is a strained application of the Act. It seems to me that if the farmer's son is on the list, that it should not be taken off by the revising officer of his own motion. unless an application was made to strike it off. If the father's name is on the assessment roll, a son's name has a right to be on the electoral list, unless application is made by some person to strike it off. The revising officer can have no evidence before him to justify him in striking off the name, unless an application is made by some person who makes a declaration that the name should not be on the list.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think a difficulty would ise in this way. The revising officer must have arise in this way. some evidence that these people are entitled to go on the list. For instance, the assessment roll is the basis of first placing upon the list those who are entitled to go on by property qualification. the names of a farmer's sons have appeared on the previous voters' list, it does not follow, as a matter of course, that they are entitled to go on the new They may have left the residence of their father, or they may have left the electoral district altogether, and may not be entitled to go on the list. The practice in the Province of Ontario is this: Where a man has a sufficient property qualification to entitle his sons to go on the list, the amount of the assessment appears on the which a great deal of difficulty has been experienced. Sir John Thompson.

assessment roll, and the sons' names appear on the assessment roll along with that of their father. It seems to me it would be very dangerous to assume that all those whose names were on the last voters' lists as the sons of farmers, are entitled to go on the new list, simply because their fathers have the necessary qualification. It might be just as properly said that an income voter should be entitled to go on the new list because he was on the old list. The practice in my county is, that no income voter's name is put on the new list who has been on the previous list unless the assessment roll shows that he is suffificiently assessed for income to entitle him to go on the list: otherwise a new application must be made. If that is right as regards income voters, surely it would be equally right as regards the sons of owners or farmers, because these people do not go on because of any property qualification which they have of their own, but simply because they are the sons of owners having a sufficient property qualification, and are living with their fathers. Suppose between the time the last voters list has been made up and the next revision they have left their fathers' home and become owners themselves, or gone out of the country altogether, surely it would not be argued that they would be entitled as a matter of course to go on the list because they had been on the previous list.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me that the assessment roll is simply one of the sources of information of which the revising officer is bound to avail himself of in making up his list. Of course there are mutations from year to year, such as mutations of ownership.

Mr. SPEAKER. That would be shown by the assessment roll.

There may be mutations after Mr. LAURIER. the assessment roll has been made up. The revising officer takes the list as the basis on which he proceeds, as presumptive evidence that those whose names are found there are entitled to go on the list : and if that presumption is not justified by the facts, then it devolves upon the parties to show that any names found there are not entitled to go on the list. But until that is shown, the revising officer must take all the sources of information that he has, and apply them in making up the list,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The instance given by Mr. Speaker is a perfectly good one so far as the province from which he comes is concerned. He says that if any income voter's name does not appear on the assessment roll, the revising officer should strike it off the voters' list. That may be the case in the Province of Ontario, if that fact is evidence that the voter is not receiving the But it is not the case in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, where neither the name of the income voter nor that of the farmer's son appears on the assessment roll at all. They are put on the voters' list in the first instance by virtue of a special application, accompanied by a statutory declaration that they are entitled to go on the list; and when that is done the presumption is that they are entitled to remain there, until the revising officer has evidence to justify him in striking them off.

Mr. CURRAN. This discussion brings up the question with reference to income voters, about

I know that some officers are striking off all the names of income voters and waiting for new applications to be made to have them put on again. There is something to be said in favour of that view also, because the parties on one side or the other have an interest in looking after the lists. But should the burden be thrown on them of striking off names, or should the burden of asking for a vote be put upon the man who wants to get his name on the list? If a vote is worth having it is worth asking for, and the whole burden of attending to the proper making of the list ought not to be thrown upon the sitting member or prospective candidates. The very discussion shows that some sort of rule ought to be made as to whether the revising officer should retain the names of farmers' sons or income voters, or strike them off until a new application is made; because there is a vast difference of opinion in various sections of the country on this subject. I think the revising officer in my district gave notice in the newspapers that all income voters would be struck off, and that a new application would have to be made to have any of them put on. Therefore, it is just as well that the law should be made clear as to whether farmers' sons, owners' sons and income voters will be obliged to make a new application or not.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I do not think this discussion is quite in keeping with the section which we are considering. It simply provides that the name of a voter can be struck off the list with respect to one qualification, or that the revising officer can retain it. I think we can pass this section without any reference to the point raised by the hon, member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). It is true a different practice prevails among the different revising officers in the Province of Ontario with regard to the retention of income voters and farmers' sons. Some hold that all who apply to be put on the list in respect of income should get up a new declaration; others hold that they should not strike off any name with respect to income, but that that should be left to the different parties. I submit that the discussion is not in keeping with the section under consideration.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). There is no doubt that the hon member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) has caught the intention of this clause. In fact, I suggested, to a member of the Sub-Committee, that a difficulty had occurred in my riding just as he has stated. It was a question whether the revising officer had power to retain the individual on the voters' list at the final revision, when there was an appeal to strike him off, if he was qualified under another form. It is for the purpose of obviating that difficulty this clause is intro-With reference to the question raised by Mr. Speaker, I would remind my hon, friends from the Fast that the names are not finally struck off by the revising officer, but are, in the first place, put upon the list to be struck off at the subsequent revision. That, therefore, is notice to all the parties that if they do not appear before the revising officer, on the final revision, to protect their interests, their names will then disappear from To come back to the primary principle of forming these lists, it would be almost might be advisable for us to take some action. simpler, so far as Ontario is concerned, if Many a farmer in a township, in the riding instead of requiring the revising officer to take which I represent, has asked to have his son's the old lists he had simply gone to the assessment roll for the current year and taken from that roll an entirely new list, to be supplemented by the declarations furnished to him in addition to those he found upon the list. That would be much more simple. Then let the parties apply whose names are not on the list, because they will have to appear before him finally to preserve their rights. Now, if we retain the farmers' sons upon the final list without placing them upon the list, to be struck off where their names do not appear on the assessment roll, we would be discriminating in their favour against those who are on as owners, because the practice has been that when an owner's name does not appear on the subsequent assessment roll of property, the revising officer enquires into the facts and places that name upon the list to be struck off at the final revision, if there is no evidence to the contrary. I do not see how we can possibly secure a list that could be made fairly fresh and correct without adopting some such system. But the clause under consideration, I agree with the hon, member for Brockville (Mr. Wood), was intended for an entirely different purpose.

Mr. BARRON. I think the practice spoken of by my hon, friend is really the practice which has been adopted by the greater number of revising officers throughout Ontario. The revising officer does, it is true, look at the last Dominion list, but he takes the assessment roll, and if a name which is on the Dominion list is not on the assessment roll, he does not put it on the new list. In other words, the assessment roll is prima facie evidence, and the revising officer goes entirely by it. With regard to leaving names on, such as income voters, farmers' sons, &c., unless there was some evidence to take them off, why, in a very few years you would have a tremendous list, because we all know the difficulty there is getting evidence to strike the names off, and unless the revising officer strikes them off by his own motion, by reason of their not being on the assessment roll, in a short time you would have an extremely long list of voters. I am speaking not only my views, but those of the revising officers of the county to which I belong. I confess that when I first gave consideration to the matter, I thought the proposal that the revising officer should strike off income voters of his own motion, was rather arbitrary, but on consideration I find it was right, for the reasons I have mentioned. The House will, perhaps, remember that there is an Act of Ontario which provides that farmers' sons may, if they see fit, not be placed upon the list as farmers' sons at all, but they are represented on the assessment roll, with their fathers, as owners of land, and then they go upon the Dominion franchise list, not as farmers' sons, but as owners of In consequence of this Act, there might be difficulty in preparing the Dominion lists. A person is put on the list as an owner because in the assessment roll he is so entered under the Ontario Act, whereas, as a matter of fact, he is not an owner, according to the Dominion Elections Act at all, but a farmer's son. Hence he will have asked to be entitled to vote under a qualification which, in point of fact, he has not got. In view of that Ontario Act, which was passed two years ago, it name entered on the assessment roll, not as farmer's sons, but as owners with him, and under the law the assessor is obliged to do This man will then be transferred to the Dominion list as an owner, provided the value of the land is sufficiently high to enable him to be placed on the list; and when he goes to vote as farmer's son, under the Dominion list, he will find himself entered with the qualification which he ought not to have. The clause five was put in the Bill by me, and it was I who proposed it to the Sub-Committee, at the suggestion of my hon, friend behind me. The former law provided that, in the preparation of the first list, the revising officer should not remove any name, if the party had a qualification other than that given him on the list, unless the name was contested. Now, that statute was repealed, and the law has stood up to the present, that only from the preliminary list could the revising officer change that man's qualification to the proper one, provided he had another qualification than that which appears opposite his name. law to-day, however, will not allow the revising officer at a court to say: Here is a gentleman who comes, having given the fourteen days' notice, to be entitled to vote as an income voter, but it turns out, in the course of examination, that he has been only in Canada for the last eleven months and that twelve months' residence is required by law. It also turns out that, a week or two ago, he bought a piece of land which entitles him to vote; and the revising officer, if this Bill becomes law, will have the right to put this man's name on the list as owner, although he has not the qualification of income voter. It has been suggested, that, perhaps, this discussion is not justified by the section, but I would ask the attention of the Minister of Justice for a moment. This suggestion comes not from me, but from a revising barrister. If I may be allowed to go back to that clause without being out of order, it is substituting the 15th August for the 1st August. has been suggested that the provision should be "up to, and not later than the 15th August," because the revising officer is always being bothered by being asked to receive declarations after the time fixed by the statute. The law says that he shall make up his list as soon as possible after the 1st August, and I would ask the Minister if he does not think it would be well to put in the words I have suggested to make the matter more clear?

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I would call the attention of the gentlemen who were on the Committee that reported this Bill, to the clause which is now under consideration. The hon, member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) has, I think, correctly taken the point that the initial discussion of this clause had no bearing upon the clause itself, but the discussion arose on this clause, because it was necessary to bring the matter to the attention of the Committee, and it was as much applicable to this clause as to any other. I understand that this third section is one which it is intended to add to the existing law. If the existing law covers the point, as I think it so does, there is no need for the secas I think it so does, there is no need for the section, though I frankly acknowledge that the wording of the section is better than the wording of the existing law. Last year a clause was proposed by myself and carried, which forms section 6 of the Act of 1890, and it seems to me that it covers the Mr. Rappon very point which is sought to be covered by the present Bill. Section 6 reads as follows:

'If it appears, on the hearing of any objection to any name on the original or a supplementary list of a polling district, that the name or qualification of the person whose name is objected to is incorrectly entered on such list, but that he possesses such qualification as entitles him to be registered thereon, the revising officer shall retain such person's name thereon, making the necessary corrections.

That means that a revising officer shall not strike off the name of any person that appears on the list, because he is not entitled to the particular qualification which appears on the list. If it appears that he has some other qualification, the revising officer will make the necessary correction. If John Smith is down on the list as an income voter, and he is objected to, he can go before the revising officer and say: It is true I am not an income voter, but I am a farmer's son, or I am a fisherman, or I am an owner of land. Then, under the section which I introduced last year, the revising officer would simply have to make the proper correction. That simply have to make the proper correction. That is the object of this section now. The provision in the Act is all right, but, if you add this section to the existing law, I do not think the revising officer will understand just what you mean. If you are going to adopt this amendment, you had better repeal the first part of section six. If it were proved that the name or the qualification was wrong under the present law, the applicant would be entitled to have it corrected. I suffered from the absence of this provision, and introduced this clause last year.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the old clause is better than the proposed amendment.

Mr. BARRON. This does not exactly meet the difficulty. If an objection is made and it appears to the revising officer that the name ought to be on the list on the ground of some other qualification than that which is mentioned, he can make it right; but what we ask the House to adopt is a provision that when a man asks for his name to be put on, he shall not be interfered with because of a wrong description of his qualifications. He gives fourteen days' notice, and there is no objection to it, and he says he wants his name put on as an income voter. The revising officer asks for evidence, the man is sworn, but it turns out that he has not the residential qualification which is required a year before he asks to have his name put on. He may have lived in Canada only eleven months, but it turns out that he has the qualification of owner. Then the returning officer says that, though he has applied to go on the list as an income voter, and is not qualified in that respect, he finds he has the qualification of owner and so puts him on. the case of an applicant asking to have his name put on the list. The question raised by my hon. friend is in regard to what is to be done when an objection is raised. What we are providing for is the case of a man who is not already on the list at all, but in regard to whom an application is made to put him on the list for the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not read the clause in the sense which it is interpreted by the hon, gentleman. The clause says:

That has no reference to the application to be put on, but only to those whose names were incorrectly entered upon the list.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). There is no doubt about that. The law is quite sufficient as it stands. I prefer the wording of the statute of 1890, and would recommend the Minister of Justice to strike out this clause altogether.

Mr. BARRON. I confess that the Bill as printed is not exactly as it was intended when the matter was brought before the special committee, and it was certainly overlooked. The point which I made was in regard to a case of an applicant asking that his name should be put on for a certain qualification, and it might turn out that he had not that for another qualification. That should be provided for.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think there is not adequate provision made for the revision of the list and the dropping off of the names of parties who are no longer entitled to remain on the list. Now, in the case of tenants, a man's tenancy may have expired and he may have gone elsewhere and another party have rented the same property. The other party has his name taken from the assessment roll and put on the voters' list along with the party who was tenant before him. If there is no formal application made to remove the name, it still remains on the list, so you have several parties entitled to vote on the same tenancy. It seems to me that the duty ought not to be imposed upon the member or upon any other particular party other than the revising officer, to see that those names are removed. I think a further provision should be made that the revising officer should see that where any party represents a tenant as having a right to go upon the list, enquiry should be made as to whether such tenant has a right to be put upon the voters' list.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think it is perfectly clear now that the section must come out. With respect to the object the hon, gentleman has in view, I think it will be met by a section in somewhat the following words:—

If, on any application to place a voter's name on the list, it appears that the applicant is not entitled under the qualification in his application, but is otherwise qualified, the revising officer may amend the application and add the name of the applicant on his real qualification.

On section 4,

Mr. CHARLTON. With respect to the notification of revising barristers of the extension of time to 15th August, I desire to ask the Government what steps will be taken to give the revising barristers the necessary notification?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. If the Bill passes this House to-day, all the barristers will be notified by telegraph at once.

Mr. CHARLTON. There is no change in the Bill that will render it difficult for the revising officers to go on with their work after 1st August, without full instructions?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I think not. The revising officers are aware by public rumour that the time would probably be extended to 15th August. They have written to the department by dozens, and they have been informed that as soon as the Bill passed they would be notified by telegraph.

Mr. BARRON. I move "That clause 2 be amended by inserting before the words 15th August 'up to but not later than.'" As the law stands it does not prevent the revising officer receiving declarations after 1st August. The proposed amendment is suggested to me by a revising officer.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I think the clause as drawn is correct. It is intended that applications should be made up to 15th August, but not later.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There can be no objection to the proposed amendment, but he would be a strange lawyer to interpret the Act as suggested by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Barron).

Mr. CHAPLEAU. As the law now stands the revising officers have no right to receive any declarations after 1st August. If the words suggested would make the clause more clear, there there can be no objection to inserting them.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If a declaration is placed in the post office on the 15th August, would the judge receive that declaration when it reached him, probably the day after?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It must be received on the 15th August and not later.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Then if it was posted on the 15th it is too late?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would suggest to the Minister of Justice that the time should be extended to the 1st September. I understand that the revising officer of the constituency that I represent takes the assessment roll of 1890, and when the list is completed this year, we have a list of voters two years old at the time it is completed. It would be desirable to extend the time, so that we would have the list made in the year in which it is said to be made. I think it would be desirable to further extend the time, so that the judge can take the assessment roll in the year in which the list is made, for it seems to me very anomalous that the list made this year is made on the assessment roll of last year. I believe that this suggestion is an important one, and ought to be considered by the House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The intention was that the list should be made on the assessment roll for the current year. We were informed in this House last year, and in the Committee this year, that the lists would be available for that purpose for the 15th August, and that being so it would be very undesirable to extend the time until the 1st September, because we should then have to change the time to complete the list beyond the 31st December, and there may be many by-elections before the next session of Parliament. I think the assessment roll is completed by the 1st August. It may not be distributed then, but the revising officers everywhere I know of make their own arrangements to have access to the list, and sometimes they have to pay a small sum in order to enable them to do that. They are certainly expected to make the preliminary list on the assessment roll of the current year.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I understood from the clerk of the township in my county, that the list would be only completed on the 1st September.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I think you will find that the extension of time to the 15th August will meet your objection.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If it does, very well.

CARPENTER. The hon, member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) is not correct. The assessment rolls in the Province of Ontario are all confirmed on the 1st July, and they are available after that date for the Dominion lists.

Mr. MULOCK. They are not printed.

Mr. CARPENTER. The preparation of the provincial lists takes place after that date, so that we have the use of them by the 15th August. That is the reason the extension of time was asked for.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to a point in connection with tenant voters. Suppose a man is a tenant in another constituency adjoining the one I represent, during the past year; if his tenancy ceases in that constituency, and he comes into the constituency in which I live, then, unless he is a resident of my constituency for twelve months before the list is revised, he cannot be placed on the assessment roll as an elector, and he is at the same time liable to be struck off the list in the riding he has resided in. On the contrary, in the case of an income voter, he can be put upon the list in any riding where he lives, if he has been a resident of If he moves into a Canada for twelve months. constituency he can be immediately put on the list, but the tenant has got to be a tenant in the riding for twelve months before he can be enrolled as a voter, even although he had been a voter in a county across the road, in which he was a tenant for years. I do not see why the same privilege should not be extended to the tenant voter as is given to the income voter.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It seems to me from what I understand of the objection of the hon. gentleman, that it is adequately met by section 3 of the Franchise Act, sub-section 4, which contains the following provision:

"Provided always, that a change or changes of tenancy during the year shall not deprive such tenant of the right to be registered on a list of voters, if such change or changes have been without any intermission of time between the tenancies, and if the several tenancies are such that would entitle the tenant to be registered on a list of voters had such tenant been in possession under any one of them, as such tenant, for the year next before the time aforesaid."

So that if he makes a change of tenancy, and is qualified as a tenant to be on the list, then he is entitled to be put on the list.

Mr. CASEY. Although his former tenancy may be in another county?

Mr. Landerkin.

Mr. McMULLEN. In my section of the country the revising barristers interpret that clause in this way: If a tenant is a tenant within the municipality and occupies one house, and within a year moves to another house in the same municipality, his name would be struck off from the ward in which he lived before as a tenant, and put on the list in the other ward. They make that clause applicable only to a tenancy within the riding in which the man has been a tenant; but the other revising officer's list is not before him, and he is pret the clause as referring to the riding in which he has been a tenant.

Mr. BARRON. With great deference to the Minister of Justice, I think he is wrong in this particular: I think the change of tenancy is construed by the revising officers and by the judges, and I think properly construed, as confined simply to the constituency in which the tenancy is when he applies to be put on the roll. If there is any doubt about that in the Minister's mind, he will see that the residential clause fixes it beyond any The change of tenancy undoubtpossible doubt. edly must be a change in regard to property within the constituency itself.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON- If the Act said so, I would change my opinion, but until it does I will

Mr. BARRON. It says that the tenant must swear that he has been a tenant within the riding for one year.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That oath has been repealed, I think.

Mr. HENDERSON. If such has been the practice in the riding of North Victoria, it is not in the county which I have the honour to represent, for I know that our 'revising officer connects a tenancy in the neighbouring county with one in our county, following the practice laid down by the hon. Minister of Justice.

Mr. JAMIESON. Without reference to the clause under discussion, I may say that I am aware that the view taken by the hon. member for North Wellington has been taken by more than one revising officer in the Province of Ontario; and although the hon. Minister of Justice is, no doubt, quite correct in reference to it, there would be no harm in making the law so clear that it would be perfectly understood by every revising officer.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We might have to pass a separate statute for each revising officer.

What my hon. friend from North Mr. CASEY. Lanark has just said I think must carry consider-The question is not how the law should be interpreted, but how it is interpreted by those who carry it out; and if the revising officers have been reading this meaning into it, the law should be so constituted that they cannot read that meaning into it any longer. I want, however, to call attention to another point. I have noticed that very often the name of one man is mentioned two or three times in the same polling sub-division where he may own separate parcels of land. There may be more than one may lead to abuse. person in the sub-division of the same name, and some person might come up and claim the right to vote after the real person had voted. I think that should be remedied, so that a man's name should. not be entered more than once for one polling subdivision.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am sure I shall bow with respect to the decision of the hon. Minister of Justice if he is fully satisfied in his own mind that the Act now provides that tenants can be put on the list in one riding after they have been tenants possessing the full privilege of the franchise in another riding. But I know that a great many revising officers do take the view that a man must not in a position to know whether the man has been vising officers do take the view that a man must a tenant or a voter in another riding. They interibe an occupant of a property in the riding for twelve months before he is entitled to be placed on the period ought to be very materially shortened, the list, though he may have been a good tenant; because it is rather too bad that a man should run in a neighbouring riding. of Justice has come to the conclusion that the law is what he states it to be, I will bow to his de-

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not think the hon. Minister of Justice will, on reflection, come to Whether such is the law or not, that conclusion. I know that some revising barristers do not so act, but hold that the tenant must have been a resident ishort enough to give qualification. for twelve months in the constituency where he seeks to have his name placed on the list. I am quite sure that the hon. Minister of Justice, in reading carefully sub-section 4 of section 3 of the Act, will come to the conclusion that he is mistaken in the first view he took. It provides that the tenant voter must be the tenant of any real property within the electoral district and must have been in possession thereof for at least one year before his being placed upon the list of voters. It is not sufficient that he has been there for eleven months or for twelve months lacking one day. So that I think the hon. Minister of Justice will find that the conclusion he hastily arrived at is not the correct one, and that the complaint of the hon, member for North Wellington is well founded. I know that in my own district at the last revision, several applications of that kind were made, and I know that they were rejected. Now, there being a doubt on this point in the minds of some revising officers, we should remove that doubt by an Act of Parliament.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I quite agree with the hon, member for West Huron as to the construction of the law; but I do not agree with him as to the policy of changing it. The jurisdiction of the revising officer is confined to the electoral district over which he has been appointed. If you give him power to consider matters arising outside of that electoral district, where are you going to limit him—to the adjoining district or to the province, or may the tenancy begin in Prince Edward Island, and continue in Ontario? To make the change suggested, would open up a great field of difficulty and trouble. I think the law as it stands is the only possible law that can be fairly and effectually carried out.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As regards the qualification being necessarily confined to the electoral district, I think the objection is well taken. hon, member for North Wellington asked me on the spur of the moment, and I answered him from a reading of the proviso; but I see that the first part of the sub-section says that the occupancy must be within the electoral district. I agree with the hon, member for Queen's, however, that it is very undesirable to alter the law. Without taking the extreme case he puts, you might have a person coming from one part of a province to another part, and claiming the right to attach his two tenancies together, and if he offered proof, there might be no opportunity to contest that proof.

Mr. CASEY. It would not be continued tenancy if he came from another district.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It might be that he gave up one place on the first day of May, and on the same day took another.

Mr. CASEY. In that case, if the hon. Minister sees objection to changing the principle, I think it has been suggested that they should remain the

But if the hon. Minister the risk of being disfranchised just because he is moved from one county to another, despite the fact that he has been continually qualified, although not in the same place. It would be easy to get over the difficulty by shortening the time, say to six months.

> Mr. CASEY. I do not see what difference it makes, or why a man should be disfranchised simply because he has moved from one place to > Mr. SPEAKER. Then you do not believe in the Ontario Act.

> Mr. CASEY. I think it is capable of amendment in that respect, most decidedly.

> Mr. LANDERKIN. As the law stands, it sometimes produces considerable hardship. I know of two parties who lived in the County of Bruce, and who, just a short time before revision, moved into the County of Grey. They were tenants in Bruce and were struck off the list, and made application to be put on the list in Grey. Their application was refused, simply because they had not been tenants in Grey for a year.

> Mr. CHAPLEAU. I wish to amend the phraseology in section 11 of the Act, so as to make it That section provides that the same more clear. revising officer may be appointed for more than one electoral district and may be appointed for a portion of any electoral district. It is absurd to say that the same officer may be appointed for several and a portion; and to make the clause read better, I wish to substitute "a revising officer" for "the same revising officer."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I propose that sub-section 7 of the Act of 1890 be amended by making it read

At the conclusion of the revising of the list, the revising officer shall, in open court, give notice of the time when and the place where he will proceed with the transcription, and shall not certify such list as correct before the expiration of the time mentioned, and such delay shall not be less than six days, during which the said list shall be accessible to the public.

In that section it is stated that the revising officer, after having held his court, shall, in open court, give notice to all parties interested that within a certain time he shall retranscribe and complete the list as revised in court. The hon, member for North York (Mr. Mulock) suggested to me that a delay should be given for that purpose, during which time the list could be inspected by the publie, and I think this amendment will meet that view.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I would like to submit to the House an amendment which has been asked by revising officers in the cities and towns. re-subdivision of polling districts by the increase of names at each revision leads to a great deal of confusion, and work and reprinting which might be avoided. And as the present sub-divisions of polling districts are pretty well known by the electorate, same. But if the number of voters would exceed 300, then the returning officer would have the right to make two polling booths in the same sub-division, placing the two as near as possible so as to prevent confusion and the unnecessary travelling of the electors. Suppose, for instance, in Halifax, polling district 15 had 250 electors, and after the revision it had 500 electors. The limits of the district would be the same, but in order to follow the intention of the Legislature, and the law that not more than 250 people should vote at the same polling place on the same day, that district would be sub-divided into two polling booths, situated near to each other, probably on two sides of the same street, and the voters list would be divided according to letters, so that all those from A to L would vote at polling booth No. 1, and those from M to Z would vote at polling booth No. 2. I am sure that in cities and towns this would prevent the necessity of reprinting the lists to a very large extent, and it would not interfere with the liberty of the electors. Of course this would only apply to cities and towns, because in the rural districts, where the population is dispersed, it would not be right to cause the electors so much unnecessary travel. It has been suggested to me by several revising officers, and especially by the revising officer of Halifax, that a clause something like this should be inserted:

In all cities and incorporated towns it shall not be necessary to sub-divide polling districts or sections thereof by reason of the number of voters in such district or section exceeding 30, but in such case the returning officer in such district may make an alphabetical division of such voters so that the division may be as nearly as possible equal, and may establish two polling booths in such division; and where the number exceeds 600, he may establish three polling booths, and so on; and such posting of the said Act as we investigate the rich this proportions of the said Act as are inconsistent with this provision are hereby repealed.

I know this would prevent the necessity of doing a great deal of printing, because, if all the names for the polling sub-division are to be reprinted, it would mean commencing the work de novo.

Mr. INGRAM. I am sorry to hear such a suggestion made. The returning officers do not know the difficulties we have to encounter. In 1887 in St. Thomas we had about 11,000 inhabitants, and twelve sub-divisions, and we never heard any complaint in regard to crowding the polling booths. At the last election there were seventeen sub-divisions, and there was a great deal of confusion. fact, the electors had forgotten the place at which to vote. I would be opposed to increasing the number of polling sub-divisions without very strong reason, and I do not think the reason has been The object should be to prevent confusion as much as possible, and then every man knows where he has to vote. According to my experience, returning officers have not a practical knowledge of the working of the Act.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) has misunderstood me. It is exactly what my hon. friend says should not be done that I want to provide against by this amendment. It is very puzzling to re-subdivide the polling sub-divisions, and, if we follow the Act, the revising officers are compelled to re-divide every sub-division that now exists. We desire to say that the polling districts that now exist shall remain, but if they include place two polling booths across the street, so that the electors may know where they have to vote.

Mr. LAURIER. I think the amendment of the hon, gentleman ought to meet the approval of this The object, I understand, is to preserve the old limits which are known to the electors and to avoid the confusion that may exist if, after every election, you have to make a new division. This is a very strong argument also against the Gerrymander Act. It might apply to counties as well as to polling districts, and the Bill which the hon. gentleman has introduced we may remember in due

Mr. INGRAM. At present the returning officers are limited by 250 names on the voters list. If I have misunderstood the hon, gentleman, I am open to correction.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I call the attention of the Minister to the effect of the clause which he is proposing, and that is to keep to the old lines. A very great difficulty arises, and every hon, gentleman must have known it in his own experience, and that is, the consecutive enumeration of the polling sub-Under the old municipal arrangement, the sub-divisions were numbered 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5, and stopped there, but here you get up to 30 or 40 throughout the riding. If you are asked what part of the riding sub-division No. 20 is in, you cannot tell at once, and that is confusing to the electorate. You get a list and you say in polling sub-division No. 27, such and such things occur. Every one will ask: Whereis polling sub-division 27 or sub-division 10? Under the old list every one knows; they are either known consecutively or from the local names. Take, for instance, the municipality of Bentinck: there is Allan Park, which is a polling place, there is Hanover, there is Elmwood, and so on through the localities in that township, and every elector in the township knows where the polls are. But you take them by consecutive numbers and it is difficult to trace them. I would like, when the Minister was going in that direction, that he would adopt the old enumeration and the old boundaries for the polling sub-divisions as they exist in the local list. The Minister will see that they have an election every year for the council, and the limits of the old polling divisions are the ones that should be observed. I have known people who were accustomed to vote in one ward under the municipal list, go to vote for the Dominion and find out that they had to go five or six miles to vote somewhere else, or not vote at all. I hope the Minister will adhere to the old line and have the enumeration confined to townships consecutively through the

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Unfortunately in doing this we would do what we want to avoid, that is to say, we would begin a new system which would be puzzling to the electors. The numbering consecutively, I admit, puzzled me at first, but it has been done by a kind of consensus of the revising officers, who had adopted all through the country the system, which is not forced upon them by the law, of numbering all the polling divisions consecutively in the whole constituency according to the number of I would not like to make a change which would be a new embarrassment, but I want, by more than 300 voters, the returning officer may | my amendment, to keep the old lines, and we will get accustomed to the numbers as well as we are accustomed to the old limits.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You cannot do that, because you have the local elections every year. You have the Dominion elections every four years, although the Minister of Justice seemed to think we may have one sooner. I would suggest to the Government, who call themselves Conservatives, that they would do well to carry out the conservative idea, and allow electors to vote on the old lines in the old places. Making a change just for the sake of change, without consulting the convenience of the electors, is, in my opinion, calculated to create confusion.

Mr. SPROULE. The member for South Grey will see that exactly the same thing is done in the municipal voters' list. They have usually one to every 200 voters, and when there are more electors, the council make a change.

Mr. McMULLEN. I agree with the proposition of the Secretary of State with regard to observing the old lines, and I am sorry to hear him announce that it is only to apply to towns and cities. In rural districts near to cities there are polling subdivisions that are largely increased in numbers, and there it becomes necessary on the part of the revising officer to make changes. Would it not be well to have a provision to extend to rural sections, where the number of votes exceeds 300, the provision to have two polling sub-divisions?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I agree with my hon. friend. The only difficulty was where to draw the line. We thought the best way was to limit that permission to incorporated towns and cities. same observation was made to me by a revising officer, that in the suburban localities the population is very large, and the same reason would apply there. If there is a suggestion made to that effect I would not object to it.

Mr. McMULLEN. In several cases, even in my own riding, where sub-divisions have taken place great confusion has existed. I have known men advanced in years who really were not able to travel from poll to poll, and when they came to a poll and found their names on the list but some four or five miles away, they had to walk that distance or not vote at all. That is a great hardship. I think it would be prudent to make the provision applicable to rural districts as well as to cities and towns, and allow the revising officer to establish two booths, one just across the road from the other, and then if they found their names were in that polling sub-division they could go to the polling booth where their names belonged.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman did that he would be vesting power in the returning officers which might be used very harshly. you had a partial returning officer he might appoint two booths two miles apart, and you could not tell what might be the result.

Mr. LANDERKIN. In some townships we have more sub-divisions than others. In South Grey the township with the smallest number of voters has the largest number of polling places. On what basis are the polling divisions arranged? Why should the smallest township have eight, and the largest one have only six?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. They are arranged for 300 voters as a maximum, and they cannot be more satisfactorily arranged otherwise. I move that the following clause be added to section 23 of the Electoral Franchise Act:-

In all cities and incorporated towns it shall not be necessary to sub-divide polling districts or sections thereof by reason of the number of names of voters in such district exceeding 300; but in every such case the returning officer of the electoral district including such cities or towns, may make an alphabetical division of such names of the voters so that the number of each division may be as nearly the same as practicable, and may establish two polling booths in such district or section, and where the number exceeds 600, three polling booths, and so on in the same proportion.

Mr. SPROULE. I would suggest that in the first line the word "all" should be struck out as not necessary.

Mr. DICKEY. The amendment says the returning officer "may" divide. In that case, if left to his discretion, he could hold one poll for 600 voters. The revising officer may or may not sub-divide. But if he does not sub-divide, the returning officer must. We should use the word "shall" instead of "may."

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would ask the Minister whethe he could not extend the provision, which I understand is now proposed with reference to cities and towns, to some parts of the rural districts where the number of voters is very numerous? If you have small polling divisions you have to make a great many lists. But if the same power was given to the returning officer which I understand is given to him in cities and towns, it would be a great con-I speak particularly of Algoma and venience. Parry Sound, where it is very difficult sometimes to arrange districts for voters lists in such a way as to suit the convenience of voters. But if the returning officer had discretion to making the polling places within the district for which a certain number of names are provided, the public convenience would be served and I do not see that any harm could arise.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon, gentleman will have the opportunity of bringing up his subject again, because a clause will have to be inserted in the Election Act to give effect to this section respecting returning officers, and the hon. gentleman's suggestion might then be taken into calm consideration.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT TO BILLS.

Mr. SPEAKER communicated to the House the following letter, which he had received from the acting Secretary of His Excellency the Governor General's :-

OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY, OTTAWA, 29th July, 1891.

SIR.—I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Mr. Justice Strong, acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber on Friday afternoon, the 31st instant, at 3.30 o'clock, for the purpose of giving assent to certain Bills which have passed the Senate and House of Commons during the present cession. during the present session.

I have the honour to be, Sir, Your obedient servant, C. J. JONES,

For the Governor General's Secretary. The Honourable The Speaker of the House of Commons,

THE SAFETY OF SHIPS.

Mr. TUPPER moved that the Order for third reading of Bill (No. 44) to amend chapter 77 of the Revised Statutes, respecting the safety of ships, be discharged, and that the House again resolve itself into Committee. He said: The House will recollect that this Bill generally adopted the English law in regard to the carrying of explosives on passenger steamers, and in fact it prohibits the carrying of explosives. But a case has been brought to the attention of the department since the Bill passed through Committee, which renders it necessary that we should assimilate the Bill somewhat to the American law instead of following so closely the English Act, as this Bill did. This is necessary to meet such a case as the following: On certain waters, especially in the interior of this country, there are no regular passenger boats whatever, but freight boats carry passengers incidentally, and under the provisions of this Bill none of these vessels which are called freight boats could carry the explosives necessary for the large mining operations, and in that way great injury might be inflicted. I find that in order to meet these cases, the American Act on this subject provided that, under the inspection of officers of the Government, a vessel that is engaged in carrying freight and passengers occasionally or incidentally may, on precautions being taken and inspection of the ship being made for the carrying of explosives with great care, be permitted to carry such explosives. I, therefore, propose to add the following clause to the Bill:-

Notwithstanding any provision in this section contained, the Minister may grant a permit to any steamboat engaged chiefly in the carrying of freight and only post engaged chiefly in the carrying of freight and only incidentally in the carrying of passengers, and which is specially fitted for the carriage of explosives, to carry explosives on such terms and conditions, and in such manner, as is specified in said permit, and if any of such terms and conditions are not fully complied with, this section shall apply as if such permit had not been granted.

Motion agreed to; Order discharged, and House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee:)

Mr. STAIRS. I would like to ask the Minister of Marine, if the Bill as now amended will prevent the carrying of passengers in the small coasting vessels in the Maritime Provinces, which may sometimes carry explosives? As the hon. Minister knows, the small coasting vessels in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick carry all kinds of freight, and no doubt sometimes explosives which could not be carried in a safer manner.

Mr. TUPPER. That provision applies to all Canada.

Mr. STAIRS. Will that allow passengers to be carried in these vessels I refer to?

Mr. TUPPER. No vessels carrying explosives can carry passengers without obtaining a permit, and the permit will not be granted unless the inspector ascertains that all necessary precautions have been taken to prevent danger and loss of life to passengers.

Mr. STAIRS. Does not the amendment only apply to steamers?

Mr. TUPPER. It applies to all vessels registered in Canada.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed. | district is also left as it was. Mr. Speaker.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 85) to further amend the Steamboat Inspection Act. -- (Mr. Tupper.)

DEVELOPMENT OF THE SEA FISHERIES.

Mr. TUPPER moved concurrence in report of Committee of the Whole on the following resolu-

That it is expedient that an annual grant of one hundred and sitty thousand dollars be made, to aid in the development of the sea fisheries, and the encouragement of the building and fitting out of improved fishing vessels, and the improvement of the condition of the fishermen.

Resolution concurred in.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 152), to amend chapter 96 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, to encourage the development of sea fisheries, and the building of vessels.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LOCAL JUDGES IN ADMIRALTY— SALARIES.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to provide that the salaries of local judges in admiralty, as such judges, shall be as follows:—The local judge of the district of Quebec, $2,000 per annum; the local judge of the district of Nova Scotia, $1,000 per annum; the local judge of the district of New Brunswick, $1,000 per annum; the local judge of the district of Prince Edward Island, $800 per annum; the local judge of the district of British Columbia, $600 per annum; the local judge of the Toronto district, $600 per annum; and that each such judge shall be paid such travelling allowance as the Governor in Council from time to time determines. to time determines.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like the hon. gentleman to explain what is the principle upon which he arrived at these amounts.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. These are the salaries provided by the law at present, except as to the judge of British Columbia, who receives no salary now. There is also this exception, that the amounts are increased by adding the sums which the judges have been receiving for a number of years past in the shape of fees. By the Admiralty Act which we adopted, we abolished the system of the judge being paid by fees, and in Quebec there is no addition, because the fees were abolished some time ago. consider that the salary in Quebec is twice what it ought to be, but I propose that it shall remain as it is fixed by law now, during the incumbency of the present judge. I think the Imperial Act obliges us to do that, and I feel that it is only right to do it in any case. Then, the other salaries are, I think, a fair remuneration as they stand for the work done. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the salaries are at present $600, and the fees slightly under $400, and we simply add the fees to the salary. In Prince Edward Island the salary is $400 and the fees very trifling, probably only $50 a year, and we have made an addition of $200 to the salary. We have not thought it proper to make any change in British Columbia, because no fees are allowed there; and the salary in the Toronto

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) So far as Quebec is concerned, I think the salary of $2,000 is entirely beyond reasonable bounds. The work there is not nearly as great as in the Province of Nova Scotia. Practically it is next to nil, and unless we are compelled by statute to continue that salary, I think, now that the matter is being considered anew, though we ought to err on the liberal side, yet I do not see why $2,000 per annum should be paid for trying a few cases, because I understand that the judge is not occupied for more than two or three days in the year. It seems outrageous to pay such a salary for the trial of two or three cases. I will not say that the salary for the Prince Edward Island judge is excessive. If it stood on its own merits, apart from the surrounding circumstances, I should be disposed to say that it is high enough; but looking at the very low salary voted there hitherto, I do not think this is too much, not merely for the work the incumbent discharges as judge of the Admiralty Court, but as a supplement to his salary as chief justice. With regard to the judge at Toronto, I would like the hon. Minister to explain whether the returns from that district justify the continuance of this salary. I understand that the judge there occupies three or four positions, and that the aggregate of his various salaries amounts to $6,000 a year-in other words, that he receives as much as the chief justice of There may be circumstances to justify that allowance, but they are not before Parliament, and it is just as well that we should have them. suppose the salaries for New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are not unreasonable.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As regards the Quebec salary, that is the sum fixed at the present time by the Act respecting the judges in the provincial courts; so that I think we can hardly reduce it during the incumbency of the present judge. With regard to the extent of business done, during the last three years there have been twenty-two cases disposed of.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Were those cases instituted in the court?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Just instituted. Out of a dozen cases instituted, perhaps only three come to trial.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is the number instituted. In Halifax, during the last three years, there have been thirty-five cases; in St. John, nineteen; in British Columbia, one, and in Prince Edward Island, five; and in Toronto there have been thirty-seven cases during the past five years. It is true that the county judge of York holds several positions, and he is a very hard worked officer, indeed; but the salaries are not all provided The same is true of several other County Court judges in Ontario who are receiving emoluments higher than those of the Superior Court judges.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I regret that the return brought before Parliament does not show, in addition to the number of cases instituted, the number of cases tried. I am not going to raise captious I see what the hon. Minister says is correct, that the salary of the judge in the Quebec an incongruity, since this Bill relates to inland district has heretofore been $2,000, and I suppose waters and minor waters, and in the main Act the we cannot cut it down. When a new judge is appointed, we will be told by him that the same salary ought to be continued; but I wish to enter my protest against setting a precedent of voting a similar sum to the successor of the present judge. The hon, gentleman says that we do not pay the County Court judge at Toronto all that he receives. We pay him $2,400 as County Court judge, $1,500 as revising officer, and $600 as Admiralty judge. I believe that he also receives $1,000 as a Surrogate judge, and that he gets arbitrator's fees in addi-All this may be right or wrong, but I think we should have the particulars. The hon. Minister says that in Quebec twenty-two cases have been instituted during the past three years. I think I shall be speaking within the bounds when I say that not more than two cases a year have been

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think there will be no objection to providing that the salary shall be during the incumbency of the present judge.

Resolution concurred in.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 153) further to amend chapter 138 of the Revised Statutes, respecting the judges of the provincial courts.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MASTERS' AND MATES' CERTIFICATES.

Mr. TUPPER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 12) further to amend the Act respecting certificates to masters and mates of ships. He said: We went over most of the provisions on the last occasion in committee, but a couple of sections were held over. The definition of inland waters and minor waters was not considered sufficiently clear, as the draughtsman had adopted the old rule which prevailed. I propose now to substitute for sections (h) and (i) the following, which I think will be found to be accurate definitions:

"Sub-section (h). The expression 'inland waters of Canada' means all the rivers, lakes, and other navigable waters within Canada except salt water bays and gulfs on the sea coasts, and includes the River St, Lawrence as far eastward as a line drawn from Father Point on the south shore to Point Orient on the north shore.

"Sub-section (i). The expression 'minor waters of Canada' means all inland waters of Canada other than Lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron, including Georgian Bay, Lake Superior and Lake Winnipeg, and includes all bays, inlets and harbours of or on the said lakes and bays."

Mr. EDGAR. I think that these definitions were certainly required.

Mr. TUPPER. The other section which stood over was section number 3. Several hon, gentle-men, especially the hon, member for North Norfolk Mr. Charlton), who, I regret, is not in his place, challenged the principle of that clause. I in vain suggested that, as I was not introducing any new principle, and as the principle he quarrelled with is in the present Act, it would be inopportune to make an amendment. I wish to say, in addition, that the inopportuneness of the occasion for making that kind of amendment is better illustrated by referring to the main Act, for if that be touched in the sense the hon. gentleman desires, we would have an incongruity, since this Bill relates to inland deep sea certificate is still outstanding. It would be a pity to introduce a principle as regards inland and minor waters, when we are dealing simply with a matter of form and not with a question of prin-The hon, member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) argued that another feature of the main Act should be changed, and that we should not require a domicile in this country for three years in the case of an American citizen in order to entitle him to a Under the present law, the successful applicant for the position of master or mate must either show that he is a British subject, or, if he is not a British subject, that he has been domiciled three years in the country and served on a British ship. A British subject can show service on any ship, and with this domicile his application is in order, but a foreign subject must show domicile and service on a British ship. The hon, gentleman said we should abolish that requisite of domicile, and I urged in reply that our neighbours in the United States went much further, and not merely insisted upon a requirement of that kind but would not permit a British subject to take command of an American ship, and that until reciprocity was obtained in connection with coasting arrangements, for which we held out a standing offer, this law should remain as it is. The hon, gentleman said I was wrong in my view of the law of the United States, and it was more liberal, and that a British subject could obtain a certificate, on passing the necessary examination, and be appointed master of a ship or engineer on a steamboat. They spoke with a great deal of positiveness, particularly the hon, member for Lambton; and I suggested that the matter should stand until I looked into it. I find that the hon, gentlemen are entirely astray and that I was right, and I would ask the attention of the House while I point out that, in the case of the master of an American ship, he must not merely sign a statement of his intention to become an American citizen, but must go further and prove that he is a citizen of the United States. His certificate expressly states that he is a citizen of the Number 4,171 of the Revised United States. Statutes of the United States may be referred to in this connection. Section 4,071 and section 4,131 of the United States statute may be referred to in regard to masters and mates, and it will be seen that a man must prove that he is a citizen of the United States in addition to proving his efficiency to command. With reference to the employment of engineers, I find that, in 1874, six months' residence was required in the United States, but that law has now been repealed, and the present law requires, even in the case of engineers, that they shall be by birth or naturalization citizens of the United States. So careful are the authorities on the other side in regard to this, that in the instructions given to the inspectors it is stated:

"Inspectors will, after the receipt of this circular, re-fuse to issue original or renewed licenses to any officer of a steam vessel, except upon evidence satisfactory to them-selves that such persons applying to them are citizens of the United States by birth or naturalization."

And further, it is provided that all officers of vessels of the United States must be citizens of that country; but, on a foreign voyage, an officer below the grade of master may have his place filled by an alien until the return of the vessel to their ports. That country has adopted this principle in a more rigid form than we have. I trust | "and the consignor or shipper." Mr. TUPPER.

this clause, which is only introduced to harmonize with the other provisions of the Bill, will be accepted.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the amendment to the interpretation clause compel the captains of ferry boats to take out certificates?

Mr. TUPPER. That makes no change in the present law. This is in order to sanction the practice which has prevailed since 1883.

Bill reported, and read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT HARBOURS, PIERS, &c.

Mr. TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 115) to amend the Act respecting Government harbours, piers and breakwaters.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. TUPPER. This Bill is merely designed to increase the ability of the Government to collect the tolls on goods landed at Government wharves. Cases have occurred where, the moment the goods left the wharf, the remedy of the Crown went as well; so this is intended to create a lien on the goods for the tolls.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not know whether the hon, gentleman has given his personal attention to this, but it strikes me as going a little too far. You want to secure the payment of the tolls to the Government-that is right enough. You want to make the owner of the goods or the consignee liable for those tolls—that is right enough. But you make the shipper or the consignor liable for those tolls. I do not see why you should do that. If a merchant in Toronto, Montreal, Quebec, St. John or Halifax ships goods, why should he be liable for the payment of the tolls? It should be quite sufficient that the consignee, the owner of the goods, should be made liable. I do not even know that the owner of the vessel should be made liable, but certainly the consignor should not. What is the special reason for this?

Mr. TUPPER. There is no special reason except to make the provision as wide as possible. The goeds are liable for the tolls.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But they are the property of the consignee?

Mr. TUPPER. The Crown wishes to hold the goods until they are paid for.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But the consignor ceases to have any interest in them. The consignee is liable. Why should you make the person who sold the goods liable for the tolls and fees?

Mr. TUPPER. In the event of the title not passing, or the non-acceptance of the goods by the consignee where they are not delivered, or where he refuses to take charge of them, then we have recourse on the consignor who has the goods in his possession.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You have got that sufficiently under the word "owner." You have it in rem, and you have it further in the word

Mr. TUPPER. I agree to strike out the words

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon, gentleman makes the vessel liable

Mr. TUPPER. Yes; she is liable for the tolls.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You make this a debt recoverable at any time. The vessel is liable at any time, it is a lien which passes with the vessel, I

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; this does not give a lien.

Mr. TUPPER. The lien is on the goods.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

GRANTS OF LAND TO VOLUNTEERS-REBELLION, 1885.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolutions :-

1. That whereas the persons hereinafter mentioned and described, being "members of the enrolled Militia force actively engaged and bearing arms in the suppression of the Indian and Half-breed outbreak," within the meaning of the Act passed in the session held in the 48th and 49th years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter 73, as amended by the Act passed in the session held in the 49th year of Her Majesty's reign, chapter 29, have not as yet received the land or scrip by the said amended Act authorized to be granted, and the time within which, under the provisions of the said amended Act, they might have received the same has chapsed; and there may be other persons in the like case; it is desirable that authority should be given for the granting to such persons, notwithstanding anything in the said amended Act contained, of the bounties thereby contemplated.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In explanation of these resolutions I may state that the object is to authorize the issue of lands or scrip to the persons whose names have been favourably reported upon by the Department of Justice, as well as to others whose claims may be subsequently established. The law at present is as follows :- "Claims for scrip under the provisions of the statutes in that behalf to the volunteers and others who were engaged in suppressing the rebellion." By chapter 73 of the Act of 1885, the Government was authorized to grant to each member of the enrolled militia force actively engaged in bearing arms in suppressing the Indian and Half-breed outbreak, and serving west of Port Arthur, a free homestead of two adjoining quarter-sections, provided that the grantee should commence to reside upon and cultivate the homestead within six months from the 1st of August, 1886, and should thereafter comply with the provisions of the Dominion Lands Act with respect to homesteads. That Act further provided that in lieu of the land to which a militiaman was entitled he might accept scrip for $80, and that all grants of land or scrip should be made by the Minister of the Interior on a warrant in favour of the person entitled, issued by the Minister of Militia. By chapter 29 of the Act of 1886 the class of persons entitled to scrip or lands under the foregoing Act was enlarged, and was declared to include every officer, non-commissioned officer and man of any irregular force raised for the purpose and actually engaged in bearing arms in the suppression of said outbreak, other than as a home guard for the protection of property at or near their place of residence. It also included every scout actively engaged during the said outbreak whose services had been certified to by competent authority, and four other classes not necessary to be mentioned for the purpose of this report. I can state that these Acts expired six months after the 1st of August, 1886. It turned out that numbers of persons entitled to benefit under these Acts were deprived of such benefits in consequence of their claims not being recognized prior to the 1st of February, 1887. Many of those claims were in-vestigated and dealt with in the report of the Deputy Minister of Justice. The object of these resolutions is, as I have explained, to authorize the granting of land or scrip to persons whose claims have been investigated by the Department of Justice and recognized as claims for which the Government are responsible, and to provide for any further claims which in the future might be satisfactorily established before the department, so as to be entitled to recognition under this Act.

Mr. OUIMET. May I ask the hon. Minister if he has received a letter from me regarding the claims of certain volunteers, who, within my knowledge, served the country faithfully during the rebellion and to whom scrip has been refused up to date, although reports show they are fully entitled to it? I do not see that they are included in the resolutions. I wrote to the hon. Minister calling attention to the omission, and I should feel very much obliged if he will tell me if it is his intention to amend the resolution so as to include those half-breeds from St. Albert and Saskatchewan who served in the Edmonton district. They are about 49 in number. I need not repeat what I have already stated in the report. Those men were enrolled, took the oath of allegiance and served this country under orders from the commanding general of the division.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In answer to the hon. gentleman I may say that I received the letter which he addressed to me, putting forward, as he has already done-on-former occasions, the claims of the volunteers or the military organization to which he refers. I can tell the hon, gentleman that I tried, between the time I received his letter and the introduction of these resolutions, to see him, I should like to have seen the hon. gentleman; but it happened that he was away, and I had not an opportunity of doing so. I understand that the last clause covers the case, the words being:

"Such other persons as hereafter establish to the satisfaction of the Minister of Militia and Defence that they were respectively within the meaning of the said Act members of the enrolled militia force actively engaged in bearing arms in the Indian and half-breed outbreak, and that they have not received the land or scrip by the said amended Act authorized to be granted."

The hon, gentleman knows that when the letter which he addressed to me arrived at the department, these resolutions had been already introduced, and it would have been necessary for me to have given a new notice and changed the resolution completely, but I think any claim which can be hereafter, in the words of the resolution, "established," will be provided for by the resolution now introduced.

Mr. OUIMET. I do not think this is perfectly satisfactory. The resolution does not read just as the hon. Minister has explained. The hon. gentleman has recited a number of different Acts which apply to the matter. He has also told the House that the reason for the introduction of this resolution was that a certain number of volunteers who had served in the North-West had not received their scrip, because they had not applied within the time indicated by the Act. These people to whom I refer have applied during the last three or four years, and, I may say, even longer ago than that. I think the Department of Militia came to the conclusion that they had no right to their In clause 5 it is said that the foregoing provisions shall apply to corps that are named. do not see why it should not be possible for the hon. Minister to include in the number the St. Albert Mounted Infantry. It appears that the services rendered by these people were services which certainly were equal to those of the other corps mentioned—equal, if not superior. I have no objection to the present resolution. I think it is quite fair that the country should pay this little tribute to men who served during the rebellion. I am quite willing to say, moreover, that if a larger number of people in the North-West Territories had volunteered as these people did, and more especially if half-breeds had been induced to join that movement, and those I knew in Edmonton and Calgary were only waiting a chance to take up arms on behalf of the Government of Canada, to protect their own property as well as to maintain the peace of the country, it would have been of great advantage to the country. The Edmonton half-breeds were enrolled under instructions from Major General Strange, and they performed their duties faithfully Mr. OUIMET.

half-breeds had taken up arms against the Indians, the Indians from that moment kept quiet, and certainly the result was very satisfactory and of general advantage to the country at large. If such example had been followed in other parts of the North-West Territories, the rebellion would have been, in my humble opinion, quieted in a much shorter time and at a very reduced expense. So I would press the claims of these people. I do so especially because they are half-breeds and not knowing all the nice distinctions that can be made in the interpretation of a statute, they are quite surprised and complain very bitterly that, after having sacrificed their own leanings and taken up arms against those whom they consider, after all, their kindred, the Indians, they have not yet received I hold they should receive scrip at once, for their right to it can no longer be disputed, and the Act now before the House should include those claims. This would prove a source of great satisfaction to those people, and in the future it may be a source of satisfaction to the country when it is known among the distant half-breeds that the Government of Canada are always able and ready to reward any services done by them for the Government and preservation of the peace of the country. I hope the Minister will see his way to add the corps I have mentioned to those enumerated in the resolu-I may answer at once the objection he has made, that it would require a new notice to add a corps to those now mentioned in the resolution, since the last part of the resolution is general, and the authorization of the Crown covers all cases similar to those specially mentioned before. I hope the hon. Minister of Militia will entertain my demand to add the St. Albert Mounted Infantry Company to the corps that are mentioned in the resolution. It will be an act of justice if the Government do so, and further, it will be an act of good policy in showing these half-breeds that the Government do acknowledge and reward all the services rendered by them.

Mr. DAVIN. I congratulate the hon. Minister of Militia on his bringing forward this resolution. It is an act of justice, an act of taidy jus-The Committee will remember that in 1887 I brought forward the claims of the very persons who are mentioned in this resolution, and of others not mentioned. I brought the matter forward from my seat in Parliament, and my contention at the time was resented and my motion was negatived. I brought it forward again in 1888, in 1889 and in 1890; and the result of pressing it on the attention of the Government was that a reference was made to the Deputy Minister of Justice to enquire into these claims. The Deputy Minister of Justice met Mr. White, together with my colleagues from the North-West and myself, and we went into the claims and studied the Acts, and no sooner had the Deputy Minister of Justice looked at the claims of those that I had represented here, and looked into the Acts of Parliament, than he had no hesitation in saying that more of these claims came within the law and that they were just. I may say in general to this Committee, and I want it to be put on record in this House, that sometimes—that at this present minute. I believe— I am pressing some claims that are looked upon, as and effectively and preserved peace and order in all the French say, with defiance by the Government, just that region. The moment it was known that the as those claims of mine which I formerly made and which are now acknowledged, were looked on with défiance. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to impress this on the House of Commons, and on the public of Canada, that I made claims here which were pushed aside with a waive of the hand, and if I had not pressed them year after year, they would never have been acknowledged. The argument I make in this connection is this: That when a member of Parliament with the responsibility which belongs to his position, presses strongly a claim, and when his reputation for justice is at stake, and his character before this House is at stake; it is very probable that he has probed the foundation of the claims he makes, and finds that there is good ground for them. Sir, as I say, the Deputy Minister of Justice no sooner looked at the Act of Parliament, and at the facts that we were able to place before him, than he at once came to the conclusion that, in regard to some of the claims I put forward, they were clearly within the Acts and clearly demanded that justice should be done in reference to them. We went over a long array of cases. He rejected some claims that I had to press, and I am not going now to express an opinion on that. But I may say this: that I have the utmost confidence—nothing could be stronger than the confidence I have—that that reference of these claims was carried on in an impartial spirit, and that justice has been rigidly done. I doubtless would prefer that some of the claims I put forward had been admitted, but I will say here honestly, that, having, the Acts of 1885 and 1886 in my hand, I could not insist on these claims which were rejected. The only claims I insisted on were claims that clearly came within the four corners of the Acts of 1885 and 1886. Now, Sir, I congratulate the hon. Minister of Militia that he has brought forward this resolution, and that we shall have an Act passed that will do justice in the premises, to my clients, if I may call them such. With regard to the remarks which have fallen from the hon, member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet), I may say, that I think the manner in which he has put it, on the grounds of justice and of good policy, is one well worthy of the consideration of the Government. I know something about the Edmonton district and something of the services rendered by these people, and the claims of the persons mentioned by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) are well worthy of the consideration of the Government. His argument, from the point of view of policy, is a good one, and if the Government will recognize the services of those people, you have no idea, Sir, of the impression it will make upon the half-breed population of that You have no idea how accurately they come to know of what takes place in this very Men who have never read a newspaper, some of them who cannot read a newspaper, if you visit them 120 miles south of Regina where they have no regular post office, you will find that two months after this House has prorogued, they are perfectly familiar with what has been done here. The way it happens I suppose is, that intelligent men among them are accustomed to read the papers and familiarize them with what occurs. I congratulate the Government and the Minister of Militia on bringing forward this resolution.

Mr. SPROULE. On looking over this resolution, I regret to find that some claims which I them I think were employed the whole time, but brought to the attention of the Government at various times, in connection with my hon, friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), of the scouts of the North-West during the rebellion, whom I thought were fairly entitled to consideration under the old Act, are not provided for in this resolution. So far as I could judge when going over these cases with the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), it appeared to both of us, that they were fairly entitled to consideration. I forget the names of all, but one was named Robert Kells, and they were employed under Major Macdonald in somewhat the same capacity as the scout under Major Steele. These men were on the prairies constantly, either on horseback or on foot, and their duties were of a similar nature to those performed by many who come under the provisions of this Act. I think they got as little pay for their services as others, and I do not see why they should not receive recognition. I believe it was the influence of the hon, member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and myself, with some others, which led to the reconsideration of these cases, the result of which is to be found in this resolution. But I regret to find that Major Macdonald's scouts, whom we considered equally entitled to consideration, have been left out entirely. There may be some technical grounds why they did not come within the provisions of the law; but I understood, when the law was amended some years ago by the late Mr. White, that it was intended to cover their cases. When that amendment was under consideration, I crossed the floor of the House and suggested to Mr. White that if the provisions then proposed did not cover their cases, it should be made to do so; and the assurance given to me was that it was intended that those and similar cases should be included. But afterwards it was found that there were some technical objections in the When their cases were submitted to the Minister of Justice, I thought provision would be made for them, and I think it is to be deplored that they are not included in this resolution.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon, friend has properly stated what our efforts were; but the difficulties in the way were such as the Deputy Minister of Justice, placed as he was in a judicial position, did not see how he could get over. The reference placed him in this position, that he had to decide whether certain persons came under the Acts of 1885 and 1886 or not, and he was limited by that reference. I went over every case with him, and I do not think he omitted a single case that could properly be brought within the recommendation which he had to make to the Government. But the case is different with the Government now. Minister of Justice has made his report, which in my opinion is in entire accord with the law and the facts; but now that that report is in the hands of the Government, it is proper for them to consider whether, when they are dealing out this act of justice, they should not include those scouts in whom my hon. friend and myself are interested. For instance, there are the scouts known as the Moose Jaw scouts, of whom there are not many, and also the scouts south of Maple Creek, of whom there are not many either. Some of those scouts were employed in the middle of the war, some of them after the war was concluded, and some of could not, in the opinion of the Deputy Minister, be said to have been placed in a position that might be described as one of engagement in the warfare. But this has to be remembered, that those men actually were in danger of their lives, A desperate half-breed, or a band of desperate half-breeds, escaping down to the frontier or coming up from the frontier to join the rebellion, might kill those scouts, if they met them. So that properly it is a question for the Government to take into consideration, whether those scouts should not be brought within the scope of this resolution. My hon, friend who has last spoken and myself are deeply interested, and have friends who are deeply interested, in some of those persons, and, when a healing measure, as well as a just one, is being brought forward, I think it would be well that they should be considered. It might even be well if some of the teamsters who risked their lives should also be considered. There are teamsters who were actually engaged in battle, and, although they were paid for their work, yet, considering that their lives were exposed, I think it would be well that the Government should consider their cases. I congratulate the Government that they have brought forward this resolution, and I think they may very well consider whether it would not be good policy to extend the bounds of the Acts of 1885 and 1886 in the directions suggested.

STANDARD OF THE PROPERTY OF TH

Mr. DENISON. The last speaker has suggested that the teamsters should be included in this measure. That, I think, would open a very broad door to claims of all kinds. We all recollect that during the rebellion it became a common subject of conversation in this part of Canada, what large sums were paid to teamsters—from $8 to $10 a day; and we heard a great many stories at the time about jobbery and corruption in connection with those payments. We must admit that they were well paid, and it would be simply absurd for this House to talk of giving them grants of land in addition. With regard to the scouts, a similar difficulty stands in the way of including them. understand that a great many men went out scouting on their own account, and brought in information which they thought would be useful to the authorities, while others were sent out by the authorities. If you admit the claims of these scouts, many of whom I know were obtained with difficulty and were therefore very well paid, you will have the self-appointed scouts putting in their claims. If you admit their claims, you will have these self-appointed corps also putting in claims, and in addition you will have the home guards. have some already on these resolutions. No doubt it may be quite proper to give grants to some of them, and no one is more inclined to act fairly to all those engaged in doing good service to their country than I; but we ought not to allow our selves to be imposed upon by everybody who may think he has a claim on the country, because he may have been sitting in his own house with his rifle by his side, and have been styled "home guard." If you look into many cases of home guards, you will find that they were composed of men who remained at home in their own villages, and no doubt continued their daily avocations, but who had rifles, either of their own or handed scouts, alluded to by the hon. member for Grey to them, and who called themselves "home (Mr. Sproule) and the Moose Jaw scouts, mentioned Mr. Davin.

guards." I think the hon. Minister of Militia would make a great mistake if he did not scrutinize very closely into claims of that kind. We have had certainly a strong warning note from the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who suggested just now that teamsters should be paid.

Mr. LAURIER. I am ready to endorse the hon. member for Assiniboia in his statement that the Government may be congratulated on their intention, but I do not think our congratulations can go any further. I do not think we can congratulate them at all upon the performance of the object they have in view. Their object, as I understand it, is to widen the circle of rewards which have already been granted under the law to those who aided in suppressing the rebellion of 1885. Well, someone said at one time: "la province est assez riche pour payer toutes ses gloires;" and Canada, though not in a flourishing condition, is still able to pay all those who have earned a reward in suppressing the rebellion. The provisions made in that respect seem to be ample already. amended Act of 1886 provides that every officer, non-commissioned officer and man of any irregular force, raised by authority and actively engaged in suppressing the rebellion, every scout so engaged, every person regularly appointed to the medical staff, every officer, non-commissioned officer and man of the enrolled corps, shall be entitled to a reward. This is a pretty numerous class, and I understand that what the hon, member for Assiniboia wants, in pressing the claims of those he calls his clients, but whom I may perhaps call his electors, is to bring them within the four corners of the Act, This was, I suppose, also the task of the Deputy Minister of Justice in investigating whether or not the claims of the applicants for reward, which were pressed by my hon, friend, came or did not come within the provisions of the Act. The report has been placed in my hands by the courtesy of the hon. Minister of Justice, and it is, I presume, the result of an investigation into the claims which were pressed on the favour of the department by my hon, friend, and, as I assume, some of those whose claims were so pressed were found to come within the Act and others were not. What is the object of the Bill? I cannot see what its object is. Is it to provide that the parties whose claims are here mentioned shall come within the Act, though they go beyond the Act? It seems to me if the provisions we have made are not sufficient, if other parties than those mentioned in the Act are clearly entitled to reward, the Act ought to be extended, but it ought to be extended upon some principle or rule and not merely with reference to individual claims. If the Act has lapsed, then a provision should be made to revive it. The resolution is restricted to specially mentioned corps and individuals. Do these militia men come within the provisions of the Act?

Mr. MACDOWALL. They do.

Mr. LAURIER. Then all that is required is to extend the time and render the Act applicable. By passing this resolution you create invidious comparisons. You create the impression that the corps and parties mentioned do not come within the Act. Take the St. Albert volunteers, to which the hon. member for Laval alluded, and the Macdonald by the hon, member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). Do they or do they not come within the Act? If they do, there is no necessity to have new legislation, but simply to revive the Act which has lapsed; but as I understood the claim put forth by the hon. member for Laval, the St. Albert volunteers do not come within the terms of the Act. If they do not and have done good service, the Act might be extended so as to include everybody who has done good service towards the suppression of the rebellion. There is no disposition on the There is no disposition on the part of this House to deal with these men in any but a generous manner, or to fail in extending the gratitude of the nation to all those who helped restore order. If the terms of the Act are not sufficient to cover all those who actually did good service, they might be extended so as to accomplish that purpose, but if the sole object of the hon, gentleman is to revive the Act because the time has lapsed, it seems to me the resolutions are altogether too long.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no intention to enlarge in any way the circle of persons who are entitled to the bounty granted under the Act the hon, gentleman has justcited. But the circumstances under which this investigation was made are these: The persons who are enumerated in these resolutions were among a large number who claimed the bounty under the Act; but, in consequence of circumstances which appeared to throw doubt on their claims, their claims were held in abeyance and no scrip was awarded them. Investigation was made, and the report the hon, gentleman has had the opportunity of perusing establishes that, although, apparently, in the first instance, these persons were not entitled to the scrip, they came within the provisions of the Act, and their claims should be fairly acceded to. The provisions of the resolution furnish ample illustration of the difficulties which occurred in administering this bounty. For instance, there was a provision in the Act that home guards should not participate in the grant, but one of the companies engaged in suppressing the rebellion happened to bear the name of home guards, and from their very name it was perhaps properly assumed that their duties and services were such as did not come within the provisions of the Nevertheless, although that apparent proof was against them, or the presumption was against them, when the evidence was taken by the officer appointed to make the enquiry, it was found that, although the troop was organized as home guards, the services they rendered were services of a nature Thus, take which it was intended to compensate. the case of Walter William Phelan, of Regina, who was a scout actively engaged during the outbreak. His services were not certified to by competent authority at that time. They have been certified by competent authority since then, but in the meantime the Act had expired, and it is necessary to make a provision in regard to him. The same thing is true in regard to the Battleford Home Guards. No doubt it would have been sufficient to introduce a resolution and afterwards a Bill founded upon it, simply extending the time during which the Minister of Militia could administer that bounty, but in the meantime these particular claims had been established to the satisfaction of the Government. and it was thought proper to state the manner in which the power of the Government was to be exercised, and also to take a general power to extend the operation of the Act so that the Minister of Militia might deal with the cases, some of which have been submitted to him, and some, perhaps, such as those the member for Laval (Mr. Quimet) has referred to have not been submitted yet. Under the last of these resolutions, the Minister of Militia will have power to make the same investigation in regard to other cases as has been made in the cases named in the preceding resolutions, and, if he finds that those claims are established, the same rule will be applied to them. Take, again, the case of Steele's scouts. The whole body of those scouts did not perhaps come within the provision of the statute, but it was found that some members, namely, those who are enumerated here were entitled under the Act, so, while it was perhaps unnecessary to specify those who were ascertained to be entitled to the bounty, it was thought better, perhaps, to givefull information to the House as to the persons to whom the bounty was to be applied after the investigation, and to intimate that our policy was to investigate further claims such as the member for Laval has referred to. Both classes of eases will be dealt with fully, the eases of those whose claims have been investigated, and of those whose claims have not yet been investigated. will give an opportunity of having them investigated under the provisions of the Act which it is proposed

Mr. LAURIER. I would then ask the Minister of Militia if he will state to the House what is the hitch which has hitherto prevented the Regina Volunteer Company from participating in the bounty?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I wish to return my sincere thanks to my hon, friend from Assimiboia (Mr. Davin), who congratulated me on this tardy measure of justice we have introduced, and also the hon, the leader of the Opposition, who was a little more retigent in his congratulations. The reason why the Regina Home Guards, of which he has just spoken, was not included in the bounty was because it was considered as a home guard, and it is under these resolutions, if they can establish their claims to the satisfaction of the Department of Militia, which will be submitted to the Department of Justice, they will get their bounty. I see nothing in the resolutions which can prevent them from benefiting from the new legislation which we are now endeavouring to introduce. My hon, friend, the gallant member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet), spoke about the claims which were submitted to the department and which more than once were brought to the attention of the Minister. I can say to the hon, gentleman that these claims were submitted to the ordinary tribunal, which was considered to be an advisory board that the Minister of Militia could rely upon to settle these claims. These commissioners were appointed to settle these claims arising from the unfortunate outbreak in the North-West. these claims were submitted to that board, they were not considered to be claims that should be recognized. We have been enlarging the legislation so as to make it apply more generously perhaps to the different claims which have been submitted to the department, and I consider that under this last resolution:

"Such other persons as hereafter establish to the satisfaction of the Minister of Militia and Defence that they were, respectively, within the meaning of the said amended Act, members of the enrolled Militia force actively engaged in bearing arms in the Indian and half-breed outbreak, and that they have not received the land or scrip by the said amended Act authorized to be granted."

It is within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Militia, acting upon the advice of the Department of Justice, to investigate these claims and to see that they shall be properly recognized. I think it comes within this resolution, which has been introduced for the purpose of meeting the very claims This is a the hou, gentleman has spoken of. measure which is practically ending the difficulties which have arisen from the different claims which were submitted shortly after the outbreak. I do not wish to be drawn into a discussion of the troubles which took place, but shortly after the outbreak we had a commission appointed which investigated every claim which was submitted to the Department of Militia. These claims, after the investigation and upon the advice of that board, were decided upon by the submission of a report of the Minister of Militia to the Privy Council, and every claim was settled by an Order in Council. Some of those claims did not come within the reach of the statute as it was originally passed. Subsequently, the provisions of the statute were enlarged so as to cover other claims which were not contemplated when the measure first came before Parliament, and now we are adding to this, after the investigation by the Department of Justice, every claim which is mentioned here. The leader of the Opposition wished to know why some other corps should not be included in this resolution. The reason is very easily understood. It is because the claims which are mentioned here have been submitted to the Department of Justice and reported upon. left a door open so that ample justice at any moment might be accorded to those who had submitted their claims to the Department of Militia, or whose claims had been submitted by the Department of Militia to the Department of Justice. We introduced a resolution that any further claims could be dealt with under the generous provisions of that resolution, after being investigated by the Department of Militia and the Department of Justice. Now, I do not see that we can go beyond that. My hon, friend the member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) has spoken of men who have rendered great service, and I must recognize with him the manner in which every Canadian responded to the call of duty. I can say, moreover, that I have tried, according to the best of my judgment, to take in every claim that was submitted to me; I have tried to do ample justice. Where any doubt had arisen, or could arise, these claims were submitted to the Department of Justice, which is the legal adviser of every department, and I abided by whatever decision that department arrived at. Now, I think that, by the last resolution, we are leaving the door open for giving fair-play and for investigating any claims that may arise, and for dealing properly with them, in the same way as these claims which were mentioned in the resolution have been dealt with, because they have been thoroughly investigated and reported upon, as was stated by my hon. friend and colleague the Minister of Justice. The report has been annexed to these resolutions, and I believe it has been placed in the hands of the leader of the Opposition by the Minister of Justice.

Sir Adolphe Caron.

Mr. LAURIER. Before I depart from this branch of the subject, I wish to say that I do not think the hon. gentleman has rightly apprehended my question. The Minister of Justice stated a moment ago that the object of this resolution was not to enlarge the scope of the Act, but merely to revive the Act so far as necessary to apply this provision. The provision of the Act should have been applied long ago, because the Act is already enlarged. Now, the hon, gentleman says that he investigated the claims of, for instance, the two volunteer companies which are here mentioned, that is to say, the Regina Volunteer Company and the Battleford Home Guards. I asked him a moment ago if he could tell me what had prevented him from dealing with these claims. He did not answer at the moment, perhaps it escaped his notice. But what I want to get at is this: The hon, gentleman, I see, has investigated some of these claims and has reported upon them, and he is ready to apply the provisions of the Act at once to the companies I have mentioned. So far so Now, my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Ouimet) also brings up the claim of another volunteer company, as I understand, the St. Albert Volunteers. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) also brings up the claims of another corps, the Macdonald Scouts. the hon, member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) also brings up the claims of another corps, the Moose Jaw Scouts. These claims have not been dealt with. I only wish to ask the hon, gentleman at this moment if he can tell us if there is any special reason why these corps were not included in the bounty? Was it because there were any doubts as to whether they came within the scope of the Act, or what was the reason?

Mr. DAVIN. In regard to two of the questions the hon. gentleman has asked, I can satisfy him. The Regina Volunteer Corps comes strictly within the Act and the reason originally given by the Department of Militia for not entertaining these claims was based on a misapprehension arising out of a telegram received from the Mayor of Regina who happened to be the colonel of the Regina Volun-He telegraphed as mayor of Regina for arms for the Home Guards, signing himself D. L. Scott; he was also in communication with the Department of Militia as Colonel Scott of the Regina Volun-teers. A confusion arose in the Department of Militia between the Regina Home Guards, which did not come within the provisions of the Act, and the Regina Volunteers, which came strictly within the provisions of the Act. The Regina Vol-unteers were organized under the Militia Act; they appeared in the General Orders, they were put on active service, they were liable to be called out at any minute. Therefore, the Deputy Minister of Justice, when he looked at the facts, saw that they appeared in the Gazette of the 11th April, 1883, that they had been organized for active service, and he saw at once that they came within the Act. I may say that a not unnatural mistake was made in the Department of Militia in confounding the Home Guards with the Volunteers, and I remember having a good many conversations with the Minister of Militia and with his officers about a telegram they produced. This, in fact, asconished me at first, but when I enquired into it I found that this telegram about the Home Guard was sent by D. L. Scott, in his capacity of As I say, the Home Guard does mayor of Regina. not come within the Act. Now, the Battleford Home Guard, as a home guard, would not come within the Act. I may say that that clause here about the Regina Volunteers is declaratory, the clause about the Battleford Home Guard is enacting, because you cannot bring the Battleford Home Guards, as home guards, within the meaning But what about these Battleford Home of the Act. Guards? They actually engaged in suppressing the rebellion, they actually fulfilled all the conditions contemplated by the Act, and nothing is more proper than that they should appear here and be rewarded for their actual services, as contemplated by the Act. I do not see that there is anything for my hon, friend, the leader of the Opposition, to quarrel with.

Mr. LAURIER. I quarrel with nothing.

Well, I think there is nothing Mr. DAVIN. even to criticize from an adverse standpoint in We have a clause here declarthe resolution. ing that the Regina Volunteers come within All the volunteers, except the Regina Volunteers, have got scrip. Application had been made for scrip immediately for them; no condition had been omitted. But I do say this, that the mistake made by the Department of Militia was a natural one, arising out of the confusion of Mr. Scott as mayor, telegraphing to that department on behalf of Mr. James, captain of the Home Guards, and Mr. D. L. Scott, as colonel of the Regina Volunteers, at the head of a company coming within the four corners of the Act, and ready at any moment for active service.

Mr. MULOCK. I wish to call the attention of the Minister to the phraseology of these resolutions. In resolution 1 it is stated that "whereas certain persons hereinafter mentioned and described shall receive scrip," and says, "they being members of the enrolled militia." Then we have to look at the last resolution to find out who are the persons answering the description given. Several corps are mentioned and persons named. In the first resolution there is also a statement that there may be other persons in the like case. It is, therefore, proposed to enact a law that will enable the Minister of Militia to grant scrip not only to the persons mentioned in these resolutions, but to others in a similar position. To what does the word "persons" refer? Does it refer to the Regina Volunteer Company, or the Battleford Home Guards, or to Walter William Phelan. I should like to ask the Minister if there has been any adjudication in the case of Phelan and others?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. Has it been given to the publie?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not suppose so. I have introduced this resolution upon the report which has come to the Department of Militia from the Department of Justice. I would not be absolutely certain, but I think the report of the Department of Justice must have come to us after the report of the Department of Militia was published. Every case has been investigated by the Department of Justice and reported upon.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not doubting it. I am merely suggesting that we should know some of ing I can give to the words.

the facts in regard to the persons. We are not only dealing with the case of Steele's Scouts, but we are laying down a precedent on which a claim can be submitted from every other person who may be in a like position. If there is any other person in the service who has the same sort of claim as James Rolland, or any other person mentioned in this resolution, the Minister of Militia will have to deal out the same sort of justice to those unknown persons.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That is intended by the resolution, after proper investigation has been

Mr. MULOCK. That being the case, the House ought to have information as to the facts of these particular cases which are to form precedents. We are declaring that persons are entitled to scrip when we know nothing about them. We are adopting a judgment which has not been given to the public, and we are declaring that it shall be a precedent and sufficient warrant for the Minister to give a similar bounty to anyone else who may come within the wording of that clause. I am not arguing against the proposition, but only urging a proper course of procedure. I rejoice with the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) at even the tardy justice given by the department. I wish, however, to have the matter proceeded with regularly, and I hold the judgment of the Department of Justice should be laid on the Table, in order that we can ascertain the facts that warranted the department in coming to its judgment. I do not view with favour the practice of handing over everything from Parliament to the departments. We want to know what we are delegating to the Minister of Justice or any other Minister, and I think the Minister of Militia will not think that an unreasonable request.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The report of the Department of Justice has been communicated to the leader of the Opposition, and I can tell my hon. friend that before the second reading of the Bill the whole report, which is printed, will be laid on the Table.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the length of the report?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. A dozen printed pages.

Mr. MULOCK. Would it not be possible to lay down in the Bill a policy which should be followed?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Resolution 1 states that there may be other persons in a "like case." This does not mean in the like case of Mr. Phelan or Mr. Rolland, but the words "like case" merely mean to be "members of the enrolled militia force actively engaged and bearing arms in the suppression of the Indian and half-breed outbreak" within the meaning of the Act, who have not yet received the land or scrip. The resolutions further say that the undermentioned persons have not received their land or scrip, and there may be others in the like

Mr. MULOCK. I cannot agree with the Minister of Justice.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is the only mean-

Mr. MULOCK. The first clause refers to persons enrolled in the militia.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is a recital that the persons undermentioned were persons enrolled in the militia and were actively engaged under the meaning of the Act, and were entitled to the bounty and have not yet received it. It recites that there may be other like cases of persons so enrolled.

Mr. OUIMET. I understand that the case of the St. Albert Mounted Infantry has not been submitted to the Department of Justice and reported on. Am I correct?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. OUIMET. Then I take for granted that the case may be reconsidered, and that a decision may be given on the case before the third reading is taken.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon, gentleman may also perhaps permit me to tell him, that the cases that have been submitted to the Department of Justice were cases in which an application was made to the Department of Militia, to re-open cases which had been decided, like the case of the St. Albert Corps.

Mr. OUIMET. I do not think any final adjudication has been made.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have been asked to give some information, and I should like to give it, if my hon, friend will let me do so. I say that the cases that appear in this resolution are cases which have been submitted by the Department of Militia to the Department of Justice-

Mr. OUIMET. I understand all that.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON,—upon an application made by the parties interested to have the cases submitted to the Department of Justice.

Mr. OUIMET. I understand that but just talk of my own case

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am talking about the hon, gentleman's case, because I am telling him that his case, or the case of the volunteers of St. Albert, was submitted like all the other cases to the commission. It was reported adversely upon, as the hon, gentleman well knows. No application was made to submit that case to the Department of Justice, or to re-open it, and, consequently, like any number of other cases, it remains in the position in which the commission had decided it, and no reference had been called for to the Department of Justice, as in other cases.

Mr. OUIMET. The hon, gentleman is so busy in his department, and has so many of these cases before him, that I can understand the hon. gentleman might have forgotten this one, but I have seen the record a few days ago, and it has not been referred to the Department of Justice, although two new applications have been made by myself. understand that the case has not been finally adjudicated upon even by the hon. Minister himself. I think I saw in the record, and I would be very glad to be corrected in that if I am wrong, that the last Commandant of the Militia has reported The hon. gentleman will favourably on this case. remember that the real difficulty in this case was in the antagonism that has existed, and that has been a matter of great difficulties for his depart- Sir ADOLHE CARON. The case which the hon. ment, between General Middleton, when he was gentleman referred to is a case which has not been in-

Sir John Thompson.

Commandant of Militia, and General Strange, who was in command of the Alberta district. case was not looked favourably on at the time, it was on account of that, and if I remember aright, the last report of the late Major General of Militia was favourable to the renewed application of these people. That is the reason why I say, that if that case has not been referred to the Department of Justice, it might be referred at once. I am quite sure that the claims of these people come within the Act, and I think that they might be placed on the list at once, and before the third reading of this resolution takes place. I say again, that it would be a matter of policy, more especially when this case comes up before the House, that this particular case, concerning the half-breeds of a very important district, where they are very numerous, should be dealt with and decided on at once. I shall be sorry if it is going to be refused, but for my part I shall have done my duty. After examining the record very closely myself, and knowing the facts personally, as I was present there at the time, I say that their case comes, not only within the spirit, but within the letter of the Act. I hope that the record will be referred at once to the Department of Justice, that justice shall be done them immediately, that it shall be done before this resolution is disposed of, and before it goes to the North-West, that these people who are only home guards, and who remained at home, although subject to be called for duty, have had their claims granted; but that those other persons, who left their homes to serve their country, are allowed to remain without their claims being adjudicated upon. I insist again as a matter of policy, and in the interest of the Government, and of the country, that this case should be disposed of at once, and that justice should be done to these men.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon, gentleman must see that unless these resolutions are passed, the case of the St. Albert Company would be perfeetly hopeless, because there would be no power under which we could act. I may call the attention of the hon, gentleman to the last resolution, which to my mind has been included in these resolutions, for the purpose of meeting such cases as the case which the hon, gentleman has just been discussing. The hon, gentleman has stated that he has seen the record. I have seen the record also, and the hon, gentleman will find that this case was submitted to a commission which was appointed for the purpose of settling the North-West claims. Now, if the hon, gentleman wishes this case to be submitted to the Department of Justice, as the other cases mentioned in these resolutions, I have no objection to submit it.

Mr. OUIMET. I wish it to be submitted at Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I shall be only too happy if the Department of Justice permits me to carry out the views which have been expressed by the hon. gentleman. I have no manner of doubt, that he is perfectly right; but I wish to point out that these cases which are mentioned here, are cases which have been investigated.

Mr. OUIMET. I do not object to them.

vestigated in the manner in which the other cases have been. I have no possible objection to this case being submitted to the Department of Justice, and if it comes back to my department with as favourablea reportas the cases which are mentioned in this resolution, I shall be most happy to carry out the hon. gentleman's wishes. I must tell the hon. gentleman, however, that I think it would be fatal to every claim which has been submitted, to object to the passing of these resolutions, because I do not see how we can act, unless Parliament gives the department the power of acting, under a Bill which will be introduced upon the resolutions.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that this is rather an unusual form in which to proceed with legislation in Parliament. There are certain provisions in the hon. gentleman's resolution which refer to persons by name, as persons who are entitled to come within the provisions of this Act. If we were to come down to Parliament and say that certain charges had been considered by a judge and jury against a person, and that he had been found guilty of committing certain offences, and that we were seeking to confer upon the Executive the authority to send to the penitentiary certain persons named in the Bill, it would be regarded as a very extraordinary kind of legislation. It is the business of Parliament to lay down general propositions of law, and it is the business of the Executive Government to apply them. Whether the principles embraced in the Act formerly passed by this House apply to the cases of Walter William Phelan, James Rolland, Frederick Rolland, or any of the others named here, I do not know. House has not gone into the investigation of this matter, or considered the claims of these parties. The Government may have done so, and may have found that these parties are entitled to come within the provisions of the law as it stood. But that is not a legislative Act; that is an administrative Act; and it seems to me that the hon. gentleman ought to seek legislation in the ordinary way, and then deal with the cases of these parties under the law and on his responsibility as a Minister. But to ask the sanction of Parliament in these individual cases is certainly a very extraordinary proceeding—one which, so far as I know, has never been adopted before. Under our constitutional system it is not the business of Parliament to discharge executive functions. The hon, gentleman and his colleagues are appointed for that purpose, and they ought to perform them, or if they are unable to do so, they ought to ask us for the necessary powers.

ir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand that the hon, gentleman's objection is that we are seeking to get Parliament to delegate its powers to us. The very reverse is the case.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not at all.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman is so accustomed to raise that objection that I thought he had done so now, but it may have been only the echo of the past that I heard. In this case we took great pains to avoid that course by stating to Parliament exactly what we proposed. already been stated to the Committee before the hon. gentleman said in his place that temporary Acts were passed entitling these parties to this bounty. Those Acts having expired, and it having been found that these parties would have been entitled to claim the of the case, which we have ascertained, we ask the authority of Parliament to meet their claims; and in case there should be others, as it is claimed there are, who are equally entitled to the bounty, we ask Parliament to give us power to give that bounty without limit of time. But having ascertained the existence of these claims and their validity, we thought it was only proper to state to Parliament what they were, and to take specific authority to deal with them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not admit the soundness of the principle just enunciated by the hon. Minister of Justice. What we ought to do in matters of this sort is indicated by the law as it was. The hon. Minister of Justice says that the claims of certain parties were adjudicated upon and, their merits ascertained: but that the law having expired, the Government have no power to make payment to them, and that there may be other cases. Well, all it was necessary for the Government to do was to submit to Parliament a measure stating that whereas certain parties by such a measure were entitled to certain claims, it is necessary that the provisions of that law should be continued, and then the Government would possess the power of continuing to deal with those cases. Some of these the hon, gentleman says have been investigated. The Government knows their merits; we do not know. If we acted upon the rule indicated by these special sub-sections, the hon, gentleman would have required, in the first Bill submitted to Parliament, to have given the names of all the parties whom it was intended to compensate, and Parliament would be called upon to investigate and decide as a legislative act whether those parties were entitled to compensation or Now, the Government did not proceed in that way; they never do, nor does Parliament ever proceed in that way. Parliament confers on the the executive government of the country an enabling power to do justice; but what are the merits of A, B, or C, Parliament does not decide. It leaves that to the Executive Government in the discharge of its functions. If we were to adopt a different policy, we might as well say that an Executive Government would be unnecessary apart from the legislative bodies, the executive functions of the Government being performed by the two Houses of Parliament That is what is done in this particular case. We are asked to assume the responsibility of saying that the parties named here are entitled to compensation under particular propositions of the law as if those propositions were still in force. The Minister of Justice may be able to say that, because he has investigated the claims of the parties; but nobody else is, and I do not think he should shift this responsibility from the shoulders of the Executive Government by naming the parties in the Bill

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Upon the hon, gentleman's own argument, there would not have been the slightest impropriety or the slightest constitutional irregularity in the original Bill to have declared the companies, the regiments and the persons to whom it applied. It would then have stood like an ordinary Supply Bill, which is passed every year, though it would be limited to the administration of this fund. But the difficulty of doing that at that time was that the claims had not been ascertained; they had to be investigated afterbounty on a petition of right, according to the state | wards. Since then, the bounty has been distributed, but it is ascertained that fifteen or twenty persons at most, and one or two corps, are entitled to the bounty under the terms of the original Act; and we ask the authority of Parliament to meet those claims, just as in a Supply Bill we ask Parliament to meet a claim which we think is founded on such evidence as we have found to exist. I admit, however, the passage of the resolution would have been facilitated if we had been less particular than we have been.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think the hon. Minister of Justice in this case is doing justice by the House. He is asking us to declare that certain persons named have certain rights, and we know The hon. Minister nothing about the merits. knows the merits of these claims, or he would not ask us to endorse them, but it is not wise to endorse in blank in this or any other case. the duty of the Government to assume the responsibility. I think the proper thing would be for the Minister to recast the resolutions and revive the legislation which has lapsed, and under that take power to deal with these cases, and deal with them as he has dealt with others. When, under the original Act, power was conferred by Parliament upon the Executive to adjudicate upon the claims of the volunteers, no volunteers were named, but it was left to the Minister of Militia to apply certain principles in order to find out what individuals came within the Act, and he, as administrator, made the necessary investigation. The mere fact that that law has lapsed does not make it necessary to adopt a different course. The principal thing is to revive the law and give the power which the Minister would have had but for the lapse of the law.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I told the hon, gentleman that before the second reading of the Bill, I would lay upon the Table the report from the Department of Justice. Now, if to facilitate, as the hon, gentleman seems anxious to do, the passing of these resolutions, he wishes me to read the whole report, I have a copy of it here and will be happy to do so, but I am afraid that will take up considerable time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Read us the first volume of Clarendon's history of the great rebellion.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am afraid the hon. gentleman would find a good many remarks which were made by the hon. gentleman himself and his friends, altogether in favour of the manner in which the Government behaved on that memorable occasion. If the hon. gentleman will consent I will place the report upon the Table, and send it immediately to the hon. gentleman, so that there will be no time lost at all.

Mr. MULOCK. I form no part of the Administration, and it is not my duty to look into this report. The hon. Minister of Justice may consider this is a proper way of conducting public business, but I entirely dissent from that view. It is not the duty of a Parliament to go into the details of a report, and Parliament was never asked to do such an absurd thing before. The hon. gentleman holds the report which he says is most voluminous, and when he proposed to read it to Parliament the proposition nearly convulsed the hon. Postmaster General with laughter. The proposition was so absurd that the hon. Minister's own colleague could not view it seriously, and he asks us to endorse that report, either with or without its being read—the one proposition is as absurd as the other. We are asked to discharge the duties of the Department of Militia. If that is the idea of the department, then as a department it is no longer necessary. When a department comes to delegate its duties to Parliament, Parliament will proceed in its own way to find the facts and draw the necessary conclusion. At present it does not occupy that position. We have, we will suppose, an efficient Minister of Militia in control, and I decline to read the report. If the Minister thinks it is his duty to read it he will perhaps do so.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon, member for North York (Mr. Mulock) misapprehended, I think, the laughter of the Postmaster General. He thought my hon. friend the Postmaster General was laughing at the Minister of Militia, whereas, as a fact, he was laughing at the hon, member for North York. And is not the hon, member for North York and even the hon, member for Bothwell in a somewhat ludicrous position? Both of them object to the Government coming here and taking Parliament into their confidence so far as to declare that a certain number of persons will come within the provisions of the Act. The hon, member for Bothwell would be quite content if the Government took the power it is about to take, and then, in the rooms of the Minister of Militia, without saying a word to Parliament, give the scrip to the persons mentioned here. In the name of common sense, what is it that disturbs the soul of the hon, member for Bothwell and my hon. friend for North York? Is there any dreadful precedent being established? Is there any harm done? These persons mentioned here have certificates from their commanding officers, which were placed before the Deputy Minister of Justice.

Mr. MULOCK. How do you know that?

Mr. DAVIN. Because I placed the certificates myself.

Mr. MULOCK. Who else knows it?

Mr. DAVIN. What I want to point out is this: that the Government have declared that they have adjudicated on the claims mentioned and found them valid, and that, if other persons establish their claims, they also would be acknowledged. The hon, member for North York and the hon. member for Bothwell would have no complaint to make, if no names were mentioned, but power taken and the scrip given without a word being said to Parliament. But the Government has taken Parliament into its confidence, by mentioning the names, and there ought to be no objection to that. There is a very good reason, probably, why those names should be given, and it may have struck the framer of the resolution that it was desirable to show Parliament how very little was the area over which the distribution of scrip, under the provisions of this resolution, would extend. Now, the hon. member for Bothwell is accustomed, and it is greatly to the instruction of this House, because he is a well-read man, on large and small occasions to soar into the highest regions of parliamentary practice, and he has not lost this opportunity. And what has been done? To compare great things with small, if the commander of an army wins a great victory and it is intended to reward him, does the Imperial Government come down to Parliament with a general resolution asking for certain powers to reward an individual or individuals in a given way? Not at all. They ask powers, just as are asked in this resolution, and give the names of the persons who are to be the beneficiaries of their bounty. This is comparing a large case with a very small one; but I maintain that the hon, member for Bothwell is fighting for a shadow. He cannot show that the least wrong is done, and, under those circumstances, to delay the passing of these resolutions, as my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) and the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) are endeavouring to do is, really—if I may say so without losing that politeness for which I believe I have got a character in this House-is almost trifling, so I think this resolution should be allowed to pass.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) I do not at all agree with my hon, friend who has just addressed the Committee. Now, what was done in the Bill as it originally stood? Did the Government come down to the House and present a whole array of names, and say that John Smith and James Jones and all the other parties are entitled to compensation under the resolutions they submitted to the House ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. What about pensions?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). With regard to pensions, we adopt a general proposition and leave it to the Administration to apply it. That is precisely what I suggest here. Let me call the attention of the Committee to this fact. In all cases, as Mr. Gladstone on one occasion said, the House of Commons is a very bad executive or administrative body. That is not its function. Its functions are entirely legislative, and it is the business of the Government, to whom the administration of public affairs is entrusted, to carry out the law and to give effect to its provisions; it is the duty of the Government to pay the parties who are entitled to be paid and to do so on its own responsibility. It is the right of this House to review every act of the Administration in the discharge of those duties. What is the position of the Government in regard to this particular matter? These parties are named here; we are asked to vote these sums; we are told that the report of the deputy Minister of Justice has been laid before the House; and next year we may discover that these payments have been improperly made, that these parties were not entitled to receive these moneys. What would be the answer of the Minister of Militia if this were brought up next year? He would say: This is your act and not ours; it is not an executive act, but a legislative act; it is a part of a law of Parliament; here are the parties named in this law; by your law, for which you are as much responsible as I am—for as members of Parliament we all stand on a footing of equality—you decided that these parties were entitled to receive these payments; you assumed the responsibility in the matter. That is how the matter stands, and I am rather astonished at my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who claims to be an admirer of the English system of parliamentary government, undertaking to make so radical a change as that which is suggested here. It seems to me that all these provisions might be dropped out. The hon. Minister can carry this through and found his Bill on the general provimentary usage, like the hon. member for West sion, and he can pay these parties just as well as he can pay those parties whose claims have not yet been investigated. We are not concerned here with the question as to whether he has investigated any particular claims or not. It is not a matter of any consequence to us that the claims of certain parties have been investigated any more than it is that certain other claims have not been investigated. Our business here is simply whether we approve or disapprove of the principle of granting compensation, as it was granted before, to those who deserve it, but we confer that power on the Government, and we hold them responsible for the exercise of that power, and that applies in regard to those claims that have been investigated as well as in regard to those which have not been investi-The principle is clear and is well understood, and, as far as I know, it has never been departed from in the Imperial Parliament; the principle is one which we ought not to depart from here. I will say nothing more on the subject. The responsibility rests with the Administration, but I do not approve of naming parties in the Bill, or legislating in this way, and I do not admit that the Government has a right to shift the responsibility for its administrative acts to Parliament in this way.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think there is a very important point raised in connection with this discussion. It is quite clear that this Bill is proposed in order to please certain individuals who are in a position to draw certain amounts with the sanction of Parliament, without submitting to Parliament the evidence upon which their claims are based. If we are intelligently to deal with the names mentioned in this resolution, and are to sit in judgment upon them, we should have before us printed every item of evidence in connection with the whole question of these persons being placed in this Bill and participating in its advantages. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) tries to impress upon the House, that my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is too much disposed to criticize items of magnitude and small items on the ground of parliamentary usage. If my hon, friend had thought for a moment that we live under a system of parliamentary government, under which every Minister is responsible for the acts of his department, I think he would not have criticized the statements of the hon. member for Bothwell as he has done. This is asking Parliament to consent to a principle to which we should not quietly consent. If we are deal with these names and allow these persons to become participants in the advantages proposed in this resolution, we should have all the evidence and every item connected with the claims they present, and under which they expect to participate. Why should we be asked to deal with names without having before us the evidence which has been laid before the Deputy Minister of Justice? Eliminate these names and give the Government power to deal with them, and then afterwards, if the parties are placed in a position they should not be placed in, the Government will be responsible, and we can sit in judgment on their acts. That is the point my hon. friend finds fault with. I am surprised that an old experienced parliamentarian, a man who claims to be, and in fact is, almost acknow-

Assiniboia, should endanger his reputation by making the very wild and unparliamentary statements he has made in the House on this occasion. I think he did himself a grave injustice, and I hope he will see that it is in his interest, and in the interest of his record, to get up and promptly withdraw the statement he has made.

On resolution 5,

Mr. MULOCK. I would ask the Minister of Militia if he will be good enough to give us the merits of the case of Walter William Phelan, of Regina, whose services have been certified to by competent authority?

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Minister of Justice replies to that, I may say that Walter William Phelan has been certified to by Colonel Otter as having been a scout actively engaged in the suppression of the rebellion.

Mr. MULOCK. We require the official report of the Minister of Militia.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon, gentleman wishes me to read the report?

Mr. MULOCK. Certainly; and whatever evidence you have to lay before us.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON:

"The claim of Walter William Phelan of Regina. The question is here whether Phelan was a scout actively engaged during the outbreak, whose services have been certified to by competent authority. There is no doubt that Colonel Otter was in command of the Battleford column, and that William White, at present of Moosomin, was the transport officer in connection with such battalion. The latter officer certifies that Mr. Phelan was employed by him during the Rebellion of 1885 in the transport service of the North-West field force, in connection with the Battleford column, and was a portion of the time employed as a seout accompanying the convoy of 150 teams from Swift Current to Battleford after the capture of the teamsters by Poundmaker. Mr. White's certificate is confirmed by Colonel Otter in writing endorsed thereon.

"Colonel Panet, the Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence, in his letter of the 23rd April, 1889, to the Department of the Interior, states that the services performed by Mr. Phelan do not appear to be of such a nature as to entitle him to a scrip certificate. I am unable to agree with the Deputy Minister in this view."

This is the expression of opinion of the Deputy

This is the expression of opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice-

'I am unable to agree with the Deputy Minister in his of 1886. He is, in my opinion, clearly entitled to scrip."

Mr. MULOCK. Whose opinion is that?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That is the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Militia.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon, gentleman be good enough to read the certificate of William White? I understood the Deputy Minister of Militia had relied upon that as one of the evidences upon which he formed his judgment.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON:

"The following persons, James Rolland, Frederick Rolland, Wm. Rolland, John Whiteford, R. E. Steele, G. M. Steele, E. Chamberlayne, A. McNichol, Peter Nelson, George Beatty and John Calder, claim scrip for their services on the ground that they were secure as their services on the ground that they were scouts actively engaged during the outbreak, whose services have been certified to by competent authority. A. McNichol has already received a homestead under the statute of 1886 for this service, and I have only to deal with the other eleven claims.

other eleven claims.
Mr. McMullen.

"The report of the Department of Militia and Defence upon the suppression of the Rebellion of 1885, and particularly the appendices of General Middleton and Major General Strange, commanding the Alberta Field Force, show that Major Steele who, for the time being was a recognized officer of the military force, organized a troop of souts to co-operate with the military force, and that these men along with the Mounted Police were in active these men, along with the Mounted Police, were in active service during the rebellion.

If the hon, gentleman is not quite ready to give me his attention-

Mr. MULOCK. I am giving all my attention to the hon, gentleman.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON:

—"The papers show that seven of these claimants served through the whole of the rebellion, and that John Whiteford. George Beatty and John Calder, the remaining claimants, were present as scouts and under fire at Frenchmen's Butte and two other skirmishes. They further show that all these men received pay from the Department of Militia for their services.

"General Middleton, in his report upon the case, dated 27th November, 1889, states as follows:—'They claim under sub-section (b) of 49 Vic., Cap. 29, which reads as follows: 'Every scout actively engaged during the said outbreak whose services have been certified to by competent authority'; but it must be remembered that scouts who performed special duties received a rate of pay for their services far in excess of that given to soldiers, and that unless specific and valuable services are shown in each ease, entitling them to it, they should not receive performed special duties received a rate of pay for their services far in excess of that given to soldiers, and that unless specific and valuable services are shown in each case, entitling them to it, they should not receive scrip in addition. There are no such certificates in any of these cases, nor does it appear how long, nor in what way they carned what they claimed. They should, I think, produce evidence from competent authority for the special services rendered by each. Some of them appear to have performed other services during a portion of the outbreak, but in none of them are particular services and duties given. I have no personal knowledge of any of the men or of their alleged services, and although Major Steele certifies that they were scouts belonging to his corps, I think they should produce proof of services sufficient to warrant the demand they have made.'

"I do not think that General Middleton had sufficiently considered the section of the statute which he cites. The right of the claimant for scrip depends solely upon this question: Were they scouts in active service during the rebellion? The fact that they received greater pay than regular soldiers does not affect the question, nor is it necessary that specific and valuable service in each case should be shown apart from ordinary scout service. I need not discuss the question as to whether, in the event of the claimant having performed acts of active scout service, within the meaning of the statute, they should produce evidence in the shape of a document 'certified to by competent authorities, as I consider Major Steele, who was their superior officer, and personally acquainted with the character of the service, is such competent authority, whose certificate, if given in good faith, it is the duty of the Department of Militia and Defence to recognize. But the services of the claimant are not evidenced by Major Steele's certificate alone. There is a certificate from the Adjutant General's Office attached to the papers, which shows that each of cognition for their services.

Mr. MULOCK. Whose certificate is that?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That of the Deputy Minister of Justice.

Mr. MULOCK. I want the certificate of Wm.

Sir ADOLHHE CARON. In the report I have submitted to the House are the documents of every individual case adjudicated upon.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Militia has simply read the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice. That opinion purports to be based on certain facts and evidence. For example, it says at the beginning that the Deputy Minister has read the certificate of the competent authority, one Wm. White, and he says that that authority, together with the endorsement by Colonel Otter and some opinion expressed by Colonel Panet, gave him the information on which he made the report. report of the Deputy Minister in no way binds this House, and I decline to accept the report of any Deputy Minister on facts not laid before Parliament. The Minister is bound to lay before the House the facts of the case, so that members themselves may decide. The Minister sees exactly where he has landed himself. He has not given us the evidence. Did the Deputy Minister's report deal with the case of Phelan?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. Then, I want the certificate of the competent authority on which the Minister bases his report.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no information contained in the certificate, and nothing turned on anything which the certificate contains. The claims of these people were investigated by the departmental board that sat on the claims, and their decision was given. The question raised in Phelan's case was this: They belonged to a corps called Steele's Cavalry. They were actually engaged as scouts. There was no dispute on that point; but the question was whether their services were properly certified or not. There was no dispute as to what their services were, as to what the certifi-There was no information contained in the certificate; the question was simply whether Mr. White was the proper officer to certify. That question being submitted to the department, the Deputy Minister of Justice declared that in the opinion of the department Col. White's certificate, endorsed by Col. Otter, that these men had actually served as scouts, was sufficient to entitle them to be considered as properly certified. We did not derive any facts from the certificate itself.

Mr. MULOCK. There could not be a more absurd example of legislative action than that which we now witness. The fact that the Minister of Militia has not come here with the proper evidence to submit, shows the absurdity of the case. I will not detain the Committee longer, but enough has come out to warn the Government against the course they have pursued. The Minister has not had much to do this session, and he might have had these resolutions properly prepared, and even if he had decided to submit them in this form, he should have come here prepared with a case to back them up.

ADJOURNMENT—THE CASE OF MR. ARNOLDI.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. I see it stated in the press that departmental action has been taken by the Minister of Public Works with respect to Mr. Arnoldi. Will the Minister state to the House whether that is true, and if so what action has been taken?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Arnoldi's case was brought before Council. It was decided he should be suspended. He has been suspended.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) What does suspension involve, because we do not quite understand it? Does it practically mean dismissal, or merely that he is suspended, pending a decision to be arrived at in future by the Government?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.—Suspension means that an officer ceases to come to the office or attend to his ordinary duties, and he is without pay. The matter will have to be decided later on by the Council.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then it is not equivalent to dismissal?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not dismissal, but suspension.

Mr. MULOCK. It will be within the knowledge of hon, gentlemen that yesterday it came out in evidence that Mr. Arnoldi has been presented with a pair of bronze dogs, which had not paid duty. Later—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon, gentleman is discusing proceedings taken before a Committee.

Mr. MULOCK. I am going to ask a question, and I am simply making a statement in order to make my question clear. It is stated in the press to-day that Mr. Arnoldi had duty paid on them yesterday, on a valuation of about $500.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We are not in a position to answer, in the absence of the Minister of Customs. The question can be asked later.

Mr. MULOCK. At what stage?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. At any time.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 105) respecting the Intercolonial Railway.—(Mr. Bowell.)

SHIPPING OF LIVE STOCK.

Mr. TUPPER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to pass an Act respecting the shipping of live stock, and to provide that the Governor in Council may appoint inspectors under the said Act and determine the remuneration to be paid them out of the fees which the Governor in Council may establish to be paid on live stock shipped on any ships carrying live stock.

Motion agreed to; resolution considered in Committee, reported and concurred in.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 154) respecting the shipping of live stock. He said: I may say in explanation of this Bill that last year there was introduced into the English House of Commons a Bill proposing to prohibit ships carrying live stock across the Atlantic, and ships carrying deck loads of lumber, from entering British ports. The measure excited considerable alarm in this country, as it threatened grave danger to one of the important industries of Canada, an industry which has grown with great rapidity since 1874. In that year, it appears, there were about 64 head of live stock, all told, shipped from Canada to Great Britain: in 1879, there were 20,588; in 1884, 53.962; in 1889, 60,000; and in 1890, no less than 120, 000; so that to prohibit the shipment of live stock would have done incalculable injury to this country. Shortly after the introduction of that Bill there was a departmental committee organized under the president of the British Board of Trade, Mr. Chaplin, and to that committee the Bill was referred, and the views of the Canadian Government were invited on the subject. At once the various parties interested—the shippers of live stock, the shipowners, and the underwriters-took a very quick and active interest in the subject, and I had the benefit of their information and advice touching the condition of that business. I then caused to be held an exhaustive enquiry on the subject, and the evidence taken in that enquiry has already been laid before this House. Those interested in the trade-the shippers the owners of shipping, and the underwriters-attended that enquiry at Montreal, Three Rivers and Quebec, and gave us all the information there was to be had. The main point brought out appeared to be, that while there had been a loss of cattle in transit while crossing the ocean, that loss had been confined almost exclusively to those vessels known as tramps—vessels coming to Canada occasionally for cargoes, and not belonging to any regular lines. The regular lines, the Allan, the Dominion, the Beaver and the various other Canadian lines engaged in this trade, were able to present and did present a splendid record, not only at the enquiry in Canada, but also in Great Britain. It was shown that they had taken the necessary precautions, in their own interests, and in the interests of the trade, to secure the comfort of the animals in their passage across the ocean and to see that the ships were fitted out tight, staunch and strong; but an unfortunate case occurred, that of a vessel known as the Linda, in which great loss took place while crossing the ocean, the cattle being swept overboard in great numbers. That case was discussed at great length in England, and evidence was given concerning it, giving rise to an unfortunate and false impression respecting the supervision of the shipments of cattle at Canadian ports. This vessel, the Linda, did not belong to any of the regular lines, but was known as one of the tramps The provisions of the law last year, under which this Government were enabled to exercise any supervision over the shipment of live cattle, are to be found in the Act relating to contagious diseases of animals, in the Revised Statutes, and the Order in Council, under that Act, gave the only power that could be exercised with reference to such shipments. But that Act, as its name indicates, related almost exclusively to the health of the animals and their condition at the port of shipment, with the view of preventing any diseased animals from being shipped and of seeing the regulations, the prohibition should be with-Mr. TUPPER.

that they were so placed on board as to prevent any likelihood of their catching disease in crossing, but their comfort and the fittings of the ship were questions not covered by the Act, and it is for the purpose of enabling the Government to see that, in every respect, the vessels engaged in this trade take the necessary precautions, not only to prevent the shipment of animals infected with contagious diseases, but to see that they shall be allowed sufficient space and enjoy ample convenience for their health and comfort and that the fittings shall be of such a character that ordinary storms would not carry them away and the animals with them, as has occurred on several occasions in the cases of vessels only temporarily engaged in the business, which were not provided with the proper conveniences for that particular trade, and with which the Government has not, under present legislation, been able to interfere. The Bill provides also that the expense of the inspection shall be met by a small tax on the animals shipped, and it is not expected that a fee higher than two cents or three cents per head need be imposed. The chief inspection so far as at present required, is really at the port of Montreal; but, with the exception of the ports of Quebec and Three Rivers, there are very few other ports at present in Canada from which cattle are shipped. I do not think there will be much difficulty in seeing that proper regulations are carried out under the provisions of this Bill. There are about eleven clauses in it, but the sections I have not dealt with relate merely to the machinery necessary to have a proper survey, so that a vessel may not, after being loaded in Montreal according to regulations and obtained a clearance from that port, stop at Three Rivers and Quebec and overload or overcrowd at these ports. I may add that the legislation in England to which I have referred has met apparently with a sudden check, but the necessity remains as great as it was before for our adopting this legislation; and I may say briefly that, independent entirely of the legislation in England, enough has been shown by the enquiry, in the opinion of those interested in the trade—the shippers, underwriters and cattlemen—to prove that additional legislation is required, but in England the Bill to which I have referred has been withdrawn. There was great opposition to the contemplated legislation in England from the shipping interests, as it proposes to clothe with very great powers the department known as the Board of Agriculture in Eng-At present under the Act relating to contagious diseases, which is administered in the Department of the Privy Council in England, a vessel which does not comply with the present regulations can be blacklisted and not permitted to enter a port on any other occasion with cattle. case of the Linda. After it was discovered that animals had been badly stowed on that vessel and cattle lost in great numbers, she was scheduled and prohibited from again entering a British port with cattle, even though she should have complied with the regulations. The objection to the Bill was that, while it is proposed that the Board of Agriculture should summarily decide that where the regulations had been violated the vessels should be prohibited from carrying cattle again, it was neglected to provide that, on the vessels being fitted out in accordance with drawn. We propose to have powers under which, as has already been done in the United States, in view of the same agitation in England and for the protection of their interests, instead of any imperative course being adopted, the department will be simply authorized to prescribe and enforce regulations for the carrying of live stock. We have gone very carefully into the question, and have also had the benefit of receiving the draft regulations prepared under Mr. Chaplin's supervision in England, which regulations will be put in force under the statute to which I allude in England, that relating to contagious diseases of animals, and these regulations will be put in force here as soon as this Bill becomes law.

Mr. LAURIER. Is the hon, gentleman able at this moment to state the general regulations which he proposes to adopt in regard to space and other matters of that kind?

Mr. TUPPER. The regulations have not yet been adopted by Order in Council, as the Bill requires after it becomes law; but, after consideration of the various interests and of the English regulations and the American regulations which are now in force, we have considered that it is advisable to observe uniformity as far as possible. Of course, it is obviously desirable that the fittings of a ship shall be disturbed as little as possible when she goes to an American, an English or any other port. As to the parts of the vessel which may be used, it is proposed that:

"Cattle shall not be carried on more than three decks. Cattle shall not be carried on the hatches or on any part of the vessel where, in ordinary course of navigation, they would interfere with the proper management of the vessel or would interfere with the efficient working of the boats."

By way of illustration, I may point out that, where the hatches are practically kept closed, with cattle underneath and hay and animals stored indiscriminately above, it becomes very dangerous. Then, as to space:

"Fat cattle shall be allowed a space of not less than 2 feet 8 inches in width and 8 feet in depth per head, and not more than four such cattle shall be carried in each pen. Store cattle shall be allowed a space of not less than 2 feet 6 inches in width and 8 feet in depth per head, and not more than five such cattle shall be carried in each pen. Each pen shall be provided with proper battens to prevent the cattle from slipping."

Then, as to the strength and description of fittings:

"Each pen shall be constructed of sound and well seasoned timber, the stanchions being not less than 4 inches in thickness in each direction." and so on.

Then, as to the passage ways, there is a discussion going on in regard to the width. Some propose a width of 3 feet, but the officers I have consulted seem to take the view that 18 inches would be sufficient for the passage way. That is a matter still to be considered. Then as to the matter of ventilation—and I may say that practically the regular liners now apply most of these provisions—it is proposed that:

"All enclosed portions of the vessel used for cattle shall be sufficiently ventilated (in addition to any ventilation obtained by means of the hatchways) by means of cowls or other proper means for the admission of fresh air, and shall be provided with proper mechanical arrangements, propelled by steam power, for the removal of the foul air."

This system is now, I believe, in vogue on our regular liners—

"Each deck (if enclosed) on which cattle are carried shall have separate and distinct arrangements for its ventilation. Proper and suitable arrangements shall be made to provide at all times adequate light for the proper tending of the cattle."

Then, in regard to the supply of food and water, I have not sufficient information to state the definite amount which will be required, but it is proposed to regulate the amount provided for each head of cattle, and this is the proposed provision as to the mode of securing the cattle:

"Every head of cattle shall be securely tied by the head so as to stand athwart ships."

The great point which has been discussed has been that in reference to space, and I think, under the existing law, we have dealt with that so that it is nothing new. I do not know of any dissatisfaction with our present regulations in that respect, and they are practically the same as those existing in the United States, that is a space of 2 feet 8 inches for fat cattle and 2 feet 6 inches for stockers.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think the space allowed for the passages, 18 inches, is too little. A space of 21 feet is as little as ought to be allowed for those passages. There is a good deal of danger when the cattle are too close together, because they may get forward with their horns and meet in the centre, and 2½ feet or 3 feet is the least space that should be allowed. Then, as to ventilation there should be sufficient ventilation in front, because that is where the greatest danger is. I shipped some cattle on one of the Donaldson steamers, and if the whole of the ports had not been opened, a large number would have been lost, and the reason was, that there was not sufficient ventilation at the front of the vessel to allow the foul air to get out and the fresh air to get in. In regard to the inspection, I should like to know if the owners of the vessels or the shippers are to pay for the inspection.

Mr. TUPPER. That is as broad as it is long. The tax will be collected from the ship, and no doubt they will collect from the shipper.

Mr. McMILLAN. It has become a great question with the shippers of cattle as to whether they would ship from Canada or from the other side, notwithstanding the difficulties which exist there, because the difference in freight is so great, and I think the burdens on Canadian shippers ought to be made as light as possible. I know that this season a great many cattle have been sent to Boston and shipped there, on account of the lower rates from that port.

Mr. TUPPER. I hope the competition will soon settle that question.

Mr. TROW. I agree with the hon, member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) in reference to the question of space. Formerly, all kinds of stock were sent to the old country, but now it is not usual to send any stock unless it is of proper age and well fat. tened, because it costs as much to send a poor animal across the Atlantic as to send a good one. I am, however, surprised to hear the statement of the hon. gentleman in regard to shipping cattle from Boston and New York. That appears to me to be perfectly assured, because our shippers will not advocate taking that route because, if we send them by our own lines, the cattle become inured to hardship before they enter the sea by going down the rivers, whereas at New York they are at once plunged into the Atlantic at Sandy Hook and become seasick, so that I think our people will unquestionably prefer our own lines to those going from New York.

Mr. SPROULE. I have received two or three letters complaining strongly of many of the regulations as they exist at present. They complain that the suggestions in the report made last year have not since been carried out. I notice that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is providing for some of them in his Bill, but I think others are not provided for.

Mr. TUPPER. I will explain to the hon, gentleman that there is no difference between Mr. Cunningham and myself with reference to the chief points in his letter; I have already explained to him that I was powerless to do anything until this legislation was obtained. As I explained to the House, the Order in Council contains the regulations; the Bill simply empowers the Governor in Council to pass these regulations.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood from the explanations of the Minister, that the Bill was not to contain these regulations. Of course, it is not necessary to say anything about it until the Bill comes down, and we see what power it gives to make those regulations.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me the regulations should be taken afterwards, when he asks for power. I understood the Minister to say, that he had not fully made up his mind as to space.

Mr. TUPPER. Only as to passage way, not space in the stalls. I am obtaining more information as to space in the stalls.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand the Minister of Marine to say that we exported as many as 120,000 horned cattle?

Mr. TUPPER. Between 120,000 and 125,000 of horned cattle, and nearly all from Montreal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the hon, gentleman sure?

Mr. TUPPER. That is the information.

Six RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My impression is that our export of horned cattle was some 60,000 or 70,000:

Mr. TUPPER. 70,000 of this 120,000 were known as stock cattle, so I think my information must be right. The figures are given on page 56 of the Report of the Commission of Enquiry to which I referred. That mentions 123,000 head of cattle; it does not say they are horned cattle, but of this number 70,000 were stockers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I rather suspect that it must include sheep.

Mr. TUPPER. Sheep are mentioned afterwards. I think I am right, I will look that up; but that seems to confirm at first glance what I stated, that 70,000 of the 123,000 were stockers.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. There seems to be a misunderstanding about the number of cattle that has been shipped. Now, the number the Minister of Marine has given is the number that was shipped last year during the summer season. I suppose my hon. friend at my left is referring to the returns that are only enumerated until the 1st of July, last year.

Mr. Trow.

Mr. TUPPER. I was referring to the evidence taken last fall at the end of the shipping season, not to the trade return.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. I am satisfied the Minister is correct in the numbers that were shipped from the opening of navigation last year from Montreal until the end of navigation. Now, this Bill that he proposes declares that it is expedient to make regulations for the shipment of cattle from Canada. The reason why it is expedient is that last year a gentleman in England, a member of the English Parliament, was agitating for a Bill for the purpose of stopping our cattle from being shipped to England. Now, if he had succeeded in getting such a Bill passed it would have caused great loss to this country. We have not the same advantages for shipping dead beef that the Americans have, and we have not as good a class of cattle for the dead meat trade as they have. Our cattle are an inferior class to those that they slaughter in New York and ship to England. We should endeavour to make regulations and restrictions concerning the shipment of our cattle to England as easy as possible. This cattle trade is capable of being made very profitable to this country. Now, these gentlemen that were here last year and were endeavouring to prevent our cattle from being landed alive in England, had several objects in view, one of which was said to be in the interest of the sailors. Mr. Plimsoll, who took the most prominent part in this agitation, had paid a gread deal of attention in England to the welfare of the sailors, and he contended that the practice of shipping cattle on board steamers was attended with danger to the sailors in handling the vessel. Another reason for the agitation was the opposition of the agricultural interest in England to the shipment of live stock in Canada. The English farmers were very anxious to stop this trade in order that they might have a better home market for their own The third reason was that which came from cattle. the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Now, we have in Canada, as they have in England, humane societies, who believe they are acting in the interest of humanity by preventing dumbbrutes from being ill-treated. It must be confessed that they have some reason for complaint, as our cattle are frequently landed on the other side in a very much bruised condition, and in an unfit state to go on the market. I have had personal experience in this matter. Some 13 years ago I took 450 head of cattle over in a steamer from Boston, which was the largest shipment of live cattle that had ever been made up to that time. I found in going over that a great many of our cattle were hurt for want of room, they were crowded together in short and narrow stalls, and were bruised on the hips and on the rump bones, and when they landed some of them had wounds on their hips as large as a man's head, and they had to be put out for a few weeks to pasture before they could go on the market. These cattle landed in that shape were not fit to be slaughtered. Cattle that arrive in England in that state ought not to be slaughtered until such time as they become sound again. In shipping cattle to England we need to give them wider stalls and more room generally, and if we did this and were able to land our cattle in England in a good condition for the market, not only would we be consulting our own interests, but the people of England would have no reason to complain that the cattle suffered cruelty on the voyage. I hope the proposed Bill will receive the serious consideration of the House, and that every effort will be put forward to make the regulations as effective as possible, in order to obtain better provisions respecting loading and unloading and better accommodation on board. The American people were aroused on this subject at the same time as we were. They had a like investigation proceeding last fall in consequence of the Plimsoll Bill. On 6th June the United States Government passed regulations similar to that proposed, and they are still in operation, and I am satisfied from what I have heard in Montreal that American cattle are landed in England in much better condition than they were formerly. We should endeavour to get our cattle shipped as safely and have as comfortable accommodation provided for them as can be obtained at American ports. Cattle sent from American ports in vessels, many of which made more rapid passages than a great many of the vessels sailing from Montreal, reached England in almost as good a condition during the hot weather as do cattle shipped by a cooler route and later in the season. These regulations appear to act in a satisfactory manner and are the means of causing cattle to be shipped to England more safely and in a better condition than before. I believe this Bill will be the means of shutting off a great many cattle from going to England that should not go. The inspector will have power to regulate matters more or less in this regard. A class of cattle has been shipped which should not have been sent to England, as the animals were not fit. One cow in an unhealthy condition, leaving Toronto last year, in a shipment, was the cause of the delay of a whole shipment in England for several days. If we had a rigid inspection of every animal that was sent on board for shipmont this would not happen, and the inspector would know whether the animals about to be sent on board were in a fit condition for the voyage or not. I am perfectly aware that the inspector in Montreal, Dr. McEachran, is a competent officer, one who will do his duty if the Government will back him up and give him the power he wishes, that he may insist on the regulations being strictly carried out. When the Bill comes up for consideration I will have an opportunity of explaining some matters in connection with it.

Mr. TUPPER. I desire to say to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that I have found the exact information. It is even more extraordinary than I at first supposed. The Trade Returns do not give the information, but the figures are given by the secretary of the Live Stock Association. On page 229 of the report of inquiry on the export cattle trade of Canada there appears the following :-

"The export of cattle from this port has doubled itself in two years. There were 60,000 head of cattle shipped from this port in the season of 1888, and in the season of 1890 there were 123,136 head of cattle and 43,372 sheep. This is more than double what the trade was in 1888, and it represents an export trade of about $11,000,000 between Canada and Great Britain, and nearly $2,000,000 of that goes to the steamship companies for freight."

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 104) to amend the Bills of Ex- terest to build their line from Calgary to Red change Act, 1890 (from the Senate).—Sir John Thompson.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The fifth section reads:

" Section twenty-four is amended by adding the following sub-section:—

"2. If the drawee of a cheque bearing a forged endorsement pays the amount thereof to a subsequent endorser, or to the bearer thereof, he shall have all the rights of a holder in due course for the recovery back of the amount of maid from any ordered who have an lorged them. so paid from any endorser who has endorsed the same subsequent to the forged endorsement, as well as his legal recourse against the bearer thereof as a transferrer by delivery; the whole, however, subject to the provisions and limitations contained in the last preceding sub-section.

I propose to add the words:

Any endorser who has made payments shall have the like rights and recourse against any antecedent endorser subsequent to the first endorsement.

On section 3,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. On re-consideration of section 3, I think we had better leave that out of the Bill. Section 17 of the original Act provides that if a Bill is drawn, and the drawee described incorrectly, he may accept by the incorrect name by which he is addressed, or he may, in addition to that, add his own signature "if he thinks fit." Now, section 3 would strike out the words "if he thinks fit," and it practically makes no change. It leaves the matter still at the option of the drawee, because the Act will read: "He may accept by adding his own proper name." This amendment will throw a doubt as to whether it was not obligatory upon him to add his own name, and I think it is better to leave the Act as

Bill reported, and read the third time, and

RED DEER VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution :

That it is expedient further to amend the Act forty-second Victoria, chapter four, intituled: "An Act to authorize the granting of subsidies in land to certain Railway Companies," and to provide that Dominion lands may be granted to the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company to an extent not exceeding six thousand four hundred acres for each mile of the said company's railway, either from Cheadle station, on the Canadian Pacific Railway, to its terminus at a point in or near Township twenty-nine, Range twenty-three, west of the 4th Meridian, a distance of about fifty-five miles, or from the town of Calgary, in the district of Alberta, in the North-West Territories, to its said terminus in Township twenty-nine, Range twenty-three, west of the 4th Meridian, a distance of about seventy-five miles.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAURIER. What is the object of this?

Mr. DEWDNEY. A year or two ago a charter was granted to the Red Deer Valley Railway Company granting power to run a line from a point on the Canadian Pacific Railway called Cheadle, or from Calgary, to a point on the Red Deer River. There was also a land subsidy given for the line from Cheadle to Red Deer, a distance of fifty miles. This year the charter expired, but they have obtained an extension for two years more, and they have represented that it will be more in their inDeer, rather than from Cheadle. The object of running from Cheadle was because of the distance being shorter to the coal fields, but they found that their market will be an extensive one in Calgary itself, and they have asked for a land grant from Calgary to Red Deer, increasing the distance twenty-five miles.

Mr. LAURIER. There is correspondence, I presume, on the subject?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I think that the negotiations have been entirely carried on between the representatives of the county and the department. I do not think there is any correspondence on the subject.

Mr. LAURIER—Is there no correspondence in reference to the change which the hon, gentleman has just mentioned?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I am not quite sure about that. I know that there has been a good deal of communications, both last year and this, and it was intended to have passed this legislation last year, but, inadvertently, it was overlooked when the Land Subsidy Bill came down. I think probably there may be some correspondence.

Mr. LAURIER. I suppose the hon, gentleman will bring it down.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes: I will bring it down if there is any.

Mr. MULOCK. I would ask the Minister of the Interior who are the promoters of this railway?

Mr. DEWDNEY. As far as I can understand, the promoters are the same as those who appear in the original charter, with the exception of Jos. Evans, who is dead.

Mr. MULOCK. Would the hon, gentleman mind reading the names.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Daniel McFarlane, Joshua T. Johnston, Henry Percy Withers, and John Bain, all of the city of Toronto.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon, gentleman say what financial backing this company has?

Mr. DEWDNEY. It was only lately—last spring—that it appeared to me they were financially in a position to go on with this work. Some six weeks or two months ago, at the commencement of the session, I had an interview with Mr. Alexander, who lives in Calgary, and who has operated largely there in building waterworks, buying property, and expending money in buildings, and with Mr. Osborne, who is the financial agent of a colonization company south of Calgary. He met Mr. Alexander in Calgary, who had been in communication with Mr. Bain in reference to the construction of this railway, and they informed me that $500,000 was on hand for the work, provided the legislation which had been agreed to could be carried out.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon, gentleman say whether any shareholders in this company have put any cash into the stock?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have no information in regard to that at all, except that I understand that they represent that they have spent some $20,000 in surveys and preliminary work. I think Mr. Ick Evans and Mr. Bain went to England once or twice in the interests of this company.

Mr. DEWDNEY.

Mr. MULOCK. Has the hon, gentleman taken any steps to ascertain the truth of the statements made by Mr. Alexander and Mr. Osborne?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Those statements were made to myself in my office.

Mr. MULOCK. How have they been verified—for instance, the statement that there is $500,000 available?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I understand that it is available. I took their word for it.

Mr. MULOCK. I hope that the other members of the company are men of greater capital than Mr. J. Ick Evans, who the hon, gentleman says was one of the promoters. He happened to be a resident of the city of Toronto, and we know something of him there. I believe he is now dead; but dead or alive, he was no financial strength to any company. Until he left the city of Toronto he occupied a very worthy position, but not one indicating that he possessed any degree of capital, namely, that of salesman in a retail store. He was very useful to hon, gentlemen opposite, because he was a great pusher and spouter, and that was the extent of his capital. We are asked to grant 6,400 acres a mile—

Mr. DEWDNEY. For 20 miles, in addition to the land for 55 miles already granted—75 miles altogether.

Mr. MULOCK. A pretty considerable grant from the public domain, to be locked up on the word of a gentleman from England, Mr. Osborne, and another from Calgary, whose only record, so far as we know, is that he took part in building some waterworks in Calgary. Has the hon, gentleman any acquaintance with Mr. Alexander?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have.

Mr. MULOCK. Perhaps he could state what his financial position is?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I know nothing of Mr. Alexander's private affairs at all, except that I know he has spent a large amount of money, some $200,000, or it may be $300,000, in the neighbourhood of Calgary.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to call the attention of the Minister and the Government to the importance of attaching some penalty clause to Acts making land grants or money subsidies to railway companies. We have been in the habit in the past of granting large subsidies to railway corporations without requiring them to show that they have the financial ability to go on and complete the work. I have always thought, knowing something of the manner in which gentlemen acquire railway charters and hold them for speculative purposes, that the Government should exact some guarantee from people who receive a subsidy either of land or money from the Government that they will carry out the conditions upon which it is granted. This company so far have done nothing. Last year they got a land grant for 50 miles, and now they are to get another for 20 miles. We are told that they have spent several thousand dollars. We have heard in the last few days how some of these men who get railway subsidies pay money to the company. They give notes, and the notes are paid out of the subsidy. the subsidy. There is nothing paid in cash. These men are simply speculators. I know nothing of the men connected with this company; but I know that the Red Deer country is greatly in need of a grant subsidies, either in cash or in land, we should railway, and these men have done nothing towards have some guarantee from the company or some building one, although they have held the charter for years. There is another company, the North-West Central, which has been assisted by this Government, and which has come to this House year after year asking for extensions of time and land grants, and they have only succeeded in constructing 50 miles in some eleven or twelve years. Those 50 miles were constructed a year ago, but the road is not operated to-day, simply because there is some quarrel among the promoters them-I visited the department, and find that selves. the Government can do nothing but ask those people to operate the road; there is no penalty whatever imposed upon them for neglecting to operate. I believe that there is another railway in New Brunswick to which a cash subsidy of $3,200 a mile was granted. One man got the money, built the road, and then refused to operate it, and I believe the Government can do nothing to compel him to do so. Now, when we are granting subsidies of land or money to these railway companies there should be some provision requiring them to operate the roads after they are built, or they should be required to make a deposit as a guarantee that they will do so, before this House gives them any portion of the public domain or any cash subsidy. In the case of the North-West Central, there is a double hardship to the settlers affected, because that road runs through a tract of country through which it was expected the Canadian Pacific Railway would be run. When the second hundred miles west of Winnipeg was surveyed the line was carried through the Oak River district, west of Rapid City, but it was afterwards diverted to the south. Then, the Souris and Rocky Mountain Railway was projected to run through the same district. That company has changed its name several times. I believe the charter was granted first in 1879. We know the history of that railway. We know the story of the boodler boy Beaty, and all the disgraceful circumstances in connection with that railway, from beginning to end. I am not going to take time to say what the quarrel is which prevents that road being operated to-day, or who is to blame. The contractor, Mr. Charlebois, is at present on the other side of the Atlantic, and I understand that he does not propose to come to Canada until after this House rises. Last year, to my own knowledge, there were 1,000,000 bushels of grain and roots which would have been shipped over the 50 miles of that railway if it had been built, and the people were compelled to haul their produce from 10 to 40 miles to market, simply because that railway was not operated. The grading was done, and, I believe, well done, the track laid, and well laid. but there is not sufficient rolling stock on it and the road is not operated. I suggested and the road is not operated. I suggested in this House, and, if I recollect aright, divided the House on the question, that that company, on receiving their land grant, should be asked to put up $50,000 as guarantee that they would build the road and operate it, but the Government refused, on the ground that it was difficult enough for the company to get the money without such The fact is, we have chartermongers getting charters through the Railway Committee president, we to build roads without any intention of building them, and see them themselves, and I contend that before we it this year.

Mr. DEWDNEY. There is a great deal in what the hon, gentleman has said, but as regards this railway, the Railway Committee had it in their hands to cancel the charter if they thought the company could not go on with it. But, year after year, companies come before the Railway Committee asking for renewals of their charter; and, if the Committee believe they are capable of carrying out their charters, renewals are granted. In this case under discussion the company received a land grant for 55 miles, and are now only asking the difference between 55 and 70.

Mr. MULOCK. Has the grant for the 66 miles lapsed ?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I am not quite sure whether it has or not.

Mr. WATSON. If their charter has lapsed, the land grant is lapsed.

Mr. DALY. I do not intend to discuss this matter at length, because I put a notice on the Paper calling for correspondence, but I wish to endorse a great deal of what the hon, gentleman has said with reference to the Great North-West Central Railway and the unfortunate condition in which it has placed those who expected the road to be in operation last year. Fifty miles have been built and equipped, both in passenger, baggage and freight cars, and there are three locomotives at Brandon; but, as the hon. gentleman has said, we expected to ship over a million bushels of grain last year over this road, but unfortunately, at the last moment, our settlers were disappointed. It appears that the contractor, Mr. Charlebois, entered into a contract for the building of 50 miles, and the contract provided that the railway, when built, should be certified to by the chief engineer of Government railways. The contractor completed the line, and a certificate was given by Mr. Schreiber, the chief engineer of Government railways, yet the company would not take the road off his hands. The question in dispute was referred to Messrs. Shanly and Light, civil engineers of Montreal, and an award made unanimously in favour of Mr. Charlebois, but a year has passed and the company have not paid to Mr. Charlebois the money due him. The sub-contractors are also owed money by Mr. Charlebois, who cannot get paid by the company, and about $15,000 or $16,000 are due traders in the vicinity of Brandon. Only the other day a petition was presented from the Board of Trade of Brandon in reference to this matter, and the people certainly desire that the road should be operated at once. I am not, however, going to move in the matter until my notice is brought before the House. This question is a burning one with our people, and we are determined, if this road is not operated next year, to ask that the company shall be declared to have forfeited all their rights. I think the charter provides that. I am satisfied the public are safe-guarded by the provisions of the charter, and I draw the attention of the Government to the matter in order that they may communicate with the president, who is now in England, or the promoters, and see that they equip the road and operate

Mr. McMULLEN. The statement of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat is sufficient to warrant the Committee in declining, if they can at all, to go on with the resolution before the House. I think the question put by the hon, member for tion. As has been truly remarked by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), we have been in the habit of granting charters to men of straw, and the result is, they have been obtained by promoters as matters of speculation, not with the intention of going on with the construction, but of peddling the charters around in order to make money. We should put a stop to that. The hon. Minister has stated that if the Railway Committee chose they could have stopped the renewal of the charter. That is true. I happen to be a member of that Committee, and cannot remember a single instance in which the Committee have refused to renew a charter when the company has presented satisfactory grounds for claiming such renewal; and that the question of a financial pledge of money being deposited as guarantee that the line will be constructed, has not, to my knowledge, been brought up in the Committee. I do not suppose any hon, member wishes to prevent the construction of this road, if it is a desirable one to build, but we should take precautionary steps to see, before we grant subsidies, that the road is not locked up in the hands of speculators who have not the backbone to proceed with it. Judging from what the hon. Minister has said regarding the financial standing of the men who hold the charter, is it quite clear he is not fully satisfied that they have the means to go on and build, and before we grant land subsidies we should be placed in possession of information sufficient to warrant us in believing that they have sufficient means to carry out their undertaking. Another point has been raised with regard to the subsidy already granted for the other 50 miles. If that has lapsed, the Minister should ask us to deal with the whole line, and not with the 25 miles at the tail end, and the latter, I presume, is the intention of this subsidy. I would like also to know whether it is the intention of the Government to give the land now asked for on each side of the track along the line or in any other section of the North-West, because in some sections, of course, we have very valuable lands, and it is highly desirable we should not part with enormous tracts of desirable farm lands to companies who intend locking them up for some time?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The land is given to them immediately about the line of their railway. They have had since 1889 ten to twenty townships, I think it was, in alternate townships, and twenty townships were reserved in connection with this land grant immediately north of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the terminus of their road. Their charter was extended for a period of two years from the passing of the Act.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was that to commence the work or was it to complete?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The time for the expenditure of 15 per cent. on the amount of the capital stock, as required by the Railway Act, is hereby extended sold for about $50 an acre. Let me draw your Mr. DALY.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the resolution. I have always North York (Mr. Mulock) with regard to the been in favour of giving assistance to construct the capabilities of the company to go on should be necessary colonization roads in the North-West, fully answered before we proceed with this resolubecause I believe the future prosperity of this country depends very largely on the thorough development of the North-West. I rise for another purpose, and it is to draw the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the absolute necessity of placing some maximum price at which these lands so granted shall be sold. It is within the memory of many hon, gentlemen in this House that when The the hon, member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) brought in a measure for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, one of the prominent conditions in that measure was that the lands should be sold at a maximum price of $1 per acre to actual settlers. That was a wise provision. That principle hon, gentlemen on this side of the House have always adhered to. We have brought in resolutions at different times to fix a maximum price at which railway lands in the North-West should be sold. I need not point out the necessity for this. These railway corporations and others naturally endeavour to make the utmost out of the public domain granted to them. The result is that they sell lots here and there and hold the other lands for speculative purposes in hopes that the land will rise in value and increase the value of what they will sell at a future day. Any one who knows the necessities of farmers is aware how injurious this must be to 'the settlers. They are kept few and far between. They are deprived of all the advantages of neighbourhood, they are deprived of markets, they are deprived of school facilities, they are deprived of facilities for roadmaking—in fact, they are deprived of everything which is comprehended in close neighbourhood, they are deprived of all this so that the soulless corporation may make money out of their industry. I think it is a grievous hardship, and, taking all things into consideration, I think it would be far better if the Governmentheavy and large as our public debt is-had incurred tifty, or seventy-five, or even a hundred million dollars more of debt, and had never given one acre of land into the hands of the railway corporations, but had given them a money subsidy and had kept the land for the people. What is the result now? There is no limit to what these corporations may charge, and they fix the price according to the necessities of the people who have to buy. The settlers who want land within reach of the markets, within reach of railway facilities, or schools, or churches, and all the advantages of neighbourhood, have to pay whatever price the railway corporation chooses to exact from them. One would think the Government might have been warned by the experience of old Canada. I was born in it, lived in it, and know something of what I speak. I know that in the earliest days of this country some of the best lands in Ontario were handed over to the favourites of the Government, to retiring army officers, and others. I have known these men to hold these lands for over a quarter of a century. The lands were made valuable by the labour and blood of the poor settlers, and finally they were attention to the Canada Land Company with which we were cursed in western Ontario. The best of the lands in that section of the country were handed over to that company at a nominal price, and they did what the railway corporations are doing in the North-West. They placed a settler here and there, and sold him his land at $2, $3 and $4 an acre, but the lands in the immediate neighbourhood were held until they improved in value, and, after the timber had been taken off by the company, the company sold the lands for as much as $40 an acre without any improvements on them. One generation of the hardy pioneers of this country have gone down to the grave as the bond slaves of this accursed company. And yet the Government are doing the same thing to-day in regard to the North-West. They are giving this land to corporations in such a way that the settlers there will become the bond slaves of those corporations. I hope the Government will not make any land grant in future without providing the maximum price at which the land is to be sold.

Mr. WATSON. As to the rolling stock on this road. I have been informed that the cause of the delay is partly what has been stated by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly). McDonald & Schiller, the sub-contractors from Mr. Charlebois, were unable to do anything until Mr. Charlebois got the money he claims from Mr. Codd. I am informed that Mr. Charlebois agreed to complete 50 miles for $1,000,000. The fencing was to be done, and the station houses were to be built, and the rolling stock was to be provided, but I am informed that there were only three old locomotives, one of them built about thirty years ago, and they were of no use. The company refused to accept the road from Mr. Charlebois, because they said the agreement was not carried out, and I am told that Mr. Charlebois agreed to knock off $75,000 from his contract price if they would accept the road. also understand that Mr. Charlebois and Mr. Codd have agreed upon a settlement, and now all that is required is to have Mr. Charlebois and Mr. Co.la in Canada to make a final settlement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that the same Mr. Charlebois who was the contractor for the Langevin Block?

Mr. WATSON. Yes; it is the same Mr. Charlebois, and I am afraid we will not see him in Canada until the House rises. I hope the Government will take some steps to have that road operated. The present equipment is not sufficient. I believe they have only twenty box cars. I expect that 1,250,000 bushels of grain will have to be carried out of that country this year, and it is the duty of the Government to see, when they give large assistance in the way of a land grant, as they have given here for 450 miles of railway, that the people are properly served. I would like to see that road kept as an independent road, but if it cannot be kept as an independent road the Canadian Pacific Railway should get in there. I think there were to be some terminal facilities granted, and the company evidently expected to be able to operate the road, because up to March last they kept their tanks thawed out. But, evidently, they are not able to get Mr. Charlebois to turn the road over to them and complete his contract. If Mr. Charlebois has agreed to take $75,000 less on account of the road not being completed according to the agreement, it shows that Mr. Charlebois has been in the wrong, notwithstanding the fact that the Government engineer did give a certificate on which the company could draw the land grant, and having been enabled to do so, they have drawn the land grant, but, like many other roads, they do not draw the people's grain. This is a very serious matter for a large section of country, and the people have suffered great hardship on account of the road not being operated, even up to the present time, and I hope the Government will take some means to come to the aid of those people. The company assure me they are willing to go on and operate the road, and even to make a deposit to cover any difference between the company and Mr. Charlebois, because they are at a loss just now; the roadbed is already completed, and they might reap a very handsome profit on carrying the crop over even the 50 miles of road. I hope that the Government will put machinery in motion whereby that road could be operated this fall. It is a shame and a disgrace for the people of Canada that the Government are giving valuable franchises to a few private individuals for the purpose of speculation, and the people are not to be served after all the sacrifices that have been made.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the House might hear from the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Davis) on this subject. It is a scheme that intimately concerns the riding he represents. Looking at the Act of incorporation, it is difficult for me to tell where this road is going to pass, and perhaps the hon. member will be able to give information to the House that the Minister is not possessed of.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Here is the plan, and you can see the route for yourself.

Mr. MULOCK. It is a matter that is of sufficient local interest to entitle the House to hear from the hon, member for Alberta.

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta). The hon, gentleman wishes to know exactly where this road is to go. The original charter, as he well knows, started at Cheadle station, the most northern point on the Canadian Pacific Railway in Alberta. When it was renewed in the Railway Committee this session the company changed their minds and wished it to start from the town of Calgary and go to a point on the Red Deer River where the coal mine is situated, about 65 miles from the town of Calgary, almost due north.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon, gentleman say who are interested in the enterprise?

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta). I understand that it has been turned over by the original promoters to Mr. Alexander and a company of English gentlemen. The original promoters were gentlemen from Toronto. Mr. Bain is the only one I have met of the original promoters.

Mr. MULOCK. The only name the hon, gentleman knows is that of Mr. Alexander?

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta). That is the only one I know in the concern at the present time. He is a gentleman of large means, and has expended in the vicinity of Calgary, this last season, at least $300,000. I know that he handles an immense quantity of English capital; where he gets it I do not know, as I am not personally acquainted with his private affairs. They have a coal mine on the Red Deer River, and they require this road to operate this mine.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the hon, gentleman know how much the company paid to obtain the transfer of the charter?

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta). I do not know anything about what the arrangements were, in any shape or form. There are no settlers along the line of the road from one end to the other, at the present time, not even on the Red Deer.

Mr. MULOCK. The information afforded by the hon, member for Alberta has supplied, to some extent, what was wanting. Now, there appears to be no reason why safeguards should not be imposed. The hon, member for Alberta has stated that the promoter, Mr. Alexander, is, he believes, possessed in his own right, or through those whom he represents, of large financial means, and therefore it is only right that we should require these guarantees. I think we cannot be too safe, we cannot be too careful, in avoiding the pitfalls that heretofore we have fallen into, and proper safeguards should be required and a system of forfeiture adopted, if necessary, in order to prevent wildcat schemesnot that I suggest this is one; I assume it is quite the contrary, and being, we will suppose, a good, sound, honest scheme, there is no reason why we should not adopt a precedent in a case such as this, which will be of service in dealing with other propositions that have not the claims this one has. Now, the Minister of Interior to-day has admitted, although he is the responsible Minister presenting this scheme for the consideration of the House, that he does not know, he has no knowledge whatever, as to the resources of the company. Before the useful information afforded by the member for Alberta, the Minister of Interior was not aware whether any one of the promoters was possessed of a dollar of money or could command a dollar of money. has not of record anything to show what resources any of the promoters had. There is nothing to show that there is one dollar in the treasury of the company, or that it has a single claim upon any person to contribute anything towards the enterprise. We only have this much evidence before us now, that some gentlemen who originally obtained the charter have transferred it, I presume for a valuable consideration, to the present pro-To that extent the enterprise already smacks of charter selling; to that extent there has been an abuse made of the charter itself, for ${\bf I}$ maintain it is no part of the duty of Parliament to issue, as it were, negotiable securities in the form of charters, so that people can come here and use their political influence on the floor of Parliament to obtain charters, and then go off and peddle them out for a consideration, making them more expensive to the purchasers, all of which moneys have ultimately to be extracted from the pockets of the people. That is the system that has been adopted, and if it is now in force let us put an end to it as soon as possible by requiring substantial When I looked at the Act of 1889, to guarantees. which the hom, gentleman referred, I was surprised that the Railway Committee under the circumstances granted a charter at all. The Minister must draw a great distinction between a grant and a charter. There is a certain idea of free trade in charters, and the Railway Committee, and the House, for that matter, are liberal to a degree in granting charters, even competing charters over the same Mr. Davis (Alberta).

locking up large tracts of land for charters that are wholly speculative, so far as the promoters are concerned, and which may or may not go into existence by the original promoters succeeding in selling the charter to some English company or some other persons of capital; and, therefore, when the Minister to-day says that he is renewing this subsidy grant on the ground that the Railway Committee has renewed the charter he certainly has not a sound argument in support of his action. The company may succeed in getting a renewal of its charter, but there might be a dozen renewals over the same territory, and you cannot make the same grants over the same territory. Now, I would remind the hon, gentleman of the action of his predecessor in regard to land grants. Instead of granting land to a particular corporation, he will see that the Government took power to grant lands to such a corporation as, within a given time, completed the road under certain conditions, and in that way the company were able to go along and earn the grant by substantial acts. In this case you are excluding all competitors, putting tracts of land at the mercy of one particular company for a long time. Now, as this subsidy is going to be within the grasp of that company, instead of giving that grant to a particular company I submit that you would be acting much more wisely if you took power for the Governor in Council, if need be, to grant it to such a corporation as shall satisfy the Governor in Council of its ability to build the road within a certain time. Then you will, perhaps, accomplish what you have in view; otherwise, you are simply placing that land grant at the disposal of a few men, who will use it to make money for themselves; if they do not succeed in floating the company there is nothing lost. Heads I win, tails you lose. That is the position when you place a subsidy at the disposal of a company, which, so far as we know to-day, has not one farthing in its coffers or in the coffers of anyone else for them. I think, before further progress is made, the Minister should submit to the House the papers in connection with this proposal. He should apply to the promoters and require them to give the guarantees, and there should be conditions given here or in the Bill that will prevent the locking up of the land. It should not be locked up, at all events, longer than the next session of Parliament. I hope when we are next called on to deal with these grants there will be such a safe policy enunciated as was in force during the administration of the hon, member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), when substantial guarantees were required from all promoters of companies before public lands were set apart for such enterprises.

Mr. WATSON. I should like to ask the Minister of Interior if it is not a fact that one of the objects of this Bill is to open up a coal region?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

guarantees. When I looked at the Act of 1889, to which the hon, gentleman referred, I was surprised that the Railway Committee under the circumstances granted a charter at all. The Minister must draw a great distinction between a grant and a charter. There is a certain idea of free trade in charters, and the Railway Committee, and the House, for that matter, are liberal to a degree in granting charters, even competing charters over the same route. But that is a very different thing from one else, and they have a practical monopoly of the whole coal region. It makes no difference if there are a dozen mines as good as the Galt mines in that region, because they cannot be operated, as the Galt company have a monopoly of the carrying of ceal from that portion of country. If we are giving a subsidy for the purpose of opening up and developing our natural wealth we should see that it is developed in the interests of the general public, not in the interests of a corporation, which is able to use its influence with the Government, first to secure a charter, and second to secure a land grant. The Government should seriously consider the advisability of fixing the maximum price at which the land should be sold. That country is being opened up by different railways, which have not only secured land grants, but cash subsidies, too. I should prefer, as a representative the North-West, to see a cash subsidy granted instead of a land subsidy. Take the le. If the ordinary grant of 6,400 acres per mile. If the Government granted only $3,200 per mile that would be only 50 cents per acre for the land, and they could dispose of the land to actual settlers for a larger sum than the cash subsidy, actual settlers who are worth more to the Government than the petty sum they receive from the land, even when they sell it. I hope the Government will take into consideration the advisability of fixing a maximum rate, and of asking the company to put up a guarantee to compel the railway company within some specified time to dispose of the land.

Mr. CHARLTON. It strikes me we have some experience in the past that may be of service to us in dealing with these great public interests, such as the public lands in the North-West. It looks to me as though we had a continuance of that vicious system which had its heyday of prosperity in 1882-83-84 in the granting of timber leases, pastoral leases and colonization grants. We had a number of men in Ottawa who applied for timber licenses, obtained an Order in Council for them and then hawked them about for sale. We have the same system continued in reference to railway charters. Charters—I do not know how many, a great many of them - for roads in the North-West, purely speculative, are secured, the men applying for and obtaining them, and subsequently obtaining grants of land, doing this purely as a speculation, without any intention of carrying out the work themselves, and hawking these charters about for sale, as timber limit leases were formerly hawked about for sale. The system is a vicious one, and I must protest against the rapidity with which we are granting portions of the public domain. We had a glaring instance of the viciousness of this system a few years ago. There was a Bill introduced, known as the Nanaimo Railway Bill, for the construction of a railway, less than 70 miles long, to run from Victoria to Nanaimo, within 3 or 4 miles of the shore, and that company received a land grant of nearly all the coal land in Vancouver Island. I protested against the grant at the time, but no one seemed to think it im-The Minister of Railways (Mr. Pope) insisted that the Bill was all right, and it was put through. That railway company has received as a grant to aid in the construction of the road a sufficient amount to pay for its construction five times ment was partly an American one. It was a huge job, a swindle on the people, with no one, It was a hardly, to protest against it, and the Bill was passed through with the connivance of the Government. The history of the construction of railways in the United States has demonstrated this fact, that in nine cases out of ten railways receiving land grants obtained more than was required and more than they were entitled to. Railway companies obtained their charters and received land grants long in advance of the time when the roads were required or when they were to be built, and had the United States granted no land what-ever the railway service of that country would probably be just as efficient, just as fully developed, as it is to-day. We are going on here at this headlong rate, chartering railway companies in the far North-West, hundreds of miles in advance of settlement, making land grants and placing them in the hands of speculators. If anything is made, very well; if nothing is made, nothing is lost, as the promoters are putting no money into the schemes, but are simply putting in their time in furthering them. The Government is acting as their tool in this matter and promoting this spirit of speculation, and in nine cases out of ten the whole scheme rests in the form of a land grant given to the company, and they are schemes that should be thrown out of the House. In due time this country, if it requires railways in any particular part of it, will be provided with companies having ample capital to construct such roads. Just so soon as there is business to make a railway pay there will be capital ready to build it. There is a superabundance of capital seeking investment, and whenever it can be shown that there will be a satisfactory and safe return the capital will be forthcoming. Only show there is a chance that the railway will pay and there will be ample means furnished to build the road, and it will be unnecessary for the Government to squander the heritage of the people, as has been done in these various North-West enterprises. We should consider this whole question carefully, and these projects should only be authorized when the people want the railways, and then we should endeavour to get them on better terms for the people.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have had a discussion on this subject many times before, and over and over again from this side of the House has the recommendation been made that the policy of fixing a maximum limit on the land grants should be enforced. I have heard a great many objections raised by speculators in railway companies benefited, but I have no hesitation in saying that the most gross injustice to a large section of Manitoba and the North-West has been perpetrated, and is likely to be perpetrated de die in diem, from the neglect of that straightforward I trust that the Minister of business proceeding. the Interior will not disregard the suggestion made from this side of the House, but he will see that precautions are taken that this grant, which I understand amounts to 480,000 acres, rather more then the area of two whole counties in Ontario, in some cases, or two whole ridings, will not be allowed to be locked up and rendered useless for purposes of actual settlement, as I know has been done in a great many other cases, and in no case with The company profiting by the arrange- greater disadvantage to settlers than in a case of lands placed under the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway in southern Manitoba, where a system was adopted which was equivalent to banishing many thousands of settlers from southern Manitoba who desired to go there. I should also like to know from the Minister if he is in a position to give us the information how many acres of land in all have now been practically taken from the control of the Government and set apart for the service of railway companies within that which used to be called the fertile belt-that is to say, within a district of about 1,000 miles long and 400 miles wide, roughly speaking, extending from the frontier of Manitoba, or from the Red River, up to the Rocky Mountains. I dare say it will be in the mind of the Minister that some two or three years ago, in the course of discussions in this House, the hon. gentleman admitted then-and I do not think that he has gone back on his statement-that in view of all the lands that had been alienated in one way or the other that, practically speaking, if the policy of the Government to continue the free grants to actual settlers was gone on with we had almost entirely lost control of the fertile portion of these 400,000 square miles to which I refer. Now, Sir, my opinion has been, and it is, that we have practically fooled away an empire in the North-West, that we have done no good to ourselves, and that we have done no good to the people of Canada by the policy that has been pursued. It is a matter of notoriety, and it cannot be too often brought before the attention of the people of Canada and the members of this House, that whereas the people of the older provinces were induced to agree to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway on the solemn and continually-repeated pledge, given by the late Premier, given by Sir Charles Tupper, given by their organs all over the country, and made in every possible shape and way to the inhabitants of the old provinces: that out of the proceeds of the sales of the land in the North-West, on the last day of January of this year, $69,000,000 or $70,000,000 of assets would be realized. So far from that having been even approximately correct, we find to-day from our Public Accounts the management of the North-West shows a dead loss of nearly $2,000,000, instead of their estimated profit of $70,000,000. Under circumstances like these it is the bounden duty of this House, it is the bounden duty of every member here, to criticize closely these grants that are made. Now, Sir, I think that the hon. gentleman, before he proceeds further, ought to be able to lay on the Table of this House, from the archives of his department, some sort of rough map or sketch which would show us, even though it be very approximately, how far these grants of land have extended, and how much land is actually left to us. There is one point on which I think the hon, gentleman has improved on the old practice, and although I rather think that the system was introduced by his predecessor I am quite willing to give him credit for having carried out the good rule. As I understand, he has put an end to the checker board systen, as it was called, and is proposing to give these lands in alternate blocks or townships, reserving every alternate township for the settlers. That, I understand, is the hon. gentleman's policy, and if we are to give these land grants at all I think so far he has done well. But, looking to the general results of the policy of the Government, and looking Sir Richard Cartwright.

the utter and lamentable fallacy of the pledges and promises which were made to the people of Canada with respect to the profits which were to be derived from the management of our North-West, I say, Sir, that the House cannot be too vigilant in criticising every one of these land grants, such as are now proposed.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I would like to say that I have already prepared a statement which I propose to place on the Table of the House, when another subsidy Bill, which I gave notice of yesterday, will be brought up for consideration. I have got that statement prepared, and I have also got a map which I propose to lay before the House, because I anticipated that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) would have renewed the application which he made last year and the year before in reference to this matter. I have a very complete statement with regard to that, and I will be prepared to lay it on the Table of the House. I think the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is mistaken with regard to the policy of the Liberal Administration in reference to the construction of railways in the North-West. He said that their policy had always been to cause the construction of railways only when there had been sufficient people in the country to warrant such construction. I have a speech before me, made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), in which he distinctly announces the opposite opinions. goes very fully into the question, and he illustrates it by reference to the United States as having constructed their railways so as to induce population. His whole remarks are in the direction that in a new country railways should be built in order to give settlers a chance of settling on the line of railway. He refers to the States of Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri and Kansas, and he gave the population of these portions of the States where railways were constructed, and what they were without railways, and he shows how rapidly the settlement progressed after the construction of His whole argument was in favour of building railways in the North-West before settlement came in. Now with regard to the remarks made by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson): As the hon. gentleman knows, the question came up last year in reference to the fixing of rates for carrying coal over the railways, and he was informed then, as I inform him now, that that matter is still in the hands of the Government, and that under the Railway Act the Government has power to fix the rates of freight over these several

Mr. WATSON. The trouble is, that they do not fix them.

Mr. DEWDNEY. They have got the power now, and there is no reason why we should take the same power in this Bill. The question of fixing a maximum price for the lands was also threshed out last year. As I said then, I also say now, that it would have killed every railway enterprise in the North-West if we had adopted that policy. I understood the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) to state that the maximum price under the former Government was $1 per acre.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Excuse me; it was with reference to the grant to the Canadian Pacific more particularly to the facts I have stated, and to Railway, and to one of the provisions of the Act.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I misunderstood the hon. It appears to me that if a maximum price were fixed with regard to land along the railways that some other parties would come in and buy it at a cheap rate, and they would hold it in the same way as railways do now, and sell it at any price they like.

Mr. WATSON. I am of the opinion that it would be much better to kill a lot of these railway companies, if it would kill them, as the Minister of the Interior says, for I believe that they exist only for the purposes of speculation. I know certainly, and the hon, gentleman must have got sufficient evidence to-day in connection with the North-West Central Railway, to show that it has been in the hands of speculators for years. It is a road that should have been built years ago, because the country required it; but it was given into the hands of speculators and it was not built. hon, gentleman also knows that a year ago a charter was promoted in this House by myself, which had the backing of a very strong company. I do not know whether he knows this or not, but I know it, and I am satisfied of it, that if that charter had been granted a year ago, during that same year at least 100 miles of that railway would have been constructed, and that without any land grant from the Government at all. But the Government refused to give a charter to that company, because some of their particular friends had another scheme on hand and objected to the charter. Notwithstanding the fact that this charter was fought through a sub-committee of the Railway Committee, and reported to this House, yet because another scheme, promoted by the particular friends of the Government, might be injured, this charter was not granted. These gentlemen knew that the road was to be built by the company for which the charter was asked, and because they thought that the road would be built, and that it would interfere with speculations, the charter was referred back to the Railway Committee to be slaughtered there. That is the policy which the Government has adopted with reference to those railways. They do not appear to be looking for men who are good men and competent to build railways, but they look out for their friends, who wants these charters to hold them for speculative purposes. The names of the first promoters of the North-West Central Railway were apparently good names, but were they railway contractors? I think I have got their names here, and I will tell the House who they were. There was the Hon. Senator Clemow, A. Charlebois, Captain Murray, W. A. Allan and Mr. Bates. Anyone would say that these men were financially in a position to build a railway, but they never built a mile of the road, nor even turned the first sod, and they held the road until they got a large price as a bonus from English capitalists. They simply held it as a matter of speculation, and the result is that we have only 50 miles of that road built now. The road is tied up in a lawsuit between the contractors and the company, and is not operated, and they hold a large tract of country which is, I believe, scheduled by the Government purely and simply as a matter of speculation. Now, I am informed that the English company have put $750,000 in hard cash into that concern, and I do not believe that the gentlemen who originally got is pretty good evidence that the company was not this franchise to build the road ever put a dollar into it, in the way of construction; but I believe, however, they sold it for a very large amount of money, the exact sum of which I don't know. Now, with this evidence before us, surely we should be careful before we proceed further in the same direction. If any company come here and show that they are bond fide able to build the railway for which they have a charter then the Government is justified in giving them some assistance to enable them to open up the country; but I do say that they should put up some deposit, which they would be compelled to sacrifice if they did not go on and carry out the arrangements agreed to in this House. The hon. Minister says that we have their promises. These gentlemen will promise anything and do nothing. With the evidence before us, we should ask this company for some security, as a matter of good faith, that they will go on and complete the work. But the policy of hon, gentlemen opposite is to give their friends large tracts of the public domain, which they can hold for years, and use their advantage to retard railway construction. We had the same thing happening in southern Manitoba. We had the Canadian Pacific Railway Company getting an extension of time for the construction of the South-Western Railway, and after that they asked for an extension of two years more. That road was promised to the settlers as far back as 1880-81.

Mr. DEWDNEY. By whom?

Mr. WATSON. By the Government and the The line was surveyed, and it was understood that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would build it; but it is only to-day that the people in that part of the country are getting the railway facilities that were promised them ten or twelve years ago. The Northern Pacific Company, I believe, offered to give a guarantee to the Government that they would construct 300 miles of that road into the Souris coal fields if they got the same grant as the Canadian Pacific Railway, but the excuse given was that the Canadian Pacific Railway company had received an extension of time in which to do the work. This practice is very injurious to the settlers, because they go in expecting a railway to be built, and after they have raised their crops they find that they are practically worthless, because it costs nearly all they can get for them to haul them to market. It must be admitted by hon. gentlemen opposite that mistakes have been made, and now is the time to avoid them for the future.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon, member for Marquette has done a great injustice to Charlebois & Co., whether unwittingly or not. He said that that company had not built a mile of the railway or put any money into it. I know that to be entirely wrong. The company were handicapped by a clause in the charter compelling them to settle the accounts of the old Souris and Rocky Mountain Co., and in the settlement of those accounts they paid $24,000 in cash. They paid the debts of the company to the amount of $50,000, at about 50 cents on the dollar, before commencing operations. Then, they graded 50 miles of the railway at their own expense, and got it ready for the iron—the ties were there—when, unfortunately, their financial aid seemed to desert them, and from that time they were unable to go on and raise the money. That bankrupt, and there were some grounds for the Minister to assume that they were financially able and would go on and complete the work.

Mr. WATSON. That was the old Souris and Rocky Mountain Railway Company—Beaty's Company.

Mr. SPROULE. Not at all. The hon, member is entirely mistaken. It was done after the charter was got by Messrs. Charlebois, Clemow & Co. They were the parties who raised the money, paid off the old claims, graded the 50 miles, and got the road ready for the iron.

Mr. WATSON. What I say is that they were not the people who held the charter while that work was done. I admit that they made a settlement of the claims, because a clause was put in the Act compelling the new company to pay the debts of the old. But the work was done under Beaty's Company.

Mr. DALY. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. SPROULE. It was the new company who settled up the old debts and built the 50 miles, and left the road ready for the iron; but the company did not furnish the iron, and the road could not be completed. Under the contract recently taken by Messrs. Schiller & McDonald the money was furnished to put the iron on, to purchase rolling stock, build station houses and equip the road. That was only to finish what had been commenced before.

Mr. DALY. I just want to correct a statement made by the hon, member for Marquette, who seems not to be informed correctly on this matter. It was Messrs. Charlebois, Allan, Clemow and others who built the 50 miles.

Mr. WATSON. From Melbourne to Rapid City?
Mr. DALY. That has nothing to do with the Great North-West Central Railway at all. The hon, gentleman's statement was that these men had put nothing into that road. I say that they built the road, and got sufficient ties there for 25 miles, and the road was in that condition when the present syndicate took hold of it and financed money for the rails, the stations and other equipment. In addition to that, they paid the $50,000 of debts which the hon, member for East Grey has

Mr. WATSON. This company entered into an agreement with the English syndicate before they built a mile of the road at all. That agreement was entered into in 1888, the road was graded in 1889, and it was not ironed until 1890.

mentioned, and were out of pocket in connection with the promotion of the road and other matters.

Mr. SPROULE. No; they entered into it in 1890.

Mr. DALY. The hon, member for Marquette is entirely mistaken. The arrangement was entered into in 1890. The hon, gentleman ought to accept my statement.

Mr. WATSON. I am willing to accept no one's statement about what I know. I say that that portion of the line between Melbourne and Rapid City was graded by the old Beaty Company, and when a charter was granted to the present promoters a clause was placed in the Bill, at my own instigation, for the purpose of protecting the interests of the people who had done that work, and that liability had to be met by the new company. The work was done by contractors whom the Beaty Company never paid, and the new company had to pay them.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. All this matter will come up again when it will be in order, but it has not the slightest relation to this question.

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the statement which the hon. Minister of the Interior intends to bring down mention all the land grants, including those to the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes.

The hon. Minister of the In-Mr. MULOCK. terior has expressed no opinion as to whether the promoters of a company should show any financial standing before being given a charter. He does not appear to attach much importance to that feature of the case. Is he, then, in favour of granting subsidies to companies that exist only on paper? So far as we know, this company simply exists on It is a purely speculative concern, which has succeeded in possessing itself of a charter without any intention of building the line, but simply of making money out of it. The hon. Minister has not ventured to express any opinion on that point. Are we about to enter on an era of charter speculation and to put our lands in the hands of speculators who will dispose of them if they can, and make money out of the scheme, or, if they cannot, let them fall back into the hands of the people. The hon. Minister should say what his views are on a question like this, as it is one of great importance and entitled to his serious consideration. With reference to rates, let me call his attention to the clause in the Railway Act. He has said that the Governor in Council has power to control the tolls on railways, and that if a railway, for example, having access to a coal region, should charge unreasonable rates, the Governor in Council may But while there is a provision regulate them. in the Railway Act which appears, on the surface, to give the Governor in Council power to reduce tolls, when you interpret that section in the light of railway practice and legislation, you will find that provision is absolutely a dead letter. The provision is to this effect: that the Governor in Council may reduce the rates, provided the income of the company be not thereby reduced to less than 15 per cent. of its capital, and the working capital is understood to include what are known as paidup shares of stock; and inasmuch as, under our legislation, all shares now are practically paid-up by services, or in other imaginary ways, and not by actual cash, it follows that to-day the rates cannot be reduced so long as even the nominal capital does not yield a return of 15 per cent. This company, therefore, will, by some process of its own, call its capital paid-up capital, by assigning its stock to its shareholders and promoters in various ways, and until the company earns a net income of 15 per cent. on the amount of nominal capital, there can be no reduction of toll. The provision, therefore, of the Act giving power to reduce toll is wholly illusory; and if this company is to receive this aid for the construction of its line there ought to be a special provision entitling the Governor in Council to regulate the tolls, independent of the clause in the general Railway Act, which does not meet the case at all.

I that Mr. DEWDNEY. I think I stated very dis-The tinctly that I felt satisfied with regard to the financial ability of the gentlemen who had come to an understanding with the present charter holders of this company. I stated that Mr. Osborn, the financial agent of the company here, was a man of good financial standing. I also spoke of Mr. Alexander, and stated that he had expended—and my statement was supplemented by that of the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Davis), whose word the hon. gentleman took, although he would not take mine——

Mr. MULOCK. You knew nothing about it.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I did know a great deal about it.

Mr. MULOCK. You did not tell us.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Yes; I said he had spent $200,000 or $300,000 in the neighbourhood of Calgary, to my knowledge. I stated that he had obtained capital to build the waterworks of Calgary, which are as fine as any in the Dominion, and that he had, besides, made large investments in buildings and in purchases of land and other operations in that country. I know of no company in whose financial standing I have greater confidence than this company.

Mr. MULOCK. Are you going to get a guarantee from this company?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have no authority for saying it, but am satisfied that they would not have the slightest objection to putting up any reasonable guarantee.

SECOND READINGS—IN COMMITTEE— THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 148) further to amend the North-West Territories Representation Act.—(Sir John Thompson.)

Bill (No. 153) further to amend Chapter 138 of the Revised Statutes, respecting the Judges of Provincial Courts.—(Sir John Thompson.)

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 122) further to amend the Fisheries Act

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the hon, gentleman has made very stringent provisions for penalties for the use of purse seines. I know there is a great difference of opinion on that matter, and, if the hon, gentleman has come to a determination against the use of purse seines on proper evidence, as I presume he has done, although I do not myself agree with what I understand is the general consensus of opinion on that subject among the fishermen, I shall not oppose the Bill. I formed an opinion on that subject some years ago when I was engaged before the Halifax Fishery Commission, but I would suggest to the House that the imposition of a fine not less than $50 and not more than $500, together with the confiscation of the vessels, is altogether too extreme a penalty. I do not know where the hon, gentleman took his clause from or how he justifies it, but I think, in starting a provision of this kind, the penalty prescribed is too stringent. If the hon, gentleman were to limit the punishment to a pecuniary penalty for the present I think it would be all right, and if, after a year or two, he finds that is not sufficient, I would not be averse to changing the Act in that respect; but in starting, I submit that the penalty is too extreme. A man may own a vessel worth $10,000, or $15,000, or $20,000. The crew may throw the purse seine without the knowledge of the owner, and, though the judge has an option as to the amount of the penalty, he has no option as to the confiscation of the vessel. And if you come to the conclusion that the mere use of the purse seine under any circumstances is to justify a penalty, and you attach to that penalty the confiscation of the vessel at large, then there is no reason for putting a penalty of not less than $50 or not exceeding $500. The very fact that you put the penalty at a low sum of $50 and the extreme penalty at $500 shows there may be very many cases where the full amount of the penalty should not be exacted. Now, in this case the judge may determine that the infraction is so slight, or the circumstances so palliative, that he would only inflict the $50 penalty, but the vessel must go, notwithstanding. I submit to the hon. gentleman that is not right, and that, at any rate, in starting out with this new provision of the Act, it is better to be content with inflicting a penalty, and make it run up as high as $1,000 if you will, but do not necessarily make the confiscation of the vessel follow the least infraction of the law.

Mr. TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman's objections would be well taken if the circumstances were the usual circumstances in connection with the imposition of a new penalty. But I submit that if the principle of the Bill be correct, and when we consider the exceptional circumstances under which we are now legislating, the objection disappears. The scope of the Bill, the hon, gentleman will observe, is confined to Canadian waters, for the reason that I have on one or two occasions expressed. At present there has been no international legislation reached, although I may tell the hon. gentleman that the views of the Canadian Government and United States authorities do not appear to be at all antagonistic. It is expedient that there should be international regulations. At present, outside of the three-mile limit our vessels and foreign vessels may use the purse seines; and I would ask the hon. gentleman's attention to this feature in connection with the penalty of this Bill, that since there are no international regulations that will prevent our vessels fitting up with this seine and going into the waters outside of the three-mile limit, the provision of the Bill would be almost nugatory, for the reason that you cannot watch all these vessels—it is simply impossible; and unless the risk is exceptionally great the Bill might as well not become law. We proceed on the supposition and on the belief, after very careful enquiry, extending, I may say, down from 1877, and we have the unanimous testimony of the American authorities in favour of the principle of the Bill, and the unanimous testimony of our own officers in favour of the Bill, all agreeing that there is a serious falling off, an extraordinary decline, in the mackerel fishery on our coast, as well as on the American coast. The falling off in the herring fisheries was extraordinary, and it is ascribed to tishing with the purse seine. The Boston Fishery Bureau, which the hon, gentleman knows well, after a careful examination of the statistics published by them, and the history of this mackerel fishery, ascribed its decline almost entirely to the use of the purse seine. I have the Fishery Reports made to Parliament year after year since 1877, since which time our fishermen have been asking for relief, and all go to show that the end of the mackerel fishery is near if this system of catching is to be permitted. It destroys not merely an enormous number of fish, but it interferes with the hook-and-line fishery. The hon, gentleman knows that this purse seine is happily, in our own provinces, confined to very few; only those rich men that are able to buy this very expensive seine are able to inclulge in this practice, so dangerous to the mackerel fishery. The hook-andline men throughout the provinces are petitioning for a remedy. Both they and their officers have pointed out that not merely does the seine scatter the schools and break up and turn the mackerel off from our coast altogether, but it takes in its grasp hundreds of barrels of immature fish, and it also prevents, to a great extent, the reproduction which is absolutely necessary for the continuance for that species of fish. It is only in that view that I would ask Parliament, if they approve of the principle of the Bill, to grant an extraordinary penalty, so as to prohibit the practice altogether, to secure that no man shall start out with the hope of being able to avoid this law, but he shall know that if he does avoid it an extraordinary penalty is attached. Taking the enormous extent of our coast line, taking the opportunities of these vessels, when they can start out legitimately, of not being interfered with, and of stating to any vessel that hails that they are just about to proceed where their neighbours are going, outside of the three-mile limit, the law would be a dead letter; it would be useless to pass it, until international regulations are reached, and hon. gentlemen know that they take a long time. I do not quarrel at all with what the hon, gentleman said, because he confined it to the ordinary case of a statute relating to the fisheries within our control, and so on. yet, as to that, our present legislation goes so far as to make a penalty in reference to ordinary offences of the Fisheries Act, and includes the apparatus, whatever that may be. Now, since the hon. gentleman has alluded to it, I would ask his attention to some of the very strong reports that have been made by our officers on that subject. already stated that in 1877 petitions against fishing with these seines reached the department, and have continued to come in from that time to the present. Commander Lavoie, who was the officer in charge of the La Canadienne, traversing our fishing grounds every season, an officer who was, I think, in the service at the time the hon gentleman refers to, was very strong in his representations and reports upon the destructive nature of this purse seine, and he reported to the department continually Mr. TUPPER.

cers for years past calling attention to the destruction wrought by this seine, and the result in the Baie des Chaleurs has been such that the apprehensions that have been entertained previously to 1886 by these officers and expressed to the department have been more than realized. In Prince Edward Island the officers represent that the reason the mackerel were growing, as they called it, very wary and shy, as compared with their habits in previous years, was the fact that the schools were broken up and alarmed by being pursued by this style of fishing engine. Finally, Lieutenant Gordon, I think it is, stated the different objections to this seine, and to those gentlemen who are not familiar with that fishing engine, so-called, only known in the deep coast waters, but not at all used in the inland waters. I will give in a succinct form several of the objections that are urged and sustained, as I will show, by the investigations of those who have been looking into the subject in the United States as well as in Canada:

"1. When a seine is thrown amongst a school of mackerel or other fish the school is broken up and scared, so that what escapes from outside the seine enclosure is scared, and makes off to deep water for a refuge. This effectually destroys all chances of boat fishermen, who depend on hand-lines and ordinary nets for a share of the broken schools.

"2. When, for instance, a seine is thrown for mackerel, it encloses the fish of every kind within its great area, and the aggregate quantity of these varieties are frequently much greater than that of the fish sought to be entrapped, including the small, valueless fish as well as entrapped, including the small, valueless fish as well as the large.

"3. When the seine is closed, and the work of taking out commences, all kinds of fish, large and small, good and bad, which are not of the grade sought, are thrown dead into the sea, thus polluting the bottom to an extent which repels living fish from its proximity. By this method thousands of barrels of herring and hundreds of quintals of cod, including bait and other fish, are destroyed, and boat fishermen, who are depending on them for a supply, are deprived of all participation in the catch.

"4. The large quantities thus destroyed in the seining process is far beyond the powers of nature to sustain by reproduction; consequently, the fishing grounds are being rapidly depleted of their tenants."

Lieutenant Gordon, in one of his reports, remarks:

"This purse seine fishing is, in one sense, like prospecting for gold or boring for oil, it being purely a speculative business, in which there still certainly remain a few business, in which there still certainly remain a few prizes, but in which there are very many blanks; but each crew looks forward to making a big haul, and not to the continuous work which the hook-and-line fishing imposes on the men. As an instance of the prizes made, one vessel, the Emma W. Brown, of Gloucester, got one hundred and sixty barrels of sea-packed mackerel at a single haul of her seine, which, at the extraordinary prices which have prevailed, would mean a take worth nearly four thousand dollars, or, say, upwards of one hundred dollars per man.

"Another vessel, the Mayflower, of Gloucester, made a somewhat similar haul, but these were the only two fortunate schooners in the whole fleet; yet the effect of these two hauls was to keep many of the fleet down on the school for some weeks later than they otherwise would our coasts for some weeks later than they otherwise would have been.

There are some statistics which are very effective, to my mind, in corroboration of the views of the various experts who have given their attention to this subject. The Fish Bureau of Boston, for instance, gives statistics of the mackerel importation for three decades, and they establish in the strongest manner the necessity of this legislation. From 1850 to 1859, total catch 1,864,915 barrels, yearly average 185,491 barrels. No. 1, 682,737 barrels, yearly average 68,263. From 1863 to 1872, as to the destruction caused by its use. Then, total catch 2,452,265. From 1880 to 1889, total again, in New Brunswick we have the fishery officatch 1,618,603 barrels. Hon. gentlemen will see that with more vessels and better vessels the catch all of the opinion that the destruction caused has fallen off, and is steadily declining. On examin- by purse seines is enormous, and will yet tend to ation this was ascribed to the introduction of utterly destroy that valuable industry; (3) we purse seines there, because with their introduction have the United States authorities saying the the quantity of the catch steadily declined with injury has been great, as is shown by the statistics reference to that market. Take the first decade I in the falling off of the catch. Under these cirgave. The take of No. 1 mackerel averaged yearly 185,491 barrels; whereas during the next decade, containing a period immediately following the introduction of purse seines, the average was 240,426 barrels, while during the last decade the catch fell to an average of 161,860 barrels. The case is so strong that legislation has already been passed in the New England States, whereas we have no that, the penalty being very small and the chances legislation on the subject.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In this direction?

Mr. TUPPER. They have legislated in the direction of this Bill to this extent: In 1883 the Legislature of Maine prohibited the use of purse seines for taking mackerel within any bay or inlet not more than 2 miles wide, under a penalty of $200. In 1885 this statute was extended so as to include bays 3 miles wide, and the penalty was increased to $500. In 1888 Congress took up the subject, and passed an Act which prohibits the catching of mackerel, except with hook and line, during the period between 1st March and 1st June. Hon, gentlemen will understand that the necessity for this stringency is all the greater in our country, because we are simply on the eve of following the very bad practice of our neighbours in that regard, and it is much better we should legislate now than encourage any people to go into the business. There are exceedingly few in it now. The only district from which I have received any protest against this proposed legislation is from one county in Nova Scotia, and it is a question with the officers of my department as to whether the seines of the fishermen there are purse seines or not. The fact that a good purse seine is worth several thousand dollars is one reason why our fishermen have not largely used them. It is now that I would rather come down with the strong arm of the law and make the penalty such that no man would enter into the speculation and buy those seines, or fit out with those seines, knowing the law is stringent and drastic. It would be infinitely better that legislation should be passed and a comparatively small penalty imposed. Fishermen making a haul such as I have mentioned could afford to pay a penalty of $500 and run the risk, because in many cases, as I frankly admit, we could not guard the coast line so as to make the fishermen feel certain they would be detected. They would have a chance, first, of not being caught; and second, that if they were detected they might show that they were outside the three-mile limit and could not be interfered with. If the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) had an opportunity of reading the appeals I have read and had seen the petitions filed in my department he would no doubt have been a warm advocate of this measure. If I understood the hon. gentleman correctly, he does not go heartly with me in the proposal now before the House, for the reason that he is not yet of the opinion that these engines are so destructive. I have given him the reasons which have led me to arrive at these conclusions: (1) our fishermen unanimously want this legislation; (2) our officers, effective, and it will be impossible to accomplish who are patrolling these waters constantly, are what we desire if we stipulate a nominal penalty in the falling off of the catch. Under these circumstances, I cannot conceive how, in regard to the fisheries, and in regard to our mode of dealing with this question, we could have better evidence of the condition of affairs than I have presented. I repeat that this is the time to impose a penalty so large and severe as to prevent any speculative firm or individuals entering into the business in the hope of evading this law being great, they might violate it. It would be, I think, wise in their interests, as well as for the fishing industry generally, that we should go as far as this measure suggests. I may say that there is not altogether a departure in this measure from the ordinary penalty in connection with violations of the Fisheries Act. I would call the hon, gentleman's attention to the severepenalties in reference to foreign fishing vessels under the Fisheries Act itself. Now, it is not that we desire to harass or unduly punish the American fishermen that severe penalties are provided. The hon, gentleman knows as well as I'do that is not the object which induced this Parliament to say that a foreign fishing vessel violating our Fishery Act should be confiscated; but it is from the necessity of the thing. It is because a smaller penalty would induce foreign fishing vessels to venture into our limits and violate our laws; and unless this Parliament were prepared to vote an enormous sum of money it would be impossible to de anything like patrol our coasts, so as to secure our fisheries from poachers. However, we are now able to do a great deal in this direction with a comparatively small sum of money by the fact that the law is so severe; and the confiscation of the American fishing vessel is for the purpose of deterring and preventing vessels from violating our laws. It was never intended to make the owner of that vessel suffer, and to inflict punishment, or torture, or annoyance, or anything of that kind; it was simply from the necessity of the thing, and in order to prevent violation of the law, that the Parliament of this country was induced to go so far. We are now dealing with a most important subject, and if the law is to be complete, and if we are to prohibit purse seining, and to prohibit it, believing that it tends to ruin our fisheries, then I say we must make the penalty as severe as in the case of a violation of our fishery laws by foreign vessels. The hon, gentleman will see that under our Fishery Act the penalties provided are: "That all materials, implements or appliances used, and all fish caught, taken or killed in violation of this Act, or any regulations under it, shall be confiscated to Her Majesty," and there is a penalty as well? There is really no departure here from that, except that we are more explicit in the present Bill, and we name the material, implements or appliances to be seized, and in that sense we are legislating more definitely with those who might otherwise unwittingly offend, not knowing the risk or the penalty they would suffer. I again express the hope that the House will see that if the principle of the Bill is right the legislation will not be effective, and it will be impossible to accomplish or a penalty so small in comparison with the great value of the purse seines that might be seized, and the enormous catches made by them, as to make the law nugatory.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Committee will remember that while I expressed a personal opinion with regard to the use of purse-seines, I stated distinctly that I yielded in my own opinion on this subject to the large consensus of opinion which appears to exist among the fishermen. I also distinetly stated that it was not my intention to oppose this Bill, because I believe the large majority of those who understand more about the subject than I do think, whether rightly or wrongly, that this purseseining must bestopped. Therefore, we may as well get down to the exact difference between the hon, gentleman and myself, and the Committee, understanding that this is a most important Billmore important than the inattention given to it would seem to indicate—the Committee will see that I am not at all opposing a Bill proscribing the use of purse seines, but I am confining my criticism to the penalty which the hon, gentleman imposes for a breach of the law. That is the sole and only criticism which I offer on the Bill. Now, the hon, gentleman says that experience has shown that the mackerel fishery on the coast of the United States has very largely depreciated in value, and in the quantity taken, during the past three decades. Very well; that during the past three decades. may be true. It is alleged by many fishermen that this is to be attributed in a large measure to the use of purse seines, but the hon, gentleman must see that Congress has never yet adopted that view. Congress has only legislated tentatively, and I urge this House now to adopt tentative legislation on this matter. Let us go by degrees; let us first try the effect of it. Congress has prohibited the catching of these fish by purse seines between certain dates, which include only three months in the year. That is a very late enactment and the effect of it has not been seen yet, but I do not understand that Congress punishes with the penalty of the confiscation of a vessel, such as we are attempting to provide here.

Mr. TUPPER. And for that reason they have not been able to prevent the use of the purseseinc.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Now, I want to show that so far as the precedent of the United States is concerned, it is not at any rate a precedent for the penalty which the hon. gentleman seeks to impose. The legislation itself is not opposed by myself, or by any gentleman on this side of the House, so that we just come down to this one point: Is it prudent in legislating upon this question to provide that a vessel, and her tackle, and her appurtenances, shall be confiscated for a breach of the law? Let the hon, gentleman look at the facts. He says that he does not think that many of the fishermen in the Maritime Provinces are engaged in this purse seining. My hon. friend, the junior member for King's (Mr. McLean), whom I do not see in his seat now, has two large vessels fitted up with purse seines, and he has pursued the mackerel fishery with purse We must consider that we seines for years back. cannot prohibit, and do not profess to prohibit, the use of purse seines beyond the three-mile limit. The American fishermen will prosecute that fishery by means of purse seines outside of the three-mile limit, and so will our fishermen, tackle, apparel and appurtenances. One of these Mr. TUPPER.

if they find it more profitable. We are seeking to prevent this mode of fishing within the threemile limit, and as the Americans cannot fish within that limit the proscription will, therefore, apply to Canadian vessels alone. Suppose that one of our Canadian fishing vessels, titted out with purse-seines, and valued at $3,000 or $4,000, is fishing, properly, legitimately and legally, just beyond the three-mile limit, and it follows a school of mackerel immediately inside of that limit—it may be done unwittingly-and that is the principal point I am arguing against the Bill-but the moment it is done the owner of that vessel is in the hands of every seaman on board, and it will not be in the power of the judge to say that this illegal act was done unwittingly.

Mr. TUPPER. Will the hon, gentleman pardon I know he knows the law well, but I would point out that this being under the Fishery Act there is an express provision which enables a person in a case of that kind to obtain redress. There is the power to remit, in the Fishery Act, as the hon, gentleman will remember.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The power to remit on the part of the Minister.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not see very well how in a case of this kind the Minister could exercise the power to remit.

Mr. TUPPER. On the presentation of these

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We are coming now to the point at issue. Is it not better to vest in the judge who tries the case and hears the evidence the discretion as to the amount of the penalty he You can make the penalty from should impose. $50 to $500, or from $50 to $1,500, if you like. do not object to the principle contained in that, but the very fact that you vest this discretion in the judge, as to whether the penalty shall be $50 or $500, shows that you recognize the important fact that there may be cases which justify the imposition of a heavy penalty, and other cases which call for the imposition of a low penalty. I particularly wish to call the attention of the Minister to this: that this Bill, while it gives the discretion to the judge to inflict a penalty of $50 or $500, dependent upon the gravity of the offence committed withdraws from him the right of saying whether the vessel shall be confiscated or not. He may say: You are only liable to a penalty of $50, but the confiscation of your vessel follows as a matter of course, and there is no discretion whatever invested in me upon that point. Conceding, as I do, for the sake of argument, the policy or the principle of this enactment, it is only at the very best a tentative measure. You do not know how it will work; you are not thoroughly satisfied that the real grievance will be struck at by this Bill; and I submit to the hon. gentleman that it would be prudent policy to so frame the Bill as to vest in the judge who tries the offence a reasonable discretion to punish the owner of the vessel with a fine of $50, or any other fine up to $1,000, or even $1,500, according to his opinion of the degree of culpability. But do not make it a necessary condition that under any and all circumstances the judge must confiscate the vessel, her vessels, fitted out with purse seines and all the necessary apparatus, may be worth $10,000, and that may all be confiscated in an hour if, for instance, one of the crew finds that the captain, in pursuing a school of mackerel unwittingly and without any intention of violating the law, has come within the three-mile limit, and says to the captain: "Pay me hush money, or I will bring an action against you into court." The second section of the Bill, referring to the sharing of the penalty, offers inducements to the crew to do that. I do not think the hon, gentleman himself will be satisfied to have power of remission vested in him as head of the department, because he will always be open to the imputation, as gentlemen occupying his position invariably are, of granting remissions to political friends and refusing them to political opponents. We want a tribunal established which will administer justice to all parties alike; we want to vest the discretion in the judge, the legally competent tribunal, to say whether the penalty shall be small or great. I am not going to haggle about a few hundred dollars one way or another; but do not make it a necessary condition that for every infraction of a law which you are going to try for the first time the vessel, and all her tackle and apparel, must be confiscated under all circumstances. is my objection, and I humbly submit that it is a very valid objection. Then, we know that in many of these cases the vessels are owned in shares. capital is supplied by capitalists who are not fishermen. One man puts in $500, another $1,000, another $2,000—the vessel may be owned by a dozen men-and they put a prudent captain on board. It is a very good maxim of the law that he is the agent of the owners and that they are to be responsible for his acts; but it would be a very harsh law which would say that for an unwitting violation of the law by the captain they should lose their property. This is a harsh, arbitrary law; the judge cannot get around it; he must order the confiscation of the vessel willy-nilly; and it is against that harsh provision that I urge my criticisms. The other clause we will discuss when we come to it. do urge the hon. gentleman, in starting this legislation, to take a prudent course. You must remember that this law is directed against our own people, and that the owners of vessels can be easily reached. They are not like American citizens, who may commit an offence and then go away. The hon. gentleman gave an instance in which the penalty against foreign fishing vessels is confiscation, and very properly so, because the owners are not in this country. It would be a perfect farce to make them liable to a fine. The remedy must be a remedy in rem, and must be directed against the vessel itself. I do not see that there is any great hardship in that. Now, I do not advance these criticisms in any captious spirit at all, but from a sincere desire to see this Bill work properly; and if you make the penalty more than it ought to be it will simply result in this, that the owners will be driven to bribe the witnesses to give false evidence.

Mr. TUPPER. I would much prefer that the hon, gentleman was an out-and-out opponent of the measure. He says he is not, but he would be a principle of the Bill is wrong he is endeavouring, in my humble judgment, to have it so framed that it will be absolutely inoperative. The hon, gentleman himself does not profess to believe in the principle of the Bill. He says: "For the sake of argument, I admit that it is right."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I said I had formed a personal opinion which I saw was opposed to that of the great mass of the fishermen, and that I would yield my personal opinion to that of the mass.

Mr. TUPPER. Exactly. I say that is the style of opponent who is the most dangerous. I would prefer that he should come out and say that he was opposed to the measure. However, his position is thoroughly candid. He says: "I have not come to the conclusion that purse-seining is so destructive as is commonly supposed, but I am willing to waive my opinion, as I know the fishermen desire this measure." Then the hon, gentleman proceeds with an arguement which, if it were adopted, would induce the House to postpone the introduction of the measure altogether. If we are not certain that this is a destructive means of catching fish why should we adopt the hon, gentleman's suggestion and enact a penalty of $1,500 for using a fishing engine which may be a perfectly legitimate way of catching fish? The very argument the hon, gentleman made goes to show how convinced he is that we are proceeding in a wrong direction. He is not, I submit, a fitting judge, under these circumstances, of what the penalty should be. That is perfectly natural, as the hon, gentleman himself does not believe in the principle of the Bill, but merely waives his opinion in deference to the views of the fishermen; and he would not make the Bill as effective in its operation as people who believe the arguments I have advanced, that the purse-seine is the most deadly fishing apparatus ever invented or ever known on the coasts of the Maritime Provinces. He knows that. The fishermen everywhere will tell him that it is a curse to their industry, that they hate it as they do the devil, that they attribute to it the injury to the mackerel fishery; and their appeals are loud and emphatic to do away with it altogether. We have been spending a long time in ascertaining whether it is right or wrong. Since 1877 their appeals have been made. They have said: This thing cannot longer be tolerated. They have said: You take statistics every year; you profess to base arguments on them; you find, what is very extraordinary, that deep-sea fish, supposed to be able to withstand almost anything the ingenuity of man can devise for their capture and destruction, so far as their reproduction is concerned, are falling off more and more every year; your own officers tell you that the purse-seine is responsible for much of the falling off, and we ask you to put a stop to that practice. Then the hon, gentleman comes forward and says that this demand is so emphatic, almost unanimous, that he is unable to oppose it, and feels that it is wrong to stand in the way of the fishermen; but insidiously he asks that the Bill should be so framed that every capitalist—and it seems to be capitalists alone who enter into this business, because the purse-seine in itself is enormously expensive—may practically, with impunity, violate that law every day. The hon, gentleman very much less dangerous opponent if he were, does not pretend to point out that I have because by saying that he will not argue that the exaggerated the possibilities of avoiding the law. does not pretend to point out that I have

He does not pretend that the opportunities for violating it are not extraordinarily great, that the means of detection are not comparatively small, and that, therefore, if there is a case in which we should exact heavy penalties this is not one. The hon. gentleman says that the Act of Congress to which I have alluded is no precedent. It is not, in this sense: that it has proved entirely ineffectual. It is like the legislation the hon, gentleman now advocates. It looks well on paper, it seems to denote a desire to stop the thing, but the result shows that the vessels..do not observe that law. The result shows that the purse-seines have been increasing, until last year, when only one thing prevented their great use, and that was, that in the previous year there were so many purse-seines used along the coast, and steamers employed in connection with them, and they played such havoc with the mackerel, that this fish were not found spawning on our coasts.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Surely, the hon, gentleman is not attempting to lead the House to believe that the Americans have been fishing with purseseines in our waters?

Mr. TUPPER. I said on our coasts, and the hon, gentleman knows what I mean. He knows that the mackerel which are outside the three-mile limit are, in a few hours, inside that limit.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Your Bill does not touch that.

Mr. TUPPER. I am talking about the Act of Congress, and I am pointing out to the House that instead of that Act, which the hon, gentleman wishes us to imitate-

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon, gentleman has appealed to that Act to show that Congress has only legislated tentatively and has only experimented with the evil. Well, Sir, you cannot play with the patience of our fishermen by beginning an experiment again. We have had the experiment, and we know the results; we know the condition of our fisheries. We have seen the results of legislation of Congress since 1888, and we know that legislation is ineffectual; and I say it is absurd to put a law on the Statute-book which we know will fall short of what we intend to effect. That is the argument I have made, that the opportunities of evading the law are very great; but if you make the law severe, if you give a fair warning to all intending violators, there will be a great deal more caution shown. The owners of those vessels, such as the $10,000vessel to which the hon, gentleman referred, when they have to face the possibility of confiscation, will be more cautions than if they have to face only the possibility of paying a fine of from $50 to $500, at the discretion of the judge. Suppose the case came before a brilliant jurist, such as the hon. gentleman, who does not believe the law is right, who believes we have gone too far-opinion of the judges?

We know that judges are Mr. TUPPER. human, and if a case came before a judge who is of opinion that we had passed experimental, tentative legislation-legislation initiated by hon. gentlemen, who said it was only an experiment, and who said they were not satisfied the law was right, and that it would be well to put in the power of the would present it on the first occasion. That was a judge this discretion, the judge would feel he had perfect liberty, consistent with his honour, to follow his own inclinations and to decide, Parliament having given him the discretion of imposing a fine from $50 to $500, that the smallest fine should be imposed. Nine judges out of ten, not feeling certain as to whether this law was right or wrong, would impose the lowest fine; and the owner of the $10,000-boat and the $7,000-purseseine would simply go out and catch the fish wherever he could, and pay the fine, so as to get rid of all danger, and settle the matter once for all. We must, in dealing with a subject of this kind, in dealing with a scheme so expensive in itself and so wonderfully ingenious and deadly that it does the injury I have said by taking such an enormous eatch at one haul, act in the most severe matter; and I have pointed out to the hon, gentleman that the present Act goes almost as far. In law it does go as far; in words I have shown the difference. "All the material implements and appliances used," is, I say, a phrase that could be construed to cover the language in that; and if the language was not here, that language I have used, being the general language applicable to the fisheries, would apply. The hon, gentleman says it is a most dangerous thing to impose so serve a penalty, involving the confiscation of a valuable vessel, or any vessel—for in the case of a poorer vessel a poorer man is affected, and the case is just as strong when the party pursued unwittingly went over the three-mile limit without any intention of fishing inside that limit. That is a possible case. I admit that our fishermen, in the pursuit of their avocation, are, of necessity, careless, as there is no object in ascertaining exactly where the three-mile limit ends or begins, in ordinary circum-But those cases are provided for, since, in the Fishery Act, it is provided that persons convicted of any such infraction may appeal, by petition, to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who may remit the penalty and restore the forfeiture under the Act. There is protection at once; but in the meanwhile this Bill now contains a fair warning to fishermen, which is in their interest, as to the extraordinary risk they run. The hon, gentleman, in attacking this power of remission, used the argument sometimes used, and with which I have a great deal of sympthy, that we should put as little of that power of remission and of discretion, in connection with convictions, in the hands of a. Minister of any particular department as possible, but that principle in reference to the Fisheries Act has never been seriously attacked in this House. Since that was made law no hon, gentleman has seriously attempted to repeal it, and it is only when party feelings runs a little high that insinuations are made; and, as far as I am aware, those insinuations have only been thrown out in reference to the fisheries bounty, and that has nothing to do with clause 6. As far as the lobster regulations are concerned, it is the first time since I have been in this. Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Would that affect the House that I have heard any grievance expressed, either by petition or in any other way, that this power had been unfairly exercised, that there had been any remission of a fine on the part of anyone who had been convicted of a violation of the law, or a retention of the fine on the other side because of political influence. If any case of that kind could be shown I know that hon, gentlemen opposite necessary provision, because the hon, gentleman well knows that some of the fisheries officers are more or less inefficient, but they are clothed with magisterial powers, they can and do fine, and, therefore, this provision has been found necessary. This meets the only serious objection that the hon. gentleman can raise to this section. The other objections which he has put might come from anyone who was opposed to the principle of the Bill.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think I am entitled to complain that that the hon, gentleman has not met or sought to meet the objections which I raised in what I think was a very fair way against this Bill. He has not attempted to meet the arguments I used, but he has impugned my motives in making those arguments.

Mr. TUPPER. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon, gentleman has argued at length, and, if he will pardon my saying so, at almost wearisome length, that my arguments in attacking this Bill were not of the best. peat that, while I am not personally convinced that the injury caused by these purse-seines is as great as the fishermen believe, I am prepared to support the hon, gentleman in passing this Bill. The only point I raised was whether you were adopting proper penalties in the enforcement of this Bill. The answer given is that the hon. gentleman is afraid to trust the judges of the land, to whom we have voted large salaries to carry out the laws. He says that probably the judges will do wrong, but the fishermen know that there is an appeal to himself, and, therefore, he will rectify the judgment of the judges. It is simply a question of putting penalties on a breach of a new law. You are going to make illegal what has heretofore been legal. Does the hon. gentleman say that the fishing in mackerel, for example, has decreased in the last ten years?

Yes; the returns show that. Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think the hon. gentleman can show that.

Mr. TUPPER. I think I can.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then I challenge him to do it. I assert that the boat fishing last year was the best for years back. But, admitting that, if a vessel worth from $5,000 to $10,000 goes out-

Mr. TUPPER. If the hon, gentleman will excuse me I will state that, in 1885, the Canadian catch of mackerel was 148,450 barrels; in 1887 it was 131,653 barrels.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What was it in 1886?

In 1886 it was 152,292. Mr. TUPPER. 1888 the catch, which had been 152,292 barrels in 1886, dropped to 65,777 barrels, and in 1889 it rose slightly to 65,849 barrels. Then there is the fishing to which I also alluded, and which is germane to this question—that is, the United States catch off That catch, the coast outside the three-mile limit. which was 330,000 barrels in 1885, when fishing inshore, dropped in 1886, when they were confined to fishing outside the three-mile limit to 80,000, to 78,000 in 1887, to 40,000 in 1888, to 17,794 barrels in 1889 and to 16,140 in 1890. Or, taking both together, as the hon. gentleman asked if I would state or venture to tell the House that the mackerel fishing had declined—and he referred to the boat and line fishing, which has nothing to do with | men from Ontario may not thoroughly understand the case—the total of the United States and Canadian fishing of mackerel amounts to 478,450 barrels in 1885, 232,292 barrels in 1886, 209,653 barrels in 1887, 105,777 in 1888, 83,643 in 1889, and 116,140 in 1890, or, taking the first and the last, it was 478,450 in 1885, against 106,140 barrels in 1890.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What was the inshore catch in 1890?

Mr. TUPPER. Ninety thousand.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) According to the statement of the hon. gentleman, we would imagine that purse-seining would do good to the fish. We know that the mackerel is a migratory fish. I repeat that you cannot prohibit the catching by purseseines outside the three-mile limit. The question is simply whether the penalties you propose to inflict are reasonable or unreasonable, whether the want of confidence which you are expressing in your judges is fair, whether the House will leave it to the Minister of Marine to review the judgment of the court, or whether the judge should be left to decide on the penalties to be inflicted. I will call the attention of the hon. gentleman to one point which he ridiculed. He says that we do not want to have a discussion on the question as to whether the penalty should be $50 or $500 in the courts be-That is the one thing which he leaves to the discretion of the judge, but he adds, that no matter whether the judge may consider the case one of unwitting violation of the law, and therefore imposes a penalty of $50, or considers it a wilful violation of the law, and imposes the penalty of $500, the confiscation of the vessel must take place in any case. If you go before the courts, and the judge says it has been an unwitting breach of the law, he may fine the party only $50, but the vessel is confiscated all the same. The prosecution, we will suppose, has been brought by a seaman on board who has a spite against his master; the judge may say: I will inflict the lowest penalty of $50, but I regret to say that although this has been unwittingly done, I am bound by the law to confiscate the vessel, with the tackle and appurtenances. Now, does that commend itself to the reasonable mind of any man in this House? say, make your penalty so large that it will strike terror, if you please, into the hearts of those who will be disposed to violate the law. I say that if the owner of a vessel has to pay $1,000 for a single throwing of the seine it is a large enough penalty to impose upon any man, but to make it in all cases, no matter whether there is an accidental mistake, or a wilful violation of the law-to decree in all cases the confiscation of the vessel, with the tackle and appurtenances, is, I respectfuly submit to the House, a principle which, in a Bill of this kind, which you are introducing for the first time, one that is unwarrantable and unjust.

Mr. TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman think that $1,000 penalty would prevent a vessel setting out with the purse-seine to catch mackerel?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Certainly, I do.

Mr. TUPPER. Then, what harm will it do to add the confiscation? That will equally prevent

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will concede to me that the vessel will start out anyway, whatever law we may pass. As hon. gentle-this matter, I may say that purse-seining is carried on in waters beyond the three-mile limit, and not in waters in respect of which we are legislating. A vessel, therefore, will start out to carry on the purse-seining in deep waters, and she may drift within the three-mile limit, or follow a school unwittingly within the three-mile limit, or in certain cases she may come in willfully. Then, I say, put on your penalty, and let it be reasonable, ranging from $50 for an unwitting violation up to $1,000 for a wilful one, and that will be a sufficient penalty to attach, and no owner of a vessel should be mulcted in more. I say, again, make such a penalty that no one is likely to repeat the offence, but do not cruelly punish the owners of these fishing vessels for what may be an unwitting offence. There is no more precarious work in the world than mackerel fishing, there is no more precarious investment than an investment in these fishing vessels. The hon, member for King's knows very well that in Prince Edward Island a large number of men have invested their money in fishing vessels and sent them out, but it did not pay, and they lost their money. The hon. pay, and they lost their money. The the junior member for King's, P.E.I. McLean) has a large amount of money invested now in that industry, in vessels fitted with purse-scines. These men honestly invest a large amount of money in this precarious enter-prise, and you ought not to impose an unreasonable penalty upon them, such as would be the absolute confiscation of the vessel under any and all circumstances. That is the only point I have been urging, and the Minister is not justified in trying to make the Committee believe that I am opposed to the whole Bill. I am giving him my full approval of the Bill, and I am assisting him in carrying it with my voice and whatever influence I have. I am only urging the hon, gentleman not to make the penalty so severe that it may result in this: that a dissatisfied seaman on board one of these vessels, if he finds that his master's vessel is unwittingly drifting into the three-mile limit, may say to the master: "Pay me so much hush money or I will have your vessel confiscated." That is what it may come to and what it will come to.

Mr. FRASER. I beg leave to say that I am in full sympathy with this Bill. I think there may be a good deal in what the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) has said, and, perhaps, as he has a strong opinion on the subject, the suggestion that the confiscation of the property might be left to the discretion of the court is For myself, I would accept But I am myself in favour worthy of notice. such a provision. of the Bill as it stands, even without such a provision as I have suggested. I admit that the business of seine-fishing is a precarious one, but the investment of capital in that business is like every other investment. The man who makes that investment is able to loose it. I come from a county which is, perhaps, more affected by seine-fishing than any other, and I know it has been an unmitigated and continual evil. In the County of Guysborough, according to reports I have received, during the whole of this season not much more than 50 barrels of mackerel have been caught, where formerly the fishermen in a single boat caught that much. I am thoroughly convinced that the decline is due to seine-fishing.

Mr. Davies (P.E.I.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has there been any purseseine fishing?

Mr. FRASER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Are there any fish caught with purse-seines?

Mr. FRASER. Not very many inside, and I am going to give the hon. gentleman the reason. I felt so deeply on this subject that I saw the Minister of Marine and Fisheries when I came up here, and I was glad to know that his attention had been called to it, because there was great need of it. Now, so far as purse-seines are concerned, it will be remembered that purse-seining is the same within the three-mile limit as without, so far as the destruction of the fish is concerned, because it is well known that nearly ten times as much herring and small mackerel and other fish are destroyed as the catches that are made and saved in these purseseines. Any captain from the United States will tell you the same thing, and the reason why I am in favour of a heavier penalty, if possible, is because I would like that, when the Government go to Washington in October, they should induce the American Government to agree upon an international law that the same confiscation should be made to apply in the waters outside the three-mile limit, to either a Canadian or an American ship engaged in that kind of fishing. I think it is not only destructive, so far as the inshore fisheries is concerned, and more destructive even so far as the fishermen are concerned, but it is destructive out-Now, it must be remembered that so far as Nova Scotia is concerned there has been a mackerel fleet from Cape Sable and Canso to Louis-They begin about the 20th of May. burg. fact is, they prevent the mackerel from striking the shore altogether. The mackerel strike out generally about 20 miles outside; they do not come in at all, from the fact of these purse-seines being used. The fish appear to understand—if I may apply the word "understanding" to fish—they seem to know that a large number of fish are destroyed, and they avoid the localities where these seines are used. Another reason is, that the fish themselves keep away from the shore. It must be remembered that the inshore is the natural spawning ground of mackerel, and they are kept out and do not come in. Not only are the mackerel destroyed, besides being caught, but there is another evil effect. It must also be remembered that a vessel coming within the three-mile limit with a purse seine will be larger than an ordinary fishing vessel, and will destroy not only the fishing but the nets of the fishermen. I believe that the waters within the three-mile limit is the natural fishing ground and farm for the fishermen who live on the shore, and no power should be given to any Canadians, Englishmen or Americans to interfere with those waters, so far as those local fishermen are concerned. I think you can inflict no penalty too severe on men who interfere with that fishing, and, therefore, I conceive, as most of the purse-seine fishing is done outside the three-mile limit, that this penalty will not be very onerous on purse-seine fishermen. These fishermen will not be found very frequently within the threemile limit. A fisherman might unwittingly come within the three-mile limit, but it will be much more difficult to prove that he is fishing within that limit than the Minister imagines. That fact must sure in finding myself for once supporting the Minbe proved by the prosecution, and it will be found that not very many come within it. So far as our local fishermen are concerned, I have come a good deal in contact with those of my county and I know something about them. There are no men in my county, and a large proportion of the people are engaged in fishing, who do not look upon purse-seine fishing as not only destructive to the fish but as tending to keep the fish away. During the last two years the fishing has been very bad in my county, and the people naturally attribute it to the purse-seine It is because my constituents are practically interested in this subject that I am glad the Minister had seen fit to deal with it, and I am glad he has not only done so as regards the three-mile limit, but also that, having that law on the Statutebook, the Government may be able when they go to the United States to show how advanced we are, and to argue during the negotiations that the Americans should, if they expect the fisheries to prosper, agree that purse-seines should be prohibited outside as well as inside the three-mile limit. I take this to be a strong point, that the penalty is severe because it will not strike very many people in Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Who will it strike? It will not strike the Americans.

Mr. TUPPER. It will prohibit the use of purse-seines within the three-mile limit.

Mr. FRASER. It will prevent the men who have purse-seines using them within the three-mile limit, and it will at least keep that fishing ground for our local fishermen. I am not anxious about the Americans, except so far as regards preventing them from coming near us at all—that is, within the three-mile limit. It was stated by an hon. member the other day, when speaking of the threemile limit, that the Americans should be allowed to fish within those waters. I do not agree with that opinion, and I assert that they should never be allowed to fish within the three-mile limit. From the investigations I have made I do not believe they should ever be granted that privilege.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is no question of the Americans fishing within the three-mile limit.

Mr. FRASER. If we have effective legislation it will prevent this purse-seine fishing within our limits. It is not very often that purse-seine fishermen will come within our limits, but it may occur occasionally. If a shoal of mackerel strikes inshore they are liable to follow it and use purseseines within the three-mile limit. I want all the fish within that limit to be preserved for the fisher-men who live on the shore. I believe the old modes of fishing were not only less destructive to the fish, but that the quantity caught each year gave better results to our fishermen. A few hundred barrels may be taken in a purse-seine and a liberal return given to the purse-seine fishermen; but if that quantity were taken by 100 or 200 fishermen the fishermen as a whole would be more greatly benefited. While I admit that the penalties in the Bill are severe, I cannot believe there are many occasions on which they will affect the men who know the law is in operation. But it will prevent purse-seiners coming within the three-mile limit and allow our local fishermen to fish undisturbed within that limit. I have, therefore, much plea- and sailing through the nets of the poor fishermen ister and the Bill which he has introduced.

Mr. GILLMOR. The hon, gentleman has not touched the question at issue, and has made no reference whatever to the objection taken to the Bill by the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). He has talked about the Atlantic Ocean, from one end to the other, about the three-mile limit, about fishing inside and outside of it, but he has not dealt with the subject of the penalties to be inflicted for the violation of the law. In my humble opinion the objection taken to the measure by the hon, member for Queen's is a reasonable one. penalty for violating the law varies, it may be $50 or $1,000 fine, but no matter how slight the offence may be the ship is confiscated. This being a new measure, the penalty proposed by the Minister is extreme. That is the point at issue, and in that view of the case I agree with the hon, member for Queen's. With respect to purse-seines destroying the fish, that is altogether a matter of guess-work. If next week the catch of mackerel proved to be as large as it was ten years ago they would hold that purse-seines have not destroyed the fish. It is true we are all very wise about the fish and their movements. Scriptures, however, tell us, you cannot tell the way of the fish in the ocean. When the fish do not happen to enter a man's weir or purse-seine he immediately says they have all gone. The Atlantic Ocean has a very large surface, and the fish are not always caught at the same place. Their habits and their haunts vary; but neither the mackerel nor the herring are going to be exhausted. With respect to the remarks made by the Minister as to the enormous amount of fish taken in purse-seines, I am satisfied that if herring are taken which are worth saving the fishermen make use of them. it is with respect to cod. If they are sufficiently large to be marketable they cure them and put them on the market. The point is narrowed down to this simple question: Cannot you leave to the court, not only the adjudicating of penalties varying from $50 to $1,000, but the question of confiscating a vessel for an offence, however slight? I think the measure is extreme in this particular, and should be amended.

Mr. KAULBACH. I was pleased to listen to the utterances of the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) who has just taken his seat. He appears to thoroughly understand the habits of the fish and the interests of the fishermen, and I think we may look forward to the time when the hon. gentlemen will sit on this side of the House.

Mr. FRASER. It I thought that would happen, I would take back all I have said.

Mr. KAULBACH. The remarks that emanated from the hon. gentleman were almost exactly on the line of a letter addressed by me some time ago to the Minister with respect to the grievances of which he complains. We now find in Nova Scotia that the purse-seine fishery has been a serious injury to fishermen, that it has so depleted the fisheries along our coast so that in many instances the fishermen have been compelled to give up that industry altogether, and in other intances they had been compelled to look after the deep-sea fishery in consequence of the Americans coming to our shores, as they have hitherto done, along the coast, and destroying them, or coming within the three-mile limit, where there have been no vessels to protect our fisheries, and taking the fish, so to speak, from their very doors. Now, we find that the mackerel fishery has decreased very considerably for some time, and that it has been gradually decreasing every year, except last year, as was shown by the statistics quoted by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. If I am correct in taking down the hon, gentleman's figures-I noted themas I accidentally happened to hear them coming into the House-in 1885 the catch of mackerel was 478,000 barrels, and in 1890, 106,000 barrels. My hon, friend beside me corrects me by saying that the catch was below the 100,000 barrels: that is a proof in itself that the mackerel fishery is decreasing.

Mr. TUPPER. In 1890 the catch was 106,000 barrels, both American and Canadian -- 90,000 barrels Canadian and 16,000 barrels American.

Mr. KAULBACH. In 1885 was it the collective numbers, American and Canadian catch?

Mr. TUPPER. Yes: 478,000 barrels.

Mr. KAULBACH. Now, Mr. Chairman, I feel satisfied that, in the interest of the fisheries of our Atlantic coast and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, where the fish most frequent, this Act should be placed upon the Statute-books, it being a most prudent piece of legislation. We have an example set us by the Americans, who have found that the use of purse-seines has almost depleted the fishery on the New England coast, and they legislating to abolish it is well worthy of being followed in the interest of our Canadian fishermen. With regard to the penalty clause referred to by the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), I may say that I think it is a saving and preventive clause, and should remain If I am correct in judging, it places a penalty of $50 minimum and a maximum penalty of $500, with the confiscation of the vessel and equipments, subject to such abatement in extreme cases as the Minister in his discretion may consider just and prudent. It is rather difficult to define the limit of the three miles, but I feel satisfied that the object of this Bill is not simply to secure the forfeiture of the vessel that is illegally fishing within the three-mile limit, but it is more particularly to abolish the use of the deadly weapon for the capture of the fish, the purse-seine, entirely. That is the main object of this Bill. I am to a certain degree speaking against my own interests in supporting this Bill, as I was interested myself in some of the vessels engaged in the purse seining, but from the very moment that I found that legislation was being brought about by the United States to abolish this diabolical system of capturing fish I felt satisfied that I would forego my personal interests, and I advised my neighbours who where joined in partnership with me in the vessels to consent to a law of this kind. This penalty clause is, in my opinion, a saving clause, and it ought to be within the discretion of the Minister of Marine and his colleagues in Council to exercise such discretion as they deem prudent in regard to it. It would perhaps lead to a very great deal of dissatisfaction if it were left to a court, for they might discriminate in such a way as to lead to a good deal of litigation, whereas this provision in the Bill settles the matter in such a manner that I think it will be satisfactory to the public. I do not know that I should comment on this question further than to was well taken; and it will be a matter of surprise Mr. KAULBACH.

say that I believe the Bill will meet the approval of the coast fishermen generally, and I feel satisfied it will be concurred in by all others who have studied the interest of the fishery industry. The fishermen themselves will concur with me that it is wise and prudent legislation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I wish to call attention for a few moments to the point raised by my hon, friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies). The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries undertook to point out to the House that this legislation was necessary, and he began by saying that the statistics in his department show a large diminution in the catch, which indicated that the mackerel fisheries were being depleted by the system of fishing that had recently prevailed. Now, if we look at the statistics that the hon, gentleman presented, it is pretty clear that they do not establish the proposition which he announced, and which he quoted to support. I could not help observing that when the hon. Minister came to the statistics for the years 1889 and 1890 he failed to read the statistics of the catch in Canada alone, but he read it in conjunction with the catch in the United States.

Mr. TUPPER. I gave both.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon, gentleman gave both, when he could not help himself. After the hon, gentleman sat down I asked him what the catch was in Canada alone for these years, and he then gave it. I must again express my regret that the hon. Minister, occupying the position he does in this House, in undertaking to give information to the House on a question of this sort, should have recourse to such a proceeding. It seems to me most improper, because if the hon. Minister had felt that the statistics for these years would have supported his proposition he would have given them; but because they indicated an increase in the catch they were withheld, and quoted in conjunction with the catch of the United States. It has been stated by the Minister, and by my friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), that the purseseines had so injured the fisheries, I suppose by catching more than ought to be caught in one year-

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell), -by destroying this particular fish; but how does that diminish the catch of the mackerel? Of course, my knowledge of the matter is altogether theoretical; but, so far as I know, the migratory fish are sometimes found away from certain waters for years, and afterwards reappear in great numbers; so that it is due to the habits of the fish rather than to the mode of catching them that the diminution in quantity in one year as compared with another is due. But I am not going to question the propriety of this measure. I think it would have been more satisfactory if a committee had been asked for, information collected and a report made to Parliament before legislation was sought. Then Parliament would have been proceeding intelligently. But at present we have only the information before us which the Minister has seen proper to give. Now, it is not to the principle of the measure that my hon. friend from Queen's objected; but he objected to the mode in which it was sought to enforce the law where there was a violation of it. I think, Sir, that objection to me if hon, gentlemen opposite agree that it is a lof the country; but this I do know, that in every proper thing to place the whole of an important class of the population of this country under the control of a Minister of the Crown, and make them dependent upon him for the freedom in the exercise of their calling and the security of their property which they possess.

Mr. TUPPER. They are now in that position. Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then it is a condition of things that this House cannot an hour too soon It is a condition of things that ought to be regarded as intolerable to any class of free men; and those who here claim specially to represent the fishermen ought to be the first to enter their protest against legislation of this sort. What does the hon, gentleman propose to do by this Bill? He provides:

"The use of purse-seines for the catching of fish in any of the waters of Canada is prohibited, under a penalty for each offence of not less than $50, and not exceeding $500, together with the confiscation of the vessel, boat and apparatus used in connection with such catching."

So that, in every case of conviction where there is a penalty attached, whether the amount be large or small, there must necessarily be confiscation of the vessel, and that must necessarily force the clients. owner of the vessel to come before the Minister and beg, as a suppliant, for the repossession of his property. Every man who engages in fishing, and who is brought before a magistrate or a fishery officer, and convicted under this law, even if the official regards the offence as a minor one and imposes a fine of only $50, must submit to have his ship confiscated, along with the payment of that sum. He ceases to have property in the ship; all property in it is transferred to the party complaining and to the Government; and the person who makes the complaint, if he be an opponent of the Minister, may find that he is, proprietors of fishing vessels in Nova Scotia, at relieved of the moiety to which he is entitled, while if he is a friend of the Minister and the owner of the ship belongs to the opposite political party the ship may be confiscated, no matter whether the penalty attached be large or small. Now, Sir, the hon, gentleman says that he cannot trust the judges. That is a very extraordinary statement on the part of a Minister of the Crown. But he asks the whole community to say that he may be trusted, that he will exercise an unbiassed judgment. Though the judge may be mistrusted, the Minister must be trusted; though there may be suspicious against the integrity of the judge, there cannot be suspicions against the fairness of the Minister; and every man who holds property in a ship knows that he holds that property by the sufferance of a Minister of the Crown, and that it may be transferred to some one else. We do not care whether we know much or little with regard to the fisheries. I wish to see an administration of the law by the judiciary of the country. I wish to see the penalties against the violation of the law enforced by the ordinary tribunals of the country; and I know no reasons whatever why the administration of the law with regard to property in ships engaged in fishing should be transferred from the jurisdiction of the courts to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries or why he should be made the supreme appellate judge with regard to all matters of this sort. I quite admit that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as a maritime man, may be conversant with the interests of the fishermen more than one residing in the interior | ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, without the portion of this country, if there is one thing more than another that the people appreciate, it is the security of their rights under the law of the land and the administration of that law by a class of men separated from political parties and amenable to the public opinion of the country, although independent of the Ministers of the Crown or of those who may be opposed to them. It is in the judiciary of this country that the people have confidence for the protection of their liberty, their rights and their property; and the hon. Minister proposes by this measure seriously to invade those rights by transferring from the judiciary of this country to himself the protection or preservation of that property. My hon, friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) spoke in favour of a measure of this sort, but he did not meet the argument of the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). The hon, member for Queen's pointed out that you are by this measure transferring from the judges to the Minister the administration of the law. You are putting every person in this country who has property in a fishing vessel at the mercy of the Minister; you are simply making those persons his clients. You say you have 35,000 fishermen in the Province of Nova Scotia. I do not know how many people you have in that province who are the owners of property in ships; but I am not prepared to entrust those people with the franchise, with the rights of free men, and at the same time make them the bondmen of a Minister of the That is what you are proposing to do. Crown. That is what this Parliament ought not to do. ought never to give its sanction or countenance to a measure of this sort. It is a monstrous thing for a Minister to come to this House and ask us to place all the property of the fishermen and the the mercy of a Minister of the Crown. My hon. friend has said that you cannot interfere with men fishing with purse-seines beyond the three mile limit. You have no jurisdiction over them, and you do not attempt to interfere with them. The decision of the court in England, in the case of Long vx. Rutledge, held that when you went beyoud the three-mile limit your rights had to be determined by the Imperial Parliament and the law of the Empire, and not by the law of a particular colony; and it would be useless, if you had the power, to legislate with regard to the waters beyond the three-mile limit when you could not control the fishermen of other countries fishing beyond that But within that limit you have the power. The fisherman may be very near the border line. The court may decide that he has come too nearthat he ought not to have come so near. It may assume from the evidence that he has been just within the three-mile limit. The preponderance of evidence may favour the contention that he was, and the penalty may be made very little, only $50. But the confiscation of the vessel must be had all the same, and there will be an appeal to the Minister as a matter of course; and I will venture to say that there will be no penalty imposed under that law in which the party will not go to the Minister, if not to get rid of the penalty, he will to get rid, at any rate, of the act of confiscation. The hon. Minister. will necessarily agree to that, for if the party has to pay $500 that will be regarded as adequate, in confiscation of the ship; so that I have no hesitation in saving that provision is designedly put in, to compel every owner of property in ships to become a suppliant to the Minister in order that he may get back the property taken from him.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon, gentleman states what is not true, and he is also out of order in saying there is any design of that kind on my part.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am not out of order, nor am I stating what is untrue. I am stating what is in the Bill. I am stating that the Bill provides for confiscation of the ship in every case.

You stated there was design. Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I say there can be, in my view, no two opinions upon that point. What can be the object of the Minister in attaching confiscation, where the penalty is $50, if it is not to force the proprietor to come to him as a suppliant in order to obtain the restoration of his property, which has been, if you will, improperly and unjustly taken from him. And is this House, representing free men, and I apprehend the fishermen of the country are free men, going to make these people the slaves of a Minister of the Crown? Why, Sir, the Emperor of Rome, in the palmiest days of its arbitrary power, would not venture to assert against the meanest citizen of the Empire the right which the hon, gentleman has undertaken to assert against the fishermen of Nova Scotia. I say that such a proposition is monstrous, and this House would be wanting in its duty to itself and in respect to the free men of this country if it would tolerate legislation of this kind.

Mr. TUPPER. The only excuse for this extraordinary excitement the hon, gentleman has worked himself into over this Bill is found, I think, in the confession he made to the Committee that he literally did not know anything about purse-seines, or apparently about the fisheries. Whether he made that confession or not, it is quite certain he does not understand the temper of the fishermen of the Maritime Previnces, if he thinks that sort of argument, which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) would not deign to use, no matter how much he might be impressed with the evil of passing the Bill, knowing, as that hon gentleman does, the intelligence of the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces, will go down with them. I can only say to the hon member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that, if he thinks it will, the sooner he goes down to the Maritime Provinces and becomes acquainted with the people there the better it will be for him, and the fewer appeals of that kind he will make in this House. This idea of his of our taking the fishermen under control and making them serfs of the Minister of Marine is entirely new and unfounded, and only took rise in the excited imagination of the hon. gentleman, an imagination unduly excited through his having made several misstatements and extraordinary propositions in the argument be addressed to the Committee; and having worked himself into a passion, he endeavoured to find vent for it by charging me with perpetrating a gross outrage on the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). So you are.

Mr. TUPPER. Let me tell the hon. gentleman who were those who brought to the attention of Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

my part in not having done before what I am now Representatives of Prince autempting to do. Edward Island in past Parliaments called my attention to this, and petitions were received from the fishermen asking for this legislation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This legislation?

Mr. TUPPER. To prohibit the use of purseseines.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is another matter. Mr. TUPPER. The hon, gentleman was so weak in argument that he had to resort to that old argument of his, that old trick of endeavouring to rally his forces by appeals to their passions and prejudices, and by making statements that I must characterize as absolutely absurd, as applied to the fishermen. This is an extraordinary power, he says, which I am attempting to exercise over the fishermen. They are to become my slaves, forsooth. The pardoning power, the power of remission, is attempted to be introduced. I would point out to him that that power has been in the Act from year to year, that it was put there to protect these very men from the mistaken acts of fishery officers clothed with magisterial powers, that it was put there in the interests of men who might be fined improperly. Then the hon. gentleman says the sooner this power is taken away the better. Out with it, he cries, and proceeds in a most excited tone to discuss a Bill that is not considered so very dangerous by gentlemen more familiar with the subject, and who have undertaken to give their views in a calm and fair manner to the House. It is wonderful that this great constitutional authority should have felt compelled to have recourse to temper and passion in discussing a great constitutional principle, a great question of law, a great question of power, the jurisdiction of Parliament and the executive. Has he forgotten the very A B C of the legislation of this country? What has he to say about the powers of the Minister of Customs? Did he thunder in this House in reference to the confiscation of vessels, if caught in the act, and the punishment of owners for violating the Customs laws?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What did the courts say?

Mr. TUPPER. What did the hon. gentleman say by his vote and sanction, when he allowed this dreadful, this outrageous legislation, to be put upon the Statute-book without saying a word, or pointing out to the merchants of this country that they were to become the slaves and serfs of the Minister of Customs? What about the criminal laws? Has the hon. gentleman in his excitement forgotten that there is a pardoning power also, not in the judges, but given us over these judges, whom I have insulted because I said they were not acquainted with the subject of purse-seines. And I can repeat that I do not believe there is any judge in any of the provinces who would at present say he knows the first thing about them or has ever looked into the subject, as to the injury they may do our fisheries, except perhaps one or two. the hon gentleman insinuates that a Minister of the Crown has insulted the judiciary because he stated that in considering the question the judge would naturally take into consideration the arguments of hon gentlemen opposite, that he would be influ-Parliament the dereliction, if I may so call it, on lenced by the fact that we were not certain as to whether the purse-seines did any damage, and that, under all the circumstances, he would decide that the punishment should therefore be nominal, the measure being considered by us as merely tentative. If the hon, gentleman is going to attack the principle involved in the Bill he should have the courage of his convictions. He should reform all the laws; he should take away from the Crown the power of pardon and invest it in the judges. Do we not stand in peril of our lives at present, according to this excited legal luminary, since we cannot appeal to the judge, in case of trouble, and ask for remission of the penalties imposed by the Legislature of this country? But the hon. gentleman was most unfair-I do not think it is unusual for him to be so-in reference to the statistics. He was not at all satisfied, and he thought he could hang his hat on a little peg. He was stretching out in a most disgraceful way for arguments, and after confessing that he knew nothing about the facts, he showed that he knew nothing about the law involved; and failing in both, he brought a charge of want of candor against myself—that, in giving statistics to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) I had carefully refrained from giving all the statistics. I did not pretend to do that. The hon, member for Queen's claimed, as I understood, that there had been no decline in the mackerel fisheries in the last ten years.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You suppressed two years.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon, gentleman again indecently and offensively repeats that I suppressed two years. The Hansard will show that. The hon, gentleman contradicts me now, being careless of the facts and of the feelings of any one who is contradicted; but that goes for very little with me from that hon, gentleman, except that I think it necessary to call attention to the unfair spirit which induced the hon, gentleman to resort to such a contention. There was no occasion to import temper into this discussion. The hon, gentleman said there was no reason for the fishermen to oppose this Bill, and, therefore, in the littleness of his mind,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. TUPPER—with his Lilliputian spirit, the hon, gentleman was not willing that I should have the credit of introducing a Bill which would be so acceptable to the fishermen, so he said that, while the principle of the Bill was right, I was endeavouring to enslave the fishermen, and to obtain a control over them which should not be allowed. Let me give the hon. gentleman a few more statistics. He seems to be hungering for statistics. I shall give him fuller statistics than I did, and, if I had known that he was so willing to receive more information, I would have given them to him before, instead of repressing them, as the hon, gentleman says. In the years 1888, 1889 and 1890 the catch of mackerel made by United States fishing vessels in the waters of the Nova Scotia coast and in the Gulf of St. Lawrence is as follows:—1888, 83 vessels, 10,418 barrels, averaging 126 barrels per vessel; 1889, 62 vessels, 6,755 barrels, averaging 109 barrels per vessel; 1890, 64 vessels, 8,443 barrels, averaging 132 barrels per vessel. Then the Canadian catch, to which I have already alluded, in 1885 amounted to 148,450 barrels, against 90,000 barrels in 1890; and the United States catch in 1885 amounted to 330,000 barrels, against 16,140 in 1890. Yet the miserable carping criticism is raised that I did not give two years in the statement that I made, and that, therefore, I abused my position We will see who was trifling with the intelligence of this House or making an exhibition of the grossest ignorance when I show that the comparison is 148,000 barrels in 1885 against 65,000 barrels in 1888, and 90,000 barrels in 1890, while the American catch was 330,000 barrels in 1885 against 16,000 barrels in 1890, figures which I have already The hon, gentleman desired that I should compare the 16,000 barrels of 1890 with the 17,000 barrels of 1889. The facts show that in 1890 there was a slight increase in the total catch over 1889, but that is not satisfactory to anybody who examines the mackerel fishery, because, while the total catch was 106,000 in 1890 as against 83,000 in 1889, we find that in 1885 the total catch I hope the hon. amounted to 470,000 barrels. gentleman now appreciates the statistics that I have given. Hon, gentlemen understanding the mackerel fishery will find that in 1890 there were about 20,000 barrels more than in 1889, but there were several hundred more barrels caught in 1885. The gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces who are interested in the mackerel fisheries will not pretend that that fishery has not declined in the last few years, and that the work of those hardy toilers in the sea has not been performed with the worst possible luck in the last few years. I have spoken of the complaints which the hon. gentlemen have made, and have used these statistics for that purpose.

Mr. FLINT. Has the Minister received any information as to the mackerel fishing this year?

Mr. TUPPER. Yes; and the mackerel fishery is improving. The reports which are before the House add to the strength of my contention in regard to purse-seines, and that is, that the purseseines having broken up the schools of mackerel, as described by the experts, the purse-seines were laid aside. The hon, gentleman shakes his head, but I am alluding to official documents, and he ought to know that the purse-seines have not been used in the last year or two to the same extent by the fishing vessels-certainly not by the American vessels—as they were before. Lieutenant Gordon in his report of this year ascribes the temporary falling off and the temporary improvement in the mackerel fishery to the rest which the mackerel have received from the purse-seines not having been so much used. The fishery this year is better all round, I am glad to say. Coming back to the question, I am glad to find that gentlemen who have opposed the penalties in this Bill are those who say they do not believe in the principle of the Bill. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) waives his objection at the desire of the fishermen, but the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) says he does not believe in the principle of the Bill. Both those gentlemen quarrel with the penalties and say that they are too severe. Consequently, those who believe in the principle of the Bill cannot be very far astray when it is opposed by those who think we are going too far in advance. I submit that in view of the Customs law, the criminal law, the present Fisheries Act containing provisions for omission, the same as these other laws, we are not going a step in advance of the spirit of our Legislature, so far as that power of omission is concerned. In reference to the penalty, we are not going beyond the spirit and the exact words of that Act relating to fishing by foreign vessels, or to the language which I quoted as the same construction in the main body of the Fisheries Act: All materials, implements or appliances used, instead of the vessel, boat and apparatus used.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). I do not think it is necessary to add any further evidence to prove that these seines are destructive of mackerel fishing. The full reports made by the fishery officers, the universal opinion of the fishermen themselves, and the opinions of the representatives of the fishing counties which have been given in this House, ought to be sufficient to settle that fact. However, I will read an extract from a letter which I hold in my hand, written by a very intelligent fisherman who has been catching mackerel all his life, and who is part owner of purse-seines, and who comes from a portion of the Province of Nova Scotia where, perhaps, more mackerel are caught than anywhere else. He says:

"It is my candid opinion that purse-seining should be stopped, that it has done much to break up and destroy the mackerel fishery, and the great majority of fishermen are of opinion that it is only by an Act of Parliament that it can be stopped."

Such testimony, I think, is valuable. I would like, however, to call the attention of the Minister of Marine to this fact. I take it, from the remarks that have fallen from him, that this Act is only to be applied to the larger purse-seines which are used by schooners, and which cost a very large amount of money.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is not the law.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). I do not think you apprehended what I said. I said I gathered from the remarks of the Minister that he intended that the Act should only apply to these larger seines. At all events, there is a description of seines used in the harbours much smaller than that, some of which cost about $500, and others costing as low as $125 or $200, but they are equally purse-seines; they are used in the bays and harbours to catch mackerel, and if it is not intended that the Act should apply to these smaller seines I think it should be made more explicit.

An hon. MEMBER. They are known as purse-seines?

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). They are invariably called purse-seines, and this gentleman who writes me, and who is familiar with the whole business, speaks of them as purse-seines.

Mr. BOWERS. I have no fault to find with the Minister of Marine in trying to make the Fishery Act as good as he can, or trying to do the best he can for the fishing interest of the country; but I think myself he is a little too sharp in making this penalty include the confiscation of the vessel and the apparatus in connection with it. Take, for instance, one of our small vessels. They only cost $1,000, to $1,200, or $1,500, and it takes a man six under or eight years to earn enough to purchase one of these vessels and pay off the incumbrance. Now, confiscating these vessels because sometimes they unthinkingly or unwittingly go inside the three-mile limit I think is rather hard on the owner, and it is not doing just the fair thing. Mr. I would like to agree with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries-I think he is a good man in his place, I think he is trying to do what is about right; still, I think he ought to be a little less severe. It would help him, and it would help the fishermen, too, if he would just drop out that last clause, and make the penalty $50 to $500, or $1,000, if he wishes. He told me the other day that he thought these purse-seines we had would not come under the denomination of purse-seines. I think they Last year there were probably $12,000 would. $20,000 worth of purse-seines bought in Digby County. They are seines running from 10 to 12 fathoms, and sometimes 15 fathoms in depth, and 150 or 200 fathoms in length. told him I did not see how he would get clear of calling them purse-seines. Last year, for the first time for about twenty years, the mackerel has appeared around our shores, and the people have bought from $12,000 to $15,000 worth of purseseines, and that they should now be confiscated if caught rising them I think is a little hard. Last year they only caught enough mackerel to pay half or two-thirds the value of those seines. They still have them on band, and this year I do not think there is going to be much purse-I would also call the attention seining done. of the Minister to this fact, that our principal bay in Digby County, is St. Mary's Bay, which is nine or ten miles wide at the mouth and is about a mile wide at the upper end. This threemile limit would probably go up this bay some fifteenor twenty miles, as it is wedge-shaped. Now, it would be pretty difficult for the fishermen to keep within the three-mile limit or in the centre of this The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. wedge. Fraser) says that the people who fish within the three-mile limit live on the shore. The men down our way live on the shore and they own these purseseines. Now, I am not saying that purse-seining is right; still I think there is a little misapprehension in regard to them. Down our way, where purse-seining has been resorted to and mackerel have been caught, the fish have all been saved. believe that our Government could easily make an arrangement with the American Government to have an international law that would prohibit all outside purse-seining. It seems to me a little hard that the Americans should fish outside the threemile limit and drive these mackerel inside, and that our men are then forbidden to take them. although I am going to waive all objections to this Bill, still I am going to ask the hon. gentleman just to try and see if he cannot take off that forfeiture of the vessel and apparatus, because it is a hard law. Let him make the penalty all the way from $50 to $1,000, if he wants to. But I would ask him, in the name of the fishermen in Digby County, to try and drop off that forfeiture clause. It may never once be needed, there may never be a vessel forfeited; still, I think the clause ought not to be there. I was pleased to hear the hon. gentleman quoting Lieutenant Gordon as a gentleman who understands these things so well, but a few days ago hon. gentlemen opposite did not think Lieutenant Gordon's word was worth anything in respect to the navigation of Hudson's Bay, when they were talking about ice in that bay,

Mr. TUPPER. He was not talking about fish hen.

Mr. TUPPER.

Mr. BOWERS—now he knows all about fishing, the hon. Minister affirms, and I think his word in regard to Hudson's Bay was worth just as much as it is in regard to this fishing.

Mr. FAUVEL. We have heard several hon. members from Nova Scotia speak on this question, and as I represent one of the maritime counties of Quebec I beg also to say a few words upon the subject. I am aware that for the last two years the Quebec Board of Trade has made representation to the Department of Fisheries asking the department to put a stop to the destructive practice of fishing with purse-seines. I may add that as soon as the Department of Fisheries received these facts from the Quebec Board of Trade the department did not believe them, and they asked for further evidence. I may remark that the Quebec Board of Trade has, on several occasions, written to me in my county asking for facts concerning this style of fishing. I know that on the coast of Labrador the population is in a starving condition. from the fact that, having been accustomed to subsist on these fisheries, that these fisheries have so dwindled away by reason of this engine of destruction, the purse-seine, that the people are no longer able to procure a subsistence. may add that formerly on the Labrador coast my firm had two large fishing establishments, and since these purse-seines came into use my fishermen refuse to go fishing on those coasts, stating that the time for fishing with hook and line had passed, and the purse seines were reaping the benefit which they had formerly lived upon. say also that these engines are of a very deadly nature. They take fish small and large, and of all sorts, and the fishermen take out of the seines only what is required for the market, leaving the small species to poison the waters. I have been living for twenty-five years on the Baie des Chaleurs. Ten years ago we had any amount of mackerel in our bays; but for the last two years I have not seen one mackerel taken in our waters. pleased that the Minister of Marine has brought this Bill before the House, and I am sure that he will receive the support of the Quebec Board of Trade, which has at all times been alarmed at the depletion of these fisheries. I may say, with regard to the clause in this Bill concerning the penalty, I agree with the Government that some drastic measures must be resorted to, and I think that when this legislation comes into effect offenders against the law should not only be fined, but their nets and purse-seines should also be confiscated. Why? We have seen snuggling done in the lower St. Lawrence lately; and have not these vessels been taken and confiscated by the Government? What difference is there between smuggling contraband goods and smuggling with regard to the fisheries. I hold that these offences are identical. The fisheries in the Gulf are dwindling away; they must be protected, and the fishermen must also be protected. In doing so the Government will be conferring a benefit on the fishermen and also on the outfitters, because the fisheries will be continued as before. The fishermen will prosecute the mackerel fisheries, as did their ancestors, by hook Let one and all have a chance to catch Let the poor man have the advantage to take fish at his door, and do not leave it solely to the capitalist, with a large engine of destruction. I have much pleasure in supporting the Bill.

Mr. FLINT. I cannot help thinking that the Minister of Marine, who has charge of this Bill, showed a warmth rather disproportionate to the character of the discussion in replying to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), whose observations were certainly, although strong, and, perhaps, too strong, altogether of an abstract charac-When referring to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries he did not refer particularly to the hon, gentleman who is at present occupying that office, but he referred to the office itself, and the power given by this House to the Minister for all time to come. It is to be regretted that the Government is not legislating on this matter under circumstances which would enable all members of the House who are interested in this question to discuss it more intelligently than they are able to do. To a certain degree this legislation is being introduced and carried through under what we might call a sort of panie. Although hon, members have criticised various provisions of this measure pretty severely they have all, apparently, decided to waive their views, whatever their views may be, as to the effect of purse-seines generally; yet the Government have not given this House or the country all the evidence that should be given before such drastic and important legislation should be entered into. Although I am willing to admit that, as regards the evidence presented by the Minister, the weight of evidence is against the use of purse-seines, as regards the effect on our inshore fisheries generally, yet it must not be taken for granted that all intelligent men interested in the subject agree with the evidence adduced by the Minister. There is no doubt that a large quantity of evidence can be adduced from parties interested in the fisheries antagonistic to the use of purse-seines in the fisheries, yet, at the same time, there is a large and intelligent minority who take a diametrically It is only fair to make that stateopposite view. ment to the House. I have been carried away to a large extent by the statements made on the subject, and no doubt the observations of an hon. gentleman with the experience and weight of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat are entitled to enormous weight. At the same time, there are other gentlemen with whom I have conversed who state in the most positive terms that in their opinion the damaging effect of purse-seines has been very much exaggerated, and there is reason to believe that the depletion of the inshore fisheries, which we all regret—the mackerel fishery particularly—has not been the result of the use of purse-seines to any very great extent. I agree, to a large extent, with the view taken by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), that we are not yet acquainted with the habits of migratory fish, and we are not prepared to say that the decline of the inshore fisheries, particularly mackerel, has been altogether due to the use of purse-seines during the last few years. It would have been much better had the Government, during the last four or five years this subject has been under discussion, and during which they have been receiving the full and able reports of their officers, asked this House to appoint a commission or committee to gather evidence on both sides, and see if we are not proposing to legislate to a large extent in the dark. How-ever, I will not dwell further on this point, as it has been tacitly agreed, I think, that we shall waive that part of the question in the discussion, vessel. and that the complaint of a large number of fisherinshore fisheries have been depleted by the use of purse-seines, shall be admitted for the sake of argument. Let me, therefore, come to the provisions under which the Minister undertakes to minimize the so-called evil effects of the use of Queen's (Mr. Davies) that the penalty is altogether purse-seines. The point raised by the hon, mem- too severe. Here we have fishermen engaged in a ber for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is one that certainly should be regarded with much interest by We are gradually becoming hon, members. accustomed to the idea of placing a vast amount of power in regard to rescinding fines and penalties in the hands of Ministers of the Crown. If any argument can be made out in favour of the adopting even this power has been carried too far, and the time has come when the question should be: placed in review and new legislation enacted, and ments are to a certain degree unconstitutional. Is by the arbitrary rulings of the Customs officials, and coffence that can be committed under this Act? Is even by the Minister of Customs himself, can have those rulings revised by some able and independent court. But leaving the Customs Department, where an argument can be made in favour of this: principle if it can be made in favour of any of the departments, I believe that the principle laid down by the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) should be accorded a very generous hearing in this House. Have we not gone too far in placing arbitrary power in the hands of officials, in making fines and forfeitures dependent on evidence which to them may appear to be sufficient, the only appeal from their decision being to the Minister, who is liable to be biassed in many ways? I know that many persons having complaints to present to Ministers are very timid of doing so and of expressing their political views while their petitions are pending. It should not be the case that parties having cases pending should be timid about expressing their views and even about going to the polls to vote. Such cases have, however, occurred in the country, and possibly the positions of the parties may be fanciful, but at the same time it places them in an embarrassing position. Now, although that is not a new principle in regard to the forfeitures placed in this Bill, yet in consequence of the large amounts that must be at stake by reason of the expense and cost of these purse-seines, I rather than increased. think the Minister ought to be prepared in Committee to make such amendments in this Act as would be more in accordance with the circumstances of the case. The hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) stated that this proposition is monstrous, and I agree that he is right in large degree; but in addition to it being instrous it is also illogical. Where the penalty is invariably the confiscation of the vessel, the boat and apparatus used in connection with the prohibited fishing, why add a paltry penalty or any other sum whatever? We have a penalty of from $50 to $500 in addition to the forfeiture of the vessel and her tackle and apparatus. I think that the forfeiture of the ship itself would be quite sufficient, without adding any penalty of from $50 to $500; or, if there is to be a forfeiture, I think the forfeiture of the seine itself ought to be Mr. FLINT.

A purse-seine costs from $3,000 to $5,000, some of them more than that, and I should think men in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, that the that the forfeiture of the illegalarticle ought to be ample, and the Minister, under the law as it would stand if this provision were made, would have an opportunity to make certain remissions. I quite agree with the position taken by the hon, member for perfectly legitimate business as long as they are outside the three-mile limit, a business which this Legislature cannot prohibit under the present constitution of the country without Imperial legislation: and yet, in consequence of an accident, or even in consequence of carelessness which might be almost accounted wilful, if they come within that of this principle it is in the case of the Customs line they find themselves confronted with absolute Department. Yet, we are aware that there is a ruin. There are provisions in the constitution of widespread feeling among thinking men that the United States, and I believe it is one of the principles of our constitution—at any rate, it is an understood principle-that too severe punishwhen persons who believe themselves to be aggrieved; this not an excessive punishment for any possible it not too severe a punishment that the whole property engaged, the vessel, the boats and the apparatus seized in this fishing, should be forfeited to the Crown? It is claimed that under this Act there is power left in the hands of the Minister to remit these penalties. It is upon this ground that I agree entirely with the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and I think the time is arriving when a determined stand must be taken against the further introduction of this principle of leaving discretionary power in the hands of a Minister. All these matters should be left entirely to competent courts to decide, leaving, of course, some power in the Crown to pardon, in eases where the offence may be of a quasi criminal nature. I think that the whole of our legislation on the fisheries ought be reviewed. and all of these cases, except very petty cases, should be taken before the courts, should be tried in the courts, and should be dealt with by judges of competent jurisdiction, who are removed from political bias and public clamour. I would not go as far as my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), in stating that the present Minister had a deliberate design of adding to his own power; but, at the same time, the tendency of this sort of legislation is to concentrate undue power in political officers, and that power, I think, should be limited I hope, as a result of the deliberation before this Committee, that some amendment will be made to this clause whereby the penalties may not be so extreme against offenders. I would suggest, as an alternative, that the purse-seine itself should be liable to forfeiture and not the vessel, or, if that is not accepted by the Committee, I would support the proposition of the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), that the money penalty be increased from $50 to $1,000 or to $1,500, and that the forfeiture of the vessel be not included.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I feel so strongly upon this point that I cannot allow the clause to pass without a few more remarks. The hon. Minister knows that in all the Bills he has introduced from, his department into this House I have attempted to bring to bear upon them fair, just and legitimate criticism, and I have never offered any obstacle ample in all cases, and not the forfeiture of the to legislation having for its object the benefiting of our fisheries. I think the hon. Minister, and I shall man has asked me to give my opinion I will give it say it frankly, was extremely unfortunate in the to him. The hon. Minister challenged the assercriticism he passed to night on my hon. friend from tion made by myself with regard to the mackerel Bothwell (Mr. Mills). There is no gentleman upon fishery. I referred to the mackerel fishery of last this side of the House, or in this Parliament, who year, and, rightly or wrongly, I said that the catch brings to a discussion on constitutional questions was better than the year before. The Minister a more ripe and varied knowledge than does my controverted that position, and he rose in his place, hon. friend (Mr. Mills).

Mr. TUPPER. Do you think he was fair in his criticism of me to-night?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think it very rarely happens in this House that the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), in giving expression to his mature judgment, has ever offended any of the experienced members on the other side, strongly and effectively as he generally puts his arguments. venture to say that my hon. friend the Minister, to-night, was not justified when he indulged in very violent and uncalled-for language in reference to my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). My hon. friend to my left (Mr. Mills) presented his point effectively and with force, as he always does, and his points should be answered by argument and not by personal abuse. I venture to say that when the hon. Minister reads the Hausard he himself will regret that, as a young member of this House, he used the uncalled for assertions he did towards the experienced gentleman who spoke on a constitutional point of the very highest importance, and who spoke with a matured knowledge of the subject, as he generally does. I think I am voicing the opinion of the whole House when I say that there is hardly a gentleman in this House, called upon to address it as often as he does, who addresses the House as forcibly and at the same time avoids the use of improper language, as does my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). He very rarely gets into personal wrangles: his remarks are generally good humoured, and I regret on this occasion that they were not received in the spirit that I think an hon, gentleman of the: age and experience in Parliament of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had a right to receive them. A young Minister in this House should accept argument and criticism with courtesy, especially when they come from a gentleman holding the position that the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) does, and the hon. Minister was not justified in retorting in the bitter, sharp and uncalled-for manuer that he did.

Mr. TUPPER. Before the hon. gentleman leaves the personal question, would be give us a little the Bill. evidence on the fairness to me, or his opinion on condition that it does not apply to the kind of the conduct of the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), purse-seines used in his county. The hon. gen-since he thought it necessary to give his opinion theman dare not support the Bill. I tell the hon. since he thought it necessary to give his opinion; on my conduct. As the hon, gentleman is dealing particularly with this subject, I call his attention to that portion of the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), where he charged me, and said that it was a terrible thing for a Minister of the Crown to mislead the House by not being candid with it in quoting statistics.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

He now says "hear, hear." Mr. TUPPER. What does the hon, gentleman think about a charge of that kind?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has asked me to give my opinion. I was willing to part but a single fishery officer, or a justice of the peace, from the personal matter, but as the hon. gentle- or a stipendiary magistrate, has the power, on the

and in order to show that the mackerel fishing was improving year after year he commenced reading the statistics for 1885, and read to 1887, but he did not read them for 1889 or 1890.

Mr. TUPPER. Would the hon, gentleman tell us whether he asked the statistics for the year before or for the decade?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I was referring to the decade.

Mr. TUPPER. And I gave it from 1885.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.L.) Now, the hon. gentleman gave the quotations for 1885, 1886, 1887 and 1888, but he did not give them for 1889 and 1890, because when they were read it showed it was against his argument, and my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) contended that that was disingenuous, I beg leave to say that I shared in that opinion.

Mr. TUPPER. I gave my opinion on the man that made that statement, and I will give it again.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is the personal point: we will pass from it, because it is not worth while wasting time upon that. I want to come to the main point. The hon, gentleman justifies the imposition of this extreme penalty because extreme penalties exist in the Customs Act. Well, we have chosen to adopt an anomalous fiscal system, and as a necessary auxiliary of that system you adopt extreme and drastic measures to enable you to carry it out. You vest supreme and irresponsible power in the Minister of Customs. The hon. gentleman who exercises that power may or may not exercise it arbitrarily or improperly. my hon, friend questioned was the principle of vesting that power in a Minister, and I say that his position cannot be attacked. There is no politics in this matter. The hon, gentleman finds on this side of the House one or two hon, members supporting his Bill, and he finds on his own side hon, members who cannot support it. the hon, member for Shelburne (Mr. White) say, in whose county there is one of the largest fishing establishments in Nova Scotia? He cannot support He says: He will only support it on tleman dare not support the Bill. Minister that if he applies the Bill to the kind of small purse-seines that are used along the coast of Nova Scotia he will find an explosion on the part of the fishermen such as would be raised if he attempted to interfere with hook and line fishing. All this goes to show that if you carry the Bill you must carry it with such moderate penalties attached as it will be practicable to enforce. I venture to say that never in the history of our legislation has power so extraordinary been vested in single officers as you propose to vest in them by this Bill. Who is to exercise this power? A judge of the Supreme Court or of the Admiralty Court? No; such judgment as the Minister may give.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon, gentleman is mistaken as to the appeal. The prosecution is not under the Fisheries Act, but under the Act relating to summary convictions.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Act says:

Persons aggrieved by any such conviction may appeal by petition to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who may remit penalties and restore forfeitures under this Act."

It has been held that in the face of that provision you cannot appeal to the ordinary courts in the

Mr. TUPPER. If you come to the Minister of: Marine and exhaust that appeal you cannot go back and appeal to the courts, but that does not prevent you appealing to them in the first place.

Mr. FRASER. The very opposite has been held. in Nova Scotia, that the appeal to the Minister does not prevent an appeal to the highest court.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.L.) That may be the case in Nova Scotia, but that is not the case in Prince Edward Island. Look at the Act:

"Every penalty or forfeiture imposed by this Act, or regulations made under it, may be recovered or enforced on parol complaint, before any fishery officer, stipendiary magistrate or justice of the peace, in a summary manner, on the oath of one credible witness."

Now. I appeal to the Minister himself. not get into a passion about this. It is not a party measure, but it is more important than many hon. gentlemen suppose. It places property to the value of $10,000 or $20,000, or it may be $100,000 in a number of fishing vessels, within the judgment of a magistrate or a single justice of the peace on the oath of one credible witness. Can you parallel that legislation in the history of legislation in the Dominion of Canada? I say you cannot. It is unjust and unfair. If you pass this law, you pass it as a tentative measure. You admit yourself that you have not sufficient facts to come to a conclusion for all Then, I say, attach to it such reasonable penalties as you have a chance to impose. I lay this down as a general proposition: excessive penalties defeat their own object; the tribunal will not convict if the penalties are excessive. A single justice of the peace, a man not versed in law, not having that training to enable him to form a proper judgment, is not the man to pass judgment in a matter of this kind. I would invite the hon, gentleman to limit his penalty to a pecuniary one, and then provide that the cases may be tried in the Courts of Admiralty, where counsel can appear, and where the parties will get justice, and where an appeal will lie to the higher judicial tribunals constituted by this Parliament.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman, instead of warning me not to get excited, forgets several He says he is a supporter of the principle of the Bill, though not on conviction; but he is to my mind placing the greatest obstacles in the way

But I wish to point out how far the hon, gentleman has gone to find arguments against this Bill. You are going to have very valuable ship properties, of the value of $10,000 or perhaps $100,000 - and he aggregates together a number of vessels to make up the amount—and you are vesting all this jurisdiction in a single fishery officer or a single magistrate. Why did the hon, gentleman forget that during all these years the fishing nets and the fishing boats of all the fishermen along our coasts, which are just as important and valuable, proportionately, to their owners, as the property of the rich man is to him. have been subject to the same jurisdiction? Why do you throw great protection and safeguards around the property of the rich men who are investing their money in these dangerous fishing engines-which are admitted to be deadly, and destructive of hook-and-line fishing along our coasts -and think it right to leave the property of the poor fishermen at the mercy of these officers? You raise no protest.

> Simply because, by Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) unanimous consent, we have, in all our legislation, determined that trivial matters, amounting to trivial sums, may be safely left to one or two justices of the peace, while enormous amounts may not be left to their adjudication.

Mr. TUPPER. I am perfectly aware of the He need argument the hon, gentleman would make, but I say it is not a trifle. The interests of the fishermen are just as important as the interests of the capitalists who invest their thousands of dollars in this business. I do not quarrel with the principle that induced Parliament to put authority in the hands of the fishery officers, but I say that the checks on these officers are ample, and, if they are not, then I say that the interests of the poor fishermen are as much involved and at stake as those of the rich men.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What are those checks?

Mr. TUPPER. The reason was not given by the hon, gentleman for magisterial powers in connection with the administration of the Fishery

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It was not because the offences were trivial, but because the penalties were trivial.

Mr. TUPPER. The penalties are not trivial-The penalties in the Fishery Act involve, besides a fine, the confiscation of the apparatus used—the instruments and materials, whatever they are, belonging to the fishermen. They are in no sense They may be his whole property for the trivial. season; and you granted these great powers to the officers from the very necessity of the case, and you threw around the citizen such safeguards that there never has been a serious complaint in this Parliament that the rights of the citizens have been unduly interfered with by the overseers. safeguards are, that the officers act in consultation of carrying out this legislation. If the Bill is to with the department, and, when they act without become the flimsy sort of thing-and I use that it, their acts are subject to review by the departterm without a desire to offend the supersensitive ment or by the Minister for the time being, who-of the case before him, without expense to the citizen. That is quite satisfactory; but, if that channel and that course of procedure is not acceptable to the citizen, then he has his rights before the courts. The decision of the fishery overseer is, in no sense, final, and the civizen may take one of the two courses. He may go direct to the Minister, or may take the appeal given to every other subject.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Where does the appeal lie from the fishery officer to the Supreme Court?

Mr. TUPPER. Under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act-

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) From the magistrate, but not from the fishery officer.

Mr. TUPPER.—the officer sits in the same capacity exactly as a justice of the peace and a magistrate. The hon gentleman will surely not insist on his pretension, and he must for the moment have forgotten that such is the law, but I am certain that, on reflection, he will admit that I am right. The power of the fishery overseer is not final and not complete. For instance, take the powers exercised now: they are exceedingly great, but the House is aware that for years we have clothed these officers with these great powers, and the result has not been such as to evoke any expression of a desire for a repeal or a change of the law in that regard. There is no reason for treating this subject, I submit, inany other way than any other fishery legislation. The law is right or wrong. If the destruction be as great as I believe, and the supporters of this Bill believe, and the fishermen believe it is, you cannot make the penalty too severe, and the rights of the citizen are protected in this case, just as they are in any other case of the violation of the Act, the only difference being that the offenders in this case will be rich men, whereas the offenders in the other cases are, as a rule, poor men.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am not going to occupy the time of the House in answering the very violent speech which the hon, member made a very short time ago. He accused me of being very ignorant, and very ignorant simply because he did not agree with me. In fact, the hon. gentleman would assign every one to the block of the dunce rather than the position of critic, who undertakes to criticize either the hon. gentleman's observations or any measure he presents, so that the hon. gentleman's pretense of extraordinary knowledge on this subject or any other he may discuss may not be disputed. I am not going to question those pretensions on the present occasion, although I am not to be supposed as acquiescing at all in them if I do not choose to take up the attention of the Committee with a discussion of his pretensions at present. The hon. Minister says that the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) wants to make this a very flimsy Bill, such a Bill as he would not have submitted to this House or as he would not support; and what reason does he assign for assuming that my hon. friend would make this a very flimsy Bill? Why, the hon. member for Queen's says that the procedure for the enforcement of the law eaght to be under the supervision of the courts, and the hon. Minister says the courts are not to be trusted, that the judges are ignorant, and that therefore the whole matter should confiscation of the real estate of the people of this

AND THE PROPERTY OF THE PROPER ever he may be, upon the presentation of the facts be under the control of the Minister of Marine. Now, I submit to the consideration of this Committee once more that there is no reason for departing from the ordinary methods of administering justice in this any more than in any Why should the ordinary judicial other case. tribunals of the country be discarded and disregarded when we come to propose a law of this sort? Sir. I remember that one of the provisions of Magna Charta is that the judgment shall be according to the law of the land. It was then complained that the king undertook to enforce the law rather than his judges, that he undertook to administer it, and it was determined that that should be the case no longer. Another provision of Magna Charta is that excessive fines and penalties shall not be permitted. That is a constitutional principle. It is a part of the law of the land, and it has stood for several hundred years. What does the hon, gentleman propose in this Bill? He proposes that, in every case, whether the offence be a serious one or not, the punishment shall be, along with whatever fine may be imposed, the confiscation of the ship and all its outht. Now, the ship may be worth $10,000 and the offence may be of the most trivial character. The magistrate or the party who sits in the first instance may decide that he will fix a minimum penalty of $50; but if he fixes any penalty at all it must be accompanied with the confiscation of the ship. Every member of this House must see that you are making a law, in the first instance, which, on the face of it, is an unjust, arbitrary measure, a measure that must entail injustice, and which, in every case, will necessitate an appeal from the fishery officer, who gives the decision in the first instance, to the Minister, who has the power of granting redress. My first objection to this is that it undertakes to make those who have property in fishing vessels, and those who are engaged in fishing, the menials of the Minister for the time being. The hon, gentleman says that I spoke warmly upon the subject. I did speak warmly, for I cannot contemplate the measure of the hon, gentleman without a feeling of indignation that any member of this House, whether he be a member of the Government or not, should propose to place a large class of the population of this country in such a position. The hon, gentleman, by fixing a penalty of $50, admits that the offence may be a triffing one, and yet, along with that admission on the part of the Parliament of Canada, he wishes also to impose the penalty of the confiscation of the ship and its tackle, which could not be justified unless it was an offence of the most flagrant character. What would you think if you proposed to attach the penalty of death to an act of simple trespass? Would it not be regarded as a monstrous outrage, as an attempt on the part of the Minister of Justice to bring every offender before him and make him dependent upon him as to the character of the penalty to be inflicted? What are you to say of an offence against this law to which, because it is trifling, you attach a penalty of $50, but along with that there may be the confiscation of the vessel, that may be worth $20,000—and that is what the hon. gentleman asks the House to vote. That is what he calls a vigourous and a drastic measure. No doubt it is a drastic measure. If the Government proposed the country for an offence against the Customs Act, that would be a drastic measure; but my hon. friend who is in charge of the Customs Department would not be so far forgetful of the position of those who sent him, as well as the rest of us here, as to propose any such measure. The hon, gentleman says now: I am Minister of Marine and Fisheries; trust me: what may be done elsewhere does not matter; it will be made right as a matter of grace by me; you cannot trust the courts of the country, because they are ignorant men, who do not know anything about this, but you can trust me. Our judges try cases of a complicated character of which they have no previous knowledge. A judge tries a case of malpractice, and yet he is not supposed to be an anatomist or a surgeon, but he proceeds upon evidence, and I submit that, notwithstanding the pretensions of the hon, gentleman to great ability and superior knowledge, notwithstanding his pretensions to infallibility, the people of this country have more confidence in the courts than they have in the hon, gentleman. They know that the courts have not the same motive for distinguishing between a Conservative and a Reformer, whether he be the complainant or the party complained against, as would have the hon. gentleman or anyone who might succeed him in office. I submit that there is no justification whatever for a departure from the ordinary rules of the administration of justice, so as to take this matter out of the hands of the courts and put it in the hands of the Minister, when in all other matters you leave it in the hands of the courts. Why should you not leave it in the hands of the courts? The Minister of Customs has great powers-some which I think he ought not to have, as I pointed out when the Act was under discussion—but he cannot disregard the law altogether. The parties may go The advice and opinions of before the courts. the hon. gentleman as to the construction of You have in the the law may be overruled. Aver's case one instance where the Supreme Court differed with the Minister of Customs; but the Minister of Marine now undertakes to guard himself against any such misfortune, for he provides by this measure that he shall be the ultimate court of appeal and that what he says shall be law. not done in England or under the common law. There, if a man is a complainant, and therefore entitled to a moiety of the penalty, the Crown may remit the penalty as far as the Crown is concerned, but not so as to take away the right of the com-plainant. That is not the position of the hon gen-tleman. A party may complain, and, if the hon. gentleman chooses to remit the penalties, the right of the complainant is gone altogether. The hon. gentleman tells us that this is consistent with our constitutional system, which, as British citizens, we are supposed to have imbibed, and as British freemen we are supposed to have some rights under, and yet he proposes to place the property of the people of Canada under the absolute control of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. FRASER. I think the discussion has taken a wider range than the Bill warrants. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says that our legal rights are taken away by this Bill. That is not so. Our legal rights are not taken away, as the hon. gentleman can see, in the case of the Queen vs. Todd, where the Supreme Court in Nova Scotia Mr. Mills (Bothwell).

Minister of Marine might, perhaps, sin in the direction of helping a political friend at the expense of a political opponent as much as I would myself, perhaps; I know there is a danger, and while I want the law so applied as to remove that danger, I am willing in the meantime—because this is an act in the interest of the many, and with the full decided that any person could appeal from the decision of any magistrates to the Supreme Courts.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But there is no right given to the Appeal Court to alter or minimise the judgment.

Mr. FRASER. Neither should there be. The court will hear the whole evidence and decide upon it. This is not like a certiorari.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But the penalty is fixed by the statute.

Mr. FRASER. And so it should be; and if the Supreme Court finds that it has been rightly inflicted, the penalty will stand.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why does the hon. gentleman give the Minister power to do what he refuses to allow the courts to do?

Mr. FRASER. The appeal to the Minister is only a matter of clemency. Suppose the case went to the Supreme Court, and the court decided that judgment was right and the vessel should be confiscated. The Minister will not enquire into the case as to whether the judgment was right or not, but he will find whether there were some mitigating circumstances which could not be brought before the court. Now, I agree with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that we should have as few cases as possible come before the Minister or any Minister-I agree with that principle. hon, member speaks as if there would be a large number; I would have him understand that a very small number of people would be affected by this law who are engaged in fishing, because, as I said before, the greatest part of the seine fishing is done outside the three-mile limit, and consequently that will not be affected. For myself, while I think I am as radical as most men, I do not see this is a violation of that principle, just because I feel and know that this is not only a nuisance, but the worst kind of a combination, and just because would oppose any combination upon land, so oppose this combination by sea, which is against men who cannot protect themselves, and I would strike at it in the strongest possible Now, I do not see that all these manner. troubles will arise, because any man who has a seine will know, when this Act is passed, what penalties are attached to it. This Act is passed in the interests of the fishermen, not in the interest of the man who is rich enough to get a seine and take a big haul; but if, after he knowingly commits an act which the justice of the peace, or the Supreme Court on appeal, considers to be a violation of the law, for one, I have not very much pity for him, and I do not think we are interfering very much with that kind of liberty that is going to build up this country when that man is fined. Now, no man respects the opinions of the hon. member for Bothwell more than I do, and no man learns more from it than I do; but I cannot see that there is any such violation of justice in this principle as he sees, nor do I look forward to all the trouble that I am ready also to admit that the he anticipates. Minister of Marine might, perhaps, sin in the direction of helping a political friend at the expense of a political opponent as much as I would myself, perhaps; I know there is a danger, and while I want the law so applied as to remove that danger, I am willing in the meantime—because this is an knowledge that the hon gentleman is not going to be long in his present position, and that we will soon have a better man there—I am perfectly satisfied to support the Bill.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon, gentleman must not be under the impression that there are two modes of appeal. He has heard that stated already to-night, and the Minister himself thought you could take your appeal to the Supreme Court, but if you do you have not got your appeal to the Minister.

Mr. TUPPER. I said that if he takes the appeal to me, in my opinion he would lose his appeal to the court, but that is not saying that if he appealed to the court he could not appeal to the Minister.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You stated the appeal to the Minister must lie from the magistrate.

Mr. FRASER. The Minister cannot exercise that power.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is the point for which we have been contending, that a man ought not to be sued before a single magistrate, an ignorant magistrate in the country, and have his vessel confiscated, and have to pay a penalty of $500 on the oath of one witness. I say there is no parallel to such legislation in the history of Canada or anywhere else.

Mr. TUPPER. The clause says "persons aggrieved by any such conviction may appeal by petition to the Minister of Marine who may remit the penalties and restore the forfeitures under this Act." The hon. gentleman will not say that an appeal will not lie after conviction by the highest court.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes; I do. That is a statutory law which must be construed according to its language, and the law says an appeal lies from such conviction, and the previous conviction to which it refers is not a conviction obtained on appeal, but before a stipendiary magistrate or a justice of the peace. But if the hon. gentleman and I differ on a point of law, it is not a bit of use discussing it. Now, I am not discussing whether the Bill is right or necessary. with the assumption that I believe in the Bill, and I think the Bill should be passed. The point we are discussing is, whether you have attached improper penalties to the Bill, and improper machinery and improper officers for the collection of the penalties-that is the whole point. I am willing the Bill should be passed, and I am willing that penalties ranging from $50 up to a $1,000, if the Minister thinks necessary, should be attached; but I say that if you put a penalty up to $1,000 you should take the case before a tribunal competent to decide upon amounts of that magnitude. that if in addition to the $1,000 you confiscate a vessel worth $10,000, including the tackle and the appurtenances, it is a monstrous piece of iniquity and injustice to let it be done before a single magistrate on the oath of a single witness. afraid that some of my friends are allowing the fact that the body of the fishermen are in favour of some measure being passed, to carry away their good judgment and lead them to consent to legislation which will be a curse to this country if it is ever attempted to be carried out.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) And a disgrace to the nation.

On section 2,

Mr. TUPPER. I wish to insert the words "pecuniary penalty" so as to make it read "the moiety of every pecuniary penalty."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I want to ask the hon. gentleman to let this matter rest on this new proposition. It involves a very important matter. The intention of the hon. gentleman was, I take it, that the penalties prescribed by the old Fishery Act, which are very small in their character, and relate to the catching of trout, salmon and little things like that—his intention is to make it more effective by allowing the informer to receive part of the penalty. Now, we are asked to pass a law the violation of which involves the confiscation of a vessel that may be worth $10,000, and it is proposed to give the informer one-half that. I am going to ask the hon, gentleman to consider this point. We know what has been the effect of vesting such power in Customs officers; there has been a clamour from one end of the land to the other against the exercise of that power. We know that some members of the Customs Department have been enable to fatten and get rich by virtue of that power, and I say this legislation vests in an informer the right, not only to prosecute, but to receive one-half the penalty, one-half the value of that vessel.

Mr. TUPPER. But I told the hon. gentleman that I wished to insert the word "pecuniary" before "penalty."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That minimises my argument very much. At the same time, I would still press upon him whether it is judicious to allow the informer to receive one-half the pecuniary penalty. I think it is very serious, even to that extent, and it is worthy of being argued.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon, gentleman has fought this keenly. There is not a man who has listened to the debate to-night, no matter what he may think of the arguments pro and con, who is not familiar with every point that has been raised as to that clause.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What about giving the informer half the penalty?

Mr. TUPPER. The hon, gentleman alluded to it. I gave an expression of my opinion, and there was a general expression of opinion given before purse-seines were talked of.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No.

Mr. TUPPER. Those members who were present and heard the discussion on a former occasion will remember the remarks made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), who held that the proposed change in the law will infuse fresh spirit into the officers who have the carrying out of the fishery laws, as to prevent the laws being a dead letter?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Let me say that the amendment made took a great part of myargument. We pay a very large amount of money for maintaining a fishery force to patrol our waters and prevent encroachments. These men are appointed to prevent the Americans from coming in, and to carry out our fishery laws. Why, then, do you propose to allow these officers to share in the penalties, when it is their duty to carry out the law, and they are paid for doing it.

Mr. TUPPER. I will explain the reason. Parliament will not grant a sufficient sum of money to enable the staff of fishery officers to be paid adequately, as are the officers of other departments. This would involve an enormous appropriation, which the country is not yet ready to make, and which no Government would ask. We therefore propose to offer this inducement, to render the officers more energetic in following up offenders against the law. In regard to purse-seines, my argument is very much stronger. I would not allow a measure to pass into law if I thought it would not prove effective. From my experience of the fishery regulations, I know that vessels scudding about our coasts will be difficult to follow and watch, and it is necessary that we should impose very heavy penalties, and offer large inducements to our fishery officers to prevent wrong being done.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have already called the attention of the Committee to the provisions of the common law with respect to the imposition of fines and penalties. The hon, gentleman proposes by this Bill to secure the confiscation of the vessel in every case, and he secures the administration of the law through other tribunals of the country. If a vessel was two miles and 759 yards from the coast she would be subjected to a fine of at least $50, and the confiscation of the vessel and all her outfit besides. There would, of necessity, be an appeal to the Minister in every instance.

Mr. GILLMOR. It strikes me as very singular that the Minister of Marine should be offering this measure for the protection of the great body of the fishermen, and declaring that they all desire the Bill, and yet he is obliged to offer bribes to the officials to carry out the law. It appears as if the fishermen themselves want to violate the law. All this goes to show that the fishermen do not wish this measure. I am, in fact, opposed to the system of offering to officials part of the fine imposed in each case. It is a wrong system, in the Customs as well as in the Fisheries Department. If this measure is in the interests of the fishermen generally they will not violate the law, and if it is argued that they will violate the law, that is evidence they do not want the measure, especially if they require an official to watch them.

Bill reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.45 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 31st July, 1891.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Mr. SPROULE moved:

That all the original correspondence between the Department of Public Works and the Finance Department with reference to the security for the construction of the Kingston graving dock, and also the accounts of S. & H. Borbridge, R. S. Montgomery, F. Thompson and E. Chanteloup, as set out in the report of the Auditor General on Appropri-Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

ation Accounts for the year 1887-8 on page F—2, and for the year 1888-9 on page F—67, and all letters, receipts, papers and vouchers in regard thereto, be produced forthwith for the use of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the report of the said Committee.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. GIBSON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the House to a paragraph in yesterday's Empire respecting my conduct as a member of this House with regard to the vote taken the day before yesterday. The paragraph is as follows:—

"Mr. Gibson, of Lincoln, refused to vote because of the manufacturing interests in his constituency, which would be ruined by the adoption of his party's policy."

This paragraph, Sir, is untrue. It is entirely contrary to the facts. On the contrary, I was elected on the trade question. I did my very best to get here, but was unavoidably detained, and had I been here it is needless to say I would have cordially and loyally supported the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright).

EXPERIMENTAL FARM.

Mr. McMILLAN. I would like to know when certain information, which I asked for, with respect to the horses stationed at the Experimental Farm, will be brought down.

Mr. HAGGART. I think it is down. My impression is that the papers were hunded me and that I laid them on the Table, but if not I will bring the papers down.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon, gentleman will send and enquire in the clerk's office he will ascertain whether they are down or not, because no notice is given in these cases.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS EMPLOYES.

Mr. McMULLEN. There was an Order of the House made for a return giving all the names of the different employés in the Department of Public Works. The Order was made a month ago. Is there a prospect of that return being brought down?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will enquire about it. I suppose they are preparing it.

WELLAND CANAL.

Mr. GERMAN. I must again remind the acting Minister of Railways and Canals of an Order of this House for a return of the extra men employed on the Welland Canal during the election.

Mr. BOWELL. I am afraid that the hon gentleman was not in his place, or he would have known that return was laid on the Table some days ago.

DISMISSAL OF J. R. GRAHAM.

Mr. BARRON. I would ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries when we may expect the return relating to the dismissal of Mr. J. R. Graham, fishery inspector in the County of Victoria? At the time, the Minister gave me to understand he was not dismissed, but the Government organ in the county said he was, and it was on that statement I moved for the return. I would like to have the return to see whether I was right or not.

Mr. TUPPER. I did not know that was the object of the hon, gentleman, or I would have brought down the papers long ago. I am under the impression that I explained to the hon, gentleman that I could bring down some of the papers, but supposed he would prefer to have them altogether, and as there was an investigation proceeding, I would wait until I could bring all the papers down. If the hon, gentleman desires, however, that the papers be brought down as they are, I will bring them down at once, but if he prefers to have the whole, together with the report, that will take a few days longer.

Mr. BARRON. If I am acquainted with the facts, and I think I am, there was no investigation at all; and since the matter has been referred to. it is quite true, if I am informed correctly, that the fishery inspector did send in his resignation.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon, gentleman is entering on a discussion. I am perfectly prepared to discuss the matter, but that is out of order now.

Mr. SPEAKER. There can be no discussion

Mr. BARRON. Will the Minister kindly give me all the papers down to the present?

Mr. TUPPER. Certainly, if they are ready.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. FOSTER moved further consideration of the resolutions reported from the Committee of Ways and Means on the 23rd June.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought it was stated last night-I do not know whether the Minister of Finance was here at the time or notthat the Government were going on with certain Bills, and would take this up later.

Mr. FOSTER. I was not here.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I said we might take up some of these Bills, but that this would be the principal business to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest that it would be better to take these item by item.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes, that would be better.

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Act, Chapter 33, Revised Statutes, intituled: "An Act respecting the Duties of Customs," by repealing the items numbered 9, 10, 400, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423 and 431, in Schedule "A" to the said Act: and to amend the Act 50-51 Victoria, Chapter 39, intituled: "An Act to amend the Act respecting the Duties of Customs," by repealing the items numbered 126, 127 and 128, under section 1 of the said Act: and to amend the Act. 57 Victoria, Chapter 20, intituled: "An Act to amend the Acts respecting the Duties of Customs," by repealing the items numbered 148, 156, 157, 158, 159, 165 and 166, under section 10 of the said Act,—and to toms," by repealing the items numbered 148, 156, 157, 158, 159, 165 and 166, under section 10 of the said Act,—and to provide otherwise by enacting that the following rates of duty be substituted in lieu thereof:—

1. All molasses and (or syrups N.O.P., including all tank bottoms and) or tank washings, all cane juice and (or concentrated cane juice, and all beet-root juice and) or concentrated beet-root juice, when imported direct, without transchipment from the country of growth and produc-

tion:
(a) Testing by polariscope, forty degrees or over and not over fifty-six degrees, a specific duty of one and one-half cents per gallon.
(b) When testing less than forty degrees, a specific duty of one and one-half cents per gallon and in addition thereto, one-fourth of one cent per gallon for each degree or fraction of a degree less than forty degrees.

(e) And in addition to the foregoing rates, a further specific duty in all cases of two and one-half cents pergallon when not so imported direct without transshipment.

Item agreed to on division.

2. All cane sugar or beet-root sugar not above number fourteen Dutch standard in colour, all sugar sweepings, all sugar drainings or pumpings drained in transit, all melado and or concentrated melado, all molasses and or concentrated molasses. N.E.S., all cane juice and or concentrated cane juice. N.E.S., all beet-root juice and or concentrated beet-root juice, N.E.S., all tank bottoms N.E.S., and concrete, when not imported direct without transshipment from the country of growth and production, five per cent. ad valorem: provided, however, that in the case of cane sugar produced in the East Indies and imported therefrom viā Hong Kong, such rate of five per cent. ad valorem shall not be exacted if transhipped at Hong Kong. Hong Kong.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to add after the word "Hong Kong," the words "or Yokohama." The same principle applies to each.

Mr. LAURIER. What principle is that, please?

Mr. FOSTER. That the importation of sugar from the East Indies vid Hong Kong or Yokohama by the Canadian Pacific Railway steamers and railway shall be considered a direct shipment. There is a considerable trade growing up in the East Indies viâ that route. If we allowed that to come under the general provision of this clause, it would be a discrimination against this sugar if it were transshipped. I also wish to add after the words "East Indies" the words "and countries to the east thereof."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. that cover? Does that cover all the Java sugars?

Mr. FOSTER. And the Philippine Islands.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Australian sugars?

Mr. FOSTER. I think there would be a double transshipment there. The purpose here was to provide for the East Indian sugars and those of the Philippine Islands. There are direct lines of communication between those places and Hong Kong and Yokohama.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It struck me that Queensland sugars might very properly come in under the same provision.

Mr. FOSTER. This is all the prospect we have at present of trade coming in that way. If afterwards it should be found that this should extend to Queensland or the other Australian colonies, an addition could be made to the provision.

Item, as amended, agreed to on division.

3. All sugars above number fourteen Dutch standard in colour, and refined sugar of all kinds, grades or standards, and all sugar syrups derived from refined sugars, a specific duty of eight-tenths of a cent per pound.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is the intention apparently that refined sugar of all kinds, no matter what the number is, shall be subject to this duty.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the intention in regard to all sugars above No. 14 Dutch standard.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I want to have that point clearly understood. In the American tariff, if I am correct, and I think I am, all sugars above No. 16 Dutch standard and colour, pay half a cent a pound.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). All under No. 16 come in free. But as I understand this resolution, that will not be the case with sugars under No. 14 with us. A refined sugar, if it is even under No. 14, will have to pay the duty of $\frac{8}{10}$ of a cent a pound.

101

Mr. FOSTER. This exactly follows the old tariff; it simply makes a difference as to the free and refined on the Dutch standard No. 14, for all sugars.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Minister does not quite catch my point yet. Raw sugar under No. 14, by this clause, comes in free, but not all sugars under 14: if it is a refined sugar and under No. 14, it has to pay $\frac{1}{10}$ of a cent a pound. That differs from the American tariff, which lets all raw, and all refined sugar under 16, come in free,

Mr. FOSTER. Under this all refined sugar would pay $\frac{8}{10}$ of a cent.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No matter how low the colour?

Mr. FOSTER. No matter how low the colour.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance why the duty upon refined sugar is placed at $\frac{s}{r_0}$ of a cent a pound? I suppose the object of the framers of the McKinley tariff was to afford ample protection to the sugar refining interest of that country, and one-half a cent a pound was the degree of protection which it was supposed the refining interest would require, and that would give them the absolute monopoly of their own market. The refiner attempting to import sugar must be at a disadvantage of half a cent a pound. Now, it strikes me that that amount of duty ought to have been sufficient in Canada, but in place of contenting ourselves with $\frac{5}{10}$ of a cent a pound, we put on a protection of $\frac{8}{10}$ of a cent. It strikes me the duty is too high, that the profit which the refining interest is able to make under the operation of the tariff, is an exorbitant one. The half a cent itself is a very high duty under the circumstances, where the Government professes to give free sugar to the consumers.

Mr. FOSTER. We discussed that point pretty fully in the course of the debate on this resolution, and the amendment which followed. However, I may state that there is a very considerable difference between our country and the United States of America, as regards the habits of the people; consequently the position in the different classes of sugar is not the same. My hon. friend will find, if he enquires into the subject, as I have no doubt he has done, that in the United States the people use a very much better grade of sugar, that is, they use a larger proportion of the higher grades, the granulated, and consequently it was with reference to that largely that the higher, No. 16, was taken. own country the larger consumption pays duty on the yellow sugars, and if we had raised in this country the standard to No. 16, it would practically have allowed in, say three-fifths at least of the whole consumption of refined sugar.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That would be a very great benefit to the consumer, and no injury in the slightest degree to the public.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon friend might with equal fairness say that it would be a still greater benefit to the consumer if we took off the duty entirely.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And so it would.

Mr. Paterson (Brant).

Mr. FOSTER We have a double object in our tariff which has been, while giving a very large reduction to the people upon the item of sugar, to keep the protective principle with regard to the refining of raw sugar in our own country.

Mr. McMULLEN. I hold in my hand a sample of Jamaica sugar cleaned, which will no doubt rate 16 Dutch standard. Now, I contend that it is an injustice to the consumers of sugar in this country to exclude an article of that standard, and compel those who would use that class of sugar either to buy a worse and inferior kind, or else buy refined. The hon. Minister has already informed the House that he went to Jamaica for the purpose of trying to secure an interchange of trade between that Island and this Dominion. The man who brought this sample of sugar to Canada came from Jamaica with the view of establishing a trade in this country in that very commodity, and securing in return commodities, the products of this country, that would be used in Jamaica. When he camehere he was surprised to find out that the tariff recently issued and sanctioned under the resolution brought in by the Minister of Finance, shut out from Canada the very commodity that he supposed was entitled to come in and be placed upon the markets of Canada. The tariff has raised the standard to about $\frac{8}{10}$ of a cent a pound. Now, I say that if the Minister of Finance is sincere, if the Government are sincere in their efforts to extend trade relations with that island, and in accordance, no doubt, with the statements he made and the inducements he held out when he was there, he ought to have amended his resolution so as to admit that grade of sugar. I can understand the reasons why he declined to do that. It is not because this country is going to lose seriously in revenue, but it is simply because it is going to take away from the refiners the advantage they have under the tariff of refining a very large additional amount of sugar other than what they would refine had he admitted No. 16 Dutch standard. I would like to ask the Finance Minister who, under that arrangement, would reap the benefit? World not the consumers of this country reap the benefit, and at the same time his treasury would not suffer one farthing in revenue? I say it is an outrage to exclude from this country that class of sugar, when the Finance Minister boldly announced to the people of that country: Come to Canada and we will open trade relations with you; we will give you the advantages of sending us certain commodities, and we will ask you, in return, to take certain things from us. They come along with the article of sugar, a standard product, a cheap product of their Island, and they ask that they should be permitted to send that sugar here free, and they are met in the face with $\frac{8}{10}$ of a cent duty upon it, if they send it to Canada, while it is admitted into the United States free. They have nothing to do but cross to the United States and they find that the tariff of that country will admit that article into the United States market, while our own tariff will not admit it here. Now, the Finance Minister says the reason why he is driven to take this course is because he finds the people of Canada, if he admits a commodity of that kind into this country, will use a very large percentage of it, and consequently, as a result of that consumption, the raw sugar would not be imported in anything like the amount it would be if you excluded that sugar. Then I say he is striking at Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is the hon the liberties and the rights of the consumers of man sure that the interpretation is right? this country, and he is imposing upon the consumers the use of the refined sugars, in order to bring into the coffers of the refiners an annual revenue sufficient to satisfy their greed. That is virtually what it is—it is sufficient to satisfy their greed that he does this, and not in the interest of the consumers of this country.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Minister of Finance—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon, gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. CHARLTON. I understood we were to have the privilege of discussing these resolutions as if we were in Committee.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes: that was the arrangement.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Finance Minister failed to answer the enquiry I put to him as to the reason for making the duty is of a cent a pound. duty, as I pointed out, in the United States is half a cent, which is considered ample there for the protection of the refiners. I imagine a duty of $\frac{2}{10}$ of a cent a pound would protect the refiner if he could import the raw product from abroad free from duty. I asked why the Government saw fit to impose a protective duty of 10 of a cent for the benefit of the Canadian refiner, when the United States find a duty of 🧦 of a cent a pound ample to give protection to American refiners. We give a protection of over 50 per cent. greater than is given by the United States in this respect. That is a feature of the Government's policy upon which we are entitled to have an explanation.

Mr. FOSTER. That has already been explained.

Mr. CHARLTON. Do I understand that the Minister of Finance refused to answer my question? I believe he answered the question of the hon. member for South Brant, that the provision respecting sugars over No. 14 would admit kinds of sugar different from those admitted into the United States; but the hon, gentleman did not answer my question, as to why the Government had imposed a duty 50 per cent. higher for the protection of the refiners than had been imposed by the Government of the United States for a like purpose.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Minister of Customs has seen this sugar, I believe?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes. I have not, however, tested the sample yet.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I presume that sugar would be classed by him as a refined sugar.

Mr. BOWELL. No. I just enquired from my deputy what he would consider this sugar to be. He thinks it is one of the centrifugal sugars that passes through one of the manufacturing establishments where manufactured. The Lon. gentleman will notice that while it is not granulated it is crystallized to a certain extent. It would be rated as No. 16. It would bear duty if imported into Canada. If imported into the United States it would pass through the Customs free.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Do I understand that this sugar, having passed through a refining process, would, if under No. 14 in colour, be permitted to come in free?

Mr. BOWELL. Certainly, if not the product of a refiner.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is the hon. gentle-

Mr. BOWELL. I at quite satisfied it is.

Mr. STAIRS. Is the sugar to which the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) is referring, a Jamaica sugar?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes.

Mr. STAIRS. A Jamaica sugar under No. 14 certainly would not be a refined sugar. No Jamaica sugar would be a refined sugar, no matter how bright in colour.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is that a refined sugar?

Mr. STAIRS. No; I think it is not a refined sugar. If it is a sugar from Jamaica it is not a refined sugar. There are no refined sugars received from Jamaica.

Mr. BOWELL. I am just informed as to what I thought was the correct ruling of the department. In the past, as under these resolutions would be the case, any sugars under No. 14 in colour, no matter from what country they came, were admitted free, if the product of a sugar factory.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If so, the wording of this clause is not correct.

Mr. STAIRS. It is practically the same wording as was adopted under the late tariff, under which no difficulty arose. All importers of sugars will understand the wording of the tariff. A refined sugar is one that has been refined by filtering through bone black. None of the Jamaica sugars are passed through bone black, and therefore this is not a refined sugar technically. There will be no difficulty in regard to determining the point raised by the hon, member for Brant.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There is a point in it-The gentleman from Jamaica who brought this sample has asked, and been told, that even with respect to a dark sugar under No. 14, that it would be subject to duty because it had passed through a certain refining process. Perhaps the hon, gentleman is aware that in the matter of molasses the department have ruled that on going through a certain process they become syrups. I think the Minister will admit that that has been the ruling of the department in days gone by. It is important that we should know from the Minister that sugars from Jamaica, if under No. 14 in colour, but having passed through some process of manufacture, call it refining or what you will, will be adnitted free.

Mr. BOWELL. That sample would.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is well that we should know it, because I understand that this gentleman from Jamaica was very much disappointed with the decision. He came here hoping to promote a trade, and he was utterly discouraged at the way in which the sugar tariff was framed, and he said it was no use attempting to do anything with this country. I may have misunderstood the hon. member who had a conversation with him. If it be true that sugars under No. 14, although they have passed through that process, can come in free, it should be publicly known.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It seems to me that, if I understood the Minister of Customs correctly, the intention of the Government would be fully met by altering clause 3 so as to read "all refined sugars under No. 14.

Mr. BOWELL. I am afraid I did not make myself as clear as I should have done. There are certain qualities of sugar made from the beet which come in sometimes from Germany and other countries, and are really the result of refining the better classes of sugars. They go through a certain process of refining. In that case the sugar would be dutiable, although it would be under No. 14. But sugar, that is the product of the manufacture of sugar which has not gone through any refining process, if under No. 14, will be admitted

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Minister should explain if he means, by a refining process, what the member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) says is a refining process.

Mr. BOWELL. A refined sugar is a sugar that comes from a refinery and that has gone through some refining process. This, however, is a sugar that comes from the plantation or where it is manufactured direct from the cane. The amendment suggested by the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) would certainly open the door to the admission of all that class of sugars coming from the refineries which is termed low yellow, and which is now flooding the United States to an enormous extent under their law, and it would certainly do so here if the provisions of our law were similar. I do not know the gentleman to whom the member for Brant referred when he spoke of a gentleman from Jamaica: but I know there has been a planter or an agent from Jamaica in this country, enquiring into the question of the sugar tariff as between that Island and Canada; and I know, further, that that gentleman's whole transactions are with the United States, and that he has thrown as much cold water as he possibly could on the idea of opening out trade relations between Jamaica and this country. When our agent was in Jamaica and conversed with this gentleman, he declared that trade could not be done with Canada; on enquiry, it was found that probably his opinion was based on the fact that all his interests were in another direction, hence we can understand the position of the sugar planter or dealer who would assume, in coming to Canada, that the tariff was not sufficiently wide to admit his sugar into the country free. The result of this tariff upon the Jamaica sugar dealers and refiners is a question, of course, that will have to be settled in the future. I might say, however, that there is one reason why the protection-I am speaking now purely from a protective standpoint—there is one reason why the duty should be a little higher in Canada than it is in the United States. It costs more to lay down raw sugar in Montreal, and in Canada, than it does in New York. The figures that I have before me give the following result. Take the prices of sugar, as they existed about a fortnight ago, and you can lay sugar down in New York at about $3.371 per hundred.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The short or long hundred?

Mr. BOWELL. The short hundred; per 100 An Act to revive and amend the Act to incorporate the pounds. While it costs to lay it down in Montreal, An Act respecting the Ontario and Qu'Appelle Land Company (Limited). Sir Richard Cartwright.

insurance and in freight, although they are purchased in the same market.

Mr. LANGELIER. I understand there is some question as to the introduction into this country of sugar from Jamaica. I received a sample which has been shown to the House which came directly from, I think, the largest firm of sugar producers in Jamaica, the firm of Lascelles, Demercado & Co. These two samples have been treated at the Customs-house as sugar above No. 14 Dutch standard, and, therefore, chargeable with the full duty on refined sugar. As a letter I have now in my possession explains, that sugar is not refined at all.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. LANGELIER. I was about to quote from a letter giving information from the firm of Lascelles. Demercado & Co. The letter states:

"Mr. Charles Demercado, of the firm of Lascelles, Demercado & Co., of Kingston. Jamaica, learning that the sugars from the Islands were admitted free into Canada, lett Jamaica in all haste in order to offer the sugars produced by his firm. On his arrival in Ontario he discovered that the sugars from Jamaica in high the sugars from Jamaica in high the sugars from Jamaica in high sugars. that the sugars from Jamaica, which are manufactured with greater care than those of Cuba, in what are called vacuum pans and dried with the centrifugal apparatus, could not enter Canada without paying duty. The Customs officers told him that his sugar was above 14 degrees Dutch standard, and consequently did not come within the class of sugars exempt from duty. He explained to them his firm's mode of manufacture in order to show that the sugar was not refined; though made more cleanly than the sugar from Ouba, it did not require to be refined in order to be put on the market for consumption. It was useless for him to discuss the guestion the law is those which the restriction. to discuss the question, the law is there which practically excludes the sugars of Jamaica. Mr. Demercado has arrived at Quebec, and has explained what I have just been telling you, to several persons. He says that the sugars of Jamaica enter free of duty into the United States, where they admit free all sugars under 16 degrees Dutch standard."

Then the letter goes on, referring to the hon. Minister of Finance after his visit to Jamaica:

"The first thing he does is to give all the benefit to the product of a Spanish Island which buys nothing from us, and to exclude the product of Jamaica, because it is too cleanly manufactured. You may easily imagine the disappointment of Mr. Demercado, who relied on the speeches of the Hon. Mr. Foster and Mr. Adam Brown, in his hope to sell his sugar and purchase codfish. The firm is one of the most influential of Jamaica, having branches in New York and London. It intended to establish an agency in Montreal."

I understand that there is no dispute of the fact that the samples of sugar which I have now in my possession have been refused free admission into It is admitted by the Customs officers Canada. that the statements of Mr. Demercado are correct that these sugars are not refined, but that in their raw state they contain too large an amount of saccharine matter to be admitted free. That is the contention of the Customs officers, and I must state at once that Mr. Demercado and the gentleman who writes to me do not complain of the action of these officers. They admit that under the Customs law it is impossible for this sugar to be admitted free, because it is over 14 Dutch standard, which, however, is admitted free into the United States. But everybody can see the effect sugar were admitted free, I am informed that it could be delivered to the consumers at from 21 to 3 cents per pound, and everybody who examines it can see that it is very good grocery sugar, which would sell in immense quantities in Canada if admitted free. But with the full duty on refined sugar against it, it cannot be introduced into this country. The result is that the consumers will have to purchase sugars refined in this country and pay the duty to the refiners, whereas, if they could get this sugar, which is just as good for all practical purposes as the sugars produced by the refiners, they would pay no duty at all. With regard to the effect on trade relations with Jamaica, the letter shows very clearly that this gentleman wanted to establish trade relations. He wanted to buy some of the products of our fisheries in exchange for his sugars; but seeing that he could not import sugars into Canada, he gave up the idea of establishing trade relations and left the country in disgust. As the letter says, it seems extraordinary that the advantage should be given to the Spanish Islands, who have no trade connection with us, over a British colony with which it was expected trade relations would be established; and the only reason I can see for this is that it was done to protect the refiners. That was the explanation given to me by several parties to whom I showed this letter. It is quite clear that the refiners had a hand in the making of the new tariff. If the tariff had been arranged to promote the commercial relations of the country and suit the consumers, it would have included in the list sugars as high as 16 degrees, as is done by the tariff of the United States. But the effect of lowering the standard to 14 degrees is that this Jamaica sugar, which would have been sold to the consumers of this country at a low price, will be replaced by sugars sold at a high price by the refiners of this country.

Mr. BOWELL. I am afraid that I misled the House a few moments ago in speaking of the difference in the price between sugars coming rid the St. Lawrence and those coming rid New York. What I intended to say was this, that sugar from Cuba could be laid down in Montreal, ria the St. Lawrence, at \$3.56 per 100 lbs., including the price paid for the sugar, freight, insurance, and the other incidental expenses connected therewith, but that the same kind of sugar from the same markets could be laid down in New York for $\$3.37\frac{1}{2}$ per 100 lbs., being $18\frac{1}{2}$ cents per 100 lbs. in favour of the New York route. That is one reason why the Government, in framing this resolution, gave a higher rate of protection to the manufacturer than is given by the tariff of the United States, and I think it is a very good reason. The Government desires to have it understood that that was done with the object of assisting those engaged in the trade in Canada, in order to have the trade carried on to as great an extent as possible riâ the St. Lawrence by our own ships, and in order that the sugar might be manufactured in Canada, while the protection is not sufficiently high to enable the manufacturers to exact too large a profit from the consumers. Now, the difference between the price in Canada of this law, not only upon the prospect of estab- under our tariff and the price in the United States lishing trade relations with Jamaica, but upon the at present, is as between 4½ and 4½. Granulated interests of the consumers of Canada. If that sugar has been sold in Canada since the tariff rosolutions were introduced, at 4½ cents, and the same character of sugar has been sold in New York The difference between the price the consumer would have to pay in Canada and the price he would have to pay in the United States if he imported from New York, would be the difference between 4½ and 4½, plus the freight and insurance from New York to Canada: so that when the facts are known it will be seen that the refiners are not those cormorants they have been represented to be. The difference is so small that the advantage derived from the manufacture of the article in this country, instead of in a foreign country, is, I think, sufficient justification for the course we have pur-

Mr. CHARLTON. What is the difference of freight between landing in New York and the St. Lawrence?

Mr. BOWELL. I did not say anything about the freight. I said that the sugar was laid down, including the price of the sugar in Cuba and the freight and insurance and other incidentals, in Montreal, since the introduction of the tariff, at $3.56, while from the same market it could be laid down in New York at $3.37½. Those figures were given by those in the trade.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who supplied the figures as to the difference between New York and Montreal?

Mr. BOWELL. From some of the traders.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Refiners?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think traders would give these figures. The information given me differs materially from that of the hon. gentleman on that point.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not see really the difference. If a refiner imports the sugar direct from Cuba to Montreal, he certainly should be considered a trader, as well as the man who would purchase it to bring it into the country for sale to the refiner. They would be both precisely in the same position.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Quite correct, and that was a little wise precaution which my hon, friend took. By terming the refiner a trader, no doubt it would sound better. No doubt he is strictly accurate in speaking of the refiner as a trader, but the fact the hon, member for South Oxford wanted to get at was whether it was a person interested, such as a refiner, who gave the figures. I have heard no argument addressed against removing all the protection the refiners have. Whatever views may be entertained with reference to that matter, no one has demanded that the refiners should be without protection, but the Government are asked what justification is there for giving an amount of protection in this country greater than what is given the manufacture in the United States? That is a fair question. It is taking the Government on their own ground, assuming their ground is correct, that it is desirable to protect the refiners in order to have the benefits accruing from their business: but we ask why should not a protection, which is considered ample in the desirable to give that protection, in order that he United States, which hon. gentlemen tell us incessantly is a much higher protected country than this, be considered sufficient here? The hon. Minister has given the reasons. He says there is 181 from Jamaica may come in free, and then we would Mr. BOWELL.

cents difference on the importation of raw material against the Montreal refiner as compared with the New York refiner. If we grant that, there would still be 12 cents protection per 1(M) lbs. given over and above that. I would like to ask the Minister this question. He heard the hon, members for Halifax (Messrs. Stairs and Kenny) and the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) basing their quotations on the price of refined sugar at Halifax, and I do not know whether the figures the hon. Minister has just quoted are the Montreal prices or the Halifax prices.

Mr. BOWELL. It is the Montreal price.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). These gentlemen quoted the Halifax price and reduced the amount by saying it was a quarter of a cent lower there. There are refineries at Halifax. What advantage has the port of New York in laying down raw sugar over the port of Halifax?

Mr. BOWELL. I have not looked into that point, but I suppose there would be just the difference of the freight from Halifax to Montreal, and the difference between the freight from Cuba to Halifax and from Cuba to New York.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). The difference of freight as between New York and Halifax would be very slight, not more than 3 cents per 100 lbs.

Mr. BOWELL. My hon, friend beside me (Mr. Wood) says from 3 to 5 cents; but it must be remembered that the refiners in Halifax and Moneton are very much further from the western market than the refiners at Montreal and New York, and they pay an additional freight on the refined which the Montreal refiner pays on the raw.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And we are to pay the bill.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon, gentleman says it is very low to Montreal on this raw sugar, but it is very much higher west on the refined.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). It is a greater distance.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes; but the hon. Minister, in comparing the figures to-day, spoke about the prices in Montreal and New York. I am not prepared to admit that his figures are exactly correct.

Mr. BOWELL. I would not say they are today, as I got them about ten days ago.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). 1 think probably the granulated would be 4\frac{1}{2} in Montreal, but I speak subject to correction; and the point the Minister makes in taking $4\frac{\pi}{8}$ at one point and $4\frac{\pi}{2}$ at the other, is that the consumer would have in addition to pay the freight from New York. But he loses sight of the fact that one-half, at least, of the inhabitants of the Dominion, can import from New York at about the same freight as from Montreal, so that his argument has no value whatever. But taking that extra freight from New York, which I do not understand, there is still a protection of 12 cents per 100 lbs. to our refiners over that enjoyed by the refiners of New York. The hon. Minister says it is may promote direct trade by the St. Lawrence. Very well, but the Minister can promote direct trade by so arranging his tariff that these sugars have the benefit of their direct importation via the of Finance went to Jamaica to promote, and which St. Lawrence. We might as well have the benefit no one would desire to discourage if it would have of direct trade over the St. Lawrence route, by any beneficial result; but Canada, after having exbringing in raw sugar from a British island as bringing in raw sugar from Cuba or any other portion of the world.

Mr. BOWELL. You mean to the refiners.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I mean for the dealers. If the hon, Minister would apply his pro-I mean for the vision that raw sugar imported direct from the the trade by the St. Lawrence, and would develop to which he made overtures for the development of all. The whole question, as it has been discussed, is seeking to give an undue amount of protection to the refiners. As I said before, no gentleman on and admit sugars, whether refined or raw under 16 Dutch standard, free, certainly the same rule ought to be applied to Canada. Why should it not? If a comparison is made with sugars in England, it will be found that the difference is far greater than it is between the sugars in the United States and Canada, because the refiners over there are availing themselves of the protection they have, and I thought that, perhaps, after the discussion that took place in this House, it had been so clearly stated by members on this side and on the other side of the House that the refiners could live and make an ample profit with less protection, that the Minister would have been prepared to yield on this point and to fix his tariff at the same rate at which it is fixed by the Americans, who are essentially a nation following out the principle of protection. The Minister heard the member for Halifax point out that the refiners in Canada were not only able to produce, but were actually producing and selling sugar 14 cents per 100 lbs. less than the Americans. If that is the case, why do they want a protection of 80 cents per 100 lbs. against the Americans? The hon, member laid it down distinctly and corrected my figures in that respect, and you will find it in his speech, that the Canadian refiners were selling sugar at 14 cents per 100 lbs. less than the American refiners. What reason is there to give a protection against these same Americans of 80 cents per 100 lbs., when, according to the argument of the hon. gentleman, not only can the Canadian refiners hold their own against the United States on equal terms, but they could take possession of the American market and find an unlimited demand for their sugar there? Minister heard his argument, and I think it would behoove him to give an answer better than that which the Minister of Customs has given as to why this protection is so excessive. We have before us an official statement, or one which may almost be regarded as official, that in giving this excessive protection to the sugar refiners by fixing the standard at 14 instead of at 16, the hon. gentleman is destroy-pended money to exhibit her produce there, after having sent a commissioner there, finds the result that, instead of there being a boun fide attempt to establish a trade, the same Minister of Finance who was the commissioner to promote this trade, who boasted what would be accomplished by his mission, and what a grand thing it would be to develop trade with these islands, introducing a place of production may come in free, to the tariffwhichheis told distinctly will shut off any possi-Jamaica sugar, he would secure all the benefit of bility of trade with that Island to which he went and a trade with a sister island, under the same flag, our trade. How far is the protection to the sugar at the same time. I have heard no argument at refiner to go? Is it the To of a cent a pound which the consumer will have to pay, or is the consumer seems to me to point to the fact that the Minister also prepared to sacrifice the whole of a probably profitable trade which can be maintained between the Island of Jamaica and Canada? Maintaining this side, whatever may be his views on the questithe present tariff means not only the cost to the tion, has argued that the refiners should be left consumer over what they ought to pay under any without any protection, but they do hold that if legitimate protection, but it means also the total the United States, which hon, gentlemen opposite destruction, or rather the prevention, of a trade say is a most highly protected country, think that which would be profitable, I believe, both to half a cent is ample protection to their refiners, Jamaica and to this country. How far is the whole trade and the interests of this country to be sacrificed, not for the interest of the sugar refiner, but for the excessive protection of the sugar refiner? If this is put at No. 16, we have testimony that trade will spring up with Jamaica which is shut off entirely if the number is maintained at the present standard. It seems to me that the Minister of Finance, who is anxious to promote trade between Canada and that Island, as is shown by his going there as a commissioner, should give some explanation of this. In the exportation of these sugars from Jamaica to Canada, the trade by the St. Lawrence and the Maritime Provinces in the way of return cargoes will be maintained, but they will be sacrificed if the hon, gentleman maintains the tariff as it is now.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Minister of Customs gave as a reason for the imposition of $\frac{s}{10}$ of a cent on refined sugar that raw sugars were imported into Montreal for \$3.56 per 100 lbs., while they were received in New York for \$3.374, or about 18½ cents per 100 lbs. less than in Montreal. On that account the Government proceeds to impose a duty of 80 cents per 100 lbs., or more than four times as great as would be necessary to equalize the rate with that paid by the American refiner. This is protection with a vengeance. The American refiner has only half a cent a pound to pay, and that is more than ample to protect him. The Canadian refiner is at a disadvantage of about 20 cents per 100 lbs., and in order to make that up, he is given a protection of 80 cents per 100 That enables him to charge from 50 to lbs. 60 cents per 100 lbs. for his refined sugar more than is necessary to meet the competition. refiner at the present time is charging from 41 to 43 for granulated sugar. For yellow he is charging 35, while in the United States he is charging 35 for yellow and 41 for granulated. If the Government had contented itself with a duty of to of a cent or 15 of a cent a pound, it would have given to the refiner ample protection, if he was contented with a reasonable profit as a competitor with the ing what would be a good trade, what the Minister refiners in the United States or in Scotland. The statement of the Minister of Customs, in order to compensate the refiner for an extra cost in freight charges of less than 20 cents per 100 lbs., as compared with the New York refiner, he has to receive a protection of 80 cents per 100 lbs., and the consumer here is to be placed at the mercy of the refiner to the extent of at least half a cent per pound.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is another point to which attention has not been called. The hon. gentlemen opposite, in the initiation of their policy declared that it was their desire to protect the manufactures of Canada against the competition of foreigners dealing in the same commodities or manufactured goods. In this case, admitting that the policy of hon, gentlemen opposite should be properly carried out, their aim should be to protect the Canadian refiner against the refiner in the United States and the refiner in England. Now, what are they doing in this case? They are not only protecting the refiner against the refiner in the United States and the refiner in England, but by the change they have made in their tariff they are producing a market for the refiners of Canada. They are saying to the consumers of Canada: You shall not have the raw material, we are not only giving the sugar refiners of Canada a protection against competition with the refiners of the United States and England, but we are going to exclude raw sugar so as to compel you to consume refined sugar. that is virtually the position they are taking in this change in the tariff. The Minister of Customs shakes his head, but he cannot get over the diffi-The Finance Minister admitted the facta few moments ago, so the Minister of Customs need not shake his head. The Finance Minister has announced to the House that if this class of sugar from Jamaica was admitted, the result would be that a very large number of people in this country would use that sugar, and it would seriously limit the market for refined sugar. He says that in the United States all the people are very large consumers of refined sugar, and they do not consume such a proportionate quantity of yellow sugars as our Canadians would do had they the opportunity; and in order to prevent them from having that opportunity, not for the purpose of revenue, but to close out an article that they would, as a matter of choice, use, the Government shut it out in order to compel the people to use the fine sugars and protect the refiners of this country—that is virtually the position they take on this question. Now, that position is not taken in connection with one single item produced in this country except sugar. I defy the Minister or any member of the Government to point out another article that is produced in this country concerning which they take the same stand as they do with sugar, that is, to shut out by the tariff a commodity that the people of their own free choice would use, in order to make a market for the commodities of the manufacturers in the sugar industry. I say it is a gross injustice to the poorer classes of this country to deprive them of their free choice when it is not for the purpose of raising a revenue, because we get no revenue from it, the revenue goes into the pockets of the refiners of Canada, and not into the treasury of the Minister of Finance. I say when it is not done for revenue purposes it is a gross injustice to the poorer MIT. CHARLTON.

question simmered down is that, according to the from Jamaica, which is a desirable commodity, and would be largely used by the people of this country; but in order to prevent their free choice in the use of that sugar, he shuts it out by this arrangement and compels them to use refined sugar, so as to give the manufacturers of this country a little more to do in that way.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not quite follow the argument of the hon, gentleman who has just sat down. I know that there is at least one class of unrefined sugar which is admitted free of duty, which is an exceedingly fine kind of sugar, and a very cheap kind of sugar, and that is the Cuba crystals. is. I fancy, as pure an article of unrefined sugar as can be found anywhere, and that is admitted free of duty, and we can buy that sugar to any extent we please. I was very much interested by the remarks of my hon, friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson), because I observed, I thought, a change in the hon, gentleman's view of questions of this kind, which I had not noticed before: I observed a care as to the manufacturer that I had not noticed before. I hope the hon, gentleman has been reading a little more extensively of English free trade literature than a good many of his colleagues on that side of the House seem to have done of late years. Under the protective policy which has been pursued in this country for the last thirteen years, we have succeeded in reducing the price of sugar to a point which we did not dream of a few years ago. Hon, gentlemen tell us. Mr. Speaker, that has nothing to do whatever with the protective policy; they tell us that simply by a law of nature production is becoming cheaper year by year, and that it is because sugar all over the world has become cheaper that we get it cheaper here in Canada. I would like to ask hon, gentlemen how it has come about that sugar all over the world has become cheaper? would like to go a little deeper down into this question than that superficial view of it taken by these hon, gentlemen: I want to know why sugar all over the world has become so much cheaper? I say it has become cheaper partly, no doubt, by reason of the progress that has been made in the process of production, and by the improvement of the machinery. But how has it come about that there has been so great an improvement in those respects? If hon, gentlemen will consider the matter a little, they will remember that this improvement has come about by reason of protection, by reason of the greatest and most strenuous policy of protection, probably, that has ever been known in the world. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the Emperor Napoleon established the beet-root sugar industry in France, which was built up by a policy of protection, the most stringent, perhaps, that was ever adopted by any nation in the world. The result of that policy has been such a fierce competition in the markets of England that the price of sugar in the English markets has been pulled down by reason of that protection in France, which was subsequently followed in Germany, in Austria, in Belgium and Holland, and in Russia eventually. The result has been, as I have said, that by reason of this policy of protection, the price of sugar in free trade England has been reduced. Free trade England said that it was altogether a fallacious policy, they said it was even worse—it was a wicked policy, to force the poor continental classes who would prefer to have this raw sugar consumers to pay so much more for their sugar by reason of this policy of protection. The result has proved to be not only that the continental consumer did not pay more for his sugar, not only that the continental consumer got his sugar cheaper, but that the English free trade consumer got his sugar a great deal cheaper, too. Not only has this been the case, but the pressure of this competition of protected sugar has been so great that free trade in tempted them. They sought the aid of chemistry and mechanical skill in all ways: built new factories and introduced economies of coal: improved machinery to an extent in the own markets by this protected industry, that refinery after refinery has been closed in England. The form India coolie emigration, securing at the same time them. been the case, but the pressure of this competition that the greatest distress has occurred in that country, that the industry of manufacturing loaf sugar has ceased to exist there. Only a short time? ago the Government of England was besieged by deputation after deputation of starving men and of those who employed them; on one occasion, believe, a deputation representing no fewer than 250,000 people waited upon the Prime Minister of England with reference to this matter, and, pressed by these deputations, the Government of England at last felt that it was necessary to interfere between the consumer and the cheap sugar in the interest of the producer, and to endeavour to induce the continental Governments who had been pursuing this policy of protection, to hold their hands and to withdraw the bounties they had given upon their refined sugars. There was a convention held in Europe to which representatives were sent from free trade England, and an arrangement was entered into by the Government of England for the protection of the manufacturers of England, and for the protection of those whom they employed: an arrangement was entered into with the Governments of Europe for the purpose of inducing those Governments, so far as possible, to withdraw this beauty by means of which the consumers of England got their sugar so much cheaper. With the permission of the House, I will read a sentence or two from an authority which I think hon, gentlemen opposite will not gainsay in respect to this The work I hold in my hand is "Sugar Bounties, the Case for and against Government Interference," and it is a work published by the lecturer on political economy in University College. Dundee, and in Queen Margaret's College, Glasgow. That is a pretty solid authority for hon. gentlemen opposite. If it is necessary that I should prove this gentleman to be a thorough free trader, I will read a few words to show that he is. Referring to the policy of the country, he says:

"It is perhaps not out of place to ask: what is our National Policy? The battle of free trade was fought out in the days of our fathers. The youngest generations have accepted the name of it, without much attempting to grasp the great arguments that Cobden and Bright and Villiers made familiar on every platform. Of late there has been a slight reaction against it. But the reactionists have proved so weak in debate, and so evidently participant. have proved so weak in debate, and so evidently partisan in interest, that they have served only to settle us more firmly in our convictions, that nothing can be said for protection that was not said forty years ago, and confuted

There can be no doubt that a gentleman who can shut his eyes as to what is going on in England as to fair trade at present is a pretty solid free trader. I will read what has been the effect of competition on the English market. He says:

"The extraordinary stimulations of productions have the effect on prices that might have been expected." This is referring to sugar bounties.-

"Cane sugar, which before 1870 ruled from 24 shillings to 25 shillings per hundred weight (Demerara crystals) Our old friend that has been so often ridiculed from and down till 1883, had scarcely ever gone beyond 22 shillings in 1884 to 15 shillings, and has varied since then from 15 shillings to 16 shillings."

That is under the competition of the protected sugar.

"To a great extent the competition was a healthy one, and did good. It stimulated the West Indian planters the cheap rates for rice—the staple food of the labourers. Thus they cheapened their productions so much that some raw cane sugar is still sent into this market in spite of the bounties. The total cost of productions has been lowered since 1879 by £5 to £7 per ton. But this cannot be a few to the control of the control go on definitely. Everything that skill and capital can do seems now to have been done."

That is to say, that the competition, as I have said, of this protected sugar had the effect of lowering the price of sugar all over the world. I want hon. gentlemen opposite to understand that the policy of protection produced that result the world over. and when they say that sugar has become cheaper the world over, they will kindly remember that it became cheaper through the agency of a protective There has been a good deal of conversation from time to time as to the number of hands employed. I want to mention what this free trader says of this point. Speaking of the hands, he says:

"Along with the sugar industry go a good many subsi-diary trades such as coopers, engineers and the large amount of shipping formerly necessary. Greenock, for instance, a town of 70,000 inhabitants, and with a muni-cipal debt of £2,000,000, has only about 2,000 men directly employed within the walls of the sugar houses, yet almost the entire population is dependent on the prosperity of sugar.

That is to say, although 2,000 are directly employel. 70,000 people in that one town, this free trade authority, this professor of political economy, says, "or," in his own words, "almost the entire population" is dependent on the prosperity of sugar, althoughouly 2,000 are employed directly in the industry, showing what a very widespreading interest it is. While there are 2,000 men employed in the industry itself, you find the people affected are in the proportion of 70,000 to 2,000. This free trader makes some other very interesting remarks in the course of this little work, and one is:

"It is much more important to the workingman that he should have a steady wage than that he should have a cheap loaf.

That is a very interesting statement for us to hear in the Parliament of Canada. It is a statement which I hope hon, gentlemen opposite will lay to heart, because it is not such a statement as we have been in the habit of hearing from that side of the House. On the same subject he says:

"And again—if everybody is not sick to weariness of the argument—continuity of employment is of infinitely greater importance to the wage-earner than cheap food."

Then we have an argument which I could not imagine how a free trader and professor at Glasgow and Dundee could present. It has been looked on as a kind of heresy by hon, gentlemen opposite, but here we have this old friend, whom we have met so often in this House:

"An Irishwoman lately went into a shop in Liverpool and asked the price of eggs. "A shilling a dozen." Indeed, sir, she said. 'I could get them in my own country for sixpence." And why don't you go to your own country and get them,' said the shopman. 'And where would I get the sixpence,' was the answer."

the other side of the House appears in the work of this free trader, and he remarks :

"This is the position in a nutshell. If our workers cannot find employment and earn wages, it matters little to them that bread is sixpence the quartern loaf and sugar twopence a pound."

Again, he says:

"Indeed, the statement that the interests of the consumer is paramount is a sophism. You cannot separate, the interest of producer and consumer, because they are to the extent of say three-fourths of the nation the same individuals."

I find, on page 47 of this little work, this remarkable statement from an authority that hon, gentlemen opposite will scarcely gainsay, in reference to this matter of cheap sugar. He says:

"The interest of the consumer, however, is not the only interest to be considered. Mr. Gladstone, whom no one ever suspected of the heresy of protection, has spoken strongly on the subject: 'My desire is that the British consumer should have both sugar and every other commodity at the lowest price at which it can be produced, without arbitrary favour to any of those engaged in the competition: but I cannot regard with favour any cheapness which is produced by means of the concealed subsidies of a foreign state to a particular industry and with sidies of a foreign state to a particular industry, and with the effect of crippling and distressing capitalists and workmen engaged in a lawful branch of British trade."

This gentleman, commenting on that statement and upon a similar statement by Mr. Mundella, says:

"There is a very strong statement involved in this. It is that, however advantageous it may be to have cheap sugar, that is not the only consideration; that the interest of the producer must be attended to, although the whole community should pay dearer for its sugar."

That is the statement made by a professor of political economy at Dundee and Glasgow. He further says:

"Under the ægis, then, of these great champions of free trade we may assume henceforth that it is allowable, according to the principles of free trade, to do something for the sake of particular producers, although it should involve that the consumers slightly suffer."

That, I think, is a statement which hon, gentlemen opposite should consider. It is something that must seem rather heretical in the eyes of the hon, member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson); but, nevertheless, it is one given by an authority of his own school. I think I may say that my hon, friends opposite are ten years, just about a decade, behind in the free trade literature of the mother country. Now, with regard to another favourite axiom of hon. gentlemen opposite; I have just one quotation to read, and then I have finished with this little book. We have heard a great deal about buying in the cheapest market, and it has been laid down by hon, gentlemen opposite that that is the thing that should be done. Whatever else happens we were to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market. What does this professor of political economy tell us about that? We have heard from the opposite side of the House, time after time, that that is the cardinal principle that lies at the foundation of free trade, namely, buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear; that is sound doctrine.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend says "hear, hear." I may mention for the information of the hon, gentleman, who was not in the House when I began my remarks, that I am quoting from a professor of political economy of Glasgow and Dundee, he says on that subject which has been cheered so enthusiastically by my hon, friend the leader of the Opposition. He says :

"Nor is it the case that the cardinal principle of free trade is, buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market." That is a maxim which belongs to no particular school. It is part of the general common sense of the commercial world, which requires no teaching; but it is so often impossible, and even immoral, that it cannot, by itself, be adopted as the cardinal principle of any policy." So that when hon, gentlemen opposite tell us that their policy is to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market, and as my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has cheered that principle. I have got to inform my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) that according to this high authority in the mother country, a free trade professor of political economy of Glasgow and Dundee, that principle is pronounced to be so often impossible and even immoral, that it cannot by itself be adopted as the cardinal principle of any policy. Now, it is quite clear that it is immoral, and any hon, gentleman who considers the question for a moment will see that it is so. It must be immoral to look only to cheapness. Suppose, for example, that by encouraging a cheaply produced commodity, you are encouraging the slave trade. By purchasing a cheap commodity in the cheapest market, you may be the cause of assisting slavery and the slave trade, which otherwise would fall to the ground; or you may encourage the sweating system which we have heard so much about in connection with free trade. It is quite clear that what this eminent professor says is true: That the principle of buying in the cheapest and selling in the dearest market, may be, if carried out to the letter, an immoral principle. I am glad to have called the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to this, and especially the attention of the leader of the Opposition. I am afraid, perhaps, that I have been wearying the House with my quotations, and certainly, if I had any remarks of my own to make I would not dream of intruding on the good nature of the House any longer. But I have something to say which is very much better than anything I could say myself, and I hope that hon, gentlemen will allow me to say it. I just wish to read a few words from a speech which was delivered by the representative of free trade England, at this conference, in reference to the sugar bounties in Europe. This is a ence to the sugar bounties in Europe. quotation from a speech made at Greenock by the representative of free trade England, at that conference, and, with the permission of the House, I will quote briefly what he says. I think it bears so very remarkably upon our own condition here that it would be a pity the House did not have the In the first place he says: benefit of it.

"The facts which I have brought before you to-night prove that no country, however intelligent and however industrious, can hold its own against unfair competition."

Now, I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite, whether it is fair competition that we, in Canada, should have our young industries placed at the mercy of the "rings" of the United States, formed for the express purpose of killing our industries.

Mr. LAURIER. That was the German competition in sugar he referred to.

Mr. McNEILL. To foreign competition. He was referring to the sugar bounties at the time, and to the unfair competition of France and Gervery pronounced free trader, and this is what many. He was referring to the protective policy Mr. McNeill. of Germany and France. I have been referring to North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). I am quite sure that that in my remarks, but the hon, gentleman was this agreeable little digression will help him amaznot present at the commencement of my address, ingly in getting through with the item under I have been pointing out that that competition, discussion. under protection, has reduced the price of sugar all over the world, and that it is by a protective? policy that the price of sugar has been reduced. He goes on to say:

To-day the bounties on sugar and on shipping, destroy one industry, and do much to cripple another: to-morrow may bring bounties on iron, coal and cotton manufactures. Where, then, would be our home industries? We should be compensated, says Sir Thomas Farrer, by buying foreign goods cheaper than our own.

That is what we are told here time after time from the other side of the House: That we shall be compensated for the destruction of our industries by

"The ship-building yards of France, Germany and Italy would be busy, while the clang of the hammer would no longer be heard on the Clyde and on the Thames: the furnaces of Belgium and France would burn brightly, while those in England and Scotland would be dark and cold; the mines of Germany and Bohemia—

He does not refer to Nova Scotia here, but to Germany and Bohemia.

Not the United States.

These words, as my hon, friend will see, might readily be employed to suit our case by using "Canada" for "Great Britain" and the "United He goos on to States" for these other countries.

"Would Sir Thomas Farrer and doctrinaires of his stamp "Would Sir Thomas Farrer and doctrinaires of his stamp then dare to console you with the statement that bounties were only bad things for the countries giving them, and that you must bear in mind that bounty-fed coal, iron and cotton goods were given to you cheaper than you could produce them? It is to check an existing evil, and to prevent the possibility of further disaster that this convention has been signed, and it will, so far as Her Majesty's Government is concerned, be carried out in its integrity. To allow the continuance of the system would be to ignore facts—to shut ones eyes to consequences, and be to ignore facts—to shut ones eyes to consequences, and by inaction and cowardice to jeopardize the interests of the greatest commercial empire in the world, and to namely, the supreme interest of the realm and the people."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I congratulate useful interpellation of the hon, gentleman from confine myself to the item under discussion. I

Mr. FOSTER. It is all for your benefit.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. our benefit: I fully appreciate that. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken was good enough to hint that we for the past ten years had been oblivious to what he was pleased to call free trade ideas in England. Well, Sir, the hon, gentleman appears to me to be a very fair brother to Rip Van Winkle in the ideas he advances, which might very well suit the middle ages, and which were no doubt in vogue in those days, but which are about as much in accord with the light of political econbeing enabled to buy foreign goods cheaper than omy to-day as the inventions of the middle ages would be with the industrial system of to-day. Now, I tell the hon, gentleman that this question was exhaustively gone into in the English House of Commons by English commissioners, as he may or may not know, and that this result was brought out very clearly, that the introduction of free sugar into England, and the extent to which English manufacturers were enabled to avail themselves of the benefits of free sugar, while it may have in-- would supply us with our coal, now supplied by the benefits of free sugar, while it may have inhardworking and stalwart miners from our own pits: and jured to a certain extent one particular industry, the looms of Saxony and Switzerland developed a great number of other industries to developed a great number of other industries to such an extent that six or seven men were employ--"would be busy at work while the factories of Great ed in the new industries for one who was inter-Britain were closed and their hands idle." fered with in the old. As for the morality of the fered with in the old. As for the morality of the question to which the hon, gentleman refers, if there is one act more immoral than another which a Government or a Parliament can commit, it is to take advantage of a majority-obtained to an immense extent, by the contributions of these manufacturers themselves—to perpetrate a legalized robbery to the extent of $2,000,000 a year on the whole people of Canada for the benefit of a dozen manufacturers like Mr. Drummond & Co. That is what has been done under this resolution: and there, if you choose, is immorality, and immorality of a very high degree. would like to know, when this clause-which I believe was not drawn by the Minister of Customs or the Minister of Finance, but which, I believe, was elaborated by a refiners' committee-when it was accepted by the Government from those people, did they obtain from them any information as to Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to add any words what it costs on the average to manufacture sugar? shall not attempt to answer the hon, member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill), who has gone into a general discussion on the trade question. When it was understood that there was to be as great freedom of debate, with you in the Chair, Mr. Speaker, as in the Committee of the Whole, I think it was understood at the same time that that freedom should be limited to the particular item under discussion at the time. If we depart from that understanding. and go into a general discussion on the trade question. I think we shall not be able to get through. The point we are discussing is whether the item in the tariff arranging the sugar duties is in the best interests of the country. I was discussing the question from the standpoint of hon, gentlemen opposite, who take the ground that they ought to give protection to the sugar refiners. I was attempting to show that, from that standpoint, the tariff as arranged, was not only not in the interest of the consumer, but was not necessary to the existence or even the well-doing of the refiner, but that it was fixed on a basis extravagantly expensive to the consumer, and consequently gave an undue advantage to the refiner. Now, I am about to read, not from a free trade authority, but, following the example of the hon, gentleman opposite, and giving him an authority which he himself recognizes as an authority. I will read from the Canadian Manufacturer, which is the organ of the Manufacturers' Association, and which I think the hon. gentleman will admit is issued in the interest of protection to manufacturers. When I say that Frederick Nicholls is the chairman of the executive and when I read as its first editorial that "what Canada needs and expects and demands is a faithful adherence of the spirit of the National Policy, the House will see that I am dealing with the Ministry on this question from the standpoint of the protectionists themselves; and we will see how they view this arrangement of the sugar duties by the This journal states:

"When Mr. Foster announced that hereafter all sugar not above No. 14 Dutch standard would be admitted into Canada free, and that hereafter, as far as sugar was concerned, we should have a free breakfast table, all Canada threw up its hats and hurrahed. Those who threw up their hats had nothing else convenient for the purpose, and it was done because they supposed that all sugar not above No. 14 Dutch standard could be used on the breakfast table."

The hon, member for North Bruce is telling us something about Cuba crystals coming in, and the hon. Finance Minister tells us that he uses No. 14 on his table; but here is what the Canadian Manufacturer says in reference to it:

"But there is not a breakfast table in all Canada whereon Dutch standard sugar was ever used, or could be used. That article is not suitable for any breakfast table, and it is unfit for use until it is refined. The refiners, however, get a profit out of it, the protection being at the rate of 80 cents per 100 lbs. So we do not have free sugar for our breakfast table after all."

Now, the hon, member for North Bruce might give his attention to his practical point which we are discussing, and not run away to the general trade question.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon, gentleman will allow me. I have got some of this crystal Cuba sugar here, and I would like to show it to him. I would be glad to use it, I know. It is delicious sugar.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What does the hon, gentleman believe—

Mr. Paterson (Brant).

Mr. McNEILL. I believe in what I see, and aste, and touch, and handle, you know.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It will not do, then, for the hon, gentleman to form his opinions from the leading organ advocating the policy which he has been lauding as essential to the well-being and protection of Canada. Now, here is another article in it, in which it takes the ground that we should give a bounty for the production of beet sugar, which the hon, gentleman has been talking about. I am not giving this as my own view or committing myself to it; but this journal gives one or two figures which have been contradicted in this House by hon, gentlemen opposite, and I commend the article to their attention. I commend some of these figures to the hon, member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) the hon, member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), and the hon, member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), and to the hon, member for North Bruce as well:

"Finance Minister Foster proposes to give to the Canadian sugar refineries $6 per ton more protection than American refiners have under the McKinley tariff. This means that they will be able to rake in $720,000 per year extra out of the Canadian consumers. And still Mr. Foster shudders at the idea of encouraging the production of sugar in Canada. If he would offer a bounty for the production of beet sugar, and if under that bounty the Government had to pay as much as $720,000 per year for such production, that money would be distributed among fifty thousand or more Canadian farmers, mechanics and workingmen, while now he proposes to distribute it among four concerns giving employment to only about 650 men. This is not according to the ethics of protection."

I read that article to show the hon, gentlemen opposite, who talk about the thousands and thousands engaged in our sugar refineries, what the official organ, if I may so call it, of the protectionist party, states in reference to that matter; and I have read it also to show that, when they speak about extravagant figures having been used on this side of the House, an organ of their own party, makes out the amount taken from the people greater than I stated it was, though I said they were able to take even more by the way the tariff was arranged. They themselves put it at $720,000 a year. I want to know if the hon. Minister thinks it is wise that all this money should be given to these four concerns, which employ 650 men, at the expense of the consumers of Canada and at the expense of discouraging and killing off what we might hope would be a profitable trade between Jamaica and this country, giving employment to our fishermen, developing our own route, and opening up a trade for the Maritime Provinces? It is well this point should be put before the hon. Minister. He will see I do not put it on the ground of wiping out the duties at all, but simply on the ground that in that country, where hon. gentlemen opposite say protection is carried to an extreme, one half less protection is given than here; and when the results are such as pointed out in their own organ, some explanation is required.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). What the honmember for Brant is specially drawing the attention of the House to is the difference between he duty imposed under our tariff and that imposed under the McKinley Bill in the United States. The hon. Minister of Customs referred to the difference in the cost of freight from the sugar-producing countries to the chief ports in the Dominion and the port of New York in the United States; and that difference, a difference of about 18 or 20 cents, according to the figures given us, accounts for a part, at all events, of the difference in the duty we impose in this Dominion. There was another consideration, however, which, to my mind, should influence the Government, and which, I infer from the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Finance, hasinfluenced them in imposing a higher duty than is adopted in the United States; and that is the difference in the character of the two markets, the market in the United States and the market in Canada. From what knowledge I have of these two markets, I believe the demand in the United States is largely for a different class of sugar than is required in Canada. In Canada the demand has been, in the past, for about one-third granulated sugar and two-thirds yellow. Our refiners at present are importing raw sugar and manufacturing in about that proportion; and from the raw sugar they are able to supply all the demand there is for granulated sugar, and at the same time to supply this large demand for yellow sugar and to give a good quality of yellow refined sugar. I think, if a comparison is made between the qualities of yellow sugars sold in Canada and those sold in other countries, it will be found that, on the whole, the average quality of ours is better than that of the sugar in the United States or Great Britain. Now, the effect, in the first place, of adopting the tariff of the United States, by making all sugars up to No. 16 free, would be to bring in this very class to which the hon, member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier) referred, this vacuum pan and centrifugal, which would compete in our market with the high class yellow sugars we manufacture at present. What the effect on the refiners would be, it is difficult for me to say; but it would have this effect, of very seriously crippling their industry. They have not sufficient demand to enable them to devote their attention to manufacturing a larger proportion of granulated, and if they could not supply this large demand for yellow sugar, their industry would be seriously affected.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What would be the effect on the consumer? There are more of them than refiners.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I do not think it would give them any cheaper sugar. If they used a larger quantity of raw sugars, vacuum pan or centrifugal, instead of yellow refined Canadian sugar, there would have to be a higher price charged by the refiners on the granulated used, to make both ends meet. So that I do not think anything would be gained to the consumer in the cost of yellow sugar, but the consumer of granulated would have to pay a higher price. There is another reason why, in Canada, we should have a higher rate of duty than they have on refined sugars in the United States. It is well known, I presume, to the hon, gentleman, that in the old country, in Scotland at all events, where there is demand for a large proportion of high-priced sugars, granulated, powdered, Paris lumps and that quality of sugar, there is a large proportion of the very low grades of yellow refined sugar made, and it requires a duty equal to the duty we have here to keep that low grade of refined sugar out. I believe it is desirable, in the interests of the consumer, to keep that low gradeout. It is a very poor quality of sugar and very unwhole- free, and that the manufacturing shall be done in some, and it is desirable to keep it out altogether if we can, just as we prevent the oleomargarine from being imported to be used instead of butter. Under our present tariff, keeping in view the qualities of sugar which are saleable in our own market, our refiners are able to supply the demand for granulated, and at the same this great demand for yellow sugar, and they are able to give the consumers both the granulated and the yellow sugars at prices which correspond very nearly with the New York prices. I took down the figures the hon, gentleman himself gave. The difference in granulated between Montreal and New York is only 3 of a cent on granulated, and only \(\frac{1}{4}\) of a cent on yellow, so that the price at which our refiners furnish this, compared with New York, is very little more than the difference of freight at present between Montreal and New York. So that, however correct the hon, gentleman's theories may be, the practical effect of our duty is to give the consumers of Canada granulated sugar at the cost of granulated sugar in New York with the freight added, and at the same time to supply the large quantities of yellow we require large quantities at the same comparative price, and we are giving a very good quality of both. I think the practical effect of the tariff which has been adopted shows that it is well suited to the wants and to the trade of this country.

Mr. FOSTER. I would not have risen but that the hon, gentleman opposite made an appeal to me in reference to this question, and, also, because I desire to touch particularly on one point, that is, as to the West India trade. One could not but be somewhat amused at the bland and surprised face of my hon, friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) when he actually discovered that we were giving protection to refiners. It would naturally strike a spectator in the gallery that we had never done so before, but at half-past five o'clock the hon, gentleman woke up to the fact that we were giving protection to the refiners. The hon, gentleman has somewhat changed his base since he spoke before on this subject, because I then understood him to desire free sugar altogether, but now he says that these bloated monopolists, the refiners, ought to have a fair protection, but that this is giving them an unfair protection, and he wants to know why we do not make it the same as it is in the United States, 2 of a cent less than our proposal. The han gentleman is gradually coming round, and no doubt the extracts which were read by my hon, friend from Bruce have had their effect upon him. I noticed that they had a very hon, member effect upon the for marked South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who said, in terms not very complimentary to the country or to this House, that the people had been bought up like sheep in shambles, and that the sugar refiners had invaded the offices of the Minister of Customs and myself, and had dictated the terms The statement in the one case of this resolution. is as gratuitous as in the other, and without any fuller foundation. Let me inform the member for Brant that the system of protection in Canada was adopted in 1878, and we have continued it up to the present time in 1891, and that we propose to keep it on the Statute-book. Our principle is that the raw material shall, as far as possible, come in the country. Since 1879 we have had a tariff on raw and refined sugar, and we have given a protection to the refining industry in Canada. We have discussed the question here and in the country, and I am willing to leave it to the country to decide at any future time. We, to-day, give the refiners less protection than we did, and we have removed three millions and a half from the consumers. We propose to keep in of a cent as a fair protection to the refiners on the clear grounds of our policy. So much for that. In the next place, my hon, friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) has anticipated me, and stated to the House some reasons why the duty should be somewhat higher here than it is in the United States of America. I am willing to leave this matter to the country. Whatever my hon, friend may state about this immense burden of 15 of a cent, I know his object. When the Government took off three millions and a-half from sugar and made that amount a present to the people, the Government did something for which the country would naturally be grateful, and now, at the end of the discussion of this matter, the intention of hon, gentlemen opposite is to try to minimize the effect of the Government policy. I am willing to let the people work it out practically and I have nothing to fear for the Government or for its policy in this respect. My hon, friend is very fond of quoting the United States tariff, and he says that the United States only charge $\frac{a}{1\pi}$ of a cent to the refiner, or $\frac{a}{1\pi}$. Is he not aware that, after the 1st January, 1892, that may be no longer the amount of the duty, and that it will not be the amount except in regard to those countries which give a reciprocal return to the United States? After that date, on this very class of sugars above No. 14, the United States duty will not be $\frac{5}{16}$ of $\frac{6}{16}$ of a cent, but $1\frac{5}{4}$ cents a pound. A good deal has been said about the gentleman who went to Jamaica and could not get his sugar in at the same rate as other countries could. The proposition we made to Jamaica and the other West India Islands was not that we would take off our tariff without getting something in return, but that we would sit down with them and have a trade policy adopted between the two countries giving equivalent advantages to both. We are willing to give them advantages on their staples coming into Canada if they give us similar advantages on our staples. They have not yet agreed to do that. They may agree to it in the future, but, until they do that, there is nothing inconsistent in our providing that they should pay on their staples coming into this country in the same way as other countries do. The same proposition which we have made to the West India Islands remains in essence to-day, and we are prepared to sit down with them and agree upon a reciprocal scale in regard to articles on which reciprocal differentiation shall be made, in order to stimulate trade between the two countries. However, that is not yet arranged. I may repeat for the information of my hon. friend for Brant (Mr. Paterson) that we have had a protective policy since 1878, and that it has included protection for the refiner.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I was aware of that before. I differ with the Minister of Finance that now they are giving less protection than before. I contend that they are giving more. That question was Mr. Foster.

clearly argued out in this House, and I simply now point it out to the Finance Minister. I ask him if he thinks that he dealt fairly with the House in the statement he made as Finance Minister as to the position of the sugar refiner in the United States, and as to what it might be in 1892. I leave it to the House if the statement of the Finance Minister was not designed to lead the House and did lead the House to believe that it might be possible that in 1892 the United States refiner might have a protection of 13 cents a pound. Does the Finance Minister not know that that is not so? Does he not know that if that comes into effect, the raw sugar of the refiner will be taxed too? and that his protection is only the difference between the refined and the cost of the raw? He knew it, but he did not tell it to the House: but he gave the House to understand that while the United States were now only giving 1 a cent a pound protection, perhaps it might be, after 1892, that they would give 14 cents a pound.

Mr. FOSTER. On the same grade of sugar.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That is what he gave the House to understand. I leave the other statements of the Minister to be considered in the light of that one.

Mr. STAIRS. I appreciate very highly indeed the manner in which the hon, member for Brant has discussed the question before the House, and I may also say the manner in which it has been discussed by other hon, gentlemen opposite. I think the hon, member for Brant has been fair and straightforward from beginning to end. But still, if I understood the statement of the Minister of Finance, it was not exactly the way that the member for Brant put it, although I may have been mistaken. As I gathered from the statement of the Minister of Finance, the point is, that at a given date, if certain countries do not avail themselves of the privilege of entering into reciprocal trade relations with the United States, the latter country may put on a duty of 13 cents on most of their sugar. Take, for instance, Jamaica, which has frequently been mentioned this afternoon; if it does not make a reciprocity treaty with the United States its sugar will be taxed the 14 cents, while in the case of Cuba, for instance, which has entered into reciprocal trade relations with the United States, their sugar will go into the United States free. Therefore, to a certain extent, the sugar refiners of the United States will have the benefit of that 13 cents of protection against those special grocery sugars which have been mentioned here this afternoon as going into the United States from Jamaica.

Mr. FOSTER. There is the raw sugar of the Louisiana product.

Mr. STAIRS. Yes; and very likely there will be no duty on the raw sugar of the Manilla product, which is a very large one, and goes into the United States to a very great extent. I said that I appreciated the manner in which this question has been discussed by the hon. member for Brant this afternoon; but there are one or two observations that I would like to make, with the permission of the House, relative to the protection that has been given under this tariff in Canada, and that given under the Mc Kinley tariff in the United States, of which we have had very full explanations by the Minister of Customs and by the hon, member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood). There are one or two things which it is worth while for the House to consider in connection with this question that have not been pointed out by either of those gentlemen. The hon, member for Westmoreland referred to the competition he put it this way—which the Canadian refiner will feel from the low grade of raw sugar coming from the United Kingdom, though there was nothing in his remarks to show the House why that competition was of an exceptional nature. The same thing will apply to competition in low grade yellows from the United States. Now, let me remind the House that the circumstances of this refining industry in England and the United States are very different from those in Canada. In both these countries the markets are very much greater; the output of the refineries, I suppose, in some cases is tenfold greater, perhaps more, in those countries than in the refineries of Canada; and the demand, as was pointed out by the hon, member for Westmoreland, in both the United States and England is, to a larger extent than in Canada, for the high classes of sugar. This, as he pointed out, leaves the low classes of sugar to be disposed of, and hon. gentlemen know that in the United Kingdom these low grade yellow sugars are often sold at a very much lower price, proportionately, than the price at which they can be produced, because they are to a certain extent a waste product that has to be got rid of. The same remark applies to the same classes of sugars from the United States. The production of all classes of sugars in Canada must be very much smaller than it is in those countries; I do not know the exact difference, but our production can hardly be one-tenth of what it is in the United States. If these low grade refined sugars comeinto Canada duty free the refiners of the United States would have had a chance to market their surplus products here, although it might be but a very small percentage of their total output, and, at the same time, it would very slightly affect the refining industry in the United States, and the sale of the low grade sugar of the United Kingdom and the States would seriously injure the Canadian refiners, as it would prevent them selling their yellow Now, there is another point that I think ought to be brought out before this discussion closes, and that is in connection with the criticism made on this tariff by hon. gentlemen opposite, that it would affect the proposed trade with Jamaica. The hon. Minister of Finance has referred to that, but there was one thing in connection with it that he did not state. There are large quantities of sugar in Jamaica-I mean large in proportion to the whole sugar production of the world-but there are large quantities that, even under this tariff, can come into Canada, and have been coming in, under the old tariff for years.

Mr. FOSTER. And from Barbadoes.

Mr. STAIRS. Yes, they are coming in at present from all the West India Islands.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Grocery sugars?

Mr. STAIRS. Refining sugar. My point is that we can have a trade with Jamaica with refining sugars. There is a large quantity of refining sugars made in Jamaica—not large in proportion to the whole production of sugar in the world, but large in proportion to the quantity of sugar used in Canada. I know that the refinery at Halifax frequently buys cargoes of Jamaica sugar which are brought there as return cargoes for the fish that go out to Jamaica from that port. This trade can go on just as well under the tariff as it exists to-day as it did under the tariff that existed before. hon, friend opposite shakes his head; but I think I am right in my statement of facts. I know for a fact that a few weeks ago a purchase of about 500 tons of sugar, not for refining purposes, was being negotiated between Jamaica and a house in Montreal; I am sure that 200 tons of that purchase was concluded, and I think it likely that the whole of it was concluded, so that shows that sugar is coming into Canada for consumption from Jamaica at the present time. Now, in reply to one remark that was made by the hon, member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), I just want to point out for the information of the House that the difference between the cost of raw sugar and the selling price of the refined sugar in the case of one refinery spread over a period of two years—the two years, if I remember aright, ending the 31st of December last -was only 60 cents per 100 lbs., so that considering the cost of refining, and the interest on all the plant, and the refiners profit, I think the House will see that up to that date, when there was a greater protection to the refiners than at present, that refinery, at least, could not have taken any very excessive or exorbitant price for refining sugar in this country.

ONTARIO EXPRESS AND TRANSPORTA-TION COMPANY.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved second reading of Bill No. (151) respecting the Ontario Express and Transportation Company.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This Bill was introduced out of its usual course by consent of the House. It is a Bill, likewise, out of the usual order, inasmuch as it does not seek the incorporation of the company, but seeks to revive a charter which had expired, and to remove doubt as to the validity of the organization of the company. A Bill of that character ought to be carefully considered, and an opportunity afforded to any person interested to present any opposition that may exist with respect to it. I propose that the Bill should stand on the Order Paper until this day week. This announcement will give any person an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The hon. Minister having taken that position in regard to that Bill I have no objection to a postponement of one week or six weeks for the reason he has given. I have never seen a Bill treated in this way, when there was no objection to its principle and no substantial opposition was offered. There are many precedents for this legislation. I should like to compromise, by asking the Minister to allow me to move the second reading on Monday night. I would, however, ask the Minister to allow the second reading to be taken, and afterwards any person who wishes to oppose the Bill can appear before the Committee. I am satisfied that if the Minister were familiar with the facts, he would admit that there was great urgency for this legislation. I hope the hon.

gentleman will grant either one or the other of sit behind him and are largely interested in the these requests.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the Bill were read the second time to-night, it would not finally be passed any sooner than if it were read the second time this night week. I think there need be no apprehension but that there will be ample time to get the Bill through, if such a Bill should pass.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If there is no substantial opposition I suppose the Government will give an opportunity to move it?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There will be an opportunity every Monday and Friday for the rest of the session. The proposition I have made is with a view to publicity. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debateadjourned.

WAYS AND MEANS-THE TARIFF.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before a final conclusion is arrived at I wish to offer a few words in reply to the hon member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood). That hon, gentleman, when addressing the House, attempted to defend the action of the Government in excluding sugars of No. 16 Dutch standard. He said if they were admitted, two-thirds of the sugar consumed in Canada would be of the raw kind produced in Jamaica, and only one-third of refined sugar. The hon, gentleman further said, that it would seriously increase the cost of refined sugars. The result is that in order to reduce the cost of refined to those who use nothing else, those who use the grocery sugars have to submit to an increased price. This fact directly aims at the resources of the poorer classes, and tends to cheapen the refined sugars for the richer classes. That is the only conclusion to be arrived at from the hon, gentleman's remarks. It is, that in order to keep down granulated sugars at present prices, or at lower prices, you must exclude grocery sugars or the kind we would receive from Jamaica. To that point I want to direct the attention of the House. Another point submitted by the hon, gentleman was that a portion of the raw material, and it is a very limited portion, comes from Jamaica for refining purposes. If we extended our Customs Act to No. 16 Dutch standard undoubtedly we would bring in a very large quantity of sugars, but the Minister of Finance in carrying out what he conceives to be the mandate of the electors in favour of protection shuts out these sugars. It is rather amusing that the hon, gentleman not only grants the refiners protection, but in order to secure entirely the Canadian market for them, he places an Act on the Statute-book that virtually prohibits the importation of this grade of sugar that would be very desirable to a large class of consumers. He has abandoned the principle of prohibition in liquor and adopted the principle of prohibition in grocery sugars, in order to give the refiners the absolute control of the market. hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) said we can refine that particular class of sugar that would take the place of the Jamaica raw sugars if imported. No doubt, but the people would help to s of a cent for it. It is quite clear that the Minister of Finance is not acting to benefit those who purchase and pay for these commodities, but in the interest of hon. gentlemen who lonly objection would be from confectionery makers. Mr. SUTHERLAND.

refining business. That, no doubt, is the reason why the hon, gentleman has taken this action.

Item agreed to on division.

4. Glucose or grape sugar, glucose syrup and, or corn syrup, a specific duty on one and one-half cents per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. this amount to when reduced to ad valorem on the average value?

Mr. FOSTER. I think about 45 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. - What do you call the value of any glucose?

Mr. FOSTER. About 3 cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then it is 50 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. It formerly went under the different grades of the sugars.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is not that a very heavy proportionate duty?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, a pretty heavy duty. We have given the advantage to cane sugar and the like of that, and this is not of so good a quality. I think it can stand the duty. I wish to add to the end of

Or any syrups containing any admixture thereof.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the hon. gentleman had any special reason for practically barring out that description of sweet, because I take it that will be the effect of the clause. It is very much out of proportion to the duty he inflicted on the others.

Mr. FOSTER. I find that the duty is a little lower than the old rate would have been. reason for adding the amendment is, that they are bringing in syrups of a lower grade and they strengthen them with glucose. That is an adulteration and interferes with the classes of better syrups which are let in under the first clause practically free.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What you practically want is to prohibit the use of glucose?

Mr. FOSTER. There is a portion of that glucose used in confectionery, and we have manufacturers of our own for that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It seems to ruffle my hon. friend's susceptibility to ask who suggested these things, but he himself is not an fait of all the little details of the trade, and in considering these emendations he may be hitting parties that he does not know. He is making a very great discrimination against this, which as far as I remember, did not exist under the old tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. The old tariff rate was higher than the present on this.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All the sugar rates were higher than the present rates. If I understand this, it is very nearly treble the rate on the fine sugars, and that seems a very high proportion indeed. The point I want to call his attention to is, that in this new change which he is making, he is discriminating heavily against this article. That may be all right, but I would like to know if the thing has been considered.

Mr. FOSTER. It has been considered, and the

The article is made in our country and they are quite willing to get it from our own factories.

Item, as amended, agreed to.

7. Ale, beer and porter, when imported in casks or otherwise than in bottles, thirteen cents per gallon.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much does that increase?

Mr. FOSTER. Three cents, about equivalent to the increase on the malt.

8. Ale, beer and porter, when imported in bottles (six quart or twelve pint bottles to be held to contain one gallon) twenty-one cents per gallon.

Item agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. If these resolutions go through to-night, I may have something to say in reference to these two items a little later. I said just a moment ago that this was supposed to be about an equivalent to the increase of malt. I think, however, there are some points under consideration at the present time which will induce a little change in this. If so, I will have to go to the Committee of Ways and Means, with a resolution to that effect.

3. Revolved. That it is expedient to amend the Act, Chapter 32, Revised Statutes, intituled: "An Act respecting the Customs," by repealing section 94 thereof, respecting the refining in bond of sugar, molasses, or other material from which refined sugar can be produced.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Will you please explain what the effect of this clause is?

I wish to add to that: "and so Mr. FOSTER. much of section 245a as relates to the warehousing of such sugars as may be refined in bond." refers to the powers under which regulations were made as to refining sugar in bond; and, of course, as the raw material now comes in free, the clause of the Act relating thereto is repealed.

Resolution, as amended, agreed to.

On resolution 4, beet-root sugar,

I find that this section is not Mr. FOSTER. quite regular in the way it was introduced, and I will move that it be disagreed to, and will introduce a new resolution on the subject later. refers to beet-root sugar.

Resolution disagreed to.

On resolution 5, item 7,

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to move disagreement to the item referring to cigarettes.

Item disagreed to.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does the Minister know what is the difference between the Excise duty on these articles and the Customs duty?

Mr. BOWELL. The proportions are just the

6. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the foregoing resolutions and the alterations thereby made in the duties of Customs and Excise on the articles therein mentioned, shall take effect on and after the twenty-fourth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and instructions.

fourth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one.

Provided, however, that nothing herein shall be construed as exempting any sugars now held to be in bond for refining purposes, in any bonded premises connected with, or occupied in whole or in part, by any sugar refinery, which may be found on examination of the stock in such premises to have been removed therefrom; from payment of the duty properly payable thereon, under item number 419, in schedule "A" to the Act, chapter 33, Revised Statutes, which shall continue in force as regards such sugars, until proper entry thereof and payment of duty thereon has been made.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). They could not have been removed in any way, could they?

Mr. BOWELL. In the clause of the tariff which we have just repealed permitting the refining of sugars in bond, sugar was always considered in bond until the entry was made and the duty paid; and this was to prevent the possibility of sugar which had been taken out of bond, and sold previous to the coming into force of the Act, being put into another bonded warehouse and exemption claimed from the duty. Under the Act, the refiners had the right to have bonded warehouses all over the country, we holding a sufficient quantity in the refineries to meet the full amount of duty payable upon the periodical settlement that took place, and we were fearful that a large amount of the sugar which had been refined and really gone into consumption might be claimed to be ostensibly in bond; or it might be allowed to remain in the bonded warehouse, although actually sold before the tariff came into operation. If that were allowed, all sugar would have to be, in the settlement, considered as a portion of sugar in bond at the time.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then the object is that in the case of all sugars, whether refined or in the process of refining, or raw material, those holding them in bond are required to pay the full duty under the old Act before the sugars are released?

Mr. BOWELL. No; just the contrary. If sugar was legitimately in bond, whether refined, partially refined, raw or in process of refining, it would be exempt from the duty; or in other words, the refiner might have a thousand barrels of refined sugar in his premises and he would be allowed to cancel his bond just in proportion to the quantity that the refined sugar would bear to the raw sugar. The object of this clause was to prevent their claiming exemption from duty upon sugar which had actually been sold, but which was ostensibly in bond.

Mr. McMULLEN. I fairly understand the hon. gentleman now; but is he satisfied that, prior to the change in the tariff, sugars, which were virtually sold into the hands of retailers in Montreal and Toronto, were not rebonded; that is, placed back in the hands of the refiner, who rebonded them pending the action of the Government?

Mr. BOWELL. We have no knowledge of anything of that kind, but we have knowledge of this fact, however, that in the case of sugar and spirits which have paid the duties, the parties who held them claimed they were entitled to the same rights as the refiner, who was allowed for the sugar and spirits he had in bond. This claim, of course, we could not recognize; if we did, we would have to recognize the claims of every merchant who held a duty paid gallon of molasses or a pound of sugar

Mr. McMULLEN. I understood that such a thing did take place, that is, that the refiners, having the privilege of putting in bond refined sugar and taking out a proportionate quantity of unrefined, were allowed to rebond the refined and withdraw the raw. I have been informed that, in certain cases, large stocks, or even very extensive stocks, which were in the hands of retailers in Montreal and Toronto, were rebonded for the purpose of giving retailers the anticipated advantage by the change of duty.

Mr. BOWELL. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has mentioned that, and I shall instruct my officers to enquire into it. But I cannot conceive it possible, because under no circumstances are importers or manufacturers permitted to rebond goods or articles of any kind after the entry has been made and the duty paid. If the duty had not been paid and an actual bond fide sale had taken place, what the hon. gentleman has said might possibly be done, but it could not be done without the knowledge or the connivance of the officer, and I do not believe any collector would permit any such evasion of the law to take place.

Mr. McMULLEN. How is the collector in a position to decide whether the sugar taken to a bonded warehouse to be bonded has been previously in the hands of the retailer, unless there is some mark or stamp put on the sugar when taken out of the bonded warehouse? I do not know of any stamp or mark being placed on every barrel when removed from the bonded warehouse.

Mr. BOWELL. Where to?

Mr. McMULLEN. Into the hands of the whole-sale dealers.

Mr. BOWELL. Then it could not be taken back. If it were removed from the refinery into a private bonded warehouse, it would be placed under lock and key of the officer, and consequently could not pass out of his hands unless there was an understanding between the refiner and the party to whom it was sold. If it went once to the warehouse or shop of the retailer or elsewhere it could not come back into bond.
