Mr. McMULLEN. While I am quite willing to admit that in special circumstances there may be some reasons for the House acting generously with old, experienced, and worthy servants, still, we must take into consideration the facts, and hold the balance fairly between the people who have to pay the taxes and those who get the money. This gentleman was unquestionably in a very lucrative position. For many years he got $3,200 a year, and from the date of his superannuation in 1888 he has been getting $2,240 a year, which is a fairly decent allowance for an old man with an imbecile boy, and out of that he should have been able to save some money. Then it appears he is a resident, not of Canada, but of England, and spends his money there. We unquestionably would sympathize with an old man in the condition in which, perhaps, this gentleman fancies he finds himself, but if he has been fairly economical, as he should have been all this time—and this imbecile boy is certainly not a child of yesterday—he should have been able, during all the years he drew a good round salary, and during the years he had an allowance of $2,240 per year, to make some provision for his boy. However, if there was a contract entered into by the First Minister, it might be well that the Government should implement that contract, but that is something with which the House has nothing to do. We are not supposed to carry out every contract or promise made to satisfy some superannuated officer. But in the case of Mr. Wallace, that gentleman had only served for fifteen years, and enjoyed a salary of $2,000 per year, and as it was desirable to get him out of the way in order to appoint Mr. Shakespeare, the Government added eight years to his time of service, so as to give him an allowance of $912, or twenty-three-fiftieths of his salary. And, in addition, we are every year called on to vote him, by special grant, $250. He was only entitled to his superannuation based on the number of years' actual service, which would have amounted to $600, or fifteen-fiftieths of his salary, but eight years were added to his time, and, in addition, we are asked every year to vote him $250. And he, also, is living in England, there spending Canadian money. It is nothing short of an abuse of the Superannuation Act, in the first place, to add years to a man's time of service, but, in addition, we are called upon to vote another sum over and above that granted through an abuse of the Act.

Mr. MULLOCK. I would like to inquire if it is the case that the letter carriers of Toronto have not been paid their salaries for the month of June?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am sorry that I cannot answer that question this evening. Neither the Postmaster General nor his deputy is here. If the hon. gentleman will be good enough to put his question on Monday, it will be answered.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). As this is the only item left—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There will be others next week.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I will only occupy the time of the House for a few moments, and it may be as convenient to do so now. I had brought under my attention the correspondence of the postal department with reference to the superannuation of Mr. Noble, who was for many years postmaster at Parkhill. I understand that the present representative of North Middlesex (Mr. Hutchins) waited upon the Postmaster General with other parties, in order to secure the retirement of Mr. Noble. Mr. Noble declined to retire, and the post office inspector was ordered to inspect his office with reference to some complaints that had been made to the Government and report. I understand that after investigation, the post office inspector was unable to find anything that would justify him in reporting either the removal or the retirement of Mr. Noble. I understand that nevertheless his retirement was pressed, with the view of making a vacancy, and Mr. Noble, though not superannuated, was transferred to another office in the province of Quebec, having no connection whatever with the postal department. In that office, he is engaged at a much less salary, and that position he secured through the active intervention of his friend who represents the county of Compton (Mr. Pope). I understand also that Mr. Hutchins, jr., has been appointed to the office from which Mr. Noble was compelled by pressure of this sort to retire. I must say that I think that pressure was unwarranted, and that the Postmaster General did not properly discharge the duties of his office in listening to these importunities and assisting in the removal of Mr. Noble and the appointment in his place of Mr. Hutchins.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Noble was transferred to the Customs Department. There was an investigation owing to complaints made by the public, and Mr. Noble accepted the other position, without having been subjected to any pressure whatever on the part of the Government that I am aware of.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. Minister of Militia will recollect that he was allowed to pass the items of his department on condition that he would furnish a statement with respect to the suspension of Colonel Walker Powell. Is the hon. gentleman in a position to give us any information now?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I may state to my hon. friend that the Major-General commanding the Canadian Militia waited upon me last Saturday afternoon, and informed me that he had suspended the Adjutant-General, at the same time handing me a communication marked confidential with reference to that suspension. In reply to a request on my part, I have received today a further communication from the Major-General on the subject, also marked confidential, but these communications are of such a character that I do not think it would be fair to the Adjutant-General to lay them before Parliament without at the same time having the answer of the Adjutant-General to accompany them. The specific charge upon which the Adjutant-General was suspended, was that he allowed to be inserted in the 'Canada Gazette' a general order without the permission of the Major-General, and without the initials of the Minister upon the proof sheet which was sent to the Queen's Printer. I have this afternoon written the following letter to the Major-General:—

DEAR GENERAL HERBERT,—I have your report of 6th inst. respecting the suspension of Colonel Walker Powell. I notice that it is marked confidential, as was also your report of 30th June. You refer to this latter report as being official, but I cannot regard a report marked confidential in that light. What I desired was such a report as, without detriment to the public service, could be submitted to Parliament and which as soon as it had been submitted, would become the property of the press of the country. Upon consideration of the matter I do not deem the charge you specify against Colonel Powell as of sufficient gravity to warrant continuing his suspension for a longer period. You will be so good as to remove the suspension and reinstate him in his position as Adjutant-General. You will also please give directions that he be furnished with copies of your official report to me so as to give him an opportunity of answering and explaining the charges against him, with a view to such further action as may be necessary.

That is the position in which the matter stands at present.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to ask the Minister of Militia if General Herbert has any authority whatever for suspending this officer? The Minister has written a letter to him asking him to reinstate Colonel Powell, to remove the suspension. As I understand it, the Major-General commanding the forces has no authority whatever to suspend any civil officer. If he treats him as a military officer, he should put him under arrest; if he treats him as a civil officer, then, I presume, the suspension rests with the Minister, and to that clause of the letter I would certainly take exception, for the Minister indirectly admits in instructing the Major-General to reinstate Colonel Powell, that he, the General, had authority to suspend him. However, the question will come up again and will then be more fully discussed.

Lachine Canal—Construction..... $12,500

Mr. LAURIER. The Minister was to furnish us with a list of the accounts making up this sum.

Mr. HAGGART. I have brought down all the accounts.

Mr. LAURIER. What is the nature of these accounts? Were they in connection with the building of the bridge?

Mr. HAGGART. Some of them are. Most of them are in connection with the electric plant used for the purpose of moving the bridge.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to ask if the $2,000 the Government has spent for an electric plant for opening and closing the bridge has proved satisfactory to the Government.

Mr. HAGGART. I think so.

Mr. GIBSON. Well, I would like to tell the committee that the last time I was in Montreal the electric plant for the opening and the closing of the bridge had proved a failure, and the work had to be done by hand.

Mr. HAGGART. For a while it did not work well, but it is all right now.

Mr. GIBSON. How long has the bridge been successfully opened and closed by this electric plant?

Mr. HAGGART. I cannot tell.

Further amount required to cover the expenditure connected with the Columbian Exhibition—Governor General's Warrant... $25,000

Mr. McMULLEN. This item requires some explanation. I know that the accounts are closed on 30th June. I would not have been astonished if sums had been left unexpended in the hands of one or two individuals, but I find no fewer than twenty-four individuals with sums of money unaccounted for. There should have been some individual charged with the expenditure at that exhibition, but I find in the Auditor General's Report no less than twenty-four individuals with sums ranging from $20 up to $2,654.

Mr. DALY. It appears that those sums were moneys paid to the men in charge of the different exhibits while they were being placed in order.

Mr. McMILLAN. How does it come that so many of them had sums of money that were unexpended?

Mr. DALY. That has all been accounted for since.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is a Mr. Larke here who was at the exposition; who is he?

Mr. DALY. Mr. Larke was a Dominion commissioner.

Mr. McMULLEN. But there is another Mr. Larke, from Oshawa, who received a salary.

Mr. DALY. He is a son of the commissioner.

Mr. McMULLEN. What was the allowance of the son?

Mr. DALY. Three dollars a day.

Mr. McMULLEN. What was the son supposed to do?

Mr. DALY. He was the clerk, I presume, in charge of the machinery.

Mr. CHARLTON. What machinery?

Mr. DALY. The engines running the machinery for the Canadian exhibit, and there had to be some one to take charge of them. He had $3 a day, and $3 for living expenses.

Mr. CHARLTON. Was he an engineer?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Were his expenses paid to Chicago and back?

Mr. DALY. I presume so.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What was the total sum paid to him?

Mr. DALY. I do not know. You will see that in the Auditor General's Report next year.

Mr. CAMPBELL. How much did Mr. Larke, senior, get?

Mr. DALY. The salary of Mr. Larke, senior, was $10 a day, and $3.50 a day for living allowance.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Auditor General's Report says it was $5 a day.

Mr. DALY. That was the sum allowed by the Order in Council appointing the gentleman. He received $3.50 a day for living expenses.

Mr. McMILLAN. There is a Mr. Cockburn, M.P., and there is a Mr. H. C. Cockburn. Is he a son of the member?

Mr. DALY. Yes. I may say that Mr. Larke got $2.50 a day less than Mr. Awrey, who represented the Ontario Government.

Mr. LAURIER. Is that the best answer you can give ?

Mr. DALY. To what ? I have answered every question the hon. gentleman asked.

Mr. LAURIER. You mentioned that as a sort of an answer to the hon. member for Huron—saying that Mr. Larke got less than Mr. Awrey. What has that to do with it ?

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentlemen seemed to imply from their questioning that Mr. Larke was being paid too much, but although he was a commissioner for Canada, he received less than the assistant commissioner for Ontario.

Mr. McMILLAN. How many assistant commissioners had Ontario ?

Mr. DALY. One.

Mr. McMILLAN. How many had the Dominion ?

Mr. DALY. Mr. Cockburn, Mr. Tassé and Mr. Larke.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Had Mr. Larke any holidays for special services during the exhibition ?

Mr. DALY. No, he had not, he worked very hard. During the exhibition, Mr. Larke gave his whole time and attention to the work of his office.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). Will we have any report from our double-headed commissioners ?

Mr. DALY. The report is in the hands of the printer, and will be distributed as soon as printed. It will contain full items of the expenditure.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is this Mr. Cockburn mentioned there the member for Centre Toronto ?

Mr. DALY. The same gentleman.

Mr. McMULLEN. I may say that I visited the exhibition, and I want to bear testimony to the efficiency with which Mr. Cockburn discharged his duty. He did well, and we have made a very creditable exhibition.

Mr. CHARLTON. I was there also, and I think the exhibition was highly creditable to Canada, and I can bear testimony to the efficiency of Mr. Larke. I believe that Mr. Larke was an efficient public servant. The exhibition necessarily cost us a good deal of money, but I do not think we should be too critical on that point. We may congratulate ourselves that we made so creditable an exhibition.

Mr. McMILLAN. I visited the exhibition also, and I may say that I was highly pleased in meeting both Mr. Larke and Mr. Cockburn. But I cannot understand how it was necessary to place money in the hands of twenty-four individuals, money that was not spent, and money that they held over after the financial year closed.

Mr. DALY. I will explain to the hon. gentleman if he will give the names of any of the individuals.

Mr. McMILLAN. I can give names of the whole of them. William Andrews, $100; Miss R. J. Barrett, $290; T. J. Bell, $151; F. Retz, $50; W. I. Buchanan, $180; The Cockburn Manufacturing Company, $1,629; W. D. Dimmock, $663; D. A. Esdaille, $120; A. Hughes, $92; G. S. Clarke, $2,654; J. B. Lynch, $40; T. W. Laren, $100; A. W. Ponton, $350; Hayter Reed, $1,640; J. W. Robertson, $100; J. J. Roddick, $200; R. H. Selwyn, $435; James Smith, $1,950; William Smith, $50; Hon. Joseph Tassé, $3,850; J. A. Tracey, $20; Philip Veale, $300; William White, $225; G. R. R. Cockburn, $4,425; or a total of $19,614.

Mr. DALY. Every dollar of the money mentioned has been accounted for, and vouchers are in the hands of the Auditor General. These sums were advanced to the different parties for travelling and other expenses connected with the inauguration of the work at the Columbian Exhibition, and expenses during that exhibition. The parties have accounted to the department for every dollar they spent.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What was the total cost ?

Mr. DALY. The total cost of the exhibition was about $230,000.

Mr. LAURIER. So it is cheaper for the Government of Ontario to employ and pay Mr. Awrey ?

Mr. DALY. We can make a fair comparison with Ontario.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). What department was in charge of Mr. Hayter Reed ?

Mr. DALY. He was connected with the Indian Department, of which he was commissioner.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will these accounts appear in the Auditor General's Report ?

Mr. DALY. Yes; and also in the report that I hope shortly to bring down to the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many officers were sent from the Indian Department, and from the North-west to the exhibition ?

Mr. DALY. One; Mr. DeCazes.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Hayter Reed, it appears, was there, too.

Mr. DALY. Only two or three days, on his way to Regina.

Mr. McMULLEN. Have his expenses been paid and charged to the Indian Department?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. What duties did he perform?

Mr. DALY. His duties were in connection with the installation of the exhibits by the Indian industrial schools, which were very creditable, and elicited very favourable comment, particularly on the part of the people of the United States, who are very much interested in the Indian population.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the officer to whom reference has been made was in charge of the Indian exhibits, what particular necessity existed for sending Mr. Hayter Reed there?

Mr. DALY. His duties were in connection with the installation of the exhibits, and he was obliged to be there, because Mr. DeCazes could not leave his agency at the time. He arrived after Mr. Reed had left. Mr. Reed was there not more than four or five days.

Amount required to refund bonus paid on a timber berth, and also to refund the actual outlay for surveys of certain timber berths, all in the late disputed territory $3,250

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman state the circumstances connected with this payment, and the names of the parties to whom this bonus has been or will be paid?

Mr. DALY. The bonus was paid to McArthur, Boyle and Campbell, the amount being $2,400, this being in connection with timber berths in the disputed territory, and they also claimed that they had expended $750 for surveys. It was found on examination that the claim made was not excessive. The total amount of $3,250 appeared in the Supplementary Estimates for '92-93, but McArthur, Boyle & Co. did not accept the amount within the allotted time, and this vote is required to be made in order to pay off the claim, they having expressed their willingness to accept the amount in settlement. All similar cases were dealt with in the same way.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to know in what sum the country has been mulcted to pay for similar claims on account of timber berths, and also for legal costs incurred. What is the total loss occasioned by this attempt to get hold of the disputed territory?

Mr. DALY. I have not the details here; but it was a considerable sum.

Mr. CHARLTON. The transaction was due to the fact that the Dominion Government was in such great haste to secure possession of the disputed territory. The result has been a loss to this Government for various payments made, as well as cost of surveys and legal expenses, and so forth. This is a penalty for adopting a policy not in the public interest, which it was well known at the time was not in the public interest, and which resulted in granting timber berths to friends of the Government at the nominal rate of $5 per square mile. I hope there will never be a recurrence of this policy.

Amount required to recoup the North-west Mounted Police for assistance given to destitute half-breeds in the North-west..... $500

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the hon. gentleman please explain this item?

Mr. DALY. During the winter, cases of destitution arise among the half-breeds, and they are relieved by the Mounted Police at the nearest post. They feed the half-breeds and clothe them if necessary, and get what work they can out of them. It is really a matter of charity, and it is necessary to be done.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the condition of the half-breeds? I understand that not many of them take to agriculture, and that they are in a rather destitute condition, in fact, so much so that many of them have applied to be admitted to the Indian bands and receive annuities. Will the hon. Minister state to what extent that report is true?

Mr. DALY. In some districts the condition of the half-breeds is not at all satisfactory, indeed, they are very poor. In other districts where they give their time and attention to agriculture, they do very well indeed; but unfortunately, owing to their fondness for liquor, and the proximity of towns where liquor can be obtained, they have not done so well. These people are moving further north and west. But, taking the half-breed population of the North-west as a whole, their condition is not different from what it has been for some years. But in some localities they are very destitute, and they are being looked after. As to the rumour that applications have been made by half-breeds to enter as treaty Indians, that occurred in only a very few instances.

To provide for advance of seed grain to settlers in the North-west Territories..... $51,903 67

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This requires a good deal of explanation. I need not say that I am exceedingly sorry to see such an item appear again in our Estimates at all. I fear that the knowledge that it has been necessary to advance over $50,000 to settlers in certain parts of the North-west Territories for the purchase of seed grains, cannot be relied upon to encourage immigration to that country. But to my mind what this suggests is more important even than the amount of money. All along, I believe—and I am afraid that the country will discover that the suspicion is too well founded—that very great carelessness has been displayed in allowing or encouraging the settlers to go into sections of the country which are not very well adapted for agricultural pursuits. One grave error which I believe has been made by the Government from first to last in the attempt to colonize the North-west has been this: that instead of trying, as they ought to have done, to concentrate the settlers as much as possible together, and to create in the first instance a large and prosperous province, from which settlement would naturally radiate, the Government agencies have encouraged the settlers to spread themselves over an enormous extent of territory in small numbers, and have permitted them in many cases to go to sections of the country which were not at all desirable for settlement, while we possess so much very good country that is unoccupied. I would like to know very particularly, and in full detail, what particular portions of country have suffered so severely from drought and other causes as to make it necessary for the Government to ask for $52,000 for advances of seed grain? That ought to be sufficient to supply 2,000 or 3,000 settlers with all the seed grain that could be required, if that is the sole purpose to which this vote is to be applied, and it does appear to me very extraordinary that we should be required to supply any such number of persons at this time.

Mr. DALY. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I may say that the districts to which this seed grain was sent are the south-eastern portion of Assinibola, the Moose Jaw district, a settlement called the Grampian Hills to the north of Regina, and the Prince Albert district. As early as last December the representatives of these districts sent representations to the Government from the boards of agriculture and other societies to the effect that owing to the hot winds and drought of last year the people in those districts were without seed; but that had not discouraged them, they having gone ahead and ploughed their land in the fall and got ready for crop this spring; and that owing to the calamity I have referred to, they were without seed. The representations made by the members for these districts were accompanied by petitions from the people who required seed. After those petitions were received, one of the officers of the department at Winnipeg was sent out to verify the facts therein stated, and upon the report of that officer the seed was furnished to the settlers. It was distributed through the different agricultural societies. These people had in the first place to make a statutory declaration under oath that they required this seed, that they had so much land prepared to put it in, and how many bushels of wheat, oats and potatoes they required for seed. Then they gave a bond, signed by themselves and two sureties, as security for the repayment on or before the 1st of next April. In the case of those who have not yet got their patent, the Government have a double security. I regret as much as the hon. gentleman does the occasion of our having to ask for this vote. It was only after grave consideration was given to the subject that the Government advanced the seed grain, and it was only after a full inspection, and upon the strongest representations to the Government, that it was an absolute necessity to relieve these people that this aid was given. It consisted of 52,100 bushels of wheat, 41,000 bushels of oats, 4,200 bushels of barley, and 100 bushels of potatoes, making in all 97,400 bushels, of the value of $43,658. The sacks in which the grain was sent cost $3,487.06, the freight was $3,158.61, and the incidental expenses, such as the services of the Government grain inspector, travelling expenses, telegrams, postage and so on, were $1,500, making a total of $51,903.67. As I have said, the grain is advanced on condition that it is to be repaid on or before the 1st of April, and the settlers failing to repay it then will be charged 6 per cent. All the seed was purchased after tenders were asked for and samples furnished. The wheat was purchased principally at Indian Head, where the best samples were got. The price of the wheat averaged 52 cents per bushel, the oats ran from 33 cents to 40 cents, according to location, the barley was 45 cents, and the potatoes ran from 34 cents to 50 cents per bushel, according to location. The declaration accompanying the application for the seed grain sets forth the name of the applicant, the number of the section, the township and range, the number of acres ready for crop, the quantity of seed required, etc., and the applicant agrees that it shall be sown this season. That declaration is made in the presence of two witnesses, who verify the statements contained in it. The applicant also gives a lien on his land for the repayment of the seed. The lien is given by those who have not homestead patents. Bonds, as I have said before, were with the usual conditions entered into by each person who obtained the wheat and two sureties. The distribution of the grain was made by the agricultural societies of the various districts, according to the mode adopted some years previously, and which has been found to work satisfactorily. Special arrangements were made with the Canadian Pacific Railway under which they gave reduced rates. The rates were as follows:—

100 miles and under.	2½ cents.
100 to 200 miles.	3½ do
200 to 300 do	5 do
300 to 400 do	6 do
400 to 500 do	7 do
500 to 800 do	8 do

All the grain, before being purchased or delivered, was inspected by Mr. Horn, of Winnipeg, the Government inspector, and had to pass inspection before it was received by officers of the department. It is expected that all this grain will be returned on or before next April, and I am glad to say that the reports from the districts to which the grain was sent, are very encouraging. They have had good rains, and their crops look well. It is, of course, a matter of much regret to myself as well as to the Government that we had to come to the aid of the people, but that is only what was done before. It is only what the municipalities and the Government of Manitoba have had to do in other portions of the country, and I am satisfied it would have been a great injustice to those people who, owing to the hot winds and drought, were unable to get their own seed last year, but had faith still to plough the land and put in seed this year, if the Government had not come to their aid in this manner.

Mr. RIDER. How many applied for and received assistance in this way ?

Mr. DALY. I could not give the approximate number.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Are they new settlers ?

Mr. DALY. Some are, and others are not.

Mr. CHARLTON. How long have they been settlers ?

Mr. DALY. It depends on the locality ; some two and three years, and others four years. The whole trouble was occasioned in three days by a hot wind which came from the south, and scorched these districts to such an extent that the settlers lost everything they had, and under those circumstances it was necessary for the Government to come to their assistance.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). After that they ploughed by faith ?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). Was there any limit to the quantity of seed each one could get ?

Mr. DALY. Every petition that came in was accompanied by a list of the people, their sections, townships and ranges, and the amounts they required. That was checked over by an officer sent out, and the applications were refused in a great many instances. We did not give them all they asked by any means, but only sufficient according to the circumstances and according to the condition the officer found them in, on consultation with their neighbours.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the maximum grant to any one ? No doubt you fixed some limit.

Mr. DALY. I see, on looking down the columns of the schedules, that the average would be about 55 bushels of wheat and about 30 bushels of oats. In some instances, 100 bushels of wheat were asked for, and in others 75 and 80. In one instance 125 bushels were asked for, but the average was about 55.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). Is not that a very large amount to give ? One hundred bushels would sow over sixty acres, allowing 1½ bushels to the acre.

Mr. DALY. That is what we allowed them. The average would appear to be about 55 bushels.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). In addition to the barley and oats, this would stock a pretty good farm.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Apparently at least 1,000 settlers, on an average, must have received assistance.

Mr. McMILLAN. Was there a lien taken upon the lands for the seed ?

Mr. DALY. Yes ; on the lands of those who have not obtained their patents. In the case of the others, a bond was taken with two sureties.

Mr. McMILLAN. In visiting the Northwest, I met two or three settlers who had taken up land that had been previously ploughed and then abandoned by former settlers, and they were held subject to the lien. Although the land had been cultivated, it was not in as good condition as if it had never been touched, because land is not benefited if only ploughed for a year or two, and it is certainly unjust to the new settlers that they should be compelled to assume the lien to which the land was subjected by the previous settlers.

Mr. DALY. I think the hon. gentleman must have been misinformed.

Mr. McMILLAN. No ; because one of them is a very near relation of my own, and I went to his place and saw his papers.

Mr. DALY. I agree with the hon. gentleman that any person who takes up land from the Government as a homestead should get it free from any encumbrance or lien. That is the intention of the law. If the hon. gentleman will give me the address of the friend he talks of, I will inquire into the matter.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). In former cases where seed grain was given, what percentage was paid back ?

Mr. DALY. I went into that last January and found it was in the neighbourhood of 50 per cent.

Penitentiaries - Kingston... $200,065 73

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman had probably better make such statement as he sees fit as to the various investigations that have been going on under the guidance of his department, perhaps of himself, into the affairs of Kingston Penitentiary for some considerable time back. I need not tell the hon. gentleman that there have been all sorts of rumours, all sorts of statements, all sorts of suspicions; but whatever information he has to give with respect to these proceedings, had better be given before we proceed to discuss the item.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Perhaps I had better, first, give an explanation as to the decreases and increases in the Estimates. We have a net decrease in salaries of more than $400. The statutory increases amount to $960 and the decreases to $1,400. These decreases are made up as follows: One supernumerary guard less, $500; one mason instructor, $600; farmer and gardener, now $600, formerly $700; assistant chief keeper of prison of isolation, $700, formerly $800; guard at $500, resigned and replaced by one at $400. In rations there is an increase of $147. Considering the fact that the estimated prison population for 1893-94 is more than for the present year, this head should show a decrease. But the increase is caused by a more conservative and correct estimate of the produce grown on the farm being made. In convict clothing there is an increase of $555.75. When the Estimates for the past year were prepared there was a large quantity of convict cloth and clothing on hand, but it is expected there will be very little at the beginning of the present year; therefore the estimate has been increased. Discharge clothing, an increase of $530. That is accounted for in the same way as convict clothing. Officers uniform, increase, $871.02. A larger number of the staff are entitled to Sunday uniforms and overcoats this year than last year. Officers' mess. This is what I explained to the House in connection with the other penitentiaries. At dinner hour rations are served to the officers instead of their being obliged to go to their homes to the mid-day meal, or bring it with them in cans. The amount required is $786.55. The provision for the officers' mess is a new provision. This is the second year. Bedding shows a decrease of $638.10. A smaller number of rugs and new blankets will be required this year. The kitchen calls for an increase of $329.90. It has been found advantageous to purchase tinware for the dining hall rather than make it in the institution. Industries show a decrease of $8,000. This was voted last year for the purpose of trades in the prison of isolation. In maintenance of buildings there is a decrease of $773. Last year $300 was voted for wire screening and $440 for patent locking bars, and these votes are not needed this year. Heating shows a decrease of $47.50, made up of small items. In lighting there is a decrease of $1,367.33. Five hundred dollars was voted for an armature last year that is not required this year, and there is $200 less for lamps. In the maintenance of machinery there is a decrease of $5,202.75. Two thousand dollars were voted for a Worthington pump last year and none is required this year. The remainder is required for the new water-works. In the farm there is increase of $210 to buy horses. In miscellaneous there is an increase of $200, which includes certain small items. This account is always overdrawn and it was thought best to increase it. The item now under discussion does not include the vote for improvements in connection with the building, but I think I had better read the memorandum of works proposed for the information of the House. They are, additional machinery, officers' houses, female prison and asylum, and a vote to enable us to purchase manilla fibre for the binder twine factory—the additional machinery also being for the same factory. As regards the investigations that have been carried on in connection with Kingston Penitentiary, I made a pretty full explanation on a previous occasion, and laid on the Table the records of the investigations which had taken place down to that time. The explanation I then made covers almost everything I have to say to-night. The rumours to which the hon. gentleman refers and which have had a very wide circulation in the province of Ontario, have arisen chiefly from statements made by discharged officers. In connection with the management of so large an institution, I have felt it incumbent upon me to take cognizance of these communications, notwithstanding that some of them were anonymous communications and in some respects not entitled to very much credit. But, inasmuch as the slightest information is enough to put one on his guard as regards matters of expenditure and management in an institution (the vote for which is upwards of $200,000), I thought it proper that an investigation should be set on foot. That investigation was commenced in the summer of 1892 and was continued for upwards of six weeks under the inspector of penitentiaries. A very close scrutiny was made of the affairs of the prison and statements were got from every officer in the institution from the head to the junior officer with regard to the management of affairs. The testimony which was taken in 1892, I laid on the Table of the House last session. It disclosed a state of things which showed that an examination had been necessary. The principal defect which the examination disclosed was an utter want of proper system in keeping the accounts. It was ascertained that the accounts had not been properly kept by the accountant, that moneys had been received by the accountant which were not credited to the purchasers of articles from the prison, and on the books there appeared to be a considerable number of accounts due by customers to the prison which were afterwards found to have been duly paid. But the chief complaint I had to make against the accountant was that, without the consent of the department, he had been obtaining a free supply of fuel. The same, also, was the case with the steward of the institution; but I have reason to know that the steward had acted in good faith, that he had been assured by the accountant that the authority of the First Minister of that time had been given for both officers obtaining free fuel. Subsequently the steward, having reason to doubt the correctness of that statement, paid for his fuel, and without complaint or detection on the part of the department, he set himself right as far as he could. Under these circumstances I was obliged to call upon the accountant to resign, taking the option of dismissal, and he resigned. The investigation disclosed that not only was that fault existing in the accountant's office, but that some of the subordinate officers of the prison had not been keeping the accounts which he should have kept—principally as regards the farmer. The accounts of farm produce which the farmer alleged to have been raised did not tally with the amount of produce with which he was credited by the steward, and it was alleged that the discrepancy was due to the fact that he was not keeping proper account of the produce of the farm, and was not taking credit to himself as he should have done, for produce delivered to the prison. That was especially the case with regard to the killing of animals on the prison grounds, principally as regards pork, and if one could take as established the accounts which were available of the amount of pork delivered to the steward of the prison by the farmer there was a very large discrepancy between the quantities killed by the farmer and those delivered by him to the steward.

Mr. McMULLEN. To what extent?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I should think, for instance, as regards the hams and particular cuttings of that kind, the amount might run up into the hundreds, taking a number of years past. But the returns laid on the Table show that. I am satisfied that is not to be accounted for by the dishonesty of the farmer, but by gross carelessness and stupidity in keeping the accounts, and from the fact that the farmer did not think it worth his while to get proper vouchers for the products he delivered at the prison, and the steward on his part thought it was not his business to keep the accounts. At any rate, a most careful investigation was made with the view of detecting whether that was the result of fraud, and we came to the conclusion, after testing the matter in every way, and giving the farmer the best opportunity to explain his position, that it was not due to fraud. I dismissed him from the office of farmer. He has subsequently been employed in the capacity of a gardener, but without the allowance of a house which he had as farmer. When that investigation was concluded, and the results laid on the Table of the House in 1893, and while I was away from the country, some anonymous communications were addressed to the member for North

York (Mr. Mulock), and he was good enough to give us an inspection of them. These alleged that the former investigation had been superficial by reason of the fact that the inspector had not gone deeply enough into the transactions of the institution, and that his impartiality was affected by the fact that he had been interested to some extent in obtaining prison supplies, himself. When I returned last autumn, communication was made to me of these anonymous letters, and I immediately set on foot a further investigation. In the first place, the inspector was required to resume his investigation, to go over the ground again, to summon before him the persons who were believed to be the authors of those letters, and to summon before him the persons who were known to have made statements reflecting on the management of the prison, for the purpose of ascertaining how far, if at all, these statements which had been circulated derogatory to the management of affairs, were reliable. The investigation therefore went on under the inspector himself; but I followed that up by an inspection, and examination, by the chief accountant of the department, the accountant of penitentiaries, whose duty it is to have a supervision of the accounts of all the prisons under our control. He conducted his investigation on an independent line entirely, not interfering in any way with the investigation of the inspector, nor did the inspector know what lines of investigation he was pursuing. He went largely over the same ground that the inspector had traversed, but devoted himself more particularly to the investigation of the system of account-keeping in the prison. He arrived at practically the same conclusion that had been arrived at in the former investigation: that what appeared to be discrepancies in the accounts of the farmer, were not due to fraudulent conduct on his part. Further developments were made as to misconduct on the part of the accountant of the prison, which confirmed me in the opinion that the action I had taken was justified, notwithstanding the painful circumstances which were connected with the deprivation of office of an old servant, followed by a severe illness as the immediate result of the disgrace, and loss of the means of support. The accounts of the prison were put on a thoroughly practical basis, as well as I can judge from the reports that have been made to me of this investigation. I think the result of all the investigations that have taken place establishes that there was perfect integrity on the part of the warden and his officers, with the exception of those I have named. All who are acquainted with the warden of the institution know that he is advancing in years, and the position is one which involves an enormous amount of work and detail, both as regards the officers and as regards the ordinary prison administration. Notwithstanding all that, I have come to the conclusion that no reproach whatever rests upon him except from inability, in consequence of his work and advancing years, to control and supervise, as one would have liked, the operations of the farm in previous years, so as to detect the want of system and the lack of zeal and industry in checking the accounts of the institution. As regards the charges which were made against the inspector, and reflecting upon his impartiality in conducting the investigation, I have to say that they were completely disproved. For instance, some articles had been received, it is true, from the prison by the inspector. The accounts show that he had purchased them like any other customer, and had paid for them at the time. Some little articles of work which were supposed to have been done for him were also paid for, and altogether the suspicion in the minds of the officers who, being discharged, made complaints against the prison management, arose from the fact that he was known to have received certain things from the prison, but the persons giving the information were not aware that he had paid for them as any other customer would. There was one little matter, some work done upon a tombstone, that amounted simply to this: the tombstone, or monument, had been purchased from a stonecutter at Portsmouth, and had been sent by water to the penitentiary grounds at Kingston, and the chief trade inspector in the prison thought that some little work might be done upon it advantageously by the prisoners, but the work was not advantageous, had not been ordered, and under the circumstances ought not to have been charged for. The work that is being carried on in the prison now is largely in connection with the new prison building, which I described to the committee last year. I should be exceedingly obliged if hon. members, according as their convenience permits, would visit the institution, so that they would be able to understand perfectly what the plan is for improving it and carrying it on; what the wants of the institution are, and, at the same time, understand its efficiency. The prison of isolation constructed out of one of the old workshops, is one of the best prison buildings in America, and those who think it so are interested in prison management, and have given a great deal of time and thought to prison buildings and prison management of every kind. It is proposed to confine in that prison of isolation two classes: those who are almost beyond recovery, and those who have only begun in their career of crime, in order that the first class, the hopeless ones, may not contaminate the rest of the prisoners, but be confined in seclusion there; and, in order that the young, inexperienced and not hopeless class may, by being separated to some extent be prevented from becoming permanently connected with the criminal class. It is not intended that this shall be a prison for solitary confinement. The plan is simply this, that each cell, being three or four times the size of the ordinary cell, shall be as comfortable as a cell can be made, for the purpose of prisoners carrying on any industry there; and that they shall associate only with the class to which they belong. If they are confirmed criminals they will not be kept in solitary confinement, but their associations will only be with persons of their own class. Those whom we hope to reclaim will be kept secluded by themselves, will occupy cells of the same description where their trade will be carried on. The work will be carried on there by the criminals. A problem will present itself when we come to consider the kind of work that can be carried on in these cells. We proposed mat-making, chair-making, wickerwork-making, and similar industries, these industries being those generally carried in prisons of isolation of that kind. In addition, we have established the binder twine factory. As I explained to the committee, a night or two ago, we have procured a machine of forty spindles, of the most improved pattern, and in the work we expect to give employment permanently to about sixty of our convicts. And we have put the price of twine at such a figure as to enable us to receive at least a fair remuneration for the labour of the convicts, say fifty cents a day, which might fairly be charged for the labour, and this will give the cost of maintaining them and something over, though not very much. In addition we want a new lunatic asylum. The present lunatic asylum while very clean and comfortable, is unsuited in this respect, that it should be removed from the prison itself. It is now part of the main prison. The result is that we have no ground on which the lunatics can take exercise with safety. If they are taken into the yards of the prison, they have to be in the presence of other prisoners. The association is not only very disagreeable, but is very detrimental to the lunatics. It is our duty to endeavour to carry out this project, especially when we consider that Kingston has the criminal lunatic asylum for the whole Dominion. In addition, we have there the prison, for all the Dominion, for females convicts, and the present ward for women is in the lower part of the prison, in the basement, indeed, and has neither that light, ventilation, dryness, nor opportunity for exercise which a prison for women should possess, more especially as some of the women convicts sent there from time to time have young children with them, too young to be taken from their mothers. Taking these circumstances into consideration, we should have on the grounds of the prison, distinct from the prison itself, and with grounds surrounding it, which would enable the prisoner to have separate exercise, a building for women, and a building for insane prisoners. We expect to make no progress with these this year.

beyond quarrying the stone, because the work we have provided for the prison will be ample to occupy the prisoners for the whole year, except quarrying and dressing stone for the new building, and I prefer not to carry it out except by prison labour. When I say the work we have in hand, for the prisoners is sufficient to occupy all available labour we expect to obtain. I mean this, that the old prison, that is, leaving out of consideration the prison of isolation, and the more modern wards of it, was built with cells narrower than any in use in any modern institution, so narrow, indeed, that when the bed is let down the whole cell is occupied by it. So we can imagine that those cells do not meet with modern views and they have been condemned by prison associations when the prison has been inspected, as one of the great faults observable at the Kingston institution. We are devoting our energies to pulling down the walls connected with these narrow cells, and we are rebuilding them on a more modern plan, by which there will be room, at least for the prisoner to pass between the bed and the wall, or, in other words, the new cell will be one-third wider than the old one. I felt it was incumbent on us even before undertaking the work of the female prison and the work on the prison for insane convicts, to remodel the old cells, and a great deal of our work has been expended on it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am sure those hon. gentlemen who were fortunate enough to be able to hear the remarks of the First Minister, listened with very great interest to his statement as to what is being done for the work on which he is engaged in connection with the Kingston penitentiary is one of the most important to which a statesman can possibly devote himself in the present condition of our affairs. It is one of the greatest blots on our present civilization that, with all the advances made with respect to the treatment of criminals in different parts of the country, whether provincial or Dominion or municipal, there is no systematic method by which criminals are classified, and while we are endeavouring to restrain and punish criminals we are every day bringing up a fresh number to take their place. It is one of the greatest evils connected with all our provincial institutions, although I am well aware that efforts are made to effect an improvement, yet they have not been satisfactory as regards grappling with the evils resulting from the present system. If at Kingston the right hon. gentleman can set an example to other institutions and adopt methods by which this great evil can be reduced, I shall be exceedingly glad. One of the unfortunate circumstances which we have to encounter is the fact that when the right hon. gentleman speaks, the majority of members are often unable to hear his remarks and, of course, must refer to 'Hansard' on the following day to find out what he said. The subject with which the right hon. gentleman has been dealing to-night is one to which this House should give more attention than hon. members have yet been inclined to give. It would probably be an advantage to the country if these institutions were more centralized or were under one management. However, perhaps the present condition cannot be avoided. We have Dominion, provincial, and municipal legislation, and if the Government of the Dominion can set an example and show how this great evil should be combated, they will confer a great benefit on the country. Any one who has any regard for the welfare of the people must have noticed with extreme regret how often complaints are made in our counties that men are confined as criminals whose only fault is that they are unable to maintain themselves. In the county where I live it frequently happens that men are confined in the common jails as criminals simply because they have become destitute, and probably owing to illness or old age, unable to maintain themselves. This is a great misfortune, for which, of course, the Government of the Dominion are not responsible. But if the hon. gentleman, in his treatment of the prisoners over whom he has charge, can point to satisfactory results from the system he adopts; if he can show that it is possible, by a proper classification to meet the great evil of our present method, that while we are punishing the criminal we are perhaps making him a worse criminal than before, and that by want of classification we are herding together the young and reclaimable juvenile criminal by confining him in the same cell or in close association with the determined criminal—if the hon. gentleman, by his legislation or by any such process as he is now carrying out at Kingston, can do anything by example to counteract this great evil, he will be doing a very great service to this country.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to ask the hon. Minister how long it was after the investigation was held by the inspector, that the other investigation was held by Mr. Foster.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Moylan's first investigation took place in July or August, 1892; the second took place after my return, I think in the month of September or October last, and the accountant commenced his investigation before Mr. Moylan had quite concluded. He had the investigation to make with regard to the books, and when he finished that duty he went on with the general investigation, involving testimony taken from officers.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was there any intimation given, by advertisement or otherwise, to persons who had any complaint to make or were aware of any impropriety having taken place, that they would be at liberty to come forward and give evidence?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, I did not advertise, but the fact was well announced in the papers at the time. It was announced that the investigation would take place by Mr. Foster, and another investigation by Mr. Moylan. Indeed, the air was so full of rumours in regard to the complaints and the investigation that that part of the public who were interested in the matter were kept on the alert.

Mr. McMULLEN. Were any parties subpoenaed before the inspector or Mr. Foster?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, all the persons who had written letters were summoned to appear; the guards who were dismissed and were available were summoned; in several instances the inspector and the accountant heard that So-and-so could give evidence; and in the course of the examination the person who gave the principal information was asked what person could testify on this or that point. In all these cases those people were summoned.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was a shorthand report taken of the evidence given?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. Has it been printed?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, I laid it on the Table in type-writing.

Mr. McMULLEN. Of course, there has been a good deal of correspondence with regard to the irregularities. With regard to the investigation held by Mr. Moylan, he was, of course, charged with having been in collusion with the warden and having participated in some of the articles that were divided, such as pork, feed, oats, vegetables from the farm, and so on.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it was only pork.

Mr. McMULLEN. Perhaps so. Then, the other investigation was by Mr. Foster from the Department of Justice here. Now, in my humble opinion, if an investigation is going to be made into any of these institutions at all, it should be held either before a county judge or a superior court judge, instead of by any person from the department. Naturally, a sympathy will grow up between men in the Department of Justice and the Inspector of Prisons and the warden of the penitentiary. An investigation that will satisfy the public should be made by a judge, or some one apart from the officials of the department altogether; and at the same time, there should be a public advertisement inviting any person who has any information to come before the commission and give evidence. I think there was some ground for the investigation held by Mr. Moylan. With regard to the investigation held by Mr.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Foster, I have not read the report, but it is earnestly to be hoped that the efforts made will put an end to the irregularities supposed to have existed. The hon. gentleman said something in regard to monuments that were being executed in the penitentiary for Mr. Moylan. Was it denied by Mr. Moylan that anything of the kind had been done?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The circumstance of suspicion which led the person to write the letter was this. There had been a monument ordered by Mr. Moylan, on which some work had been done in the prison, and it was alleged that he had been charged with this work and had not paid for it. It was alleged likewise that the monument had been concealed from me during my visit to the prison. But the facts were these. The monument had been ordered from a stonecutter or monument-maker in Portsmouth, and had merely been sent to the prison grounds for transportation to Kingston, and thence to Ottawa, or wherever the monument was to be erected. With a desire to do some kindness to Mr. Moylan, some work had been done on the monument by one of the trade instructors. That had not been ordered, and, therefore, was not properly charged to him.

Mr. McMULLEN. It was proved that some pork or hams had gone to the house of Mr. Moylan, and Mr. Moylan claimed that he had paid for this.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The charge was brought that he had ordered the pig. It had been charged to him, and he promptly paid for it. In investigations our practice is this. When a complaint arises, we make the inspection by the inspector; if it is a matter of account we send the Chief Accountant likewise; and if we think we have got to the bottom of the matter, we do not pursue the investigation by a judge. But in the case of British Columbia, as I mentioned the other night, the investigation showed that the disorganization among the prison staff was pretty extensive.

Mr. McMULLEN. It would be well even yet to issue a commission to some judge to further investigate. No doubt the hon. gentleman is doing his best to get to the bottom of the whole thing and purge the institution of all irregularities, but there is suspicion that there are still irregularities to be removed. With regard to the pork which Mr. Moylan says he paid for, I think the hon. Minister will find that some of the officers will prove it was never weighed when it left the penitentiary, and in that case Mr. Moylan must have weighed it himself when he received it, or he did not pay for it. If it was not weighed and no account taken when it left the penitentiary, it is singular how it came that he paid for it afterwards.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He has a voucher for it, and I saw the voucher. It may yet be necessary to have an inquiry by a judge.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). Are all the supplies got by tender?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. RIDER. Has any plan been adopted for the disposal of the binder twine manufactured in the penitentiary? Can consumers purchase direct from the prison or is it supplied wholesale?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This season, and I hope for the future, too, any person can apply to the prison and obtain delivery there, but after this year our supply will be very much larger, and we may have to make arrangements for distribution throughout the country.

Mr. RIDER. Can persons buy in small quantities on applying to the prison?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, and if ordered to be sent any distance, the freight will be paid from the prison to certain points westward as far as Owen Sound. That is generally the point to which freight will be paid in connection with articles of that kind.

Mr. RIDER. Is it sold at a uniform price, or is there a discount on large quantities?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is a discount of a half cent a pound on carloads. The price is 8 cents for pure manilla and 7 cents for second quality. We expect to make 150 tons by the 1st August.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I am instructed by one of our Canadian manufacturers that the engines are of American manufacture, purchased outside of Canada, and our manufacturers feel a little sore that similar machines manufactured here should have been overlooked. I simply make the statement without any knowledge of the facts.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It may indeed be so. We obtained the spindles and the motor power and all that from one contractor, and he certainly had to purchase the binder twine machinery in the States, and it may be he obtained the motor power there too. I will inquire into the matter, and there will be opportunity on the Supplementary Estimates to discuss it again.

Mr. RIDER. Is the output for the present year all bespoken?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. By no means. We have a number of applications, and my expectation that we will not need to make any definite arrangements for sale this season is based on the small quantity and the excellent quality and the demand so far.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to draw the hon. Minister's attention to the price paid for flour. There was a contract with the Rathbun Company for strong bakers' flour at $4.69, from the 1st July, 1892, to the 30th June, 1893. The deliveries were as follows:—July 2nd, 100 barrels at $4.69. That flour was then selling in Montreal at $4.45, which makes a loss between the contract price and the selling price at Montreal of $24 on that lot. On August 5th, 100 barrels of flour were delivered, amounting to $469. In Montreal the same flour was selling at $4 per barrel, which would make a loss on the contract price of $69. On September 15th, 1892, 115 barrels were delivered at $4.69, making $539.35. The price in Montreal on that day was $4.35, which would give $488.75, or a loss on the contract price, as compared with the selling price, of $50.60. On October 5th, 240 barrels were delivered at $4.69, amounting to $1,127.60, and the price in Montreal was $4.35, or $1,044, showing a loss of $83.60. On December 7th, 120 barrels were delivered which, at the contract price of $4.69 amounted to $562.80, and on that day the same flour could be purchased in Montreal at $4.25, or $510, showing a loss on the contract price of $52.80. On December 29th, the delivery consisted of 135 barrels, which, at $4.69 amounted to $586.29, whereas in Montreal the selling price was $4.25, or $531, showing a loss of $55. On April 6th, 120 barrels were delivered at $4.69, amounting to $562.80, and the price in Montreal was $4.10, or $492, thus making a loss of $70 on the contract price. On June 13th, 115 barrels were delivered, amounting at the contract price to $539.35, when it could have been obtained in Montreal on that day at $4 a barrel, or $460, showing a loss of $79.35. The gross amount paid to the Rathbun Company for this quantity of flour was $4,854.15. And the price in Montreal would be $4,370.75, or a net loss on the flour under the contract of $485.15. If the hon. Minister will compare these statements, he will find that the prices I have given are the advertised figures at which flour was sold at Montreal at the dates upon which these deliveries were made. The loss, therefore, was not only $485.15, but the cost of carrying the flour from Kingston to Montreal.

Mr. DAVIES. What was the brand of that flour?

Mr. McMULLEN. Strong bakers was the brand.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. These figures would go to prove that it is not prudent to buy flour by contract. We accept the lowest tender. I do not remember the price. I think that the hon. gentleman must have referred to the year before last.

Mr. McMULLEN. From July 2nd, 1892, to June 30th, 1893.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I should like to compare the hon. gentleman's memorandum with the figures.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will send the list over to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think that tenders were accepted for the supply of flour for the present year a few days ago. I do not think the hon. gentleman if he were tendering, would base his tender for a year's supply on the market quotations of to-day. Flour might have sold at $5 or $5.50 when Mr. Rathbun tendered. He tendered, no doubt, anticipating a rise in the market. I carried a large quantity of wheat myself anticipating a rise; but the rise never came. Had this flour advanced in price my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) would not have come forward with a statement to show what had been gained. So long as the contract was let by tender, I do not see what complaint there can be. There were a number of tenders in. I was interested on behalf of my friend Mr. Rathbun, of Deseronto. He asked me, after the tenders were in to advise him when the tenders were opened if he was successful, because he wanted to purchase a quantity of wheat for fear of an advance, and he did purchase a quantity. I know. All grain dealers or millers in carrying on their business must allow for a rise in the market.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have no doubt my hon. friend who has just taken his seat had a powerful influence on behalf of his friend in getting him the contract. I would like to know how many tenders were in.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot remember exactly.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was the contract advertised?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. The first delivery under this contract was made on the 2nd July, at $4.69 a barrel. On that day in Montreal this brand of flour was selling at $4.45. There was not a date throughout the year when delivery was made when this brand of flour was not selling in Montreal for from 25 cents to 35 cents, and in some cases even 40 cents less than the price the Government was paying to the Rathbuns.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The market fell. We invariably get at least four or five tenders from all over the country, from Montreal, Kingston, and as far east as Halifax.

Mr. SPROULE. The fact that this firm are not Conservatives and not of Conservative leaning, and the fact that this contract was let by public tender are guarantees that they got the contract at the best figures the Government could then secure. As my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) says, they would naturally put a higher price than the market price on the day the tender was put in, in order to save themselves in case of a rise in price.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. TAYLOR. The contract was let early in June, as it was this year.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was the flour delivered by the Rathbuns' Manitoba Strong Bakers'?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think it was Manitoba Strong Bakers'.

Mr. McMULLEN. Some gentlemen asked me what brand it was. Manitoba Strong Bakers' is the best grade of flour, so that the difference would be even greater than I have quoted.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps it would be convenient to settle what business we shall proceed with on Monday.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I hope to be able to move the Bill with regard to the French Treaty and the lobster canning resolution.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 9th July, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DELAYED PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. TISDALE moved:

That Bill (No. 57) to incorporate the Gleichen, Beaver Lake and Victoria Railway Company; and that Bill (No. 157) to again revive and further amend the Act to incorporate the Brockville and New York Bridge Company be placed on the Orders of the Day immediately after routine, for consideration of the Committee of the Whole, in accordance with the recommendation of the 17th Report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think it is right at this late stage of the session to permit a proceeding of this kind. As a member of this House I take objection to it.

Mr. TISDALE. If the hon. gentleman had been at the Railway Committee, or if he now looks at the Bills, he will perhaps withdraw his objection, because they are purely formal Bills. One is an extension, and the other is to incorporate under the Model Bill a railway that no one objects to. There has been some delay in the sittings of the committee, and we were called together this morning for the purpose of expediting these Bills. If these Bills are not on the Order paper now they cannot be reached until Wednesday next.

Mr. LAURIER. There seems to be some reason in the objection taken by my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen). My hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) says that these Bills are formal. If they are purely formal, how is it that we have reached almost the dying hours of the session and nothing has been done yet with regard to them? It seems to me the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) had better follow the regular procedure.

Mr. SPEAKER. Objection having been taken, of course, the motion cannot be entertained.

MONTREAL PARK AND ISLAND RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. LISTER. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to make a correction of a few remarks I made on Wednesday evening concerning the Bill respecting the Montreal Park and Island Railway. I stated that a lease had been executed between that railway and the Montreal City Railway Company whereby the former railway company were to pay 5 per cent, which would be the revenue of the Montreal Park and Island Railway Company. I find I was misinformed as to that particular fact, the arrangement being that the Montreal City Railway Company builds the cars and other equipments and that the railway seeking incorporation now, pays 5 per cent upon the cost of that. I did not think then, nor do I think now that it is of any consequence, how the revenue of this road is derived. My argument will be the same. I beg, however, to correct the statement I made. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), who introduced the Bill, also took objection to my using the word "advocate." I desire to say that in using that word, I did not for a moment intend to impute that my hon. friend was promoting this Bill otherwise than as a member of this House honourably might do.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I intend to move, Mr. Speaker, that the Bill be sent back to committee. I do not propose to make any remarks on the Bill, further than those I made last Wednesday evening, and the correction made by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) does not render necessary any reply on my part to that branch of the case. I do not agree with him, however, that it matters very little whether there is a lease or not. The hon. member (Mr. Lister) stated then:

The leasing company is to pay a rental to this company seeking incorporation, and the rental which they are to receive is to constitute the profits of the stockholders of this company. So that the matter stands in this position, that the rental is a fixed sum; upon $500,000 it will be so much, say $50,000 if you like, upon $1,000,000 it will be only $25,000. So that the effect of the legislation is to reduce the profits that the present stockholders will receive upon $500,000 exactly one-half. The result of that must necessarily be to depreciate the security held by Mr. Williams to the extent of just 50 per cent.

If the premises of the hon. member had been correct the conclusion would have been correct also; but there is no lease and the revenue of the company is not affected by the traffic arrangement made between the Montreal Island Park and Railway Company and the Montreal City Passenger Railway Company. The road is the property of the company seeking incorporation here, and is going to be operated for their profit. Instead of the clause which was in the Bill as reported by the Railway Committee, I would ask permission of the House to insert the clause of the local charter, which reads as follows:—

The capital stock of the company shall be five hundred thousand dollars divided into five thousand shares of one hundred dollars each, with the right to increase such capital to one million dollars when a majority of the shareholders shall so decide.

The hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Girouard) has given notice to insert the words "Two Mountains" after the word "Terrebonne." That motion was made in the Railway Committee, and it was not insisted upon, because it was supposed that it was not covered by the notice. I have a copy of the notice, which reads as follows:—

The Montreal Park and Island Railway Company will apply to the Parliament of Canada, at next session, for an Act subjecting it to the jurisdiction thereof, and to confirm and increase its powers, to extend its boundaries, &c.

It does not say to which county the road shall run, though the Bill mentions Terrebonne, L'Assomption and some others. The hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Girouard) asked that Two Mountains should be added; and, to meet the views of the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies), who opposed the Bill at the last meeting, I have agreed to substitute the word "shareholders" for the words "subscribers for the capital stock" in the fourth line of clause 3. I therefore move:

That the Bill be recommitted to the Committee of the whole House, with power to insert the following clause after clause 3:—

The capital stock of the company shall be $500,000 divided into 5,000 shares of $100 each, with the right to increase such capital stock to $1,000,000 when the majority of the shareholders shall so decide;

And to insert in clause 6, after the word "Terrebonne" the words "Two Mountains"; and to substitute the word "shareholders" for the words "subscribers for the capital stock" in the fourth line of clause 3.

I may say that after $1,000,000 of stock is subscribed, a two-thirds vote of the shareholders will be required to increase the capital further.

Mr. LISTER. This is not an Act for a new incorporation ?

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). It is intended to replace the local charter. All the powers of the local charter are renewed and repeated in this charter.

Mr. LISTER. Then you ought to provide for protecting the present shareholders.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). There is a clause, which was inserted in the Railway Committee, for that purpose.

Motion agreed to, Bill amended in committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 100) to incorporate the French River Boom Company (Limited.—(Mr. Coatsworth.)

Bill (No. 82) respecting the Lake Erie and Detroit River Railway Company, and the London and Port Stanley Railway Company.—(Mr. McGregor.)

Bill (No. 138) to incorporate the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.—(Mr. Macdonell, Algoma.)

DILLON RELIEF BILL.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved second reading of Bill (No. 148) for the relief of James St. George Dillon.

Mr. MASSON. I beg leave to call the attention of the House to what I consider some of the principles that ought to be taken into account before this Bill is read. The ground on which Bills of this kind receive the sanction of this House are limited. The relief sought must be on the ground of adultery, and the rule is also clear that the party seeking the relief shall come to the House with clean hands. In arriving at a decision in this matter it is well to consider the facts as shown on the report of the committee before whom the evidence was received. It appears that these parties were married on the 27th August, 1883, and that for five years they lived together as man and wife apparently on reasonable terms. At the end of that time the husband takes his wife on a trip to France. He then leaves her—forsakes her, so far as the evidence informs us. It is also clear that before starting on his journey he contemplated such a separation. He says he had no fixed idea as to how it was to be accomplished. He did not speak of it to her. He takes the trip apparently with the idea of getting rid of his wife, and while in France he separates from her. There is no writing, no deed of separation, nothing binding on him to make any provision for her. She finds her way to Canada and for six years lives in a respectable manner with her mother. He had no reason to suspect her. He says: "As far as I knew she was living a perfectly proper life with her mother." That being the case, it is clear that he has committed an act which disentitles him to relief by this House. It is clearly laid down by the English authorities that a separation of this kind, without cause—and he puts forth no cause, except incompatibility and extravagance, no legal grounds for separation—is a bar to relief. He obtains a separation, therefore, without any just cause, and she lives there in this manner and faithful to him for the period of six years. Now, the authorities are clear that he is not entitled to relief by reason of acts of adultery committed after such an act. In a case decided in the English courts in 1870, Yeatman vs. Yeatman, the facts were very similar to the facts in this case. The husband in this case took his wife to Germany and left her there, just as this man took his wife to France and left her. She lived there and elsewhere, so far as the evidence shows, virtuous, for a number of years. Afterwards he applied for a divorce, and on the third occasion of applying in 1870 was able to prove that she had committed adultery. Relief was refused him and the judge refused a decree, closing his judgment in these words :

Nothing is more likely to conduce to adultery than throwing a young wife on the world without the protection of her husband, and desertion without excuse before adultery complained of is, therefore, in my opinion, a strong reason for withholding a decree.

This has been held strong reason for withholding a decree in England and decrees have frequently been withheld on such grounds, and I think it is strong reason why this House should refuse the relief sought for in this case. Now, another ground which I think is of vital importance for this House to consider in settling the principle on which this relief should be granted is that in his evidence, the petitioner, while he frankly stated that during the five years they had lived together as man and wife he had been faithful to her, upon being asked the question whether he had been faithful during the six years of separation, declined to answer. The committee held the objection to be a good one and did not press for an answer. But the fact is, he takes the responsibility, upon the advice of his solicitor, of objecting to answer this question, and in this manner he comes before this House. Now it is clear under the English practice and the English authorities that this is a subject that may be inquired into in such cases. The Act of 1857 fully recognized that as a defence, but no rule of procedure was laid down, and no means provided whereby this could be worked out. But that difficulty was removed by the Act of 1860, in which was enacted that :

Any person shall be at liberty in such manner as the court shall by general or special order in that behalf from time to time direct, to show cause why the said decree should not be made absolute by reason of the same having been obtained by collusion or by reason of material facts not brought before the court; and on cause being so shown, the court shall deal with the case by making the decree absolute or by reversing the decree nisi, or by requiring further inquiry, or otherwise as justice may require.

Now it may be argued that, these two grounds being the only ones, this case comes within neither of them. But the authorities are clear that the conduct of the petitioner is material which may be referred to under the second head, that is the suppression of a material fact; and the English practice provides that where the respondent does not come into court and raise that question the Queen's Proctor, representing the Queen and the public, may do so at any stage in the proceedings. The authorities put it in this way :

Until after the decree 'nisi' is pronounced, the Queen's Proctor seldom, if ever, has material on which to intervene.

The Queen's Proctor intervened after decree 'nisi,' alleging adultery by the petitioner subsequent to that charged in the petition, and on proof of it the decree was rescinded.

There are many cases cited in our authorities on that point which show that the suppression of a material fact may be brought out, and if brought out, it is an absolute bar to the relief. I do not wish to take up the time of the House further than to call attention to the authorities on that point. In Bishop on Marriage it is laid down that it will not avail the plaintiff that he is less guilty than the respondent. He must come into court with clean hands. In Geary on Marriage it is laid down that if the petitioner has been guilty of adultery he (or she) cannot obtain a separation on the ground of any matrimonial offence committed by the respondent, whether cruelty, however aggravated, or adultery or both, for adultery by the petitioner is an absolute bar. If, therefore, the act sought to be inquired into by one member of the committee, which by reason of the objection to answer the question, was not inquired into, is an absolute bar to relief, then it would not be proper for relief to be granted in this case. The distinction has been drawn in some cases that have been settled merely on the ground of practice. In our English courts, where they have rules of practice and procedure, the parties are put at arm's length, and in due time the Queen's Proctor is instructed that he is to present and upon the record the lines of his defence or the objections he has taken to the decree. He has, therefore, in some cases been ruled out by the lateness of the hour at which objection is taken, or by the manner in which the record stands; but in a court of Parliament like this, where we have no pleadings, where there are no strict rules of action whereby we are to determine whether relief shall be granted or refused, we are not bound by any such rules, and when the petitioner refused to answer that question he disentitled himself, in my belief, to relief. I would also call the attention of the committee to the evidence of collusion—which I will not allege as conclusive—which is another reason why relief of this kind should not be obtained. The recital of the facts points very clearly to a desire on the part of both parties for a divorce. It is very strange, too, that this woman who, deserted in France, after she returned to this country and lived in this respectable manner with her mother for a space of six years, should suddenly not only depart from virtue, but flaunt her conduct in the face of the world. It looks very much as if she was endeavouring to show in a public manner that after enduring her neglect for so long a time, she had at last thrown off all shackles of law or decency, and decided to flaunt her conduct before the world. There is no doubt from the evidence given that she was guilty of the act complained of. As soon as knowledge of her guilt comes to the husband, proceedings are taken, and shortly afterwards she writes a letter, which is put in evidence, to the petitioner's solicitor, in which these words are found :

Mr. Fitzpatrick has forwarded me your letter, and I hasten to answer. Will divorce be pronounced soon, as I am at least in much haste as Mr. Dillon to see this tiresome affair finished. Will you let me know when the divorce will be granted, as I do not wish to bear any longer than is necessary this name under which I have been so thoroughly unhappy.

I call attention to the facts that immediately after this departure from virtue, action was taken, and shortly after that this letter was written, which to my mind presents a suspicion, if not an evidence, of collusion. I submit therefore, first, that when he had no cause whatever to seek a separation, desertion on his part disentitled him to relief; secondly, that he is not entitled to relief on the ground that he refused to answer a question regarding his own conduct during the period of separation; and thirdly, in view of the evidence, it would be dangerous to grant relief since a suspicion of collusion has been raised.

Mr. WELDON. I rise to press upon the House the view that this House, according to the authorities, and under a sound practice, has no duty in a case like this but to grant a second reading. I will not argue the question of fact which has been raised by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson). A divorce Bill, as we all know, is a private Bill, and the practice governing divorce Bills that has prevailed in this Parliament for twenty years or longer, is clearly laid down in Dr. Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure. On page 771 of Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, I read :

The incorrectness of the procedure in the Peterson case became obvious, and the House agreed that divorce Bills ought to follow the practice laid down for all private Bills.

I turn now to the practice laid down by May, and endorsed by Dr. Bourinot, with reference to the duty of the House at this stage in dealing with private Bills. At page 726 Dr. Bourinot quotes from May :

The second reading corresponds with the same stage in other Bills, and in agreeing to it, the House affirms the general principle or expediency of the measure. There is, however, a distinction between the second reading of a public and of a private Bill, which should not be overlooked. A public Bill being founded on reasons of state policy, the House in agreeing to its second reading, accepts and affirms those reasons ; but the expediency of a private Bill being mainly founded upon allegations of fact which have not yet been proved, the House in agreeing to its second reading affirms the principle of the Bill conditionally, and subjects to the proof of such allegations before the committee. Where irrespective of such facts, the principle is objectionable, the House will not consent to the second reading ; but otherwise the expediency of the measure is usually left for the consideration of the committee.

In short the view is that on the second reading of a Bill, if the House is satisfied, first, that it has jurisdiction, and secondly, that the reasons alleged on the face of the Bill are not repugnant to some rule of policy ; in the case of divorce Bills, for instance, and if the facts alleged to support a case of adultery on the part of the respondent, are proved, then we have jurisdiction, and it conforms to our policy to support the Bill. I hold, therefore, that at this stage, there being an allegation of adultery on the part of the respondent, and there being no doubt about the jurisdiction of the House, it is our simple duty to give a second reading to the Bill. I do not forget that we have sometimes departed from a sound practice, but I think every member of the House will agree that it is better to bring Parliament back to a sound practice in this matter ; that is to say, that instead of doing as we have occasionally done, discuss questions of fact and questions of law in a full House, it would be far better to discuss questions of this sort in committee. Under the rule we have laid down, these questions of fact should be first ascertained in a small tribunal, a body much more like a court of justice, the standing Committee on Private Bills, and we would certainly prefer that these embarrassing questions should be argued out and points of fact determined there before the House deals with them. Therefore, I urge that the House simply as a matter of form, should give this Bill a second reading. I may say with regard to the positions taken by the hon. member for North Grey on points of law, some are unanswerable, so far as I know, and I will not controvert any position that he took, except as I may do so in raising this point of practice. We have been in the habit of taking the findings of the Senate Committee as our basis of fact, and in that I think we are wrong. We have our own committee in which we should ascertain the facts, instead of taking for granted the statement of facts furnished us by the Senate committee. We have the right to bring other witnesses and examine them ; and I would point out how inconvenient it is to take it for granted that the Senate committee know the facts, and our own committee does not know them at all. Let me say, though it is not very germane to this discussion, that it is well worth considering, whether the two Houses of Parliament should not agree to a special procedure in dealing with these divorce Bills, and appoint a joint committee, so that there would not have to be two distinct committees to conduct trials of fact. For my own part, I would be glad to see such a material alteration in our practice.

Mr. EDGAR. I am inclined to agree entirely with my hon. friend who has just spoken, in thinking that the Private Bills Committee of this House has the fullest sort of jurisdiction to look into all questions of fact connected with divorce Bills, or any other Bill. I think it is certainly unwise to take up the time of the House unnecessarily in assuming a condition of facts that may be disputed, or that may be cleared up by an inquiry before our own committee. I am rather inclined to think a divorce Bill might be introduced into this House as well as into the Senate, and put through our Private Bills Committee, and sent to the Senate like any other private Bill. However, that question need not be discussed just now, but I certainly think, with all due deference to the conscientious objection to which some may hold to divorce Bills in general, this Bill ought to be referred to our Private Bills Committee, and then, when we get their report, we can consider the matter.

Mr. CHARLTON. It seems, from the opinion expressed by my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) and my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Masson), and others, that a difference of opinion exists in this House as to the proper course to take in granting divorces. I have felt ever since I entered Parliament that our procedure in this House with respect to divorce was most absurd. The granting of a decree of divorce is a judicial act. I am called upon to-day to act as a judge in a matter I know nothing about, in a matter on which there is a difference of opinion as to whether the Bill should be allowed to pass, pro forma, and whether the man is entitled to a divorce or not, because of certain circumstances; a difference prevails as to the facts, and yet we are called upon to act as judges in a matter of the very greatest consequence to the individuals concerned. I contend that if a divorce is to be granted at all, it must be for certain defined acts, these acts must be defined by law, and the granting of a divorce should be a proceeding had before a court—the decree should be granted by a court; and the system of introducing a Bill into the Senate and sending it before a committee of that body, and afterwards sending down the Bill to this House, where not one in ten of the members knows anything about it, and asking concurrence in the Bill is an absurd mode of dealing with the question. It is a mode not judicial in its character, and the sooner we get rid of this system in the provinces wherein individuals have to apply to this Parliament, the better it will be to all concerned. I repeat that the granting of a divorce is a judicial act, it is one that should emanate from a court of law; evidence should be heard before a judge, and, after the evidence has been taken, the judge should determine whether it warrants the granting of a divorce, and, upon his decision the decree should be given or withheld. This duty can only be performed, properly, by a judge of a divorce court. Whether we understand this divorce case or not, we are called upon to vote on it, and I enter my protest against this mode of performing this very important and delicate task, which should be discharged by a court of law, and should come before a court and not this House for adjudication.

Bill read the second time, on a division.

EXPORTS AT NIAGARA FALLS AND FORT ERIE.

Mr. COLTER (for Mr. Featherston) asked, What is the amount and value of goods exported as freight via the ports of Niagara Falls and Fort Erie; also, the amount and value of goods via the same ports by express?

Mr. WALLACE. The value of the exports entered through the Customs at the port of Niagara Falls during the fiscal year of 1893, was $1,452,430. The value of exports entered through the Customs at Fort Erie during the fiscal year 1893 was $1,403,868. The Department of Customs makes no statistical record of goods exported by express as distinguished from goods exported in any other way.

IMPORTS AT NIAGARA FALLS AND FORT ERIE.

Mr. COLTER (for Mr. Featherston) asked, What is the amount and value of goods imported into Canada via the ports of Niagara Falls and Fort Erie, as freight; also the amount and value of goods by express?

Mr. WALLACE. The value of imports entered through the Customs at the port of Niagara Falls during the fiscal year 1893, was $1,488,023. The value of imports entered through the Customs at the port of Fort Erie during the fiscal year 1893, was $940,752. The Department of Customs makes no statistical record of goods imported by express as distinguished from goods imported in any other way.

IMPORTATION OF ALLEGED IMMORAL BOOKS.

Mr. McCARTHY asked, 1. Whether a seizure was made by the Collector of Customs at the port of Montreal on the 1st May, 1894, of certain books imported by Mr. Norman Murray, on the ground that the same were of an indecent and immoral character? 2. Whether the Commissioner of Customs has made any report, given any opinion or made any recommendation with reference to the said seizure to the Controller of Customs? 3. If so, when was the report, opinion, or recommendation given, and what was the purport thereof? 4. Has the Controller given any decision in the matter respecting the seizure? If so, what is his decision? 5. Did Mr. Norman Murray, on the 12th June last, write to the Controller of Customs, asking whether the Commissioner had reported as to the seizure, and what the decision of the Controller of Customs was? 6. If so, has the Controller answered Mr. Murray's communication?

Mr. WALLACE. My answer to the first question is, yes; to the second question, no. The third question is covered by my answer to the second question. My answer to the fourth question is, no. To the fifth question, I cannot say; to the sixth question, no; no trace of any such communication can be found in the department.

CHICAGO EXHIBITION.

Mr. INNES asked, Have the Government received any official report from the commissioners appointed to the Columbian Exhibition held in Chicago last year, or is any report expected? If so, when will said report be presented to this House?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Minister of Agriculture has received the official report of the commissioners, and it will be laid before the House as soon as printed.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURN.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I wish to state as regards two returns asked for in reference to the industries in Guysboro' and London, that the vote for publishing these returns will not be available until the Appropriation Act is passed. When they are printed they will be delivered, but I am afraid it will be after prorogation.

Mr. MARTIN. What about the two returns, one by the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and one by myself, respecting the cost, &c., of the Columbian Exhibition? I was told the other day that inquiry would be made in reference to it.

Mr. CHARLTON. The order of the House for these returns was issued early in the session, and they should have been down long ago.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I presume the reason is the same as I gave with reference to the other returns.

Mr. MARTIN. No, some of the officials of the department wrote me some time since, to know if the one return would do for the two motions, and I answered that it would, if it covered all the information I required.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will inquire about them.

Mr. McMULLEN. Three months ago an order of the House was granted for a return for the construction of buildings in Manitoba and the North-west during the last three years. That return should have been brought down long since.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have asked all the departments which have been required to furnish returns to the House to make a statement of the reason as to why returns have not been brought down, and when they expect to have them ready. I hope to have that statement at the opening of the House to-morrow.

THE TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I wish to ask information from the Government in reference to a matter which appears in the blue-book in relation to the treaty between Canada and France. I notice that in a despatch of the 6th February, 1893, the Prime Minister telegraphed to the High Commissioner, as follows:—

No draft received; no steps shall be taken towards ratification until we cable approval. At present cannot understand what terms proposed either side.

Two days later the High Commissioner telegraphed:

Treaty was signed on Monday in accordance with instructions from your Government.

Reading over the papers that have been included in this blue-book, I do not find any instructions of the character mentioned in this communication from the High Commissioner.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I presume that the instructions that he referred to were the original instructions on which the negotiations were founded. There were no specific instructions to sign the treaty. What

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Sir Charles Tupper evidently meant was: that he had signed the treaty in accordance with what he understood our instructions to be.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman mean by instructions, this Order in Council?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That, and whatever correspondence preceded it. But there is no other correspondence regarding the signing of the treaty except what is here.

THE CRIMINAL CODE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved third reading of Bill (No. 126) to amend the Criminal Code of 1892.

Mr. McCARTHY. When the amendment was made in Committee of the Whole to section 22 of the Criminal Code, I suggested that perhaps the amendment was not in the proper direction, and I am still of that opinion. I think that the power given to arrest for every offence mentioned here is not in consonance with our practice in criminal matters, nor is it any improvement upon the present system. I can perfectly understand authority being given to arrest where an offence is committed of a grievous character. But this amendment would permit the arrest of any offender for any offence against the Act no matter how trivial the offence might be. We may have gone too far already in the Act, as the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has pointed out, but that does not appear to be any justification for reconciling these two clauses of the Act by an amendment in the wrong direction.

Mr. MARTIN. The remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) appear to me to apply, not to my amendment, which was accepted the other day, but to the provisions of section 552. The only effect of this amendment is to make clause 22 clear, and to make it mean what it evidently does mean. If the objection of the hon. gentleman is a good one, it should be remedied by changing clause 552. If this amendment is not retained, it leaves clause 22 nebulous and doubtful.

Mr. McCARTHY. Perhaps clause 552 ought to be amended. It is bad enough that a person should be arrested by a police officer under clause 552, but it is still worse if he should be arrested on mere suspicion of any offence. I quite agree that the statute needs amendment, but it does not follow that because clause 552 has gone too far that we should ratify it by amending clause 22. It is far better to leave clause 22 in a nebulous state than to make it bad. I move that the Bill be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole with power to strike out the amendment to section 22.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg is right in supposing that the construction of the section as it stands on the Statute-book is the same as the amendment we adopted in committee the other day. But it may be that that section goes too far, and I would ask the hon. member to consider whether we had better not omit the amendment at present, and consider the subject more fully?

Mr. MARTIN. I am inclined to think that section 552 goes too far in giving the police officer power to arrest for every offence under the Act, and, for the reasons mentioned by the hon. gentleman, I have no objection to let the amendment stand.

Bill amended, reported, and read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

Resolutions reported from Committee of Supply (July 6th) were read the second time and concurred in.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 154) further to amend the Acts respecting the Civil Service (Mr. Costigan), read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

Bill (No. 155) to amend the Act respecting the Judges of Provincial Courts (Sir John Thompson), read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

HOUSES OF REFUGE, ONTARIO.

Bill (No. 156) respecting Houses of Refuge for Females in Ontario, read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. An Act was passed by the Legislature of Ontario applying to all offences cognizable by that Legislature, and this Bill, which deals with the same matter, relates to offences over which we have jurisdiction.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—DRAWBACKS ON ARTICLES USED IN CONSTRUCTION.

Mr. HAGGART moved that the House resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that the words 'original construction,' in section 1 of chapter 7 of the Statutes of 1882, respecting the allowance of drawback on certain articles manufactured in Canada, for use in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, shall be construed to extend and include the first iron or steel bridge erected in a locality, but not to any renewal or repair thereof:

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman please explain?

Mr. HAGGART. The object of the resolution is to give interpretation to section 1 of chapter 7 of 45 Victoria, which reads:

The Governor in Council may, from time to time, make regulations for ascertaining the quantities and values of fish-plates and other fastenings, spikes, bolts, nuts and iron bridges manufactured in Canada and procured by the Canadian Pacific Railway, to be used in the original construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as defined by the Act thirty-seventh Vict., chapter fourteen and also the quantities and values of all the telegraphic apparatus manufactured in Canada and procured by the said railway company to be used in the original construction and in the first equipment of the telegraph line in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Under this clause they sent in a request—

Mr. LAURIER. Who did?

Mr. HAGGART. The Canadian Pacific Railway—for a rebate on the steel bridges which they are now putting in on certain portions of their line to replace temporary works which they had at the time of construction. It was held that the words "original construction" prevented them from getting the drawback which they thought they were entitled to under this clause of the Act, and the object of the step now proposed is to give the interpretation indicated to the words "original construction."

Mr. LAURIER. It is difficult for any body to form an opinion as to the merits of the legislation which is now sought. The explanation which has now been given by the Minister of Railways show that this application comes from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The hon. gentleman will realize at once that the House cannot come to any conclusion upon this point unless it be placed in possession of the correspondence on which he is now acting. The very first thing he told us was that application had been made by the Canadian Pacific Railway to obtain certain things which they are not entitled to under the Act. Under such circumstances, the hon. gentleman in my judgment, cannot proceed to a conclusion with this motion unless we have the correspondence. I do not, at the present time, offer any formal opposition, I do not object that the House should go into committee, but I suggest that the matter should be left in committee until we have the correspondence before us.

Mr. McCARTHY. I understand that the explanation given us is that the words "original construction" in the charter of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company mean what they say, and that what the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are now applying for is to be permitted to get a drawback upon the iron or steel bridges which they are now building to replace original construction. I agree with what has fallen from the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House (Mr. Laurier), that it would be more convenient if we had the correspondence. I understood the Minister of Railways to say—and I suppose he does so on the advice of the Minister of Justice—that the Canadian Pacific Railway is not entitled, as the law now stands, to this drawback. What is desired then, is that an amendment should be made to the contract between the country and the Canadian Pacific Railway to give them a drawback to which they are not entitled.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think that is not exactly the position. Though it is quite proper that any application made, and the correspondence upon it should be brought down, I am afraid that that correspondence is of so meagre a character that it will not throw much light upon the question. But the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's contention is that the expression "original construction" includes every original construction on the road that is made of iron or steel. But the interpretation which I thought we were bound to put on the Act, in order to guard the Treasury as much as possible, was that it did not include these structures, in consequence of our having declared, for the purpose of the subsidy, that the railway had been finished. Now the plans and arrangements of the Canadian Pacific Railway undoubtedly were that in all these parts of the road where these structures are about to be put in, or have been put in recently, structures of iron or steel were to be inserted. But in order to expedite the opening of the road for traffic temporary structures were erected, and the contention of the company is that they should not be prejudiced by the fact that they opened the road for traffic five years before the period provided for by the contract, when, if they had occupied these five years in construction, they could have put in these iron or steel structures. And they contend that they would be prejudiced if these temporary structures of wood—such as trestles, &c.—were to be held to be the complete construction of the road within the terms of the Act. They claim that they should be permitted, notwithstanding that—for the purposes of expedition—they used these temporary structures they should be allowed to finish the road according to the original plan. And they say that that reading of the Act would be satisfied only by allowing them to insert iron or steel instead of the temporary structures, and that a drawback should be allowed upon these. It is understood to have been in the interests of the manufacturers of the country who are engaged in this kind of industry that this provision was adopted, with a view to having these structures produced in Canada, and, I think, it would be to the advantage of that industry that the drawback should be allowed on the terms contended for.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know if this will only apply to the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, only the main line—not the branches.

Mr. EDGAR. Can the hon. Minister of Railways give us an idea of the amount involved?

Mr. HAGGART. I could not give the amount.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAURIER. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman do not take this through the committee to-day, but give us the correspondence, so that we may discuss it in committee. The hon. gentleman will admit that we are not in a position to discuss it at the present time. The correspondence surely cannot be of so meagre a character as the First Minister suggested, for I understand that his arguments were derived from the correspondence.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. What I got was from arguments addressed to myself in argument by the counsel of the company.

Mr. HAGGART. I think that the application only covers a couple of pages. I have lost the correspondence. I telegraphed for it to-day and I expect an answer this evening. It was simply a request of the kind I have mentioned. I referred it to the Minister of Justice to see what interpretation he would put upon the clause of the Act, and he did not seem to think that it would allow of this drawback being given.

Mr. LAURIER. Is there a report from the Minister of Justice?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think so.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know whether there is a report or whether it was a verbal communication. At any rate it was to the effect that the clause did not cover the demand made.

Committee rose and reported progress.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Towards meeting expenses of Intercolonial Convention..... $5,000

Mr. CHARLTON. Will that convention close its labours to-morrow?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it will close to-morrow.

Mr. LAURIER. May we expect that a report of the proceedings of the convention will be laid before Parliament as soon as it has concluded its sittings?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Of course I am not in a position to promise, but my expectation is that the proceedings will be made public at the close, and, if so, they will be laid upon the Table at the earliest moment possible.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). How much does the Minister expect he will have to ask for?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think this is the last time of asking.

To pay W. Gliddon for services, according to request, as expert in ascertaining the cost of production of certain printing works as set forth in the schedule attached to the report of the referees in the case of McLean, Roger & Co. vs. The Queen, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act to the contrary..... $100 00

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Gliddon is in the civil service, and he could not be paid without a special vote.

To recoup the vote for unforeseen expenses ($10,000) and in addition to provide a further amount ($10,000) for expenses in connection with the Royal Commission on the Liquor Traffic, including translating, printing, &c..... $38,000

Mr. CHARLTON. When may we expect the report?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Well, considering the lapse of time, we may expect it at any moment; we have a right to. I am very sorry the report has been so long delayed; it is contrary to the expectations of the Government, who fully expected, since Parliament opened so late, that we should have it within the first week of the sitting. I can assure the committee that the Government have not failed to press very earnestly and with great persistence upon the commissioners, the necessity of giving us their report.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose the commission is sober enough now to make their report?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think they have recovered from the evidence they took. We have been led to expect, at least, a preliminary report about the opening of the session, but various circumstances, which have been communicated to us from time to time, have been given as delaying it. But we have the assurance of the commissioners that within a very few days the report will be ready.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the Government are disappointed, in view of the length of time that has elapsed since this commission was appointed, in not having received a report, I can assure the hon. gentleman that the Opposition are not disappointed. It was expected by many members upon this side of the House, when this Royal Commission was appointed, that the course of events would be just about what they have been, that this commission would be a very long time in making its report, that the proceedings, in fact, would be a dilatory proceeding. The temperance people of this country. I am free to say, are not very well satisfied with the course matters have taken. The pressure of temperance sentiment, we know, of course, is an embarrassing thing to the Government, and the prohibitionists' demands are demands that the Government have not been ready to take into serious consideration. The appointment of the commission was a very astute political expedient, beyond question, and I think if they had no instructions to that effect, they have imagined and have carried out what was wanted of them, and have guessed very correctly at the object of their appointment. They have served the purpose of the Government admirably in the delay that has occurred in making their report. I have always held, and I hold to-day, that the commission was utterly useless, that we did not require to know whether whisky was a bad thing, whether the evils of intemperance are very great, whether the prohibition of the sale of liquor would be a good thing for the country. These questions that have been discussed so long in this country, were questions that required no Royal Commission to deal with. I imagine that when we get the report and evidence of that commission we will have a great mass of material of very little or no use at all to the country. I have watched the proceedings of the commission so far as I have been able, and they seem to have travelled about the country in a sort of a jaunting style; they have called before them liquor dealers, hotel-keepers, saloon-keepers, and all classes of the community, and what in the world will be the use of all that mass of material they have been collecting, I am at a loss to understand. Of course, we will know better what the character of the evidence is when we come to see it. I venture to predict now that we will not have the report before the country, so that the people may have time to digest it and form opinions upon it, very much before the next election comes on. The appointment of the commission was a very good political expedient, I repeat; it carried this question on over several sessions, it removed from the Government a difficulty that confronted them, and it put the evil day away from them. But we have got, some time or other, to face this temperance question. The appointment of Royal Commissions, and the staving off of action must terminate, and the sentiment of the country demands that something else be done. It is evident that temperance sentiment is growing, and this question will have to be met; and if the Government will proceed to take such a course as the Liberal party of Canada has pledged itself to take when it comes into power, to refer this question to the people, to take a plebescite, in order to ascertain what the state of public sentiment is, for it cannot be ascertained by Royal Commission, or by investigation of any other kind, however searching, they would be, adopting the desirable course. The proper foundation on which the predicate action is to ascertain definitely what the state of public sentiment is. If a great proportion of the people are in favour of a prohibitory law, it will be the duty of any Government in power to place such a law on the Statute-book. If such a public sentiment did not exist, it would be impossible to enforce a prohibitory law. When we get ready to ascertain what the state of public opinion is, to get rid of trifling and adopting political expedients for putting off the necessity of action, and amusing the people, it will be found desirable to find out what course to adopt, and provide for laying the matter before the people, and asking them for their mandate, and decide this question, entirely separate from all other political questions, as a question standing strictly on its own merits, when we come to ascertain directly and positively what is the desire of the people in respect to a prohibitory law, then we will be in a position, not to appoint Royal Commissions and go on with this fooling of the public from year to year, but to face the question and definitely decide whether public sentiment does or does not demand an enactment of a prohibitory law.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I see $10,000 in the item to recoup an amount taken from the sum provided for unforeseen expenses. I take it that amount has been used for this purpose. Does the Minister know what has been the cost of the commission to the present time, and also what it is likely to cost before it is finally completed?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Up to the present time the Royal Commission has cost about $100,000.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Including this amount of $18,000 for printing and translating?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; but that sum does not include everything. There will be a vote in the further Supplementary Estimates to cover the balance.

Mr. McMULLEN. I should like to ask the First Minister whether it is the intention, when the report has been submitted, together with all the evidence, to refer the documents to the Supreme Court for their opinion, or whether we shall deal with it here?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The subject has been referred there already, in order to save time, and not place us under the reproach of wasting time.

Mr. LAURIER. Do I understand the First Minister to say that the commissioners have not yet reported?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They have not yet reported. The evidence, however, has been sent in, and is being translated and printed.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Are the members of the commission the same members who were originally appointed, or have any been superannuated on account of age?

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Is the Government aware that Mr. Gigault, one of the commissioners, left yesterday for Europe?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I hope he will sign the report.

Mr. McCARTHY. Is the sum of $18,000 for printing and translating included in the $100,000?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes. I gave that as the total expense down to this time. It does not include everything—there will be about $20,000 more to be paid.

Mr. McCARTHY. Are the labours of the commissioners practically concluded?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, except signing the report.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the details of the expenditure be subsequently given? How are the commissioners paid?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They are paid a per diem allowance and moving expenses.

Mr. McCARTHY. I understand that about $20,000 more will be required?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, about $120,000 altogether.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

THE INDIAN ACT.

Mr. DALY moved second reading of Bill (No. 116) further to amend the Indian Act.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. DALY. Under the old law, the consent of the Band and of the Superintendent General was necessary to a will made by an Indian. The approval of the band is done away with in this Bill, for the reason that it was found in a number of cases that some of the chiefs in council representing the band would take a pique and prevent the provisions of a man's will being carried out, simply because they had some ideas of their own on the subject. It created a good deal of trouble amongst them, and this Bill provides that the Superintendent General alone shall consent to the will.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think it is very objectionable that the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs should have anything to do with making an Indian's will. If an Indian is capable of making a will at all, then it ought to be done without the interference of the Superintendent General. If he is not capable of making a will the law ought to decide what the disposition of his property should be and it should follow the law. It seems to me that it confers a dangerous power on the Superintendent General, and a power liable to serious abuse, however honestly he may be inclined, because he must get his information, not simply from the will itself, but from the parties who may be interested. That being so, the information upon which he acts may be very imperfect and unreliable. I am sure the hon. gentleman has discovered by this time, what an amount of intrigue often exists among parties in the band, and how difficult it is to ascertain precisely what the facts are in a given case. It seems to me that it would be very much safer and better, either to allow the Indian to make such a disposition of his property as he deems fit—within the limit that it shall not go to parties not entitled to reside on the reserve—or to take away the power of disposition of the property.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to add my protest against this arbitrary power being placed in the hands of the Superintendent General. These powers in this Bill are most autocratic, and you might as well give to the Superintendent General the power of making a will for an Indian. The only difference would be that he could initiate proceedings as to what could be done with the property, while under this Bill he has absolute power to countermand any disposal of the property an Indian may desire to make. I doubt whether it is proper to invest in the hands of any man such arbitrary powers as these. The object of the Bill is a good one, and if the Superintendent General is a man of the very highest character, and of purity of purpose, it might work properly; but if he is a man liable to be misled by intrigue or misrepresentations the effect of this clause may be indeed very pernicious.

Mr. DALY. The arguments of the hon. gentlemen would have some weight if this had not been the law of the country for over twenty years. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has forgotten that under the law as it has been all these years the Superintendent General can disallow a will entirely. As the law is now, if there was an objectionable clause in the will, the Superintendent General would have to disapprove of the whole will, but under this Bill he can disapprove of a portion of it. The material change in the law is: that we do away with the consent of the band to the will, so as to get over these intrigues which the hon. gentleman refers to. We wipe out that feature of it entirely and simply leave to the Superintendent General the power he had before, but in the present case, he need not disapprove of the whole will, but only the portion of it that is not right. If the Superintendent General had not this power the Government could not control the disposition of lands upon the reserve.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I wish to call the attention of the committee to what seems to me, an omission in this Bill. Perhaps I can better explain what I mean by giving an example. There are Indians upon the reserve, in the constituency from which I come, who have quite an amount of property. In one case that I have now in my mind, the family of the Indian consists of two daughters who are married to Indians in another reserve in another part of the province. When this man dies, it appears to me that, by this Bill, he will not be allowed to leave his property to these daughters, as they have become by their marriage members of another band, and have no right to reside on the reserve. This circumstance would arise. In order that these daughters might benefit by his property, he would be required to sell it to some one entitled to live on the reserve, and suffer a loss in consequence. I have suggested to the Superintendent General that after the word "reserve," he might add these words, "except where the devise or bequest of land be made to the daughter, sister, or grandchildren of the testator."

Mr. DALY. I am of opinion that the amendment my hon. friend suggests is not necessary, because in the case he speaks of, the daughters would be entitled to reside on the reserve, notwithstanding that they had married and left it. That feature of the question was considered by the Department of Justice when this clause was framed, and that department was of opinion that people placed in that position would be protected.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is not the general impression.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) From my experience of the Indian Act, my impression is that when a woman of an Indian band marries into another band, she ceases to be recognized by the band she left.

Mr. DALY. I am perfectly satisfied to accept the hon. gentleman's amendment.

Mr. CHARLTON. There is another difficulty. Unforeseen cases may arise of the same character as that suggested by the hon. member for Haldimand, and I am afraid that we are taking a course here which may result in great loss and injury to innocent persons. I am unable to see why an Indian who possesses property should not be allowed to bequeath it without the interference of the Superintendent General, or anybody else.

Mr. DAVIN. He is only a child.

Mr. CHARLTON. He knows enough to acquire property, and he ought to know enough to devise that property. He is the person interested in it, his wishes ought to be respected, and I do not see why he should not be allowed to bequeath it without the interference of any official or any white man. By this Bill the Superintendent General is clothed with power that makes him a dictator; it makes him, practically, a tyrant over the Indians, and he may be the worst kind of a tyrant. He may thwart their purposes, and there is no check upon him whatever. I say, give to the Indian the right to bequeath his property without the interference of the Superintendent General, or any one else.

Mr. DAVIN. The remarks of the hon. gentleman on this subject affords an instance of the nonsense we frequently hear in this House when gentlemen speak on subjects of which they know nothing whatever. If the Indian were not protected by such provisions as this Bill contains, he would be plundered by designing persons. Everybody who knows anything of the Indian, knows that although in stature a man, he is, in intelligence, a child; and he would give away his property for a mere song. The tyrant the hon. gentleman calls the Superintendent General is the same kind of a tyrant as a parent is over a child from its infancy to the time its capacity for responsibility is reached. He is the loco parentis in regard to the control of the property of the Indians and is under no temptation to play the part of the tyrant. If such a power were not given to the Superintendent General, it would have to be placed in the hands of a judge or some one else, to take charge of these wards of the people of Canada. My hon. friend from North Norfolk, who talks about an Indian being allowed to dispose of his property as a white man disposes of his, is too humane, too Christian, too good a man to utter such a sentiment, if he knew anything about the Indian character.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me that the hon. member for Assiniboia is not as familiar with the subject as he pretends to be. By the law, as it exists, the power of the Indian as a testator is limited. He has not the power of devising that is given to the white man; he must devise under certain limitations.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. member for North Norfolk said he should have the power of the white man.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend said that if limitations were to be put upon the liberty of the Indian, they should be fixed by the law, and not left to the will or caprice of the nation; and that is what I object to, too. The law at present does not allow the Indian to bequeath his property outside of the reserve or to any person beyond the degree of relationship of a first cousin. That is very proper; but the Minister of the Interior is seeking to remove those restrictions of the law, and to place the matter wholly in the hands of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs; and the reason he gives is that it is to avoid disputes that might arise in the band. I cannot conceive that there could be any great difficulties in the working of the law when it is limited by the provisions I have spoken of; but the hon. Minister proposes to remove these restrictions and leave the question whether the will of an Indian shall prevail or not, entirely in the hands of the Superintendent General.

Mr. DALY. Surely the hon. gentleman has not read the law. The will of the Superintendent General is now required absolutely.

Mr. LAURIER. I know all that; but the law says that no will shall become valid unless the property is devised in the family and kept in the reserve, and, as I read the Bill, this power is transferred to the Superintendent General.

Mr. DALY. If the hon. gentleman waits until we get to the subsequent sections of the Bill, he will find that everything is provided for. I would like the hon. gentleman to instruct me as to this point. Instead of the restriction which I find here, that is to say, that the Indian who makes a will must devise and bequeath his property within his own family, I see only this, that while the Indian is at liberty to draw a will as he pleases, the Superintendent of Indian Affairs is at liberty to approve it or not.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think the hon. gentleman is right. The limitation appears to be according to the proposition here that a person who resides on a reserve shall not be entitled to bequeath to any, except one who also resides on the reserve. Whereas the law, as it was, coupled with the necessity of residing on the reserve the further limitation that the property should be left to the testator's family. So that there is a very substantial difference in that respect.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The clause giving the Indians power to devise land at all, where he is not emancipated, does not date back further than 1881. That the Indian should have control over his personal property and may fairly be trusted with the bequeathing of that to those members of his family he may deem proper, may not be an unreasonable provision. But where the Indians are unemancipated Indians, it does seem to me altogether at variance with public policy that we should, by devise, bequest, or in any other way, create a new distribution. One of the difficulties I am sure the hon. gentleman must have already ascertained, is that by licenses permitting Indians to deal among themselves, some members of the band have come into possession of a very large portion of the reserve, while others have nothing beyond the simple annuity which has been allowed to them; and I know myself cases where, were it not for this liberty that has been given them in certain cases, which has given rise to inequality, and which has led to great hardships on the part of certain portions of the Indians, many of them who are now wards of the Government would have ere this have applied for emancipation. We know that on the continent of Europe, where people are much better qualified to deal with the subject of property than the Indians who are wards of the Government, the law itself determines what the distribution of real estate, to a very great extent, shall be, and it does not leave to the party who is in possession the right to altogether decide how that property shall go. If on the grounds of public policy, that may be done in the case of a population qualified to deal with their own property and to take care of it—intellectually qualified, I mean, not legally—it seems to me of even greater consequence that the Government ought not to put in the power of the Indians, so far as real estate is concerned, which is still in the hands of their chiefs, held in trust for the whole band, and which no Indian has anything more than the usufruct during his own life—the Government should not give these Indians the power of saying that one man of the family should hold the whole of the property to the exclusion of all the others. I do not think that is a good way to prepare the Indian population for emancipation. My opinion is that when you confer upon the Indians the power to devise or bequeath personal property, you go as far as you ought to go, and that in all cases where the Indian is not prepared to accept, or where the Superintendent General thinks he is not qualified to receive emancipation, the law itself ought to decide how the real estate belonging to the band shall be disposed of. I am sure that will be more satisfactory; it will give less opportunity to those who are grasping to obtain more than their due share of the reservation, and will relieve the Superintendent General himself of a very great deal of unnecessary work and prevent his becoming an instrument of injustice in many cases. I know this has sometimes happened—I do not know whether it has fallen in the experience of the hon. member for Assinibola (Mr. Davin), but I know there are cases where a portion of an Indian band became converted to Christianity and another portion remained pagan, and where an attempt was made on the part of some of the families to punish either the one class or the other, either in consequence of their non-acceptance of the new faith, or of their acceptance of it. I dare say the hon. gentleman himself may have had brought before him instances where attempts were made to deprive a member of the band of his office as head man or chief because either he has become a Christian or has refused to become one, because of the power of creating disabilities, both as affecting rank and property among the Indians, is practised with great impartiality between those who are pagan and those who are Christian. Each class is equally ready to employ whatever power it possesses in this way to inflict disability and punishment upon those of contrary opinions. It does seem to me it would be safer if the law continued as formerly, that the reserve should be distributed amongst the members of the band as nearly equal as possible, that the principle of equal distribution should be maintained as long as the Indian is unemancipated, and that power of disposition by will should be confined to his personal property.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). One of the great difficulties in framing an Indian Act is the different stages of advancement of the various tribes. There are many degrees of advancement among the different tribes, and it seems to me that in the case of the more advanced bands, the object of legislation ought to be more and more in the direction of giving them control of their own affairs. It does seem an anomaly that they should be intrusted with the highest rights of citizenship, which we have given to them in the older provinces, and that in matters affecting themselves individually and their own property, they should be in such a condition as defined in this Bill, without the power even of devising any property, any personal property, they may possess, and with the Superintendent General having full power to nullify the will and declare that they have died intestate. If I rightly apprehend it, this is putting more power into the hands of the Superintendent General than he had before. It seems to me that in the case of the more advanced bands, we should legislate to give them greater control of their own affairs and not take away from them the limited powers they already have. It seems to me we should not take from the Indians and centre more power in the Superintendent General. Of course one can speak quite freely in this matter, because no Superintendent General will for the moment suppose that they are any insinuations thrown out against him as to his desire to do what is right, according to the best of his judgment. It can be understood that the more advanced Indians are feeling that they ought, in these matters, to have more control of their own affairs than they have at the present time, and to give them less seems to me to be a retrograde step and one that will not be pleasing to them. Is it the intention of the Minister, under this clause, to provide that if an Indian is possessed of lands he cannot will it to any individual he chooses, but that he may will the proceeds of his improvements. Or does the Minister still retain, as I understand it, the power to disallow the will in toto, even as relating to personal effects.

Mr. DALY. Yes; certainly; that is the law now.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Instead of the band having anything to say about the land, that power is taken out of their hands and vested in the Superintendent General?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is not that giving the Indians less control than before? The land is theirs and is held in common. The Minister might explain what has led him to take this view. What cases have arisen and what difficulties does he seek to obviate by this means—for something must have actuated him in making these changes?

Mr. DALY. It is designed wholly for the purpose of carrying out the object mentioned by hon. gentlemen, and that sought by the more advanced Indians that of giving the Indians more extended powers as to the disposition of their property. By this law we are seeking to do this as far as justice will allow. This Bill provides that an Indian may bequeath property of any kind to any other person, provided that a bequest of land shall not be made to any one not entitled to reside on the reservation. Under the present law he is limited to devising property to people within his family. These changes have been brought about entirely at the suggestion of the Indians and are the outcome of the experience we have had with some of the more advanced and better educated class of Indians in the province of Ontario. I can see none of the difficulties ahead of me that hon. gentlemen have spoken of. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) gave us a disquisition upon the descent of real property, but, so far as the descent of real property of Indians is concerned, we are not changing the law except as I have mentioned. It is absolutely necessary that the Government, through the Superintendent General, should maintain control in order to obviate difficulties the hon. gentleman pointed out, namely, that the Indians should have no right to devise land to one not entitled to reside on the reserve. The land being the property of the band in common it should be held by those who alone are entitled to share the property in the reserve. All we are seeking is to permit the Indian to devise any and all kinds of property, and second to do away with the provision of the present law that the will shall receive the consent of the band. As I pointed out, cases have arisen where the council representing the band through pique or through ideas of their own, have simply refused to carry out the will of the testator.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Or through the influence of parties personally interested.

Mr. DALY. Yes, personal interest has also had its influence. Under the law as it stands the Superintendent General has the right to disapprove of the will, but he can only disapprove of it as a whole, and it may contain provisions that would be ultra vires of the law as to the devising of the land, and, in order to carry out the law that the Indians shall not devise property outside of the reserve, the whole will had to be set at naught. Surely no person taking the position of hon. gentlemen would object to a provision of this kind, for the Superintendent General can have no wish except to carry out the wishes of the Indians.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Only that we do not want the powers of the testator lessened.

Mr. DALY. Certainly not; we only wish to hold control of the lands in reserve.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You do not say anything about a location ticket. Is any person in possession to have the right to devise whether he has a location ticket or not?

Mr. DALY. Certainly; it is very difficult to get them to take location tickets.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 116) to further amend the Indian Act.

(In the Committee.)

On subsection 3 of section 1,

Mr. DALY. We strike out the words in the old clause which provided that the Indian woman shall be living with her husband at the time of his death, because a woman might be of perfectly good moral character and not be living with her husband at the time of his death through no fault of her own, but through immoral conduct on the part of her husband. As long as she is of good moral character, whether she is living with her husband or not, she is entitled to inherit.

On subsection 2,

Mr. McCARTHY. I was going to suggest that perhaps it would be more satisfactory if the words, "if she is a woman of good moral character" were left out. If she is living with her husband at the time of his death, that is sufficient to entitle her to inherit. Who is to judge as to her moral character? Possibly if the hon. member for Assiniboia were here, he would be able to tell us whether there are many women who would answer that test. It appears to me it is quite sufficient for us to know that she is living with her husband. I would move that those words be omitted.

Mr. DALY. That is exactly what we want to avoid. A woman may not be living with her husband, and still be of good moral character, but she may have been forced to leave her husband on account of the immorality of the husband. The law as it now stands provides that she must be a woman of good moral character and living with her husband at the time of his death. We strike out the words "was living with her husband at the time of his death," in order to avoid some cases of hardship that have occurred where a woman has been of good moral character, but owing to the conduct of her husband, has had to leave him.

Mr. McCARTHY. Put it the other way. You require two qualifications; you require her to be living with her husband and to be of good moral character.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would suggest that that clause be amended further, and that after the words "widow" in the fourth line, we insert these words: "during her lifetime and after her decease, to the nearest of kin to the deceased husband."

Mr. DALY. I cannot accept the hon. gentleman's amendment.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is it in the opinion of the Minister of the Interior quite just to deprive a woman of all share in the estate of her husband if she does not happen to be a woman of good moral character? Perhaps a little injustice might be done. Even if not of good moral character, she might be entitled to something.

Mr. DALY. That has been the law for a great many years.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am sure the hon. gentleman must have discovered that it is a law which often works great hardship. You cannot set up the same moral standard amongst the Indian population that you do amongst the white population. There are cases where an Indian woman has left her husband and has been living for twenty or twenty-five years with another Indian, and her husband has taken another woman as his wife. You cannot deprive her of her annuity in consequence of the fact she is not living with her husband, although her conduct is quite as good, perhaps, as that of the vast majority of the Indian men. I brought the matter under the attention of the late Deputy Minister, that such complaints have been made, and I am quite sure that those who complained were not of a higher character morally than those against whom complaints were made.

Mr. DALY. We have met the objection by providing that the Superintendent-General shall be the judge. Formerly the Indians were the judges, and probably for reasons better known to themselves than to the department a man or woman might make representations against a widow to show that she was not of good moral character, and those representations would be proved not to be founded on fact. Now it is discretionary for the Superintendent-General to make inquiries and ascertain whether the representations made are true, and if they are not true, he is of course not bound by the representations made.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But where true, the same standard of morals which prevails among the white population should not be made to apply to the Indians.

Mr. DALY. I agree with the hon. gentleman.

On section 2,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Where are the wills to be probated, and under what authority is the regulation made?

Mr. DALY. Probated in the county where the reserve is situated.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This subject is, however, under the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures. If the Indians are allowed to probate wills, this Government will have to provide machinery for probating them, because Indian lands are not under the jurisdiction of the province or subject to provincial law.

Mr. DALY. The first section of the Bill permits Indians to devise real and personal property outside of the reserve. Although as a matter of fact several wills of Indians have been probated in Ontario, it is questionable whether this should have been done. But having granted this power to Indians to devise their property, it is right we should provide as far as we can that their wills should be probated. To remove any doubt created by the probating of wills of Indians, we endeavour to provide, as far as possible, that an Indian's will shall be entered for probate.

On section 3,

Mr. CHARLTON. I infer that if an Indian should occupy any road allowance he would be liable to summary conviction by imprisonment. Why not first make provision that he should vacate the road allowance? He may occupy such by mistake, and yet he is liable to fine and imprisonment without notice having been served on him to leave it. It would be better to put the Indian in a position where he would receive notice, and then if he resisted the law, he might be punished.

Mr. DALY. This provision refers to any Indian other than a member of a band. This is the law which has been in force for twenty-one years. The provision is specially to provide against white men coming on reserves and starting up liquor schacks.

On section 4,

Mr. MONTAGUE. I call attention to the fact that there is no authority in this clause for the Superintendent General to apply the annuity of an Indian who is absent from the reserve owing, for instance, to imprisonment, to the support of his wife and family.

Mr. DALY. We considered that the words used here "or of conduct justifying his wife and family in separating" were sufficient to cover the case mentioned by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague). The reason for the change is: that we have had cases in which an Indian by his cruel acts has forced his wife to leave him and he was more guilty than if he had deserted her, but under the present law he could not be punished by having his interest money taken away from him. We want to preserve the rights to the wife and children. I think the clause would include cases mentioned by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague.)

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am afraid the hon. gentleman did not quite understand what I said. If an Indian commits a crime his annuity ceases while he is in prison. I contend that authority should be taken by the Superintendent General to pay that annuity to his wife and children who need it while he is in prison more than at any other time. The crime for which an Indian is imprisoned may not be such as to justify his wife and family separating from him in the eyes of the law.

Mr. DALY. We were under the impression that the clause covered every case of that kind, but I have no objection to an amendment that will meet the views of the hon. gentleman. I will add after the word "him" in the second last line, the words "or is separated from his family by imprisonment."

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think that meets the request I made; but in my opinion the clause should be further added to. The Superintendent General should take power to stop payment of annuity and interest money as well as to deprive of participation in the real property of the band, any woman who, without reasonable cause deserts her husband and the sum might be applied to the support of the children.

Mr. DALY. It is only in very rare cases that the wife has any property, and we are only supposed now to deal with the conduct of the husband.

On section 8,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What change is in this?

Mr. DALY. Under the present law, an agent is only ex-officio a justice of the peace for the purposes of the Act within the limited jurisdiction of his agency as defined by the Order in Council appointing him. It is found, particularly in the North-west, in many instances, that an agent who is a justice of the peace is called upon to administer justice without the boundary of his agency, and, as he is probably the only justice of the peace within hundreds of miles, considerable difficulty has been experienced in administering the law. We are simply extending the territorial jurisdiction of these officials.

On section 9,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Have there been any moneys paid back to any of the municipalities lately?

Mr. DALY. I am not aware whether there has been or not.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understand that this Act makes no change with regard to outsiders being on the reserve—it is the old law, practically?

Mr. DALY. Yes, with this exception, that they may be there only with the consent of the Superintendent General. This is to provide that where Indian girls marry white men, or Indian men marry white women, they have a right to live on the reserve so long as they conduct themselves properly. As the law now stands, they could not reside there.

On section 11,

Mr. CHARLTON. Is it necessary often to use compulsory measures to get Indian children to attend these schools?

Mr. DALY. Very much so; and we have not had the authority before. Parents have interfered and taken boys away just when they were beginning to learn a trade.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does the Minister intend, by this Act, to add to the number of Indian schools in the North-west?

Mr. DALY. I think the Supplementary Estimates of this session include all the industrial schools that it is proposed to establish in the North-west Territories; that is, the schools at St. Boniface, St. Pauls, Elkhorn, Brandon, Qu'Appelle, Battleford, Red Deer, High River, and one other which I cannot remember just now. So far as my recollection goes, these are all the Indian schools it is intended at present to establish.

Mr. McMULLEN. There are nine Indian schools in the North-west, which cost about $155,000, some costing as much as $30,000. As we have only about 20,000 Indians in the North-west, it seems to me that there must be an enormous sacrifice of money with these schools. I had intended giving the House an outline of my investigation into this matter, but as the remaining days of the session are so few, I have no desire to impose a lengthy speech upon the House this session; but I can assure the hon. gentleman that after a careful and thorough investigation, I have come to the conclusion that the expenditure on Indian schools and reserves could be very largely cut down. For about 40 per cent of the money that goes into the hands of the officials and the employees on the farms there is no return at all. I intended to inquire what was the reason for this. In my opinion, the expenditure connected with the Indian schools of the North-west should be thoroughly investigated.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The expenditure on the few Indian industrial schools for the very small number attending them is double the amount expended on the thousand students attending Toronto University, who may fairly represent the two million people of the province of Ontario. But I do not rise to discuss the expenditure on these schools, but to ask the hon. gentleman whether there ought not to be here a provision such as is contained in many other statutes, that within a certain period after the opening of the session, these regulations should be laid on the Table of Parliament. Because this is a power to restrict the liberty, not only of the parents, but of the students themselves; and where such power is given the Governor General over these parties, who are wards of the Government, the facts ought to be reported to the House, and the regulations laid upon the Table.

Mr. DALY. I am sorry to find that such provision was not made. It was in the original draft of my own and must have been omitted. I shall draft a provision to meet the views of the hon. gentleman. When the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) speaks of the amount expended on industrial schools exceeding that expended on Toronto University, he must remember that the money so paid covers the clothing and cost of living of the children. The children come there with nothing on them but a blanket, and are clothed, fed, and educated, and treated as parents would treat their children. The number of children may seem small, but we have eighty and a hundred, and two hundred in some of the schools. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) will find all the information he desires in the report of the Department of Indian Affairs. I regret he was not in the House at the time the Estimates were under consideration, as he would have heard the full explanation which I gave of the industrial schools and the general conduct of Indian Affairs.

Mr. McMULLEN. I admit that the hon. gentleman gave an extended report on the estimates with regard to the schools, and I am sorry I was not present at the time, because I was prepared to offer some criticisms. Some reductions have been made in the general expenses, but not as many as we have a right to expect. Any one going through the report must conclude that there is a considerable number of teachers compared with the number of pupils. In some schools there are four or five teachers to a very limited number of children, and there appears to be room for very considerable reduction in that respect.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman's information is gathered from the Auditor General's Report of 1892-93. But since that fiscal year there is a new regime, and to-day we pay so much per pupil, leaving the schools to find their own teachers. So that if there are too many teachers, that does not add to the expense of the Government.

Mr. CHARLTON. Under that system, does the Government secure competent supervision and an efficient staff?

Mr. DALY. If the hon. gentleman had been here when the Estimates were up, he would have heard my reply to the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) on that point. Our inspection is most rigid in every particular. We have adopted a system of book-keeping by which we see at a glance every dollar expended and received, from the smallest item to the largest, and in fact the schools complain that our inspection is too rigid, both as regards the expenditure of money and the whole regime of the school.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think that the system of farming out the education of the Indians is a prudent one at all. Those schools should be entirely under Government inspection.

Mr. DALY. So they are.

Mr. McMULLEN. Last year I find that Father Leduc drew $3,594 for his school in the district under his charge. I would like to know in what way this money is apportioned and what schools it includes.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman has got the Indian schools mixed up with the schools of the North-west Territories. Let him take the Auditor General's Report and separate the Indian Department from the North-west Government, and he will find that they deal with entirely different subjects. The payment to Father Leduc was made to him. I presume, as superintendent of the school at Calgary or St. Albert, and would have nothing to do with the Indian schools at all. That, no doubt, is where the hon. gentleman found the number of teachers he referred to.

Mr. McMULLEN. I did not take my information from the Auditor General's Report, but I called for the accounts in the Public Accounts Committee, and I went over the files, some thirty-two altogether. It is from them I gathered the information I am giving the hon. gentleman. In my humble opinion, the accounts connected with the Indians of Manitoba and the North-west are kept in a very loose and mixed up condition, so that you cannot get at the facts as you ought to be able to do. I asked the hon. gentleman how many reserves there were, and although he told me there were thirty-eight, and I could only make out twenty-four or twenty-five by the accounts.

Mr. DALY. The accounts of the reserves are perfectly kept. We have a perfect system of book-keeping. But the hon. gentleman could not get that information by going over the accounts from the office here. Those accounts are kept at the office in Regina, and the hon. gentleman has only been furnished with such as the department here could furnish. As regards the number of reserves, it might be possible that in the case of some there were no accounts; but if the hon. gentleman will take the report of the Department of Indian Affairs and scan it carefully, he will get all the information he asks. If the hon. gentleman will read the report he will get the basis of the system, and will perhaps be able to found an investigation that will give him information which these accounts cannot give.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I can understand how you would manage all this except with respect to the cattle. That seems to me to be somewhat different from the purchase of land to add to the reserve even permanent improvements. In what way would you provide that the cattle should belong to the band? I suppose they could not well be the property of individuals. Do you propose to make them the property of the band?

Mr. DALY. This is to cover questions that have arisen with reference to the purchase of cattle for the Indians of the North-west. We thought we had power under the law, with the consent and authority of the Governor in Council to expend the capital of the band in purchasing cattle; but it was held that we should have to get legislation to empower us to invest the capital of the band in buying cattle, having first got the consent of the Indians. With this consent the cattle are purchased in the interests of the band as a whole.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But how do you deal with them when you have purchased them? I can understand how you can make a permanent improvement that would be of benefit to all, but I cannot see how the cattle could be held in common, unless it be in the case of some special cattle for breeding purposes, in which I suppose they would be in the charge of the council?

Mr. DALY. The cattle would be in charge of the agent and whatever increase there was would go to the band as a whole.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But who would take care of them?

Mr. DALY. The agent. There is no difficulty about that. There is need of some such provision as this. The Piegans, the Bloods, and the Black-feet are going to become great ranchers. They are even selling their ponies to buy cattle.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me that it would be very advantageous to have power to distribute cattle among individuals of the band, so that if a man showed a special disposition to take care of his cattle, he might be encouraged in this way. They are much more likely to devote special care to what belongs to them personally than to what belongs to them collectively.

Mr. DALY. That is a matter for consideration. I may say that it is part of our policy to encourage individuality among the Indians. In the book of the agency we have a separate account for each Indian who shows a disposition to be frugal and hard working. Though the increase of the cattle will be for the benefit of the band as a whole, an equitable arrangement can be made so that those who take an interest in cattle will receive an advantage.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But you are not taking power to distribute the cattle in the way you suggest.

Mr. DALY. We think we have the power already. The question was whether we had power to invest the capital of the band in cattle. We think we have power under the general provisions of the Act, to distribute to individuals.

On motion to report the Bill as amended—

Mr. DALY moved that the following be added as clause 12:—

The regulations made by the Governor in Council under this Act shall be published in the Canada 'Gazette,' and shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament within the first fifteen days of the session of Parliament next after the opening thereof.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before the Bill is reported, I wish to call the hon. Minister's attention to subsection 9 of section 20, relating to probate. When we undertook to give Provincial courts special jurisdiction over matters exclusively within the legislative jurisdiction of this Parliament, we were obliged to designate or create courts for the purpose. We designated them by referring to them as an existing court, instead of making a new appointment, and that was held to be a sufficient creation of a court for the purpose. Under the British North America Act, Indians and the lands reserved for Indians are under the exclusive jurisdiction of this Parliament. If we provide for the probate of the will of Indians we should provide that in each province the law of probate of wills shall be the law for the probate of Indian wills. You could in that way apply the law of each province to the probate of Indian property within its territorial limits. Unless this is done the hon. Minister will find that there is no procedure to give effect to this particular section of the Bill.

Mr. DALY. I think we will have to anticipate legislation from the Local Legislatures. It is here provided that :

Notwithstanding anything in this Act it shall be lawful for the courts having jurisdiction in that regard in the case of persons other than Indians, but not without the consent of the Superintendent General, to grant probates of the wills of Indians and letters of administration of the estate and effects of intestate Indians.

That means that notwithstanding anything in the Indian Act, we empower the court that has the jurisdiction to permit a will by an Indian being submitted to probate. As I mentioned before, several cases of that kind have arisen where probate has been granted to Indian wills. The only point in question was not that the court had not jurisdiction to grant the probate, but that they had not the right to grant the probate unless authority was given under the Indian Act. We do not seek to give jurisdiction, but only to remove doubts as to any objection interposed by the Act.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If any judge has given probate to an Indian will, he must have been one who had never for a moment considered the subject.

Mr. DALY. Possibly so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me in order to convey jurisdiction, jurisdiction must come from this Parliament.

Mr. DALY. We do not seek to give it.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 145) further to amend the Fisheries Act.—(Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

LICENSE TO CURE LOBSTERS.

House resolved itself into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution :—

That a fee of twenty-five dollars shall be paid for a license to can, preserve or cure lobsters.

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The resolution now in your hands, and most of the clauses relating to this subject in the Bill, refer to a question that was very fully considered two sessions ago. The fee as proposed in this resolution, however, is largely increased over the former proposal, and while I should, personally, prefer to see it at that sum, and I believe it would be in the interest of the fisheries to have it so, still, I cannot overlook or ignore the strong feeling that this suggestion has evoked from the localities chiefly interested. It is not an ordinary fee in the sense of a fee imposed for a fishery license, because it does not relate to a license for fishing, the fishermen having nothing to do with it. It is a fee imposed upon the canners, and having regard to the various representations that have been made, I propose to make that fee $10 instead of $25. The canner will have a quid pro quo, he will have a great advantage in obtaining greater security in the conduct of his business, and also a security from poaching and illicit packing. He gets a brand, as the Bill proposes to give him, that will be of great value. It will enable us to enforce the close season regulation, and prevent the development of a practice that now tends to destroy the business, which is injuring it in the English market. During the close season there has grown up a habit along a coast that it is very difficult indeed to guard or protect, of canning in a slipshod, happy-go-lucky fashion, in which all kinds of things are put in a can, and that is soldered up and put upon the market, with the result of depreciating the article in the market generally. In view of the opinion that has been expressed in Parliament on both sides of the House—because hon. gentlemen have given me the advantage of their opinions since I proposed this resolution—I would suggest that the fee be made $10 instead of $25.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Would the hon. gentleman say in this connection whether he is prepared to make a similar reduction to the fishermen on the lakes ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, I am not. The House will understand that I was not the first to suggest a high fee on the lakes, nor was any gentleman from the Maritime Provinces the first to do so. The subjects are dissimilar. The fees on the lakes are very high indeed, and properly high, in my opinion, because they are fixed so as to deter and prevent as many as that fee will prevent, from seeking to engage in those fisheries. That subject was dealt with before Confederation, and when we came into Confederation that system was accepted. There is a vast distinction ; we have on the one side the illimitable ocean, and we have on the other the limited lakes, and the rules are in no sense alike. That has nothing to do with the Bill. While some who oppose the regulations on the lakes, endeavoured to make a comparison between the system on the sea and on the lakes, there is no fairness in the comparison. When we came into Confederation in 1867, there was no such thing as a fee of any kind on the ocean, but fees were all over the lakes simply on the principle on which they now obtain, namely, for the purpose of limiting applications for fishing licenses. But the license system prevails in the Maritime Provinces chiefly in waters somewhat analogous to the lakes, that is, when you come to an estuary of a salmon river, and when you deal with the salmon fisheries, and to some extent with the traps on the coast, they pay equally high with those on the lakes, notwithstanding that they are bordering on the ocean. Where you have trap-nets you have a very high license fee for the same subject. In respect to the traps for mackerel, there is a very high license fee, indeed, in order to prevent as far as possible applications for those licenses, or the use of nets.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says that the ocean is illimitable, but the hon. gentleman forgets that we have but a very little portion of the coast of that ocean.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We have as much of it as we like for fishing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, on the high sea, but this is a fishery on the coast.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This is not a fishing license. The hon. gentleman missed the first part of my explanations which I offered in order to cut the discussion short. No fisherman is affected by this.

Mr. MCGREGOR. I am pleased to hear that the hon. gentleman has decided to cut down the fees from $25 to $10. He seemed to be almost immovable, because we have been trying all the season to get him to reduce the fee on the lakes, by petitions from the county council, from the city council, from the township council, and from thousands of individuals, but we cannot get him to move one particle. He cuts down the fees from $25 to $10 on the sea fisheries, but on the lakes we cannot fish at all, we are not allowed to send out a single line. I am glad to know that the hon. gentleman begins to yield a little to the wishes of both sides of the House.

Mr. FRASER. I would like to know whether this includes everything?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Only the canneries.

Mr. FRASER. Do I understand that this is in lieu of all other charges?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, and it is less than the old fee of $5 and so much per case.

Mr. WELSH. I should like to see the fee reduced to $5. There are hundreds of farmers in Prince Edward Island who put up each fifty or sixty cases of lobsters, worth about $200. This will prove a heavy tax on these farmers. I admit the principle is good, but I hope the Minister will reduce the fee from $10 to $5. As soon as these men have got in their crop they go to work lobster fishing.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no fishing in the fall allowed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Mr. WELSH. They get in their crops in May, and they have from that time until the end of July. I hope the reduction I have suggested will be carried out.

Mr. PERRY. I can see the propriety of having the lobster fishery regulated, but I cannot understand why a tax should be imposed of $5 or 5 cents; nor can I understand if a license is issued, why it is necessary to charge for it? On the shores of Prince Edward Island every man who owns traps, boats and lines for the lobster fishery runs the risk of loss of life and property.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That man does not pay one cent.

Mr. PERRY. If the Minister will look at the reports he will see that hundreds of traps and large numbers of boats and nets have been lost to the fishermen. Why then, should it be necessary to impose a tax of $10 upon him?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He will not pay $10.

Mr. PERRY. It is not from the lobster canneries that the $10 will come, but from the poor fisherman who catches the lobsters. They will receive less for their catch in order that the canner may pay his $10. There is no reason whatever why any payment should be made. Is this proposed for the purpose of creating a lot of officials around our shores, and pay them either salaries or a certain fee for each license? Will these $10 in the shape of fees be handed over to those officials? How are these licenses going to be issued? Will there be a surveyor appointed? Whatever plan is adopted, do not tax the poor people who are working hard to make a living for themselves and their families by lobster fishing, for they contribute already more in proportion to the revenue of Canada than do the people who are better off, because they consume more dutiable articles. I understood the policy of the present Government was Canada for the Canadians, that our fishermen were to be protected. But this is protection in the wrong direction, and it is one-sided; we are going to take $10 from the packer, and each fisherman will receive less for his catch, and the present price is low enough. If this policy had been adopted ten years ago when lobsters were large and plentiful it would have been made desirable but the size of the fish is smaller, the price is less, and the catch is not so large as it was fifteen years ago. I do not know whether a reduction in the value of lobsters is due to the regulations and Orders in Council passed by the Government, but it really looks like it. Until the Government began to think they were wiser than the Almighty, we had large, good lobsters, and excellent prices, but now when the Government arrogate to themselves the power of controlling the elements and the crops, and ascribes these to the National Policy, and the protective policy, it looks as if the protection was in the wrong direction. As the Government protects one class of the people, why should they not protect the fishermen? They are not protecting them, but they are extracting from them money which is not required. If it is necessary to have a license system, I am not opposed to it, but no fee should be charged, for it would not be taken out of the richer class, but out of the hard-working fishermen of Prince Edward Island.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No.

Mr. PERRY. The canneries will obtain the fish at so much less from the poor fishermen in order to make up $10 license fee. I am not against rules and regulations, for perhaps they may be necessary for the welfare of the lobster fisheries of the country, but to impose a tax on the people who are taking the lobsters, who are running the risk of the destruction of their property and nets and boats all around the shore of Prince Edward Island is to adopt a course which will tend to keep them back from following the avocation for which the Almighty designed them. We have there the most hardy class of the Dominion, who are risking life and property to develop the natural resources of the country, and this Government should not seek to put a bridle on the people who are so promoting the general welfare.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not propose to follow the remarks of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Perry), who has gone far afield and has missed the point of the resolution and the object of the Bill. But I do not wish he or any other hon. member shall pretend or make a pretense to the fishermen who are interested in this measure that it is in the slightest degree hostile to their interests. On the contrary, any intelligent man, I do not care on what side of politics he may be, if he comes from a lobster district in the Maritime Provinces and tells the truth, will state to this House that th's industry is in a precarious condition, that lobsters are decreasing, instead of increasing. No member of this House pretends that the contrary is the fact. We stare that in the face, and we should take a lesson from the history of other countries that went into that business before we did. By listening to all kinds of agitators who for greed desired to take all they could, and as quickly as they could, and without institutions like ours, that dared to do right, they went on until the fisheries were exhausted. We have consequently on our shores a large amount of foreign capital invested, simply because there were no laws in the United States worth the paper they were written on. Although the fisheries there were just as valuable in their day as ours, the lobster fisheries of the United States have become fished out and ruined. While our lobster fisheries are diminishing, while it is difficult to catch lobsters of the quality that a few years ago could be caught, it is high time that some power should intervene to preserve that fishery. It is my experience, as Minister of this department, often to find—not always, I am glad to say, because there are gentlemen on the opposite side of this House who sympathize with me—it is my experience often to find some people anxious to make a little political capital out of a matter like this, and in a manner which, I think, is most contemptible. They endeavour to play to these poor fishermen—for, unfortunately, they are nearly always poor—and to make it appear that because the Government proposes some severe measure for the protection of the fisheries, that the Government is tyrannical and despotic. I would not hesitate to go before any fishing community in the Maritime Provinces and justify the principle involved in this Bill. I have communications from men interested in this business on both sides of politics who write to me in favour of it, regardless of the political aspect, and the only men who can be against me in this are, first of all, the men who wish to catch votes instead of lobsters; and, secondly, the men who wish to catch lobsters illegally. The packers, the men of capital, small or large, the men who are trying to carry on honest business are with me in proposing this measure, because at present the law operates unfairly to them. They have their factories, which can be watched and guarded, but when they close down their establishments in compliance with the regulations, there springs up all around this extended coast in the little bays and nooks, men who defy the regulations, and who play the very mischief, so to speak, with the market. They go into the woods with a little pot and a little solder and so on, and in a haphazard fashion, they put into cans and cases the lobsters they have poached and illegally taken, and place them on the market. When the law-abiding packers have their wares ready for market they find these illegally canned lobsters, even in the English market, bringing a bad name upon the whole product. That condition of things is getting worse every year. There is no personal pleasure for me to propose a law that at first blush looks like restriction, and may be unpopular. Neither for personal nor political considerations would I do it; but I know that it is my duty to propose some measure like this. My officers have convinced me from their experience that it is only by a license system and a reasonable fee that we can regulate this business, and have laws that we can enforce to protect the honest fisherman. For that purpose, this Bill is proposed. One word as to whether this is a large fee or a small fee. I would ask hon. members to remember that we discussed this matter for two or three days a couple of sessions ago, and we decided then that there should be a $5 fee for the packer and canner, and a fee of so many cents on every case, which would amount almost to the fee of $25, as originally proposed in this resolution. It was pointed out that that would relatively bear hard upon the smaller canners, and so I reduced the fee to the small sum of $10. When you consider that even the small canners pay something like $5,000 a year in wages, you will see that this $10 fee is not going to be a huge burden. It will give us a snug little sum of six or seven thousand dollars a year, and for that we give them in return fifty times the value. We give them, not merely a guarantee of a decently enforced close season, which is worth a great deal to the honest packers, but we give them a Government brand which all gentlemen familiar with the business of lobster canning acknowledged two sessions ago to be of great advantage. We give them, as I said, a Government brand, and Government inspection, and we undertake to supply the proper officers for that. Therefore, I say that the men who intend to do business according to the laws and regulations have everything to gain by this measure, and the only men who can object to it are really the very men that we want to stop, whether they are farmers or whether they are fishermen. These are the men who, in spite of law and regulations wish to fish when it is illegal, and to fish not only to the injury of this staple fishery itself, but to the injury and detriment of the law-abiding classes engaged in the industry.

Mr. WELSH. I have no objection to the regulation. I say that the regulations are good, but why not make the fee $5 instead of $10. This $10 fee, as the Minister remarks, will, no doubt, be approved of by the large lobster packers, but it will tend to prevent the smaller fishermen from taking a few fish in front of their doors.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It does not affect them at all.

Mr. WELSH. The only difference between the Minister and myself is as to the amount of this fee. Would not a $5 fee carry out the hon. gentleman's object as well as a $10 fee? If the hon. gentleman makes the amount $5, he will be doing himself credit, and the factories justice,

Mr. PERRY. If the Minister intends to inspect any one of those cans, it is going to be a very expensive business. The hon. gentleman has not told the committee what fees the canners will have to pay for this inspection.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have endeavoured to tell the committee: $10 for the season—that covers everything—instead of the old proposal, which was so much on every case.

Mr. PERRY. I readily admit that the Government brand, after proper inspection, will tend to raise the character of the article in the market. But there is an objection to that, namely, that the officer intrusted with the work of inspecting and branding may not do what is conducive to the welfare of the packer. He may be a selfish man; he may perhaps not represent the article as it exactly is. After all, I do not know whether we require a much better means of establishing the character of these fish in the foreign market than that of a man's own private interest. If a man has $10,000 invested in a lobster fishing or packing business, it is his interest to raise the character of the fish as much as possible. The small fisherman who packs only perhaps fifty cases of lobsters in the year, is not able to spoil the market. If I mistake not, even the Minister himself stated a year or two ago that the fish packed after the close season spoil the market, and not the fish caught and packed from the 25th of April or the 1st of May to the 15th of July. The Minister knows that the lobsters caught after the close season do more to depreciate the value of the fish in the foreign market than the want of branding. It appears to me impossible for a man to go into a factory day after day and see that the cans are put up properly, so that he may brand them with the Government brand. I do not see how this is going to be carried out. However, I am not so much against that as I am against the $10 fee on the packer. If the Minister cannot see his way clear to reduce it to $5, I am sure it will be a great hardship upon the people engaged in packing, not only around Prince Edward Island, but in Nova Scotia as well; and I think the Minister is taking a wrong step to protect his own constituents, who are largely interested in lobster fishing. Suppose he does extract $5,000 or $6,000 from these poor fishermen, he will expect votes from them when the time comes; and how is he going to look them in the face and ask them to vote for him under these circumstances? If I mistake not, I shall make a better case with the fishermen of my county than he will with the fishermen of his county. But, apart from that, it is a step in the wrong direction to tax the poor fishermen of the Dominion of Canada. For those who fish in the bays it would not be so bad; but in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, from the 1st of May to the 15th of July, the fishermen cannot put in more than about forty fishing days owing to the storms which carry away their gear and tackle and prevent them fishing. Yet the Minister stands up and says, we are going to tax them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not at all.

Mr. PERRY. The fisherman is not taxed directly, but he is taxed indirectly. The packer will pay the tax, but he will take it out of the fishermen by paying enough less for the lobsters to make up the $10. The packer is a man who understands his business, and he is not going to lose the $10; he will take it out of the fishermen. I cannot for the life of me see the good of imposing that fee of $10.

Mr. BOWERS. I think the Minister is perfectly right, if he is going to have a tax for a license at all, in imposing $10. I do not think $10 is out of the way, especially if the Government brand the package in which the lobsters are placed. At the same time, I would call attention to the latter part of this clause, which says, "can, preserve, or cure lobsters." I would like to add, "except where preserved in ice." Lobsters preserved in ice may be kept in a live state.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That will be covered. We do not interfere with that.

Mr. FRASER. I do not think that for $10 all that the Minister expects can be done. There can be no inspection of the lobsters that would be worth anything on the market unless the inspection takes place at the time the lobsters are put up. It will be worthless for the official to go around to the factories and put the Government stamp on the packages after they are put up, and indeed it is questionable whether the Government have any right to inspect anything except in order to show whether or not it is deleterious. I do not think it would be worth very much in any market of the world to have a Government inspection as to the character of an article, that is, as to one being better than another. This inspection will show all to be equal. Of necessity all who put up lobsters must get the same ranking from the Government, whether their lobsters are good or bad. I see a difficulty there; the Government may put its mark on that which may turn out to be bad. There is only one way in which a trade mark may be good: let each packer have his trade mark, and let the market decide which article is the best.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is what they are doing now, and that is what is playing the mischief.

Mr. FRASER. But the hon. gentleman must see that his official cannot be on the spot, and he must take the word of the man who put up the lobsters. It would take a fee of $500 to make the inspection effective, because he must have a man in each factory all the time. When the inspector goes and finds ten, or fifty, or 1,000 cases of lobsters, how can he learn anything about them except from the man who puts them up? And he must give the same certificate all round. So that, while the purpose of the Minister may be very good, I do not see that this provision will reach the end he is aiming at. If he thinks that $10 paid in by each packer is going to enable him to have such an inspection as will change the whole character of the goods inspected, he will signally fail. In the county I represent, they are packing lobsters around the shore for 100 miles. How many officers will the hon. Minister have? Will he have an officer at each packing house? He cannot do that, and I, therefore, look upon the packing as not of very much value. If this be the object, to have the law put in operation and those who violate it punished, I say that is all right; but as regards deciding the character of the lobster, I do not think that will be attained at all.

Mr. STAIRS. The main object of this provision is not to secure the inspection of lobsters but to prevent the packing out of season. The other is a very incidental thing, but it is thought the measure will have a beneficial effect in time. It will ensure to the purchasers of lobsters abroad that the cases which have the Government stamp were packed in the proper season. They know in England as well as we do that lobsters packed in Canada out of season often turn out badly. Therefore, although this provision may be open to some of the objections pointed out by the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), it will have a very beneficial effect, because it will assure the purchasers of lobsters in England that the lobsters having the Government stamp have been carefully and properly packed in season. On that account alone this Bill is worth passing. The practice of packing out of season has grown upon the coast of Nova Scotia in the past few years, and is doing a great deal of harm to the legitimate trade. As the hon. member for Guysboro' knows, it is impossible to watch the coasts of Halifax County and Guysboro' so efficiently as to stop illegal packing, that is packing out of season; and when the hon. Minister proposed this feature of stamping the cases, some few years ago, it seemed to those interested that that was better calculated to stop illegal packing than any provision that could be adopted.

Mr. YEO. While I agree that it is very desirable to take every proper means to protect the lobster industry, still I do not see the necessity of imposing a fee of $10 for the license. That may not seem a very large sum, but in Prince Edward Island alone it will amount to over $2,000, and while it will not be of much consequence to large establishments, it will be a heavy tax on small ones. I think the hon. Minister would do much better if he would reduce this fee, or strike it off altogether. As regards Government inspection, I do not think that any good can come of it, except that it will show that the lobsters have been caught in the fishing season. Those engaged in the industry are anxious to put up good fish under their own brand, so that the Government brand will not be of much benefit. I would urge on the Minister the necessity of reducing the license fee to $5, if he is de-terminated to have a license. I would be glad to support any reasonable measure for protecting the lobster fisheries, where protection is necessary, but I cannot see that they will be better protected by imposing a fee of $10 than a nominal fee. In portions of Prince Edward Island the fishing season is altogether too short. On the south side of the Island very few fish are caught some years, and this imposition of $10 will be much felt.

Mr. McLEAN (P.E.I.) When a couple of years ago this Bill was introduced with a provision requiring a fee of $5 per license, and 1½ cents tax per case, it met with the general approval of those engaged in the lobster business. I approve of this measure, but do not think the hon. Minister has gone far enough. I do not think that the packers will object to this fee of $10, provided there is no extra charge for branding the case. I think, however, some of the other provisions of the Bill might be improved upon.

Resolution concurred in.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 145) to amend the Fisheries Act, was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. BOWERS. What objection is there to killing whales with explosive material. I think whalers use bombs altogether, and I do not think you could kill a whale in any other manner to-day.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no amendment with reference to whales, which are not killed in the way the hon. gentleman suggests. The present Act provides:

Every one who hunts or kills seals, porpoises or whales by means of rockets, explosive materials--- and so on, just as in this proposed amendment, except that we introduce here the words "or fish of any kind," which words are introduced because there is growing up a most dangerous and despicable practice of using dynamite in killing all manner of fish which, as every one knows, is a most wasteful and destructive method. There is an Order in Council against it to-day, but it was deemed better to give it the effect of an Act of Parliament, which will secure for this provision greater notoriety and greater weight.

Mr. FRASER. I am glad the hon. Minister has introduced that amendment. It is more than a despicable practice. I do not know a punishment too severe for the man who would be guilty of such a thing.

Mr. ROSAMOND. Hang him.

Mr. FRASER. I do not exactly advocate hanging. But the punishment should be sufficient to stop this practice. I know cases in the province of Nova Scotia where pools had been emptied of fish in this manner. It is an infinitely meaner practice than the shooting of pigeons from a trap, of which we have heard so much. It is unmanly, it destroys the fish and prevents others from enjoying the sport which is of all sports the best. As to whales I do not pretend to know anything about them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The rest of the section is the same as in the Act.

On section 2,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As I have just been saying, this is introduced to meet the case of British Columbia. Hitherto the only place where drifting was allowed was in British Columbia, and, in the Fraser River drifting was the only fishing carried on, and is the only fishing that is really practicable. In the province of New Brunswick, though it has been against the law for thirty years, they had been accustomed to take salmon in this way outside the harbour of St. John. I had a very exhaustive report made by Mr. Prince, the commissioner of fisheries, and he has concluded that the fisheries will not be prejudiced by permitting this method of fishing there, where somewhat similar conditions exist to these in the Fraser River, so long as we regulate the practice under the license system.

Mr. BOWERS. I do not see why the province of Nova Scotia should be excluded from this privilege.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is not a drift-net used in Nova Scotia.

Mr. BOWERS. But one may be used.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. When a case comes up we will deal with it.

Mr. BOWERS. On the southern shores of the Bay of Fundy I believe there are two or three parties who have drifted for salmon.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is very dangerous if they drift inside the three-mile limit just now. I shall be glad to look into any case which the hon. gentleman will bring forward, and which he can put on all-fours with this case and the case of the Fraser River. I know of no such case.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). I would like to know the meaning of this clause. Does it mean that persons shall not drift for salmon anywhere except in the provinces of British Columbia and New Brunswick?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes. The law to this date is that no drifting for salmon shall take place in Canadian waters except in British Columbia. That has been the law ever since 1867—though, of course, as British Columbia did not enter until after 1867, the exception of that case was not made until later, the law in 1867 being to prohibit drifting for salmon in Canadian waters altogether. But it has been discovered that in the Bay of Fundy, no method of fishing can be carried on in connection with that tide, which is a terrific tide, except this method of drifting. But great complaint has been made, even among the fishermen, because this fishing is not regulated, not being under license. There is great trouble and infinite confusion and even injury to the fisheries of the St. John River, toward which the salmon taken in these drift-nets are making for spawning purposes.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). Would it not be plainer to say—

No one shall drift for salmon, except under license in British Columbia and New Brunswick.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have no objection to that; perhaps it will read better.

Mr. BOWERS. Do I understand the meaning of that to be that if a man wishes to fish for salmon in Nova Scotia he cannot get a license?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have told the hon. gentleman that drifting for salmon has not been lawful outside the province of British Columbia.

Mr. FRASER. I think the change proposed by the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. White) does not bring out the meaning suggested by the Minister. In fact, I think it would mean the very opposite. I would suggest that the clause should read something like this:

No licenses shall issue for drifting for salmon except in British Columbia and New Brunswick.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Shelburne is right.

Mr. FRASER. It means that they might drift without license elsewhere than in British Columbia and New Brunswick.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, no. That is too technical altogether. I move that the clause read—

No one shall drift for salmon except when under license in the provinces of New Brunswick and British Columbia.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 3,

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. This is the place to make the change in the fee, if you wish to make it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes. make it $10.

Mr. FLINT. I think the hon. Minister should make this clause a little elastic. I am aware that during the present season a large number of lobster traps have been made in Nova Scotia. Perhaps tens of thousands of dollars worth will have been made before this law can be brought into effect, all of which are intended to be used, and must be used about the 1st January, 1895. And I am afraid a considerable amount of property will be rendered valueless—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Oh, no.

Mr. FLINT—unless this clause is extended for another year or some other arrangement is made in that regard.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am satisfied there will be no such loss as the hon. gentleman says. They can easily knock a lath off. As the hon. gentleman knows, they have to put these traps in order after using them every season. There is not a bit of difficulty about it. I have not received one complaint on that score. In fact, I may tell the hon. gentleman that my officers, while they have advocated this, are satisfied, from experience, that there is little protection to the fisheries in it. The lobster is by no means inclined to tackle even that size, though he could squeeze out. So sensitive is he, that the moment he perceives that these slats are not very far apart, he immediately retreats.

Mr. FLINT. What is the present width allowed?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no regulation except in Prince Edward Island, where it was an inch and a quarter, but it was useless.

Mr. FLINT. I have in my mind now a new patent trap which a company is making in the county I represent. They have made many thousands of these traps in the expectation of a great sale, and have undertaken contracts to deliver large quantities. I am apprehensive that these gentlemen might find themselves injured by these regulations.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I may say in all sincerity that I would rather see them ruined than to see the fisheries ruined. The very object of this Bill is to prevent the use of traps that will effectively take all lobsters.

Mr. FLINT. These traps have been made honestly, the makers not knowing that the law was to come in and strike them down. Before the bill passes its third reading, I would like to have an opportunity to communicate with these gentlemen to see if something cannot be done to prevent the destruction of their property.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman is needlessly alarmed. I may tell him that I have allowed this proposition to stand until this late day in the session in order that the bill might be made known throughout the Maritime Provinces. I was anxious to get all useful suggestions, and none have been made with respect to the point the hon. gentleman mentions. I am confident the difficulty he fears is not a real one.

Mr. McLEAN (King's, P.E.I.) In reference to this clause I think there will be a good deal of hardship if you require that all the slats on the whole of the trap are to be put an inch and a half apart. The former regulation only referred to the lower slats, but now you cover the whole traps. Of course that destroys the trap, because they cannot be taken apart and put an inch and a half apart. Then the penalty I see is to be not less than $400. I would ask what provision there is to be for the protection of the packer that sets his traps out in good order? Of course a good deal of trouble might be thrown upon the packer by fishermen taking the traps out before putting them in the water.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The law could not fasten upon an innocent party any consequences in this case. It would have to be shown that a person used this trap under the legal size, but no one letting a trap go out of his possession, according to law, would be brought within that section.

Mr. BOWERS. I would call the Minister's attention to the fact that this inch and a half is no protection to the lobster at all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is some protection, I admit it is not much.

Mr. BOWERS. I measured the traps the year after the hon. gentleman brought down his bill, and I measured plenty of spaces of two inches, and the traps took lobsters of seven inches. I think that size should be either two inches, or else the Minister should not allow lobsters to be taken under 10½ inches. If he allows them now to catch any size of lobsters they wish, they will destroy the whole lobster fishery in a short time, because they will take lobsters of five or six inches.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, but he will see the difficulties that beset me on every side. I am incurring enough odium in making the present reform, which is in the right direction. I say frankly that this is a minimum of protection, it only allows the smallest lobsters to get out. Perhaps it will be worthless to the packer.

On subsection 5 of section 3,

Mr. FRASER. You say "have been legally caught and packed." I think "legally caught" is sufficient.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is an advantage to the packer. He wants to get that certificate, and it is a great thing for him to have it, for it aids him in selling. That is the packer's advantage.

Mr. FRASER. It may not be the Government's advantage.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We will take the risk.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

On section 4,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This change is made in consequence of the complaints of the operators of drift-nets, gill-nets and all others, which are required, according to the present law, to be wholly out of water during the weekly close season, while pounds and weirs may be used all the time, without giving the fish a chance to make the run. There is no reason why salmon nets within three miles of a river's mouth, should be required to be lifted, and none others. This subsection puts all nets on the same footing, and seeks to do away with the complaints of those operating gill-nets, seines, and so forth.

Mr. PERRY. Does that mean that a man catching herring would have to take up all these nets on Saturday evening and not set them out again until Monday? Is that the intention?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. All herring nets have now to be lifted. That has been the law for years.

Mr. PERRY. If that is the law, it is a bad one.

Mr. BOWERS. There should be some clause inserted providing that this need not be done in case of storms. Some fishery overseers might take advantage of a fisherman being prevented by bad weather from lifting his nets, and prosecute him out of personal spite.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No fishery overseer is out in bad weather.

Mr. PERRY. I remember two years ago that the fishing season in Prince Edward Island expired on a Saturday. It was a stormy day, and the men could not go out and take in their traps. On Monday morning when they were in the act of taking them in, the steamer 'Stanley' came along, and about 500 traps were destroyed, of the value of $400 or $500. Such action might be taken on the information of a fishery overseer. The same result might follow, because there is no protection afforded to the fishermen. If the weather is stormy on Saturday, and a fisherman cannot take in his nets, they are exposed on Sunday, and perhaps Monday a fishery overseer may prosecute a fisherman. I suppose the penalty may be regulated by Order in Council, or by departmental regulation. I contend it is a great hardship to the fishermen.

Mr. BOWERS. I certainly think there should be some allowance made for stormy weather. There may be times when it would be impossible for the fishermen to take up their nets on Saturday, and the hon. Minister, I hope, would not force the fishermen to violate the local law by lifting them on Sunday.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think it better to allow the section to remain. No complaints of hardship have been made. If the change suggested were made it would be impossible to conduct any prosecution without the plea being put in that there had been stormy weather.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I know localities in which large pound-nets are set off the Nova Scotia coast. A school of mackerel may come along, and 1,000 barrels be caught in one of those nets. It would be utterly impossible for the fishermen to dispose of the fish immediately, even to get them out and clean them. What are the fishermen to do? Is it necessary for them to take up their nets and allow the fish to escape?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No. On section 5,

Mr. FRASER. The power proposed to be given to the fishery officers is excessive. They should be allowed to remove the nets, but not destroy them. I know that a large number of nets have been wilfully destroyed, when this should not have been done.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I accept the amendment, and am willing to omit the words "and destruction."

Mr. BOWERS. I think that provision about "attempted violation" should not be there. A fishery officer might think that a man was attempting to violate the law when he was innocent. It is bad enough to forfeit a man's gear for a violation of the Act, and for not an "attempt" at violation.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think that is a reasonable suggestion. I will leave out the words "attempted violation."

On section 19,

Mr. McLEAN (P.E.I.) Do I understand that to refer to lobsters?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If lobsters are fish it does.

Mr. McLEAN (P.E.I.) That could be made a very great hardship on a man where there is a lot of fish caught in a place. I would like to know from the Minister if there is going to be any provision as to what will cause a man to forfeit his license. The license is given for a nominal fee of $10, and I would suggest that for a second offence the penalty should be cancellation of the license.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We would not deal with that in the bill, but there will be no cancellation of the license unless there was wilful violation of the Act.

Mr. FLINT. I think that clause is unnecessary, and too harsh.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It may seem harsh, but if the hon. gentleman were in my position for a while, he would find that these small penalties really lead to infractions of the law. A man says to himself, I can run the risk of paying this fine even if I am caught, and there are nine chances to ten that I will not be caught. If we are going to have this law at all, I believe that we should have very serious penalties so as to stop infractions of it.

Mr. McLEAN (P.E.I.) That was my idea when I spoke in reference to this. I think that the first offence should have a pretty heavy penalty, and that the second offence should cancel his license.

Mr. BOWERS. I have no objection to a heavy penalty for fishing out of season, but I do not see any reason in putting a penalty of $20 for each fish. I think there should be a penalty for the whole thing, and not for each fish.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is the maximum fine. At present a magistrate may fine a man only $5 no matter how many fish he has, and that makes the thing a farce. If the offence is wilful, the fine should be heavy.

Mr. BOWERS. There is no heavier penalty for subsequent offences than for a first offence. Why not make it $20 for the first offence, and $50, or even $100, for second and subsequent ones; but the punishment seems too severe that a penalty of $20 should be inflicted for each fish.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the magistrate should inflict a severe penalty, and if there should be mitigating circumstances, the Minister has power to remit and in some cases we have done so.

Mr. DICKEY. I think it is doubtful if the penalty should be mentioned in that clause. The penalty here clashes with the penalty mentioned in some other clauses.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon gentleman is right. In order to meet his view, I will add after line 41, the words "where not otherwise provided for."

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 10th July, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MR. TURCOTTE, M.P.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier) presented the fourth and fifth reports of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he reports the evidence and all the proceedings of the committee?

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I may call the attention of the House to the order of reference:

That the matter therein stated be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, to inquire fully into the said allegations, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses upon oath or affirmation, and that the said committee do report the result of their inquiries.

That is the limit of the order; but at the same time my intention was to lay on the Table in the course of the afternoon the evidence and all the papers and records that were laid before the committee.

Mr. EDGAR. I believe that was the understanding of the committee when it adjourned.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I would like to move the adoption of the fifth report of the committee, which has reference to the compensation to be paid to Mr. Charlebois, who appeared before the committee as a professional man.

Mr. LAURIER. I would suggest that before we take up that report we consider the fourth report, dealing with the subject-matter of the charge. I think the other would come more fittingly after we dispose of the fourth report. I suppose the hon. gentleman intends to move the adoption of that report at an early day.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). My duty is to present the report of the committee to the House, not to move its adoption. However, if a day is fixed by the House for its consideration, the adoption of this report could be arranged for afterwards. It has nothing to do with the merits of the case at all.

Mr. LAURIER. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to suggest a day for the consideration of the fourth report?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I shall be glad to confer with the hon. gentleman in the course of the day for that purpose.

PAYMENTS TO BANCROFT, CONNOLLY & CO.

Mr. RINFRET asked. What was the date of the payment of $43,621.54 to Bancroft, Connolly & Co., in respect of the Kingston Graving Dock, mentioned in the Auditor General's Report of this year, page C-153? If in more than one payment, what are the respective dates and amounts of such payments?

Mr. OUIMET. The date of payment in question was the 13th July, 1892. The sum was paid in one cheque.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier).

THE TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. FOSTER moved second reading of Bill (No. 147) respecting a certain treaty between Her Britannic Majesty and the President of the French Republic.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Surely the hon. gentleman will give some explanations on this subject.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not think my hon. friend would need any explanations after the treaty had been so long before the House—after it had been discussed in one session, and allowed to stand until another session for the consideration of the members of the House. I do not know that I have much further explanation to make than the very full communications which I made to the House on several occasions last year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That was against the treaty.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no. There were one or two points upon which there was some little doubt, with reference to the interpretation of some items in the treaty. Those doubts have been set at rest. One was with reference to the item of fish preserved in their natural form—"poissons conservés au naturel," and I was not clear in my own mind as to the meaning of that. If it meant, as I supposed it did at that time, fish simply in their natural state, it would have cut us off from the benefit of the extension of a very large and important industry in this Dominion. That question was not definitely settled until a few days before the end of the session of last year. However, communications were had, as will appear from the papers brought down, and that question is now set at rest. This class includes what you may call generally canned fish, which are not preserved by the addition of other substances—such, for instance, as are sardines—but preserved salmon and canned lobsters and all that kind, and all fish canned or preserved in that way, come in under that clause. There was also a point made with reference to the question of soap, as to whether the treaty would allow all common soaps to come in or not. It does not. I contended last year, against some adverse opinions on that point, that it referred simply to what is known technically as castile soap, and that is the interpretation which has been given by the French commissioners in communication with the department. So that these two points being cleared away and the House having had time to consider the matter, we now approach the ratification of the treaty, and I am here to-day to move the reading of the Bill for that purpose. There have been two or three objections raised outside of this House to the ratification of the treaty. One has been raised by a very large and important body of people, the prohibitionists, who are looking forward to the time when there will be a prohibitory law enacted by this Parliament and prohibitory laws possibly enacted by the different provinces, if the provinces have the constitutional right to do so. The prohibitionists fear that the adoption of a treaty of this kind, which gives a lower rate upon a certain class of wines, might militate against the putting in force of the people's will in favour of prohibition, when their will comes to be crystallized in the form of actual legislation. However, I have explained to those who have written to me, and the explanation can be seen on the face of the treaty itself, that the treaty does not operate as a bar. The voice of the people which gives force to this treaty—and so far as this country is concerned, that is the majority voice of Parliament—is the very voice which must, if prohibition is ever enacted in this country, enact that prohibition; and when it comes to the enactment of such a law, the majority of Parliament will immediately remove the obstacle, in so far as the treaty is an obstacle, by giving notice of its termination, and it cannot be fairly urged that the time which is set for the denunciation of the treaty, namely, twelve months, would be any impediment to carrying out the wish of the people as regards a prohibitory law. For certainly no prohibitory law could be enacted and put in force by the majority of Parliament in less time than that. The treaty would be denounced and be entirely out of the way, so far as any bar is concerned, when prohibition came to be enacted in this country. So that I do not think there is any great force in that objection. Another objection has been raised by a different class of people—those interested in the cultivation of the vine, and particularly the manufacture of wine from the grape. They fear that the introduction of French wines under the lowered duty may militate against their nascent industry. They have, however, after the ad valorem duty is taken away, a very fair protection; and taking into account the cost of carriage, and possibly the greater cost of the imported wines, they will still have left them a very substantial, and, I imagine, an adequate protection in that respect. They think that they labour under some disabilities with reference to the preparation of their wines, which are not found to the detriment of French makers of wine. That matter has been looked into by the Government, and if there is found to be any substantial disability that they are under, as compared with the makers in France in that respect, that disability can be taken away. I think there is no very great obstacle in the way of doing that. The treaty is one of the first results of the treaty-making power conferred upon us, or exercised by us, in conjunction with England, through our High Commissioner. It has been formed between Great Britain and France and has the signature of the British and French plenipotentiaries, and it becomes a matter of some grave moment, when Parliament approaches a treaty formed in that way, as to whether we shall ratify it or not. Other things being equal, it is certainly incumbent on Parliament to give it a careful consideration, and there will have to be weighty reasons against it before Parliament will undertake to refuse its ratification. I hope these do not exist in this case. In my opinion they do not, and I present this Bill now without going any further into the discussion at present. With these few explanations added to the quite thorough discussion we gave the question last year, I ask the House to vote the ratification of the treaty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. While it is satisfactory to find that the hon. gentleman has seen so much new light, not merely within the last eighteen months, but also, if we are to judge from certain statements made by him in the early part of the session, even in the last three or four months. I would not be guilty of making the inquiry, and probably I would not get much information if I did, as to the nature of the application of domestic discipline by which the hon. gentleman has been reconstructed on this occasion. Possibly we would have to inquire further for that. We might have to cross the Atlantic in order to know how it is the results at which the hon. gentleman's mind has arrived to-day differ so very materially from the results at which the same hon. gentleman's mind arrived somewhere in February or March, 1892.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will point out the exact differences.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am going to, and have provided myself with the documentary evidence. I am bound to say, Sir, that while, as everybody knows, we on this side of the House have been always advocates for obtaining the largest treaty-making power for the people and Government of Canada in dealing with foreign nations, yet if there could be anything that is likely to cause doubts to arise in our minds as to the desirability of conferring the treaty-making power at any rate upon the present representatives of Canada, it is a course which these hon. gentlemen have pursued during the last eighteen months. I can understand very few things likely to cause more discredit to us than the extraordinary vacillation, and the extraordinary diversity of purpose which has evidently existed between the members of the Government and the plenipotentiary—as I suppose I must call him—of the Government on this matter. Sir, I do not propose to condemn this treaty one whit more severely than it was condemned by the hon. gentleman himself when he first called our attention to it about eighteen months ago. But, Sir, I want to call the special attention of the House to this—that according to the statements which were made to this House by the hon. Minister of Finance himself when this treaty was submitted, after making all allowance for the doubts that have happily been removed from his mind as to the exact meaning of "preserved fish" and the exact amount of soap that might be included in the operation of the treaty—after making all allowance for these, this remains—so far as it is possible for me to understand the treaty—that this is a treaty in which we get, for practical purposes, exceedingly little and in which we give a good deal. Now, Sir, the Minister was good enough to give us a calculation some time ago as to the amount that we were likely to lose, which, I think, he supplemented and rather increased in his answers to certain questions of mine in the early part of this session. But, according to his own statement and according to his own evidence, while all the reduction that will be made on the part of the French Government will amount to something like $30,000 or thereabouts, the loss to us will be very nearly three times that amount even on the, as I think, minimized estimate which he then submitted to us. Therefore, Sir, looking at the treaty on its merits, there are an extremely small number of articles, as far as I can see, in which we are likely to carry on any trade of any importance with the people of France under the provisions of this tariff as explained by the hon. gentleman. If in any respect he has found other advantages coming to us it is for him to state them. He did not state them on this present occasion. Were this a treaty which allowed these articles of ours to be imported free into France in return for a reasonable number of similar concessions on our part, I dare say there would be a very considerable deal to be said for it. I dare say that some considerable trade would be developed between the two countries, and I, for one, would be delighted to see our trade with France, or with any country, largely increased, more particularly if it took the shape of a material reduction of the taxes of the people. But, Sir, as far as I can find out, what hon. gentlemen propose to gain is this: they are not going to obtain any admission of articles free, but simply to gain the advantage between the maximum and minimum French tariff. So far as I know not one single solitary article, good, bad or indifferent, is admitted free. The hon. gentleman can correct me if I am wrong on that point.

Mr. FOSTER. None free.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. None free—so I thought. All are subject to duties and tolls of very considerable amount. On the article of canned meat, the minimum tariff is 15 francs; on the article of condensed milk it is 5 francs; on fresh-water fish, eels—we obtain the privilege of free import of eels, I suppose in their live state—5 francs. This, I presume, will prove of great advantage to Prince Edward Island and other portions of our country in which eels have their habitat. Lobsters and crawfish, 25 francs; apples and pears, 2 francs. On apples and pears, dried, it appears to be 10 francs; preserved fruits, 8 francs. I think these are per kilogram.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. FOSTER. Per hundred kilograms.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The report is per kilogram. It does not correctly state the case, I presume; no doubt the hon. gentleman is correct. On building timber, rough or sawn, we obtain, apparently 65 centimes to 1¾ francs. Wood pavement, 3.50 francs; wood pulp, mechanical, 50 centimes; wood pulp, chemical, 2 francs; extract of chestnut and other canning extracts, 3 francs; common paper, machine-made, 10 francs; boots and shoes—is that per pair?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not sure. What page is that? Oh, I see you are not reading from the treaty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am dealing with an estimate presented to us. I am reading from a condensed table supplied by the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; that is per pair.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Furniture of common wood, 5 francs. Furniture other than chairs of solid wood, common, 9 francs; other chairs, 20 francs; wooden sea-going ships, 2 francs—per ton, I fancy. I cannot for the life of me see, under a tariff of that kind, even though there may be some moderate advantage as compared with the present maximum advantage, that we are likely to obtain any substantial advantage, and I do say that there will be very considerable difficulty, in all human probability, if, at any future time, we wish to revise this tariff with a view to encouraging and developing the trade with France. But the hon. gentleman to-day said nothing at all about a point to which he very properly called attention last year, and that is that—if I followed him correctly, and if I understood his explanations—not one of these advantages would accrue to us, except in the event of these goods being imported by a line of steamers plying directly to France. That, I understood to be the hon. gentleman's position. Now, at present we have not a line of steamers plying directly to France by which any considerable portion of the goods we export to France is likely to go. Evidently this would involve very considerable further complications. The hon. gentleman did not tell us to-day—I do not know whether he has any further information on the subject—whether, in the event of their proposals being carried out it will be possible for us to avail ourselves of them to send these articles to France. Prima facie, I should suppose not, but that is a point, no doubt, on which, before this discussion closes, the Government will be ready to give further information. As I understand them, the Atlantic service is to run between here and Britain, and then have some communication crosswise to some French port. But I hold it very doubtful whether that would bring us within the purview of the French law so far as to enable us to benefit by this minimum tariff. That is a point that the hon. gentleman or his colleagues no doubt will give us further information about. But, after all, what I want to call the attention of the House to is this: that, at the very best, we are likely to face a very heavy tax indeed, and the market which is offered to us is one for a very small number of articles, a very few of which we will be able to export in any largely increased quantity. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman dwelt very gingerly, indeed, on the plea which, after all, would be, in my opinion, much the best plea to recommend the treaty, that the honour of this country was involved. Doubtless the hon. gentleman recollected well that when we were discussing this in the early part of the session, he cut that ground entirely from under his own feet, because he told us then, in reply to questions from this side of the House, that the Government had not made up their minds on the subject, that the Government had to hear certain deputations, that the Government had, and would be, governed, I presume, by political considerations, and considerations of expediency; and, therefore, it clearly followed that the honour of the country could in no shape be involved in rejecting or refusing this treaty, a point which the House, on both sides, will do well to take into account. Now, the hon. gentleman knows, and we all know, unfortunately, that this is a very bad time, indeed, to propose even a small reduction in our revenue. The accounts which have lately been placed in our hands and made public, show only too clearly that we must face a large reduction of revenue for the current year, a reduction very little if at all short of two million dollars, a reduction which will be quite sufficient, unless the hon. gentleman is able to show grounds for supposing that our expenditure will be less than that of last year, to substitute a considerable deficit for the nominal surplus with which we closed our affairs in 1893; and in the teeth of that, we have the Government coming down with proposals which involve a considerable loss of revenue at both ends. In the first place, we are going to lose a certain amount of revenue, it may be what the hon. gentleman expects, but I am inclined to think it will be at least $40,000 or $50,000 more, because I doubt whether the application of this treaty can be confined entirely to goods imported from France; and we will, besides that, in all probability, lose a considerable amount of revenue if the result of this treaty is to diminish the consumption of our own wines, inasmuch as our wine growers are obliged to pay a considerable amount of duty for the French alcohol which they require to fortify the article they produce. Now, I am not by any means disposed to advocate protection in any shape or form, but neither am I disposed to advocate discrimination against our own people, and I am bound to say that it appears to me that these wine growers have good grounds of complaint when you allow French and other wines to be imported into this country at a considerable reduction, knowing very well that a large part of the most expensive ingredients which go to make these wines, are obtainable by them absolutely duty free, while we, if I recollect the terms of our excise law aright, absolutely prohibit our own people from obtaining similar advantages. Sir, taking the arrangement altogether, I must say that I doubt whether we have any cause to congratulate ourselves on the first fruits of our treaty-making power. I believe that, entirely apart from the undignified and vacillating conduct of the Government in this matter, this treaty has been conducted on lines which are likely to inflict a considerable injury on a certain section of the people, and involve a considerable loss of revenue, for which apparently we will derive no sort of corresponding advantage. To quote the hon. gentleman:

Until we receive more satisfactory assurances than we have as regards the various items of which I have spoken, I think the House should not be asked to ratify this treaty.

The hon. gentleman, then, was, no doubt, clothed and in his right mind, and I think he spoke not only his own true and genuine sentiments, but the true and genuine sentiments of a great number of his supporters, if only they were free to express their opinions on the subject.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The treaty to which this Bill relates is open to so many obvious, numerous, and easily understood objections, that it will require something more than the half-hearted defence which the Minister of Finance made for it in introducing the Bill now in your hands. I think, Sir, that the suspicion prevails in this House that this treaty has been forced upon the Government, and will be forced upon the House, and upon the country, not because the Government themselves really believe that it is to the advantage of the country, but because it is forced upon them by influences outside the Cabinet, is a suspicion which is justified to a still greater extent by the speech of the Finance Minister. Now, with regard to the objections that are to be made to this treaty, objections which, I say, are numerous, and which come from many different sources, I will mention, in detail, those which I think are most entitled to consideration by this House. In the first place, there is one which was alluded to by the hon. the Finance Minister. Well, Sir, one can understand that that hon. gentleman would feel, or, at any rate, ought to feel, a great deal of sympathy with the prohibition movement in this country. There was a time when that cause was very much at his heart, but circumstances alter opinions as well as cases, and now we have that hon. gentleman placing himself in direct opposition to the well-expressed wishes of the great body of the temperance people of this country. There is not a single temperance organization which has not petitioned this House against this treaty, because they say that it will hamper them in any attempt they may hereafter make in carrying their views into effect.

Mr. AMYOT. Are the prohibitionists the majority in this country ?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think it has been pretty well shown that outside of the province of Quebec the prohibitionists are, if not a majority, very close upon a majority in this country. However, it is well known to the members of this House that I am not an advocate of prohibition. I have never yet been able to see my way to vote for a measure which I think is not only in many respects objectionable, but is impracticable. But this much I do say, and I think there are hon. members in this House who will take the same view, that while I am not prepared to vote for a measure of prohibition, I am prepared and I am pledged to give the advocates of that measure a fair field, if no favour; I am pledged to oppose any measure which may tend to embarrass them in the course upon which they have entered, which may tend to put a stumbling-block in the way of their efforts to secure a prohibitory measure. Upon that ground while I would not give my pledge to support a measure of prohibition, I have given my pledge to those gentlemen, and I think it is a pledge they were entitled to, that I would not support any measure which would put a stumbling-block in the way of their future progress. I think that is a very strong objection against this treaty, and one for which, as I say, the Finance Minister ought to have, if he has not, a great deal of sympathy. Then there is another point to which I did not hear the hon. gentleman allude, although I was not in the House at the opening of his remarks. We have in this country a tariff which, whether for good or for ill, imposes very heavy burdens upon the great mass of the consumers, and here we are asked to adopt a measure which, while not, in the slightest degree, alleviating any of those burdens, takes a very large portion of the duty from articles which are unquestionably articles of luxury. The people of this country have expressed in no uncertain terms their desire for tariff reform, a desire which certainly has not borne much fruit in this House, so far as the present tariff is concerned, and after this House has practically re-enacted the old tariff, with all its burdens, do hon. gentlemen suppose that the people will be satisfied to find that this House and this Government have taken the duties off articles of luxury such as champagne and things of that kind, while the other duties remain still in force? I think the hon. gentlemen will find that public opinion will not sustain them in taking that course. That is one of the objections to this treaty. It must also be borne in mind, as was stated by the last speaker, that we are entering into this treaty at a time when we must anticipate a considerable reduction in our national income. This, then, is not a time to enter on a course of reducing duties on articles of luxury, especially when the duties on articles of general consumption remain fixed as they are at the present time. Another objection to the treaty is one which may not perhaps find much favour in this House, but I think there are hon. gentlemen who will give it a considerable degree of weight. This House has refused to make any reduction in its tariff on articles of British manufacture, and which we receive from Great Britain, and while articles we receive from Great Britain, to whose markets we have free access, are not given preference, yet we jump at the chance of securing a slight reduction of duty on articles sent to a foreign country where we can obtain such a reduction. If we can afford to lose a certain amount of revenue, let us lose it with the mother country, to which we have free access, and not with a country where we have very limited advantages. I do not know how these arguments strike the hon. gentleman from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), but it is remarkable that those who advocate close connection with the mother country, those who are always advocating the doctrine of the unification of the Empire, should be prepared to advocate a treaty to give special advantages to a foreign country, while as regards the mother country, with which we have absolute freedom of trade, we make no reduction. I cannot understand how any hon. member who desires that we maintain close connection with the mother country can advocate the course now suggested. There are other drawbacks. There are the complications which will arise from what may be called the reciprocal clause of the treaty. In every one of those particulars Canada is placed at a disadvantage. I do not think we can congratulate the plenipotentiaries on the terms on which they negotiated this treaty. As already pointed out, the conditions are entirely unfair as regards Canada. I need not go over the details which have already been mentioned and which, no doubt, will hereafter be referred to; but we hamper ourselves to very little purpose by entering into conditions which may put it out of our power at any future date to make a treaty with another country, while at the same time this treaty is an exceedingly one-sided one so far as France is concerned. With all these obvious objections to the treaty, what does the Finance Minister tell us are the advantages we shall receive? With these objections, the advantages should be correspondingly great. I think hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches have entirely failed to make out a case. For my part, I am not prepared to accept the treaty; I am not prepared to vote for a treaty which seems on its face to be unfair, and which is open to so many objections, and which is evidently attended with so few advantages; and in order to bring this matter to an issue, I beg to move the following amendment:—

That all the words after "That," in the original motion, be struck out, and the following inserted instead thereof: "while this House is willing at all times to sanction any treaty which, on fair and equitable terms, will add to Canadian trade, it is unable to assent to the treaty that has been made with France, on the ground that it will not prove reciprocal in its results, in that it gives to France greater advantages than Canada receives, being unfair and unequal inasmuch as, according to one of its terms, France is entitled to the benefit of all commercial advantages which Canada may hereafter give to any other foreign power, not merely in tariff matters, while Canada is only to participate in any reduction of duty granted to any other power in any of the articles enumerated in the treaty. It is further unequal and unfair in this that while any increase in the duties on the class of wines which under it France is to have advantages in respect of, entitles France to denounce the treaty, Canada is not placed in the same position should any increase be made by France in the minimum tariff which is to be enforced so far as Canadian products mentioned therein are concerned; and in the opinion of this House it is unfair and unjust to the great mass of consumers that duties should be lowered, as by the treaty they are to be, on articles of luxury, while high duties are to be maintained on many of the necessities of life and this too at a time when owing to the falling revenue the duty can ill be spared."

In submitting this resolution, I have avoided saying anything in regard to a question which will be, I think, exceedingly interesting and a little amusing to some hon. members of this House. I am not going to enter into the question of protection so far as our own wine-growing industry is concerned, but I leave the advocates of the National Policy to justify, if they can, such an interference with a growing, flourishing and valuable industry. So far as the free trade principle is concerned, one might fairly accept the treaty so far as that industry is concerned; but hon. gentlemen who take a different view, and are opposed to free trade and are in favour of the National Policy, will be compelled to justify upon the arguments they put forward hitherto with regard to that policy, the dealing of a great blow at this wine industry, which is now flourishing among us. With regard to the reciprocity clauses of the treaty, our plenipotentiary was certainly very careless about our interests. In regard to one class of the objections to which I have referred in this resolution, while we have to submit to any increase in the French minimum and only obtain redress by reducing the tariff on those articles after one year's notice, the French Government, if we make the slightest increase in our duties on wine or any of the articles enumerated in the treaty, have power to terminate it without notice. A more unfair condition it is hard to conceive, and I am at a loss to understand how hon. gentlemen can justify a treaty which contains a clause so exceedingly disadvantageous to our interests.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I desire to offer a few words with respect to the treaty now before the House. In order to refresh my memory, I read over the statements made during the debate on this subject last year, and I was impressed very strongly with the decided stand taken by the hon. Finance Minister against the treaty in the interests of Canada. I am very much disappointed to see that he has made so few remarks about it; and that he passes very lightly over some points which he brought up last year with regard to the definition of certain articles mentioned in the treaty. In addition to reading his speech I studied the various clauses of the treaty, and I read all the communications that passed between the High Commissioner, through whom the treaty was negotiated, and the Ministers of the day. And after reading and studying the whole, I have come to a conclusion, which I think every hon. gentleman who impartially considers the matter will come to, viz., that although there is a great deal in the treaty in the interests of France there is very little in it in the interests of Canada. I can, in fact, corroborate that statement, by giving the opinion of the plenipotentiary who negotiated the treaty. At page 35 of the blue-book, Sir Charles Tupper writing to Mr. Bowell, under date 18th January, 1893, writes as follows in reference to what he said to the French commissioner:—

I added, that the fact that the minimum treatment which it was proposed that France should give to Canada on a number of articles would be practically of little value without direct communication between the two countries, afforded a sufficient guarantee of the interest which Canada had in obtaining that direct steamship service.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is evident to me that when we consider the treaty on its merits, as we should consider it, and without reference to the supplementing of that treaty by a steamship subsidy of $750,000 a year; that the treaty is of no value to Canada. On page 37 of the blue-book, in a letter written to one of the commissioners, M. Hanotaux, dated Paris, 18th January, 1893, Sir Charles Tupper expresses himself in almost the same language, and says:

You will also readily perceive that the concession of the minimum tariff on a number of articles which it is proposed to give Canada, will be practically of no value unless direct communication between the two countries be provided, as the surtaxe d'entrepôt would make it impossible for Canada to derive any advantage therefrom.

You see, Mr. Speaker, that the High Commissioner in two places expresses his opinion that there is nothing in the treaty which will be of any practical value to Canada as far as the treaty itself is concerned. No doubt Sir Charles believed that if a direct steamship line were established between a Canadian and a French port, then in all probability the treaty would be of some value to us. Let me draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the financial loss which we will sustain by this treaty. I have gone over the figures very carefully, and I have compared my figures with the figures given in the latter portion of this blue-book, and I find that they very nearly correspond. I give the official figures so that there may be no dispute about the matter. On the basis of our exports to France, in 1892, France would lose under the minimum tariff offered to us, $29,778, and on the basis of the trade of 1891 with that country, she would gain $19,126, or in the two years France would be the loser by about $10,000. Now, taking the other side of the shield. On the basis of the importations from France in 1891, Canada would lose directly $82,929, and on the basis of the importations from France in 1892, we would lose directly $61,156, or a total direct loss in these two years of $144,085. You know, Mr. Speaker, that this would not be all the loss, because of those articles which are mentioned in the treaty we import about as much from other countries as we do from France, and by the reduction of duty in favour of France it would divert that trade out of its present channels and consequently increase our French trade. There would be a loss to us in the difference between what we get now on the importations coming from other countries, and the revenue that we would collect if all these articles came from France. We would lose in 1891, in an indirect way, $77,532, and on the basis of the indirect trade in 1892, we would lose $71,711, making a total indirect loss to our revenue for the two years of $149,243; or adding the direct loss and the indirect loss together, we would lose about $132,867 in the year 1892, and $160,461 in the year 1891. On the other hand there would be a gain to France in 1891 of $19,126, and a loss to France in 1892 of $29,778, or a total loss to France of $10,652, as compared with a total loss to Canada of $293,328. That shows, Mr. Speaker, that the treaty is not fair to Canada in that one particular. It is said by those who sustain the treaty, that there would be a very large increase of trade which would more than counterbalance this loss of revenue to Canada. But in looking over the articles contained in this treaty, which we are supposed to get into France under the minimum tariff, I cannot come to the conclusion that even under this treaty these articles will be more largely exported to France beyond what we export to the present day. For instance, we have canned meats to export. We know that the United States and Great Britain have this export at the present time, and in 1891, previous to the French tariff of 1892, when the old tariff was about the same as it is to-day, we gained very little in our trade in that direction, for in fact we sent very little canned meats to France. Is it reasonable to expect, when the minimum tariff of to-day is about as high as the general tariff of 1891, that we can increase our trade very largely in that particular respect? Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that unless we have direct trade with the ports of France, we cannot get the advantage of the minimum tariff, and, therefore, the steamship line is a necessity to supplement this treaty if it is to be of any advantage to us. For you know that the laws of France make provision that any article coming through any foreign port in Europe shall be charged with what they call in France the "surtaxe d'entrepôt" of 30 per cent; and we cannot take advantage of the minimum tariff unless we have a direct line to carry our goods from Canada to a French port. Now, we will take the article of condensed milk pure. We have no condensed pure milk in this country. All our condensed milk contains sugar, and the condensed milk containing sugar is put upon the maximum tariff list in France. Therefore we have nothing of this article to export at all, and it is the same to Canada as if that article were not in the treaty at all. France gets pure condensed milk from Switzerland, which is much more convenient, even if we had any to export. Again, we export very little if any fresh-water fish; and I want now to come to an item which the hon. Finance Minister mentioned—fish preserved in their natural form. He had himself a doubt last year as to what that particular item meant. Now, how are we to know? Who has given the definition that includes canned fish? We must be guided by the phraseology of the treaty; and if there is any other understanding between the plenipotentiaries and the Government of France, that correction should have been verbally made in the treaty. I doubt if canned fish come under the phraseology of the treaty; and, in all probability, if this phraseology is accepted by Parliament to-day, there will be a good deal of trouble in the matter if we expect to have canned fish admitted under the minimum tariff. Then, it is supposed that we are going to increase very largely our exports in apples and pears. We send no apples or pears to France now; we did not send any there when the market was free to us. Under the tariff of 1891, which made apples from Canada and the United States free, we did not send an apple. How then is it to be expected that we shall send any when there is a duty imposed, and when we can send all our apples to the English market, more especially when the United States has also the advantage of the minimum tariff on apples and other fruits? Take another article, the article of building timber in the rough or sawn. In 1890-91, previous to the adjustment of the French tariff this timber was free, and Norway and Sweden supplied 90 per cent of such timber used by France, the United States, Canada and some of the nations of Europe supplying the other 10 per cent. Now, if we did not extend our trade in 1891, when the market was free for our timber, how can we hope to extend it in 1893 and 1894 under the minimum tariff? Norway and Sweden have the advantages of the minimum tariff; so has the United States; and even if Canada obtains the same advantage by this treaty, she has to compete in the French market with the same competitors that she had before; and if she did not increase her trade under the same conditions before, how can she hope to do so now? Then take the articles of staves. France imports nine-tenths of her pine staves from Norway and Sweden and about nine-tenths of her oak staves from Austria. It is said by those who support the treaty that in all probability Austria, being under the maximum tariff, will cease to send oak staves to France and that there will be a substitution of pine for oak staves, and that in all probability Canada could supply a portion of them. That is a far-fetched argument. It is not likely that pine would be substituted for oak staves, as it is well known that vessels made of oak staves must still be made of hard-wood staves. But supposing oak staves continue to be used, where would they come from? Not from Canada, because we have no oak forests, but they would come from the United States, from the oak forests of Virginia, and other states, as the United States staves are admitted under the minimum tariff. Therefore, we could not expect to build up a trade in this particular item. Then, take boots and shoes. Now, I appeal to any one in this House who has given any thought or consideration to this question, does he really suppose that the Canadian manufacturers of boots and shoes can compete in the French market with the English manufacturers? It is from England that France receives the larger proportion of the boots and shoes she imports. It is often said by the Conservatives of this country that they had to establish protection for our manufacturers of boots and shoes in order to protect them from the importation of boots and shoes from England. Then how can we expect to build up a trade in a foreign market in competition with the very parties we cannot compete with at home? We cannot reasonably expect to increase our trade with France in boots and shoes. Take the article of furniture. We send no furniture to France—never did, and probably never will. When it was free, we sent none; and under the minimum tariff to-day we do not send a single chair or other article of furniture. But it is said that we are going to have our wooden ships admitted free. We have been trying for the last fifteen or twenty years to sell a few wooden ships to France. We have sold very few at any time, and within the last few years we have sold none. In 1891 we sold forty-two wooden ships, and in 1892 we sold thirty-five, but not a single ton went into the French market. In 1891 under the general tariff France had a duty of 2 francs a ton, and to-day under the minimum tariff the duty is 2 francs a ton. But what did the French Chambers do even after this treaty was negotiated and signed? You know that in the last few years the French Government have given a construction bonus for every ship constructed in a French port, and a sailing bonus for every French ship carrying the French flag. After this treaty was negotiated the French Chambers passed a law increasing the construction and sailing bounties, and making it imperative that no ship sailing under the French flag should receive the sailing bounty unless it was constructed in a French port. With that bar between us and the French market, we can rely upon it that not a single ship constructed in Canada will ever be sold in France. You would not suppose for one moment that a Frenchman who wished to sail a ship would purchase one in Canada and sail her under the French flag when he knew that he could not receive a single dollar of the sailing bounty by reason of her being constructed in a foreign country. He would rather pay more for a French ship for the sake of being entitled to the bounty. There is another thing to which I want to draw your attention, and that is the unfair way in which we are dealt with as regards the favoured-nation clause. The second article of the treaty reads as follows:—

Any commercial advantage granted by Canada to any third power, especially in tariff matters—

It does not matter whether it is within the tariff lines or not—especially in tariff matters, shall be enjoyed fully by France, Algeria and the French colonies.

Suppose we negotiate for a free trade treaty with the United States, including in it a large number of articles not included in this French treaty—for instance, suppose we include articles such as these which we import from France, namely:

Importations from France, 1890-91:

Raw hides.....	$ 50,000
Wool fabrics.....	230,000
Brushes.....	36,000
Calf, lamb and sheepskins and other leathers.....	65,000
Manufactures of brass.....	30,000
Buttons.....	15,000
Glue.....	19,000

Laces and lace collars.....	$34,000
Canned tomatoes.....	17,000
Total.....	$496,000

Supposing a number of those articles were included in an arrangement made between this country and the United States, and came in lower than the ordinary tariff, or free altogether, on condition that the Americans would give us corresponding advantages, then every dollar we give the United States under that agreement would have to be extended to France under this treaty. That is our position. Then look at the position that France occupies. Here is the corresponding clause :

It is understood that the advantage of any reduction of duty granted to any other power on any of the articles enumerated above shall be extended fully to Canada.

So that if France entered into a treaty with any other country, which gave that country special advantages, we would be only entitled to a share in them to the extent of the articles mentioned in the treaty. So that on the one side we are confined to the articles of the treaty with France, and on the other hand, France is not confined to those articles. Take this treaty upon any ground you wish, it is unsatisfactory to this country. It is going certainly to be of much benefit to France. It will increase the importations from that country, especially of wines and champagnes, to a very extraordinary degree. It will give France a monopoly of that trade and divert our trade with other countries in those articles to France. There is another one-sided clause in this treaty, namely, the centre paragraph of article 4 :

It is agreed likewise that if non-sparkling wines gauging fifteen degrees at the most, or sparkling wines, become subject later on to an increase of duty in Canada, the French Government by denouncing the present agreement could terminate its operation immediately without waiting until the expiration of the twelve months' delay provided for above.

That is a one-sided clause. Supposing France increases her duty on any of the articles mentioned in the schedule, we have no corresponding clause which would enable us to terminate the treaty without giving the notice of one year, while France can terminate it at once. Why should this discrimination be made against Canada? If it is right that the French should have the privilege of terminating the treaty by any overt act of the Canadian Government, we should have the same privilege in case they increased the duty. There is another objection, and that is this treaty will open the door to the entry of large quantities of liquors into this country at a reduced rate. Surely we drink enough liquors in Canada, surely we have enough of our own, and if liquors are allowed to come in at all, they should come in burdened very heavily, they should come in subject to a high duty, so that the importations may be of some benefit to the Treasury, if not to the people who drink them. The temperance people are a unit in demanding of the Government that they should not open the door to the admission of liquors larger than it is opened now, and thus raise an obstacle to obtaining the prohibitory liquor law which they so much desire. The Minister of Finance has said that in case prohibition were enacted, we could give notice of the termination of this treaty at the end of a year: but every one knows that after all arrangements have been made, after a steamship line has been placed between this country and France, and after all the paraphernalia necessary to put in operation a trade of that kind is once established, it is much easier to say the treaty can be terminated than to terminate it. There will be strong influences in different quarters brought to bear on the Government to prevent such action on their part. If the people of this country are determined to drink wine, we manufacture plenty in Canada, good enough for anybody. This treaty is a direct blow at our grape-growing interest and the native wine industry, and the parties connected with those interests are perfectly right in opposing its ratification. There are many other objections which might be taken, but I will not longer detain the House. If this treaty were presented on its own merits, there would not be ten members in this House who would justify it as being in the interests of Canada. As far as I can see, from the correspondence, Sir Charles Tupper did the best he could. I do not think any other man could have done better. He sought to get from the French people everything he could for our advantage, but failed, as probably any other man in his place would have failed; and he has now placed in our hands a treaty which is of no advantage to us, and which we should judge, not from the standpoint of Sir Charles Tupper, but from the standpoint of Canadian interests, as representing the Canadian people, and if we judge it from that standpoint alone, we shall refuse to give it our ratification.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Coming from a grape-growing district, I wish to show the House how this industry stands before we dispose of this subject. According to the report of the Ontario Bureau of Industries for 1891-92, the following are statistics showing the condition in which this industry is at present: —

The number of bearing vines in Canada is.....	2,282,000
And of unmaturing vines.....	878,000
Making a total of bearing vines for 1894.....	3,160,000
Number of acres planted in vines, allowing 300 vines to the acre, would be 10,533 acres, the production of which, allowing 15 lbs. of grapes per vine would be 47,400,000 lbs. To 3,160,000 matured vines may be added 878,000 vines which have undoubtedly been planted since 1891, making a total of..... 4,038,000 vines.

And a total acreage of..... 13,460 acres.

The estimated cost of bringing an acre of vines into bearing is $120, or a total outlay of $1,615,200 for 13,460 acres, not taking into account the value of the land.

The cultivating and caring of 13,460 acres of vines would take at a low estimate	111,300 days.
The picking or harvesting.....	47,400 do
The packing and hauling to stations.....	47,400 do
A total labour expended yearly of	206,100 do

To harvest this crop of 47,400,000 lbs. of grapes would require 3,950,000 baskets averaging 12 lbs. per basket, and the cost of these at 3½ cents each would be $138,250.

Of this yearly production of 47,400,000 lbs. of grapes probably 15,800,000 lbs. are made into wine and the amount of wine stored in the various cellars will be at the end of the year 1894 about 2,000,000 gallons; and that with the different plants, casks and cellars have a value of $1,900,000.

Resuming Mr. Barnes's datas :

Total number of vines planted..	4,038,000
do do acres in vines..	13,460
do value of vineyards exclu- sive of lands.	$ 1,615,200
do number of days of labour expended yearly.....	206,000 do value of baskets, 3,950,000 at 3½ cents.....	$ 138,000 do Approximate number of gallons of wine.....	2,000,000 do value of wine crop and cellars.....	$ 1,900,000

Therefore, according to Mr. George Barnes, one of the largest wine manufacturers in Canada; the total value of the grape and wine industry in Canada is as follows :—

Value of vineyards.....	$ 1,615,200
do 13,460 acres of land say at $75 per acre....	1,009,500
do 31,600,000 lbs. table grapes at 1½ cents per lb.....	395,000 do baskets used annually.	138,000 do wine cellars and wine in storage. Fall 1894	1,900,000
	<hr/> $ 5,057,700

Now, Sir, we have not only brought this matter before the Government, but we have petitioned the Government asking for consideration of the vine growers' interest, because this is an industry which the Government has encouraged to a certain extent.
The hon. Finance Minister said in his opening address that the wine producers of this country had the advantage of the freights from France to this country. Well, Sir, the truth of that matter is this, that from Bordeaux to Montreal you can lay down wine cheaper than from Windsor to Montreal. So the freight rates are actually against wine producers of the Windsor district. If you will allow me, I will read the petition of the wine manufacturers and grape growers of Ontario, so that the House may understand the position of these industries before they are called upon to vote upon this question. This petition is addressed to the hon. Minister of Finance :

At the last session of Parliament you very cordially received a deputation of the wine manufacturers and grape growers of Ontario who presented you a memorial protesting against the ratification of the French treaty regarding the admission of French wine into Canada, and you very kindly promised us that our petition would be taken into consideration. Now we have reasons to believe that the ratification of this treaty will again be considered by the Government at the present session, and we again enter our protest, our reasons being substantially the same as heretofore ; and in addition, the Canadian wine manufacturers ask for the same privileges as to the use and distillation of grape spirits to fortify weak wines that the wine makers of France and the United States enjoy, and the grape growers and wine makers of Canada ask also that the tariff on imported wines be made the same as the United States tariff : viz., 50 cents on all wines gauging less than 26 degrees of alcohol. Encouraged by the kind and fair treatment our deputation received from yourself and from all members of the Government to whom they were introduced and to whom the object of their petition was made known ; we again respectfully submit to your favourable consideration, that :—

The wine manufacturers and grape growers of Ontario being informed that the Dominion Government intend to consider the ratification of the proposed commercial treaty with France, lowering existing tariffs on certain commodities imported from that country and amongst others, wine, beg to protest against the ratification of said treaty for the following reasons :

That we unanimously believe that the Dominion Government has not been informed and is not aware of the magnitude and importance of the grape and wine industry in Canada, and how it would be affected should the proposed treaty come in force and the 30 per cent ad valorem duty be removed on French wines.

It is a conceded fact and beyond dispute that the interests of the grape growers and wine manufacturers are mutual and identical, and that any tendency to lower the duty on wines will surely lower the price of grapes which is now as low as the cost of production can justify it ; and it is but too true, that owing to the extremely low prices farmers now get for all kinds of cereals they grow, they are obliged to turn their attention to other lines, and many have gone into grape growing, which can still be carried on at a profit, if the Government will grant us the legitimate demands ; which we submit in this, our petition.

As any change in the wine tariff immediately concerns the grape growers and wine manufacturers of Canada, and as these industries are at present in their infancy and should need encouragement rather than adverse legislation, and moreover, as the avowed policy of our Government is the protection of our native industries, the people of Canada who have invested a large amount of capital in planting extensive vineyards and in wine manufacture ; presuming on the stability of our institutions and the durability of our laws, fervently hope that such legislation of our Government, involving the material interests of thousands of our industrious citizens, and the loss to them of hundreds of thousands of dollars, will not be enacted without compensation or the necessary provisions for the protection of those whose business would thereby be ruined.

The wine market of the United States is closed to us on account of a specific duty of 50 cents per gallon, and if the French wines are admitted at a lower rate than at present without the legitimate legislation or regulations that would enable us to compete on fair and equal terms with them, the Canadian market would also be practically closed to us, as the wine manufacturers in France possess numerous advantages and privileges that we do not enjoy.

A certain effect of the proposed treaty will be the flooding of this country with cheap and spurious wines, in which grape juice will hardly if ever, be present ; and an indirect incentive also to the Canadian manufacturer to make spurious wines.

Considering the high wages paid by the grape growers in this country, and the rates of interest they pay on their investments, and also the uncertainties of grape culture, it is safe to say that grapes cannot be profitably grown for less than $25 per ton, and this is the highest price that wine manufacturers can afford to pay and expect to make a legitimate profit at the present price for which native wines are sold.

Owing to the exorbitant price spirits are sold at in Canada, they cannot be used but at a loss, to make sweet wines, or to fortify weak wines from vintages produced during unfavourable seasons when grapes do not attain their full maturity, or otherwise are wanting in saccharine elements or contain an excess of acids.

Instead of employing spirits directly, which course would be too expensive as mentioned before, wine manufacturers of Canada use sugar for the purpose of fortifying their wines. By the process of fermentation, sugar converts itself into a certain percentage of alcohol when added to grape or other fruit juice, but this method, although giving satisfactory results, is far more costly than the French or California method of using spirits ; and the use of a small percentage of grape spirits in natural wines, is a great preservative, and without question, does not impair the salubrity of the wine.

The wine manufacturers of France and also those of California and other parts of the United States can, with certain government restrictions, distill from their grape must, pomace or wines, spirits which they use to fortify their wines, and in these countries wine makers can buy from the distillers, without having to pay an excise duty, the high wines or cologne spirits they need to make sweet wines or fortify weak ones, which process is called "vinage des vins."

The price they pay for spirits is so low that with their marvellous ability in blending wines, and also their methods of making wine with raisins, currants, prunes and flavourings, they can produce artificial wines at a nominal cost, even for less than it costs us for cellaring and labour.

Mr. MCGREGOR.

The privilege of distilling spoilt wines or grape must is practically denied us, and we are annually losing thousands of dollars, which might be saved, had we the advantage of the French or California wine makers.

At Washington, on the 1st of February, 1894, an amendment on the Whiskey Tax Bill was carried, allowing the wine makers to fortify their wines with California grape spirits ; and the amount that could be added to wine to increase its strength to four degrees, which was formerly allowed, is now increased to ten degrees of spirit.

It is an undisputed fact that the light wines called dry wines such as claret and sauterne made from Canadian grapes are as wholesome and palatable as the same class of imported French wines of the same vintage ; while it is beyond doubt that the sweet wines, such as ports and light sherries, manufactured in Ontario are superior in many respects to the cheap ports and sherries manufactured in the old country.

It is well known that the freight rates on wines shipped directly to Canada from France or other European ports are very much less than the rates we have to pay on our railways in Canada. For example, the freight charges on a consignment from Bordeaux to Windsor, Ont., is less than one-half the cost of the freight on a similar consignment from Windsor to Montreal, although the distance between Bordeaux and Windsor is over five times that between Windsor and Montreal. Here again, French wine makers have the advantage over us.

2nd. Ontario alone has an area suitable for the grape culture at least equal to the present area of vineyards in France. See the report of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization for 1891, pages 99, 100 and 103.

From the foregoing facts it is evident :

That our market is limited solely to Canada and that we cannot export profitably our wines or grapes to foreign countries, and therefore it is of the greatest importance for our wine and grape industries that this Canadian market should be reserved to the Canadian producer and not open to foreign competition.

That if the proposed treaty is ratified without certain restrictions, and also without equivalent advantages being granted to us from the Government, our grape-growing and wine industries will be practically ruined.

That in order to be on equal footing with foreign wine makers, the wine manufacturers of Canada should have the same privileges as to the use of spirits, and distillation of grape pomace, that United States and French wine makers enjoy. The wine makers of Canada fervently hope that these privileges will be granted to them.

That for the protection of Canadian wine manufacturers and also for public protection, a commission or examining board be appointed to analyse and test the wines, and that no wines but those made from grape juice be admitted, that spurious or doctored wines called in France vins frelatés be positively excluded from being imported and that the same tests used at the Paris Octroi by the Paris Commission to discover different wine falsification, be used in Canada.

The supply of Canadian wines whether dry or sweet is equal to the demand and if need be, we could supply the whole continent with wine, as with our soil and climate we can produce an unlimited quantity. Canadian wines are sold as cheap and even cheaper if everything is taken into account than the same quality of wines are sold in Europe. In order to promote the Canadian wine industry, we consider it an urgent necessity that our own Government should make the tariff on light wines approximately the same as the United States tariff by raising the Canadian tariff to 50 cents net per imperial gallon for all wines gauging 26 per cent or less of alcohol. We therefore earnestly and respectfully request the Government to raise the tariff as aforesaid. This would increase the demand for Canadian wines, would encourage the wine makers to improve the quality of their wine yearly; and a healthy competition would cheapen the article to the consumer.

In conclusion; we beg to submit:

1. That the grape growers and wine manufacturers of Canada unitedly and emphatically protest against the ratification of the proposed French treaty regarding the clause admitting wines free of the ad valorem duty.

2. That the grape growers and wine manufacturers of Canada unitedly and urgently demand that the tariff on light wines imported in Canada should be raised to 50 cents per gallon.

3. That the wine manufacturers of Canada hereby earnestly demand some special legislation enabling them to use spirits under similar restrictions as those governing the United States and other foreign wine makers.

We trust that the Government will carefully consider our requests and enact such legislation that while they are accomplishing their object in the proposed new relations with France they will not ignore the legitimate demands of the grape growers and wine manufacturers of Canada, but encourage and promote the interests of one of the most promising industries of the country.

Now, this petition is signed by fifty wine manufacturers, and the other petition is signed by over 700 grape growers. We find, too, that grape growing is an industry which can be carried on in connection with the farm. The Minister of Agriculture has told us that in the North-west the people must pursue a system of mixed farming, and in many portions of Ontario we find it necessary to follow that advice. With the low price of wheat, oats and barley, and other disadvantages that we have in carrying on farming, the grape-growing industry comes in as a great assistance to the farmer in many portions of western and south-western Ontario, and adds considerably to his comforts and his gains. A large number of hands employed in this industry have been imported from the old country. They are a very happy people, very industrious and prudent, and make first-class citizens, and we find it a great advantage to have them amongst us. This industry gives employment to those people from early spring to late autumn, during which time they are employed in looking after the vines, preparing the grounds, and conducting their little industry in proper shape. In the winter these men are employed in trimming vines for the next season's growth.

We remember well that after the Franco-Prussian war when the French Government required money, these French peasants who were engaged in grape growing, were the people to whom the Government appealed, because, from their frugal and prudent habits, they had been able to save up a great deal of money. Then, again, we know that the low price of wheat and grain has greatly decreased the value of the land in most parts of this country, but in districts where the grape is grown, land has largely increased in price, and is as high to-day as it has been at any time in the history of the country. Then, again, the reduction of the duty on wine takes the burden of taxation off the rich, and places it on the poor; it is one method of making the rich richer, and the poor poorer; therefore, we claim that when you reduce the duty from 30 per cent, as the same amount of money has to be raised for carrying on the Government of this country, instead of the rich paying their fair proportion of it on the luxuries which they consume, they are relieved from a portion of the taxation, which is placed, instead, on the poor. We in Ontario have felt the iron heel of this Government. We feel that the Government are particularly opposed to Essex. For many years we have been in the habit of fishing on our shores, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has deprived us almost entirely of that industry, which has been worth many thousands to us. Now, this Government is going to strike a blow at the grape industry, which is one of the greatest industries we have. As showing the utility of this industry, I may mention that when grapes are affected by frost in the fall of the year, although they are not as good for table use, they are even improved for the purposes of wine-making; whereas, if the farmers are not permitted to make wine, the grapes will be lost when struck by the frost. Then, again, when grapes are being sent to market, should there prove to be too large a supply the surplus can always be used for the manufacture of wine, so that nothing is lost. Now, we hope that the Government will be able to see their way clear to assist our grape growers in this wine industry. We feel, not only as citizens, but as temperance men, that it is a great mistake to take the duty off wine to so great an extent, and transfer the taxation to those who are least able to bear it.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I am sorry that once again the duty has devolved upon me of defending the National Policy in this House, when that duty should have been undertaken by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. FOSTER. We know we have a good second.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I am sorry this duty has devolved upon me the second time, because I believe this is a National Policy

Government, and it was the duty of this Government on this occasion to refuse to ratify the treaty, and to take the part of the Canadian wine growers. To judge by what the Finance Minister has said to-day, and judging by his previous speech in this House, he has no ground for ratifying this treaty, for he himself condemned it last session, and he had nothing good to say for it to-day. Now, he might have made an appeal to members of this House in favour of ratifying this treaty, from what I may call the national view of the question. This Canada of ours is at last becoming a treaty-making power. That is something of which all Canadians ought to be proud, and I am glad to know that we are becoming more and more self-governing, and I hope our development will continue in that line. Had the Finance Minister come down to the House and said, We are bound by the treaty-making power, and must decide what line of conduct we will follow with regard to this question? No. There are two methods to follow with regard to making and ratifying treaties—first, the English or European method; second, the American method. I prefer the English method. If we negotiate a treaty I consider the national honour requires that the treaty should be adopted, as opposed to the American method, which allows a treaty to be ratified and signed, but the Senate retains power to reject the treaty if it sees fit. I would prefer to follow the English method, and that when a treaty is signed we should guarantee its passage through this Parliament. But the Finance Minister has not made that appeal to the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I mentioned it, but I did not do it as well as you have done.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I will give another reason. The Finance Minister in revising the tariff went about the country and ascertained the views of the people. If we take the views of the people in regard to proposed legislation, much more ought we to take the views of the people in regard to a treaty, because while we can correct legislation almost at any time, we can only correct a treaty by giving the necessary notice. I should like to see this proposition brought forward, that before we commit ourselves to a treaty, especially if we follow the English method, we should first ascertain the views of our own people and see how far they would be affected by the treaty. It is quite evident that the Government did not know the magnitude of the grape growing industry, and the extent that it will be affected by this treaty, for if they had taken the opportunity of going among the grape-growing community of Ontario they would have found grape culture to be a very large industry, and a very prosperous and growing one. That industry has been developed within the last twenty or twenty-five years. It is confined to York, to some extent, to Halton, Peel, Wentworth, Haldimand, Welland, and the counties on the Essex frontier. Those counties constitute the garden of Ontario. If hon. members would visit those counties during the present month or next month they would see the extent of this grape-growing industry which is placed in jeopardy. Hon. members, especially those of French descent who are residents of this country, are inclined to vote for the ratification of the treaty because it happens to be a treaty made with a country from which their ancestors came. I respect them in that view; but I wish to point out that the large proportion of our wine-growers are of French origin, and I think they should rather stand by their compatriots in Canada than with their forbears in old France. The wine-growing industry expected different treatment from a National Policy Government. They expected, instead of a reduction, an increase of protection, and they expected also another concession to which they are entitled, namely, that they would get free alcohol for the purpose of fortifying their wines. They have asked both of these concessions, and instead of these being granted, they are met by a treaty which proposes to let in French wines in competition with our Canadian wines. The Minister to-day made some explanations as to what he would be prepared to do in regard to giving grape-growers spirit for fortifying their wines; but he did not make a definite statement, and I should like a more definite statement as to what he proposes to do, for I consider he is bound to tell the grape-growers of this country what he is prepared to do in the direction of enacting mitigating legislation in regard to permitting grape-growers to use alcohol for the purpose of fortifying their wines. Prohibition has been touched on here to-day as usual, and everyone has endeavoured to edge to one side and to show that he as a prohibitionist is anxious to do something in favour of that cause. We in Canada are growing excellent grapes and making good wine, and what I should like to see is our people using more and more native claret. There are men who pretend to have a fine taste for wine, and some of them like to say that they are accustomed to French wines and that our clarets do not approach the French. It may be that they themselves have a vitiated taste, but if they will educate themselves to drink Canadian claret, and I am satisfied we do make good Canadian claret, it will be drunk more and more by the people. What is wrong with the people of this country is the extent to which they are affected by the tea-drinking curse. If the farmers of the country had the same views of life that the peasants of France and of Europe possess, every farmer would have one, two, three and a dozen barrels of claret bottled for his own use, and the people would drink sound claret instead of health-destroying tea, which, as has recently been pointed out in the case of Ireland, has been the means of sending thousands of women to insane asylums, and of doing great damage to their health generally. Speaking not only from that point of view, but more generally, I wish to see our own industries, and especially our wine-growing industries, encouraged by this Government, which adopted the National Policy; and I should like to ask why the Government have departed from that policy, and why they are asking the sanction of this House to this treaty, and why they should have committed themselves to it. While I should not like to see the treaty defeated on the ground, first stated, namely, that in honour we are bound to ratify any treaty which our negotiator has signed—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I take issue with the hon. gentleman on that question, and that is really the issue to-day. The issue is one as regards our treaty-making power. If we are prepared to follow the European method and not the discreditable method adopted by the Americans, and that is the great issue before us to-day. I should be very sorry to see the treaty defeated. On the merits of the treaty itself I should like to see it defeated, but not when we have regard to national honour.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the hon. gentleman will refer to section 4, he will observe that full power is observed to ratify the treaty or not.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). This is the first time our treaty-making power has ever been up in this House, and it is important that we should decide whether we are going to follow the European and English methods, or the discreditable American method, in regard to the ratification of a treaty.

Mr. FLINT. It has already been a matter for remark that those opposed to any additional favours being granted intoxicating or spirituous liquors imported into Canada, have on this occasion joined hands with those who are friendly to the increased development of the wine industry in Canada; but that need not occasion very serious remark, even from a prohibitionist standpoint. Although prohibitionists believe that the use of intoxicating liquors is injurious in almost every aspect of the case, yet they believe that if ever that evil is to be overcome, it is to be overcome by constitutional agitation within the Dominion of Canada. I think all the members of this House, who, to a greater or lesser extent, look to legislation in the direction of prohibition, all agree that it is not advisable to build up new interests antagonistic to the overcoming of the evils caused by the consumption of spirituous liquors. This treaty has to be considered mainly upon its principles rather than upon the amount of trade it represents, because as has been pointed out by the Minister of Finance and by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald), the amount of trade involved in this treaty is absolutely insignificant compared with the whole trade of the Dominion. Therefore, it is to be considered not so much in reference to the trade which it affects, as upon the principle which this Parliament would lay down by accepting it. I carefully read the speech of the Minister of Finance on this question last session, and I must say that every line of that speech breathed nothing but discouragement and despair in regard to any practical benefit which Canada would derive from the adoption of this treaty. There are only two arguments, it seems to me, in favour of it. One: that it gratifies a certain sentimental feeling existing among the members of this Parliament who are attached historically to France, and the other is, that it appeals to all of us who desire to see our trade relations extended with other countries. Take out these two considerations and there is absolutely nothing left in the treaty. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will dwell upon this question almost solely from a temperance standpoint. There are in the Dominion of Canada an enormous number of taxpayers, and voters who sympathize with them, who would look with extreme displeasure upon any step taken by the Parliament of Canada at the present time which tends to give favours to the liquor trade. We can deal, and we hope to deal, successfully, by and by, with these interests within the Dominion; but we do not desire to see built up other industries antagonistic to prohibition or the more speedy destruction of the liquor traffic. Now, let us see how this treaty will affect that principle. The more successful the treaty is in developing the sale of the goods mentioned in schedule 3, the greater obstacles do we build up towards at any time terminating this treaty. It may be perfectly true that constitutionally and legally there may be no obstacle in the way of abrogating this treaty whenever the Parliament of Canada comes to the conclusion that it would be their interests to have it terminated; but we are inviting the building up of interests antagonistic to the destruction of the liquor traffic and antagonistic to the agitation in favour of temperance reform. If the producers of the articles mentioned in schedule 3, build up a gradually increasing and profitable trade with France, we array their interests against us in our future efforts to obtain a prohibitory liquor law. That this has been widely recognized, I need scarcely say, for the House is well aware that all temperance bodies of any magnitude, which have met since the publication of the treaty, have denounced the treaty and have appealed to their representatives in Parliament not to accept it on the ground that it was favouring the traffic to which they are opposed.

At one of the largest temperance conventions ever held in Canada, which met at Toronto about a year since, the following resolution was moved by the Rev. Dr. Potts, and carried unanimously :—

That this convention expresses gratification that so far the Dominion Parliament has not ratified the proposed treaty with France, whereby our country shall be required to import certain forms of intoxicating liquors on specially favourable terms, and that a memorial be forwarded forthwith urging the Government to resist all attempts in Parliament to secure the endorsement of a proposal, the carrying out of which would be so detrimental to the welfare of our country and so utterly opposed to the wishes of a great majority of our citizens.

A few days ago, at a prohibition convention held in the city of Montreal, a resolution almost similar in its terms was adopted unanimously and by a rising vote. No one can deny that these people were actuated by the highest possible motives, and it seems to me also that no one can deny that there are great reasons for apprehension from their standpoint, that the acceptance of this treaty will very much embarrass them in the steps they propose to take within a year or two in the agitation they are carrying on. It will be noticed by all those who have perused the correspondence, that practically the whole argument in favour of the treaty on the part of the French negotiators, was, their strong desire to increase their markets in Canada for sparkling wines and champagnes. A glance at the tables given us for our information in the same blue-book will show that of the exports of this country of the goods mentioned in schedule 1 of the treaty, by far the largest value is in wines and champagnes; the other articles being insignificant in value in comparison with the whole amount of the exports. There can be no reason to doubt that the result of the reduction of the duty upon those articles will affect the importation of wines and champagnes more largely than it will the other articles. At any rate, the main argument of the French negotiators of the treaty was, that it would increase and enlarge their market for these goods. From the position which the prohibitionists of the Dominion take with respect to the goods mentioned in schedule 3, no amount of utilitarian value derived by us would be a compensation for the acceptance of the principle by the Parliament of Canada: that intoxicating liquors are to be specially favoured. We know that not long since, the Government, in its wisdom, did give some favours to the liquor trade in the way of reduction in the malt duty, and that has been complained of. The ground we take—and I think it is a legitimate and reasonable ground—is, that these articles should be as highly taxed as possible, and that the whole trend of our legislation—even on the part of those who are not prepared to go to the extreme length of absolute prohibition—should be to so increase the duties as to render the interests in the trade less and less from year to year, in order that the obstacles to obtaining a prohibitory law may be reduced to the minimum. Now, it has been pointed out with a great deal of force that we are, by the adoption of this treaty, giving away this valuable principle, for scarcely any benefit whatever, because we do not obtain from France a free entry for these goods; we do not obtain even the minimum tariff upon many articles of export which the commissioner pressed very urgently upon the negotiators on the part of France. A careful study of the negotiations will show that the Canadian commissioner had to work against great obstacles—that scarcely any encouragement was given us by the negotiators on the part of France to believe that they were at all anxious to effect a treaty with us. If we turn to the speech made by the hon. Finance Minister, we notice these discouraging features scattered throughout it. He says :

There is this also to be stated: That since the treaty was made, an important change has taken place in the legislation in France with reference to ships. In olden time it was considered by Canada to be a very great moment, that she should get her wooden ships into France at a favourable rate, and the old negotiations proceeded upon that plan. Since that time the duty upon foreign ships has been largely reduced in France, so that now the maximum is 5 francs and the minimum 2 francs, reduced you may say to a nominal duty. Circumstances have also somewhat changed since 1878, so that that does not become so important to us. But ships was one of the articles which were mentioned in the treaty and which we were to have admitted at the minimum rate. But since the draft treaty was agreed upon, French legislation has intervened which makes that compensation to us of less value even than it would have been had this legislation not taken place. France has for a number of years paid a bounty upon the construction of wooden vessels, and a bounty upon the sailing of both wooden and iron vessels; and the legislation which has taken place within the last few weeks has been of such a kind as largely to increase the construction bounty upon wooden ships in France, as well as largely to increase the sailing bounty, and it has made it imperative that the sailing bounty shall not be given to vessels constructed outside of France which may be bought by the citizens of France. So that in so far as we had hoped for compensation on the article of wooden ships, that legislation has been in the direction of nullifying any benefit that we had expected to gain in that respect. My attention was drawn to that in reading some of the English papers, and I immediately had Mr. Fabre communicated with; and he sent me a copy of the French law, which I will bring down with the papers I intend to lay on the Table of the House.

In order to give a fair idea of the speech, I would have to read a great deal more than I would care to trouble the House with at the present time. He was aware of the difficulties which met the negotiator on the part of Canada by reason of the strong protective spirit in France and the determination of the French negotiators to yield as little as they possibly could in return for the advantage of having their wines and champagnes introduced into Canada at a lower rate of duty. One further remark strikes me, and must have struck all the other gentlemen who have made a study of this treaty; that is: that under it France is not bound to preserve the present relation between the minimum and the maximum tariff. We are purchasing, so to speak, an uncertain value—an indeterminate value. There never can be a time when the French Parliament cannot increase the minimum duty and thus nullify all the present advantages, small as they are, that we think we obtain. The treaty appears to me fully to comply with almost all the terms of the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman—that it is unfair and unjust in its commercial relations, and is particularly unfavourable to the interests of that large class of the people of Canada who are pressing forward from time to time, in this Parliament and outside of Parliament the desirability of as speedily as possible prohibiting the importation of intoxicating liquors of all kinds into Canada.

Mr. DICKEY. I desire to say only a few words on this treaty, as it affects the question of prohibition, and I shall be very short. First, dealing with the question of principle, I regret to differ with very many of my friends in the prohibition ranks, although my difference is known to those with whom I am associated in the work. I have been unable to discover any principle in this treaty that would prevent an honest prohibitionist from voting for it. It is true, it deals with the importation of wine into the country; but it is equally true—and I submit that any person who overlooks that would be simply shutting his eyes to an obvious state of the facts—that we raise in Canada every year millions of dollars of revenue from this liquor traffic; we lower the rates of duties and we heighten them; and I am unable to discover that, in dealing with a particular branch of the liquor traffic, the importation of wine, in a particular way, we are violating any particular principle. I am quite open to conviction on the point of the practical danger to the prohibition cause of creating vested interests under this treaty; but I am unable to discover any distinction in principle between dealing with the wine importations from France in a particular way and dealing with the making and importation of whisky, or with any other mode of raising a revenue from the liquor traffic. It is quite true that to prohibitionists the raising of a revenue from the liquor traffic is entirely distasteful, and we would like to wipe it out of the tariff altogether. But as a practical matter, while this revenue is being raised, and while this Parliament has to deal with questions of that class, according to the will of the people, I see no objection to dealing with the particular branch of the question involved in this treaty. The question of expediency is another question, and I am quite free to admit that on the question of expediency there may be two different opinions. I simply give to the House my own individual opinion on that head. It is insisted that by ratifying this treaty and allowing business to grow up under it, we shall be creating vested interests which will be in the main opposed to prohibition—new interests which the prohibitionists will have to fight. Well, Sir, I look upon the matter in this way. The interests opposed to prohibition to-day in the Dominion of Canada, ramifying as they do every portion of this country, are so enormous, that any trade that will spring up under this treaty seems to me a very small matter indeed. It seems to me that if the prohibitionists, after facing fearlessly for years the enormous strength of the entrenched capital which is invested in the liquor business, and with the hope of triumph not far off, are to be frightened at the wine that will be drunk by the club and city men in Canada under this treaty, they have got into the position of Othello when he said:

Man, but a rush, against Othello's breast,
And he retires.

Why, Sir, it seems to me that even independent of the wine interest, a treaty of this kind, which will not affect the country, which will not affect the farming population, which will not affect the population which is the backbone and strength of the prohibition movement, will not seriously imperil the interest of prohibition. But what are the facts? Who was assisting the prohibitionists in their opposition to this treaty? The wine growers of Canada. The hon. member for Essex (Mr. McGregor) read a petition signed by 700 wine growers of Canada and 50 manufacturers of wines, in which they represent that the ratification of this treaty will absolutely ruin their business. I would ask any prohibitionist in this country if he would not desire the opportunity of ruining the whisky business of Canada by making a treaty with France or any other country. If it were in the power of the prohibitionists to destroy our distilleries by making a treaty with another power, would they not be glad to make that treaty? Why? For this reason, that the capital invested in this country, employing men in this country, is ten times harder to fight than outside capital: and the wine interests of Canada, employing our labour growing grapes and making wines, is ten times more difficult for the prohibitionists to fight than the interests connected with the importation and handling of foreign wines. Either the prohibitionists or the wine growers of Canada entirely misjudge the effect of the treaty, because if the wine growers are right, the prohibitionists are certainly wrong, and vice versa. I believe that the wine growers must understand their business, and that the effect of this treaty would be to seriously hamper that business, if it brings about any large importation of foreign wines. Viewing the matter from this standpoint, I cannot regard it as a very serious question in connection with prohibition. But I do regard it as serious in another aspect, that touched by the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean). In my view, the Government of Canada, when Sir Charles Tupper, as their agent, made this treaty, was not acting as a political body but as the agent of this country. I look upon it that Sir Charles Tupper was the duly accredited agent of this country, that he and Lord Dufferin were authorized to enter into a treaty, and that this House cannot revoke its authority after the damage has been done; but if there be anything wrong about this treaty, it is for us to punish our agents. I submit that we should adopt what the hon. member for York calls the English rule, accept the treaty made in good faith with a foreign power by our plenipotentiaries, and visit our wrath upon the plenipotentiaries themselves, and that the proper method of doing so, is by a motion censuring our High Commissioner for the bargain he has made. But I submit that the honour of this House is involved in our ratifying the treaty and passing the Bill now before us. The danger to prohibition is, at the very best, distant, problematical and depending upon the results that may follow the development of business arising from the ratifying of this treaty. The effect on our national honour would be, in my judgment, immediate and disastrous, if we failed to ratify the treaty, and for that reason, without going into its merits from a business standpoint, which I am not competent to do, I shall have great pleasure in supporting the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I must confess to my astonishment at the line of argument adopted by the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean), and the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey). These hon. gentlemen say that although the right to sanction this treaty is reserved to this Parliament, and although its ratification is postponed until we exercise that right, this House is in honour bound to ratify it. The hon. Minister of Finance took a very different position last year. He altogether denied that doctrine, and I, on that occasion, supported the view he expressed. I have seen no reason to change my opinion up to the present. I called the attention of the House last year, when it was intimated that the Government were bound to ratify the treaty negotiated by their agents, to the case of the treaty between England and France in respect of the slave trade, negotiated in 1841, the negotiations for which had been completed. The French assembly took exception to the treaty, when it was discovered that it was unpopular with the assembly, and Mr. Guizot, who was then First Minister, said that every step in the negotiations preceding the ratification of a treaty, or the exchange of ratification, was a substantial step which enabled either of the contracting parties to reconsider what was being done and to decline to proceed further, if they saw proper. That is precisely our position. Under the fourth article of the treaty, the Government reserve to the Parliament of Canada the option of sanctioning or of refusing to sanction it, and the present agreement, having received the sanction of the Parliament of Canada and the French Chamber, shall be ratified and the ratification shall be exchanged at Paris as soon as possible. We are, therefore, as free to consider whether this treaty is in the public interest as if it were an ordinary matter of legislation before the House, and there is no question of honour involved in the matter. The negotiators themselves did not absolutely bind this Parliament. They reserved, as they were, under the circumstances, bound to do, to this Parliament the right to ratify this treaty or to withhold their ratification; and we are now engaged, not in a mere matter of form, but in a matter of substance. We are going to determine by our votes here to-day whether this treaty is in the public interest of Canada or whether it is not. I say then that we are as free to deal with this treaty as we have been with any other matter that has ever come before this Parliament. We have reserved to Parliament the power that we are now exercising in this matter. The hon. Minister of Finance has said to-day that he had not expressed any opinion in discussing the subject, that he did not express himself adverse to the treaty, but merely said that its provisions were to him unintelligible, and that until he had further light upon it, he was not prepared to recommend its ratification. I think the hon. Minister's statement went much further. I think it is impossible to read his speech without seeing that the whole drift of that speech was adverse to the treaty and not merely a speech due to the fact that the Minister was inadequately informed with regard to the meaning of certain provisions of the treaty. What I wish now especially to call the attention of the House to is that the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) and the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) were at that time in the House, and yet made no protest against the views expressed by the hon. Minister of Finance. They did not say to the hon. Minister of Finance: Sir, you are mistaken. Your plenipotentiary has negotiated a treaty; he has negotiated that treaty under your authority and sanction, and you are in honour bound to submit that treaty for ratification in accordance with its provisions. The hon. gentleman who now says we are in honour bound to ratify this treaty, that we have no discretion in the matter; that we have no judgment to exercise; that we are merely here engaged in the discharge of a formal duty and not in the discharge of an efficient duty in behalf of the public at large, made no objection whatever to the views expressed by the hon. Minister of Finance on that occasion, which were so very much at variance with the views these hon. gentlemen expressed here to-day. The hon. Minister of Finance has called the High Commissioner who assisted in the negotiation of this treaty a plenipotentiary. I think, Sir, that that is, under the circumstances, a very proper name. He is a plenipotentiary not acting on behalf of the Government, but, Sir, he is a plenipotentiary acting over the Government. He is clothed with full power, power which he is exercising not in the work of negotiation, but in securing the sanction of the Government, and through them the sanction of Parliament to this work, which, so far as he is concerned, was completed twelve months ago. Whatever allegiance the hon. Minister of Finance, or the First Minister and his colleagues may owe to their plenipotentiary, I, as a member of this House, feel that I am free to exercise my judgment on this occasion precisely as I was free to exercise my judgment in supporting the view put forward by the Minister of Finance twelve months ago; and it does seem to me that there is nothing in this treaty which calls upon this House for ratification. There is no public interest to be promoted; there is no important industrial interest to be served by the ratification of the treaty. Why, Sir, look at its provisions. One of my hon. friends here has said that in all the provisions of this treaty France has stood upon her traditional policy. She has declared herself in favour of a high tariff, but she says: We have on certain articles a maximum and a minimum tariff, and, if you make certain concessions which are definite in their character, we will permit you to come in under the minimum tariff, whatever that tariff for the time being may be. Look at the provisions of this treaty with respect to wines. The duty, so far as Canada is concerned, is specific in amount. We are not at liberty to tax French wines, after the adoption of this treaty beyond a certain maximum figure. But the French Government are at liberty to increase their minimum tariff to any extent, so long as they keep the maximum tariff somewhat higher. We are not at liberty to increase our tax upon the imports from that country, but they are at liberty to increase their taxes upon the imports from this. With regard to the duty upon other articles the result is precisely the same. There is a provision in the second article of the treaty which the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) has read to the House and which I think is well worthy the serious consideration of this House. That clause provides that any commercial advantage granted by Canada to any third power, especially in tariff matters, shall be enjoyed fully by France, Algeria and the French colonies. So that if we were tomorrow to enter into negotiations with the neighbouring republic or the Australian colonies or any other power with a view to admitting certain articles under certain concessions, under this treaty we should be obliged to make the same concession to France, though France would not be called upon to make any concession to us. Now, I say that the existence of such a treaty would prove an insuperable barrier to negotiation with any other country that might otherwise be disposed to negotiate with us. Before our negotiations could be consummated and before we could be satisfied that our negotiations would be successful, we would be obliged to denounce this treaty in order to get rid of it, so as to give the assurance that this treaty, which really gives us no commercial advantage, would not stand in our way in case we had a fair prospect of succeeding in securing commercial advantages with another country under reciprocal arrangements. For these reasons I say, Mr. Speaker, that the treaty is in an eminent degree unsatisfactory. Then there is another matter which the hon. gentleman, as Finance Minister and as speaking on behalf of the Government on this occasion ought to have explained to us, and that is the provision relating to direct transit between France and the ports of Canada. Now, the High Commissioner told the French Minister that this treaty would be of no value whatever unless there was direct communication—steam communication—between the ports of Canada and the ports of France. Was that communication to be established by France? Was France to be called upon to bear any proportion of the burden or to give such assurances to Canada that we could feel we could call upon her Legislature to give its sanction to a large expenditure to establish such communication? Not at all. The hon. gentleman knows that this country, which, under this treaty, is placed at a decided disadvantage, was to bear the burden of establishing that steam communication with France in order to promote trade between France and Canada. There is no reciprocity in the matter; there is no fairness in the distribution of the burden in proportion to the benefit. There is nothing of this question of steam communication indicated in the treaty, but hon. gentlemen know that in the correspondence which led to this treaty it is expressly declared that the Canadian Government will establish such communication in case the treaty is carried into effect between the two countries. Now, the hon. gentleman did not say one word as to whether that portion of the arrangement was to be carried out or not. Here is a portion of the arrangement that does not appear on the face of the treaty. What is Sir Charles Tupper's statement to the French Minister as to its not being expressed in the treaty? He says that it is not convenient, that it is not in accordance with the policy of the Government of Canada that it should be expressed, but the intention of the Government of Canada is clear. That the Government of Canada does intend to establish such direct steam communication Sir Charles Tupper assures the French Government is beyond all doubt. There is no room for doubt in the matter, and the Ministers in asking us to ratify the treaty, feel bound to establish direct steam communication between some port in France and some port in Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. Bound by the treaty, do you mean?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I mean bound by the arrangements and engagements which preceded the treaty, and led up to the treaty and without which the High Commissioner of Canada says the treaty is of no avail.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then why does he proceed with the treaty? Does he differ from the High Commissioner in that respect, and is he prepared to say that the High Commissioner is mistaken in saying that the treaty will confer upon this country no advantage, and upon France no advantage, unless the steamship communication is established?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He did not say that. The language is very dissimilar. On certain articles the advantage would not be so great.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). These are the words:

As verbally agreed, we have the honour to inform Your Excellency that these demands will be recommended by the undersigned to the Canadian Government. It is meanwhile understood that if, as we hope, the Government of the Dominion of Canada thinks it possible to give satisfaction to the Government of the French Republic on this point, the French Government will consent on its part to add cheese to the list of articles of Canadian origin which in terms of article 3 of the agreement signed this day will be admitted in France, Algeria and her colonies, to the advantage of the minimum tariff.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is not what the hon. gentleman referred to. He will find it on page 37.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I propose reading both paragraphs. He says on page 35:

I was not aware of any change in the policy of the Government in regard to the steamship service, but that it was not considered proper to make a question of this kind the subject of an engagement to another country.

That is precisely what I said.

And that I would write a letter to him (see enclosure) explaining that fact, and furnish him with a copy of an extract of the speech I had recently addressed in London to a large deputation of gentlemen interested in the Port of Milford Haven, from which we would see the importance that

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Canada attached to obtaining direct communication with France.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I called attention to the statement that the High Commissioner had said that the treaty would be of no advantage whatever without the direct steamship line. I challenge that statement. It cannot be found.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). On page 37 we read:

You will also readily perceive that the concession of the minimum tariff on a number of articles which it is proposed to give Canada will be practically of no value unless direct communication between the two countries be provided, as the surtaxe d'entrepôt would make it impossible for Canada to derive any advantage therefrom.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Exactly, on a number of articles.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). On the articles mentioned in the treaty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On a number of them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The number is very small, at most, and if the hon. gentleman undertakes to except any, he will find very few left.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When you left the Chair at six o'clock, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries had called my attention to a paragraph that I was reading from a communication from Sir Charles Tupper to Mr. Hanotaux, the French Minister, and which he seemed to think did not bear the construction I was putting upon it. I will briefly call the attention of the House again to that same paragraph, and I think it will be seen that I construed it rightly. The paragraph to which I referred, and which I was discussing, reads as follows:—

You will also readily perceive that the concession of the minimum tariff on a number of articles which it is proposed to give Canada, will be practically of no value unless direct communication between the two countries be provided.

Now, "a number of articles" here does not mean a number of the articles that are enumerated in the treaty, but a number of articles all of which are included in the treaty, and which include all the articles therein referred to. This will be seen, if you closely examine the sentence. The words are "on a number of articles which it is proposed to give Canada, will be practically of no value unless direct communication between the two countries be provided," not a number of articles selected out of those enumerated, but a number of articles which are exported from France all of which are embraced in the treaty. I need not refer further to this subject, because I think every hon. member who will examine the words of this communication, will see that they mean what I have concluded they mean, and can mean nothing else when closely examined. Now, I wish to call the attention of the House to another paragraph, a portion of which I referred to before, that is, a communication addressed to the French Minister by the Earl of Dufferin and by Sir Charles Tupper, in which they inform him that the two countries have voted a subvention of £100,000 for the purpose of establishing a line of steamers between a Canadian port on the one side and a French terminus port on the other, and Sir Charles Tupper informed the French Government that unless that subvention is granted and a line of steamers established, the treaty will be practically of no avail. Now, the Government have not, up to the present time, proposed that this subvention should be given, without which they say the treaty will have no practical value. It is well worth while also to notice the communication which was written by Sir Charles Tupper immediately after the signature of the treaty which he had been directed not to sign, and which he says he signed under instructions that these communications which were not embraced in the treaty, are optional and not binding upon the Government. Certainly this is a very extraordinary communication to make, and after the declaration that he had made to the French Government, it does seem very extraordinary that we should now be called upon to ratify this treaty which the Minister of Finance admitted was a most unsatisfactory treaty in the observations which he addressed to the House last year, and which is not accompanied by that subvention to establish a line of steamers which the representative of the Government declared to be essential to the practical operation of the treaty. I am not going to weary the attention of the House longer this evening. I submit this point for the consideration of the House, but there is nothing in this treaty which, if it is brought into operation, can be practically advantageous to this country. It is a treaty which has been negotiated in consequence of the importunities of the representative of Canada, and to which the French Government, from the first, was perfectly indifferent, in which they have shown they have no interest whatever, a treaty which the Minister of Finance, and I believe the First Minister, are as firmly convinced as I am, can confer no benefit upon this country, and the ratification of which is only being pressed by them upon the assumption that it will never be brought into operation, and is not likely, therefore, to be practically mischievous. Well, Sir, if we had to consider merely the trade between Canada and France, that might be the case; but the treaty so long as it remains legally operative, whether it is commercially so or not, will stand in the way of negotiations with other states, because there is no concession we can make for the benefits conferred herein which we shall not be obliged to concede to France without obtaining any further concession on her part. A more one-sided arrangement it would be impossible for any one to negotiate, a more one-sided arrangement I am perfectly sure any Government not forced by conquest to do so has never submitted to an independent legislature.

Mr. CHRISTIE. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing this question, but I simply rise, as a prohibitionist, to record my protest against the ratification of this treaty, because I am fully convinced that if ratified, it will be a barrier and a hindrance in the way of prohibitive legislation, and not only so, but will tend to promote and facilitate the flooding of the Dominion with cheap intoxicating wine. Of course, as a free trader, I should be glad to see free trade with France and closer commercial relations not only with France, but with the whole world, but not in the article of intoxicating drink, and so I have no other course open to me than to record my protest against the ratification of this treaty, and, I think, I may say that the whole body of prohibitionists is opposed to the treaty on these grounds.

Mr. COCKBURN. Were it not that the terms of this treaty affect materially the commercial welfare of Ontario, from which province I have the honour to come, I would have contented myself with giving a silent vote. We must all have noticed that during the last ten years the farmers in the province of Ontario, owing to one cause or another, have suffered more or less. I do not say that among those causes I would place that of the National Policy—I believe that has been one of their main supports. But be the causes what they may, we have seen them driven into other avenues of industry to supplement their means of livelihood. Accordingly, we find a large development in the manufacture of cheese and butter and other manufactures of a similar character, and during the last few years, with a view to remedying the difficulties of their position, they have largely diverted their energies into a new channel, namely, that of vine or grape-culture. So large an industry has this become that already there are in Ontario some 6,000 acres under vine culture, and the available area in Ontario suitable for grape culture is, I believe, as large as the present area in France itself. Those 6,000 acres planted in vines are capable of producing some 20,000 tons of grapes annually, and those 20,000 tons would produce in their turn some 4,000,000 gallons of wine. Some 6,000 people are more or less interested, directly or indirectly, in this industry, an industry which throughout the whole Dominion is valued at over $5,000,000. When I look at an industry covering a value of over $5,000,000 annually, I would expect that with a Government professing the policy known as the National Policy, due regard would be paid to the interests of those engaged in it, and instead of adverse legislation, a helping hand would have been held out to them. This adverse legislation will affect more particularly the province of Ontario, and if I may judge by the changes made in the tariff, will bear again more heavily on that province than on any other province in the Dominion. When I look at the treaty itself, to see the advantages we are to obtain, I may say I am struck with amazement. We are told in article 2 that whatever commercial advantages—not whatever tariff advantages—we may grant to any other power, we must grant to France, Algeria and her colonies; while France guards herself most carefully, inasmuch as she says it is understood that the advantage of any reduction in duties granted to any other power on any of those eighteen articles shall be fully extended to Canada, but on no other articles. It leaves the power in the hands of France so long as she has a maximum tariff, or a nominally maximum tariff, to raise the duties on those eighteen articles. We can find no fault with France if she does so. But we find in article 4 that if we attempt to make any increase in our duties on non-sparkling or sparkling wines, which are the two great items of the treaty, by that very act the French Government may denounce the arrangement and terminate it immediately, without waiting for the expiration of the twelve months' notice set forth in the treaty. It seems to me that the conditions are very unfair, and are not such as people trading on equal terms would for a moment dream of entertaining. With respect to the other point, namely, as to how far the honour of the country is involved in this matter, I must join issue with my hon. friends in considering that the honour of the country is involved at all. If I did consider the honour of the country was involved, I would consider it my duty to vote for the treaty to-night, irrespective of all other considerations; but I find, on the contrary, that our own Finance Minister told us on the floor of this House last year that this was not a matter in which the honour of the country was concerned, and he stated distinctly that before he would advise the adoption of the treaty he would like to consult two or three deputations on their way to Ottawa to see him regarding it. No man, I hope, in this country, far less a gentleman occupying the commanding and respected position held by the Finance Minister, would tell this House that on a question in which the honour of the country is concerned he would wait to consider representations made by deputations with respect to the commercial advantages or disadvantages obtainable from any treaty. But the ground has been taken that we are bound in honour to accept this treaty because it is a treaty to which the faith of England and the faith of this country is pledged. We have been told by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) very plainly that there are two modes of ratifying a treaty, the English mode and the American mode. Which of these should be adopted? The question is not what system should be adopted for the future, but which method are we obliged to adopt under terms of the articles of one treaty. It did not occur to the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) that in a treaty of this kind in England, the instrument is settled by the responsible Ministers, never comes before the House, that it is not a matter to be dealt with by the House. If it is a treaty that does not meet with the approval of the members of the House, it is competent then for members not to arraign the treaty, but to arraign those diplomatists who framed it, or rather the Government responsible for it. I hold that in the consideration of this treaty we are to be guided by the terms of the treaty itself, and the express terms on which it is to be ratified or not ratified are clearly set forth in article 4, for we are told that the arrangement must receive the sanction of the Parliament of Canada and the Chamber of Deputies of France, and that the papers connected with that ratification shall be exchanged as soon as possible. It states, in brief, that until the tariff has received the ratification of the members of this House, and also the ratification of the members of the French Chamber, the treaty shall have no existence. I do not wish for one moment to detract in any way from the credit due to Sir Charles Tupper for his exertions in this matter. I think he has done as much as any other man could do under the circumstances, but I decline to regard him here in the light of a plenipotentiary who is to bind us fast by whatever arrangement he has made. I regard him simply as one who has gone to France to try and do the best he could, and who comes before this House now and says: this is the best I am able to obtain for you gentlemen, what do you think of it? I do not think that this House has to resign its functions. I do not think that this House has any reason to be afraid to tell the High Commissioner or Lord Dufferin or any one else, what they think of this treaty. We are to look at this treaty, not in the light of how it is to affect France or England, but we are to consider whether it is or is not for the welfare of our own beloved Dominion. We ought to be careful indeed of running into fresh treaties. Only eighteen months ago this House, by a unanimous vote, requested the Home Government to relieve Canada from the operations of the treaties with Belgium and Germany, and now we are anxious to rush into another treaty and bind ourselves fast to it. Not only are these the objections which I have to the treaty, but when I take into consideration, also, the fact that the impression left on the minds of the French negotiators was clearly that we were to run a line of steamers in direct communication between Canada and France; it leads me to consider whether it is worth our while to ratify such an agreement. Place it as you will, the impression was left in the minds of the negotiators that we would establish this direct line between Canada and France. I am prepared to admit, that, by this treaty, we may be able to sell a larger amount of lumber from Vancouver and the Maritime Provinces, and Quebec, but I do hold that the loss we shall sustain in trying to run a direct steamship line to France, will much more than counterbalance the advantages which we hope to gain. There are some points in this treaty with reference to which I honestly confess I would be afraid to face my electors if I supported it. Take champagne, for instance, which is considered a luxury to be enjoyed only by the rich, or, as my hon. friend besides me suggests, perhaps by the Parliament at the expense of the country. When I find that 30 per cent ad valorem is to be taken off the duty on champagne, I see that for every bottle of champagne that the rich man buys, it is proposed that he shall pay from 50 to 60 cents less for it; so that for every glass of champagne the rich man drinks, the poor people have to contribute 15 cents.

An hon. MEMBER. How many glasses in a bottle?

Mr. COCKBURN. There are four good brimming glasses to the bottle, or five when passed around with the foam on it. I say that with a falling revenue which causes us to face a deficit of one and a half millions or two millions of dollars, it ill-becomes us to take the burdens off the rich and fine the poor man 15 cents for every glass of champagne the rich man chooses to drink. If we are prepared in Ontario to go to our constituents and ask them to agree to the proposal that they shall contribute 15 cents towards every glass of champagne we drink, all I can say is that I think the members from Ontario must have more effrontery than I believe they actually possess. Well, Sir, looking at all these points, I can see no reason why we should adopt this treaty. I do not think that in refusing to ratify it, we are in any way casting a reflection on our High Commissioner, Sir Charles Tupper, or those who so ably assisted him. I simply take the ground that it was their business to do the best they could for us under the circumstances, and that they have done. They have placed before us the result of their bargaining, and we ourselves calmly viewing the matter here, do not think the game worth the candle.

Mr. AMYOT. I must congratulate the hon. members for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) and North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) on having taken two very nice fishes like the last speakers into their net. The one is a prohibitionist, and the other is a wine grower protector. The amendment of the hon. member (Mr. O'Brien) attacks the merits of the treaty, but it does not surprise me when it comes from the hon. gentleman and from his hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy). It is a treaty which concerns a country called France, and if I remember well, whenever the name of France has been pronounced in this House, we have seen them at the head of a little army ready to oppose anything which bears that name. I am quite sure that the sentiments which actuate them in opposing this treaty will not receive the approbation of the country generally. Those hon. gentlemen cannot bear anything which has a French name, or a French descent. If they came to Quebec, they would try to destroy the monument to Wolfe and Montcalm, and they would have advised England to give back Sebastapool because Sebastapool had been captured by both the French and the English. They will not suffer anything in arts or science if it has a French name. They would destroy the Confederation if they could, because there are French people in it, and how could you expect them to approve of a French treaty. They think the French treaty is bad because it has to do with France. These are the sentiments of their hearts, but they cannot make me believe that those sentiments are shared in by their electors. I believe that their electors hold the sentiments of the colonial envoys who give such praise to the French element all over the world, wherever they met with it. I believe that their electors like to see England and France joining hand in hand to spread civilization and knowledge and prosperity and happiness to the people all over the world. I am sure, too, that the sentiments of these hon. gentlemen (Mr. McCarthy and Mr. O'Brien) will soon cease to be expressed in this House, and that next Parliament we will hear no more of them. Now, Mr. Speaker, usually, the affairs of the country are conducted by two parties, the Government and the Opposition party, and I ask myself, how it is that in this case the Government has not to meet the Opposition squarely, but that the Third Party brings in a side fight. In the counties where there are prohibitionists, the members who will vote against the treaty, will say: we have voted against that bad Government which is in favour of intoxicating liquors, and in the counties where there are wine growers they will say the Government has not granted protection to the wine growers; and so they will try to catch votes. The Opposition assumes no responsibility for this motion, and I contend that that amounts to a false pretext. I would like to see the Opposition, as a party, coming squarely before the country and opposing the Government on this French treaty. Then, we could see the members from the province of Quebec, who are to answer to the electors speaking French, taking the responsibility of their vote with their party. In our province the word France is no objection to a treaty. We want for our province as many markets all over the world as possible, be they Spanish, German, Italian, French, English, Scotch, Irish or any nationality whatever. We want good markets anywhere in which to sell our products, so as to be able to say to the States, You will not open your doors to us, but we have found people elsewhere with whom to trade and interchange our products. But the Opposition do not meet the Government; they try to avoid the responsibility of that position, and I do not think their attitude will take with the public. With regard to the prohibitionists, I will not discuss the merits of their thesis, or their moral power, if they were in a majority, to bind the minority. I will not discuss the question of compensation to the vested interests if we abolished the trade of alcohol. They say, alcohol is a poison, and we want the people to abstain from taking poison; that is their thesis. Well, Mr. Speaker, if they are so much in favour of humanity, they must not stop there. There are other poisons. Tobacco is a poison; why do they not try to stop the importation of tobacco, and the culture of tobacco? Surely they should do so. But there is not only that poison. Everything we have may be turned into poison. If we eat too much, we become poisoned; nine-tenths of the illness in this world are due to over-eating. Let a man eat very little meat, and live chiefly on vegetables and fruits in a moderate way, and every doctor worthy of the name will guarantee him against illness. Will the prohibitionists propose a law prohibiting the people from eating too much? If you drink too much water, you will get indigestion of water, which may be fatal. If you drink too much tea, coffee or lemonade, if you take anything to excess, it will become a poison. Alcohol, as the doctors know, is not bad of itself. If you take alcohol at the proper time, you may avoid a great illness. What we want is to have good alcohol, with no poison in it. So I think the prohibitionists do not go to the full extent of their programme. If they think their mission is to impose by force health upon their neighbours, they should not limit their efforts to alcohol. They should include tobacco; they should include all those kinds of liquors which contain something deleterious to health. But I never thought for my part that wine-taking was included in the prohibitionists' programme. Who will say that pure wine in itself is a bad thing? The hon. mover knows the Bible by heart. Has he not read somewhere in the Bible about the use of wine? I will read in the 104th Psalm, verse 15:

Mr. AMYOT.

And wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and oil to make his face to shine, and bread which strengtheneth man's heart.

Will the hon. gentleman say that the Bible lies? If wine is not bad in itself, if it is good, why does he want to prohibit it? Now, I will drink another—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. AMYOT. When I am speaking of the wine of Scripture, it is so good that the word drink comes to my mouth. Now, I will read Timothy, chapter 5, verse 23:

Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities.

Now, if we look at other parts of the New Testament, we see that the best Doctor of humanity, the Son of God Himself, took the trouble to change water into wine. Will the hon. mover condemn that? Will he prohibit the work of God?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am not a total abstainer.

Mr. AMYOT. It is preposterous to say that the prohibition of wine is based upon a moral principle. But I say to the prohibitionists: You want to prevent people from taking alcohol; all right, what is the best way? Let them have good, pure and cheap wine; that will be the best prevention. You will never find a man whose stomach is in proper order ready to take alcohol; he will take good, light wine, and will be satisfied with it. What is the case in the countries where wine-growing prevails? We never see drunkards there. But go into the cold countries—I will not name any, they are known—where there is no wine-growing; there you will see drunkards by thousands, and you will find suicides, murders and robberies due to the poisonous effects of alcohol upon the brain as well as upon the body. Let us have good, cheap wine, and the thesis of the prohibitionists will be enhanced. But, on the contrary, prohibit it, prohibit even alcohol, and then you will have the distillation of alcohol at home; you will have the fraudulent importation of all sorts of drinks from other countries, and you will kill more people by bad liquors than are killed to-day under the legal importation of alcohol. What is wanted is good liquors, inspected by the proper authority; what is wanted is the protection of society by the purity of liquor; and good light wine is one of those drinks that will prevent the habit or the necessity of taking alcohol. As to the wine-growers, I was surprised to see a gentleman of such experience as the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) opposing the treaty on behalf of the wine-growers of Canada. Does he pretend that the wine-growers will not be protected under this treaty? Let me read him an extract from a paper, which has not been contradicted so far as I am aware:

The removal of the 30 per cent 100 ad valorem duty on French wines would not interfere in the least with our Canadian wines, which would still be amply protected by the remaining specific duty of 25 cents per gallon.

There will remain a protection of 25 cents per gallon.

Mr. COCKBURN. I do not think the hon. gentleman has caught the point I made. I quite agree with him with regard to the cheaper kinds of wine, but the point I wanted to make was this, that in the matter of champagne, which is an expensive liquor, we are relieving the consumer of from 50 to 60 cents on every bottle he buys, and we are doing that at a time when the revenue is falling and we are face to face with a deficit, and we will have to replace the $45,000, which we will lose that way by taxing other people in order that those who can afford it may enjoy the benefit and luxury and delicious flavour of the higher classes of champagne.

Mr. AMYOT. The one who consumes one bottle of champagne will then purchase two bottles, and that will make up the difference.

The cheapest French wine shipped to Canada cannot be bought under 40 cents per gallon, including cost of the cask; adding to this our specific duty of 25 cents and ten cents per gallon for freight and all charges,—equal to a protection of about 90 cents—the cost laid down to the importer would be 75 cents, and could not be sold with reasonable profit, under 85 or 90 cents per gallon, whereas Canadian wines are freely wholesaled as low as 60 and even 50 cents per gallon.

Now the hon. gentleman sees the amount of protection given the wine growers. They in fact will be amply protected, and they will still be the exclusive masters of the market for their grapes. And if we admit into this country cheap French wine, the taste for that class of liquor will increase, and the wine growers of Canada will thereby gain a more considerable market for their product. That is another kind of protection to that industry in Canada. No one can deny that. To-day our wine is sold at from 50 to 60 cents per gallon, but if it comes into general consumption, as I am sure it will, then it will command from 60 to 70 cents per gallon, and will obtain a much more ready sale. So that not only will our wine producers still enjoy a considerable protection under this treaty, but they will command a larger market for their products, owing to the larger use which will be made of wine generally in this country, and the more wine our people will use, the less alcohol will they consume, so that then the prohibitionists will attain that part of their object which may be a good one. Every one in this Parliament and country desires to see the use of alcohol diminished. But what is the way to accomplish that desire? Will it be accomplished by the sudden abolition of the use of alcohol and wine? I say it will not, and can easily prove my assertion. Go into those counties where the Scott Act prevails, and you will find there more drunken people than in those where alcohol is sold under the protection of the law. Go into the states of the Union where prohibition is in force, and you will find more saloons in cellars, with corrupt air and liquor, where people kill themselves with drink, than in those states where alcohol is openly sold in accordance with the law. Now, I will not discuss the whole of the treaty, but will only add a few words. We are told that we will lose $90,000 of revenue by the treaty, and that we are not in a position to suffer that loss. Who can prove that to-day? I believe, on the contrary, that if the treaty should come into force, as I am sure it will, the increase of commerce between Canada and France will be such that the amount of duties collected will be increased considerably, and that not only we will not lose $90,000 revenue, but will gain many thousand dollars more. Our commerce will increase. We will buy more, and the duties will be collected on a larger scale. I believe the treaty to be a good one because it will give us an entry into the French market. I have consulted some of our lumber merchants, and they have told me that we will be able to do a considerable trade with France in various kinds of timber, and also in wooden ships, even in spite of the bounty given in France, and that the increase of trade will amount to many thousand dollars the first year. This is another way of protecting the lumber merchants and the men who get out our timber from the woods, and also of enhancing the value of our Crown timber lands. Take the article of wood pulp, I am sure that in that article alone we will be able to do a considerable trade with France. Also in prepared skins and boots and shoes. The latter is an industry in which this treaty will enable us to compete in the French market with other nations. The United States send annually over $100,000,000 worth of divers articles to France, while we do not export to that country over $100,000 worth. What is the reason for that difference? It is because the States now enjoy the advantage, which we do not, of being included among the more-favoured-nations, and that advantage will be given us by this treaty. But if the treaty be not a good one, we have only to give twelve months notice to put an end to it. We are told, however, that we will not be able to grant any other country any advantage without giving the same advantage to France. Well, in that case we will give the notice and put an end to the treaty. But perhaps when that question comes up, the commerce of the two countries will have increased to such an extent that France will be equally interested with us in going on and extending the treaty, so as to make it more profitable to both countries. Hon. gentlemen speak of the dignity and honour of Canada. I am of the opinion of those who think that we are bound in honour to ratify the treaty. We are not legally compelled to do so, but we are bound in honour to ratify it, even if it should last only for one year. On the merits of the treaty itself, however, I am satisfied it will prove very advantageous to Canada. I am not surprised to see opposition to it, and I am sure that no matter what advantages the treaty may offer us, just because it is a treaty with France, the hon. members from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), and North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), would oppose it.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I feel that I cannot give a silent vote on this question, but the remarks I intend to make will be very brief. The hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) has made the statement that the French-Canadian members of this House are in favour of the treaty because of the good feelings they entertain for old France. True, we love old France, just as an Englishman loves old England, as a Scotchman loves old Scotland, and an Irishman loves old Ireland. But this is not a matter of sentiment, it is a matter of business, and in matters of business we are not going to be led by sentiment. I recollect that some twelve or thirteen years ago the leader of the Opposition, I believe it was the Hon. Mr. Blake, proposed to this House that steps should be taken to secure to Canada the power of making commercial treaties with the nations of the earth. I recollect very well the discussion upon that occasion. Seven Conservatives voted with the leader of the Opposition, and I was one of them. I see to-day, Mr. Speaker, that this power which was asked for some twelve or thirteen years ago is an accomplished fact, and I feel that I should be wrong, indeed, unless some very strong reasons are given, in voting against the ratification of the first treaty negotiated under these new conditions. What are the reasons urged against it? One comes from the Prohibition people. I believe that the treaty, instead of favouring the use of liquor, will, on the contrary, advance the cause of temperance. Take the countries where light wines and beer are generally used, such as France, Germany, Austria, Italy and Spain, and you will find that temperance is better observed there than in countries where such light beverages are not used. It is also alleged that the treaty will have the effect of destroying the protection to the wine growers of this country. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Amyot) has shown by figures, the correctness of which I was convinced in my own mind before, that a protection of 20 to 25 per cent still remains to the wine growers of Canada. Are we to be told that this is not a fair protection? Is it not more than the protection which is usually extended to the farmers of this country; more than the protection that is given to many manufacturers? I believe that the wine growers have ample protection to maintain their industry. Objections have also been made that we do not receive from France the equivalent of what we give. Everything considered, I think we have got a "fair show." I think we ought to give the treaty a fair trial. If, after a year, or two years more, we find that it is not in the interests of Canada, it will be a simple matter for the Government of Canada to give notice of its revocation. For these reasons, and seeing that no sufficient arguments have been given against the acceptance of the treaty, I shall vote for its ratification.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Girouard) makes a strange mistake in one respect. But his opening remarks with which I shall deal first were thoroughly sound. He said that this should be treated as a question of business and not as one involving national sympathies. I think he is perfectly correct. There is no doubt that those of French race in this House would rather see a treaty concluded with France than with some other nations—very naturally. But, Sir, I do them the justice of believing that they would not accept a treaty with France merely because it was a treaty with France if it were not a good treaty for Canada. If the treaty be not good for Canada, if it be not in the interests of our constituents to accept such a treaty, our people of French nationality are as much bound to reject it as we of English-speaking descent would be to reject a trade arrangement with Britain which was unjust, or which interfered with the interests of the people of Canada. I hope that this phase of the question need not be discussed further than it has been. But, Sir, when the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) said that he had sympathized very much with Mr. Blake's desire to obtain the treaty-making power for Canada, and that as this was the first treaty we have made under some imagined increase of our treaty-making powers, he felt called upon to support it, he was entirely mistaken. There has been no increase in the treaty-making powers of Canada. This treaty was not made by Canada in the way Mr. Blake wished and in the way the hon. member for Jacques Cartier wished at the time when he supported Mr. Blake's motion. This treaty was made by Great Britain with the assistance of a Canadian representative on the embassy. The treaty is not one between Canada and France directly; it is one between Great Britain and France, though concerning the interests of Canada. It is exactly the same sort of treaty as the reciprocity treaty formerly arranged with the United States, or the Washington treaty, concluded with that country in later years. In this case our representative discussed matters with the French representative under the sheltering wing of the Marquis of Dufferin representing the British Government, and under the auspices of the British Government a treaty has been completed so far as these authorities could complete it. Then the question is raised how far our national honour is involved in the acceptance of the treaty so concluded. It should be enough to say that the treaty makes provision for its being accepted by this House before it has any effect whatever. We can not be accused of breaking faith with France if we discuss the treaty and accept or reject what our representatives have done. Still more is that the case when it appears, not only from the speech of the hon. Minister last year, but from the correspondence, that our Commissioner, Sir Charles Tupper, did not carry out the views of this Government during the negotiations. The treaty was not made in the terms this Government expected. This is particularly true in regard to the most-favoured-nation clause, in which, as is quite clear from the telegrams, from the statements made last year and from the correspondence, this Government had no intention of agreeing to grant to France the same privileges granted to any other nation in case of making a subsequent treaty with any other nation. This is what the Finance Minister said on this subject last year :

On the other hand, as the treaty is signed, Canada agrees to give France "most-favoured-nation" treatment, not only on the articles that are mentioned, but on any articles of her tariff in which she gives better terms to any other country. That was not the intention of the Government, as will be seen by a telegram which was sent to our Commissioner in January, in which it was expressly stated that we agreed to the "most-favoured-nation" treatment, so far as articles named in the treaty are concerned. Our Commissioner, either through error or reasons which he explains in his correspondence, signed the treaty with the clause in it as I have read, giving most-favoured-nation treatment to France in all articles of our tariff.

So we see that this treaty, in this most important particular, was framed contrary to the intention of this Government, as expressed to their commissioner in France during the discussion. To allege that our faith as a nation, as a Parliament, is bound to a treaty so framed, is absurd, and would be absurd, even without the clause contained in the treaty, making it subject to our final acceptance. The treatment this question has received from the other side of the House leads us to think that the Government have never been whole-hearted in regard to it. They were not specially anxious to open trade with France on the terms expressed in this treaty, not anxious at all, as they themselves stated. But it was necessary, apparently, to do something to show the use of having a very expensive and very high commissioner in Great Britain, and this treaty was hurriedly concocted, and when it came under the notice of the Government it was found to be not very acceptable, even to themselves. Last year they dealt with the subject very tenderly, and dropped it for the session, giving no certain voice as to whether they would ever ask the House to accept it. This year, from some influence or other, they have been induced to ask the House to accept it, but neither from the Ministers themselves nor from any of their supporters, has there come any justification or defence of the treaty upon its merits. We have had such humorous speeches as that of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), we have had mistaken ideas put forward on the part of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) on side issues connected with the treaty, but there has been no defence of the treaty on its merits, either by the Government or their supporters. It is clear that neither their honour, nor that of the country, nor that of Parliament, is concerned in the acceptance of this treaty. It is merely the reputation of Sir Charles Tupper as a negotiator which is at stake, and it is merely for the purpose of maintaining it that we are now asked to accept a treaty which is indefensible on the face of it. If there are any hon. gentlemen in the House who feel that it is worth while to injure the country's trade for the purpose of accomplishing that object, they may heartily support the treaty. I do not see that any reason laid before the House has been sufficient to induce the House to accept it for its own sake. What are the disadvantages of the treaty? They are, I think, very correctly expressed in the amendment of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). The treaty is admittedly unfair to Canada in many respects, and particularly in regard to this favoured-nation clause, which of itself should be sufficient to secure the rejection of the treaty. Again, while France reserves the right to raise the minimum duties on which our goods are admitted without breaking up the treaty, we are not allowed to increase the duties on any of the articles to be imported from France under this treaty, without breaking the arrangement. On the other hand, we only receive favoured-nation treatment from France in regard to the articles named, while she is to receive, with all her colonies, favoured-nation treatment from us on all articles. That ties our hands completely in regard to reciprocity arrangements with other countries, and makes this treaty a movement, not in the direction of increased foreign trade, but one calculated to restrict foreign trade. Would we not be in a nice position if we were discussing a reciprocity treaty with the United States, and were forced to tell them that we would be compelled to give to France and her colonies all the advantages we might give to them under any arrangement we might make? Do you suppose for a moment that the Government at Washington would entertain a treaty of this kind? They objected even to our giving favoured-nation treatment to Great Britain when we attempted to conduct negotiations for re-reciprocity. How much more would they object to it in regard to a country as foreign to us as to the United States themselves? It would put a stop absolutely to any hopes of reciprocity with the United States, and the advantages to French-speaking and to English-speaking people of Canada alike, are unspeakably more important than anything that could be gained under this treaty. Our friends from the province of Quebec know that as well as do any others. They know that nothing could be of greater benefit to them than a reciprocity treaty with the United States, framed so as to consult the best interests of this country. They know it would do infinitely more for them than any trade it is possible to expect with France or any other European country. They realize, too, that in voting to support this treaty they are cutting off for ever, or as long as this treaty lasts, all hopes of such an arrangement. It is unfair also and unjust, as has been already pointed out, to those of our population who do not use luxuries. I speak of luxuries advisedly, for French wines, even with the 30 per cent duty knocked off, will still be luxuries not within the reach of the great mass of our population. I do not think I need to press that proposition. The effect of the treaty, in this clause of it, leaving out its bearing on the question of prohibition altogether, will be to allow those who drink champagne and claret, and other French wines, to import them at 30 per cent less than they have been paying for them heretofore. The result will be a loss of 30 per cent to the revenue, which, as my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. McGregor) pointed out, will have to be paid by the rest of the population who do not drink champagne and claret. We have had lengthy discussions during this session on the subject of the pressure of the tariff upon the poorer classes, or to put it even more broadly, upon those classes who are not actually wealthy in the community. It has been shown that many of the taxes imposed by the existing tariff bear very heavily upon people of small means. We are by this treaty imposing another burden upon those people of small means for the benefit of people who can afford to have champagne and claret on their table every day, or to set it up, to use a slang phrase, very freely for their friends. I call such a proposition monstrous and absurd in an assembly which is supposed to protect the interests of the poor above all others. It is unfair to a large class of our agricultural population, as has been well pointed out by the hon. member for Essex. I would ask the House to remember that the wine industry is only in its infancy; that it is not only in the county of Essex, but all along the shores of Lake Erie, and for a considerable distance inland, that there is a climate and a soil adapted for raising grapes and for making home-made wines. I think it is too bad when we are taxing the agriculturist so very heavily in other respects, that he should be prevented from taking advantage of such a means of increasing his very small revenue as will be afforded in this way, and it must be remembered that large as were the interests spoken of by my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. McGregor), they do not represent the total interest involved at present or that possibly may be involved. There is another point in the treaty which has not been dwelt upon to any extent, and that is the commercial relations of St. Pierre and Miquelon to France and the rest of the world. It appears that under the new tariff in France a great many articles which are imported on either maximum or minimum duties in France itself are made free, or are admitted at very much lower duties in St. Pierre and Miquelon. The Government were informed of this fact during the progress of the treaty negotiations, and it was supposed that those reduced duties applied entirely to goods imported from Canada. It appeared, however, afterwards that the provision is general, and that St. Pierre and Miquelon could import many articles duty free from the rest of the world and send them to France in competition with articles sent from Canada under the terms of the treaty, on which at least the minimum duty would be charged. Without going into figures, I ask those familiar with the statistics to remember that even the minimum duties are really highly protective duties, and as a matter of fact, the customs arrangements of St. Pierre and Miquelon would enable those small communities to become points for collecting and sending into France duty free a large number of those articles which some hon. gentleman expect to be able to send there from Canada under this treaty. One or two of my hon. friends have spoken of the large prospective trade with France under the proposed treaty. I think the Minister of Finance last session addressed remarks to the House which were sufficient to destroy any such hope. He pointed out that the present minimum tariff in France is in many cases higher, and in very many cases quite as high as the tariff applicable to the products of all countries which was in force previous to 1892, and we obtain very trifling trade advantages by having our goods admitted on those terms. The hon. gentleman pointed out also that we would not get practically any advantage from the treaty unless we established a direct steamship line with France, which is not now proposed to be done. Such a project would involve an expenditure which the Government has not thought proper to submit to the House, an expenditure which would not for a moment be entertained in order to obtain the advantages of this treaty. To sum up, I am satisfied that this treaty is unfair to Canada, and is a matter of very slight consequence to the people of France. I am sure they were not anxious to enter into it, but were induced to do so by solicitation on the part of Canada, and their representatives managed to give Canada as little as possible as a result of the negotiations. Moreover, the treaty is unfair to special interests in Canada, and to large classes in this Dominion, and it would prove a stumbling block in the way of future negotiations for extension of trade with other countries. For all these reasons, I feel bound to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) unless some other should happen to be proposed which would more exactly express my views on the subject.

Mr. LACHAPPELLE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, we have been told, in the course of this debate that the House was not in honour bound to ratify by its vote the treaty with France, signed on the 6th of February last, by our High Commissioner in England, the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper. Still, these gentlemen have given credit to this high functionary for his exertions in the matter and proclaimed aloud that he had accomplished all that was possible of accomplishment to obtain better terms and to have embodied in the treaty the most advantageous concessions to Canada. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Cockburn) have laid stress on that point. Do I fail to grasp the situation, Mr. Speaker? do I fail to apprehend the question and are the hon. gentlemen warranted in making such statements? It seems to me that our High Commissioner, who represented Canada on that embassy, was quite free to sign the treaty or not. I could realize the meaning of such remarks as fell from the hon. members, if our plenipotentiary had not been free to discuss, approve of or decline to ratify the treaty; but he was under no obligation to accept that trade arrangement; he had full discretion in the matter. I am then warranted in drawing the inference that it would be most unfair to our Commissioner for us to withhold ratification of the treaty negotiated by him under our authority. I contend further that, granting that we are not in honour pledged, as it has been repeatedly stated on the floor of the House, to ratify the treaty, I think that the House is in honour bound to support its representative who acted on behalf of Canada in France. What are the reasons urged against the ratification of the treaty? What are the objections that have been pressed, or that may be alleged, against the provisions of this treaty? The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), when discussing the merits of the treaty, stated that, previous to its being signed, the views of the Canadian people should have been ascertained, and that, if such a course had been pursued, the people, through their representatives on the Ministerial side or the party in power, would have given expression to their views with regard to the proposed treaty, and quite a different conclusion might have been reached. But my hon. friend has overlooked a very important fact; he forgot to tell the House that the gentleman who was chosen as plenipotentiary had, during the 30 or 40 years of his political career, ascertained the views of the people; that he knew the needs of our country and the spirit of our people, and that he was, therefore, well equipped for the occasion, an advantage which should not be lost sight of by hon. gentlemen in this House. Sir Charles Tupper's political career, his vast experience are such as to warrant us in assuming that by the very fact he signed the treaty, it should commend itself to our approbation. As to the grounds for entering into a treaty with France, I may say that this policy is the outcome of a desire to see closer commercial relations with the whole world. Ever since the reciprocity arrangement with the United States came to its termination in 1866, such a want made itself keenly felt, and has only been still more intensified by the passage of the McKinley Bill by which the American market has been practically closed to us. It was this desire on the part of Sir Charles Tupper and the Conservative party of opening the field for enlarged trade relations, that brought about the present trade arrangement with France. Of all necessity, our trade relations with the markets of the world ought to be remodelled. America should consider old Europe as her best market. And of all the European markets, if there was one which our representative was justified in seeking access to, it was the French market. The French nation in the matter of importation comes next to England; it is our most important market after that of Great Britain. France imports foreign goods to the amount of over one billion a year; the United States rank next. Such, I think, was the ground on which our High Commissioner made up his mind to go to France and seek admission for our products into the French market. Protests have been recorded against the ratification of the treaty, on several grounds. It was stated, in the course of the debate, that the proposed arrangement would confer no benefit upon the country; a statement which they have so far failed to substantiate. I contend that certain advantages will accrue to the country from the treaty. It is a new departure, which will pave the way for future negotiations for extension of trade with other countries besides France. I think that the first exercise of our treaty-making power includes those very stipulations which should govern in the future trade relations between France and Canada. But who are those who protest against the treaty? There are two classes of people arrayed against it: the wine-growers and the prohibitionists. It seems to me strange enough that the treaty should be denounced by two classes of men who hold quite different views; the prohibitionists, on the one side, who are bent upon destroying the wine and the liquor traffic; and, on the other hand, the wine-growers, who represent the grape and wine industries. If I understand aright their position, the latter gentlemen oppose the ratification of the treaty from the standpoint of their personal interest. But, as it has been stated, and I may be allowed to allude to it here—the objection raised by these gentlemen is utterly baseless; and the interests of that class of people will not be affected nor placed in jeopardy, should the treaty be ratified and come into force. The importation of French wines into our country will result in developing among our people a taste for those wines which have a smaller percentage of alcohol in them than our native wines; and the stimulation of the consumption of those lighter wines will promote the cause of temperance; for in countries where light wines are largely used, there is no room for prohibitionists and temperance societies. I entertain the utmost respect for prohibitionists, and I duly appreciate the moral character of the temperance reforms, but let me repeat that the fact of the inhabitants of northern countries being addicted to excessive drinking is to be attributed to the influence of the climate rather than to a natural predisposition, and therefore the use of beverages which do not gauge a percentage of alcohol high enough to render them nocuous to the public health, should be encouraged. Therefore, I can see no reason, from the prohibition standpoint, to oppose the treaty arrangement now before the House, as the evil these societies are loudly complaining of, and which they are endeavouring to eradicate, would be better remedied through the general use of the cheap wines secured to us by the treaty. Those societies, under the circumstances, have an undoubted right to agitate temperance reform: "Alcoholism, behold the enemy!" Such is, as it were, the watchword of the prohibitionists. That alcohols manufactured in this country, as over the world, are essentially more intoxicating than grape spirits, leaves no room for doubt, and that also accounts for the prevalence of alcoholism nowadays. In times gone by, when there were no adulterated spirits for sale, there were very few drunkards. I will then say to the advocates of prohibition: Encourage the admission into our country of light wines and of unadulterated liquors, if you wish to put a stop to the evils of alcoholism. I shall pass over in silence certain statements made by hon. members about wine or grape-growing in France. The petition of the wine-growers which was read to the House by my hon. colleague the member for Essex (Mr. McGregor) contains certain statements, the accuracy of which I could easily challenge. There are to be found in that petition statements wholly at variance with facts, and among others, one to the effect that the French market is not the best wine market in the world; an erroneous assertion which members of this House will hardly think worth while refuting. For it is an indisputable fact that

Mr. LACHAPPELLE.

France is looked upon as the wine-market 'par excellence,' and that she is ahead of all other wine-growing countries for the high quality of her wines. This was an inuendo to the effect that phylloxera had worked such destruction among French vines that, had it not been for the timely help of a certain American seedling grape introduced into that country—I forget the name of that seedling, which is grown on a large scale in Ontario—the French vineyards would have suffered total ruin. This is a sample of the egregious mistakes committed by the gentlemen who framed the petition. It is further stated in the same petition that the admission of French wines is tantamount to the importation of spirits on a large scale. The only way to check this evil—I should call it a public danger—would be to appoint an analyst to analyze and test the wines imported from France to ascertain whether they gauge the required percentage of alcohol. Such tests are used at the Paris octroi; and such is the remedy suggested by the petitioners to obviate the evil complained of. Objection is offered to the arrangement on the ground that twenty articles included in it, and having the benefit of the minimum tariff, will be of little advantage to us. This is another misleading statement, for the admission of those articles, of lumber especially, not to mention other articles, is likely to be highly beneficial to the Canadian lumber interests. Among the papers laid before the House in connection with this matter, I find a letter from Mr. Godday, a Quebec lumber merchant. In my opinion, the information conveyed by this gentleman is the best answer to be given to the hon. members who deny that any advantage will accrue to this country from the proposed arrangement so far, especially, as the lumber interest is concerned. The letter reads as follows:

1, ST. HELEN'S PLACE, LONDON, E. C., 19th February, 1894.

The Secretary,
Dominion of Canada Government Offices,
17, Victoria Street, S. W.

DEAR SIR,—Would you kindly inform me what prospects there are of the early ratification of the France Canadian Treaty. The present difference to the prejudice of Canadian wood imported into France is about $1½ per M. feet and as shipper of such, I am desirous of speaking to my French buyers with some knowledge of the subject as regards their future position. If some hopes were held out of an early ratification of the treaty there is no doubt but that a good and profitable business could be done with France this season. I am given to understand that lumber shipped from the United States to France pays the minimum tariff and I would learn with pleasure that Canada is shortly to avail herself of the same advantage.

Thanking you, in anticipation, for the information you may be able to afford me.

Yours truly,

H. G. GOODDAY, of Quebec.

So far, Mr. Speaker, with the lumber interest. But are there no other industries connected with the lumber interest? Let me mention, for instance, wood pulp or cellulose, which is included among the twenty articles admitted under the treaty. From all the above facts, Mr. Speaker, I draw the conclusion that the proposed treaty is beneficial enough to the country to justify us in giving it as general a ratification as possible; and I doubt not but that such will be the course followed by the House, without a dissenting voice. This question, Mr. Speaker, is not one which I, as a French-speaking member, would consider as involving national sympathies; however justifiable such sympathies may prove in other matters. As stated by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) this is a matter of business, a question of general interest to the country. We are called upon to ratify the first treaty entered into not only with France, but with Europe. This first exercise of our treaty-making powers will no doubt receive further development in the same line later on. Bearing in mind what I would style the high-handed treatment of Canada by our American neighbours, we should bend all our energies towards making trade arrangements with foreign nations so as no longer to depend on the American market, and thereby achieve our commercial independence.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, if this House were to-night engaged in discussing a business question, a matter of trade, and of dollars and cents between England and Canada, I think that any hon. member who would support an unfair advantage against Canada in that matter of business, would be very properly considered a traitor to Canada. Therefore, I agree with the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) that every member in this House, no matter what his origin may be, should consider this treaty as a true Canadian. It would be an insult to any member of this House to suggest that, because he might be of French origin, he would be guided by any matter of sentiment or anything else, but his duty to his own country of Canada. There are one or two points which seem to me exceedingly important in the consideration of this question. The clauses relating to the most-favoured-nation treatment are, in my judgment, of the first importance. By article III. of the treaty, France agrees to give Canada the advantage of any reduction of duty which she may grant to any other power, on any of the few articles mentioned in the treaty. On the other hand, by article II., Canada agrees to tie her hands and to give to France any commercial advantage in respect to all and every article that she may grant to any third power. On the face of it, that is grossly one-sided and unfair to Canada. It is not a fair bargain between two countries, and more than that, looking to the future, Canada's hands are tied in making commercial treaties with other countries. We are bound now, as we know, by some of the treaties that Great Britain has made which include the colonies, notably the treaties between Great Britain and Germany and between Great Britain and Belgium. This House but a few years ago protested in the strongest possible language to Great Britain against being any longer included in these treaties, and I am sorry to say that England has turned a deaf ear to the unanimous protest of both Houses of the Canadian Parliament in that respect. But, Sir, we can hardly imagine how our Government ever came to consent to such an unfair arrangement between Canada and France as this is. I must, to a certain extent, exonerate the Government from ever having consented to such an arrangement, because I find that in their latest telegraphic instructions to Sir Charles Tupper, dated 12th January, 1893, they say:

We agree to most-favoured-nation treatment, so far as articles named in the treaty are concerned.

That would be all right. Canada only gets that treatment from France, and that is the only treatment the Government authorized Sir Charles Tupper to give to France. Let me see if I am wrong in my interpretation of that, for I hope that our Government would not have agreed to anything else. But, Sir, I do not require to depend upon the language of that instruction to Sir Charles Tupper, for I have the explanations in detail given by the Minister of Finance as to what instructions the Government gave to the High Commissioner, and how they were carried out by him. On the 13th of March, 1893, the hon. Minister of Finance in discussing this treaty, said:

Now, I wish to state also, that this treaty contains two clauses with reference to what you might call "Third Power" treatment. With reference to the Canadian articles, France binds herself to give to Canada the same terms in regard to the articles mentioned in the treaty that she gives to any "more-favoured" nation. On the other hand, as the treaty is signed, Canada agrees to give France "most-favoured-nation" treatment, not only on the articles that are mentioned, but on any articles on her tariff in which she gives better terms to any other country. That was not the intention of the Government, as will be seen by a telegram which was sent to our Commissioner in January, in which it was expressly stated that we agreed to the "most-favoured-nation" treatment, so far only as articles named in the treaty are concerned. Our Commissioner, either through error or for reasons which he explains in his correspondence, signed the treaty with the clause in it as I have read, giving "most-favoured-nation" treatment to France in all articles of our tariff.

That surely is explicit enough, and there can be no doubt that I was right in defending the Government, because they never gave such instructions to their commissioner to France. But that there may be no doubt upon it, I will make another quotation from the statement made to this House by the Finance Minister on the 30th March, 1893. He used this language :

I think it is also well to state that one of the chief points, which the Government have to keep in view, is with respect to the favoured-nation clause. Whatever may have been our understanding with respect to all the other clauses of the treaty, as to articles which were to be allowed to come in, it is perfectly true that by our telegram of 12th January, we assented to those clauses, whether we fully understood, them here or not, and as responsible for them. But, with respect to the extension of the most-favoured-nation treatment, that was never contemplated by the Government, that was not included in our instructions, and, so far as that is concerned, was entirely beyond the wish of the Government.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Who said that ?

Mr. EDGAR. The Minister of Finance, from his place in the House on the 30th March, 1893. Now, Mr. Speaker, that being the case, how does the Minister of Finance stand up in the House and ask us to ratify that treaty which the Government of Canada never gave instructions should be entered into, and which the Government condemned, as the Minister of Finance says, in one of its most vital points. Another misapprehension has arisen about this unfortunate treaty. It is a "little French treaty" as the First Minister says, but still we have not an opportunity in Canada of very often discussing treaties little or big, and so we will be excused for taking some unusual interest in this, although it is only a little one. I hope we will not again have such a treaty to discuss. Another point is this : You will observe that this treaty, under its terms, extends its benefits to the colonies of France—"France, Algeria and the French colonies." As far as Canada is concerned, by far the most important of the French colonies in matters of trade is St. Pierre and Miquelon, at our doors. Why, Sir, our trade and navigation returns show that last year, while we exported to France $264,000, we exported to that little colony of St. Pierre and Miquelon, $219,000, nearly as much as to the whole of France. Therefore, undoubtedly that was an important colony to be considered ; it was a consideration to have the trade of that colony when the treaty was negotiated. But what do we find ? We find that it was undoubtedly considered by the Government an important matter to obtain the trade of St. Pierre and Miquelon, because in this same telegram from Mr. Bowell to Sir Charles Tupper of the 12th of January, this is stated :

The Government agree to other conditions in return to minimum tariff on articles named as regards France and St. Pierre and Miquelon.

This is evidence, perfect evidence, that this was a large part of the consideration. Well

Sir, will it be believed by the House that the French treaty does not effect our trade with St. Pierre and Miquelon in the slightest degree ? Will it be believed by the House that when the treaty was signed, Canada had access to St. Pierre and Miquelon with all the rest of the world at a very low rate of duty, utterly independently of this little French treaty ; so that that consideration, a very important part of the consideration of the treaty, as it was understood by the Government when they sent over that telegram of the 12th of January, utterly failed and collapsed. Am I wrong in that ? Does anybody doubt me ? I will quote the Finance Minister again on that point.

Mr. FOSTER. A better authority than you generally quote.

Mr. EDGAR. A pretty good authority, that one person in this House cannot deny, at any rate.

Mr. LAURIER. Except himself.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. Minister of Finance, on the 13th of March, 1893, went into a long statement, showing what great advantages we would get from our possible trade with St. Pierre and Miquelon—showing that the tariff that we would have to pay on what we sent to those islands was an exceedingly low, almost a nominal one. One would imagine when he was defending this treaty, that that benefit had all been derived from the treaty, but candour compelled him to admit otherwise, because he said this about it :

Now, it is only fair to state this as well. That the proclamation by which this reduction in tariff rates is made for St. Pierre and Miquelon is a proclamation which leaves that trade in these articles open on these terms to the whole world, as well as to Canada. From the correspondence as it went on, Council was of the opinion that that was to be as compensation to Canada as far as these articles are concerned, but the decree which was promulgated, and which reached us, I think in the latter part of January, shows that the proclamation was made general, and that these articles, as far as St. Pierre and Miquelon is concerned, came in at the lower rate. They, however, come from any country as well as from Canada.

You see the consideration had fallen through. It may be said, perhaps, that Sir Charles Tupper did not inform this Government that that was one of the considerations which he was trying so hard to get, but we find that he did, because on the 21st November, 1892, in a letter which he wrote to the then Premier, Sir John Abbott, Sir Charles Tupper, speaking of the consideration, at page 23 of the blue-book, said :

And a large reduction below the minimum tariff in St. Pierre and Miquelon, which will amount to a remission of duty of some 250,000 francs per annum on Canadian export and thither under the maximum tariff which will become payable there after the first February next.

And further on, on the same page, he said :

It will thus be seen that the remission of duty on the wood imported into France from Canada, as shown by the French trade returns, which I am satisfied are correct, and on the wood exported under the proposed remission of duty to St. Pierre and Miquelon, will exceed in amount the whole of the ad valorem duty which it is proposed to surrender on the wines.

So my point is that while in one case in regard to the favoured-nation treatment, the Government distinctly instructed their commissioner not to sign the treaty with such clauses in it, in the other case, in regard to the St. Pierre and Miquelon trade, they were misled by him, or both were misled by their ignorance of the state of affairs in thinking that they got that St. Pierre and Miquelon trade under the treaty, when they did not. Now, earlier in the evening, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) and I think the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) seemed to think that we were bound to-night, at the request of the Government, to ratify this treaty, because it had been signed more than a year ago by the British plenipotentiaries on our behalf. Well, apart from the arguments which have been used to-night, especially those advanced by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and apart from the language of the treaty itself, which throws it open to the Parliament of Canada and to the Legislature of France to reject the treaty at any moment, I would just quote the words of the Finance Minister himself last session on that point. After pointing out, with the greatest possible frankness, all the objections—some that I have urged to-night, and some that I have not urged—he said this :

And certainly, until we receive more satisfactory assurances than we have as regards these items of which I have spoken, I shall not ask the House to ratify the treaty.

Was that admitting that the House could not ratify it? Why, Sir, it was suggesting that unless he got satisfaction on those different points, he would not ask the House to ratify it. I would like to know what satisfaction he has got on the question of the most-favoured-nation treatment? What change has come over him since last session? No new light has been thrown by him on the subject to-night; and why has he changed his mind from what it was then, when he said that he certainly would not ask the House to ratify the treaty until he had satisfactory explanations about these matters? And even this session it seems that it was not absolutely necessary for this House to ratify this treaty, because at a very early part of this session, this question was asked by the hon. leader of the Opposition :

What is the policy of the Government with regard to the commercial treaty with France? Is the Government to ask or not to ask ratification of the treaty?

The answer of the Minister of Finance was this :

I beg to say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that two important delegations have asked to be heard with reference to this treaty, and the Government have therefore decided to defer giving the answer until after the Easter Holidays, after these delegations have been heard.

So that even the hearing of a delegation was sufficient in itself to throw doubt on the minds of the Finance Minister and the Government whether they should ask the House to ratify this treaty at all or not. Under all the circumstances, without detaining the House any further, I beg to move, in amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) that the following words be added at the end thereof:—

That it appears from the papers laid before the House and the statement made to this House by the Finance Minister, that this treaty was signed, as to the most-favoured-nation treatment, without the instructions of the Government, and further that the treaty was entered into under the erroneous impression on the part of the Government that the trade with the French colony of St. Pierre and Miquelon would be affected by the treaty.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was glad to hear the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) call the attention of the House to the fact that we are discussing to-night a matter of pure business, from which he was very anxious indeed that all matters of sentiment should be eliminated. The hon. member made that observation evidently because one or two members of this House had expressed a feeling of sympathy in the direction of increased trade with France, and the hon. gentleman evidently feared that the treaty was, by some, supported out of the natural feeling of desire which some members of this House have in that direction. But the hon. gentleman, when he made that statement, forgot entirely that some of the reasons which had been already advanced in this debate by some of the principal speakers on his side of the question, were considerations very far indeed removed from the question of business and the question of trade, and had thrown a political acrimony into the discussion which, according to his view, ought to be entirely removed from it. Indeed, the hon. gentleman, himself, forgot his own injunction, a few moments later, when he sought to prejudice the minds of this House against the treaty, on the ground that it had been negotiated by Sir Charles Tupper, and to some extent represented Sir Charles Tupper's personal views, rather than the views and directions of the Government of Canada. I intend to second heartily the injunction which the hon. gentleman pressed upon this House, that other considerations than those connected with business matters should not be drawn into this debate, except, of course, those questions of sentiment and honour which are connected with the good faith of the country and the public spirit and sense of propriety which should have weight in a Legislature like this in considering our negotiations with any other country. For that reason my earnest request to this House on behalf of the Government, who have been alleged to take a very slight interest in this matter, is that, in considering this treaty, members will disregard the argument which was advanced at the very outset of the debate by one of the leaders of the Opposition, based on the assertion that the Government had been vacillating in this matter, and that that should be of itself a ground for the rejection of this treaty. That story of vacillation arises from the fact that last session we declined to ask the House to enter upon the consideration of a bill to ratify the treaty. We declined for reasons stated frankly to the House by the Finance Minister, and which would, if they had not been removed or explained, have justified a similar hesitation this session. The treaty had been signed at Paris eleven days after the opening of last session. Parliament sat for less than sixty days after that treaty had been signed at Paris. The mere fact that so short a time could elapse between the signing of the treaty and the closing of the session would be itself a reason to consider whether the treaty ought not to be laid over another year in the absence of any strong wish to the contrary expressed by the other party. But there were certain matters of interpretation which had to be set at rest, and these the Finance Minister expressed to the House—whether, for instance, under the expression of the treaty which related to our preserved fish, that expression was not too strict to allow our preserved fish to be admitted into France under the minimum tariff. There was also a question of interpretation with regard to lumber and various other matters, which could not possibly be settled before the close of the session. Additional information upon such points has since been obtained and laid on the Table, and this House, as well as the Government, have received the explanations which have been made, and which must have convinced the House that the terms of the treaty were such as to include the articles which we expected would be included, but the inclusion of which were considered doubtful at that time. These are the facts with regard to the pretended vacillation on the part of the Government, on which this House is asked to reject this treaty. And then, I think, I might ask upon the same ground that the House should utterly ignore the statements urged in subsequent speeches, for example, by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that the Government were not desirous of having the treaty ratified, that they did not believe it to be a genuine arrangement, beneficial to Canada, and were only acting under the dictation of the High Commissioner—that the High Commissioner was indeed a plenipotentiary, but not a plenipotentiary on behalf of, but, rather, over the Government of Canada; and the statement likewise with regard to the coercion which that gentleman had used on the Government of Canada in relation to this ratification. I would ask the House to disregard these expressions and statements upon one particular ground, and that is, that they are absolutely and unqualifiedly untrue. The High Commissioner of Canada, as well as the other plenipotentiary who was engaged in the negotiation of the treaty, of course was most anxious that the country on whose behalf the new treaty arrangement was made should give that arrangement its sanction. It has been fairly admitted, and could not be contested, that the plenipotentiaries had made for Canada the best arrangement—and I think it was the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) who made the admission—which they were able to accomplish. But beyond the mere statement of the desire they entertained that the representations they had made to the other country would be justified, and that the arrangement which they had made—the best they could—should meet the approval of the Parliament of Canada, there has not been the slightest attempt at coercion or dictation on the part of those hon. gentlemen in regard to the Cabinet, or any single member of it. And I trust that the House will give us credit for at least having spirit enough to resist any attempt at dictation with regard to matters of this kind if any should ever be made. Now, having joined the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) in the request that considerations which are foreign to the subject, and which were adduced in order to mislead the judgment of the House—or, at any rate, could have only that effect—should be discarded for the moment, I will ask the House to enter upon a consideration of the few points that have arisen. With regard to some of them I may say that misapprehension has prevailed in the minds of the gentlemen who have spoken. Let me ask the House to consider this fact at the very outset of my argument upon it, that the Government of this country, no matter in whose hands it has been from time to time, has been for upwards of twenty years trying to make a trade arrangement with France. In the course of these twenty years the subject has been pretty well considered and discussed. In the course of the negotiations which took place a little more than a year ago in Paris the history of all the negotiations, every protocol that had passed, is known. Is it not singular, if this is such a bad arrangement for Canada, that no gentleman, in the course of this long discussion, which has lasted for several hours, has pointed out one particular in which the arrangement could be improved? We have objections with regard to the most-favoured-nation clause, but these I will notice separately. With about twenty-one years of experience of negotiations with France, and with a full canvass of the lines in which trade with France could be enlarged, is it not singular that, while gentlemen have spoken in round terms of attack upon this treaty, they have been unable to name one article which should have been admitted or one that should have been excluded from the working of the treaty. By this hon. gentleman can judge of the fairness and the merit, to say nothing of the sincerity, of the criticisms that have been passed on the treaty. If it is the case, as I think it is; if it must be admitted, as I think it must, that the different plenipotentiaries have accomplished all that was possible of accomplishment in the range of the products of the two countries, how is it that we have been unsuccessful for more than twenty years in endeavouring to bring about a trade arrangement with France? Is it possible that the statesmen who have taken part in these negotiations from time to time were not aware how limited a range of subjects could be included in a trade arrangement? Or is it that the products of France and Canada are not the same as they were twenty years ago when we commenced the negotiations? The conclusion is irresistible that an arrangement such as hon. gentlemen opposite, when it came their turn to assume the responsibility of Government, were endeavouring to bring about has been brought about, and now that it has been brought about, now that it opens the field for enlarged trade with France for the first time, we hear criticisms based on the limited range of products which can be included in a trade arrangement with France. Now, taking another view of the situation, I was somewhat surprised to hear my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) making his criticism with regard to wines and the reduction of duty upon the wines of France. That opens up a bit of history with regard to the fiscal policy of the Government of this country. I think it will be found, if we trace its way back, that these duties were increased to their present level in order to give the Government of Canada a lever to bring about such an arrangement as we have here. Certain I am, and certain I am that I can prove from the records of this House, that as long ago as 1879 this House put on record and finally embodied in a statute an offer to abandon this very duty if it could bring about a trade arrangement with France, such as has been accomplished now. But now that our offer has been accepted after standing on the Statute-book since 1879 we turn about and say: We are making too great sacrifices and these duties that we put on to make arrangements with France must remain; our offer was too generous and we repent of that offer made in pursuance of a statute standing on the books of this country for some fifteen years. I would like to refer the House to the 'Hansard' of 1879. The House will see that there was then introduced a series of resolutions with regard to tariff arrangements, and some of them looking to trade arrangements with other countries. The ninth of these resolutions is in these terms:

That it is expedient to provide that the whole or part of the thirty per centum ad valorem imposed by this Act upon wines imported into Canada, may be dispensed with on proclamation of the Governor in Council whenever it appears to his satisfaction that the Governments of France or Spain or either of them have made changes in their tariff of duties imposed upon articles imported from Canada into those countries.

That was our statutory offer, standing, as I have said, for something like fifteen years. And, now that our offer has been accepted by France, now that she has made a reduction of the duties on articles imported from Canada, now that all the articles that we could ask to be admitted are admitted, the House is asked to denounce the arrangement on the ground that it is not so desirable as we thought it would be in 1879, and as this House has thought it ever since—for that proposal has remained ever since upon the Statute-book. I, therefore, think that the argument of the hon. member for Toronto against the reduction of the duty upon wine as being a reduction of the taxes on luxuries as contrasted with the necessaries of life, was hardly a fair or logical one. Now, in estimating the loss which it is said would accrue to Canada by virtue of the provisions of this treaty, I can do little more than reiterate the observations which have been made by hon. gentlemen who have been heard in defence of the treaty, and who have pointed out how unreasonable and unfair it was to conclude, from the circumstances of the past, that the trade of Canada is not to be improved or increased, but that we are to measure the loss to the Treasury simply by the standard of imports and exports of the years when the trade was under very different conditions indeed. The minimum and maximum tariff of France has been established since then; certain nations have been admitted under the minimum tariff, and we have to consider, not what the condition of affairs was in 1891 for example, when the circumstances of competition were far different from what they are to-day, but we have to consider what our position will be under the minimum as compared with the maximum tariff of to-day, the United States, for example, then competing with us in many of those articles, having the benefit of the minimum tariff, but being about to renounce that benefit, if we can draw conclusions from the legislation of the past few months in Congress, and finding ourselves with regard to timber, which we hope to export to France in great quantities, now almost excluded in that market, in which Norway has the benefit of the minimum tariff. I merely mention this circumstance to show that the conditions of to-day, the increase of trade under the circumstances of to-day, and the loss or gain with regard to revenue, cannot be accurately measured by the conditions of the past. A great deal has been said to the House by gentlemen who are earnestly desirous of representing the prohibition sentiment of this country, against the enactment of this treaty on the ground that it gives facilities for the introduction of the wines of France. I appreciate and I endorse what was said by several members of this House, especially with great earnestness by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) and by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle), with regard to the advantages which would accrue to this country from the increased consumption of the lighter wines instead of the whisky and other spirits which are in general consumption to-day. But if there were anything in that argument, I assert now, as I asserted to the gentlemen who came to see me as a deputation on the question of prohibition, that the interests of prohibition in this country have nothing to fear with regard to this treaty. In the first place, one cannot conceive it possible that a measure of prohibition should be enacted in this country and come into force in less than twelve months from the time of its passage. Business interests would have to be considered, and a fair opportunity given to those who are in a business which would be affected or stopped entirely by the enactment of prohibition, to get into other lines of business, and to make arrangements to avoid complete and immediate loss; and under those circumstances we have but to ask that the denunciation of the treaty shall be made in obedience to the prohibition sentiment of the country as expressed in the prohibition enactment, and this treaty will stand no longer in the way of prohibition. I have to say further that if any influence rests with me in the counsels that shall be given with regard to this Act, this Act will not be proclaimed by His Excellency until we have the distinct understanding from Her Majesty's Government that the notice for the denunciation of the treaty will be given whenever Canada requires it, so that that matter shall not rest in vague doubt; and we shall have the pledge of Her Majesty's Government, if she is willing to ratify this treaty, that this treaty will not be put into force longer than Canada desires it. The same argument may be advanced with regard to other effects of the treaty upon this country. Surely after having for upwards of twenty years endeavoured to bring about just such an arrangement as this, when it is admitted, practically, that this is the only arrangement possible, we can give it a trial on the understanding that we shall get out of it on a year's notice whenever we please. Under the circumstances I think the question is not at all so formidable a one as was pretended, and that I was justified in using the term I did about the treaty, and which gave some merriment to my hon. friend on the other side of the House, when I called it "this little French treaty"—not the little French treaty as being unimportant, but as a matter about which those terrible calamities did not gather which hon. gentlemen opposite had been depicting from time to time. It is an arrangement terminable, as it were, practically at our own pleasure, and easily determined if it is found injurious to this country; it is the best trade arrangement that can be accomplished, and one that we have been endeavouring for long years to bring about. Now, with regard to the criticism made by my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) of the statement given to the House by the hon. Finance Minister in the early part of the session when he was asked whether the House would be asked to ratify the treaty at the present session. My hon. friend from Toronto misunderstood altogether, I think, the answer given by the Finance Minister, and I have heard that answer misquoted in this House—no doubt, because quoted merely from recollection—at least twenty times. We were assured time after time that the Government were vacillating about the matter, because the Finance Minister said that an answer would not be given to the House until deputations had been heard, and my hon. friend, and the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) construed that into an expression meaning that no obligation rested upon this Government or this House to confirm the treaty, because it depended on what deputations might say with regard to it. Now, my hon. friend will see, when I call his attention to the words, that that was not a fair interpretation of what the Finance Minister said. The Statute for the adoption of this treaty was prepared when the question was asked in the House, and the policy of the Government had been decided upon, but it was, of course, courteous that, even before formulating our decision upon the subject, much less presenting it to the House, we should wait to hear what the deputations had to say. One of the deputations consisted of some 250 gentlemen interested in prohibition. They had requested an interview, and I think appointed a time when they would come to Ottawa for the purpose of that interview. Another deputation consisted of the wine growers of western Ontario, a large number of whom desired to be heard. What would they have thought of the way in which the public business of this country is transacted if they had seen a statement made in this House that the treaty would be ratified before they had an opportunity of being heard? Common courtesy at least required that these gentlemen should be heard before the answer was given in the House, and that is precisely what the hon. the Finance Minister said. Our policy with regard to the matter, as I have said, was framed, subject, of course, to anything that could be represented to us that had not already been brought to our attention, and had not been already considered, and when these gentlemen came, we found that the matters about which they wished to make representations had been considered, that nothing new was to be advanced, and that the policy could be stated to the House as it was. I find this in the 'Hansard' of 19th March, 1894 :

Mr. LAURIER asked, what is the policy of the Government with regard to the commercial treaty with France? Is the Government to ask or not to ask the ratification of the treaty?

Mr. FOSTER.—I beg to say in reply to the hon. gentleman that two important deputations have asked to be heard with reference to this treaty, and the Government have therefore decided to defer giving their answer until after the Easter holidays, after these delegations have been heard.

Now, with regard to one of interests which has been represented by that deputation, and with regard to which certain members of this House have expressed their strong desire for protection, I desire to call the attention of the House for a moment only to the nature of the petition which the wine growers of Canada have addressed to us. Among hon. gentlemen who are in favour of the protection of that industry, I include hon. members on our own side of the House who are in favour of protecting native industries generally, and hon. members on the other side of the House who are not in favour of protecting the industries of the country, excepting in so far as concerns their own particular constituencies. Now, if the House will be good enough to look at the petition of the wine growers, which was read to the House by my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. McGregor), the House will see that that is not unqualifiedly a petition to reject the treaty; it is, at least in the alternative—a statement that certain measures will have to be adopted in order to preserve their interests by enabling them to receive and use without excise duties, certain products that they have to employ in fortifying the native wine. I will read as little as possible, so as not to weary the House, but I think there is a paragraph in it where this point is clearly brought out. At the end of page 3, these words are used :

We trust that the Government will carefully consider our requests and enact such legislation that while they are accomplishing their object in the proposed new relations with France they will not ignore the legitimate demands of the grape growers and wine manufacturers of Canada, but encourage and promote the interests of one of the most promising industries of the country."

A little before that, in stating what legislation they required, it is said :

From the foregoing facts it is evident that if the proposed treaty is ratified without certain restrictions, and also without equivalent advantages being granted to us from the Government our grape growing and wine industries will be practically ruined.

These which follow are the equivalent advantages which they ask :

That manufacturers should be allowed to distil their grape must, pomace or wines, without any license or excise duty, subject to proper restriction.

That for the protection of Canadian wine manufacturers and also for public protection, a Commission or Examining Board be appointed at each Canadian port to analyze and test the imported wines, and that no wines but those made from grape juice be admitted, that spurious or doctored wines called in France vins frelatés, be positively excluded from being imported and that the same tests used at the Paris Octroi by the Paris Commission, to discover different wine falsification, be used in Canada.

So the House will see, I think, that the petition is not an unqualified one, declaring that the industry will be destroyed by the operation of the tariff, as, indeed, one could hardly expect they would allege, because the wines of this country, I am informed, are sold more cheaply than the French wines of the same class, and the duty which will still remain, one would think would be still a very considerable protection indeed to the wine-growing industry of the country. But, instead of seeking the rejection of the treaty, the request of the wine growers was that if the treaty should be adopted, certain advantages to them should be secured by the Government or by Parliament, and that certain tests should be adopted for the purpose of seeing that the treaty is not fraudulently made use of for the introduction of spurious wines into Canada. A few other points were made which require only a passing notice. The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) in his speech thought it necessary to add to the resolution moved by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) a further reason for denouncing this arrangement, and that was that the arrangement had been entered into, and the negotiations made on the expectation that Canada would receive exceptional advantages in the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. Mr. Speaker, the announcement that the reduction of the duties in St. Pierre and Miquelon would be made with respect to all the world, was made and conveyed to this country before this treaty was signed, and, therefore, the statement of the sub-amendment is absolutely incorrect in its terms. I must qualify the sub-amendment still further in that regard. The record shows that the arrangement with respect to St. Pierre and Miquelon by which those are practically made free ports was made in pursuance of these very negotiations, and in consequence of them, and it is so alleged by the plenipotentiaries who have acted for us and for the mother country. The negotiations commenced, as will be seen by this correspondence, at a time when the tariff of St. Pierre and Miquelon was a very high one, and according as negotiations progressed and as representations were made with respect to the commerce of this country with these islands, concessions were made by the Government of France, and in a postscript to a letter by Sir Charles Tupper, dated Paris, 15th November, 1892, this expression occurs :

The French commissioners stated to me that they would be quite prepared to make substantial remissions of duty, below the minimum tariff, on Canadian products sent to St. Pierre and Miquelon, and to the other French colonies.

And on page 20, in the course of a letter to Sir John Abbott, dated 18th November, 1892, Sir Charles Tupper, speaking of the French negotiators, said :

They also drew attention to the position of St. Pierre, which was now placed under the French tariff, and stated that they would be prepared to give to Canada a large reduction below the minimum on animals and their products, pigeons, oats, hay, and apples ; fresh meat, firewood, staves, and eggs, it was stated, would be admitted free of duty, and building lumber would pay fifteen centimes instead of one franc and twenty-five centimes per 100 kilogrammes. In fact the concession they would make to Canada in regard to the colony would amount to a remission of duty of about $250,000 below the minimum tariff on the present Canadian exports to St. Pierre.

It is true that we hoped at one time as the result of these negotiations, that Canada would acquire exceptional advantages in the markets of St. Pierre and Miquelon, and that has not been realized. But as I mentioned to the House a moment ago, I repeat, that we were aware before the treaty was signed of the general nature of these concessions with respect to the tariff on those islands, and the House will see there was no intention on the part of France that those advantages should be extended to Canada alone. We asked to be allowed to send into France certain products under the terms of the minimum tariff, but we never could oblige France to give those terms to Canada alone, and it would be absurd to ask it ; but while we hoped to obtain exceptional advantages as regards those two islands, we had no right to insist on such terms.

Mr. LISTER. We give these to France alone.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, and it is not proposed that the arrangement that is made with respect to France shall be exceptional with her. That brings me to consider the observations made with respect to the most-favoured-nation treatment, and which we would have preferred to have seen omitted from the treaty, as the Finance Minister said last session. But when the House comes to consider that, as a fundamental objection to the treaty, hon. members must consider what the position and policy of Canada is with respect to other countries. We give exceptional treatment to no country. When we make treaty arrangements with France we extend them to other countries of the world, and these hon. gentlemen, if there are any of them under the impression that by extending the most-favoured-nation clause by this treaty, we are preventing preferential arrangements with the mother country, or with any other British colony in the Empire, will find they have been entirely mistaken. The terms of the treaty do not preclude us from making any preferential arrangements with the mother country or any other colony because we only engage to give France the most-favoured treatment that we extend to other powers, that is to other powers than those who made the treaty, viz., Great Britain and France. Under these circumstances, the House will see that, as regards the arrangement made with respect to the most-favoured-nation clause, while we should have preferred it to have been omitted, there was no reason for refusing to make the arrangements with France on this account, considering what our policy has been with respect to the general treatment accorded to other countries, and considering the great power that remains within our hands of putting an end to this treaty whenever we shall be disposed, if we shall be disposed, to make preferential arrangements with any foreign power. Under these circumstances, I sincerely hope the House, while I shall not be obliged to press on it any consideration of honour, will find this treaty an acceptable one, and one that was made in the interests of trade and especially in the interests of trade with the country with whom we have been for so many years endeavouring to enhance our trade. I do not think it at all necessary to press any considerations of honour and good faith upon this House. Undoubtedly the Government whose representative made the treaty is obliged in every sense of honour to put it fairly and honourably before the House. But when the question was argued by hon. gentlemen on the other side as to our honour ; I listened attentively, and I found that instead of discussing questions of honour, they have discussed questions of legal obligation and they have pointed out that the House cannot be bound by any sense of honour in regard to this treaty, because there is a clause in the treaty which says : that it shall not have effect until it receives the assent of Parliament. Undoubtedly any treaty which a representative of Canada may make should contain such a provision, and undoubtedly Parliament is free to decline to ratify any such treaty that has been made. The considerations of honour and good faith which are involved, arise simply from these few facts : that the negotiations which preceded the treaty were initiated and put forward by the Government of Canada, that they were pressed upon Her Majesty's Government, that Her Majesty's Government chose the duly authenticated representative of Canada to be her plenipotentiary in the negotiation of that treaty, and not only secured to us the great advantage, which my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) seemed not to perceive, as to the treaty-making power; but Her Majesty engaged practically that the treaty which Canada should make would be Her treaty. Under these circumstances, there should be a due appreciation of the great advance which has been made by Canada with regard to the negotiation of treaties with foreign countries. There is a sense of pride at least, in living up to what may be considered our bargain, and this, if not involving the honour and good faith of this House, appeals to the sentiment which this House ought to feel as representing a people who are engaged in securing from time to time, the fullest measure of self-government, and at the same time the closest relations with the mother country, whose power and whose authority we have invoked on this occasion to make the arrangement with France.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, of the numerous statements made this afternoon by the right hon. gentleman, there is one as to which nobody on this side of the House would be disposed to take any exception. The hon. gentleman has stated that for twenty years at least, we have been endeavouring to negotiate a treaty with France, and that statement is true. For twenty years and more, we have been endeavouring to negotiate such a treaty, and after twenty years we are in the presence of this treaty which the hon. gentleman, at one time—I will not say, in a moment of weakness, but of expansive frankness—characterized as “the little French treaty.” After twenty years of effort, the mountain has produced this mouse, and certainly a little treaty it is. If you look at it what do you find? You find that after twenty years of effort on the part of our diplomats to induce the French nation to give us something like reciprocal trade, they have obtained from the French Government their consent to sell under certain conditions in this country: wines, soaps, nuts, almonds, plums and prunes. There is nothing else in the treaty on the part of France. After twenty years of effort that is all we have to show, and it took the Government something like eighteen months to make up their minds as to whether or not they would ratify that “little French Treaty.” The right hon. gentleman has taken exception to the charge that his Government have been vacillating in the matter. Well, Sir, let us say: they have not been vacillating, but we will say: that for eighteen months they have been considering whether they would ratify that “little French Treaty” or not. One whole session passed away; four months of another session passed away, and after eighteen months of consideration they have at last made up their minds to ask for ratification. The right hon. gentleman said they were not vacillating but that they were considering. They were considering for instance whether or not the expression:

have been properly translated into English, and after giving this matter due consideration they have come to the conclusion that indeed the translation was right. But, Sir, the right hon. gentleman is mistaken. He does not give to himself or to his Government the credit to which they are entitled. It is not this session only that the Government found out what was the true meaning of “Poissons conservés au naturel” and “Homards et langoustes conservés au naturel.” We had it last year. We then had the interpretation, which the hon. gentleman said we only had this year. Last year we had the interpretation from the mouth of the Minister of Finance himself. Let me call his attention to what he said on the 30th March, 1893:

I did not propose at present to ask the House to ratify the treaty; that communication had opened with the British Government and the high Commissioner, with reference to certain clauses and other matters in connection with the treaty, and we were waiting the result of these communications. I may say that those communications have progressed to a certain extent. With reference to two of the two clauses, regarding which I was in doubt at that time, the meaning appears now to be clear. The terms “Poissons conservés au naturel” and “Homards et langoustes conservés au naturel,” were badly translated, I believe, into English, and I came to the conclusion, in looking them over, that they meant simply that fish in their natural shape were admitted. They are, however, wider than that and bear out the construction given them by the papers laid upon the Table, and the despatches of Sir Charles Tupper, that canned fish, and salmon and canned lobsters are allowed in under these clauses, at the minimum rate.

Mr. FOSTER. What date is that?

Mr. LAURIER. The 30th March, 1893.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. And the House was prorogued the next day.

Mr. LAURIER. The House was prorogued the next day, but it was only this year the Government were able to give their explanation. And even at the opening of the present session, when the question was put to the Government: whether or not they were ready to say what their policy was, they could not do so. They were still considering upon wines, and upon soaps, and upon nuts, and upon plums and upon prunes. But, Sir, there is more than that. It is a matter of notoriety I believe, which will not be denied, that when Parliament opened this year, the young Achilles who presides over the Department of Marine and Fisheries was under his tent. That is the expression that was used in former times: we say now that he was gone on a strike. For many weeks and days the hon. gentleman withdrew under his tent, and, like Achilles of old, would not take any part in the fray. We also remember, judging by his beaming countenance, that Agamemnon went to his tent and removed the difficulty between them, and from that day it was decided that the treaty should be ratified. With regard to the treaty itself, for my part I would be in favour of it. I am in favour of any extension of trade, and so long as we have a protective tariff in this country it is impossible for us to extend our trade to the south or to the east or to the west, except by commercial treaties. Here is a treaty; but I take complete issue with the right hon. gentleman in the statement he made a moment ago that under this treaty we are deriving the advantages that we contemplated in 1879, when the House of Commons passed the resolution to which he alluded. I deny altogether that under the treaty we are now considering it is to be expected that there shall be an extension of trade. Why, Sir, if this treaty is ratified, Canada will not be in any better position than she was in in 1879 with regard to French trade. Why? Because the minimum tariff, under which our goods are to be admitted to France, is higher to-day than the tariff which prevailed in France in 1879. It is a matter of notoriety that ever since the war of 1870 the French tariff has been always on the increase, and to-day it is higher than it ever has been at any period in history. In 1892 a double tariff was adopted in France, a minimum and a maximum tariff, and the whole effect of this treaty, if it is to be ratified, will be that we shall have the benefit of the minimum tariff, and I commend this to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), and the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle), who have told us that under such a treaty our trade with France would extend by leaps and bounds. Those hon. gentlemen should know that if it was impossible to extend our trade with France up to the year 1892, on account of the barrier which met our goods there, it will be still more impossible to extend our trade under this treaty, because the minimum tariff which will meet our goods in France to-day is higher than the tariff of 1892. Now, we had the figures given to us last year by the Government themselves on this question, with reference to the old and new duties on every one of the articles coming from Canada which are to be included in the treaty. The comparison is as follows:—

Mr. LAURIER.

Articles.	Old Tariff, General.	Present Minimum Tariff.
Canned meats.....	8 francs per kilo	15 francs
Condensed milk, pure.....	6 francs	5
Fresh water fish, eels.....	5	5
Fish, preserved in their natural form.....	10	25
Lobsters and cray-fish preserved in natural form....	10	25
Apples and pears, fresh... do do dried and fresh.....	Free	2
Fruits preserved, others....	6	10
Building timber in rough or sawn.....	8	8
Wood pavement.....	Free	65 centimes to 1 $\frac{3}{4}$ francs
Staves.....	1	3.50
Wood pulp (cellulose) mechanical.....	Free	75 centimes
Wood pulp, chemical.....		50 centimes
Extract of chestnut and other tanning extracts.....		2 francs
Common paper, machine made.....	Free	3 francs.
Prepared skins, others whole	11	10
Boots and shoes.....	50	25
	75 to 2 francs.	75 to 2 francs.
Furniture of common wood	5	5
Furniture other than chairs of solid wood, common....	7	9
Other chairs.....	15	20
Wooden sea-going ships....	2	2

Now, Sir, it is quite evident that we gain nothing whatever under the arrangement now proposed, and the contention of the right hon. gentleman, that under this arrangement we would have the advantages that we contemplated in 1879, is altogether erroneous and unfounded. Then, with regard to St. Pierre and Miquelon, the contention of my right hon. friend is simply this: that we gain nothing whatever in our trade with St. Pierre and Miquelon from the treaty. Our goods have been admitted to St. Pierre and Miquelon with those of all the rest of the world under a special tariff; but under the treaty we expected to have preferential treatment there, but we have failed to obtain it. I call the attention of the House and the hon. gentleman himself to the very statement made by Sir Charles Tupper in one of his letters, as follows:—

The French commissioners stated to me that they would be quite prepared to make substantial remissions of duty, below the minimum tariff on Canadian products sent to St. Pierre and Miquelon, and to the other French colonies.

How is this to be construed? There was a general tariff in St. Pierre and Miquelon applying to all the world, as the hon. gentleman has stated; but the French plenipotentiaries assured us that they would give our products a special treatment. Where is it to be found in the treaty?

Those were the negotiations at one time, but those negotiations did not materialize. We received, under the treaty, no special advantages, but are on an equal footing with the rest of the world. We are admitted to the minimum tariff; but with regard to St. Pierre and Miquelon, the negotiations which were pending at one time have not materialized, and we remain in the same condition and on the same footing as all the other nations of the world. The point taken by my hon. friend is quite well taken and has not been answered by the right hon. gentleman. But there is another condition, and it is one to which I invite the special attention of the House. The hon. gentleman stated a moment ago that we were, to a certain extent, bound to ratify the treaty. It is not possible to entertain this view when we consider the whole treaty itself. What does it say :

The present treaty having received the sanction of the Parliament of Canada.

If such is the provision of the treaty, negotiated and signed by the two nations, it is idle to say that at present we are bound to ratify it. But there is another consideration. Though we are not bound to ratify the treaty, I say further that the Government cannot ask for its ratification until they have redeemed the pledge given by their plenipotentiaries to the French Government. The hon. gentleman spoke a moment ago some brave words in which I altogether agree. He said that there is a bargain and we ought to live up to it. Yes, and the bargain which was made and the consideration whereby the French Government was induced to sign the treaty, was that there was to be a line of steamers plying between a French and a Canadian port in order to give the treaty some value. I call the attention of the right hon. gentleman to this. What is the declaration which was made to the French plenipotentiaries? On the very day the treaty was signed, a condition was made which I shall now read to the House; and I ask the right hon. gentleman what his ideas of honour are, when he asks the House to ratify this treaty without having taken any steps to implement that condition? Lord Dufferin and Sir Charles Tupper, speaking for the Canadian Government, wrote to Mr. Develle, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, on the very day the treaty was signed, in these terms :

We take this opportunity of affirming what we have already made known to Your Excellency during the progress of the Conference, that the Canadian Parliament, desirous of favouring a development of commercial relations between the two countries, has voted a subvention of one hundred thousand pounds for the purpose of establishing a line of steamers to run between a Canadian port on the one side and a French terminal port on the other.

Speaking of honour, I say that the Canadian Government, in the face of such a declaration had to do one of two things. When the treaty was signed and it was brought to their consideration, they had either to at once take steps in order to carry out the promise then made, or they had to notify the French Government that they would not be bound by such a promise. But when they ask the ratification of the treaty without implementing that express condition—nay, we have the word of the Finance Minister that they do not intend carrying it out—I say they are asking us to ratify a treaty obtained under a deceit, which is a dishonour to Canada. It may have been an imprudent pledge on the part of the plenipotentiaries, but the pledge was given. And why was it given? Because, as Sir Charles Tupper himself, said, unless there was a line of steamers plying between Canada and France, the treaty would be absolutely valueless. He gave the reason for that statement, and the reason is obvious. There is a special condition in the French tariff that all goods coming into France, not direct from the country of production, but passing through the port of another nation, are subjected, besides the duty in the tariff—whether that be the minimum or the maximum duty—to a surtaxe d'entrepôt of 3 francs 50 centimes per hundred kilogrammes; so that unless our exports go direct from Canada to France, the treaty would be without value, because they would be subjected to that surtaxe d'entrepôt. The hon. Minister of Finance last year contemplated that condition of things, he brought his mind to bear on it, and this is what he said :

There is one point that I missed, and which is necessary to know in order to have a fair understanding on the matter. France, if she holds to anything, holds to what she calls the "surtaxe d'entrepôt" and consequently of these articles not one can be exported from Canada into France if it touches at a European third port. They can be sent direct from here to France, or direct from an American port to a French port, but if they touch any other European ports and are transhipped from that place, a surtaxe d'entrepôt of three francs fifty centimes for every hundred kilogrammes is levied. It was with respect to that we wished to have a fast line of steamers between this country and the French ports.

This was the language spoken last year by the hon. Minister of Finance. At that time the Canadian Government, understanding exactly the import of the pledge given by their plenipotentiaries to the French Government, said on the floor of Parliament, through the Finance Minister, that it was their wish to have such a line of steamers between Canada and France. Where is that line of steamers to-day? I have in my mind at this moment the words spoken this afternoon by the Minister of Finance, in reply to some remarks on this side, that the Government would not bring down any subsidy whatever for this purpose. I have nothing to say with regard to the policy of the subsidy. That is a question of great moment, but the point which I make and the charge I make against the Government is that they obtained the signing of the treaty by leading the French Government to understand there would be such a subsidy, and that when they failed to redeem their promise, they thereby cast dishonour on the name of Canada, and violated the pledge which their plenipotentiaries gave. I quite admit that our Government are not bound by these negotiations, if our plenipotentiaries exceeded their power; but it cannot be held for a moment that a Government would undertake to have a treaty ratified which was negotiated under such circumstances, and yet discard the promise made to a friendly nation, under which that treaty was obtained. What has the Government to say in answer to that charge? What is their policy? They have declared their policy to be no subsidy to a line of steamers between this country and France. As regards the policy of granting a subsidy, I have nothing to say. If the Government had proposed such a subsidy, it would require our serious consideration. But what have they to say in their own defence for not being prepared to implement their promise? Is that the idea of honour which hon. gentlemen opposite entertain? The right hon. First Minister said that we must live up to our bargain. Is he living up to the bargain made by his plenipotentiaries when he asks Parliament to ratify this treaty, concerning which the French Government have been led into error, without having taken any steps to correct that error. This is the objection of all others that I have to make against this treaty. The hon. gentleman treats this as if it were a light matter. It may be in his eyes, but I believe that by the British Government and the Foreign Office it would not be held a light matter, and I charge upon him that it was his bounden duty to have notified the French Government at once. He has not done so, and I say that, therefore, he is asking the House to ratify a treaty obtained under false pretenses—obtained on the faith of a promise which the Government are not prepared to carry out.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think that the debate this afternoon and evening shows only too well what has been throughout this session a matter for common observation—that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Laurier) is a man fitted for opposition, and that he is well supported by similar spirits behind him. That hon. gentleman and those who act with him have not only opposed everything that this Government have done, but they have opposed every treaty that has been negotiated by Canada since 1887. Not only have they opposed these treaties, but in the case, for instance, of the Washington Treaty they opposed the ratification of it, and afterwards they were most violently opposed to the denunciation and abrogation of that treaty, and they have been repining and regretting ever since the advantages that were lost under that treaty, the adoption of which they had so violently opposed. So it was not to be expected in this case, whether it was a big treaty or a little treaty, or a medium sized treaty, that these gentlemen would rise to anything like a statesmanlike position and discuss the treaty on its merits in connection with the interests of this country. Most of us anticipated that they would take the course they have taken. Not a well sustained opposition has been shown to this treaty. Certainly no vigour and life were in the Opposition benches until a little was infused into them from the cross benches, and they found the possibility of adding to their ranks by making an opposition, and therefore, the leader of the Opposition, speaking late in the debate, has taken perhaps more pronounced ground than he would otherwise have done. But he has failed to grasp the situation, and to appreciate the elements of the case, and has ignored really the history that led up to the treaty, ignored the object of the treaty, and has not given a fair rendition of it. Why, Mr. Speaker, can we accept the concluding sentence of the hon. gentleman's address and believe that he is giving a deliberate opinion upon this question? He says that the great reason, the one reason above all others, why this treaty should be rejected by Canada is, forsooth, that France may have the right to refuse to ratify the treaty, that France may have ground, on account of bad faith on the part of our representative and on the part of our Government to refuse to sanction the treaty. And that, according to the hon. gentleman, is the reason above all others why we should hasten to refuse to sanction it also. We have had, unfortunately, an exhibition of that sort of spirit in this House from the Opposition benches on a former question this year. In the case I refer to they suggest as loudly as possible to the mother country injury to Canadian interests, saying that there has been bad faith on the part of Canada, and that therefore Great Britain should take a position against Canada, and punish us for bad conduct. And now the hon. gentleman says that his main reason for opposing the treaty is that he fears from what happened during the negotiations the French Government will think of something they have never yet suggested—though they have had correspondence with this Government and with its representative since that time, and the position remains as it was when the treaty was sanctioned. Consider also the value of that objection. The hon. gentleman does not cite one word in the treaty, in the agreement or in the bargain by which Canada is bound to give a dollar of subvention to a steamship line. On the contrary, the plenipotentiaries refused to enter into any such agreement. But they had no hesitation in putting in writing what they honestly and correctly believed to be the policy of this Parliament—and in proof of it they refer to the statute of this Parliament—and the policy of this Government, which was set forth at the time, and had been openly discussed and well understood. But, so that Canada should not be bound to implement that, so that Canada should not be bound to spend a dollar under that policy, if she chose to abstain from doing so, they ostentatiously kept that subject out of the treaty, and gave that as their reason. But I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to another document which must have failed to attract the attention of the hon. leader of the Opposition before he took such strong ground. In the papers there is a report of a discussion with Mr. Hanotaux, after the discussions had arisen, and when explanations were requested. How is it that Mr. Hanotaux explained to the Canadian representatives that this surtaxe d'entrepot would not be in the way of Canada in the case of shipment through the United States, but that we should be able to ship through these foreign ports on this side of the Atlantic, the objection being only in the case of the shipment from European ports. Instead of being met by the charge of bad faith with reference to the question of the direct line of steamers, the subject received no consideration, and was not alluded to in any shape. But these hon. gentlemen seem to forget history, and history of a comparatively modern date. The leader of the House has said, and the leader of the Opposition has agreed, that for a period of twenty years we have been trying to do something with France. What was it? To make a wide commercial treaty? Did any member on either side of this House, did any newspaper in Canada ever in these twenty years when France was going from high protection to higher protection, ever suggest or suppose that there was a possibility of larger trade relations between this country and France? Such a thing was never suggested. The whole subject of our negotiations with France arose out of a comparatively small affair, out of one single transaction. I ask the hon. gentleman to reflect for a moment and he will remember that the whole question between France and Canada related to the subject of the duty on ships on one side and the duty on wines on the other. And in these negotiations our representative, Sir Alexander Galt at one time and Sir Charles Tupper at another, only desired to make a more extended arrangement. The instructions that went forth from Canada were practically to obtain a reduction of the duty on Canadian ships entering France, and to offer on our side some favour in connection with the wine duties. But not only is that so, Mr. Speaker, but when this duty was put on wine, this additional duty of 30 per cent ad valorem, I ask you and I ask this House to remember that the gentlemen sitting opposite then as they are sitting opposite now, quite appreciated the object of that extra duty. It was not put there in the interest of the wine growers of this country, or in the interests of the revenue of the country; it was placed there simply in connection with the negotiations that might be set on foot in order to reduce the duty of 40 francs a ton on Canadian ships entering France to the old duty, which was two francs a ton. I may remind the House that in 1873, when we had, comparatively speaking, the English wine duties in the Canadian tariff, France was admitting our Canadian built ships into her ports, charging them a duty of 2 francs a ton only, that being the minimum tariff at that time. We made very few ships for France, they were chiefly built in the province of Quebec; and I am speaking by the book when I say that France was a comparatively small market for us at that time. Nevertheless it was a market, and there was a possibility that wooden ship building for that market might increase. Consequently, we did everything we could to get back to the most-favoured-nation treatment, so to speak, or at any rate get that duty reduced from 40 francs to 2 francs a ton. Well, nothing was done until 1879, and then an ad valorem duty was added to a duty already high enough on the article of wine; and it was for the purpose, as Sir Leonard Tilley said to Sir Alexander Galt at that time, of securing the remission of the duty to which I referred. Now, then, when that was put on, Mr. Anglin, speaking from a maritime point of view—and it was the Maritime Provinces that were particularly interested in this question then as they are largely interested in it now—protested against the duty as almost prohibitory, as a duty that would tend to smuggling; and he was ably supported by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who objected strongly to this extra duty. But finally Mr. Anglin came to the conclusion that the Government would be able to arrange for an exchange of ships for the light wines of France, and that I take it was the position of the House on that occasion, and of this country, until the treaty was an accomplished fact. Now, it is easy for wise-aces to rise up and suggest how much better they could have done the thing. That is the time when people are wise, but it is delicate and difficult to say what should be done prior to and during negotiations. It is a dangerous thing to mark out what your particular policy and offer shall be and what you will guarantee to accomplish, but it is child's play, when the thing is ended, when there is no retreat on the part of the people responsible, to rise up and tender advice; and I am only surprised that hon. gentlemen who have taken part in this discussion and criticised this treaty, have not been able to tell the House the manner in which they would have done the thing, what kind of a treaty they would have made. Apparently they would have made a bigger treaty, they would not have made a little treaty, but beyond a little badinage of that kind. I have failed to ascertain any particular objections on their part, except two—one, that France would have a charge against us of bad faith if we did not do something more than ratify this treaty; and the other, that we made a great mistake in ratifying the act of our plenipotentiary in inserting the favoured-nation clause. But so far as other articles could be exchanged with advantage, what could we have given in the treaty? I have heard no one make a suggestion. Now, something can be said on the part of France in connection with our chaffering over the duties. Criticism has been made as to whether our offer was genuine or not. We wanted that duty reduced from 40 francs to 2 francs per ton, and in 1881, after there had been pour parlers between Sir Alexander Galt and the representative of the French Government showing our desire, France did reduce the duty from 40 to 2 francs a ton, and that duty has remained. But we went further than, perhaps, we had the right to do; anyway France considered that we were acting in good faith—as the hon. gentleman wishes to discuss the question of good faith—France considered it good faith on the part of Canada, and thus we were obliged to take off that additional duty; and in the different pour parlers and negotiations, they pointed to the statement of Sir Alexander Galt, who at one time offered to reduce that 30 per cent to 15 without any concessions from France, to show good-will merely, in the hope that they would meet us half-way, promising to take the other 15 per cent off when they made a step. Well, the hon. gentleman has criticised this treaty as containing so very little. The hon. gentleman says we are getting wines, soap, nuts, prunes, almonds, and so on, and he laughs at those items as comparatively unimportant. But that is the reverse of the position of some of his friends. They are afraid we are allowing entirely too much on our side, and only obtaining limited privileges on the other. But to show the inconsistency of our hon. friends, in 1881, when the Reform party in Canada supposed we were going to make a large French treaty instead of a small one, what was their position then? They rose up and opposed the very idea, and said that if the treaty was extended it would discriminate against the poor in favour of the rich, and that silks, laces, kid gloves, millinery, perfume, dolls, fans and all that, were all subjects for revenue, all articles of luxury; they were ready to oppose it on account of its great extent, and the large number of items that would be admitted into this country on favourable terms. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman, if my hurried reference to the history of these negotiations be correct, how is it that we are not obtaining as much as we expected to obtain in 1879? I cannot find any where any hint that we expected to obtain further concessions or better treatment than we have in the treaty now before the

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

House. I have given, I think, some reasons for that. The chief change that has occurred is that wooden ships are not so important to us in this treaty, we can expect very little out of any concession on that score, even if they were admitted free into the ports of France. But in place of the shipping interest, there is another very large interest involved, I speak of the lumber interest. The hon. gentleman, coming, as he does, from the province of Quebec, knows that whether his view be right about this treaty or not, the men who are in the spruce lumber business in his province are intensely anxious that this treaty should be ratified. They are business men, they have their money in this thing, they are sending lumber into France at present under great difficulties, and competing against European countries who have the minimum tariff at present, while the maximum and very high duties to which the hon. gentleman referred are imposed on Canadian lumber. Can it be pretended that while we are shipping our lumber into the French ports to-day with the maximum tariff against us, while Norway and Russia are sending their lumber in on the minimum tariff, there will not be a very great advantage to this country and to that interest in particular, when we can get into that market on the same terms as those countries which are our competitors. We are anxious to meet the wishes of those men who are engaged in the trade. Take Senator Snowball. Senator Snowball has furnished me with the statistics of that important trade in New Brunswick, from the Miramichi district in particular, and from the port of St. John, with the ports of France. He says that the non-ratification of this treaty has done that interest a great injury during the past year, that they would have made a great deal more money if they had been able to get their stuff in on the favourable terms provided by this treaty; and that he and others in this business are anxious and waiting for the ratification to take place. Take the consular reports laid upon the Table of the House. The consul at Rouen, I think it is, or at any rate one of the British consuls, speaks of the importance to Canada of the lumber interest in particular, and regrets that this treaty has not been ratified. Take the other questions that the hon. gentlemen have only skimmed over, take this question of lobsters, whatever the duty be. The hon. gentleman referred to said that the duty was that under the minimum tariff. I admit it. But whatever it is, the lobsters will go into the market on more favourable terms than the lobsters of any other country. We have the lobsters, and we want that market. We have it already to a limited extent, with the maximum tariff against us. Every one knows, and inquiries are being made for the purpose of carrying that out, that a very large and valuable export will be the consequence in that particular when this treaty is sanctioned. The hon. gentleman spoke of the fact that the minimum tariff was higher than the maximum or regular tariff of years ago. I submit that is not putting the question fairly before the House. No one pretends there is free trade in this arrangement. We are not giving France free entrance for her goods into this country. We are giving her a minimum tariff, we are reducing our maximum and keeping on a pretty high minimum tariff. But let us look at the subject in its broad and true light. It is not that we are to get our products in at the minimum tariff, merely, but we are to send to France goods we already sent into that country under the terms of the maximum tariff, while we know that there are only two, or, at most, three countries in the world which enjoy those advantages; and whatever the scale may be, so far as they require those articles they will get them from the country which enjoys the minimum tariff, and the competition at all events will be only among those countries producing those articles and enjoying those favourable terms. We have made a better treaty than the United States made, and with this advantage, that while some of the articles are common to the treaty made by the United States with France, and to that made by Canada to France, we shall have practically a very valuable advantage in having all those articles to ourselves so far as the minimum tariff is concerned within a very short period if the Wilson Bill becomes law in the United States. It will make our relative position a great deal better and more valuable. Touching this question of direct shipment, I assert we can ship and obtain advantage under the treaty through the United States. We can, however, ship our lumber direct, as hon. gentlemen know it is shipped, in the lumber vessels that take that kind of cargo, and when the trade springs up, I take it that this country can well afford, if it is worth its while, and the treaty is maintained, to subsidize a line of steamers, as it did afford, and cheerfully afford, for several years to vote subsidies for a direct line of steamers to ports in France with a maximum tariff against all our goods. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that in 1887, 1888, and 1889, for three years, this Parliament cheerfully granted $60,000 a year in order to aid a steamship service to carry the goods of this country to France and bring back French goods, and we had not even a little treaty between the two countries. If it was feasible then to conduct that trade, handicapped as Canada was, with other countries enjoying more favourable terms in regard to the articles we are sending there, if it was to our interests and advantage to spend that money, how much more would it be advantageous to Parliament and the country to ratify this treaty and obtain better terms, even leaving the question of steamships and aid of that kind aside. You give those advantages to the Maritime Provinces, as regards lumber and lobsters particularly, and Parliament will have no trouble and difficulty as regards those goods being conveyed to market, for the people will do that part of the work. Take next the question of St. Pierre and Miquelon. The hon. gentleman did not say, what I think is a point of importance, that while those ports were made free during the negotiations, Canada has advantages over every country, with the exception of Newfoundland, perhaps, to a limited extent. Those French islands are off our shores, and Canada has, from her natural position, greater advantages than any other country. But, at all events, that is no objection to the treaty. We have no right as regards the most-favoured-nation clause to claim or expect that under the proposals of the treaty, other nations should be excluded from that privilege. On the question of exchange, no matter what our calculations may be as to the development of the different lines mentioned in the treaty, let us not forget that we were not masters of the situation altogether. We had not many concessions to offer. We went as 5,000,000 to negotiate with 70,000,000, because that was the relative standing, taking the population of France and her colonies; and when it is considered that the United States, with a population of 60,000,000 did not make so advantageous a treaty with France, I think that is a fair point to claim on behalf of this treaty. In regard to the most-favoured-nation treatment, I should like to say a word. What was the position of our plenipotentiaries? The Order in Council under which these negotiations took place referred to the historic fact that Canada has always given France the most-favoured-nation treatment, and that that was the policy of this country. Sir Alexander Galt had gone to France, and said, the policy of Canada is to treat French goods as liberally as the goods of any other country in the world, and we will treat you all alike. Sir, Charles Tupper went with the same statement. No one questioned the propriety of those statements. They have been on the Table of the House, in the blue-books, they have been read and re-read, and no one has said that those statements should be withdrawn. But when the French Government said: "Will you put those statements in a treaty and make that undertaking good?" What would have been the position of Canada or her representatives if they had said: "No, we have given those assurances to you from time to time, but we will not agree to be bound to give you the most-favoured-nation treatment." The position of Canada would have been deplorable, and the negotiations would have terminated speedily. But this treaty is at most an experiment, it may be terminated on a year's notice. But when it is remembered that this treaty is at most an experiment, that it is liable to be terminated on a year's notice, what becomes of the importance of the argument which otherwise might hang around the question of favoured-nation treatment or prohibition or any other question. We are at most giving up what we were ready to give up long ago for a very small concession, and we are obtaining a far greater concession than we expected to obtain or had any reason to expect. It may be argued that this will prove to our detriment. From the information I possess, and particularly from the lumber interest, and that is the largest interest affected in Canada, it is worth our while to try the experiment, and I have not heard anything to-day to convince me that a single interest will be injured, but on the contrary, I believe there is the prospect of many interests being greatly improved.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I desire to say one word in explanation of the vote I intend to give on the ratification of the treaty. Notwithstanding the defence that has been made of the treaty by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I may say that in my judgment the advantages that are to accrue to Canada under that treaty are largely problematical; but at the same time it appears to me there is another question involved, and that question is this: whatever may be the conduct of Canada with respect to the treaty in the future, at present our good faith and the honour of the country are to a very large extent pledged to the ratification of this treaty. Consequently I feel it my duty as a member of this House, whatever my views may be of the treaty itself, to vote for its ratification.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Montague) is another member who wishes to escape from the responsibility of voting for the treaty under the excuse that our honour is pledged to it. That point has been sufficiently answered already, and it is too late for any one to take shelter behind it. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries made the statement that the Government never expected to obtain better terms than those included in the treaty. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that the Government did expect to obtain better terms, and they were satisfied they would secure better terms when they authorized Sir Charles Tupper to negotiate this treaty. He knows that Sir Charles Tupper signed this treaty practically in contravention of instructions received from the Government here in regard to the favoured-nation clause, perhaps the most important point in the whole treaty. The whole question of what trade we may do with France under this treaty is infinitely small compared with our commercial relation with other states which may be affected by this arrangement. The hon. gentleman knows that on the 12th January, 1893, the following cablegram was sent to Sir Charles Tupper:—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Re French negotiations. Government cannot accept conditions involved in clauses regarding steamship subvention and reduction duty French books, but agree to most-favoured-nation treatment so far as articles named in Treaty are concerned. They agree to other conditions in return for minimum tariff on articles named as regards France and St. Pierre and Miquelon.

That was on the 12th of January, and on the 6th of February Sir Charles Tupper signed the treaty containing the favoured-nation clause, not as he was instructed, but in regard to all articles whatever. There was a case in which the Government expected their ambassador to obtain better terms, and not to sign the treaty otherwise, yet that ambassador exceeded his powers and failed to do his duty by accepting a treaty in different terms, and on terms which are practically injurious to the country. The Minister of Marine ought to be aware that there was considerable discussion on the question of admitting our cheese into France on favourable terms. That was a matter directly concerning the farmers of this country, and, therefore, no doubt of small interest to the present Government. Sir Charles Tupper wrote on the 26th of January to Mr. Bowell:

The question of obtaining the minimum tariff on cheese is, in my opinion, a matter of the utmost importance, and one that would far outweigh in solid advantages the small loss of revenue resulting from the concession asked in return.

It should lead to the Canadian cheese industry finding a large market in France, for a new product, Gruyère cheese, on most favourable and advantageous conditions. What Cheddar is in England, Gruyère is in France, namely, the most popular cheese, the consumption of which is enormous.

Switzerland, which sent France in 1891 over 36,000,000 lbs. of this cheese, is now under the maximum tariff, which imposes a duty of 25 francs per hundred kilos, against 15 francs, the minimum tariff rate. Under such a rate the Swiss trade with France must largely cease. Gruyère cheese, as you may be aware, is made of skim-milk. A profitable utilization of this by-product, therefore, of our cheese factories becomes possible if the minimum tariff be conceded to Canada on cheese. If you are able, as I hope you will be, to arrange this matter, I would suggest sending to Switzerland, Mr. Robertson, the Dominion Dairy Commissioner, who is now in England, to study the question of the manufacture of this cheese, locally, for the guidance and instruction of the cheese-making industry in Canada.

That concession was asked in exchange for the reduction of the duty on paintings, engravings and architectural designs. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries must also be aware that Mr. Deville, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, wrote to Lord Dufferin and Sir Charles Tupper in the month of January, as follows:—

Of course it is understood that if, as you hope, the Government of the Dominion gives satisfaction to the Government of the Republic on this point, the French Government will consent to add cheese to the list of articles of Canadian origin which, in accordance with the terms of article 3 of the agreement signed to-day, are to be admitted into France, Algeria and the colonies under the minimum tariff.

There is an advantage which was expected and which was not obtained; an advantage that would have vastly increased the market for our cheese, and yet the Dominion Government appeared to be unwilling to make the slight concessions required by the French Government in order to obtain that privilege. I charge it upon them as a remarkable disregard, remarkable even in them, of the interests of the farming community that they did not make the small concessions needed in order to obtain this privilege from the French Government. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries makes little of the promise made about the steamship line. He knows that Sir Charles Tupper was notified by cablegram that nothing could be guaranteed the French Government in regard to that subsidy, but nevertheless he induced the Marquis of Dufferin to sign with him an assurance to the French Government that that was still the policy of the Canadian Government. Sir Charles Tupper wrote also the 18th January (six days after the telegram to the contrary) to M. Hanotaux:

As I informed you to-day the Government of Canada have agreed to the proposals in your memoranda which you handed to me at our meeting on 22nd November last, with the exception of the proposed reduction of duty on French books, and the clause relating to the steamship service between France and Canada. This does not arise from any change in the policy of the Government on the latter question, as I have placed it before you, but there does not seem to be any ground for embodying the intentions of the Government in a treaty to which there are obvious objections.

Notwithstanding that he had been cabled to the contrary, Sir Charles continued to take advantage of the fact that a subsidy had been voted in the previous session of the Canadian Parliament, and he makes that the ground of assurance to the French Government that it was still the policy of the Canadian Government to continue that subvention, while we have now been told that it was not the policy of the Government. I think, Sir, that the filial plea made by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries will not destroy or remove the accusation of deceitful conduct made by my hon. friend and leader against the gentleman who, unfortunately, represented Canada on that occasion; and the statement that we had never expected any further advantages from the treaty than those contained in it, is equally demolished by the facts disclosed in the correspondence, which, together with the condemnation of the treaty by the Finance Minister last year, are enough for me on the subject.

Mr. McKAY. I would like to say a very few words on this subject. I believe that certain industries in this country will be very materially benefited by this treaty; but, on the other hand, there is a large industry in the western part of Ontario which, I am afraid, will be somewhat injured. But, as has been said by some hon gentlemen, who have preceded me, as I consider that the honour and the pledge of the country are somewhat involved in the ratification of this treaty, and as our Premier said in reference to the industry to which I particularly refer, and which is so important in the Niagara peninsula and on the shores of Lake Erie, that something may be done to protect that industry, in the shape of a reduction in the excise duties or in some other way, I propose to vote for the ratification of the treaty. If I may be allowed, I will read a letter which fully describes the condition of affairs in that industry:

SANDWICH, Ont., July 9, 1894.

Hon. W. F. MACLEAN, M.P.
Ottawa.

HONOURABLE SIR,—We have just heard that a reduction of 33½ per cent of excise duty is to be granted to the wine manufacturers. We beg to call to your attention that such a reduction would hardly be of any benefit to us as the price of spirits would still be too high, and we could not use them with any advantage. We expected that the Government would make such regulations, that the price of proof spirits, including excise duty, would not cost us over $1.00 per gallon. We cannot compete with the cheap imported wines under the French Treaty unless we can have spirits at that price. We submit that if the Government intends to protect us in any way, that the excise duty should be so lowered as to make the cost of spirits to us only $1.00 per gallon. Hoping that you may induce the Government to consider favourably our request, and thanking you for your kind co-operation, we remain, in haste,

Yours gratefully,

(Signed.) ERNEST GIRARDOT,

In behalf of grape growers and wine manufacturers.

I just read that letter to show what the wine-growers will expect if this treaty is adopted.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, at this hour of the night, I shall certainly not trespass upon the House at any great length; nor do I think I can add very much to what has been brought before us in the various speeches that have been delivered in the course of the debate. It appears to me important, however, to bear this in mind. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have stated that they would not vote in support of the treaty if they did not think that they were in honour bound to give it their adhesion. Now, I think this is a matter which we should understand, because it concerns not only this treaty, but all treaties; for from this time out I think we may be sure that no treaty will be made with Canada which will not be subject to the ratification of Parliament. Now, what is the provision of the treaty-making power? The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) contrasted what he was pleased to term the disgraceful manner in which treaties were made by the Americans with the British and European system, and he expressed the hope that we would adopt the British and European system, and not follow the system in vogue on the other side of the line. I do not think that the language of the hon gentleman in reference to the American treaty-making power was justified or called for; and I think that if the hon. gentleman had known of what he was talking, he would hardly have spoken of it in those terms. The United States constitution requires that a treaty can be made only by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate; and every power that enters into negotiations with the United States for a treaty is perfectly aware that the Executive of that country has no authority to make a treaty, and that a treaty can only be made when two-thirds of the Senators who are present when the matter is put assent to it. On the other hand, the British system has been that the power of making a treaty rests with the Crown. That is still the constitutional law, and the Crown would have the constitutional right to make a treaty which would bind not merely Great Britain, but also, in strict constitutional law, bind this country. But that is not the constitutional practice. The practice has grown up, and is now firmly settled, that no treaty will be made to bind this country without the consent of the Parliament of this country. So that when this treaty was made, as it undoubtedly was made by the plenipotentiaries of this Government, under the directions, real or supposed of this Executive, and when that treaty reserved to the Parliament of this country the right to say whether it should be sanctioned or not, and postponed its ratification until our sanction was given, it does appear to me to be the height of nonsense to argue that we are bound in honour to ratify the treaty because the plenipotentiaries of this Government have thought fit to sign it. What is the use of the stipulation that it is to be submitted to us for our approval? If it is a matter of honour, if the honour of Canada is pledged, and the honour of the gentlemen who sit in this House as the representatives of the country is pledged so that they are bound to ratify the treaty, whether they approve or do not approve of it—and that is the language we have heard to-day from several hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House who have addressed us—then it is ridiculous nonsense to call upon us to go through the farce of sanctioning the treaty, and it might as well be passed without our sanction at all. Therefore, it appears to me that we have to consider whether this treaty is one which in the interests of Canada we ought to adopt. An appeal has been made by the First Minister that we should not allow a matter of sentiment to enter into the consideration of the question. True, he said, referring to the language of the treaty, we are speaking of a legal obligation; but, above and beyond the legal obligation, he said, if I understood his argument aright, that there was a moral obligation on the part of the people of Canada to ratify the treaty. Again I deny that proposition; again, it appears to me that nothing has occurred which justifies the Government in appealing to us on any moral consideration or any consideration of honour to adopt the treaty; and we can refer to the language of the Finance Minister when he brought this matter before us last year and appealed to us before we adopted the treaty to consider it well in all its bearings, as to its advantages and disadvantages. In the latter part of the hon. gentleman's statement, which was made on the 13th March last year, he used this language:

The treaty is signed subject to ratification by the Canadian Parliament, and I make this full and frank exposition of the treaty in order that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House may look into it and consider it, for it requires a little consideration in order to see just what the effect of the treaty is in these different particulars, and certainly until we receive more satisfactory assurance than we have yet, as regards the items of which I have spoken, I shall not ask the House to ratify it.

So we find the hon. gentleman telling us at that time that certainly, unless explanations were given him, which had not reached him, he would not call on us—member of the Administration though he was—to ratify the treaty. I think, therefore, that we are certainly free to consider this treaty on its merits, and to determine whether we should adopt it, in the interests of the country we represent. Now, what is a reciprocity treaty? It is idle to argue, because no one will deny, that certain benefits will be obtained under this treaty. It is idle for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to impress upon us that the lumber interests will be, to a certain extent, benefited. I am not able to say to what extent. Judging from the difference between the maximum and the minimum tariff in France, my conclusion would be that it could not be of very great advantage even to the lumber interest, because after all the difference between the maximum and the minimum tariff, on this item of lumber, is the difference between 45 centimes, which is the minimum rate, and 75 centimes, which is the maximum rate. That is to say, the difference between the maximum and the minimum tariff is only between 2½ francs, as compared with 1¾ francs; so that the full difference ranges between 45 and 75 centimes, or 10 cents and 15 cents—the equivalent in cents—per 100 kilos., as I understand it. It is for a practical man to say whether that is a practical advantage or not. I admit, as we are bound to admit, that certain advantages are to be gained under the treaty. But the question is, what is a reciprocity treaty? Why, surely it means that in return for the advantages we propose to give to France we should get some corresponding advantages. Now, how are they to be measured? A simple method of measurement presents itself. We find that, as compared with duty we have been levying we will lose directly, according to the statement of the Minister of Finance, made on the 13th March last year, in the neighbourhood of $82,000. That is the direct loss, calculated on the importations from France of the preceding years. But, as was pointed out by the hon. gentleman from East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) on the subject, that is only a portion of the loss we will sustain, because the moment we reduce the duty on the French goods—sparkling wines and wines under twenty-six degrees—no one will think of importing the same wines from any other part of the world. We have been importing sparkling wines from the United States and various other parts of the world, and clarets up to twenty-six degrees alcoholic strength. Although these are not admitted under the treaty, because the treaty only deals with articles of French origin—wines sparkling and non-sparkling, and so on, of French origin entering Canada shall be free of duty—although we only reduce the duties in favour of French wines, that of course will divert the trade in those articles to France, and therefore we must add at once to the amount of duty we will lose on the direct importations from France the indirect loss on the importations we now make from other countries, which will not be much less than one-half of the loss in French duties. We know therefore what we are losing, measured by that standard. What are we gaining? I certainly did not know until the hon. member from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) made the statement to-night—I was groping through the report, but could not find exactly what I suspected—that the benefits we were to get through our exportations to St. Pierre and Miquelon were not dependent on the terms of the treaty. That is now admitted. It is even boasted by the First Minister that we knew all about it—and I will come to that in a moment, if the House will bear with me—before the treaty was signed. It is stated that we knew perfectly well that this reduction in the duty on goods to St. Pierre and Miquelon was not owing to the treaty, and it is argued that of course we never expected to get the sole benefit of that reduction. Of course the right hon. gentleman argues, and so does the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that we did not hope, and had no right to expect that we alone should get the benefit of the reduction of duty on the imports of goods into these islands. That is quite true. But do these hon. gentlemen forget that although we did not expect that, if it was in the treaty we would have the right to insist upon it and enforce it; and as the matter stands now, it is not in the treaty, and the duty can be placed just as the French Government may think fit to place it on the importation of goods into those islands. The tariff can be changed as the French Government pleases. I do think we have the right to complain, if this was known to the Government—but with all deference, I doubt very much if it was—of the misleading statements that have been placed before the House. Can it be doubted, on reading the correspondence, that it is distinctly represented in that correspondence, that it is owing to this treaty we are getting these advantages in these islands. Let me refer to the letter of Sir Charles Tupper of the 26th of January last:

DEAR MR. BOWELL,—In continuation of my letter of yesterday, I may say that Sir Joseph Crowe and I met the French negotiators at 4 o'clock this afternoon at the Quai d'Orsay. They informed me that owing to the question of procedure in respect of the exceptions to the general tariff of St. Pierre and Miquelon, which, they said, the Government had the power to put into force without consulting the Chambers, there was an objection to a reference to this matter appearing in the body of the treaty. I pointed out to them that as this concession—

I ask the attention of the First Minister to this. It certainly does not agree with the statement made to this House.

—I pointed out to them that as this concession was one which had influenced the Canadian Government a good deal in their instructions to myself, it was desirable that some specific reference to the matter should appear on record. I suggested, therefore, as the best way of meeting the wishes of the Canadian Government in the circumstances, that it should form the subject of a letter to be attached to the treaty.

It does appear, according to that statement, that the High Commissioner did profess at all events—and I assume he was acting in good faith—that it was by virtue of and under the terms of the treaty that we were gaining these advantages, which we are now told are given to the whole world, so far as the trade with these islands is concerned.

This was agreed to, and the concession is mentioned in the draft of optional letter I referred to in my last, a copy of which I attach together with the question of the exchange of a reduction of the duty on paintings, prints, drawings, etc., for the minimum tariff on cheese.

Then, Sir, if we do not gain the advantage, because that is what I am coming to—if we do not gain the advantage in these islands what advantage do we gain in France? The Finance Minister puts the figures at $30,000, or $30,416, to be accurate, is all the duty that is taken off the goods we are shipping to France in exchange for $82,000 which we surrender at once in the direct importation from France and the loss which we sustain by the matter to which I referred a moment ago, the fact that trade will be driven into that channel by reason of the advantage we give to France in our market. Well, if reciprocity means fair treatment, if it means equality of treatment, if it means that we are to get as much as we give, can any hon. gentleman say that this is a treaty which, in the interests of Canada, we ought to ratify? It is useless to debate the question of free trade and protection. It is beside the question before us. The theory of this is that this, being a protectionist country we are surrendering a part of our protectionist policy to another protectionist country in exchange for an equivalent advantage given by that country. And if that result is not achieved, as it is not, we would not be justified in ratifying the treaty. No explanation has been offered us, though the question has been brought up, why Canada should be placed at a disadvantage in other matters. The French have carefully provided that if we interfere at all with the tariff on our part, they may immediately denounce the treaty; while they reserve liberty to alter their minimum tariff and we have no privilege of denouncing the treaty. Now, surely, that was a matter for explanation on the part of some Minister. Of course the correspondence we have here is very partial. We have not the communications addressed to Sir Charles Tupper, but only the letters from him, and we are unable therefore to understand, except from extracts he gives, what instructions he was acting under. But can it be possible that our Government allowed such a condition to appear in a treaty and called for no explanation? If an explanation was to be had, why should not the House be taken into the confidence of the hon. gentlemen and why are we not informed what that reason is? Again, Sir, why is it that if we make any treaty with any other power, France is to be admitted to all the benefits and advantages of it, while, if there is a treaty between France and any other country we get no advantage except in relation to the enumerated articles? Is that equality; is that what we who are watching the interests of the country ought to expect? So, whether you look at its main features, or whether you regard its incidents, we find that in no way has care been taken to safeguard our rights or to see that Canadian interests were properly protected. Now, Sir, I am not going at this late hour to deal with many of the matters which I had intended to refer to. But one or two questions, even though I detain the House at this untimely hour, I cannot help making a few observations upon. We are told that this treaty is the outcome of twenty years' negotiations, that we have been offering to France the very terms embodied in the treaty and now we have got them we are not satisfied with them. Surely that is not a fair statement of the case. We have not for twenty years, but for many years been trying to get a trade arrangement with France, but no man can pretend that up to the last moment when this treaty was signed Canada ever offered to accept the terms to be found here. Look, Sir, at what Sir Charles Tupper demanded on behalf of Canada. The articles enumerated are to be found in two places. On page 25 of this blue-book appears the list, and an additional list is given on page 30. Among them we find ships, pearl ashes, agricultural implements, sewing machines, petroleum, agricultural products, including hay and bran, animals and their products, cheese and butter, eggs, game and poultry. And even to this long list additions were subsequently made. What we were seeking was a fair honest treaty with France, and to be told that we are bound to take anything we can get is to belittle the country in every way and is not an argument that I, for one, am prepared to accept. I find here something to explain what I could not otherwise understand the reluctance of the Government to ratify the treaty. We find here that the High Commissioner, deliberately, as it appears to me, overstepped the instructions received by him from the Government. Instructions were sent him on the 11th of January by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the most imperative terms that he was not to bargain with the French Government with relation to steamship subvention, and he was not to give to the French Government the advantage of the most-favoured-nation arrangement except in so far as the articles named in the treaty were concerned. The High Commissioner flaunts the instructions he gets in the face of the Government, apparently. He immediately goes to the French authorities and says: I am not authorized to include in the treaty what I have represented to you with regard to the intentions of the Canadian Government as to the subvention. And he says the only reason for that—let me read his words so that I may do no injustice to the High Commissioner:

The only reason was that it was not considered proper to make a question of this kind the subject of engagement with another country.

So I do think that the language of the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition is perfectly justified. We did bargain, in the first place, with the French Government that we would implement this treaty by a subvention for a steamship line. We did it through our High Commissioner, who represented to them afterwards that this condition could not be put in the treaty, because "it was not considered proper to make a question of that kind the subject of engagement with another country;" but if language means anything, we did represent to the French Government that it was part and parcel of the terms on which this treaty was to be signed that we would establish, at all events, to the extent of a subvention, a direct line with France. We have been told this afternoon by the Minister of Finance that the Government have no intention of carrying out their part of the agreement.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no use, I suppose, in attempting to correct the misquotation, because I am misquoted all round, first by the leader of the Opposition and now by the hon. gentleman. I made no such statement. I made this statement simply, that we are not bound by any treaty to do so. I did not say whether we proposed to do so or not.

Mr. McCARTHY. Very well, we have the explanation of the hon. gentleman, but I think we are entitled to know whether the Government do or do not propose to carry out that stipulation. This hair-splitting fashion is not the way the House ought to be dealt with by the Government. The hon. gentleman, we know, last year gave that as one of the reasons why he would not recommend the House to ratify the treaty, and now we are told that he did not say they would not do so, but that they are not bound to do so by the treaty. All I can say is that there is only one of two courses open to this Government, in honour, either to repudiate the acts of the High Commissioner or to ratify them in good faith. There is no middle course. The High Commissioner undoubtedly has pledged the honour of his Government to the French Government to that subvention, and if this Government is not prepared to ratify that stipulation the arrangement ought to have been disowned; at all events, the High Commissioner ought to have been recalled, and the Government ought to have been free from the obligation which he made without their authority. In the same way, we find that he was not authorized, he was expressly enjoined not to include the favoured-nation clause in the treaty. He did so. The explanations were all here. We know no more about that than the Minister did when he addressed the House on 13th March last. His explanation was that the High Commissioner had made that mistake, had entered into that agreement, either through error, or for the reasons given in his letter, and the letter is here. He knew, therefore, how the matter stood, we know how the matter stands now. Well, we see that this kind of engagement may be embarrassing. According to the argument addressed to us to-night, it is a matter of no consequence. Well, why, if it was a matter of no consequence, was the High Commissioner directed not to embody those terms in the treaty? But we know it is a matter of consequence. What is troubling us now? The engagements made years ago by England with Belgium and with the German Zollverein. I suppose it never entered the heads of the statesmen who made those engagements that they would be hampering the colonies of Great Britain as they have been hampering them. It never entered into their heads that these engagements would prove obstructive, and I commend the wisdom of the Government, I commend the wisdom of the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he forbade the insertion on the part of the High Commissioner of the favoured-nation clause, which the High Commissioner afterwards deliberately inserted. Now, we have the explanation why this treaty was not ratified. Notwithstanding all that has been said, I can hardly think the First Minister was sincere to-night when he told us that the Government all along intended to ratify this treaty. The excuse is that there was not time last year. That was used by the Minister of Finance when he addressed us, when he gave these various reasons why the treaty should not be ratified last year, and when he called upon the House to consider well the terms of the treaty before we voted upon it. Then the matter remained in abeyance, apparently, all through the year, and even at the opening of this session the Government had not determined, apparently, whether they would ratify this treaty or not. We are told that the cause of this delay in announcing to the House that the treaty was to be ratified, was a desire to deal courteously by the deputations that were to wait upon the Government. Surely, if the minds of the Government were made up, it was idle to invite or to permit these gentlemen to travel to Ottawa as deputations, and to present arguments to them on a subject as to which the minds of the Government were fully made up. Sir, I shall support the amendment to the amendment, and if that is voted down, I shall support the amendment of the hon. member for Muskoka, on the substantial ground that this treaty does not give fair play to Canada in any respect, that it is unequal and unfair in all its conditions. It is a treaty which takes away from the duty on luxuries and virtually puts it upon the necessaries of life, a measure which, at this time of day and in the circumstances of this country, this House is not justified in adopting. I have figured it out, and I find that the duties upon wines averaged about 55 per cent ad valorem, taking the specific and the ad valorem together, they are now reduced 25 per cent. Whether we are prohibitionists or whether we belong to the opposite school, we all agree that these are luxuries, and for mere sentiment, for no substantial advantage, for no advantage that can accrue to any industry of this country, we are removing from the luxuries of life a duty yielding $125,000 to $150,000, which sum will have to be made up on the necessaries of life, already overtaxed.

Mr. DAVIN. I crave the indulgence of the House for a few minutes while I explain the reasons that influence me in voting in the division that is now imminent. Although I shall follow in the course that has already been taken by far more distinguished members of this House than myself, I shall venture to say a word as to the obligations of honour that rest upon this House. Sir, as I understand this question, the Government of Canada is bound in honour to ask this House to affirm this treaty, but the House, strictly speaking, is not bound in honour to affirm the treaty, nor to affirm it at all, unless it shall appear to the House that the treaty will be of commercial value to Canada. That is one point of view, for in a case of this kind we dare not confine ourselves to the merely commercial aspect of the case. There is, I hold, a clear and constitutional principle which ought to guide the action of this House. I consider that the Government is bound to stand or fall by this treaty; but if it should appear to this House that, on the whole, the best treaty possible under the circumstances was made, that the Government and its plenipotentiaries did all in their power to make a satisfactory treaty, even though the treaty may fall short of what we could desire, even though it might fall short of what was attainable, yet, if it shall be shown that the treaty is on the whole likely to prove useful to Canada, then I say that the House would act dishonourably if they did not support the Government, and support its High Commissioner, who made the treaty. Sir, it is very important on this, the very first occasion of the kind, that it should be clearly understood that the Parliament of Canada is not bound by anything a man in the position of Sir Charles Tupper does or did in Paris. We are perfectly free, I hold, to come to this treaty and ask it to render an account of itself; and I say for myself that if on looking at the treaty I should come to the conclusion at which the hon. gentleman has arrived, that this treaty was a bad treaty for Canada, that it was vicious, that it was wholly unequal and it was such a treaty as Canada should not be asked to accept, I as a member of this House would then feel I was bound to vote against the Government, because I hold that the Government could do nothing else than stand by this treaty, even though its plenipotentiary may not have carried out to the very full the instructions that were given to him, or may have gone beyond his instructions in some small detail. I want to say one or two words; if the House will bear with me in regard to what I cannot but consider was a clever but still, if I may say so, a carping speech, a fault-finding speech on the part of my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). He said it was idle to say that certain interests would be served. He asked what the lumber interests would gain, as though he was addressing a jury and having the last word and there was no one to reply to him. What would the lumber interest gain? he asked. What was the difference between 45 and 75 centimes? he inquired. Why, there is a very large difference. Add a few more centimes, and the amount is doubled. But we need not pause to ask what is the difference between 45 and 75 centimes. All the leader of the Opposition has to do is to ask some of the lumbermen in Quebec who are friends of his own, as to what will be the advantage to Canada as regards lumber, and the answer will be such as was given by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle), or by Senator Snowball to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. My hon. friend said we would lose $82,000. And here I must say that he betrayed a defect that I have noticed in my hon. friend whenever he comes to deal with questions of this kind, the defect which belongs—and I say it with a certain amount of modesty and reticence, and still I must say it—to a scologist in any science or on any given subject. Nothing can be easier than to talk flippantly political economy. But the hon. gentleman said we would lose $82,000. I may point out that unless you approach this question strictly from the standpoint of a prohibitionist, there is not a man on the Opposition side of the House who should not rejoice, apart entirely from the admission into France of our lumber and other products under favourable conditions, at getting rid of taxation, at lowering the burdens on the people. Let me point out in regard to this supposed loss of $82,000 that in the same sentence in which the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) pointed out that loss, he gave the answer, for he quoted with approval his hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Macdonald). The light which the hon. member for Huron pounced on the question gleamed once again in the mind of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and he said this is the direct loss. But what would be the result? People would get in a far larger quantity of wine than they are obtaining now from France. Undoubtedly if this should prove to be the result of the operation of the treaty, it would be the same as that which followed similar legislation in England, the result of a lower duty being to add greatly to the customs returns; and instead of our revenue losing $82,000, I should not be surprised if the Finance Minister came next session with a budget showing instead of a loss a gain, or at all events a loss of not a single cent. Let me say here, in passing, that putting again the strictly prohibitionist view aside, and I may say I sympathize with them in their alarm, would any man in his senses who knows anything about wine growing countries doubt for one moment the truth of what Mr. Gladstone boasted was the result of lowering the duties on cheap wines, the stimulation of their consumption, and that cheap wines with a small percentage of alcohol in them undoubtedly contributed to the cause of temperance? But I say that merely in passing, and I assure my hon. friend that he need not be alarmed in regard to the probable loss, because he undoubtedly answered his question in his own remarks. The hon. gentleman asked what advantages would be gained? But he did not tell the House under what disadvantages we should suffer. He is in the same position as almost every hon. member who undertakes to discuss this treaty. Certain changes are enacted, but you cannot without experience know what will be the result. I have not heard a single hon. member who was able to enter into the details of the treaty and show the incidence of the change, showing how far this or that result would follow, how the figures would pan out at the end of twelve months. That term twelve months is in my opinion the safeguard of this treaty. Without it, speaking for my own constituents, I should have had to vote against the treaty, because I have there a large number of prohibitionists whom I represent, and they thought the treaty was to extend over a very long period, but with twelve months in it when we can pronounce upon the treaty, what is the difficulty? Let a wave of prohibition pass over the country and let an Act be passed to carry out prohibition, and in twelve months the treaty can be put on one side and the people can be placed in the peril described by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), in which we should all be getting indigestion from drinking water. In regard to what was said about the steamship subvention, the hon. gentleman said that Sir Charles Tupper pledged the country to give a subvention to a steamship company. But what answer would the hon. gentleman make with a wave of his hand if such an appeal were made in a court? He would say, it is not in this treaty. There is no use going further than that. My hon. learned friend stooped to an act that I thought quite unworthy of a statesman of his pretensions. He stooped to demagogism; he stooped to play the part of a demagogue about lowering the duties on sparkling wines, and, of course, his plea was intended to sound in the ears of men of toil. Without playing the roll of a demagogue, I want to show how the tables can be turned on him. He talked about reducing the price of the luxuries to the rich. I have shown already that instead of the rich paying less, they will pay more. And now, Sir, what is the answer to it all? If the exports from this country to France are increased in consequence of this treaty, in what will they be increased? Canned meats is one article, and are not the sons of toil interested in the manufacture of canned meats? If the manufacture of canned meats is increased, will not there be more sons of toil engaged in that industry? Does the same not apply to condensed milk, preserved fish, preserved apples, boots and shoes, wood pavement, extract of chestnut and other tan extracts?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Chestnuts.

Mr. DAVIN. What does the hon. gentleman say?

Mr. DALY. He said "chestnuts."

Mr. DAVIN. I will leave them entirely to my hon. friend (Mr. Mills). He has a monopoly in them. I ask, Mr. Speaker, are not the middle classes and the working classes interested in the increased exports of all these goods which this treaty will bring about? For every objection that has been brought against this treaty, there is a ready answer, and that makes out a strong case in its favour. The treaty may not be all that we desire, but I say that on the face of it, it is a step in the right direction. Remember that it is our first treaty, and unless there are some very strong reasons, very different reasons from the clap-trap and the mere quibbling and carping that we have heard, I say that this House ought not be asked to reject the first treaty, and to give the Government of England, and the statesmen of England the idea that when we again ask them to join with us in negotiations, that the first thing which would happen would be that when the treaty was brought before a volatile Parliament it would be rejected, and that Parliament would condemn the action of the High Commissioner of its Government, even though he should have acted side by side with one of the ablest diplomats and statesmen of his time, and one who had been Governor General of Canada, and knew the needs of the country and the spirit of our people. Amongst other things this treaty shows that we are at the threshold of greater events than Canada has yet seen. Those who have approached this treaty in the spirit of my hon. friends from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), and from Ontario (Mr. Edgar), and those who have poured what I would call little, petty streams of criticism upon it, are out of sympathy with the hour, and are not in full touch and rapport with the splendour and the breadth of view of that day which is drawing upon Canada.

Mr. OUMET. I hope the House will bear with me for a few moments while I address it on this subject, which I consider to be one of great importance. The main question that has been discussed at great length is this: are we in honour bound to ratify this treaty according to the request that is now made by the Government? I will not discuss that question, but I will suggest that perhaps the more business-like way of putting pretty nearly the same question is this: is it to our interest to honour the signature of our plenipotentiaries who have signed the treaty for us? I say that it is in our interest to do so. As has been said, we have been over twenty years trying to negotiate a treaty with France. The French nation has been the only nation that has been willing to negotiate with us, and I maintain that that is a compliment paid by that great nation to Canada. If we are going to refuse to confirm this treaty, signed by our representatives, I believe that we shall be fifty years more without having a like proposal from any other country. Let me ask: Is it our interest to ratify this treaty from a business standpoint? We must remember that the French nation in the matter of importations comes next to England. France imports foreign goods to the amount of nearly $900,000,000 a year, and of that enormous amount, it imports $288,000,000 of goods that are produced and exported by this country. When we talk of the little French treaty, and the few articles included in it, we must not lose sight of the fact that in 1891 France imported $38,000,000 worth of these very articles alone. Of these articles, we have ourselves exported $28,000,000 to Great Britain and elsewhere, while our direct trade with France hardly amounts to $500,000 a year. We are looking for markets, and here is a market of $38,000,000 worth in France, for the articles mentioned in that treaty. We have now an opportunity of exporting these goods to France on conditions which give us the preference over nearly every other country exporting to France.

Mr. LAURIER. That is not so.

Mr. OUIMET. How is it that it is not so?

Mr. LAURIER. The First Minister said a moment ago that there was no preference.

Mr. OUIMET. Is not the minimum tariff which we are to have a preference?

Mr. LAURIER. The Prime Minister said it could be extended to any other nation.

Mr. OUIMET. Why, Mr. Speaker, we have had speeches in this House hours and hours long to prove that if we only had a preference of 10 per cent or even 5 per cent in the English market, it would be the greatest boon that could come to this country. When we see by comparing the minimum tariff and the maximum tariff with France that we shall have a preference of between 33 and 50 per cent over other nations, are we going to be told that we are not going to increase our exports to France? France imports annually $38,000,000 worth of the very articles mentioned in this treaty, and in our competition for this trade we shall have a preference of from 33 to 50 per cent over other nations. Is this not beneficial to Canada? Now, I come to that argument that has been presented by the leader of the Opposition. He said that when lumber was admitted free to the French market we did not establish any commerce in that article with France, and that with this treaty, with a minimum tariff no better result can be obtained. France imposes high duties on the goods she has to import. She has not the lumber she wants; she must import it, and, ac-ording to the theory of the hon. gentleman, surely the French people pay the duties imposed upon it. Then, if we have to compete with Russia or Norway, or the United States in the supply of lumber in the French market, and we have only to pay 33 per cent against these other countries paying 50 per cent, are not our goods receiving a preference over the others? I already said that time and again it has been argued that if England were to impose only 5 per cent on all the goods coming from the other nations, this would be a preference for us that would give us possession of the English market to the extent of all the goods we could send there. If that argument is good for England, why should it not be good for France? As I have said, France is the second country of the world in the importation of goods from foreign countries, and when the French people offer us preferential terms, not to the full extent we wished for, but to the extent of the goods she imports, amounting to $30,000,000 a year, of which we could export to France $28,000,000, I say she is granting us a great preference. Now, take the British market: we export our lumber there, and pay no duty on it. Norway exports her lumber principally to France; she has the benefit of the minimum tariff. Do you think if Norway could only sell her lumber to France at the same price, after paying the duty, at which she could to England, that she would send it to France? It is because she finds a profit there that she sends her lumber to France instead of to England. It is not a question of sentiment; it is a question of business. And, Sir, there is another thing: trade invites trade; commerce invites commerce. When a ship leaves Halifax, or Quebec, or St. John for a French port, loaded with lumber or the products of the fisheries, we have plenty of other things, like wheat, meat, &c., which we could send to the French market on the same conditions as other countries. Everybody knows that France imports a very large quantity of breadstuffs.

Mr. LAURIER. That is not included in the treaty.

Mr. OUIMET. I do not pretend that. I only say that we shall stand on even terms with the other nations in the things we produce, and if we create a trade in the articles that we export to the amount of $28,000,000, surely the ships will find some advantage in completing their cargoes with wheat and other products that we sell in the English market in competition with the rest of the globe, and on the French market we shall be, after all, on equal terms with the other nations of the globe. We shall not sell our wheat at a less price than the other nations, and do you think that those nations who send their wheat to France, sell it at a less price than they do in the English market? Surely not; and why? Because their ships would just go to the next port—to Southampton, instead of to Bordeaux or Havre, or some other French port, if they could get better prices in England. So I say this treaty is only a beginning; it is only an overture, and if our tradesmen know how to utilize their opportunities they will do it in such a way as to bring about another treaty, which I expect will be much larger than the present one, and much more beneficial to both countries. Now, I come to another point. One of the reasons given by the hon. leader of the Opposition why we should not ratify this treaty is that we have not lived up to our bargain, and what does he propose? He proposes to repudiate the whole bargain. That is his argument. He says we are dishonouring ourselves—for what? For not voting a subsidy, when he argues that there is no advantage at all in having commercial arrangements with France. Why should we bind ourselves to vote a subsidy of $500,000 when he says himself that this treaty is of no importance at all? We shall bide our time; we shall follow the exigencies of trade. If it becomes necessary to the interests of this country to encourage a direct line to France, we shall do it, as we have done everything that has been understood to be of advantage to this country. We shall do it, not in consequence of an engagement, because there is no engagement, but for the interest of our own people and for the fostering of our commerce with France. As I have said already in this House, I am sorry to see that the hon. gentleman is belying the professions of those newspapers that are supporting him in the province of Quebec. Last year when he suggested that we were temporising, that we were delaying, what did the papers supporting him in the province of Quebec—'L'Electeur' and 'La Patrie'—say? I am not citing these things to raise any national feeling. I think that sentiment has more to do with this matter than business. The fact is that France is the only nation that until now has been willing to negotiate a treaty with us. And what is the motive of that willingness? France, no doubt, recollects with some degree of pride and pleasure that there is in Canada a population of one and a half million of her own blood, and I do not think I am wide of the mark in stating that were it not for this, France, in all probability, would not have been the first nation willing to negotiate a treaty with us, and would not have shown the patience she has. For twenty years treaties have been negotiated, and never brought to any conclusion with that country, and if this treaty has not been brought to a conclusion before this, it was not owing to any lack of willingness on the part of France to do her part. It is unfortunate that the prejudice should have taken root in the province of Quebec, but no doubt the feeling there exists that if this treaty was not ratified, it was simply because it was a treaty with France.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. OUMET. What does the hon. member for Bothwell know about it? He has not read what I have read, and I deny his right to insinuate that what I am saying is not true. What I say is based on articles that have been published to this very effect.

Mr. LAURIER. Why do you not read some articles of your own papers?

Mr. OUMET. Our newspapers have stated what I have just expressed. They have stated that the treaty is not as good a one as we might expect, but that, at all events, it is a beginning, and that we should respond to a nation which has been willing to negotiate a treaty with us, especially when hon. gentlemen opposite taunt us so often that under our National Policy we are in favour of restricting commerce with every other country. What we have done is exactly in harmony with the principles of the National Policy. We are prepared to trade with every country on more than equal terms, and I say that we are trading with France on even terms. After all, when they offer us a market of $38,000,000, what is the amount of wine we are going to import? The amount imported to-day, including the wines imported through other countries, is not over a million dollars worth. Some people are shocked because the duty is reduced on wines, but we must not forget that wine is a staple article of French export. What else could we get from France? France will not send us lumber or wool or breadstuffs, and when, fifteen years ago, if we offered to reduce the duties on wines, it was because that was the only product in connection with which we could invite France to trade with us, and could give France some advantage. The treaty we are now asked to ratify is the first one we have succeeded in negotiating in twenty years. It has been signed by our plenipotentiaries, and we must not forget that these plenipotentiaries, though accredited by Great Britain, were accredited by our own request, and were, to all intents and purposes, our representatives. Sir Charles Tupper is the man who actually negotiated and concluded the treaty, and the English ambassador was only there to do what Sir Charles Tupper requested, as representative of this Government. Sir Charles Tupper did not obtain all he demanded, but obtained what he could get, and I repeat that if we refuse to honour the signatures of our representatives at Paris, we may say farewell to all prospects of future negotiations with France or any other country. Certainly, that rejoices the hearts of hon. gentlemen opposite. They would rejoice if this country were to go to the dogs, if our commerce were destroyed, and our Government with it. By all means this House is in honour bound to ratify the signatures of our representatives, and in doing so we shall be acting in our best interests. This treaty will be the opening of a new trade, and lead to immense advantages not only with France, but with other countries. This treaty will be spoken of on the continent of Europe, and our neighbours, the Americans, will learn that if they will not trade with us, we can find other nations who will, and who will give us advantages which the great republic has always refused.

Mr. CHARLTON. At this late hour, I shall not detain the House any longer than a few minutes. I simply desire to present one or two considerations which I do not think have yet been touched upon. It is evident that the Government have approached the consideration of this question with some hesitation and some doubt as to the proper course they should follow. It is evident that it is only after considerable hesitation they arrived at the conclusion to ask Parliament to ratify this treaty. It is only natural that should be the case. It is natural that the treaty should have struck them as one not desirable in our interests, and that I believe in the real sentiment of the Minister of Finance and the First Minister. I want to point out to the Government that this treaty, should it prove unsatisfactory to Canada, as, in my opinion, it undoubtedly will, can only be terminated on notice given, not by us, but by the English Government. I want to point out to the Government the fact that certain circumstances exist that render it possible, if not probable, that England may be governed in her conduct in this matter in the future, not by our wishes or interests, but by considerations of greater importance to herself. We know to-day that there is friction between English interests and French interests in Egypt, that there is friction in the Soudan, that there is friction in the matter of the concession by the Belgian Government to Great Britain of a strip of the eastern portion of the Congo Free State to connect the English possessions in the north with the English possessions in the south of Africa. We know that relations exist between these two countries that are strained and delicate. Now, the time may arrive, and quite likely will arrive, when we want to terminate this treaty and ask the English Government to take the necessary steps. But circumstances may be such that England would decline to do it for the reason that she does not want imperial interests, of far greater importance than those involved in this little treaty with France, to be imperilled. That is a matter that has not been brought up—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I discussed that.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am glad the hon. gentleman has discussed that. If he has discussed that question, I am surprised that he stands before this House and asks for the ratification of a treaty which can only be undone in the manner I have referred to. There is another point that has not been alluded to. The provision for the importation of a wine at a reduced rate is one which will, probably, in reality apply to other countries besides France. France, since the phylloxera has worked such destruction of the vines, is not able, I believe, to furnish the wine required for home consumption even. France has not the supplies of wine to spare to this country, if this is true. She imports immense quantities of American cider and high wines and manufacture these into the wine of commerce which is exported to the United States and Canada. Under this arrangement France may admit the cheap wines of California, Cape Colony, Australia, Spain and Portugal and dump into this country, as of French origin, those wines which we refuse to admit. I do not propose to detain the House, but in closing I may say that the treaty is one that for other reasons I cannot support. It will tie our hands in any preferential trade arrangement we may seek to make with other British colonies, as the outcome of the conference which has just been held in this city; it will tie our hands in any negotiations for reciprocity in the United States if we get a Government in power that will be in favour of reciprocity, and will make the reasonable concessions necessary to secure it. It fixes definitely the amount of duty which we may exact, while France is free to raise her minimum duty to within a small fraction of her maximum duty, if she so desires. I shall support the amendment to the amendment, and, if that is defeated, I shall support the amendment; and I warn the Government that if this treaty is passed it may be a good deal more difficult to get it rescinded than it has been to get it ratified.

On main motion,

Mr. LAURIER. I move the following amendment :—

That all the words after the word "That" be struck out and the following inserted instead thereof :— “ the Treaty with France having been negotiated under the assurance given by the British Plenipotentiaries to the French Plenipotentiaries that the Canadian Government's policy was to establish a direct line of steamers between Canada and France, said assurance being especially contained in the letter of Lord Dufferin and Sir Charles Tupper to Mr. Develle, Minister of Foreign Affairs, the 6th of February, 1893, to wit :—

‘ We take this opportunity of confirming what we already made known to Your Excellency during the progress of the Conference, viz. : that the Canadian Parliament, desirous of favouring the development of commercial relations between the two countries, has voted a subvention of £100,000 for the purpose of establishing a line of steamers to run between a Canadian port on one side, and a French terminus port on the other.’

It was the duty of the Government before proposing the ratification of the Treaty, either to accept the statement of the said plenipotentiaries, or to notify the French Government that they would not be bound by the same.”

Mr. SPEAKER. Was the hon. member for East Hastings present, and did he hear the question put?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I heard the question put.

Mr. SPEAKER. Was the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe present, and did he hear the question put?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I have got it by heart.

Mr. SPEAKER. Did the hon. member hear the question put?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER. Did the hon. junior member for Hamilton hear the question put?

Mr. RYCKMAN. I did on the first division, and I heard the last part of it on the last division.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must have heard the question read from first to last in one or other of the languages, to entitle him to vote. Did the hon. member hear the question read from first to last?

Mr. RYCKMAN. No; I did not the last time.

Mr. SPEAKER. Strike his name from the list. Was the hon. member for Algoma present, and did he hear the question put?

Mr. MACDONELL. I heard the different amendments, and I heard the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. Did the hon. member hear the question put?

Mr. MACDONELL. No.

Mr. SPEAKER. Strike his name from the list.

Mr. McKAY. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), the hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Boston), and the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Lowell) were not present when the question was put.

Mr. SPEAKER. Was the hon. member for Kent (Ontario) present, and did he hear the question put?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I did not hear the question put.

Mr. SPEAKER. Strike his name from the list. Was the hon. member for South Middlesex present, and did he hear the question put?

Mr. BOSTON. I did not hear the question put.

Mr. SPEAKER. Strike his name from the list. Was the hon. member for Welland present, and did he hear the question put?

Mr. LOWELL. I did hear the question put.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 2.50 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 11th July, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 159) respecting the land subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.— (Mr. Daly.)

DOMINION LANDS.

Mr. DALY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 160) respecting Dominion Lands. He said: This is a Bill of three short clauses. It is to amend section twenty-three of the Dominion Lands Act, which is the section relating to school lands. It provides that in the event of any person proving that he squatted upon school lands prior to survey, and upon the land being surveyed and on his substantiating the fact of his residence, he will be permitted to homestead that section, and it is further provided that land shall be found elsewhere in substitution for the particular land on which he squatted. The reason is that in a great many instances hardships ensue to people who squatted on school lands prior to survey. This was the law prior to 1883. The next clause provides for the publishing of orders and regulations. The next provides for the sale or lease of public lands:

The Governor in Council may authorize the sale or lease of any lands vested in Her Majesty which are not required for public purposes, and for the sale or lease of which there is no other provision in the law.

The necessity of this is because we have not the power, in connection with Ordnance lands, of disposing of lands lying along the river front, and, therefore, require this legislation.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What was the total public debt of Canada on 30th June, 1894? What was the net public debt of Canada, 30th June, 1894?

Mr. FOSTER. The total gross debt of Canada on the 30th June, 1894, was $305,071,801.86. The net debt was $240,528,905.41.

FISHERY WARDEN ON COAST OF LABRADOR.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, 1. Is W. H. Whitely, of St. John's, Nfld., still in the employ of the Government as a fishery warden, den, on the coast of Labrador? 2. Have any complaints been made to the Department of Marine and Fisheries against the said Whitely as to his mode of granting and cancelling fishery leases and licenses? 3. Has the Government been informed that the said W. H. Whitely does not charge any license fee to Newfoundlanders, favours the same to the detriment of Canadians, and refuses fishery locations to Canadians in order to grant them to Newfoundlanders? 4. Will the Government inquire about this matter and take immediate action to remedy such a state of things?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. 1. W. H. Whitely, of Bonne Espérance, is fishery officer for the Bonne Espérance division, Labrador. 2. No complaints have been made to the Department of Marine and Fisheries as to Mr. Whitely's mode of granting and cancelling fishery leases or licenses. He has nothing to do with granting or cancelling them. 3. The Government has not been informed that W. H. Whitely does not charge any license fee to Newfoundlanders, and refuses fishery locations to Canadians in order to grant them to Newfoundlanders. 4. If any distinct and specific charge is made, an immediate inquiry will be held. I should like to add in justice to Mr. Whitely, who has been the object of several inquiries during the last two or three sessions, and all those inquiries have been answered satisfactorily, that Mr. Whitely, as I am informed by Commander Wakeham, who knows him very well indeed, has been there many years. He is the largest resident merchant on the coast, he has lived there for 40 years, and has been fishery officer for over 30 years, and is respected by every one on the coast. For the sake of educating his family, he was obliged to go to St. John's, Nfld., in winter with them, though some of the family remained at Bonne Espérance in the winter. At first he used to come to Quebec in winter, but this was a long, tedious journey in a schooner, and when the mail boat was put on fortnightly from St. John's, Nfld., to Labrador, it was much handier to go to St. John's. Mr. Whitely receives $100 from Canadian Government, but no allowance for travelling expenses. He is a justice of the peace and postmaster at Bonne Espérance. Owing to his means and influence, he is able to keep order among the fishermen at this out of the way place, in a way that no one else could.

BIRTH OF AN HEIR-APPARENT.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to say a word or two on a subject which may perhaps be of some interest to members of the House. I have not observed that the Government have moved the House to congratulate Her Majesty in any way on a certain recent interesting and auspicious event. Now, we are all aware that the Government of late have been very busy indeed. One section of the Government have been employed in celebrating what I may call the victory of the Lord High Commissioner over certain malapert Ministers who have been taught their places at long last. Another section have been equally busy in devising the 121st amendment or thereabouts to a tariff which seems specially designed to promote a united Empire, by making it as difficult as possible for Canadian consumers to use British manufactured goods; and yet a third section have been engaged in the most useful and sanitary operation of whitewashing themselves and their colleagues, somewhat after the fashion of the renowned W. M. Tweed, and it is to be hoped that the ultimate results will not greatly differ from those which attended the operations of that gentleman. But those gentlemen are now reasonably at leisure. They have eaten their leek, they have applied their whitewash, and they have put up every conceivable bolt and bar against the British goods.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. CHARLTON. I move the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And I think, if I may be permitted to continue my remarks, that they may now find time possibly, and I am sure in so doing they will meet the wishes of both sides of the House, to offer our congratulations to Her Majesty on an event, which, both as a sovereign and a woman, must have given very great pleasure to that illustrious lady. It may possibly be the case that the Premier can find no precedent for an address in a case of this sort. I believe myself that the circumstances are absolutely unprecedented in British history, and for that matter, so far as I know, in almost any other history. It is a most rare event that a reigning sovereign should have the pleasure of seeing no less than three direct heirs in descent to the throne in her own lifetime. I think, under the circumstances, it might be very well that Ministers should move the House to take some official notice of the event, as, if I am not misinformed, it has been done by one or two other colonial Legislatures in session; and if they do not see their way to do so, although it is of course reasonable that they should have the opportunity of taking the initiative, I dare say Her Majesty's loyal Opposition might be able to relieve them on this occasion.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. On the motion for the adjournment of the House, I congratulate the hon. gentleman, the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), on having begun to recollect, after many years of forgetfulness, that he is a British subject, and owes a duty to his sovereign and to the institutions of his country. The observations which the hon. gentleman has made introductory to the subject of a congratulatory address to Her Majesty, are like a great many observations which he addresses to the House, when he is in a particularly unpleasant mood, as he is after the long sitting last night and his unpleasant experience of this morning. No member of the Cabinet has been engaged in celebrating a victory of the High Commissioner over any of his colleagues, nor has any victory taken place. That is the first answer which I have to give to the hon. gentleman's question. In the next place, no amendment has been devised to the tariff, much less would there be a particle of truth in saying that we have devised the 121st amendment for the purpose of excluding British goods from this country. In the third place, instead of being engaged in whitewashing any of their colleagues, the members of the House who have been connected with the investigation to which the hon. gentleman's polite allusion is evidently made, have simply been engaged in seeing that justice is done, in their opinion, to a member of this House, instead of the blackwashing process which the hon. gentleman desires to see applied, not in the interest of justice, but in the interest of low party intrigue.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sure that the House will be sorry that the right hon. gentleman did not answer the remarks of my hon. friend in the same pleasant mood in which they were expressed. The hon. gentleman loses his temper, whereas my hon. friend was never so pleasant before, I think, as he is to-day. I therefore advise the hon. gentleman to resort to a similar method, which has unfortunately been somewhat rare with him. But without discussing now whether it was the High Commissioner who triumphed in that matter of the treaty, or whether it was some members of the Government, at all events the hon. gentleman will admit that in the performance of his many duties he has forgotten the most important event to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has forgotten to inform the House what his view is to-day as to the results of the work of the High Commissioner.

Mr. LAURIER. I may tell my hon. friend that I am not to be reconstructed. I am of the same mind all the time.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

THE TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 147) respecting a certain treaty between Her Britannic Majesty and the President of France.

Mr. LAURIER. I would like to ask the leader of the Government if it is the intention that we shall sit on Saturday?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think so.

Mr. LAURIER. I think that will meet with the approval of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. McCARTHY. Before this clause is carried, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether it is proposed to reduce the duties upon wines from the Australian colonies in an equal measure with the reduction of duties on French wines, which will follow the coming into force of this treaty? As I understand the effect of this treaty, it merely applies to wines of French origin, but it applies to those wines whether they are imported into Canada from France or from England, or any other country. We have had a conference sitting recently with a view to increasing intercolonial trade. If our first act after that conference is to reduce the duty on French wines to 25 per cent—for that is practically what it comes to—while leaving the wines imported from the sister colonies at 55 per cent, it is a very unfair discrimination. I would like to have the assurance of the Government that wines from Australia and the Cape—I do not know whether wine-growing is carried on so much there as in Australia—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, it is.

Mr. McCARTHY—will be put upon the same footing.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I have no hesitation in answering my hon. friend's question, perhaps a little more widely than he has asked it. In the first place, then, the treaty does not oblige us, as is apparent on the face of it, to give to France preferential treatment in our market. It simply obliges us to take off the ad valorem duty. We are at perfect liberty to take off the ad valorem duty upon wines coming from any other country. We are at perfect liberty to reduce the specific duties below the present rate, but, in that case, of course we should be obliged to give France equal treatment with the other foreign country or power. We are not, however, obliged to withhold from our sister colonies the same treatment or better treatment than we give to France in relation to her wines; nor is it the intention of the Government to withhold from the sister colonies at present equal treatment with respect to the same kind of wines as is given to French product.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does the hon. gentleman propose with respect to other wines—German, for instance, and Spanish?

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to the wines of countries which have most-favoured-nation treaties the clauses of which bind us, then wine of the same quality would come in under the same conditions as French wines. With reference to other foreign countries, that may be a matter for consideration as to what is best to be done. The points I have answered take in all except the nations that have no favoured-nation treaty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Germany has a favoured-nation clause, and Spain also.

Mr. FOSTER. No; not Spain.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It had at one time.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If French wines are admitted at this reduction; if German wines are admitted, if Australian and Cape wines are admitted on the same terms—and I presume United States wines, if any such come in—how will United States wines be treated?

Mr. FOSTER. They need not be treated in the same way.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, no. What I want to know is what the Government proposes to do. This is the proper time to have an explanation of the policy of the Government with respect to these countries.

Mr. FOSTER. The Government does not intend to discriminate for the present against any country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It would follow that all wines of this description, practically speaking, will come in at this reduced rate of duty. From the calculations given by the Finance Minister, as far as I can understand them, he had only considered the loss on the wines which were imported from France. I do not think he took account of the others.

Mr. FOSTER. Two calculations were made; first, as regard the French imports, and next as regards all imports of a similar nature from other countries.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As regards French wines, the amount given by the hon. gentleman as representing our loss was $82,000. As far as I can judge from our Trade and Navigation Returns, a considerable amount will have to be added to represent the loss on imports from other countries. The hon. gentleman might state what that amount is in addition to the loss on the French wines. I should presume it would come to $40,000 or $50,000.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will look at the statements made in the blue-book, he will see that calculations and tables were brought down for the years 1891 and 1892. However, it is not much trouble to give the results again. Of course, the calculation covered not only the loss on the wines, but also that on other articles as well. On the importation of 1891, the reduction on wines, not sparkling, and containing not over 20 degrees of proof spirit, will be $23,840—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think there must be an error there.

Mr. McCARTHY. It appears on page 20. The total on champagne and other sparkling wines is given at $46,000. I would draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance to the statement for the year 1892. There is plainly a mistake. It is put at $58,000 for that year, as against $82,000 for 1891. The hon. gentleman will see that the loss on sparkling wines is given at $23,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I will read the figures for 1892. According to the importations of 1892, the loss on the non-sparkling wines would be $30,499, and on champagne and other sparkling wines, $41,695. On the importations of 1893, the loss would be, on the first class, non-sparkling wines, $30,234, and on champagne and other sparkling wines, $41,313; total, $71,547. Then, with regard to countries other than France, 1891 and 1892 are given in the blue-book. I will give the figures for 1893. On wines imported from other countries than France the reduction would involve $76,568 on the non-sparkling wines, and $8,722 on the sparkling wines. So the total loss would be about $150,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is somewhat in excess from the hon. gentleman's former estimate.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if this would include the wines made in Hamburg, an inferior class of sherry? If it does, the treaty will have a most disastrous effect upon this country. In spite of what my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) said last evening, I have not the slightest objection to the introduction of French wines on any ground of their affecting the welfare of the people. But I should object to a treaty which would have the effect of bringing in the very low and injurious class of wines which are manufactured in Hamburg and some other German ports, which are not wines at all and the introduction of which into this country would be most injurious in every respect.

Mr. EDGAR. I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that the treaty uses the expression "wines other than sparkling wines." I suppose we can interpret that by our own tariff Act. Item 8 of the Tariff Bill which is before us puts in one item:

Wines of all kinds, except sparkling wines, including orange, lemon, strawberry, raspberry, elder and currant wines containing twenty-six per cent or less of spirit of the strength of proof.

That is the definition of our tariff as regards wines. The treaty does not say wines made from the juice of the grape alone, and I take it that we would surely be bound to give effect to that treaty in the spirit of our own tariff enactment. I would ask the Finance Minister another question. I understood him to say that by this treaty we do not discriminate in favour of France in the matter of wines. Is that what the hon. Minister said?

Mr. FOSTER. No. My hon. friend, with that unfortunate facility for hearing just a part, and the part which suits himself, sometimes, has not got all the view I conveyed. I said there was nothing in the treaty to bind us to discriminate in favour of France.

Mr. EDGAR. I should say so, too. But while there is nothing to have that effect in the treaty itself, yet there is something in the Tariff Bill before the House which, read with the treaty, does discriminate in favour of France against every other country in the world as regards wine. The treaty says that France shall be relieved of the 30 per cent ad valorem duty on certain classes of wine. Under the tariff Bill, the Government may do so by proclamation under Order in Council. Under the Customs Act, which the Government is passing through the House now, wines of two kinds included in the French treaty, that is to say, under items eight and nine, are as against the whole world, without any exception whatever, under the terms of this Act, to be subject to the old specific duties and 30 per cent ad valorem in addition. Wines coming in from Great Britain even, unless this tariff is altered before this session closes, must pay the duty from which French wines are exempted. Wines coming in from the United States, from the Cape of Good Hope and Australia under the terms of this Act are not exempted, and we have no treaty exempting them, and unless legislation is passed by the Government this session, this treaty will absolutely discriminate, as regards wines, in favour of France, and against the whole world, Great Britain included.

Mr. SCRIVER. I think I am justified in stating that the statement of the Finance Minister in reply to the question put to him by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), rendering it probable, to say the least, that the same privileges which have been conceded to France in this treaty will, at no very distant date, be conceded to the colonies generally, and perhaps to other countries, will justify the attitude of the temperance people towards this treaty, rendering it probable, if not certain, that intoxicants will be cheapened and increased in quantity ; and this fact, I am free to say, will increase and intensify the feeling of the temperance people of the country generally against this treaty.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I remind the Finance Minister that he has not yet answered my question in regard to sherries. Will they come in under this treaty at a reduced rate of duty ? It is very important that this question should be answered, because if that class of wines is admitted under the treaty, then the mischief will be increased tenfold as it applies to French wines.

Mr. CHARLTON. I appear to have misunderstood the Finance Minister, and I am confident other hon. members have also misunderstood him. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) asked the Finance Minister whether the wines of Germany would be admitted on the same basis as those of France, and he answered : "Yes, under the provisions of treaty." He next asked whether, in that event, the wines of Spain would also be admitted, and he said no ; and in the course of the questioning I understood the Finance Minister to say that the wines of the United States would be admitted upon the same terms as the wines of France, and after a moment's conversation with the leader of the Government, the Finance Minister informed the House that no discrimination would be made against any colony in the matter of wines. If that is the case, we will have the wines of all countries admitted on the same terms as the wines of France, and we have the statement of the Finance Minister that the wines of Australia, Cape Colony, Germany, and the United States will be admitted on the same terms. Hon. members want to know definitely to what extent this provision lowering the duties on sparkling wines and other wines will go. Will it include other countries than France ? Will it include the United States, Italy, Spain, and Portugal ? What countries will be excluded, and what countries will be included ? The temperance sentiment want to know the facts. If all importations of wine are to be reduced in price, then the general dissatisfaction with the treaty will be very much intensified among the temperance people. Their objection to the treaty was based on the assumption that it only affected the wines of France and, of course, it would be increased if the statement of the Finance Minister be correct, that this reduction is to apply to all countries, or even to many countries. What we want to know is, what countries are to be exempted from the operation of the duties on wine ?

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend if he had listened to what I stated, would have had the information already, but I will try and make the matter clear to him. He seems to have the idea that I had involved myself in confusion in regard to this point, but it was probably owing to the fact that we were speaking on different questions. The question, as it seems to me, stands exactly thus : By this article of the treaty we bind ourselves simply to let in French wines of a certain grade at a certain rate. We do not bind ourselves by the treaty to discriminate in favour of France with respect to those classes of wine. If we allow French wines of those classes to come in at that rate, we are obliged by virtue of certain treaties to allow like wines of certain other countries to come in at the same time and on the same terms.

Mr. CHARLTON. What countries ?

Mr. FOSTER. Belgium and Germany. The question was asked, whether Spain had not the benefit of the most-favoured-nation clause. My answer was that she had not at the present time, and the consequence was that her wines would have no right to come in under the most-favoured-nation clause. The next branch of the subject was in regard to colonial wines, and I said we were not disposed to treat the colonies on any less favourable basis than is given by the treaty to French wines ; and I went further, and said that by the treaty we were not precluded from treating the wines of like standard received either from the colonies or from Great Britain on a less favoured basis than that we extend to the wines of France, and, further, I stated that at present we were not disposed to make any discrimination against any country sending wines here. Of course, that is a matter of grace. These other countries have not the claims of kinship that our colonial friends have, but for the present we do not propose to begin the discrimination, and it may be that in the course of a little time we may get from some of these countries reciprocal benefits for the favourable treatment that we offer them in this respect. I think that states the whole position. My hon. friend inquired as to a certain class of wine. I cannot answer him categorically, because I do not know the class of wine of which he speaks ; but the general answer is : that wines to come in from the Zollverein under advantageous treatment must be wines of a character and grade similar to the French wines which are allowed in, and if they be of that similar character and grade they would come in at the same rate of duty.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I wish to ask the Minister of Finance whether he intends to make any concession to the wine-growers of Canada in the way of lowering, or removing the duty on alcohol used for the purpose of the fortification of their wines. Our wines now come in competition with these French wines, and I think it would be incumbent on the Government to state now, whether they intend to grant any compensative legislation to our wine-growers in this direction.

Mr. FOSTER. The only answer I can make to that question to-day is: that the Government are considering the proposition that was made by the Canadian wine-growers with the view of removing any disability that they actually may be under as compared with their now French competitors.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). But both the American wine-growers and the French wine-growers have the advantage of free alcohol for the fortification of their liquors, and I say that it is only justice to the Canadian wine producers that they should enjoy the same advantage.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yesterday, in discussing this question, the First Minister stated that the deputations which had waited upon the Government in the interest of the Canadian wine-growers had urged that some of the ingredients—alcohol, I presume—should be placed in a more advantageous position with regard to the excise imposed upon them. I think it is right that we should now know how far the Government intend to comply with that request. We are considering a treaty that very seriously affects our Canadian wine-growers, and I believe that they should now have some intimation from the Government as to what they intend to do.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is impossible that we could state to-day what the policy is to be on that question. If the hon. gentleman will look at the petition of the wine-growers, he will see that it contains a series of statements, supplemented by the explanations that they gave to myself when they waited upon me, as to the condition of their business under the French treaty. It will require us, first of all, to know whether Parliament will ratify the treaty or not, and then we have to take up and consider the various statements made by the wine-growers with regard to the extent to which French wines will compete with their industry, and with regard to the reasonableness of the request they make as to the material for the fortification of their wines. These statements, while they have been received by us with all respect, require to be investigated, so that we may vouch for them to the House, before pronouncing on a policy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That might be all well enough if this matter were brought up for the first time. But remembering that the treaty has been under consideration for eighteen months, the House had a right to expect that the Government would be fully conversant with all these details. It was not when these people first appeared before the hon. gentleman, that he knew that their industry was likely to be interfered with by the importation of French wines. The thing was stated to my knowledge in the public press as long as fourteen or fifteen months ago. I would like to inquire of the Finance Minister, as I suppose his officers have advised him about it: what quantity of alcohol or brandy, or whatever they use for fortifying their wines, is annually consumed by our own wine-growers?

Mr. FOSTER. The Controller of Inland Revenue has that information. I may say in reference to the question which has just been discussed: that the Department of Inland Revenue has been looking into that matter very carefully.

Mr. EDGAR. As I understand it, the Finance Minister has stated to the House, that upon this treaty coming into force, similar wines and other goods of Germany and Belgium will have to come into Canada on similar terms. I understand that to be a necessity under the treaties which Great Britain has made with Germany and with Belgium, which included Canada in the most-favoured-nation treatment clauses; treaties which we are trying to get denounced so far as Canada is concerned. That being so, I want to know from the Finance Minister: whether he would not require legislation, under our tariff, to meet that; whether the treaty between Great Britain and Germany, for instance, will, ipso facto, be authority for our customs-houses to allow in the wines of Germany at the same reduced rates as they will have to allow them in from France, when this treaty is completely brought into force. I hope I have made myself clear to the Minister, and I hope he will not think I am unduly pressing him.

Mr. FOSTER. I like to be pressed.

Mr. EDGAR. What I want to know is: whether, in his view, legislation will be necessary. In his tariff Bill he has not so far made provision for that.

Mr. FOSTER. First of all, I may say, with reference to the Tariff Bill, that it is not completed yet.

Mr. EDGAR. I quite admit that.

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to the claim of these countries, which have most-favoured-nation treaty arrangements, I do not think it will be necessary that a clause in the tariff should state that wine from these countries should come in at that rate. I think they could claim that under their treaty, that if they paid a higher duty, they should have the benefit given them by their treaty. I want to say again, that the Tariff Bill has yet to be read, and that there is time to do anything that is necessary, and wherever—as has always been our rule—it can be amended for the good of the country, it will be so amended.

Mr. EDGAR. As I understand it, and I hope my hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) and the temperance people will understand it also: the bringing of this treaty into force with regard to France, will automatically allow Germany and Belgium to send in their similar wines at the same reduced rate.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If that is the position taken by the Government, I think it is an erroneous position. I have no doubt whatever that wines properly so-called, brought from Belgium and Germany, under the most-favoured-nation clause of the treaty with Great Britain, would be entitled to come in here under the same treatment if we grant that the English contention of Spain is of universal application. But I do not think it follows that every artificial ingredient designated wine, could be claimed to be brought in under the treaty, and I think it would be a very mistaken view, if the Government or Parliament were to permit such a notion to go abroad, because a declaration of that sort might be used against us if it were found necessary to undertake to exclude these wines. The hon. member for Muskoka has spoken of artificial preparations called wines.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am speaking of what is properly called a wine, because it contains more or less of the juice of the grape; but it is known to be an adulterated and a very deleterious article.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me that this Parliament, without any violation of the treaty into which Great Britain has entered, has a right to legislate to exclude articles of that sort on the ground that they are preparations, the use of which is exceedingly injurious to the health of the people. I think there ought to be no doubt or mistake with regard to that. But I understood the hon. Finance Minister to state yesterday that the High Commissioner had informed France that Canada had not a maximum or a minimum tariff; that whatever tariff we adopted in this respect with regard to the wines imported from France would be adopted in regard to wines imported from every other country; that there was no intention to have two rates of duty upon imported wines. If the Minister hesitates about adhering to the rule he declared yesterday, I think now is the time we should know it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think we had also better have here the Controller of Inland Revenue, who, according to the hon. gentleman, has been specially charged with looking into these matters, and who possesses information which the Finance Minister does not. Has the hon. gentleman sent for him? Because I think we should have the benefit of the information he can give us on this point.

Mr. McNEILL. I think it would be very difficult to draw the line which would distinguish wines such as have been referred to by my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr.

Mr. EDGAR.

O'Brien) from other wines, which may not be exactly of the same grade. There is no doubt that it is usual to fortify wines in France, in Germany, and I suppose to a certain extent in this country also. How much they may be fortified, or to what extent foreign ingredients may be introduced into them, is merely a matter of detail and of degree, and I think it would be exceedingly difficult to lay down such a rule as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has referred to, unless some such course is pursued as I believe is pursued in France, where that only is described as wine which contains only the juice of the grape. In Canada, I believe, there is not any wine, or scarcely any wine, manufactured without the addition of sugar. In France that is not the case. There some wine is manufactured without the addition of anything to the juice of the grape, and that, I believe, is alone described as wine. I very much fear, from the discussion which we have had to-day, that the result of the admission of all these foreign wines to which reference has been made, will be that our Canadian wines will become very much deteriorated, will become very much more alcoholized by the artificial addition of alcohol, than was formerly the case. It would seem, from the question that has been put more than once by my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean), who is so much interested in this matter, that already a considerable amount of alcohol is employed by our wine makers in Canada, and there can be no doubt that the addition of alcohol to wine is deleterious. There is no doubt that such wine is not likely to be so wholesome a beverage as it would be if the alcohol were created by the addition of sugar to the juice of the grape. The result of all this would seem to be that we shall have a great deal more alcohol of a deleterious kind consumed in this country than we would have had, had there not been the introduction of these different varieties of foreign wines. That is a result, I think, very much to be deplored.

Mr. SCRIVER. I must say I was a little surprised at the appeal made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) to free from duty the spirit or alcohol which our wine-makers use in fortifying, as he calls it, the wines which they make. After listening to his eloquent speech last night, advocating the more general use of cheap and pure wines, and his condemnation of what he called the intemperate use of that beverage, which is said to cheer and not inebriate, and by the intemperate use of which he claimed that a certain number of the females of this country were made fit to become inmates of a lunatic asylum, I was surprised to hear him appeal to the Government to take off the duty from a spirit which the wine-makers have said in their petition must cost no more than $1 a gallon. If it costs more than that, they cannot fortify their wines so as to make them compete successfully with the foreign wines. I have never used these wines myself, but it seems to me that any wine which is fortified by the use of a spirit which costs only $1 a gallon is not a fit beverage for sane people.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think the statement we have had from the Finance Minister is one of very grave import, and, although I suppose it is not necessary to be followed by legislation, still it is well that we should consider it now, as it has been made to us. In the first place, it appears to me that the French Government may well complain if this reduction in duty is to be made general. What advantage are the French people to have from their treaty if we are to reduce our tariff all round on wines of the kinds mentioned in the treaty? Of course, I quite understand, as I find in the correspondence, that it was distinctly stated by the High Commissioner, that we would not bind ourselves to discriminate in their favour; but I think that when this treaty was signed, it was signed on the understanding that French wines would have an advantage in our market over the wines of other countries.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. McCARTHY. If the hon. gentleman will wait a moment, he will see what I mean. What this article stipulates for is "wines, sparkling and non-sparkling, of French origin." I can perfectly understand, and I so understood from the first, that we would apply that to all countries—that no matter where French wines came from, they would be subject to that provision, and in that sense we would not discriminate. But what the hon. gentleman says now is that we are to admit United States sparkling wines, for example: what we will do will be to admit all sparkling wines and all non-sparkling wines of the degree of alcohol, specified here, from all countries. That, of course, we are not called upon by the treaty to do, and for my part I am not prepared to go any further than we have gone. It appears to me that having gone the length of admitting French wines of that description, while it is fair and right that we should extend the same privilege to wines of a similar character coming from our own colonies, it is a vastly different thing to apply the provisions of the treaty, not in its language, but in its essence, as it were, to the United States and other countries, which give us no advantages.

Mr. EDGAR. It applies to Germany now.

Mr. McCARTHY. I was going to come to that. I was dealing with those countries not included in the favoured-nation clause. With regard to the favoured-nation clause, how does that apply? Under it, whatever benefits we give to France we are bound to give to the countries embraced in that clause. That is to say, we are bound to give to these countries the admission into Canada, at the reduced tariff, of wines of French origin which they may export. The treaty does not include all sparkling or non-sparkling wines. It specially states "all sparkling or non-sparkling wines of French origin," and therefore I submit that we would not be bound to extend to other countries anything beyond the very language of this treaty, and the French plenipotentiaries guarded themselves very carefully in the language they used. The treaty does not read "all sparkling and non-sparkling wines entering Canada," but "wines sparkling and non-sparkling of French origin." If that is not the meaning of it, what is?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is the meaning of it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then we are going beyond what we are compelled to do, even in the case of those countries which enjoy the favoured-nation treatment, and certainly, in the case of those who do not enjoy that treatment, we are reducing the duty on wine and lessening our revenue to an extent beyond what we supposed when considering the question last night. I think this is a very favourable opportunity for us to extend the same privilege to our sister colonies, and carry out the idea which prompted our calling delegates together from all parts of the colonies at the meeting which has just been brought to a close. I think this would be a favourable opportunity to do that, but if that advantage has to be extended, not merely to the sister colonies, but also to Italy and Portugal, and all the rest of the world, I do not see that there is very much to be gained by it.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). In reply to the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Sriver), I wish to say that all wines contains more or less alcohol. The wines of this country contain as little alcohol as those of any other; but when they are moved, they have to be fortified, and all I claim is that our own wine-producers should not be at a disadvantage as compared with the foreign producers. Our wine-growers say in their petition to the Government:

Owing to the exorbitant price spirits are sold at in Canada, they cannot be used but at a loss, to make sweet wines, or to fortify weak wines from vintages produced during unfavourable seasons when grapes do not attain their full maturity, or otherwise are wanting in saccharine elements or contain an excess of acids.

The wine manufacturers of France and also those of California, and other parts of the United States, can with certain government restrictions distill from their grape must, pomace or wines, and in these countries wine-makers can buy from the distillers, without having to pay an excise duty, the high wines or cologne spirits they need to make sweet wines or fortify weak ones, which process is called "vinage des vins."

The privilege of distilling spoilt wines or grape must, is practically denied us, and we are annually losing thousands of dollars, which might be saved, had we the advantage of the French or California wine-makers.

Without entering into the merits of the discussion as to whether people ought or ought not to drink wine, I simply say that the Canadian wine manufacturer ought not to be under a disadvantage, but should enjoy all the advantages which the foreign growers possess.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. With regard to the question of the most-favoured-nation treatment, I think we ought to keep ourselves, as regards this discussion, free altogether from any complication which would arise through our adopting any particular interpretation of that clause. There is the view put forward by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills): that we are not obliged to give to those countries having the most-favoured-nation clauses, the benefit of treaties which we purchase by tariff concessions from other countries, unless we get tariff concessions from them also. Then there is the view put forward by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). We are not, however, dealing with that subject now, but with the subject contained in the treaty, and before we are called upon to give effect to any interpretation with regard to the most-favoured-nation clause in treaties with other countries, we shall have to consult this House and Parliament, and in the meantime there can be no change in the duties made. I do not quite understand the view taken by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), that that clause works automatically, and that perforce if we give concessions to France with regard to their wines, we must—even without legislation—give the same treatment to Germany.

Mr. EDGAR. I only made that statement after getting it from the hon. gentleman's colleague, who said that legislation, in his judgment, was not necessary to bring into force the clauses of treaties of Great Britain with Germany and Belgium, in reference to these products, and that after this treaty came into force, the custom-house officers would be justified, under it, without any legislation, in reducing the duties on wines. That is why I said it would be automatic.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not so understand the hon. gentleman, and did not catch that remark, but that view would require reconsideration. The tariff law of the country is supreme, and no treaty can be given effect to by the customs officers of this country without the authority of Parliament. Of course, such a clause is automatic in the United States, simply because once a treaty is ratified by the Senate it is the law of the land, and becomes the customs law of the land if it deals with customs. In this country the case is different. Our tariff law will remain in force until changed by Parliament, when the whole subject of our relations with the most-favoured nations, and likewise other wine-producing countries, will be considered. We do stand by this policy, and it is in accord with the promise given to Great Britain, and the expectations held out to the other colonies: we will give these concessions both to Great Britain and the other colonies, and we regard that point as settled. The other points are simply foreshadowed to-day, and Parliament will be consulted before any action is taken.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the proclamation bringing the treaty into force be issued before the next meeting of Parliament?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We may be bound to do it soon.

Mr. McCARTHY. How will the customs law be affected? The hon. gentleman said very properly that we must alter our customs law before we can give effect to the treaty. If we do not alter in advance the customs law this session, it would be better the proclamation should not be issued before next session.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would not like to say we would not put it in force until the next meeting of Parliament. But the interval will be a very short one, if there should be an interval at all. The ratification must be made by the French Chamber, and they have not taken up the subject. My information was they would close on the 14th July, and Parliament will be sitting, we hope, within six months from this.

Mr. WELDON. As this Bill ratifies the treaty, I would like to have our minds made clear on the point raised by the hon. member for Simcoe. He gave a very technical interpretation to the treaty, when he says that under the most-favoured-nation clause we are only bound to admit wines of French origin from the countries enjoying that clause. Surely that is too narrow and technical a reading. Surely the German people would complain that it was a breach of faith—that we were only technically keeping the clause, and practically breaking it. We bind ourselves to France to admit French wines, and the hon. gentleman says we are only bound to Germany to admit from that country what we admit from France, namely, French wines. That is very technical. We must treat Germany in the matter of wines as we treat France. Under the 5th clause of the Zollverein, there is little doubt. That clause reads:

Any favour or privilege or reduction in the tariff of duties, either on imports or exports, which either of the two parties may concede to any other power shall be extended immediately and unconditionally to the other. Therefore any promise we make to France must unconditionally be kept with Germany.

On schedule A,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the total amount we exported to France of these articles last year?

Mr. FOSTER. Timber, rough or sawn, $105,196; canned meats, $1,326; lobsters, $124,801; apples, dried, $1,400; leather, sole and upper, $803; total, $233,526.

Mr. CHARLTON. Are these all the articles exported?

Mr. FOSTER. These are all the articles that appear in our Trade and Navigation Returns to have been exported. When we seek to find from the French import tables what our exports are, we find it impossible to do so owing to their different tabulation. To get at that the figures would have to be got from all the different ports of entry in France.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. gentleman tell us the sum total imported into France from all countries of all these various articles, according to their books?

Mr. FOSTER. In round numbers, France imports of products included in the list of minimum duties given to Canada to the amount of about thirty-eight or forty millions.

Mr. CHARLTON. Francs or dollars?

Mr. FOSTER. Dollars.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is of the entire list of articles in the treaty?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Have you at hand the figures showing how much of that was in wood?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not those figures at hand at the moment.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Going back to section 3, I observe that the stipulation is respecting "articles of Canadian origin imported direct from that country accompanied by certificate of origin." These certificates, I presume, would have to be granted by the French consular agent?

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose so. That would be considered by them an official certificate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You have not made provisions for granting them through our customs.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

On schedule B,

Mr. FOSTER. Those words, "common soap" must come out. The article which is admitted from France is not common soap, but it is the castile soap. If you look at the reading you will see that it is savon de Marseilles, and it is really the definition of common soap, or savon commun. Savon de Marseilles is the term for castile soap. It is only castile soap that the negotiations related to, and that we are to admit, so that in this schedule we do not need to keep the article of common soap 1½ cents per pound.

Five cents should be made 2 cents, that is the real duty on castile soap.

Bill reported.

FAST ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

House resolved itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may enter into a contract for a term not exceeding ten years with any individual or company, for the performance of a fast weekly steamship service between Canada and the United Kingdom, making connection with a French port, on such terms and conditions as to the carriage of mails and otherwise as the Governor in Council seems expedient, for a subsidy not exceeding the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAURIER. We have had no explanation at all, so far, from the Government. We expect some explanations.

Mr. FOSTER. This question occupies a similar position, but in a greater degree, before the House that the French treaty did when it came up yesterday for consideration, in this respect, that it is not new to the House. The matter of the improvement of an Atlantic service is one of many years' discussion and consideration in this House, and I imagine nearly all the members who are present are quite as well acquainted with the different steps that have been taken, as I am myself. Some three or four years ago when a resolution was introduced and a Bill passed authorizing the Government to pay a subsidy of $500,000 for a fast Atlantic service, I remember the discussion upon it was pretty thorough, and full explanations were given as to the policy, the aims and design of the Government the quality of the service that it was thought desirable to get; and the steps which had up to that time been taken were laid before the House. Since that time, on two or three occasions, a debate has arisen with reference to the advertisements that were published, the tenders that were received, and the provisional arrangements that were entered into by the Government with certain parties for the purpose of establishing this line. Therefore, it will not be necessary to repeat what history is involved in the statements that have been made so fully before the House, and that are easily referred to in pages of the 'Hansard.' There is, however, I suppose, an additional explanation required now when the Government asks for an additional subsidy. This involves an addition to the present authorized amount of $250,000 a year, and some explanation is certainly due as to why the Government has been moved to ask for this additional vote. To put it shortly, I may say the reason is this: The whole policy of the desirability of a fast Atlantic service has been affirmed by this House, and is believed in by the majority, and the Government has the views of the majority in that respect. Granted, then, that a fast Atlantic service is desirable, that we all wish to attain it, and that we want one of the type and character of that which has been laid before this House, that is, one as good as our neighbours have. Now, we have found it practically impossible to get that service for a subsidy of $500,000 a year, and holding the same view as to the necessity for the service, the Government has come to the conclusion that if $500,000 will not bring it, they are prepared, as an ultimate and outside limit, to go to the amount of $750,000 per year for ten years, in order to secure that service. Now, a division of opinion may arise as to whether the Government and the country are justified in going beyond half a million in order to secure the advantage of a fast Atlantic service. The Government have considered the question very thoroughly, I think, and they have come to the conclusion that the desirability is so great, and the advantages which would accrue are so great, that the country would be justified in extending the amount heretofore agreed upon to $750,000. And for the very same reason that the desirability of a fast Atlantic service was urged when it was put before the House in previous years.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has referred to advantages; what are the advantages?

Mr. FOSTER. I shall come to that point directly. I wish to say just here a few words with respect to the efforts made by the Government. I am not going to detail in an exact description all that has taken place; suffice it to say this: We have, on two occasions entered into provisional arrangements, which we contemplated, in the first instance, would result in our obtaining a service for $500,000. That was the provisional arrangement, if I recollect aright, entered into with Anderson & Company. That, however, as the House well knows, and as the country knows, was not carried out. The promoter found it impossible to carry out the establishment of the line under the conditions which were imposed. That went by the board. Negotiations then arose with several companies, with the Allan line, with several English lines, with a French line, with a large company known as the Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, with a Belgian company as well, and the result of all those negotiations has simply been this, that the demands have run up from responsible parties from $750,000 to $1,250,000 as a subsidy required to carry on a fast mail Atlantic service under the conditions which were imposed. In all these negotiations a practical conclusion was reached in one alone. That was as regards the negotiations with Mr. Bryce Douglas, since deceased, who represented a very able company in Great Britain, in which Lord Hartington had a very large interest, and with Mr. Douglas we did make a provisional arrangement offering for the service we required, $750,000 per annum for ten years. That, I think, would have been carried out, we believe it would have been carried out, except for two causes: one, the unfortunate death of Mr. Bryce Douglas, the chief promoter; and the other, the crash which occurred in the financial market about the time when the scheme was being floated, which made it practically impossible to float such a large scheme for such a purpose. All of these negotiations have brought the Government to the conclusion that with a less subsidy than $750,000 per year, it is impossible for them to accomplish the object they have in view. They, therefore, present this proposition to the House, and ask for authorization on these terms and to this extent. With respect to the Atlantic service, I may say that other services are conjoined with it, and the House would scarcely have the idea it should have before it in the discussion of this subject, if it confined itself entirely to a fast Atlantic service. Within the last few days—and I think it is not unfitting that I should refer to it—there has been sitting in Ottawa a notable conference, notable certainly as regards the countries themselves, the extent of them, the population of them, the resources of them, and their geographical disposition, and notable also with respect to the character and calibre of at least some of the men who sat in the conference. That conference was an outgrowth, it was a successor, although it was not on the pure and direct lineal line, but it was practically a successor of the conference held in London in 1877. This, however, was entirely a colonial conference, and the basic idea of the conference, of the work of the conference, and the results of its labours was this, the building up of a unity of sentiment, of thought, of commerce, and of feeling between the different parts of the Empire. The two great forces which are relied upon to build that up are those of communication by cable, and steam communication, the one bringing together, by securing almost the entire annihilation of space, communication between these different populations and countries, binding them in unison with each other and with the Empire; and the other, securing steamship communication and thus promoting the interchange of trade and commerce between these different countries. These two ideas were the chief ideas which underlay the conference, and which actuated and which resulted in the work of the conference. Some attempt has been made, and successfully, to partially carry out that idea. A year or two ago, or rather three or four years ago, the Government of Canada obtained the assent of Parliament, and the authorization was willingly given, to spend a certain amount of money on a service between Australasia and Canada, and last year we were successful in obtaining the hearty sympathy of all the Australasian colonies, and the actual and practical co-operation of one of the largest of the colonies, New South Wales, which contributed a joint subsidy with Canada towards establishing that portion of the line of through communication between Australia and Canada. The Huddart line of steamers runs with regularity—it is a good line and most excellent in all its appointments—and it makes regular and speedy trips between Australasia and Canada, with a constant accretion and accumulation of freight, carried both ways, and what is equally gratifying, a constant and large increase of passenger travel across our continent, going to the old country, largely. There is a practical step taken in the direction of realizing those ideas of which I have spoken. But there was another and more stupendous step than that taken before this great idea of intercolonial and Imperial communication had taken hold of us, and we had, by large efforts on our own part, and great enterprise on the part of the capitalists, built a line of steam communication from the Pacific to the Atlantic. So we have now taken two steps towards completing that communication, one thoroughly completed, and the one other well and successfully begun. So to-day the line of communication is open between the Australasian continent and the Atlantic seaboard. Now, we feel it to be necessary to carry out this idea—and that is the idea I should like the House to remember in the discussion this afternoon, to establish a fast Atlantic service from our eastern shores to Great Britain and the continent, working in unison with the Pacific service, and thus open up and complete one of the most important and magnificent through lines of communication to be found anywhere in the world. And we are prepared as a Government, and we ask Parliament to look upon this measure with that idea present in their minds, and we ask them to be prepared to make a large sacrifice in order to complete that line of communication from sympathy with the ideas that I have mentioned, and from exact and definite advantages which we believe will accrue to ourselves from the establishment of this as well as the other line of communication. So much for the idea. That idea is not simply entertained warmly by Canada, but I may say that in the conference which has just ended, it has had the entire sympathy, and the promise of the practical co-operation of all our Australasian co-colonists. They have approved of the idea and have joined with Canada in the furthering of the accomplishment of that idea.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. CHARLTON. To the extent of assisting with a subsidy?

Mr. FOSTER. To the extent of assisting with a subsidy; the subsidy of the Australian colonies, of course, going on the Pacific side of the line of through communication. And, all at the conference were perfectly agreed that in view of the Imperial interests, and the large possible advantages which would accrue, that the British Government as well had some interest in it, and all united in respectfully placing the claims of this great through line of communication before the mother country with the idea of soliciting joint operation in carrying out the scheme as a whole.

Mr. CHARLTON. How does this line compare as to distance with the Suez Canal line?

Mr. FOSTER. By the present line of communication you may start a letter from Sydney and you can put it into London in quicker time than you can start it from Sydney and put it into London by the eastern route. And, with equal speed and under equal condition—that is having on the Atlantic a service of equal speed and one into which the other service can run easily and quickly without being disjointed—they can put letters and passengers more quickly into London, and I believe with greater comfort and certainly with greater variety and pleasure to those who travel, than by the other line.

Mr. PRIOR. How much quicker?

Mr. FOSTER. From one to three days quicker. Now we will be perfectly fair about that. It is quite possible that the advent of a competing line of communication via the routes I have spoken of, may add to the quickening of the communication by the Suez route, and that consequently their time may be reduced; but what I have stated is upon the basis of the present time, and if they can quicken time, we can quicken time as well.

Mr. CHARLTON. That depends a good deal on the distance. Have you got the distances there?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not the actual distances just now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you not remember roughly the distance from such a point as Sydney to, say, Marseilles?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not remember the distances, and I would not like to give them without being correct, but I will have them before the discussion is over. I laid some stress upon the idea of having this through line to London without the disjointing and delay which take place under present conditions. To-day when you have made your speed upon the Pacific, and your speed across the Canadian Pacific Railway, you have then no Canadian line starting from our ports which can be used, as it were, under agreement, or authority, or control, to facilitate the connection between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the route across the Atlantic.

It has occurred, time and again, that mails which came with all possible speed across the Pacific, and with all possible speed across our railway, have lost two or three days in the transfer at the city of New York, and so have arrived in London much later than they otherwise might. But, with this communication complete, with this part of the line supplied and a through communication established, that would not occur, and on uninterrupted and well-jointed line of communication would have the advantages and would result as I have stated with reference to the delivery of mails and of passengers.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Has the hon. gentleman a statement as to the comparative cost to a passenger, from Sydney to London via the North American continent, and the cost via the Suez route?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not the actual ticket price, but I can tell my hon. friend that that regulates itself, and as these two lines of communication are competing lines the cost must be graded about the same, taking into account the advantages or disadvantages on the different lines. I imagine the difference in that respect is practically not worth talking of. The gentleman who has been the pioneer of the Pacific trade, and who has managed the running of our steamers now plying between Sydney and Vancouver, took in, of course, this larger idea of intercommunication and made overtures to the Government, and has been laying his plans and making his investigations and inquiries in Great Britain; and as a result of our conversations with each other—as is shown by the papers that have been brought down—the Government, after proposals and counter proposals, went so far as to grant a provisional agreement under which, under certain conditions, a contract might be made with Mr. Huddart giving him a certain amount of time and certain conditions under which to, if possible, float his company and establish his line. The conditions were: that we should give him $750,000 a year for the first ten years as a subsidy, and thereafter for the second ten years we should give him at least $300,000 per year; that being the extent of the obligation. The kind of vessels and the character of the service which is to be carried on is detailed in the papers which have been brought down, and it is only necessary for me to say that they are to be first-class.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. These papers do not seem to have been printed as they ought to have been.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry that the papers have not been printed. They were brought down in sufficient time, and it does not seem to have been the fault of the Government that they were not printed. The provisional agreement is as I have stated, and the service is to be a first-class service in equipment and every respect, and the speed is to be first-class speed so as to do the voyage from port to port in first-class time.

Mr. LANGEЛИER. How many knots an hour?

Mr. FOSTER. I think 20 knots an hour, deep sea trial, long course.

Mr. McCARTHY. What time is given Mr. Huddart to implement the contract?

Mr. FOSTER. After the passage of the resolution to which we hope to have the consent of Parliament, Mr. Huddart has been given three months in which to implement his proposals, and to carry out the establishment of the line.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Apparently what you contemplate is not a ten years' contract, but a twenty years' contract.

Mr. FOSTER. We would not as a Government enter into this thing for a single moment unless we thought it would be permanent. To make a flash in the pan, to have a five or a ten years' service, and then let it drop, we think would not be wise, but would be a waste of money. So we contemplate as a permanent arrangement granting a subsidy for the first ten years of $750,000 a year, and a subsidy for the second ten years of $500,000 a year, and after that we will let posterity, or those who live after that, take care of the service.

Mr. CHARLTON. What is the amount of the subsidy for the service between Canada and Australia?

Mr. FOSTER. New South Wales gives £10,000 per year, and Canada £25,000 per year; the other colonies have not yet made their contributions. Conditions must always have their effect, and in the Australian colonies they have their effect in the lapsing of the mail subsidies and subventions. Some of the colonies which are thoroughly well disposed towards the line and will assist it have not found it possible to do so at this particular time; but the fact that they are not able up to this time to give a direct subsidy does not argue that they will not help it. Then, again, there are sectional difficulties there, arising in part from causes that will always have their influence and in part from the fact that the Australian colonies are not confederated. Some of the colonies have already made an offer of a subsidy, provided they may have a port of call. That remains still to be adjusted. New South Wales has granted her subsidy provisionally for three years. So that when these subsidies fall in arrangements may be made, if it is found possible, for a greater length of time. Now, as to the time that Mr. Huddart received to implement the conditions of the proposal, it was three months. But at that time it was not contemplated that Parliament would not be called together at an earlier period or that the resolution would not have been passed at an earlier period; and the supposition was that Mr. Huddart would have had an opportunity, with the power of the resolution behind him, to implement his proposals in a fairly favourable time of the year. However, things have gone on until this particular time; and we do not bind ourselves, and have not bound ourselves, to cut Mr. Huddart off at the end of three months if at the end of that time he has established his bona fides, and has not been able to complete the operation. So that, as contemplated in the correspondence, it is the design of the Government to extend that time somewhat to Mr. Huddart, as far as it may be considered wise to do so, in order to give him a fair chance to float his project and establish his capacity to get the line into operation. However, that is by the way. Now, with reference to the line itself, the policy of the Government is the same as it was before. We propose to make the connection on this side simply and solely a Canadian connection. It will be noticed in the papers brought down, that the port mentioned in the provisional agreement is the port of Halifax. It is not finally decided that Halifax shall be the port. Representations have been made from other possible terminal ports, amongst others, from the city of St. John, a large and enterprising port in the Maritime Provinces, which has many natural facilities and many enterprising business men, and which has claims for possible participation in the advantages that will arise from commerce going across the Atlantic. These views have been impressed upon the Government, and Mr. Huddart has acquiesced in them; and the provisional proposition has been amended by submitting for the word Halifax the words which occurred in the preceding arrangements that were made: Halifax, or St John, or both as may be hereafter determined upon.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is Halifax for the whole year around?

Mr. FOSTER. No; that is for the winter port. When speaking of the Maritime Provinces, we speak of that portion of the service that is carried on in winter. This agreement must of course be between the Government and the promoters or contractors of the line. St. John, I may say both as a member of the Government and with somewhat of a personal interest as well, has a most enterprising set of citizens, and great natural advantages, and has to be in every way considered as regards the ports from which our great steamship lines go, during the winter season especially.

Mr. GILLMOR. What about St. Andrews?

Mr. FOSTER. St. Andrews is in the past and will be in the future. It has a history, and I hope it will continue to have a history even brighter in the future than it has had in the past; and sometime or other I hope that lines of fine steamships will be found going in and out of the noble port of St. Andrews. I was going to add my hope that my hon. friend will still be its representative when that takes place; but I do not know that I can do that unless he modifies his party allegiance. On the other side we propose, as before, to have a terminal port in Great Britain—that has not been decided upon either—and to have a connection, either by the vessels direct, or by a cross service with a port in France, so as to make the communication complete between France and the continent and Great Britain and ourselves. Now, my hon. friend has asked me about the advantages that would accrue. I am not disposed just now, and I do not think it would be wise for me, to go into a long argument as to the advantages which would accrue from the establishment of this service. They are patent, I think, to any one who looks into the question. In the first place, there is the advantage of prestige which it would give us. How are we situated to-day? A great country with five millions of people, a reading and writing and travelling people; and yet we are dependent, so far as Canadian instrumentalities go, for communication between ourselves and Great Britain, upon lines of steamships which have been founded by enterprising men, which have a history and have been well carried out, but which it is not saying too much are to-day, in point of speed and equipment, not sufficient for communication in these modern days between such a country as Canada and Great Britain. It is a decided loss of prestige for this country, in the eyes of its own citizens and of those who may be regarded as its friends and may become its future citizens, to have a limp and lame and halting service on the greatest highway of commerce for this country, to wit: between this country and Great Britain. Three-fourths of our mail matter, I may be right in saying more than three-fourths, finds its way to Great Britain through a foreign port; and we think it would add to the prestige of the country, if our postal communication, and our passenger communication as well, were supplied with a means of communication more consonant with modern demands for convenience of transit and rapid mail service than is the case to-day. We may be sentimental or utilitarian, but it is sometimes indeed very difficult to find the dividing line between the two. The best sentiment is very often the best utility, and I think there is a good deal of store to be set by the argument arising from the sentiment of pride and prestige in this matter. But there are advantages outside of that. This line of swift communication between Canada and the old country will not only carry our mails and our passengers and do that in a way which will minister to the pride and gratification of the Canadian people, but it will also be a means of carrying the products of Canada, which must necessarily, in increasing quantities, seek a market in the old world. I refer to products of high value and of somewhat perishable character, which require quicker transit and improved methods of treatment and care in transit. This line of steamers which will be built, and which will have a large freight capacity as well as speed and passenger and mail conveniences, will supply that need, and give to our farming population and our mercantile population a very great advantage—an advantage which they all appreciate, and which they are, so far as their sentiment has been made known, very desirous of obtaining. There is not a Board of Trade from British Columbia east of importance which has not taken up this subject and forwarded its views to the Government; and the views of these Boards of Trade are unanimous in their expression of the desire that this Government would implement the present means of communication by a fast Atlantic service. Take the best collection of mercantile men in the best cities of the country to-day, go to a great Board of Trade meeting at Toronto or Montreal, and there is no sentiment which you can express before the six hundred or eight hundred business men assembled at either of these meetings, which will be more loudly applauded and more heartily concurred in than the expression of your desire for a fast and improved Atlantic steam service. That must count for something. Business men are hard-headed, as a rule, and when they applaud an idea of that kind, they are not actuated by partisan motives at all. They are simply actuated by the enlightened and progressive feeling which actuates sound business men; and if you take those great cities, you will find that the sentiment of their business men is largely in favour of this scheme. That sentiment is based on something, and must have some weight in the scale, coming as it does from hard-headed, solid business men.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What about the freights?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is very anxious. He is leading me on too fast, but I am getting ahead very speedily as it is. But you may say that there are other men than the mercantile men, the business men, the nabobs of the Board of Trade. So there are. There are the hard-handed and hard-headed producers of the country; and to-day our farmers are concentrating their attention more and more upon that immense and increasing market in Great Britain, where the best finished products, and the best paying products we have, will find a ready market and cash return. For the dairy products and the finer meat products and for all these kinds of products which bring forth the intelligence and the industry of the best and most enlightened farming enterprise in the country—for all that class of what you may call fine and finished products, there is an increasing demand on the other side, and there is on this side an increasing appreciation of the necessity of taking advantage of everything which will tend to their betterment in that direction. A line of steamers such as we propose, will supplement that idea. When you talk of this scheme to the educated farmer, and by them I do not mean simply those who have received a college education, though every farmer might be the better for that, but all those who have improved methods and ideas of farming—when you talk to these men about this scheme, they see its advantages just as well as do the business men on Boards of Trade in every city of this country. Some men may talk in a hard, calculating, selfish way, of dividing this subsidy of $750,000 per year into so many dollars, and distributing of it among the producers of this country instead of spending it in this way. In the first place, you would not divide it; and in the second place, that idea is too narrow for this large country to entertain. So that in these respects, there is a strong sentiment in the country founded upon these considerations, founded upon the advantages to trade generally, which largely favours the establishment of a line of this kind. I might go on to speak of other advantages. We will have the advantages of the carriage of our own mails, which is always a forerunner of something else. Just as John the Baptist was the forerunner of a greater, this means of swift steam communication, and this means of the establishment of the electric cable, are the precursors of a solid increase of business. My hon. friends opposite may not altogether appreciate my simile, but it not one that is too far drawn, after all. After all, it is true, and we must acknowledge that the cable and the swift steamship line are the pioneers of trade, which is bound to follow in continually increasing proportions. And if hon. gentlemen do not like the simile, they can take the more prosaic form of expression. That view, however, is true. A fast steamship service will bring passengers from Australia and Great Britain and from other countries through this Dominion, so that they can see its great extent and its vast resources, its fine diversity of climate and productions, and the great future before it. That will give us a high place in the appreciation of these people, many of whom will not confine their expenditure to their personal wants, but will be induced to invest their capital in our midst. We have evidences of that already, owing to the means of communication that now exist. Go through the country to British Columbia, and you may mark investment after investment which has been made simply through the casual travel drawn to this country, and the appreciation of the advantages the country offers for investment which have forced themselves on the attention of travellers. That has taken place, and it is folly to say that such a result will not follow in this case. These are some of the advantages that will take place. Without wearying the House further at this moment, especially as I may have something to say in answer to objections which, I have no doubt, will be raised by hon. gentlemen opposite, I will now conclude. However, I just want, in impressing this matter on the attention of the House, to ask hon. members again to think of a little more than simply the sum of $750,000. I would ask them to think of the growth of our country, of its possibilities, of its union with other countries, and of all the benefits that may come from these large lines of communication, and to consider whether it is not the best policy for us not to shirk expenditure in order to secure these advantages, even though at the outset we may have to pay pretty dearly for them. It is the first step that costs. But I can look into the future, and I think the not very far future, when this country has double or three times the population it has to-day—

Mr. CHARLTON. How long ?

Mr. FOSTER. Longer than it would be if there were none like my hon. friend in this country carrying on a propaganda likely to drive our people from the country. Not very far in the future, I can see the time when this country, with double or treble its present population, with its great resources developed, with greatly increased travel and trade, will support on the Atlantic as well as on the Pacific not only one, but many lines of first-class communication which will not call upon the treasury to any great extent for their support, but which will be supported by the very development of trade and commerce that will have taken place. But as, I say, it is the first step that costs, and we must be prepared to take the first step, even though it does cost, relying upon the resources of the country and the future of the country to bring the day when the cost will be less, though the advantages will be always in increasing proportion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. After all this grand eloquence, I feel that it would be perhaps rather hard to bring the hon. gentleman down to more prosaic facts.

Mr. FOSTER. I wanted to make a good admixture with what I knew your speech would be.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Possibly the hon. gentleman may know the nature of what I am to say ; possibly not. Perhaps the hon. gentleman is not aware that long before he was a member of this Parliament I was myself a strong advocate of a swift Atlantic line. And I may tell him this, if he wants to know it : that I brought that matter a great many years ago before the British authorities and the British postal service, and I think he would have done well to do the same. My own impression in this matter is that we had better leave out of consideration what the hon. gentleman calls the sentimental side until we get at the facts. Later on, when he brings down the Bill, which I presume he is going to found upon this resolution, we may have something to say. Meantime, I may congratulate him on the fact that a large portion of the mantle of the High Commissioner appears to have descended upon him. There is a twang in what he has said of the wonderful 640,000,000 of bushels of wheat that we were to have exported years ago, and the $58,300,000, in cash, or securities better than cash, that were to be brought into our treasury on or before the 1st January, 1891. How those promises, and a good many other promises like them, have been fulfilled our history records only too well, and therefore the hon. gentleman must pardon a little skepticism on our part, and he must excuse us if we ask to defer for a time the consideration of the sentimental side of the question. Sir, I think it might have been as well, perhaps, for the hon. gentleman to give us some information as to what he supposed would be the character of this service : I mean the number of steamers required and the probable cost of constructing them. That, I suppose, he has got. He would hardly have gone into this matter without ascertaining such facts as these.

Mr. FOSTER. The number of steamers required will be at least four, and the cost of building them will be somewhere in the region of £200,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman expects to get a 20-knot service, and if he expects, at the same time, a freight-carrying service of the character he describes, I am afraid that for once in a way his ideas are exceedingly limited if he supposes that an expenditure of £200,000 apiece will admit of these conditions being fulfilled. I am very much afraid that he will find £500,000 sterling would be nearer the mark than £200,000.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems I have underrated the cost.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid you have, very materially. And this goes to show that possibly a little more consideration might have been given to these proposals before the Government compromised themselves upon them.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes ; the cost will be £400,000 or £500,000 for each vessel, instead of £200,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In other words, an expenditure of £2,000,000 sterling will be required for the fleet. Unless the rates of steamship insurance are much lower for winter service, and particularly for the waters we propose to traverse than they used to be. I would strongly suspect that even so large a sum as $750,000 a year would scarcely allow a fair rate of interest, plus insurance, on the money necessary to construct four vessels of that size. I would like to know if the hon. gentleman is in a position to give us information upon a point of some considerable moment, and that is the probable estimated cost per voyage of vessels of this description—I mean the return trip from this country to England and back again.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot at the moment lay my hands on the paper giving that information. The cost would be somewhere in the region of $60,000 or $70,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So that, taking fifty-two voyages in the year, the expense of maintaining this fleet, wholly apart from any question of depreciation or accident or anything of that kind, will amount, roughly, to about $3,500,000 per annum, or £700,000 sterling. I merely want to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the matter, because he will see that in considering what he is now proposing, which I understand is to be a twenty-years contract, we ought to be very well advised indeed as to what sort of a bargain we enter into and what possibility there would be, or what reasonable probability there would be that the promoters can carry it out. I confess that as I look at the matter it seems that the whole of our subsidy would barely pay the interest on the cost of construction plus a very moderate rate of insurance. Then there would remain the cost, which, as I suppose, the hon. gentleman knows, is extreme, of vessels maintaining a twenty-knot service. Now, I would like to know from the hon. gentleman, as, no doubt, these matters have been fully considered by the promoters at any rate, what tonnage, after deducting engine room, he supposes would be available in these vessels. And I would like to know also what the hon. gentleman calculates the consumption of coal would be.

Mr. FOSTER. The vessels are to be about 10,000 tons register. They will have a carrying capacity of about 3,000 tons of cargo. They will carry 500 first-class and 1,000 steerage passengers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And they will carry 3,000 tons of freight?

Mr. HAZEN. I think the provisional contract says 4,000 tons.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Unfortunately the papers have not been printed, so we are at a disadvantage in discussing these matters, and are obliged to call upon the hon. gentleman for information which would had been at hand had the papers been printed. As I understand, he proposes to have a service which will take 3,000 tons of freight.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And would allow of 500 first-class passengers?

Mr. FOSTER. 300 first-class, 200 second, and 1,000 steerage.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Now, I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman is prepared to state to the House—perhaps it may be in these papers—for what sum he could obtain a contract for a sixteen or seventeen-knot service from the company that are now engaged in carrying on ocean service.

Mr. FOSTER. So far as the result of the tenders has gone, it would take a sum ranging from $500,000 up to $700,000. That however, was the sum two or three years ago, when these tenders were asked for.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought he might have got later information, because it would appear to me an extraordinary circumstance if $500,000 or $600,000 were demanded for a sixteen or seventeen-knot service, and only $750,000 for a twenty-knot service. I presume the hon. gentleman is perfectly well aware—if he is not, I have no doubt his mercantile friends behind him can inform him—that the increase of expenditure for every additional knot over sixteen is enormous. It would probably cost, if I am correctly informed, twice as much to obtain a twenty-knot service, and consequently the difference between the two tenders, if he has received tenders, seems to be very great.

Mr. FOSTER. The actual figures of the tenders were £104,000 from the Allans for a sixteen-knot service, taking some of their fast vessels, and gradually adding thereto. That was in 1889.

Mr. LAURIER. 1890 or 1891.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will notice that it is a matter of considerable moment for us, in considering this question, to know what service of a more moderate character might be obtained. I think it is a matter to be regretted that the hon. gentleman has not endeavoured to ascertain more recently.

Mr. FOSTER. I can afford the hon. gentleman a little more information. In 1890 we had a tender from an English firm, a well-known shipping firm, Furness & Co., offering to establish a sixteen-knot service for a little over $900,000. There is also a tender for a seventeen-knot service for $750,000, by a French company.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Any other?

Mr. FOSTER. That is all I see now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is an enormous discrepancy between these tenders, because, as I was just observing, there is no doubt that an additional three or four knots will cost twice as much at any rate, will cost the company a great deal more, than would be required for supplying a more moderate service of sixteen or seventeen knots per hour. The hon. gentleman is no doubt aware of another thing; he must be aware that there is great doubt in the minds of experienced merchants and experienced seamen whether it is at all possible, with any reasonable degree of safety, to run at the rate of twenty knots, day and night, through all that part of navigation from the Straits of Belle Isle up to Quebec, during the summer season. Having gone over that route a number of times, I should very much prefer, for my own personal safety, a more moderate rate of speed. I would like to know what arrangement the hon. gentleman is making with the company with respect to this payment. Is it to be made according to services rendered? If these people fail to give us the 20-knot service, have the Government the power of forfeiture?

Mr. FOSTER. That depends entirely upon the contract, which is not yet made, but in the contract the Government will certainly guard that point carefully. We do not propose to pay for a service unless we get the advantage of it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is precisely what I wanted to know. I think we ought to have the contract which the Government proposes to make, submitted to us.

Mr. FOSTER. But the Government has made no contract, the contract, in all these details, is yet to be made. We have simply stated on broad lines what we are prepared to do, and the gentleman at present in question has undertaken to see whether he can float a company to carry that out. When he satisfies himself with reference to that, then will come the making of the contract; all these different details will then be taken up. But the contract that we did actually make with Mr. Anderson would be a guide upon this point, and in that contract, of course, we guarded all these points.

Mr. LAURIER. I think the hon. gentleman somewhat forgets the engagements he has made already with Mr. Huddart. In the papers which have been brought down, and which I have had the advantage to purchase for some time, I find the proposition made by Mr. Huddart was this:

The company to be incorporated (in England) under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, whereby the liability of its members is limited to the amount of their shares. Capital £2,000,000 to be raised as follows: Ordinary shares, £500,000 divided into 100,000 shares of £5 each. Debentures, £1,500,000, three and a half per cent on 21 years debentures, to be guaranteed by the Dominion Government in a manner to be agreed upon.

This was the proposition of Mr. Huddart. Now, at a later stage—the date is not given —this letter was written by Mr. Bowell to Mr. Huddart:

JAMES HUDDART, Esq.,
Ottawa.

SIR,—I am instructed to inform you that the Government of Canada is prepared to enter into a contract (subject to the approval of Parliament) with you, or a company to be formed by you, for the placing upon the route, between England and Canada of four Royal Mail Express Steamships, each capable of steaming 20 knots per hour at sea, of from 8,000 to 10,000 tons register—as may be found commercially necessary—for passengers and freight, fitted out with modern refrigeratory machinery for the successful transportation of beef, fish, game and other perishable articles, &c., a cold, chilled or frozen condition. Trips to be weekly. The terminal ports in Canada to be Quebec in summer and Halifax in winter.

No mention here of St. John, by the way.

The mails to be landed and received during the summer at Rimouski. The terminal port in England to be hereafter agreed upon. Each vessel to be allowed one week in the year for repairs, &c.; but the continuity of the weekly service must be maintained by the substitution of some other vessel of suitable character. The contract to be for ten years, renewable upon such terms, both as to time and amount of subsidy, as may be mutually agreed upon by the contracting parties. The steamers to carry all mails which may be offered both in Canada and in England, upon terms and conditions usually contained in contracts of this character. The Government agrees to pay in aid of such service a subsidy of $750,000 per year for a term of ten years under such conditions as may be required by the Government for a first class service; and to pay for ten years subsequent out of subsidy earned, the interest upon a capital sum of £1,500,000 at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum.

There are the conditions.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Now, if I correctly interpret what my hon. friend has just read, what Mr. Huddart proposes is: that we should practically furnish, or make ourselves responsible for, the greater part of the capital that is to go into these steamers. I cannot conceive a more foolish and suicidal arrangement than any such arrangement, if the Government enter into it.

Mr. FOSTER. In what way?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As I understand it, the Government agree to pay a subsidy for ten years, equivalent to 3½ per cent on a capital of $1,500,000.

Mr. FOSTER. What does that practically amount to?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The result will be that if the party breaks down, the Government will be unable to withdraw from the contract so far as that amount is concerned.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all. It is out of subsidy earned that this amount will be paid.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is proposed to issue debentures guaranteed, and this document appears to be a quasi-guarantee. What is the use of talking about a capital of £1,500,000, and guaranteeing interest at the rate of 3½ per cent on a proposition signed by Mackenzie Bowell, as Minister of Trade and Commerce, unless it was meant practically to bind our credit to the payment of bonds for that amount. However, I see it is six o'clock, and we had better suspend the discussion.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 57) to incorporate the Gleichen, Beaver Lake and Victoria Railway Company.—(Mr. Davis, Alberta.)

Bill (No. 157) to again revise and further amend the Act to incorporate the Brockville and New York Bridge Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

FAST ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

House again in Committee on Resolution.

(In the Committee.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, perhaps the Minister of Finance has by this time overhauled his papers and as he enlarged on the possibility of obtaining a much faster service via this route from the Australian colonies to England than at present exists, possibly he can now tell us, what the comparative distances are, from Melbourne or Sydney to Liverpool, by this route, and by the Suez Canal route?

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry to say that I have not been able to get these distances. I think my memo. must be in the department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. 'Prima facie' I shall imagine that there was a difference against our route of some two or three thousand miles.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman is positive on this subject I will not contradict him, but I should like to know.

Mr. FOSTER. It cannot be that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will see as to the question of obtaining any considerable proportion of the mail service, that this is a matter of some moment. My impression is that the distance from Sydney to Vancouver plus the journey across the continent and plus the Atlantic voyage, must very considerably exceed the distance via the Suez Canal.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. But that distance across the continent though long is made by fast travel.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I grant you; but the hon. gentleman was perfectly correct in saying that if we put on a fast service at both ends, that there is a very considerable chance of the service via the Suez Canal being improved. After all said and done this is a question of distance. I think the sea distance alone from Melbourne to Vancouver and from Quebec to Liverpool, is quite equal to the distance via the Suez Canal.

Mr. FOSTER. I can give you the average mail time?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The distance will be more to the purpose, because if we know the distance we know what could be done. The hon. gentleman estimated that these new steamers would carry about 3,000 tons of freight, and I would like to know what rate of freight is expected to be charged per ton, in the calculations that have been submitted to the Government?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a matter which has not been discussed and must be left largely to competition.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a matter which it would be very desirable that the hon. gentleman and the Cabinet generally should be advised upon, before recommending this project to the consideration of the Parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. We have not yet attempted to regulate steamship freights.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not asking that the hon. gentleman should regulate it. I am asking what are the hypotheses put forward by these promoters as the basis out of which they expect to earn enough to keep their line going. It is very important that they should submit those to the Government, and very important that the Government should know whether they are correct or not. They have two sources of revenue as far as we can see: the freight they can obtain on these 3,000 tons, and the number of passengers they will be able to carry. As to the passengers, we know very well that during a few weeks in the year, there will be a considerable number, if the fast line service is adopted, and during that time I think it quite likely that very fair returns may be obtained; but we know perfectly well that during the greater part of the year, the number of passengers going by this route would be small. During the winter months the hon. gentleman can hardly flatter himself that there will be any very large number of passengers crossing that part of the Atlantic, and if he will take the trouble to confer with the managers of the New York steamship lines, he will find that that is precisely their experience. Unless I am greatly mistaken, many of these expensive Atlantic liners are taken off altogether after serving their purpose for a few summer months. So far as it is possible to obtain any idea of the cost of this service, from the vague and general information which the Government appear to possess, the minimum cost for expenses would amount to three and a half millions of dollars per annum, allowing some $60,000 or $70,000 for the round trip; and from the information that has been furnished me I am afraid that this is an underestimate of what the actual cost would be. We have to fall back, therefore, to a large extent upon the freight. The hon. gentleman says that he does not know what the freight rates would be; but this we do know: that our return freights will be very small. We know perfectly well that there is little chance of getting more than a full cargo one way. To a very great extent these ships will return in ballast, and we know that a great bulk of our exports, from their nature, consist of articles of large bulk and small value; articles which this company and no other company could pretend to carry unless they take the low rates which are usually paid to the ordinary liners. Now, I should like to know from what articles the hon. gentleman and the promoters expect to make up on an average a cargo of 3,000 tons per week at remunerative rates. Grain, I presume, they will hardly carry. Flour they will hardly carry; at any rate, they cannot hope to get any more for that than would be given to ordinary ocean tramps. The same thing applies to a great extent to such articles as cheese and apples, which are not likely to pay for speedy transit. Live cattle are out of the question. So that practically, as far as I can see, there remain a very small number of articles which the hon. gentleman can expect to see carried. I can hardly see how there can be any reasonable chance of making up a cargo of 3,000 tons a week from what the hon. gentleman calls the finer description of meats and perishable goods. I would like to know what class of articles he expects to furnish a cargo of that extent at remunerative rates?

Mr. FOSTER. It is impossible for me to answer categorically what the vessels will carry. They will carry very much the same description of freight as is carried by other fast lines of steamships. Having a refrigerating apparatus, they will take such articles as chilled meats, and anything else that requires cool storage. My hon. friend knows quite as well as I do all that variety of articles from which freights will be found. The very same description of articles will come to be carried in these vessels from Canadian ports as is carried by the same class of vessels from United States ports. The argument of my hon. friend has been valuable in one respect. He has shown the large amount of capital that is necessary; he has shown the great cost of management;

he has shown that there may be some difficulty in getting full passenger lists; he has shown that there may be some difficulty in getting freights. All these are difficulties which meet the establishment of a new line. The initial difficulties in these respects must not be underestimated. They are large. All the arguments and assertions of my hon. friends go to prove that an undertaking of this kind in its early years is one which has disadvantages and disabilities to contend with, and which necessitates a large amount of aid in order to put upon even keel. I do not think any capitalist who undertook to provide a steamship service of this nature, to compete with the more southern lines, would expect to make it pay in the initial years; and that is the reason why a contract extending over a period of years is required. These difficulties will no doubt be met. Now, I do not agree with my hon. friend that it would be difficult to find passengers for these vessels. If the vessels are made first-class, if their equipment is first-class, if their catering is first-class, I do not doubt at all that even in that part of the year which my hon. friend seems to fear, these boats would obtain a fair share of the traffic; and in the major part of the year there is no route for the passenger tourist, or the passenger who wishes quick time, that would be more available or that would commend itself more to those travellers than this route. There are reasons why that is so. It is better in certain seasons of the year than the more southern routes. But, still, the contest will come. It goes without saying that to-day probably a majority of the Canadian travellers go by the southern routes for the sake of getting better vessels. Suppose you divert all that passenger traffic, which is quite possible, even that might not fill these vessels. The travel from the western states, and the through travel also have to be catered for. I look for a large diversion of the through travel which has hitherto gone by the Suez route entirely. For New South Wales this service would be admittedly—there was no question about it when it was discussed in the Conference—the quickest one for both mails and passengers. The vast extent of the Australasian continent must be taken into account. The island is a vast continent in itself, and when you go to the western side of the island you are many hundreds of miles away. For New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland and New Zealand this route furnishes an alternative service for both mails and passengers. For these there is not a shadow of a doubt that this line will tap the travel which has hitherto gone by the Suez route. Take the experience of gentlemen who have travelled by these two routes, and you will find that they are loud in their praises of the Pacific route. By that route they get rid of a great many disadvantages and inconveniences. They get rid of the torrid temperature of the Suez route; they get the most Pacific Ocean in the world for travel—that is the universal testimony of people who have travelled upon it. Not that storms do not occur on the Pacific; but year in and year out it is a remarkably Pacific Ocean. Then they get diversity. As soon as they reach the shores of British Columbia, they have a change from the sea route. They have an agreeable diversion to a land route of 3,000 miles; and after that they are taken up by the Atlantic route. I have no doubt at all that a great deal of the through passenger travel will be diverted to this route; and for the western United States it furnishes an alternative route, which must attract a certain amount of that travel. So that I do not think it is hopeless at all to expect that in the course of time, as the route advertises itself, and makes its attractions and capabilities known, it will draw very largely for passenger travel.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman count on freights from Australia for this route?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly not. That would be an absurd thing—to think that you could load a vessel at Sydney, transfer the freight at Vancouver to the Canadian Pacific Railway, carry it to Halifax or Quebec, and tranship it again. I do not think my hon. friend would ask that question, except in a quizzing mood.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has made such extraordinary statements to-day that I did not know what he expected.

Mr. FOSTER. I saw the trap the hon. gentleman wanted me to fall into.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All I can say is that if these are the sources of supply which this line will have to depend upon, it will have a great difficulty to pay its expenses. Practically, if it is to do any good at all, it must depend on the freight and passengers it can obtain from Canada. It is quite true that a certain percentage of the American travel may be diverted during a limited portion of the summer months; but it will only be a small percentage; and the hon. gentleman proposes to have vessels which will carry about 1,500 passengers of the various grades. Now, I do not think he or the promoters are at all justified—knowing what we know of the capabilities of this country, and knowing what we know of the competition to which they will be subjected—in expecting to divert any considerable portion of that traffic. And while it is perfectly true that the St. Lawrence is a most magnificent and picturesque route, it is equally true that the navigation of the St. Lawrence at a high rate of speed would be a very dangerous experiment.

Mr. FOSTER. That advertises it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I say distinctly that I do not believe it is possible to navigate the St. Lawrence from Quebec to the Straits of Belle Isle, week in and week out, at an average speed of twenty knots an hour. I would be very sorry to go on a vessel that undertook to do it.

Mr. FOSTER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. At what rate of speed would you feel safe in going?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At a very considerably less rate of speed—a less rate of speed on the whole, I submit.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to know the number of knots.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not proposing a fast Atlantic service. The hon. gentlemen are proposing a twenty-knot service, which is close on to twenty two or twenty-three ordinary miles per hour. The hon. gentleman knows well enough—and there are plenty of gentlemen in his department who can inform him if he does not—that that is a pretty perilous rate to proceed at during the night along the gulf of the St. Lawrence, and he knows that that, although it is a most picturesque route, it is likely to be, during a considerable portion of the year, much more dangerous than the southern route which starts clear from a point on the ocean. I do not mind telling the hon. gentleman that if the real object were to attain a fast route between the two continents, it is my conviction, for one—although I simply give it for myself—that the true point of departure will be found in some one of the open ports of Nova Scotia, from Nova Scotia to Milford Haven. And I could quite understand the British Government and ourselves finding it well worth our while to make a considerable sacrifice for the purpose of maintaining a fast route. You could get a route nearly a thousand miles shorter than that from New York and several hundred miles shorter than that from Quebec. If the object were simply to bridge over the sea between the two continents, Nova Scotia would be the proper point of departure, and as far east as you could get. However, we are not discussing that, but the proposition the hon. gentleman has made. It is quite clear that neither the Government nor any of the parties concerned have given, or are willing to give, the House anything like detailed information as to the sources of revenue. When we are asked to engage in a contract ranging over a term of twenty years, we ought to see our way a good deal better than the hon. gentleman or his colleagues appear to see it. We ought to have a great deal more than the hon. gentlemen know, or, at any rate, choose to tell us, about the sources of freight supply. I admit that what he says is correct enough as to certain perishable articles, but I do not admit that they will make anything like a cargo of three thousand tons on an average, week in and week out, and the steamers will be obliged to fill up with the coarser description of article which constitute the bulk of our exports, and probably will have, for a good many years to come, to accept very small rates. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that the ordinary expenditure for these vessels will be very heavy. He knows perfectly well, and if he does not, his colleagues know, that where you are dealing with such very costly implements as vessels costing five hundred thousand pounds sterling, a large sum every year has to be set apart for repairs and depreciation. That amount has been mentioned at various rates, as high as fifteen and even twenty per cent; and I am inclined to think that the experience of the great New York liners goes to show that these estimates are not much in excess. If you add that to the enormous figure the hon. gentleman himself has admitted, it will be perfectly evident that it is very questionable indeed whether it will be possible—because, as I have already shown, the subsidy will all be absorbed in paying interest on the capital sunk and ordinary insurance—under any circumstances, to make this line pay expenses for a considerable time. We know perfectly well that the next act in the drama—if we get ourselves committed to an enterprise of this kind, and if this can be shown or proved to be unsuccessful, for the reason I have stated—will be an application for a further subsidy, and we also know (and I will have more to say on that probably before we close), that the financial position of Canada to-day is such that those extended engagements should only be entered into with very good cause. The hon. gentleman knows, and I know perfectly well, that for a year or two he is not likely to be troubled with a large surplus. He knows that at this moment his revenue is two million dollars, at least, short of what it was this time last year, and that that means a considerable deficit. Now, he is proposing to add three-quarters of a million dollars per year for a term of ten years to our expenditure. The least then he can do is to show that there is good ground for believing that further demands will not be made and that there is reasonable expectation of the enterprise paying its way.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has referred to the question of the navigation of the St. Lawrence and to information which is available to me. That is an important subject, and I think it only right that at this stage I should put the House in possession of the information at my command. I was thunderstruck to hear the hon. gentleman's leader, earlier in the session, speak as he did of the dangers of the navigation of the St. Lawrence. I could not understand where the hon. gentleman obtained such extraordinary information about the river, and the Gulf of St. Lawrence—not only beautiful and picturesque as it has been admitted to be to-night, but one of the finest waterways in the world, a waterway which is the great boast and pride of this country, and which has been described by a very high notable authority as a lane well marked by lights and as one of the safest water courses in the world. Why, one of the great advantages of the St. Lawrence route is its safety; and if we only had steamships that would at all compare with those that at once confront an angry ocean with all its dangers, I am sure that passengers would much prefer to embark on these steamers and traverse a waterway so placid as that of the St. Lawrence. Had we such steamers, our share of the travel would be even greater than it is. The hon. gentleman has made extraordinary statements, both as regards the navigation of the St. Lawrence and as regards this enterprise from a paying point of view. Such statements are most dangerous. Coming from him and at this stage, they can only have one effect, that of injuring this scheme in the money market, in the minds of people who are not so well acquainted with the facts as the navigators on these waters. It really seems unfair. I submit that that is not the way in which any Legislature that approves of aiding a steamship service should take up a question of this kind. We know, for instance, that in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway the same prophecies were made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and we know that their effect was dangerous, and no doubt retarded for a long time the successful floating of that scheme. These hon. gentleman prophesied that that road would never pay for the grease on its axles. We know they prophesied that it would never be built, or that if it were built, it would only be at the cost of ruining this country. Those dangerous statements had their effect no doubt in creating difficulties, but those difficulties were ultimately surmounted and triumphed over in a magnificent manner, and so I believe in like manner will the statements made by the hon. gentlemen to-night be falsified. He asks that we shall say at once what none even of the projectors can at the moment say, what all these specific plans are, the exact nature of the cargo from the first passage to the last in the year, and the exact rate of freight they would charge. Take England when, in her day, she heavily subsidized steamers—she heavily subsidizes them yet—but take any discussion in the British Parliament upon assistance to steamship lines, and I challenge hon. gentlemen to find a case in which such questions were asked. The reason is to be found in the fact that Parliament as a whole was anxious to see the enterprise succeed. It was so in the United States. You endeavour to get the best offer you can, but you leave private people to take the risk. They have all the facts before them. But no Government is able to satisfy Parliament upon the minutiae of the steamship business. But we can meet these other questions. We can meet what I consider to be libels upon a fair fame of the navigation of this splendid Canadian waterway. Now, the hon. gentleman has referred to information that is at my hand. Unfortunately, when other gentlemen were looking into these projects some time ago, these damning statements were made and published all through the English papers. We know there are enemies to this scheme. Some people think their private interests are affected, though some obtained heavy state aid when they first embarked upon this sort of work. From Canada, from old Canada, they got subventions that were probably comparatively larger than the $750,000 which is now proposed. However, stories of that kind, whether they came from interested parties or not, appeared in the London paper in the time of Mr. Anderson's contract, and in the time before him to the effect that the navigation of the St. Lawrence was most dangerous. Now, Commander Gordon, who had sailed up and down the Gulf, and spent summer after summer there in all weathers, wrote a most indignant denial of these statements from a nautical standpoint. He was a retired officer of the Royal navy, himself a magnificent sailor, who never lost a ship, and never got a ship into danger. His opinion, as expressed in the London papers, was that the navigation of the St. Lawrence was far safer for steamships than the waters of the Atlantic coast, either on the American side or on the side of the mother country, and that the great dangers to trans-Atlantic navigation by this route were not in the gulf or river, but as the vessels neared the Irish coast, and as they neared the British Islands, dangers which are common to all lines. And he pointed out that, relatively speaking, the dangers in reaching New York harbour, taking them all round, were greater than those met in reaching the Canadian Atlantic ports in winter or the port of Quebec in summer. In this his statements are corroborated by other officers. Take, for instance, the commanders of these huge British ships, these leviathans, such as the 'Blake'—these and other officers are in the habit of sending to the Department of Marine congratulations upon the way in which that waterway is lighted, and expressing their gratification at the ease and safety of navigating these waters both up and down. The leader of the Opposition early in the session, as I have said, made a most extraordinary statement. He based it upon a statement in Admiral Bayfield's pilot book, to the effect that in the St. Lawrence it was not safe at night or in foggy weather to go a greater speed than from four to six knots an hour. That, to some extent, was an authority for the statement made by the hon. gentleman. I was astonished. I had not looked into the subject with the thoroughness I thought the hon. gentleman had done. So I made inquiry. The statement seemed to be contrary to everything that I had gathered, either from navigators or from underwriters, or from those who are continually finding fault, and who are very glad to find fault, with the department on the slightest occasion. I had heard no such statement, but had been led to believe quite the contrary. I asked for an explanation, and I think it only fair to the country and to Parliament that I should put them in possession of the criticism made by my officers on this question. Perhaps the easiest way is to give it just as I got it, instead of giving my own interpretation of it:

Captain Bayfield's surveys of the river and Gulf of St. Lawrence, between Quebec and Strait of Belle Isle, were made, and the first charts issued, between 1827 and 1834. Captain Bayfield was engaged in surveying in British American waters up to 1845, but did little or no work on this route after 1834. Captain Orlebar resurveyed parts of the route about 1858 to 1860. Captain Boulton made a resurvey of the Beaujeu channel in 1874. The British Admiralty have since then made a complete survey of the island of Newfoundland. This involved a resurvey of the Strait of Belle Isle. The Dominion Government, acting with the Imperial Government, have made a late survey of the river St. Lawrence from Quebec to the Saguenay, and of the east end of the island of Anticosti. When Captain Bayfield's survey was completed in 1834—

—I would call particular attention to this—

—there were only four lights between the Atlantic Ocean and Quebec, viz.: those at Green Island, established in 1809; Point de Monts, 1830; and the South-west Point, St. Paul's Island, and South-west Point, Anticosti, in 1831. Two more were added shortly afterwards, probably as a result of the survey then made. Heath Point, established in 1835, and Lower Traverse light-ship, 1836. There were then no fog-alarms, no gas buoys, no light-ships. There are to-day between Belle Isle, or Cape Race, and Quebec, 70 light stations and 4 lightships, from which 87 lights are shown. Three of the light-ships are equipped with steam fog-whistles, and fog-horns are established at seven stations, and explosive signals at nine. The fourth lightship has a bell as a fog-horn signal.

This list does not include any of the lights in the Gulf of St. Lawrence south of Gaspé, or on the Cape Breton coast, but only those under the control of the Dominion of Canada, which would be used by a vessel sailing between Quebec and Ireland, by either the Strait of Belle Isle or Cape Race.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is added:

Besides the regular lights there are 8 gas buoys, two of which are equipped with bells, and over 50 can buoys. The new charts show characteristic soundings throughout the Strait of Belle Isle, in the approaches to Anticosti, and up the river St. Lawrence, and——as I have stated to the committee—

—the route has been described by a competent authority as a "well-marked and well-lighted lane."

So much, then, for the condition in which these waters are. Now, I will trouble the committee—because this is important information upon a subject upon which I am certain hon. gentlemen opposite have entirely gone wrong—with something more. My officers say further:

Any contention that high speed cannot be maintained in the gulf in consequence of the danger of navigation is not borne out by the facts. The gulf can be described as a fine open stretch of water remarkably free from out lying dangers. There is no more difficulty in a steamship running at a full speed, under ordinary conditions of weather, from the entrance of the gulf to within 60 miles of Quebec than in maintaining full speed on the open Atlantic.

There is necessarily a slight element of danger in thick weather in consequence of the relative proximity of land, but this danger is certainly no greater than the danger that arises in approaching land on any of the Atlantic coasts. In fine weather, or even in bad weather, if clear, the gulf coasts are now efficiently lighted and fairly well provided with fog-signals, to which we are steadily adding. In thick weather speed must be reduced whether a vessel is in the gulf or the open Atlantic, but in the gulf there is not the same liability to fog that is found on other portions of the Atlantic coast, and the path of cyclonic storms always trends to the south of the gulf and consequently extremely bad weather is not encountered in that vicinity.

Now, the memorandum refers to the old chart or pilot book to which the hon. gentleman referred. It is based upon information in Bayfield's time, and cannot apply to the present time, as it is contrary to the practice of cautious and well known commanders. However, so far as caution in approaching the shore is concerned, it is simply a caution which is inserted in the sailing directions in all parts of the world. It is intended as a caution against approaching little known coasts, rather than as applicable to well known pilotage grounds. Now, I want to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to another point. A rate of 13 knots would have been as startling to any Parliament considering the subject in the days when the Allan line were given a $400,000 subvention to run down the gulf, as this suggestion of a 20-knot steamship; in both cases the danger is the same. I was curious to hear an answer to my question from the member for South Oxford, but he did not give it very definitely, because I think that nautical men would say that there is very little difference in striking an iceberg or a shoal when running at 13 knots and running at 40 knots; in both cases the consequences would be disastrous. The distinction of danger is very difficult to draw. But this is the point, that at that time without these lights—for it was many years ago, as the hon. gentleman knows, that the first steamships were subsidised—the danger could have been magnified with truth to a far greater extent than any dangers that have been suggested on the present occasion; and with that history of many years, with a system far inferior to what now obtains, this is the magnificent record in connection with mail steamships—and it is given to me by my officials, and I suppose will be accepted as correct—that no mail vessel has for the past twenty years been wrecked in the St. Lawrence. Compare that with the record on the English coast, the Irish coast, or the coast out of New York. Take the pilot chart, and if we published a geodetic survey, such as they published in New York, and anything similar to that would be shown, then investors in England, in approaching this question, might well be frightened, for there is hardly a chart issued that does not show you the spot of a wreck outside New York harbour, month after month. But the case is in favour of the St. Lawrence when we can show that although these steamships of the different lines run year in and year out, not one vessel carrying mails has been lost or wrecked in the St. Lawrence for the past twenty years. Then I am also told by these officers whose duty it is to observe these things:

The fastest vessels hitherto used in the St. Lawrence trade have found no difficulty in navigating it at full speed, except as before stated in exceptionally bad weather, which may be met on any route, which when met will unavoidably delay vessels, as they are now often delayed in the English Channel, in the Irish Channel, on the banks of Newfoundland and in the approaches to New York. If a seventeen knot vessel can run at full speed there is nothing to prevent a twenty-five knot vessel from similarly keeping up her full power.

I will not weary the committee by going back further to a document which I have, and which any hon. gentleman can see if he wishes. It was prepared in the lifetime of the late Commander Gordon and was published in the papers, in which he gave his opinion that this route was one of the safest in the world; and I think he was the authority to whom I referred when I said that these waters had been described as a well lighted lane.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman raised a point which I will not discuss with him on the present occasion. On a former occasion I quoted to the House, not my own opinion, because I do not pretend to be an expert in those matters, but the opinion of competent authorities as to what were deemed at that time the difficulties of the navigation of the St. Lawrence. These difficulties are there. The hon. gentleman says, and I am glad to hear it, that they have been overcome by the application of art and science. That is possible. I do not dispute that point with him, not being an expert in those matters. But I am only too glad to receive the opinion of competent authority on the present occasion as on the former occasion. But I would call his attention to this fact, that four or five years ago when the subsidy of half a million dollars a year for a fast service, was voted by this Parliament, men on the floor of this House then warned the Government that the conditions which you were exacting at that time of a 20-knot service, of a service equal to the fastest and to the best which was then plying the ocean, could not be expected. There were conditions which did not exist elsewhere, and these conditions were the physical difficulties in the way. Now, the hon. gentleman said that the difficulties exist no more. Well, if that be so, I am sure that everybody will be glad to hear it, every Canadian will be happy to know it. If it be possible at the present time to maintain a service of 20 knots an hour over the St. Lawrence route, it is a subject for rejoicing. I am not approaching this question to-day in a carping spirit, I am only asking for information. So far we have not the information we ought to have. We have a proposition of ten lines only, which has not been supplemented by the Minister by any other information which will enable us to come to a decision. He has presented to the House his proposition accompanied by glittering generalities, going as far as John the Baptist. But we expect something more, and we are obliged at the present time to put question after question to the hon. gentleman. John the Baptist was preaching in the desert, as some gentleman observed a moment ago. I do not know whether this project will also be the precursor which hon. gentlemen expect it will be.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am sure you were deserted last night.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, I have only to say that the lash of Sir Charles Tupper, long as it is, does not extend to this side of the House. We are asking for information on this question, and it is only by means of a surgical operation that we have been able to extract from the Minister of Finance any information concerning this project. What have we before us? We have simply this:

That it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may enter into a contract for a term not exceeding ten years with any individual or company, for the performance of a fast weekly steamship service between Canada and the United Kingdom, making connection with a French port, on such terms and conditions as to the carriage of mails and otherwise as the Governor in Council seems expedient, for a subsidy not exceeding the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year.

This is very meagre information. We ask for more. We ask, for example, what will be the length of the contract? It is stated in the resolution that it will be ten years, but when we look into the matter carefully, after having cross-examined the Ministers, we find that it is practically for twenty years, because there is a provision for its renewal for ten years more. So we have this information, that the contract is really to be for twenty years, and not for ten years. There is another feature with respect to this matter on which, in view of the discussion of yesterday, we should be informed, and have full information. The hon. gentleman said that connection will be made with a French port. How is that to be understood? What is the kind of connection we will obtain? If a steamer leaves an English port to proceed to Canada, will it come direct, or will it touch a French port? We are interested in obtaining an answer to this question, because the hon. gentleman knows as well as I, that this is a most important point. The Finance Minister has spoken about a great Imperial route. I should like to know at the present time what are the means by which the connection is to be made with a French port? How is this to be done? Will steamers call at a French port after leaving England, or will they come direct to Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has asked for definite and exact information on a point with respect to which I am not prepared to give him definite and exact information. The only condition laid down, and it is the condition that has always been laid down, is that there shall be connection with a French port—the line shall go from Canada and Great Britain and to France. There are two ways in which this can be accomplished. One is that a vessel which leaves Halifax, St. John, Quebec, or Montreal shall itself make a French port. Another way, and it would be the natural method, is for the vessel's mails, passengers, and some freight to be landed at an English port, and then proceed to a French port, and after landing cargoes and return to the English port, load up and take on board mails and passengers. Under certain conditions that might be carried out, but, of course, it would depend a great deal on the port which was chosen in Great Britain. The other way in which it could be done would be to have a transit or cross service between an English port and a French port, run by the same company, and worked by the same line. One or other of these plans is the one which will be adopted, but which one will depend on the possibilities of the case.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the vessels go in any case to an English port first?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. If Plymouth or Southampton was chosen, passengers and mails would be landed there, and possibly some of the freight, but in that case the freight port would probably be London, and the vessel would go there. If Liverpool was the port chosen, the difficulty of making a direct service would be very greatly enhanced, and the difficulty would be so great it would, I think, be impossible to do it. In that event, a cross service would be the most natural mode of making the connection.

Mr. LAURIER. I am surprised if hon. gentlemen opposite are satisfied with the information given by the Minister of Finance. The Government is asking Parliament to vote a subsidy of $750,000 a year under certain conditions stated, one of which is that there shall be connection with a French port; yet the hon. gentleman is not prepared to give to those who are expected to vote this subsidy an explanation as to the very point which hon. members wish to know.

Mr. FOSTER. I have given the explanation.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman said there are two ways, but they are very different ways of carrying out the service. This is an important point with those with whom we are negotiating as to the subsidy, those who will undertake to carry on this service, and they should know exactly what would be required of them. We should know whether the vessels will call at a French port or not, whether they will be allowed to go direct from France to Canada and from Canada to France, also whether connections will be made with other steamers, or whether they will be obliged to call at French and English ports themselves. If hon. gentlemen opposite are satisfied with these explanations, there is nothing more to be said, and I will let them say so, but as men of common sense I appeal to the House if the Minister is treating the House fairly when he is not prepared to give full information on this subject. Parliament has now been in session four months; this proposition is now brought down, but the Government cannot tell hon. members what they are prepared to do in this connection. I submit that if the majority are satisfied with such treatment, it is for them to say so, but the country cannot accept it, nor can this side of the House accept it. We have ample reason to expect from the hon. Minister full information, and yet he simply states that there are two ways in which this matter can be carried out. Anybody, however, could tell us that fact as well as the Minister. But it is as to which of the two ways will be adopted that we desire information.

Mr. DAVIN. In the North-west and in Manitoba we take great interest in this fast line service, and we are very anxious that the Government should take guarantees as to the freight rates that will be charged by this line. A short time ago we discussed the question of ocean freight rates, and I hope that before any arrangement is made with this new company the Government will take guarantees that a maximum rate will be fixed. There is another matter which I have no doubt the Government will watch, and that is that satisfactory arrangements should be made for cold storage, as I hope by the time this line is working, we in the North-west and

Manitoba will have made arrangements for doing a large export business in that line, and I hope, therefore, the Government will see that satisfactory arrangements are made in that regard. There is another suggestion I would venture to throw out, and it is this. At the present moment twenty knots an hour seems to be a very high rate of speed, but twenty years from now, or even ten years, twenty knots an hour across the Atlantic may not be the maximum speed; and I think it would be well to consider whether in making any arrangements with this company the Government should take care not to tie its hands in this matter of speed, but to make such an arrangement as will bind the company ten or fifteen years hence to give us a service that will attain the maximum speed of that day, or a speed having the relative position to the maximum speed of ocean-going vessels that twenty knots occupies to-day. As the leader of the Opposition has said, I am not an expert any more than he is, and I cannot say now whether large ocean vessels steam faster than twenty knots an hour. An hon. friend says twenty-one knots. If that be the maximum of speed at the present time, the speed we are bargaining for stands as twenty is to twenty-one, and it would be very easy to make such an arrangement that ten, fifteen or twenty years hence, if the maximum speed was then twenty-three knots, a relative advance would be made by the company with which we are entering into arrangements. But what we in the North-west—and I am speaking now after consultation with my friends from Manitoba and the North-west—are most anxious about is: that the Government should take guarantees as to the freight rates that should be charged, and that a maximum shall be fixed, so that we shall not be in the position that we were told the other night we are in to-day, and that this steamship company which will be chartered by ourselves shall not take into account what the price of the cattle, dead or alive, will be in Liverpool, and instead of calculating the rate at which they will carry freight with a view to a fair profit, that they will not simply ask themselves what rate can this freight bear. I hope that these few remarks will be considered by my hon. friend the Finance Minister, and that he and the Government will bear in mind these matters about which we are anxious, namely, freight charges and ample capacity for cold storage, while at the same time looking forward to the relative maximum speed.

Sir JAMES GRANT. I was very pleased indeed to hear our Finance Minister introduce this resolution with reference to a fast steamship service. The able and exhaustive address which he delivered, so comprehensive in its character and involving almost every point in connection with the question under discussion, makes it quite unnecessary for me to detain the House at any length in discussing this very important question. We have also heard the extremely able and comprehensive statement of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, on the important question as to the navigation of the Lower St. Lawrence. We know perfectly well that the capitalists of Great Britain from whom we expect the money to establish this Atlantic service will look very carefully at this discussion in the Canadian House of Commons before they embark in this progressive enterprise. If the navigation of the Lower St. Lawrence was so impracticable as some would lead us to suppose, do we fancy for one moment that the capitalists of England would help us to carry out this very desirable undertaking. Far from it. But the statements brought forth to-night with reference to this question, are so conclusive in their character, and from such eminent authorities who have given a life study to the matter, that we have no reason to doubt that the navigation of the St. Lawrence, is as safe as the navigation of any waterway in the world. Some twenty years ago when the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was under discussion, one of the great problems before us, was the water stretches. To-day with another great project submitted to this country to complete a system of rapid service not only across the Atlantic continent but across the great oceans, we find that the question of the navigation of the Lower St. Lawrence is again disturbing the equilibrium of those who ought to help us through with this most great scheme. I doubt if at any time in the history of Canada a more important proposition was ever placed before our people than that which we are now considering. Living as we do in a progressive age, we require to keep in pace with the times. We know that our neighbours to the south of line 45, have very materially advanced the interests of their great country by those lines of rapid steamers, sailing from New York to the various ports of Europe. Are we not aware of the fact that our principal Canadians take the New York route to Europe in preference to the boats sailing from our own ports, which doubtless rendered great service to Canada in their time, but which to-day lack the speed of the fast American ships. Having the country we have, having a people of such energy and activity, and developing such extraordinary resources as we have developed by the Canadian Pacific Railway within the last twenty years, it is absolutely necessary for us, not only to have rapid transit from one end of the country to the other, but also to have a fast service across the Atlantic. We cannot keep pace with the times unless we engage in this enterprise. What does a fast service mean? A fast service brings us in more immediate and speedier contact with the outside world, and it will cause many individuals to come to our country and see our resources, who otherwise would not visit us. It has been pointed out by a very able authority, a gentleman whose opinions are looked up to with pride and satisfaction—I refer to Sir William Van Horne—a gentleman who has studied the lines of travel in the great American republic. He has pointed out that the most rapid lines of travel are those along which the greatest settlement has taken place. We know that we have the thorax of the Dominion in our great North-west Territories, and in order to bring the tide of immigration into that country, we must have facilities to transport it there, and to transport it with the greatest rapidity. If there is one thing more than another deserving of the support of public men in this country, it is that they should lend a hand to carry out this fast service within as short a time as possible, in order to encourage as great a tide of immigration here as we possibly can have. We hear a great deal about the expenditure of $750,000 a year for this service. We remember that when the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was under consideration, Sir Charles Tupper came down with a measure asking twenty-two and a half million dollars to complete that road, and we know that those who had the progressive idea of this country in mind at once acquiesced in and voted for it. Let us remember the vast benefits which that great line of railway has conferred upon Canada. At one time this national highway was looked upon by many as a sort of lusus naturae, but it has brought the outside world to recognize the fact that in no country is there to be found a people possessed of a more go-ahead and progressive spirit, than is to be found among our five millions of Canadians. Has not that railroad developed our resources and brought us a great tide of immigration? We have asked for quantity, and quality from our immigrants, and we have got the quality, for no country in the world has been blessed with a more desirable class of settlers who have come here to make homes for themselves. We prefer having suitable immigrants to undesirable immigrants in large numbers. We do not want paupers to come to this country; we want individuals with moderate means who will help to contribute to our resources and to the advancement of our material interests. The Canadian Pacific Railway, therefore, instead of being a failure as some faint-hearted people prophesied at its inception, has concentrated and developed the resources of Canada in a manner that we have every reason to feel proud of. This railroad has not only developed our country, but it has united us as a people from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It has accomplished even more than that in this short space of time. We must have a fast line to complete the entire circle from the east to the west. We know what steam and electricity will do for us; and when this fast line of steamships is an accomplished fact, undoubtedly the Pacific cable will follow That is very desirable, and we must have it, because the trade of the country will demand it. I do not take much stock in the observations which were made by Sir John Colomb at the Royal Colonial Institute, London. I read the able address which was recently delivered by our Commissioner, Sir Charles Tupper, on the resources of Canada, and I felt that it was one in which every Canadian had reason to feel pride. It is a statement which does great credit to him, and which must tend to advance the interests of this country. Canada has played a most important part in the Empire, and no less a part in the past than in the present. What has that great conference which recently took place in Ottawa done? It has shown the outside world, and the representatives of the other colonies assembled here, that the statesmen now in power in the Dominion of Canada were willing to undertake the responsibility of sending the Minister of Trade and Commerce to Australia to see what they could do to assist us in promoting the unity of the Empire. We know what conferences have done in the past; and history is repeating itself. The great conference that took place one hundred and twenty years ago, to the south of us, when the representatives of the thirteen colonies met at Philadelphia. True, they separated from the British Empire and established their independence. That conference brought about the greatest schism that ever took place in the Anglo-Saxon race. Another conference was held in Prince Edward Island thirty years ago, when the representatives of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island met at Charlottetown, and by wise and careful deliberations formulated principles which united us together and enabled us to enjoy to-day the glorious privileges of Confederation. The past few days we have had another conference, a conference still more important, which has brought together representatives of the seven self-governing colonies to meet representatives of the seven provinces of the Dominion of Canada and the representative of Great Britain. This important assembly met in this capital, selected by Her Majesty, on the anniversary of the very day Her Majesty ascended the throne, as if there was something behind it. I look upon this conference as one of the most important events in the history of our country, and I believe that it will result in bringing about, not only a fast Atlantic service, but a cable service between this continent and Australia. There is one other point to which I wish to call attention, that is, to the route across this North American continent compared with the old eastern route. If we compare these two routes in a sanitary point of view, I may be asked as a medical man, to say what I think about them. I say that the route across the North American continent is vastly superior to that by way of the Suez Canal. Who can compare the hot atmosphere of the Suez Canal, sweeping across the arid sands of the desert, with the exhilarating atmosphere across the Dominion of Canada by way of the Canadian Pacific Railway? I believe the day is not far distant when we shall have a fast service from Australia, Japan and the east across the Pacific, over the Dominion of Canada and home to England. I feel proud as a Canadian to consider what has been accomplished in so short a space of time. I will not go over the ground so ably traversed by the hon. Minister of Finance. Suffice it to say, that I am pleased to have this opportunity of offering a few observations, and I trust that when the vote is taken there will be no division in according to our Minister the fullest support possible for the well-timed resolution which he has placed before the House on this interesting and important occasion.

Mr. MARTIN. As I said a moment ago, if we are to have a fast service, I quite agree with the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), that attention should be paid by the Government to the question of rates upon the ocean. However, I rise for a different object. The hon. Finance Minister, as I understood him, has based his support of this proposition almost entirely upon sentiment—upon the grand idea that passengers were to be taken from Australia, across the Pacific Ocean on practically Canadian and Australian steamers, across the American continent, through Canada upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, and then across the Atlantic to the old country upon a line of steamers sailing from a Canadian port and subsidized by the Canadian Government. I beg to draw his attention, and the attention of the House, to this fact, that at the present time through passengers from Australia to England, and those from England to Australia, instead of passing through Canada over the Canadian Pacific Railway, pass for nearly half the distance across the continent through the United States. The Canadian Pacific Railway, instead of taking those through passengers over the fertile plains of Canada, which are to be filled up with the immigrants spoken of by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, take them through a large part of the United States. If, as the hon. gentleman has suggested, this fast line of communication between Australia and England is to result in settling the country, we have to ask ourselves what country it is which is to be settled. Because, let me point out that the great competitor with Manitoba for immigration is the states to the south of us, notably North Dakota. Now, the Canadian Pacific Railway, under the name of the Minneapolis, St. Paul and Sault Ste. Marie Railway, ordinarily known as the "Soo line," passes from the north-west corner of North Dakota, right through that state and comes out at the south-east corner, so that those through passengers, instead of being able to see the fertile plains of Manitoba and the North-west, go through a portion of the North-west in which they will hardly see a farm, in which the farms are few and far between. They go only as far east as Pasqua, which is a few miles on the other side of Regina, thus passing through a portion of the North-west which is almost entirely devoted to ranching, and in which they will scarcely see a farm: going on to the boundary through another portion of the country in which they will scarcely see a farm; then passing through the states of North Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and the northern part of Michigan; and coming back into Canada at Sault Ste. Marie. This is the route taken by those through passengers at the present time. Of course, it is true that there is also the Canadian Pacific Railway running from Pasqua to Sudbury, all through Canadian territory, and if the Government will arrange with the Canadian Pacific Railway to take through passengers over that line through the plains of the North-west, through the fertile plains of Manitoba, through the city of Winnipeg, then they will be able to base their idea of sentiment upon some facts. But, so far as I can see, the Canadian Pacific Railway will, in the future, probably pursue the policy they are following at present, and have been following ever since the Soo line was opened for traffic, namely, that of sending practically all their through passengers through those states I have mentioned over the Soo line, thus leaving Winnipeg on a branch road, so far as that through traffic is concerned. I may say that Sudbury is about 1,400 miles from Pasqua or Moosejaw, where the Soo railway leaves the main line. The distance is about the same either way. In fact, I fancy it is about fifty miles further over the Soo line. This point, where the Soo line leaves the main branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is some 400 miles west of Winnipeg, so that when, through the forces of nature and other circumstances over which this Parliament has no control, but to which the Canadian Pacific Railway, as a business enterprise, were bound to give attention, the present state of affairs was brought about, we find that the through passengers never see those portions of the North-west they should see, never see the city of Winnipeg, but are taken to similar portions of the United States, devoted to similar industries and to agriculture. Instead of going through the city of Winnipeg, instead of seeing the results of Canadian enterprise, in the North-west, they go through the cities of Minneapolis, and St. Paul, and never learn really the resources and position of the north-western portion of Canada. I regret very much this circumstance, and I think it detracts a very great deal indeed from the basis of sentiment on which the hon. Minister of Finance founds this proposition. The distance from Montreal to Vancouver is some 2,900 miles. The distance from Sudbury, where the Soo line leaves the Canadian Pacific Railway, to Pasqua, where the Soo line again joins with the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is something over 1,400 miles, so that for almost half the distance from Montreal to Vancouver the passengers are taken through American territory. I may say that the Canadian Pacific Railway have made special efforts to make the Soo line attractive in every way to the travelling public. They have put a magnificent service on that line, and have succeeded in taking almost every through passenger in that direction. This is a matter in which the city from which I come feels specially aggrieved. We feel specially aggrieved that after Canada has spent so many millions constructing a railway into the North-west, and after so much has been said of the benefits of a great line of communication from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the cruel fact remains that instead of that communication taking place through Canadian territory, as it was expected it would, so far as through passengers are concerned—from whom we expected a great deal in the way of advertising our country and bringing its natural resources before the world at large—these passengers never see Winnipeg, but that city is really side-tracked, and the money we have spent goes to the benefit of the people in North Dakota.

Mr. KENNY. I am very much surprised to hear the statement which has just fallen from the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). I am sure that the House generally will be equally surprised and disappointed to learn from that hon. gentleman that the policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway is actually to divert traffic from Canada instead of through Canada. One object of a fast Atlantic service is to divert the passenger traffic across this continent, which the hon. gentleman tells us goes largely through the United States, to the Canadian route, and I supposed that there were no men in Canada so interested in carrying out that policy as the owners of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I know that as soon as the Canadian Pacific Railway was completed, those who were in the active management of that railway intimated their intention of endeavouring to procure from the Imperial Government a contract for the transportation of the eastern Asiatic mails, the mails from China and Japan, over their railways to Vancouver and by a line of steamers on the Pacific ocean. The gentlemen who are prominent in the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway did, in conversation with me, and I am sure with many other members of this House, explain that it would be a decided advantage to them if the passenger traffic from Europe to China and Japan, which now goes by the way of the United States, could be diverted to Canada. The men who make these long journeys are necessarily men who have a good bank account, because the expense of the journey is so great that it is only men that are well to do who can make it, and it is desirable that when these gentlemen cross the American continent they should go by the Canadian route, because though they travel for the purposes of pleasure or of business, they would occasionally stop off on Canadian soil to admire our beautiful scenery and our magnificent prairie country and would be tempted to make investments and take an interest in the development of the resources of Canada. Now, how is it that we lose that passenger traffic to-day? It is due to this fact, that the man in England and on the continent of Europe, who desires to make that trip, has first to cross the Atlantic ocean. He puts himself in communication with the agents of the various steamship lines crossing the Atlantic, and is told by them that the direct service to Canada is an inferior service, that it is a slow service, and that if he wants to make the voyage in comfort, and speedily, he must go to New York. What happens? When he arrives in New York, his intention is to take the Canadian route across the continent, but he has letters of introduction to bankers and others in New York, he explains his object, and they use all their influence to induce him to take the American and avoid the Canadian route; and I always thought that there were no people in Canada so much concerned in this fast Atlantic service as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Hon. members of this House will remember that a year or two ago it was stated in the newspapers that that railway company was desirous of making some arrangement with the Government of Canada for placing a line of steamers on the north Atlantic—a fast service—and I should have been glad had they succeeded in so doing. I would have been glad for this reason, that whilst the companies, which are only owners of steamships, are merely interested in getting passengers to cross the Atlantic, the Canadian Pacific Railway, if it owned the steamships, would be equally interested in getting those passengers to remain as long as possible in Canada, and in inducing them to settle in Canada.

Mr. MARTIN. If the hon. gentleman will allow me—perhaps he is not aware that the Soo Line, of which I have spoken and which runs from Sault Ste. Marie to North Portal, south of Regina, is owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. KENNY. I am quite aware of that, Mr. Chairman. I assure the hon. gentleman that I sympathize with the regret he has expressed to this House that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the transportation of passengers who come from Europe, across this continent, should divert them to their American route from their Canadian route—which I understand to be his cause of complaint—and I think it is a very just one, and it is contrary to all the policy which I have heard expressed by the managers of that company. The hon. gentleman has told the House that the service established by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company along their American route is an attractive one. I think he must also admit that their service by their Canadian route is an equally attractive one. I suppose that if a passenger, contemplating crossing the continent either way and purchasing a ticket at Montreal or Vancouver, expressed a preference to go by the Soo road, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will offer no objection. But I am surprised, and I think the House will be surprised to hear that after all that Canada has done for the development of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the officers of that company are now energetically diverting the course of travel from the Canadian route to their American route. In fact it has always appeared to me that, as far as Canada was concerned, we could never derive the full benefit which I expected from the large expenditure we have made in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and from the large subsidy we are now paying to steamships on the Pacific ocean plying between Canada and Japan and between Canada and Australia: until we had an efficient service, a fast service, on the Atlantic Ocean. This matter has been frequently under discussion in the House ever since I have had the honour to sit here. I am convinced the majority of the people of Canada desire that Canada shall have her own transatlantic mail service. I believe that they desire that it shall be an effective service and that it shall be in its aim, object and administration essentially Canadian. Objection has been taken by the hon. the leader of the Opposition on the ground that the character of the service between the terminal port in England and France has not been sufficiently defined. Now, the hon. gentleman must know that ever since the Cunard Line was established, or from a date soon after it was established and down to the present day, it has always had a service between Liverpool and Havre for their French commerce. I imagine that it would be possible, if the present project is successful, as I sincerely trust it may be, to make some such arrangements between the English port and the continent as is conducted to-day by the Cunard Line between Liverpool and Havre. As regards the amount of the subsidy, it is a large amount; but I think the country will be more reconciled to pay the subsidy mentioned when it is considered that the tenders which have been made to the Government of Canada during recent years for the sixteen-knot service were half a million dollars a year, that the Furness Company, a company well and favourably known asked, for a sixteen-knot service, $900,000 a year, and that the French company, for a seventeen-knot service, asked $750,000. So there is nothing unreasonable in the amount which the Government is asking us to vote for a thoroughly efficient service. The difficulties of diverting travel from its accustomed routes are great, and, no doubt, even when this service is established, it will be a matter of time and will require energy and activity and ability on the part of the owners of these steamers and their managers to divert travel from its accustomed routes. These considerations, I think, would warrant us in making a contract for ten years, with a renewal subsequently. Reference has been made to the St. Lawrence route. I expressed my individual opinion upon that part of the question on previous occasions in this House, and I am of the same opinion, still I would not venture to say one word, in a debate like the present, against any route; for this reason—that I know that no matter how humble may be the position a man occupies in this House, this project is met with hostility, as it has enemies, as the vested rights are opposed to it, and as they have made their influence felt not only in Canada, but on the other side of the Atlantic, in Glasgow, Liverpool and London, that every word that is said against this service in this House will be quoted against it in the London newspapers, and in the Liverpool and Glasgow newspapers as well. But I must say, and I am simply repeating what I have said here before, that if Canada's ambition is to place on the Atlantic a service which shall run with the regularity of a ferry, it should start in England from a non-tidal port and should run to the same non-tidal port all the year round in the Dominion of Canada. When I made that statement before in the House I felt that I was taking a position very much in advance of the public sentiment of Canada to-day. It is thought desirable in the public interest that we should have this service running to Quebec during the summer months and to such port as may be found suitable during the winter months, that, under any circumstances, whether it is a twenty-knot service or a fifteen-knot service, it shall be essentially Canadian, and that its terminal port all the year round shall be within the Dominion of Canada. I have referred to the hostility of vested interests. Certain railway interests are evidently hostile to any arrangements which would take the winter terminal port from Portland, in Maine, for this reason—that these railway companies have made their arrangements and have made their outlays of capital in Portland in connection with this service and they are positively hostile to any change of terminal port in the winter. The fact is that we have been for many years past subsidizing a line of steamers which was largely instrumental in building up a foreign port at the expense and to the detriment of our own Canadian port. I am of the opinion that this fast Atlantic service is a national necessity. A country of 5,000,000 of population, we have spent $100,000,000 or more upon a transcontinental railway system, and as often happens in business, it becomes a necessity for us to make a further investment of capital in order to protect the original outlay. Therefore, I think it is manifestly to the interest of Canada that we should establish on the Atlantic a service which will be in keeping with our railway service, and which will be in keeping with the steamship services which we have on the Pacific Ocean, and with the aspirations of the Canadian people. I read recently in a newspaper published in the interest of hon. gentlemen opposite, a statement that the fast Atlantic scheme would, if adopted, be quite as bad for Canada as the Canadian Pacific Railway was. I sincerely hope that the fast Atlantic service may be as great a benefit to Canada as the Canadian Pacific Railway has been. It is my opinion, and I know it is shared by hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House, that no public work done in Canada since Confederation has benefited us so much as the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, no other act has so attracted the attention of the mother country and of capitalists throughout the world, and of the people to the south of us, no other act has so raised us in the estimation of our own people as the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is my opinion that if we succeed in the project we now have in hand, benefits will result equally advantageous to this Dominion. Why Mr. Chairman, it is within the knowledge of all of us that of the gentlemen who came from the Antipodes to attend here the conference which has been so eloquently referred to by the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant), those who came from the west came by our Canadian route; the British flag waved them a farewell when they sailed from Australia; it floated over them on the voyage from Australia to Canada, and welcomed them when they arrived in Canada. How was it with the gentlemen who came to this conference from the east? I believe every one of them crossed the Atlantic from England to New York; not one of those gentlemen who came to this conference from the east, came by the Canadian steamers. Other things being equal they would have preferred to come by the Canadian route, but owing to the fact that the service is so inferior as compared with that which exists to New York, they did not travel by it. We know that there is not a single day in the week in which one or more steamers are not entering the port of New York from Europe and from Great Britain, and yet so anxious are the Americans to have a service essentially their own, that by special Act of Congress they have purchased two British ships, and the Cramps, of Philadelphia, are now building two more ships for that service. Those of us who have crossed the Atlantic from New York, know that the ships which leave that port are first-class in every respect; they are magnificently and luxuriously fitted up, and they are sailing frequently. If it is good for the Americans to have a service of their own, I say it is good for Canadians to have a service of their own. The outlay is large, I admit; but if the hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to examine closely they will find that the $750,000 which we pay out yearly will actually be disbursed in Canada by these steamships. They will require to purchase each trip about 2,500 tons of Canadian coal, the value of which will be about $6,000. If you multiply that sum by fifty-two weekly trips, you have something like $300,000. Then we must remember that these steamers will carry about 3,000 tons of freight, although we cannot expect they will always be filled with freight; and hon. gentlemen will realize that the expenses of these ships, their ordinary disbursements, what they will pay for provisions, etc., will involve an expenditure in Canada annually which will equal the $750,000 which we pay out as a subsidy. It has been said that one of the great benefits which it is hoped will accrue to our fellow colonists and to Canada as a result of this conference, will be the establishment of a cable between Australia and Canada. Now, for my own part I should imagine that a completed service super mare would be more beneficial, more appropriate, than a service sub mare, and that really the sub mare service should follow the super mare. However that may be, I trust that if the cable is established, it will confirm and strengthen the pleasant relations which were inaugurated recently between Canada and the other colonies of the empire. But it does appear to me that it would be more proper to complete our steamship service. The opponents of this project urge that we must be economical. Economy is a very good thing, very praiseworthy, very commendable; but after all, economy never built the Canadian Pacific Railway nor any other great work in Canada. While I think it is wise to be economical, I think this is a project which will result in great benefits to Canada. I think it is an object which is earnestly to be hoped for, devoutly to be prayed for, and cheerfully paid for.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is quite clear that my hon. friend who has just taken his seat is very anxious to get a fast Atlantic service, so as to benefit the city from which he comes.

Mr. KENNY. I did not say a word about it.

Mr. McMULLEN. He thought a great deal about it, although he did not mention it. No doubt the city of Halifax was in the hon. gentleman's mind. Now, we have endeavoured this afternoon to extract from the Government information regarding the ultimate results to Canada of the fast Atlantic service. After the Finance Minister moved the second reading of this resolution my hon. friend put a number of questions to him, one of which was with regard to the length of the route by the east, and by the continent of America to the Australian colonies, the difference in length, and the possible difference in time, and the Minister could not tell what the difference in length was; he had not even given the question that much consideration. Then when we inquired with regard to the character of the freight that these fast steamers would carry he was not in a position to give us any information at all. The hon. gentleman might very well have armed himself with a great deal of information on both these points. Had he taken the trouble to inquire what was the class of freight carried in the fast Atlantic service that comes to New York, he could easily have found out whether Canada produces to any considerable degree that kind of freight that is carried from American ports to Liverpool, and whether the same kind of freight would likely be carried by our fast Atlantic service from Quebec or Halifax to Liverpool. That information we certainly should have had. The country will unquestionably expect from the Government answers to the questions which we have put to-night, and which have not yet been answered. I do not think that the House should be treated as it has been treated to-night during the discussion of this question. Hon. gentlemen opposite have trifled with the House in connection with this very important question. It is a very large amount to contribute, $750,000 a year for ten years. This capitalized at a reasonable rate of interest represents about twenty million dollars, which could be better utilized than by expending it on a fast Atlantic service. How are the labouring classes and the farming community to benefit by such a service? The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has spoken in regard to cold storage. If such provision were made on board of the steamers, no doubt it would prove advantageous. We would like to see the establishment of a dead meat company in Canada, for it would be beneficial to the country; but our experience in that regard in the past has not been a happy one. The enterprise had an unfortunate ending, and a considerable amount of money was lost in it; but we would like to see it re-established. I wish to point out in connection with the trade done that no information has been given as to the freight that will be shipped, and as to how Canada is to be benefited by it. We are told that we are to have some transcontinental traffic, and the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant) made an eloquent speech on that subject. Winnipeg trains, however, go through Minnesota, Dakota and the northern states instead of through Canada, and then from Ottawa to the coast the Canadian Pacific Railway route is by way of the Short Line, which runs through the State of Maine. There are two links wanting even in that portion of the route. When the hon. gentleman again proposes to rise and make a patriotic and kite-flying speech he should recast it, and make provision for those two missing links in the national transcontinental line to which he has referred. I contend that the Government should be in a position to give the House more information on this subject. What are we to say to the people with respect to the advantages to be derived from a fast Atlantic service? What practical provisions are to be made with respect to the charges for freight, and what kind of freight is to be carried? We have no information on these points—half of the questions asked have not been answered by the Government. Perhaps this lack of information is due to the fact that the Finance Minister is not in a state of health to enable him to give the subject full consideration. If such is the case, then some other members of the Cabinet should have studied it in order to have been able to furnish the House with intelligence and courtesy that information to which we are entitled.

Mr. WELDON. I desire to say a very few words in support of the resolution now before the House. There is no doubt that the bold and courageous measure which has been introduced to-day is one worthy of the strongest support of hon. members. I cannot share the pessimistic view as regards the prospects of the company that organizes a twenty-knot service on the Atlantic in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway and with the Australasian service. If hon. gentlemen will take a map and look at the North Atlantic they will see there is from the Straits of Belle Isle to land on the Irish coast an open sea, which these vessels will cover in three clear days, which is explained by the fact that they will run so far north. After the consideration which was presented to the House by the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant), namely, the comfort in the summer of the northern route, the advantage of our cool climate, we can see at once that if there is a vigorous movement on the land by the railway companies, by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, to tap the centres of the population of Canada, and the great cities in the north-western states, there is no reason, apart altogether from the question of tapping the Australasian trade, why this route should not derive a large revenue from passengers alone. This country contains five millions of people, many of them wealthy people, who are well able to travel, and who have social and trade connections with the British Isles, and if we can obtain a line equal to the great New

Mr. McMILLAN.

York lines, we may hope to draw our Canadian people to our own steamship lines. Besides, there are close at hand, four large cities, Detroit, Chicago, and the twin cities of Minnesota, Minneapolis and St. Paul, with two millions and a quarter of people in those four cities alone, having intimate trade connections with the British Isles, travelling there very frequently—cities full of wealth, and including, of course, many people who travel—if our railways can tap these great centres they will at once have a guarantee for passenger traffic sufficient to make this new steamship line a success. I am now speaking of summer travel. All this traffic is without any regard to the hope we have of diverting a considerable portion of the passenger traffic from those distant colonies of the Empire which are in the under-half of the world. What are the advantages to be derived by Canada, apart from sentiment? Surely it is a great advantage to the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway, and the Intercolonial Railway, to increase their traffic in this way, and these results form no inconsiderable portion of the total practical economic advantages to be derived from the vigorous carrying out of the resolution now before the House. But, Mr. Speaker, is the hope of diverting the traffic from Australasia altogether a vain hope? Is there any considerable passenger travel from the Australian colonies to the British Islands now which we may fairly hope to divert to the Canadian route? My information derived from gentlemen resident in Australia and also from gentlemen from the Antipodes who have been in our city, is that there is an enormous stream of passenger traffic in the early months of the year, January, February, and March, composed of people who are making their way from those colonies to Europe. The Peninsula and Oriental Line runs a fortnightly service, and during those three months of the year the vessels carry swarms of people, the berths being taken long before the vessels sail. The Orient line has also a fortnightly sailing—they are magnificent boats, and their cabins are always crowded. A French company, the Messageries Maritimes, has a monthly sailing, and the vessels are crowded during the early months of the year with colonists going to the British Isles. During October, November and December, and the early part of January, when they are returning to their homes, these vessels are crowded again. The North German Lloyd, too, which has a monthly running to Australia, must not be forgotten, besides which there are a number of smaller lines carrying a great many passengers. I have already mentioned that there is enormous travel during the months of January, February and March, and also during October, November, and December; but, during the intervening six months there is also considerable travel. Now, what hope have we of diverting any considerable portion of that traffic? If we can tell the people of Australia that they can be carried across the Atlantic in three clear days and we can assure them of what gave me the very highest pleasure to hear from the Minister of Marine when he gave the House an official and guarded account as to the safety of the St. Lawrence route, when these facts are put before the people of the Australasian colonies, and also the people of the western states, what an attractive programme we are able to present. We have heard, recently, the opinion of Australian gentlemen visiting Ottawa as to the transcendent grandeur and beauty of the three ranges of mountains lying between the prairie and the western sea. Our friends who have travelled by the eastern route, have also told us of the drawbacks to the Suez route, of the terrible storms which prevail in those torrid seas, of the intolerable heat of the Indian Ocean and the Red Sea, and dismal days when travelling through the Suez Canal and the Eastern Mediterranean. The Pacific route is charming. The Canadian route is simply magnificent, and with three days of open sea on the Atlantic, how much more attractive to wealthy people is it to point them to this northern cool Canadian route. So I say with regard to the trade of Canada in the first place, and with reference to the passenger traffic from Australia in the second place, that those in this House are not acting fairly who speak haltingly or doubtfully of this project, which to those of us who have given it some study, seems abounding in promise. I shall not speak of the other phases of the project now. I confess that I am an ardent Imperialist whose strong hope is that this Empire, now well united, shall be more thoroughly united and not disintegrated. To me it is of considerable moment and satisfaction that these ships that cross the long wash of Australasian seas, and that these Atlantic ships which cross from Newfoundland to Ireland, shall be the carriers of a great commerce in peace and the convoys of that great commerce in war. To me it is a strong consideration that these ships will lend appreciable strength to the navy of England in protecting Canadian commerce in time of war. For these reasons I have the very greatest pleasure in supporting the resolution before the House.

Mr. HAZEN. After the speech to which the committee just listened, the remarks which I am going to make will be but commonplace and prosaic, as they will not deal in any degree at all with the great features of the scheme now under consideration by this Parliament, but with a matter that comes more particularly home to the constituency which I have the honour to represent in Parliament. When the provisional contract entered into between the Government and Mr. Huddart was laid on the Table of this House, there was a very great degree of irritation felt, not only in my constituency, but in the province of New Brunswick as well, because of the fact that the only Maritime Province port named in that contract as a suitable winter port at which these vessels should call, was the port of Halifax. It was felt that this conclusion had been come too entirely too speedily and without a fair consideration of the many advantages possessed by the port of the city of St. John. The people of that city had just made a very large expenditure upon their harbours, without one single dollar of federal assistance, they had put that harbour into excellent condition to do a large freight and passenger business, they had provided elevator accommodation and wharf accommodation, their harbour is in a most favourable geographical position, being 300 miles in round numbers nearer to the city of Montreal—the great distributing point of Western Canada, than Halifax is; and it was felt by the people of St. John that they stood in the best position to get whatever freight business might come to the Maritime Provinces during the winter months. The feeling of the citizens very naturally was: that without a fair consideration of the merits of the different ports, this Parliament would be asked to pass legislation which would have the effect of carrying away from the port of St. John business which in the course of nature—no subsidies at all being granted—might reasonably be expected to come to it. This feeling of irritation was based on ground so substantial that when I and my colleagues representing that constituency approached the Government and placed so strong a case before them, I am pleased to say that not only the Government, but the gentleman who is promoting this line, both consented that the provisional contract should be changed in regard to the provision which stated that the terminal port in the Lower Province should be Halifax. As has been announced here to-night by the Finance Minister, the provisional contract does not now state that Halifax shall be the port in the winter months, but that the terminal port in the Lower Provinces shall be either Halifax or St. John, or both.

Mr. LAURIER. How are they going to manage that?

Mr. HAZEN. It is agreed upon, and I have the authority of the Government and of Mr. Huddart that it is so.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand that, but how will it work? Will they go to Halifax and St. John, or to each port alternately, or how?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is to be determined by agreement between the company and the Government.

Mr. LAURIER. That is another of the points which has yet to be determined.

Mr. HAZEN. Under the provisional contract which now states that the winter port in the Maritime Provinces shall be Halifax or St. John, or both, there are four options. In the first place, after consideration, Mr. Huddart and the Government may come to the conclusion that taking all things into consideration the port of Halifax is the best port for the terminus of that line in the interests of the country as a whole. The second option is, that looking at it from the same standpoint, they may come to the conclusion that the port of St. John offers greater advantages than does the port of Halifax, and that in the interest of the trade of the country as a whole, the port of St. John should be selected as the terminal port. The third possibility for the Government is—and now we come to the question of both ports—that there should be an alternative trip to St. John and to Halifax, the vessel one week going to Halifax and the other week to St. John. The fourth alternative is this: that as now the Allan line of steamers come to Halifax and go to Portland, Maine, they might come to Halifax and then come up to St. John. These four propositions are all worthy of consideration, and I may say that as a representative of the province of New Brunswick and of the city of St. John, I am pleased that the matter has been placed in the position it is now in. I am satisfied that when it does come to be determined, it will not be determined without the most careful investigation and inquiry, on the part, not only of Mr. Huddart—who tells me that he will visit St. John and carefully examine the advantages possessed by that port—but also on the part of the Government. I trust that the conclusion come to will be the one best in the interests of the country as a whole. I am rejoiced that this provisional contract has been so changed, and I am rejoiced, not from a narrow sectional feeling, nor from a local feeling, but because I believe that in the interests of Canada it is most desirable that no mistakes should be made in the location of the terminal points, and that the greatest amount of care should be taken before these terminal points are finally decided on. Now that the contract has been changed in that way, on the representations and suggestions, and on the strength of the case which my colleagues and I were able to present, I know that the most careful investigation will take place before any conclusion is arrived at. This would not be the place for me, nor would the House at this late period of the session tolerate any discussion with regard to the merits of the different ports in the Maritime Provinces. There are many important advantages possessed by the port of St. John. Its favourable geographical position, the fact that it is much nearer western Canada than the port of Halifax, the fact that at all seasons of the year and during all the winter months it is absolutely free from ice, the fact that it is a safe port, as stated by such high authority as Sir John Hopkins, admiral of the North Atlantic squadron and other eminent navigators, all tell in its favour. The safety at the port is vouched for by the fact that the insurance rates, both on freight and hull, out of that port are as low as in the case of any other port in the Lower Provinces. All these are questions that will have to be weighed when the terminus comes to be considered. I am pleased that the matter has been placed in the position it is now in. It places us on an equal basis with the other Maritime Province ports. It is a recognition of the merits possessed by the harbour of St. John. It shows that the rights of that port have to be considered in matters of this sort, and I believe that this recognition by the Government and by the Parliament of this country, will go a long way to dispel the erroneous idea which has existed for many years in different parts of the Dominion; that the navigation of the Bay of Fundy and the harbour of St. John is not of a safe character. The very contrary can be demonstrated, and will be demonstrated to the satisfaction of those interested in this steamship line.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have heard to-night from a great many sections of the country interested in the fast Atlantic service, and a great many interests have been represented in this discussion; but one very important interest has not received that attention which it deserves; I refer to the tax-paying interest. In my opinion we are entering upon a scheme, in connection with this fast Atlantic service, that will develop the necessity for a much larger expenditure of money than is contemplated by the Government in the grant they are at present asking for. If it is true that tenders for a sixteen-knot service have been higher in some cases than the Government propose to ask from this House for a twenty-knot service, I think we may fairly assume that the amount asked for will be inadequate for the purpose they contemplate. It is necessary to build four vessels, costing £500,000 each, so that the total expense will be £2,000,000 sterling. We have presented to us to-night the fact that the Government have not matured properly their plan. We have no definite statement made by them as to how they propose to connect with a French port. We have heard it stated that they propose to have winter ports in the Maritime Provinces, but it is uncertain what ports will be selected. The Government have not given to this House any tangible assurance as to the amount of business which this steamship line will secure. The fact that its winter terminus will be different from its summer terminus proves that the business will shift from one route to another, and this line will labour under disadvantages such as the lines centering in New York do not labour under. The Government have a magnificent scheme in view, that is, to establish a weekly service on the Atlantic in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway route, and one of the great sources of revenue for this line is to be travel from Australia. Well, Sir, an expense that will naturally and necessarily follow the voting of this subsidy for a fast steamship line on the Atlantic will be an increased subsidy for a line between Vancouver and Australia, so as to enable the ships on the latter line to sail more often than once a month. If this scheme is carried out, the result will be that there will have to be a weekly service on the Pacific from Vancouver to Australia. This whole scheme involves a possible expenditure of from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000 a year, instead of an expenditure of $750,000. This grand scheme of a weekly line from Australia to Vancouver, to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and a fast line of steamships across the Atlantic, is a very fine scheme indeed—a captivating scheme. We have had a great deal of gush about this matter. But this thing is to cost money; it is to cost a great deal of money. It was stated to-day that our total debt is $305,000,000, and our net debt $240,000,000, and whatever schemes we may have in view, whatever our vaulting ambition may reach after, it is as well to stop and count the cost and consider the means we have at command. The trouble with Canada is that it is already overloaded. We have a population of 5,000,000, and we have been entertaining schemes commensurate with the resources of a population of 25,000,000. We are like the frog in the fable which wanted to become as large as an ox, and swelled up in contemplation of its resources until it burst. We are in danger of incurring obligations in this and other directions that will result, not in promoting the advancement or prosperity of this country, but will result in disaster. The Finance Minister this afternoon drew glowing pictures of the prosperity that would come to Canada as a result of this scheme—the doubling and trebling of our population. Sir, we have heard these prognostications made before, and against them we can present the naked fact that the population of this country is not increasing rapidly—that in the last decade it increased only 11 per cent, and in the previous decade less than 16 per cent. This cold fact, placed in juxtaposition with these glowing anticipations of growth and prosperity, might fairly check us in the schemes we are entertaining. Now, Sir, this annual subsidy of $750,000 is equivalent to an addition to the debt of this country of $20,000,000, and if it is necessary, as it will be before this scheme is made complete by the addition of a weekly service from Canada to Australia, to make that sum $1,500,000, that will be equivalent to an increase of $40,000,000 to the debt load of the country. The trouble is that great and captivating as the scheme is, the country is not able to pay the costs, and there is not enough in it for this country to assume the responsibility. England is interested in this matter; the Australian colonies are interested in it, and we are proposing to saddle ourselves with a great expense, incurred for the sake of promoting the prosperity and advancement, not of ourselves alone, but the prosperity and advancement of the mother country and the Australian colonies. I believe it is not in our interest to assume such onerous obligations. I believe we had better pause in this matter; we had better wait until the Government have more thoroughly matured the scheme, because it is perfectly evident that the scheme they have laid before the House is an immature scheme—that they are proposing a large expenditure with no definite idea of how the running expenses of the line are to be paid, or what its resources in the way of revenue and business are to be. It is certain that the Government in going into this matter will in all likelihood be assuming obligations and giving guarantees of stock for the purpose of building these boats, that will place us under serious responsibilities, with the result that we shall probably regret having, in the present strained state of our finances, incurred these obligations for problematical advantages, which will probably never be realized to the extent which the Government expect. For these reasons I say that we should consider the interest of the taxpayer. We should realize that Canada is a country already overburdened by debt and taxation, that we are carrying loads wholly out of proportion to our resources, and that, however grand and captivating these schemes may be, however much certain localities such as Halifax, St. John or Quebec may prosper by the establishment of this line, and the expenditure of this large sum of money, the great mass of the people of Canada are interested, not in embarking in such schemes, but in saving the money that they will cost.

Mr. McMILLAN. There is one idea which struck me when the hon. Minister of Finance was telling us that our agricultural population would be greatly benefited by this line to Australia. I wonder if the object of that line is to bring into Canada this six million of cattle, which we were told by one of the delegates, could be purchased in Australia at two pounds, ten shillings per head. As far as that fast line is concerned, I am perfectly convinced, as a farmer, that the statement of the Minister of Finance, that the farmers are in favour of the subsidy is without foundation and fact. They know well that they are not going to be benefited by it, but, on the contrary, will have an extra burden imposed upon them. We are paying at present $147,000 per year to a line of steamers to carry the mails. Should that line still continue to run, the trade that will be taken by this fast line will be the best paying trade that can be secured on the route. They are not going to carry the coarser freight, unless compelled to do so in order to complete their cargoes, and what ever coarser freight they will have to carry will have to be carried at a loss. It is absurd to say that a fast line across the ocean can be run as cheaply as a moderately fast line; and therefore, in order to make the traffic pay they will have to charge higher rates of freight, and the farming community will not thus be benefited. Before the Government ask the rate-payers to bear this extra burden, they should give us, in detail, the benefits that will accrue to them—whether it is by securing lower freight rates or in what other way. As regards the St. Lawrence route, which the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) said he would not like to say anything about, I must say that after having crossed by the St. Lawrence route many times during the past few years, I cannot agree in what the hon. Minister of Marine says regarding its safety. That hon. gentleman said that it is one of the safest routes for passengers. Well, Sir, I have always heard captains of those steamers say that the passage is a very dangerous one, and to argue that a line of steamers, running at the rate of twenty knots an hour, can be run with just as little risk close to the mainland as in the open ocean, is to argue an absurdity. If the hon. gentleman were on board the steamer on which I was crossing, when we were going through the Straits of Belle Isle at the rate of six or seven miles an hour, and when we only escaped by the skin of our teeth striking an iceberg, he would not venture to make such a statement. During three days in the beginning of June last year, while in the gulf of St. Lawrence, we did not make sixty miles on account of the hazy weather. On dull days and dark nights, the steamers on this route cannot make more than six miles an hour, and to say that they can run at the rate of twenty miles an hour is to seek to impose upon the credulity of the people. As a farmer, I am convinced that we will not get any increased accommodation owing to this fast line. All that will result will be the increased amount of taxation which we will have to pay; and our finances are in such a condition at present that the Government would do well to pause before imposing any extra burdens on the people. Certainly, one steamer a week entering the port at Montreal in the summer, or the port of Halifax in the winter, cannot have the effect of diverting a very large amount of passenger traffic to this country. That line will not even have the monopoly of carrying the mails, because we know that those who have letters to post, if they are not in time to catch these steamers, will send them by way of New York. I would ask the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) if it is not a fact that the Board of Trade of that city passed a resolution against this proposition? At that time it was stated that the winter port was to be at Halifax, but now the Government have left that point undecided, no doubt to draw the support of Maritime members to this measure. I do not believe that this will be any benefit to the farming community, because, as regards our most perishable products, such as fruit, apples, butter, cheese and eggs, if they are put into refrigerators on a moderately fast vessel, the trade will be served just as well as it would be by this line, because in any case the difference in time cannot be more than two days, and no hon. gentleman can maintain that the saving of a couple of days could be of any great advantage. This cry about the great advantage which is going to accrue to the farmers, is only a repetition of what we have been hearing for the last fifteen years as to the benefits accruing to them through the National Policy. But this session the Finance Minister was compelled to admit that the farmers and the labouring classes have to pay the whole amount of the duties imposed on the goods they consume. I shall certainly vote against this proposition, especially in view of the haphazard way in which we are asked to enter into this expensive arrangement.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I do not wish to detain the House at this late hour, but I cannot refrain, before the debate closes, referring to this one point in connection with the subject, and I do so as a protest against the manner in which the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House and the gentleman who preceded him dealt with it. They followed the line of some of those on that side who addressed the House, in condemning the Government because they did not bring down a detailed statement, showing how this scheme is to be made a commercial success. It must be apparent to any one that that is an impossibility. No doubt there is a difference of opinion on this point. I noticed in the papers some time ago that gentlemen from Montreal, who have much experience in steamship business, furnished figures to show that this scheme could not be made to pay. Their opinions, no doubt, are entitled to some weight, but we have opposed to their views those of other gentlemen prominently connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway, who expressed opinions directly the contrary. That simply shows to my mind that in any scheme of this character, when it is in its experimental stage, as this is at the present time, those who are in the very best position to form a judgment will differ as to its commercial success. So far as I am concerned, I think it is the duty of members of this Parliament who feel as I do to express themselves in favour of the scheme, and I have heard nothing in this debate which would lead me to the conclusion that there is anything to prevent the commercial success of the scheme. Let us, for a moment, consider the conditions which are required to make it a success. There are certain facts known to us all. There are certain principles which every person knows govern the movements of the travelling public. In the first place it is essential in these days that the conveyances should be made comfortable. Any company that undertakes to gain the patronage of the travelling public should furnish conveyances up to the standard of comfort and convenience, and even luxury, which the travelling public of these days demand. I understand that it is the intention of the promoters of this scheme and that it is contemplated by the Government that in this respect this line of steamships shall be equal to any that cross the Atlantic. The next great question is the question of safety. It is unnecessary that I should say anything upon that point after what has been said by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I was exceedingly pleased to hear the favourable statement he was able to make with regard to the navigation of the St. Lawrence. It confirms the favourable opinions I have always held of that route. And there is this further to be said: it must be remembered that in these northern latitudes, in the summer time, we have, during the twenty-four hours, some eighteen hours of daylight, and during the remaining six hours the darkness is not nearly so dense as in more southern latitudes. So that when a ship is at sea in northern latitudes she can maintain day and night the highest rate of speed, and the danger of collision with other ships or with floating ice is reduced to a minimum. In my opinion the advantage in point of safety is altogether with the Canadian route. Now, after comfort and safety are secured what is the next point? The next point is the question of speed. In my opinion the failure or success of this whole scheme turns upon this one point whether the line will be able to reduce the time required to make the journey between Europe and America. It is well known that in these days travellers almost universally go by the fastest trains and by the swiftest steamships. Other considerations may have their weight, but this I believe, is the question of vital importance. Now, let us consider for a moment, from such facts as are within our knowledge, what are the chances of the Canadian route becoming a success from this point of view. In the first place we have an important advantage in having the shortest mileage route. Any member of this House can convince himself of this fact if he will go into the library and stretch a string on the globe from Montreal, or from Chicago, or any other point in the North-western States to Liverpool and London. He will find that the direct line passes through the valley of the St. Lawrence and almost directly through the Straits of Belle Isle. In addition we have the longest land journey and the shortest ocean voyage. In point of speed, for saving of time that is of very great importance; for we all know that travel by land is faster than travel by water in the ratio at least of two to one. Consider the winter route. If you stretch a string on the globe from any point west to Halifax and thence to Liverpool or London, it is longer than it would be via the St. Lawrence; but if you stretch it to New York and from New York to Liverpool or London it is considerably longer still. Our geographical position gives us those advantages that we have by winter or summer route the shortest route and also the longest land journey and the shortest ocean voyage. These are advantages which nature has given us and which no rival route can take away, and these in themselves, in my opinion, are sufficient to settle the question in our favour. Let us test this in another way. The distance from Liverpool to Rimouski or Halifax is about 2,500 miles. A steamship running twenty miles an hour will make that voyage in five days and three or four hours. Allow sufficient time for delays in approaching land—or reckon it another way and allow the ship four or four and one-half days at full speed, twenty knots an hour, and, in approaching a harbour, twelve to sixteen knots an hour. She will make the journey easily in five and a half days. Rimouski is eight hours from Montreal, and Halifax is twenty-four hours from Montreal. The time required for a twenty-knot steamer from Liverpool to Montreal would be five days and twenty hours in summer and six and a-half days in winter. Now, the quickest time that can be made from New York is practically seven days. We hear about the record-breakers that make trips in five and a half days, but that means a trip from the lightship at Sandy Hook to the lightship at Queenstown Harbour. And if you will consult as I did to confirm my opinion, the returns of the American Post Office Department you will find that the fastest steamers between Britain and New York last year required seven and one-half days on an average for the delivery of mails between Liverpool and New York. The 'Umbria' and the 'Etruria,' the fastest steamers of the Cunard Line, required respectively 7 days, 11 hours, and 48 minutes, and 7 days, 11 hours, and 54 minutes. The 'Teutonic' and 'Majestic' require about the same, and even the 'Campania,' the new steamer of the Cunard Line, which has made such wonderful fast passages, breaking the record of all steamers that preceded her, in two trips in the summer of 1893, under the most favourable conditions, took 6 days, 22 hours and 18 minutes to deliver the mail between Liverpool and New York. Now, in the same summer, the summer of 1893, the 'Parisian,' which, I believe, is only a fourteen-knot steamer, delivered the mails between Liverpool and Montreal in seven days, or within a little more than an hour of the time of the 'Campania' on her fastest trip, when she was really running twenty-two knots an hour. It appears to me, with these facts before us, that if we take advantage of our geographical position, we can reduce the time required for the journey between Europe and America from ten to thirty hours within what is required at the present time between Great Britain and New York; and if we can do that, I believe the success of this scheme from a financial standpoint, is assured. Hon. gentlemen have asked for calculations. Well, the Minister of Finance made a statement to-night that these steamers were calculated to carry three hundred first-class passengers, two hundred second-class passengers, and one thousand steerage passengers. Now, it is simply a question whether we can get this traffic or not. Any school boy, if he takes these figures and calculates the receipts according to the ordinary passenger rates, will find that if these steamers can secure the passenger traffic there is no question that they will pay handsomely. If we can show that the journey can be made between Great Britain and America safely, and in from ten to thirty, or forty, or even, to some points, perhaps fifty, hours less than by New York, there appears to me to be nothing in the way of making this enterprise a commercial success. I may be more sanguine than other members, but I have had confidence for years that the time would come when we would have a fast Atlantic service, and when it would prove a commercial success. The information which I have been able to receive, and the information which has been laid before the House in this debate, confirms me in the opinion that all we require now is capital, business enterprise, good management and pluck to make this scheme a success. I cannot say what success will crown the efforts of Mr. Huddart, who has this scheme in charge, in the money markets of Great Britain, but I sincerely hope that he may be able to raise the capital required, and that he will be successful in carrying out this very important project which he has undertaken.

Mr. CHESLEY. After the long discussion which has taken place on the resolution now before the House, I shall not detain the House for any great length of time at this late hour. For several years past this question of a fast Atlantic steamship service has been before the country, and has been thoroughly discussed by the press of the country and by the boards of trade throughout the Dominion. I find from inquiry and from conversation that a large number of the members of this House believe that Canada ought to have a line of fast steamers on the Atlantic Ocean running directly between Canada and Great Britain. Whether this idea that is so prevalent, may be considered as sentimental, or whether it may be considered as a purely business matter, does not appear at the present time to enter into the question. The fact remains that a large number of the members of this House, especially from the western provinces and from the province of Quebec. believe, as I said, that Canada should have a line of steamers of her own, subsidized with Canadian money, and with the terminus in Canada. I may say that I am quite in accord with the idea that if we are to continue to subsidize steamers carrying mails across the Atlantic, the steamers should have their terminus in our own ports, and that our money should no longer be paid to lines of steamers having their terminus in foreign ports, the result of which is to build up the trade of those ports at the expense of this country. A great deal has been said in reference to the amount of money that it is proposed to give as a subsidy to this line of vessels. It will be remembered that in the session of 1889 the sum of $500,000 was voted by this House as a subsidy, and the Government were given authority to enter into a contract with an individual or a company for the purpose of establishing this line of steamers upon the Atlantic between Great Britain and Canada. Well, five years have elapsed since that enactment was placed upon our Statute-book, and so far as I have heard, no company or individual has made an offer to take advantage of this $500,000 and establish such a service. The matter has remained practically a dead letter for five years, and the Government now come to Parliament and ask authority to increase that amount by $250,000. The sum is a large one, and if we are to have this line of steamers, if the idea prevalent in this country is to be carried out, and this line of steamers is to be subsidized with three-quarters of a million dollars a year for ten years, then I think that all the information attainable as to the route, as to the ports, and everything else that would be a subject for fair consideration, ought to be laid before us and considered before the contract is finally arranged between the Government and any company that may accept the offer. I think the fact that an offer of $500,000 having been before the world for the last five years and no party having come forward to take advantage of it, is the very best evidence that the sum is considered insufficient by people who are interested in such matters. Therefore, if we are to have a line of this character, it is absolutely necessary that the amount of subsidy should be increased, and that the inducement held out should be strengthened. Now, this line has chiefly been discussed to-night as a mail and passenger line, but we are told that these steamers are not only to carry mails and passengers, but that they will be able to carry three or four thousand tons of freight; therefore, they are to become a freight line as well as a mail and passenger line. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) says that these vessels should run from a non-tidal port to a non-tidal port, and I suppose that what is uppermost in his mind is that these vessels are to make fast trips across the ocean between the two nearest points of land. That may be all very well if you consider the matter in connection with mails and passengers alone, but if these vessels are to carry three thousand tons of freight, the condition of things is entirely altered. We all know that water carriage is much cheaper for freight than land carriage, and it behooves the Government and the contractor, whoever he may be, in dealing with this matter of a mixed character of freight, passengers and mail, to consider where the terminal point of this business shall be, especially on this side of the water, in the winter season. I believe it is decided beyond doubt that it will be at Quebec in summer. The city I have the honour to represent in this House is only 480 miles from Montreal, which is the common centre. The sister city of Halifax is 760 miles from that city. If it is proposed that freight for these vessels be hauled nearly 300 miles additional for the purpose of taking those steamers at a certain point, it is a mistake, and the effort will prove a failure; this freight must be sent to the nearest seaport where those vessels can take it on board, if we expect to succeed in competing with the short lines of railway between Montreal, New York, Boston and Portland. If we expect to make it a freight line and ensure its success in carrying freight, then that must be by adopting the shortest railway route and the port nearest Montreal. That is my view on this question.

Mr. Wood (Westmoreland).

Mr. GILLMOR. That port is St. Andrews.

Mr. CHESLEY. I believe the distance to St. Andrews is a little shorter than to St. John. In addition I may state to this House a fact not generally known, and it is this, that in coming to the city of St. John over the Short Line Railway, if you wish to go to Halifax you must cross St. John River over the cantilever bridge, which is owned by a company, and Sir William Van Horne, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, has stated publicly that the tolls on the bridge per car are equal in cost to an extra haul of 150 miles. So hon. members will see that if freight is carried from Montreal to Halifax, it does not only pass over 760 miles but over a distance equal to 900 miles, or double the distance of the haul to the open port of St. John. This, I think, is a plain and simple statement of facts, and I am glad to know that we have been able to place the case before the Government and before Mr. Huddart, who has charge of the matter, in such a way that they have consented to change the terms of the provisional contract from "Halifax" to "Halifax or St. John, or both," with a view of meeting the wishes and strong representations made to them on this question. There are very many points connected with this matter which are not as well understood as they might be by the general public, perhaps by members of this House, and perhaps by members of the Government as regards detail, but I simply make the statement, and I wish it to be remembered, that if we expect to make this a freight line, carrying 3,000 or 4,000 tons of freight from Canada to the markets of the world, we must in order to be able to meet the competition of New York, Boston and Portland, make St. John the winter terminus of the route. For very many years past large inducements have been held out to the city of St. John to make public improvements and expend the money of the citizens for the purpose of being prepared for this trade when it should reach the port. We were told when this House subsidized what is known as the Short Line Railway at a very great cost to the country that it was for the purpose of bringing the seaports of the Maritime Provinces as closely as possible to the business centre of the country, which is Montreal. That line is built and it is a fixed fact to-day. The distance is 480 miles, and it is the shortest route to our own port. Afterwards we were told in St. John that we had not necessary harbour facilities for the purpose of handling freight. The Canadian Pacific Railway came in there, and in order to bring the road down to the deep water terminus the citizens bought from the Dominion Government a property at a cost of $40,000 and handed it over to that railway company to give them a deep water terminus on the western side of the harbour, entirely clear of the bridge and its tolls. After that was done, the city in view of the trade we expected from the west went to an expense of nearly half a million dollars in constructing a deep water terminus in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. That terminus has been made, and it is one of the best on this side of the Atlantic. There is a depth of water of from 27 to 30 feet, there is a large water front and a very large area of ground enclosed, and the largest steamships can lay there afloat at low water. In connection with that, we have placed on that property one of the best elevators in Canada. So the House will see that our port is well and thoroughly equipped for the handling of western freight, and if we are to obtain any of the advantages accruing from this large expenditure of money made by the citizens of St. John from their own pockets, without any assistance from the Parliament of Canada or the country at large, then I say we have a right to ask that when this agreement is made we should be considered, at all events in connection with the freight business of this steamship line. I believe further, that we are in such a position that we will be considered. When the Finance Minister has stated publicly to-day that this change had been made, that the provisional contract has been changed in that way, and we further had the statement that Mr. Huddart had agreed to this and put it in writing, we know that when the final arrangement is entered into between the Government and the contractor, Mr. Huddart, notice must be taken of this, and I am satisfied it will be dealt with to the advantage of our port. I do not say this in a spirit of antagonism to Halifax. If it is determined that Halifax is the best port at which to land mails and passengers as being the nearest point of land, I concur. But I wish to mention this fact, which also is not entirely understood—and I make this statement backed by the opinion of the captains of the Furness line and of the Dominion Line, and of the manager of one of these lines of steamers—that if two steamers leaving the other side of the Atlantic at the same time were off Halifax together, and one steamer went into that port and landed mails and passengers, while the other proceeded to St. John direct without stopping, the mails and passengers would be landed at about the same time in each case, from the fact that the distance is 280 miles by rail and by water, and the increased speed of the railway is just about off-set by the detention of leaving the ocean and entering the port of Halifax. It is well for this House to understand that fact, because it ought to enter into the consideration of this whole question when it is being dealt with by the Government. I have not grown as eloquent over this subject as some hon. gentlemen who have spoken. I have not predicted the many great things that this line is going to accomplish for the country, but sincerely hope, if established, that it will be entirely successful. There are many matters in connection with this project that might be discussed very fully. I affirm again that I am thoroughly in accord with the principle that when you pay the public money of Canada to subsidize a line of steamers on the Atlantic Ocean, that the terminus of these vessels should be in Canada, and that whatever business may accrue from that transaction should accrue to the people who pay the money as a subsidy. I was more than surprised to-night to hear members in this House, especially hon. gentlemen from the west, express an almost universal feeling in favour of this line of steamers. They are perhaps, or at least appear to be, more in favour of it than the people of the Maritime Provinces, because there may be some question there as to whether this line will be a paying line or not. I find that the prevalent idea in this House is: that Canada must have a fast line of steamers on the Atlantic Ocean, with a terminus in Canada. I shall conclude by hoping that the Government, after having put the port of St. John in the provisional contract, will fairly and fully consider the claims of that port when the time comes for making the final arrangement.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). My province has not, I believe, been heard from to-night, but the feeling in Ontario is undoubtedly in favour of this fast Atlantic service. However, the feeling in Ontario is on general lines, and I regret to say that the question has taken too much of a local aspect here to-night. For instance, although we are in favour of the scheme we do not think that it would be wise to define at present the port at which the Atlantic terminal shall be. It may be in Halifax or in St. John or in Louisburg. I have heard very eminent authorities say that in Cape Breton you will find the best and nearest port to Europe, and if that is the case, we in the west do not wish to be bound down to either of the ports of Halifax or St. John. There is another consideration of this matter. The terminal port of this service must be determined by the railway situation, and the railway terminal may in time come to be away up towards Labrador or it may be in Louisburg. If a really fast Atlantic service is desired it must be from the seaport nearest to Liverpool. Railways are constantly extending eastwards, and that being the case, the port must be adapted to such railway extensions. The question also seems to-night to turn on the contract with Mr. Huddart. For my part I would rather have seen the proposal put as an offer, open to the world, so that we should have the greatest and freest competition in this matter, and if Mr. Huddart should fail in his enterprise, which I hope he shall not, that there might be an opportunity for other men to come forward and endeavour to carry it to a successful issue. In order to organize this scheme and to finance it, it requires the very highest ability and the very best and most intimate connections with the financial world, and from the discussion to-night one would almost gather that these qualifications are limited to Mr. Huddart. As I have said, I would like to see the contract placed before the public in such a way that the capitalists of the world would have an opportunity of taking it up so that he who was most able to command the money should have an opportunity of undertaking the service. It will require a whale among the fish to finance this project. It will require a whale among the fish to manage this line, and it will require a whale among the fish to draw business to this line and build up our country through means of it as it ought to be. I make bold to say here to-night that I think the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is the corporation that should organize, equip and maintain this service. I do not know what the views of that company may be in regard to the project. They may be behind Mr. Huddart, for all I know, or they may, at least, be friendly towards him; but whether that be the case or not, other things being equal, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should control this Atlantic service. The Canadian Pacific Railway would have a vital interest not only in inducing immigrants to come here, and to carry them across the ocean, but they would have a vital interest in settling up our North-west Territories. I again repeat that for this reason the contract should be open to competition, and I think if that were the case we would have a much better chance of seeing this project accomplished. I may say that as far as the west is concerned, and especially my own city of Toronto, we have a substantial interest in this fast Atlantic service. At present, New York gets most of our passenger traffic to Europe, but we would naturally prefer to use the Canadian port. I trust that the Government will succeed in their efforts. I trust that this scheme will be successfully floated and that Canada will have the honour of having the most rapid, most substantial and most comfortable line crossing the Atlantic ocean.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not going to review the discussion which has already gone through a pretty wide range, as we will have several other opportunities in which to deal with it, when I hope we will succeed in getting a little more detail and useful information out of the Government than they appear to possess to-night. As a good deal has been said by my hon. friends from St. John (Mr. Hazen and Mr. Chesley), and as I happen to have a memorial from the St. John Board of Trade, it may just be as well to read, what—prior to this happy deliverance between Halifax and St. John—the Board of Trade of St. John had concluded on the subject. Their memorial reads as follows:—

Whereas this Board is informed that it has been proposed to subsidize a fast line of steamers to carry mails, passengers and freight, making weekly trips between ports in Canada and the mother country, and that the proposal has not met with the favourable view of the Government; that the steamers contemplated are to be of 20-knot speed, and to freight accommodation for a general cargo of about 3,000 tons; and it is in contemplation that a yearly subsidy of $75,000 for an extended term of years, shall be paid by the Dominion of Canada in connection with such fast Atlantic line.

Whereas this Board believes that steamers of 20-knot speed cannot compete successfully for through mails and passengers with steamship lines from New York, which have already attained a speed of 22 knots, which speed in the near future will be increased. In this connection this Board is of the opinion that the greater distance between the Canadian winter ports and the great American centres and New York should be considered, and it is believed that unless inducements as to speed and accommodation fully equal to, if not in advance of the New York lines can be held out, passenger traffic cannot be diverted from the channels it has already formed, and that should the Dominion become bound to a subsidy of such large amount for steamers of but 20 knots speed for an extended term of years, there will, in this respect be no adequate return.

Therefore, if the views of the Board in this respect are correct, the proposed service will become practically a fast freight line, carrying a portion of the Canadian lines, and having incidental passenger accommodation; a service which in the opinion of this Board could be secured by a much smaller expenditure than is now proposed.

That the expenditure of so large a sum as $750,000 yearly to be guaranteed for such a service for an extended term of years must involve a most serious demand upon the resources of the country and hinder aid to the development of other enterprises, tending more materially to advance the interests of the whole Dominion. While if, as this Board is led to believe, the proposed line is being advocated largely in Imperial interests, the giving of so large a subsidy would seem to cast upon Canada an undue proportion of the cost, and a responsibility far beyond any probable return.

This Board therefore respectfully asks that the terms of the proposed scheme be reconsidered, and that the Dominion may not be committed (in the hope of a passenger traffic which this Board believe will not be secured) to a contract which would involve a heavy burden upon the resources of the country without proportionate return.

And your memorialists as in duty bound will ever pray.

Resolution reported.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 12th July, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SLIDEMASTER AT FORT COULONGE.

Mr. RIDER (for Mr. Devlin) asked, Who is the present slidemaster at Fort Coulonge? When was he appointed? What is his salary? Who was his predecessor? What was his salary?

Mr. OUMET. The present slidemaster at Fort Coulonge is Edward Davis, temporarily employed as deputy slidemaster at Coulonge. He was appointed on 6th April, 1894. His salary is $1.50 per working day. His predecessor was A. Proudfoot, whose salary was $1 per day.

WIDENING LACHINE CANAL

Mr. MONET asked, What sum of money has been paid to Alphonse Charlebois, contractor for the widening of the Lachine Canal in 1876?

Mr. HAGGART. The sum of money paid to Alphonse Charlebois, contractor for the widening of the Lachine Canal from 1876, was $65,200.

PAYMENTS TO MR. L. Z. MALLETT.

Mr. MONETTE (translation) asked. What amount has been paid to Mr. L. Z. Mallette for repairs to the Dufferin Terrace, and for the rebuilding of the Kent and St. Louis gates at Quebec?

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) The following amounts have been paid to L. Z. Mallette: For the rebuilding of the St. Louis Gate, at Quebec, $9,200; for the rebuilding of the Kent Gate, $9,500. There was no payment made to that gentleman for repairs to the Dufferin Terrace.

NON-PAYMENT OF INTEREST ON DOMINION STOCK.

Mr. McCARTHY. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance why it is that the interest on the Dominion stock, due on 30th ulto., has not been paid? I have a letter from a gentleman who is a holder of some Dominion stock, and he complains of the non-payment of interest.

Mr. FOSTER. This is the first I have heard about the matter; but I will inquire and let the hon. gentleman know.

MR. TURCOTTE, M.P.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would like to mention that it has been agreed that the discussion on the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the case of the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Turcotte) should be taken up for discussion to-morrow. I move:

That the fourth report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be taken into consideration to-morrow, after routine proceedings.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I would remind the right hon. leader of the House that he promised that we should have the Supplementary Estimates yesterday, but they have not yet been brought down.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I renewed that promise yesterday for to-day.

Mr. LAURIER. And I suppose the hon. gentleman will renew it to-day for to-morrow.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I hope yesterday's promise will be fulfilled, but if not, I make the same promise for to-morrow.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to ask the Government if they have brought down the return respecting the cost of construction of public buildings in Manitoba and the North-west?

Mr. HAGGART.

Mr. OUIMET. The officers of the department are preparing the statement called for by the hon. gentleman. But a difficulty has arisen, owing to the punctuation of the resolution, as to whether the hon. gentleman desires the cost of these buildings in detail since Manitoba and the North-west were incorporated in the Dominion. If, however, it is only for the last three years—

Mr. McMULLEN. That is all.

Mr. OUIMET—then the return will probably be laid on the Table to-morrow.

THE TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved third reading of Bill (No. 147) respecting a certain treaty between Her Britannic Majesty and the President of the French Republic.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would take this opportunity of inquiring from the Controller if he can inform us what is the amount of alcohol, or brandy, or whatever material is used, which our wine-growers are in the habit of consuming yearly, according to the returns of his department, in fortifying the wine which is made in Canada?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I suppose the hon. gentleman is aware that we exercise no supervision over the manufacture of domestic wine.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As this is a matter of some importance, and as it would naturally have engaged his attention, does he know, as a matter of fact, how much is consumed? We are informed that we manufacture about 2,000,000 gallons of native wine; about how much alcohol is required or used by these people for fortifying and preparing it?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I can get the information for the hon. gentleman; I would rather be accurate about it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

FAST ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. FOSTER moved second reading of resolution respecting the granting of a subsidy for the performance of a fast weekly steamship service between Canada and the United Kingdom.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if it is intended, in case this proposed fast line is established, to still continue to the Allan line the subsidy they are now getting?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly not.

Mr. CHARLTON. Then this amounts to the Government subsidizing one line, and crushing out of existence the other line.

Mr. FOSTER. A line of 20 knots is to be subsidized, while the subsidy is withdrawn from a line of 10 or 12 knots.

Resolution concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 161) further to amend the Act respecting Ocean Steamship Subsidies.

Motion agreed to; and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

House proceeded to consider resolutions reported from Committee of Supply (July 9th).

To meet the expenses of the Inter-colonial Conference..... $5,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. By the way, has any formal statement of the conclusions arrived at, been handed to the Government and been put in type?

Mr. FOSTER. Not yet. The minutes of proceedings, of course, have been taken, and they are now being revised, and as soon as the revision is finished, they will be printed. I hope we shall be able to have them printed, probably within a week or so—not sooner, I am afraid.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid they will not be of much use to the House.

WAYS AND MEANS—ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN QUEBEC.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee on Ways and Means

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in rising in my place in order to bring before this House the grievances and protests of public opinion in the province of Quebec, in connection with the administration of justice and the conduct of a certain number of magistrates charged with administering the law, I entertain no illusion, nor do I experience any feeling of idle fear as to the responsibility that devolves upon me. I am fully alive to the serious responsibility that attaches to such a course; but, at the same time, the conviction is deeply rooted in my mind that I only obey the dictates of duty to public interest, and that I am voicing the opinion of the majority of those amenable to the law in the province of Quebec. Allow me, first, to testify my respect for a pure judiciary, for those honourable judges upon whom devolves the magnificent and noble mission of rendering, through a sound interpretation of the law, to Caesar the things that are Caesar's—that is to say, of administering justice to the citizens of this country. But my respect does not degenerate into a senseless idolatry, nor into a servility altogether out of place. Judges are servants of the country; therefore, those amenable to the tribunals, the ratepayers, have the right, through their chosen representatives in Parliament, to impeach them on just grounds. We live in an essentially democratic country. Parliament is the high court of justice in the Dominion. That the judges should be irremovable is a rather extraordinary privilege, to my mind—I am not prepared to advocate a change in another direction—but, as I said, that judges should be irremovable is a privilege extraordinary enough; should we now make them irresponsible, I do not know where this new departure would lead us to. I, therefore, claim, in behalf of the press and of members of Parliament, the right of freely criticising magistrates and the way in which they administer law. It is of the highest importance, Mr. Speaker, that judges should be kept under a two-fold control: that of public opinion and that of Parliament. Our system of government lends to their position an exceptional importance. We live under a system of confederation in which the central power exercises a predominating authority. The appointment of lieutenant-governors belongs to the central power. So with the appointment of the judges. Lieutenant-governors, so appointed by the federal authority, are irresponsible to a large extent; now, if, in addition to lieutenant-governors, judges are also declared, at least practically, irresponsible, our system of government would soon degenerate into a pure autocracy. I, for one, enter my strongest protest against the theory of a school, quite large and quite noisy, which attempts to implant in our midst the notion that never should the conduct of lieutenant-governors and judges be open to criticism. I readily agree that one should be guarded in his expressions when criticising the judges. I readily admit also that whenever a member brings to the notice of Parliament grievances and protests, great care should be taken to keep within the strict limits of truth. It may, perhaps, be objected that it is rather late for me to take the steps I am now taking. To this I answer that I was in hopes that the hon. Minister of Justice would himself initiate the proceedings of which I am bound to take the initiative. It is quite impossible that the protests from the province of Quebec, in the matter under discussion, should have failed to reach the ear of the hon. Minister. His French-speaking colleagues around him cannot plead ignorance to the fact that long protracted and acrimonious polemics have been carried on, in the Quebec press, in regard to the conduct of several judges. The 'Minerve' itself, the mouthpiece and property, to a large extent at least, of the hon. the Postmaster General, has indicted some judges. Queen's counsels, under their own responsibility, have pledged themselves to cite them before Parliament. The Minister of Justice himself has received complaints against several judges. I know that, concerning one of the judges to whom I shall soon refer, Ministers have received communication of a memorial, drafted by Messrs. Beauchemin and Mallette, two eminent Conservative lawyers, indicting, so to say, Judge Tellier. I expected, therefore, that the hon. Minister of Justice would take the initiative, and that he would not compel a private member to rise in his place and take the step I am taking to-day. I may add that it is a well-known fact, among those who surround me, that the state of my health, for two or three months past, was not at all what could be desired. I may further remark that after going through the ordeal of several investigations of which I had taken the initiative, in concert with gentlemen who, later on, lost all recollection of their own doings, I hardly felt inclined to pledge myself again. Allow me further to state, Mr. Speaker, that owing to the fact that so many members of the Bar had, in my presence and elsewhere, protested against the conduct of judges, I expected that some of them would bring before the House the grievances they felt prepared to sustain. An incident which happened a few days ago, in the House, and which is still within the vivid recollection of members of this House, an incident, I say, which ought to elicit expressions of regret from some of us, at least—is the immediate cause of the step I am taking at this late stage of the session. Pursuant to that incident, I was laid under the necessity of proceeding, and I do now proceed. I do act, under my own responsibility, and should I fail, during this session, to accomplish all I intend to do, I pledge myself to do more at the next session. The community knows that whenever I have adopted a line of conduct I believe to be the right one, I never flinch. If, therefore, I am not prepared to-day to prefer charges against a larger number of magistrates, the reason is that the time at my disposal did not allow of my completing the dockets which are partly in my possession. Prior to proceeding any further in the matters to be dealt with, I wish to extend my thanks to those members of the Bar who have supplied me with the information upon which I intend to ground myself in the difficult work I have undertaken, and which I hope successfully to push to a successful issue. Here is how Todd, in the first volume of "Parliamentary Government in England," page 571, deals with the question of parliamentary inquiries :

The great function of Parliament has been declared to be "the maintenance of the law and the redress of grievances. Thus, it is one of their principal duties and functions to be observant of the courts of justice and to take close care that none of them, from the lowest to the highest, shall pursue new courses unknown to the laws and constitution of this kingdom, or to equity, sound legal policy or substantial justice." * * * The express power, which is given both Houses of Parliament under the two acts 12 and 13 William III., ch. 11, and Geo. III., ch. 23, to address the crown for the removal of judges from office, who are otherwise declared to be irremovable, is indicative of the duty that devolves upon Parliament to watch the course of the administration of justice. And Parliament has not only the right to address the crown for the removal of a particular judge, but in cases of misconduct, it has the right of exercising a superintending control over the manner in which they discharge their duties, and to institute inquiries relative thereto. The judges of the land act under responsibility ; and any misconduct of which they may be guilty may be inquired into, and animadverted upon, by either House of Parliament.

Further on, Vol. II, page 872, he says :

It is also evident that the action of Parliament for the removal of a judge may originate in various ways. It may be invoked upon articles of charge presented to the House of Commons by a member in his place, recapitulating the cases of misconduct of which the judge complained of has been guilty ; or, after a preliminary inquiry—by a royal commission, (at the instance of Government, or at the request of either House of Parliament) or by a select committee of the House—into the judicial conduct of the individual in question.

Such is the course I contemplate following in dealing with this question. We are now living under a reign of terror in the province of Quebec, and in using such language I do not fall into exaggeration—those are the accurate and exact expressions to be used. Still, I wish it to be understood that this language should not apply to quite a large number of magistrates ; though, unfortunately, they apply to a number of judges who belong to the class of those who keep the community under the reign of terror I have just mentioned. To what must be attributed such a state of things ? To a fact which all men of experience who now listen to me will agree to, namely, that all magistrates, for a number of years past, have been selected out of one party alone. Formerly judges sat in Parliament. We have had to sustain long, protracted struggles before we succeeded in bringing about a change in a state of things which made of the House a truly autocrat government. We at last got rid of the presence of judges in Parliament, who were then, as now, under the control of the Crown. Our public liberties were placed in jeopardy by the fact that judges sat in Parliament. Is there not a still greater danger in having judges on the Bench who interfere with politics, magistrates who are not responsible to the people, while an attempt is now being made to render them irresponsible to Parliament ? Mr. Speaker, I shall now proceed to enumerate the articles of the charge I have to prefer against a certain number of magistrates. It is natural enough that I should begin with Mr. Justice Bossé. I mentioned his name the other day in my seat in this House. Prior to that, I had dealt with him in the press. Events have brought me in contact with the hon. judge under important circumstances. It was no fault of mine that brought me before him in criminal trials.

The House is acquainted with the character of those trials, while hon. members still recollect the great parliamentary inquiry held here in 1891. It was the facts connected with such inquiry that brought me into immediate relation with the Hon. Judge Bossé. I had reposed confidence in him up to the moment when I happened to get better acquainted with him. I was aware of the fact that, as a politician, he had never risen to the first rank. I knew that, as a practising lawyer he had not displayed the broadness of views for which members of the Bar in this country and elsewhere have made a name for themselves; but I was under the impression that he had divested himself of vulgar prejudices and risen above degrading passion. I found out, as I shall prove later on, that on the judicial Bench, whenever a political question was at stake, he was a violent partisan. I shall deal with facts within my personal knowledge, and within the personal knowledge of hon. members of this House who have been mixed up in those events as members of the Bar. I have just mentioned the inquiry of 1891, relating to the abominable frauds perpetrated in the Public Works Department for upwards of twelve years. Those frauds were brought to my notice under circumstances which I need not relate to the House anew. The first step taken by me in connection with the public denunciation of these frauds was when I published, on the 30th of April, 1890, a declaration signed by Messrs. Robert McGreevy and O. E. Murphy. This declaration has been looked upon by some as a piece of indiscretion. There are men who share my responsibility for that declaration, but they seem to forget it. I published that declaration for the public good, in the interest of the country. I trust history will not impute to me as a crime the fact of having resorted to that means for bringing to justice the thieves who had been robbing the public treasury for years and years, and who have been put on their trial by the Government and punished. A few days after those affidavits had been published, I was arrested at the instigation of Mr. Thomas McGreevy, jointly with the two subscribers of the declaration of the 30th April. I waived all claim to dilatory proceedings and I declared myself ready to stand my trial at the nearest term of the criminal court, which opened in the month of October, 1890. During the interval which had elapsed between the arrest of Messrs. Robert McGreevy and O. E. Murphy and my own arrest for criminal libel, Messrs. McGreevy and Murphy had been arrested at the instance of Mr. Michael Connolly for conspiracy to defraud in relation to a note signed by Michael Connolly, a note which, as hon. members of this House still recollect, was nothing but a bit of waste paper about four inches long by about two inches wide. In order the better to show the extent of the guilt involved in Judge Bossé's conduct in the matter, I shall proceed without delay to relate to the House the circumstances which led to the arrest being made. While searching for the papers necessary to our common defence in the criminal libel suit, Mr. Murphy had found this famous note, about that large about four inches by two. Mr. Robert McGreevy, who was present when the find was made, asked Mr. Murphy to transfer the note to him. Mr. Murphy without reflection handed the note over to him. A prosecution was instituted by Mr. Robert McGreevy against Michael Connolly by a firm of lawyers of high standing at Quebec, Messrs. Casgrain, Angers & Lavery. Now, when the moment was at hand when Mr. Murphy was called upon to swear to the note having been given for value duly received, he declined to do so. I avail myself of this occasion to bear witness to the memory of a man whose character has been so much blackened and who is now gone over to the great majority, but a man with whom I held intercourse for two years, especially during the inquiry held here, and to repeat on the floor of the House, that whenever he was called upon to give evidence under oath, he always told the truth. When called upon to give evidence that the note had been signed for value received, he declined to swear to it. The prosecution was forthwith given up. What happened next? Mr. Michael Connolly, who was paddling the same canoe as Nicholas Connolly and Thomas McGreevy, immediately brought a criminal suit for conspiracy to defraud against Robert McGreevy and Owen Murphy. The suit was brought on, after the latter had declined signing an affidavit contradicting their first affidavit, signed by him and published by myself on the 30th April. They were arrested, if I recollect aright, on the very day of the opening of the criminal term, pursuant to their refusal to sign the affidavit just mentioned. The object of the arrest was obvious: Messrs. Robert McGreevy and O. E. Murphy were essential witnesses; they were the very men whose evidence would be most conducive to the unearthing of the robberies which had been perpetrated and in connection with which the hon. Minister of Justice later on instituted criminal and civil proceedings. The battle was engaged; my charges struck a blow at the Connollys and at Thomas McGreevy. There was, therefore, a tremendous interest at stake for them in ruining the men who had been their accomplices and who turned out to be their accusers. The latter had declined—as I said twice before—to sign affidavits contradicting their true declarations, published by me on the 30th April. They had by all means to be got rid of. Mr. Justice Bossé could not plead ignorance to the nature of the suit brought on, because at the October criminal term Robert McGreevy and Murphy were indicted before him. There was a true bill found against him, and at the same time the jury returned a true bill against me for criminal libel against Thomas McGreevy. No sooner had the report of the jury returning a true bill against me been presented to the court than my counsel, Mr. Casgrain, stood up and read to the court a speech in which I pleaded justification and declared myself ready to stand trial. My plea of justification was an exhaustive review of the situation. It was simply impossible that Judge Bossé, upon the perusal of the plea, should not be aware of the aim and the nature of the suit brought against Robert McGreevy and O. E. Murphy. We then witnessed a strange struggle. The hon. member for Bellechasse was for the time being Crown Attorney—the Quebec Crown. In spite of all the harm which he now says of me, and which he did not think me guilty of at that time, I still keep a green spot in my heart for the hon. member, in remembrance of the exertions he then put forth to obtain justice for us. He does not lack legal skill, and he is looked upon at the Quebec Bar as a crafty lawyer. I had also retained the services of lawyers of high standing; I had for counsel the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier) and the hon. the Attorney General for Quebec (Mr. Casgrain). After the first skirmishing was over, we were all agreed, and the Quebec Bar with us, as to the fact that Mr. Justice Bossé was under the control of Thomas McGreevy, and we were quite perplexed as to what course we should follow. I was ready to stand my trial, and my counsel insisted upon going on with the case. Robert McGreevy and Murphy, put off their guard, when arrested on the very day or on the eve of the opening of the criminal term, were applying for delay. Mr. Justice Bossé did not mean proceeding that way. As just stated, Robert McGreevy and Murphy were applying to the court for delay, and we declared our readiness to go on without delay with the suit. Mr. Justice Bossé, driven to the wall, obliged, out of mere propriety, by reason of the affidavits produced before him, to grant the delay applied for by Robert McGreevy and Murphy, felt that he was under the necessity of fixing a day for my trial. We were positive that the case would be proceeded with. What was then brought to bear? I am going to relate facts of which I shall give convincing evidence. A trial, known as the "Ste. Anne case," was then being tried at that term of the criminal court. The hon. Senator had been assaulted, at an election, and his assailants were indicted before the criminal court. At the opening of the court, Mr. Fitzpatrick, who appeared for the Ste. Anne people, made a motion to have the petty jury list produced, on the ground, as he stated, that Mr. Gagnon, the sheriff, who had returned the panel, was a nephew of the hon. Mr. Pelletier.

Mr. TARTE.

the real prosecutor of the Ste. Anne people. Mr. Justice Bossé, at the opening of the term and prior to fixing a day for my trial, had declined to grant the application made by Mr. Fitzpatrick. On the very day following that, when we had compelled him, through fear of public opinion, to fix my trial: on the very next day, I say, he granted Mr. Fitzpatrick's application, which he had rejected a few days before, and he dismissed the jurors; and so it came to pass that he adjourned the term to prevent my case being heard. Being powerless to try the case of McGreevy and Murphy, he simply prevented my case being heard. He had determined, first, to ruin the two men whom he knew to be the accusers of those who had been his political chiefs: the accusers, I say, of men who had been even more than that! Prior to allowing my case to be heard, he had determined to try the case of those two men. Mr. Justice Bossé then abruptly closed the October term. There are only two terms of the Criminal Court in Quebec every year. The next term was to come off in the month of April following. It opened on the 10th of April, 1891. But meanwhile events had progressed. I had continued the sequel of those indiscretions which I am now upbraided for by some persons: public opinion had thereby been deeply impressed with the conviction that frauds had been perpetuated for too long a time before the face of the Minister of the Public Works Department. The county of Pormeuif was opened through the death of the regretted Dr. de St. George; I had made known to the public my determination to run for the Federal Parliament in that constituency, but a dissolution of Parliament had cut short that project. Events had hurried on. General elections had been held, and I had been returned to the House for Montmorency. The criminal term opened on the 10th of April: Parliament had been convened for the 29th of the same month. The hon. leader of the Opposition was my counsel. At the very opening of the term, he applied to the judge to fix a day for the trial of his client. We knew beforehand that my trial would not be fixed so soon; but we wished to ascertain to what extent the judge would carry his denial of fair play. Delays intervened; the honourable judge always granted the motions made in behalf of McGreevy by his counsel. Then came a day, in the middle of the term, prior to the session, when we applied to the court for putting off the trial until the next term. The hon. leader of the Opposition, as I said, was my counsel: I was a member of Parliament; it was a fact of public notoriety that I was to take my seat in the House on the 29th of April, and to bring down before Parliament the charges of which I had the evidence in my possession. I refrain from relating by their particulars, the underdealings which took place during that term; such manoeuvres had been up to that moment unheard of in the judicial history of the country; suffice it to say that, so desirous was Judge Bossé of reaching his ends, that, even without taking the advice of the Attorney General, he went so far as to fix for the hearing of Robert McGreevy and O. E. Murphy a date, prior to that fixed for the hearing of men who were waiting in jail for their trial. I call upon all the lawyers in this House, irrespective of political parties, who hear me and are able to rise above paltry political considerations, to say whether this is not an unprecedented fact. I call upon the hon. Minister of Public Works, who has been the representative of the Crown for several years before the Criminal Court at Montreal, to tell me whether, in the course of his legal career, he has ever met with a single case where a judge had, under his own responsibility, fixed a date for the hearing of persons at large, prior to that fixed for the hearing of prisoners actually waiting their trial in jail. Mr. Justice Bossé, as I said, and without consulting the Attorney General, after having declined, at the outset, to fix a day for my trial, went to the length of fixing a date for the trial of Robert McGreevy and O. E. Murphy, prior to that of people actually detained in jail. The hon. member for Bellechasse did not fail in his duty under the circumstances. Once does not make a habit. The substitute of the Attorney General, the member for Bellechasse, perfectly understood the odious part, the infamous game played by Judge Bossé. He said more harm of him than we did ourselves. The representative of the Crown realizing, in last analysis, the nature of the plot organized by the guilty parties to defeat the ends and burk the course of justice, loyally sided with us. The question really in point was how to prevent Robert McGreevy and O. E. Murphy being condemned to penitentiary before they had given their evidence. Mr. Justice Bossé had bent his energies—I do not know whether it could not be proven, by probing facts to the bottom, and taking also into consideration the fact that so many people perjure themselves—the judge, I say, had determined upon sentencing those men to penitentiary. Such is, at all events, my conviction, which is shared by a great many people. A great many cases had been placed on docket during that term. As Judge Bossé plainly saw that he could not reach, by means of a first panel, the case of Messrs. McGreevy and Murphy, he inquired from the substitute of the Attorney General whether he intended summoning a second panel of jurors. The representative of the Crown replied in the negative and at the same time read a communication from the Attorney General in which it was stated that the Crown was not ready to proceed with the case of Messrs. McGreevy and Murphy. Judge Bossé, on hearing the letter read, flew into a terrible passion and from the Bench, denounced the Attorney General and his substitute in violent terms. There were only two days left for the expiration of the jurors' career. The judge, without taking the advice of the substitute of the Attorney General, peremptorily fixed a day for hearing the case of Messrs. McGreevy and Murphy. The substitute of the Attorney General, provided with a 'nolle prosequi' which he himself had procured from the Attorney General's office, entered the judge's chamber, holding the document in his hands. I was standing near by with my counsel. He came out of the room and told us: I just saw the judge and told him: You want to create a scandal and save criminals; now we are going to raise a scandal too, and show you up, if you drive us to it. Such were the facts related to my counsel and to me by the Crown Attorney. He also told us: Judge Bossé is going to yield. We had to find a back door for the judge to come off. Mr. Isidore Belleau then moved that the trial should be postponed to the next term, and the judge granted the motion. This falling back is the exact counterpart of a similar retreat I shall soon speak of. Let us see what came to pass: the parliamentary inquiry of 1891 was held. Most positive and conclusive evidence was adduced of the frauds perpetrated, but the honourable judge was still on the Bench bemoaning the downfall of his beheaded friends. He was on the watch for his victims. The criminal term opened in October, 1891. Messrs. Robert McGreevy and O. E. Murphy had for defending counsel, F. X. Lemieux and Isidore Belleau, two Queen's counsels. The trial was no trial at all. It was a regular refusal of justice, an act of revenge and of persecution. I repeat on the floor of the House what the two lawyers just mentioned told me when the trial was over. Whenever a question comes before the Bench, in any matter connected with politics, Judge Bossé can divest himself neither of his prejudices nor of a spirit of partisanship. I have ready at hand an extract from one of Lord Brougham's speeches, which I shall presently read. On hearing it read, the House cannot fail to recognize in it the full-length portrait of Judge Bossé, the unjust judge—I will not say the portraiture of the prevaricating judge, as that would be going beyond my meaning—but I shall say the unjust and the partisan judge. During the McGreevy-Murphy trial, the stand taken by Judge Bossé, his every action showed he only sought to convict the prisoners. As they understood that they could not expect any fair-play from the judge, they left the country. Judge Bossé had the two lawyers called in his room. I hold from both lawyers, and more especially from one of them, the report of what they said to the judge on that occasion: "Mr. Justice Bossé, the accused parties were perfectly right to leave the country. You did not give them any fair-play at all. You have been acting all the time as if you had made up your mind to sentence them to penitentiary." I now approach another political trial, the Mercier case. In the McGreevy-Murphy case, Mr. Justice Bossé had, without taking the advice of the Crown representatives, fixed a day for the trial of people out of jail, prior to the date fixed for prisoners actually detained in jail. All the counsel who appeared for the accused stood up by turn and declared that they were ready to let this case take precedence of the trial of their clients. This trial was of paramount importance. Those persons were under an indictment for treason. The attention of the whole country was riveted on that important judicial event. Now, as I said, notwithstanding that the defending counsels for the prisoners had stood up by turn and declared their readiness to let this trial take precedence over their cases, the Hon. Judge Bossé peremptorily declined their offer and ruled that the trial of the prisoners detained in jail should forthwith be proceeded with. His object in so doing was transparent. He had manifestly agreed with the Crown on depriving the defendants in the Mercier case of the advantage of knowing the second panel which was to be assigned. On the day that the second panel was summoned, the defending counsel applied to the court for the petit jury list being produced in court. This application was peremptorily rejected by the judge. I call to witness all lawyers in this House, irrespective of political parties. I am aware that passion often sways the minds even of members of this House. But here are facts on which lawyers who have at heart the good name of the profession—and there are many—cannot differ of opinion. While the jurors were deliberating, and prior to the verdict having been delivered against Mr. Mercier, and the persons accused of the same offence with him, an incident occurred, to which I wish to direct the attention of the House. The paper 'L'Electeur' published an editorial extolling the merits of the ex-Premier. Whether there was any truth in it or not, or whether it was a timely article, it is not within my province now to say. But let any unbiassed man read now that editorial, and tell me whether there was room in it for a judicial reprimand? As I said, the jurors were deliberating—and should the proof be allowed, evidence could be adduced showing that the jurors had already taken three or four votes, and that they had been unable to agree on a verdict. It is a fact the judge could not be ignorant of. When the jury returned to court, on the following day, the Hon. Judge Bossé gave a terrible lecture to 'L'Electeur,' and made use of a language, unparalleled for its violence, towards the accused persons. The jurors went back to their room and two hours later returned a true bill. I have no hesitation in stating that, on that occasion, from the very opening of the trial as throughout the proceedings, the Hon. Judge Bossé did not act as a judge, but played the part of a regular tyrant who believes himself above public opinion and above Parliament. He tried to stifle the press; he threatened the editors with imprisonment. As members of the press, we contended that it was our right, during the progress of a criminal trial, to inform the country as to what was going on in court; and we gave the judge to understand that we would stick to our right, as we were afraid neither of him nor of the prison. The eyes of the country were opened to the light, and public opinion was roused to such a pitch, that the Hon. Judge Bossé had to pack off, to quit the Bench. I know—and history bears witness to the fact—that lots of things secrete themselves under false appearances, under the mask of truth, justice and legality. The hegira of Judge Bossé from the Bench, on that occasion, is owing to the fact that he was afraid of public opinion. I was an eye-witness to his coming down from the Bench; an eye-witness to his leaving the court. I knew he was to quit the Bench—and should others fail to grasp my meaning—the judge, I am sure, will understand me. Now, I may say, Mr. Speaker, that from the moment he came down from the Bench—and I have no hesitation in so saying—from the moment he presided over political trials, he lost the confidence of all those who are amenable to the tribunals in the province of Quebec. A number of lawyers who sit in this House, as well as others outside of Parliament, are fully aware of it. No wonder that, after having had to deal with him, as just stated, I should have endeavoured to analyse the motives which might have influenced his course during the political trials referred to. I am very careful not to state anything beyond what I am prepared to substantiate. I know that in such cases, it is difficult to obtain the proof of facts, as evidenced during the great Parliamentary inquiry of 1891. All those who have participated in that inquiry—the hon. Prime Minister, first of all—know that a number of witnesses did notoriously perjure themselves. I even know of a witness who had his evidence drafted for him by two lawyers, one of whom died since, while the other is still in the full enjoyment of life. I am, therefore, very careful not to go beyond what I am prepared to substantiate. Still, Parliament is no ordinary court of law; Parliament is vested with inquisitorial powers. I spoke, a few days ago, of a cheque: I did not speak of it without pondering over the matter. Let me seize this opportunity of stating that I never meant to say that Judge Bossé had taken a bribe.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) What about that cheque?

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) You need only, Mr. Speaker, to refer to the editorials I have published in past years, in which I alluded to Judge Bossé in connection with the matters now before the House. I always said, and I say so again, that never, on any of the occasions referred to, had Judge Bossé taken a bribe. I never meant to say so. I spoke about a cheque, the other day, and I am going to refer to the matter again. It is a well known fact in political circles that Thomas McGreevy and Connolly, while being kept in confinement, in violation of the promises made to them, showed to a certain person papers which were still in their hands and which may still be in their possession, for all that I know of it. Among those papers was one, I was told by one of the individuals who saw them, a cheque which had been sent as a blank cheque to Judge Bossé, when that criminal suit brought by McGreevy against me was pending before the Court.

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) What was the amount of the cheque ?

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) From the information given me by that gentleman, I gather that there were outstanding accounts in connection with contested election cases. When he sent the cheque, McGreevy, it appears, had written a note to Judge Bossé saying : Fill up the cheque for the amount due to you. The gentleman who related the facts to me is still living, as also the witness who was present at the interview. I met him lately in Montreal.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Is the cheque still among Mr. McGreevy's papers ?

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) Has the cheque been filled up ?

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) After it had been placed in Judge Bossé's hands.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) How do you account for the fact that the cheque is still in Mr. McGreevy's possession ?

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) The hon. member ought to know that a cheque is returned to the person who has signed it, after it has been paid.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Was the cheque among Mr. Robert McGreevy's papers ?

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) No ; it appears that it is among Mr. Thomas McGreevy's papers.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) If it is still a blank cheque, how is it that it was in Mr. McGreevy's papers ?

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) The question put by the hon. gentleman shows that he did not take the trouble to follow my line of argument.

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) Would it be indiscreet on my part to ask the hon. member to give us the name of the gentleman who informed him ?

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) It would be unfair to give the names now ; it would be bad policy and not at all in the interest of the future investigation. The hon. Minister recollects that, during the great inquiry in which he himself took part, it had been agreed upon not to divulge the names of the witnesses beforehand. I should think it a mere matter of prudence to follow the same course in this case. But I shall not fail to subpoena that gentleman as a witness, should an investigation be granted. I shall also subpoena the individual in whose presence the information was conveyed to me in Montreal. Should I have been deceived, I shall be the first to say so. I cannot assume the responsibility of the fact, except in as much as the information proves true. But it should be well understood, Mr. Speaker, that I never charged in the past, nor do I charge now Judge Bossé with having taken a bribe. I state again that he is unjust, tyrannical and that he should not meddle with the administration of justice in those political trials ; but I never said and I do not mean to say that he is a corrupt judge. But, Sir, I have been informed that upon other occasions, considerable sums of money had been exchanged, for political purposes, between Messrs. McGreevy and Bossé.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Were those sums of money given to Judge Bossé after his appointment to the Bench ?

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) Previously to his appointment.

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) Did the gentleman who informed you that he had seen that cheque among Mr. McGreevy's papers, mention the amount of the cheque, or was the hon. member inquisitive enough to ask that gentleman to what amount the cheque had been filled up ? Did he also inquire as to what institution or what bank it was paid.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) I do not recollect having asked him whether the cheque had been paid to a bank. I do not remember what was the amount mentioned, because, in the course of our conversation, several cheques and sums of money were mentioned. It is in the neighbourhood of $2,000, I think, but I cannot state the exact amount, on account of so many other cheques having been mentioned. I may add that we then expected to have the cheque, but these gentlemen, having been released from custody, have thought it proper to keep their small papers. I sum up the accusations brought against the Hon. Judge Bossé as follows : I accuse before this Chamber Judge Bossé of having acted as a partisan and not as a magistrate, during the terms of the Criminal Court held at Quebec in the month of October, 1890, the month of April, 1891, the month of October, 1891, and the month of October, 1892 ; of having conducted himself in such a way as to cause Her Majesty's subjects to lose respect and confidence in the administration of justice ; of having abused his position as a judge, for party purposes and for the benefit of certain men with whom he had identified himself before he ascended the Bench; of having, to reach his ends, rendered unjust and arbitrary decisions; of having usurped the functions and the rights of the responsible Attorney General; of having held on the Judicial Bench language and propositions calculated to prejudice juries against persons brought before the tribunal.

Mr. GIROUARD. (Translation.) Is he the only judge charged?

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) No.

Mr. GIROUARD. (Translation.) Are you going to make the other charges now?

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) Certainly.

Mr. GIROUARD. (Translation.) It had better be done now.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) The charges are rather vague.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) I never expected to convince the hon. member. When I began this statement of facts, I never entertained any hope in that direction. The next magistrate to whom I regret to have to allude to, is the Hon. Judge Ouimet, to whom is assigned the judicial district of Richelieu. I should state that in bringing forward these charges, I do not act in my own personal name. Personally, I have no grievance against the honourable judge. I have always looked upon him as one of my friends; I make this charge on behalf and at the request of a large number of citizens of the district of Richelieu. Mr. Ouimet was appointed to the Bench on the 11th of April, 1886. He was instructed to reside at Sorel, the chief town of the district, where he was charged to administer justice.

Mr. GIROUARD. (Translation.) Is this obligation to reside in the judicial district enacted under the authority of an Act of Parliament, or by a mere order of the Government?

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) I think it is a statutory enactment.

Mr. GIROUARD. (Translation.) Would you quote the Act?

Mr. LAURIER. (Translation.) It is the Act of 1872.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) I shall not undertake to interpret the laws relating to the administration of justice, for I confess that the hon. gentleman is more competent than I am in that line. I bring down facts upon which the hon. member will have to express his opinion and on which I think he is inclined to pronounce himself rather hastily. I am going to lay before the House facts which I am in possession of, and should they prove untrue, I would only be too happy to confess my error. On the 8th of April, 1889, the Board of Trade of Sorel sent to the Government, or rather to the hon. Minister of Justice the following resolution

Mr. TARTE.

Resolved:—Whereas the despatch of judicial business in this district has suffered to a large extent, for some years past, from the absence of a residing judge at Sorel, the chief town; and whereas, owing to said absence, the trade interests have not yet reaped the benefits of the provincial law of 1888 relating to summary matters; and whereas the judicial business of this district is large enough to necessitate the permanent presence of a judge at the chief town.

This Board respectfully prays His Excellency the Governor General in Council to take all necessary steps in order that this district shall no longer be deprived of a residing judge:

Resolved:—That this Board do address itself to the members of the Commons for the county of Richelieu and for the other counties of the district, and urge them to press upon the federal government their claim to the effect that the district of Richelieu be no longer deprived of a residing judge.

This resolution was forwarded on the 10th April to the hon. Minister of Justice, who forthwith communicated it to the hon. Judge Ouimet, at Sorel. The judge's reply, dated 4th May, 1889, reads as follows:—

“SOREL, 4th May, 1889.

“SIR,—I have the honour to reply to your favour of the 23rd ultimo, by which you draw my attention ‘that repeated complaints have been made to the Department of Justice, by reason of my not residing within my judicial district as required by law,’ ‘and to acknowledge the receipt of J. B. Labelle, Esq., M.P., letter addressed to you, and annexed to an extract from the minutes of a meeting of the Board of Trade held at Sorel, on the 8th day of April, 1883.’

“1. That I have been appointed a judge of the Superior Court, for Lower Canada, on the eleventh day of April, 1886, while absent in the North-west Territory of Canada, as chairman of the Royal Commission on rebellion losses of 1885.

“2. That the Commissioners returned back to Ottawa, in July, 1886, and were engaged to look at and examine the evidence in support of the very numerous claims filed before them in order to make a report, till the month of August, 1887, when the Commissioners presented their final report to the Minister of the Interior and concluded their work;

“3. That I resumed permanently my official duties as judge for the district of Richelieu, in September, 1887;

“4. That since that date, I have always attended, monthly, to my official duties, and with my residing in my judicial district, during (21) twenty-one days per month, with the exception of part of the months of July and August, the vacation time, as it appears by the proclamation herewith annexed, issued by the Quebec Official Gazette, 16th April, 1887, fixing the terms of the Superior Court, Circuit Courts, and Criminal Court in the said district of Richelieu;

“5. That outside of the twenty-one days above mentioned, devoted as aforesaid to my judicial district, I sat in the Civil Courts at Montreal and St. Hyacinthe on requisition, to help my brother judges, without, in any way, causing any prejudices in the affairs of my district, as provided by law;

"6. That in March, 1888, I rented a house at Sorel, for my residence, from Mrs. Mathieu, of Montreal; but that on the first day of May, 1888, on account of some family trouble about the property, Mrs. Mathieu has been unable to give me possession of the house, which occurrence obliged me to get special rooms at the Brunswick Hotel, at Sorel, as it appears by the Hon. Judge Mathieu's letter, herewith filed.

"7. That later on, in January, 1889, I rented another house, at Sorel, on King Street (Rue du Roi) No. 129, from E. Moreau, Esq., advocate, as mentioned in their notarial lease, passed before A. P. Bouchard, Notary Public, hereto also annexed, which house I presently occupy.

"8. That consequently, I am residing judge in my judicial district, within the meaning of the Statute, and the terms of my commission.

"9. That judicial matters, in the district of Richelieu are attended to according to law; so, I fail to see any complaint against the administration of Justice, as it fully appears by the official statements of the Clerk of the Superior Court, hereto annexed.

"Those, Sir, are my official explanations in answer, to your request.

"I have the honour to be, honourable sir,

"Your most obedient servant,

"(Sgd) J. ALPH. OUIMET,

The Honourable

Sir JOHN THOMPSON,

Minister of Justice, etc., etc., Ottawa.

Meanwhile the hon. judge communicated to the hon. Minister of Justice the lease made and passed between Mr. Moreau and himself on the 10th of April, 1889, two days after the resolution I have just read had been adopted by the Board of Trade of Sorel. I am sorry to have to state—for I have the proof of it at hand—that when Judge Ouimet wrote this letter to the Minister of Justice he had never resided at Sorel, in the district of Richelieu; that he was not residing there at the time, and that he has never since resided there. The hon. judge leased a house from Mr. Moreau; he boarded and lodged there during the terms, and that is all. His family has never resided in Sorel, and does not yet reside there. The best proof of it is a petition sent to the Minister of Justice, in the month of May, 1894, signed by business men and leading citizens of the district of Richelieu. It reads as follows:—

To His Excellency the Most Honourable Sir JOHN CAMPBELL HAMILTON GORDON, Viscount of Formartine, Lord Haddo, Methlic, Tarves and Kellie, in the Peerage of Scotland, Lord Aberdeen in the Peerage of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, Governor General of Canada, &c., in Council.

The humble petition of the undersigned, amenable to the tribunals and residing in the city of Sorel and in the judicial district of Richelieu, in the province of Quebec, respectfully submits:

That from the time of its re-organization into a separate judicial district in 1857, down to the spring of 1886, the said judicial district of Richelieu always had a judge of the Superior Court residing and living in the town or city of Sorel, its chief town, to administer justice, in pursuance of the express provisions of the law;

That, from the said time (the Spring of 1886) down to this day, the said district has always been, as it still is, deprived of a residing judge, and this for reasons which your petitioners are unaware of;

That, during the said lapse of time, that is to say, for eight consecutive years, justice has been invariably administered and it is still administered by one of the honourable judges of the Superior Court residing and living in the city and district of Montreal, and usually exercising his functions there.

That, in the opinion of your petitioners, the actual and effective residence at the chief town of the said district, of a judge especially entrusted with the administration of justice, as formerly, and as in the other judicial districts of this province, would be highly conducive to the promotion of the interests of those who are amenable to the laws, and would also to a large extent aid in the progress of the locality and promote the general business interests throughout the said district.

Wherefore your petitioners humbly and respectfully beg that Your Excellency be pleased to take and adopt such means and steps as he may, in his wisdom and prudence, deem fit, expedient or necessary, to procure and insure permanently in the future, to the persons amenable to the tribunal in the judicial district of Richelieu the services of a judge of the Superior Court, residing and living in the chief-town of said district, in the city of Sorel, to administer justice, &c.

And you will do justice.

And as in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray.

Sorel, May, 1894.

It will be proven beyond dispute that the honourable judge never resided in Sorel, but that he has always resided in Montreal. Now, however incredible the fact may appear—the Auditor General's Reports are authority for it—this gentleman has drawn, since his appointment to the Bench, from 1887 to 1892, the sum of $2,286 for sitting in other courts in Montreal out of his judicial district. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) was inquiring as to how the law stood on that point. The law is very clear: it is endorsed on the blanks of certificates which are given to the judges to transmit their accounts to the Department of Justice. Every judge is entitled to draw $6 a day if he goes out of the judicial district where he resides. Now, the hon. Judge Ouimet has drawn $2,286 for sitting in Montreal, where he resides. I may perhaps be told that this is not a serious accusation. Should a simple citizen obtain money under such pretexts, he would immediately be indicted before the criminal court. I do not mean to say that the judge knowingly and wilfully did so; I do not say that he has pondered the full extent of his guilt; but the public who know how the law stands on the matter, can ascertain, by referring to the public accounts, that a gentleman upon whom devolves the administration of justice, draws sums of money to which he has no right. This is a fact, in my opinion, the gravity of which should not escape the notice of those who have at heart the respect due to a pure magistracy.

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) If the hon. member allows me to interrupt him, I would like to know whether the receipts to which he refers are the original receipts?

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) What.

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) I would like to know whether they are the original receipts or merely copies of them?

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) I lay before the House and before the hon. Minister of Justice the papers which have been handed over to me on the matter. The hon. Minister of Public Works, by referring to the report of the Auditor General, will satisfy himself that the amounts stated as having been drawn by Judge Ouimet for having sat at Montreal, while he resided there, are correct. I find those sums stated in the Auditor's Report. As far as Judge Ouimet is concerned, I may say that the communications which I have received on the matter teem with grievances about the way in which he administers justice in his district. The fact that he has always declined to reside in his judicial district has resulted in actual refusals of justice. Lawyers and litigants complain that he despatches his business in great haste and then hurries away. I sum up my accusations against the hon. Judge Ouimet as follows: I accuse the Hon. Judge Ouimet of having neglected his judicial duties in the district in which he is charged to administer justice, that is to say, in the district of Richelieu; of never having resided in the said district to the great detriment of the ends of justice; of having deceived the Minister of Justice, especially by a letter written on the 4th of May, 1889, in which he stated that he had resided in the district of Richelieu, and in transmitting to him a lease made and passed in the city of Sorel, the 16th day of April, 1889, before Monsieur A. P. Bouchard, notary, which lease has never been executed by the said honourable judge; of having, while he resided in Montreal, taken and drawn from the Government of the Dominion, in the years 1887, 1888, 1889, 1890, 1891 and 1892, considerable sums of money, that is to say, $2,286 for travelling expenses for being transported from his supposed residence at Sorel, and of having sat as judge in the said city of Montreal; of having, in fact, resided at Montreal since the date of his nomination until to-day, instead of residing at Sorel, in the judicial district of Richelieu. I have another count of indictment against that judge, but I do not think it proper to bring it to the knowledge of the House. I may, perhaps, in the course of the inquiry, that may be made into the general administration of justice, amend my actual charges and make other accusations. The time at my disposal has been so short that I have thought it preferable to wait until all my papers were in proper shape.

Mr. GIROUARD. (Translation.) It is better to make a clear house. If the hon. gentleman has other charges to make, it is better to make an end of them.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), who is an eminent lawyer, and one of the senior members of this House, is perfectly aware that in a case like this, the proof is difficult, and it takes a long time to procure the necessary evidence. I have no right to bring before the House facts which may have come to my own personal knowledge, but respecting which I have been unable to gather all the desirable information.

Mr. GIROUARD. (Translation.) Well, then, let the hon. member not mention them at all.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) I do not quite agree on that point with the hon. member; still, I shall take his suggestion into consideration. The fact ought not to be lost sight of—and those among the hon. members who are conversant with English parliamentary history will agree with me—that in the inquiries held on the administration of justice, such as the one I ask for, those members of the British Parliament who had suggested them, have had sometimes to proceed for years and years, session after session. It can, therefore, be no matter of surprise that I should reserve to myself the right of amending my accusations, and of preferring other charges should I judge it proper to do so. The hon. members of this House ought to have it at heart to reach the truth. Some citizens of St. Hyacinthe have placed in my hands the papers on which I ground the charges I have to formulate against Judge Tellier. I must say that, personally, I have no grievances against the hon. gentleman. I happened to get acquainted with him when he sat in this House, and since that time I have had no intercourse with him. A few years ago, Messrs. Beauchemin & Mallette, two lawyers of high standing in the district of St. Hyacinthe, drafted a memorandum, which I shall communicate to the hon. Minister of Justice. This memorial would be given in evidence, should the Government grant an inquiry. These lawyers, whose political proclivities are well known, had made specific charges against the conduct of that magistrate. He was accused of being an unjust and partial judge. On that point, I do not wish going beyond what is stated in the memorial. Mr. Tellier belongs to that class of judges who travel a great deal, and who draw large allowances for real or presumed travelling. By referring to the Auditor General's Report, you will find out that in 1891, Mr. Tellier has been absent from the judicial district of St. Hyacinthe for 218 days. In 1892, he was absent 243 days, according to the same report. In 1893, he was out of his district for 271 days; that is to say, he drew from the public exchequer as travelling allowances, in 1891 the sum of $1,308; in 1892, $1,458, and in 1893, $1,626. Lawyers whom I have consulted assured me that judges sit on an average during 250 days a year. At all events, there are 52 Sundays, besides a certain number of legal holidays. There is also the judicial vacation. And further, they have a court at St. Hyacinthe; the judge, surely, ought to have sat on the Bench there. And yet Mr. Justice Tellier has charged for 271 days, for which he drew payment, for travelling expenses when out of his district. I may, perhaps, be open to reproach for not making charges against other judges, and for not pointing out other facts. I trust that I have been far enough—without creating more scandal than is necessary—to put on their guard other judges who may have made the same mistakes, and to prevent them from committing other faults. But, at all events, I think it is high time that public opinion should assert itself by the voice of those who are its representatives in Parliament, and insist upon the judges of the land setting the example of the respect due to the laws. The charges which I have made against Judge Tellier, besides those contained in the memorandum whose existence I have pointed out to the hon. Minister of Justice, may be summed up as follows:—I charge the Hon. Judge Tellier to have acted as a partisan and not as a magistrate on several occasions; to have, in the elections, sought and asked candidates to come forward in opposition to the party which he combated before he accepted the office of judge; to have, in a spirit of partisanship, refused to permit judicial advertisements to be published in the newspaper called the "Union," which is hostile to the Conservative party; to have, while on the Bench, attacked the Provincial Government, while it was administered by his adversaries of other days; to have followed a general line of conduct which created the impression that the hon. judge is partial and favours one political party more than another in matters which come before him; to have, without any right and illegally, drawn travelling allowances, especially in the years 1891, 1892 and 1893. As I have just stated, when replying to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), I shall take into consideration the suggestion he offered me, that is to say to pass over in silence the names of those judges against whom I am not prepared now to bring charges. I expressly reserve to myself the right of making other charges should I deem it proper, either at the next session of Parliament or before royal commission which the Government might appoint. I wish it to be well understood that I have other papers, which I have communicated to some of my colleagues in this House, but, all things well considered, we have come to the conclusion that it were better—seeing that those papers have not yet been put in proper shape—not to proceed now against the judges. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier is certainly alive to the feeling now prevailing in the province of Quebec. He is one of the men whom I rely upon to extend a helping-hand to me in the difficult task I am now undertaking. In doing so, I am equally free from hatred and from political animus, for, among the judges whom I have just named are found two men with whom I have always been on the most friendly terms. It is neither in my own name nor in order to ventilate personal grievances that I proceed against them, but because they have asked me to do so. Before going any further, allow me to read the extract from Lord Brougham's speech alluded to at the outset. It is taken from his speech on political reform, delivered, if I recollect aright, in 1828:

Now, what is the consequence of this carrying party principles into judicial appointments? The choice of judges is fettered by being confined to half the profession, so that you have less chance of able men, and those you get are of necessity partisans, and therefore less honest and impartial. Why should the whole Bench be ministerial or Tory? No man can desire it to be so for the purposes of judging over a community, far, very far, from being ministerial or Tory. Yet it must be so unless vacancies should occur during those visits of Whig Ministries, "few and far between" when once in a quarter of a century power alights upon that party, and then spreads its wings and flies from them in a few months. Does not this arrangement instil into the minds, both of expectant judges and of men already on the Bench, a feeling of a party fatal to strict justice in political questions? I speak impartially and unhesitatingly on this point, for it is perfectly notorious that, nowadays whenever a question comes before the Bench, whether it be upon a prosecution for libel or upon any other matter connected with politics, the counsel at their meetings take for granted that they can tell pretty accurately the leaning of the court, and predict exactly enough which way the consultation of the judges will terminate, though they may not always discover the particular path which will lead to that termination. While the system I complain of continues, while you suffer it to continue, such a leaning is its necessary consequence. The judges have this leaning; they must have it; they cannot help having it; you compel them to have it; you choose them on account of their notoriously having it at the Bar; and you vainly hope that they will suddenly put it off when they rise by its means to the Bench. On the contrary, they know they fill a certain situation, and they cannot forget by whom they were placed there, or for what reason.

Here we have delivered from life, in its general features, the system complained of, now prevailing in the province of Quebec. I call upon the members of the Bar who sit in this House, to tell us whether in the majority of cases, namely in political cases, they cannot tell pretty accurately the leaning of the court. This is a fact established beyond controversy. Lawyers will tell you that they multiply proceedings in order to avoid producing the evidence and arguing their cases before certain judges. I call upon all members of the Bar who hear me to say whether such is not their experience. After that, how is it possible that our population should rely any confidence in our magistrates? We are being criticised for our attacks on the judiciary. It is no pleasure, no privilege to stand up and censure the judges. That it is by no means a pleasant task is evidenced by the fact that three-fourths of the members of the Bar are afraid to incur the risk attending such a course, for a judge has it in his power, if he so chooses, to ruin his accuser; and such ruin may be brought about within a very short time. Were you to take information on the matter, you would learn that a lawyer loses all his cases because the judges before whom he argues his cases belong to the Conservative party. I call the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to that state of things, and I entreat him to make investigations about it. He may to a large extent, remedy this lamentable state of things, by putting a stop to the system, the evil effects of which I have pointed out, and by a more severe control being exercised over the men who occupy seats of justice. It is the prevailing impression on the other side of the House—an impression which is shared by a great many minds out of this House,—that the party in power may rely upon the judges appointed by them. Things have come to such a pass that many politicians on the ministerial side look upon the judiciary as the best political organization to be found in the country. No matter how my words may clash with the feelings of a large number of people, I am bound to tell the truth. It behooves those who grasp the situation, to extend a helping-hand to the hon. Minister of Justice in examining into the facts, and to prevail upon him to grant an inquiry calculated to put a stop to the present state of things. I do not feel very sanguine about the treatment which a certain press keeps in store for me. I am not in the habit, as a rule, of being stirred up or ruffled by any amount of abuse heaped upon me. I have fulfilled, I think, the duty devolving upon me, without resorting to intemperate language. If the facts brought before the House were unfounded, untrue, I should be too happy to acknowledge my error and to apologize, as any man is in honour bound to do upon such occasions. Should, on the other hand, the facts prove true—I speak on the assumption that the hon. Prime Minister may attach enough weight to my statements to warrant his ordering an inquiry to be made into the general administration of justice—the hon. Minister shall find out that I have not said the whole truth. I could have said a great deal more in that connection. Under the circumstances I felt that the duty devolved upon me of rising in my place in the House; but I may add that I do not intend to stop mid-way, and that I shall bend all my energies upon pursuing my investigations, and pushing on to a successful issue the task I have undertaken; and should the hon. Minister of Justice deem it expedient to order an inquiry to be made, I shall make it my duty to lay before him all the information available.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I need not remind the House that the question now before it is one of great importance, as it affects the judiciary, especially the judges of one of the highest courts of a province. The House has a very delicate duty to discharge, and one that requires great care from every person who has either to deliberate on the charge or even to speak to it. I received a note from the hon. gentleman yesterday, intimating that he would make charges to-day. I received, a week or ten days ago, from him an intimation that he would do so in a short time, and in consequence of that I refrained for many days from making observations which I might have thought it my duty to make with respect to what transpired in the House about two weeks ago in the course of another discussion. The House will remember that something transpired while we were debating another question with respect to the judiciary of the province of Quebec, although the measure before the House at that time had no relation to the judiciary of Quebec. But in consequence of what was said at that time, and which I shall not of course repeat, two of the judges of the province of Quebec whose names had been brought into that discussion communicated with me in terms which I feel, in justice to them, as well as to the judiciary generally of Quebec, I should mention to the House now, because it has some connection with the attitude which I shall have to take with respect to what has transpired this afternoon. Immediately after that discussion in the House, I received, by telegraph, a communication from Judge Bossé, stating, in effect, that he had received information through the press, or otherwise, of accusations that had been made against him, and stating the purport of those accusations. The learned judge stated that he had to give the most unqualified and emphatic denial to the accusations which had been made; but both in that message and in several messages subsequent to that, as well as in more formal communications, the learned judge insisted, as a matter of fairness to himself, that an investigation should take place into the charges which he understood had been preferred then. I received, a day or two afterwards, a communication from Judge Davidson, in which that learned judge stated, as to the charges in connection with himself which had been made in this House, that those charges were absolutely untrue, and he insisted, as a matter of justice to himself, that a like investigation should take place. Both of those judges pressed upon me the propriety and importance of myself undertaking the business of accusing them before this Parliament of the charges which had been made, for the purpose of having a thorough investigation into their conduct, especially in relation to those charges, but in regard to any others, also, insinuated or suggested. The view which I took of the request of those judges was this: That while the statements which had been made in the House were, in my humble opinion, most offensive to those judges, they did not involve such charges as could be treated as an impeachment against either of them. The rules of discussion would, I think, prevent me referring to what took place on that day, even for the purpose of justifying the opinion I have just expressed; but I certainly felt a great deal of sympathy with men who were under an accusation such as had been suggested that afternoon, while at the same time I felt that the charge had not been made in a distinct way, but had been based rather on hearsay statements of what had been said against those judges outside; and while I entertained very great sympathy for them, I felt that the charges made of misconduct on their part were not such as would justify me in asking the House to proceed with an inquiry regarding them. That impression was confirmed by the statement which the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) made on a subsequent day, in which he impressed upon the House that he had not made an accusation against Judge Bossé with respect to the cheque which has been discussed to-day, but that he had asserted only that certain things had been said to be the general impression respecting certain other things which had been said by Mr. McGreevy. When we come to consider what has taken place this afternoon, in the course of the hon. gentleman's speech, I think I must submit to the House that the hon. gentleman has not dealt with the judiciary of his province in a way we had a right to expect of him. In passing, I may say that the judiciary of that province, which I am exceedingly sorry to hear impugned in very general terms occasionally in this House, has at this moment the highest respect of the people of the Dominion at large. We know but little in other provinces of the party questions. I mean the smaller party questions which agitate politicians in that province, and which lead them sometimes to question the conduct of members of the Bench, but we know the high standing which the judiciary of that province has held for very many years past, and all that we know of the men who compose that judiciary now, or nearly all we know of them—and perhaps I need not qualify it to that extent even—leads us to respect them personally as gentlemen and as honourable judges; and we in the other provinces of Canada feel, to say nothing of what the people in the province of Quebec may feel, that the reputation of the judiciary of that province is exceedingly dear to all the people of the Dominion, who treasure as one of the best possessions of the country, not only a pure judiciary, but a judiciary distinguished by its learning, its attainments and the record of the individuals who compose it. Therefore, I feel that while, as regards the general principle of the treatment of judges in Parliament, it is a matter of great delicacy and concern to the House how they shall be treated and spoken of here, it is in relation to that judiciary a matter of great concern to all of us as to how we shall proceed and as to how they shall be treated in discussions in this House. We think, therefore, that when the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) came to discuss the conduct and to impugn the conduct of members of that judiciary it would have been at least fair that he should have given to the judges concerned and whom he has accused to-day, a copy of the accusations which he would make against them, or, at least, that the hon. gentleman should have given to me a statement of what the charges were which he intended to prefer, in order that I might be able to present to the House this afternoon the nature of the answer they would make. The hon. gentleman is not bound by any rule of order to do so; he is within the rules of the House, and has a perfect right to make his accusations on a motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and we have no right, perhaps, to complain. His conduct in that respect is a matter for the judgment of the House and of the people he represents, but it would have been more satisfactory to all of us if we had an opportunity at least to hear what the judges had to say in regard to these matters, and what my department might have to say in regard to the particular complaint made, so far as the hon. gentleman has particularized with respect to the sums which two of the judges have received from the public treasury. I think the hon. gentleman also owed it to Judge Bossé, and certainly to the judiciary of the province of Quebec, when he rose after consideration of this subject, for he must have considered it, seeing that many of the matters he alleged had been discussed before, that the accusations which he would make when he rose to accuse the judges should be very specific and detailed in their character. Surely the hon. gentleman's object was not to attack private character; surely his object was not to degrade in the public estimation the men who occupy the seats of justice in his own province. I assume—I surely have the right to assume—that the object of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) was to have a fair investigation and a fair criticism of the conduct of those whose conduct he thought was improper. Sir, that investigation can only take place under the rules of Parliament, under the precedents which guide us from the mother country and here, when specific accusations are made to the House, giving time, place, circumstance, and name of the cause. We are here to-day listening to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) making an accusation, for instance, against Judge Bossé, with regard to the manner in which the judge conducted himself from time to time, in the hearing of a cause in which the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) was concerned. Endeavouring to hold oneself impartial as regards the investigation which the hon. gentleman has challenged under the accusation he is bringing forward; the only impression he left on my mind from the speech he made with regard to Judge Bossé in relation to the trial of his own cause was: that the learned judge had not tried that cause to the satisfaction of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). That is not an accusation to be made in this House, that is not an accusation upon which a public inquiry can take place into the conduct of the judge. The hon. member (Mr. Tarte) tells us that motions were made at various times to put off the trial, or to fix the date of trial; and that in one very important trial there was long deliberation by the grand jury and several ballotings in the jury room. On whose authority, pray, is that said? The hon. member (Mr. Tarte) takes care that it shall not be upon his authority. He tells us that there were many ballotings in the grand jury room, and that the judge must have known of them. He tells us that at a subsequent day the judge was bitterly denounced in a newspaper—which I suppose he will admit to be a partisan newspaper in the sense of espousing strongly a particular party which took a deep interest in that trial—he says that the learned judge was bitterly denounced in that paper, and that subsequently, and before the trial began, the judge vindicated or endeavoured to vindicate himself from the attack and left the Bench in order that another judge might preside at the trial. One would naturally infer—if one's mind were not infused with a strong sense of prejudice or resentment against Judge Bossé—that he did that from a sense of propriety and of delicacy; that when at the very outset of the trial, before even the trial commenced, but when the accusation had been found by the grand jury, he found that he had been accused publicly in the press of partisanship and of helping to procure that accusation; one would have thought that his motive in retiring from the Bench might fairly be taken to be the motive of a man of sensitive feeling anxious that the trial should proceed without that suspicion attaching to its result, which would perhaps have attached to it if he had gone on to try the case after his motives had been so strongly impugned. But the suggestion which is made by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) is: that under these circumstances, the retirement of Judge Bossé from the Bench was the result of cowardice and conscious guilt. Mr. Speaker, that is not the way in which a judge should be spoken of in this House. I am referring to Judge Bossé alone. I would be quite as sensitive in the case of any judge in any province of Canada, and I would say: not only that that is not the way to make charges against a judge, but that it is not the way that judges should be spoken of in this House. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) accuses Judge Bossé with regard to the disposal of any particular application to him in that case or any other case, let him accuse Judge Bossé of having made a wrong decision from a corrupt motive, and this House, as well as my own department, is bound by the very sentiment of respect that it entertains for the Bench at large, to make an investigation in order that the ends of justice may be promoted, and the exact state of the facts arrived at. But what the hon. member (Mr. Tarte) does is to read a paper, which he wishes to be considered as formal charges; a paper which does not mention one cause, one date, or one instance, but which contains a general charge of partisanship and prejudice as against the judge. I think, therefore, Sir, that the statement I have ventured to make in reproach as to the way in which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) has made this accusation is well justified and will be borne out by the general feeling of the House. The hon. member (Mr. Tarte) conceiving that the learned judge was actuated by the feelings which he has suggested, of partisanship and hatred against himself, has drawn, and has presented the inference to the House, that in postponing the trial of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) and in fixing a day for the trial of McGreevy and Murphy earlier than the day on which the hon. gentleman himself would be tried, the object of the learned judge was to get those persons convicted and sent to the penitentiary in order that when they appeared as witnesses for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) they might appear under the ban of a condemnation already pronounced. What statement has the hon. gentleman made to justify that? He has undertaken to state what his opinion is as to the feelings and motives of Judge Bossé. But these are not charges such as I supposed he would make when he gave notice to me that he would prefer charges, and they are not charges such as ought to be made without distinct date, circumstance, and accusation, that the decisions were improperly given. Notwithstanding that the hon. gentleman went over a number of the incidents of the trial of himself and these other persons, he did not intimate nor even attempt to show the House that the decision of Judge Bossé with regard to any particular application whatever was wrong in point of law, much less to show reason for suspecting corrupt motives. The hon. gentleman has chosen to present a detail of those incidents to the House, as incidents which justify in his own mind the impression that the learned judge was acutated by malice towards him, was desirous of seeing him convicted, and was desirous to see his witnesses prejudiced in the minds of the jury who might come to try him. He has suggested this, without anything being put forward to the House to show that the judgment which the learned judge gave was not perfectly right, and fair, and correct, and such as any other judge would have given. Let me call the attention of the House to the terms in which these charges against Judge Bossé are made, so that I shall not be under the dread that in hearing the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) speak in a tongue with which I am not quite familiar, I have misjudged the expressions which he used, or the general tenor of his remarks. Here is his statement in writing :

I accuse before this Chamber, Judge Bossé of having acted as a partisan and not as a magistrate, during the terms of the criminal court held at Quebec in the month of October, 1890, the month of April, 1891, the month of October, 1891, and the month of October, 1892.

The House will see that in the course of these five months the learned judge must, in the ordinary course of business, have had multitudes of cases before him, and multitudes of motions to act upon, and the accusation is, that he acted in a partisan manner and not as a magistrate. If this House should hold an inquiry on the subject, the learned judge is absolutely without a date, without the name of the cause, without the name of an accuser, and it might be that when we came to an investigation, if an investigation should be held, we should find that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) is relying not upon any knowledge that he has upon the subject himself, but upon a statement such as he based his remarks upon the other day : that such was the general tenor of the understanding of those who had conversed with a certain man, while that man was in jail. The next statement in this paper is :

Of having followed a course of conduct of a nature to deprive the subjects of Her Majesty of respect and confidence in the administration of criminal justice.

Not even the comfort of having any months named as regards that accusation. It may relate to the judge's whole career since he went on the Bench.

Of having abused his situation as a judge in order to follow the ends of the party politics of certain men with whom he was identified before he ascended the Bench.

No cause, no date, no incident !

Of having, in order to attain his object, rendered unjust and arbitrary decisions.

I would ask the House if a vaguer charge could possibly be made against a magistrate than that.

Of having usurped the functions and the rights of the responsible Attorney General.

No indication whatever of what cause is referred to, or of what time the offence is supposed to have been committed.

Of having held on the Judicial Bench language and propositions destined to prejudice the jury against persons brought before the tribunal.

Now, the hon. member, I think, will see—and if he does not I am confident that every other member of this House will see—that these are statements which ought not to have been made here, unless time and place and date and circumstances were given, such as any person, even the humblest in the land, would feel that he was entitled to before being accused, much less before being tried. But I am placed in this position, Mr. Speaker. If I am to refuse an investigation into these charges, I shall leave that judge under calumny and slander, it may be under the public impression that an accusation has been made here which he could not answer ; and, therefore, with regard to what shall be done upon these charges, I must ask the House to permit me to reserve my answer until a future day. The consequences of the statements made to-day are very serious, even though the accusations themselves may seem to the House to be vague and trivial. The consequences are very serious indeed to the judiciary, to say nothing of the judges immediately concerned ; and when I am conscious, as I have already told the House, that the judges impugned indignantly repudiate the truth and justice of those accusations, and are most eager that an investigation should take place, the House will see the peculiarly embarrassing position in which I am placed with regard to my relations to the judiciary of that province. The accusations which the hon. member has made against the other judges, while exceedingly vague, are of a somewhat different character. The accusation against Judge Ouimet, whose judicial district is Richelieu, and whose residence is fixed at Sorel, is this :

I accuse the Hon. Judge Ouimet of having neglected his judicial duties in the district in which he is charged to administer justice, that is to say, in the district of Richelieu; of having never resided in the said district, to the great detriment of the ends of justice; of having deceived the Minister of Justice, especially in a letter of the 4th of May, 1889, in saying to him that he had resided in the district of Richelieu, and in transmitting to him a lease made and passed in the city of Sorel, the 16th day of April, 1889, before Monsieur A. P. Bouchard, notary, which lease has never been executed by the said honourable judge; of having, while he resided at Montreal, taken and drawn from the Government of the Dominion, in the years 1887, 1888, 1889, 1890, 1891 and 1892, considerable sums of money, that is to say, $2,286, for expenses of travel for being transported from his supposed residence at Sorel, and of having sat as judge in the said city of Montreal; of having in fact resided at Montreal since the date of his nomination until to-day instead of residing at Sorel, in the judicial district of Richelieu.

I will state to the House briefly what I remember as regards these complaints. They were brought to my notice, as the hon. member has stated, by a communication from the Board of Trade of Sorel, in the year 1889. The complaint on that occasion was simply and solely that the judge had not resided in Sorel, as the Board of Trade thought he ought to do. It was not alleged, if I remember rightly, that any injury to the interests of suitors or the interests of justice resulted therefrom; but, in the opinion of the Board of Trade, they had a right to insist that the judge should live there. I communicated the complaint to the learned judge, and he answered it in the letter which the hon. member has read to-day, indicating that he had leased a house in Sorel, that he had not been able to take possession of it, that he, therefore, lived in the meantime in the city of Montreal, and that in the city of Montreal he discharged judicial duties from day to day, as he was called upon to do by his brethren. The House will remember that while a judge of the Superior Court of Quebec is assigned a place of residence in his appointment and by his commission, and is expected to reside there, he has equal jurisdiction in every other part of the province, and is liable to be called upon to do judicial duty in any other section of the province where an additional judge is required. That was the reply made, and I communicated it to the Board of Trade of Sorel; and since then I do not remember to have heard of the matter at all until the receipt of the letter of this year which the hon. member has referred to, and which came during the late part of the session, so that it has not yet received any personal attention. Of course, an inquiry will be made carefully into the circumstances to which the hon. gentleman has referred in his charge, with reference to the drawing of travelling expenses and the expenses of sitting in the city of Montreal. But I must say that the conclusion which I came to in 1889, irrespective altogether of the lease to which the hon. gentleman has referred, and in respect of which he has said that I was deceived, was that the complaint of the Board of Trade was a very trivial one, so far as the administration of justice was concerned. I ascertained, as I thought reliably at the time, that the judge had discharged all the duties required of him in the town of Sorel, and that his presence was needed at Montreal a great deal in connection with the administration of justice there—vastly more so than in the town of Sorel. Then, there is the statement made against Mr. Justice Teller; and the hon. member has intimated that I have received with regard to that judge a communication from an avocat in the judge's district—St. Hyacinthe, I think he said. I have not at this moment the slightest recollection of having received any such complaint. The communications, verbal and otherwise, in which I have ever heard the name of Judge Teller mentioned were communications of which any man sitting in a judge's seat might well be proud; and I have always considered that if there was a judge anywhere whose conduct was above reproach and suspicion, that judge was the very one whom I have just named. Therefore, the House will perceive, when I read them, how completely unjust are the accusations which are made, in view of their vagueness and their utter inadequacy to the requirements of any charge which ought to be made against any public magistrate.

I accuse the Hon. Judge Tellier of having acted as a partisan and not as a magistrate in several circumstances. Of having, in the elections, sought and demanded candidates in opposition to the party that he had combated before he accepted the charge of judge. Of having made proof of a partisan spirit in refusing to permit judicial announcements to be published in the newspaper 'l'Union' which is hostile to the Conservative party. Of having made, he being on the Bench, attacks against the Provincial Government, when it was administered by his adversaries of former times. Of having held and followed a general line of conduct which has created the impression that the hon. judge is partial and favours one political party rather than another, in the matters which come before him. Of having drawn, without right, and in an illegitimate manner, travelling allowances, especially in the years 1891, 1892 and 1893.

These are the accusations which have been made against Mr. Justice Tellier. As regards the matter of expenses, of course an inquiry will be made, as I stated in the case of Judge Ouimet; but as regards the other charges, which ought never to have been made, unless accompanied by a specification of the circumstances which would justify an inquiry, and inform the accused magistrate of what is alleged against him and what he has to meet, I shall give information to the House, at as early a date as possible, of what the Government propose to do with regard to an inquiry.

Mr. LAURIER. Let me say, at the very outset of the remarks I have to offer on this occasion, that I will endeavour to speak with a full sense of the propriety and the gravity with which such a subject ought to be approached. I fully agree in what the hon. gentleman said a moment ago, that the character of the judiciary ought to be held sacred, that it should never be attacked except for cause adequate. Still, agreeing in this inherently, we are aware that judges are after all men and liable to error—liable to err involuntarily, and liable to err voluntarily, as all men are. Judges, whether on the Bench or not, are after all composed of the same flesh and blood that they were before they ascended to that dignified position; and we have examples in history of judges on the Bench—and some of them more eminent and greater men of history—who have so far belied their reputation as to incur the deepest censure on their memory for all time to come. I need only cite the case of Lord Bacon as an example, which is in everybody's memory. But let me say that while I make this reference, I do not intend at this moment—and I wish to be well understood—to cast any suspicion whatever upon the judges whose names have been brought before the House. At the same time, I am bound to say this: and I speak with a full sense of my responsibility as a member of this House, attaching some value to my reputation as a public man, that the administration of justice in the province of Quebec is not as satisfactory to the public as it ought to be; that there are judges in that province whose conduct is certainly calculated to disgrace the high positions they hold and the administration of justice at large. That is largely due to the fact that judicial appointments have been made too often, not upon judicial considerations, but upon political considerations—that men have been appointed to the Bench whose only qualification for that office was the services they had rendered to their party, and not their standing as members of the Bar. Four names have been cited this afternoon—Mr. Justice Davidson, Mr. Justice Bossé, Mr. Justice Ouimet and Mr. Justice Tellier. Let me say at once that the remarks which I make with regard to the character of the appointments cannot apply in any way to Mr. Justice Bossé or Mr. Justice Davidson. Both these gentlemen were partisans in the sense that we are all partisans, when engaged in politics. We are here defending our course, promulgating our own views, and when I say that Judges Bossé and Davidson were partisans before they were appointed to the Bench, I do not apply that term in any offensive way. They were both, I am glad to say, able lawyers, though partisan in politics, well-learned in their professions, and both were at the very top of their profession while at the Bar. Let me go one step further with regard to Mr. Justice Davidson. I must say this to my hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Tarte): that when I heard the other day the name of Mr. Justice Davidson mentioned by him, I could not construe his remarks—he will pardon me for so saying—at all as detracting from the character of that learned judge, who acted, I am bound to say, at a time when there was great political excitement in the province of Quebec, on a commission appointed to investigate the Baie des Chaleurs scandal. He was appointed at the same time as Mr. Justice Baby and Mr. Justice Jetté. Now, I must say this: although in my remarks I may perhaps not altogether agree in the opinion of all my hon. friends, that I cannot forget that if these three gentlemen were acting as a commission, they so acted upon the advice of the then responsible adviser of the Crown, Mr. Mercier. But having said this, I must add, however—and I say it without meaning any offence at all to Mr. Justice Davidson—that I dissent in a great many ways from the report he made on that occasion to the Lieutenant-Governor. I think the report was not at all justified by the facts, but in saying that I do not want to attack his judgment in that respect. I only wish to remark that the reasoning of Mr. Justice Jetté, in my opinion, was of a nature more calculated to commend itself to the judgment of all impartial men, than the report of Judges Davidson and Baby. Of course, in all these matters, gentlemen who belong to the legal profession understand rightly that because one man differs from the decision of a judge, it does not follow that the judgment is wrong, and it does not follow at all that any implication should be deducted therefrom that the conclusion at which the judge arrives may not after all have been the best. But for my part, I give my views just as they are. Now, with regard to the charges made against Judge Bossé this afternoon. If I understood my hon. friend aright he did not at all question the competence of Mr. Justice Bossé as a learned judge and a learned member of the profession. He did not discuss or decry his legal acumen or his great learning. No man who has had the honour of practising before Mr. Justice Bossé would decry these qualities in respect of which he is justly eminent. The only charge that is made against Judge Bossé by my hon. friend the hon. member for L'Islet, was that Mr. Justice Bossé was of hot temper, and, perhaps, of vindictive temper as well. Now, I quite agree with my hon. friend, the Prime Minister, that it is difficult for the judge to repel a charge of that kind. There are men on the Bench—I give my own views and do not intend that what I say shall apply to Judge Bossé—who are so constituted that they are unconsciously biased by preconceived notions. They may come to conclusions which I think the better temper of the men would not endorse. They come to these conclusions, not at all through dishonest motives nor through anything that may be presented as a charge against them, but because the preconceived notions that they may hold upon one subject or another—let it be politics or anything else—bias their judgment, though they are not in their own minds conscious that they are being so biased. I can understand, as the right hon. Prime Minister said a moment ago, that on the charge made by my hon. friend it would be difficult for him to come to any conclusion. But I do not at all agree with the right hon. gentleman when he says that the accusation which was made against Judge Bossé was altogether to be set aside because it was too vague. In fact, I was glad to hear that Judge Bossé himself had come to a different conclusion, and, in a communication which he sent to the Minister of Justice, had expressed not only his willingness, but, as I understood the hon. gentleman, his anxiety to have the matter properly investigated. If investigated at all, the first thing he would do—at all events the first thing he would be entitled to do—would be to demand particulars as to the charges which are brought against him. My hon. friend from L'Islet accused Mr. Justice Bossé of having acted on a certain occasion in a partisan manner. Now, no charge against the reputation of a judge could be graver than this. But this is the accusation which my hon. friend from L'Islet, on his responsibility as a member of this House, brings against Judge Bossé. If my hon. friend from L'Islet had not been a layman, if he had been more versed not only in legal practice, but—he will permit me to say, as he is a young member of this House in parliamentary practice—he would have seen that it would have been more conducive to the object he has in view to bring his charges forward in more accurate and definite language. But, after all, the accusation is there, and I am glad, I repeat, being an old associate of the Bar with Mr. Justice Bossé, having, though not very often recently, yet often in former years, had the honour of appearing many times in his court, to hear that he cannot allow his fair name to rest under the accusation made, and that he is anxious for an investigation. However, I do not dispute what the right hon. gentleman said a moment ago that Mr. Justice Bossé would not have the advantage he has a right to have if he were compelled to face an investigation on the charge of the hon. gentleman without further explanation. But I need not remind the right hon. gentleman, I need not remind any hon. member of this House, that it is the right of the judge, under such circumstances, to have full particulars before he is called upon to enter upon his defence.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

Mr. LAURIER.

After Recess.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, with regard to the charges preferred against Mr. Justice Ouimet and against Mr. Justice Tellier, I must say that I differ in toto from the opinion expressed by the right hon. the Minister of Justice. The charge against Mr. Justice Ouimet is, in my estimation, of a very grave character indeed. The right hon. Minister of Justice stated this afternoon that this charge was too vague to be entertained. Sir, it seems to me that the charge is as direct as it can be, and it is nothing less than this—and it is a very grave offence—that Mr. Justice Ouimet has been drawing from the public exchequer moneys for travelling expenses to which he was not entitled. Mr. Justice Ouimet is assigned by his commission to the charge of justice in the district of Richelieu. By the law as it exists in the province of Quebec, certain judges are assigned for the district of Montreal, certain others for the district of Quebec, and in each of the rural districts one judge is entrusted with the administration of justice. The law in this respect is to be found in article 2319 of the Consolidated Statutes of the province of Quebec :

Ten judges of the Superior Court shall reside in the city of Montreal, and two of them shall always be available for the business of the Circuit Court of the said district, four shall reside in the city of Quebec, one in the city of Three Rivers, one in the city of Sherbrooke, one in the village of Aylmer or in the immediate vicinity of each of these localities, one in the county of Gaspé, or in the county of Bonaventure, as provided in the next article, and one in each of the following districts, namely : Arthabaska, Beauharnois, Bedford, Iberville, Joliette, Kamouraska, Montmagny, Richelieu, Rimouski, Saguenay and St. Hyacinthe, in the places which are assigned to them according to law.

Now, as I understand from the declaration of the Minister of Justice this afternoon, and in fact it is a matter of public notoriety, the commission of Mr. Justice Ouimet obliges him to reside at the town of Sorel, which is the shire town of the district of Richelieu. Yet, it is a matter of public notoriety that Mr. Justice Ouimet never complied with that condition, and never at any time resided at Sorel, but always resided in the city of Montreal. At the same time, if I understood the hon. member for L'Islet, about the month of May, 1890—

Mr. TARTE. 1889.

Mr. LAURIER—1889, the Board of Trade of Sorel sent a memorial, calling the attention of the Minister of Justice to this fact. The Minister of Justice always, if I understood him aright, stated that the offence at worst was a trival one. Sir, it is impossible for me to share that opinion with the right hon. gentleman. The offence is not and cannot be a trival one. If the law obliges Mr. Justice Ouimet to reside at a particular place, and if he fails to reside at that place, the offence cannot be a trivial one, especially in a judge of the land. I would not admit that it would be a trivial offence for any one to systematically disregard an obligation imposed upon him by law, and formally accepted by him, but when it is considered that this offence is committed by a judge of the land, it surely cannot be considered a trivial offence. The judge, by his station, is bound to set an example, he should be the very first to obey the laws which it is his mission to administer. What respect, I want to know, can the citizens of any country have for the laws when the very man who is charged with the administration of those laws is the first to disregard them? Moreover, Mr. Justice Ouimet himself fully acknowledged he was in the wrong, that he was disregarding the law, when, upon his attention being called by the Prime Minister to the fact that a complaint had been made against him because he did not reside in his district, he sent to the Prime Minister what was, to all appearances, an evidence that the charge was wrong, sent him a lease of the house which he had just hired in the town of Sorel, thereby conveying to the Minister of Justice the impression that up to that moment he had been obeying the law, and that for the future he would comply with it, since he had taken the trouble to rent a house in the town with the evident intention of residing there. Sir, I must say that the words used this afternoon by the hon. member for L'Islet, when he characterized this proceeding of Mr. Justice Ouimet as a deceit practiced upon the Government, were not a whit too strong, because Mr. Justice Ouimet conveyed to the Minister of Justice the impression that henceforth he would reside in the district of Richelieu, in the town of Sorel. As a matter of fact, I repeat, that Mr. Justice Ouimet never, at any time in his life, complied with that condition and inhabited the house which he had rented, but he continued to reside in the city of Montreal. There are here many members of the Bar of Montreal who know that I am within the strict truth when I assert that at no period of his judicial career did Mr. Justice Ouimet reside in his district. Well, under such circumstances, I ask, is it a trivial offence—was it not a deceit practiced upon the Minister of Justice? If Mr. Justice Ouimet had said to the Minister of Justice: I have resided in the city of Montreal, I am aiding in the administration of justice in that district—it would have been a very different thing, and the Minister of Justice would have been bound to tell him: All this may be true, but the law requires you to reside in your district, and you must reside there. But instead of that, the judge—I am sorry to have to speak in this manner, but I place myself in the judgment of every hon. member within my hearing at this moment—conveyed a false impression to the Minister of Justice when he told him, as a defence to the complaints of the Board of Trade, that he had rented a house in the town of Sorel. What conclusion could be drawn by the Minister of Justice? Evidently he understood that Mr. Justice Ouimet was going to reside in that house he had rented. In point of fact, he continued to live in the city of Montreal, in point of fact his family has always lived there, in point of fact his domicile has always been in the city of Montreal. Now, Sir, this is the first instance in which Mr. Justice Ouimet has disregarded his duty, but there is another which, in my estimation, is certainly of a very grave character. My hon. friend from L'Islet charges that Mr. Justice Ouimet, through an entirely indefensible construction of the law, has continued to draw large sums of money every year in the way of travelling expenses. The Minister of Justice told us this afternoon correctly, because it is a matter of common notoriety to all who live in the province of Quebec, that Mr. Justice Ouimet has aided in the administration of justice in the city of Montreal. It is admitted on all hands that he has been holding courts and sitting in Chambers in the city of Montreal; but I say it was indefensible for him under such circumstances to draw money for sitting in the district of Montreal. What is the law in this respect? The law says that the judges shall have a salary and then travelling expenses:

That is to say: In the province of Quebec, to each of the judges of the Superior Court attending as such any court held at any place other than that at which he is directed to reside, for each day that he is absent from his said place of residence, $6.

Now, Sir, I call attention to the fact that Mr. Justice Ouimet is assigned to the district of Richelieu. Whether he sits in the district of Richelieu every day in the year, or only ten days in the year, he is allowed to draw $4,000, and nothing more; but if he goes out of the district of Richelieu and holds a court in the district of Arthabaska, or in the district of Three Rivers, or in the district of Quebec, or in any other district, he is allowed for each day of absence $6 for travelling expenses. So far, so good; I think the law is fair. But Mr. Justice Ouimet was required to reside in the town of Sorel; he did not reside in the town of Sorel, he resided in the city of Montreal; and will it be pretended that he should be allowed to draw $6 a day for travelling expenses when he was administering justice in the very town in which he was to reside? It may be said that it is beneath us to resort to pettifoggery or quibbling in a matter of this kind; it may be said: It is true that Mr. Justice Ouimet was directed to reside in the district of Richelieu, he did not reside in the district of Richelieu, he resided in the city of Montreal, but it would be an intolerable abuse of justice to pretend that because he was assigned to reside in the district of Richelieu and failed to carry out that obligation, he should not be allowed under such circumstances to draw travelling expenses for the time he was administering justice in the city of Montreal. Well, Sir, I say that the thing is indefensible, such a construction of the law would be unwarrantable. I do not like, however, to speak too strongly upon this case, because Mr. Justice Ouimet has not yet been heard in his own defence; but I must say that there is enough in the accusation of the hon. member for L'Islet to warrant an investigation, and a request to Mr. Justice Ouimet for an explanation of his course. Now, passing to the case of Mr. Justice Tellier, I do not care at this moment, since he has not yet been heard in his defence, to express too strong an opinion upon the case, neither do I care to endorse the panegyric passed upon him by the Minister of Justice. That point will come up in due time; but I take issue altogether with the Minister of Justice when he stated, if I understood him aright, that the charges against Mr. Justice Tellier were altogether too vague to demand an investigation. The first charge, as I gathered from the reading thereof by the hon. member for L'Islet, and afterwards by the Minister of Justice, was this, that Mr. Justice Tellier interfered in politics, that he sought candidates in the county in which he resides and in the neighbouring county. Well, Sir, I want to know if there can be a more direct and a more offensive accusation than that? The language is plain. Mr. Justice Tellier is here accused of interfering with politics, forgetting his position as a judge, and looking after candidates, taking part in the selection of candidates, seeking himself to have candidates brought into the field. In face of this accusation, I repeat that I must take issue altogether with the views expressed by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister told us, however, that the accusation was too vague, that the hon. member should have indicated the particulars of time and circumstance. Sir, it is impossible on such an occasion to be more particular than one would be in any process of court, and I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to this fact. Would he, for instance, in a matter with which we are all familiar, in a controverted election petition, exact such minute information when the petition was brought forward? The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do, and, in fact, everybody knows it, that in all controverted election petitions, the charges are as broad as they can be made. The man is charged with having violated the law in almost every particular, but before he is put on his defence he has a right to have particulars; and, of course, if an investigation were had, a judge would have the right to call upon his accuser to give him the particulars, to state the circumstances, the parties with whom he was alleged to have conspired, the year and the date, and so on; but I leave it to the judgment of every member present whether, when a judge is charged with having actively interfered in politics, it will not be a miscarriage of justice to say that the accusation should not be investigated because it is too vague. Mr. Justice Tellier is accused of being a partisan. There is another charge to which the right hon. gentleman referred, one very trivial, I admit, but one which, if true, shows the partisan character of the judge. It is alleged by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) that Mr. Justice Tellier compels suitors that come before him to publish the advertisements which they are bound to give according to the laws of procedure in the province of Quebec, in one paper rather than in another paper, that he compels them to publish their advertisements in a Conservative rather than in a Liberal newspaper. According to the laws of procedure in our province, advertisements have to be published in many instances. If a man is absent from the province he can be assigned by advertisement. A meeting of creditors may be called, and an advertisement has to be published in the newspapers. If it be true, as has been stated here, that Mr. Justice Tellier will stoop to the baseness under such circumstances of saying to a suitor: You shall advertise in this paper rather than in that paper, you shall advertise in this paper because it is a Conservative paper, and not in that one because it is a Liberal paper—this would be very mean and very base, and it would show a partisanship which ought to be repudiated in any judge. That is not, however, the most serious charge brought against Mr. Justice Tellier. Mr. Justice Tellier, under the law which I have quoted, is authorized to charge certain travelling expenses. If he goes out of his district, he can charge $6 a day for travelling expenses. In one year, Mr. Justice Tellier drew from the public exchequer, $1,626, at the rate of $6 per day; this would mean that the learned judge was out of his district and sitting in other courts during 271 days. Well, Sir, there is in this fact something which requires explanation. I do not care to speak more strongly than I can avoid speaking; but we all know that there are 52 Sundays in the year, that in the province of Quebec there are at least thirteen holidays, so sixty-five days have to be deducted from the 365 days in the year, leaving 300. Mr. Justice Tellier must live, by law, at least eight days in the month in his own district for the purpose of administering its judicial affairs, and that would mean 80 days, which, again, would leave 220 days. Then there is the long vacation of two months, giving sixty days more to be deducted. That would leave less than 200 days which the learned judge could devote to other districts, to other than his own district. And yet Mr. Justice Tellier charged for 271 days, for which he drew payment for travelling expenses. The thing is physically impossible—it is not possible that Mr. Justice Tellier can have been 271 days out of his district; and this charge requires explanation. I do not care, as I said a moment ago, to go beyond what is actually legitimate and necessary in this matter, but here are accusations specific and determined in themselves which the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) in the discharge of the duties he owes to his constituency and to the country has brought to the knowledge of the Minister of Justice. It is true that the judges must be respected, it is very true that the administration of justice is sacred, but it is equally true that it is the duty of Parliament to see that every officer, be his station high or low, does his duty, and if charges of this kind are brought up against judges, who, of all men, should be the least amenable to suspicion, who, of all men, should be above suspicion, such charges cannot be passed with a sweep of the hand, but they demand at the hands of the Minister of Justice, and subsequently at the hands of Parliament, a full and absolute inquiry.

Mr. CURRAN. The charges which have been brought to-day by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) are not, as the right hon. leader of the House says, the charges we have been awaiting during the last few weeks. They are not the charges which the country had a right to expect for considerably more than a year, they are not charges indiscriminately propounded within the last few days or during the present session, because, during the last session of Parliament they were iterated and reiterated. The threat that they were to be launched was published over and over again throughout the land, and certainly there can be no excuse for any vagueness or indefiniteness or want of precision in the charges which the hon. gentleman not only stated that he would make during the course of last session of Parliament, but which he has made to-day, charges which are, upon his own showing, not of recent date, but charges which in the case of Mr. Justice Bossé resulted from circumstances which took place prior to the fall of the Mercier Government, and during the great excitement of years gone by, and in the case of Mr. Justice Ouimet, the great part of the indictment, if what has been laid before the House may be called an indictment, against him, were brought against him by the Board of Trade of Sorel years and years ago. We have had these charges put forward, I say, designedly, with skilful vagueness. The hon. leader of the Opposition would lead the House to believe and lead the country to believe that the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) being a new member of the House, being a layman, was unable, from a lack of technical training, to put into shape and definite form, and specific phrase, the charges which he wished to launch against the honourable occupants of the Bench in the province of Quebec. But surely those who have been in this House for any length of time are aware that in all these political matters, the hon. gentleman could secure the services of many hon. and learned friends to assist him. Could not the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) have applied to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), whose learning we all acknowledge, and whose skill in matters of this kind no one disputes? Could he not have applied to his leader, or to the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), or to the numerous lawyers well skilled in the practice of their profession, who would have put those matters into proper shape for him? But it was designedly done. These charges were launched on the public because the hon. gentleman knew, and those in his confidence well knew, that it would place the leader of the Government, the Minister of Justice, in the position which he describes as one which is very painful indeed. On the one hand, charges utterly vague are put before the House, with which this House cannot deal, and on the other hand, the leader of the Government has before him from some of the judges whose names are mentioned here, communications claiming that a full and thorough investigation should be made into any charges that might be made against them. We have then the statement which the hon. gentleman reiterated to-day, but in what shape is it? After having laid these charges upon the Table of the House what does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) do? He is not content with the charges as they stand, but he avails himself of the occasion and enjoys the opportunity of making a firebrand speech to accompany those vague accusations. He tells us that the judiciary of Quebec—and he has not been reproved for it by his leader—has come to be considered as the best political organization of the Conservative party in that province. Is that a charge that should be allowed to be made without reproof from those of the Liberal party who practice at the Bar of our province? I say now, what I had occasion to say before in this House: that in the province of Quebec, we have a body of judges, whose honour and whose integrity, whose honesty and whose learning have been the admiration of the whole Dominion of Canada. I am satisfied, Sir, that never in the brilliant history of the judiciary of the province of Quebec were there more able men on the Bench than now, from the Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals, down to the youngest member of the Superior Court. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) seeks to tarnish the judiciary, and he shows how high his appreciation of virtue is. After having denounced his own fellow-countrymen in the province of Quebec, after having covered them with opprobrium, after having spoken of them in language unfit to be uttered in any Parliament about the judiciary of any country; he shows his high appreciation of virtue by delivering the funeral eulogy of the late Owen E. Murphy, and speaking of him as a paragon of perfection. We can see from that, the hon. gentleman's standard of morality. He thinks there is nothing bad enough to be said, not merely against three or four of the judges of his province, but against very many of them, and yet in the whole course of his experience he tells us, he never met a man who spoke so truly as Owen E. Murphy, during the time he was in partnership with him in carrying on his investigations. I was happy to hear the leader of the Opposition speak in quite different terms of the learning of Justice Bossé, from those which his colleague (Mr. Tarte) used in referring to the legal attainments of that judge. The member for L'Islet told us that Judge Bossé had never been a very distinguished lawyer, but I am glad to say, that testimony as to his great learning and ability was given by the leader of the Opposition. But we are told by the member for L'Islet, that Judge Bossé was a violent partisan; that he was a politician over and above all things; that he could not get rid of his political proclivities and that politics submerged everything else in him. Well, some of us have the honour to know Judge Bossé, and some of us have sat with him in this House. During four years of my first session in Parliament, I occupied the same desk with him, and I knew, as every body else knew, that Mr. Justice Bossé came into this House for no other reason than to comply with the most earnest solicitation of his political friends. He did not like political life; he came here against his will, and he remained here against his will, and no inducement could be offered him that would decide him to return when the term of his first Parliament expired. He might have carried his constituency again and preserved that constituency to the Conservative party, but he did not like politics enough, and I am sorry to say he did not like his party enough to sacrifice his feelings, and so he returned to his law practice and the Conservative party lost the constituency as well as his distinguished ability. We are told by the hon. gentleman who has spoken on the opposite side of the House, that these charges are perfectly clear and perfectly definite. The leader of the Opposition in the first part of his speech seemed to take the same view as the right hon. the leader of the Government with regard to that, but warming up to the subject he at last told us that nothing could be more definite or pointed than these charges against the judges. It takes but very little argument to show those who have heard the speeches, that my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) is entirely mistaken with regard to the position assumed by the right hon. the leader of the Government. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) made a very strong statement with reference to what he considered the very grave charge that Judges Tellier and Ouimet obtained $6 a day when they were residing outside their district, and he says that the Public Accounts show that they had no right to charge the sum alleged against them. There is no use wasting time over that. The right hon. the leader of the House stated in the most emphatic language that he would look into that charge immediately; and that is the only charge about which there is any definiteness at all. The authorities say that a charge of this kind against a judge should be like an indictment, and now let us see what is the nature of the charge laid against Judge Tellier. The elementary lesson given to every law student is, that in making a complaint, the first rule should be: look out for time and circumstance. Where is the time, place or circumstance mentioned in this charge? Judge Tellier is accused:

Of having acted as a partisan and not as a magistrate on several occasions.

What occasions, when, where and how? Is there any year given in the charge, is there any time specified, are there any circumstances related to show what would constitute the offence with which this honourable judge is charged? He is further charged:

To have in the elections sought and asked candidates to come forward in opposition to the party which he combatted before he accepted the office of judge.

What election, when, where, in what district, in what part of the province? Was it in the province of Quebec at all? Nothing definitely is stated. We are not told who the candidates were, who were applied to, or when they were applied to. And yet my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition says, that that charge is perfectly clear.

To have in a spirit of partisanship refused to permit judicial advertisements to be published in a paper called the 'Union,' which is hostile to the Conservative party.

To have done this, when? Where is this journal published? What particular advertisements are referred to? In what cases were those advertisements? In what year did they occur? And what were they about? Not a single syllable in all this upon which any one could for one moment be put on trial in the most inferior court in the country. He says further:

To have, while on the Bench, attacked a provincial government while it was directed by his adversaries of other days.

It is not mentioned when. Was it the Joly Government, the Mercier Government, or what Government was it? When was this action done, where was it done, and how was it done?

To have followed a general line of conduct which created the impression that the honourable judge is partial and that there is one political party more than another in the affairs that come before him.

Well, that is really charming; its precision is simply delightful. Now, we come to the last charge, which, as I said before, the hon. Minister of Justice said would be investigated; that is to say, that he had, without any right, and illegally drawn travelling allowances in the years 1891, 1892 and 1893. That is not very specific. There is no sum mentioned. The judge is not given particulars which would enable him to meet this charge. Yet, seeing that the years are given, and that he is charged with having drawn money which he had no right to draw according to law, the Minister of Justice has undertaken to say that an investigation will take place into that charge. Now, I leave the case of Mr. Justice Tellier, and proceed to take up the case of the hon. Mr. Justice Ouimet. He is accused of having neglected his duties in the judicial district of which he is the administrator, of never having resided in that district, of having deceived the Minister of Justice by a letter written on the 4th of May, and of having, while he resided in Montreal, withdrawn certain sums of money—and here the sum is specifically stated as $2,286—for travelling expenses during the years mentioned here. This charge with reference to travelling expenses is specifically made, and the hon. Minister of Justice has promised that it will be investigated. An investigation will also take place, I have no doubt, into the charge of neglect of duty. It may be shown that the chief justice of the province felt that the judge, instead of residing where he is supposed by law to reside, was of more use in the city of Montreal, where there is an overwhelming amount of work to be done, and requested him to reside there: and no complaint has been made since the resolution was passed years ago by the Board of Trade of Sorel, not because the business was neglected, not because the members of that board had any charge to make against the judge, but simply because he did not reside there, and probably they considered that the place was losing a certain amount of importance by his absence. But if any charge worthy of the fair investigation can be brought against this hon. gentleman, if more especially no explanation can be given of his charges for travelling expenses, then certainly he will be called to account. But when we come to the first charge that is brought here, that which caused the great explosion this afternoon, that which we waited for with such great interest, that which the whole country was told to wait for with the greatest expectation, there never was any such fiasco before in any Parliament, since parliamentary institutions were established. We have heard charges made time and again; we have heard those charges reiterated, and the hon. gentleman who made them never called to order by this House, or criticised by those who are supposed to lead him in this House. There was nothing that this country was not led to expect of turpitude, of wrong-doing of the deepest dye, on the part of our honourable judges in the province of Quebec. We did not know what those charges were. The judges were told, and they have been told again to-day, that after these three gentlemen had been disposed of, other judges would have to look out. No names were given of any against whom those charges are to be brought; but the judiciary of Quebec have been told, as they were told before: Look out; we will not only denounce you in Parliament, but we will level against you the whole machinery of our press; we will open the batteries upon you, right and left, back and front; and if you dare to act as honourable men, if you dare to stand up for what is just and right and proper, we will let you see that we are the people, and the power of the press at our command will teach you that, although you hold positions which you can only be deprived of by Parliament, at all events we can make your positions on the Bench intolerable, because you cannot open your mouths to defend yourselves; you have to sit there and listen; and we will make you feel that to be on the Bench in the province of Quebec is to be in a position that by and by no honourable man will care to occupy. If people without responsibility are to be allowed to come forward and make charges with impunity against men of honour and integrity who have attained a high position in their profession, then men fit for the position of judges will refuse to accept the office. Now, what are the peculiar circumstances of Judge Bossé's position? We know what was taking place in the province of Quebec at the time the Hon. Judge Bossé is said to have made himself amenable. The whole province was in turmoil. The two political parties were grappling together. A Government in the course of a few years had squandered millions and millions of the people's money, and were trying to squander more; the province was brought to the verge of bankruptcy and the people were rising in their might; but those who had been enjoying the sweets of that kind of wrong-doing did not wish to be driven from office, and consequently they left nothing undone to retain their places. It was at that particular time that criminal proceedings were taken before the court in which certain gentlemen figured; and because the judgments of the court were not given in accordance with the views of the hon. gentleman who has brought forward these accusations, and who was concerned in those suits, we are told forsooth that the judge who pronounced those judgments, who made those orders, who granted delays or caused cases to go on, was a man whose passion had blinded him, and whose pre-justice had made him unfit to sit on any judicial tribunal in this country. After all this great outcry, after the province of Quebec and the Dominion had been prepared for something definite and dastardly, something on which Parliament could act, the hon. gentleman comes before this House and accuses Judge Bossé of having—what?

Of having acted as partisan, and not as a magistrate, during the term of the criminal court at Quebec, in the months of October, 1890, April, 1891, and October, 1892. Of having conducted himself in such a way as to cause Her Majesty's subjects to lose respect and confidence in the administration of criminal law.

That is very indefinite.

Of having abused his position as judge, for party purposes and for the benefit of certain men with whom he had identified himself before going upon the Bench.

Not even the names of these gentlemen are given—nothing to indicate what the hon. gentleman is driving at.

Of having, in order to arrive at his end, rendered unjust and arbitrary decisions.

In what court? In what case? At what time? Under what circumstances? Not one of these is given.

Of having usurped the functions of the representative of the Attorney General.

In what case?

Of having pronounced upon the Bench speeches that were calculated to prejudice juries against persons brought before them.

In what case? What persons were brought before him? Again, no particulars are given. There is not the slightest indication of the most ordinary particulars that are required in any indictment brought before any court, in the simplest case that could be brought before a court of justice, and that is the whole charge brought against Judge Bossé. With reference to other subjects not connected with Judge Bossé's matter, there may have been certain irregularities. No doubt irregularities may have grown up in the province of Quebec—if you may call them so—with regard to certain judges who reside in the city of Montreal, and who by law—a law that is becoming to some extent obsolete—who, by the letter of that law, ought to reside in another district. These are matters which will require investigation, and no doubt that investigation will be given, and probably that investigation may lead to changes which have been spoken of in the Legislature of Quebec as to doing away with the old system of decentralization no longer suitable to the present state of things. But taking everything into consideration, what after all have we? We have simply a great noise made in the press, in Parliament, in every section of the country, which prepared us for something that was going to astonish and shock everybody—and these frivolous and indefinite charges are the result of it all. The judges of the province of Quebec may breathe, indeed. It is true there are some more who are threatened. It is true that we have been told these are not the only charges which will be made; but if those that are kept back are similar to those that have been brought forward, then, thank God, the judiciary of the province of Quebec may hold its head as it has done in the past. The judiciary of the province of Quebec is not in a worse position, in so far as the hon. gentleman who has brought these charges is concerned, than almost every other section of society. The public men of the province have not escaped his venom, the hierarchy have not escaped his vituperation. Nobody has escaped. It is an honour to be denounced by him. The last, the very last lines that were written to the public of Canada by the late lamented Archbishop Taché, of St. Boniface, whose funeral I had the sorrow of attending only a few days ago, were written in reply to an attack of that hon. gentleman. I thought of this, when looking at the remains of that great patriot and prelate, who had done so much for his country. I thought of the attack which had been made on him, in his declining years, after he had devoted his whole life to the service of his country, after he had done all he could in its behalf as a missionary, from his early youth, after he had for fifty years sacrificed his time and all the energy and strength of his mind and heart and soul for its benefit. In his last hours that venerable and noble prelate felt himself called upon to stand up and defend himself against the hon. gentleman. And when he was told that the charges made against him were intended for others, "Oh, yes," he said, "you say they were intended for others, but you know on whom they must fall, and the last, the unkindest blow of all, is you charge that my intelligence is deteriorated, that I am no longer able to stand up and defend my people, and that I have sacrificed them." And now, following this attack on Archbishop Taché, who has gone beyond the hon. gentleman's reach, we have these charges made against the judges. These gentlemen can well afford to stand in such noble and exalted company, and for my part I feel there is no more valuable certificate of character than to be vilified by the man who has vilified everything high and noble and generous in this country of ours.

Mr. CURRAN.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I feel, as an old member of the Bar of the province of Quebec, that I should not allow the charges which have been made by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) to pass without offering to the House a few remarks. The hon. gentleman has said that lawyers fear to express their views on occasions like this, because they are called upon every day to plead cases before the honourable judges who are accused. The hon. gentleman has forgotten the history of the Bar of the province of Quebec. Does he not know what took place in 1874, when the Bar of Montreal, during two consecutive terms, refused to appear before the court of appeal. Sir, the Bar of Montreal, like the Bar of any country, are the proper guardians of the Bench, and it is not for a layman, even able as the hon. member for L'Islet may be, to undertake such a charge. The Bar of Montreal in 1874 undertook to discharge its duties, and did it nobly. They did it without attacking the whole judiciary of the province of Quebec. Their charges were directed against some men, and limited to those men, and their charges were successful, without resort to laymen, and much less to politicians. On that memorable occasion I did not hesitate to do my duty like any other member of the Bar, for there was not any exception. We undertook to vindicate the administration of justice, and we did it well. You have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, noticed that within such a short time as ten or fifteen days since the hon. gentleman made his first charge against the judiciary of Quebec, mentioning only two judges, he had already changed his mind. His first charge was directed against Mr. Justice Bossé and Mr. Justice Davidson. Within ten days he has already dropped one name. No more is said of Mr. Justice Davidson. It is evident that the hon. gentleman is in the habit of making serious charges against men high in office in this country, who cannot defend themselves on the floor of this House, nor even anywhere else, except upon an impeachment. It is evident that the hon. gentleman is in the habit of making charges without giving to these charges due deliberation. The hon. gentleman owes it to Mr. Justice Davidson, he owes it to this House to say why he did not repeat his charges against him to-day. He ought to have made an apology to the honourable judge, and before he asks us to believe what he says to-day, he ought to give some reasons why he did not continue his charges against Mr. Justice Davidson. The hon. member has charged two honourable judges with partisanship. The hon. leader of the Opposition has told us that judges are but men. Yes, Mr. Speaker, judges are men, and whether the judges are taken from the political arena or from outside of it, men, lawyers especially, have their leanings in politics and their preferences as between the political parties of the country. Are we to believe that men who have political leanings, political inclination, or political sympathies, are incapable of discharging the duties of a judge? Look at what took place some ten or twelve years ago on the other side of the line. Fifteen of the best judges in the land were selected by Congress to try the validity of what is known as the Tilden-Hayes presidential election. I believe eight of these judges were Republicans and seven of them Democrats. They were all men who had been discharging judicial functions for years and years. The fifteenth judge was chosen because his political leanings were not then known. And, Mr. Speaker, when they came to consider the validity of that election, on every question that came before them the eight Republicans stood on one side and the seven Democrats on the other. Are we to be told, Mr. Speaker, that these men were not acting in good faith and were not discharging what they considered to be their duty? No, Mr. Speaker. I have not the slightest doubt that the men who, in the province of Quebec or in the other provinces, are called upon to decide election petitions or other political trials act honestly, believing that they are performing their duties and acting as judges ought to do. A great deal has been said by the learned leader of the Government and by my hon. friend the Solicitor General about the vagueness of these charges. I quite agree in the opinion of the hon. members. In an important moment like this, on a solemn occasion like this, when we are to undertake the trial, not of an ordinary criminal, but of one who is called upon every day to judge his fellow-citizens, we should not forget the forms of procedure which have been laid down in that ancient Parliament which is the model of our own. We should hesitate very much indeed before we venture to depart from the forms of procedure laid down in the British Parliament. In Todd's 'Parliamentary Government' in England, page 874, I find this rule laid down:

That the House of Commons should not initiate, and Ministers of the Crown ought not to sanction any attempt to institute criminative charges against any one, unless upon some distinct and definite basis; and in the case of a judge such charges should only be entertained upon allegation of misconduct that would be sufficient, if proved, to justify his removal from the Bench. But it is immaterial whether such misconduct had been the result of an improper exercise of his judicial functions, or whether it is solely attributable to him in his private capacity, provided only that it had been of the nature to unfit him for the honourable discharge of the judicial office.

I find this case cited by Todd, at page 864:

On June 2nd, 1891, a member of the House of Commons, in his place, presented an article of charge of certain crimes and misdemeanour against the Hon. James McClelland, one of the barons of the courts of Exchequer in Ireland, which was delivered in at the table of the House and read. He then moved that, on that day fortnight, the House would resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, to take the said article into consideration. Lord Castlereagh (the Foreign Secretary) denied that "there was any rational ground to impute such corruption to Baron McClelland as to justify the inquiry;" and after a short debate the motion was withdrawn; and it was resolved that the said article of charge be rejected.

On page 865, Todd cites the following :—

In 1821, Chief Baron Standish O'Grady, of the Irish Court of Exchequer, was accused by the Commissioners on the Courts of Justice in Ireland, in their ninth and eleventh reports, with having unjustly and arbitrarily increased his own fees.

And what was the decision of the House ?

Whereupon it was resolved, after much debate, and the rejection of some amendments exculpatory of the Chief Baron : (1) That the receipt of fees by judges in the courts of common law and exchequer has been recently abolished by law. (2) That this House, under all the circumstances above stated, does not deem it necessary to adopt any further proceedings in the case of Chief Baron O'Grady.

Let us take first the case of Mr. Justice Tellier and Mr. Justice Ouimet upon the common ground that they have received fees to which they are not entitled by law—I mean, by fees, travelling expenses. Why is it that the hon. member, if he wants to be fair to these two honourable judges, did not mention the case exactly as it appears from the report of the Auditor General ? Why did he not mention that at least half a dozen judges stand in exactly the same position ? Mr. Speaker, I mention this because the very fact that several other judges, respectable judges of the province, did the same thing, is the best proof that it must be legal and honourable, and that these two judges, Mr. Tellier and Mr. Ouimet, were not violating any law. I find, for instance, that in 1887, Mr. Justice Taschereau, who is allowed to reside in Montreal, received for travelling expenses, $1,344—

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me. Mr. Justice Taschereau is allowed by law to reside in Montreal.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). That is what I say. But since what date ? The hon. leader of the Opposition knows that it is only about two years since he was authorized to live in Montreal.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not know the date.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). Is it more than three years ?

Mr. LAURIER. I cannot say the date.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I know it is at least within the last three years that he is allowed to reside in the city of Montreal, and Mr. Justice Taschereau received in 1887, $1,344, as a matter of fact having his residence in the city of Montreal, although he was required by the law, as in the case of Mr. Justice Ouimet, to reside in his own district. In 1890 he received $764 for travelling expenses ; in 1891, $890, also for travelling expenses ; in 1892 he received $688 for travelling expenses ; and in 1893 he received $836. Take the cases of Mr. Justice Plamondon, Mr. Justice Lynch, and Mr. Justice DeLorimier, they are all the same.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier).

Mr. LAURIER. Not at all.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). Mr. Justice DeLorimier has his residence in his own district, only for the term.

Mr. LAURIER. I know nothing of the case of Mr. Justice DeLorimier, but as to Mr. Justice Plamondon, I say emphatically that the charge of the hon. gentleman is not true.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, I make no charge against Mr. Justice Plamondon. I say that I find in his case a charge for travelling expenses, in one year, amounting to about $870. I know that Mr. Justice Plamondon resides in Arthabasca, at the chef lieu in his own district. I have no doubt that he, as well as Mr. Justice DeLorimier and Mr. Justice Taschereau, had a right to make the charges they did. I know them to be too honourable to do anything in violation of the statute. But why single out Mr. Justice Tellier and Mr. Justice Ouimet, and say nothing of these other judges ?

Mr. LAURIER. I will tell the hon. gentleman the reason why. I know that for every cent that Mr. Justice Plamondon has charged for travelling out of his own district, he actually did travel on circuit away from his place of residence. That is quite different from the case of Mr. Justice Ouimet, who has charged for holding court at places where he resides.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I take issue with the leader of the Opposition on that point. He says he has been travelling in his own district and attending to circuit. In 1890 he got $870 for travelling on circuit ; and in 1893, $390. There is a vast difference. Very likely he was called upon to attend the Court of Review in Quebec, which is perfectly legal. I want it to be understood that I make no charge against any of these honourable judges, whom I know to be very careful in carrying out the law ; but I say that what the other judges do in similar cases must convince the House that, after all, Mr. Justice Tellier and Mr. Justice Ouimet have not been guilty of violating the statutes. More than that. Suppose for a moment that these judges have been overcharging their travelling expenses ; there is a remedy, but it is not before this court, not even by impeachment, not by making such a charge as the hon. member for L'Islet has made. The remedy is to make a criminal charge in the ordinary court of justice, where a judge has a right to be heard like any other man who is put in the dock, and against a decision of which court he has a right to appeal. I say that even though these judges have been overcharging for their travelling expenses, we have no right to investigate that offence. If true, let the accuser prove his charge before an ordinary court, and if those judges are found guilty, then they should be dismissed by the Government upon such conviction by an ordinary and proper tribunal. Now, I come to the other charge made against Mr. Justice Ouimet, that of non-residence. I am not going to defend Mr. Justice Ouimet, who, by law, is required to reside in his own district. I think all judges should give an example to the community of respecting the law of the land. However, there may be something said in his favour. It may be said that he has been discharging the duties of a judge in the district of Montreal. I have seen him there myself, week after week, day after day, discharging the duties of a judge residing in Montreal. And, Mr. Speaker, do you not think that his presence was required there when you consider that even at the present time there are over a hundred cases in arrears on the roll of the Court of Review, and it will take more than one year to clear up that roll. Now, even if Mr. Justice Ouimet is required by law to reside in the town of Sorel, and if he has not done so, the proceeding is not by impeachment. You cannot find a single precedent in the world where an impeachment was laid upon such a count as that. The proceeding of the hon. member should be by taking a vote of non-confidence in the Government for allowing the judge to violate the law after the complaint made by the Sorel Board of Trade. Now, I come to the charges made against Judge Bossé. I was very glad to hear the hon. leader of the Opposition contradict the hon. member for L'Islet on the point of the capacity of Judge Bossé. The hon. member for L'Islet, showing what an impartial accuser he is, says that as a political man, Mr. Justice Bossé was a failure. Well, Sir, if to be a success in politics one must be skillful in throwing mud in the faces of every one opposed to him, decidedly, Mr. Justice Bossé was not a success. That gentleman, I believe, sat in this House during four years, and all those who sat in the House with him will remember that whenever he addressed the House no other member commanded more respectful attention than he did. I quite agree with the leader of the Opposition when he said that no member of the Bar in the city of Quebec occupied a higher position than Mr. Justice Bossé when he was in active practice; and to-day, as a judge in the Court of Appeal, he stands second to none in the province of Quebec. Now, let us examine into the charges of the hon. member for L'Islet, or into the articles of the charge preferred by him, not in the indictment, if I may be allowed to use that expression, that he has laid upon the Table of the House, but in his own speech. The first charge is that in the trial of the hon. member for L'Islet in 1890, Mr. Justice Bossé showed partiality. In what way did he show partiality, how did he display partisanship? He says that there was a criminal charge made against

O. E. Murphy and R. H. McGreevy for the sole purpose of preventing the hon. member from proving by those men that he was justified in writing the articles that he did in his newspaper. The hon. member says that he asked that his trial might go on first in order that he might have the testimony of those two witnesses, Murphy and Robert McGreevy, before their character was impugned. Evidently the hon. member for L'Islet had some doubt in his own mind whether his two witnesses would not be found guilty. But instead of making it a reproach to Mr. Justice Bossé for insisting upon the trial of these two men, who were his principal witnesses, before he began the trial of the hon. member for L'Islet, I think the course he pursued is rather to be commended. Mr. Justice Bossé wanted to establish beyond doubt that these two witnesses were to be believed, and the only way to establish their character was to have the charges made against them, investigated and cleared up. But the trial of the hon. member for L'Islet was begun first, and that is the first article of complaint laid by the hon. member, but instead of proving his case, I think he has proved the very reverse. The second article in the charge relates to the same trial. Mr. Mercier was then in power. He had undertaken, along with the hon. member for L'Islet, to bring formidable charges against the Government at Ottawa. The hon. gentleman had in view, not the vindication of justice, but the overthrow of the Dominion Government, and if charges were brought against that Government which would secure that end, then the ends of justice would be attained. Seeing that Murphy and Robert McGreevy were to be tried first—and I gather all these facts from the speech of the hon. gentleman, for I do not know them otherwise—Mr. Mercier gave directions to the Crown prosecutor, who was the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), I believe—

Mr. AMYOT. I was one of them then.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I repeat that I am not familiar with the facts, as I was in Europe at that time; but gathering the facts as presented by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), it appears that Mr. Mercier gave instructions to the Crown prosecutor to enter a nolle prosequi.

Mr. TARTE. I wish only to say that Mr. Mercier never gave any order. He never took any interest in the case; he was not even here at that time.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). If Mr. Mercier did not give the order, his Attorney General did, and that is the same thing. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) this afternoon, in his own speech, said that the Attorney General was pleased to give the order not only in writing to the Crown prosecutor, but he took the trouble to go to the court-house and see the Crown prosecutor and order a nolle prosequi, unless a different order was given by the judge. Let us now take the other ground of objection, the second article of the charges made by the hon. gentleman, that of political partisanship. If the political trials which took place in Quebec had not occurred, we would never have heard of the inefficiency of the judicature of the province. In fact, we never heard of it until the Mercier Government came into power. When Mr. Mercier saw that his plundering was discovered, and that his trial was going to come on before the courts, he resorted to all means possible to cast discredit on the judges. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) said that injustice was committed by Mr. Justice Bossé, and that he was guilty of partisanship and of an act of tyranny. And what was in it? There were men in jail awaiting their trial. The Government officers wanted these political trials to proceed first. Mr. Justice Bossé would not consent. He applied the ordinary rule of criminal practice, and said that men in jail should be tried first and men out of jail should be tried afterwards. In what respect was that wrong?

Mr. LANGELIER. The charge made by my hon. friend is that the judge did the very reverse.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I understood the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) to say that that was the case.

Mr. LANGELIER. The member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) said the judge did exactly the very reverse, that he insisted on trying men not in jail before he tried the men in jail.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I do not think that makes much difference. The judge did not decide the cases according to the wish of Mr. Mercier and his friends, and consequently he and his friends are dissatisfied to-day. Another charge is this: The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) said the grand jury could not agree to bring in a true bill against Mr. Mercier. One morning there appeared an article in 'L'Electeur,' a very insulting article—

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Not at all.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). It was an article which was a very insulting article to Judge Bossé. At ten o'clock, according to the recital of facts made by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), the judge brought in the grand jury and gave them a lecture, as the hon. member said, in regard to the articles published by 'L'Electeur' commenting on the case and containing insulting remarks as regards the judge. It is too often the practice of newspapers to make comments on judges, and instead of the judge being deserving of reproach in this instance, he was worthy of approbation. The hon. gentleman mentioned in a further article of complaint, as the motive which induced Mr. Bossé to act as he did, that a blank cheque was sent him by Mr. McGreevy. When pressed by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) said the cheque was filled up. But he did not know the amount, he did not know whether the cheque was paid by the bank, if I understood him correctly. But he made an admission, which, in my opinion, was very important. He said the cheque was drawn in order to pay costs in election cases, which were conducted by Mr. Justice Bossé when a counsel practising at the Bar. What is there wrong in that? If I were judge, and a cheque was sent to me for professional services rendered by my office, I would perhaps send the cheque to my office; but suppose I did not, the question was this, was the amount due, was it pretended that it was given in order to induce the judge to decide in favour of the party sending the cheque, was it sent with a view to corrupting the judge? The hon. member himself admitted that there was no such intention on the part of the sender, and that the cheque was not accepted with any such corrupt object in view. Suppose the facts mentioned by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) were true so far as this blank cheque was concerned, there is nothing to show any impropriety on the part of the judge in receiving the cheque. To conclude, I look upon the charges made by the hon. member as futile, as frivolous, as affording a mere pretense under cover of which to throw mud at the judiciary of the province of Quebec, because in the late days of political excitement those judges decided against the hon. gentleman's party, and consequently were the cause of the overthrow of the hon. gentleman's friends in the province of Quebec. In order to show that the hon. gentleman cannot really be serious, he even threatened the judges with further charges. When asked to bring forward those charges, the hon. gentleman said he was not prepared to do so. If he were not prepared to do so, he should not have made that declaration if he had any respect for the judiciary of his own province. When asked to give the name of the witness who told him he saw the blank cheque, the hon. gentleman failed to do so; he said, I cannot give you my secrets, I am bound to keep my secrets; when the trial comes on, I will give you the name. He further said, Where would I have been in 1891 if I had given the names of my witnesses? There is, however, a marked difference between the case of 1891 and the present case. The case of 1891 was a political one. It was a great charge of conspiracy against certain members of this House, and even against a Minister of the Crown; but we cannot say that either political party has anything at stake in the charges made against the honourable judges. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) wanted to show that he was acting in good faith, in this matter, he would have said : I never saw the cheque—he has admitted that to-day—and he would not have refused, as he has done, to give the name of his authority. I find another fault with the proceeding of the hon. gentleman. It has been pointed out by the leader of the Government, as far as the Government is concerned, and as far as the judges are concerned, that the hon. gentleman has given no notice of his charges. But we have some one else concerned in this matter ; the members of this House are concerned in it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) knowing that he was bringing the most serious charges that could be brought against any officer of this country, more serious than the charges that were made in 1891, more serious than any charge that could be brought against any Government ; knowing this, he should have given notice to the House and to every member of the House, in order that the parties interested might be communicated with and prepare their answer to these charges. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman has not given notice to the House, and although I requested him privately to do so, the first intimation I had of the nature of the charges was when he rose in his place this afternoon. At the present hour, when we are at the close of the session, it is most unfair that charges should be made when the judges have not even time to reply, and when there is not time for an investigation. I call the special attention of the leader of the Government to this. I say that the reputation of the judges of this country is so important, and so sacred that even if we have to sit here another month—if the hon. gentleman is going to grant an investigation—these charges ought to be inquired into—not by a Royal Commission, because we have had too many of these Royal Commissions already—but investigated on the floor of this Parliament. Notwithstanding my desire to go home, and enjoy the beautiful country air, I say if it is necessary to remain here two months longer we ought to clear up these accusations before Parliament prorogues. It is important to the administration of justice it is important to the people of this country, and it is important to the judges charged that we should know the truth about this matter, if in the opinion of the House there is anything to investigate. For my part, I do not see that there is anything to investigate. If my views were to prevail, I would move that the articles of complaint be rejected and that no further proceedings be had upon them ; but, of course, a matter of this importance is always in the hands of the Minister of Justice, under whose charge, under whose care, and under whose protection the judges of the land are specially placed.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier).

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a single point, and that on a question of practice. I shall take no part in the merits of the discussion about which I know nothing. The manner in which the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) has undertaken to place these charges before the House clearly shows the need of a better practice than that now prevailing. When charges of so grave a nature as those indicated by the hon. gentleman some days ago and threatened in his speech, are to be urged by any member of Parliament against judges of the Superior Courts, it certainly is but common fairness to the judges themselves, it certainly is but observing the dignity of Parliament, and but observing the well-established and sound practice, that some opportunity should be given to have these charges put before the Minister of Justice in the first place, that they may be then communicated to the judges, so that their answer would be in the possession of some member of Parliament, in order that when the discussion is in the first place brought up in this House and spread on the wings of the press over the whole country, and put in 'Hansard,' the answer might go with the charge. A winged lie that gets forty-eight hours start flying around this earth will never be overtaken and destroyed by the truth. One-third of the people of Canada to-day have their minds clouded by a charge made against one judge in the province of Quebec, as we understood it the other day, the charge that he had taken a bribe. I need not characterize the indecency of referring to that cheque if the hon. member (Mr. Tarte) did not mean to have it believed by this House and by the country that the judge had taken a bribe. But, notwithstanding the impression left on our minds, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) says to-day that the judge referred to is not venal, and is not, in his opinion, corrupt. The second charge made by the hon. gentleman has reference to the travelling expenses charged by certain judges. What possible harm could the administration of justice suffer if that charge had been sent to the Minister of Justice in the first instance, and by the Minister to the judges themselves, so that the answer might be put in possession of the Minister, or one of his colleagues, with the result that the answer could be given to-night to the country along with the charge. If that charge is false, what a cruel wrong it is that a lie shall go out over the whole country to the destruction of the reputation of the judge. Therefore, I urge, Mr. Speaker, that Parliament, for the better protection of its own dignity, and for the better protection of the judges, should insist that in matters so grave and so serious, a better and wiser practice should prevail. I do not think I need cite authority to prove this, but I will read from the remarks of one gentleman who, a few years ago, was a member of this House, and who, on all questions of constitutional law, was listened to with the greatest respect. I am sure I express the regret of many that that distinguished lawyer and statesman has not now a seat in this House. The words I will quote were used in a discussion very much like the one we are at present engaging in.

Mr. LAURIER. Is that Mr. Blake ?

Mr. WELDON. I will give the name in a moment :

I think that we ought to insist that our course of procedure should give him (the Judge) some opportunity to answer the charge, to state his case when it was being debated before the House, as we would give to any other judicial officer. This judge is unfortunately to be left without that opportunity of answering here to us now, the present charges which the honourable gentleman by the course he has pursued, has made, in my opinion, most unwarrantedly in point of form, whatever may be the truth of their substance.

Those are remarks taken from the speech of the Hon. Edward Blake in 1883, in the case of the county judge of Bothwell, which my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) will know all about. I may say that the view taken there by Mr. Blake was shared by Sir John Macdonald. I think, also, that this House can do nothing better—as has been said two or three times to-day—than insist on specific charges in cases like the present. We must all deplore any general attack on the reputation of the whole Bench of a province, and we should insist on specific charges, and upon giving this measure of fairness to the judge, that we would insist upon giving to the meanest criminal.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, after hearing the vague accusations which have been formulated by the hon. member for L'Islet against the judges, I thought that perhaps I might dispense with coming to their rescue, considering that voices commanding a greater authority than mine have pleaded with eloquence their cause. I would not have risen in my place were it not for the statement made by the hon. member for L'Islet, that, in bringing forward those charges, he did not speak in his own name, but that he was voicing the feeling of the majority of the inhabitants of the province of Quebec. The province of Quebec, to quote his own words, was under a reign of terror, and the people were living in awe of the magistracy charged with the administration of justice. I take issue with the hon. gentleman on that point. I shall not say that the statement was an untruth, because such language would be unparliamentary; but I say that it is a gratuitous, an unfounded assertion, as I am going to show. I am the representative in this House of two judicial districts, the district of Montreal and that of Joliette. Should the persons amenable to the courts of justice be living under a reign of terror, as stated, there would not be such a large number of cases before the courts. We have in Montreal quite a number of judges, and yet, as the hon. member for Jacques Cartier stated, there are over a hundred cases in arrears on the roll of the Court of Review. There are sittings of the Circuit Court every day of the month, and yet all the cases inscribed cannot be heard. At the Court of Review and the Court of Appeals there are heavy rolls which cannot be cleared up. If Montreal were under a reign of terror, how is it that there are so many litigants, so many suitors? Does such a state of things argue a lack of faith and confidence in our tribunals? By no means. It implies but this: the hon. gentleman's thunderbolts have proved in the end nothing but a harmless fusee; he has merely been letting off crackers in the House. I understand why the hon. gentleman has kept back so long the charges which he had promised to make two years ago. He expected that a general election would have been held this year; and these charges were kept in store on an emergency as the only means of securing his return to the House. But when he saw that general elections would not be held this year, and that the press was forcing him to act in the matter, he launched that formidable indictment which was to shake the province of Quebec, if not the Dominion, to its very foundations. What was the outcome of it? Nothing at all. The House has still a vivid recollection of the charges published by the hon. gentleman in 1890, in that well-edited paper 'Le Canadien.' The thieves who were plundering the province of Quebec were made the target of his thunderbolt articles. In 1891 he had changed his opinions and made up his mind to leave the folds of the Conservative party, which was no longer pure enough for him. But in 1891, just after leaving the Conservative party, the hon. gentleman was seen stumping the country in favour of those whom he had just branded as thieves and deserving to be kicked out of power. We met him on those occasions, and when called upon to give expression to his views with regard to the Quebec scandals, he would say that he did not want to champion the cause of robbers. So the hon. gentleman passed condemnation upon both parties; the Conservative party he denounced as the party of corruption; and as to the Liberal party of Quebec, it was a repair of thieves and brigands. Which party was he going to side with? For a man with so delicate a conscience, a man who instinctively abhors immorality and corruption, and who has many secrets which he keeps disclosing as he goes along, this selection was no easy job. Where did he drift after leaving the Conservative party? He fell in with robbers and brigands. But the hon. gentleman does not stop there ; he had somebody else to attack. L'Abbé Gosselin was one of them ; he simply told that reverend gentleman to shut up, that he was an ignoramus, and that he was going to set him to rights as he had done with so many others. But the hon. member does not stop midway ; and after giving a good lecture to that priest, he goes one step further. He denounces the bishops, as the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Curran) just stated. Was he then going to stop there ? By no means ; nobody has escaped his venom. He is now busy throwing mud at the judges, besmirching the ermine, and if he could possibly have sullied his own reputation, it would have been done long ago. What are the charges brought against these judges ? In my opinion, those charges are absurd and unfounded. The district of Montreal is altogether free from the taint of corruption, if the hon. gentleman is to be believed. With regard to the district of Joliette, he is reticent. None but honest administrators of justice are to be found there. But since the departure of the hon. member for Quebec, things have undergone quite a change ; when he was there, he saw to it that the law was well administered, and so it was up to the moment when he was unfortunate enough to have three bad cases before the courts. The Hon. Judge Bossé, up to that moment, had enjoyed an enviable reputation ; he had been a lawyer of high standing ; he was noted for his legal acumen and his knowledge of the law ; but since he gave judgment against the hon. member, he is no longer but a second-rate lawyer and a rabid partisan. In short, the hon. member passes judgment upon all classes of society ; and his findings have about all the same weight. The hon. member for L'Islet is not through yet with his charges, for he told us that he had other accusations to make. I presume that he is now going to betake himself to the district of Montreal, and that he will pay a passing visit to the district of Joliette. As to the latter district, my mind is quite in peace, should the hon. member turn his batteries in that direction, for the administration of justice in that district is in the hands of an honest judge. And yet, this judge has also drawn from the public exchequer allowances for having administered justice in Montreal, although he resides there. The hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), have stated that the judge for Terrebonne was allowed by law to reside in Montreal. He has certainly now the right to reside in Montreal, though, when he was appointed to the Bench, he was bound by law to reside in the district of Joliette. I also take issue with the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), on another point, when he stated that our population lacked confidence in the judiciary. The best proof that the community rely confidence in the judiciary is found in the fact that we have not a sufficient number of judges in Montreal to attend to the dispatch of judicial business ; and that the judges appointed to rural districts have to come and help their brother judges. Those judges only come to sit in Montreal at the request of the chief justice. They are paid six dollars a day for their travelling expenses, and this only when they hold court. This allowance is granted to them as a compensation for their trouble in administering the law in the district of Montreal. As regards the administration of justice, as in all other matters, all those who are high in authority, and who have to see to it that the law is obeyed and respected, are made the target of attacks and censure. If we pass in review all the other social bodies, we shall find that exactly the same thing occurs in every instance. Take, for instance, the family : is it not true that the father, the head of the family, is criticised by his children, whenever they feel the weight of parental supervision ? They are apt sometimes to think that they are more clever than the head of the family. Take, again, our educational institutions ; we all have had some experience in that line. Is it not a fact that we criticised our superiors when they forced us to work, so as to benefit, to the largest possible extent, by the pecuniary sacrifices incurred by our parents ? In all stations of life, authority is criticised. And if we turn to our municipal organizations, we will also find that municipal authority is constantly censured and criticised. So again with our banking institutions, which are under the control of the shareholders themselves.

Mr. WELDON.

Mr. LAURIER. (Translation.) And even aldermen are open to criticism.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Yes ; I will come to that point by and by. Have not bank presidents been called robbers, and have not the accusers of those men been also accused in their turn ? Take, for instance, the Montreal City Council, the most immaculate body under the canopy of heaven, when I was one of its members. Is it not a patent fact that all the imaginable harm is said of them, that the gravest and most violent charges are brought against those men, who devote their time without any remuneration, to the service of the city ? I protest against malicious insinuations directed against men who are vested with authority, in all the walks of life. When I rose to address the House, I wished only to say a word or two. I merely wished to record my protest against the statements of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), statements which are altogether unfounded, not to say false, which would be using unparliamentary language. It is surely a painful spectacle for the French-speaking members of the House to see accusations of that nature launched against men of their own blood. I have been sneered at for stating, when the Bill for corrupt practices at elections was under discussion in this House, that the Bill was calculated, in my opinion, to create a bad impression abroad; that it had a tendency to make the world believe that we were a corrupt people, apt to be bribed and to take bribes. And, still, I was right in making the statement. For, should the judges of the land be called upon, under that Act, to leave the Bench and go fishing through the constituencies, as a smelling commission, for criminative evidence in relation to corrupt practices, it would come to this, that the candidates, ill-treated by them, following in the footsteps of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), shall come and lay their grievances before this House, and complain of the administration of justice by the magistrates. What I said when that Bill was under discussion, I do repeat now. I said, and I say again, that the inquests should not be conducted by judges, on the ground that the political party whose interests are affected will always find room for complaining. No wonder, Sir, that people are found who censure the decisions of our courts. The first case I ever had in court, though I did not argue it myself—for I was not a lawyer at the time—I lost it. Of course, I found that the judge was wrong. I went in appeal and I lost again. Then, I began to think that, perhaps the judge might be right and that I was wrong. It is contended that, in the province of Quebec, the judges do not properly administer the law, owing to the fact that they cannot divest themselves of a spirit of political partisanship. Such is the import of the charges made by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). The hon. gentleman is wrong; he should not use such language. Killing two birds with one stone might happen in such a case as this. A judge was attacked, of late, on account of his Liberal proclivities. It would be quite easy for us to take up the gauntlet; victims might happen to be found in both parties. An honourable and respectable press should not stoop to those base attacks. I blame the press as I blame the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) for voicing the feeling of the malcontent. The hon. member told us that he was not speaking in his own name, but that he was voicing the feelings of the great majority of the people in the province of Quebec. I deny the contention. This allegation of the hon. gentleman is unfounded, utterly baseless, and the facts I have just related formally contradict his statement. I wind up my speech with these few remarks; and, as I said, I should not have risen in my place had not the hon. member for L'Islet stated that he was but echoing the opinion of the majority of our rural and urban population. The hon. gentleman forgot to mention the new settlements when he alluded to our rural population. I presumed he meant to say that later on he would bring charges against the justices of peace in the country. His next onslaught shall probably be directed against the justices of the peace and the commissioners for the summary trial of small causes, especially if he pleads before them and loses his cases. I represent a county of the district of Joliette, and I reside in Montreal. I am therefore in a position to know how justice is administered in those two districts, and what was the opinion of the population about it. I may say, Mr. Speaker, without any fear of contradiction, that the people in those two judicial districts are not at all alarmed at the way in which law is administered. The people there respect the judiciary and are quite satisfied with the administration of justice. Our magistrates are respected, and deservedly so. They are liable to err, like the rest of human kind. I was also under the impression that the judge's decision was wrong when it was given against my clients, and when I carried my cases to the Court of Review or to the Court of Appeals, I have lost and gained in appeal, which goes to prove, after all, the judges in the court below had perhaps rendered a fair judgment, and that I was wrong, and too hasty in attacking his decision. But I never raised such a tempest about it as the hon. member does now. It often happens that a case is appealed and carried, while before the Supreme Court it may be quashed. One is never sure to gain one's cause, even if he has two judgments in his favour. The fact that a judgment is quashed does not imply that the judge in the court below acted improperly. Any member of the Bar, of some experience, will tell you so. It does not follow that the judgment quashed has been rendered by an unjust man. And when the decision given by three judges of the court below is quashed in the Superior Court, are we to believe that those three judges were dishonest? I say, no. Those three judges acted fairly, honestly, but they simply put a different construction on the law. The five judges of the Court of Appeals are neither more honest nor more honourable than the judge of the Superior Court whose decision they have quashed. I believe that the judges administer law to the best of their knowledge and conscience; and it is most unfair to say that their judgment is swayed by a spirit of political partisanship. Judge Tellier, of St. Hyacinthe, is accused of being a partisan, of yielding to his political sympathies on the Bench. But why did not the litigants aggrieved take their cases in appeal? I would like very much to have the names of the men who put their complaints in the hands of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). It would perhaps be found that the list is swollen by the names of all the unlucky litigants who lost their suits before the judge. Hence, probably, originate those complaints against Judge Tellier. Now, it is alleged that Judge Tellier compels the suitors or the lawyers to publish their advertisements in a Conservative rather than a Liberal journal. Such an assertion is ridiculous. That such a thing should happen is simply impossible. It is ridiculous to come and tell such stories to people who know procedure. It is not at all necessary to go before the judge and ask him in which journal the advertisements should be published. When we subpoena an absent witness, we are not to go before the judge and ask him in which journal the advertisement must be published. Any lawyer who would make such a blunder would be laughed at by the judge. I say, therefore, that all the charges of the hon. member amount to nothing, and the reason for the hon. gentleman making so much noise, the cause of his bringing forward his accusations at the close of the session, is his belief that the general elections would soon be held. As the elections are to come off only in two years, he understands that he has taken a false step, which he cannot retrace, while public opinion, aroused by his onslaught on the judiciary, anxious to know the truth about those charges, compels him to go forward and proceed with his impeachment. I say, therefore, that it was only when driven to the wall, that the hon. gentleman has decided to come and tell us the hearsay stories we have just listened to. My hon. friend opposite says it is too late now, at this stage of the session, to begin an inquiry into the charges. As the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) said, if the Government is going to grant an inquest into the truth of these charges, let it begin now, even if it were necessary to remain here two months longer. If disrespect for the judiciary is fostered in the people, the outcome will be anarchy. Judges are no longer necessary, when the people believe that judges are corrupt, mere partisans, from whom no justice can be expected. I say then that in the public interest, not only of the province of Quebec, but of the whole Dominion, a serious inquiry should be made into these charges. I would further suggest that, if the Minister of Justice grants an inquiry, a general investigation should be made on the general administration of justice. It is important to know whether the charges launched against the other judges are true or not. Although no other charges have been laid on the Table of the House, still there have been published some in the press. The Prime Minister just told us that it would require a few days to examine into those accusations and find out whether they are founded or not. In my opinion, if the Government grant an investigation, it should be of a broader nature and should go beyond the charges laid on the Table of the House by the hon. member for L'Islet. It should not be confined to the accusations brought against the hon. judges Tellier and Ouimet who have received money; but it should extend to all the other judges who have also received some. I see in the Public Accounts the names of seven or eight judges who are in the same predicament. If Judge Ouimet charged illegally his travelling expenses, then Judge Delorimier is also guilty of the same offence. But, in my opinion, neither of them are guilty. I should rather be of opinion that they have been underpaid for the time they have sat in Montreal where their presence is so much needed. I am, therefore, of opinion, Mr. Speaker, that in spite of all those charges, the province of Quebec may continue to venerate and respect the Judicial Bench; and should the charges prove of such a nature as to justify the Government in granting an investigation, this inquest should extend to all the charges brought against the judges, not only on the floor of the House, but in the Canadian press. I shall support such an investigation, even if it is necessary to remain here two months longer. I may be told that, being a bachelor, it is no wonder that I should speak that way. It may possibly be so, but, at all events, the general good of the country, the administration of justice should prevail over private comforts.

Mr. AMYOT. Mr. Speaker, as my name has been dragged into this discussion, I do not think I should allow it to go without saying a few words. It is true, I was Crown prosecutor in those criminal trials before the court in Quebec when the Hon. Justice Bossé decided some of the points of procedure. I do not think I should now give the details of what I did as Crown prosecutor, or state what private instructions I received from the Hon. Mr. Mercier and from the Attorney General in relation to the conduct of those trials. I think it is the better for me to wait until the enquête takes place, when I will tell the whole story of what I know. Suffice it to say now that in all that occurred then I did not find one single word or act of the Hon. Justice Bossé which was not fully in accordance with his duty as a judge. At all times he tried to secure the best possible administration of justice. It is true that as Crown prosecutor I differed with him on points of procedure or upon the urgency of going on with the trials. All that will be explained, however, and then Parliament will see who was trying most to have justice administered in our province—whether it was the Attorney General, or the Prime Minister acting for him, or the judge himself. The facts will be made known at the enquête. I do not believe in commenting now on facts stated ex parte. I regretted a little while ago to hear the hon. leader of the Opposition commenting very bitterly upon facts concerning Messrs. Justices Tellier and Ouimet without those honourable judges having an opportunity to give their version of the facts. I think we should not do that in this Parliament or any where else. It is not proper to pass judgment upon facts stated ex parte. We have had precise accusations made against these judges in connection with money drawn from the public exchequer. In my opinion that could not be the basis of an impeachment in the present circumstances, though the charge is a grave one and certainly should be ventilated. But would it not have been proper to say to these honourable judges : We will make such and such accusations against you, and you should have your answer ready, so that the country will be apprised at the same time of both the charge and the defence ? The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) has been adopting a mode which is most unfair to the judiciary at large, and to the judges attacked in particular. He has been acting in accord with the conduct of some part of the press of this country. I have under my hand a widely circulated paper from Quebec, "l'Electeur," of Tuesday, the 10th of July, in which there is a telegram dated Ottawa, July 9, as follows :—

To-morrow Mr. Tarte is going to make before the House his accusations against the judges. It is said that his accusations apply to four judges.

And they are named ; and of all those judges named only one is to-day accused specifically. After giving the names of those judges, the telegram says :

The accusations against the two first are, it appears, very minutely defined. It is contended that in the accusations concerning one of the four judges there are allegations the proof of which will oblige the importation before the commission of many women of bad repute from Montreal.

I say, Mr. Speaker, we should be ashamed, in this refined country, to see such base accusations made against the moral and private character of the judges. And that paper protects itself behind the charges that the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) is going to make, and when the hon. member makes his charges there is not a word of that in them ; yet the accusation in the paper remains against the judiciary at large. It is not only to-day that this sort of thing has been going on. It began in this Parliament last session, eighteen months ago ; but it has been going on in the press of the country for many years by all sorts of inuendoes and insinuations. The respect of the public for the Bench is one of the conditions of order in society ; and very guilty are those who take it upon themselves to try unjustly to diminish that respect. Of course, if the judges prevaricate, there must be a remedy ; if they are corrupt, there must be a remedy. They are not above the law ; they do not make the law ; they only administer it ; and there must be a remedy. But what is the proper remedy always adopted in constitutional countries ? It is by an impeachment formally made in Parliament, in which charges are formulated definitely and specifically. But what is done to-day, and what has been done for many years past ? All sorts of insinuations have been made, and nothing else. Even to-day we heard the hon. member for L'Islet saying that all the lawyers could ascertain that Judge Bossé was in the hands of Thomas McGreevy. He did not say that the judge was in the hands of Thomas McGreevy, but that the lawyers said so. Later on he said that I myself was saying all possible things against Judge Bossé :

and in another part of his speech he said that the lawyers told the judge that Robert McGreevy and Murphy were right in going away, because they were going to be condemned. He has not the courage directly to accuse the judge himself, but is making others accuse him, by saying that such a fellow said such and such a thing. Mr. Speaker, that is not an honourable, an honest or a straightforward way of accusing a party. So far as I am concerned, I never said one word against the honesty and probity of Mr. Justice Bossé. I always respected him when he was at the Bar. Whenever I had a hard point of law, to whom, but him amongst the old lawyers, did I like to go to consult, to get good sound advice ? And when he was appointed on the Bench, all the lawyers of Quebec were glad, because the high office was given to one amongst the most prominent of us, and because we were to have on the Bench a man whose great knowledge of law was a sure guarantee for the administration of justice. I have never said anything against that honourable judge, and I am quite sure that the lawyers who the hon. gentleman alleges said these things against Judge Bossé, will, when they are called upon, give a flat denial to that accusation. But this is not the way to bring charges against a judge. Why does not the hon. gentleman say specifically what wrong he has done ? He says he does not speak against the integrity of Mr. Justice Bossé. Why then did the hon. gentleman speak of the cheque of the Hon. Thomas McGreevy at all ? If that cheque was not intended to buy the honourable judge, what was its intent ? And if it was not so intended, why speak of it at all ? Why make that insinuation ? This is not straightforward, not worthy of a gentleman who is protected by his privilege as a member of this House. Had he made such an insinuation in a newspaper, he knows that he would have been brought before the jury of his country and made to suffer the consequences. Here, however, he is not exposed to any such consequences, and finding himself thus protected, he indulges in slanders and insinuations. He charges that money was obtained by the Hon. Judge Bossé. When asked if Judge Bossé received that money before he was appointed judge, he replied yes. Then, why bring it here at all ? Where is the law that would prevent Mr. Justice Bossé receiving money before he was made a judge, from the Hon. Thos. McGreevy, either as a lawyer for legal purposes, or as a politician for subscriptions or otherwise ? What blame can be attached to the honourable judge in that respect ? And if there be no harm in it, why mention it here ? I do not question the intention of the hon. gentleman, but to-day he comes with new accusations which he does not dare support by furnishing any particulars. He has made this insinuation, he has spread it among the minds of the people, sheltering himself behind his irresponsibility as a member of this House, and to-day he is careful to avoid it altogether in the conclusions he makes. Will the Minister of Justice, in the instructions to be given, if he gives any, instruct the judges or a royal commission to investigate this insinuation? But if the Minister should appoint a commission of investigation, the whole of the charges ought to be brought before it—not only those made to-day, but also the insinuations he made on a former occasion, so that an end may be put once for all to this levelling of charges and insinuations against our judiciary. Out of our thirty-six judges, we find that only three have been accused to-day, and what do the charges amount to? Is there one single corrupt decision charged against them, or one judgment claimed to be ill-founded, No. We have Judge Bossé accused of having delayed a law suit in one instance and of not having delayed a law suit in another instance, and we are not informed of the circumstances. No details whatever are given us. Surely those cannot be called charges. We have charges concerning many matters against two other judges, and still no particulars are given. The Minister of Justice is charged by the hon. gentleman to make an investigation at large and seek to find some evidence against these judges. I am glad that all the other judges have escaped, and that we are in a position to say to the rest of the Dominion that after years of litigation, and after every means taken by the hon. member, who even went so far as to invite people through his newspaper to furnish him with proof, we can point the rest of the Dominion to our judiciary as composed of men as pure and enlightened as are to be found in similar position in any other country in the world. We are gratified to know that in our province we have upon the Bench men who can compare with the judges of any country. Mr. Justice Bossé and Mr. Justice Davidson have requested the Minister of Justice to grant an enquête, and I think they are entitled to one. But as regards Mr. Justice Davidson, into what can the Minister of Justice investigate. We were told that he mistook a servant girl for a sister of charity, that he had gone somewhere, but where we do not know. It may have been to church. But the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) thought that he might as an honourable man utter in this House insinuations and charges which will appear in our official records, not only for one day, but for ever, and although he has cast these insinuations against Mr. Justice Davidson, which appear in our official record, to-day, when he formulated his charges, he has nothing to say against the honourable judge; and if the Minister of Justice does not investigate these insinuations, he will say that he laid the information, but that hon. Minister failed to proceed on that information. And the hon. member calls that attitude an honourable one. I am sure that the lawyers in this House, who have a proper sense of justice and experience of the way our law should be administered, will not endorse such conduct in this House, but will do their duty as right-minded citizens by taking means to prevent a repetition of such conduct. I will not take up more time of the House, but will simply repeat that in the evidence which I may have to give as to the conducting of the criminal terms alluded to by the hon. member for L'Islet, not a word will come from my lips except in praise of the manner in which Mr. Justice Bossé conducted the proceedings during these terms.

Mr. BELLEY, (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to say a few words in connection with the accusations before the House. In 1893, the hon. member who has formulated those charges ran for the Federal Parliament in the county of L'Islet. He then attempted to stir up the electors of that constituency, and told them: "Return me to the House of Commons and I shall impeach several judges. I pledge myself to put a stop to the corruption which prevails among the judiciary of the province of Quebec." For two years past, we have not heard a word about those formidable charges. It was but the other day that they were brought on the tapis, the hon. gentleman having been compelled to place them before the House. There is no gainsaying it, Mr. Speaker, everybody was anxious to know what was going on on the Bench; everybody wished to know whether the judicial ermine had been sullied, as stated. To-day we have the satisfaction of knowing beyond the shadow of a doubt that our magistracy is admittedly above suspicion. The very charges launched by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) are the best possible proof that the members of the Bench of the province of Quebec faithfully and honestly administer justice. That they are not corrupt and are worthy of public confidence. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) finds himself in a very sad predicament. He cannot even lay any claim to the merit of having followed the regular procedure in bringing down his charges. Instead of making vague accusations, he should have specifically stated the allegations upon which he intended to rest his charges. Therefore, the course followed by the hon. member is a crying shame, and deserving of unqualified condemnation at the hands of the country. The accusations formulated by the hon. member against the Hon. Judge Bossé are futile, and those put forward against the two other judges have nothing in them calculated to make these officials lose the respect to which they are entitled. The only charge he prefers against them is that of having irregularly received money from the public treasury for travelling expenses. That is the only charge he could find against them. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), when undertaking to voice the feelings of those who had grievances against the judges, more out of spite and disappointment than otherwise, and when putting forward his charges in the vague manner which he did, has assumed a part unworthy of the position he occupies as a member of this House. I would have expected that the hon. member would also have preferred charges against the Hon. Judge Davidson, as he did against Judge Bossé; for he had mentioned the name of Mr. Justice Davidson the other day when he told us that Mr. Justice Bossé had received a blank cheque from Mr. Thomas McGreevy. But to-night, the hon. member has formulated no accusation against Mr. Justice Davidson. Why did not the hon. member bring, also, charges against the latter? The reason is that the hon. member, who has always been the evil spirit of his nationality, who has missed no occasion of belittling, of disparaging it, did not dare formulate any charges against an English-speaking judge. He received instruction from the hon. leader of the Opposition not to do so, because he was an English judge, and that such a course would be calculated to prejudice the interests of the Liberal party in the minds of a great many of their partisans. Such a course, I contend, is a crying shame, it is revolting. The other day, the hon. member made insinuations of the gravest nature against Judge Davidson. Why did he not come to-day before the House and bring charges against him? The only reason is that he was afraid of a portion of the Liberal party from a political standpoint; I mean that he was afraid lest it should injure the interests of their common cause. When the hon. member, in former days, attempted to discredit the magistracy, not a single member of the Bar ever did believe a word of what he said. To say we have the satisfaction to know that we were not wrong in disbelieving his utterances. We knew perfectly well that the hon. member had contradicted himself on every question, and he would do so again on this question. His utterances never had any weight. We knew that he had thrown mud at everybody. We knew that he had constituted himself the accuser of the clergy, that he had been now in favour of free trade, now in favour of protection. Yesterday, a Conservative; to-day, a Liberal, there is hardly anybody whom he did not drag in the mud. Did he not attack the hon. leader of the Opposition himself? There is not a single individual in either party whom he did not violently attack. It is because we knew his past conduct that we did not believe in his declarations. But to-day, he supplies us with the proof that we were right in disbelieving his allegations. The magistracy is avenged, and the hon. member has the fate which he deserves.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BELLEY.

(In the Committee.)

Lamp springs, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the object of this, and what is the present duty?

Mr. FOSTER. The present duty is 25 per cent. The old duty upon articles included here was 10 per cent, and this keeps it at the old duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. For what reason is the change made?

Mr. FOSTER. The thing used for a lamp spring is a clock movement, and we rearranged the duty on clocks.

Horse clothing of jute, shaped or otherwise manufactured, 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. Jute cloth, out of which this clothing is made, is now dutiable at 20 per cent, and, under the tariff as it stands, the rate on the clothing, the manufactured article, will be 20 per cent also. The old duty on this article was a compound duty. It is thought fair to make this 30 per cent, seeing that it is a manufactured article. It certainly would be unfair to leave it at the same rate as the material of which it is manufactured.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That may be true, only the 20 per cent duty would have taxed the manufacture. I see no reason for making a change. But I do not suppose the article amounts to much.

Glass bulbs for electric lights, 10 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a reduction of duty. They are not manufactured in this country. The tariff now before the House taxes them 30 per cent.

Frames, clasps and fasteners for purses and chatelaine bags or reticules nor more than 7 inches in width, when imported by the manufacturers of purses and chatelaine bags or reticules for use in their factories, 20 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. A lower duty is put on these because they are not manufactured in the country. Under the present tariff they would be dutiable at 35 per cent.

Maple sugar, 20 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not otherwise provided for. I explained that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is this equivalent to as a specific duty?

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose it is valued differently at from 8 cents to 12 cents and 15 cents per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a duty of about 2 cents per pound, then. I suppose it does not matter a great deal, but it is a heavy duty.

Mr. SCRIVER. We do not import any.

Mr. RIDER. What is the object of this duty of 20 per cent on maple sugar?

Mr. FOSTER. To get as much revenue as we can out of any that comes in.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should imagine the possible revenue from this would be $50.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, that will help.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You threw away $300,000 to-day for mighty little consideration, and now you want to save $50. Very well.

Mr. FOSTER. No objection to saving $50.

Mr. RIDER. I would be glad if the hon. Minister would give this a little further consideration. Our only market for maple sugar is in the United States, and a duty of this kind would have a tendency to provoke retaliation and do us harm.

Mr. FOSTER. Would you like the duty taken off?

Mr. RIDER. Yes; or put in a reciprocity clause, as in the case of certain kinds of grain.

Mr. FOSTER. I would have no particular objection to taking the duty off.

Add to section 227 of Bill No. 125 "An Act to consolidate and amend the acts respecting the duties of Customs," the following words: "But not less than 35 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does that mean?

Mr. FOSTER. That is to do what I proposed to do when we were going through concurrence. You would not allow us to do it then, consequently we had to bring it down in the form of a resolution.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have no doubt I had excellent reasons for it, though I have forgotten them. But what does this relate to?

Mr. FOSTER. That relates to small bolts and rivets, less than $\frac{3}{8}$ -inch, the duty upon which the genial whip on this side of the House made a very strong plea to have increased. We did not find it possible to admit his plea in that respect, but proposed to add a saving clause that the duty should not be less than 35 per cent. If the hon. gentleman will think what is necessary in order to make one of these screws or rivets he will come to the conclusion that it is not an inordinate duty.

Ground logwood, ground fustic and patent prepared dyes—free.

Mr. ROSAMOND. Is log-wood itself free—chip log-wood?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. ROSAMOND. It is not mentioned. The extracts of log-wood and ground log-wood are mentioned, but not chip log-wood, the form in which it is usually imported.

Mr. FOSTER. Chip log-wood, and the pure chips, and the ground log-wood, are now all free.

Tea adulterated with spurious leaf, or with exhausted leaves, or which contains so great an admixture of chemical or other deleterious substances as to make it unfit for use.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That tea is not to be imported at all?

Mr. FOSTER. That is put in the prohibited list.

Mr. STAIRS. I want to ask the attention of the Minister of Finance to a suggestion I have to make in connection with tea. I think the introduction of the item that has just been made in schedule "C," would enable him to strike out in section 708, the words commencing with the words "provided." I think as it stands that these words are not required, and that they may lead to a little difficulty in administration. Possibly the Minister will remember that I was of that opinion at first, and I am more strongly confirmed in it since he has put in the provision respecting the prohibition of adulterated teas. I think it is quite possible that as the two sections stand to-day, tea might be admitted and passed by the inspectors under the items which is put in schedule "C" and that it might not be possible for the importers to give proof that the tea purchased in bond was such as might be entered for home consumption in the country of production. I was of opinion when that provision was put in, that we were asking the importers to do something they might find it impossible, in some cases, to do. Of course, I know this is not the time to consider this suggestion, but I make it now in order that the Minister may have time to consider it before he takes up Bill No. 135.

Resolution reported.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Mr. FOSTER presented a message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

ABERDEEN,

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Supplementary Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1895, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," the Governor General recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, July, 1894.

Mr. FOSTER moved:

That the Message of the Governor General and the Supplementary Estimates contained therein, be referred to Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

THE INSURANCE ACT.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 111) to amend the Insurance Act.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We disposed of the Bill and left for further consideration the amendments of which I gave notice, and which are found on page 443 of the Votes and Proceedings. After the words "loan or investment company" in the eighth line of subclause 1 of section 16, I wish to add the words :

Waterworks companies, gas companies, street railway companies, electric light or power companies, electric railway companies, when the line of railway does not exceed twelve miles in length, every such company being a company incorporated in Canada, or on the security of life insurance policies.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are the objects of these amendments ?

Mr. FOSTER. The main object of the amendments is almost entirely this one. The general line of investment of insurance companies is laid down in the Insurance law, and it has been for the last six or seven years past been strictly adhered to, the object being to have securities for investment on behalf of policy-holders such as would be prudent and safe investments. There were a certain number of companies acting under old charters in which the limit of investment was very much greater, taking in a range of securities which would not be allowed by companies coming in at present under the policy of investment which has ruled during the last five, six, or seven years. It is proposed to bring the old companies which have had this wider power of investment in securities not allowed to other insurance companies and not considered as reliable under the new law, but without disturbing any previous investments. But on going over the matter and conferring with the companies it was thought the present list of securities might be extended by the addition of certain lines, and accordingly the following new ones have been added:—Water-works companies, gas companies, street car companies, electric light or power companies or electric line of railway, when such does not exceed fifteen miles in length, and the stocks of any chartered banks in Canada. These are the new lines of securities in which all the insurance companies organized after the passing of this Act may invest, and it is an extension so far as those are concerned, and all the investments made by the companies chartered many years ago, and which charters giving them a wider power of investment, shall after the passage of this Act be limited to the securities laid down in it. The power of investment under the old charters included any bonds, stocks or mortgages of marketable values. That gave them almost illimitable power. It enabled those companies with the old charters to invest in the stocks of railway companies, in fact in any kind of bonds or stocks. It is not proposed to interfere with investments already made in those lines, but the intention is to place all the companies on the same basis, and to compel all to invest in securities which are considered safe and prudent.

Mr. FOSTER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did I understand the Finance Minister to say that bank stocks are included ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, they are now included.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Strictly speaking, there is an objection to that from the fact that although not often enforced, our bank stocks, I believe, still continue to carry the double liability. Is not that the case ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is an objection to have the class of securities we are dealing with now subject, under any circumstances, to being called upon to pay a double liability. It is true that in most cases it does not at all follow that any large claim may be made upon them, but still the thing is a possibility.

Mr. TISDALE. I propose to move that the committee rise and report progress, with the object of referring this amendment to the Banking and Commerce Committee. The amendments to the Insurance Act, except this one, were referred to that committee, and were considered during two mornings, and were reported on satisfactorily to the department and to the committee. After we had got through our labours and made that report, this very important amendment was proposed, so that it has not been considered by the Banking and Commerce Committee, and the companies—particularly the best and greatest company in Canada : the Canada Life—are very much dissatisfied with this proposed curtailment of their powers. It is true that theirs is a very old charter, and as the Minister of Finance says, no company would get it now. But still they have been a most prosperous company under it for forty-seven years, and they are able to declare profits that such a change as this will largely curtail. With a change of such importance as this, suddenly brought on, we ought to have an opportunity of considering it in the committee where we can hear the objections of the companies, and get at the facts, as we cannot get at them in Committee of the Whole, particularly at this late stage of the session. In the case of a company that has existed and been so successful, and in all that long time has not lost a dollar in all their large investments, surely can stand another year under present conditions, provided there is not time to pass this Bill this session. This Bill was inaugurated in the Senate and passed, and sent down to our House, and after hearing the companies very fully, the committee agreed upon some important amendments. This amendment, as at first introduced, would have curtailed $5,000,000 of investment that the Canada Life has in this country, and although changes have been made favourable to the companies, still it is a very serious step, against the protest of a corporation so successfully managed, to insist upon this amendment without serious consideration. In the interests of the policyholders of that company, to whom 92½ per cent of the profits go, I would ask the First Minister to refer this Bill to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. I feel very strongly that this course should be taken. I do think that we should have some good reasons for this important and radical change. It is only fair to the public and to the companies that we should consider this amendment in the same way as we have considered the rest of the Bill. Apart altogether from the proposition that is involved, which is to curtail, against their will, the power that this company has had for forty-seven years, I feel it my duty to speak very emphatically about the matter. We want the circulation of money in this country. Our banking institutions, though excellent, are often insufficient for the class of securities, that have been safe so far as this company is concerned. Many of our insurance companies are small, as the Canada Life once was, but through good management it has grown to be a great company. We should proceed with all care and caution in this matter, and I do not see that there is any particular hurry for it this year. It is true that since these amendments were given notice of, some of the companies have been here in delegations, but they could not possibly be fully heard. I feel it my duty to move that the committee rise and report progress, with a view of asking the House to send this amendment for consideration to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Mr. EDGAR. I largely agree with what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) has said. This is an exceedingly important clause that we are asked to consider now, and it involves a great many complicated considerations. There may be some securities that are suggested here as proper investments for insurance companies, to which very considerable objections might reasonably be taken, and I think I am safe in saying that a good many securities are omitted from this which many people would think not unsafe investments for insurance companies. Considering the enormous amount of capital which has to be invested every year—the savings of the people—by insurance companies. I think they are institutions which should be handled with the greatest possible consideration by Parliament. This Bill, as the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) said, although a Government measure, was allowed to go before the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and they were invited to freely consider its provisions. I was one of those who spent considerable time and trouble in considering it, but the present proposal was not before us at all, and, of course, at this stage of the session, it is impossible that it could be fully considered. It would cause a great deal of delay to consider it properly, and as there is no urgency that I can see, I would suggest that the Government should allow the Bill to stand over for another session. Some important commercial legislation on the Orders of the Day must necessarily stand over. The Insolvency Bill and the companies Act cannot be taken up this session, unless we are going to stay a good many weeks more here, and this Bill is not so urgent, in the opinion of any body, as that insolvency law. If these other Bills are to stand, I think this Bill might very well stand also, so that I believe the committee could profitably rise and report progress.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I object to the view that this has suddenly been brought on.

Mr. EDGAR. I did not say that.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. My hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) did. Notice was given twenty-four days ago, and fourteen days ago a large deputation was heard to present all the objections which the companies had regarding it. They stated their views at length, and in consequence of their views we have made the amendments which I have read to-night. We have not heard since of any objections, but we have heard of the assent of all the companies except one that were represented on that occasion. And I submit to you, Sir, that the hon. member's motion is not at all in accordance with order. The House has referred this Bill to the Committee of the Whole, and it is proposed, while leaving the Bill before the Committee of the Whole, that we should rise and report progress and then refer the Bill to another committee; so that two committees would have the Bill before them at the same time.

Mr. McCARTHY. I understand that my hon. friend's motion was that the committee rise and report progress, and the reason he gave was that the order referring the Bill to the Committee of the Whole should be discharged, so that it might be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. I would add my voice to what the two hon. gentlemen have said in favour of allowing this matter to stand. It does appear to me that it cannot do any harm to allow it to stand for six or eight months. It seems to me to be a very harsh measure to interfere with the vested rights of the Canada Life, the most successful insurance corporation that we have ever had. Not a word has fallen from the Minister of Finance, and I do not think that any word could fall from any person, suggesting that the investments which the Canada Life has made—I speak of that company because I understand from what the First Minister has said it is the only company affected—are unwise or improvident or not in the interest of the policy-holders. Now, the policy-holders—and I speak feelingly, as a policy-holder—have invested their savings in this company, and they are interested in the profits of 92½ per cent. These profits have been obtained during many years past, and there is reason to believe that they will continue on the same basis for the time being. The company, as a company, and the stockholders have comparatively a very trifling interest in this matter. The whole stock of the Canada Life is $125,000, and their interest in the profits is only 7½ per cent of the amount. The profits of 92½ per cent belong to the policy-holders. These have been invested knowingly and deliberately under the terms of the charter, and it does appear to me that it is un-British legislation to take away the vested rights of this company. I do not mean to say that we have not the power to do it. It could not be done in the United States. Such an attempt would, of course, be unconstitutional there. We have the power to do it here, but it is not the habit of British Parliaments to take away vested rights unless an overwhelming case of public convenience or inconvenience is made out. There is another reason why the hon. First Minister ought not to press the measure at the present session. The theory of our legislation is that a Bill should be read a first, a second, and a third time. Now, although I do not as a point of order mean to suggest that even at this stage these amendments may not be made, as not being within the purview of the title of the Act; nevertheless, after the Bill has been read the first time and the second time, has been referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and has come back from that committee, it is then for the first time suggested in a notice of motion on the Order Paper that these amendments should be made. It is quite true that friends in the House may have sent these notices to the insurance companies; but what means have the general public of becoming acquainted with this legislation? It is not the kind of thing that attracts the attention of the newspapers, and the means which we have of sending Bills to our constituents and those interested in them are not open to us in this case, in the manner in which these suggestions have been made for our consideration. I would therefore join my hon. friend from Norfolk in urging that the committee rise and report progress, but more with a view of the matter remaining over for one year, so that it could be fully considered. I may say, speaking for myself, that I understood that these amendments were not to be pressed this session. I informed the Canada Life and the Confederation Life, whose managers communicated with me when these notices were put on the paper, that I understood that some arrangement had been made so that the measure would not be pressed this session. I am not in a position to point out, and no person has pointed out, to what extent it does interfere with the vested rights of the Canada Life; it would have to be compared with the provisions of their charter. But I hope the matter will be allowed to stand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know that I can add anything to the arguments that have been made in favour of allowing the Bill to be considered by the Banking and Commerce Committee; but I would express the hope that the House will agree to that proposal. The hon. Prime Minister has said that notice was given to the amendments proposed; but he has now proposed important amendments which we have had no opportunity of considering. This is a very important matter, affecting a great interest, and the Bill, when it was before the Banking and Commerce Committee, received a great deal of earnest consideration; and I am sure that, after hearing the views and the information which were presented to that committee, many members viewed the matter in a different light from what they did when the matter first came before the committee. I do not think any one pretends to say that the company more particularly affected by this measure has made any mistake in the interest of its policy-holders, in its investments. A great difference of opinion will exist in the country as to whether it is well to put upon it the disabilities proposed here. If the matter were discussed in the Banking and Commerce Committee, I am not sure that many other important points might not be raised to show that we would be doing an injustice to the people of Canada by some of these proposals; for instance, money would be taken for investment out of the country which is now not only rendering a good profit to those who have invested it in insurance companies, but which is also helping institutions in whose bonds and stocks companies such as insurance companies are able to invest their money. It is a large subject, and one that should receive most careful consideration on the part of those interested. I do not know how I, like the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), got the impression that these amendments were not to be pressed this session. I understood that they were more particularly a departmental suggestion. In theory, the proposals appear to be very good, but the effect of them would be so widespread that I think the House and the Government ought to consider very carefully all that is to be said, pro and con. I would, therefore, urge upon the First Minister, if he can see his way clear to do so, to give us an opportunity of studying the effects of these amendments before he presses them upon the House.

Mr. TISDALE. I think the Prime Minister misunderstood what I said about introducing the measure so late. What I intended to express was that I do not wish in any way to obstruct the passage of the Bill, but feel it my duty, in regard to this particular section, to say to the hon. gentleman that while it is true that the companies have assented to the amendments to this amendment, they did so because they felt that they could do nothing less at this time. What they would like would be a chance to be heard before we passed this particular clause; and it is only from a sense of public duty that at this stage of the session I feel bound to say, or move anything upon the subject. My opinion is very strong that if we had this clause before the committee and had the departmental officers present and the different companies represented there to discuss the matter a much more satisfactory understanding would be obtained. I do not wish in any way to imperil the passage of the rest of the Bill, which is satisfactory to the department and the country, but under the circumstances, I think the Government might allow the balance of the Bill to pass, and let it be understood, if they wish to press this clause next session, that all the parties will be brought before the Banking and Commerce Committee and give them a chance to be heard.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I do not know that there would be any objection on the part of the Government to refer this amendment to the Banking and Commerce Committee, if we had time to do so at present. Of course, as the speakers who preceded me have remarked, if this cannot be done at this period of the session, the question really is whether this clause shall be dropped now, or whether it should be gone on with. I might here say this, with regard to the necessity of referring this clause, in any case, to the Banking and Commerce Committee, that it does not appear to me much advantage would be gained by that course. This same clause has been considered repeatedly by that committee, since I have had the honour of being its chairman. It has been introduced into the Acts incorporating the different insurance companies in the past few years—that is the clause as first introduced by the leader of the Government. It has since been enlarged, and that has been done to meet the views of certain companies, the representatives of which came to Ottawa and waited upon the leader of the Government in reference to it, after it first appeared in print. In deference to their opinion, after the conference which took place between the companies and the officers of the Finance Department, it was considered not objectionable to adopt this suggestion, and add to the class of securities which were first included, the different securities to which the right hon. the leader of the Government has referred to-night. Now, the result of the conference which has taken place, is that this clause, as it stands at present, is approved by and acceptable to all the life insurance companies in Canada, except the company to which the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) has referred, namely, the Canada Life. And so far as that company is concerned, the question seems to be narrowed down simply to this: whether we are to pass any legislation affecting it which will restrict the right of investment it had under its original charter. The object in introducing this, was, to place all life insurance companies on the same footing with regard to their investments, and for my part, I cannot see why that principle should be objected to with regard to any company. In order not to interfere with any vested rights which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) referred to, this clause was only made applicable to future investments.

Mr. McCARTHY. It does interfere with vested rights.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Well, I have not the same standing in the legal profession which the hon. member for North Simcoe has, but I must say that I fail to see how it interferes with any vested rights of the Canada Life, or any other company.

Mr. McCARTHY. Surely if a company has a right to invest in a certain class of securities, and if that right is taken away, that is altering the charter of the company to that extent and interfering with its vested rights. The hon. gentleman is confounding "investment" with "vested."

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). If any interference with the rights a company possessed under its original charter is an interference with vested rights, the hon. gentleman may be technically right.

Mr. McCARTHY. Substantially right.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I am not a sufficiently competent authority to pronounce on that question, but it appears to me the question is simply this: The policy of the old Parliament of Canada, at the time this company obtained its charter was entirely different from that of the Dominion Parliament at present, which is the policy that was adopted some years ago and has been followed uniformly in the incorporation of all the life insurance companies, incorporated in the last few years. I fail to understand why, if this be a good policy, if it be desirable to limit the investments of insurance companies at all, that policy should not be made applicable to old as well as new companies. I must say that I fail to see any injustice or hardship whatever in applying the same rule to all companies alike. All the other companies doing business in Canada are in accord on this point, and I believe, desire to see this Bill passed, except the Canada Life Company, and that company opposes it, as I understand to-night, upon the ground that it is unwilling to be deprived of any power of investment which it possesses under its original charter. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) referred to the fact that this is an old company, that its affairs have been well managed, and that it is at present in a very good position financially, and that none of the policy-holders having been finding fault with their investments. The hon. member for North Simcoe said something to the same effect, namely, that he thought that the investments of this company and its past good management was a guarantee for the future. I for one am not prepared to indorse the statement that the management of the past is a guarantee for the future, and for this reason—the management and direction of the affairs of these insurance companies does not always remain in the same hands. The company may have been well managed by the directors who have had charge of it in the past, whether they have changed recently or whether they are likely to change in the future, I do not know. We do not know but that they may change and the management go into entirely new hands and a company that has been well conducted in the past may be very badly conducted in the future. With regard to this company, I would like to say further that since that matter came up I have looked a little into the affairs of the company. I felt it my duty to do so, because the company is doing a very large business in Canada, and I know that in my own section of the country and in the constituency I represent there are a large number of policy-holders who are deeply interested in the affairs of this company and to whom it would be a very serious matter if any mismanagement or any disaster were to result. This company has certainly done a very successful business extending over a long period of time, and has conducted its business really on the lines laid down in the clause we are considering, and has almost uniformly limited its investments to the class of securities we propose it shall in the future be restricted to. But, whether there has been a change in the management or not, I find in the reports published of the insurance companies, that within the last five years there has been a very material change in the class of investments which this company are making. Now, in the report which appeared last I find that the Canada Life have invested some $450,000 in bonds of the Kingston, Napanee and Western Railway Company—6 per cent bonds. They enter these bonds in their list of securities at their par value as the market value. They have invested a further sum of $400,000 in bonds of the Lake Erie and Essex and Detroit River Railway Company. They have invested a further sum of about

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland).

$400,000 in bonds of the St. Lawrence and Adirondack Railway Company. They have invested also in the Michigan Central Railway Company's bonds. They have invested a further sum of $375,000 in shares of a commercial corporation, H. Walker & Son, for which they hold also $400,000 of these same Lake Erie, Essex and Detroit River Railway Company's bonds. I have taken the last report of the Department of Railways and Canals to get what information I could glean from it in reference to the affairs of these railway companies. I might say here generally, in my opinion investment in securities of this class is not the kind of investment which our life insurance companies ought to make. Our life insurance companies are in a different position from almost any other class of companies in the country. They do not subscribe any large amount of stock. The money which they receive and which they have for investment is not money belonging to stock-holders of the company, it is money which is paid in by the policy-holders of the company, and which the company holds as a sort of trustee for the payment of these policies when they become due. We know the position in which many of these policy-holders would stand if there was any failure on the part of the life insurance companies to meet their obligations when they mature. These amounts for investment are made out of little sums which people who are insured pay from year to year in order to provide something for the benefit of their family or those who are dependent upon them after their death. And it would be a most serious matter if, through any mismanagement of these life insurance companies, these people who had trusted their money with them for safe-keeping were not to realize the amounts due them as the policies matured. I have felt, therefore, that these companies ought not to be permitted to invest in what I call a speculative class of securities of doubtful value, such as these railway bonds. And it appears to me that is really the underlying principle of this whole resolution; that is really why the Government have considered it necessary in regard to life insurance companies to take a sort of paternal—if you choose to call it so—charge of their business, and why Parliament has thought it wise and in the interest of this country that the class of securities in which they were allowed to invest should be limited to those which generally were considered safe in their character. The railways to which I have referred, the Bay of Quinté Railway and Navigation Company and the Kingston, Napanee and Western Railway, I understand, now amalgamated, and have a total bonded debt of $60,500 and $450,000. Their net earnings in 1893 were $44,361. It is true that this will be sufficient to more than pay the interest on their bonded debt, but, so far as I can learn, these bonds have really no market value, and if the company, under any circumstances, were obliged to realize on the securities at the present time, they would really be unable to sell them in the open market, and would be obliged to take up and manage the road, in order to realize the amount which they have advanced upon it. Then the Lake Erie, Essex and Detroit River Railway Company is in somewhat the same position. It is a road eighty-eight miles long. The company has a subscribed capital of a quarter of a million dollars and a paid-up capital of only $25,000. They have a bonded debt of $900,000. The whole of these bonds, I find, are held by this Canada Life Insurance Company. During last year the net earnings of this road were $36,393.49. This would be $17,806.51 short of paying the interest on the bonds. I can hardly think that under these circumstances, this would be a very safe or desirable class of investments. They must certainly be a class of securities which could not find sale under present circumstances in the open market. The St. Lawrence and Adirondack Railway is twenty miles in length. The company has a capital of $350,000 and a bonded debt of $400,000. Last year their working expenses were $45,404 and their gross earnings $31,922. This railway company came short by $13,481 of paying their working expenses, so that there would be nothing from the earnings of the railway, at all events, to pay interest on the bonds.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Can the hon. gentleman inform us whether there are not some other securities in addition?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I can give the hon. gentleman no other information except what I find in these public reports.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is hardly fair to the company to make such a statement here, where they are not represented and cannot make any explanations. The company may be able to give explanations.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I am only reading their published statement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I just wish to say to the hon. gentleman that he might do an injustice to them.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I cannot conceive how there can be any injustice to the company in reading the published statements made by their own management, in which they give this as the list of their securities.

Mr. McCARTHY. What is the advance on these?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I did not add them up. There are $450,000 on one, $400,000 on another, and $500,000 on another.

Mr. McCARTHY. What is the percentage of the advance, and what other securities are there?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). There is no other security here.

Mr. McCARTHY. It does not follow there is no other.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). This is a public statement of the management of the company, in which it is distinctly stated that these sums of money are advanced on these securities. If there were other securities, certainly they would be put in. It is a right and proper inference for us to draw that all the securities they hold are put in here, as they would not make a statement to their own disadvantage in that respect. We can hardly conceive it possible that a business corporation would do a thing so unbusinesslike as that. I do not wish to do any injustice to the company, and I would not have referred to this matter at all if it could have been avoided, but it did appear to me that this question is now narrowed down to this simple point, whether we are doing right at the present time, or doing any injustice to this company, in bringing them under the same rule that applies to all other companies, and limiting them to a class of securities, so far as investments are concerned, which all other companies adopt. It appears to me that it is the duty of Parliament, if it has any duty at all to perform with regard to these life insurance companies, to watch over the interest of the policy-holders, and it is the interest of the policy-holders which I feel it my duty to look after in this matter. The very fact that the policy of this company has entirely changed within the last few years, shows to my mind that there has been a change of management, and that if the principles which Parliament has adopted during the last few years are right, if they are necessary, if they are in the interest of the policy-holders, it is certainly in the interest of this company, and especially in the interest of the policy-holders, that the same legislation should be applied to them, and that in the future they should be limited to the same class of securities as those to which other companies are limited at present. I have no personal interest in this matter whatever, but since my attention has been drawn to it during the last few days by the interviews we have had with the representatives of this company, and knowing as we do that this is the largest company in Canada, and they hold at the present time insurance on the lives of some 25,000 persons, amounting to upwards of $60,000,000, I feel it is of paramount importance to the policy-holders of the company in Canada, that the interests of this great company should be guarded. There are more interests involved in this company than in any other; I am not sure but that there are as much as in all the other Canadian life insurance companies together. I think it would be a mistake to delay this matter. I see no object in delaying it; the matter seems to be narrowed down to so simple a question that it is simply a matter of policy just now for this Parliament to deal with. I see no object to be gained by referring this matter again to the Committee on Banking and Commerce; and I for one, as representing a large number of the policy-holders of this company, hope that the Government will pass this Bill and that this clause will be added during the present session.

Mr. EDGAR. I happen to be a policy holder in that company myself to the extent of $20,000, that is the only interest I have in it, and I think that gives me some right to speak on behalf of the policy-holders. I must say that I think, if I am not unparliamentary, that it is exceedingly unfair and most unfortunate that the hon. gentleman occupying the position of chairman of the Committee on Banking and Commerce, should stand up in this House and make such an attack as he has made upon the securities of any large financial institution in this country, without their being here, or any body to represent them, to reply to his statement. What have we to do with investigating the affairs of that company? What is the inspector of insurance for, if he has been all these years allowing such securities as the hon. gentleman is throwing doubt upon?

Mr. FOSTER. The securities which their charter gave them a right to.

Mr. EDGAR. But would they be accepted by the insurance company as a proper investment?

Mr. FOSTER. He has no right to deny them.

Mr. EDGAR. Why have they not been reported upon long before this? We have the chairman of the committee, justified by the Government, making an attack upon a great commercial corporation, and they know perfectly well that every other insurance company in the country will publish the speech the hon. gentleman has made, and will misrepresent the whole condition of that company, the strongest financial institution we have in Canada except the Bank of Montreal, perhaps stronger even than that bank. I think it is unfair and most unfortunate, and that this action just shows one of the reasons why we should not go into a detailed discussion of all these elaborate securities. What does anybody in the House know about the character of these securities that the hon. gentleman has referred to? There may have been collateral securities and important personal securities in addition. There are connected with some of these railways in Canada men of very great wealth and standing in the community. The railway of Hiram Walker was one of those mentioned, and doubt and suspicions are thrown upon his bonds. Why, Sir, does any body in this country suppose that the bonds of Hiram Walker cannot be made as good as gold? I am sure this whole discussion shows the unwisdom of proceeding with this Bill.

Mr. COATSWORTH. As I happen to have the honour to represent a large number of the policy-holders, I feel a considerable interest in this company. Now, looking at the matter from that point of view, two or three questions arise. There is no doubt that the statement made by my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) in regard to the securities, is a very important one and a very serious one. Still, we must bear in mind that it is an ex parte statement, and although taken from their reports, we ought to have the explanations of the company, and we ought to know particularly whether, as has been suggested by some hon. members, these securities are collateral, or do not represent the full sum that they appear to represent. Besides that, the two objects that we want to secure on behalf of the policy-holders are, in the first place, that their moneys shall be invested in absolutely safe securities, and in the next place, that they shall produce the largest possible revenue. As I understand it, the effect of this legislation is likely to be this: it may, and doubtless will, result in the investment of the moneys of the company in more limited and, perhaps, safer classes of securities, but at the same time it will reduce the scope of their investments in such a way that their earning power will not be as great as hitherto. It will be freely conceded that that will be the result of the legislation. If that is to be the result of it, then we place them at a disadvantage as compared with the undertaking of other companies. They have been in the position heretofore to make statements with respect to their earnings, and, based on the earnings of the past, have made calculations for the future, not only with regard to their earnings, but also as to the statements they have made with persons with whom they have entered into contracts. No doubt the result of any great diminution in the income of the Canada Life will greatly shock the minds of policy-holders, who entered into contracts on the basis of the company's earnings in the past, and if the company's earnings are much restricted in the future, it will probably affect the business of the company very seriously. I have not had an opportunity of discussing this matter with my constituents, many of whom are policy-holders in that company. It is only within the last two weeks that I heard of the matter, and I did not even have an opportunity to attend when the discussions were taking place with representatives of the company, and I feel, therefore, that it is incumbent on me, representing as I do, very many of the shareholders of this company, to support the suggestion of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale). I do not say the proposed legislation should not pass, but I say this : that the matter is an exceedingly important one, and one which may affect to a very great extent 27,000 people, one on which we should not lightly or hastily embark, and one on which we are entitled to the fullest information before we decide conclusively what is to be done. The period of the session is so late that there is not opportunity to freely and fully discuss the matter, and therefore I feel inclined to support for the present the suggestion that the Bill be laid over until next session, and if we find on investigating the matter that the securities will be made better by legislation of this kind, I will most heartily support the Bill.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No doubt what the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) has said is correct. It is a matter of great importance and of great difficulty, too, when we find, and no doubt correctly, that the largest company in Canada, one having 27,000 constituents, can have its policy-holders object to a measure for the protection of the policy-holders. I do not think the hon. gentleman's objection that the company would be placed at a disadvantage as compared with other companies is well founded or well considered, for the same provision will apply to all companies. It applies to most companies now, except, of course, as regards foreign companies, which we can control by no legislation whatever. One would have supposed that it would tend to strengthen a company to have this additional legislative protection in regard to the investments of the company. I think the most improper suggestion that could possibly be made within the range of parliamentary debate is the observation made with respect to the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), the accusation of unfairness against him, and at the same time an attack is made on the Government. I assume that the company can stand a discussion of those investments which it has made ; I assume it has special explanations to make with respect to those investments ; I am willing to assume as correct what the hon. gentleman said in regard to the great strength of the company, the only doubt cast on that having been the observation of the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), that it is making an attack on the company to read in public its own sworn returns. I should think a company that would admit that that was the correct advocacy of its position was not in the position of strength claimed for that company. So far as regards interference with vested rights, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Tisdale), as the hon. member for Westmoreland said, is technically correct. The company has a right by law to make bad investments if it pleases. Any company in its position has that right, but with regard to companies of all classes which have derived their sanction from legislative authority, it is never considered. I submit, an infringement in substance of vested rights to provide Government supervision with regard to them, or to provide safeguards as to where they stand in relation to the public. That is what the Bill does. I do not mean to say that the caution hon. members have observed as regards the details of the amendment is at all unfounded, or that the scrutiny which they gave to the measure is at all unacceptable ; but when we find we have reduced the stringency of the provisions in such a way as to remove all objections made by the deputation that came to Ottawa on the subject, and which deputation the officers of the department heard with myself, and where the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee, was good enough to assist me in receiving those representatives, and the simple answer of one company now is that we do not like the Bill, I do not think that is a good reason for asking that a useful proposition of legislation should stand over to another year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The First Minister must remember that the Canada Life Company is not before the House asking for any legislation, and I think I am perfectly correct when I say that no particular opposition was made to the legislation proposed by the Government. As I understand, every hon. member who spoke in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) was simply asking for time and opportunity to examine the amendment proposed. Speaking for myself, I said that the amendments, so far as we understood them when read, seemed to be in the right direction so far as insurance law is concerned. It is unprecedented that when a company is not before the House asking for legislation, and is not represented by any advocate or person prepared to answer statements made with respect to the company's position on a public Bill like this, to go into details of the affairs of the company, as has been done by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood). That was the position I took. If the company had come here asking for legislation, the position might have been a very different one, because some representative would have been able to lay before the House particulars of the company's affairs. Great injury might arise from the statement made as it has been made in this House, very unfairly in which particulars were given respecting a company which is not before the House. It is quite true that hon. gentlemen in asking to have the legislation proposed postponed or referred to a committee stated that it was not that the Canada Life Company, but policy-holders might have the opportunity to see how that legislation will affect that particular company. It is true that reference has been made to the fact that the company claim that this Bill will limit the rights under their charter, and they were referred to very properly as vested rights. For myself I am not a stickler for vested rights. I believe it is the duty of this House, if they find that rights have been granted to a company which are not in the interests of the public, to at any time reconsider their decision. But any member of this House will admit that it should be only upon strong representations and upon facts well established that we would interfere with rights that have been granted by previous legislation. I would like to call the First Minister's attention to the fact, that I do not think any member raised any particular opposition to the propositions made by the Government in this Bill. It was simply that we recognized in them important changes affecting seriously the policy-holders of insurance companies, that we asked for time to have an opportunity of considering the effect of the amendment. The chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee appears to have had an opportunity of meeting these deputations to the Government, and after all the consideration that he seems to have given the question, I think he might have treated it in a very different manner and shown us some reason for the general legislation that was passed, instead of bringing up the private affairs of the company. To my mind it was a very unfair way of putting it on the present occasion when no person was in a position to meet it. I am confident and satisfied, as the Minister has said, that the company referred to is a strong, well managed company, and can stand the criticism of this House. But what has been said here, and the statements that have been made with reference to the company, must show the First Minister the importance of giving us an opportunity of considering this before the Banking and Commerce Committee, if only out of simply justice to that company, and to its policy-holders. I am sure that on calmer consideration the First Minister will see that it is unfair that we have not had an opportunity of considering the question, not particularly with regard to that company, but as to the general affect on all insurance investments. It is simply impossible for us to understand the proposed amendment as it was read to us at the Table of the House to-night. I still hope that after careful thought, the Government will grant the request that this should be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee. I can hardly agree with the hon. member that there is not time for this course, because if the Government feels it necessary to press it this session, a special meeting of the committee could be called on a matter of such importance as this. If the course we suggest is adopted, the members of the House will be much better satisfied, and the people of the country who are so largely interested in the insurance companies will also be better satisfied. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) is not the only man who holds an insurance policy, nor are his constituents the only people in Canada deeply interested in this question. We all should have an opportunity of looking into the matter, as he says he has had, by consulting with the officers of the department and the parties interested. The hon. gentleman must know that in the past, many suggestions have been made by officers of the department which did not meet with the approval of the committee, and one thing can be said for that committee: there is no party politics introduced into it. The members of that committee meet and deal with these questions to the best of their ability and knowledge and decide on the facts placed before them. I am very sorry for what has taken place to-night, because I think it was quite unnecessary and unfair to bring up these matters in this particular case. If the Government passes this legislation through in this way, and if any injury is done, the responsibility will rest upon them and not upon the members of the committee who have not had an opportunity of considering the effects of the amendments proposed.

Mr. TISDALE. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) in his strictures on the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood). It is probably unfortunate that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) brought up this matter, but I will not say that it is unfair. This company is quite able to stand it, and I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact, that this company has nothing to conceal. They publish these statements and their proprietors and managers and policy-holders get these reports and are able to ascertain the class of securities, and the people interested have not shown any want of confidence in the company. That is an important point in this matter. With all deference to the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) I prefer the opinion of the gentlemen who control that company, considering their ability and financial standing and judgment, to the opinion of a gentleman who has only read their report. I say that the men who represent that company are second to none in Canada. Surely there are railway securities in Canada that to a certain extent are safe, and if not, it is about time that we stopped building railroads. We are willing that men should go to England and raise money on the bonds of such roads as he speaks of, and surely if the people of England are asked to supply money for them, they ought, to a certain extent, be considered safe securities. I entirely disagree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) that simply because they have railroad bonds on Canadian roads the securities are bad.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I did not say that these securities were bad. I simply read the securities. I called attention to the fact that this is a strong company, that it had been doing business a long time, that it had gone on the principle of investment mentioned in that clause, that during the last few years they had changed that policy, and I called attention to the character of the investments they were making.

Mr. TISDALE. If there is anything in the argument, it is an argument that these securities are unsafe, and that insurance companies should not be allowed to invest in them.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). My argument was this: that it was contrary to the policy which Parliament had adopted in regard to all other life insurance companies.

Mr. TISDALE. But not to the English and Scotch companies, that have no limits, and that were the patterns upon which these complaints were founded. A great deal depends on the class of men who manage the companies and their knowledge of this sort of security. I do not question that this class of legislation, up to a certain extent may not be correct, but since I have heard the discussion, and more particularly the argument of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood)—I have come to the conclusion that it is all the more important that we should consider this matter in the Banking and Commerce Committee where we can call the parties and hear them. I feel that I am discharging a duty here, and I am fearless in discharging that duty. I can say that the members of the Banking and Commerce Committee have grudged neither time nor labour in inquiring into these provisions. For my part I propose to do my duty on those committees or cease to be a member of them.

Mr. McCARTHY. The chairman represented the committee.

Mr. TISDALE. The chairman is a most able and estimable man, for whom I have every consideration; but, as I disagree with other gentlemen on other matters, so I disagree with him on this matter. There will be friction between the Government and the House, and dissatisfaction on the part of the companies if we do not give them the consideration that they demand. At times we have ignored the companies or refused to do what they wanted; but we have heard from them; and we have heard from them before the smaller tribunal in a way in which they could not be heard from here. I shall regret it exceedingly if the Government insist on passing this measure at this time and in this way. If they do, I shall simply have discharged my duty. I would very strongly like this clause to be dropped this session, and probably next session I would be one of the strongest supporters of the measure, after I had heard fully what these gentlemen might have to say. I go this far with the hon. member for North Simcoe, that while I agree that the general practice is, as laid down by the Prime Minister, that we have a right in shaping this general legislation to deal with vested rights, still, this is a case in which we ought to be most careful, because I have the utmost objection to legislating away any right even to the extent of curtailing it, unless it is established to my satisfaction that the public interest demands our doing so.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I do not suppose that anything I can say will affect the decision of the House; but I do feel under the circumstances that an appeal ought to be made to the hon. First Minister not to press this particular clause at this time. I do not disagree with him as to the necessity of protecting the policy-holders in insurance companies, where their interests are necessarily dependent upon these investments. But I regret to have heard to-night the way in which this matter was discussed by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Commerce. I think that the subject of these securities is one which, if it came up at all, should have come before that committee, when the representatives of the company in question would be present and would have an opportunity of offering any explanation they saw fit. While I acquit the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) of intending to do any possible wrong to the company he has referred to, I want to point out to him that he has taken no account of the surrounding circumstances. If he knew the managers of the Canada Life as well as I do, from personal contact with those gentlemen for many years—for more than twenty years I have known the president of that company in connection with other financial transactions, and have had reason to respect his judgment on such subjects—I think he would have hesitated to make these disparaging references to that class of securities. We all know how railway companies are associated with each other, and how those securities may be guaranteed perhaps by other companies who have a controlling interest in them. But I do feel that if we pass this clause to-night, as the hon. First Minister seems disposed to do, the companies in keen competition with the Canada Life will at once place these two circumstances together, and will point to this class of securities as the reason for the passing of this Act; and I am sure that every hon. gentleman here will say that it was unfair to the company to place it in that position, in view of the keen competition that we know exists among the various life insurance companies. I can only plead, in the line of the remarks of the hon. member for North Norfolk, that no harm can come to the policy-holders of that company; and incidentally, I may say that it is the only company in which I hold a policy on my life, so that I have some interest in the welfare of that company. The hon. member for Westmoreland says that all the other companies are satisfied. So they are, when the range of their investments is not affected by this legislation; but here is a company which has successfully conducted its business for a long series of years, and whose financial administration, to those who know intimately, is above reproach; and it does seem a little unfair that its rights should now be taken away from it in the expiring hours of the session, and under the present circumstances. I can only appeal to the hon. First Minister to allow this matter to stand over, and if he does, I believe no wrong will be done to any one, while justice will be done to the company.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has made a very pathetic appeal; but it is a little amusing to see the trend of the criticism of this measure, as though an attack were being made upon any particular company—say upon the Canada Life, which has been mentioned. That is not the purpose of the Bill or of the amendment proposed to be inserted in the Bill. The amendment is simply to relate to the securities of these companies for the future; and this company is one whose charter long ago had given to it a range of securities beyond what the settled policy of Parliament for the last six or seven years has considered safe or prudent, or such as insurance companies should be allowed to invest in. That is all. The criticism has been made, on the other hand, that this legislation interferes with vested rights. Technically, it takes away from this company a right which a charter granted to it forty-eight years ago gave it, as to the range of its investments. But it does not disturb any of the investments at present made. It only curtails the investments to be made in the future; it leaves intact all the investments made in any securities up to the present time. It is said that this is a departmental view. True, and that is the way the matter has arisen. The department, looking over the matter, has the right to advise the Minister of these things. In the course of its investigations, the department did advise the Minister of the range of investments which these companies had, and after consultation it was thought best that an amendment of this kind should be made. It is the departmental view, it is true, but it is a departmental view in which the Government entirely sympathises. Now, we must be fair. We must not construe this as an attack upon a company. Neither must we go to the extreme of supposing that it is a company that is being legislated against. That is not the case. The Government has the power of legislating with reference to insurance. Outside all the arguments that can be put, there is a perfect agreement upon this, that the interests of the policy-holders is the chief interest to be considered, and that the profits they get, but the safety of their investment. Talk about getting the policy-holders together, in order that they may press their views on the Government, that is impracticable. Of the 27,000 to 30,000 policy-holders how many of them pay any attention to this, or would get any notice of it if it were left over for a year. They simply go upon the representations made to them by the company, and they insure, not for the sake of the profits, but for the sake of the investment they will have, when the policy expires. And the first consideration of this House should be to make sure that this investment of the policy-holders, which is their main investment, shall be in perfectly safe securities, as far as possible. Now, Parliament, in dealing with the charters of companies, is supposed to gain more experience every year, and to be able to deal more intelligently with them each year than in the preceding years. The charter that the Canada Life Company has was given forty-eight years ago. Under that charter, the range of its investments is practically unlimited. It may invest in bonds or mortgages or stocks, without reference to the Treasury Board, or without reference to their value. That charter was granted forty-eight years ago. Parliaments have met every year since, and in this matter of insurance companies we have come to look upon it as the settled policy that we should limit the range of their securities. For what purpose? Not out of any antagonism to the companies, but under the idea that it is the safety of the policy-holders which must be looked to. Now, there is a class of companies which had these large powers granted forty-eight years ago, but the policy of granting which, later Parliaments have condemned. All the later insurance companies are limited in their investments to a line of securities of a safer kind, in the opinion of Parliament. And now the Government, consistently with that policy, ask that those companies which obtained charters forty-eight years ago, giving them this unlimited power of investment, should, so far as their future investments are concerned, be obliged to conform to the later and better policy. An ingenious, but not a fair attempt, was made by an hon. gentleman on the other side to construe the statement of my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) as an attack on the bona fides or the credit of certain companies. That was unfair. The hon. member for Westmoreland did not say that Hiram Walker & Sons was not a solvent company, that it could not pay dollar for dollar. He simply cited it as one of the investments upon which the Canada Life has made a loan, and it is altogether unfair to say that he attacked any one of these securities because he pointed out that such investments are not in the line of those sanctioned at present. But the safety of the policy-holders is the question before the House tonight, and as far as I am concerned, after the representations that were made to the department and the investigation I have given the matter, I would not take the responsibility myself of shelving the question, and I think the House ought to take that responsibility. Who is to be harmed? The hon. gentleman who spoke last said that it would be a disadvantage to the Canada Life now if this amendment were pressed, because then the insurance agents of other companies would use it against them. I look upon its effect as exactly the opposite. The insurance agents, who are competing with those of the Canada Life, if this amendment be not passed, will be in a position to go to their constituency and say to those they are canvassing: Do not insure with the Canada Life, because its range of securities is not as safe as ours. Insure with us. But if we pass this to-night, and place all future investments of the Canada Life on the same basis as those of other insurance societies, that argument will be entirely taken away, and then they can only say, what will be true, that there is no advantage, as far as investment is concerned, on the part of one company over another company, because all the companies are restricted to the same class. So that it will be better for the Canada Life, in that light, that this amendment should pass rather than doubt should be cast on its investments. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) simply read to the House, not the private affairs of the company—not at all—but the sworn statement which it is obliged to make. For what purpose is that sworn statement made? That it shall not be made public? No; but that it shall be made known. My hon. friend simply read what is in the blue-book, and what the company have sworn to. His contention was not that the Canada Life is not a safer company, not that it has not been well managed, not that it is not still well managed, but simply that in the interest of over $60,000,000 of policies, in the interest of the investment of $15,000,000 of assets, it is better that the range of securities which was allowed forty-eight years ago, should now be restricted to what Parliament has repeatedly declared advisable during the last six or eight years, and to which all the other companies are obliged to conform. There has not been an attack made upon any company, and no attempt to make capital against any one company. My hon. friend from Toronto thought that the profits might be somewhat brought down, if these investments were limited, but he very properly showed the preference which should be given to safety over profits. The first thing to be looked to is the safety of the investment of the policy-holders, and then after an investment is made perfectly safe, the next object is to obtain as much profit as possible. Parliament has held, during these last years, that a certain range of securities ought to be fixed in order to secure the general safety of the policy-holders, and while not disturbing the investments that have been made by any chartered company, chartered so long ago, all we ask is that for the future its investments shall be made on the same basis and restricted to the same securities as those of the other companies.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is curious that the great interest which the hon. gentleman expresses for the policy-holders, and which I have no doubt he quite sincerely feels, does not strike the policy-holders present in this House.

Mr. FOSTER. A very small number are present.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, of all those present, and I have not heard any one of them express but the one opinion, namely, that it would be preferable to allow the matter to remain in the hands of the company as it is, rather than have the powers of the company restricted. These gentlemen who are here—the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) and one or two others who have spoken, and myself—who are policy-holders in the Canada Life, are of that opinion; and I submit it is not an unfair conclusion to draw that the other policy-holders not present hold the same view. I quite appreciate the anxiety of the department of insurance, which is shared by the Government, to make these policies sure investments for the holders. No more commendable object could be presented to this committee. But at the same time, Sir, surely the policy-holders may be allowed to have some little voice in the matter. This grand-motherly way of taking care of our interests by our Insurance Department may not be appreciated as it deserves by the policy-holders. We have, with perfect knowledge of this company, its management and its affairs, chosen to invest our money in this way. Are we to be told that we do not understand our own business, that the Insurance Department is wiser in our own affairs than we are, and that the department is going to take care of us, if not the interest upon our investment, at least the principal itself?

Mr. FOSTER. That argument would do away with the Insurance Department altogether.

Mr. McCARTHY. Not at all.

Mr. FOSTER. Its work is all grand-motherly, you know.

Mr. McCARTHY. It may be grand-motherly, but it should not be so to too great an extent. I can see perfectly well that it is a good thing that these securities should be valued—

Mr. FOSTER. We have not that right.

Mr. McCARTHY. The department must put a value upon the security for the purpose of the deposit.

Mr. FOSTER. We have no right to discriminate.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is exactly what I am objecting to. The department wants to take a right which they have not had up to the present time. After all, it is not very much we are asking. It may be that this amendment is in the right direction. But it is clear the department is not always right in reference to these securities, because the department itself has changed its opinion upon certain representations. We are told the matter has been decided on these representations and decided outside the House. It does appear to me that it is coming to that, and that we might as well go home. We are told that certain gentlemen representing certain companies met the Government. One member of this House was admitted to that conference. These gentlemen have met and decided the matter, and we are asked to ratify and adopt it at once. Surely the committee of the House should have the right to consider this matter and hear the arguments and know the reasons which lead to the conclusion which has been given to us. No arguments are given to us. The amendment is read and we are expected to swallow it. For my part, I think we ought to have time for consideration. I was led to believe that the matter would not be pressed this session, and consequently I did not prepare myself to deal with the subject, and particularly to meet any attacks made. But since the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) made his charges, I have looked at the report to which he referred, and I do not think it was wrong to say that in the way it was made the charge was an unfair charge. I hesitate not to adopt and repeat the language, and I think I shall be able to prove what I say. The hon. gentleman made a statement from the report of the company, and, as the Prime Minister said, the company cannot object to its sworn report being referred to. But not only did the hon. gentleman undertake to state the nature of the securities, he undertook to criticise and value these securities. He went to the report of the railway statistics, and, declaring that as this railway was earning so much, and the other so much, the securities given by those companies and bought by the Canada Life could not be good.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I read from the public report, and it is for the House to judge.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am speaking of the hon. gentleman's argument. Of course, it is for the House to judge, if we are permitted to judge anything. Not only did he quote from the public report of the company, but he went into criticism and actual valuation of the bonds mentioned in this list. But he left an impression very different from that left on my mind by the reading of this report, and, in justice to the company, I propose to give to the House the actual figures with regard to these investments. In the Kingston, Napanee and Western Railway Company's six per cent bonds, and in the Bay of Quinté Navigation Company's six per cent bonds, the company holds $560,000. But there is a margin of $110,000 on that, for the company has advanced only $450,000. Of the Lake Erie, Essex and Detroit River Railway Company's bonds, 6 per cent, they hold $500,000, but only $400,000 has been loaned, leaving a margin of $100,000. Then we have all in one group the St. Lawrence and Adirondack bonds, the Michigan Central Railway Company's bonds, which I fancy are fairly good security, 600 shares of the Michigan Central stock, the New York Central and Hudson River Railway shares—perhaps the hon. gentleman will think these are a bad security—total, $655,000, upon which $500,000 has been advanced. Of the Lake Erie and Detroit River Railway Company's bonds the company holds $460,000, and there is also 4,000 shares of Hiram Walker & Son's—and I do not think we can get a better security—these two together making $796,000 upon which only $375,000 has been advanced—nothing like the face value of the securities. And we are here, behind the back of this company, to say that these were improper or unwise investments.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). My argument was that this was not a proper class of securities for the investments of insurance companies' funds.

Mr. McCARTHY. The impression the hon. gentleman left was that these investments were clearly unwise, but the impression on my mind on reading the report is entirely different. The hon. gentleman criticised these securities as being of a class that could not be realized upon at the present time.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I expressed that opinion.

Mr. McCARTHY. Very well; it was a criticism upon these securities. I think it was an unfair criticism, and if it was not purposely done to injure the Canada Life, I do not know with what object it could have been brought before the House by the chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee. I have to make this statement in order that the full position of the investments of the Canada Life may go upon 'Hansard,' together with the half-statement made by the hon. member for Westmoreland. The hon. gentleman stated that there had been a change in the management of the company. It is well known that the management of the company is in the hands of the president, who is also the managing director, and that it has been in his hands for many years.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I did not say there had been a change of management. I said nothing about the management. I said that during the last five years there had been a change in the character of the investments.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman said also that there had been a change in the management, or else I took his words down wrong. However, of course, I accept the hon. gentleman's statements on that point. There has been no change in the management of the company; it is still in the hands of the able gentleman who has brought this company to a point of success of which every one in Canada is proud. I do not know that there is anything in Canada to-day of which we have more reason to be proud than the success of the Canada Life. It is now branching out on the other side of the line. It has opened agencies in two of the neighbouring states. It is an institution which, instead of being attacked, ought to be supported by every person who has the interest of his country at heart.

Mr. DENISON. I wish to say a word or two with reference to the remarks of the last speaker, who seemed to think that the policy-holders were all in favour of having this stand over. I happen to be a small policy-holder, and, for my part, I am strongly in favour of this proposed amendment. What I want, and what I think every policy-holder in the company wants, is security. My object in insuring was that, in case of my death, my heirs might have something that they could count upon with certainty. I do not want to be in a company, the security of which I think there is any doubt about. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) stated that the management of the company had been for a great number of years in the same hands as at present. We know that the present manager has been there a great many years, and consequently the chances are that before many years we are likely to have a change in the management. But as long as the present manager is there, I, as a policy-holder, have perfect confidence in his management, and would be glad to have him remain there as long as possible. But it is quite possible there may be a change of management under the same manager, through direction of the board of management. However, as a policy-holder I want to say that what I desire is absolute security rather than a high rate of interest. It is well known that where people look for a high rate of interest, there is a higher element of danger and loss; and the lower the interest, the better the chances for security, because when the security is good, of course the company or person can borrow more cheaply. As regards the remarks of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), when he stated at the outset that he was quoting from blue-books for the accuracy of which he could not vouch, I think it is unjust to him to say that he was making unfair charges. I think any member of this House is justified in taking up a blue-book and quoting reports that he finds in it as freely as he likes; and I for one would not join in the criticism to which that hon. gentleman has been subjected. I may say further that other companies besides insurance companies are limited in their investments. The Court of Chancery limits them. Trust corporations who carry out wills by deceased persons, are limited in their investments, and I concur in the idea that the investments of this company should be limited.

Mr. DICKEY. I wish to say a word in consequence of the remarks of the hon. member for North Simcoe, who undertook to speak for all the policy-holders in this House. I do not know on what ground he took, but I wish to say that I am a policy-holder in this company for the sum of $6,000, and as such policy-holder I am extremely interested in placing some limitation on the investments of this company. What I want is that this company shall be safe, not only at the present time under Mr. Ramsay's management, a man in whom we all have confidence, but forty years from now—as I expect to live forty or fifty years longer; and it is only by limiting the investments of the company that we can be sure of permanent security. With regard to the postponement of this measure, I would say that according to the argument of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and others, there is no necessity of postponement at all, because they argued on the principle that no change should be made, they argued on the principle that this company has vested rights with which this Parliament should not interfere. There is no necessity for any committee to take up that point. I do not know that this particular resolution may not be improved, but I sincerely hope that the committee will act upon the principle of limiting the investments of this company.

Mr. HAGGART. I have looked over the statement of the affairs of this company, and I find that they have investments to the extent of nearly $15,000,000, and that they have liabilities to parties insured with them to the extent of $65,000,000.

Mr. EDGAR. That is not the present value, not the present liabilities.

Mr. HAGGART. I was looking at the amount of the stock of the company, and I find it is $1,000,000, and the amount paid up is $125,000. I have no idea what the value of that stock may be; but it is possible that some person may get control of the stock of that company for a small sum of money. What would be the effect if a speculator, or some one that was interested in railways, should get control of the management of that stock, say, for the sum of $250,000 or $300,000? Is it not possible that this may be done, and that he could control these investments to the amount of $13,000,000 or $15,000,000?

I say nothing about the character of the investments; I have looked carefully over them, and I think probably that they are fairly and fully secured. I think the investments are good so far as I can see. But what is to prevent a person getting control of the stock, electing his own manager and getting control of the company, then realizing on the securities and getting possession of the five or six million dollars and investing it in some undertaking in which he was interested himself? He might be the purchaser of railway bonds, or of securities like that, and with the money that he gets from the sale of those securities, what is to prevent him from making investments the profits of which he may put into his own pocket, or the amount above the actual cash value, or the market value, and the policy-holders, perhaps, losing half their money? There is the danger, and I think it is the duty of the Government, in the interest of the policy-holders, in the interest of those who have by far the largest investment in that company, to see that no such power should be given to any set of directors or any speculators.

Mr. EDGAR. One word as to what the hon. gentleman apprehends from the danger of one person getting control of, we will say, the Canada Life Company. The hon. gentleman says that the person who got control might be interested in railway securities and unload them on the company. Very well, might not that gentleman give bonds, stocks, or other securities, say of building societies? Might he not be interested in all these different securities that the Government proposed to allow that company to invest in?

Mr. HAGGART. Are those speculative stocks that he is allowed to invest in?

Mr. EDGAR. Why, certainly; any stocks are speculative if you buy them cheap and sell them dear. What the hon. gentleman suggests is that some of the proprietors of this company should become common swindlers, and buy up railway stocks, sell them to the company, and put millions into their pockets. Well, if he is going to stop that, he must strike out all the investments in stocks or bonds of any institution whatever. The hon. gentleman's argument does not apply to the case at all.

Mr. CASEY. I think the remarks of the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) are eminently in place. I am unable to criticise the full list of the stocks in which companies are allowed to invest, because the amendment has been sprung upon us and I have not a copy before me. But in looking it over briefly, I notice that electric railways, street railways, and a number of other enterprises the stock of which could eminently be described as speculative stock, are left open to investment; and if it is possible to do the swindling trick described by the Minister of Railways and Canals, it is eminently possible to do it in connection with securities of this kind. I see investments are limited to railways under fifteen miles in length. Well, if the stock of a railway of 200 or 300 miles in length is a speculative investment, I do not see why the stock of a railway less than fifteen miles long should not be just as speculative and as easily manipulated. What I complain of as a member of the House is, not so much the character of the proposed amendments as our inability to ascertain their nature. The Government are not treating the committee, the companies and the country generally properly in springing these amendments on the House. I am neither a shareholder nor a policy-holder in the Canada Life; in fact I have the honour to be connected with a rival company, but of all things we should avoid discussing the business of any company covered by this Act in such a manner as to prejudicially affect its reputation and business. What we should discuss is the list of investments provided for insurance companies by the Government. The Finance Minister has stated that it has been the settled policy of the Government for five or six years to restrict the investments of insurance companies as is now proposed. If it has been so, it must have been their settled policy during this session, and if so, why did not the Government make those proposals before the Committee on Banking and Commerce, to which the Bill was referred? Why not have discussed the changes there after full notice had been given to the companies and parties interested? Why wait until the end of the session, and push through amendments which members have not had an opportunity to consider? Security, as the Finance Minister said, is the first object to be aimed at. Although I am not a shareholder or policy-holder in the company mentioned, as a member of this House I have a right to consider whether the list before us is a safer list than the one now permitted to the Canada Life, for example. The Finance Minister has said it is a safe one. The hon. gentleman, however, says he does not rely on his own judgment, but on that of the Superintendent of Insurance, Mr. Fitzgerald. We are all willing to give that gentleman credit for what ability he possesses, although some of us may not know what ability he does possess. But it is disrespectful to the House to bring down a list after the committee has finished with the Bill, and ask this House to accept amendments on the ipse dixit of Mr. Fitzgerald. It appears these amendments are not submitted by the First Minister or the Finance Minister, but by Mr. Fitzgerald, because the First Minister has admitted that they are not his own amendments. I think the representatives of the different companies, and the public generally, should have due notice of the changes proposed before they should be allowed to go into effect. The least that should be done under the circumstances would be to refer the Bill back to the Banking and Commerce Committee for full and impartial consideration on its merits. I cannot say at this minute whether I support or oppose the proposed changes, because I have had no chance to consider them, and on that ground we should not be called upon to pronounce an opinion on them at the present time. In regard to the Canada Life Company, the point arises as to how far this House has the right to interfere with the charter of that company. It may be we are wiser than Parliament was forty-eight years ago, but whether we have the right to take away vested privileges is another question. Even if so, it is questionable whether we should exercise it. This Bill had better be reconsidered by the committee, and it should be referred back to it, or if the Government do not see their way to take that step the debate should be adjourned, so that hon. members may have time to consider it before they are called on to pronounce judgment.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I hope the Bill will be referred back to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. This is a very important matter. It is very desirable that the Government should strictly uphold any legislation they enact for the security of life insurance companies and policy-holders, and in every step they take in that direction I shall be very happy to support them. But here is a case in which a company interested has carried on business for a long time, has worked up a very successful business, has had a very brilliant career, possesses an able staff of directors and officers, and they complain that this change is going to limit their enterprise and lessen their revenue, and if it is going to have that effect, the Government should pause before they start out on any legislation which proposes to do anything detrimental to the welfare of a company so eminent as the Canada Life. It has been in operation for many years, and the success and well-being of the company and the judgment exercised in making investments lead us to believe as policy-holders in the company that their investments are as safe and secure as any investments made under the control of the Government. It is very well for the Government to be paternal, but it is possible to carry the paternal feeling too far, especially in regard to a public institution, conducted on business methods. We should have these institutions well managed; let the Superintendent of Insurance inspect the securities; if any security is defective let him pronounce it to be so, but let the company do business in its own way, and I believe it will make investments as safe as are those prescribed by the state. I contend that the company should not be limited as regards its investments, but that if considered desirable they should be inspected by the superintendent in order that they may be secure to the policy-holders. I do not wish to see any steps taken that will cripple an institution which has had such unbounded success during so many years.

Mr. McMULLEN. I happen to be a policy-holder for a considerable sum in the Canada Life, though perhaps in a little different position from any other hon. member. I also happen to be a stock-holder and director in another company. I have listened to the arguments pro and con, and I must say that I think the amendment is in the right direction, and I am going to support it. Some hon. gentlemen have stated that this is interfering with the private rights of a company which has been existing for some forty-eight years. Well, we interfere with banks every ten years.

Mr. McCARTHY. We reserve the right to do that.

Mr. McMULLEN. And we have just as good a right to reserve the right to interfere with insurance companies, because they are incorporated by this Parliament. We regulate our banking institutions, and we have as good a right to regulate our insurance companies, and the fact that a company has had a charter for forty-eight years does not carry with it any argument that we may not interfere. I endorse, to a large extent the remarks of the Minister of Railways. I believe that the time is not far distant when Parliament will have to interfere in the direction of giving policy-holders, with a paid-up cash value policy, some interest in the management of these companies. Where there is a company such as the Canada Life, having under its control $13,000,000 of money, held by the insignificant sum of $125,000 stock, in my humble opinion, the day is not far distant when Parliament will have to declare that when a policy comes to have a certain cash value, the holder of that policy should have a vote in the election of directors, and in shaping the management of the company. It is unfair that such a very limited amount of stock, which might easily be controlled by one or two men, should leave such an enormous amount of funds which properly belong to policy-holders, at the risk of $125,000 stock. After having listened to the whole argument, I am quite in favour of the amendment.

Mr. McNEILL. I regret very much the somewhat harsh criticisms that have been passed upon my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood). I think some of these criticisms almost went so far as to imply that his statement was not only in point of fact unfair, but that it was wilfully unfair. For my part, I can say that I think that any one who has had the privilege of the acquaintance of that hon. gentleman, must be well aware that there is no member in this House who is less capable of deliberately making an unfair statement. I do think that this difference of opinion might be amicably settled. I have listened to this discussion with all the care that I could possibly command, and I do not really see why an amicable settlement of the differences between hon. members could not be arranged. In the first place, I think it is very natural that there should be a strong feeling of sympathy in favour of a company that has been for so long a time so successful, and so blameless. I think it is also natural that those who are upholding the cause of this company should ask that there shall be time given to have this motion fully investigated and fully understood, and that the representatives of this company shall have an opportunity of being heard. I cannot see why there should not be a meeting of the Banking and Commerce Committee, even yet before the close of the session, and if that be so, what possible harm can accrue from having the matter discussed there. Why should not this clause of the Bill be referred to that committee as well as the other clauses that have been already considered by it. My hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) said—and it was the only argument I heard addressed to that point at all—that it was useless to refer this clause to the committee, because statements had been made by those who were opposing the clause which implied that nothing that could transpire before the committee would change their views. When the hon. gentleman made that statement he must have overlooked the fact that my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) who moved this amendment, distinctly stated that if this matter were referred to the committee, it was very possible that he would support the proposal of the Government. I do not see why the Government should refuse this reasonable request so that this matter may be carefully investigated in the hope that all parties may be satisfied. If I had heard any argument whatever to show that this would not be done, I would be prepared to support the clause; but until some such argument is advanced I feel disposed to oppose it. Supposing even that there was not time to refer the matter to the committee this session, where is the injury going to accrue to any of the policy-holders by allowing it to stand over until next session.

Mr. McCARTHY. I hope the First Minister will yield; it is now half past one o'clock.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is rather too late to yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. There is no such prime importance in the measure that we should sit up all night to carry it through. Even if we go into the consideration of it, it cannot be done in any reasonable time, and I really do think that the committee should rise. I want to say a word in answer to my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). For my part, I think we ought to be very careful indeed before we interfere with vested rights. The illustration that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) gave us about banks was not at all in point. We merely grant a charter to the banks for ten years, and at the end of ten years they have to ask for renewal, which we may grant on such terms as we think fit. But when a company is incorporated, when money is invested, when 27,000 policy-holders have chosen to go into this company, and many of them, and most of them, I dare say, have gone in because of the very handsome profits they have been paid under the good management of this company, it does appear to me that a case of overwhelming strength should be made out before we interfere at all with vested rights; and nothing of the kind has been made out here. This is merely a suggestion that has occurred to the insurance department during the sitting of the House. The Insurance Bill was introduced in the Senate in the early days of the session; it went through the Senate, was brought down here and read the first and second time, was referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee and was brought back here, and it was not until the 18th of June that this notice was put on the Order Paper. Then, there was no opportunity of circulating it throughout the country. Of course, the insurance companies became aware of it; but they are not alone interested in it. They are merely the trustees for the stockholders. The people interested in this change are the policy-holders, and they certainly have a right to ascertain the legislation going on in this House, which is supposed to be in their interest. I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion that the committee rise negatived: yeas, 35; nays, 70.

Mr. CASEY. I would like an explanation as to why the securities of water and gas companies, electric railway and power companies, street railway companies, and so on, are considered better than those which are excluded, such as railway bonds?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. From experience they are found to be less precarious.

Mr. CASEY. We do not know a great deal about the stock of electric companies, as they have only been in existence a few years.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is their debentures.

Mr. CASEY. Street railways are included here. These are sometimes very successful, but I have known of street railway companies which have come signally to grief. I should like to know whether this is a line of security better than those excluded. I do not see that street railway companies in general are at all better security than steam railway companies.

• Mr. McNEILL.

Mr. McCARTHY. Why is it that the bonds or debentures of steam railway companies are not admitted to be good security while those of street railway companies are supposed to be good? There must be some reason for the inclusion of the one and the exclusion of the other.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We think that steam railways are more precarious in the sense of running the risk of general trade throughout the country and adjoining countries. In discussing the objections which the companies had to the severe restrictions that were in the clause as printed, we endeavoured to reconcile our views with theirs, and we felt that the list of securities we have embodied in the amendment now before the committee is satisfactory to them all, except to the Canada Life Company, as regards its claim to vested rights.

Mr. CASEY. The clause referring to electric railways limits them to fifteen miles in length. Under that limitation, investments in the Toronto electric railway will be excluded, and that is one of the best paying railways.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. All street railways are included, but to avoid misunderstanding, I move that the clause reads as follows :—

Street railway companies, electric light or power companies, electric railway companies, when the line does not exceed fifteen miles in length, although not merely street railways.

Mr. CASEY. Does that mean all street railways, however operated and without limit of length?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

On section 2.

Mr. McCARTHY. Is that to permit the company to make loans? It does not appear to me, on a hasty reading, to apply to anything but the debts of the company, or judgments recovered. That seems to require some consideration.

On section 5,

Mr. CASEY. Does the hon. Minister think it wise to limit the amount of investment in foreign securities when the company wishes to establish a foreign branch?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, I think so. You know we have allowed investments in the United States securities and State securities

Mr. CASEY. But I am speaking of the amount. The clause that has just been read, as I heard it, says that the total amount shall not exceed $100,000.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It seems necessary to have some limit to the amount.

Mr. CASEY. Why?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Otherwise we have no control over the value of foreign securities. We allow not only all that is necessary, but all that is desirable where the company has a foreign branch.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister does not know that he allows all that may be desirable. On what ground does the hon. Minister think it desirable to limit the amount to $100,000. Suppose the company should think it desirable to invest three or four hundred thousand, and suppose they could make larger profit by doing so, why should they be prevented?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). If the hon. gentleman—

Mr. CASEY. I am asking the hon. Minister.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). But I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the first clause where power is given to invest to any amount in securities of the United Kingdom or the United States.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman does not understand my point. I am not speaking of the nature of the investment, but of the amount of the investment that can legally be made.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). It has always been limited to the amount necessary under the laws of the foreign country to enable the company to do business in that country.

Mr. CASEY. But some of the companies claim that it might be desirable, in order to give them a better standing and to enable them to do business on better terms to allow them to invest larger amounts.

Mr. McCARTHY. Make it $200,000—$100,000 is a mere bagatelle in the investment of the funds of an insurance company.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). This is all the company asks.

Mr. CASEY. Perhaps the hon. Minister can answer my question now. I can understand the limitation as to the quality of investments, but I cannot see why the company should be limited to the investment of $100,000 in a foreign country if more can be profitably invested there.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. So as to keep the investments under the control of Parliament.

Mr. CASEY. But the investments of the company as to their amount should not be subject to the control of Parliament. The investment as to quality may be and should be, but not as to the amount. The object of parliamentary control as to the quality of the investment is the security of the shareholder and the policy-holder. But if the company find that it will pay them better to invest $200,000 in a foreign country than to invest $100,000, I do not see why this Parliament should interfere or meddle with the purely business management of the company. Nor do I see how the limitation of the amount keeps the investment more under control of this House. Of course we have no control over these investments in a foreign country. After all said and done, I do not know how you are going to enforce this clause. Will you deprive a company of its license if they invest more than $100,000 in a foreign country? How would the amount of investments be controlled?

Mr. FOSTER. They have to make their returns.

Mr. CASEY. What will you do to them if they invest more than $100,000 abroad?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is a penalty of so much for each offence against the Act.

Mr. CASEY. The question is, why should a company which finds it profitable and desirable to make investments abroad to the extent of more than $100,000, be prevented from doing so?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We think that there should be a parliamentary restriction upon the amount as well as upon the quality of foreign securities.

On section 17,

Mr. McCARTHY. Does this prevent an insurance company from investing in real estate?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Bill reported.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 162) to consolidate and amend the Act respecting land in the Territories—(Mr. Daly.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 2.05 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 13th July, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MR. TURCOTTE, M.P.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier) moved that the fourth report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, be now adopted. He said: We have had six or seven sittings of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate this matter, and we have come to the conclusion that the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Turcotte) was not guilty in the manner and form charged by the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau). Three motions were made before the committee, the first one to acquit Mr. Turcotte; the second one to convict him, and the third one that no decision be arrived at until the court had pronounced upon the penal suits taken against Mr. Turcotte before the ordinary courts of the province of Quebec. This last proposition was rejected, as was also the second one, and the first proposition, acquitting Mr. Turcotte, was adopted. I now move that this first proposition, that is to say, the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, be now adopted. I do not intend to offer many remarks in support of the report. As I understand the Act of Independence, I find that no member of Parliament should have a contract with the Government, or on behalf of the Government, directly or indirectly, or through the interposition of a trustee or any other person. I find, also, that no member of Parliament should execute any contract with the Government, or on behalf of the Government, directly or indirectly, or through the interposition of a trustee or a third person. Therefore, a member of Parliament must be very careful not to come within either of these two cases. Now, let us see, in the first place, whether the hon. member for Montmorency has been proved to have had a contract with the Government. My contention is that a member cannot be supposed to have a contract, or to execute a contract, with the Government, or on behalf of the Government, directly or indirectly, unless there is some kind of action or intervention on the part of the member with the Government. For instance, a man may have a contract with the Government and a member may intervene in order to secure its execution, by himself directly or indirectly, or through the interposition of a third person; but there must be a personal intervention by the member, either to obtain the contract or to obtain its execution. The evidence is not very voluminous, two witnesses only were examined, Provost and Larose, who were supposed to be the principal contractors, Mr. Provost for the provisions and groceries supplied to the citadel of Quebec, and Mr. Larose for provisions supplied to the Marine Department in the city of Quebec. Mr. Provost says that he tendered in good faith to the Government to obtain this contract. He says, moreover:

I was bound to execute that contract, and if Mr. Turcotte had not supplied me with goods, I would have been obliged to get them somewhere else.

And here is something more. You will find on page 14 that Mr. Provost is asked about a letter which the hon. member for Montmorency laid before this House when the charge was made against himself, and which has been proved before the committee. He says:

Q. Does the letter you wrote to 'L'Événement' contain the truth?—A. A part, probably.

Q. What part does not contain the truth ?

WITNESS.—Will you please return me the letter.
(Witness reads the letter.)

—A. It is the truth.

Q. Then your letters contained the whole truth ?

—A. Yes.

Now, that letter says :

Having been confined to the house for seven or eight days by a rather serious illness, I was unable until yesterday to see the parliamentary correspondence which appeared in 'L'Electeur' on the 16th April last.

You will please notice that this letter was written by Mr. Provost of his own movement, without any solicitation on the part of Mr. Turcotte. The letter continues :

In that correspondence it is stated that Mr. A. J. Turcotte, M.P., had secured for Mr. Provost, his partner, the contract for furnishing groceries to the citadel, and that after the dissolution of the firm of Turcotte & Provost, I had claimed the profits of the contract, something like $1,600.

I desire to state here that I secured that contract in the regular way by tender, and that at the time when I secured it, I was not a member of the firm of Turcotte & Provost. Moreover, in view of the fact that just then I had no longer a store at my disposal, I made arrangements with the Turcotte firm for the delivery of my goods.

As to the other assertion of your correspondent that I was to have $1,600 from Mr. Turcotte for the fulfilment of my contract, it is entirely erroneous. I did not make any such claim, and I had no occasion to do so, for I was paid personally by the Government, by cheques to my order.

Sir, I believe that the charges brought against Mr. Turcotte, so far as the citadel is concerned, are not proved. As regards the charge concerning the provisions supplied to the Marine Department, it has been almost generally conceded in the committee that there was no proof made. Mr. Larose says most emphatically that he secured the contract himself. It was perfectly understood at the beginning that Mr. Turcotte was not bound to give him the goods, and Mr. Turcotte said to him : "You may get the goods for the Marine Department at my store, if you like, or you may get them anywhere you please." Inferences might be drawn from some of Mr. Provost's answers. For instance, he was asked : "Why was the contract placed in your name ?" And Mr. Provost answered : "Mr. Turcotte could not contract in his own name." Then he is asked ; "Did Mr. Turcotte contract in the name of another man ? A. Nothing of the kind." Such a conclusion cannot be drawn from the answers of the witness, and I do not think it is our duty to judge this case by inferences. For my part I am willing to support the report of the committee, although I have some doubts in my mind. But in this case we are called upon to apply strictly a penal law, and as the benefit of the doubt must be given to the accused, I am willing to give him the benefit of that doubt.

I wish to call the attention of the House to a matter of very great importance, which was discussed to a certain extent in the committee. This case is pending before the courts of justice, and of course it is not necessary that we should wait for the courts of justice to pronounce on it. But what might be the consequence ? This Parliament might take one view and the courts of justice a different view, and this leads me to refer to the remarks which I made in moving the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in 1891 respecting Mr. Thomas McGreevy, and the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin). With the permission of the House I will quote what I said on that occasion, as my observations apply with equal force to the present case :

I ask whether the committee, having a history of this kind, in which almost every serious charge that comes before it seems to be decided by a party vote—honestly it is true, I do not pretend to accuse the other side of acting dishonestly more than I do this side, we all have our predilections—but it is time to consider, when the honour of a member of the House and the honour of his family are concerned, whether we should not adopt a tribunal which would give a guarantee of greater justice to the party concerned. I heard an objection made by an hon. member of the sub-committee that it would be unfair for us to divest ourselves of jurisdiction in a case of this kind. We have already divested ourselves of our jurisdiction in regard to the very existence of this House. At one time election petitions were always tried before a Committee on Privileges and Elections, but it was thought the ends of justice would be better attained if these cases were brought before the courts of justice, and I say that justice would be better rendered if such grave charges as these were brought before a court of justice. I think the constitution ought to be amended in that respect, not to destroy the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but to give this House power to refer any such charge to the Exchequer Court, with an appeal to the Supreme Court.

Perhaps it would not be wise to refer all cases affecting the seat of a member to the courts of justice. There may be cases when the dignity of the House is so much at stake that we cannot divest ourselves of our jurisdiction ; but I contend, and I specially call the attention of the leader of the Government to this case, and I hope that between the present time and the next session he will prepare a Bill to remedy the evil, that in cases of the violation of the Independence of Parliament Act the moment the charge is made it should be referred to the Exchequer Court, with an appeal to the Supreme Court. I move that the report be adopted.

Mr. EDGAR. Before this motion is adopted, I desire to offer a few remarks on this subject. It might be inferred from the short and very simple statement made by the hon. gentleman who moved the adoption of the report that this case is of a very simple character. It is not a complicated case to my mind, either on questions of fact or on questions of law. There were only two witnesses practically examined, and their evidence has been printed and distributed among members of the House, and they were uncontradicted. So there was no dispute as to the facts. What as to the law? I think the law on the subject is as plain as statutes can well make it. I shall first refer to the legal position of the question, and then I shall see how the facts bear upon the law, and the law upon the facts. By section 10 of the Independence of Parliament Act it is provided that :

No person, directly or indirectly, alone or with another, by himself or by the interposition of any trustee or third party, holding or enjoying, making or executing any contract or agreement expressed or implied with or for the Government of Canada, on behalf of the Crown, or with or for any of the officers of the Government of Canada, for which any public money of Canada is to be paid, shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons, or shall sit or vote in the same House.

As to that section I think the House will find, when the evidence is considered, that language could not be drawn to-day more aptly suiting the case which we have before us than the language of that clause. Then we have another section which also has a bearing on this case, and if there could be any possible loophole out of which the hon. member for Montmorency could crawl under section 10, he could fall under the provisions of section 12, which says :

If any member of the House of Commons occupies any office or commission or is concerned or interested in any contract, agreement, service or work, by section 9 or 10 of the Act rendering such candidate incapable of taking his seat and voting in the House of Commons, or knowingly sells goods, wares or merchandise to or performs any service for the Government of Canada or for any of the officers of the Government of Canada, by which any public money of Canada is paid, whether such contract, agreement or sale is expressed or implied and whether the contract is single or continuous, the seat of the member shall be vacated and the election shall be thenceforth null and void.

These are the two sections under which this charge would fall in order that the House might find the seat of the member for Montmorency (Mr. Turcotte) to have been vacated. But there is another section in the same statute which has a bearing on this case, and which shows the intention of the Legislature in this enactment. It is section 16, which I quote as follows :—

In every contract, agreement or commission to be made, entered into or accepted by any person by the Government of Canada or any of the departments or officers of the Government of Canada, there shall be inserted an express condition that no member of the House of Commons shall be admitted to any share or part of such contract, agreement or commission, or to any benefit to arise therefrom.

Mr. EDGAR.

In case of such a contract being signed and carried out there is a penalty of $2,000 attached. This section would have applied to Mr. Turcotte if the Government had done its duty and drawn, according to law, the contract which Mr. Turcotte would have signed. Mr. Provost would have rested under a penalty of $2,000 for having admitted a member to a share or part of such contract. The Government did not so draw the contract, and therefore this section is quoted by me only as showing the general scope and tendency of that legislation. To apply the law to the facts, I would refer first to what seems to me the only point that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) made in moving the adoption of the report. He said that it was disproved by the evidence that Mr. Turcotte had interfered between Mr. Provost and the Government with regard to this contract. When the hon. gentleman made that statement he must have forgotten that it was proved in evidence that as regards the first contract which Mr. Provost said was carried out by Mr. Turcotte, Mr. Turcotte in his own handwriting filled in the blanks in the contract. The hon. gentleman has forgotten, and it is beyond question that each of the three contracts for the Militia Department which are in question, were filled, executed and carried out, and the goods delivered by Mr. Turcotte. Is not that interfering between Mr. Provost and the Government? And more than that, the evidence shows beyond question that every cent of the money that was paid for these three contracts, either went into the firm of which Mr. Turcotte and Mr. Provost were partners, or went entirely and solely into Mr. Turcotte's own pocket. And is not that interfering in these matters between the Government and Mr. Provost? If not, I do not know what is.

Mr. AMYOT. Was Mr. Turcotte a member of the House in 1891?

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Turcotte was not a member when he signed that application.

Mr. AMYOT. When he signed it?

Mr. EDGAR. When he filled it in, in November, 1891; but under that application which he filled in in his own handwriting he carried out the contract with the Government, because he became a member in March, 1892, and that contract covered the whole of the year 1892, and that is the first contract in question in this matter, and that is why I refer to it. He was, of course, ineligible for election at the time, and he has been ineligible ever since. The House will understand that the contracts which the member for Montmorency (Mr. Turcotte) is alleged to be interested in, were, as far as I am going to discuss them or move in this subject, contracts with the Militia Department for the supply of groceries and provisions for the citadel at Quebec, during the years 1892, 1893 and up to the 1st of April, 1894. The evidence shows that Mr. Turcotte was in partnership with Mr. Provost for ten years prior to the 2nd of February, 1893, doing a grocery business in the city of Quebec. Their interests were equal in the partnership, and that partnership was going on when Mr. Turcotte was elected to the House of Commons in March, 1892. That firm was fulfilling the Government contract for the supply of groceries to the Quebec citadel at that time. The contract, it is true, was standing in the name of Mr. Provost. Mr. Turcotte had, no doubt, good reasons for having it so, because he had been an unsuccessful candidate in 1891, and an election petition was pending, and a vacancy was anticipated, and Mr. Turcotte was a candidate early in the year 1892, and was elected. When he ran for the constituency his firm was doing business with the Government under that contract which stood in the name of one of the partners. It might just as well have been in the name of both, because it was for the benefit of the whole firm, and so it continued for the benefit of the whole firm until the dissolution of that firm by deed, under date 2nd of February, 1893. That there may be no doubt of these statements which I make, I would refer hon. gentlemen to the deed of dissolution of partnership, 2nd of February, 1893, exhibit 102, page 16 of the evidence. On page 11 of the evidence, Mr. Provost was asked :

Q. What was Mr. Turcotte's share in that business?—A. The half, we each had half.

There is, therefore, no doubt on that point. On page 8 of the evidence we find : that the tender for that year was signed by Mr. Larose on behalf of Mr. Provost. Mr. Provost does not repudiate the signature of his clerk, Mr. Larose, and so we will have to assume that Mr. Provost had it properly signed. That tender was sent in to the department (tender exhibit 26) under date 30th November, 1891, and Mr. Provost says at page 9 of the evidence :

Q. Do you know by whom it is written?—A. It is in the handwriting of Mr. Larose; the body of the paper is by Mr. Turcotte.

Now, that tender, as will be seen by page 9 of the evidence, was accepted on account of the department by Col. Panet, and it was carried out by the firm. The goods were supplied by the firm in the usual way, and as you will see at page 9 and 10 of the evidence, official cheques of the Militia Department were issued in the name of Mr. Provost, who was the nominal contractor, and they were endorsed by "Turcotte & Provost," the name of the firm, and they were deposited in the Merchants' Bank as Mr. Provost says : because we did business with that bank. The question is asked :

Q. Who furnished the groceries and provisions—in short all the supplies to be furnished under the contract for the year 1893?—A. It was always the firm.

Now, these cheques which were made to the order of Mr. Provost, and endorsed by him to the order of the firm of Turcotte & Provost, were sometimes endorsed by the firm name by Mr. Turcotte himself. At page 10 the question is asked :

Q. Here is one—and there are several others like it—which is endorsed under your endorsement, by Turcotte & Provost?—A. Yes.

Q. In whose writing is that endorsement?—A. It is Mr. Turcotte's writing.

Q. Mr. Turcotte, the member for Montmorency?—A. Yes.

There were several other cheques, all endorsed, "Turcotte & Provost," in the handwriting of Mr. Turcotte. Mr. Turcotte, we see, was a partner in the firm. The groceries were supplied by the firm, the moneys were deposited by the firm, and the cheques were endorsed by the firm. Now let us see who got the benefit of these. At page 11, the question is asked :

Q. Whilst the firm of Turcotte & Provost existed, where did the money received under these cheques go to? for whom was it received?—A. The money was received for the firm, and used by the firm, like any other money.

Can there be any question about that? It is not disputed or contradicted. If there should be any doubt as to whether Mr. Provost's evidence was correct on that point, we have at page 27 the evidence of Mr. Larose, who was managing clerk for the firm of Turcotte & Provost :

Q. There are here a number of cheques of the year 1891; will you look through them in a general way, and say if you recognize them? (The witness looks over the cheques.)—A. Yes.

Q. You have looked over these Government official cheques for the year 1892, payable to J. B. Provost?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know whether these cheques were deposited to the credit of Turcotte & Provost?—A. We used to deposit them in the Merchants' Bank to the credit of Turcotte & Provost.

Q. And these cheques were, in fact, so deposited?—A. Yes.

Q. All of them?—A. Yes; they are all marked at the Merchants' Bank.

Q. Were they deposited to the general account of the firm?—A. I do not know of any special account.

Q. Were they deposited to the private account of J. B. Provost?—A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. You were the manager of the firm?—A. Yes.

There we have it proved beyond question that during that whole partnership period one member of the firm had that contract in his name, that the firm supplied the goods, the firm drew the money, and the firm used the money for firm purposes. That part of the case is absolutely proved; it is not contradicted; there is no reflection or suggestion upon it. And will any one say that that is not a case falling within the statute? Will any one say that Mr. Turcotte did not directly or indirectly, alone or with any other, by himself or by the interposition of any trustee or third party, hold or enjoy, undertake or execute, any contract or agreement with the Government for which any public money of Canada was to be paid? Why, the language of the statute fits this case exactly. The contract was in the name of one of the partners. In that case, you hardly require to call him a trustee or a third party; he was one of the firm itself. Mr. Turcotte might as well have held the contract in his own name or in the name of the whole firm; he would have had no greater interest in it and been no more responsible for it. And still, the majority of the committee considers that this is not a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act. Then, look at section 12 of the Act, which provides that if he is concerned or interested in any contract of that kind, he is ineligible and liable to have his seat vacated. Then, it goes further: or if he knowingly sells any goods, wares or merchandise to the Government of Canada, for which public money is paid or to be paid, he is ineligible and disqualified. Why, what case could the Act apply to if it does not apply to this case? Well, the partnership ceased. There is a deed of dissolution of the partnership. Exhibit 105 shows that Mr. Provost went out on the 2nd of February, 1893, and that Mr. Turcotte became the sole member of that firm, which was called Turcotte, Provost & Co. from that time forward. There are some documents put in relating to that change in the business. Exhibit 104, at page 17, shows that Mr. Provost sold out the whole of his interest in that grocery business to Mr. Turcotte. He made no reservations or exceptions; he sold the stock-in-trade and all interest that he had in the business of the firm for a consideration of $12,000, which appears to have been paid, or for the payment of which provision appears to have been made; and one would suppose that this Government contract which the old firm was enjoying would naturally go to Mr. Turcotte with the other business of the firm. But the hon. gentleman will say that that contract was not the firm business, but Mr. Provost's own business. Then I would ask, did Mr. Provost keep that contract which was standing in his own name when he dissolved this partnership and went out of business in Quebec altogether? No, Sir, he did not keep that contract; he had nothing more to do with it; but he produces a document, signed by Mr. Turcotte, of the same date as the date of the deed of dissolution, the 2nd of February, 1893, which was a very important bearing on the case after that period. The document is exhibit 2, at page 4:

QUEBEC, 2nd February, 1893.

I hereby undertake to pay to Jean Baptiste Provost the sum of four hundred dollars a year, from the first of January, 1894, on condition that the contract be awarded to Mr. Provost, and failing the said contract I undertake to pay him but three hundred dollars a year from the said date, and conditioned, of course, on my business being prosperous.
Mr. EDGAR.

A. J. TURCOTTE.

The words, "the contract," there are possibly meant to be mysterious; but Mr. Provost, who produced this document, was asked:

Q. What is the contract alluded to in the document you have just read?—A. I had only that contract; I do not see that there was any other; I had only that contract for furnishing supplies to the citadel; I think it is a contract for furnishing provisions to the citadel that is alluded to.

Q. What is the contract for the citadel? What was it for?—A. The contract to supply supplies and provisions to the troops.

So he identifies it as that contract for which he was to get a consideration from Mr. Turcotte. Now, we have a little further explanation about that mysterious agreement of the 2nd of February. At page 11, the question is asked:

Q. After the dissolution of partnership, whether it was in 1892 or 1893, to whom did the moneys go which were paid in fulfilment of these contracts for the citadel?—A. I handed over each month the cheques to Mr. Turcotte; but all I myself got is what is stated in the document marked exhibit 2.

That document is the contract, signed by Turcotte.—

Q. How did you get the sum mentioned in exhibit 2—that is to say, the sum of $400; did you deduct it from some of the cheques or how did you get it?—A. I got Mr. Turcotte's cheque for $400.

Q. But why did Mr. Turcotte give you the $400?—A. Mr. Turcotte was to pay me $300 a year for the good-will of the business.

Q. And as to the other $100 included in the $400, what were they for?—A. He paid me $100 over; there was no further understanding than that, when he gave that document which he had agreed upon, $300.

Q. But apart from the $100 you have just mentioned, did you receive yourself, directly or indirectly, any part of the moneys arising from the fulfilment of the contracts for the citadel?—A. No.

Q. Neither in 1892 nor 1893?—A. No.

Then we have some more information on the point, at page 13:

Q. In 1894 I see you got the contract?—A. Yes.

Q. You said a while ago that it was not you that carried out the contract. Why is the contract in your name when it was Mr. Turcotte who performed it?—A. Because I considered myself bound by the paper now on file.

Then at page 8 we have more references to this exhibit 2. The witness said:

Q. These documents are signed "J. B. Provost." I want to know who J. B. Provost is?—A. It is I.

Q. Was it you wrote that signature "J. B. Provost"?—A. I have not as yet seen any of my own; I am looking over them.

Q. You stated a while ago that you kept a grocery store at Quebec?—A. Yes.

Q. Since what date?—A. Since the 15th March, 1894.

It appears that Mr. Turcotte went out of business in Quebec for about thirteen months and then returned to business again.

Q. Is that grocery store far from Mr. Turcotte's store?—A. No, it is but a short distance.

Q. How does it happen that it was not you who performed the contract which was in your name, when you had a grocery store. Was it because you could not do, or because you did not want to do it?—A. Because I considered myself bound by my contract, that is to say, that I was not to furnish the goods.

Q. Bound to whom?—A. To Mr. Turcotte.

Then at page 8 we have more references to this exhibit 2. The witness said :

I used to give the cheques to Mr. Turcotte and he put them to his credit.

Q. Why did you give him the cheques?—A. I did not consider that they were my property.

Q. But why did you not consider them your property? The cheques were made to your order and they were sent to you?—A. I have handed in a certain document here which shows the reason why; and I had an undertaking with Mr. Turcotte, and could not claim from Mr. Turcotte more than what is stated in that document itself.

Q. What were you to receive?—A. What is stated in the document, nothing more.

Q. Who was to get the remainder of the moneys paid for the fulfilment of the contract, over and above the $400?—A. I have told you that I gave the whole amount to Mr. Turcotte.

Q. Was there any contract or arrangement between you and Mr. Turcotte, as to the fulfilment of the contract with the Government or the Militia Department for the supplies to be furnished to the citadel?—A. No contract other than the document I have handed in.

It is pretty clear what the arrangement was. We have the arrangement not only carried out, but the documentary evidence proving what it was. Whether Mr. Provost was a partner of Mr. Turcotte or not, while he was a partner he only got a half interest. When he went out of business, Mr. Turcotte got the whole benefit of the contract standing in his name and supplied the goods. But when Mr. Provost came back to business in Quebec and had a grocery store of his own, he got no benefit from the contract and supplied no goods under it, though it was standing in his name. Mr. Turcotte supplied the goods and got all the money. In the report which is laid before us, it is suggested that Mr. Turcotte could have had no beneficial interest in this contract after the dissolution of the firm after the 2nd February, 1893, because on that date a deed appears to be signed by Mr. Provost transferring to Mr. Larose, not to Mr. Turcotte, all his interests under the Government contract. That is seriously claimed as a reason why the committee should exonerate Mr. Turcotte. Well, I propose to the House that we should discard that instrument altogether, except as an evidence of the fraudulent attempt to conceal and cover up this whole transaction. That instrument is exhibit 108, page 21 of the evidence. That is duly executed before a notary by Mr. Provost and Mr. Larose, and purports to transfer the contracts with the Militia Department for the furnishing of groceries from Mr. Provost to Larose. Mr. Turcotte's name is not mentioned in it. Now, the consideration in dollars and cents in that transfer is not given. It merely says, for valuable consideration. Now, let us see what Mr. Provost says about that pretended contract :

Q. I just want to know, purely and simply from you, whether it was you that signed that deed?—A. Yes; a power of attorney was prepared for me and I signed it.

Q. You signed that deed?—A. Yes; that was the deed I was made to sign.

Q. Who made you sign it?—A. I was made to give a power of attorney to Mr. Larose. I remember nothing but the power of attorney. I remember having given a power of attorney to Mr. Larose, and of that power of attorney Mr. Larose has a copy. Before saying that I signed the one which is now here, I should much like to see the other.

Q. Do you remember, about the date of the dissolution of your partnership with Mr. Turcotte, having sold your rights in the contract for supply in the citadel to O. E. Larose?—A. I do not remember that.

Q. Did the Mr. Larose who is mentioned in this deed No. 108 give you anything as payment, or did he give you any consideration whatever for the purchase of the contract you had with the Government for supplying the citadel?—A. No.

That is Mr. Provost's recollection. Now, what of Mr. Larose, the other party to the deed? At page 25 of the evidence it will be seen that Mr. Larose testified :

Q. Be good enough to examine exhibit No. 108 and say whether you recognize it?—A. I remember well having signed this document, but I do not remember precisely all its contents; it may have been read to me at the time and I may have signed it and still not remember now what the deed contains.

Q. At whose request did you sign it?—A. I went to the office of the notary, Mr. Charlebois, and there met Messrs. Arthur Turcotte and J. B. Provost, who had previously reached the place.

Q. What Mr. Turcotte?—A. Mr. A. J. Turcotte.

Q. The member for Montmorency?—A. Yes; and Mr. Jean Baptiste Provost. They were there to execute the deed of dissolution of the firm and I went there to get a power of attorney from Mr. Turcotte, for his business and at the same time that I signed my power of attorney, I signed exhibit 108.

Q. Then who asked you to sign exhibit 108?—A. I cannot say whether it was Mr. Turcotte, Mr. Provost or Mr. Charlebois that read the document to me and asked me to sign it.

Q. Were you told at the time, by Mr. Turcotte or Mr. Provost, why you were asked to sign that document?—A. No.

Q. You are sure that you are the O. E. Larose therein mentioned?—A. Yes.

Q. The J. B. Provost therein mentioned is the J. B. Provost that was examined before this committee?—A. Yes.

Q. I see it is stated in this document that Mr. J. B. Provost sold you the rights he held in a contract with the Militia Department for furnishing supplies and provisions, &c., for the citadel—I mean exhibit 108—and for a good and sufficient consideration. Did you give anything to Mr. J. B. Provost at the time?

Then the chairman, interrupting, said :

Q. What was the consideration you gave to Mr. J. B. Provost for transferring the contract to you?

—A. I never had anything with Mr. Provost.

By Mr. Langelier :

Q. Did you give him money or other consideration?—I paid nothing to Mr. Provost.

Now, I can show not only that the parties who signed that did not know what they were signing, that they did not know its contents, that no consideration whatever was given, but also that it was never carried out in any single respect.

Q. After the pretended sale set out in exhibit No. 108, that is to say, the sale to you of the contract with the Militia Department, by J. B. Provost, who carried out that contract?—A. The firm of Turcotte, Provost & Co.

Q. Of whom was that firm composed?—A. Of Mr. Turcotte, I think.

Q. Of which Mr. Turcotte?—A. Mr. A. J. Turcotte.

Q. The member for Montmorency?—A. Yes.

Q. Was it Mr. Turcotte who furnished the goods?—A. Yes.

Q. The member for Montmorency?—A. Yes.

Q. After that, to whom were moneys derived from the fulfilment of the contract paid?—A. The cheques came to the store.

Q. Were the cheques to the order of J. B. Provost?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know whether the contract was submitted to and recognized by the department?—A. I do not know.

Q. But you remember that the cheques were made payable to the order of J. B. Provost?—A. No.

Q. Did Mr. Provost retain these cheques himself? Did he deposit them to his credit?—A. No.

Q. Then he received the money derived from the cheques and the cheques remained in the store; or the proceeds of the cheques, and that was deposited in the name of the firm of Turcotte, Provost & Co.?—A. Yes.

Q. You were at that time in the employ of the firm?—A. Yes.

Q. What position did you hold?—A. I was manager.

—and so on. Then the question was asked Mr. Larose—page 31 :

Q. Then, why was the contract transferred in that way by the deed?—A. I cannot give any other explanation; I do not know myself.

Now, I think, therefore, we can assume that not only was that transfer from Mr.

Mr. EDGAR.

Provost to Mr. Turcotte's clerk, Mr. Larose, intended to be a blind, but it was never carried out, the department was never notified. It was executed, but no consideration was paid for it, neither of the parties to it understood it, the contract was fulfilled just as before by Mr. Turcotte, and the money was received by Mr. Turcotte himself, who was not a party to this deed. It was intended to be a blind; it was an abortive attempt to make a blind, and instead of being a defence for Mr. Turcotte it aggravates his case immensely by showing the attempts at deception that were made throughout this matter to keep from the Government, or at least from Parliament, the fact that he was a Government contractor. Now, what does this proposed report suggest as to the grounds of defence? Let me read the first clause in this report, and let the House, after the evidence which I have quoted, understand what sort of defence it is :

Whereas the said Provost has sworn and established by documentary evidence that he had in good faith tendered for and obtained such a contract, relating to the Militia Department for the years 1892, '93, '94.

"In good faith" he tendered for and obtained this contract. Why, Mr. Speaker, that is a play upon words of the most childish kind. We know what kind of faith it was from the evidence. We know why it was done; we know what the intention was from the results. Where is that expression "good faith" obtained? Sir, it is obtained in the evidence, page 13. I know that, because I had the benefit of hearing that explained to the committee by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). The question was asked Mr. Provost :

Will you say why you made the tender in your own name in the place of making it in the name of Turcotte & Provost, or Turcotte & Co.?—A. Because Mr. Turcotte, being unable to have the contract in his name, it was made in my name.

That was what he meant by good faith, according to his notion of good faith. Honour among thieves, perhaps, but it was his notion of good faith. Then the Solicitor General asked :

Did you act in good faith in that matter?—A. It was in good faith; like the cheques I returned to the firm.

That is the kind of good faith. He tendered in good faith because Mr. Turcotte could not tender in his own name, and it was in good faith because it was "like the cheques I returned to the firm." The cheques came to his own name, and in good faith, and to keep good faith with Turcotte, he handed the cheques to Turcotte who put them in his pocket.

In making your tender, did you act in good faith?—A. Yes.

Of course he did, and that is the kind of good faith, stated in the report, which we are asked to confirm on the subject of that contract. Then we are asked to say that Mr. Provost has carried out and executed these three contracts of 1892, 1893, and 1894. Does any man in this House believe that Provost had carried out and executed those three contracts with the department? He did not carry out one, except that during the first year he was a member of the firm that carried it out. But, worse than that, the committee asked this House to say that Mr. Provost received in pay departmental cheques to his order, and then it stops there, implying that he got that money. Why, Sir, is not that almost an insult to the House—to ask us to stop there, when every hon. member of the House who has looked at the evidence knows perfectly well that that is only a half truth which suggests a falsehood? We know that Mr. Provost received, in payment, departmental cheques to his order, but every single one of them he endorsed over, and did not receive a dollar of it himself from beginning to end. Then the report says it does not appear that Mr. Turcotte, in any way, interfered between him and the Government. Why, he interfered throughout; he took the whole business out of Provost's hands, and Mr. Provost did not conduct it at all. Then it goes on to say that Provost had not liberty to dispose of his contracts in the way he pleased and grant sub-contracts to whom he chose, he alone having the obligation to fulfil his contract with the Government. Now, as to his being at liberty to dispose of his contracts in the way he pleased, that is certainly not so, because exhibit 2 shows that he was under contract, and all his evidence shows that he considered he was under contract with Turcotte to let him have the whole benefit of the business as he did; and therefore, as between Turcotte and Provost, Provost was never, for one instant, at liberty to dispose of his contracts in the way he pleased, and also to grant sub-contracts to whom he pleased. We have had no evidence of that. He was acting in good faith, he said, with Turcotte, and how could he grant a sub-contract? He gives a reason: "He alone was under obligation to fulfil his contracts with the Government." Now, I will admit that he assumed an obligation to the Government to fulfil that contract, he was bound to fulfil that contract; but I say that Mr. Turcotte, as a partner of his during the partnership, was also bound to fulfil that contract with the Government; and afterwards when Provost acted alone for Turcotte, Turcotte was an undisclosed principal, and he was also liable to the Government under that contract, according to law, when the Government found out that he was the principal under that contract. Why, Sir, there must be an idea running through this paragraph that because Mr. Turcotte had not signed a contract with his own hand with the Government, he would not be liable for violation of the Act. He did the work, he received the money, yet he would not be liable. Well, Sir, I admit that something very like that was held some years ago to be law, under an old statute in Canada, which was similar to this; that was the law as laid down in the old Russell case, but that is not the law of Parliament now, and has not been since 1877. In the report on the Anglin case, in the appendices to the Journals of 1877, this was the unanimous report of the committee, which was unanimously adopted by the House, and I would like the attention of the House to this point, because I think it bears upon this case:

That it appears from the evidence before the committee that the Hon. T. W. Anglin, since he has been elected a member of this House, has fulfilled various orders given by public officers for the insertion in his newspaper, the St. John 'Freeman,' of advertisements in connection with the public service, and various orders given by the post office inspector, under the instructions of the Postmaster General for the printing of forms required for the Post Office Department, and has received public moneys for such advertisements and printing.

We might say in place of that, that Mr. Turcotte has executed orders for work in the Marine Department, and he has received payment for them. Well, this report quotes the language of the old Russell case, in which it was held:

The performance of a particular work undoubtedly raises an implied contract to pay the value of such work.

The Russell report goes on to say:

It is to be remembered, however, that the statute is a disabling and penal one, and must be strictly interpreted. The word "contract" is accordingly to be taken in its most restricted meaning. There must be in our opinion, a distinct covenant, or a subsisting and continuous agreement, assented to by both parties, and having the character of mutuality.

That is what the Russell case says, and if that were law to-day, I think Mr. Turcotte would be relieved by it. But this committee in the Anglin case said:

The committee, are, however, of opinion that the said precedent and practice are erroneous, and that according to the true construction of the Act for securing the independence of Parliament, the transactions in question did constitute disqualifying contracts.

Now, Sir, it is impossible to fall back on that argument about mutuality, or a contract signed between the Government and a member, nowadays. I would, now, like to put this case to the hon. members for Quebec. Supposing Mr. Turcotte had supplied the goods under this contract, and the money not all having been paid to him for those goods, but the cheques for the money having come to the hands of Mr. Provost, and supposing Mr. Turcotte were to fail, and an assignee or trustee of his estate, or curator, whatever he would be called, were appointed for the creditors, does any one in this House favour a statement that the creditors of Mr. Turcotte would not be entitled to recover that money for Mr. Turcotte's benefit, which was held by Mr. Provost as trustee for Mr. Turcotte, for the goods Mr. Turcotte had delivered? I, of course, put aside the illegal character of the transaction. And in that view of the case, Mr. Turcotte will be carrying out this contract with the Government through a trustee, in the language of the Act. I think in this class of cases, Parliament should be jealous of its honour and it should proceed to vindicate its independence, and, moreover, it should resent any attempt by a Government to tamper with the liberties of the people by giving the right, as is being done by the majority report which the Government are supporting, to buy a member of Parliament with public money, under the present condition of the law. I wonder if the Government have still been accepting supplies from Mr. Turcotte for the Militia Department since the day this question came before the committee? The members of the Government were present, and have full knowledge of the evidence produced. I should like the Government to inform me whether, in face of the absolute knowledge that Mr. Turcotte is a beneficiary under the contract, they are accepting supplies and are going through the farce of handing a cheque to Mr. Provost, which they find is sent back to the department with Mr. Turcotte's name on it. Are they doing that? If they have stopped that proceeding, and I hope for the credit of the Government they have stopped that contract with Mr. Turcotte, how can they justify the majority report? They must condemn Mr. Turcotte if they have stopped the contract. If they have not stopped it, and are carrying out the contract under circumstances which they know about, they are guilty of a serious breach of the Independence of Parliament Act, with full knowledge of the facts. I believe the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Turcotte) is a very important political factor in the district of Quebec. I understand he occupies very much the same position there which Mr. Thomas McGreevy, of lamented memory, once held in that district, only while Mr. Thomas McGreevy was a particular pet of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), Mr. Turcotte is a particular pet, follower and supporter of the hon. Postmaster General. If the Minister of Justice does not know it, everybody else in this House is talking about it. It is being generally stated, that the Postmaster General has put his foot down on this occasion, and the rest of the Government, including the Minister of Justice, have to toe the mark and whitewash Mr. Turcotte at the dictation of the Postmaster General.

Mr. EDGAR.

Remarks of that kind are not confined to one side of the House, and the country will understand that if the majority report is carried by the votes of the Government, the sooner the Government is known under the name of the Caron-Thompson Government the better. I move in amendment as follows:—

That the Report be amended by striking out all the words after the word "inquiries," where it occurs in the first clause of the said Report, and inserting the following instead thereof:—

"As to the first clause of the order of reference, the finding of the Committee is:

That Arthur Joseph Turcotte and Jean-Baptiste Provost were carrying on the business of grocery merchants, at the city of Quebec during the period from the 11th March, 1892, until 1st February, 1893, under the firm name of Turcotte & Provost, each partner having an equal share in the business;

That on the 30th November, 1891, a tender had been put in for the supply of groceries to the militia in Quebec, for the year 1892, in the name of the said J. B. Provost; the writing in the body of the tender being in the handwriting of Mr. A. J. Turcotte, and the signature, J. B. Provost, being in the handwriting of Mr. Larose, an employee of the firm;

That the tender was duly accepted by the Militia Department, and the contract was duly fulfilled by the said firm, and the supplies were paid for by official departmental cheques amounting in that year to $4,112.85, and all issued payable to the order of J. B. Provost, in whose name the tenders was made, the cheques were all endorsed by J. B. Provost personally, or in his name by Mr. Larose, under power of attorney, these cheques were afterwards endorsed, for deposit, by Turcotte & Co., sometimes in the handwriting of Mr. Turcotte, and sometimes in the handwriting of Mr. Provost, the cheques were then all deposited to the credit of the firm of Turcotte & Co., and the proceeds were received by the firm, and used by the firm, like any other firm money, although Mr. Provost swears, and is uncontradicted, that 'when the partnership existed I always put the money to Mr. Turcotte's credit and I derived no benefit from it;'

That under another similar contract with the Department, for the year 1893, in the name of the said J. B. Provost, the said firm became contractors for the supply of groceries to the citadel at Quebec, and did so supply them, and did receive payment for the same, until the 2nd February, 1893, when the said firm was dissolved by mutual consent.

As to the second clause of the order of reference the finding of the Committee is as follows:—

That on 2nd February, 1893, the firm of Turcotte & Provost was dissolved by mutual consent, and on the same day A. J. Turcotte entered into the grocery business on his own account in the city of Quebec under the firm name of Turcotte, Provost & Co.;

That by a deed of the same date J. B. Provost sold out his entire interest in the old business to A. J. Turcotte for a consideration of $12,000;

That by another deed of the same date (Exhibit No. 108), J. B. Provost purported to sell to O. E. Larose all his rights and interest in his aforesaid contract with the Militia Department for the supply of groceries to the citadel. No sum is mentioned as the consideration, but the sale is stated in the deed to be made for good and sufficient consideration ;

That with reference to this last mentioned deed (Exhibit No. 108), J. B. Provost had no recollection of signing any document to Larose of that date, except a power of attorney. He had no recollection of ever having sold his rights under the citadel contract to Larose, and he never received any consideration whatever therefor from Larose, that the recollection of Mr. Larose on the subject is that he went to get a power of attorney and was asked to sign, and did sign this deed, but he paid no consideration whatever to Provost for it, and did not carry out the contract, that the new firm of Turcotte, Provost & Co., composed of Mr. A. J. Turcotte alone, fulfilled the contract for the remainder of the year 1893, supplied the goods and received the money from the department by means of the cheques issued to J. B. Provost, endorsed by him, and handed over to the new firm and deposited to its credit ;

That the contract for 1894 was not awarded to J. B. Provost by tender as before, but by a letter from the Deputy Adjutant General, dated 10th January, 1894 (Exhibit No. 3), and was carried out, up to 1st February, 1894, and up to the date which this inquiry extends ; in the name of J. B. Provost, but for the exclusive benefit of Mr. A. J. Turcotte.

As to the third clause of the order of reference the finding of the Committee is :

That on 1st February, 1894, the said A. J. Turcotte ceased to use the firm name of Turcotte, Provost & Co. (Exhibit No. 106), in his business, and adopted the business or firm name of A. J. Turcotte & Co. (Exhibit No. 107), and under that name continued up to which this inquiry extends to do business as a grocer in Quebec, and to supply the Militia Department with groceries for the citadel at Quebec, and to receive for his own benefit the proceeds of the official cheques, although the contract stood in the name of J. B. Provost, and that the cheques were issued to J. B. Provost, and by him endorsed to the said A. J. Turcotte ;

That the only agreement in writing between J. B. Provost and A. J. Turcotte relating to these Government contracts, is a paper dated 2nd February, 1893 (Exhibit No. 2), signed by Mr. Turcotte, in the following words : " I hereby undertake to pay to Jean-Baptiste Provost, the sum of four hundred dollars a year from the 1st of January, 1894, on condition that the contract be awarded to Mr. Provost, and failing the said contract I undertake to pay to him but three hundred dollars a year from the said date, and conditioned of course on my business being prosperous ; "

That it is explained by Mr. Provost that the $300 mentioned was for his good-will and $100 for the Government contract, and the sum of $100 was all he was to get out of the contract.

As to the fourth clause in the order of reference the finding of the Committee is :

That some time shortly before 3rd May, 1893, O. E. Larose was a manager or clerk for Mr. A. J. Turcotte in his grocery store in Quebec, at a salary of $950.00 per annum ; and as an increase of work was given him by Mr. Provost having left the firm, he asked for an increase of his salary. This was agreed to by Mr. Turcotte, at $1,200.00 per annum, with the alternative that if Mr. Larose received the contract for supplying the Marine and Fisheries Department, at Quebec, his salary should be $950 per annum, plus his profits from such contract.

That the contract was in due course received by Mr. Larose and fulfilled by him, and he made a profit for the season of 1893, of $400.00 or $450.00 thereon, and in addition thereto he received $950.00 from Mr. Turcotte, to make up his salary for services as clerk and manager for Mr. Turcotte :

The Committee therefore find that Arthur Joseph Turcotte, Esq., member for the electoral district of Montmorency, after his election for said electoral district and until the 2nd February, 1893, was a partner in business with one Jean-Baptiste Provost, and did as such partner hold, enjoy and execute or was interested in a contract with the Department of Militia and Defence and under which public money of Canada was paid, and as a member of said firm knowingly sold goods to the Government for which public money was paid, although such contract was standing in the name of Jean-Baptiste Provost alone as a trustee or third party for the benefit of said firm, and that the election of the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte thereby became void.

The Committee further find that the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, Esq., after said 2nd February, 1893, and until 1st April, 1894, held, enjoyed and executed and was solely interested in a contract with the Department of Militia and Defence and under which public money of Canada was paid, and knowingly sold goods to the Government for which public money was paid, although such contract was standing in the name of Jean-Baptiste Provost as trustee or third party, in reality for the benefit of said Arthur Joseph Turcotte.

And that the election of the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte thereby became void.

I do not draw any inference as to the result of the contract with the Marine Department, and I do not propose to ask the House to assent to the proposition that the hon. member should be disqualified on account of his dealings with the Marine Department, although, I think, he should be. It is a question, however, open to a difference of opinion, and, therefore, I have not included it in the amendment I propose ; but I confine myself to the contract with the Department of Militia and Defence, from which I have drawn those inferences.

Mr. MASSON. Mr. Speaker, before this question is put I would like to call the attention of the House to some few points in respect to it. I will not for a moment attempt to answer the long speech of two hours that we have just listened to from the mover of this resolution : but I would ask the House calmly to consider the evidence given, and the facts found by the majority of the committee and reported to the House ; and to contrast them with the finding that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) wishes the committee to have found, and this House to find now.

It is unnecessary for me in doing so to go into the evidence with any detail. The facts of the case as they stand are admitted on all sides. It is admitted that the first contract referred to was in the name of Provost, and in his name alone, that he tendered for it, that he obtained the contract, and he tells us that he tendered for it in his own name, because at that time his partner was a candidate for election to the House of Commons. There is nothing morally wrong or disgraceful in a person dealing with the Government, and but for the direct statute in that behalf there would be nothing wrong in a member of Parliament tendering in the open field for a contract, and if he, being the lowest tenderer was awarded the contract, there would be nothing morally wrong or disgraceful in fulfilling it. But legislatures in times past have considered that it is dangerous to allow such contracts to be made with members of Parliament, as the holding of such contracts might influence them; and for that reason, and that reason alone, these contracts are made illegal. It is not wrong, nor will any one contend that it is wrong or illegal, for a contract to be made with a member of a firm or corporation of which another member is a member of this House. No one will contend that the disability extends not only to the member, but to all those associated with him in business as members of a firm or corporation. The disability is confined to himself, and the contract must be for his benefit. It does not necessarily need to be in his name. The Act specially provides for that—that if he is the party to a contract made in the name of a trustee or a third party for him, then it is just as if it were in his own name. But the first test we have to apply to this case as to whether the Act complained of is within the statute or not, is this: Is there anything to show that Mr. Turcotte was a party to the contract? Was it made at his request? Was it made by reason of any agreement existing between him and Provost at the time, that would place him in the position of being a beneficiary interested in the contract, and place Provost in the position of being only a trustee or third party holding it for him? Was the contract taken by Provost in his name by reason of any agreement between Turcotte and himself? or was it taken at the request of Turcotte? There is not a scintilla of evidence that Turcotte requested it to be done, or that he was a party to the doing of it. Provost certainly had the right to tender; he certainly had the right to enter into the contract; he certainly had the right to supply the goods. But it is said that in supplying these goods he took them from the firm in which Mr. Turcotte was a partner. Had he taken them from another firm, that other firm would not be in any way interested in the supply of the goods to the Government. They would only be interested in the sale of the goods to Provost, and Provost himself would be the only person interested in the delivery of the goods to the Government, and the receipt of the money from the Government. Can it be, therefore, argued that because he takes the goods from a firm of which a member of Parliament is a member, that member of Parliament has an interest within the meaning of the Act that there is no possibility of a contract being made except in such a manner as will bring him strictly within the statute? If it is possible for an outside firm to contract with a Government contractor to supply him with material and still remain independent of the Government, I think it is equally possible for a member of Parliament to contract with a Government contractor to supply that Government contractor with material, and still remain independent of the Government and of Parliament. Another test which might be applied to this: Did any privity or agreement exist between them during the existence of the contract whereby but for the Independence of Parliament Act Mr. Turcotte could call upon Mr. Provost for an account? Did there exist, either at the inception of the contract, or during the time it was being carried out, any privity or agreement whereby Mr. Provost could be called to account by Mr. Turcotte? If he could be called to account by Mr. Turcotte, then surely Mr. Turcotte would be interested in the contract. But there is not a tittle of evidence to show that. In fact the evidence is clear that there was no undertaking on the part of Turcotte with Provost that Provost should supply the goods, and that Turcotte should share in the profits, or get the proceeds of the contract. It was the voluntary act of Provost to take the goods from this firm, as he might have taken them from any other rival firm in the city. Another test as to whether this case comes within the statute is: If Provost was only the trustee or the agent or the third party for Mr. Turcotte, it would be clear that the Government, in the event of the failure of such a contract, made by the agent, could have enforced the performance of the contract against Mr. Turcotte as an undisclosed principal. Is there any evidence to show that the Government could have enforced that contract against Mr. Turcotte as an undisclosed principal? Or could Mr. Turcotte have maintained an action against the Government as an undisclosed principal? On these two latter tests, I think, there is no evidence to show either that the Government could have maintained an action against Mr. Turcotte as an undisclosed principal for the enforcement of the contract, or that Mr. Turcotte could, as an undisclosed principal, have maintained an action against the Government. Therefore, on the first charge, the charge which, perhaps, was attended with more difficulty for the defence than any of the others, the evidence amounts simply to this, that Provost took the contract in his own name, that for the fulfilling of that contract he got goods from this firm, and that, on getting paid for those goods by the Government, he paid the firm for them. There is nothing in the application of the cheques. We all know that in business transactions a cheque or a bill of exchange passes as current money.

Mr. EDGAR. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? The hon. gentleman states that Provost bought these goods from the firm and paid the firm. What evidence is there of that? I have not seen it.

Mr. MASSON. The whole trend of the evidence is that Provost was the contractor, that Provost went to the firm and got these goods from the firm, that the cheques came to Provost, and that he paid them to the firm. Had the money been paid to him, it would have been the same as cheques. There is no argument upon the handing over of the identical document. In mercantile dealings, we know that cheques pass from a debtor to his creditor, and so do bills of exchange in the same way, and there is nothing in the identity of the cheque to prove conclusively that the money was paid by the Government to Mr. Turcotte. The explanation why the cheques were handed to Turcotte & Co. is clear. They were given to Mr. Provost and by him to Turcotte & Co. in payment of goods received by Mr. Provost from Turcotte & Co., for the fulfilment of his contract. I know it is urged that the fact of the firm finally receiving all the money is evidence that they were themselves the contractors, but I think we should require something more, in the face of Provost's statements under oath that he was acting bona fide, that he was bound to fulfil his contract, and that if he did not get his goods from Mr. Turcotte's firm he would have had to get them elsewhere. With reference to the other contracts, the same remarks hold good as to the purchases and the transfer made. There is not the same difficulty there, especially after the dissolution of the partnership, because up to the dissolution of the partnership the same state of affairs existed; but after the dissolution the contract was transferred, not to Turcotte & Co., the successors of the firm of Provost & Turcotte, but to Larose. It is therefore necessary, in order to attach this matter to Mr. Turcotte after that, to establish that there was an understanding between him and Larose, whereby Larose should hold the contract as his trustee or agent. There must be something to show that Larose was bound to account to him, and that if he played false and got the goods elsewhere and did not give Mr. Turcotte the benefit to which the alleged arrangement would entitle him, Turcotte would, but for the Independence of Parliament Act, be able to enforce it in a court of equity. There is no scintilla of evidence to show there was any agreement between Larose and Turcotte, that the former should hold the money as trustee and account to Mr. Turcotte or the firm of Turcotte & Co. for the profits. As to the arrangement with Mr. Provost with reference to the $400, that is a matter between the two, in which the good-will is set at $300, and the subletting this contract at $100. It is difficult to see how it can be argued that there is conclusive proof that Mr. Turcotte was a party to the assignment of the contract and was placing himself in the position of a contractor—in the position of a person who would have to deal with the Government and look to the Government for his remuneration. Had the assignment of the contract been to him instead of to Mr. Larose, that argument would have been irresistible. But when we find that the contract itself is transferred absolutely to Larose, until we find that Larose was simply standing between the Government and Turcotte and that Turcotte is in the circle, until then we have no case against Mr. Turcotte. There must be a legal connection or bond that can be enforced, and that, but for the Independence of Parliament Act, Mr. Turcotte could enforce. Where is there any evidence to show that? After the assignment, was there any privity between Larose and Turcotte, whereby the latter, but for the statute, could have enforced the contract. Neither in its inception, nor during its fulfilment, was there any evidence to show he could enforce it or that the Government could enforce it against him. There is nothing to show that the Government could have proceeded against Turcotte as an undisclosed party to that contract, or that Turcotte could have proceeded against them in that capacity. These are the main tests to apply, and it is unnecessary to go closely into the details of the evidence to see the plain facts, that through it all it evidently was present to the minds of the parties contracting, that Mr. Turcotte was not available. But for that reason, it is urged that the other parties did it for him. But because he could not do it himself, is that any reason why they should do it? Or because they did it they went on doing it, is that any reason to infer that they were doing it for him? It is not illegal for one member of a firm to deal with the Government, although another member of that firm may have a seat in this House. We have cases of that kind all around us. We have the cases of legal firms. One member of a legal firm may represent a constituency in this House and yet another may be employed by the Government in very large matters and receive from the Government yearly large sums. Does any one hold that it is wrong for one member of a legal firm to do business for the Government and receive pay from it because his partner has a seat in this House? and will any one hold that if this be done, the partner having a seat in this House has violated the Independence of Parliament Act? It is quite possible for a contract with the Government to be made with one member of a firm and be carried out by him and for him to receive the money and divide it among the other members, exclusive of the member of Parliament, even though one of the firm may not be in a position to enter into such a contract himself without infringing the Independence of Parliament Act.

Mr. LISTER. He gets a part of the money.

Mr. MASSON. Has that ever been thought a fit subject of inquiry? Has it ever been thought necessary to investigate such a transaction and examine into the books of a legal firm? Why then should everything be assumed against a grocery firm, in such a matter, and in favour of a legal firm? It may be said that the stock in trade of a grocery firm is the property of all the partners; but in like manner the time and the ability of each member of a legal firm is the property of all, and all are entitled to share in the profits, just as the partners of a grocery firm are entitled to a share in the profits of their stock in trade. One member of a legal firm is as much entitled to the profits arising from the time and ability his co-partners have given to the service of the Government, as a partner in a grocery firm is entitled to the profits on the goods sold to a private individual or to the Government. Wherein is the distinction? What is a valuable asset in one firm goes to the Government through the channel of a single member; what is a valuable asset of another firm goes to the Government through exactly the same channel. It will be admitted that if one is legal and the other is illegal, something more than the bare fact of the transaction must be proved in order to establish that illegality. Have we any evidence to show that the transaction was with one party for the other? The gentleman prosecuting this charge did not cause the production of the books to show that the goods were charged to the Government or to Mr. Provost. If there was anything turning upon this point this at least should have been done. It would only be a matter of book-keeping, after all, but if anything turns upon it, then, even as a matter of book-keeping it should have been brought out. The barest possible statement of fact has been produced and from the bare statement of fact that one partner tendered, one partner got the contract and fulfilled that contract by taking material from his own firm, we are to presume that a member of Parliament knew all about it, was a party to it, and took the benefit of it. I say that we want more than the bare statement of facts to prove that. In a case like this, which is penal in its nature—for if we find the facts as we are asked to find them, the result must be the expulsion from this House of a member—we must construe the statute strictly and we must find that the case has been proved clearly before we can find the party guilty. A member of Parliament, in such a case as this, is entitled to the benefit of all the doubts that can reasonably rise. It must be proved positively, not merely by innuendos, or by presumptions, but by facts.

Mr. MULOCK. Why? In ordinary trials inferences are drawn; why not in this case?

Mr. MASSON. The circumstantial evidence that is brought in must be conclusive. To make it conclusive we must have something more than the mere statement of fact that the contract was made by one member of a firm and fulfilled by him through the aid of his firm. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is worth while troubling the House longer in reviewing these facts. The evidence is short, and the facts are few, and the case turns upon the point I mentioned—upon the question whether these parties got the contract for the benefit of Mr. Turcotte, whether they were bound to him in such a way that they must be considered as trustees for him in the various steps that were taken and so that he was the recipient of the benefits within the meaning of the Act. I think that the evidence falls short of proving conclusively that this is the case.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman from North Grey (Mr. Masson) has evidently not read all the depositions taken before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or he certainly would not have made many of the statements that he has made to-day concerning this case. The hon. gentleman who moved the resolution had some doubts as to whether the gentleman whose seat is attacked had a right to retain his seat. But the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and who evidently has not read the evidence at all has no hesitation whatever. He thinks that there has been no breach at all of the Independence of Parliament Act. The hon. gentleman knows that before this committee only two witnesses were examined, Mr. Provost and Mr. Larose. The hon. gentleman will also, perhaps, recollect when I call his attention to the fact that, day after day as that committee sat, Mr. Turcotte was present in the committee room, and I would ask the hon. gentleman if it is not somewhat remarkable that Mr. Turcotte, who was there every day, and who must have had as much knowledge of these transactions as any witness called, never offered himself as a witness for the purpose of giving explanations of incidents which might or might not be clear to the committee. Mr. Turcotte did not hesitate to rise in this House and read a statement explaining, as he pretended, how it was that he had brought himself under the penalties of the Act. Was it because the statement he made here was not true, and that testimony given under oath would have shown that his statement to the House was not a correct statement of the facts, or was it because he was guilty of the charge that he failed to take advantage of the right he had to go into the box and, under the solemnity of an oath, declare what he knew or did not know of the transaction. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the conduct of Mr. Turcotte in this matter in not taking advantage of his right and stating before the committee the facts within his knowledge is a circumstance weakening the contention for the innocence of the accused which my hon. friend from North Grey has so earnestly advocated today. My hon. friend says that it is not improper per se for a member of Parliament to enter into a contract with the Government. It might not be improper for a member of Parliament to enter into a contract with the Government if there was not an Act of Parliament forbidding it. But there is such an Act of Parliament, passed for manifestly good reasons. We all know that this matter of members of Parliament entering into contracts with the Government was considered to be against public policy. It became so bad at one time that a large proportion of the members of the House were interested in contracts, and, from selfish motives became slavish supporters of the Administration. It is not, as is contended, forsooth, because Mr. Turcotte is a grocery man that he is assailed, and it is not because somebody else may be a lawyer that he is not assailed. Well do I recollect the case of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, when charges were made that the hon. gentleman was interested in large sums of money granted to his firm by the Government. The hon. gentleman's answer was that while he was a member of the firm, he never participated in the profits made by the firm acting for the Government. And there is just the difference between that case and the case under consideration. No person will pretend to argue for a moment that if a firm received compensation from the Government, and a member of that firm was also a member of Parliament, he would not come under this statute and be liable to its pains and penalties, but if he does not participate in the moneys received from the Government, then he cannot come under the statute, and he is not responsible. Over and over again I have heard my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries state that he was not interested in any of the profits received from the Government, that went to his firm for services rendered to the Government by that firm. I would remind my hon. friend again that there is a distinction. Now, what do we find? This innocent man from Quebec, who has been characterized by my hon. friend beside me as the guide, philosopher and friend almost, of the Postmaster General, who occupies almost the same position towards him that a certain unfortunate gentleman did towards the late Minister of Public Works—this innocent individual who can be entrusted with the mighty secrets of state, who can be entrusted with that mighty fund which the evidence shows has been gathered around that old historic place of Quebec, this innocent individual, for some reason of other, is not permitted to go into the witness box and tell his own story, he is not permitted to go into the witness box as a counsel to advise, or as a political friend; but he studiously abstains from going where he ought to have been the first to go, to tell the House whether these charges were true or false. My hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Masson) says: But he had a right to take this contract; he entered into the contract in his own name, and he furnished goods out of the store like a third party would have done who had no interest in the store at all. He sold them to the Government and he got his pay, and that is all there is about it. Is that so? Does not the evidence of Mr. Provost show clearly that it is not so? On page 13 he was asked the question:

Will you say why you made the tender in your own name, in place of making it in Turcotte & Provost, or Turcotte & Co.?—A. Because, Mr. Turcotte being unable to have the contract in his own name, it was made in my name.

That was the reason. Mr. Turcotte was ambitious for political honours, he was likely to be a candidate, and he was a candidate for political honours in Montmorency. But he knew the law, and in that respect he was different from our hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Corby), who honestly got up in the House and admitted that there had been a breach of the Act, but said he was ignorant of it, and the House accepted the explanation. But what do we find here? This man, who was a candidate for the House of Commons, knowing as he must have known that if he had a contract with the Government he would not be entitled to sit in the House, cunningly devises this scheme whereby he thought that the law might be set at defiance, and instead of entering into the contract in the name of Turcotte & Provost, he gets his partner and his friend Provost to make the contract. Did Provost make it as a matter of fact? Because we see that the trusted manager of the business, Mr. Larose, who had been in charge of it for twelve years, who had authority to sign the name of all the members of the partnership—we find that he was then the servant of Turcotte before Provost entered into the partnership at all. We find that Larose signed Mr. Provost's name, and that the body of the tender was filled up in the hand writing of Mr. Turcotte. For all we know Mr. Provost never saw the tender at all. Mr. Turcotte's confidential man signed Provost's name. Turcotte himself filled up the tender which was sent into the Government, and Mr. Provost swears that the reason this was done was because Turcotte was unable to have the contract in his own name, and it was made in his (Provost's) name. Now, what do we find? They go into partnership. It is not pretended that Mr. Provost bought any goods from Turcotte & Provost, but the evidence shows that the goods under this contract were furnished by the firm of Turcotte & Provost. There was no selling to Mr. Provost, but it was a direct deal between Turcotte & Provost and the Citadel; so that the goods were furnished by Turcotte & Provost to the Government, and the Government sent in payment for those goods the cheque of the department, payable to Provost. Now, I call the attention of the House to that part of the argument of my hon. friend. If Mr. Provost was buying goods from Turcotte and Provost, he would have some profit on them. Instead of handing over the cheque that he received from the department and placing it to the credit of the firm, he would have cashed the cheque, he would have paid the firm what it was entitled to for the goods supplied, and he would have kept the profits for himself. But instead of that, the money received for these supplies is handed over directly by Mr. Provost, and it goes to the credit of Turcotte & Provost in their bank account, endorsed by Mr. Provost, and endorsed again by Turcotte & Provost, and the money deposited. The money was received by the firm and used by the firm, as the witness says, like any other money. Those are the words he uses: "The money was received for the firm and used by the firm like any other money." So that these two men in partnership, one of them a member of this House, were dealing with the Government directly under the form of a contract in the name of Provost, but really for the benefit of Turcotte and Provost, selling goods to the Government, receiving pay for them, the proceeds going to the firm like any other money that they might receive as merchants. Well, the partnership of Turcotte & Provost was dissolved. You would have thought that if this contract belonged to Mr. Provost he would have carried it out. Provost did not go into the business again for a year; the business was carried on by Turcotte in the name of Turcotte & Provost. Turcotte continued, after Provost left the partnership, to furnish these supplies as they had been furnished before to the citadel at Quebec, and the cheques that were received in payment of these goods were handed over by Mr. Provost at once to Turcotte, endorsed by Turcotte, placed in the bank to his own credit and became his own money. When the dissolution took place there was an agreement entered into, and Provost says that $100 of money under that agreement was to be paid to him for the contract which he had with the Government. That that statement is true is supported by the fact and by the conduct of parties, because we find that cheques were handed by Mr. Provost to Mr. Turcotte, Mr. Turcotte endorsing them, and they were placed to his own credit in the bank, and the money was as much his as was money received from any other source. My hon. friend has advanced many propositions of law. He said we must go on, and show that an agreement existed in fact between Mr. Turcotte and Mr. Provost whereby all the proceeds from that contract would go to Mr. Turcotte. Why need we go further than the appropriation of the money? If there was no evidence whatever, we have the fact that all the moneys received from this contract went to the credit of Mr. Turcotte or Mr. Provost, or to Mr. Turcotte alone. That fact supports and sustains the testimony of Mr. Provost, that there was an agreement between them whereby the whole proceeds of the contract should go to Mr. Turcotte. The hon. gentleman said that Mr. Provost obtained the goods from the firm and paid the firm. There is not a tittle of evidence to that effect; it is not pretended on the part of any of the witnesses that goods were bought by Mr. Provost from the firm of Turcotte & Provost, or from Mr. Turcotte alone, and that he paid for them. There is no evidence in that direction, the evidence is clear and conclusive that the arrangement was to turn over this contract and carry it out with Mr. Turcotte after the dissolution of partnership, by which arrangement Mr. Turcotte was to receive the whole profits of the contract, less $100 per annum which was to be paid to Mr. Provost. Then the hon. gentleman said the contract was transferred to Mr. Larose. Was not that in itself a suspicious circumstance? Mr. Larose was the trusted manager of Mr. Turcotte—he was his partner. The hon. gentleman must know that Mr. Provost would have no right to transfer this contract to Mr. Turcotte, because he was a member of Parliament. Then the next best course to adopt in order to evade the statute law was to turn over the contract to some one else, and the contract was accordingly handed over to Mr. Larose, who was in fact Mr. Turcotte. I suppose it is being carried out to-day by Mr. Larose for the benefit of Messrs. Larose and Turcotte. Why is it necessary to go into any argument in regard to a case about which there is no doubt whatever? The evidence stands uncontradicted, and it must be assumed to be true. No attempt has been made to contradict it, and that being clear, it goes without saying that Mr. Turcotte is a person who has been beneficially interested in this contract. An hon. friend reminds me that the witnesses who have proved this case so clearly, were not witnesses friendly to those who have been preferring the charges, that in fact they were hostile witnesses, who were brought here under arrest. This is the class of witnesses by whom the hon. member who preferred the charges has proved them, and he has proved the charges clearly and abundantly. There is no doubt whatever that Mr. Turcotte was beneficially interested in the contract, and has been so up to the present time, and that being so, there is but one course for this House to adopt to-day, if it pretends to observe in any degree the laws of the country, and that is to declare that the seat which the hon. member now holds has become vacant by his acts.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, if I rise to address the House after the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), who has so kindly co-operated with me during the inquest held on the charges which I have brought against the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Turcotte), it is not that I have much to add, as far as the evidence is concerned. I may be allowed, however, seeing that I have taken the initiative of those proceedings, to state, at the outset, that in following the course I have taken, I have neither obeyed the promptings of hatred, nor listened to the suggestions of revenge as against one of my French-Canadian colleagues. Up to that moment, I may say, our intercourse had always been of the most friendly character, and I hope that, in following the present course, I have not incurred the hon. gentleman's hatred, nor drawn upon myself his revenge. I have been reproached in the press of the province of Quebec with having initiated proceedings in this House against a French-Canadian colleague. I resent such language; for I think I am inferior to none of my colleagues in this House in attachment to my nationality. I may say, though, that I was quite prepared for these attacks from the Conservative press. For it is a well known fact that when you attack a member of the Conservative party, you attack the whole party; you attack the very head of the party. No wonder, therefore, that prior even to the charges having been brought down on the Table of the House, party spirit should have been appealed to by the Conservative press; and previous even to the proof being heard, a verdict of not guilty had already been rendered in favour of the hon. member for Montmorency. Allow me, Mr. Speaker, as a plea of justification, to state that, under the circumstances, I have thought it to be my duty and in the public interest so to act. I may also be permitted to say before the House, and in presence of the Ministers, that certain Conservative leaders in the city of Quebec have co-operated with me and lent me their support. They are men of high standing among the supporters of the hon. Postmaster General and the member for Montmorency.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Would the hon. member be good enough to give us the names of the parties mentioned; we have a right to know who they are.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) I cannot divulge the names of those Conservatives who have come to me and assured me of their support as to the charges I have brought against the hon. member for Montmorency.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) I deny that.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) The hon. member for Chicoutimi denies it to be the case?

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Why don't you name them?

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) The hon. member for Chicoutimi should not make insinuations of the kind. I declare before this House, upon my honour, that I have been urged by Conservative leaders of the district of Quebec to take the stand I have taken, and previous to my bringing down the charges having met the hon. member for Montmorency, I took the trouble to inform him of the fact. As to the inquest which has just been closed, I cannot but congratulate myself as to the position I have taken. The charges I brought, in May last, against one of my colleagues in this House, have been absolutely proved. What are the facts? They are of a very simple character; and it were idle for the hon. member for Bellechasse and the Conservative party to attempt to misrepresent them, and to draw from them inferences and deductions unwarranted by the facts. The evidence, based on the papers on file before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, shows that Mr. Turcotte, now member for Montmorency, was a candidate for parliamentary honours in that constituency in 1891, against the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). The evidence also shows that he was defeated at that election. We have also the documentary evidence that he was, at that period, in partnership with Mr. J. B. Provost, of Quebec, under the firm name of Turcotte & Provost, and that, in the month of February, 1891, prior to his election, he transferred his interests and his rights under the Government contract which the firm of Turcotte & Provost were fulfilling, stating in the deed of transfer, that as he was a candidate and he had a contract which stood under the firm name of Turcotte & Provost, he could not be at the same time a candidate in the county of Montmorency and a Government contractor. Mr. Turcotte was defeated by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) at the election of 1891. The election of my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) was contested; and as the present Government availed of all the means within their power to win nearly all the by-elections—with the exception, however, of Vaudreuil and Richelieu—nomination day for Montmorency was fixed on the day following the local elections. The Liberal party having been defeated in the province of Quebec owing to an unparalleled outburst of slander, of impudent falsehoods and appeals of politicians of the stamp of the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley), directed against the Hon. Mr. Mercier, the present Government was enabled to secure the return even of the member for Montmorency (Mr. Turcotte).

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Talk about the Langlais scandal.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) That scandal is nothing compared with that of Pointe aux Esquimaux.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

BILL FOR THE RELIEF OF JAMES ST. GEORGE DILLON.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 148), for the relief of James St. George Dillon.

Mr. MASSON. Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I wish to call the attention of the House to some of the principles involved in this class of legislation, and to the position in which this Bill now stands. Before being referred to the Committee on Private Bills, there was some discussion in this House which showed that at least some hon. gentlemen were dissatisfied with the evidence taken before the Senate Committee. Upon the probably correct ruling then urged by the hon. gentleman from Albert (Mr. Weldon), the Bill was sent to the Committee on Private Bills. Their report is now before us, which shows that no further evidence bearing upon the issue was taken, but that counsel for the petitioner was heard, and while the argument of counsel is not on record, the promoters of the Bill have taken the opportunity of printing and distributing it. From that argument members of this House who were not on that committee will see the various grounds upon which the Bill was supported. Although the evidence of the Senate Committee was not formally adopted, I suppose this House can treat it now as having been adopted by that committee in making that report. We have therefore to look to that evidence alone as to the facts of the case. These facts I mentioned on a previous occasion, but I will briefly rehearse them now. The parties were married on the 27th of August, 1883. For five years they lived together in Canada, during which time we may gather from the evidence that there were some slight clashes between them. Very vague evidence is given by the petitioner as to the wife's disobedience, absence from home, and not caring for children. I say that it is vague, because no detail is given. The magnitude and the effect of these cases of misconduct is not brought before us in the evidence in such a way that this House can form any definite decision as to what they amount to; but whatever they were, the evidence clearly showed that they were condoned. At the expiration of five years the petitioner and his wife, as man and wife, start for

Mr. BRUNEAU.

Europe, and arrive in France. As to what took place there the evidence is an entire blank. Travelling abroad as man and wife certainly must be taken as his condoning all previous offences. He and his wife arrive in France on goods terms; his wife entitled to his protection, his support and comfort, as well as his love. Not alone is it not mentioned in the charge, but he does not even hint at any misconduct in France. As part of a preconceived idea of his own, not communicated to her, he carries out his intention of separation; separation which I contend in the eye of the law must amount to desertion; separation, he says, with mutual consent. Any person versed in the English law of marriage must know that mutual consent cannot be considered a ground of dissolution of marriage. He, therefore, deserts her, and leaves her in a foreign country. He said he left her with her father, but the evidence does not show how the father happened to be in France and the mother in Canada. But of all places in the world to leave a young wife; to leave her in France, I think cannot be considered the very best place to leave her.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. MASSON. It is not hard to explain. France is a country where it is alleged. I do not say truly, that there are more divorced women than in any other country in the world.

Mr. BERGERON. Oh, no.

Mr. MASSON. She was left there, not with her mother, but with her father, and we gather from the evidence that the father and the mother were separated. She does not there remain, but shortly finds her way back to Canada, where she lived with her mother. As he himself puts it, and I quote his words:

Q. Had you any reason to suppose, that she was unfaithful to you, during the six years that you remained separate?—A. No reason whatever. As far as I know, she was living a perfectly proper life with her mother.

These are the facts as they are represented by himself up to the time that he applied for this Bill. I will not pretend to argue that the acts that he relies upon would not entitle him to a divorce, were he himself blameless; but I put my objection to the Bill upon two grounds: first, that in deserting her in a foreign country, causing a separation without just cause and excuse, by leaving her there, he disentitled himself to relief. I quoted some English authorities the other night, which I will not trouble the House with repeating now, but there are many others much stronger than those cited then:

If the husband, without reasonable excuse, separates from his wife, he is not entitled to a divorce, if she does commit adultery. If chastity be a duty of the wife, protection is not less that of the husband, and the wife has a right to the comfort of the husband, and the husband's society, the security of his home and name, and his protection, so far as circumstances permit. If he falls short of this he is not wholly blameless, and if she falls (though not justifying her fall), he has so far compromised himself that he forfeits his claim for divorce.

Such was the decision of the judges in Jeffrey vs. Jeffrey, decided in England in 1864. In an earlier case, before the present rules of English practice came into force, it was held that where he separated from his wife, even suspecting her misconduct, or had at least cause to suspect, that that did not excuse him, but that he was bound to exercise greater vigilance and caution over her conduct, and if he left her unprotected, he deprived himself of any remedy on account of her misconduct. That case was decided in 1859, shortly before the present English rules came into force. I will not further delay the House, because I do not wish to occupy more than a few minutes of the hour devoted to private Bills. I only wish to point out that upon that ground the English authorities refused divorce, and though we are not bound by the English authorities, we should at least be somewhat guided by them. It may be argued truly that this Parliament is bound by no rules of procedure, and that it is our discretion to grant or refuse. I admit that to be a statement of the facts, and I will not cavil with it. I present these as English precedents, which I think this House will do well to follow. As I have said, there was nothing to justify the separation in France, and if there was cause before the parties left Canada, that cause was condoned by the husband. As another ground on which I think that further information is wanted, I refer to the report of the Senate Committee, which I presume we have a right to use, and if not, we should have better evidence before us. I find that during the examination he was asked whether he had been faithful to his marriage vows during the five years that they had lived together. To that he answered, yes. Then he was asked whether he had been faithful during the six years that they had lived separate. That question he declined to answer on the advice of counsel; the Senate Committee ruled that he was not bound to answer, and the question consequently was not pressed. I know it may be argued, as it apparently was argued before the Committee on Private Bills, that as the Senate Committee did not insist on an answer, no argument can be urged against him for his refusal to answer. I submit the contrary. If it is necessary that this House should have the information involved in an answer to that question; if it is necessary for the proper decision of these cases that that question should be inquired into; then, if on the advice of counsel he refuses to answer, he takes the risk and responsibility on his own shoulders, and we have nothing to excuse him for. Now, I may say that since 1857, in England, the propriety of an inquiry on that point has been recognized. It was recognized by the ecclesiastical courts long before, but since 1857 it has been laid down in the rules of practice of the civil courts. At first there was no procedure for carrying these out. Then, in 1860 procedure was provided, and even under that procedure we find by the reports that a great number of cases have turned upon questions of practice in relation to when and how the objections should be raised. It was required that the Queen's proctor, acting on behalf of the Queen and the public, should, within four days after his intervention, file an affidavit setting forth the grounds on which he pressed the objection. But in 1877 the rules were made not to apply to the Queen's proctor. These rules were numbered from 70 to 76, and referring to the practice when parties put in an answer; and rule 202, passed on the 17th of April, 1877, provided that these rules, from 70 to 76, both inclusive, should no longer be applicable to proceedings by the Queen's proctor. The proctor may, by filing a plea, put himself in a position to cross-examine on this point. I see that it has been urged before the Private Bills Committee that it was not usual to cross-examine on that point, and I have no doubt that many authorities prior to the Evidence Act can be cited to show that cross-examination on that point was only resorted to when the party was examined by way of discovery, and not as a witness in the suit, and that he could only be examined when he had made statements to the contrary. But even before the Evidence Act, in undefended cases, where circumstances were brought out in the evidence tending to show that the petitioner may have been guilty of some matrimonial lapse, it was usual to call him into the box to give his explanation when he was not in a position to give evidence on his own behalf. When he was not in a position to be called to give evidence against himself, he was still, on a prima facie case, liable to be called into the box for explanations. Now, however, the practice is clearly laid down. Mr. Dixon, after quoting a number of cases, says:

As a matter of fact the petitioner now invariably appears in support of his own case, and is cross-examined with severity at times upon the question of adultery.

I think therefore it is clear that the English practice is that he is liable to be cross-examined on that question; and in this case the petitioner by refusing to answer the question has put an obstacle in the way of this House granting him the relief he seeks. Now, as I wish to be very brief, I will not detain the House longer in pressing these points. With regard to the question of collusion, which I referred to a few nights ago, I have on further consideration, after consulting the authorities, which show that collusion should not be presumed, decided to abandon that view of the case. It only rested on suspicious circumstances, from which collusion might be presumed; and, as the rulings are against presuming collusion I abandon that point. But on the two points which I have mentioned, I think this case requires further consideration. I would therefore move, seconded by Mr. Henderson :

That all the words after "that" in the said motion be omitted, and the following substituted therefor: "This order be discharged, and the Bill be referred back to the Standing Committee on Private Bills to make further inquiry."

Mr. TISDALE. I propose to reply briefly to some of the arguments of my hon. friend in regard to this case. He bases his opposition to the Bill on two grounds: first, that there was a desertion; and, secondly, that we have not complied with the rules of procedure adopted by the English courts. Now, I must say that I cannot comprehend the hallucination which has taken hold of my learned friend's brain to cause him to attempt to convince this House or any sensible man that there is any ground at all for contending that there was desertion. If there ever was a case in which it was clearly proven that there was nothing approaching desertion, this is one. What are the facts? There can be no dispute about them. This man went to Paris with his wife, and there, he left his wife with her father by mutual consent. You will understand that the evidence is simply his own; but no one contradicted it. What is the evidence? It is a melancholy thing when a man has lived with a woman, that the circumstances of the domestic circle become such that they mutually agree to separate. They have the right to do so under the law, and I believe it is much more sensible and proper, when they find that they cannot live under the marriage vow on proper terms, to separate, after giving the matter serious consideration. But with whom did he leave his wife? He left her with her father, and surely he could leave her with no one better calculated to protect her and have control over her. When called upon to give his reasons for the separation, Mr. Dillon gave them, it seems to me, very modestly and moderately. One of his reasons was that their lives had been very unpleasant for several years previous to the separation. Her continued absences from home, her neglect of her children, her incompatibility of temperament, her leaving home against his orders—all these rendered life intolerable. The wife was not before the committee to be heard, she did not want to be heard, and surely her absence is a strong element in the applicant's favour. His moderation commended his case to my mind, and it is a distortion of the evidence, in my opinion, to attempt to say that there was evidence of design in his taking his wife across to France and there deciding on the separation. What struck me in that connection was that this course showed a proper desire to avoid scandal at home, by bringing about the rupture abroad, because we all know how such disagreements, made public at the time of their occurrence in the quarter where the couple reside, cause great unpleasantness and scandal. This was mitigated, to some extent, by the separation taking place in a foreign country, and I have no doubt that they did not agree to part without having very seriously considered all the circumstances. The evidence shows that the wife had pecuniary means of her own, but, nevertheless, the husband allowed her fifty dollars a month, which, it has not been attempted to show was not an ample allowance. I cannot agree that the wife, having been left in charge of her father, was placed by design in the way of temptation to go astray. There is nothing to show that she did go astray while abroad. On the contrary, she came back and went to live with her mother in the city of Montreal before she went astray. What does that prove? It proves that the husband was sensible, both in the choice of the place where he left his wife, and in the choice of the person in whose care he left her. What is the second objection made by the hon. gentleman? He says we are not following the rules of the English court in regard to applications for divorce. But is Mr. Dillon to be punished because both the committee of the House of Commons, and the committee of the Senate, which is the divorce court here, decided that he was not called upon to answer a question, which he would have been bound to answer under the procedure of the English court. The English court has no jurisdiction here, the hon. gentleman admits that we have supreme jurisdiction, and yet he asks that this man shall not obtain his divorce because he did not answer a question which the committees of the Senate and the House of Commons decided he should not be called on to answer. That was not a refusal to answer, but in that he simply acted on the advice of his counsel, and according to the ruling of the court. The counsel in thus advising him simply did what he was bound to do. I leave it to any legal gentleman in the House whether, when he has established the case of his client before a court, it would not be his duty to advise his client to refuse to answer a question of that kind. And the committees having ruled the question was not in order, we are not here entitled to refuse the divorce because that question was not answered. I shall not allude further to the evidence except to say that, to my mind, this man acted, under the circumstances, in a proper way. It was not he that wanted the divorce, but his relatives, who felt themselves disgraced by the public revelations of this woman's conduct in the city of Montreal. Further, there is this to be considered: the applicant had, as a reasonable and proper man, consented to the mother visiting the children, but his father informed him that she was behaving in such a manner that it was not proper the children should any longer be allowed to visit her. And, let it be remembered that, though separated in this way, he allowed the mother to visit the children, until her conduct became so shocking that he was appealed to by his father not only to release the family from the stigma resting upon them through her conduct, but to remove his children from her influence. Then it was that he came to the court, the only one in this country having jurisdiction. And yet, upon this plain statement of fact, my hon. friend engages in splitting straws to induce the House to refuse this man a decree.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Mason:

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to the fact that the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. McAllister) has not voted.

Mr. McALISTER. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor). If I had voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. TURCOTTE, M.P.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) I was about to say, before six o'clock that Mr. Turcotte had, previous to the elections held in February, 1891, transferred to his partner, J. B. Provost his interests under the contract for furnishing supplies and provisions for the Citadel. Mr. Turcotte was elected to the House of Commons about the 11th of March, 1892, and he continued in partnership with J. B. Provost; the firm of Provost & Turcotte fulfilled the contract which Turcotte, in 1891, had transferred to his partner. This was proved beyond question. The firm fulfilled the contract, and Mr. Turcotte got his share, amounting to a half-interest. Those facts are not denied, they are not contradicted, and in my humble opinion, this fact alone is sufficient to cause the seat of the hon. member in this House to be vacated. But there is further evidence of the fact showing premeditation on the part of the hon. member to wilfully infringe the Independence of Parliament Act. On the 2nd of February, 1893, took place the dissolution of partnership with Provost, and on the very same day, Provost sold to his clerk, Mr. O. E. Larose, the contract which he had with the Government. I may here add that Mr. Larose was at the time Mr. Turcotte's employee, and that he continued as manager of the firm up to the month of March last. On the very day that occurred the dissolution of partnership and the sale of his contract, Mr. Turcotte, member for Montmorency, gave to J. B. Provost, the holder of the contract a paper under which he undertook to pay to him the sum of $300 for his good-will and $100 for the Government contract. Since the 1st of February, 1893, Mr. Turcotte has sat in this House and has fulfilled a Government contract standing in the name of Provost. Since the 2nd of February, 1893, for the consideration of $100 of money paid to Provost, Mr. Turcotte has fulfilled his contract and has been a beneficiary under this contract. All or nearly all the official departmental cheques, went, through the agency of Provost, to the firm of Turcotte, Provost & Co., and that of A. J. Turcotte & Co., under which names Mr. Turcotte has been doing business alone, since that date. If, after 1891, at the time of the elections, when the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) was elected in the county of Montmorency against Mr. Turcotte, the contract was transferred by Turcotte to Provost and has since continued in Provost's name, the reason is, as stated by Provost, that Mr. Turcotte, being a member of Parliament, could not hold a Government contract. A proof which goes to show that Mr. Turcotte knew that he could not keep the contract under his own name, is the fact of his having been aware of the sale of the citadel contract to Larose. The evidence is clear, conclusive and still it is discarded in order to exonerate and whitewash the hon. member for Montmorency. Technicalities and a wrong construction of the statute law have been resorted to; they have even distorted the charges which I have brought before the House. The report states that the accusation purports that Mr. Turcotte's contract was made in Provost's name for Turcotte's benefit, while the simple reading of the first charge formulated by me amply and positively shows the contrary. In the second place, the committee report states that Provost tendered for and obtained in good faith his contract with the Government, and the inference was drawn from that fact that Mr. Turcotte was not guilty of a serious breach of the Independence of Parliament Act. Is it not true, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Turcotte was Provost's partner when the contract for supplying the Quebec Citadel was awarded to him, in 1891? Is it not true that he was his partner in 1892, when, in the fall of the year, Mr. Provost was informed by a letter from Colonel Duchesnay, that the contract was continued for the year 1893? What construction is it possible for the hon. members to put on Provost's statement to the effect that if the contract stood in his name, the reason was that Mr. Turcotte could not hold a Government contract? The report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections states, in the third place, that it was Mr. Provost who fulfilled the Government contract. This is mere quibbling. It was not Provost who fulfilled the contract; in other words, Mr. Turcotte fulfilled it, in partnership with Mr. Provost up to the 1st of February, 1893, and from the 1st of February, 1893—it is an undeniable fact that Mr. Turcotte alone has been fulfilling this Government contract. A fourth reason alleged in the committee report goes to say that Mr. Provost was free to sublet his contract to whom he chose. Nothing more futile could be imagined. Why, is it not a well known fact that it was the firm of which Mr. Turcotte was a member that fulfilled Provost's contract? Supposing that Mr. Provost were free to sublet his contract to whom he chose, was Mr. Turcotte entitled to fulfil this subcontract? I say no, decidedly, and the law on the subject is as plain as statutes can well make it. By section 10, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, chap. 2, it is provided that:

No person, directly or indirectly, alone or with another, by himself or by the interposition of any trustee or third party, holding, enjoying, making or executing any contract or agreement expressed or implied with or for the Government of Canada, on behalf of the Crown, or with or for any of the officers of the Government of Canada, for which any public money of Canada is to be paid, shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons, or shall sit or vote in the same House.

Who, I ask, is the member of this House who would deny the fact of Mr. Turcotte having, up to the 1st of February, 1893, held, enjoyed, made or executed, under the firm name of Turcotte & Provost, the contract awarded to J. B. Provost? Nobody, either within this House or outside of it, could deny, in face of the evidence adduced, the fact of Mr. Turcotte having directly held, enjoyed, made or executed, with the Government of Canada, from the 2nd of February, 1893, the contract made by Mr. Provost with the Government. The fifth reason alleged, however incredible it may appear, Mr. Speaker, is this: it is contended, with a view to justifying and whitewashing the hon. member for Montmorency, that Provost, on the 2nd of February, 1893, had sold out his contract to Larose. Why, Mr. Speaker, is it contended that it was Mr. Larose who fulfilled Mr. Provost's contract, and who received the money from the department? This statement of the committee report is altogether at variance with facts, as it was proved in evidence that Mr. Larose never did execute the contract nor give any consideration for the same. Further, from the documentary evidence on file before the committee, it appears that all the cheques were made in Mr. Provost's name, and endorsed by him; that the cheques thus endorsed were transferred to the hon. member for Montmorency, Mr. Turcotte, who endorsed them personally, or had them endorsed by some of his employees, and they were then deposited to his own credit in the Quebec Merchants Bank. When this evidence is considered, a more unpalatable reason than that could hardly be found, in extenuation of the guilt of the hon. member for Montmorency. Now, it was undoubtedly the character of that evidence which elicited from the independent press of the province of Quebec an opinion adverse to the whitewashing which, through a spirit of partisanship, the Committee on Privileges and Elections wish to give the hon. member for Montmorency. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read to the House some expressions of opinion from independent newspapers of the province of Quebec. It is within the recollection of the members from the province of Quebec that, at the late elections of 1892, the Conservative party have spread broadcast throughout the province of Quebec, the Montreal 'Star,' in order to prove their charges against the boodlers and the robbers, as they then styled the Liberal party. If that paper were such an authority at the time, I presume it is still so to a certain extent. In connection with the case of the hon. member for Montmorency, the 'Star' contained the following despatch from Ottawa, in its issue of the 30th of June last:—

A bare quorum, scattered among the empty benches, enabled the Government to get through certain appropriations for pressing necessities. The Curran bridge and Turcotte scandals are still dragging their weary length along. Why Mr. Turcotte has refrained from resigning thus far is a mystery. Such a course, in view of the evidence, seems inevitable.

On the 7th of July instant, the 'Star,' after editorially reciting the facts of the case, came to the conclusion that it was impossible for it to approve of the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse:

It is difficult to see how the Government, having permitted Mr. Corby to go to his constituency can accept Mr Amyot's motion in the Turcotte case. The evidence seems to a lay outsider to be absurdly clear. Mr. Provost, Turcotte's old partner, swears that contracts to supply provisions to the Militia Department (the citadel), originally held in the name of Provost and Turcotte, were subsequently made out to himself (Provost) alone; that the tenders for the contracts had been put in his name, instead of the firm name, because Turcotte being a member of the House of Commons, the firm he was interested in could not hold a Government contract; that under an agreement, contained in a letter which he filed, he received $100 from Turcotte on account of the contract; that, although the cheques from the Militia Department, in payment of provisions, were made payable to him (Provost), he used to hand them over to Turcotte, because he did not consider them his own under the agreement existing between him and Turcotte; that Turcotte endorsed these cheques (some of them were produced) and supplied the provisions for the filling of the contract. A document was produced purporting to be a sale of the contract to Larose, but Provost could not remember having signed it. And, moreover, the cheques were, no doubt, in Provost's name and put to the credit of the firm.

This is the case in connection with Provost and the Militia Department. Larose, an old clerk of the firm, had a contract with the Marine Department; and he swore that he had been asking for an increase of salary and the firm gave him the profits of this contract in lieu thereof. Did not that imply that the firm really owned this marine contract? But Larose aside, can there be any doubt as to the effect of the other case? Mr. Amyot's apologetic resolution is very deftly drawn; but the task it attempts is too great for human ingenuity. He maintains that the Militia contract was Provost's own exclusive property; but Provost tells us that he only possessed $100 value in it, and that all profits went to Turcotte or his firm. Mr. Amyot cunningly meets this by saying that "there is no evidence of any profit out of contract with the Militia Department," but neither is there evidence that there was no profit and there is evidence that Mr. Turcotte stood where the profits would fall, if any accrued. This is also a point that Mr. Turcotte himself might have illuminated, had he made a statement under oath.

And it winds up with these words:

The Government certainly cannot accept the Amyot motion without stultifying itself. Even if there be a tendency to whitewash, the "wash" is too thin.

When the report of the committee on Privileges and Elections was published, it was again discussed by the press, and the 'Star' returned to the charge. It is an appeal to the Government not to perpetrate such a gross injustice as that they seem bent upon committing, in whitewashing the hon. member for Montmorency. About two days ago, it thus expressed itself:

A member of Parliament should not dabble in Government contracts. It is not enough for him to evade conviction under the letter of law; he must be above suspicion. But in the Turcotte case it is hard to see that even the stored coach-and-four of the accused gets through. Provost swears that he gave the Government cheques received on account of the Militia contract, over to Turcotte; and Larose admits that he received the profits of the Marine contract in lieu of a demanded increase of salary from Turcotte's firm. The Government have, of course, a majority large enough and probably subservient enough to apply the needed coat of whitewash, if the leaders give the word; but the Ministry will not strengthen its position in saving one man by a resolution which will array Messrs. Weldon, Dickey and McCarthy with the Opposition. The country is becoming more careful of the independence of Parliament than it formerly was; and this will be a bad time to let through so doubtful a case—to put it in its most favourable light. As we see it, the case is not at all doubtful, and Turcotte ought to go.

Thus the independent press of the country, which is not fettered by Government contracts, gives expression to its views as to the nature of the evidence produced before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Some members of this House—who, by the way, found fault with my bringing charges against one of my French colleagues—may, perhaps, take objection to the 'Star' being quoted as an authority on the matter, on the ground that it does not champion French-Canadian interests. Well, then, let me quote other papers beside those which do not champion the interests of my race; let me give expressions of opinion coming, not from French Liberal papers, but from a Montreal paper, which deservedly styles itself an independent paper. On the very same day that the 'Star' published the editorial, I have just quoted 'Le Monde,' thus commented upon the matter at issue, under the heading, "Saved at last":

The member for Montmorency is to keep his seat: such is the decision come to by the majority of his colleagues in Committee. The House will follow suit. He is to be congratulated, so much the more so as his case was without any redeeming feature. He has been given the benefit of the doubt, owing to the leaning towards leniency which is the attribute of a majority of members whose conscience is not quite at rest. Mr. Turcotte had better, in our opinion, have followed in the footsteps of Mr. Corby. Are we then to allow the English-speaking members to monopolize apparently at least those great traditions of manly courage?

And in the same editorial, 'Le Monde' further remarked:

Upon Mr. Amyot devolved the task of white-washing Mr. Turcotte.

The letter written by Mr. Provost, and published in 'l'Événement,' on the 16th of April last, was not inserted in the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) has given the member for Montmorency the benefit of the doubt, and in order to justify his course in moving the adoption of the report, he remarked that Mr. Provost stated "that the letter contained the whole truth, that he had tendered in the regular way, and that he had been paid personally." Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to call your attention to that letter, and to say that it is most positively contradicted by the documentary as well as by the verbal evidence, produced before the committee. Mr. Provost states in his letter:

In that correspondence it is stated that Mr. A. J. Turcotte, M.P., had secured for Mr. Provost, his partner, the contract for furnishing groceries to the citadel, and that after the dissolution of the firm of Turcotte & Provost, I had claimed the profits of the contract, something like $1,600.

I desire to state here that I secured that contract in the regular way, by tender, and that at the time when I secured it I was not a member of the firm of Turcotte & Provost. Moreover, in view of the fact that, just then, I had no longer a store at my disposal, I made arrangements with the Turcotte firm for the delivery of my goods.

As to the other assertion of your correspondent, that I was to have $1,600 from Mr. Turcotte, for the fulfilment of my contract, it is entirely erroneous. I did not make any such claim, and I had no occasion to do so, for I was paid personally by the Government by cheques to my order.

J. B. PROVOST.

Now, let me call the attention of the hon. members of the committee and of the hon. members of this House to the statement made by Mr. Provost in the letter addressed by him to 'l'Événement.' The statement that he was not one of the members of the firm when he obtained the contract in 1891, and when the dissolution of the partnership took place on the 22nd of February, 1893, is disproved by the facts. He further states: "I was paid personally by the Government, by cheques to my order." That is a falsehood, for he was paid by Mr. Turcotte. He got a share, he received a half-interest, up to the 2nd of February, 1893, and since the 3rd of February, 1893, Mr. Provost has received and been paid only $100, not by the Government, but by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Turcotte), under an agreement dated the 2nd February, 1893. This statement is evidently calculated to mislead public opinion, and Mr. Provost declared that he published it only to put a stop to the rumour that he was the informer.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Mr. Provost swore to the truth of that statement.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) The hon. member may put the construction he likes on the evidence, but he should not indulge in quibbles. Even if Mr. Provost had stated that his letter to 'l'Événement' contained the whole truth, such a statement might be erroneous, and it is clearly so. He is, besides, an illiterate man, as shown when he was called upon to give his evidence before the committee, and he does not know the exact import of words, like the hon. member for Bellechasse. He might therefore have been unconsciously led into error, for, I am happy to say that I believe him to be an honest and upright man. Such is the proof made. Such are the uncontroverted facts in evidence. I do not know what stand the majority of this House are going to take on the question, but I hope the good example set by two Conservative members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections will find followers on the floor of this House, among the other members of the party. Should they not follow that example, many people would endorse the 'Star's' statement:

If the Conservative party can only live by such means it is time for decent men to wash their hands of the party.

SESSIONAL INDEMNITY.

Mr. FOSTER moved that, to-morrow, the House resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolution :—

That it is expedient to provide that for the present session of Parliament the deduction of eight dollars per day mentioned in section 26 of the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons, Chapter II of the Revised Statutes, shall not be made for twelve days in the case of a member who has been absent from a sitting of the House of which he is a member, or of some Committee thereof, during such number of days, but that this provision shall not operate to extend the maximum amount mentioned in section 25 of the said Act, and that in the case of a member elected since the commencement of the present session it shall not apply to days prior to his election.

Motion agreed to.

LAND SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAYS.

Mr. DALY moved that, to-morrow, the House resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolution :—

1. That the Governor in Council may grant the subsidies in land hereinafter mentioned to the Railway Companies, and towards the construction of the railways also hereinafter mentioned, that is to say :—

To the Rocky Mountain Railway and Coal Company, Dominion lands to an extent not exceeding 6,400 acres per mile for a line of railway from a point at or near Olds Station, on the line on the Calgary and Edmonton Railway, in a westerly direction to the Red River, and thence along the said river in a westerly direction to the Coal Fields, a distance of about 60 miles.

To the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, Dominion lands to an extent not exceeding 6,400 acres per mile for a line of railway from a point in the vicinity of Souris, on the Souris Branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in a westerly direction to the Pipestone Valley, a distance of about 32 miles.

To the Brandon and South-western Railway Company, Dominion lands to an extent not exceeding 6,400 acres for a line of railway from a point in Township 1 in either Range 23 or 24 west of the First Principal Meridian, in Deloraine, a distance of about 17 miles.

2. The said grants and each of them may be in aid of the construction of the said railways respectively in the proportion and upon the conditions fixed by the Orders in Council made in respect thereof, and except as to such conditions the said grants shall be free grants, subject only to the payment by the grantees respectively of the cost of surveying the land and incidental expenses, at the rate of ten cents per acre in cash, on the issue of the patents therefor.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BRUNEAU.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved :

That when the House adjourns this day, it do stand adjourned until 3 o'clock p.m. on Saturday, and that Government business have precedence on that day.

Motion agreed to.

FAST ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. FOSTER moved second reading of Bill (No. 161) further to amend the Act respecting ocean steamship subsidies.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before adopting this motion, I think the Minister should be in a position to give to the House the information that was asked for at the introduction of the Bill. We wanted to know whether it was the intention of the company to provide for cold storage, and as to what kind of freight would be carried, but he was not in a position to give us the information. I would like to know whether it is the intention that cold storage shall be provided in these steamers, and what is likely to be the class of freight to be carried by them ?

Mr. FOSTER. Cold storage is to be provided, of course. My hon. friend will see that by looking at the provisional agreement, the papers with relation to which have been placed before the House, the class of freight to be carried is really explained by the provision for cold storage. It is that class of freight which requires that peculiar treatment in its passage across the Atlantic to enable it to be put in good condition upon the English market. The same class of freight will be carried by these vessels that is carried by the vessels from New York, consisting of chilled meats, poultry and perishable goods of that kind, which require cool and even temperature, or which require freezing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) Before the Bill is read the second time, I beg to say that I was a good deal disappointed with the observations which the hon. Finance Minister addressed to the House upon the resolution yesterday. I expected the hon. gentleman would have been able to give to the House definite information upon this subject. He spoke of the proposed line as though it were a connecting link between the Australian colonies and Canada and the mother country. If there was no communication between Canada and the mother country without this very large appropriation, then the observations which the hon. gentleman addressed to the committee would have had more force. I think we are called upon to consider not only the material advantages that the country is likely to derive from this very large charge upon the public resources of this country, but we have also to consider what the effect may be upon the various means of communication that exist at present without any subsidies, and that will exist after such a very large subsidy is granted, under more disadvantageous circumstances than they do at this moment. I expected that the hon. gentleman, instead of dealing in generalities, would have given us information upon this subject. The hon. Minister, in the observations which he addressed to the House, showed that something between 150,000 and 160,000 tons of freight might be carried from Canada to Great Britain by these steamers each year, but he did not undertake to show the House what kind of freight these steamers were to obtain, and what the chances were of getting the necessary freights to warrant this undertaking. Now, Sir, we know that in the appropriation this House has made for steam communication between the Maritime Provinces and the West India Islands, the country has derived none of the advantages which the hon. gentleman anticipated, and which he led the House to believe would be derived from the establishment of that means of communication; on the contrary, we have from all the ship-owners who are engaged in the West Indian trade, complaints that the trade they are obliged to carry on as a mere private enterprise, depending upon freight charges which are made to those whose goods are being carried from the Maritime Provinces to the West India Islands, is seriously interfered with by the appropriation which Parliament has made, and instead of rendering substantial assistance to the commerce between Canada and the West India Islands, it has seriously damaged that commerce. Now, I did expect that the hon. gentleman would have told the House in what way this appropriation in aid of this projected line of steamers, if brought into active operation, would affect the steam communication that now exists between Canada and the mother country. There are important enterprises that have existed for many years for the purpose of carrying on trade between Canada and the United Kingdom. In what way are these parties to be affected by a Government appropriation? It does not seem to me that the consideration of that matter lies beyond the question we have before us, but on the contrary, it is pertinent to the consideration of this question how far we are to injure men whose money is invested in private undertakings, by subsidizing to this very large extent another line of steamers to enter into competition with them. Then the hon. gentleman did not point out to us in what way the country was to be benefited by this undertaking. He spoke in vague terms of the lines of steamers that ply rapidly between Europe and America being preferred to those that progress more slowly; but while this might be an advantage to travellers, the hon. gentleman did not show in what way that was to advantage us, how it was to benefit this country. It is true that he told us that wealthy men—and it is only the wealthier class who travel in this way round the globe—would visit our country, would be carried through it, would see various portions of it, but a class of persons who would thus be brought through the Dominion of Canada are not the class who are likely to make Canada their abode. Parties who are likely to settle here are of very different classes to those who would be carried through Canada if such a line were to be made successful. I do not believe the success in that respect will be what the hon. gentleman anticipates, and if it were, I am unable to see what great advantage the country is to derive from this undertaking. We in Canada have been promised, for the past fifteen years, the rapid settlement of the country, and the rapid increase of its wealth. Our late census shows that the expectations of the Government in those respects have not been realized, that the progress of settlement has been very slow, and that the increase of wealth in so far as personal property is concerned, has scarcely kept pace with the depreciation in the value of real estate, and so it is questionable whether the value of property in Canada, personal and real, is today very much greater than it was ten years ago. I think there has been a general feeling on the part of the great majority of the people of this country, that if we are to secure the settlement of our waste lands, if we are to add to the material well being of this country, to any appreciable extent, we are obliged to lighten the burdens of taxation and diminish public expenditure. It appears to me that, in order to accomplish this object, which is of the first importance, we should abstain from increasing further our liabilities and making large additional charges on the resources of Canada. The Government propose to enter into contracts which will impose, during the next ten years, on this country an annual outlay of three-quarters of a million of dollars. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) put to the Finance Minister during the progress of his speech, some questions which made it pretty clear that even if this enterprise is undertaken, it is not likely to be continued unless a larger subsidy is given even than is now proposed. Let me suppose, for a moment, that the hon. gentleman is able to get some parties who will secure the construction of steamers, who will put them on the route, and that it is found afterwards that the freights are very meagre, and that the number of persons who choose to travel in that way is not at all equal to the number of passengers the steamships could accommodate, what would the hon. gentleman ask Parliament to do if the enterprise was likely to fail? It is pretty clear that the hon. gentleman would not be willing to go back, but would insist on going forward, and we would, in all probability, be called upon to increase the subsidy which the Minister of Finance now asks. Whether that be so or not, it seems to me, looking at the resources of the country, the slow progress made in the settlement of our waste lands, and the circumstances of our population, it is not wise at the present time to increase the permanent charges on the revenue of Canada in the way the hon. gentleman proposes. I can see nothing in it that would be advantageous to the agricultural class. It can be a matter of no consequence to the farmers of Canada whether a steamship requires seven or ten days to cross the Atlantic from a Canadian port. There is nothing in the trade which the hon. gentleman has spoken of which will compensate the taxpayers for the very large sum which the hon. gentleman proposes to charge against the people of Canada. I have no doubt that, looking at the Government as now constituted—I am not speaking of the personnel of the Government, but of the departments of the Government—looking at what the expenditure had been in the past, what it is at this moment, without, in the least degree, interfering with the efficiency of the public service, it could be cut down at least two million dollars, and I do not say but that it might not be cut down by four million dollars a year. But the hon. gentleman's proposal is to add this year three-quarters of a million dollars to the expenditure, and thus seriously to interfere with the reduction of taxation which the people demand. Why, the Minister of Finance at the beginning of this session announced his intention to reduce the taxes. He must have thought it was a proper measure in so far as he was able to accomplish it, or it would not have received the sanction of himself and his colleagues. It may be that the measure is disappointing; but, however that may be, the intention was expressed, and I dare say the Minister would tell us now, if it were in order to discuss the subject, that the intention had been accomplished. But it is apparent that the hon. gentleman adds at one stroke $750,000 a year to the charges upon revenue, he will not be in a position, from his point of view, at all events, to further reduce the taxes of the people. How, then, does the hon. gentleman expect to secure immigration for Canada? We can only get people to come here and reside, to occupy our waste lands, and undertake to establish homes here by making Canada a cheap country to live in, by reducing the burden of taxation on the population; but the hon. gentleman proposes merely for the advantage of the wayfarer and sightseer who may cross the continent, to expend $750,000 annually for travel east instead of west. I do not think the people of this country have anything more than a very remote interest in what the hon. gentleman proposes to accomplish, and, as to the effects of it, they will be very different from what the hon. gentleman has pictured. He has told the House that Canada is the half-way house between Australia and England. That may be so if we take one route. It is off the line if we go by another route. I have no objection whatever to trade coming through Canada, if those engaged in the trade can secure it. I have no objection to Canada and other colonies being more closely drawn together, and I believe this might be done to the mutual advantage of all; but I do not think it would be advantageous that this should be done solely at the expense of the people of Canada, and I do not think the people of this Dominion are primarily those who have the largest degree of interest in it, either from political or commercial considerations, and that being so, I regret very much that the Government have committed themselves to this enterprise. I do not believe this is the most effective way of securing closer trade relations between Canada and the mother country. If we wish to cultivate trade relations we ought to undertake to reduce the liabilities as quickly as we can, to reduce the burdens on our population, to secure as far as we can freer intercourse between Canada and those other countries, and if we can succeed in lightening the burdens of our people and reducing the taxation, we will do more to promote trade and to secure settlement than we can by all the tall talk and the glittering generalities which the hon. gentleman has addressed to us on the introduction of this subject to the House. I make these observations because in the first place, I do not think that the hon. gentleman is likely to succeed. I may go further: I say that it seems to me that he can hardly expect to succeed, and if he did I believe it would be a very great misfortune to this country for many years to come.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up the time of the House at this late stage of the discussion on this great question for more than a minute or two, but I do not like to allow the observations which have fallen from the lips of my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) to go without saying just one word in reply. I did hope, after the discussion we had on this subject the other night, that the second reading of this Bill would have been passed without any further discussion and by the unanimous vote of this House. It does seem to me extraordinary that any hon. gentleman could think it possible to argue, that there is any doubt at all as to its being an advantage to this country to have a line of steamers plying between Canada and the mother country, at least the equal of these great steamers that ply between New York and England. For my part I do not think that the proposition is arguable, and I will not attempt to argue upon that line. If what so great an authority as Sir William Van Horne says is correct—and there is no greater authority on this continent than he is on matters of this kind—if what he says be correct, and if it be the case that we can divert a very considerable proportion of the traffic which now goes by New York to our own ports, then the benefit which will accrue to this country will be so great and so far-reaching that it is almost impossible to forecast their extent. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) says that we are off the main route if some other route is taken. Of course we are off the main route if an inferior route and a longer route is taken; but what we say is: we have the greatest transit service in the world across this continent; we have the finest steamship service on the Pacific, and the only thing remaining for us is to complete the link with the mother country and the heart of the Empire. We say that we have spent an enormous sum of money in providing the finest service across the American continent, that we have spent large sums of money in subsidizing these steamships on the Pacific, and we contend that we cannot possibly get anything like a commensurate benefit for the outlay we have already made, until by a fast Atlantic service, we complete the route between the east and the heart of the Empire. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) talks about the tremendous burden it would be to the people of this country; but the hon. gentleman seems to forget that when this country consisted only of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, we then subsidized a line of steamships to the extent of about half a million dollars a year. Canada now consists, not merely of Ontario and Quebec, but of the whole of the half of this continent. In those former days, we had no line of communication between the Pacific and the Atlantic, and we now have, as I have already said, the finest line of communication upon the continent. We then had no steamships on the Pacific; we now have the finest steamships crossing that ocean. At that time the revenue of Canada was $8,000,000 a year; to-day the revenue of Canada is $37,000,000 annually. At that time the trade of Canada with the mother country was $39,000,000 annually, to-day it is $107,000,000 a year. At that time the trade of Canada with the world was $78,000,000 a year; to-day it is $248,000,000, and yet the hon. gentleman thinks that it is extravagant on our part to increase, under these circumstances, the subsidy from $500,000 to $750,000. For my part the only doubt that I have on this matter is as to whether we have gone far enough. The only doubt I have is as to whether it would not have been better to have given even a larger subsidy—I do not say that it should have been done, but that is the only doubt on my mind.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister admits himself that this cannot be a route for the carriage of freight.

Mr. McNEILL. The Minister is here to answer for himself, but I never understood him to make that statement.

Mr. CHARLTON. Australian freight.

Mr. McNEILL. The vessels will be capable of carrying 6,000 tons; 2,500 tons of coal and 3,500 tons of freight. Why should they not carry freight? Why should not this be a route for freight as well as for passengers when we have such vessels on the ocean for the purpose of carrying freight? I should like the hon. gentleman to inform me why this should not be a route for freight?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman suppose for a moment that this route can compete with the route around the Cape or the Suez Canal route, for the carriage of freight, when by these other routes they have a continuous water way?

Mr. McNEILL. We are not talking about competing around the Cape for freight. We are talking about Canadian freight; we are talking about the freight of half a continent, and that is enough for a few vessels for some years to come. The position the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) takes is simply this: that having the finest line of communication across the continent, and having the finest line of communication upon the Pacific, we are to sit down here in abject helplessness and to say, that we will not attempt to have a fine line of communication upon the Atlantic, because this great country is incapable of having it, or because, I suppose, Providence has decreed that we are to be without. I cannot understand that argument. The country that did not consider the Rocky Mountains a barrier too great to overcome, is not going to say to-day that she is unable to provide a line of fast steamers on the Atlantic. The history of this country within the last few years teaches us a different lesson, and if my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) could raise his spirit to the height of the spirit of the people of this country, he would find that they have very little regard for such doctrine as he has been preaching to-night. I believe that the people of Canada to a man, when they understand this matter, will approve what this Government has done, and shall look with pleasure for the continuation of the great policy, which has been carried out so successfully in the past. This is only a portion of the same policy Canada has pursued; and the policy that has been carried out in the past would be incomplete if we said to-day: that we are not able to establish such a line of steamships on the Atlantic as is absolutely required to give us the full advantage of the outlay we have already made.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I do not wish to enter into a lengthy discussion upon this question, but I wish to put myself on record so that my opinion may be known. I listened attentively to the speech of the hon. the Finance Minister and I read it carefully over this afternoon, and knowing that he is an able man, and that he can present a question in its strongest light before this House, I have come to the conclusion that he was at a loss to find strong arguments to sustain the resolution that he moved. In my opinion he did not present one solid argument in favour of the project. In glowing language he spoke of the great advantages we were likely to have; but he never came down to details or endeavoured to show what classes of the people would be benefited by this fast line. He stated that the prestige of Canada would suffer if we did not have a line as fast as those which run from New York to the old country. Now, in my opinion, and in the opinion of men who know a great deal more about ocean navigation, it is impossible to have a line of steamers on the northern route that will make the same time as the steamers on the southern route, because the northern route has disadvantages which the southern route has not. Therefore, although we may vote this large sum of money for the purpose of establishing this line of steamers, we shall never have as fast a service as the southern route possesses. The result will be that a large number of the passengers whom we expect to get for this fast line will continue to travel as they do now, by the southern route. The Finance Minister tried to show that this fast line would be of great advantage to the farmers of this country. Wherein did he show that it would be of advantage to them? He said that this line would carry dairy products and other finer products of the farmers. But what advantage would it be to the farmers of this country to have their cheese landed on the English market one day sooner? Would they realize more profit on it? Not one sentence did the hon. gentleman utter to show that the farmers would realize one cent more on their dairy products by having them landed twenty-four hours sooner than is done by the present steamers. Then, with regard to our eggs, butter and other so-called perishable articles, what advantage would the farmers of Canada derive from having them placed on the English market twenty-four hours sooner than at present? If the hon. gentleman will come down to practical grounds, and show how our farmers will realize a higher profit on what they have to sell, or how they will otherwise be benefited by the establishment of this fast line, he will be presenting an argument which will be received by the people of this country; but merely to say in general terms that they are going to realize great profits is only begging the question. Then, I would ask, what great advantage is it going to be to the great majority of the people of this country to have a fast line of steamers which will land its steerage and other passengers in England twenty-four hours earlier than at present? I am within the mark when I say that not more than one out of every hundred of the people of this country cross the ocean at all; and to those who do it does not matter one fig whether they are twenty-four hours longer in crossing or not. Therefore, the people who are called upon to pay their subsidy are the people who are not going to realize any benefit directly or indirectly from the establishment of this fast line. It is said also that the boards of trade throughout the country have interviewed the Government and pressed upon them the importance of establishing this line of steamers; and the hon. gentleman went so far as to say that when any person spoke before the boards of trade in the large cities and mentioned this project, he was cheered to the echo, which showed that there was a sentiment in the country in favour of it. Did the hon. gentleman give the reasons put forth by these boards of trade as influencing them to interview the Government on the subject? What profit is to come to the cities from having their mails or their imported goods, or anything else, delivered one day sooner? There might be an argument in favour of that if we had not the cable line between this country and the old country; but in the presence of the cable I cannot understand how any firm or business man in this country could be largely benefited from receiving their mails twenty-four hours sooner than at present; and I have not heard a single argument from the other side showing what benefits they would realize. Nor have I heard a single argument to show what advantages would be gained by the ninety-nine people out of every hundred who are called upon to pay this subsidy, but who do not use the steamships directly or indirectly. Therefore, on behalf of these ninety-nine people, I am constrained to oppose this subsidy. The people of this country have borne a heavy burden for many years; they are now passing through a crisis; and they are hardly prepared to undertake the obligation of paying $750,000 a year for ten years, and after that $500,000 a year for another ten years, to establish a line of steamships which will bring no advantage whatever to the farmers and working people of this country. I think it is unwise to place such a burden upon their shoulders, and, therefore, in their interest I oppose this measure.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, I think it is right that I should say a very few words to express the opinion I hold with reference to the Bill which we are now discussing. I do not yield to my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), nor to my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon), in my support of any feasible and proper scheme calculated to bind more closely the ties between this country and the mother country, and to bring us nearer to our sister colonies. But, Sir, as was said the other night, with reference to the French treaty, so I think it may very well be said with reference to this proposition, that we ought not to allow a sentiment to carry us away, without some consideration as to the business character of the proposal, and the burdens which that proposal entail, and will entail for the next twenty years, upon the people of this country. We have done much, it has been said, in building the Canadian Pacific Railway; and in glowing terms my hon. friend said that the people who were not deterred from building a railway across the Rocky Mountains are certainly not going to halt in the establishment of an Atlantic line of steamers. But, Sir, the very fact that we have spent an enormous sum of money in building the railway uniting the Atlantic and the Pacific, ought, I think, to make us pause, and give our people a little time to recover before we add to the burdens necessarily imposed upon us by that great undertaking, by the addition of another subsidy for what is said to be the furtherance and completion of that great scheme. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have a connection with the mother country. We have two lines of steamers leaving our ports weekly from the city of Montreal and connecting with the mother country. Therefore, to say that we should now vote this subsidy of $750,000 a year because in the days of the old provinces, when we had no communication by the St. Lawrence, when we had to build up a line of ocean communication between Canada and England, we voted a comparatively much larger sum in proportion to our resources than we are called upon to vote now, does not appear to me to be an argument which at all tends to the conclusions which the hon. gentleman wishes the House to adopt. When we subsidize a line of railway, do we subsidize it where a line is already in existence? No, we establish a line of railway, we grant a subsidy, in order to open up communication by rail between certain points, between which there is no communication. But to-day we have communication not, I am quite willing to admit, as fast or perhaps as well equipped as we would like—but still a communication between the St. Lawrence and the mother country, which, on the whole, is fairly and reasonably good. Then just let us see what benefit we expect to derive from the granting of this subsidy. Do we expect that we are going to carry many more passengers? Perhaps we may. I have had some little experience of crossing the Atlantic. It has been my fortune, within the last eleven or twelve years, to have crossed the Atlantic as many times. I have either gone or come, and in some cases have both gone and come, by the St. Lawrence, and have had opportunities of conversing with the steamship captains regarding the proposal which has been mooted from time to time for the establishment of a fast line. And what has their experience been? I have no desire in any way to decry the enterprise, but I feel confident in saying that their experience has been that twice perhaps in a year—once the 'Parisian,' the best boat on the Allan Line, and once the 'Vancouver,' the best boat on the Dominion Line, carries a full load of passengers from Montreal or Quebec to England, and on every other trip these boats go without a full load. Now, that is an actual, positive fact. It is not that they are not able to carry the number that offer, but that, with the exception of the July trip on the Allan boat and the corresponding trip on the Dominion boat, there is not a sufficient number of people offering, even at the reduced rates at which these boats carry passengers, to fill up the room and space they have for passengers. Exactly the same thing happens on the return trip. Once on the return route in September, these boats are also crowded to their utmost capacity, and once only, and if you take the trouble to look into the fifty-one other occasions on which these boats cross, I venture to say you will agree with me that they do not carry one-third of their capacity. We might, if we had a fast and better equipped line, induce a certain number of wealthy people who now go via New York to take the boats which ply to and fro from that port,—the 'Majestic' and the 'Teutonic' of the White Star Line, and the other boats of the Cunard, and the other lines of steamers, but we must also remember that there is also the North German Lloyd boats which carry a certain proportion of people even from Canada—we might get a certain proportion of these people to take the St. Lawrence in preference to the other route. But I do not think any hon. gentleman will contend that if we had on the St. Lawrence route the very best line of the whole four or five, that all the Canadians would go by it. People like variety, and my own experience is that friends of my own have sometimes chosen, for the novelty of the thing, to go by the German Lloyd boats at one time and by the Cunard boats another time, and again by the White Star Line; and I have not the slightest doubt that if we had the very best line of them all, we would not even control the whole of our own trans-Atlantic traffic. I admit also, if you choose, that we would induce a certain proportion of people of the Western States to go by our fast line. I think that is quite possible, though I do not believe it would be a very large number, because I think the majority of Americans would still continue to go by New York, but it is possible that a fast line, such as we propose to establish would secure a certain proportion of the travel from the Western States. But granted that these boats would be laden down with passengers, of the class of people who can afford to pay the rates of a twenty-knot boat, I want to know how this country will be any the better off by that. I want to know how, for the $750,000 you are going to put on the necks of the people, they are going to be better off because boats sailing by the St. Lawrence go out—if your imagination will carry you so far—week after week, laden down, every berth full, with travellers who are able to pay high figures for the accommodation. Some of them may be Canadians, some of them may be foreigners. Unless this country grows much more than it has grown in recent years, the bulk of them must be foreigners, if these vessels are to carry full loads. And are the people of Canada to put their hands in their pockets and pay to establish a quick express service for the benefit of the Americans, the citizens of St. Paul, Minneapolis, Chicago, and the other cities of the west? What earthly benefit will that be to the people of Canada? People come in here now through the tunnel at Sarnia and pass on to Boston by the Grand Trunk. Do let us be practical. I have seen these trains go by laden with Americans, passing through Toronto, and these people, when they are not sleeping or lolling on their soft cushions in the Pullman cars, look out right and left at our smiling fields. I would like to know what great advantage it is to us to carry people in that way. Yet the proposal is that we are not merely to give them rail accommodation, but give them Atlantic accommodation at a cost every year to our people of $750,000. That is what it amounts to. If there is going to be any great benefit derived from the passenger traffic—and I am assuming now, much against my own conclusion, that this line will go full, because when you come to think of the winter months, what will it be? Are our people in the west going to travel down by the Intercolonial Railway to St. John or Halifax in order to catch that steamship line, or will they still go by New York? I do not believe that there will be five per cent of the few who travel from Canada in the winter months who will take this line in preference to the New York route. They are not going to spend sixty hours, I think it is, in a railway, with the chances of a snow blockade, in order to take a steamer from Halifax, when in fifteen hours they are certain to get to New York and may take a boat from there. But for the sake of argument, conceding that these boats will carry all these people, conceding what the highest and wildest imagination on this side of the House can picture, let us see what will be the case in the matter of freight. Are we to be called upon to add to the subsidies we are already paying in order to get our freight carried? Are there not vessels enough leaving the port of Montreal now to carry all our freight? Is there an hon. gentleman sitting in this House, on either side, who will pretend that for want of vessel accommodation in the St. Lawrence our freight is driven to take another route? Sir, the trouble is not there. The trouble is that the vessels that go from here have to come back empty, because we put a tariff on goods coming to this side that prevents the importation of English goods. Take down the tariff—bring that down to a reasonable level so that cargoes can come from the other side into this country and you will have fewer vessels coming into Montreal empty, and you will have done something to build up the trade between this country and the mother land without costing this country $750,000 a year for subsidies. I have taken the pains to look into the Trade and Navigation Returns. I have not the figures by me at the moment, but I can state the general result of my investigation, which is that many of our vessels have to come into the port of Montreal in ballast, the meaning of which is that the cargo they take from here has to pay the freight both coming and going. The difficulty is not that we cannot find vessels that we need to subsidize carriers for our freight. Why, as the hon. gentleman who last addressed us (Mr. Macdonald, Huron) said, and said with perfect truth, with conclusive truth, is there a merchant who cares whether his freight is twenty-four or thirty-six hours longer coming or going—

Mr. FOSTER. Lots of them. You will find them in your own city, if you inquire.

Mr. McCARTHY. I would like to know in what kind of goods there is the necessity for such speed. Take the farmers of this country—does it make the slightest difference whether our exports of wheat or other produce of the farm go in a 20-knot vessel or—

Mr. ROSS (Lisgar). Or in a sailing vessel.

Mr. McCARTHY—or in a sailing vessel, practically; whether they go by an Allan boat that will take fifteen days to get to London, or whether they go by a boat that will steam at 20 knots and reach her destination at Southampton in six days. There may be some classes of goods for which a fast service is desirable, just as there are express parcels for our railways to carry goods that will bear the expenses of quick transportation. But, for the bulk of our trade, I venture to say that no practical man would pretend that these goods would bear the cost of what is practically an express service. And so we come back to the question, what is this proposition? We are asked to establish this line, with its $750,000 of cost upon the people of this country—and why? Because Sir William Van Horne, the highest authority, as my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) said, upon this subject, has spoken in favour of it. Sir William Van Horne would be a great fool if he did not speak in favour of it. If this project is going to benefit any body, it is going to benefit the carriers of this country, and particularly the Canadian Pacific Railway. But we have already done for the Canadian Pacific Railway as much as we can afford to do, and as much as this country is prepared to do. We have subsidized it with $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of land, and we are not called upon to do anything further for the Canadian Pacific Railway. I wish that road every prosperity, but it must now take care of itself, as it seems to me. It cannot be expected that we in this country, for the benefit of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or the Grand Trunk Railway, or any of these carriers can give any further aid in any form or shape. And that is practically all that Sir William Van Horne has ever said or urged—and very naturally—in favour of this line. But, Sir, apart from that there is a matter, not so important in one sense, and yet, I venture to think, of some little importance. I think that before we vote this money we ought to know that this scheme has a reasonable chance of success. We have already the experience of voting subsidies to railways, which, with the imprimatur of the Dominion of Canada upon them have been able to go into the money markets of the world and obtain capital which otherwise they could not have obtained. And we have had capitalists complaining, not making legal claims, but setting up moral claims, the complaint being that by our endorsement of the scheme we have given it a currency, which on its merits it would not have secured. I do not believe that we ought to pass this Bill on any such supposition. I think the hon. Finance Minister has a very shrewd suspicion that that will be the result. And I dare say, looking at the state of the exchequer, that is his hope. I do not think he cares to add to his deficit now looming up in enormous figures the amount of this subvention. In fact, I do not know where he is going to get the money.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Reduce the tariff.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not quite see the point of my hon. friend's observation. What I ventured to say was that I do not believe that by reducing or increasing the tariff, you can screw many dollars out of the people of this country in the shape of taxes. I think that you have gone—that is, that we have gone—to the utmost limit of the tax-paying power of the people of this country, and the present condition would seem to indicate that. If hon. gentlemen agree with me in the conclusions I have drawn, then, as reasonable men we ought not to be carried away by the kind of rhetoric we have been listening to, but, as reasonable, practical business men we ought to see whether this scheme can be made a success. If a practical man cannot take a sheet of paper and show a reasonable prospect of this scheme being floated, or of its being a success when floated, I do not think any man of business would say we ought to proceed. Most of us can make our fortunes on paper, but I do not know any one who can make a fortune out of a scheme of which he cannot predicate in advance that it is likely to be a success. Now, we have heard expressions from the Finance Minister—for he did not seem to know very much—

Mr. FOSTER. That is chronic.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think the hon. gentleman will blame me for saying that.

when we remember that at one moment he announced, in reply to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that the cost of these vessels would be $200,000 apiece, and a moment later was compelled to admit that they would cost about five hundred thousand dollars—I should say pounds—apiece.

Mr. FOSTER. Pounds—my hon. friend seems to be as far out as I was.

Mr. McCARTHY. I made the mistake of saying dollars instead of pounds. That is about the calibre of the hon. gentleman, that is about the kind of observations we are treated to from him when he seeks to be witty. I think the hon. gentleman, remembering the high position he holds, had better, for the dignity of the country, if not for his own, treat such matters with a little less levity.

Mr. FOSTER. Thank you, my mentor.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think I was justified in saying that the hon. gentleman knew but little about the matter when he stated at one moment that the cost would be £200,000 apiece, and soon after had to admit that the cost would be between £400,000 and £500,000.

Mr. FOSTER. And the hon. gentleman knew about as much when he spoke of their costing that number of dollars.

Mr. McCARTHY. I made the mistake of saying dollars for pounds. I made a mistake, just as he sometimes might do, in saying dollars instead of pounds. However, that is neither here nor there. Now, Sir, he admitted afterwards that the cost would be $60,000 or $70,000 per trip.

Mr. FOSTER. Fifty thousand or sixty thousand dollars is what I said.

Mr. McCARTHY. Pardon me, I heard you distinctly. I cannot take back water on that, for I heard the hon. gentleman say $60,000, or $70,000—unless he wishes to correct himself and put the amount right again. Then, if you will make that up and multiply it by the number of trips, and make some allowance for the wear and tear, and then put on the other side the possibilities from travel and the possibilities from freight, which the hon. gentleman has not favoured us with, I do not believe there is a practical business man in this House who can make the two ends meet. Then what will happen? Either one of two things must happen, either the scheme cannot be floated, and discredit is done to us in propounding a scheme which is rejected by the people of London, or the scheme is floated and fails to be successful. Then, of course, there will either be an absolute collapse or a claim made upon us to add to the subsidy we have already granted. That argument will be used, the argument has already been used. Why, we have gone $500,000, and this is only $250,000 more; and then if we give $750,000 and Mr. Huddart comes back and tells us. I have tried to float this scheme and cannot do it on $750,000, I must have a million, we will be asked to give a million. But if the scheme is floated and fails, we will be asked to support it by an additional grant in order to keep up the credit of the country. Now, I think the first thing we ought to have had from the hon. gentleman who undertook to bring this scheme before the House, was a statement, such as we had a right to expect, as to the possibility of success. That we have not got, and so far as we have extracted from that hon. gentleman any figures on the subject, these figures do not warrant, in my humble judgment, and I do not think they do in the judgment of any business man in this House, a belief that this scheme is likely to prove a success. Now, I cannot approve of this scheme, first and foremost, because I see no advantage to the people of this country in the establishment of a fast line, beyond a secondary one; secondly, I do not believe that this line can be a success. I am putting aside altogether the doubt which has been thrown upon the St. Lawrence route, because my own belief upon that subject is that in day light—I do not think the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would go any further than I am willing to go—in day light, or in bright nights, the St. Lawrence is probably as safe as the open sea. But given a fog, I do not think even the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, brave and intrepid as he is, would feel satisfied that a vessel should be propelled beyond the very slowest possible speed in the St. Lawrence, looking at the ice we find there, and looking at the difficulties of navigation when, during a period of fog, it is impossible to navigate a ship. Now, there is no use of our living a fool's paradise and shutting our eyes to the dangers of that route in some kinds of weather. Of course we know it is a beautiful route, it is much pleasanter for those who travel to keep in sight of land, to get off the wearisome sea voyage at an earlier period. I quite appreciate all these advantages, but at the same time those who travel as often as I do have experienced the delay, for I do not think I have ever travelled both ways when we were not delayed some considerable time, at all events, by fog, when it would be madness for the captain to allow the ship to go beyond a snail's pace. Even if we had our twenty-knot boats, it would not be expected that we could make twenty-knot time; the result might be at best, with our short distance—I think it is 300 miles shorter—or with a faster line, not necessarily a twenty-knot line, that we might establish practically as short a route between Quebec and the other side as they do between New York and the other side, giving 300 miles in our favour. But what does that come to with these enormous ships? We hear every now and then of a great Cunarder or a ship of some other New York line, having made Queenstown in five days and thirteen or fourteen hours. That is the best they can do, and we know that the bulk of people get off at Queenstown and have to travel eight or ten hours before they reach Liverpool; so that the time amounts practically to about six days. Now, while a service of sixteen or seventeen knots would be a more reasonable one for our route, more consonant with our means, quite sufficient for every purpose, we would practically be within six days of the other side, and I think we can attain that without burdening the people of this country as it is proposed. But we are called upon for what purpose I have not been able to conceive, to grant this subsidy in order that the people may come from far off Australia and travel over a Canadian route and then take boat and go to Liverpool. I would like to know whether a man who is making a journey of forty or fifty days, would be induced to come, or prevented from coming, by the existence or non-existence of a fast line. We have got the grand service of the Pacific, we have got the grand service we hear of across the mountains, we have a service to suit us from Montreal to England. If a man wants to go from Australia to England, is he going to say: I am not going by that route, I will go by the Suez Canal and endure all its discomforts, all its heat, all the dangers from sickness attendant on that route, because when I get to Montreal I will only find a boat that goes fourteen or fifteen knots an hour? Now, is that likely? I do not think it will ever enter any man's head to refuse to come by reason of that difference in time. Now, I would be willing to give a small sum to encourage the Allans and the owners of the Dominion Line, if encouragement be needed, to improve their service. I am free to admit that the service for passengers has not been kept up since the building of the 'Parisian' and the 'Vancouver,' as we had a right to expect. But what does it prove? It proves that the practical men engaged in this business have not felt warranted by results to give us a better service, and the Allans will tell you that the boat that loses the most money is the best boat they have on the line, the 'Parisian,' the favourite boat that always commands the travel whenever the travel is there for it. For these reasons I desire to have it understood that I am opposed to the grant of this $750,000.

Mr. KENNY. It is very evident to the House that a great change has come over the spirit of the dream of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He has told the House for the first time since this question of an improved Atlantic service has been under discussion, that in his opinion a fast Atlantic service would be no benefit to Canada. We all know that so far back as 1889 this House, in its wisdom, decided that it was in the interest of Canada to subsidize a fast Atlantic service to the extent of $500,000. So far as my memory serves me, when that question was under discussion in this House the hon. member never said one word in opposition to that project.

Mr. McCARTHY. Nor in its favour.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman protects himself now by telling us that he never said a word in favour of it. If he thought it would be disadvantageous to Canada, as he now professes to think it to be, it was his duty to have told us he was opposed to it, and have given the House the reasons for his opposition, but as he remained silent it is evident he was recreant to his duty to that extent if he believed then, as he says he believes now, it would be injurious to Canada. The hon. gentleman has referred to his experience in trans-Atlantic navigation, and he has told us that he feels warranted in speaking with authority on this matter, owing to the fact that during the past ten or twelve years he has made frequent passages across the Atlantic. On this question, therefore, the hon. gentleman, as far back as 1889, when he explains he did not say a word in favour of a fast trans-Atlantic service, he was, from his own personal experience, as familiar with this question as most of the hon. members of this House. I think it is regrettable that the hon. gentleman, entertaining the strong views he does, did not make them known sooner to the House, and the hon. gentleman cannot therefore expect his arguments to have the same weight as they would have had if they had been presented when the question was first brought under discussion, for it is difficult to reconcile the hon. gentleman's silence with the vote of $500,000 per annum in 1889, and the speech he made to-night. The increase under consideration is $250,000 a year, and he is terribly apprehensive that this additional amount is going to entail vast disadvantages on the Dominion of Canada. The hon. gentleman also told us that before this scheme was accepted by the House, it was the duty of the Government in proposing this measure—I presume he throws the responsibility on the Government—to state to the House the amount those steamers will earn each trip, the value of the passenger list, the amount of the freight list, in order, I suppose, that this information may be used for or against the promoters of this project when they go on the money market of England. We are to-day simply asked, if it is not wise in the interest of Canada to increase the amount we voted with the hon. gentleman's sanction.

Mr. McCARTHY. Not at all.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman certainly was a member of this House in 1889 when $500,000 was voted, and when every project which was likely to increase the intercourse between Canada and the mother country received his cordial approval. He had no misgivings in those days in regard to the expenditure of $500,000 for improving those relations; but for reasons which I will not attempt to define, he has entirely changed his view in regard to this project and other measures which he seemed formerly to favour, and the advocacy of which gave him his principal influence in this House. The hon. gentleman said it was the duty of the Government to state to the House exactly the financial aspect of this question, so that hon. members might know in advance what the passenger list will be, and what the freight list will be; in other words, the Government were asked to tell the House what the revenue of the steamers would be. We can estimate the expenditure, because we have particulars respecting the disbursements of other ships crossing the Atlantic, and the cost of those ships upon a round trip, but no man living could make a positive estimate as to exactly what the freight list would be, what the rates for freights would be, or the rates of passage. That is a risk which the owners of the ship will have to take, and I think it will be rather the duty of the promoters of the enterprise when they issue their prospectus to make that statement rather than for the Government to make it here. The hon. gentleman said that when this project is launched on the money market of England the fact of the name of Canada being identified with it involves on us the obligation and duty of inquiring exactly into questions of freight and passengers, and the hon. gentleman has argued that as in regard to railway projects when floated on the London market, if afterwards they turned out not to be unsuccessful, their failure inures to the disadvantage of Canada. Whatever force there may be in the hon. gentleman's statement as regards railways in Canada, it can have no application to the present project, for this reason: capitalists, ship-builders and business men of England know quite as much as we do, and a great deal more, in regard to trans-Atlantic steam navigation, and therefore I must say there is no force in the hon. gentleman's argument wherein he made it obligatory for the Government to come down with a positive statement as to the returns with respect to earnings from freight and passengers. The hon. gentleman also stated that we must take some time during which to recover from the large expenditure made on the Canadian Pacific Railway. We all admit that for a population as small as that of Canada, we have incurred a very large obligation; but it has been urged, on the other hand, and it is a valid argument to use in this case, that it is only the part of wisdom that we should endeavour to establish a fast Atlantic service in order to derive the full benefit of the expenditure we have previously made. The hon. gentleman thinks a fast Atlantic line will not increase travel through Canada, and that even if it did, it would be no advantage to Canada. I must say that this is a novel doctrine; I have never heard it argued in this House or out of it that it was not advantageous to divert to our shores and through our territory a large amount of passenger traffic.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the hon. gentleman explain how people carried across this continent and taking a steamer at Montreal will prove beneficial to the country?

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman in some aspects of the case is more sanguine as to its success than I am. Looking at the passenger traffic, he thinks it possible that passengers may come from New York to take the St. Lawrence route.

Mr. McCARTHY. I did not say so—the hon. gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. KENNY. I remember that the hon. gentleman spoke of western travel, because we are all familiar with that question, and there is a general belief that a fair amount of passenger travel will certainly be secured for this line from the Western States.

Mr. McCARTHY. I hope so.

Mr. KENNY. But before the hon. gentleman arrived at that point, he intimated to the House that there was some other source of travel.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman evidently misunderstood me.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) thinks that it will be no advantage to Canada to have a large amount of travel diverted to it from other countries. He must be sufficiently familiar with the ordinary routes of travel throughout Europe to know that the most noticeable recent improvements on that continent are to be found along the most frequented lines of traffic. Not only is that the case in Europe, but it is positively established with respect to this continent. Even in an old settled country like Europe, the hon. gentleman must know that within the last ten or twenty years the greatest progress that has taken place, is due entirely to the fact that by an improved system of railways, and improved steamship communication, the course of travel has been diverted to the more progressive cities and countries. What has happened in Europe is very certain to happen here. Therefore, I think it is very much to be regretted that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) having this information in his breast for so many years—because he has told us that it was within ten or twelve years that he has commenced to cross the Atlantic so frequently.

Mr. McCARTHY. Ten or twelve years since I first began to cross, and I have been gaining information ever since.

Mr. KENNY. Well, 1889 is only five years ago. If the hon. gentleman possessed this information five years ago, when the question was under consideration in the House, he either had a very poor opinion of the value of the statements he might make, or else perhaps he had a poor opinion of the intelligence of the House.

Mr. KENNY.

Mr. McCARTHY. There is a third explanation more obvious still, and that is that I was not present in 1889.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman was, perhaps, crossing the Atlantic in 1889?

Mr. McCARTHY. I think, perhaps, I was.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I just happen to notice that in 1889 the hon. gentleman was busily engaged in discussing a subject entitled "Wrecking in Canadian waters," so that he must have been in the House then.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman considers that he is not to be held accountable for not having expressed his views before, simply for the reason that he was not here in 1889. I speak subject to correction, but it is my opinion that this question has been frequently referred to in the House since that date, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) must have been very frequently absent if he had not some opportunity before the present, and before this change of sentiment came over him, to explain his views to the House. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) stated that Canada had foolishly spent some of her income in establishing steamship communication between Canada and the West Indies, and that the only result of that outlay had been that we injured certain sailing ships that were engaged in the trade, and that no advantage had accrued to Canada. I understand that this question was referred to in the House very recently, and that one gentleman who sits on the same side with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) expressed his opinion that it was an advantage to Canada to have a steamship service with the West Indies. If the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) will look at the total exports from Canada to the West Indies in 1887, when we had no steamship communication with those countries, he will find that they amounted to $2,005,559 worth, and that in 1893, when we had steamship communication, they amounted to $3,059,140. I will readily admit that our trade with the West Indies is not as satisfactory as I think it should be, and that when I argued in favour of a subvention for that steamship service it was because I believed that without that service we should lose the trade we then possessed. I may say that, having watched the development of that steamship traffic between Canada and the West Indies, I am more convinced than ever of the correctness of my argument then, because I find that gentlemen who were active in their opposition to that proposal, are now in self-defence obliged to encourage steamship communication, and are actually agents for steamship lines between Canada and the West Indies. Let us see again if the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) is correct, that it has been no advantage to Canada to have steamship communication with the West Indies. In the year 1887, when we had not steam communication from Canada to the West Indies, our total export of flour to that country amounted to 254 barrels. Now, the hon. gentleman will not contend that we cannot produce as good flour as any country in the world, and in order to show the development of that trade under a steamship service, I may say that in 1893, with steamship communication, Canada exported 13,228 barrels of flour to the West Indies. I think that is a very satisfactory answer to the statement of the hon. gentleman. Take our exports of animals and agricultural products to the West Indies. In 1887, without steamship communication they amounted to $181,440 in value, and in 1893 with steamship communication they were $469,381 worth. I give these figures to prove the correctness of my previous contention, that if we had not the steamship service our exports to the West Indies would have been infinitely less than they were in 1887. Whilst I make this statement to the House, I must say, also, that, in my opinion, our trade with the West Indies is not as large as it should be, and I think that is very considerably due to the fact that the people of the United States have more steamships and better and faster steamships, running from their country to the West Indies, than we have from ours.

Mr. McCARTHY. Subsidized ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They were at first.

Mr. KENNY. As the trade between the West Indies and Canada has developed under a steamship service, so I believe that the trade between England and Canada will develop under a fast Atlantic steamship service. Another hon. gentleman told us that all the boards of trade of Canada had petitioned in favour of this improved Atlantic service, and yet the same gentleman says that it is going to be no benefit to the business of Canada. That would simply mean that he knows better than the merchants of Canada; and the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) must know better than all the boards of trade of Canada, because he places his individual opinion against the united wisdom of all those boards of trade in the different cities of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman has intimated that this project is not likely to be a success. Well, I do not know any better way to accomplish its failure than the mode of procedure which the hon. gentleman has adopted, he has intimated to us that he would be glad if it would succeed, and, sharing that opinion with him, I regret exceedingly the form of address which he has made to the House this evening.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, in speaking on this question I am not in the position that was attributed to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), because when the vote for $500,000 was proposed in 1889, I then expressed myself as unfavourable to that grant; and I am still more confirmed in that position to-day when the proposed vote has been increased to $750,000. Now, I have listened to the discussion that has taken place, and I have not heard any arguments at all addressed to the House that would warrant us in making this large grant. It is a serious matter to increase the debt of this Dominion by thirty or forty million dollars. Our debt is now a very heavy one for five million people, being equal to $60 a head for every man, woman and child in this Dominion, while the debt of the United States, with 65,000,000 people, is only about $12 a head. Look at the position of Canada as compared with that of the United States. The United States, with 65,000,000 people, have been content to go on in their own way, without establishing a single line of steamers to cross the Atlantic ocean. Until lately there has not been a single line of American steamers crossing the Atlantic. All the steamship lines crossing the ocean are owned by English or Scotch capitalists, and are registered in Liverpool, London or Glasgow. Yet we, with our five million people, with an enormous debt, with great demands on the treasury, and with deficits anticipated next year, and the following year—a little country like this wants to rush into deeper debt in order to have a fast line of steamers at a cost of $750,000 a year. Now, I am satisfied that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) would get up and oppose this proposition if he did not suppose that the terminus would be at Halifax.

Mr. KENNY. I think that is a most unfair observation for the hon. gentleman to make. I addressed the House on this subject yesterday, and I never mentioned the name of Halifax in the whole of my speech. I think it is hardly fair for the hon. gentleman to attribute such motives as that.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not want to hurt the hon. gentleman's feelings at all; but I know that the hon. member for Halifax is too good a business man; he has too much at stake in the city of Halifax, and he has too much knowledge as a business man, to advocate a scheme like this if he did not know that it was going to be a great benefit to the city he has the honour of representing. I believe the same thing is true of the hon. members from the city of St. John. They expect that St. John is going to be the terminus; and a short time ago what did we find the business men of St. John doing? When they believed that the terminus was not going to be there, they passed a resolution strongly opposing the grant of $750,000. So far as the boards of trade are concerned, I think the great majority of them have pronounced against this scheme. I think it was only a short time ago that the board of trade of the city of Hamilton passed a resolution opposing this scheme; I understand that the board of trade of the city of Kingston passed a resolution opposing it; and the other smaller boards of trade throughout the country, such as those of Brantford, Galt and Guelph, have all I believe, passed resolutions opposing it. I do not know any board of trade, except those of Toronto, Montreal and Halifax, that has passed resolutions in favour of this proposed grant. Now, the hon. member for Halifax brings up the question of subsidies to the lines of steamers sailing to the West Indies, and he argues that if these have been a benefit, the proposed subsidy would also be a benefit.

Mr KENNY. I was answering the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills).

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. gentleman, at all events, argued that as the line of steamers to the Spanish and British West Indies had increased our trade, the like result would follow from the establishment of this line of steamers. But the conditions are altogether different. To the British and Spanish West Indies there was formerly no line of steamers at all; there were only sailing vessels; and it is impossible to build up a trade when you do not know when your shipments will arrive or leave. But what is the fact in the other case? We have now in Canada four lines of steamers crossing the Atlantic. There is no difficulty in making shipments to England, Ireland or Scotland; we know every day that these steamers are going to sail from Montreal or Quebec or Halifax. If we had no line of steamers already, it might be argued that we should establish a line; but having these lines, I think it is the height of folly to establish another line for the sake of getting steamships three or four knots an hour faster than we have at present. Now, the only argument advanced in favour of this scheme is that our passenger travel would be increased. Granted that it would. It would be a great wonder if we did not get some benefit. There is no doubt that a few more passengers would cross by these steamers than by the present lines; but I venture to say that very few passengers from western Canada or the western States would go via Montreal or Halifax when they could go by the New York route, which is a much shorter rail route. They want a change, and they can go there and find a steamer sailing every day in the week—as fast a steamer as we could hope any of the proposed steamers to be. Then, what object would they have in taking a long railway journey in order to go by a steamer from a Canadian port? Then, how much of our mail matter would go by these steamers? Are business men going to hold their letters over for a steamer that sails once a week? What matter if their letters have to wait for twenty-four hours? To-day telegraphing is cheap, and no business man thinks of doing business with the old country by letter. It is too slow, and it matters little whether our letters go in six days or eight days or nine days, as long as they get there. Then, after all, what does any person care whether his letters go by Montreal or New York, as long as they go safely? We can now send our letters either via Montreal or New York or Boston, as we desire. So that, even supposing the passenger travel did increase, I do not see that it is going to be of great benefit to the people of Canada if we have to provide this fast line of steamers at an enormous expense. We shall have to pay the piper. I do not think it will pay. Looking at the matter in all these features, I am decidedly opposed to this grant. I think it is altogether premature for a small country, burdened down as we are. With so many demands made upon us, and with so many ways of spending our money, I think we might well hesitate before granting this large sum to establish a fast line of steamers. I am satisfied that it will never carry—it is not expected to carry—our bulky freights. These will have to seek the markets of the world in smaller vessels, of which there is an abundance now. The only trouble is that these vessels cannot get freight, and as I have said, the bulky freights must seek the markets of the world in cheaper and slower boats than this fast line. Our butter and cheese and such things have now plenty of boats to carry them across, and it does not matter much whether they reach the other side two or three days sooner or later. There are a great many other ways in which we can spend all the money we can spare to much better advantage. And it is not only $750,000 that we may have to spend. The chances are that we will have to improve the service on the Pacific Ocean, and to pay an additional amount for carrying the mails. And apart from all that, it is not fair to these enterprising men who have established lines of steamers at enormous expense to step in and create a competing line, and thus ruin their business. It is well known that if we give this large grant to this new line, we must thereby take traffic from the Allan, the Dominion and the other lines from Montreal. And it is not fair to those people to build up a rival line for which there is no occasion at all. I therefore think the motion is very unwise, not in the interest of the people, and one which should be rejected by this House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not, at this hour, intend to add much to what I had occasion to say when the hon. Minister of Finance introduced this measure, but I take the opportunity of remarking to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) that his speech, quite as much as that of the Minister of Finance, convinces me that this is absolutely a leap in the dark, so far as any genuine knowledge is possessed by the Government as to the possibility of making of this line a commercial success. I differ totally from certain hon. gentlemen in believing that it is not our duty to discuss and analyze any such proposition as this. It is emphatically our duty, when the Government ask us to enter into a contract, extending over a most unusual term of years, to analyze and examine, to the best of our power, the statements on which that proposal is based. There can be no doubt whatever that it will not be to the benefit of the credit of the people of Canada if large sums of capital are induced to be embarked in this enterprise—whether furnished by English or other capitalists. I do not care—and if it should prove, as the hon. gentleman knows right well, a great many other investments of English capital in Canada have proved—to be a very unremunerative enterprise. I know perfectly well that for many a long year after the Grand Trunk Railway was constructed—and yet the Grand Trunk Railway has undoubtedly, in the long run and on the whole, proved of very considerable service to the people of Canada—the credit of Canada suffered in a very considerable degree. I know that the improvement of Canada in many ways was very greatly retarded by reason of the fact that members of the Canadian Government of that day had—probably without sufficient reflection—committed themselves to predictions with respect to the success of that road, which unfortunately were very far from being fulfilled. Why, as long a time after its construction as 1875 and 1876, I had the ill success of that enterprise continually flung in my face, when I was negotiating loans in London for the benefit of the people of Canada, and the point on which those capitalists most insisted was that prominent members of the Canadian Government had recommended it as a highly remunerative one to the English public. I am not going to say that it would not be greatly to the benefit of the people of Canada to have an improved steam service. On that point, I think there is a tolerable consensus of opinion. But what we have to consider is: first, whether, under the proposition now submitted, there is a reasonable chance of securing the service, and next, whether we can afford to pay for the luxury. For my part, I am bound to say that, looking at the present financial position of Canada, I regard the proposition to pay $750,000 a year, in addition to our present engagements, as one which ought to be very carefully considered indeed, before we commit ourselves to it, especially for a period of ten or twenty years. Every human being who pays the slightest attention to the state of affairs in Canada to-day knows that in all human probability, for some considerable time to come, we will have very great difficulty in making both ends meet, unless we choose to greatly increase our taxation.

When the Government know that there is already a deficit, in an all probability, of not less than $500,000, if the account be fairly stated, for the year 1893-94, and when they know that there is the strongest possible likelihood that there will be probably a very considerably greater deficit for the succeeding years, they have no right to propose to add $750,000 a year to our expenditure or thereabouts, unless at the same time they show where the money is to come from. It is their duty, when they make such a proposition, to tell us in what way they propose to obtain the funds, because they are perfectly well aware—I think that is very clearly demonstrated—that there is no reasonable ground for expecting that the people of Canada collectively are going to be benefited to any great extent, no matter how great a success this line may be. But there are one or two other considerations which the Government might have said something about, and about which they have said nothing. I have very considerable doubts—and I know they are shared by men of long experience in these matters—whether it is likely that you are going to carry on successfully a mixed freight and passenger service at this very high rate of speed. Practically, I believe, the great ocean greyhounds, as they are called, which maintain a very high rate of speed across the Atlantic, do not attempt to carry any considerable quantities of freight. I do not believe that freights in sufficient quantities to bear a very high rate of toll will be found for these boats. Nor have the Government brought forward any evidence whatever to contradict that opinion. Now, there are certain natural advantages which Canada possesses, if a fast service be desired, which the Government might, under certain conditions, have fairly presented to our view. There is no doubt, as I hinted the other evening that there are points, particularly points in the province of Nova Scotia, which are very much closer to Europe than any other point on the North American continent. I had reason to believe that, under certain conditions, operating in conjunction with the Imperial authorities, operating, perhaps, in conjunction with the United States authorities, it might have been possible for the Government, by judicious arrangement, to have obtained the co-operation of these other Governments in starting a really fast passenger line between certain points in England—or perhaps Ireland, though I think England would be the preferable terminal point—and the extreme available point in the province of Nova Scotia. The distance would be very little more than two-thirds the distance from New York, and it might be possible—if it is a matter of such enormous importance to obtain such an extremely fast service—to obtain a service which would give a decided advantage to the Canadian route over any other possible route. A line might be run in that way that would shorten the Atlantic trip to four days instead of six or seven days, which is the present average; and if, in the course of invention, it became possible greatly to increase the speed of ocean steamers, the same relative advantage would be found for this route. I could understand the Government coming to us after due co-operation with the Imperial authorities and with our neighbours to the south, with a proposition to shorten by one-third the ocean ferry from Nova Scotia to England or Ireland, and I think that perhaps an arrangement might be made which, without putting a heavy burden on the people of Canada, would give us, if it is so desirable a thing, this fast passenger and mail service. I do not mean to say that even that could be made to pay without large subsidies, and I do not mean to say that it would be possible for us, by our own individual and proper motion, to make it pay; but I do say that if such be the object of the Government—and be it remembered that it is only as a very fast line for passengers than any sort of argument has yet been brought forward in favour of this line—it might be, I say, that something might be done in that direction. But I am bound to say, Sir, that, for the general benefit of the people of Canada, I can see nothing in the proposition now submitted to them which warrants the expenditure of three-quarters of a million dollars per year in the present financial condition of the people. We are to bind ourselves for twenty years to an expenditure of three-quarters of a million dollars a year. There is a great deal of force in the remarks which were made by one or two hon. gentlemen in reference to this matter, that you are extremely likely to be called upon for much larger subsidies for both ends of the line. You are extremely likely, if this $750,000 prove inadequate, to be called upon for a much larger sum for your Atlantic service, and I suspect that you will be called upon for a much larger sum presently, if this scheme does materialize, for an improved service on the Pacific. Now, Sir, it is sheer folly for us to enter upon these engagements without seeing our way better than I believe the Government sees it at this time. I say, and repeat, when the Government with a deficit known to exist in the current year, with a deficit likely to exist in the ensuing year, propose to add largely to the expenditure of the country for a considerable time, it is their duty to say what particular set of taxes they are going to put on in order to pay for this. I must say that I think there is only too much ground for believing that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was perfectly correct in saying the Government bring this down without any very strong belief that the scheme will be put in practice within any reasonable space of time, or that they will be called upon to provide the funds for it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to say a few words, Mr. Speaker, because I think the question a very important one. If we read the signs of the times and observe the manifestations of the people, we must see plainly that this is one of the important requirements of Canada to-day. Whether we consult the commercial world, the travelling public, or the sentiment of the country, we find the scheme indorsed. The hon. member for North Simcoe says that no reason has been given in favour of this scheme except a sentimental reason. But even that is a good reason. In the Intercolonial Conference, which was held here within the last few days, it must have been apparent to every one who paid the slightest attention to it, that one of the important reasons that was urged for the bringing the colonies closer together, or in getting them under something like a commercial zollverein, was a sentimental one, and that was urged by almost every member of the conference. Sentimental reasons in real life often induce nations and individuals to do things that they would not otherwise do. Therefore, we ought not to overlook the sentimental reason. The hon. gentleman says we cannot make the speed on this route. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries gave reasons for believing that we could make speed on this route. His reasons were given from the experience of men, who, above all men in the country, ought to know the truth in this matter. At least the reasons were satisfactory to my mind, and I believe that we are safe in assuming that speed can be made on the St. Lawrence route. The third objection of the hon. member for North Simcoe was that a man going across the ocean did not care for a fast route. I think he gave the best answer to that. He told us that for many years past, while he had been travelling back and forth between here and the old country, in the majority of instances he had gone by way of New York.

Mr. McCARTHY. I did not say that.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to tell us how many times in the last twelve years he has gone by way of New York and how many times by the Canadian route? I understood him to say that most of his trips were made by way of New York, and why should that be the case if there is no advantage in the line? We are living in an age of excitement, enterprise and hurry. Business and travel take the shortest route, and the object is to save time, whether one hour or many. Take the case of two railways touching common points. Any man who is travelling will take the railway which makes the shortest time to the point he wishes to reach. So will trade take the quickest route. The hon. gentleman asks what benefit it will be to Canada to have passengers come by this route instead of by New York. Is it not a fact that passengers travelling through the country become a great means of advertising the country? The fact that we are on a highway of travel, that people come by this way from China and Japan, as well as from Australia, has been a means of advertising for Canada which we could get in no other way. So long as people travel by these routes there will always be the incentive for the investment of money in various enterprises here, and in that way, if in no other, the country will benefit. We know that to-day, whatever may have been the fact a few years ago, travel from Canada to England, Ireland or Scotland is largely by way of New York. We believe that that is due to the fact that they have faster lines of steamers, that our own lines are getting behind the age. The hon. gentleman asks why we do not support the lines in existence. One gentleman said we had four lines of steamers crossing the Atlantic from the port of Montreal, and that it is an injustice to them to subsidize another line, because they propose to make faster sailings. But we do so because these men have fallen behind the times. Though they have made large sums of money out of this trade, they do not see their way clear to giving us a faster service, and because they believe they control whatever trade there is, they are not prepared to improve their lines of steamers. For this reason these steps are proposed in order to provide a faster line than we have to-day. Now, if it is claimed that it will not be a success from a commercial standpoint, we might ask whether these men have made money out of the business heretofore. Who are the millionaires of Canada to-day? Are they not the steamship-owners of the country? Take the men who run the Allan line, who run the Beaver line and the Dominion line; these are men who have made a great deal of money out of Canada during the last twenty years; these are the wealthy men of the country, and they have made their money out of this trade. But to-day their lines are falling behind, because the country needs more rapid transit, and the steamship companies need to improve their speed every year. Now, consider this question from a farmer's standpoint. We know that in public discussions all over the country there has been many expressions of opinion that it is important in the interest of Canada that we should improve our steamship lines, not only by way of obtaining a faster transit, but in the way of cold storage. It is proposed in this scheme to include cold storage for the carriage of perishable commodities from Canada, and that is one of the more important requirements of the time. We are told that for this subsidy of a little more than $500,000 a year the country will reap no corresponding advantage. Well, consider the development that has taken place in our export trade during the last two years. Take the product of cheese exported to the old country. A few years ago it did not represent $500,000, now it represents nearly $13,000,000 a year; a small portion of the returns from this one line would pay annually the sum asked for in connection with this scheme and the development of that trade, as also in other perishable goods of farmers' produce, can be largely enhanced by better steamship communication. But we find that we have not made an equal development in the lines of butter, fruit and various other things on account of the very slow steamship travel to-day, and because we have not the advantages of cold storage, and if we can get both greater speed and cold storage by the subsidy that is offered to this company, then it becomes important that we should give it. Although we may not be able to figure out to our own satisfaction just how much trade will be developed by reason of this fast line, neither could we do it when we proposed to subsidize the Canadian Pacific Railway, neither could any one tell what the trade of Canada would be by reason of that enterprise. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is opposed to it, and I inferred from his remarks that if he had been in the House a few years ago, he would have opposed the proposal to give $500,000, as was done for this purpose. Well, it is only an acknowledgment to his own constituency and to the world that he has been negligent in his duty heretofore, because it has been the exception rather than the rule that the hon. gentleman has been found in his seat attending to the business for which he was elected. But when he tells us now after a lapse of some five years that he finds out that he made a mistake then, it is an acknowledgment that I would scarcely expect him to make in this House, and he will not make it when he goes back for re-election, if he ever does go back to that constituency. His silence on that occasion gave consent to the proposition, and I do not think his constituents will blame him for it. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said this was a jump in the dark. Well, the hon. gentleman said the very same thing in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway. He says we are going to destroy our credit abroad by this grant, just as we did in the venture of the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I would like to ask that hon. gentleman if there ever was a time in the history of Canada when our credit stood higher in the markets of the world than it does to-day. We have by means of this expenditure opened up these vast lines of communication, and I think it was most unfortunate for him to advance that argument, because if there is one thing more than another that has strengthened our credit, I think it is our experience with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The hon. gentleman says that we cannot afford to pay the price for this luxury, as he calls it. I am sure the business people of Canada do not regard it as a luxury, but as one of the necessities of the day. The voice of the people for several years has spoken in that direction, and the Parliament of Canada have responded by making this offer, which we believe will accomplish what is needed for Canada. The commercial world thinks it is needed and the commercial world ought to know what is needed in that line better than any one else. The class of men who are engaged in navigation think that it is possible, and they ought to know whether it is possible. The voice of the Canadian people is that it is needed, and I think that as a class they know as well what they want as the people of any other country. We know what has been accomplished for Canada in making her known to the outside world by means of the Canadian Pacific Railway that we have built up, and that experience I think will warrant the further expenditure that is now asked for. It seems to me that we are standing in this position to-day. We have made one of the great highways of commerce across our country that has been a great advertisement to the country, that is attracting not only capital from abroad, but people from abroad, and is bringing us abreast of the great nations of the world. But there is one link in that chain that is wanting, and for the want of that connecting link we are not receiving the benefit that we ought to receive from this vast thoroughfare crossing our country; and if we supply that link I am satisfied that in time to come we will find it to our benefit, and we will not regret it any more than we regret to-day the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It may be said that we have not been able to give statistics to satisfy every man in this House that we will receive dollar for dollar in return for the outlay; but in no enterprise of this kind can any man figure out beforehand what the result will be. We know that we are living in a fast age, and those who are not keeping up with the age are falling behind. What suited us twenty years ago will not suit us to-day; what suited the travelling public ten years ago will not suit them to-day. Unless we keep up with the age we must fall behind, and if we neglect this means of supplying the great need to our country that I have pointed out, we will be recreant to the trust reposed in us by the people of Canada.

Motion agreed to, on division.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 12.30 a.m. (Saturday).

Mr. SPROULE.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

SATURDAY, 14th July, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. BAKER moved the adoption of the tenth report of the Committee on Public Accounts.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Will the hon. gentleman state the purport of the report?

Mr. BAKER. The report recommends the printing of the report and exhibits. There is no conclusion drawn by the committee—the matter is left wholly in the hands of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. Does the hon. gentleman expect that this printing can be done before the session comes to a close?

Mr. BAKER. Not unless the session is protracted beyond the length now expected.

Mr. LAURIER. That would mean that there will be no discussion during the present session.

Mr. BAKER. No discussion on the printed evidence in complete form. The evidence has been printed from day to day, and is nearly complete; so there is nothing to prevent discussion, if the subject is brought before the House.

Motion agreed to.

REVISION OF LISTS.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day, I wish to call the attention of the First Minister to a paragraph which appears in a newspaper, it is true, but that newspaper is the Montreal 'Gazette,' which is supposed to be more or less an organ of the Government, and to have more or less some authority and importance. It is headed "Revision of Electoral Lists." It says:

The electoral lists for the Dominion Parliament are now undergoing their annual revision. Mr. H. J. Kavanagh, Q.C., is the revising barrister for Montreal Centre, Mr. Justice Archibald for Montreal West, and Mr. Justice Mathieu for Montreal East.

It goes on to state the qualifications of the electors under the present law, and it concludes as follows:—

Those who have not yet registered their names should do so as early as possible, so as to secure their names being placed on the lists before they close.

I do not understand that it is expected the revision will take place under the present law and under the present rolls. I understood, some few weeks ago, that instructions had been given to the revising officers not to proceed with the revision of the lists, in view of the amendments which the Government contemplated in regard to the law. I do not suppose that a contrary order has been given.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That paragraph can have no reference to the Dominion lists. There were instructions given not to proceed, and I am sure the revising officers are not proceeding, and will not proceed until the decision of Parliament is given on the Franchise Bill.

REPRESENTATION OF QUEBEC WEST.

Mr. LAURIER. I have not observed, Mr. Speaker, that you have yet issued your warrant for an election to fill the vacancy in Quebec West.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have not notified the House of the issue of the writ, because I have not been notified of a vacancy having occurred in the representation of Quebec West.

Mr. LAURIER. I have a pretty distinct recollection that the Prime Minister himself announced the death of the late lamented member. I observe that the statute reads as follows:—

If any vacancy happens in the representation of the House of Commons by the death of any member or by the acceptance of any office, the Speaker on being informed of the fact by any hon. member in his place—

I would have supposed under this section that the notification of the Prime Minister would have been sufficient to inform the House that a vacancy had occurred, and a writ would have been issued.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not read the Act in the same manner as does the leader of the Opposition. I think I require to be specially informed by some member rising in his place and announcing it, on which of course my writ would be issued immediately, or this would be done on my being notified in the other way, by two members in writing.

Mr. LAURIER. If that is your decision, Mr. Speaker, given in accordance with your construction of the law, I beg to notify you of the death of the hon. member for Quebec West.

Mr. McCARTHY. I should like to know whether it is not competent under the provisions of the statute for the House to directly issue a writ. I do not think the power of the House to control the issue of the writ is taken away because the statute directs that you, Mr. Speaker, may issue a writ in a certain event. That is a cumulative and additional power, but the authority of the House to issue a writ still remains. If not, it would be well to repeal that section, as it should be left open to the House during the session of Parliament to do, as is done in England, direct the issue of the writ. I can see perfectly well that it is important that the Speaker, when the House is not in session, should be able to exercise his power, but when the House is in session it should direct the issue of a writ. It appears to me that it is a shocking scandal that this constituency should have remained unrepresented for six or seven weeks because you, Mr. Speaker, have not been technically informed of the death of the late member, although the Prime Minister made a eulogy with respect to the late deceased member which I think was joined in by the hon. gentleman opposite, and everybody assumed it was known, although perhaps not officially to you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. AMYOT. This House is not Parliament; it is bound by the laws of Parliament, and you, Mr. Speaker, are bound by the laws which Parliament has passed, and this House has no right to override the laws thus passed.

Mr. SPEAKER. My own view with regard to it is, that certain preliminaries must take place before the Speaker can issue his warrant, and these preliminaries are specified in the Act. With reference to vacancies, the Act declares:

If any vacancy happens in the House of Commons by the death of any member, or by his accepting any office, the Speaker, on being informed of such vacancy by any member of the House in his place, or by notice in writing, under the hands and seals of any two members of the House, shall forthwith address his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for the issue of a new writ for the election of a member to fill the vacancy, and a new writ shall issue accordingly.

Now, as I read the statute, I am of the opinion that I must be informed in one of the two ways specified; either by a member rising in his place and informing me directly of the vacancy having occurred, or by two members informing me in the other manner described by the statute, by sending me a notification over their hands and seals.

Mr. AMYOT. That is the law.

Mr. McCARTHY. Pardon me, Mr. Speaker; you have not answered the question as to whether the House has the right to issue the writ.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think I should be called upon to express an opinion upon a question of law of that kind.

Mr. McCARTHY. Oh, you know all about the House.

FAST ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 161) to further amend the Act respecting Ocean Steamship Subsidies.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In the first place I desire to inquire of the Minister of Finance, what authority he has for supposing that we will escape the surtaxe, as it is now, if we send our vessels to an English port and then communicate by a cross service with a French port?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think we will escape the surtaxe at all.

Mr. LAURIER. Then what is the use of having this communication if you do not escape the surtaxe?

Mr. FOSTER. The proposition for a service connecting with Great Britain and France, is a proposition which was decided on by Parliament, as to its desirability, before we had a French treaty at all.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes, but if I understand the matter, the only object of this complicated service in compelling these boats to be connected with a French port, was even at that time to avoid the surtaxe.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Mr. LAURIER. If that was not the object, what was the object of the subsidy which was given three years ago, and to which the Minister of Public Works referred with great pride, the other night. We subsidized a few years ago, a direct line between France and Canada, with the special object of avoiding the surtaxe, and if it is not to avoid the surtaxe, what is the object of it? Does the hon. gentleman expect that he can develop a trade by this hybrid system of having communication at the same time between France and England. I can understand boats plying directly between Canada and France or between Canada and Great Britain; but I confess—and the hon. gentleman must admit himself—that he lays a very serious objection upon the practicability of the line he proposes to subsidize, if he compels these boats to be connected with a French port. If it is not to avoid the surtaxe, I am at a loss to understand what are his motives for having such a communication as this.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Possibly the hon. gentleman wants to kill two birds with the one stone. He wants to make the French treaty a nullity, which I think it practically will be if the surtaxe goes into operation; and at the same time to make it impossible to get the contract, which may be a desirable object all things considered, for this fast service.

Mr. LAURIER. Surely we have a right to get some information from the Government. Here is a resolution of just ten lines binding the Parliament of Canada, to a subsidy of $750,000 a year, and even at this moment when we are considering the Bill in committee the hon. gentleman is not able to tell us what is to be the nature of the communication which we will have. It is intended that the boats to be subsidized will call at a French port? There is a preliminary contract with Mr. Huddart, and if it materializes, is it intended that the boats should call at a French port, or is it intended that there should be a line between an English port and France?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend will recollect that I answered that question the other evening. I said that it was impossible to tell yet. It will be modified by the circumstances and conditions as they are found to be. I explained then that there were two methods by which the connections could be made. One was that the main vessels should go of themselves to a French port. I explained that if certain ports were ultimately decided upon as the ports of connection in England, that that would be rendered feasible. That is: that it would be rendered much less difficult than if certain other ports were chosen. We do not know as yet what port will be chosen as the port in Great Britain, so that it is impossible to answer the hon. gentleman's question, and it will have to just be regulated and guided by the circumstances as they arise. We propose to give $750,000 for a subsidy, and we must moderate our fulfilment of that, according to the conditions proposed by this resolution, with circumstances as they arise. The other method of communication would be by a cross-service which could be easily carried out, and if one of certain ports is decided upon as the best port in Great Britain, this cross-connection would be the only service which could be had.

Mr. MULOCK. Would you escape the surtaxe by that?

Mr. FOSTER. We would not escape the surtaxe by that. As I explained to my hon. friend, we would not escape the surtaxe by the vessels breaking bulk in an English port before they went to a French port, but we would escape the surtaxe if the vessels went direct to a French port.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do think that it is absurd for us to proceed with this Bill in the face of the very meagre and unsatisfactory information that the Government is able to give us. If the Minister is disposed to deal fairly with the House, the information that has been asked for should be given to us and to the country, and should be laid on the Table before we proceed with the Bill. By passing this Bill, we are virtually placing in the hands of the Government the granting of a subsidy of $750,000 a year for a fast line service, and we are leaving every detail and every important matter absolutely in their hands. There is no information given as to what is going to be done. Then, with regard to the anticipated freights to be carried from this side to Europe, and from Europe to this side, we are also largely in the dark. Now, I think it is not treating the House properly to ask them to pass this Bill and then to go home, leaving the Government to see what they can do during the recess. I was sorry yesterday that, owing to my having asked a question across the floor when the Speaker was in the chair, I was deprived of the privilege of addressing the House on the second reading of the Bill; but I fully endorse the criticisms then offered upon this scheme by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I do think it is a scheme entirely beyond the financial powers of the people of this country, in the face of the burdens they have now to bear, and I think the House should insist on having more information before consenting to its adoption. We have a fairly good steamship service to Great Britain now, and by the course we are asked to pursue we are going to hamper and cripple that service. We are threatening to establish a new line that will largely take from them the traffic they now have, and we are going virtually to prevent the improvement of those lines as long as this Act is on the Statute-book, because their owners will fear from year to year that this fast line is going to be put into operation, and that their lines will have to become merely freight lines. It is not treating those lines fairly to proceed in this way, and for my part I will oppose this scheme at every opportunity.

Mr. McCARTHY. I would like to have a more direct answer from the hon. Finance Minister to the question with regard to the surtaxe. If this fast line calls at an English port before going to a French port, would our goods be subject to the surtaxe?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. McCARTHY. Notwithstanding the treaty, which allows our goods, if they go by a direct line, to be admitted free of that tax. I think it expressly says that goods of Canadian origin, to be admitted free of that surtaxe, must go direct.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is a provision of the law regarding the surtaxe d'entrepot. That is not in the treaty.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am right about that. The treaty says:

The following articles of Canadian origin imported direct from that country, accompanied by certificates of origin, shall receive the advantage of the minimum tariff on entering France.

Would it not be considered a direct importation simply because the vessel called at Southampton or some other English port on the way?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the goods must go from a port on this side, possibly from an American port, direct to a French port, without calling en route.

However, the Minister of Finance can make a more authoritative statement on that point.

Mr. FOSTER. I think there is no doubt that if a cargo starts from Canada, and the vessel calls at another European port before it calls at a French port, and breaks bulk, that would not be considered a direct importation, and the goods would be subject to the surtaxe d'entrepot.

Mr. MULLOCK. Suppose it does not break bulk?

Mr. FOSTER. If it does not break bulk it seems to be reasonable to suppose that would be direct.

Mr. MULLOCK. Has the Minister nothing more than a mere opinion upon it? Has there been no discussion to ascertain what construction the French authorities would place upon such a condition? The matter should not be left to guess work, because the Minister has recommended the treaty on account of the preference it will secure for our goods in France. If we are not going to get the benefit of preferential rates, what is Canada getting in return for what she is giving? Surely the Government have some understanding with the French authorities as to what sort of carriage will secure to us the benefits of the treaty.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not a matter for understanding with the French Government at all. France has a law on the subject, and the treaty contains no modification of that law. We must send our importations direct, for the French law requires that to be done, otherwise they are subject to the surtaxe d'entrepot. It is not considered feasible that the steamers sailing from Canada to England should call at a French port. Great quantities of our goods, such as canned goods and fish, may go direct by sailing vessels and other lines from Canada to France, or through the United States to France, irrespective altogether of this line. It is not expected that this line of fast steamers should go to an English port and then to a French port, even though by doing so they would secure exemption from the surtaxe.

Mr. LAURIER. At all events, one thing is clear: we were all under the impression that this connecting with a French port was with the view of avoiding the surtaxe; but I understand from the statement now coming from the Treasury benches, that that is not the intention. May I ask, therefore, what is sought to be obtained by this connection? The hon. gentleman must admit that it is a great obstacle to the establishment of this line. If the men who are to invest their money in the enterprise are to be told that it is an obligation upon them to have a connection with a French port, that is a construction which I am sure that no one up to this moment has given to the proposition. This is a point on which we should have information.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it is a mistake to say that the connection with France, referred to in this Bill, was pressed with a view to avoiding the surtaxe, because that condition was a part of the arrangement for a fast line before the treaty was negotiated. If I do not mistake, it was in the Act of 1889, before the negotiations for the treaty commenced, and the object was to facilitate trade with the continent.

Mr. LAURIER. But even at that time there was a tariff, to which our goods going into France were subject. If they went by England, or if the vessel carrying them called at another port, they were subject to the surtaxe, and if the treaty meant anything at all it meant that our goods were to avoid the surtaxe, and to be subject only to the tariff. The surtaxe existed in 1889, and I understood that one of the objects of the treaty was to avoid that tax.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the doctrine of continuous voyage were to apply in this case, it seems to me that under the arrangement the hon. gentleman proposes we ought to escape that tax. It is well known that in the early part of this century the Americans undertook to carry goods between the Dutch West Indies and Holland, and landed those goods in Boston, reshipping them there, and carrying them to Holland. Lord Stowell held that when the intention was, at the time the goods were shipped, that they ultimately should go to Holland, the fact that they were landed and re-shipped again at Boston did not prevent the voyage being regarded as a continuous voyage. The same doctrine was laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the prize cases during the period of the civil war. Goods intended for the Southern states were shipped very often to Nassau and re-shipped there again for the southern ports, but the court held that as the intention was that these goods should ultimately go to the southern ports, at the time of the original shipment, the voyage must be regarded as a continuous voyage. If goods are shipped from Canada with the intention that they shall go to France without being transhipped—if that was the original intention and they are carried to France, it seems to me that the marine doctrine of continuous voyage ought to apply in the construction of this treaty. If that be so, the construction would not be adverse to this country, as the hon. Minister of Finance points out. But I wish to call the attention of the committee to opinions which have been expressed by the Minister of Finance and by the High Commissioner with regard to another matter. Of course, it would be irregular to allude to anything that transpired in a former debate during this session, but I may say this, without any reference to the place where the opinion was expressed, that the Minister of Finance led us to believe that this subsidy was being proposed with the view of giving effect to the representations which the High Commissioner made on a former occasion. The High Commissioner said that although there was no intention of including the proposed establishment of direct communication with France in the treaty, as that would be contrary to the policy of this Government, nevertheless that was the intention. That intention has not been abandoned, and I understood the hon. Minister of Finance on one occasion to say that when this subject came up for discussion, it would be seen that the Government had not abandoned that intention. If the hon. Minister is now rightly construing the effect of this subsidy, the Government have abandoned that contention, that intention is not being carried out, the appropriation of this money for the proposed line has nothing whatever to do with the treaty, and will not have anything to do with giving effect to any representation the High Commissioner made to the French Ministers. If that is so, then certainly either the hon. gentleman was mistaken in the views he expressed on a former occasion, or the Government must intend to propose something more than they have yet submitted to the House, because if the Government have not abandoned their intention of establishing direct communication with France, we must expect something further on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend, I think, strained the argument, and I do not think the data are quite sufficient to justify the conclusion he has come to, that something like bad faith will be exercised towards the French Government if the fast line service is not implemented by direct communication between Canada and France. What the High Commissioner simply did was to make a statement of fact expressed in a statute passed by this House, namely, that a certain subsidy had been granted for a line of communication between Canada and France. That was a fact which might well be stated, as giving an earnest of the intention and desire of Canada to develop trade as far as possible with that country. But certainly there can be no contention that bad faith would be exercised, so far as the French treaty and trade are concerned. There is no surtaxe d'entrepot in this country. And whatever may be contended with regard to the surtaxe d'entrepot in the case of goods shipped by a British vessel from Canada to France which touches during the voyage at a British port, that can be no bar to the sending of products to Canada from France by a vessel which touches at a British port. So that that cannot be in the least construed as showing any bad faith in connection with this treaty. But we may as well understand, first as last, that before there was any talk of a French treaty, this policy of through communication with France was agreed upon, not only with reference to trade with that country, but to trade communications in general. The idea long present with the House was that we should have a fast Atlantic service, and in course of time it came to be mooted, in connection with that idea, that if we had a fast line of steam service with Great Britain, we should extend that so far as to have connection with the European continent, and when the question came to be considered what part of Europe should be the destination, the decision was arrived at to make the connection with a port in France, and that intention was expressed in a statute, without reference to any treaty or avoiding the surtaxe d'entrepot. The surtaxe d'entrepot is a law of France intended especially for the benefit of her own commercial marine, and the conditions of it must be met by us as well as by any other country that makes a treaty with France, and in no case does France take off this surtaxe d'entrepot from any country with which she makes a treaty, provided the conditions are such as to warrant the exaction of that impost.

Mr. EDGAR. With reference to the interpretation by the Government to-day on the effect of sending Canadian goods to France by a vessel which touches first at an English port, I think that the High Commissioner, on a very important occasion, took quite the reverse view. Sir Charles Tupper publishes, at page 37 of the blue-book, an extract from a speech which he made to a deputation from Milford Haven, representing that as a good point for the Canadian line. He said to that deputation:

There was, however, one feature connected with the matter which had not been prominently adverted to. It was the feature to which Canada attached a deal of importance. That was they proposed to have not only a direct and rapid communication by going to an English port, but they proposed also to have a direct line of communication between Canada and the continent of Europe by requiring vessels to proceed on to a French port. Owing to the system adopted, and held with such tenacity by France, the trade between Canada and France was greatly obstructed by the want of direct steam communication between the two countries.

The next clause is one to which I will draw the particular attention of the Minister of Finance:

Now, a vessel coming to an English port in the first instance would not at all affect the regulations in France, provided the vessel went on under through bills of lading and delivered her cargo, if intended for France or any port on the continent of Europe, without having landed it in England first.

Now, what is the position that the Commissioner took, that the surtaxe d'entrepot could not apply, and would not come in force against Canadian cargoes, so long as the cargo was not landed at an English port. I do not know whether that was right or not, but it seems not to be a correct view according to the Minister of Finance. Perhaps the Minister of Finance can say what reason he has for doubting the High Commissioner?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is all the better.

Mr. EDGAR. It may be all the better; but do you not see, Mr. Chairman, that the Commissioner, who has been specially engaged over there not only in negotiating the treaty, but in looking up the different ports in England to which the fast line might run, is supposed to know a good deal about the subject he is specially paid $10,000 a year for looking after. And if he was wrong, and if the Finance Minister is right to-day, I really would like to know. The Minister of Justice may have looked up the French law on the subject, for, after all, it all depends on that. What is the French law on the subject?

Mr. AMYOT. I think I am able to satisfy the hon. gentleman. I have a pamphlet published by "La Presse" on the 25th of March, giving an extract from the French law, which is as follows:—

It is also admitted that direct transfer by sea is not interrupted by stoppage on the way in one or many harbours in other countries to load or unload the vessel, if the goods being entitled to the favour have not left the ship and no such goods have been loaded on the ship at that port.

So it seems that the interpretation given by Sir Charles Tupper is the right one, and that the Government—

Mr. EDGAR. Are wrong.

Mr. AMYOT—in promising so little, are not beyond the mark, and that they will probably give us much more than they promised.

Mr. EDGAR. But then their interpretation—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have no interpretation. We do not give the House to understand that we have any assurance that the goods will be admitted. We do not undertake to say that the law of France will be administered by them in a certain way, and we must—

Mr. LAURIER. Go it blind and take what you can get.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, we do not go it blind at all. But we get the communication for trade purposes with the continent which Parliament desired us to get before there was any negotiation on hand, before there was a treaty. Then we try to get the best interpretation of the treaty that we can; but we should be fools if we promised in advance that the authorities in France would administer the customs law in a certain sense, a sense which we desire, but which we cannot dictate to them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But it does look the most slipshod imaginable legislation and the most unbusiness-like legislation for the Government to come down with a proposition to engage ourselves in a contract involving so large a sum of money, and not be able to inform us now, after having had the benefit of three or four of these gentlemen in Paris for months together, upon so simple a point as this.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Because they had nothing to do with this project.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But it was the hon. gentleman's duty to ascertain this point before submitting the question to us. We ought to be advised on these matters. We cannot form an accurate judgment as to the value or the possible cost of this scheme unless we are advised. It is quite clear that either, to all intents and purposes, you must have a French terminus or those who purpose contracting for this service must maintain a cross service, which will be a pretty expensive operation. Does the hon. gentleman know the cost of a cross service, if you have your port at Milford Haven or Liverpool?

Mr. CASEY. I deeply sympathize with the hon. the Premier and the hon. Minister of Finance in the trial to which they are submitted to-day in discussing this subject generally. They are teased with questions. They are asked to explain things. They are asked to describe things. And what are they asked to explain and describe? They are asked to describe that which is indescribable. They are asked to explain that which is unexplainable. For the scheme before the House is very much like chaos, as it was before the Creative Spirit passed over its surface; it is without form, and void. It is indescribable and inexplicable to any ordinary understanding, and I submit that it is unfair to ask these hon. gentlemen for explanations which cannot be given, for facts which they do not know, for opinions which they admit they are not qualified to give. But, although this scheme cannot be described, it can be illustrated in a vague way—the whole matter is vague; it is a floating question, the Ministry and the country are at sea about it; the whole scheme is at sea. But it can be illustrated to the mind of one who will think of those great devilfish or octopuses described by Victor Hugo, with a small body—in this case, a very small mass of concrete facts, bobbing up and down in the middle of the Atlantic—and eight tentacles reaching for support in all directions. No, not the whole eight tentacles, one of them is fixed, anchored firmly around the citadel at Quebec, for we are told that Quebec is the only possible summer terminus. Another tentacle is feeling along the shores of Nova Scotia trying to insinuate itself into the harbour of Halifax, while another passes Nova Scotia and is stretching up into the Bay of Fundy, floating in the bore of that celebrated expanse of water to see if it cannot obtain a footing—I suppose one can hardly speak of a footing for a tentacle, but a place to fasten upon, in the harbour of St. John. On the eastward, the other tentacles are spreading far, one towards Southampton, another towards Liverpool, another towards Havre, and another towards some port in Germany.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Where did you locate the bore?

Mr. CASEY. I am told that it arises with greater force and vigour in the county of Cumberland than anywhere else. All this mixture of discussion that has arisen about the subject leads us, in the immortal language of Sir Boyle Roche, to "smell a rat and see him brewing in the air." In all this discussion of summer terminus and winter terminus, we see the rat materialize. In this connection, I may be able to relieve the anxiety of my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and those who are in doubt as to what this steamship line is intended to carry. We have had a great deal of discussion as to what it will carry, and where the freight is to come from. I infer from the misty, yeasty mass of discussion that has arisen, that this scheme is intended to carry, at all events, all those ports in the Maritime Provinces which can put forward any claim to be the winter terminus of the line. The two hon. members from Halifax, no doubt, will feel their positions more secure after this Bill is passed. The members from St. John will feel that they can say to their electors: Return a good solid New Brunswick contingent to support the Government, and the winter terminus of that line will be in St. John. The people of the constituency in which Louisburg is situated, will flutter with delight. Even smaller places than that will be excited over the question. The municipality of Shediac will pass resolutions; the citizens of Kouchibouguac and Kouchibouguacis will be in a flutter of excitement; and Tignish, as my hon. friend suggests, and various other points of equal notoriety and importance in the Maritime Provinces, will be led to think, that if this Bill passes the House, and if their district returns a good supporter of the Government, there is a chance for one of the tentacles of the great octopus being landed right among them. That I believe to be the chief object of this proposed fast line—to carry the Maritime Provinces, and not to carry freight, either by cold storage or otherwise. But, leaving for a moment this view of the question, I wish seriously to urge upon the House and the country that at the late Intercolonial or Imperial Conference, more should have been done than we have heard of, to secure from other members of the Empire, large contributions towards this line, if it is to be undertaken. We have been told that we ought to be proud of the fact that Canada has provided such excellent transcontinental means of transportation, and we are told that having done so, we are bound to spend more to secure transoceanic transportation of the same character. And this is how it goes on, from one expense to another. If we improve one part of our communication we are told that it is our duty, in the interest of the Empire and in the interest of the world at large, to make that communication better in other directions. Now, Sir, I think the Empire and the world at large ought to contribute a little this time to help us. We have done all this at our own expense, so far, and the advantage has not been so great to Canada as it has been to those who are taking long voyages, or those who wish to send freight through to ports on the Pacific and beyond. We undertook the immense burden of building the Canadian Pacific Railway without securing Imperial aid, but to the great benefit of Imperial communications. I do not know exactly what Imperial aid has been secured in this case, but it cannot be anything very considerable, when we are called upon to contribute as largely as we are doing. I do not know what was said at the conference as to whether the Australasian members of the Empire should contribute anything to this enterprise. I think they are as much interested in it as Canada, for it is to be a highway leading from Europe to Australasia, and it is not just that the people who live along the route of a great international highway should bear all the cost of constructing and keeping it in first-class condition. Then, I do not think enough has been done to consider the rights of the existing companies who have so long and satisfactorily carried the trade between this country and Great Britain. If it is wise to appropriate this sum of money for the purpose of securing the fast steamship line, I think it should be a condition of the appropriation that the existing companies should be allowed an opportunity of competing for the prize. They have done nearly everything that was required in the way of accommodation. If money is to be expended to this extent in securing better communication, I think these existing companies should be offered, by the text of the Bill itself, a chance to compete for the carrying out of that undertaking. There are so many ways of looking at the effects of this proposal upon the various parts of the country, and they have been so fully discussed, that I will not go into them at all; but I think these two points do require the emphatic attention of the House and the country before this Bill is passed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are one or two points as to which it is very desirable we should have an authoritative statement from the Government. As I said, we are at a very great disadvantage in not having printed copies of the correspondence in our hands, and, therefore, we have got to rely very largely on the statements made by the Minister of Finance. One point which I want to have a definite assurance about, is this: When we talk of a fast steamship service, is the hon. gentleman prepared to assure the House that if this $750,000 is to be paid, we will have a bona fide service of twenty knots an hour? That is a very different thing, as the House well knows, from having a steamship capable of performing twenty knots an hour. I desire, therefore, to know, in the first place, whether an absolute speed of twenty knots an hour is intended to be secured to us?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend will see, in looking at the conditions of the arrangement, that it is a stipulation that the vessels shall have a speed of twenty knots an hour in deep sea.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And maintain that?

Mr. FOSTER. Shall have a speed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. "Shall have a speed" is a very vague term. There are fifty vessels that can attain what is called a twenty-knot speed, for one that will maintain a twenty-knot speed across the Atlantic; and what I want to know is whether the Government have decided definitely that a speed of twenty knots in deep sea, as he calls it, is to be maintained. I take it that if the words "deep sea" are included, they would not include the St. Lawrence navigation. How is that? We can hardly call the St. Lawrence navigation "deep sea" in the ordinary acceptance of the term.

Mr. FOSTER. All that we do in making these proposed arrangements, is to lay down the particular lines upon which the service shall be conducted. The lines are stated very succinctly, but not in detail. One of the conditions is that after having a certain tonnage, after having a certain capacity, they shall have a speed capacity as well. When we come to make a definite contract with these steamships for a speed capacity in deep sea of twenty knots an hour, the details will be worked out, of course.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But that is not a detail, it is what you might call a principle in a fast service.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course my hon. friend will quite understand that certain allowances will have to be made. In the Anderson contract, which serves largely as a guide, there was a stipulation that the vessels should have a capacity of so much on trial speed, that they should make from port to port a voyage of eighteen knots: that is, that between the port in Great Britain and the port here, the average speed should be maintained at eighteen knots an hour.

Mr. MULLOCK. Suppose they do that?

Mr. FOSTER. If they did not, they came under the penalty which ultimately would have worked the forfeiture of their contract.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have been talking all through this discussion of a twenty-knot service, which is nearly equivalent to five hundred miles per day. Now, there is little doubt that if such stipulations are introduced as the hon. gentleman alludes to, it won't be a twenty-knot service we will get, but an eighteen-knot service. Some reason or other will be alleged as an excuse for reducing the speed and there is a strong temptation to do so in view of the enormous expense which attends the obtainment of an extra knot or two. From what the hon. gentleman now says, he seems to deduct 10 per cent from the twenty-knot service. If he adopts anything like the same rule that was adopted for the Anderson service, this is going to be a bare eighteen-knot service, and not a twenty-knot service. There is another point as to which it is desirable we should have a clear understanding. Certain parties have applied for a guarantee of their debentures. There is a very curious expression to which I have called attention before, in the reply of the Minister, which would seem to me to mean that the Government are not adverse to guaranteeing debentures to the amount of £1,500,000. I desire to know now whether the Government propose to give any guarantee of interest for a term of years unless the service is rendered?

Mr. FOSTER. To that question I have given already an explicit answer, and if it is not so considered, I wish to give an explicit answer now. All that to which the Government has pledged itself is this, under certain conditions to give a subsidy for ten years of $750,000 a year, and for a succeeding term of ten years to guarantee the interest of a certain amount of bonds, that interest to be paid out of subsidy earned, which is equivalent to the Government giving as a subsidy for the second term of ten years an amount equivalent to the interest at 4 per cent on the bonds to the amount of £1,500,000. I have made already the explicit statement that this sum is to be paid out of the subsidy earned, and if subsidy is not earned, no payment is contemplated and no payment will be made.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course such a guarantee amounts to very little, but unless special care is taken in the wording of the contract, people will be apt to be deceived.

Mr. FOSTER. Full care will be taken.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. People will naturally think when there was a discussion in regard to debentures being taken at 3½ per cent, interest guaranteed by the Canadian Government for ten or twenty years, that that guarantee will be irrespective of the payments for subsidy.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not think that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is correct so far as speed is concerned. If there is a requisition that there shall be a speed of twenty knots on the Atlantic, I do not think we need have any fears that there will be any deliberate reduction of speed when the vessels reach the St. Lawrence, setting aside the technical question as to whether that is deep sea or not. It will certainly be largely dependent on the rate of speed the vessels are able to maintain whether this enterprise will be successful or not. The hope is that by shortening the route we will thereby draw traffic which we otherwise would not obtain, and there is no danger whatever that the vessels will deliberately slow up when they get into the St. Lawrence.

Mr. GILLIES. I should like to ask the Finance Minister in regard to what will be the winter terminal port, whether it is restricted to Halifax or St. John, or whether other ports in Nova Scotia will be considered. I was under the impression that it was an open question, and that the company would have a free hand in selecting a port, subject, of course, to ratification by the Governor in Council, until I heard the Minister of Finance the other day say that the port of St. John was bracketed with Halifax in the provisional contract. From that statement I would assume that the selection would be limited to those two ports. If so, I would like to know it definitely, so that I may take such steps as recommend themselves to me with a view of having the third section of the Bill enlarged so that the Governor in Council may have a free hand in dealing with this matter. There is another port, that of Louisbourg, fully as capable of meeting the requirements, and even more capable of serving as a winter terminus than either Halifax or St. John, and I have been placing its claims, feasibilities and advantages before the Government, and I will do so before this House at the first favourable opportunity, so that public attention and the attention of investors in this trans-Atlantic steamship project may be drawn to the importance of this historic port, and that its pre-eminent advantages above all other ports on the Canadian Atlantic coast as a terminus may be fully realized by them.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The only two ports which have been named in the discussion with respect to this matter, and there has been very much discussion with respect to preliminaries, and also details, are Halifax and St John. Of course, no port is precluded from making its representations to the company, and we do not intend to make an enactment that no other port shall be taken; but those are the only two ports in regard to which I have any reason to hold out any expectation as regards selection being made.

Mr. MULOCK. The Bill before the committee is the only document showing the authority to be conferred on the Governor in Council. If that is the fact, I find nothing in it that contemplates any liability beyond a period of ten years. The Finance Minister has referred to a guarantee to the company, besides the amount of their bonds, for a term at the expiration of the first ten years. What I desire to ask is, what statutory authority is the Government supposed to take beyond that which is contained in the present Bill; or are we discussing merely a ten years' subsidy at the rate of $750,000 per annum?

Mr. FOSTER. That is all.

Mr. MULOCK. Then how is the Government going to make provision for extending aid to the company after those ten years have expired? Is Parliament to be asked to give such authority now?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, it is not. One of the proposals which Mr. Huddart made was to the effect that some arrangement should be made, if his offer were accepted, for a term beyond the ten years period. Of course, by that time it would be considered by us that if any subsidy were to be given by Parliament, it would be much less than this sum, and the sum mentioned in the proposal to us which we should undertake to give, if we undertook to give any sum beyond the ten years period, was an amount not less than interest on £1,500,000. In speaking of that as a guarantee, it is a loose form of expression—we do not propose to guarantee any bonds absolutely. It is a fact, however, that we would permit the contractor to assign subsidies earned, and we would recognize the assigned, and that amount might be paid out of the subsidies that might be voted or might be earned.

Mr. MULOCK. Are we to understand that no liability of any kind is being incurred beyond $750,000 a year for ten years?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. And all conversation and discussion as to what might happen after the period of ten years is merely looking into the future, but forms no part of the contract or understanding between the country and the company in question. The reason it is important that this matter should be made perfectly clear at this stage is this: There is a tendency on the part of the Government to assume certain power by Order in Council and afterwards call on Parliament to ratify its action. An example of this was given three or four years ago. During the first session after the general election of 1891, Parliament was asked to ratify a verbal understanding said to have existed between some members of the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway in regard to a transaction seven years old. It was in regard to an extension of the railway through the southern part of Manitoba, and this railroad, according to the Act of Parliament, was to receive a certain number of acres per mile. The company chose to extend the line fifty miles further. There was no statutory or other authority entitling the railway to any additional grant, but after the general election Parliament was asked to give, I think, 320,000 acres of land to this railway on an understanding that had existed between one of the departments and the railway company seven or eight years before, and it was granted, there being an Order in Council laid on the Table based on the report of the Department of the Interior, stating that there was such an understanding, although it was of a hazy and nebulous character. This debate is taking place, and the Minister has in a sense pretended to have it in his mind to hold out some sort of promise that at the end of ten years some other kind of a liability is to be incurred. I want it to be distinctly understood that the Government has no power whatever to create any such liability at the present time, however flimsy such liability may appear, but which may hereafter be developed into a liability, in the way we know sometimes happens in public matters of this kind. The Government should now give us distinct pledges that in no way will they enter into any contract or liability beyond what is authorized within the four corners of the statute, so that we shall not be called upon to redeem the honour of the Crown, which may be said to be pledged in view of the discussion which has taken place here.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is perfectly clear that the only authority which the Government will have is that conferred by the statute, namely: to make a ten years contract for a sum not exceeding the sum named in the statute. There has been a proposal made by Mr. Huddart that we should make a contract looking to a further subsidy, and while we will have no authority to do that, we will make it only, if we make it at all, subject to the approval of this Parliament. That is beyond the ten-year period. What Mr. Huddart proposes, and what we shall do if necessary, subject to the approval of this Parliament, is to indicate that the service will be continued for a further period of ten years; but the hon. gentleman will see by the papers brought down what is said as regards that, and the word "guarantee" is not used at all in the sense he alludes to.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Finance used the word.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, I know; he was describing it, not quoting it.

The Government agrees to pay in aid of such service a subsidy of $750,000 a year. As to a subsequent period, it may for the ten years subsequent out of the subsidy earned pay the interest on the capital sum of a million and a half dollars at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum; the contract to be entered into within three months after the requisite authority is to be obtained from the Parliament of Canada.

That is the Hon. Mr. Bowell's letter in reply to Mr. Huddart's proposition. The hon. gentleman will see that the interest on that will be $300,000.

Mr. MULOCK. How could there be a contract for a longer period than ten years?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If there be no contract there will be no subsidy earned. The subsidy will be only the amount of the actual poundage for the mail service carried on in Canada, if the mail service reaches any considerable growth at all by that time.

Mr. MULOCK. The allusion to the subsidy is in case this country chooses to send freight, mail or otherwise, by that line, as any other shipper would.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Subsidy earned.

Mr. MULOCK. It is in that sense the Minister of Trade and Commerce has used the term, just the same as any private citizen might be indebted to the line for services rendered. But we are giving this as a bonus.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We undertake to give them our mails for a subsequent ten years, if the contract is performed.

Mr. MULOCK. Then under that contract the reference to a subsidy after the ten years, is in connection with a contract to render service for a longer period than ten years?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. And so it has reference to what may be earned?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will pass over the papers to my hon. friend.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The statement made by the Premier was apparently this:

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

March 6th, 1894.

I would concur that the renewal should be said to be for a ten years period, and that the guarantee of interest for a second term of ten years, should be at 4 per cent on one and a half millions dollars to be paid out of subsidy earned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the letter I read is later than that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It all shows how extremely unreasonable it is to go on with discussions of this kind until printed documents are placed in the hands of members. I must say, I have never known a question of this importance which has been marked by such an extremely slipshod style of proceeding. This correspondence could have been printed in three or four hours, and it should have been printed long ago. With respect to the other point, the more I look at this, the more I see that our guarantee for anything like a genuine fast service is going to be very much flimsier than my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) imagines. Here are the words of the Hon. Mackenzie Bowell:

JAMES HUDDART, Esq., Ottawa.

I am instructed to inform you that the Government of Canada is prepared to enter into a contract, subject to the approval of Parliament, with you or a company to be formed by you, for the placing on the route between England and Canada of four Royal Mail Express Steamships each capable of steaming 20 knots per hour at sea.

Not a word in this, you will observe, of steaming practically 20 knots an hour, or even 18 knots. All that is required, and the Government are prepared to enter into the contract, is that the steamships should be capable of steaming 20 knots at sea. They might not run 15 knots. It does appear to me that we are under a great delusion when we are talking of a 20-knot service. The more explanations we get about it, it looks to me that the 20-knot service is to fizzle down to an 18-knot service, and in practice will be very likely to fizzle down to the 15 or 16 knots, which will very effectually dispose of an enormous deal of the so-called argument that has been used as to the possibility of securing a very considerable portion of that class of passengers who desire to have a short trip across the Atlantic. I think that my friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill), before he is many years older, may have to revise a good many of the declarations that he gave on the floor of this House as to the value of a fast service.

Mr. McCARTHY. If I understand it rightly—for I have not been able to see even a copy of the papers brought down, and which have not been printed—there is now something in the nature of a provisional contract. That is: there has been a letter from Mr. Huddart which has been answered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I understand that Mr. Bowell has assented to the proposal of Mr. Huddart; making in that sense a contract. If that is so the contract is, that we shall not merely deal for ten years but for twenty years, and yet the Government are only asking authority to enter into a contract for ten years. I thought that what the Government were really asking us to do was to give authority to carry out the provisional contract that had been made with Mr. Huddart. But, if the provisional contract is for a period going over the first ten years, by a renewal period of a further ten years, then we are not conferring authority, and nothing can be done until the next session of the House unless Mr. Huddart enters into a new arrangement.

Mr. LAURIER. If we refer to the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance when he introduced this resolution, we will see that it is not only contemplated, but in fact stated there in so many words, that this is practically to be a twenty years' contract. Now, I call the attention of the House to the language of the hon. Minister as reported in 'Hansard' on page 5882. Speaking of the conditions with Mr. Huddart, he said:

The conditions were: that we should give him $750,000 a year for the first ten years as a subsidy, and thereafter for the second ten years we should give him $500,000 per year; that being the extent of the obligation.

Then later on:

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Apparently what you contemplate is not a ten years' contract, but a twenty years' contract.

Mr. FOSTER. We would not as a Government enter into this thing for a single moment unless we thought it would be permanent. To make a flash in the pan, to have a five or a ten years' service, and then let it drop, we think would not be wise, but would be a waste of money. So we contemplate as a permanent arrangement granting a subsidy for the first ten years of $750,000 a year, and a subsidy for the second ten years of $500,000 a year, and after that we will let posterity or those who live after that, take care of the service.

Mr. FOSTER. That $500,000 should be $300,000

Mr. McCARTHY. You said $500,000.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be.

Mr. LAURIER. Nothing could be more explicit than this language. Now, coming to the negotiations which took place, I find that unfortunately a good many of the communications are not dated; but taking the papers as they are, and they are in chronological order, I find that Mr. Huddart first of all proposes to incorporate a company with a capital of £2,000,000—£500,000 in shares, and £1,500,000 in debentures bearing 3½ per cent for twenty-one years, to be guaranteed by the Dominion Government in a manner to be agreed upon. To this the Minister of Trade and Commerce gives an answer in which, as stated by the hon. Prime Minister, the word 'guarantee' is not to be found:

The Government agrees to pay in aid of such service a subsidy of $750,000 per year for a term of ten years under such conditions as may be required by the Government for a first-class service; and to pay for the ten years subsequent, out of subsidy earned, the interest upon a capital sum of £1,500,000 at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum.

This answer elicits a reply from Mr. Huddart in these words:

As to the question of the Government guaranteeing to pay for the second ten years of service, out of subsidies to be earned, the interest upon the capital sum of £1,500,000 at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum, I beg to point out that when that rate of interest was mentioned it was proposed that your Government should also liquidate the principal. Now that it is agreed that the Government shall only pay interest, it becomes necessary that the rate should not be less than 4 per cent. It would be impossible to succeed in obtaining the money at a lesser rate.

To this the Minister of Trade and Commerce replies on the 7th of March, as follows:—

3rd. You ask that a guarantee of interest for the second term of ten years should be at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, instead of 3½ per cent on £1,500,000, payable out of subsidies earned. The Government would be willing to accede to this request, to be, of course, conditional on the service having been found satisfactory.

Now, Sir, it is manifest that there is an engagement on the part of the Government to have the subsidies granted, not for ten years, but for twenty years. It is an engagement adopted on both sides—by Mr. Huddart and by the Government.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to inquire of the Minister, in the event of this proposition becoming law, how long would it be before we might expect the proposed service to commence?

Mr. FOSTER. That will depend a good deal upon the success of the promoter in floating the scheme and having the contracts entered into for the building of the vessels. Upon that the hon. gentleman with all his exigency would not ask the Government to pronounce a decided opinion. That is one of the things on which no information can be given. But after the scheme is floated, after capital is found and the contracts are entered into, then it will be possible approximately to come at a period within which the service may be established. These vessels are very large and require a great deal of time for their building. I suppose vessels of that size could be built in twelve or eighteen months; so that to have the service complete would require two years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But surely you will have a time limit?

Mr. FOSTER. We will have a time limit, and the time limit will, of course, be stated in the contract we make.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a point on which you might have made up your minds.

Mr. FOSTER. How could we do it? The hon. gentleman knows, because the papers brought down show, that we give an additional time to Mr. Huddart to float his scheme, to get his capital, and to have everything arranged for building the vessels, in order to allow him a reasonable time in which to do that. When once the scheme is floated, and the contracts for building the vessels are made, then, of course, we will enter into a contract, and that contract will state at what time the service is to be commenced.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you give this gentleman three, or six, or nine months in which to collect the capital?

Mr. FOSTER. What we propose, as the hon. gentleman will see by the papers, is three months from the passage of the resolution. There has been some criticism because these papers have not been printed. They were brought down about a month ago, but they mysteriously disappeared, and did not appear again for some time. I think they turned up in the hands of the hon. leader of the Opposition the other night.

Mr. LAURIER. There is no mystery about that, and the statement of the hon. gentleman is about half true. The first batch of papers was brought down about a month ago, and the second about eight days ago.

Mr. FOSTER. And the first were the important ones.

Mr. LAURIER. They were both important.

Mr. CHARLTON. The House is called upon to take action in this very important matter without being placed in possession of the necessary information. These papers should have been printed, so that every member might have had an opportunity of making himself acquainted with all the details. The matter seems to be shrouded in mystery. We were told that there was no provision made with regard to the second ten years, that the Government had a perfectly free hand, and that if they proposed to grant any subsidies for those years they would be free to have them applied in a certain way. The impression left on the House was that the Government could refuse to grant subsidies for the second ten years. But we have it now made clear by the papers that there is an explicit arrangement for the second ten years. There is so much uncertainty about the provisions of this whole intended contract that the matter should be held over until Parliament, which is seized with the authority of acting in this matter, is in a position to comprehend fully all the facts connected with it. It is evident, in the first place, that this Mr. Huddart is being placed in a position which gives him advantages that he is not entitled to over the owners of existing lines. We have steamship lines at present. We have one line that has received a subsidy for carrying the mails, and the Government now propose to make a grant of a large sum of money annually, one of the incidents of which will be to crush out of existence the lines now in existence, and to render unremunerative the capital which has been invested in good faith by shipping firms in Canada. We have the Allan line and the Dominion line, we have all the steamship lines that this country needs, and we have capital prepared to embark in the construction of additional vessels if they are required; and the Government, by making the provision now proposed to be made, will ruin the individuals whose money is embarked in these lines. And, as I pointed out the other night, we have not seen the end of this matter, if we enter into this engagement. This subsidy of $750,000 a year will prove insufficient to accomplish the purpose the Government have in view, if they embark on this scheme, and I predict that the inevitable result will be that further grants must be made. Then the establishment of this line is part of the general scheme. We are to have steam communication with Australia. We are to establish a line that will invite Australian business by offering special facilities for the transportation of passengers between the Antipodes and Great Britain, and to make that scheme workable, we will have to pay an additional amount, in the form of subsidies, for lines upon the Pacific Ocean. It will be entirely inadequate, for the purposes of this scheme, to have a monthly service from Melbourne or Sydney to Vancouver, but we will require to have as frequent trips from Australia to Vancouver as from Quebec or Halifax or St. John to England. So that one of the consequences involved will be additional subsidies to a Pacific line, and before we see the end of this matter, in place of a subsidy of $750,000 a year, we will require to pay at least $1,250,000 or $1,500,000 a year. And this we have to contemplate when our revenue is falling and our country overburdened with debt.

Mr. FOSTER.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have increased our uncontrollable expenditure since 1878 four or five times faster than the population of the country has increased. We have been extravagant; we have been launching out into wild schemes, and whether this scheme in itself is desirable or not, we are bound to pause and consider whether this country is in a financial condition to warrant our embarking on it. Most assuredly it is not. Our population is increasing very slowly, the increase in the last decade being only between 11 and 12 per cent. One of the reasons for this is that our country is overburdened with taxation, and our people are fleeing from it because they have fear for the future, and yet we are asked, not only to continue the same extravagant course, but to accelerate it to ruin. We are asked to add practically $20,000,000 to our public debt, and to take a step that will inevitably lead to further large expenditure. The scheme is not sufficiently matured; it does not commend itself to the judgment of the tax-paying community, and we ought, before taking final action, to be possessed of all the information in connection with it. We ought to have all the papers; we ought to have time to consider it. It is brought down in the closing days of the session, when it should have been placed before Parliament a month or six weeks ago. One of the bad features of the policy of this Government is the keeping back of important schemes of various kinds that may elicit severe public criticism, until there is not time to apply that criticism and consider the case. I protest against it in the name of the tax-payers. I say it is a scheme which, upon its face, does not commend itself to the better sentiment of the country, and one which should receive careful and full consideration, with all the facts before us, and with time to consider these facts, before we decide the matter.

Mr. MULOCK. The papers which the right hon. First Minister has been good enough to lend me to read contain the word "guarantee," as quoted by the Minister of Finance. The reason why I think the word should be changed is that it would imply the country becoming responsible to third persons, and not only being bound to pay its just debts for services rendered, but perhaps made liable upon bonds and pledges to make good that liability, even if no services be rendered. Now, one feature of the Bill is that it does not declare the full liability contemplated. If there is to be any understanding about entering into a contract involving a liability beyond the ten years liability, we should clothe the Government with the necessary authority, and it should be within the letter of the law that the Government may contract it. These hazy understandings, sooner or later, are sure to lead to trouble. I would prefer myself giving a clear and unmistakable power of attorney than a vague authority that may be used much further than was contemplated, or than it could be used if the power of attorney were in explicit terms. Reading from the papers on the Table, I find that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in a letter addressed to Mr. Huddart, the date of which does not appear, used these words:

And to pay for ten years subsequent, out of the subsidy, the interest upon the capital sum of one million five hundred thousand pounds at the rate of 3½ per cent.

The right hon. Minister of Justice will observe that when this correspondence began it spoke about a payment to the company of interest at the rate of 3½ per cent out of the subsidy earned, and not a guarantee. Mr. Huddart replied to that letter, and alluding to the renewal, said:

As to the renewal of the contract, although it is not specifically provided that it shall be given for a term of ten years, I think it is necessary to say in our minds that it should not be for a less term than ten years. It would help the position hereafter if you would indicate your approval of this opinion. As to the question of the Government guaranteeing to pay for a second ten years' service, out of the subsidies to be earned, the interest upon a capital sum of $1,500,000 at 3½ per cent per annum, I beg to point out that when the rate of interest was mentioned, it was proposed that the Government should also guarantee the principal. Now that it is agreed the Government shall only pay the interest, it becomes necessary that the rate should not be less than 4 per cent.

The answer to that proposal by the First Minister was as follows:—

March 6th, 1894.

Sir John Thompson's memo. :—

I would concur that the renewal should be understood to be for a ten years' period, and that the guarantee of interest for the second term of years should be at 4 per cent on £1,500,000, to be paid out of subsidy earned, both matters to be of course conditioned on the service being found to have been satisfactory to the Government.

The right hon. the First Minister will observe that he has used the word "guarantee" there, and it will probably be construed into this country giving a pledge and guarantee of some kind out of the subsidy. And if you guarantee for a period of ten years to pay at least 4 per cent out of the subsidy earned, you thereby pledge the country to supply traffic to that line, at least to the extent of £60,000. You are guaranteeing here, if you are agreeing to anything, to pay out of the subsidy earned at least £60,000. You are agreeing to supply traffic to the extent of £60,000, and you are entering into a contract to furnish custom of some kind to the extent of $300,000 a year to this line.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. To pay at least that sum if the company earn it.

Mr. MULOCK. Not if it earns it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Certainly; how can we pay anything if they do not earn it?

Mr. MULOCK. How can they earn it unless you deliver it? You are agreeing to deliver them goods.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We deliver money to them. If we never sent a letter, we would pay them $300,000 if they earned the subsidy that is by making the voyages at the speed provided for in the contract.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister is changing his base. A little while ago he said as to the payments to be made during the second ten years that these payments would be made for services rendered.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I beg pardon. I was not citing the arrangement; I was reasoning on the fairness of undertaking to make those payments in a time ten years in advance of this, or twelve or fifteen years. I was showing that the amount we were making ourselves liable for would be that which the steamship line would earn practically by carrying our mails. I was not undertaking to say that the sum we would pay them would be limited to the poundage, but the argument I was making was that we might fairly undertake to pay for the following ten-year period a sum equal to £60,000 sterling, considering the poundage which would be earned by them in the ordinary mail service.

Mr. McCARTHY. Is it useful to discuss this question, for I understood the Minister to answer to me that there was no intention of entering into a contract beyond ten years?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not say that. I said we were not taking authority to make the contract for more than ten years, and if we make a contract for the succeeding ten years, we will come to Parliament and ask its authority for doing so.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is what I understood, that this Bill gives authority for a ten years' contract. The only question is whether the Government will feel authorized, when they have express power from Parliament to make a contract not exceeding ten years, to enter into a contract for twenty years.

Mr. MULOCK. But they tell us they are going to do it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then I do not see the object of the Bill. If the Government are satisfied that no contract can be made for a period short of twenty years, what is the use of passing this Bill? If the measure is to be subject to the approval of Parliament and cannot become operative until the House meets again to approve of it, I cannot see the object of conferring this power now.

Mr. FLINT. I do not propose to make any lengthened remarks on this question, because I am painfully aware that every moment at the closing hours of the session is precious to hon. members. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) laid it down recently as an axiom that the silence of any member of Parliament when a proposition of this kind is submitted carries with it the presumption that he favours the proposal. I presume the House does not agree with that opinion, because, naturally, if that view were accepted by the House, every member opposed to a measure would feel called upon to express his opinion at greater or less length, which would lengthen debates that are already, perhaps, too long for this period of the session. So far as I am concerned I was ready for the consideration of this matter—and I believe the same is true of other members who are not generally favourable to the policy of the Government—with an open and unbiassed mind, prepared to be convinced that this expenditure, which, under ordinary circumstances would be looked upon as something very serious and grave, might be justified as bringing with it sufficient and substantial advantages. After listening carefully to what has been said by the very able and experienced gentlemen who have advocated this proposition, I am not convinced as to the substantial advantages which will accrue. In the very eloquent speech with which the proposal was introduced, the main points dwelt upon by the Finance Minister were the prestige which would accrue to the Dominion as a whole from its facility in transporting passengers from the old country to this and across the continent en route for the Australian colonies. Another hon. gentleman, speaking with a great deal of warmth, dwelt at some length upon the advantages that would accrue to the North-west Territories and the unsettled portions of the Dominion from the encouragement to immigration. Other gentlemen dwelt upon other features of the case, such as the facilities which would be given for the exportation of certain of our agricultural products. Now, I think the debate has shown that in all these particulars there are no compensating advantages for the enormous outlay we are called upon to make. The question of immigration certainly cannot be involved, because, as has been shown very clearly, immigrants are not particular as to the time of their arrival of this country within one, two, three or even more days, and the very nature and character of the class of steamships that are to be engaged by this heavy appropriation forbids the idea that the line will to any great extent bring immigrants into the Dominion. In regard to freight, time is scarcely ever of the essence of the contract as to the carriage of the ordinary classes of freight that go between this country and the mother country. The delay of one, two, three or more days is of no consequence whatever in regard to the vast bulk, ninety-nine hundredths of the freight that we shall send to the mother country. The weight of the argument has been mainly upon the advantage of the passenger traffic and the collateral advantage to the Dominion by way of advertising the country. Now, I do not think that any hon. gentleman will seriously argue that the financial and substantial advantages to be derived from this class of traffic—though there must be a certain advantage to the country from wealthy travellers passing through it—can at all correspond with the demand made upon the public purse. I think it is also apparent from the loose and vague nature of the proposal at the present time that concessions are being made to certain local interests and that there is more of a political than a commercial view taken by the Government and its supporters in encouraging this scheme. While not binding the Government down to items and details in every particular, I think that, in order to set at rest certain questions which have agitated the country for the last twenty years or more, and which threaten, under the discussion of this scheme until it is fully in operation, to agitate the country for many years to come, the House ought to have something fixed and final as to where the winter port of this line in the Dominion should be. At the present time, owing to strong representations made, and properly so, by the representatives of St. John, we have a sop thrown to these gentlemen that possibly the harbour and city of St. John would be made one of the termini on this side in the winter time. This only keeps open the question that has too long embarrassed public men and embarrassed business relations in the Maritime Provinces. The question of the advantages of the port of St. John and the port of Halifax has been carried on almost ad nauseum to the people of the Maritime Provinces and the people of the Dominion at large, and I think the Government, before passing these resolutions, should declare definitely the nature of the engagements of the company as to making its terminus at one or both of these ports. If they make a terminus at both, we can easily see that it will mean only a fortnightly steamer in the harbour of Halifax, and the same in St. John, unless the passenger terminus is made in Halifax and the freight terminus in St. John. This latter would have certain advantages. St. John has many advantages, notwithstanding all the advantages of the port of Halifax. I am not here to enlarge upon the advantages of St. John, but certainly its supporters make out a good case. They are 300 miles nearer to Montreal, the commercial metropolis of the Dominion; they are about 275 miles nearer, so far as the carriage of freight by sea is concerned. Freight by sea can be carried much more cheaply than overland, particularly when you take into consideration the expense of transshipment. I think the merchants and citizens of St. John have made out a very strong case, and the Government should settle the question here before the resolutions are passed, as to the exact relation in which the merchants of these two ports will stand. By leaving the question open to the extent proposed by the Minister of Justice, he will encourage claims from other ports upon the Atlantic. The province of Nova Scotia is favoured by nature with large and commodious ports, capable of receiving ships of the largest tonnage. I do not mention this as making a claim, but I have no doubt a claim could be put in and will be put in, if this question is left open, for the port of Louisburg, and for the port of Shelburne. The port of Shelburne is well known to be one of the finest in the world in its harbour accommodations, and a railway is being constructed to connect it with the Intercolonial at Halifax. Now, if this question is left open, we will have an agitation on the south coast of Nova Scotia, and claims put in for the winter port terminus. I think the Government, before bringing this resolution down, should have settled this point with Mr. Huddart, and that the claims of these ports should either be put aside, or one or other of them decided upon definitely, rather than that the matter should be left open for the two years which are to ensue before the steamboat line is to come into operation. We all know the political effect this will have; we all know the promises that will be made, not, perhaps, directly by the Government, but by their supporters, in Cape Breton, and in the counties on the south shore of Nova Scotia, in the neighbourhood of St. John, and in the river counties, as well as in the county of Halifax. Now, the political effect must be very bad, and the commercial effect must be bad also, because business relations will be suspended, to a certain extent, in anticipation of a settlement of this question by the Government. As I said before, I only speak in this superficial way upon a subject which requires at the hands of every member of this House a great deal of study. I regret exceedingly that the papers and correspondence on this subject could not have been printed in order to enable the members of the House to carefully study the questions involved. We are told now that there is a contract which, by mutual agreement, may be enlarged or narrowed, and in which more extensive details may be inserted. But it is a contract binding upon the Government as far as it goes. But, at the same time, even without the passage of this resolution, the good faith and honour of the Government are, to a large degree, already pledged, and pledged beyond the powers that are now asked for, as has been shown by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), and the hon. member for Simeoe (Mr. McCarthy). The contract really extends far beyond the time of this Parliament and extends, at least, for twenty years. I complain that those who have a great anxiety to assist the Government, if the scheme is feasible, and those who have an anxiety to make this scheme satisfactory to the people of the country, should not have had an opportunity to look into it and to study all these details. Now, a fast line in itself is not obnoxious to large masses of the people. There is a certain patriotic gratification in having a line equal to those which run between the great American cities and Europe; but if we are to pay too dearly for our whistle, if we are not to have substantial financial advantages arising out of it, then we must forego the gratification of our patriotic feeling, and our desire for prestige. No one questions the financial ability of the Dominion of Canada to maintain a line equal to the best in the world. The Dominion could build a line at its own expense, and thus receive whatever credit might be derived from it; but every one agrees that it would be a very foolish outlay of money for the Government to undertake it. The only question is as to the financial advantages to be derived by the great mass of the tax-payers from one end of the country to the other, by the establishment of this line at so great an expense. If Halifax is the winter port, there will be a great local advantage to that city. There will be a great local advantage derived by the city of Quebec and the neighbourhood from the amount of labour which will be required in the landing of freight and passengers from this line at that port; and so with regard to the city of St. John. There is one branch of the subject, however, which it will not do for us to overlook, and which militates against the port of St. John. It is that at Halifax we have a more speedy and cheaper coal supply than could be obtained at the port of St. John. If Louisburg should be chosen during these ten years, or at any time beyond that, then a still greater advantage would accrue to the line by obtaining their coal supply still more easily and cheaply. There would also be a great advantage to the general revenue of the whole province of Nova Scotia by the extra sale of coal to supply these steamships: and there would be other collateral advantages which would be derived by a growing and ambitious port by having the terminus of this line. I regret that the Government have not taken this question of winter port or ports once and for all out of the domain of agitation by settling it definitely, even though, at some risk to their popularity. I think the people of the whole Dominion are tired of the discussion of the winter port question; but I foresee as one of the results of the passage of this resolution, a renewed agitation on that question, which will not be settled, at any rate, for some time after the ensuing general election.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I did not intend to offer any remarks to-day, but there have been some remarks made by the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House, and by some who have preceded him, which should not be allowed to pass without an answer. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) condemned this scheme because, he said, it is intended to destroy existing lines of steam communications between Canada and Great Britain. The hon. gentleman says that it is unfair to the gentlemen who have invested their capital in these undertakings that this proposition should be entertained by Parliament. I do not see how that hon. gentleman can claim there is any unfairness in this transaction, if he remembers the statement that was made by the Minister of Finance the other day, that this offer was first made to the managers of the Allan line of steamships, and that they asked, for this same service, a subsidy which amounted to $1,250,000; that they asked, too, for a 16-knot service, a subsidy equal to the amount that we are proposing to pay Mr. Huddart for a 20-knot service. It appears to me that these hon. gentlemen, in discussing the question to-day, have entirely failed to comprehend the object of this service. It is, as I understand it, to secure a service between Canada and Great Britain, which will compete with the existing lines of steamships between New York and Great Britain. The hon. gentleman who has spoken proposed to deal with the present Allan line of steamers or with a line of steamships which has a speed of 16 knots. That is to my mind simply absurd. You might as well try on the streets of Ottawa to compete for travel with an omnibus against the present electric car system. This objection is really the same as was advocated, first by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who addressed the House last night. He said he thought a 16-knot service was everything that Canada required. In my opinion a 16-knot steamship is the very worst class of steamship you could place on the route between Great Britain and America at the present time. It is fitted for neither one class of traffic nor another; it is not fast enough to secure first-class passengers in competition with the 20 and 22-knot steamships sailing to New York, and it is too fast and too expensive to compete for freight traffic against 8, 10 or 12-knot steamers now carrying freight between Montreal and the mother country. If the hon. gentleman will study the statistics of the merchant shipping of Great Britain, he will find that 80 per cent of the entire steam tonnage of Great Britain has a speed something less than 12 knots an hour. These statistics prove conclusively that all the freight traffic of the world carried by steamers, is carried by steamships of a very low rate of speed, the cost of transportation being the prime element of consideration in carrying freight. On the other hand, in order to secure the passenger traffic it is necessary to have vessels thoroughly equipped, and the most comfortable vessels that can be produced.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) says "hear, hear." I am glad to know he endorses what I am saying. The hon. gentleman entertains doubts, apparently, in regard to the commercial success of this undertaking. As I stated in the few remarks I made on a former occasion, I can see no reason, and I claim no good reason has been presented to the House in the course of the discussion which has taken place, why there is anything to prevent, under proper management, this scheme proving a commercial success. Why, there are passengers to carry—no one can deny it. The passenger traffic between Great Britain and America has assumed enormous proportions. It furnishes employment for from twenty-five to thirty of the largest and best equipped steamships on the ocean. A great portion of that traffic is Canadian, and the Canadian is the national route for these passengers. I claim that in proportion to our population we have two or three times the social and commercial intercourse with the continent of Europe which the people of the United States enjoy. Taking the great mass of people in the Southern States, I believe one-half or two-thirds of the whole population never think of crossing the Atlantic. In Canada all classes of our people travel, and I believe nearly all of them have at some time or other crossed the Atlantic, and many of them have made trips across very frequently. I consider this is a propitious time to introduce a scheme of this kind. We have the steamship line on the Pacific. We have the Canadian Pacific Railway completed, and there is developing at the present time a most important stream of travel between Europe and the Pacific, China and Japan and the continent of Australasia. With proper steamships on the Atlantic in connection with our railways, and our steamships on the Pacific, I certainly can see no reason why we should not practically monopolize the entire traffic. I may remind the House that this is not an unimportant traffic. Last year the steamers from China and Japan brought on an average 150 cabin passengers each week. That of itself is sufficient to furnish one-fourth of the traffic required to give those steamers now proposed a full passenger list. Then, as has been pointed out during the discussion, we are in a position, from our geographical position, to compete successfully for a very considerable portion of the passenger travel through the north-western states. I see no reason whatever why, under the exceptional circumstances, hon. gentlemen should entertain such fears as to the future of this enterprise. We have the traffic; all we want is the class of steamships to attract the travelling public, and there is no reason in the world why they should not go by this route. I believe it is possible, if proper steamships are put on the route, to convey by our Canadian route passengers and mails between Europe and America as safely and comfortably and in far less time than by any other route; and if we do that, and have passengers and freight, I do not see why hon. gentlemen opposite have any reason to entertain feelings of apprehension as to the success of this scheme. I must say that I for one have full confidence, if it is properly managed, that this scheme will prove a grand commercial success. I have been surprised, in the course of this discussion, to hear an hon. gentleman like the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) claim that Canada is to derive no advantage from having a fast passenger service of this kind. To my mind it is one of the most important questions before the country to-day, one which more closely involves the future progress and prosperity of the country than any question which has been before Parliament for some time past. I attach a good deal of importance to the direct money benefit which the country will receive from this traffic should this scheme prove a success, as I believe it will prove. One of the hon. members who addressed the House, I believe the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), pointed out that these steamers would require thousands of tons of coal, and that their other disbursements would amount to a considerable sum. This is a point worthy of consideration. In addition, I believe it would not be impossible to show that the actual disbursements all through the country of a large number of passengers would amount to an important sum. If we could induce, by establishing a service of this kind, a few thousand tourists of the wealthier class to visit this country and spend each year two or three weeks here, their actual disbursements alone would go a long way towards meeting the amount we are required to pay to secure this steamship service. But while those matters are important, they are not, in my opinion, the most important. I believe this question is of vital importance to the future progress, development and growth of this country. No one will dispute the fact that in Canada we have great resources; they are vast in their extent; they are varied in their character. What we want to do is to make those resources known. In my opinion there is no way in which we can accomplish that object so effectually as to bring the people of foreign countries here, and let them see our country for themselves. The hon. Minister for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) last night spoke of the folly of bringing wealthy men, at the expense of the Canadian people, from Chicago, and Minneapolis, and St. Paul on this side of the Atlantic, and from Paris or London on the other side, and carrying them across this country in luxurious Pullman cars. I am surprised that any gentleman, and especially a gentleman occupying the position which he does, and with the experience which he has in dealing with large public questions of this kind, should venture to utter such an opinion as that. That, to my mind, is just the very thing this country wants. We want to see these wealthy men come to Canada, and travelling, if you like, as he says, in their Pullman cars. We want them to look out of the windows as they go along and see our fertile fields, and the thriving villages and towns they will pass through all along their journey. I venture to say that if we can succeed in doing that, there is no sound business man but will be convinced from his own observation that he can find in Canada a vast field for safe and profitable investment for his capital. Then, Sir, we want those who are interested in manufacturing enterprises to visit the country. Let those who have the capital and the disposition to enter into new manufacturing industries travel through it. Let them see its resources. Let them see the vast variety and extent, and the cheapness of the raw material which we have in this country. Let them see our magnificent water powers; let them see the means of communication that we have, and they will be convinced, too, that this is a magnificent field for entering into new and diversified manufacturing industries. We want men who are interested in commerce to visit our cities, to become acquainted with our business men, to study the manner in which our business is transacted, to see the products which we have to sell, and to convince themselves that there is opportunity here for large commercial transactions. The hon. gentleman has talked about immigration. We want above all that those who are interested in agriculture should come to this country and travel, if you wish, simply along our lines of railway. Let them look out from the windows as they go along and see the fertile fields—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick teeming with population during the last ten years.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Yes, and the North-west, too.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And in the North-west, too.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). We want that class of people to come to our country to observe the fertile fields, the herds of cattle and the flocks of sheep, to see the very comfortable homes in which our rural population live; and when they have passed through the older provinces where the country is settled, let them go a little further on and see the vast extent of country which is still waiting for settlers. The hon. gentleman talks about the growth of population in New Brunswick. We have been putting forth efforts to bring people to this country, we have been circulating literature, publishing statistics and sending agents abroad. These have accomplished much. They have not, perhaps, accomplished everything that we might desire in this respect, but I will say this: so far as my own personal opinion goes I believe that such a scheme as this at present before the House, and which will bring to this country a continuous stream of foreign travel, will do more to settle the country, to stimulate our manufacturing industries, and to promote our commerce, than any other device which has ever been proposed. This, Mr. Chairman, is not a new policy which we are now considering. As the Minister of Finance has observed: it is merely repeating a proposition which has been before this Parliament for years; the only difference between this proposal and the proposals we have had before being, that the subsidy now asked for is a little larger, but the service is correspondingly better. This is a policy which has received the sanction of every Parliament since Confederation. It has been the policy of every Government in this country, not only since Confederation, but the policy of the Governments of the provinces before Confederation. From the days of Joseph Howe and Samuel Cunard down to the present time it has been the aim and ambition of the Canadian people to have a trans-Atlantic service which shall be Canadian in its character, and which shall make Canada a highway for foreign travel. For my part I hope this scheme will succeed. I believe it will succeed. I believe there are no grounds whatever for the fears which the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) expressed: that in future we will require larger subsidies. My opinion is that if this scheme is fairly launched, after it has once proved that we can successfully compete with the New York route, as I believe it can be and will be proved, then in a few years we will not need to pay a large subsidy, we will not need to pay any subsidy; but we will have not only this line of steamships, but a number of lines on the route carrying passengers and mails between Canada and Great Britain.

Mr. McNEILL. Before my hon. friend (Mr. Wood) rose to make the very interesting and pertinent observations he has addressed to the House, I wanted to say one word in reference to the speed of the vessels to which my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) referred. He spoke as if this were a contract and that we could not obtain any more definite statements with reference to the speed to be maintained than we find here. There really is nothing in this as I read it with reference to the speed that is to be maintained, but the statement is, that vessels of a certain power shall be supplied, and I take it, when the contract is entered into, the Government will see that the power of these vessels shall be properly applied.

Mr. LAURIER. You are trusting to the Government.

Mr. McNEILL. I am trusting to the Government certainly. There is nothing to lead me to believe that they will not enter into a contract so as to give effect to the meaning of these words, Mr. Huddart himself, says, that it is of vital importance that the service should be a fast service, and that the success of the service depends upon its being fast. He says in one of his letters to the Minister:

I cannot find courage enough to submit lower rates of speed, or smaller steamships.

Showing that he considers, as I have said, that the success of the unertaking depends upon our maintaining a high rate of speed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would recommend it to be so specified in the bond.

Mr. McNEILL. There is no bond.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is pretty nearly equivalent to it.

Mr. McNEILL. I take it that when a definite contract is entered into, it will be found that provision will be made to have the benefit of the full power of these vessels, and I have reason to believe that Mr. Huddart himself will be anxious to provide for that.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me an observation? He heard a moment ago the remark of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) that freight traffic is carried at a low speed, not exceeding 12 knots. At the present time passengers are carried at 20 knots. As the hon. gentleman observes, these ships are to carry both freight and passengers. Passenger vessels do not generally carry freight—not even 1,000 tons. These vessels are to carry 3,000 tons. How does he reconcile these facts? Are we to have the low speed to carry freight or the high speed to carry passengers?

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend is somewhat mistaken in his facts. It is really not a fact that fast vessels carry only about 1,000 tons of freight. The 'Teutonic' and the 'Majestic' carry as much as 3,000 tons of freight. I was informed by a member of this House that the purser of the 'Teutonic' told him when he was crossing the Atlantic that she had then on board 3,000 tons of freight.

Mr. LAURIER. She must have more than 20 knots capacity, then.

Mr. McNEILL. I think not.

Mr. LAURIER. I am not an expert; I only ask for information; but I understand that all the steamers of 20 knots now plying between New York and the old country do not carry more than 1,000 tons of freight.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman is mistaken as to that. When this subject was under discussion before, 700 tons was mentioned as the greatest amount of cargo carried; but the 'Teutonic' and the 'Majestic' are new vessels, built on a different plan from those older vessels, and vessels are now being constructed on still better lines and with a greater carrying capacity. These vessels will be able to carry from 3,000 to 3,500 tons of freight, and they may be very much smaller vessels than the 'Teutonic' or the 'Majestic.' They may be only 8,000 tons, whereas the 'Teutonic' and the 'Majestic' are 10,000 tons. Mr. Huddart himself told me the other day that they would have a carrying capacity of 6,000 tons, of which 2,500 tons would be for coal. But supposing, for the sake of argument, that my hon. friend is perfectly correct in saying that the 'Teutonic' and the 'Majestic' do not carry more than 1,000 tons of freight, though I know he is mistaken, that has nothing to do with this matter, because these vessels are to carry from 3,000 to 3,500 tons of freight, and are to be capable of a speed of 20 knots.

Mr. LAURIER. I will quote to my hon. friend the letter from a German steamship company, dated Hamburg, June 23rd, 1890, and addressed to Messrs. Munderloth & Co., Montreal. It says:

Do the Dominion Government really want 18 to 19-knot steamers, or will they be satisfied with 17, if it be but called something more? A knot difference makes a tremendous difference in expenditure. As yet there are only seven merchant steamers afloat and one building, which have an actual service speed of over 18 knots. They are the 'City of Paris,' the 'City of New York,' the 'Teutonic,' and the 'Majestic' of the White Star line, the 'Augusta-Victoria,' the 'Columbia,' the 'Normania' and the 'Furst Bismarck' owned by the Hamburg-American Packet Co.

That is the company writing this letter. The writer goes on to say:

The question now arises, what is really intended? Is it a line for postal service and Canadian passengers only, to sail between Southampton and Quebec or Montreal? Or is it to be a direct communication with the great New York lines, with Halifax as a landing and starting point and fast railway trains thence to New York? Are the steamers to run the whole year or only in summer? As Canada can hardly supply a sufficient number of passengers for such costly boats, I suppose the object will have to be to attempt encroachments upon the ground of the New York lines. Will that be a success? Calculating the working expenses of a voyage of such a boat, I arrive at the following figures:—

Wages and maintenance of crew	$10,000
Bunker coals	20,000
Engine and dock stores	3,000
Ordinary repairs and outfit	5,000
Insurance	8,000
Port dues and expenses	4,000

Every round trip 50,000

Now, I call my hon. friend's attention to this:

There is nothing to be taken into account for interest on capital, nor for depreciation, which items must be set down at about $250,000 to $300,000 per annum for every steamer.

Cargo cannot be taken into calculation, as these big steamers take ridiculously little, and cannot afford to lose time in loading and discharging, consequently very little would be made out of that source. All will depend upon the income derived from first and second-class passengers, as emigrants for Canada will hardly be sufficient from Southampton and continental ports and emigrants for America difficult to dissuade from the New York route.

That is a very competent man, the manager of the Hamburg-American Packet Co.

Mr. McNEILL. I have no doubt the gentleman who wrote that letter is a competent man, but I know that the 'Majestic' and the 'Teutonic' carry a great deal more freight. In fact, there is nothing in that letter about 1,000 tons, which I expected to hear from my hon. friend. But, as I have said, a member of this House, Mr. Burns, told me that he had just come across the Atlantic in the 'Teutonic,' and that the purser of that vessel had told him that she had on board 3,000 tons of freight. But, independent of that, these vessels will carry 3,000 tons of freight, and there is no doubt that there has been enormous advance in naval architecture within the last three or four years in respect of this matter of combining speed with carrying capacity. So that, so far as that is concerned, I think we may pass it by. As to what the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) said, with regard to the average speed of vessels carrying freight being 12 knots an hour, that is no doubt the case with regard to ordinary freight. But does my hon. friend suggest that there are not hundreds of thousands of tons of freight carried every year, which it is most important should be carried in fast ships? Does my hon. friend suggest, for example, that if we had, as we hope to have, in these vessels, cold storage for the carrying of fresh meats, it would not be a wise thing to have that carried in vessels steaming faster than 12 knots an hour? I am quite certain that the hon. member for Westmoreland never suggested such a thing. If we have cold storage for fresh meat, it stands to common sense that the fresher we can put that meat on the English market the better.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is of very little consequence. Fresh meat is sent from Australia

Mr. McNEILL. The advantage we would have over Australia would be that we would be able to put our meat on the English market much earlier.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman think it matters a straw whether it goes 36 or 48 hours earlier?

Mr. McNEILL. I think it matters a great deal. The sooner we land the meat on the English market the better. If we are sending poultry or eggs over, it makes a very great difference. And I think there are many other kinds of freight which are known to business men, as to which it would make a very great difference whether carried faster or slower across the Atlantic, and as to which it is very important they should be carried fast. As regards what my hon. friend said about the competition being limited to two ports, I did not understand that two ports only are to be allowed to compete for this line. I understood the right hon. Prime Minister, on the contrary, to say that there would be an opportunity for other ports to compete, if they desired to do so; and I presume it will be left to the contractor to decide for himself what is the better port.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did the hon. gentleman listen to what the First Minister said? He spoke of only two ports being involved.

Mr. McNEILL. I understood the First Minister to say the very opposite. I understood him to say that, in his opinion, the two ports mentioned were most likely to be chosen, but that it would be left to the directors of the company to decide which was the best port.

Mr. McCARTHY. I desire to move an amendment before this is carried. I want to see that we distinctly understand that the provisional contract is not the one that is to be carried out—that all the Government take power to do is to enter into a contract for a ten-year service. I have read the papers since I addressed the committee, and I find there is a distinct contract, which could be enforced in the Exchequer Court against the Government, for a twenty-year service, if ratified by Parliament. Now, the Government are asking power to enter into an arrangement, and I think we ought to know whether it is the intention of the Government to negotiate a contract on the basis of a ten year service or not.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is impossible to be more explicit than I have been. It is impossible for any one to be more explicit, but I am bound to assume that the hon. gentleman is in good faith in putting the question. The papers which have been brought down show that the Government have contemplated, entering an arrangement with Mr. Huddart for a ten years service at a subsidy of $750,000, and to undertake for a renewal, after the ten years period has elapsed, at a very much reduced rate. We are asking the power of Parliament now to enter into a contract for the ten years service at a subsidy of $750,000 a year, and no more.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then I would suggest to the right hon. gentleman, as everything is so vague in the terms of this Act, that these words should be added:

That such contract to be made shall be subject to the approval of Parliament.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will not accept that. We are asking authority to make a contract.

Mr. McCARTHY. For ten years, and the two points are: first, ten years; second, that the amount shall not exceed $750,000. But I did not gather from the right hon. gentleman that it would be impossible for the Government to include in the contract a renewal clause. Everything being vague, as to the terminal point, as to the speed, everything being at sea. I do not think it is unreasonable that so important a contract should be subject to the approval of this House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If we have to make every detail subject to the approval of this House and wait until we get authority from this House, there is not use making a contract with Mr. Huddart or anybody else. If every detail, the dates of departure and arrival, the destination, the rates of freight, and the speed and the penalties and all that—is to be ratified by Parliament, no man who is capable of carrying out the contract will ever make one.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not make any such unreasonable proposition. The Government propose a contract with Mr. Huddart. That may contain, as many do, the stipulation that it shall be subject to the approval of Parliament. The question will be whether, not the details, but the contract as a whole, shall be subject to the approval of Parliament.

Mr. MELOCK. The question is whether we have a Government by Parliament or by Governor in Council.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. McMULLEN. I just want to say a word or two in reply to some remarks made this afternoon. It was said the manufacturers of this country would reap a very large advantage from the establishment of this line. I hold in my hand an extract from the Canadian 'Manufacturer,' the organ of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association :

Let us see what it means for Canada to have a fast line of Atlantic steamers at a cost of $750,000 a year. The sum of $20,000,000 can be obtained in the money market by an annual payment of $750,000. It is well to inquire at this time if Canada can indulge in the luxury of paying $750,000 a year for a fast steamship service. Such steamers do not accept as freight such produce as Canada desires to ship abroad. If quick passages across the Atlantic are desired it would be cheaper for Canada to supply tickets free of cost than to pay $750,000 a year. If a traveller must make a quick passage across the ocean let him try the New York route : and if a merchant is desirous of a quick delivery of goods from abroad, let him order them to be sent via New York.

Now, the 'Sun,' which is the organ of the Patrons of Industry, has this to say :

Patrons realize that a capitalized expenditure of $20,000,000 on a fast Atlantic service could be better spent, if it is to be put at all, in relieving the farmers of Canada from some of their present hardships. If $750,000 a year is to be given to a steamship company to carry millionaires rapidly to Europe, it will have to be raised by means of the customs tariff.

These are two very important extracts, and I thought it my duty to read them to the committee.

Bill reported.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—DRAWBACKS.

House again resolved itself into committee on resolution respecting the allowance of drawbacks on certain articles manufactured in Canada for use in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose the Minister will give us some explanation with regard to this, and state fully upon what grounds the Canadian Pacific Railway have a claim to this interpretation of the contract subsisting between them and the Government.

Mr. HAGGART. When the road was under construction, it was impossible in many cases, owing to the rate at which the work of construction was proceeding, to furnish bridges of a permanent character, and temporary bridges were put in. These are now being replaced with works of a permanent character. Under the law the company was allowed to bring in free of duty such bridges as they wished for building the road. Under a subsequent act it was provided that where they got the bridges manufactured in the country, the manufacturers were allowed a drawback. I explained the matter when the resolution was first introduced, and promised the leader of the Opposition to bring down the correspondence on the subject. This is the letter which I received from Mr. Shaughnessy, the Vice-President of the Canadian Pacific Railway, asking for the drawback :

You are familiar with the fact that during the progress of construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it was necessary, in order to push the work to completion with the greatest possible dispatch, to make some portions of the work of a temporary character by using the timber of the country for bridges, in localities to which material for permanent iron bridges could not possibly be transported until after the rails were laid. Since the line was opened for traffic, the company has been gradually and continually providing the permanent structures originally contemplated.

Under the terms of the contract with the Government, the company was permitted to import into the country, without the payment of duty, certain articles required in the original construction of the railway, such as rails and fastenings, iron bridges, etc., and it was thought necessary, in the public interest, to pass an Act at the same session of Parliament, authorizing the Government to pay a drawback to any person in Canada, who manufactured for the company, the same articles (see 44 Victoria, chapter 12). This Act was amended the following session by 45 Victoria, chapter 7, which is, as I understand, now in force.

I beg to enclose herewith the following accounts in favour of the different manufacturing companies for drawbacks, with the necessary affidavits made by the company's chief engineer, and the managers of the manufacturing companies:—

Dominion Bridge Company, for rebate on Gull River bridge.	$1,844 90
Dominion Bridge Company, for rebate on Beaver River bridge	1,227 04
Dominion Bridge Company, for rebate on Harrison River draw span	1,877 68
Hamilton Bridge Company, for drawback on Pic River bridge	5,950 92
Hamilton Bridge Company, for drawback on Pitt River bridge	1,754 83

These accounts are payable to the bridge companies, but are forwarded through this office, in order that the circumstances under which the bridges were provided, and the grounds upon which the manufacturers are entitled to the drawbacks, might be fully explained, and certified by our chief engineer.

Will you kindly pass these accounts on to the proper officer for payment, and advise me when this has been done, so that I may settle accounts between this company and the two bridge companies.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) T. G. SHAUGHNESSY,
Vice-President.

On receipt of this letter, I went to the Department of Justice and they seemed to have some doubt as to the meaning of the clause and whether it should apply to the bridges that were now being constructed. In order to remove these doubts I have brought down these resolutions.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the hon. Minister give us an idea as to how these stipulated amounts are arrived at as the proper sums to be given as drawbacks on these bridges.

Mr. HAGGART. By the amount of duty the manufacturers would have to pay on the materials that enter into the composition of the bridge. That is something that would have to be found out by the department, and the law provides in what form it shall be fixed.

Mr. McMULLEN. Of course; a good portion of the iron used in the bridges manufactured in Canada is from pig iron on which we have paid a bounty of $2 a ton. In order to get an accurate account of what they are entitled to, the bounty on the pig iron should be taken into consideration as well as the duty on the iron which was imported into the country. I would like to know if there has been any definite system adopted by which these amounts have been arrived at?

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know what form has been adopted. The Act says:

Mr. HAGGART.

The Governor in Council may from time to time make regulations for ascertaining the quantities and value of the fish plates and other fastenings, spikes, bolts, nuts and iron bridges manufactured in Canada and used for the Canadian Pacific Railway in the original construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway as defined by the Act 37 Victoria, Chapter 14; also the quantity and value of all telegraphic apparatus manufactured in Canada and used by the said railway company in the original construction and in the first equipment of a telegraph line in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Governor in Council, with the assent of the Treasury Board, and upon such terms and conditions as they may think proper, may pay over to the person or persons in Canada for whom such articles as aforesaid, manufactured in Canada have been procured for the said company, sums of money not exceeding the amount of customs duty which would have been payable on such articles respectively if imported into Canada.

Mr. McMULLEN. I suppose there have been rebates made on some other bridges, or are these the first?

Mr. HAGGART. I think application was made to Council, and then referred to the Treasury Board, and the Treasury Board fixed the amount to be repaid the as a rebate. I do not think there are any regulations as yet.

Mr. McMULLEN. It would be well if some definite regulations were made in the Order in Council by which the rebate on every bridge could be gauged. If it has got to be left to the returns that the manufacturers of bridges themselves make—I suppose when they are made under oath we have no right to question their accuracy—there might not be uniformity. Next session a return may be asked for setting out the refunds that have been made, and there might be difficulties in getting at the accurate amount these people are entitled to.

Mr. HAGGART. I think these are the first applications.

Mr. McMULLEN. Could the Minister give us any idea of the entire amount of rebate that possibly may have to be made, as the Canadian Pacific Railway is giving no amounts, and is not stating the number of bridges on which possibly they may ask a rebate.

Mr. HAGGART. I have no idea at all. I have tried to get the probable amount they may require, and they could not tell me themselves. They are expending, I think, in the neighbourhood of from $2,000,000 to $4,000,000 a year for the purpose of putting the road in a better state of repair. But I could not tell you the amount that will be required for steel bridges along the whole line, under this change in the Act.

Mr. CHARLTON. How long has the work of replacing the old temporary structures that were first erected, been in progress? For instance, such structures as those north of Lake Superior that were built of round timber?

Mr. HAGGART. They have been continuously replacing them since the line was opened for traffic.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is it intended to have these applications for drawbacks applied to all temporary structures they have replaced since the line was first opened for traffic?

Mr. HAGGART. It is.

Mr. CHARLTON. So the list my hon. friend gave the House, upon which the road would make application, would be an incomplete one? That would be the first instalment of a larger amount?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. This will not apply to the Soo branch, will it?

Mr. HAGGART. No. It is nothing but what they were entitled to under the statute, and under their contract with the Government.

Mr. McCARTHY. I would like to know if the Minister can give us any idea of what percentage this $12,000 is of the total value of the work. I understand from the statute which the hon. gentleman just read to us that if the iron work of the bridges had been purchased outside the country, the railway company would have been entitled to receive from the Government the amount of duties that had been paid on their importation. But these have been made in the country, and have not been imported, and the manufacturer is entitled to the same amount, as I understand it, that the importer would have had. Now, about what is that? I think we ought to know about what proportion that is of the value of the work.

Mr. HAGGART. I cannot tell accurately what the customs duty is, but I think the old duty was a cent and a quarter a pound, before the passage of the present Act.

Mr. McCARTHY. I did not want the figures with any great accuracy, but I want to get some idea of the percentage, the ad valorem amount. Of course, it will depend upon that whether this is a trifling sum or a very large sum.

Mr. HAGGART. I cannot tell the percentage.

Mr. FOSTER. The old duty on iron bridges was a cent and a quarter a pound.

Mr. McCARTHY. About what ad valorem?

Mr. FOSTER. The rate per pound would depend upon the size.

Mr. McCARTHY. Can you give us some idea?

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose it would be 4 or 5 cents a pound.

Mr. CHARLTON. Can the Minister give us any information as to the value per pound of this steel work in the bridges? That would enable us to make a comparison between the value and the duty.

Mr. HAGGART. The price varies a little; I think it is 5 or 6 cents, and that would make the per cent about 30 to 32½.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think the report of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company last year states that the cost of balance of the bridges would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $750,000.

Mr. HAGGART. That will include the underwork.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think the report states that next year it will take about $750,000 to complete the bridges.

Mr. FOSTER. I imagine 6 cents a pound would be more than the average price.

Mr. McMULLEN. In the account the Minister has given of the rebate on these three bridges, what system has been adopted? Do they just show so much reduction on each bridge, without giving any rule by which the amount is arrived at?

Mr. HAGGART. The way the amount will be determined is by the company sending their account in to the Council with an application for payment; this will be referred to the Treasury Board, who will find out what percentage they are entitled to.

Mr. McCARTHY. I understand there was some affidavit sent. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will read it, as it may convey information to the committee.

Mr. HAGGART. I have not the affidavit here.

Mr. McCARTHY. For my part, I am not willing, and I do not think this House is willing, to change the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. This is, no matter how it may be disguised, or how it may be introduced to us, simply an alteration of the contract in favour of the company. The contract says in certain terms that the company are entitled to this drawback, or it does not. I understand the opinion of the Department of Justice is that, under the terms of the contract, the company are not entitled to the benefit of this drawback, and certainly that is the view I would have formed as regards the contract by reading the statute. The company are asking, in effect, that they should receive from the Government of Canada a drawback of 30 odd per cent upon the value of the bridges which they shall build in substitution of bridges built when the road was first constructed. If we may take the amount stated in the report, and that is the only information we have, the total outlay will be something like three-quarters of a million dollars, and the amount of the rebate will reach two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is more than that, because it is necessary to complete the work, and the company has been putting in bridges since 1891.

Mr. McCARTHY. The company did some work last year in removing bridges. I would like to know whether this sum is simply an instalment of the work required to be done. In the last report of the company the following statement is made :—

The very heavy expenditures for improvements are nearly at an end. The timber bridges remaining after the present year are mostly of such a character that their re-placement may be spread over a number of years. For the present year $714,965 will be required for permanent bridge work and other improvement or permanent way.

Any one acquainted with the road is aware that there are enormous bridge structures upon it, and we can easily imagine that the amount of expenditure for bridges will be very large. I am not prepared to alter the contract in one line or one letter. Under the contract the company have been able to float their securities, construct the road and pay dividends, and, according to the contract, as I have said, they are entitled or they are not entitled to get the drawback proposed. I would not deprive the company of a single right under the contract, but I am not prepared, and, in fact, I do not understand why we should interpret the contract in a different sense from the meaning which its language bears.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the change of structure from wood to stone and steel structures began in 1892. The company put in that year 500 stone or steel bridges and culverts; in 1893, the same number, and they expected to put an equal number in 1894. So there will be 1,500 wooden structures superseded by either steel or stone culverts when the work has been completed. In many cases the company have inserted long stone arches which are covered with earth, and take the place of trestle work which formerly existed, and, in some places, of course, the nature of the crossing is such that a steel bridge is required with stone buttresses. I believe, in British Columbia, there were a large number of grasshopper trestles, built, especially along the Thompson and Fraser Rivers, wooden structures which, at the time of the original contract with Mr. Onderdonk, were to be superseded either by stone or steel structures. I think all those have been removed, and, in most cases, stone walls have been built, and between the wall and the declivity, the space has been filled in with earth and stone, and a solid foundation made where trestle work existed before. So far as all those cases are concerned, no steel bridges are required; but over the ravines and torrents, steel structures are required and have been erected. It seems to me that the question we have to consider is, what was originally intended and contemplated in the contract as entered into between the company and the Government? If a particular class of structure erected by the company were intended to be permanent structures, then the company would stand exactly in the position of any other company in Canada; but if those were regarded from the first as temporary structures, and the understanding between the Government and the company was that they were to be superseded at a very early day by steel structures, then the provisions of the contract under which the company shall be entitled to import their iron and steel free of duty would apply, and would apply to them as much as if they have been put in at the first instance. The whole question is one as to the construction to be put upon the contract originally entered into between the Government and the company.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the hon. gentleman is right as to the time when the reconstruction commenced, the ordinary life of the wooden structures being seven years, namely, 1885. Therefore, I am under the impression that the amount stated applies to all structures so far erected. I do not agree, in the fullest sense, with what the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said in regard to this being an additional privilege given to the company under their contract. There is no doubt the company possessed the right, originally, and I think it is fully established that the structures which were put up on the road were merely temporary structures, and that the engagement of the company with the Government was that for the sake of opening the road in 1885, those temporary structures should be inserted with the distinct understanding that permanent structures should be put in as soon as the ordinary life of the wooden structures was exhausted. While it is an extension of the contract, it is only an extension of time for a privilege already granted. The company had the right to import the iron for those structures originally free of duty, they had the right to have them manufactured in Canada with an abatement to a certain extent. The only difficulty which arose in interpreting the contract when my interpretation was asked, arose from the fact that the contract had been declared completed, by Order in Council, in 1885, and I did not feel myself able to construe that term "completed" as only meaning provisionally completed. I thought I had to interpret it as meaning that the road had been finished, although it had only been finished in the sense that those structures had been erected for the purpose of opening the road for public traffic. That is precisely the difficulty in the way, and it is only a technical one, or, at least, only a question of time. Therefore, we thought it better to come to the House and obtain an interpretation as to the construction of the contract in this respect.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think the House should perfectly understand that this alteration in the contract will mean before we are done with it probably up in the millions. I think we had better realize and understand what we are doing. Of course that ought to make no difference if the railway company were entitled to the change—because change it is—in the contract which is sought to be made now at the instance of the hon. the Minister of Railways. But for my part I do not look upon it by any means as a technicality. I look upon it as a substantial change in their contract, and let me tell the committee why. This company were entitled to get certain grants of money and certain subventions in land only upon the completion of the road, as the road was completed from time to time and certified as being completed under the contract. Now, what they say is: although we applied to the Government and represented to the Government that the road had been completed, and the Government assumed that it was completed and gave us our money and land in pursuance of the contract, yet it never was completed in point of fact; these were mere temporary structures and the road is not yet completed and we are going on to complete it. Is that a position that the company can fairly take? They have obtained all the advantages under the contract, on the supposition and upon the statement, and upon the representation which I have no doubt, was made perfectly bona fide, that the road was completed. That they want to complete it in a more permanent way and change the original structure now to a more permanent structure cannot be said to be for the first time a completion of the road. It is a change from a temporary to a permanent structure, which might have been given but which was not given to them by the contract. It must have been foreseen. Every one must have known then just as well as they know now, that the first structures of the road would have to be made of wood and not of iron, and therefore when we provided in the contract that we should give a rebate upon such material as they brought into the country for the construction of the road, we distinctly limited it to that, and we ought not change it. I shall oppose this at every stage as a departure from the terms of the contract, and as wholly unwarranted and wholly unjustifiable in the public interest, as far as I can see.

Mr. TISDALE. I regret that I cannot see this matter in the same way as the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). In my opinion it ought to be considered in a broader way than the strict technical construction which he wishes Parliament to apply to this matter. One of the conditions of the contract, in spirit at all events, though perhaps not technically in the letter, was that the Canadian Pacific Railway should have the right to bring in its iron or steel free of duty for the purpose of the construction of this road. It was to the advantage of the country, fully as much as to the advantage of the railway company—that these temporary structures should be for the time being adopted, and frequently, where the temporary structures are of a nature that for a certain length of time they are safe for the business of the company and for the public to utilize, they are adopted at first. If they had not been adopted in the first instance in this case, the Western part of our country which was particularly affected must have awaited the benefits of the railway for a much longer time, had not this understanding been arrived at between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway. That it was a wise and a fair understanding goes without saying, because had it not been so arranged everybody must admit that probably the railway company would have at first put in permanent structures and delayed the running of the road much longer, to the disadvantage of the country and to the disadvantage temporarily of the company itself, though in the end it would be more advantageous to them. Surely the advantage of speedily getting facilities for the settlement and development of that country, and of establishing a great internal and external traffic by the completion of the road, ought to be looked upon in a fair and broad manner. As I understand there is no claim here for renewals or for repairs, and if that claim were made I think it would be going beyond the spirit of the contract. The speedy manner in which this road was constructed by the company was immensely beneficial to the country, but it entailed much extra expense, and as one of those having to take responsibility in the matter, I am quite prepared to justify our dealing with the spirit of the contract and not with the letter of it. If it is necessary, as it seems to be, in order to prevent any question arising afterwards, that Parliament should put this construction upon the contract and declare that this was within the spirit of it, I am prepared to justify it and believe that it ought to be adopted.

Mr. CHARLTON. I venture to say that there has not been a road built in America that was completed at first, in the sense of building stone culverts, stone arches where they were practicable, and steel bridges. This kind of work is done by almost all railway lines, gradually, as the resources of the road warrant and as the necessities of the road require. On the principal American lines such as the New York Central, the Lake Shore, and the Michigan Central, this kind of work is in progress yet, although these roads have been great lines of transit for scores of years. The work of improving these lines is constantly in progress. The Lake Shore road, one of the principal lines in the United States, has received these stone culverts only a few years ago; and the Canada Southern, although it is a first-class road and completed for more than twenty years, has only just had put in its stone culverts. The point raised by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is very pertinent. The Canadian Pacific Railway claimed to have been a completed road and upon that claim it received its money and land subsidies. It said: we complied with the contract made with the Government, the road is completed, we ask you to inspect the road, and the road was inspected by the agents of the Government and pronounced completed. Upon that inspection the road received subsidies in land and money, that it was only entitled to when it was completed. The road has been built for seven or eight years since these subsidies were received, and in the usual evolution in the operation of a railway line, this road is now going through the process that all other main lines in America have gone through, of perfecting its construction and completing its permanent works. It is substituting steel bridges for wooden ones, and putting in stone arches that will last for ever. They are all operations, not of original construction, but expenses which are chargeable from time to time to the earnings of roads, and not to capital account. I do not believe that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, in coming to the Government and making this claim, are standing on good ground. It looks to me as if they first claimed the road to be completed for the sake of getting the subsidies, and now claim that it was not completed for the sake of getting a drawback. When the company claimed that the road was completed, and the Government paid them the subsidies for the completed road, that was all they were entitled to receive. I do not wish to adopt any position that will do the Canadian Pacific Railway any injustice; but I wish to point out that it is just going through the process that all American railways have gone through, that of perfecting and improving the line, putting in more permanent structures than were necessarily put in when it was first constructed. All railways have heretofore used first of all wooden bridges, which are kept as long as they serve their purpose; they are then replaced by steel bridges, which are kept until they in turn give place to something else. With these wooden bridges the road has been operated as a completed road for seven or eight years; now, in the course of time, the company are reconstructing the road, and putting in certain works in a better manner; and I do not think the company are entitled to come and ask for a rebate on the materials brought in to enable them to carry on these repairs, for that is what they are. The company put in these wooden bridges for the purpose of using them; they did use them for seven or eight years; and now that they are worn out, they are putting in others. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company are not a mendicant company who find it necessary to ask this House to relieve them of their burdens. There has not been as great a railroad success on this continent as the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is a monument of the sagacity and enterprise and foresight of its promoters, and they have made fortunes out of it. They have been dealt with by this Government in a most liberal manner. They actually received from this Government, in money subventions, land grants, and portions of the road built by the Government, enough to build the main line. The Government actually built the main line for them, and on the basis of the credit so established, they proceeded to acquire the Canada Central, a line from Ottawa to Quebec, a line from Ottawa to Toronto, a line from Toronto to Owen Sound, and a line from Toronto to St. Thomas, and they constructed a line from Woodstock to Windsor, one through the State of Maine, and numerous branches in the west. They have built up the most enormous railway system on this planet to-day; and if the North-west settles up, all the promoters will be made immensely rich. And they owe all this to the liberality of this Government in giving them out of the public resources of this country, enough to build the road and establish their credit. For these reasons, I do not believe that we are called upon in the interest of the taxpayers of this country to make this concession to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I have not the least feeling against that company. It is a great corporation. Its manager is the Napoleon of railway managers on this continent and in the world. But for all that he is not entitled to more than he can justly claim; and it is not necessary to benefit this wealthy corporation at the expense of the overburdened taxpayer of this country. If this claim is allowed, another difficulty arises. The company were entitled to import their material free of duty. These bridges, as I understand, are being constructed in Canada. How much of the material has been imported? As my hon. friend from Wellington says, we are granting bonuses for the production of the very material which was probably used to a large extent in the construction of these bridges. It is a very difficult matter to get at; and, admitting, as I do not admit, that the Government are entitled to make these rebates, they need to be very cautious as to how it is done, and they want to be very particular as to whether the material is imported material or not.

Mr. SPROULE. So far as I remember the original contract, and the debate that took place upon it in this House, it was contemplated that one set of iron or steel bridges should be allowed to be imported by the company free of duty. Whether that set of bridges has been put in or not, it seems to me in equity to make very little difference. It is true, wooden structures were used in many instances because they were available at the time, and they enabled the company to push on the work more rapidly, although the company no doubt contemplated putting in better structures after a while. But if my memory is not at fault, a calculation was made by some hon. gentleman on the other side of the House regarding the cost of the road to the country, and in that calculation a rebate on iron bridges was included. I am inclined to think that it was the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton)—and one of the items of that cost was the drawback on the material that went into the road.

Mr. CHARLTON. Your memory is quite at fault.

Mr. SPROULE. If it was not the hon. gentleman, it was some other hon. gentleman on that side of the House. I am not going to put an interpretation on the law: but under the original contract, this was one of the rights of the company, and if they have not availed themselves of it, I do not think it makes any difference whether they put in these bridges when they built the road or whether they do it now.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If I am not mistaken, I think there have been some steel bridges erected on the road since its original construction. If so, I would ask the Minister how they have been dealt with.

Mr. HAGGART. None of them have been dealt with yet.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am sure that no member of this House wants to take any technical advantage of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as to what they are entitled to; at the same time, we do not want to give them more than they are entitled to. We ought to hold the balance fairly between the company and the taxpayers of this country. I am not a lawyer, and I am not able to state what is the proper interpretation of the law on this subject. But if the change that is proposed to be made by this statute is giving the Canadian Pacific Railway advantages that were not intended at the inception of the scheme, I would certainly oppose it. On the other hand, the First Minister has stated, on his word of honour and his reputation as Minister of Justice, that we are simply implementing the terms or understanding entered into at the time the Canadian Pacific Railway was constructed.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Minister of Justice did not say anything of the kind. If he did, that would alter the whole matter.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not go so far as to give my word of honour about it, because it is a matter of fact, of which I have no personal knowledge, since it all took place before I was here. But this much is clear: that the Canadian Pacific Railway were entitled, under their contract, to have free of duty the material for all iron and steel bridges that they imported for the original construction of the road. A parallel Act was passed, allowing a like rebate in favour of manufacturers, where the bridges were manufactured in the country. The only difficulty that has arisen is in construing the words "original construction." For the purpose of enabling the road to be opened in 1885, temporary structures were accepted by the Government, and on that the line was declared to be finished, the subsidy was paid, and the road opened. The difficulty I had in construing "original construction" to include the permanent structures intended to be put in, and the construction of which was delayed, was simply the circumstance that the road in the meantime had been declared to be finished. As regards the original contract and the statute allowing the rebate to manufacturers, there is no limit of time expressed. The contention of the company is that "original construction" includes permanent structures, which they always intended to put in at these points, but for which they were allowed to substitute wooden ones, in order that the road might be opened in 1885, as the Government desired.

Mr. McMULLEN. If it was in compliance with the request of the Government that the road was completed in 1885, and if, in order to carry out that request, the company had to change their intention in the matter of construction—

Mr. TISDALE. I might say in reply to some of the criticisms of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that the terms "completion" and "original construction" are not synonymous by any means. The question has been raised in the courts of law. I have known a case, for instance, such as this. Municipalities gave bonuses to a road, the bonuses to be handed over when the road was completed. The same road had an agreement with one of the trunk lines, by which the trunk line was to take it over and operate it when completed. And yet I have seen the road get the bonuses from the municipalities when the rails were laid, and very little ballast. But it was completed so that the trains could run over it, and the courts held that the company were entitled to the bonuses. Yet the road was not so completed that the trunk line could take it over and operate it. So that the fact of the bonuses or subsidies being paid does not always establish that the construction of the road is finally completed. My own opinion is that the Canadian Pacific Railway, under the original Act, are entitled to receive what they claim, but I think that the Government exercised a wise discretion, in view of the doubt, by coming to Parliament, putting the case frankly, and getting the sanction of Parliament. We know that it was because of the desire of the Government and Parliament to get that road completed in the quickest possible time that these temporary wooden structures were put in instead of these iron or steel structures, and we know that had the latter been built in the first instance, there could be no question as to the right of the company to the rebate. No great line is considered finally completed until it has iron or steel structures, and it seems to me it would be contrary to common sense to argue that it was not intended this road should be originally constructed in what is considered a substantial manner for a trunk line. In view of the fact that it was owing to the desire of the country and Parliament that the company completed the road with temporary structures and put it in operation in that way, I think it would be contrary to the dignity of this House and to justice to now take advantage of that concession by the company to the wish of the Government and the country, and say that because, in the first instance, they put up temporary structures, they are not now entitled to a rebate on their permanent iron and steel structures. Under the circumstances, there is a very strong case, and I think that the hon. gentleman opposite, if they look at it from this standpoint, will agree with me. I do not suppose they intend to treat it as a matter of party, but as a matter of fair dealing between the country and this great corporation. I do not desire to refer to the time when the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had less faith in the road, for I think it is a proper and a manly thing when a man finds that events show that he was wrong to declare his changed opinion, and I am glad to hear the words of commendation the hon. gentleman has expressed about this road and its success. I appeal to him as a business man—and he is a good business man—if it will not pay the country and the people of the country to assert the principle that where the credit and good faith of the country are pledged, and a doubt arises as to interpretation, the country will not take advantage of that doubt to the injury of the other party to the contract. I appeal to him whether it will not improve the reputation of the country, which both parties have helped to build up, to interpret these matters on higher ground, and, where there is a doubt, to declare that we will not take advantage of that doubt.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to say a word in reference to what the hon. gentleman has said about my beginning to have faith in the Canadian Pacific road, and his allusion to the fact that I had spoken in complimentary words of the management of that road. Mr. Speaker, I have always had faith in the Canadian Pacific road. I have criticised the action of the Government in giving so much money, so much more than was necessary, but I have never said a word calculated to injure the Canadian Pacific road; and as long ago as 1884 and 1885 I received a letter from the president of the company thanking me for the fair course I had taken, even though opposed to the Government's action, which course had been serviceable to the company in floating its securities. I have never said anything against the management, but I have spoken of it always in the highest terms. The road has been managed with great vigour and skill from the inception. It fell into the hands of men of unusual grasp and energy. The criticism I have made is against the Government for having given the company too much money, and made it a richer corporation than it ought to have been, at the expense of the country.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I was of the Government at the time the settlement took place between the Government and the company. We knew perfectly well that the road, as completed for the purposes of the subsidy had not all the iron bridges that were to be built. We required the railway to be used immediately instead of waiting for years, perhaps, before these bridges were built. It was perfectly well known to the Government that these wooden bridges were erected in order to allow the company the sooner to deliver the road to the public for use. But we did not intend by that to deprive the company or the public of the benefit of these permanent structures. I passed over a large portion of the road, and saw how these bridges were, but we thought that a fair interpretation of the contract required that we should accept the road, leaving it to the company to perfect the construction afterwards. If they had built these iron bridges at that time, they would have had the rebate, and because they built these wooden bridges at their own cost and are now replacing them with bridges of iron, how can we refuse them the rebate which they would have received had they built the bridges of iron in the first place? I think they are entitled to this rebate, and shall support the resolution.

Mr. SPROULE. I think that if you look closely at the Act, Mr. Speaker, you will see that what is meant by "original construction" so far as concerns the payment of the subsidy by the Government is not the same as the final completion of the road:

Upon the construction of any portion of the railway hereby contracted for, not less than 20 miles in length, and the completion thereof so as to admit of the running of regular trains thereon, together with such equipment thereof as shall be required for the traffic thereon, the Government shall pay and grant to the company the money and land subsidies applicable thereto, according to the division and appropriation thereof as hereinbefore provided ; the company receiving in lieu of cash, terminable bonds of the Government.

And so on. That seems to be clearly intended to mean that they may receive the benefit of the subsidy given by the Government before the road was finally completed, and just as the hon. member who has taken his seat (Sir Hector Langevin) says: the wooden bridges were put in for the purpose of giving the public the use of the road at the earliest possible time, and in order to get the advantage of the subsidy that was granted by the Government. I think that the contention of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) is quite consistent: that a road can hardly be considered finally completed when it is handed over, or when it has earned a subsidy given either by the Government or by a municipal corporation, and, in this sense, the Canadian Pacific Railway could not be looked upon as finally completed when it had earned its subsidy from the Government.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I understood the hon. Minister to state that no iron or steel bridges had been substituted for wooden ones. In that case the company are seeking to have the law defined in the manner he proposes prior to entering upon any work of that kind.

Mr. HAGGART. No ; they are asking for a drawback on iron and steel bridges, already substituted for wooden ones. I said that none had been paid for yet. I read the claim to the House, showing some of the bridges that had been completed.

Mr. EDGAR. Some years ago, when the temporary structures were put up by the Canadian Pacific Railway, I was certainly one of those who found a great deal of fault with the Government for declaring it a completed road, and considering these structures as finished works, I did so because I was afraid the Government were not going to have permanent substantial structure put in when they allowed the Canadian Pacific Railway to get their subsidies on the wooden structures as finished road. The fear I felt was that the country would not have these completed permanent structures put in. It appears that my anticipations were wrong. I still think the Government were very much to blame in taking the risk they did at the time. But it seems that the company have been able to put in these permanent bridges. I think it is not unreasonable to treat them as if they were put in as original structures.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that those who were in the House when the contract was entered into with the Canadian Pacific Railway will remember that when the road was finished, the bridges were to be of a permanent character of stone or steel and iron, and the road, as to grades and general construction, was to be as good as the Union Pacific. In 1885, when the first traffic took place over the road, it was then declared by the company—and I am sure most hon. gentlemen will recollect that it was first used in carrying troops—that these structures were not such as were to be in the road when it was finally completed, that they were of a temporary character. I suppose if the contract is interpreted in accordance with its spirit, the company, so far as these bridges are concerned, will be entitled to stand in no worse position than if they had not hastened the work at the instance of the Government, and put in temporary structures.

Mr. McCARTHY. If any member of the Government will say that this work was done by the railway company at the instance of the Government in any other way than the contract called for, I will certainly not be found opposing this resolution as I do. So far as my recollection of the history of the railway is concerned, no pretense was made by the Canadian Pacific Railway that they had not complied with their contract. They contended that they had complied with their contract, and, therefore, they asked that the Government should fulfil this portion of the contract, and the Government did so. Now, it never was contemplated by this contract—which the hon. gentleman will remember was not made by the House, but was made by the Government and sanctioned by the House by an Act of Parliament—it never was contemplated that the original structures should be of iron. Let us understand that. I will demonstrate it by the words of the contract. We all know that it would have been impossible to exact the construction of the railway up in the mountains in a permanent way, and within the time that was limited, and the contract was precise about it. The contract said :

The company shall lay out, construct and equip the said eastern section and the said central section of a uniform gauge of 4 feet 8½ inches, and in order to establish an approximate standard whereby the quality and the character of the railway and of the materials used in the construction thereof, and of the equipment thereof may be regulated, the Union Pacific railway of the United States as the same was first, constructed, is hereby selected and fixed as such standard.

Now, that was our bargain, and there was a great deal of quarrelling over that. It will be found by reference to the division that took place on the night the contract was adopted, that a resolution was proposed with regard to that very clause as being unsatisfactory and insufficient. The end was that the contract as entered into by the Government was adopted by the House and was ratified by this Act of Parliament. Now, will any person tell me that the Union Pacific Railway, as originally constructed, had iron bridges or iron structures.

Mr. WELDON. What are the facts of the case?

Mr. McCARTHY. I think I can show to my hon. friend that the Union Pacific Railway was not constructed of iron: I think we all agree about that.

Mr. SPROULE. It is a venture without knowledge.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not seeking to alter the contract, but my hon. friend who sits in the adjoining constituency, and who has different views on most subjects to myself, without knowledge, without knowing a single word as to what that construction was, is prepared to alter it in favour of the company and against the country.

Mr. SPROULE. I said most distinctly that if it was right that the company should get that rebate then they ought to get it, otherwise I did not favour it. I do not want to be misrepresented.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then the hon. gentleman should not vote for this resolution, because if they have a right to get it by law we do not require to alter the contract. The Minister of Justice tells us they have no right to get it by law.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not understand it that way.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Minister of Justice tells us that according to this contract they are not entitled to get the rebate and drawback, and this resolution was introduced to alter the contract and declare that the words mean something that they do not mean.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, I say that there is a doubt.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then let us have the doubt cleared up, let the courts decide the question. I do not think there is any doubt about it. I am not here saying that this company should not get every cent they are entitled to, but I am not prepared to vote away a million dollars—for it will come to that—in favour of this company until I know why it is that we should grant that sum of public money. Now, I have read to you that the standard was to be that of the Union Pacific Railway, the same as it was at first constructed. Then what is the language of the contract:

And the Government shall also permit the admission free of duty of all steel rails.

Now, I will pause here for a moment. They alter the weight of the steel rails. This very report in front of me says that they have changed the weight of the steel rails, and made them heavier, and the next thing we shall be asked is to give a rebate on steel rails, because that was merely temporary, and the report shows here that they have altered the weight of the steel rails and have put on heavier rails in many portions of the road.

And the Government shall also permit the admission free of duty of all steel rails, fish plates and other fastenings, spikes, bolts and nuts, wire, timber and all material for bridges —

In what?

—in the original construction of the railway and of a telegraphic line in connection therewith.

Now, is the original construction not complete?

Mr. AMYOT. That is not wooden railways; it applies to the original construction of iron bridges.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am reading the section. Now, what I submit is, first, we have the contract showing what the construction is to be; next, we have the statute declaring that in that construction, if they choose to use wood they can do it, so long as they bring it up to the standard of the Union Pacific. They did bring it up to that standard, the road has been completed, they got everything they were entitled to get. Now, they want us to interpret the contract to mean something which, according to the opinion of the Minister of Justice, the words of the contract do not mean. Well, this may have a far-reaching effect, and may bring some of us before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. My hon. friends will remember that it was one of the terms of this contract that until this construction was complete, no member of this House was authorized to invest in Canadian Pacific Railway stock. If it is not finished yet, why, all those who have got Canadian Pacific Railway stock are contractors under the Independence of Parliament Act, and are entitled to be expelled from the House. So I think we had better pause before we alter and change the terms of this contract and bring about consequences which would be disastrous to some of us, at all events, to my certain knowledge.

Mr. HAGGART. It is true that the Canadian Pacific Railway claim that they have a right to this under the law as at present. If the hon. gentleman who has just given us the law on the subject, would read the Act which defines what the original construction means, he will see it has no reference whatever to the contract, and whether the road comes up to the standard of the Union Pacific or not. It says:

The Governor in Council may from time to time make regulations for ascertaining the quantities and value of the fish plates and other fastenings, spikes, bolts, nuts and iron bridges manufactured in Canada and used for the Canadian Pacific Railway the original construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway as defined—

Not by the Act that he has read, but——by the Act 37 Victoria, chapter 14.

Perhaps I may be wrong, but I think there is very little doubt that they are entitled to the amount under the law as it is. There is no definition such as the hon. gentleman states in chapter 14 of 37 Victoria, as to what the standard of the road shall be. And I think that the facilities in the country for making bridges at the time the road was constructed were such that not a tithe of the bridges could have been completed, and it would have been impossible to move them to the places where they were intended to be used without the road first being constructed. Taking that Act in regard to drawbacks and giving it the interpretation of 37 Victoria, chapter 14, the company are within their right in making this claim; but as the Minister of Justice seemed to have doubt on the subject. I thought it better to bring this whole matter before the House, explain it, and ask the House to pass an Act for the purpose of removing the doubt.

Bill reported.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS.

House resolved itself into committee on resolution respecting the deduction mentioned in section 26 of the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons, chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McCARTHY. I would suggest to the First Minister the desirability of making this a similar resolution, permanent, instead of bringing down a proposition of this kind each session. The number of days allowed might depend on the length of the session. Last session, which was two months in length, I understand six days were allowed, and this session, 12 days are proposed to be allowed, and it has extended over four months. It would be better to make the provision a general one.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There are two or three amendments needed to this Act, and we propose to introduce a Bill on this subject next session.

Resolution reported.

DOMINION NOTES.

House resolved itself into committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend the Act respecting Dominion Notes, chapter 31 of the Revised Statutes, by substituting the words 'twenty-five' for the word 'twenty' in the fourth line of section 3.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to add the following words:—

The Minister of Finance and the Receiver General shall not issue Dominion notes beyond the sum of twenty million dollars without having gold for their redemption of an equal amount for the additional issue.

Mr. FOSTER. In asking the committee to pass this resolution, I desire to correct two or three misapprehensions which, whether they exist in the House or not, seem to exist in the country, if one may judge from the newspaper comments made upon this proposed resolution. It is sometimes asserted that the object of thus raising the limit by five million dollars is to force the circulation of small notes, or to provide for a greater circulation of small notes in the Dominion. There is no call for a greater circulation of small notes than is at present provided for, and it is not contemplated, for there is no necessity for it, that the issue of small notes, ones, twos, and fours shall be at all extended by this raise of the issue. In fact, we could scarcely do that. An impression exists in some places that the Government can force an issue in the country by printing notes and paying them out for public works. It has never been done in this country, I hope it never will be done, and it is not intended in this case. The impression also exists, and it has been voiced by some newspapers, that perhaps the Government is in necessitous circumstances, and they take this method of doing what would be equivalent to forcing a loan, as the term is used. There is no intention of forcing a loan. If there was even that intention, it could not be carried out. We can only put into circulation, and keep in circulation, according to our system, the amount necessary for the commercial requirements of the country. If more than that amount is issued, it is redeemable in gold and the notes come back to the banks, and so it is not retained in circulation. In short, the whole reason for the extension is this: by the Act, the banks have to hold a certain amount of their reserve, 40 per cent, in Dominion notes. These are the notes of large denomination, and the limit of twenty millions, up to which we can now issue, it is necessary to raise in order to meet the necessities of the banks of the country for those large notes. We are obliged to hold specie and guaranteed securities to the extent of 25 per cent of our issue, and 15 per cent of that has by the law to be in gold. The amount of specie that we do hold actually at the present time is over $8,000,000, and the amount of guaranteed security is about two millions. That is we have a reserve of $10,000,000 for about $20,000,000 of issue, while the law only contemplates 25 per cent so far as the two kinds of security that I have spoken of are concerned. We have, therefore, an overplus in gold of some $5,000,000 above what is necessary by the law, and in gold and guaranteed securities of over $5,000,000. The gold that the banks hold varies from time to time.

Sometimes it is here and sometimes it is there. Large quantities of gold have come into the banks and the reserve, therefore, being larger, the forty per cent being necessary to be held for this, they ask from us large notes, and we must have these large notes in order to supply them with that which the law says they shall have to carry as portion of the reserve.

Mr. CHARLTON. What is the largest denomination of notes ?

Mr. FOSTER. One thousand dollars. That is the whole reason for asking this. I did not think it would be necessary to ask it, because if you will refer to the Act there is a clause in it which says that more than the amount fixed or authorized by the law may be issued provided the Minister of Finance, the Receiver General, hold dollar for dollar in gold. But, the decision from the Department of Justice holds, that that does not apply to the extreme limit of $20,000,000, as to what Parliament has authorized, but to another section of the Act which allows the overplus between what has been heretofore authorized and the $20,000,000 to be raised by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Treasury Board ; and that, therefore, it does not refer to the Parliamentary limit of $20,000,000, and that we have no right to issue above the $20,000,000, even though we hold gold to the amount of the issue of the notes and for their redemption. This simply makes the law hereafter permissible. That is, to allow us to raise above the $20,000,000 provided we hold gold to an equal amount.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is an amendment which I certainly would have suggested if the hon. gentleman had not brought it forward. I confess that I was disposed to entertain the same opinion as the Minister of Finance, that under section 6 he had full power to issue as much more as would be required, and although I listened attentively to the explanation that he gave as coming from the Justice Department I confess that I do not quite follow it, in view of the terms of section 6.

Mr. FOSTER. In the opinion of the Minister of Justice that applies to section 3.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Section 6 enables an additional issue with the approval of the Governor in Council, but the powers of the Governor in Council are limited, I think, by section 3, to $20,000,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a question of legal explanation, and I will not put my opinion against the opinion of the Minister of Justice on a point like that. I merely say that any body reading the Act would have supposed that such a provision as the Minister of Finance now proposes to make, was fully authorized under section 6. However, the main point is : that it is to be clearly provided that for every single dollar over $20,000,000, you keep gold for gold.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. That is it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The only objection I see to it is, that as you have got $13,000,000 of large notes, looking at the bank returns I hardly see that we require any additional issue. Their total reserve, I think can hardly exceed $26,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER. We only know what these reserves may be by a return which is given at the end of the month, and if they come to us and say : We want large notes and here is gold for it, we have got to keep 40 per cent reserve, and between the time of one report and the next, we cannot say that they do not require it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If, as a matter of fact it is quite true, as the hon. gentleman says, that 40 per cent of the bank reserves must be held, and it is a mere matter of calculation if the balance of the $20,000,000 after deducting the notes in circulation are not sufficient, I do not see that there is any objection to the issue, with the provision that he has now inserted. Without that I certainly should have thought it unnecessarily risky.

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE.

Resolution reported from Committee on Ways and Means (12th July) was read the second time and concurred in.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—LAND GRANTS.

Mr. DALY moved second reading of Bill (No. 159) respecting the land subsidy of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. He said : The object of this Bill is to enable the Government to grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, as part of its original main line grant, tracts of land along the railway, or within the 24-mile belt, in whole townships, that is, the odd and even-numbered sections together. The reason of that is that in that part of the main line from Medicine Hat to Crowfoot Crossing, for instance, the land is arid and requires irrigation ; and the terms of the original grant specify that the land that the company shall get shall be land fairly fit for settlement. There is no question as to this land being fairly fit for settlement if it were irrigated ; but as it is at present it is not fairly fit for settlement. The company have experimented at different stations along the line of railway in the tract I speak of within the last eight or nine years by having gardens made. About every third or fourth year there is a rainfall, and then they have a good crop ; but in the other years they have not. That demonstrates that it is impossible to do anything with this land except by irrigation, and this Bill will enable the company to irrigate the land. If they were to take the odd-numbered sections only and were to put in irrigation works, they would benefit both their own and the Government land; and this Bill is to enable them to have the land en bloc, so that whatever they do in the way of irrigation will benefit their own land. There is an area approximately of about 4,952,652 acres. One-twentieth of that, or 247,632 acres, go to the Hudson's Bay Company, and school lands amount to 275,147 acres. The area of odd-numbered sections within the block, exclusive of school lands, amounts to 2,214,936 acres, out of which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have already accepted 776,960 acres, and it is reasonable to suppose that if a scheme of irrigation were applied to this block, the company would be enabled to select out of it at least 1,000,000 acres more, and possibly a larger area.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the hon. gentleman's proposition simply this, that whereas at present we are in the habit of granting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company each alternate lot, he proposes to grant them each alternate township?

Mr. DALY. Not alternate townships—every township in this block.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does he propose in that case to give the company an unbroken tract, say of fifty, sixty or a hundred miles long by a depth of six, or twelve, or eighteen, or twenty-four miles, as the case may be?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because that is a much more questionable proceeding. I thought at first that he was proposing to give alternate townships, for which there is something to be said; but the other is much more dubious. He proposes to grant blocks adjoining the railway for perhaps hundreds of miles.

Mr. DALY. It is only in the district between Medicine Hat and Crowfoot Crossing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is the only district?

Mr. DALY. That is the only district.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). As I understand, the object of the Bill is to enable the Government to agree with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to grant a certain area lying in a district that is comparatively rainless, and where irrigation will be required in order to bring the lands into cultivation; and I understand that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have assented to the proposition upon condition that they may receive all the lands that they will take in that way en bloc, and that they will not be put to the expense of irrigating lands which they will not be entitled to receive. Of course, there is a great deal to be said in favour of that proposition, because the Government get rid of lands which under the terms of the contract would not be regarded as fairly fit for settlement. But I do not find in section 1 any statement as to the particular district where these lands are situated; and if this Bill were passed, there would be nothing to prevent the lands being granted en bloc in any part of the North-west Territories. Now, I fancy that the hon. Minister has come to an understanding with the company that there is a certain well-defined district within which these lands will be granted to the company, and there ought to be some indication by parallels of latitude and meridians of longitude where these lands are located, so that the power of the Minister to grant under the Bill would be confined to the area so defined. Then I find that by section 2:

The grants of lands so made shall include the statutory allowance for roads between sections in the areas so granted, but shall be subject to a reserve of one acre out of every one hundred acres for the establishment of public highways to be defined as hereinafter provided.

Now, I do not clearly understand what the hon. gentleman proposes by this section. If he were to make a grant, say of a hundred miles square, to the Canadian Pacific Railway, would they be at liberty, under it, to depart from the plan of survey which the Government have applied to other portions of the territory? Would they be at liberty to lay it out into townships more than six miles square, and adopt other than the rectangular system of survey? I would infer from this section that that could be done, and it seems to me that it would be a serious departure from the policy which has been hitherto pursued in the North-west Territories. According to the plan of survey that has hitherto prevailed, of making a road four rods in width around every square mile of territory, it would require, in addition to the six hundred and forty acres in the territory, sixteen acres to every square mile to be allowed for roads. That is, you would surround every section with a strip of land two rods in width and a mile in length, which would extend on the four sides of every section. I confess I do not quite understand what the hon. gentleman means by one acre out of every hundred acres for the establishment of a public highway—whether that is the only allowance that is made for highways along with the six hundred and forty acres, or whether that is in addition to the sixteen acres, under our plan of survey, that would accompany every section of a mile square. I think that in this respect the hon. gentleman's Bill requires to be made very clear, and the first section requires limitation to some particular area or district of the North-west Territories, and ought not to be drawn in the indefinite manner in which it now stands.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the Act, in the direction the hon. gentleman has indicated, could be amended by adding a fourth clause, to this effect: "This Act shall be only subject to that section of country between Medicine Hat and Crowfoot Crossing."

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DENISON. I would like to ask the number of acres allotted to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the balance of their subsidy.

Mr. DALY. Speaking from memory, I think there is a balance of about two million acres at present, which the company have yet to select to complete their main line grant.

Mr. CHARLTON. How far have they gone back of the main line?

Mr. DALY. The original grant was twenty-four miles on each side of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway from the Red River to Calgary. In addition to that, there is a block of six million acres odd of land set apart in the north-westerly portion of the province, which was taken by the Canadian Pacific Railway at the time of the $50,000,000 loan. That is the time they handed back so many millions of acres to the Government, they selected this tract of land in a block, and that is the only land, so far, they have got without the main line, except another tract of land twelve miles wide on each side of the projected line of railway running from Saskatoon to Battleford. That makes up the total area, so far, of the land we have given them. In answer to the hon. member for Bothwell, I quite agree as to the necessity of limiting this. It was so intended, but by some means the draughtsman omitted what was originally in the Bill, defining the tract to which this should apply, between Medicine Hat on the east and Crowfoot Crossing on the west, within the twenty-four-mile belt. As to the road allowance, as the Bill states here: "The grant of land so made shall include the statutory allowance for roads between sections" in the areas so granted. That means they shall have sixty-six feet road allowance, including the sections of land. Section 3 provides:

The Minister of the Interior may cause such public highways as he thinks expedient to be surveyed and set off through any tract of land granted under this Act, provided the area taken for this purpose does not exceed the one-hundredth part of the aggregate area of such tract; and upon the approval by the Minister of any such survey, the area set off thereby shall become and be a public highway, and shall be open to the public for use as such.

That will give all the highway necessary, but if we were to leave the road allowances open at present, according to the present survey, it would interfere with the system of irrigation. We provide there shall be sufficient highways and roadways for all purposes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman does not do that by the provision of the Bill. Were he to make a grant to the company, the interest of the Crown would be granted away in the entire territory granted, that is, embracing not only the section, but the highways, subject to the power of creating highways to the extent he has mentioned. The one hundredths part would be very much less than what is now required, because if we take a strip of land two rods wide, half a chain in width, around a square mile, it embraces sixteen acres and sixteen square rods, and that is a good deal more than the one-hundredth part of six hundred and twenty acres. That would be six acres and one-fifth. It seems to me, that being so, the hon. gentleman requires to declare what the reservations are, extending the provisions of the Dominion Lands Act to the plan of survey and the propositions of this Bill, so that the company will receive only the lands which would be received by private parties in the case of lands set out for settlement. The Government may, of course, provide that until it is required such roads shall be opened by proclamation or some other form, the company shall not be required to open the roads on those lands. But it does seem to me that the company ought not to have the power to alter the plan of survey, or to interfere with the arrangement made by the Government, that that is an exercise of sovereignty which ought to remain here, conveying to the company precisely what you would convey to any private individual in case the lands were laid out for settlement.

Mr. DENISON. I was going on to say that this two million acres would be, roughly, one hundred townships. If these one hundred townships were selected in what are called the bad lands, that is where there is an insufficient supply of water, it would be right to hand the tract over to the company that would have to irrigate it. It would not be reasonable to allow those who hold their lands on speculation to come in and reap the benefit of the expenditure, which would be very large, made by the Canadian Pacific Railway in carrying into effect its irrigation projects. But if the hundred townships were selected anywhere else than in these lands where there is insufficient supply of water, it would be advisable to amend the Bill.

Mr. CHARLTON. Are we to understand from the Minister that this extensive tract of land, 48 miles in width—24 miles on each side of the line—he did not give us the length—

Mr. DALY. The length is 106 miles.

Mr. CHARLTON—are we to understand that this tract all requires irrigation, and that it is all susceptible of irrigation?

Mr. DALY. No; the company have already selected 776,000 acres out of that.

Mr. CHARLTON. Then the Governor in Council ask power to grant to the company the even as well as the odd-numbered sections for the whole of this tract, and the power to carry on this work, on the ground that this land all requires to be held by the company because of the necessity of irrigating the land. Now, I doubt very much whether one-quarter of the land is susceptible of irrigation, and if that is the case, we are granting to the company an advantage that they are not entitled to. It makes a great difference whether they are allowed to have every section and take a whole block of land. The intention of the Government when the charter was originally granted, and the land grant was provided for was that the rights of the settlers should be provided for by reserving for their occupation and use one-half the land within this belt. If the company can get the whole land, and can get it located in a special way, it is more valuable than would be the same area of land made up of even-numbered sections. Unless it can be shown that it is necessary to grant these lands for the purpose of securing irrigation, there is no reason to grant the lands. It may be better for the company, but we are here to look after the interests of the people.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me a mistake to change the survey.

Mr. McCARTHY. We have not come to that yet.

Mr. SPROULE. I think this section raises the question of the survey. It says:

Notwithstanding anything contained in the Dominion Lands Act, chapter 54 of the Revised Statutes, or any other Act.

And so on, which covers the question of the survey. If this land is thrown open for settlement, as it would be after a system of irrigation has been carried out, it would be very inconvenient for the settlers when the surveys were changed, and with the very limited allowance made for roadway which this Bill provides for. Besides, I understood it was the intention of the Government to pass a general law regulating irrigation schemes in the North-west Territory, so that their works could be extended over roadways as well as any other portion of the farm. That would be better than this proposal to make a grant of a solid block of land under these conditions.

Mr. McCARTHY. This section only permits the Government to give the even-numbered sections as well as the odd-numbered, and does not affect the question of survey. It provides also for giving the school lands, the Government having set apart lands of equal extent and value elsewhere. I see no objection to the principle. It seems to me a reasonable thing to grant to the company land in bulk where they have to be at the expense of irrigation.

Mr. CHARLTON. Of course, where they have to irrigate.

Mr. McCARTHY. But I think the thing to be complained of is that they have the power over lands that may not be capable of irrigation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is defined.

Mr. McCARTHY. But includes lands that do not require irrigation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But I understand that these have been selected by the company.

Mr. McCARTHY. Not altogether, I understand.

Mr. DALY. These were selected by the company when it was ascertained that irrigation was necessary. I have confined the tract to the country where it is necessary that there should be irrigation. The idea is to give the company land en bloc, so that whatever irrigation work they undertake, they will be able to irrigate the tract as a whole. There are no settlers there and there never will be until irrigation takes place.

Mr. CHARLTON. Can any of it be made productive without irrigation?

Mr. DALY. Not every year. So far as experience goes, it yields a crop about every fourth year. When they have rain, it is all right; magnificent crops are raised on this land; but the results are uncertain.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman does not propose to provide that these lands shall be selected by the plan of survey in use in the Territories.

Mr. DALY. They will have to close up the road allowances, but by the reservation made under the Bill we will give all the necessary road space wanted by the people. We take out school lands and the Hudson's Bay lands if the Hudson Bay Company consent. This arrangement is only tentative. We do not know whether the company will carry it out or not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the company held these lands for ranching, some arrangement might be made that parties could not come in claiming that they were on the lines of the road and not on the lands of the company, as long as the company maintain opposition against parties trespassing by going on what would be the road allowance as well as the land of the company. But suppose the company undertake to sell the lands and set them out for settlement, this would enable them to take a plan of survey altogether different from that existing in the North-west Territory elsewhere.

Mr. McCARTHY. We can deal with that on the next section. This is the first section which does not affect the question of survey.

Mr. CASEY. It is very inconvenient to have a Bill of the importance that this turns out to possess brought down at this time of the session and hurried from the second reading into committee without the information we ought to have on the subject. But, perhaps the hon. gentleman can give us some of the information, approximately at all events, as we go on. Has any estimate been prepared of the percentage of these lands requiring irrigation?

Mr. DALY. All of them.

Mr. McGREGOR. Three-quarters of them.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister says all.

Mr. DALY. Yes, I think it all requires irrigation.

Mr. CASEY. Has any estimate been prepared by the engineers of the department?

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. CASEY. It is mere guesswork.

Mr. DALY. Observation and experience shows it.

Mr. CASEY. As the land is not settled, I do not know how observation and experience can show it.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman did not hear my opening remarks. I said the Canadian Pacific Railway had experimented with lots along their line of railway between Medicine Hat and Crowfoot, these last eight years.

Mr. CASEY. How many settlers are there at present in this district?

Mr. DALY. None.

Mr. CASEY. No land has been taken up by settlers at all?

Mr. DALY. No, with the exception, I think, of one of the Lester Kay farms. That is the only settlement.

Mr. CASEY. Is the whole of this country adapted to irrigation?

Mr. DALY. Yes, it is presumed so.

Mr. CASEY. This appears to me to be a very grave departure from the policy deliberately adopted by this House of reserving half of this land for the purpose of actual settlement by farmers. The trouble in these new countries, both in the States and here, has been the taking up of a large extent of land for ranching or grazing purposes, to the exclusion of farming. Now, in the case of ranche lands, I am aware that provision is made for withdrawing them from the ranchers when they are required for settlement; but if this land were given in blocks, as the Minister proposes, to the Canadian Pacific Railway, the case would be very different. The railway would not be in the same position as the ranchers; the railway would be the actual owners of the land, and could prevent any settlers from coming in on any terms. I do not see for what other purpose this land could be used than for large ranches, if the terms of this Act is carried out. If the roads laid down in existing surveys are broken up and closed up, and no more ground is devoted to roads, than this Bill proposes, it would be impossible to lay this country out into farms for ordinary purposes, and it could only be used as a roaming ground for large herds and flocks. As the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has pointed out, the amount reserved is hardly more than a third of that which is now required for the ordinary roadways around the mile sections. One acre out of a hundred would not provide for any closer subdivision of the land than strips a mile wide and three miles long, and that is not a subdivision suitable for the purpose of farm occupation. Again, as the hon. member for Bothwell pointed out, there is no clause here as to the direction and distance apart of the different roads, to be preserved, so far as possible, even with the reduced amount of land devoted for that purpose. The Act says that the Minister of the Interior may cause such public highways as he sees fit to be laid out. According to this Bill he may run them in any direction to suit the convenience of large occupiers of land. That must be the intention of the Act, or it would not have been phrased as it is. It is evidently the intention to establish a ranching preserve in those lands which shall never be opened to occupation by farmers for actual settlement. I think it would introduce the evils of ranching in their very worst form, and shut up the country entirely against the class of settlement we desire to encourage, and would make the use of this land only possible to corporations having large capital, and only to such corporations to whom the Canadian Pacific Railway chose to lease it. Now, it is quite true that irrigation is only possible by a combination of capital, on a pretty large scale, with a combination of land. It is also true that much of this land is not fit for occupation by farmers until it is irrigated. If that be the case, the object of the Government should be to provide a scheme by which irrigation might be carried on, and yet leave the land open to future occupation or settlement of the kind we desire to attract to that country. If the Canadian Pacific Railway are willing to undertake the works of irrigation covering this area, the Government would do better, in my opinion, to pay their share of the cost of irrigating the even-numbered sections, and reserve them for future sale to actual settlers, than to lock up the whole country in the way it is here proposed to do. It stands to reason that the Canadian Pacific Railway would not irrigate the even-numbered sections free of cost without benefit to themselves; but if that irrigation makes these lands useful to the company, it would make them useful to the Government, and make them fit for settlement. I think it would be a highly proper proposal that large blocks, at least, of this country should be set apart for experimental irrigation, the Government paying their share of the cost of irrigating Government lands, but reserving those Government lands for the uses to which Government lands are usually destined. There is another point in connection with this Bill that seems to be a departure from good policy. We shall by this means, no doubt, get rid of a good deal of land that we could not otherwise get rid of to the Canadian Pacific Railway, subject to the disadvantages I have referred to. It would accumulate this land, however, along the line of road. Now, I believe it is more for the interest of the North-west at large that the company should be induced to take up large areas at some considerable distance from the main line, such as the six million area to which the Minister referred in the North-western part of the Territories. It is only by such means that the railway will be induced to build side lines, colonization roads, leading into those lands. The predicament in which the Government and the railway find themselves with these bad lands on their hands, is only another proof of the unwisdom of the Government in authorizing the Canadian Pacific Railway to build by the present route. They should have been compelled to adopt the route laid down by the Government surveyors in the first place, and approved by Sir Charles Tupper as Minister of Railways after he came into office, through the fertile belts of lands along the Saskatchewan. There would have been no occasion for irrigation there, and no trouble in getting the lands disposed of satisfactorily. But now that the railway is located in this semi-desert country, the only hope for settling up that back country, as it is for the time being, a front country as it should have been, along the Saskatchewan, is to make it the object of the Canadian Pacific Railway to build branch lines tapping that country. This would be the best reached by giving them certain lands in that district and making it their interest to build a railway there for the purpose of making the land valuable. I have no doubt that the larger part of the land covered by this Bill could be disposed of to companies who would irrigate it, if the proposition I have submitted is carried out, of reserving the even sections of those lands and paying for their irrigation. The Minister should have informed the committee as to the method by which he proposes to irrigate that land, whether there are running streams sufficient, or whether artificial sources of irrigation as practiced in some parts of the United States must be adopted. I move in amendment that the first clause be amended by omitting the words "in such areas as the Minister deems expedient," and inserting the following, "in areas of not more than four contiguous townships forming a block twelve miles square." Surely an area of 144 square miles would be sufficient in which to test the method of irrigation proposed to be introduced, and it would still leave large tracts in the hands of the Government.

Amendment negatived.

On section 2,

Mr. MCGREGOR. My experience of that part of the country is that it is not worth a cent without irrigation. The Minister is adopting the proper plan to utilize it. It constitutes a portion of the American desert, which crops out there, and the principal product is a large quantity of sand. There are no ranches, because grass does not grow there—the only vegetation is the cactus. The country from Moose Jaw to Medicine Hat produces crops every third or fourth year; at Moose Jaw there is a crop about every second year. At Medicine Hat there has been a settlement for seven or eight years. It is on the banks of the Saskatchewan River, and is a nice little place, and if grain would grow there regularly, there would be a good settlement. But I am free to agree with the Minister of the Interior that this land is valueless without irrigation, and this can be done only under the system proposed by the Minister. The district then would possess some value. There are many lakes, and there are ranges which the buffalo visited in early days, and the water could be utilized by running it towards the Saskatchewan. I feel satisfied from my knowledge of the country that the Minister is adopting the proper course by negotiating with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and asking the company to irrigate the land and make some use of it. Unless this is carried out in blocks, I do not see how it can be accomplished. There are no farms to be interfered with, because there are very few farms in that district. The early settlers have gone west, to the foothills of the Rocky Mountains, where they have ranches and where the land is a little more solid, for the desert runs out ninety miles on this side of Calgary. From my knowledge of the country, I repeat that the Minister has taken the proper step, and everything should be done to assist him to carry out this arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway, which no doubt will be followed by the best results possible. If the company incur a large expenditure for the purpose of irrigating and improving this land, which is now valueless, and the company are willing to accept it as part and parcel of the land deeded to them, this country will not be giving the company a very large amount.

Mr. CASEY. I have always understood from Professor Macoun and others that this land only required irrigation to become valuable. I still adhere to my opinion that a contract should be entered into with the company to irrigate all the land and afterwards keep their share for sale or settlement. It is well known that eight or nine miles is as far from market as a farmer in that district can stand.

Mr. McGREGOR. The only thing grown there is the cactus.

Mr. CASEY. That is so in certain places, of course.

On section 3,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not object to a grant being made to the company, if it is necessary for the company to carry out the present plan; but what I object to is that it should be left entirely discretionary as to whether the company shall carry out the present plan of survey. The very moment settlers flow in there, it should be done upon the plan and survey already existing in other portions of the territories.

Mr. DALY. The whole matter of survey is still left with the Government under section 3.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No; it provides for six acres only in every section. This is an entire departure from what has been done in the rest of the North-west Territories. I can well understand how the company, if it required the land for ranching purposes, might want to protect it against trespassers and control it; but the moment settlement begins, provision should be made that sale and settlement should proceed on the plan which exists in other portions of the territories. The rectangular system of survey is as applicable there as anywhere else east of the Rocky Mountains. The Government should not part with the control of the present system of survey and settlement.

Mr. CASEY. The Minister says he has reserved to himself the right to deal with this branch of the subject as he considers expedient. That is the wording of the Act. It does not define that they shall be made according to the present rectangular plan of survey, and it is evidently the intention to leave to the Minister to introduce another plan if he sees fit.

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You substitute discretion for the law of the land.

Mr. CASEY. It may be necessary to grant lands in a solid block, but the rights of the public must be guarded and the established system of survey must be retained.

Mr. SPROULE. It is quite evident that if this land is ever put into small farms that the one-one-hundredth part would be inadequate for highways. Dry tracts of land like this would not be likely to be used as ranches, and while it may be made into larger farms, even though that were done, I think the reservation for highways would not be enough. In addition to the objection of interfering with the present mode of survey, this would also be a strong obligation to passing the clause as it is.

Mr. McGREGOR.

Mr. CHARLTON. A road around each section would require about three times as much land as is provided for here.

Mr. DALY. The road allowance in the North-west Territories is 66 feet, and the object of closing up this road allowance is that the land may be had in the full block, in order that the irrigation works may be carried on. If, as I presume this land is divided into 80-acre farms, there will be a road provided for these people to have ingress and egress to their farms, and if it were not that we are providing a highway for the public it would not be necessary to make this provision. The Canadian Pacific Railway may retain the present road allowance for all we know, but we want to safeguard the public by providing that the Minister of the Interior shall have power to provide for highways sufficient to give the public a right to cross over the area of land that is sought to be irrigated.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister enables parties who may settle in the rear to make a highway across this property; but the public are parting with their right to make a particular plan of survey in a very large tract of country.

Mr. DALY. The whole thing is a departure, and we have got to meet the new idea contained in this Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am not objecting to meet the wishes of the company to control the territory, if they were to hold it as ranching lands, which I do not suppose they can do. If their works of irrigation are successful, they will divide it into lots, and are you going to hand over to a private corporation the policy which you have heretofore thought necessary to retain under the national control? I would give the company every protection in carrying out their plan, but when the sale comes to be made, I would require the sale of the property upon the rectangular system, with roads around every section, as exists in other portions of the North-west Territories. That you do not do, and you part with your power to secure it.

Mr. SPROULE. The reservation for highways is not adequate at all.

Mr. CASEY. I think the retention of that rectangular system should be compulsory. My hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) thinks that this land would not be used for ranches, but I cannot see what else it can be used for if the provisions of this Bill are carried out. Without adequate roads through the country you cannot divide it into farms and have farm settlements.

Mr. DALY. I move that the committee rise and report progress, and I will consider the objections.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to : and the House adjourned at 11 o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 16th July, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPRESENTATION OF QUEBEC WEST.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that my attention having been called by the hon. member for Quebec East, in his place in the House, to the fact of the demise of John Hearn, Esq., member for the electoral district of Quebec West ; I have, in accordance with section 8 of chapter 13 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, issued my warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

RAILWAY PASSENGER TICKETS.

Mr. HAGGART moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 163) respecting the sale of railway passenger tickets. He said : The object of the Bill is to compel parties who hold return tickets to present them themselves at the station, and give a receipt to the effect that they are owners of the tickets. Supposing a party bought a return ticket from Montreal to Toronto and back, on going down to Montreal the ticket would be punched and the return half broken off. Any one presenting that at a station, and stating that it had not been used is entitled to the return of the money for that portion of it. They have been in the habit of travelling back to Toronto on this half ticket, and the conductor, instead of punching it, takes it up and delivers it to a third party, who pockets the rebate, even after using the ticket for the return journey. The Bill is for the purpose of trying to prevent frauds like that.

Mr. CHARLTON. This is throwing on the innocent ticket holder an unnecessary amount of trouble because conductors do not perform their duties. If the conductor delivers back the ticket he has stolen it, and this Bill simply gives a great deal of trouble to the travelling public in order to prevent a railway conductor from stealing.

Mr. LAURIER. I cannot very well understand the explanation of the Minister, but it seems to me the Bill will subject the travelling public to a great deal of inconvenience. If the Bill passes I suppose it would be in order for the hon. gentleman to introduce the system of passports in this country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When the proposal was made to prevent the passenger transferring a railway ticket who had purchased it, I opposed that provision and I never saw any reason to change my opinion. If the ticket is paid for it cannot be a matter of importance to the railway company who rides upon it, because the company is put to no inconvenience or additional expense. It seems to me that all the restrictions we have imposed upon the travelling public in this respect are to their disadvantage without conferring any special benefit on the railway corporations.

Mr. HAGGART. There will be as little inconvenience as possible to the travelling public, because I intend to compel the railway companies to have blank forms at every station which can be filled in by the party claiming the rebate.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the passenger arrives when the train is about to start he may be delayed by complying with this formality.

Mr. EDGAR. It seems to me that this is not only paternal legislation, but a sort of grand-motherly legislation.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WRITS OF ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) put the following question to me on Saturday last :—

I should like to know whether it is not competent under the provisions of the statute for the House to directly issue a writ. I do not think the power of the House to control the issue of the writ is taken away because the statute directs that you, Mr. Speaker, may issue a writ in a certain event.

As I explained the other day, the statute declares what the duty of the Speaker is in certain cases, that is, in the case of a vacancy caused by the avoidance of an election under the provisions of the Controverted Elections Act, or a vacancy caused by the resignation or the death of a member, or the acceptance of an office by a member ; it imposes upon the Speaker the duty to issue his warrant in such cases. But it also expressly reserves to the House the right to deal with the report of the judges upon an election petition where corrupt practices are reported to have extensively prevailed, and also with regard to unprovided cases. The House has undoubtedly the right, I think, to order the issue of a writ, but the power has been delegated to the Speaker in the cases to which I have referred.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I understood from the right hon. First Minister on Saturday that he would be prepared to-day to state what measures on the Order paper he does not propose to proceed with this session.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In addition to the railway resolutions which are on the paper, we have another list, which has been handed in to-day, and which will appear on the Notice paper to-morrow. There will also be a resolution on the subject of the bounty on steel and iron, which will probably be given notice of to-morrow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You mean an amendment to the tariff?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; it was the resolution foreshadowed by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. FOSTER. It was what was explained in bringing down the tariff—an extension of the duty on pig iron or puddled bar.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not expect that we shall have any other measures to bring before the House than those I have mentioned. As I mentioned to the House some time ago, we do not intend to ask that the Bill respecting insolvency be proceeded with; we hope simply to ask the House to discharge that order, and to provide for the printing of a large edition of the Bill for circulation, in order that the mercantile community may become familiar with the changes which have taken place in the Bill since its introduction in the Senate; and we think that the time which has been bestowed upon it by the Senate has been well spent, inasmuch as the progress made in the deliberations there will be so much towards the progress to be made with the measure next session. The same with regard to the Bill respecting the incorporation and regulation of joint stock companies, which is a measure requiring full consideration by those who are interested in commercial pursuits in connection with joint stock companies. We think that the other business on the paper we may expect to despatch. In making this statement in regard to having no other measures to introduce, I make it, of course, in the hope that full despatch will be given to the public business, in order that we may have prorogation as soon as possible. If that should be found impossible, and the session should be further protracted, we shall certainly have other measures to bring down.

RELIEF OF JAMES ST. GEORGE DILLON.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 148) for the relief of James St. George Dillon.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DENISON. I think it is only proper that I should state to the House that it was found impossible to get Mr. Dillon for examination, so that the Bill is reported back to the House exactly as it came from the House, without any further information.

Bill reported, on division.

EXPENSES OF HON. SENATOR TASSE.

Mr. RINFRET asked, What is the total amount of the account presented to the Government by Hon. Senator Tassé, for all expenses incurred in connection with his mission as Government Commissioner at the Chicago Exposition? What is the amount paid by the Government? Is it the intention of the Government to pay to him, or to pay in respect of his mission as Government Commissioner, any money over and above the amount paid up to this date?

Mr. DALY. The total amount of the account presented by Hon. Senator Tassé for all expenses as Canadian Government Commissioner at Chicago was $3,850. The amount paid to Senator Tassé was $3,850. He has made no further claim.

DUNDAS AND WATERLOO ROAD.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth) asked, Has any settlement been made by the Government with Dr. Walker as the purchaser of the Dundas and Waterloo road in 1884: 1. As to his claim for a refund of purchase money paid by him with interest thereon; 2. As to claims for damages preferred by him? If so, what amounts have been awarded and paid?

Mr. OUMET. On the 5th of January, 1893, the Exchequer Court of Canada rendered judgment in favour of Dr. Walker for the sum of $9,750, without costs, in full satisfaction of his claim. That sum was paid to Walker's counsel, through Chrysler & Lewis, their agents, on the 20th of January, 1893.

ATLANTIC MAIL CONTRACTS.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL asked, 1. What was the amount paid during the years 1891, 1892 and 1893, respectively, for carrying the mails between Canada and Great Britain? 2. To whom were the moneys paid, and in what proportion to each party? 3. Is it the intention of the Government to pay a subsidy for carrying the mails to the proposed fast line, over and above the annual subsidy of $750,000 for ten years, now under the consideration of this House? 4. Are the subsidies now paid to the other steamers carrying the mails between Canada and England to be discontinued after the establishment of the fast line? 5. Are the mails between Canada and England to be carried exclusively by the fast line; if not, are the present contracts or arrangements to be continued?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The amount paid for the year ending 30th June, 1891, was $131,327.03; for the year ending 30th June, 1892, $71,798.03; for the year ending 30th June, 1893, $126,533.33. These sums were paid to Messrs. H. & A. Allan, of Montreal. It is not the intention of the Government to pay a subsidy for carrying the mails to the proposed fast line, over and above the annual subsidy of $750,000 for ten years, which covers that now under consideration of the Government. The subsidies now paid to the other steamers carrying the mails between Canada and England will be discontinued after the establishment of the fast line. The mails between Canada and England cannot be conveyed exclusively by any line, because persons addressing correspondence, frequently mark it to go by a particular line, and their wishes in this matter are always respected; moreover, it is the universal practice of commercial houses to send originals by one line and duplicates by another.

SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAYS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved that the House resolve itself into committee, tomorrow, on the following resolutions:—

1. That it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to grant the subsidies hereinafter mentioned to the railway companies, and towards the construction of the railways also hereinafter mentioned, that is to say:—

To the Bracebridge and Baysville Railway Company, for fifteen miles of their railway, from Bracebridge towards Baysville, in lieu of the subsidy granted by the Act 55-56 Victoria, chapter 5, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole, $48,000.

To the Brockville, Wesport and Sault Ste. Marie Railway Company, the balance remaining unpaid of the subsidy granted by the Act 52 Victoria, chapter 3, not exceeding $3,200 per mile, and also the balance remaining unpaid of the subsidy granted by the Act 53 Victoria, chapter 2, which was re-granted by the Act 55-56 Victoria, chapter 5, not exceeding in the whole, $86,800.

To the Tilsonburg, Lake Erie and Pacific Railway Company, for sixteen miles of their railway, from Port Burwell to Tilsonburg, in lieu of the subsidy granted by the Act 55-56 Victoria, chapter 5, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole, $51,200.

To the Brantford, Waterloo and Lake Erie Railway Company, for eighteen miles of their railway, from the town of Brantford to the village of Hagersville or the village of Waterford, or some intermediate point on the Canada Southern Railway, the balance remaining unpaid of the subsidy granted by the Act 50-51 Victoria, chapter 24, not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole, $4,790.

To the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company, for thirty-four miles of their railway, from the city of St. Catharines to the city of Hamilton, in lieu of the subsidy not to exceed $108,000, granted by the Act 55-56 Victoria, chapter 5, a subsidy calculated on a basis of three and a half per cent on the amount of the said subsidy, to be paid in semi-annual instalments for such period, not exceeding twenty years, as the company may elect, representing a grant in cash of $108,000.

Provided that, upon the completion of ten miles of the said railway, a semi-annual subsidy may be paid, proportionate to the value of the portion so completed, in comparison with that of the whole thirty-four miles: Provided also, that the company may deposit with the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, a sum not exceeding $400,000, in consideration whereof, there shall be paid by the Government to the company, for such period, not exceeding twenty years, as the company may elect, a semi-annual annuity, calculated on a basis of three and a half per cent on the amount so deposited, or a guarantee of a like sum, as interest on the bonds of the company: Provided further, that the company, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may assign the said subsidy and annuity to trustees by way of security for principal or interest of any bonds or securities which may be issued by the company in respect of their undertaking: And the subsidy last above petitioned to the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company, shall be paid in instalments, the first semi-annual payments upon which shall be made at the end of the six months from the date of the chief engineer's certificate of the completion of the first ten miles of railway, and each subsequent payment at the end of six months thereafter, for the term of twenty years or less: And it is a condition of this subsidy that the sum not exceeding $400,000 above mentioned shall be deposited with the Minister of Finance and Receiver General before 1st January, 1895.

To the Montreal and Ottawa Railway Company (formerly the Vaudreuil and Prescott Railway Company), for thirty miles of their railway, from Vaudreuil towards Hawkesbury, the balance remaining unpaid of the subsidy granted by the Act 50-51 Victoria, chapter 24, and for thirty miles of their railway from the western end of the thirty miles subsidized by the said Act 50-51 Victoria, chapter 24, towards Ottawa, the balance remaining unpaid of the subsidy granted by the Act 53 Victoria, chapter 2, not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole, $118,400.

Notwithstanding the expiration of the time limited by the Act 53 Victoria, chapter 2, and by the contract entered into with the Quebec Central Railway Company, and notwithstanding anything otherwise in the said Act contained, the Governor in Council may pay the subsidy granted by the said Act to the said company at the present worth of the twenty annual payments mentioned in the said Act (interest computed at four per cent), for and upon the completion of its railway extending from a point between the Chaudière River and Tring Station to a point on the International Railway at or near Lake Megantic, and upon the inspection and acceptance of the same by the Chief Engineer of Railways and Canals, the sum in all of $288,000.

To the Philipsburg Junction Railway and Quarry Company, for 6 $\frac{1}{4}$ miles of their railway, from Stanbridge Station to Philipsburg, in the county of Missisquoi, and branch to _____, the balance remaining unpaid of the subsidy granted by the Act 55-56 Victoria, chapter 5, not exceeding \$3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole, \$2,912.

To the Joliette and St. Jean de Matha Railway Company, for eight miles of their railway, from St. Félix de Valois to St. Jean de Matha, in lieu of the subsidy granted by the Act 55-56 Victoria, chapter 5, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole, $25,600.

To the Lake Temiscamingue Colonization Railway Company, for fifty miles of their railway, from Mattawa to the crossing of the Kippewa River, also 15 per cent on the value of a wooden truss bridge over the Ottawa River near Mattawa, not to exceed $15,000 in all, in lieu of the subsidies granted by the Act 55-56 Victoria, chapter 5, also the balance remaining unpaid of the subsidy granted by the Act 50-51 Victoria, chapter 24, for their railway from Long Sault to Lake Kippewa, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile of railway, and 15 per cent on the value of the bridges, also a sum of $1,750 additional per mile on the fifty miles of their railway from Mattawa to the crossing of the Kippewa River, not exceeding in the whole, $274,940.

For a railway from St. Placide to St. Andrews, eight miles, in lieu of the subsidy granted by the Act 55-56 Victoria, chapter 5, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole, $25,600.

For a railway from St. Eustache to St. Placide, in the county of Two Mountains, for eighteen miles of such railway, in lieu of the subsidy granted by the Act 55-56 Victoria, chapter 5, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole, $57,600.

For a railway from a point on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway on Isle Jésus, in the county of Laval, towards St. Eustache, for twelve miles of such railway, in lieu of the subsidy granted by the Act 55-56 Victoria, chapter 5, to the Carillon and Grenville Railway Company, for twelve miles of their railway from St. Eustache to Sault au Recollet, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole, $38,400.

For a railway from the parish of St. Rémi, in the county of Napierville, to St. Cyprien, in the said county, for twelve miles of such railway, in lieu of the subsidy granted by the Act 55-56 Victoria, chapter 5, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole, $38,400.

To the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company, for bridging the several channels of the
Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Ottawa River at Culbute and west thereof, a subsidy of $31,500, to be paid out monthly as the work progresses, upon the certificate of the Chief Engineer of Government Railways, in the proportion which the value of the work executed bears to the value of the whole work undertaken, and for three miles of their railway extending from a point three miles east of Pembroke to Pembroke, in the province of Ontario, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $9,600, in lieu of the subsidy granted by the Act 51 Victoria, chapter 3, provided that the entire work subsidized upon this railway shall be completed within four years from the passing of this Act, the subsidy granted by this Act not to exceed in the whole, $41,100.

To the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway, for seven and one-half miles of their railway from Hull to Aylmer, in lieu of the subsidy granted by the Act 53 Victoria, chapter 2, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole, $24,000.

To the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway, for eighty-five miles of their railway, from Aylmer to Pembroke, the balance remaining unpaid of the subsidy granted by the Act 47 Victoria, chapter 8, less the subsidy granted from Hull to Aylmer, provided the Ottawa River is crossed at some point not east of Lapasse, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole, $73,172.

To the Harvey Branch Railway Company, for three miles of their railway, from the southern terminus of the Albert Railway to Harvey Bank, the balance remaining unpaid of the subsidy granted by the Act 50-51 Victoria, chapter 24, not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole, $4,046.

For a railway from a point on the Intercolonial Railway near Newcastle or via Douglstown, to a point on the River Miramichi, opposite the town of Chatham, in the province of New Brunswick, six miles, in lieu of the subsidy granted by the Act 49 Victoria, chapter 10, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole, $19,200.

For a railway from some point on the Joggins Railway, near the Hébert River, to Young's Mills, in the province of Nova Scotia, a distance of five miles, in lieu of the subsidy granted by the Act 52 Victoria, chapter 3, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, and not exceeding in the whole, $16,000.

To the Woodstock and Centreville Railway Company, for a railway from Woodstock to the international boundary between the province of New Brunswick and the State of Maine, twenty-six miles, in lieu of the subsidies granted by the Acts 50-51 Victoria, chapter 24, and 53 Victoria, chapter 2, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole, $83,200.

2. That the subsidies hereinbefore mentioned as to be granted to companies named for that purpose shall, if granted by the Governor in Council, be granted to such companies respectively, the other subsidies may be granted to such companies as shall be approved by the Governor in Council as having established to his satisfaction their ability to construct and complete the said railways respectively; all the lines for the construction of which subsidies are granted, unless they are already commenced, shall be commenced within two years from the first day of August next, and completed within a reasonable time not to exceed four years, to be fixed by Order in Council, and shall also be constructed according to descriptions and specifications and upon conditions to be approved by the Governor in Council, on the report of the Minister of Railways and Canals, and specified in an agreement to be made in each case by the company with the Government, which agreement the Government is hereby empowered to make; the location also of every such line of railway shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

3. That the granting of such subsidies respectively shall be subject to such conditions for securing such running powers or traffic arrangements and other rights as will afford all reasonable facilities and equal mileage rates to all railways connecting with those so subsidized, as the Governor in Council determines.

4. That the said subsidies respectively shall be payable out of the Consolidated Fund of Canada, by instalments, on the completion of each section of the railway of not less than ten miles, proportionate to the value of the portion so completed in comparison with that of the whole work undertaken, to be established by the report of the said Minister, or upon the completion of the work subsidized—except as to subsidies with respect to which it is hereinbefore otherwise provided.

Mr. LAURIER. I would call the attention of the right hon. gentleman to the fact that we have not had a particle of information in the way of correspondence which should accompany these resolutions. It will be impossible to discuss them until we have such correspondence laid on the Table.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will mention that to the Minister when he comes in.

Motion agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 161) to amend the Act respecting ocean steamship subsidies.—(Mr. Foster.)

INDEMNITY TO MEMBERS.

Resolution reported from committee (July 14th) respecting the indemnity to senators and members of the House of Commons, was read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 164) further to amend the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION NOTES.

Resolutions reported from committee (July 14th) respecting the Act respecting Dominion notes, was read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 165) to amend the Act respecting Dominion notes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INSURANCE ACT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of amendments reported from committee on Bill (No. 111) to amend the Insurance Act.

Mr. McCARTHY. Before these amendments are agreed to, I desire to call attention to the debate in the committee on the subject of the additional changes proposed by this amendment. In the committee, the discussion was very largely upon the interference with the vested rights, I venture to call them, of the Canada Life Insurance Company, which has, by its charter, the right to invest in bonds and debentures and other securities which are defined in that charter. It is proposed, by a general enactment, to curtail and limit this right of investment to certain classes of security, particularly specified, and which are not as wide as, and do not include, investments allowed in the Canada Life charter. I think we ought to be very careful, indeed, before we interfere with the rights of the company—a company which has been in existence so many years, as the Canada Life has been, a company which has been so successfully managed, and which, on the whole, I think, it can be said is a credit to the country. We are asked to introduce a kind of legislation for which there is no example in the mother country. The only control that is attempted over insurance companies there is in insisting upon their making a return to the Department of the Board of Trade of the investments they have, which the Board of Trade publish; and the public having the means of seeing this and knowing about these investments, are supposed to be able to take care of themselves. That is the law in England, and has been for years. Now, to my mind, Sir, that is quite sufficient to enable the people to guard themselves. We are proposing, however, to define what, and what only, the insurance companies may invest in, and I think it will be found, by looking over the character of these permitted investments, that an insurance company may make just as bad investments in these securities allowed as the Canada Life may do with the larger power allowed under the present law. So I desire to protest against any interference with the vested rights of that or any other company. It appears to me that it is a very dangerous thing to do. It is un-British. It could not be done in the United States.

because the constitution of that country prevents interference with vested rights. But in this country Parliament is omnipotent, and there are no restraints upon us except such restraints as, in the public interest, we put upon ourselves in a matter of this kind. I desire, however, to call attention to a statement of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), which was sprung upon us in committee, and which there was no opportunity, or not sufficient opportunity, to reply to. I ventured then to say—though for that I was chided by some of my hon. friends—that the statement made by the hon. gentleman was an unfair statement. The Canada Life were not seeking any legislation; their affairs were not before the House particularly, yet the hon. gentleman, occupying a position of authority as chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee, came here prepared to make, and did make, a statement with regard to the character of the investments made by the Canada Life Assurance Company, condemning some of these investments as unsatisfactory. Now, as I said at the time, that was an unfair statement. I did not mean to say, and I hope my hon. friend did not understand me to mean, that it was intentionally an unfair statement; but all the same, it was an unfair statement to make, and all the more so because it was in point of fact, misleading. I venture to say, and, therefore, calculated to do the company a very great deal of damage. Now, I will refer to the statement, because I desire to put the matter straight before this Bill passes the House. The statement of my hon. friend will be found at pages 6021 and 6022 of the unrevised edition of the 'Hansard':

But, whether there has been a change in the management or not, I find in the reports published of the insurance companies, that within the last five years there has been a very material change in the class of investments which this company are making. Now, in their report which appeared last, I find that the Canada Life have invested some $450,000 in bonds of the Kingston, Napanee and Western Railway Company—6 per cent bonds. They enter these bonds in their list of securities at their par value as the market value. They have invested a further sum of $400,000 in bonds of the Lake Erie and Essex and Detroit River Railway Company. They have invested a further sum of about $400,000 in bonds of the St. Lawrence and Adirondack Railway Company. They have invested also in the Michigan Central Railway Company's bonds. They have invested a further sum of $375,000 in shares of a commercial corporation, H. Walker & Son, for which they hold also $400,000 of these same Lake Erie, Essex and Detroit River Railway Company's bonds. I have taken the last report of the Department of Railways and Canal to get what information I could glean from it in reference to the affairs of these railway companies.

Then the hon. gentleman went into a general discussion of investments of that class, after which he proceeded:

The railways to which I have referred, the Bay of Quinté Railway and Navigation Company and the Kingston, Napanee and Western Railway, I understand, now amalgamated, and have a total bonded debt of $60,500 and $450,000. Their net earnings in 1893 were $44,361. It is true that this will be sufficient to more than pay the interest on their bonded debt, but so far as I can learn, these bonds have really no market value, and if the company, under any circumstances, were obliged to realize on the securities at the present time, they would really be unable to sell them in the open market, and would be obliged to take up and manage the road, in order to realize the amount which they have advanced upon it. Then the Lake Erie, Essex and Detroit River Railway Company is in somewhat the same position. It is a road eighty-eight miles long. The company has a subscribed capital of a quarter of a million dollars and a paid up capital of only $25,000. They have a bonded debt of $900,000. The whole of these bonds, I find, are held by this Canada Life Insurance Company. During last year the net earnings of this road were $36,393.49. This would be $17,806.51 short of paying the interest on the bonds. I can hardly think that, under these circumstances, this would be a very safe or desirable class of investments. They must certainly be a class of securities which could not find sale under present circumstances in the open market. The St. Lawrence and Adirondack Railway is twenty miles in length. The company has a capital of $350,000 and a bonded debt of $1,400,000. Last year their working expenses were $45,404 and their gross earnings $31,922. This railway company came short by $13,481 of paying their working expenses, so that there would be nothing from the earnings of the railway, at all events, to pay interest on the bonds.

Now, during the course of the discussion the hon. gentleman was asked whether for these loans the company had any other security, and he replied that of course he did not know. No doubt that was correct, but it does appear to me that it was unfair of the hon. gentleman to characterize these as bad investments, as dangerous investments, without knowing the facts in this respect. Now, Sir, I have a statement with reference to these investments with which I shall trouble the House in order that the matter may be put right. On the 6 per cent bonds of the Kingston, Napanee and Western Railway, $500,000, and the Bay of Quinté Railway and Navigation Company, $60,000—these roads being amalgamated—the Canada Life has loaned $450,000. But they have loaned this sum, not merely upon the security of these bonds, but upon the guarantee, in addition, of the Rathbun Company, a well-known company which has a paid-up capital of $1,500,000. So that the House will see that this was not an investment in bonds, as was incorrectly stated by the hon. gentleman, but it was a loan to the Rathbun Company—which is reported to be worth two and a half million dollars above all liabilities—upon the collateral security of this $560,000 worth of bonds. Now, Sir, what is the position of the bonds? These bonds have an interest charge upon them of $33,600. The last year's earnings of the two companies taken together—the hon. gentleman gave us one, but not both—were $41,361 and $3,638, or almost $48,000. So there is a balance of about $15,000 over the interest charge, or, in other words, the companies are earning 9 per cent, although they have only to pay 6 per cent upon the bonds. So that for that particular investment the hon. gentleman will see that the $450,000, which has the personal guarantee of the Rathbun Company, earns $48,000, while the charge upon the bonds is $33,600, and all that the company require in order to pay 6 per cent on the amount loaned is $27,000. Then another investment to which the hon. gentleman drew attention was the loan of $400,000 on the St. Lawrence and Adirondack Railway Company's bonds. But the hon. gentleman did not tell us that in addition to that $400,000, there were bonds of the Michigan Central Railway Company for $125,000, shares in the same company for $60,000; New York Central and Hudson River Railway Company's shares $60,000—altogether, as security in the nature of bonds and stocks, $645,000. But this loan is guaranteed by Dr. Webb, of New York, to whom the loan is really made, who is a son-in-law of one of the Vanderbilts, who is president of the Wagner Palace Car Company, and a man in very high standing; so that there again the hon. gentleman will see that when he assumed there was an investment made—though I think if he had looked more carefully he would have seen that it was not an investment, but these were merely held as a matter of security—the transaction is not one that, when understood, any person would object to. Then I add the further statement with regard to the other loan, a loan of $800,000 to Hiram Walker, Edward C. Walker, Franklin H. Walker and James H. Walker, jointly and severally bound, the firm of Walker & Sons. This loan is collaterally secured by the bonds of the Lake Erie and Detroit River Railway Company for $900,000. They have power to issue $20,000 a mile, but for the lenders' security this is restricted to about $9,000 per mile. In addition there are 4,625 shares of the stock of the Hiram Walker & Sons Co. (Limited); altogether, therefore, the security amounts to $1,316,000, in addition to the personal liability of Hiram Walker & Sons. I think the hon. gentleman will acknowledge that this is ample security for these investments also. Then when we look at this particular railway, we find it is not yet complete. It has been bonused by this Parliament, but the road is intended to connect with some other road—I cannot at the moment state the name. It is now under construction, and although it is not yet completed, the road has been earning $36,000 a year over and above working expenses, which is not far from sufficient to pay the interest upon the advance.

Mr. DICKEY. Can the hon. gentleman give us the rates of interest of these various roads?

Mr. McCARTHY. All of them 6 per cent. Now, I think it is important and fair to the company that these statements should be made, and the argument I deduce from them is that I think it is very dangerous to interfere with the management of the company. We must realize this, that if this Bill is passed, and the company having these large sums to invest, is confined to the class of securities mentioned in the amendments, it can only be with considerable loss of earning power on their money, and I venture to say without any practical advantage, because no one will pretend to say that investments cannot be badly made in the classes of security which are included in the Act.

Mr. SPROULE. Can the hon. gentleman tell us about the market value of these bonds and securities?

Mr. McCARTHY. I will tell the hon. gentleman as to some of them. For instance, in the Kingston, Napanee and Western, the whole issue is held by the Canada Life, it has never been put upon the market, and nobody has ever tried to sell and nobody has ever sought to buy them. The St. Lawrence and Adirondack road, which is a road connecting with the Canada Atlantic and another of our roads, I forget the name at the moment—

Mr. SCRIVER. The St. Lawrence and Adirondack road starts from Valleyfield and connects at the boundary line with this road generally called Dr. Webb's road.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is a road running really in connection with the New York Central.

Mr. SCRIVER. It is virtually a part of that.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think it has been built only within the last year or two, but it is intended to divert travel to the Adirondack Mountains which has hitherto gone by the Delaware and Hudson, to the New York Central system. Now, these bonds have not been marketed and therefore it is impossible to do more than to say that they are bonds for so much, and that the road is earning so much. But the New York Central and Hudson River Railway shares are well known to be worth 100 cents on the dollar; they vary from 96 up to 108 and 109. In the same way with the Michigan Central securities, 5 per cent shares and 5 per cent bonds, the bonds are over par and the stock is generally quoted about par. I think the bonds of the Lake Erie and Detroit River are in the same position; they have not been marketed. I do not know that Walker & Sons' stock in their company has been put upon the market either. I submit this statement upon the authority of the manager, who made careful inquiries before he advanced the loans, inquiries from the bankers of these different parties and others, and took every precaution before these investments were made. I think these facts show that the loans are reasonably secure; and also show the danger of interfering with business affairs and attempting to control them, as this amendment proposes to do.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland. I can take no exception to anything which the hon. gentleman from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has said this afternoon, with regard to the business of this company and the securities which they have for the loans which were referred to the other day, which was not available to me, and which is not available to any one who has no sources of information except what he can glean from the public records. The hon. gentleman has told us that one of the securities referred to is secured by the guarantee of the Rathbun Company, and another one is secured by the personal obligation of Dr. Webb, of the New York Central, and another one by the personal guarantee of Hiram Walker & Sons. Of course I presume the hon. gentleman is correct in making these statements; but as I said before, we have no means of knowing these facts except from the information given us by the companies themselves. I am glad to know the hon. gentleman gives me credit for not wishing to injure this very important insurance company in the remarks I made the other day; and I hope the effect of them will not be to injure the business of that company. The hon. gentleman has drawn an argument from the statements which he has made to-day, which is the only reason why I rise to make one or two remarks in reply. He says he thinks these facts are sufficient to convince the House that it is dangerous to interfere with the investments of these insurance companies. If that argument is a sound one, I presume it involves this, that Parliament should not restrict the investment of insurance companies in any respect, but that insurance companies should be left as free as are ordinary business corporations to invest their money in any way they choose. I can only repeat on that point what I said the other day, that I think life insurance companies stand in a different position from any other corporation in this regard, that the moneys which they hold do not constitute capital subscribed by the stockholders, but are moneys received from the policy-holders and which the companies hold for investment, as trustees for the benefit of those who are to be benefited by those policies when they mature. For that reason, it appears to me wise that Parliament has in respect to this class of company interfered and restricted their investments to a class which appears not to be absolutely secure in every respect, but as a general rule to be regarded as a better class of securities than the class of investments to which the hon. gentleman has referred. I hardly think the hon. gentleman himself would advocate the policy of allowing life insurance companies to loan their money on the personal obligation of any private company, however good that security might appear to be. I have never heard that idea advanced before, and I am sure it is contrary to the policy of Parliament with respect to investments of insurance companies. I should like to say something with regard to the other remark which the hon. member made, that a change in the security might involve a large difference in the earning power. That may possibly be so. But if that is so, it is one of the strongest arguments in favour of restricting the companies with respect to their investments. As a rule the safety of the investment largely depends on the amount of interest paid. If the rate of interest is large, as a rule a larger risk is incurred; if it is low, the investment is of a safer kind; and the very argument that to restrict this company as regards investing in securities would reduce its earning power is the strongest argument that can be adduced in favour of placing such company under restriction. I should like to add this, that the experience of the last few years has shown the wisdom of the policy Parliament has adopted with respect to restricting the investments of life insurance companies. I can remember very well, and no doubt every hon. member can remember, when the public of Canada was very cautious as regards investing in Canadian insurance companies, when it was very difficult for a Canadian company to compete with the old standing English companies; and the reason was not because they did not allow them sufficiently low premiums or sufficiently large dividends and sufficient inducements of that kind, but simply from the fact that the public had doubts in regard to the security at the back of the policies of the Canadian companies. The effect of the legislation of the Parliament of Canada in restricting these investments to a special class of securities has been to increase the business of the Canadian companies—it has really been as much in the interest of the Canadian companies themselves as of the policy-holders, and I am glad to find that the Canadian companies are doing a large and I believe a prosperous business. I hope for this reason that the present policy will be adhered to, and it will be made to apply generally to this very large and important company referred to as well as to all other life insurance companies doing business in Canada.

Mr. EDGAR. I think after the explanation given by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to the unfortunate attack made by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), the hon. gentleman, who may not have intended to attack the Canada Life particularly, appears not to have done any harm to the company. It shows, however, that the hon. gentleman was very unfortunate in taking up an illustration of that kind, without having information as to its correctness.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). How could I obtain that information?

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman could have obtained that information. I would say that before the hon. gentleman made an attack on securities in the hands of a public company, he should ask that company in respect to the same. He could have obtained that information by asking the company for it. That course would have been a fair and reasonable one.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I think the hon. gentleman is unfair in saying that I made an attack on the company. I merely read from a public record a full statement made by the company itself.

Mr. EDGAR. A partial statement.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I read all the statement.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman no doubt read all the information on the face of the document.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman has spoken already.

Mr. EDGAR. It is perfectly evident that the information read by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) could have been had from the company. As to the general principle—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Spoken.

Mr. EDGAR—involved in the Bill with respect to going back on the charters of existing companies, I should like to say this, that the Government might as well bring in a Bill providing as to the nature of securities in which all land companies in Canada might invest, because it is perfectly well known that there are large loan companies doing business here to-day which have a right to lend money on many classes of securities which more recently chartered companies have not the right to loan upon. So the Government, no doubt, will find itself with the responsibility of revising all that legislation, as well as the legislation under consideration.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am opposed to these amendments being agreed to. I believe this principle is detrimental to the interests of a very important company in this country. I am opposed to the amendment because I believe they strike at vested interests which the Parliament of Canada have guaranteed to that company and the Government as regards those rights should protect such interests when guaranteed by this House.

Mr. SPROULE. If there is one principle more than another which this Parliament has a right to control it is in regard to investments in securities by life insurance companies. As time passes the securities change, and a class of securities which might have been good twenty years ago might be worthless to-day, and it would not be reasonable that because those securities had been good twenty years ago, a company should be able to invest money belonging to policy-holders in such securities, and it is the duty of Parliament to decide that the company should not invest in those securities. If so, we are adopting a principle which Parliament should not endorse, whether in the interests of the policy-holders or of the company. I do not believe that the contention of the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Edgar) as regards the comments of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) is correct. Every hon. member does not possess the information submitted by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and when an hon. member brings to bear on any measure the best information available to him at the time he has fairly done his duty. In view of the fact that the value of the securities is changing, that insurance companies are breaking down, while at the same time the amount of money invested in their hands is increasing from year to year, Parliament cannot be too careful in enacting such legislation as will compel the companies to make the very best investments possible. Personally, my feeling is that railway securities are not good securities. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has referred to the bonds of a railway, but he says they have no market value. How is any one to estimate their value if they have no market value? For all we know, they may be only worth 25 cents, or they may sell at par. How can we know what a private individual's security may be worth? Take, for instance, Dr. Webb, who is Vanderbilt's son-in-law. What do we know about his personal security? What do we know about the personal security of Hiram Walker or the Rathbun Company? We know nothing about their personal security whatever, beyond the status which they have in the commercial world to-day, or beyond the information contained in Dun, Wiman's or Bradstreet's agency, and, to the knowledge of many members in this House, that information is sometimes unreliable.

Mr. M'LOCK. Whilst not inclined to disapprove, in a general way, of the safeguarding of insurance funds, which I consider in the light of trust funds, yet I think it is but right that some consideration should be given to institutions carrying on business largely on the state of affairs existing up to this moment. It has occurred to me that it is impossible to deal with existing companies in a safe way, and, at the same time, to provide for the operations of future companies. I do not happen to have any concern in the particular company referred to, nor, in fact, in any insurance company in Canada, so that I speak without any personal interest. I think we should have regard to existing interests. Would it not be possible to say that, so far as any existing company is concerned, this law should not apply to the extent of existing liens of policy-holders upon funds sought to be invested? If the present policy-holders are regarded as the first claimants upon securities, it is they whom we ought to consider, and if these policy-holders are not prejudiced, we need not be particular as regards the past. Take any existing company with so many outstanding policies, and there is a present surrender value for all existing policies. These policies are expiring every day. I would suggest that, as regards all new business, you should apply this new law, but, as regards funds on hand to deal with existing contracts, you are taking a very serious step when you are not permitting the insurance company to be able to invest these funds according to its anticipations, when it entered into such contracts. When a company issues an insurance contract, the rate that is charged is based upon the prospective gain from the money received from the insured, and that view of the situation, of course, was largely affected by the powers of the company as to investments. So that as to existing policies, I think that the law should not be made to apply to the extent of the surrender value of the existing liabilities to policy-holders. Take the company that has been alluded to. It has, I presume, a large portion of its assets invested in funds of the classes permitted by the Act, and it has, I suppose, other portions of its assets invested in classes of securities not within the spirit of the Act. These two investments, together, ought to be quite equal to the surrender value of all existing liabilities to policy-holders. If you deduct from the total amount of liability the value of the assets invested in the permitted securities, the balance alone represents the proportion of the securities that would be disturbed by this proposed legislation. As time goes on, and existing policy-holders are paid off, every day an existing policy is paid off, to that extent, the claim of that policy-holder upon the fund ceases, and, by degrees, the company would thus pass into adopting a new scheme of investment. Its existing rates on the basis of existing contracts would not be disturbed, nor would policy-holders have a grievance, because, whether they know the powers of the company or not, at all events, the statute has given notice of the securities in which their funds may be invested, and they would have no cause of complaint against Parliament. I think a policy could be adopted by which the existing companies could gradually adapt themselves to this safer scheme, which would be harmless as regards existing funds, and which would not prejudice existing rights. In saying this, I agree with the spirit of the legislation laid down in this Bill. The funds of insurance companies are trust funds, and every safeguard should be cast around their proper husbanding, in order that the interests of widows and orphans and others cestuis qui trustent shall be safeguarded. Good management, is of course, of first importance, and good principles of management should be laid down by Parliament itself. I think the law could be made to come into force by degrees, and not at one fell swoop create disturbance in regard to existing contracts; in fact, altering existing contracts. To pass this measure now, is like telling the company: you have entered into large liabilities, you have entered into contracts involving the payment, in the future, of very large sums of money, on the expectation that you will be able in the management of your affairs to avail of your existing powers in order to make good those contracts. We are now going to alter the powers of your company so that we are practically making it impossible for you to make good the contracts you have entered into. Parliament is taking a very serious responsibility upon itself in passing this legislation in such a way. If, for example, a company has entered into contracts to pay many millions in the future, expecting to realize, say, 6 per cent on investments; and if Parliament renders it impossible for the company to earn 6 per cent on its investment of the funds collected from the policy-holders, Parliament will be to blame if that company should meet with disaster. I therefore think that the Bill should not be pressed to a third reading in its present shape, but that we might very fairly adopt a graduating principle which would not, in the slightest degree, give a complaint to an insured person in case of an existing company making default. This legislation being injected into the middle of a going concern, and altering its whole earning powers, I can conceive of insured persons having a well-grounded claim for compensation against Parliament if this legislation should result in destruction to the company, and prevent it from implementing its contracts. When you look at this measure, you will see, Mr. Speaker, that it is a disturbance of existing interests and a violation of vested rights. Whilst the object aimed at is, in the abstract, good, the method adopted is vicious in that one feature, and I think it ought to be subject to further consideration before Parliament gives its assent to the measure.

Amendments agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed, on division.

C. P. R.—DRAWBACKS.

Resolution reported from committee (July 14th) respecting drawbacks on articles used in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, was read the second time, and concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 166) to provide for drawbacks on certain articles used in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION LANDS.

Bill (No. 160) respecting Dominion Lands, was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to inquire of the Minister whether this contemplates the case of a settler who has squatted on lands before they are surveyed and which are found when surveyed to be not open to homestead entry—whether it is contemplated to oblige him to remove from that location, and take another?

Mr. DALY. No; on the contrary, this is to enable the Government to give him a homestead entry for that, and to substitute another quarter-section for the school land. It is to protect the squatter.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does this apply only to school lands, or does it also apply to railway lands, for example?

Mr. DALY. It applies to all lands.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why in that case do you appear to limit it to school lands? Would you not require to make it applicable to Hudson Bay lands and railway lands?

Mr. DALY. No. We control railway lands ourselves. It is only school lands which are fixed by statute.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought Hudson Bay lands were fixed in the same way.

Mr. DALY. They are, but we have had no difficulty in arranging with the Hudson Bay to take other lands, if necessary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No doubt the Government has been able to substitute other lands for Hudson Bay lands, as the Minister has said; but the statutes set apart certain sections for the Hudson Bay Company, and I am of opinion that that would have the effect of making a conveyance to the company by parliamentary title instead of by grant. It is true, we have always,

I believe, had a grant made by the Crown to the Hudson Bay Company of the particular sections set apart; but that, I think, has been a work of supererogation, as the title is already vested in the company. The United States Supreme Court has held in exactly similar circumstances that there is a Congressional conveyance, and here, I think, there is a parliamentary conveyance of the lands to the Hudson Bay Company. If that is so, the mere assent of the company to accept other lands would hardly be sufficient, although that has been the practice, because the title is already in the company by virtue of the very words of the statute.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think this does not apply either to Hudson Bay Company lands or to school lands; it only applies to lands open to settlement. If it did apply to Hudson Bay lands, it seems to me we ought not by Act of Parliament to override the provisions under which the Hudson Bay Company select their lands.

Mr. DALY. I was mistaken in saying that this applied to any other than school lands. It was the Bill as originally drafted which led me to that conclusion. As the Bill now stands, it applies only to school lands, and does not interfere with the Hudson Bay Company lands at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). My observation was directed to the statement of the hon. Minister in reply to the hon. member for South Oxford.

On section 3,

Mr. DALY. The object of taking that power is to cover the case in which lands are neither Dominion nor Ordinance, but which may be vested in the Crown by the right of Canada. Along the chain reserve of the Niagara River, the proprietors of land adjoining have made application to the department for the water lots, and those proprietors would be entitled, as a matter of right, to the water lots, were it not for the chain reserve. That reserve is in dispute between the Ontario and Dominion Governments, but in the event of its being decided that the Dominion Government is entitled to it, the right would accrue to the Dominion Government to sell and dispose of the water lots adjoining.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that in any way brought into collision with the rights that have been obtained or are applied for respecting the utilizing of the water power of the Niagara?

Mr. DALY. Not at all. It has nothing to do with the water power. The proprietors simply require the lots for boat-houses, &c. This is from the mouth of the Niagara River up to about Suspension Bridge and does not run as far as the Falls.

Mr. CHARLTON. Does it interfere with the right of way of any road, such as an electric road ?

Mr. DALY. No.

Bill reported, and read the third time, and passed.

LAND GRANTS TO RAILWAYS.

House resolved itself into committee on resolutions (p. 5935) providing for the granting of subsidies in land to the railway companies therein mentioned.—(Mr. Daly.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DALY. The first item is the land grant to the Rocky Mountain Railway and Coal Company. This company was incorporated with power to construct a line of railway between certain points, but objections were taken to the route, and they got subsequent legislation which provides for the building of a line from the town of Olds on the Calgary and Edmonton Railway into the coal fields immediately west. The length of the railway was fixed at sixty miles, and this is to grant them 6,400 acres a mile for that sixty miles from Olds into these anthracite coal fields. The land we expect to get immediately on each side of the railway, after it leaves the Calgary and Edmonton land grant.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who are this company, and what evidence is there of their capacity to build the road ?

Mr. DALY. The company is composed of a number of local men in Calgary. They have had these lands examined by competent engineers from England, and have interested English capital. They have shown to the Government that they are prepared to go and build this railway and develop these coal lands. In addition to the development of the mines, there is a large tract of agricultural country lying along the line of the railway, between Olds and the objective point at the mines, which this company will serve. The evidence adduced to the Government was the same as that furnished in similar cases, and it shows that these gentlemen would have no difficulty in getting the necessary capital to go on with the work.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I must say that, bearing in mind many of the developments that have occurred, from time to time, in the case of these railway charters, I think the Government would have done well to have adopted the suggestion many times made in this House, that before they make a formal subsidy involving about 400,000 acres, they would do well to insist on a reasonable deposit being put up. There is a very great danger of these charters being hawked about, when there is a subsidy attached to them, and being used for any purpose except the particular development of the section of the country concerned. The hon. gentleman has hardly given the House any particular justification for parting with this number of acres. We ought to know who these gentlemen are, what capitalists they have interested and what length of time must elapse before they commence building the road.

Mr. DALY. I will give the hon. gentleman the information. The gentlemen whose names are mentioned in the Act of incorporation, which was assented to on the 21st of July, 1891, and revived and amended this session, are : Peter McCarthy, John Ryan Costigan, of Calgary ; Walter Reginald Baker, of Winnipeg ; and Isaac K. Kerr, of Eau Claire, Wisconsin. This is the application made, dated 21st March, 1893 :

HON. T. MAYNE DALY,
Minister of the Interior,
Ottawa.

The application of the Rocky Mountain Railway and Coal Company respectfully sheweth :

The said company was incorporated by Act of Parliament, 54-55 Vict., Chap. 58, the Bill having been assented to on the 31st July, 1891, and to which Act we beg to refer.

The Act provides, as will appear by reference thereto, for the construction of a railway from a point on the C.P.R. at or near the Town of Anthracite, thence north, etc. It was objected that such a line of railway would be little if any benefit to the country other than in the development of the coal fields, and upon further consideration, the company has concluded to construct the proposed railway starting from a point on and connecting with the Calgary and Edmonton Railway in the vicinity of Olds Station, thence running in a westerly direction by the Red Deer River to the coal fields ; and, in the event of the present application being favourably considered, such amending legislation will be asked for as may be necessary to enable the company to deviate from the line laid down in the Act of Incorporation. The company has expended large sums of money in and about the prospecting and developing of the coal fields in question. The services of a competent engineer were obtained during the past summer, and by him a personal examination of the said coal fields was made. He recommends further systematic exploration by boring. This will necessitate considerable outlay in procuring a diamond drill and other necessary appliances and the company, before incurring this heavy expense, feel that they should be assured of such reasonable assistance from your Government as the importance and extent of the enterprise would seem to warrant. The proposed railway would facilitate colonization of a vast tract of agricultural land which at present is too far removed from railway communication for settlement, and the advantage to that entire country arising from a steady and inexhaustible supply of superior coal would be inestimable.

We therefore trust that your Government may feel warranted under the circumstances in assisting our company by way of a land grant of 10,000 acres per mile. The company would be willing to accept such reasonable proportion of the grant as your Government might indicate in the vicinity of the coal fields, that is township 31, range 11, west of the fifth I.M., provided no reservation be made of coal or other minerals, the balance to be taken from Government vacant lands between the Bow River and the Saskatchewan, and if available and thought necessary west of the Calgary and Edmonton Railway.

We forward herewith sketch prepared by J. A. McArthur, D.L.S., showing location of coal field. The line of railway would be in the vicinity of fifty-five or sixty miles. Any former application of the company for assistance by subsidy or otherwise must, of course, be considered as withdrawn. The company therefore respectfully trust that your Government may be pleased to give this application their most favourable consideration.

(Sgd.) P. McCARTHY, President.

(Sgd.) THOMAS O'BRIEN, Secretary

Accompanying this is a copy of a resolution passed by the city council of Calgary :

CALGARY, ALBERTA, 20th March, 1894.

Moved by Alderman Jacques, seconded by Alderman A. L. Cameron and resolved :—

That in the opinion of this Council the building and operating of the proposed Rocky Mountain Railway, from the head waters of the Red Deer River to the city of Calgary, by the route which is now proposed by the company to adopt, would be of immense value to the section of country through which it is intended to pass as a colonization road, and that opening up of the Anthracite coal mines at the head of the railway would be of very great advantage to the settlers in a large district; therefore the council desires to impress upon the Dominion Government the propriety of a substantial grant to the said railway company.—
Carried.

WESLEY F. ORR,
Mayor.

Certified a true copy,

J. D. GEDDES,
City Clerk.

In addition to that, the application is accompanied with a report on the coal fields, made by Walter B. M. Davidson, F.G.S., Associate R.S.M., member of the American Institute of Mining Engineers, metallurgical and mining engineer. These are all the documents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman stated, if I did not misapprehend him, that certain English capitalists had been interested in this scheme and that the promoters had satisfied the Government that they had the means to carry on this scheme. I may remind the hon. gentleman, also, that he did not state what length of time was allowed for commencing, and what length of time for completing the road.

Mr. DALY. When I said the information as to the financial backing of the company had been given to the Government, I should have said it was given to myself. I was under the impression that it was in writing, but it may have been a verbal communication made to myself by the promoters of the railway. I do not see the correspondence on the file. But certainly representations were made to me that this Mr. Davidson, who has made this report on the coal fields, had interested English capitalists, friends of his, in the scheme. As to the length of time allowed, it is provided that the construction of the railway shall be commenced on or before the first day of July, 1897, and that the railway shall be completed, adequately equipped, and running to the satisfaction of the Government, on the first day of July, 1901.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Considering that this scheme was on foot three years ago, the proposition of the Government to give these parties three years to hawk about a railway subsidy of 400,000 acres, is exceedingly objectionable. I do not like at all to part with control over the comparatively small proportion of valuable lands available for settlement that we have still retained, unless there is the very clearest evidence and proof and good guarantees given that the public will be greatly served thereby. I must say, Sir, that I do not like at all the proposition as the hon. gentleman has explained and defined it. I am afraid we shall have a repetition in this case of our experience of past years, when certain parties, having no means whatever, will get hold of a railway charter with a subsidy attached either in land or money, and, instead of the country's interest being promoted, a more or less considerable sum of money will be taken out of the pockets of the people, and made over to certain wild-cat promoters.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the House ought to consider the position of the Northwest with regard to railway accommodation. We have an immense stretch of railway in that country. We have an immense area of lands in the immediate vicinity of railways already constructed that are still unoccupied, and yet, with that fact before us, the Minister proposes that other railways shall be constructed, and for this purpose large subsidies of land shall be given. I confess I am utterly unable to see what the aim and object of such a policy can be. The road which the hon. gentleman proposes to construct will start at a point sixty or seventy miles north of Calgary, and will run westward towards the Rocky Mountains, though there are millions of acres along that line of railway extending to Edmonton that are not yet occupied. Why, then, should we undertake to subsidize a road to scatter the population away from the lands that are already open for settlement, and for which railway facilities are provided. If there was want of coal to be consumed, I can understand how the Government might be anxious to open up these coal fields, and attach certain conditions to the party who would come into possession; but there are ample coal fields in the immediate vicinity of the roads already constructed, and that being so, it does seem to me of the first consequence for this country to direct its attention towards the occupation and settlement of the lands in the vicinity of the roads already built. When these lands are fairly taken up, then we may turn our attention to the construction of other railways; but until these lands are taken up, we are simply providing for tying up the public lands in the hands of the railway company. If the lands now opened for settlement and for which railway facilities are afforded, were occupied, there would be no necessity of a land grant in any one of those cases. In the case specially under consideration, the population would be ready to flow into that country, and railway capitalists would know that they were constructing a road that would be fairly remunerative, and a land grant would be unnecessary. I would say further that wherever the House, upon full investigation, comes to the conclusion that a railway is needed in order to open up the country and to furnish facilities to immigrants, then the Governor in Council and Parliament, instead of allowing the lands to pass without control into the hands of the railway corporations, ought to provide that the company shall only be entitled to the maximum sum from the sale of these lands; so that, in the first place, the company will have no interest in holding them for speculation, and in the next place, if the lands had acquired before a special value, the special value shall inure to the public benefit. If these parties were to get 6,400 acres of land, assuming the road to be a necessary work or undertaking, and the Government were to have power to assume control of the lands and to pay the company a sum not exceeding $10,000 or $12,000, then the public would have some control, and they would prevent the lands being held for mere purposes of speculation. But the whole scheme, as disclosed by the statement made by the Minister, shows that it is a mere speculative enterprise, and that the parties are proposing, not to undertake the construction of the road now, not to do anything in that respect now, but to have the privilege of beginning this work after this Parliament has gone out of existence and the people have been called upon to elect another Parliament. Why, Sir, let us leave to the Parliament that will succeed this one, the same privilege of judging of the public interest, the same freedom of determining what is proper in their own day, that we assume. We are not doing that, we are undertaking to decide now what shall be undertaken four or five years hence. I think this is an improper position; but apart from that altogether, I say that with an immense area of land open to settlement by roads already in existence in the North-west Territories, we ought not to give away the residue of the public land that remains to us for new railway enterprises where there is no necessity for their being undertaken or constructed, nor will there be for several years to come.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it is time we should call a halt in granting public lands in the North-west for railway schemes of this kind. When the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, a very large grant was made to that company, and when grants were made to the branch lines, and when a loan was being made to the Canadian Pacific Railway to enable it to complete that road and to complete some other undertakings in connection with it, it was said that by the year 1891 we would have 58,000,000 of money out of that country in return from the sale of lands. Now, up to the present time we have not got 8,000,000 of money, and the people of this country have been called upon, and are now called upon, to pay annually an enormous sum in the way of interest upon the moneys that have been paid to complete the construction of that road, and enable us to get, as was promised by Sir Charles Tupper, a very large return. He said that not only the money invested would be returned, but that the people would get a very large amount over and above the amount of money that they were asked to grant to complete that road. We have not got to-day four millions of money out of the sale of land in the North-west. And what are we doing to-day with the resources to which the people were pointed as the means by which they would relieve themselves from the burdens of the debt they undertook for the construction of that road? Why, Sir, year after year, and session after session, these resources are being frittered away in schemes got up for the purpose of enabling men there and throughout the Dominion to make money by getting a subsidy of 6,400 acres of land per mile for the construction of a road across the prairie. Suppose these lands should bring $1.50 an acre, that is $9,600 a mile, which sum should construct a road in that section of the country without any additional aid. I contend it is wrong and unjust to the people of Ontario who have built their own roads. Take the counties through which different lines have been constructed, and you will find that by county grants, and municipal grants, and in other ways, the people have procured railway accommodation by direct taxation, by the issue of debentures for twenty years. But in the North-west we are not only asked to bear all the burdens involved in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but we are asked now to contribute a most valuable portion of the lands left, for the purpose of supporting schemes for the construction of roads through sections of country that are not settled. I contend that the people should not be asked to grant subsidies for the construction of these roads; it is decidedly wrong to give away in this fashion the entire resources of that country and leave the people of the older provinces to pay the debt, as well as to bear the responsibility we have undertaken to construct the lines already in existence. There is another point in connection with the Bill that I think is exceedingly objectionable, and that is, that they should have until the year 1897 to commence this road, and until 1910 to finish it; and if no other member of this House will do so, I shall move that this land be not granted unless the line is commenced within twelve months from the passage of this Bill, and that the promoters shall give a sufficient guarantee that they will complete it at least within three years. I say it is wrong to allow any company an opportunity of peddling around from pillar to post a charter carrying with it 6,400 acres of land and trying to make money out of it. We know what we did with regard to the North-west Central. We made a large grant of land for it, and the charter was peddled around and fought over from year to year, and the parties were supposed to make considerable money out of it. Now, if there is any money to be made out of those lands, the Dominion Treasury should get that money, and the profits should not be allowed to go into the pockets of railroad speculators.

To the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, Dominion lands to an extent not exceeding 6,400 acres per mile for a line of railway from a point in the vicinity of Souris, on the Souris Branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in a westerly direction to the Pipestone Valley, a distance of about 32 miles.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would ask the Minister whether this is an extension of the line to which the Government granted a subsidy of 6,400 acres on the sixty miles already completed?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is there as good reason for granting this additional subsidy as there was for granting the other?

Mr. DALY. Yes. This line of railway runs from what is called Monteith Junction, on the Glenboro' extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway into the Pipestone country. The company built this extension of thirty-two miles through the Pipestone Valley on the faith that the Government would give a land grant of 6,400 acres per mile.

Mr. CHARLTON. So this section is already built? Then there was sufficient inducement to lead the company to build the road without a subsidy?

Mr. DALY. I do not think there was.

Mr. CHARLTON. We are following a very vicious system in regard to giving land grants to railways. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company is a great corporation, which is undoubtedly prepared to extend throughout the North-west branch lines as rapidly as business demands. The Government, very shortly after the last election, and under very suspicious circumstances, granted the Canadian Pacific Railway a land subsidy of sixty miles of road already built. The company desired for their own purposes to reach certain coal fields. After this road had been constructed the company desired a land grant. The extension of the road westward was in the interests of the company, and it is perfectly absurd to see a great, wealthy corporation such as the Canadian Pacific Railway, possessing enormous resources, informing the Government that they will not build any new branch roads to develop additional business unless the Government give a sufficient land grant to build the road. The company are always ready to extend their line so soon as the growth of business warrants it. This country is throwing away land for the purpose of assisting in the construction of such branch lines. We have now three propositions before the House for land grants, amounting to about 700,000 acres. The first item is for a coal road. The second item is a grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway as a subsidy for the construction of a road that they would have built under any conditions. The land grants already given to railways by the Government aggregate 44,000,000 acres, and this proposition involves an additional grant of nearly three-quarters of a million acres. Will there be an end to this extravagance on the part of the Government of this valuable heritage of the people? In one case the Government give lands to a company to build a railway where they would build it under any circumstances; and in the other case, no less than three years are given to a company, in order to allow them to sell their charter to a genuine company at a large margin of profit. The whole system is vicious. The railway development is great enough; what we want in the North-west is not more railways, but more people, to furnish business to the road. We do not want more land grants to enable companies to build unnecessary roads, and if, as in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway, there is business offered, railway companies will build branch roads. At all events, this country could well afford to wait until this condition has been brought about, for no further land grants are needed, and it is not desirable to give away land unnecessarily. We should realize that the people of the future will need these lands and will desire to buy them from the Government, not from corporations, holding them at high prices, and the Government should not want to use the resources of the people for the benefit of persons desirous of promoting the interests of selfish corporations and speculative concerns.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where are the 200,000 acres to be given?

Mr. DALY. Out of the north-west portion of the North-west Territories. There is no other land available.

Mr. CHARLTON. It has all been given away.

Mr. DALY. In answer to the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton), that the road would have been built in any event. I say no. The company constructed it on the faith and expectation of receiving 6,400 acres per mile. Two trains are run weekly on that branch, and of course the traffic does not pay all expenses. It was a mistake that this branch was not included when the proposal for a similar bonus was brought down.

Mr. CHARLTON. Then these thirty-two miles have already been built?

Mr. DALY. Certainly.

Mr. CHARLTON. Then this is in the same position as the other branch of sixty miles?

Mr. DALY. This should have been included at the same time—it was omitted.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Has the hon. gentleman any correspondence between the department and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in regard to this road, during an earlier period?

Mr. DALY. Yes. I have the following letter, dated April 15th, 1892:—

MONTREAL, 15th April, 1892.

The HON. EDWARD DEWDNEY, Minister of the Interior,
Ottawa.

SIR,—By Order in Council, dated 7th February, 1891, subsequently confirmed by Parliament, a grant of land, 6,400 acres per mile, was made for an extension of this company, Souris branch to the coal fields near La Roche Percée, an estimated distance of 60 miles, the same in addition to the grant previously made for 100 miles of the said branch extending from Kemnay south and west 100 miles. This extension has been completed to Oxbow, a distance of 114½ miles from Kemnay, and the work on the remaining distance to the coal fields, 40 miles, well advanced and will be completed early in the coming summer. It is the intention of this company to make further extension of this line from the coal fields west and north-west to a junction with the main line at or near Regina or Moose Jaw, and surveys are now in progress. This proposed extension will develop and open up for settlement a district containing some of the best agricultural lands in Southern Assiniboia. It is also proposed to construct during the present year another extension of the Souris branch from a point near Souris westward to the Pipestone Valley, a distance of about 30 miles, which will also afford much needed railway accommodation to an important section of the country. The general benefits secured to settlers in Southern Manitoba and Eastern Assiniboia by the construction of this Souris branch system, and especially in the opening up of the coal fields, assuring to those districts an unlimited supply of cheap fuel, are well known to the Government and the directors feel that they are justified in asking for a similar grant of land in aid of the further extensions above named. I therefore beg to ask that the usual grant of 6,400 acres per mile be made for the extension from the coal fields west and north-west, to a junction with the main line, an estimated distance of 150 miles, and for the proposed line from near Souris to the Pipestone Valley, about 30 miles, in all 180 miles.

(Sd.) C. DRINKWATER.

Secretary.

Mr. CHARLTON. The company were in such a hurry to build the road they would not wait for legislation giving them a land grant. This whole system of granting a drawback on bridges already built and giving land grants to railways belonging to the Canadian Pacific Railway reminds me of a story told of the proceedings of the Pennsylvania Legislature, when Tom Scott of the Pennsylvania Railway ruled it. An hon. member rose and said that he proposed the Legislature should adjourn if Tom Scott had no more business to transact. This House had better adjourn if Sir William Van Horne has no more business to be passed. It is evident the Canadian Pacific Railway have some pull on the Government in some way or other. I object to this system of giving grants to railways that are already built. The company could not wait long enough to have the necessary legislation put through this House to build a road, because it was necessary for the development of their business to proceed with it. The system of giving these land grants is reprehensible in the highest degree.

Mr. McMULLEN. By these grants we give away thirty-five townships. The Minister has told the House that there are no lands now available for settlement except those under the control of the railway companies and the Hudson Bay Company.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman is mistaken in that. The Government controls all the even-numbered sections.

Mr. CHARLTON. Thank God for that.

Mr. DALY. Every railway opens up Government land and enhances its value.

Mr. McMULLEN. It appears to me that the Canadian Pacific Railway is doing as they like up in that North-west country. I do not wish to hamper the Canadian Pacific Railway in anything they are justly entitled to, but in view of the burdens placed upon the people in order to build the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I do not think we should throw away the lands we have left. These side lines, in my opinion, should be built by provincial aid, or in some other way, according as the trade of the country warrants their being built. The Minister has intimated that over one of these lines being constructed, there is a train running only twice a week.

Mr. DALY. That is what I understood.

Mr. McMULLEN. That shows that we are building these roads in advance of the necessities of the country.

Mr. DALY. The people are satisfied.

To the Brandon and South-western Railway Company, Dominion lands to the extent of 6,400 acres a mile for 17 miles.

Mr. DALY. This is a revote. This land grant was given three or four years ago to a line with the high sounding name of the Brandon and South-western Railway, which was projected to run from the Turtle Mountain coal fields to Brandon. The subsidy is given for the seventeen miles from the coal fields to the Deloraine branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Deloraine. They have expended considerable money, and have constructed a portion of their road. The grant lapsed, as no subsidies were asked for railways last session.

Resolutions agreed to.

LANDS IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. DALY moved second reading of Bill (No. 162) to consolidate and amend the Acts respecting lands in the Territories.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman intend to go on with this tidy little Bill of some 200 clauses?

Mr. DALY. The amendments are largely verbal, and it is merely a consolidation of the old Act. The changes have been made at the request of the judges and the legal authorities of the North-west Territories, and they are not very important. I have had the amendments marked in copies of the bill, so that hon. gentlemen can see what the changes are.

Mr. LAURIER. Is this one of the measures with which we were threatened a moment ago by the Prime Minister?

Mr. DALY. Oh, no.

Mr. LAURIER. I would hope at this period of the session, that the hon. gentleman would not go on with the Bill, which he says is merely a consolidation of the law now in existence, and in which the changes are merely verbal.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There are some provisions that are more than merely verbal amendments. I am in hopes that we will finish the Bill before 6 o'clock this afternoon, and we will not ask the committee to sit longer.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the hon. Minister thinks it necessary to go on with this Bill, we shall require some explanation as to how the law now stands and what changes he proposes to make. If the Bill were simply a consolidation of the law, it appears to me that we might go on with the law as it is until the House meets again. This is a very late period of the session at which to introduce a Bill of the tremendous proportions of this Bill, and to insist on going on with it. But if the House does undertake to legislate, of course it must consider the changes which the hon. gentleman proposes, because the responsibility is with it.

Mr. DALY. In order to facilitate the passage of the Bill, I furnished the hon. gentleman and other members of the committee with copies of the Bill, with the changes marked in red ink. I am perfectly willing to give an explanation of every change that is made.

On section 22,

Mr. DALY. The only change there is to provide no person shall be appointed deputy registrar, unless he is a barrister, solicitor or advocate of one of the provinces of Canada. The person who may be called upon to take the registrar's place should have, in this respect, the same qualifications of the registrar.

Mr. CHARLTON. Why should the registrar have legal qualifications?

Mr. DALY. He is dealing with registration under the Torrens system.

Mr. DAVIN. He could not possibly perform these duties unless he was a lawyer, and a good one.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What salaries are paid to these officers?

Mr. DALY. The registrar at Battleford, appointed by Mr. Mackenzie has $2,000; the registrar at Regina is paid $1,600, and the registrar at Calgary, $1,600.

Mr. SPROULE. Can you get good lawyers at that figure?

Mr. DALY. These are all good men.

On section 25,

Mr. DALY. The new words in that section are to provide that the inspector of land titles shall furnish securities as well as the registrar. He is called upon to take the registrar's place in some cases.

Mr. MULOCK. What security do they give, and to what amount?

Mr. DALY. Guarantee bonds for $1,000.

Mr. MULOCK. That is not very much.

Mr. DALY. It is sufficient, because they have to deposit their fees in the bank every day, and they have to give an account every month.

Mr. MULOCK. Are they responsible for mistakes?

Mr. DALY. The security they give is only against default.

Mr. MULOCK. What security is there for the faithful discharge of their duty?

Mr. DALY. They are supposed to have the necessary qualifications. They are responsible just as other officials are. The assurance fund provides against liability for mistakes by Registrars.

Mr. MULOCK. Suppose a registrar gave a title to a person to whom he should not give it—a perfectly clear case, say of fraud?

Mr. DALY. The security against that is that the officer knows that dismissal from office would follow. Such security as the hon. gentleman suggests is not expected in the other provinces or other countries in which the Torrens system has been adopted.

On section 31,

Mr. MULOCK. Are the registrars prohibited from carrying on business outside of their offices?

Mr. DALY. I think this covers all that.

Mr. MULOCK. Do you require them to devote their whole time to this business?

Mr. DALY. Certainly.

Mr. MULOCK. You have not so declared.

Mr. DALY. That is the old law. These offices are open from 10 to 4, and on Saturdays to 1 o'clock, and very often these officers work much longer hours than that.

Mr. MULOCK. It would not be so bad if you were not appointing deputies. These officers may relieve the registrars from their main duties and leave them free to engage in other business.

Mr. DALY. They are under inspectors.

On section 39,

Mr. CHARLTON. With regard to fees, I see that they are not specified here.

Mr. DALY. They are fixed by Order in Council.

Mr. CHARLTON. About what rate of fees is charged?

Mr. DALY. I have never had any practice under this Act, and could not say.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. A little less than the fees in the provinces, excepting the contribution for the insurance.

On section 41.

Mr. CHARLTON. Subsection 2 is new?

Mr. DALY. What is new in it is underlined. As to the Hudson Bay Company, the provision is to exempt them from filing any patent. Hon. members will understand that by the terms of their Act the land is theirs, ipso facto. This is to do away with the necessity of making out a grant for them.

Mr. MULOCK. But can the purchaser apply for registration?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. Then the tax certificates should be dispensed with if it is the purchaser that applies, just as well as if it is the Hudson Bay Company.

Mr. DALY. This does not apply to the purchaser, it is the Hudson Bay Company themselves.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved third reading of Bill (No. 149) further to amend the Act respecting the North-west Territories.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to object to anything the Bill contains, but, for the purpose of asking the House to add to the measure an amendment which, I think, on reflection and consideration, the House will believe to be in the public interest. In 1891 we conferred upon the Legislative Assembly of the North-west Territories almost complete power, power almost as full as that which the provincial bodies enjoy under the scheme of the British North America Act, by which a certain portion of legislative authority is vested in the provinces, while a certain portion of authority is retained by this Parliament. But we did not confer on them any additional authority to that they already enjoyed in the matter of education, and it is in regard to that subject I propose to draw the attention of the House this evening. It cannot too firmly be kept in mind that, according to the scheme of the distribution of legislative authority, the subject of education was declared to be a matter of local concern, and, therefore, properly belonging to the province; and my argument will be that, as we have conferred upon the Legislative Assembly of the North-west Territories nearly all the power and authority which have been conferred upon the provinces, this power or right to deal with the matter of education should not be withheld. Let me, for a moment, draw the attention of the House to the provisions of the North-west Territories Act of 1891. By that Act it was determined that the Legislative Assembly "shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, and of any other Act of the Parliament of Canada at any time in force in the Territories, have power to make ordinances for the government of the Territories in relation to the class of subject next hereunto mentioned, that is to say." I want to compare that Act, section by section with the authority which the provinces possess under the British North America Act. In the first place, as no constitution, properly so-called, was given to the Territories, so, of course, there is no power possessed by them to amend the constitution. The first authority given to a province is to amend its own constitution, and in that regard the Legislature of a province has wider powers than is possessed by this Parliament, because this Parliament has not the power to amend its own constitution. The next power which is conferred by the British North America Act is "taxation within the province in order to raise a revenue for provincial purposes." Upon the Territories we conferred power of direct taxation within the Territories in order to raise a revenue for territorial or municipal or local purposes. So that the great sovereign power, the power of taxation, the power of raising money in that way was conferred upon the Legislative Assembly of the Territories. Then "the borrowing of money on the sole credit of the province" was withheld, because, as I have already had occasion to say with respect to amending the constitution, there being no province, the power to borrow money was very reasonably and very properly withheld. The next is, "the establishment and tenure of provincial offices and the appointment and payment of provincial officers." We gave to the Territories "the establishment and tenure of territorial offices, and the appointment and payment of territorial officers, out of the territorial revenue." Then, "the management and sale of the public lands belonging to the province, and of the timber and wood thereupon" are withheld, as in the province of Manitoba. We give, however, "the establishment, maintenance, and management of prisons in and for the province," and "municipal institutions in the territories," while we withhold the "establishment, maintenance, and management of hospitals." We give the power to raise a revenue by "shop, saloon, tavern, auctioneer, and other licenses." We confer power with respect to "local works and undertakings, other than such as are of the following classes,"—these are not quite the same as apply to a province, but are very nearly so. We confer power with respect to "solemnization of marriage in the provinces," and also in the Territories. We confer power "with respect to property and civil rights," and "with respect to the administration of justice, including the constitution, maintenance, and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and of criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts; but not the power of appointing any judicial officers." We give authority for enforcing any law to punish "by fine, penalty or imprisonment for enforcing any law of the province made in relation to any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in the section"; also, "generally matters of a merely local or private nature in the Territories." So it will be seen that, with very few exceptions, and some of those exceptions incident to the fact that autonomy has not yet been fully conferred on the Territories, the same power as the Territories would have if they were a province, has been substantially conferred upon the legislative body which has power to make ordinances in those Territories. With respect to education, we made no change. We left the law with respect to that subject as it has been since 1875, and that law is a most extraordinary one, unprecedented, so far as I know, and one which, I think, ought no longer to remain in force in the Territories. It is compulsory as to separate schools. It enacts that there shall be separate schools. Substantially, its provision is that whatever the majority may be in any locality, it may establish a school known as a public school, and the minority in that locality may establish a separate school. So that there may be in every locality where there are Protestants and Catholics the two school systems. The majority have the right to call theirs a public school, the minority have the right to establish what is called a separate school, and it becomes a separate school in that locality, although it may not be a separate school in any other locality. The exact provision of the clause reads:

But such ordinance shall always provide that the majority of ratepayers of any district, may establish such schools there as they think fit, and make the necessary assessment and collection of rates therefor; and also that the minority of the ratepayers therein, whether Protestants or Roman Catholics, may establish separate schools there.

That is a provision which has been the law with regard to the North-west Territories ever since 1875. Now, Sir, let me draw the attention of the House to the present position of the North-west Territories so far as population is concerned. The population of the Territories, according to the last census, is 66,799, of whom 13,008 are Roman Catholics, or not 20 per cent.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. How many Indians are included in the total population?

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think the Indians are included in this 66,000.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Well, I do.

Mr. McCARTHY. I may be wrong about that. In British Columbia there are 20,000 Catholics in round numbers, out of a population of 97,000, or over 20 per cent.

Mr. MARA. How many Indians?

Mr. McCARTHY. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman whether that includes the Indians or not, but he probably can tell me.

Mr. MARA. It does.

Mr. McCARTHY. The 97,000 includes the Indians, and I suppose there are Catholics among the Indians as well as Protestants.

Mr. DALY. The larger proportion are Roman Catholics.

Mr. McCARTHY. So that out of the 20,000 Catholics the larger proportion are Indians, according to the information the hon. gentleman gives me, and therefore my figures will be understood in that sense. Then in Manitoba there are 152,000 population, of whom 20,000 are Roman Catholics, or 13 per cent. In New Brunswick, out of a population of 321,000, there are 115,000 Roman Catholics, or 36 per cent. In Nova Scotia there are 122,000 Roman Catholics out of a population of 454,000, or 27 per cent of Roman Catholics. In Prince Edward Island the proportion of Roman Catholics seems still larger, there being 47,000 out of a population of 109,000. That is the proportion of Roman Catholics in these various provinces. But it must be remembered that in the province of British Columbia and Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick there is no separate school system. The absolute unlimited control of education is vested there in the Provincial Legislatures, and it is so vested because, according to the scheme of Confederation, that being a matter of local concern, was deemed to be one proper to be left to the local authorities. We know that in Ontario there was a separate school system at the time of Confederation, and that it was stipulated on the part of those representing the province of Quebec, as I understand it, that that system of separate schools—which in fact had been imposed upon the province of Ontario by a majority of the representatives from the sister province of Quebec, when they were united as Canada—that that system should be perpetuated, and as a correlative, it was enacted that the same system existing for the benefit of the Roman Catholics in Ontario should be established for the benefit of the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec. So far as these two provinces are concerned, a special arrangement was entered into as a part of the terms upon which Confederation was established; but with regard to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia they were left free to deal with the matter of education as to them seemed fit. When Prince Edward Island was afterwards admitted to the Union, the authority respecting education was left to the Local Legislature in Prince Edward Island, and when British Columbia was brought in, the authority to deal with education unfettered was left to that province, and when we conferred a constitution upon Manitoba we conferred it in the manner which is perfectly familiar now to the House, and which is expounded to be practically, that Manitoba was to have unlimited control in the matter of schools. Now, Sir, why under these circumstances should we fail to trust, or be afraid to trust, the people of the North-west Territories with full and complete power in matters of education? In the case of almost every other power which it is possible to confer upon the Territories, we have thought them worthy of our confidence, and I want to know why it is that we think them unworthy of dealing with this matter of education? I am not here to argue one way or the other with reference to separate schools. My own view on the subject is perfectly well known. I would prefer that there should not be separate schools. I would prefer to see all the children of the land brought up without being divided into hostile camps on the matter of religion; but I am quite free to say that I would not interfere with any of the provinces, or with the laws or regulations of any province, that in their wisdom think proper to adopt separate schools. It is a matter with which this Parliament ought to have no concern. The question here is: why should we insist, because in 1875, when there was hardly any population in the Territories at all, and when we governed them from here almost absolutely, why should we now when we have thought proper to give them power and authority in matters of legislation? Why should we in this particular matter of schools withhold from them the full and complete power which I submit is theirs as of right? I do not propose to occupy the time of the House with anything more than a brief statement—because the subject is pretty well known to us all—a brief statement of the scope and object of my amendment. I have tried for many years past: in 1892, in 1893 and during this session, to have this change made. I did not try before, because I felt it was a matter so local in its nature that until invoked by the Territories to move in the matter, I did not take upon myself to bring the matter to the notice of this House. But in the year 1890, I think, the Assembly of the Territories, by a practically unanimous vote, petitioned this Parliament to do away with this clause with reference to education, and to give them unlimited power to deal with it, and since that time, from session to session, whenever the Bill has been brought up, petition after petition has been presented to this House. So far as I know, no petition has been presented against that power to deal with education being conferred. We have therefore the request of those who are locally interested that they should have this authority, and having that request from them, there should be some good reason for withholding it. During the two last sessions the Government introduced a Bill dealing with the North-west Territories, and in neither of these Bills did the Government propose to deal with the question of schools, and upon my moving in the matter at the close of the session, the Government thought proper to withdraw the Bill without permitting a discussion on the subject. This year the Government have again introduced their measure; and if I had known that they intended to introduce it and pass it through the House I should not have troubled the House by the introduction of a Bill on the subject; because it seems to me that it is a matter that the Government ought to have dealt with, and if the Government did not think fit to deal with it, the proper time to move an amendment was the time I am now taking, when the Government measure for enlarging to some extent the power and authority of the Legislative Assembly is under the consideration of the House. Now, I want to draw the attention of my hon. friends to a very important provision. By this legislation we are really rivetting upon the people of the North-west the separate school system for all time. One of the provisions of the constitution with regard to separate schools—a provision which was observed with reference to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and, if my memory serves me rightly, also with reference to Prince Edward Island and British Columbia—was that conferring full power on the Provincial Legislatures with reference to education, with this proviso:

If and for each province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education subject and according to the following provisions.

This is not merely of application to the provinces of Ontario and Québec, but is of universal application, so far as it is embodied and may be embodied, and probably would be embodied, in any constitution given to any province. Subsection 1 provides:

Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the Union.

Now, we insist by the clause of the Act of 1875, which has been included in the various consolidations of the legislative powers of the North-west Territories, which have been made from time to time, that they shall have separate schools; and if we continue insisting that that system shall prevail up to the time we create provinces in the North-west, then the application of this clause of the first subsection of section 93 of the British North America Act, to which I have referred, rivets for all time upon the new provinces the system of separate schools. Create a province there now, enact the usual clauses of the British North America Act, and the result will be that in the new province those who have enjoyed what is spoken of as a right or privilege with respect to denominational schools would be able to say: The constitution given to this province by the Dominion Parliament does not permit any interference with any right or privilege which we enjoyed prior to the time of the creation of this province. That, I think, is a most important consideration. It has been urged, and I have heard it argued: Why not allow this matter to remain until the new province is created? Why interfere with the matter so long as there are mere territories? It will be quite time enough, when we are creating provinces in the North-west, to give them full power in school matters. Well, those who argue in that way will, I think, find it very difficult to contend that the population of the North-west are not as competent as any other population throughout the Dominion to legislate in regard to educational matters. But even if they were not, we ought to leave it to them to select the system of education which they prefer, so that they should not be conducted against their will by the clause of the Act to which I have referred. Nor is it altogether an unimportant matter in another sense. In a sparsely-settled population, such as you have in the North-west, could there be anything more suicidal and foolish than the division of the school population into two separate bodies? It is difficult enough, no doubt, to educate the children in the North-west, even with one school system. But for the people to divide their resources and to fritter away their means in the establishment and perpetuation of two systems, does appear to me to be the greatest possible folly, and probably more so there than in any other part of the Dominion. Now, what is the position of affairs there at the present time? And when I say the present time I refer to 1891, the last year for which I have been able to get a report on educational matters in the library—I do not suppose there has been any important change since then as to the number and the division of the schools. According to this report there were 210 Protestant public schools and 34 Roman Catholic public schools; and when I speak of the public school, it is the school of the majority. In the North-west, unlike the province of Ontario, there is not one set of public schools and another set of separate schools; but there may be a Protestant public school in one locality, and a Roman Catholic public school in the adjoining locality, and the school of the minority will be the separate school, whatever it may be. Now, I cannot find that there are in the North-west any separate schools of Protestants; however, my hon. friends who come from the Territories will be able to correct me on that point. The Protestants have not availed themselves of their privilege of establishing separate schools, and the result is that either their children have to go without schooling or have to attend the Roman Catholic schools in places where the Roman Catholics are in the majority. But there are eleven Roman Catholic separate schools; and I think the House will be astounded to learn the cost at which these schools are maintained. Now, at Lacombe, which I believe is the term used by the separate school party for Calgary, if I am correctly informed, the daily average attendance at the separate school is 94, and the cost per pupil, $29.53. In the Protestant public school the average attendance is 159, and the cost per pupil, $18.65. So that for the separate school the cost per pupil is $10.88 more than for the public school. No doubt that is owing to the fact that the public school is the larger ; but join these two schools together, and the cost of both would be materially reduced. And that is by no means the worst example of division. In Prince Albert the average attendance in the Protestant public school is 78, and the average cost per pupil, $33.55 ; the separate school has an average attendance of 11, with a cost of $48.58, or $15.03 per pupil more in the separate school than in the public school. Well, these are the places that I am able to trace and compare the public school system with the separate school system, because the names are not identical, and I have not been able to trace the others and to make any comparison with them. But let me give the House the statement of one or two schools here, Catholic separate schools. At the school called St. Andrew's—I do not know where it is—the average attendance is nine and the average cost $56.25 per pupil. At the school called St. Peter's the average attendance is seven and the cost per pupil $58.96.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Are those Indian schools ?

Mr. McCARTHY. I fancy not. They are put down as Roman Catholic separate schools. They are not Indian schools, no doubt.

Mr. FERGUSON. Have you any idea of the locality of these two schools ?

Mr. McCARTHY. I have not.

Mr. FERGUSON. They may be at very remote points.

Mr. McCARTHY. No, because there is a larger Protestant population there than Catholic population, or there would not be separate schools.

Mr. FERGUSON. Can you give us a comparison of the cost of the pupils in the Protestant public and Catholic public schools ?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes ; but I first want to draw the attention of the House to the cost in Ontario of the schools. In Ontario the cost per pupil is $8.40. I think it is only fair to tell the House that I understand that calculation has been made, not upon the average attendance, but upon the average number ; but working it out upon the average attendance, the cost would not be more than $14 or $15 per pupil.

Mr. MASSON. Is that the provincial cost alone ?

Mr. McCARTHY. Everything—the Legislative grant, the municipal school grants, and assessments, the clergy reserve fund, and everything. The cost is put down for 1892 at $8.40 per pupil, but I understand that is based upon the total number of pupils and not upon the average attendance, whereas in this table, in the public schools here, it is based upon the average attendance. My hon. friend (Mr. Ferguson) wanted to know what the cost of the public schools is compared with the cost of separate schools.

Mr. McCARTHY.

Mr. FERGUSON. Pardon me, I want the cost of the public Catholic schools and the cost of the public Protestant schools.

Mr. McCARTHY. The public schools of each denomination. At Moose Jaw the cost is $11 per pupil ; at Qu'Appelle, $16.76.

Mr. FERGUSON. Pardon me again. Can the hon. gentleman give it to us territorially divided.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have not worked that up.

Mr. FERGUSON. That does not amount to anything at all.

Mr. McCARTHY. My hon. friend will treat that as he pleases. I give it to him just as I find it here. It is $11 or perhaps $14, as the figures are not very clear. I find another school at Regina is $33, then I find a school at $21, and one at $17, and running down the column I find one as low as $6.64, and another as high as $55, where the attendance is twelve. I think probably that is the highest in the list.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is that a Protestant school ?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am speaking of Protestant schools now.

Mr. FERGUSON. They are getting the most after all.

Mr. McCARTHY. I was speaking of the highest among the Protestant schools. My hon. friend is assuming the part of an advocate before he learns the facts.

Mr. FERGUSON. We will get the facts before you sum up.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes. Take the other schools—public Catholic schools. The first one shows a cost of $55.75 per pupil. The school at Saskatchewan costs $46.76 per pupil. The school at St. Albert costs $21.21 per pupil. That at St. Leon $56 per pupil, and that at St. Laurent $64.28. There is no doubt that the average cost of the Roman Catholic public schools was larger a good deal than that of the Protestants. No doubt about that, but I do not think that is a matter of comparison so much as the comparison between public schools and separate schools. Where we find both these in the one locality, we find the difference in cost, which I have given the House, and that difference is enormously in favour of the public school system, and we can easily conclude that if there were but one school system instead of two, the cost would be proportionately less. Now the total amount spent by this Parliament in school matters is over $100,000, so that the question appeals to us from the economic point of view. $101,696 is the total amount we have granted apparently for educational purposes in the North-west, and the House can judge, from the statement I have given, whether the expenditure is a wise or foolish one. Of that expenditure, the amount spent on the Protestant schools is 73·20 per cent, and on the Catholic 26·28 per cent, both public and separate. Therefore my conclusion is that whatever way you look at it, this question—and I desire not to raise any irritation or excite any passions, but simply that the matter should be discussed on its merits—whatever way we look at it, I am unable to see or appreciate any argument or reason why we should not rid ourselves of this question from Dominion politics, and hand the dealing with education to where it properly belongs. I therefore beg to move an amendment, which will carry out that provision. I propose to make the amendment fit in with the Bill which we are now asked to read a third time. The first provision of that Bill is as follows :—

3. Sub-paragraph (b) of paragraph seven of subsection one of the section substituted by section six of chapter twenty-two of 1891, for section thirteen of The North-west Territories Act, is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor :—Railway companies, (not including tramway and street railway companies) and steamboats, canal, transportation, telegraph and irrigation companies.

That is the additional power conferred upon the Territories by this section, one of the powers that we withheld from the Territories having been the incorporation of railway, steamboat, canal and transportation companies, and the effect of this amendment will be that the Territories will have power to incorporate tramways and street railway companies. Now, I propose to add :

That the said Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House with instructions that they have power to amend the same by adding to the first section the words following : “and said subsection is further amended by inserting therein after the thirteenth paragraph thereof the words following :

14. In relation to education. But this amendment shall not take effect until after the next general election of members of the Legislative Assembly of the North-west Territories.

2. And by amending the second section thereof by inserting the words “fourteen and” after the word “section” in the first line thereof.

That will be to repeal the law with regard to education as it is now found in the Statute-book. I move this, seconded by Mr. Denison.

Mr. HUGHES. In rising to offer an amendment, I need not say, Sir, that I do so fully recognizing the position of the House as to this question. We have had this question before us for some years. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. McCarthy) has on more than one occasion given notice of his intention to move amendments to this North-west Territories Act. But, until the present time, the House has never been favoured with the opportunity of hearing the hon. gentleman's views or his arguments in support of them. The hon. gentleman has rightly stated that two years ago he gave notice of a motion to bring in a Bill abolishing the control of this House in relation to separate schools in the North-west Territories, to amend the Act in the manner he now proposes to do. You may remember, however, Mr. Speaker, during the whole session, those of us who were anxious to take part in the discussion of that question had to sit here awaiting the convenience of the hon. gentlemen, until finally we were very much surprised one evening to have the House called together to deal with the subject, the only warning that we were to have the question under discussion being the simple announcement, “call in the members.” It had been my intention on that occasion, had the opportunity been afforded, to move an amendment in the line I now propose. But, as I said, no opportunity was afforded me; the members were obliged to vote one way or the other on the question, and that without warning. We also remember, Sir, how last session we were called upon day after day to be in our places in the House in anticipation and expectation of the hon. gentleman from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) bringing on his motion. But the matter was allowed to drift until the close of the session and nothing was done. Then, on that occasion, as on the present, the hon. gentleman showed but little interest in the affairs of the House, his attendance being evidently with the desire of getting in his motion in the closing hours of the session, when it could not be discussed, and when, as now, there would be a very small House to discuss the question. I need not comment further—it is not proper I should—than to say that is the seeming object in bringing in his motion at the time and in the manner he does. Ample opportunity has been afforded this session, as in former sessions, to have this matter brought up and discussed calmly and fully when the members would not be hurried, as at the present time, when a member occupying the time of the House even for a few minutes is subject to the odium in the minds of his comrades, who wish to bring the session to a close, of occupying time unnecessarily. But, that aside, the proposition of the hon. gentleman is to relegate to the Territories control in matters of education. Now, Sir, from the view-point on which I stand, that seems an objectionable proposal. So far as secular education is concerned, I go as far as the hon. gentleman does, possibly I go further than he does, in relegating that to the control of the Territories. But, in regard to theological education in the public schools, when the hon. gentleman proposes to hand that over to the Territorial Legislature, I certainly differ from him, and I shall endeavour in as brief a manner as possible to give my views on these points. I shall outline briefly my reasons for differing from the hon. gentleman, reasons jotted down, as his arguments were given in the course of the address to which we have just listened. In the first place, if the hon. member's motion is passed, we recognize as he does, the right of these Territories to establish separate schools. That right I deny as being entirely subversive of the principles of responsible Government, and good Government in any form. He also leaves it an open question with the Territories and provinces arising therefrom to establish these schools. I shall endeavour, as I proceed, to show that this idea is fallacious. If the Territories, following out the views of the hon. gentleman, were given this control of education, and at the time of their establishment as provinces, by their own act, only one system of public schools was recognized, the obnoxious principle of separate schools might still find root in the North-west Territories as in the province of New Brunswick and in the province of Nova Scotia to-day. Both of these provinces have asserted the principle of public schools, and yet, Sir, you will find that virtually they have their separate schools, theological institutions, in the city of St. John, Moncton and other parts throughout the province. We find in the city of St. John that the Roman Catholic convents are leased to the public school board of that place—I know whereof I speak, and this is true not only of St. John, but of other places in the Maritime Provinces—and the Sisters and Brothers are hired, and are regularly on the staff of the public schools as teachers. Thus, though in name there are no separate schools, the principle of separate schools is established in the province of New Brunswick. And there is an agitation springing up now causing dissension among the people, an agitation which, I fear, will go a long way toward creating unrest throughout this country. More than that, Sir, the policy of the hon. gentleman, if adopted, would allow of the taxes collected from the people being used for theological purposes, and that, of course, I object to. The hon. gentleman recognizes that theological or sectarian teaching is part of national education, and that is a point in which I would differ from him. I hold that our object should be the total severance of theological teaching from our national system of education. I think no one will gainsay this point—that it is the duty of the state to recognize how the citizens of this country shall be trained. In declaring for a Dominion franchise—whatever the faults may be found in the details—we have declared our right to say that the citizen in Nova Scotia shall stand before the country on the same footing as the citizen in British Columbia or any other part of the Dominion. We have asserted that we have the right as a nation to lay down the rules that guide our citizenship. Now, no doubt, in the old days, the church controlled state affairs, and it remained part and parcel of the state machinery, and the only education one could find was the little smattering in the church. There were scarcely any schools except for the purpose of training people for the clerical profession and a few state functions, and education was very limited. The church in those days controlled the whole machinery of education, and the theological part of education was considered, as it is even down to our own day, to be by all odds the most important. But times are changed, and we now find that the people of the nation recognize that the children of the land should be educated, not only in matters of church form, but in various other interests of life. As time advanced, we find a little reading, writing and arithmetic taught in the schools, and there education ended. Now, however, we find that not only are children trained intellectually, but that attention is given to sanitary matters, and they are trained in the broad political principles of the nation, and taught the municipal, provincial and national institutions under which we live. We even go further and admit that it is necessary to train them morally or ethically, that they may be able to distinguish between right and wrong, and that each may know his duty towards his fellow men. This, in short, is the difference in the aim of the education of to-day, and the aim of the education of a number of years ago. But that the state should tax the people for the purpose of inculcating any theological creed or dogma, is something that I am satisfied is, if not of the past, will be of the past in a very few years, in this land. Now, in dealing with this matter of separate schools in Canada, we find ourselves confronted not only with the question of religion, but also with the question of race; and here I may be permitted to say a word on this latter point. Some of our French-Canadian fellow-citizens take it as a personal attack upon their rights when any opposition is offered to separate schools. Now, it is not long since I had the pleasure of reading a report, I think it was of the Roman Catholic Committee of the Council of Public Instruction of the province of Quebec, where the very best men in that province demanded that the theological control of the schools should be abolished, and that the teachers should be trained just as they are in other provinces of the Dominion; that the clerical control so long exercised over the schools there, should be, if not entirely abolished, at least largely abolished. However, I wish to touch briefly on this question of French nationality. It is a myth. Our French-Canadian fellow-citizens are of the same race and lineage as are those of British origin. France was originally settled by the Celtic race, so were the British Islands; in other words, we find one the Britannia major and the other

Britannia minor. Then we find France overrun by the Teutonic races; the Franks, the Goths, Burgundians and other peoples from the forests and plains of Germany. The same or kindred peoples we also find settling in Britain, the Angles, the Saxons and the Jutes, at exactly the same period, all kindred races exactly. Later on we find France settled largely by the Norsemen or Normans, as they are called in history, all along the valley of the Seine, along the shores of the Bay of Biscay, and even around the southern part of France. That large infusion of Scandinavians or Norsemen flowing into France, has made her largely what she is to-day. We find the identical people settling in Britain under the names of Danes, or Swedes and Scandinavians. Following on down there is an infusion of those Norman people into England, and then we find a return movement in the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, during which there were settlements in France from Britain even up to the days of the Henrys. So that so far as race and blood are concerned, the two peoples are identical, and the cry of difference of race, when viewed in the light of history, must necessarily vanish. Now, language is another point on which great stress is laid. I stand here prepared to indorse any system that will, in any legitimate manner, encourage the study of the French language. A child who speaks and understands one language well, is educated, but a child who understands two languages well is better educated. It has been said that a child who understands three or four languages knows nothing at all; but, at the same time, I am free to say that it is an advantage to any one to be able to understand and speak two languages well. I would be the last man, the last member of this House, either by voice or vote, to seek to deprive my French-Canadian fellow-citizens of any right they enjoy in the province of Quebec or the Northwest Territories, of educating their children in their mother tongue. You can box the compass on religion every morning if you choose, but language cannot be changed short of a lifetime. Therefore, this question is one that we must necessarily leave to settle itself; and in the years to come I am satisfied that you will see a language neither all English nor all French, but a language strengthened by the best elements of the two tongues, and the people will be the better for it. Now, in discussing this question many considerations must necessarily be touched upon, and what I propose to say I shall say with all due regard to every man's faith and every man's creed. I have no desire to interfere in the slightest with any man's creed or theology; I would not tolerate any man interfering with mine; and, therefore, I would not in the slightest interfere with any man's theology. If, therefore, in reviewing these matters, I should say anything that might be considered harsh, or that is not generally discussed on the floor of this House, I trust that those who differ from me will recognize that I am only dealing with historical facts, and not with a desire to hurt any one's feelings. Many of our fellow-citizens, the moment you talk of separate schools, raise their hands in holy horror and proclaim that their religion is attacked, that an attempt is made to abolish their church. Well, Sir, I maintain that a church, be it Protestant or Roman Catholic, or be it of any other denomination, that cannot stand without being bolstered up by the state, should vanish, and the sooner it vanishes the better for all concerned. Now, the contention that the French religion is synonymous with Romanism is also a myth. Let us review history, and you will find that up to the sixteenth century the people of France fought heroically against being subjected to the tyranny of the Romish Church. We find that as late as the sixteenth century the people of France held out heroically against being subjected to the control of the Church of Rome. Away back, before the end of the first century there were over a hundred creeds. Early in the fourth century we find the famous Council of Nice called, and even then, just as in the present day, we find theologians quarrelling; there has been a standing quarrel from that day to this, and so it will be until the end of the chapter. I will mention another very important fact, from which I date the rise of what you may call the assumption of temporal power on the part of the Roman Church. You may remember, Mr. Speaker, that early in the fourth century the capital of the Roman Empire was changed from the city of Rome to Constantinople. We find at about the same time that Constantine, the Emperor of Rome, adopted the Christian faith, and that the hangers-on of the Government and the great majority of the priests of the old heathen religion boxed the compass and turned with him. That has been the rule from the time of Constantine down to to-day. About that time we find the whole Roman empire divided into metropolitan divisions, and a metropolitan placed over each of those divisions. The capital was removed from Rome to Constantinople. We find almost the only authority existing in Rome to be the bishop of the church; from that time dated the power of the church in Rome and its assumption of power in the Western Empire. During succeeding years we find various attempts made by the priests of the Christian Church to fasten themselves on western Europe. Shortly after this time we find the church ready to support the party prepared to pay the highest price for its support—just as we do to-day. The price to be paid for the support of the church has not changed from that day down to the present. In the eighth century we find the church extending its power to France. We find the Pope of Rome, fearing there would be a unification of Italy under the Lombard princes, formed an alliance in order to secure his authority in Europe. In return for assistance given in favour of the Pope of Rome against the Lombard princes in northern Italy, Romagna and Ancona, the Pope gave two provinces to his ally, and thus began the temporal power of the Church of Rome. From that date, step by step, we find that church gradually becoming stronger—I will not enter into all the historical facts connected with it—and gradually becoming, age after age, more intolerant, until, in the eleventh century it absolutely refused to recognize the control of the Emperor. Up to that time, it is well known that every priest and bishop and even the Pope himself was elected by the people or appointed by the Emperor. They claim no divine right to rule, as they do at the present time. In the middle of the eighth century we find the temporal power of the church established, and it continued to be so down to 1870, until the unification of Italy, when Victor Emmanuel changed his capital from Florence to Rome, and from that date to this, the Church of Rome has gradually ceased to be a temporal power. Having entered into this historical review, we need not go further; I could go into details and show how, step by step, this power was assumed, and this divine right was assumed, but it is not necessary. We find ourselves in Canada suffering from the misgovernment and mismanagement of by-gone ages. I have no antipathy whatever to any of our Roman Catholic citizens or to the citizens of any church, but when it comes to our having our schools governed by that church—I will not go into the details, although I have all the figures here—and when it is apparent that extra cost is incurred, that bad management prevails and other objections arise, I object to this state of things, especially in a sparsely-settled country—but I need not go into these facts as they have already been stated by the last speaker, and are very well known. But there are very many objections that are very properly urged to any such system being perpetuated in this country. We find that separate schools were established as a compromise measure. In the provinces of Ontario and Quebec they are established, and I suppose they will remain until some time in future years when they will vanish of their own accord, when the people will have become so broad and liberal that a system of theological government will not be tolerated. But in the North-west, the matter is entirely different; in the Territories there is no need of compromise. I can easily see why, in the early days of the province of Quebec separate schools were established. We have two races in that province, English-speaking and French-speaking people, and I can easily see how the question might readily arise of establishing separate schools, based on the question of language; but I cannot see any reason why such schools should be based on theology, as subsequently was the case. As regards language, the two races were about evenly divided—language on the one hand and theology on the other. The English-speaking people, mostly Protestants, and the French-speaking mostly Roman Catholic, and it is very easy to see how the school question gradually developed into the form it subsequently assumed, when Roman Catholic and Protestant separate schools were established. I do not wish to be misunderstood—I do not desire to be understood as being in favour of Protestant separate schools or Protestant control of schools; but my theory is this, that there should be no theological control whatever in connection with schools. I shall endeavour to submit a few points to support my view. It is our duty to teach the youth of the land, intellectually. The question of theology cannot possibly arise in teaching reading, writing and arithmetic, or, in fact, teaching any of the subjects that form our school curriculum. History is the only subject on which any difference of opinion can possibly exist, and even in regard to that I am satisfied an arrangement could be arrived at which would be perfectly satisfactory to persons of all creeds and forms of theology. Therefore, no question can be raised by any theologian on subjects which we may call intellectual in our public schools. There can be no possible objection to teaching sanitary laws or physical laws relating to disease, and the development of the human frame in our schools. These are recognized to-day by all theologians as being proper, and certainly theology does not enter into those subjects; therefore, Protestants and Roman Catholics can attend such schools without straining their consciences. Moreover, it is well recognized that the principles of government should be thoroughly instilled in the minds of the youth, and theology cannot possibly enter into the principles of government; and I am satisfied that no one should, for a moment, object to the teaching of that subject. It is said, look at what the free school system in the United States has produced. I point to the United States as a country carrying out the free school system. The men who are causing the dissensions and troubles in the United States, are not men who were educated under the free school system of the United States, but they are the offscourings of theological institutions in the countries of Europe. I speak of every theology, not caring what it may be. There is an old saying which is this:

Of all ills with which mankind is cursed Ecclesiastical tyranny is the worst.

If you can point me in history, anywhere, and find the beneficial results of any such teaching, then I am prepared to admit I am in error. These strikes in the United States and these anarchist troubles that reveal themselves all over the country are the product of those who have been brought up in countries ruled by theological institutions.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Mr. Speaker, I protest against such language.

Mr. AMYOT. The gentleman attacks Protestant theology as well as Catholic.

Mr. HUGHES. One as well as the other.

Mr. AMYOT. Go on.

Mr. HUGHES. There is no objection whatever that can be urged on the part of any theologian to the teaching of morality. Right is right, and wrong is wrong. Long before we found any of the precepts of theologians that are blessing or injuring the world, long before these theologies were introduced on the face of the earth, we found right, right, and wrong, wrong. Morality as taught in our schools cannot be objected to from a theological point of view. For the benefit of some of our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens who might object to the absence of the teaching of morality in the schools, I wish to read what a very eminent writer says on the subject of the teaching of morality, and when his name is mentioned it will prove acceptable to the great majority of the members of that faith. Mr. Lilly, one of the leading members of the Jesuit branch of the Roman Catholics in England, says :

The ethics of Christianity are not, as Mr. John Morley somewhere calls them, "a mere appendage to a set of theological mysteries." They are independent of those mysteries, and would subsist to all eternity, though Christianity and all other religions were swept into oblivion. The moral law is ascertained, not from announcements of prophets, apostles, evangelists, but from a natural and permanent revelation of the reason. "Natural reason," says Suarez, in his great treatise De Legibus, "indicates what is in itself good or bad for men ;" or, as elsewhere in the same work, he expresses it : "Natural reason indicates what is good or bad for a rational creature." The great fundamental truths of ethics are necessary, like the great fundamental truths of mathematics. They do not proceed from the arbitrary will of God. They are unchangeable, even by the fiat of the Omnipotent. The moral precepts of Christianity do not derive their validity from the Christian religion. They are not a corollary from its theological creed. It is mere matter of fact, patent to every one who will look into his Bible, that Jesus Christ and his apostles left no code of ethics. The Gospels and Epistles do not yield even the elements of such a code. Certain it is that when, in the expanding Christian society, the need arose for an ethical synthesis, resource was had to the inexhaustible fountains of wisdom opened by the Hellenic mind.

The clearness, the precision of psychological analysis, which distinguish the ethics of the Catholic schools, are due more to Aristotle and Plato, than to Hebrew prophets or Christian apostles.

I merely cite that to show that even among eminent writers and theologians in the Roman Catholic church the question of morality is not necessarily connected with the teaching of theology, so that so far as the teaching of morals is concerned our schools could very well be spared the trouble. Now, Sir, it may be asked, why is it that the church is so anxious to control the teaching of theology in our schools? Of course it is a relic of the old days and they do not care to give it up. In fact none of these principles have been given up without a struggle. During the last 200 years, since the overthrow of theological control in relation to education, the world has made more progress than in all the previous years of its existence. That fact alone I would urge in opposition, to any control on the part of theologians in our schools ; any control other than as citizens of this country. We may well ask : have theologians any confidence in their own principles? If they have, why do they seek to take advantage of the public schools of the country in order to inculcate their principles. They have their various meetings every day during the week, and they have the Sunday schools in which to control the children, and yet we find they are not satisfied with that, but that they wish to control the public schools of the country in relation to the matters of their theology. They certainly should not fear intelligent public criticism, if their dogmas are right they should not be afraid to have them fearlessly criticised. There is one other reason why we should not have this system of separate schools, either Protestant or Roman Catholic, for I do not make any exception to either one or the other. There is the question of vested rights. The record shows that every year these separate schools in the North-west are increasing in numbers, and by the time we come to establish these Territories as provinces, we will find that these schools have taken such firm root that it will be all but impossible for this Government to eradicate them. I could point to the record of Ontario—but I shall not take up the time of the House to go into that aspect of the case—to show that separate schools instead of unifying and upbuilding the nation, divide it, and create a citizenship inside of a citizenship owing allegiance, not necessarily to the nation, but to a foreign power. I contend that separate schools are unnecessary, and especially where settlement is very sparse. Many of these schools in the North-west Territories have not more than seven or eight children attending them, and yet you will find that in some localities Protestant children—because there are no Protestant separate schools there, and I hope there never will be—are forced to walk many miles in order to attend the public schools, because the schools in their own sections are Roman Catholic ones. I am informed by many people who come from the North-west, and I am informed by Roman Catholics in the province of Quebec, that neither in the province of Quebec nor in the North-west do they demand theological schools. The Roman Catholic people themselves do not ask them, and, therefore, I do not see why they should be forced upon them. This is a new country, and in a new country we should be very careful what groundwork we lay down, and we should examine very critically into the question of allowing these theologians of any denomination to control our schools, for the seed planted in early days is very hard to eradicate in later years. I maintain that separate schools are contrary to the principles of responsible government. Responsible government recognizes the individuality of each citizen and separate schools train the youth of the land, not to recognize that individuality which is necessary for true citizenship. Therefore, I maintain that children trained in separate schools are not likely to be as good or as loyal citizens, ready to sacrifice their whole independence for the country, as those trained in public schools. Another point. I am pleased to say that not only do we find several branches of the Christian church to-day denying the right of the state directly or indirectly to recognize any church, but we find many individuals in other religious bodies which do not take the same stand, stepping out and refusing to accept from the state any recognition of churches. I trust that it will not be long before all the churches, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, will take the same line, and agree to abolish separate schools, not only in the North-west, but in these provinces. Another point. In separate schools the control of the youth is abdicated to the theologians—there is no getting round that point—and in that way the children are brought up not to recognize the parental authority and the state authority as supreme, but to recognize the church as overshadowing both the state and the home, and as the great fountain of authority. The church to-day has a high recognition, owing to the respect we all show the clergy, from the position they occupy: and if their doctrines are as they should be, they should not ask for more. They have a certain amount of superstitious regard—I do not use the word improperly—tendered to them by people of all denominations, so that the utterances from the clergy go further, and are received with less criticism, than the utterances of ordinary citizens. Therefore, I maintain that they should not ask for any special privilege in relation to the schools of this country, on account of the position they already hold in the minds of the people. Separate schools, Sir, create a nation inside of a nation. Before separate schools existed in this country the youth of all creeds and doctrines were loyal to the core; but to-day we find, unfortunately, springing up in various localities a spirit which looks to the church before it looks to the state. In other words, we find the ultramontane spirit growing up in many parts of Canada to-day, and recognizing the Government of Canada, not as the paramount authority, but as secondary to other authorities. Another point is this: If one creed has separate schools, then all must have them. The schools of the North-west are wrong, even on the basis of separate schools, for they are recognized simply as Protestant and Roman Catholic schools. But if one creed is entitled to separate schools, then all are: the Methodist, the Presbyterian, the Anglican, the Baptist and all other denominations have an equal right to demand them. Therefore, I maintain that the present basis for separate schools, if separate schools are to be recognized, is entirely wrong. I advance these arguments to show the absurdity of the whole principle of separate schools. Now, there is another aspect of this matter. If the older provinces seek to force the system of separate schools on the North-west Territories, I feel satisfied that the day is not far distant when those territories will be peopled with a race that will not tolerate separate schools. It does not require much of a prophet to foresee that in the near future the North-west Territories will have a much more predominant population than they have to-day, and it is well for us in the older provinces to consider, if we seek to impose separate schools on the people of those territories at the present time, whether they will not in the near future come down here and say: We will abolish your separate schools. In other words, they may retaliate in the coming years, as I have no doubt they will in any event. Another important point is this: Every session in Canada, so long as I remember, we have found one province arrayed against another and one theology against another, owing to this creed interference in state affairs, and, Sir, look at it as you will, get round it as you may, compromise as you will, and concede any point you deem it necessary to concede, the question of these theological differences is eternally cropping up in this country. I maintain that the true position is that every man should, as I trust every man does, worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and that there should be entire separation of church and state in all matters, and that can only be brought about by abolishing all separate schools. Another objection to separate schools is this: You may remember that the American revolutionary war was brought about because the people were taxed without representation. They were free men, and they refused to pay taxes without representation. The contrary principle, I maintain, should hold good, that no taxation should carry with it no representation. We find, however, that the separate schools in Ontario, and also in the North-west, are governed by the clergy, and the clergy in both Ontario and the North-west are exempt from taxation. Therefore, we find a set of men, we may almost say a sovereign body, governing without being taxed. That principle is wrong. We also find the other principle in this fact: that the Roman Catholic people of the country are taxed, while they have not their share of representation in the government of these schools. Another very important point is this: We find that these Roman Catholic schools are almost entirely under the control of church orders. That undoubtedly closes many avenues of life to young men and young women of the Roman Catholic faith. These people have not the same privileges in the way of rising in the world as their Protestant fellow-citizens. We find our Protestant young men and women engaging in the teaching profession and becoming ornaments of society; while in almost all these Roman Catholic schools the teaching is done largely by members of church orders, and this closes that important avenue to young men and young women of that faith. I could go further; but I will not take up the time of the House with any more arguments on this subject. I am well aware, Sir, that any man who stands up and differs in the slightest degree from those who favour separate schools, or attempts to put the brake on theological interference in the control of the community, will be called intolerant, and have the finger of scorn pointed at him. However, although I do not expect, I may inform the House, my amendment to carry just at present, I am satisfied that the day is not far distant when the question of the separation of State and Church will be one of the live issues of this Dominion. I am satisfied that the people will rise above all petty matters and advantages that are now flung around this, and will recognize no man's creed but look on him simply as a citizen of Canada. That is the only true basis here, I care not what a man's creed may be, but only what his politics are. I have set an example of this in my political career. So long as a man stands forth and takes a straight line in relation to public affairs, I shall support him, irrespective of what religious creed he may profess in his private life. But once I find a community governed by theological opinions, or questions of state made subservient to questions of theological concern, then I must respectfully beg to express my opposition to that state of affairs. We are all citizens of Canada and should stand forth as such, and place ourselves on record before the country as public men, and not as members of any religious organization. I therefore beg to move the following amendment:—

That all the words in the amendment be struck out and the following inserted instead thereof: "That the said Bill be not now read the third time, but: recognizing, that the fullest powers relating to education, consistent with the well-being of the Dominion of Canada as a whole should be conferred on the provincial and territorial Legislatures; and that those powers should involve the training of the youth:—

(1.) Intellectually, that each one may know how to read, write, cipher and be instructed in geography, history, language and literature.

(2.) Physically, that there may be sound bodies for sound minds.

(3.) Politically, that each one may understand the duties and rights of citizenship, and be familiar with the various educational, judicial, municipal, provincial and federal forms, powers and functions of government in Canada.

(4.) Ethically or morally, that each may know right from wrong, and understand man's duty towards his fellow man.

And further recognizing that from a national view-point it is wrong and contrary to the spirit of responsible government to confer upon a provincial or territorial Legislature, authority to establish or to enact to establish a system of separate or denominational schools wherein theology or creed may be taught.

That the Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House with instructions to amend section 14, subsection 1, of the North-west Territories Act by omitting all the words in the subsection after the words "provided that" in line 3, and inserting the following: "No authority shall be vested in the Lieutenant-Governor in Council or the Legislative Assembly of the Territories to pass ordinances or to enact laws permitting or authorizing or recognizing the teaching or the practising of any creed, or theology, or sectarian forms in any educational institution receiving public support, and that separate or denominational schools supported in whole or in part by public taxation or receiving any support from national, provincial, territorial, municipal or local taxation may not be established."

In moving that amendment I do not for a moment profess that I will receive much support in this House. I would be very much surprised if I did. But whoever lives to stand on the floor of this House in the near future, will find that the sentiments embodied in that resolution, are the sentiments that will carry, not only on the floor of this House but in the Dominion of Canada.

Amendment negatived.

And the question being put on the amendment.

Mr. AMYOT. I shall only detain the House for a very few moments. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) asks that full liberty be given to the North-west Territories to legislate in the matter of the schools. I am glad he has put the question so clearly and distinctly. The hon. gentleman quoted section 93 of the Confederation Act, and I admit the interpretation he gave to it. He has admitted that that clause gives forever to the provinces, which will enter into the Dominion, the right to separate schools. But he says that since we have given to the North-west Territories nearly all the rights which we have given to the other provinces, we ought also to give it the control over education. That is, if I understand it rightly, the stand the hon. gentleman has taken. The reason, Mr. Speaker, is this—and I am surprised that it is not more generally understood by the adversaries of separate schools—that when we established Confederation we established the autonomy of the provinces, guaranteeing to the provinces exclusive right and control of all matters assigned to them. But, so far as education is concerned, we have extended the principle of autonomy further yet, we have extended it to the father of the family, and have virtually declared that each father of a family shall be the supreme master of his children, and may send them to the school that pleases him. To make certain that the Local Legislatures shall not use their majorities to infringe upon the privilege of the father of the family, we, the Parliament of Canada, have remained the trustees and guardians of his rights. We cannot interfere with the provinces in matters assigned to them, but in relation to education, the principle is extended further and it is for us to see that the rights of the father of the family are protected. Does the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) understand me?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. AMYOT. In matters of education, for fear some ill-advised people, bigots or fanatics, moved by whatever motives, should try to deprive the father of the family of his sacred right to educate his children as he pleases, we have constituted the Parliament of Canada the protector of that right. So that upon us is thrown the moral obligation and duty of preventing the provinces from taking the money of the parents to teach their children in any other language or religion than that which the parents desire. I am glad the hon. member has admitted that this section applies to the whole of the Dominion not only as it was originally constituted but as it was intended to be constituted later on, and will even apply to Keewatin district when it is made a province. The preamble of the Act says:

And whereas it is expedient that provision be made for the eventual admission into the Union of other parts of British North America.

And if the hon. gentleman reads section 146 he will see that provision was made for the admission of Rupert's Land and the North-west Territories, which included the present province of Manitoba, and it was provided that this should be on such terms and conditions in each case as are in the addresses expressed and as the Queen thinks fit to approve, subject to the provisions of this Act. I will add only one word. The hon. member for North Simcoe must remember that by this House and by the Senate of Canada it was promised most faithfully that the Parliament of Canada would be ready to provide that the legal rights of any corporation, company or individual within the same shall be respected and placed under the protection of courts of competent jurisdiction. One of these rights was the right of education and another was the right to speak French or English. The hon. gentleman knows that all the Acts concerning Manitoba and the North-west have referred to the British North America Act and to that address of both Houses. I remember that at that time some doubts were expressed as to the meaning of the phrase, but does the hon. gentleman not remember the interpretation that Lord Granville gives it in his letter to Sir John Young? I need not take the time of the House to read the letter I speak of. The hon. gentleman knows that in that letter it was solemnly affirmed that the language and the separate schools would be protected. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) is an honest man I am assured; he is a sincere man, and understanding that Confederation took place on that condition will he say now that it is fair that the majority, merely because they are a majority should refuse to be bound by the condition? Would we have induced these provinces to join the Confederation under false pretext? Let Canada not repeat here at Ottawa the miserable and contemptible tricks by which, in the province of Manitoba they have succeeded in abolishing for the present—for the present, but not for long—the separate schools and the French language. If Canada wants to be peaceful and prosperous let her give justice and due protection to every one. After all, of what does the hon. gentleman complain? He says the separate schools costs $100,000 a year. How much does it cost him? It costs us as much as it costs him. Does he think we would be glad to send our money there to educate the children in a manner contrary to the wishes of the parents? Are not the French-Canadians loyal? We want the British Empire to be prosperous, grand, to dominate the world; we want Canada to remain joined with England. We have the right to say that our forefathers assisted in keeping this domain for the Queen, and to-day we pretend to be the most devoted subjects of Her Majesty. Sir George Etienne Cartier declared that the last gun fired in defence of British supremacy in Canada would be fired by a French-Canadian. We are loyal subjects of the Queen, and we have the right to remain loyal as French-Canadians and as Catholics. The hon. gentleman need not be afraid; he will not find any traitors amongst us; he will never find us working against the Queen, because the Pope teaches us to respect constituted authority and to be faithful to the Queen. But we have these treaties and guarantees that these institutions shall be preserved; we have the honour of the Dominion pledged. Can we not depend upon that? The hon. gentleman says he approaches this question in a cool way. I may set fire to my neighbour's house in a cool way, but that does not justify my act. I shall not go into details or take the time of the House, but I say that in matters of education autonomy has been granted to the father of the family, that the provinces have no right to interfere with him, and, if they do, the Parliament of Canada is bound under the treaty, in honour and, I might say in conscience, to interfere and protect him. Then let us not for a moment enact a law that will deny those vested and sacred rights.

Mr. LAURIER. This is a subject which, as we all know from past experience whenever it has been brought before the House, is liable to create a great deal of excitement and even of bitterness. I am sure that the House must feel happy that the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), in introducing this subject to our attention to-day, has done so in a speech certainly remarkable for its moderation and its temperate tone. For my part, while differing in toto from the hon. gentleman in the conclusions to which I arrive upon this question, I may say that I shall try and emulate the moderation with which he has approached it. The hon. gentleman, in his opening remarks, said that the legislation which is now on the Statute-book concerning the subject of education in the North-west Territories, is extraordinary and unprecedented. I admit at once that it is extraordinary, but I do not at all admit that it is unprecedented. It is certainly extraordinary, and I agree with him in his statement that the subject of education is one which, by its very nature, should pertain to the Local Legislatures. This was the case at the time Confederation was discussed in 1864, and it is equally the case in 1894; and we may ask ourselves why was this extraordinary legislation adopted in 1875. We may well ask ourselves, what is the reason which induced the Parliament of Canada, when dealing with the question in 1875, while granting local powers to the North-west Territory, to deprive the Legislature which was then created of a power which must be admitted is essentially of a local nature? Here comes the precedent. The legislation, as my hon. friend knows, was not unprecedented. The Legislature was deprived of its supremacy in matters of education in order to make that Legislature conform to the other provinces in respect to the powers relating to the subject of education; it was made to conform to the two largest provinces of the Dominion in respect to that matter. My hon. friend knows as well as I do that in that respect the Legislature of the North-west Territories was placed upon absolutely the same footing as the Legislature of Quebec and the Legislature of Ontario. Again, we may ask the question why the Legislatures of Upper and Lower Canada were deprived, at the time Confederation was discussed, of their control over the matter of education. The reason everybody knows. It is a matter of history that when in 1864 the idea of Confederation, which up to that time had been a misty and hazy one, at last took something like a practical and tangible shape, the old provinces of Upper and Lower Canada had been convulsed by an agitation over the question of separate schools. True it is, that the Protestant minority of Lower Canada had enjoyed for more than thirty years the privilege of having its own schools without any interference from the majority; and it was only in the year before that the long agitation had been settled in Upper Canada by granting to the minority of that province the same privileges which had been granted to the minority in Lower Canada more than twenty years before. It is also a matter of history that of all the leaders of public opinion at that time, Mr. George Brown was among the most uncompromising opponents of separate schools. It is also a matter of history that if there was any man who, more than another, contributed to shape the events which made Confederation possible, that man was Mr. Brown; but it is also a matter of history that in his anxiety to make Confederation a success, and to anchor the new scheme in the affections of the people, Mr. Brown did not hesitate at that time to sink his own opinion on the question of separate schools, and consented to deprive the Local Legislature of his own province of supremacy over the question of separate schools. Let me here quote the language of Mr. Brown in regard to that question. The quotation may be a little lengthy, but I believe it is quite apposite to the subject we have in hand. After showing the advantages which Ontario was to obtain from having control over its own local affairs, Mr. Brown, in the Confederation Debates, spoke as follows:—

But, I may be told, that to this general principle of placing all local matters under local control, an exception has been made with regard to common schools.

Mr. Brown here quoted the clause about education in the resolutions of the Quebec Conference:

Education: saving the rights and privileges which the Protestant or Catholic majority in both Canadas may possess as to their denominational schools, at the time when the Union goes into operation.

Then, Mr. Brown goes on to say:

Now, I need hardly remind the House that I have always opposed and continue to oppose the system of sectarian education so far as the public chest is concerned. I have never had any hesitation on that point. I have never been able to see why all the people of the province, to whatever sect they may belong, should not send their children to the same common schools to receive the ordinary branches of instruction. I regard the parent and the pastor as the best religious instructors—and so long as the religious faith of the children is uninterfered with, and ample opportunity afforded to the clergy to give religious instruction to the children of their flocks, I cannot conceive any sound objection to mixed schools. But while in the Conference and elsewhere I have always maintained this view, and always given my vote against sectarian public schools, I am bound to admit, as I have always admitted, that the sectarian system, carried to the limited extent it has yet been in Upper Canada, and confined as it chiefly is to cities and towns, has not been a very great practical injury. The real cause of alarm was that the admission of the sectarian principle was there, and that at any moment it might be extended to such a degree as to split up our school system altogether. There are but a hundred separate schools in Upper Canada, out of some four thousand, and all Roman Catholic. But if the Roman Catholics are entitled to separate schools and to go on extending their operations, so are the members of the Church of England, the Presbyterians, the Methodists, and all other sects. No candid Roman Catholic will deny this for a moment; and there lay the great danger to our educational fabric, that the separate system might gradually extend itself until the whole country was studded with nurseries of sectarianism, most hurtful to the best interests of the province and entailing an enormous expense to sustain the hosts of teachers that so prodigal a system of public instruction must inevitably entail. Now, it is known to every honourable member of this House that an Act was passed in 1863, as a final settlement of this sectarian controversy. I was not in Quebec at the time, but if I had been here, I would have voted against that Bill, because it extended the facilities for establishing separate schools. It had, however, this good feature, that it was accepted by the Roman Catholic authorities, and carried through Parliament as a final compromise of the question in Upper Canada. When, therefore, it was proposed that a provision should be inserted in the Confederation scheme to bind that compact of 1863, and declare it a final settlement, so that we should not be compelled, as we have been since 1849, to stand constantly to our arms, awaiting fresh attacks upon our common school system, the proposition seemed to me one that was not rashly to be rejected.

Mr. LAURIER.

I admit that, from my point of view, this is a blot on the scheme before the House, it is confessedly one of the concession from our side that had been made to secure this great measure of reform. But assuredly I for one have not the slightest hesitation in accepting it as a necessary condition of the scheme of union, and doubly acceptable must it be in the eyes of hon. gentlemen opposite, who were the authors of the Bill of 1863. But it was urged that though this arrangement might perhaps be fair as regards Upper Canada, it was not so as regards Lower Canada, for there were matters of which the British population have long complained and some amendments to the existing School Act were required to secure them equal justice. Well, when this point was raised gentlemen of all parties in Lower Canada at once expressed themselves prepared to treat it in a frank and conciliatory manner, with a view to removing any injustice that might be shown to exist; and on this understanding the educational clause was adopted by the Conference.

And here I am pleased to say that so far as the Protestant minority of Quebec are concerned, the pledges given at the Quebec Conference have been amply and fully redeemed since Confederation has been established. One of the first acts done by the Local Legislature in 1861 was to pass a law, which has proved satisfactory to the Protestant minority ever since. I call my hon. friend's attention to this. Mr. Brown was no more than is my hon. friend an advocate of a separate school system—Mr. Brown was just as thoroughly an opponent of that system. He said, just as does the hon. gentleman, it is a blot on our system. But for all that, strong as was the objection of Mr. Brown to the separate school system, in order to secure peace and harmony, and in order to carry out this great scheme of Confederation, he consented to sink his own personal views on education, and I ask why not every patriot, with a view to secure the same result, adopt the same course as Mr. Brown did then? Such was the position in 1875, when the Territories were organized. The question then sprung up, and I well recollect what took place at that time. When Mr. Mackenzie introduced the Bill there were no provisions in it regarding the question of education. As soon as the Premier sat down, Mr. Blake, who was not a member of the Government at that time, but was a prominent supporter of the Administration, rose and made some remarks. Speaking of the general power of the Legislature, he went on to say:

It give the Council all the powers practically enjoyed by this Parliament and the Local Legislatures together; and it would be proper to restrict and define their powers in all matters connected with municipal government, and provision should be made at the earliest possible moment for municipal institutions, local taxation, and improvements. He regarded it as essential under the circumstances of the country, and in view of the deliberation during the last few days (referring to the New Brunswick school question) that a general principle should be laid down in the Bill with respect to public instruction. He did believe that we ought not to introduce in that Territory, the heart-burnings and difficulties with which certain other portions of this Dominion and other countries had been afflicted. It seemed to him, having regard to the fact that, as far as we could expect at present, the general character of that population would be somewhat analogous to the population of Ontario, that there should be some provision in the constitution by which they should have conferred upon them the same rights and privileges in regard to religious instruction as those possessed by the people of the province of Ontario. The principle of local self-government and the settling of the question of public instruction, it seemed to him, ought to be the cardinal principles of the measure.

This proposition was introduced by Mr. Blake. How was it accepted by the House at that time?

Mr. McCARTHY. In what year was that?

Mr. LAURIER. In 1875, at the time that the Bill for the organization of the Territories was introduced. Mr. Mackenzie, who was in charge of the measure, rose immediately after Mr. Blake, and answered him in the following terms:—

As to the subject of public instruction, it did not in the first place attract his attention, but when he came to the subject of local taxation he was reminded of it. Not having had time before to insert a clause on the subject, he proposed to do so when the Bill was in committee. The clause provided that the Lieutenant Governor, by and with the consent of his Council or Assembly, as the case might be, should pass all necessary ordinances in respect of education, but it would be especially provided that the majority of the ratepayers might establish such schools and impose such necessary assessments as they might think fit, and that the minority of the ratepayers, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, might establish separate schools, and such ratepayers would be liable only to such educational assessment as they might impose upon themselves. This, he hoped, would meet the objection offered by the hon. member for South Bruce.

I may say that these observations were received without a word of dissent from any hon. member on either side of the House, and when the Bill was in committee, Mr. Mackenzie introduced the following amendment:—

Provided further that when and so soon as any electoral district shall be established as hereinafter provided the Lieut.-Governor, by and with the consent of the Council or Assembly as the case may be, shall have power to pass ordinances for raising within such district by direct taxation or by shop, saloon, tavern, or any other licenses, a revenue for local and municipal purposes for such district and for the collection and appropriation of the same.

When and so soon as any system of taxation shall be adopted in any district or portion of the North-west Territories, the Lieut.-Governor and Council or Assembly as the case may be, shall pass all necessary ordinances in respect of education, and it shall therein always be provided that a majority of ratepayers in any district may establish such schools therein as they may think fit and make the necessary assessment and rates therefor, and further that the minority of ratepayers therein, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, may establish separate schools therein.

This provision was introduced at that time. Not a word of dissent was expressed. It became the law of the country, and is the law of the country to-day, and this is the provision which the hon. gentleman desires to remove from the Statute-book. I will not discuss with the hon. gentleman here or anywhere else at present, at all events, the subject of separate schools. There are different views as to those schools. This question does not, however, come up for discussion on the floor of this House to-day. I have noted all the objections brought forward to the separate school system in the North-west. It is alleged that it is very expensive, more expensive than the system of public schools. So be it—I will not discuss the matter with the hon. gentleman. Let me, however, observe this, that if the system of separate schools is more expensive than the system of public schools, the minority will suffer, and not the majority, in fact, it will be so much worse for the minority; but if the minority are willing to pay that price in order to have their own schools and their own system of education, why should this be a matter of offence, or a subject even of objection on the part of the majority? But I will not discuss the question with the hon. gentleman, and I will not discuss the objections he has raised. I ask: Is it advisable, let separate schools be objectionable, they cannot be more objectionable to-day than they were in 1876, or in 1864, when Confederation took place—they are just the same now as they were then—is it advisable, in view of our present condition, in the hope we entertain of forming a nation on this continent, because after all that is the hope we entertain to-day—is it advisable, entertaining, as we do that hope, to go back to the old heart-burnings, which Mr. Brown declared to exist in 1864, and open up again the question to agitation which we had hoped was finally closed at that time? I know very well there are men, I will not say in this House, but in the province of Ontario, and perhaps elsewhere, who would be pleased to have the door opened to that agitation and have the whole system of separate schools discussed again, not as regards the Territories, but also as regards the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Well, there may be two sides to this question. Looking at the press of Ontario we find this idea expressed: but the question was discussed before, and when it came to be discussed practically by practical men, it was found advisable to allow matters to remain as they are at the present time, and allow a minority to have separate schools where they desire them. My hon. friend has surely not forgotten the convention of the Equal Rights Association, which sat in Toronto in June, 1889. Among the other subjects that were discussed there was this very question of separate schools. Mr. J. L. Hughes moved the following resolution:—

Mr. EDGAR. He is a brother of the member for Victoria.

Mr. LAURIER. I did not know he was related. However, Mr. J. L. Hughes is well known in the city of Toronto, and he moved the following resolution:—

We record our approval of our national system of free education in this province, and we insist that every ratepayer should be deemed a supporter of the public school, unless he himself, of his own free will, signifies his desire to be ranked as a supporter of separate schools, and that the Act should be so amended as to be explicit on this point.

This resolution, moved by Mr. Hughes, was not satisfactory to a certain number of delegates there, and Mr. D. W. Clendenning, seconded by Mr. Holmes, moved an amendment to the resolution, as follows:—

That the system of separate schools was a standing menace to the civil and religious liberties of Canada.

Mr. A. F. Campbell then moved an amendment to the amendment:

That the separate schools system was not an institution which it was desirable to allow to grow up in the country.

I have just heard these very words from my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who has told us that separate schools were a menace to the country. The subject came to be debated, and there was in that convention a gentleman whose name is a household word to the province of Ontario, I mean Professor Cavan, a man of sterling worth, a man of unspotted character and of great breadth of thought. Principal Cavan, speaking on the amendment and sub-amendment, used the following language:—

Principal Cavan said that he was entirely in sympathy with those who opposed separate schools. The separate schools, most unfortunately, were guaranteed by the Act of Confederation, when this question had been thoroughly taken into account. There was another thing. Their Protestant brethren in Lower Canada had also in some sense the system of separate schools, and they must take extreme care they did "not take ground that would be injurious to their brethren in the province of Quebec. The resolution before the chair was framed by gentlemen every one of whom was opposed to separate schools in Ontario, and he would never vote for it if it expressed by implication acquiescence in the separate schools, but they could not undertake at one stroke the entire reform of the Dominion. They had concentrated themselves upon one great and flagrant violation of the law of equality and they had better get that righted before attacking any bad feature in the constitution.

There was a representative from the province of Quebec also present at that meeting, Mr. Lee, of Sherbrooke, and he used the following language:—

Mr. Lee, Sherbrooke, said that the name proposed for this association was Equal Rights to all. In this agitation, what they asked for themselves, they must be willing to grant to others. He did not believe the separate schools system was a good one, but thought that if separate schools were taken from the Roman Catholics in Ontario, the majority in Quebec would demand that the Protestant schools be taken from the minority in that province. He did not think the convention could demand the abolition of separate schools in this province and ask that they be retained in Quebec.

Thereupon the question of separate schools was dropped by the convention. Now, Sir, I have no fear, for my part, that there should ever arise an agitation in the province of Quebec for the removal of the separate schools of the Protestant minority; but, certainly, it is only fair to ask that what is granted in Quebec to the minority should also be granted to the minority elsewhere. It is not unfair to ask that the one measure of justice which prevails in one province should also prevail in the other provinces and territories. And so long as we agree to have separate schools anywhere, I see no reason why we should not agree to have them everywhere as they exist at the present time. It may be that the system of separate schools is not acceptable to the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy), but does he, or does anyone, expect that it is possible to form this nation if each one of us insists upon what he conceives to be the right, in any matter whatever? Is it possible to form a nation upon any other basis than the surrender of prejudice, of passion, of sentiment, or even of conviction, for the general good? The system which now prevails in this country may not be acceptable to the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy), but I would call his attention to the words which were pronounced upon the floor of the British Parliament upon one occasion by that master of political thought, Edmund Burke, an authority which ought to be acceptable everywhere. Burke once spoke these words:

In most questions of state there is a middle. There is something else than the mere alternative of absolute destruction and undeformed existence. This is, in my opinion, a rule of profound sense, and ought never to depart from the mind of an honest reformer. I cannot conceive how any man can have brought himself to that pitch of presumption, to consider his country as nothing but carte blanche upon which he may scribble whatever he pleases. A man full of warm, speculative benevolence may wish his society otherwise constituted than he finds it; but a good patriot and a true politician always considers how he shall make the most of the existing materials of his country. A disposition to preserve and an ability to improve, taken together would be my standard of a statesman. Everything else is vulgar in the conception, perilous in the execution.

Now, Sir, these words seem to me to apply to our country more than ever they applied to the United Kingdom. We have here a mixed community. As has been well expressed by the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot)—although I do not share his manner of expressing his views—we want to form a nation on this continent. I appeal to my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). He is English, and I am French; he is Protestant and I am Catholic. I call upon him and I call upon all Canadians, French or Catholic, Protestant or English, to sink a little of their preferences, of their prejudices, of their passions, of their sentiments, upon the altar of our common country. I will not detain the House at any length at this period of the session, and I believe it would be injudicious on my part to protract the discussion, although the subject is a tempting one. Again, I repeat: it is not the question of separate schools that I am discussing at this moment, it is simply the question of carrying on our system of Confederation upon the basis which was adopted in 1864, and maintained in 1875.

Mr. DALY. I do not intend to detain the House at any length, but possibly it is right that I should take some part in this discussion, seeing that the matter before the House is an amendment moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to a Bill which I have charge of, and more particularly from the fact, that I am the member of the Government representing the people of the North-west Territories in this House. I wish, Sir, to give the House a little history in connection with the government of the North-west Territories. Since these Territories were acquired by Canada, I find that the first Act for the temporary government of the North-west Territories and Rupert's Land, was passed in 1869. In that Act there is nothing as to schools. It would appear that a doubt arose after the passing of that Act as to whether or not its provisions were in the power of this Parliament, and subsequently in order to meet the objections which were raised, and to settle the question whether or not that Act of 1869 was within the power of this Parliament, legislation was obtained from the British Parliament, and the Act respecting the establishment of provinces in the Dominion of Canada was assented to by the Imperial Parliament on the 29th June, 1871. Section 1 of that Act says:

This Act may be cited for all purposes as the British North America Act of 1871.

Section 2 reads as follows:—

The Parliament of Canada may, from time to time, establish new provinces, in any of the territories, forming for the time being, part of the Dominion of Canada, but not included in any province thereof; and may, at the time of such establishment, make provision for the constitution and administration of any such province and for the passing of laws for the peace, order and good government of such province, and for its representation in the said parliament.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you will see from the provisions of that law, that this Parliament has been given power by the British North America Act of 1871 to, from time to time, establish new provinces in the Territories, and at the establishment of those provinces in the Territories make provision for the constitution and administration of such provinces. Up to the present moment, with the exception of the province of Manitoba, which was given its constitution by the Act known as the Manitoba Act of 1871, no provinces have been carved out of that vast territory. But no doubt the time will come—it may come very shortly—when the people of that country will come to this Parliament and say that the time has arrived when one or more provinces should be carved out of what is now known as the North-west Territories. Those Territories are now governed, as the House knows, under the laws passed by this Parliament from time to time, by a Territorial Legislature. Now, the British North America Act of 1871 confirms and makes valid the Act of 1869, which I have quoted. The next Act relating to the government of the Territories is an Act to make further provision for the government of the North-west Territories, chapter 16, 34 Victoria, 1871. There is nothing in that Act as to schools. Then, we come to chapter 5 of 36 Victoria, 1873, and there is nothing in that Act as to schools. The next is chapter 34 of 36 Victoria, 1873, an Act further to amend the Act to make further provision for the government of the North-west Territories; and there is nothing in that Act as to schools. Then, the next Act is chapter 49 of 38 Victoria, 1875, upon the introduction of which by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, the debate arose from which the hon. leader of the Opposition has quoted. Now, I may say for the information of the House, that the Bill introduced by Mr. Mackenzie was entitled "An Act to consolidate and amend the laws respecting the North-west Territories." On that occasion, Mr. Blake preceded what the hon. gentleman has read with the following language:—

The task which the Ministry has set for itself was the most important it was possible to conceive. To found primary institutions under which we hope to see hundreds of thousands, and the more sanguine among us think millions of men and families settled and flourishing was one of the noblest undertakings that could be entered upon by any legislative body, and that it was no small indication of the power and true position of this Dominion, that Parliament should be engaged to-day in that important task. He agreed with the hon. member from Kingston that the task was one that required time, consideration and deliberation, and they must take care that no false steps were made in such a work. He did not agree with that right hon. gentleman that the Government ought to repeal his errors. The right hon. gentleman had tried the institutions for the North-west Territories which he now asked the House to frame, and for the same reason as he had given to-day—that it would be better for the Dominion Government to keep matters in their own hands and decide what was best for the future. He (Mr. Blake,) believed that it was essential to our obtaining a large immigration to the North-west that we should tell the people beforehand what those rights were to be in the country in which we invited them to settle. It was interesting to the people to know that at the very earliest moment there was a sufficient aggregate of population within a reasonable distance, that aggregation would have a voice in the self-government of the territories, and he believed that the Dominion Government was wise, (although the measure might be brought down very late this session and it might be found impossible to give it due consideration) in determining in advance of settlement what the character of the institutions of the country should be in which we invite people to settle. He did not agree with the policy of asking people to settle in that western country, and tell them that a paternal government would look after them, and would give them such institutions as the Government thought suitable. We had better let the people know their fate politically and otherwise before they settle there. The task to be discharged now, or at some future time, was one of considerable importance. And amongst the difficulties was the determining of what the range of power the council would be in the first place, assuming that its character would be that of a mixed neminative and elective council, as he understood it would be, of the First Minister; the Council at a subsequent period assuming the position of a Legislative Assembly when the population was sufficient to entitle it to assume that position. He did not hear from the Honourable First Minister any distinct enunciation of the powers committed to the Council and afterwards to the Assembly. Looking over the Bill hastily, it seemed that the powers were amongst those of the British North America Act with respect to the peace, order and good government.

Then, in order to make my narrative complete, I would like to read the quotation from the same speech which has been read by the hon. leader of the Opposition:

He regarded it as essential under the circumstances of the country, and in view of the deliberation during the last few days that a general principle should be laid down in the Bill with respect to public instruction. He did believe that we ought not to introduce into that territory the heart-burnings and difficulties with which certain other portions of this Dominion and other countries had been afflicted. It seemed to him, having regard to the fact that, as far as we could expect at present the general character of that population would be somewhat analogous to the population of Ontario, that there should be some provision in the constitution by which they should have conferred upon them the same rights and privileges in regard to religious instruction as those possessed by the people of Ontario. The principles of local self-government and the settling of the question of public instruction it seemed to him ought to be the cardinal principles of the measures.

Then, the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, replying, said:

As to the subject of public instruction, it did not in the first place attract his attention, but when he came to the subject of local taxation he was reminded of it. Not having had time before to insert a clause on the subject, he proposed to do so when the Bill was in committee. The clause provided that the Lieutenant-Governor, by and with the consent of his council or assembly, as the case might be, should pass all necessary ordinances in respect of education, but it would be specially provided that the majority of the ratepayers might establish such schools and impose such necessary assessment as they might think fit; and that the minority of the ratepayers, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, might establish separate schools; and such ratepayers would be liable only to such educational assessments as they might impose upon themselves. This, he hoped, would meet the objection offered by the hon. member for South Bruce.

That took place on the 12th of March, 1875. The debate continued, and amongst others who spoke on the subject was the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills); but I see that no reference whatever was made by any of the other speakers to this question of the schools. On the 1st of April, 1875, we find that Mr. Mackenzie, when the Bill was in committee, with Mr. Moss in the Chair, introduced the resolution that was read by the hon. leader of the Opposition:

When and so soon as any system of taxation shall be adopted in any district or portion of the North-west Territories the Lieutenant-Governor and Council or Assembly, as the case may be, shall pass all necessary ordinances in respect of education, and it shall therein be always provided that a majority of ratepayers in any district may establish such schools therein as they may think fit and make the necessary assessment and rates therefore, and further that the minority of ratepayers therein whether Protestants or Roman Catholics may establish separate schools therein.

There was no other important amendment made, and the House sat in committee till six o'clock. After recess the discussion continued, it appears from the record, upon other matters. The Bill was reported and received its third reading on the following day, namely, the 2nd of April, without discussion. Now, Sir, from the reading of the language used by Mr. Blake on that occasion and the reply made to him by the then leader of the Government, Mr. Mackenzie, and considering that there was no dissenting voice in the House at the time that this amendment was proposed by Mr. Blake and accepted by Mr. Mackenzie, and subsequently embodied by him in legislation, it is clear that it was made deliberately and designedly, because, as Mr. Blake said in his speech, "it was essential to our obtaining a large immigration to the North-west that we should tell the people beforehand what those rights were to be in the country in which we invited them to settle." Now, it might be well to read what the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie's views were on the subject of separate schools. In the debate which took place on the motion of the hon. member for Victoria in reference to the New Brunswick School Act on the 10th of March, 1875, Mr. Mackenzie said :

In this particular instance, I may say, I believe in the secular system—I believe in free schools, in the non-denominational system, and if I could persuade my fellow-countrymen in Ontario or Quebec, or any other province to adopt that principle, it is the one I would give preference to above all others; but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact, that in all the provinces there is a very considerable number of people—in the province of Quebec indeed, a very large majority, who believe that the dogmas of religion should be taught in the public schools—that it has an intimate relationship with the morality of the people—that it is essential to their welfare as a people, that the doctrines of their church should be taught, and religious principles according to their theory of religious principles be instilled into the minds of their children at school. For many years after I held a seat in the Parliament of Canada I waged a war against the principle of separate schools. I hoped to be able, young and inexperienced in politics as I then was, to establish a system to which all would ultimately yield their assent. Sir, it was impracticable in operation and impossible in political contingencies; and consequently when the Confederation Act was passed in 1867, or rather when the Quebec resolutions were adopted in 1864 and 1865, which embodied the principle should be the law of the land, the Confederation took place under the compact then entered upon.

I heartily assented to that proposition, and supported it by speech and vote in the Confederation debates. And, sir, the same ground which led me on that occasion to give loyal assistance to the Confederation project, embracing as it did the scheme of having separate schools for Catholics in Ontario, and Protestants in Quebec, caused me to feel bound to extend at all events my sympathy, if I could not my active assistance, to those in other provinces who believed they were labouring under the same disability and suffering from the same grievance that the Catholics of Ontario complained of for many years.

In that extract Mr. Mackenzie lays down the views that were held, not only by himself, but by Protestants in Ontario then, and by Protestants, not alone in the Legislative Assembly, but in the House of Commons, and which are, I am sure, held to-day by people who are Protestants as Mr. Mackenzie was. Now, the question before the House is as to whether or not we should, by legislation at this time, by the amendment to the Bill now before the House, take away from the minority, or from the people of the North-west, who went in there and settled on the understanding and with the expectation that they would enjoy the rights given them by Mr. Mackenzie in 1875, and I confess my opinion is that it would not be right or just, so long as the territorial condition exists in that territory, so long as this Parliament governs that country as it does to-day, so long should the law remain as it is. But when the time comes, as it must come shortly—because the provisions of the Act of 1871, gives us the authority—for this Parliament to give a constitution to any province, or to any two provinces carved out of those Territories, then, and not till then, will the time come for this House to deal with this question of education. Nor would it be right or just that we should repeal clause 14 of the Act, as it now stands, giving the powers that were given by Mr. Mackenzie. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) tried to argue that by the legislation which was passed by this House in 1875 and by the continuation of that upon the statutes, we were riveting upon the people of the North-west Territories a separate school system for all time; and by way of strengthening his argument, the hon. gentleman quoted section 93 of the British North America Act. With deference to the hon. gentleman's opinion, I cannot see the application of section 93 in the way the hon. gentleman suggests. That section says :

Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege in respect to denominational schools which any class of persons may have by law in any province of the Union.

Now, we are not discussing law affecting any province of the Union at this time, but laws that were given by this Parliament by virtue of the Imperial Act of 1871, to the Territorial Assembly; and so far as section 3 of section 93 is concerned, in my opinion, the same argument would prevail. What do we find is the condition of things now? We find that, under the authority of the North-west Territories Act, section 14, Ordinances have been passed by the territorial legislature in reference to education, and we find that on the 31st December, 1892, an Ordinance was passed by that legislature which made considerable changes in the matter of education there. Up to that time, under the Ordinance immediately preceding, namely, the Ordinance of 1888, education in that country was governed by a Board of Education, which was composed of men representing both the majority and the minority. Under the Ordinance, the inspection of the different schools was made by inspectors appointed by the different sections of the Board of Education. But in 1892, by the Ordinance passed then, we find that the system of inspection now is similar, so far as all the schools are concerned. The inspectors are appointed by the Council of Public Instruction, or the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and they are appointed irrespective of their religion, to inspect all schools, whether separate or otherwise, in any portion of the district for which they are appointed. Objection was taken here, in a previous debate, to that Territorial Ordinance on the ground that by it separate schools were taken away from the minority. On the contrary, it is stated, and I think on good foundation, that, so far as separate schools are concerned, they continue to exist in that country to-day, to all intents and purposes, and it is only with regard to their inspection that any change has been made. And I think, in justice to the people who have gone into that country, under the Ordinance passed by virtue of section 14 of the Territories Act, and who established schools under that Ordinance, and subjected themselves to taxation for that purpose, believing that that law would prevail for all time to come, if would not be just or right for this Parliament now to take away, by one stroke of the pen, the rights of these people. But, when the time comes, as it may come soon, when the people of that country desire that one or more provinces shall be carved out of their territory, then it will be necessary for us to give a full constitution to such provinces, then, and not till then, will we be called on to deal with this question of education.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is not my intention to detain the House but for a brief period. I am not called upon, of course, to address myself to the subamendment of the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes), because that has already been disposed of, and I think that the vote of this House has shown that it is not easy to embrace eighteen hundred years' history of the world in a motion, and get for that motion the support of a very large number of representative men. Now, I have a few observations to make with regard to the speech of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I do not agree with the hon. gentleman in the view he has put forward as to the importance of conferring upon the people of the North-west Territories all the powers of self-government that are possessed by the people of the provinces. Such a course would be altogether at variance with what has transpired under representative institutions, wherever the English race has spread, and wherever English institutions prevail. We know that new colonies are being established and governors appointed to them, the instructions which are given these governors embrace a very much more limited area of legislation than in the case of colonies where there is a larger population existing, where society has become more complex and where there is a greater variety of interests to be dealt with. In fact, Sir, the growth of society does not differ very much from the growth of the individual. No one undertakes to put a minor in the full possession of his property and allow him to dispose of it just as he pleases, and, in the same way, no one undertakes to confer upon a new society all the powers that belong to a sovereign body. In these matters experience shows the wisdom and necessity of proper regulation. We must remember that the Territories are being peopled, so that, in a five-years term those interested in the government of the Territories are often very much smaller in number at the beginning of the term than at the close. And those who in the future, at no distant day, will be interested in the Territories, are under the jurisdiction of this Legislature and have a voice in moulding the legislation here, so that the interests and wishes of those who are to become inhabitants of the Territories are better represented than they would be if the matter was put into the control of those who are the first occupants of the Territories. It is for that reason that the House wisely kept control of this very important question when government was bestowed upon that country. If you look at that country to-day you will find they have not responsible government. In fact I am told by a number of the members from the Territories that the majority of the people would be opposed to responsible government. They confess their immaturity; they confess that their circumstances are such that it will not always be the case that, with responsible government, their control of larger matters would not be as great as through this House, in which they are represented in proportion to their numbers. So, I think, there was no ground of complaint as put forward by the hon. member for North Simcoe, that this House had retained for itself control over the subject of education, when, in 1875, the principle of representation was, to a limited extent, introduced into that country. Then,

Sir, the hon. gentleman might look to the experience of our neighbours. Take the case of the territories of the United States that have not sufficient population to entitle them to become states of the union, you will find that what they possess is determined by Congress and Congress is authorized to make all needful rules for the government of the territories. And the assumption throughout the territories and elsewhere ever since the Union has been that Congress could be more safely entrusted with the superintending control of that government than could the first settlers in the territory. Then, Sir, you have the fact that the Territories are the common property of the Dominion. They are held in trust, if I may use the expression, on behalf of all the provinces; and, that being so, this House has undertaken, in so far as it possesses control, to use that control with a view to producing as little friction as possible either with the interests or with the prejudices of the people, no matter what those interests or prejudices may be. Now, Sir, when you look at the subject of education prior to the union, you will find not that any system was expressly imposed upon the province, not that the principle of separate schools was virtually established, but the rule was established that where separate schools were established and had been established before the Union, they should remain, and where they were not established, the province should retain control over the subject to introduce them or prevent their introduction, as seemed proper to the people. We have a practical illustration of this fact in the position of things in the Maritime Provinces and the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. So far as the Territories were concerned—I do not at all admit that the introduction of separate schools there stands upon the same footing as the introduction of separate schools in the province of Ontario, or of dissentient schools in the province of Quebec. In these provinces they are protected under the constitution; they cannot be interfered with by the Local Legislature. But in the North-west Territories, as the hon. Minister has said, it has been a matter not of right, not of guarantee to any particular class of the population, but a matter of policy. They were introduced with a view of preventing conflict in this House upon the subject of separate schools and for the reason that they were introduced there they should be maintained as long as these Territories are under the control of this Parliament. When this Parliament has discharged its duties and when the people of these Territories have received the population to entitle them to enter the union they must assume the responsibility of deciding for themselves under the British North America Act how far they shall maintain the principle of separate schools or maintain the non-denominational system. Any attempt on our part whatever our inclinations of feelings may be to anticipate what ought to be done in that particular, by the province after its autonomy is established, instead of being a source of security to its institutions would be a source of the greatest danger. The hon. member for North Simcoe has referred to the fact that these separate schools in the North-west Territories are expensive, that it costs a very considerable sum to educate children in these schools. If the hon. member had looked at the returns of the schools of the whole North-west Territories, he would have found that there was very little difference in that respect between one class of schools and the other. I took the trouble of going into the accounts of the North-west Territories. I was anxious to get some information before the Public Accounts Committee on the subject, but have been unable to do so. Any one can see that the expenses have been very large, and I do not think it is because separate schools and public schools exist there, but it is that the people of that country had the means of education provided by grants from Parliament, and, therefore, they are not as economical as they would be if the money had been raised in the ordinary way through taxation of the people themselves. Now, the hon. member has said, and others hold that view, that it would be well if we could educate all our population in the same public schools. I at once accept that proposition, I say that, too, and I would be rejoiced if all our people could see alike and all accept the public schools as the only schools for the elementary education of our people. But, Sir, that is not the view taken by all the population. A very considerable number of our people wish to accompany secular with religious instruction. They believe that it is a matter of immense consequence, they hold strongly to that view, and they hold to that view so strongly that wherever they are able, they will establish parish schools instead of separate schools, if these are denied them; and they will educate their children in those schools and pay for their maintenance, besides contributing their portion of taxation to the maintenance of the public schools. Well, Sir, that is an expression of very strong feeling. Practical results show how strong that feeling is. Inquiry into the subject satisfies me, as I think it will satisfy any one who makes it, that if you take the centres of population in the United States, where a system of secular instruction prevails, and where there are no provisions for denominational schools to any extent as they exist with us in the province of Ontario, you will find that the percentage of children attending the parish schools in proportion to the number of that faith by whom those schools are supported, is greater than the percentage of children in the province of Ontario who are attending the separate schools, showing that you do not secure the object which you profess to have in view when you do away with separate schools and undertake to introduce the entire population into the public schools under a secular system. You do not accomplish that object; you do not accomplish another object. Under our separate school system in the province of Ontario we have the same examination, the same system of inspection, for the separate as for the public schools; and in that way we secure a fair standard for imparting that education which the community thinks the interests of the state, under a system of popular government, demand. Under the system of parish schools which must prevail where you have such institutions as those that are established in the United States, you have no such inspection, you have no such examinations. You cannot have; you cannot undertake to interfere with the affairs of the household and to say how well qualified the private teacher employed by the voluntary contributions of the parents, shall be to discharge the work in which he is engaged. So far as I have been able to examine those institutions, the great majority of the parish schools, say in the state of Michigan, where they exist, are altogether inferior in point of efficiency to the separate schools that are established in Ontario. Now, that being so, I think we ought, as public men, to look at practical results rather than at ideal notions of theoretical perfectibility, which we are not likely to attain, and which certainly has not been attained, but has proved a very great failure where an opposite system has been tried. But, however that may be, I think this is perfectly plain, that if we are not to make this House and this Parliament the arena of religious contention, if we are not to raise religion against religion and race against race in the national assembly of Canada, we must abstain from undertaking to make this a battle ground for a decision of the question as to whether in the Territories there shall be a system of wholly secular education or not. We leave that question, under the restrictions imposed by the Act of 1875, to the people of the Territories; and when they have obtained the maturity entitling them to representation as a province, then the Legislature of that province, subject to the provisions of section 93 of the British North America Act, subject to the restrictions which that Act imposes, must decide for themselves what system of education will be established there. I believe myself, if I were a voter, I would vote to establish the Ontario system in the Territories; but, not being a resident of the Territories, not expecting to be when they become a province, I must leave that question to them, because they are the parties who will be chiefly affected by the decision to which they come. Now, my hon. friend from

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) has spoken about the provisions of section 146 of the British North America Act, arguing, as I understand him, that the question has already been decided in that Territory, not by this Parliament, but by the terms of the British North America Act itself. I do not see that. By section 146 of the British North America Act it was open to us when we acquired that Territory, and when we acquired the Territory now constituting the province of Manitoba along with it—I say it was open to us to set out in our application for the acquisition of the territory, the terms and conditions upon which it was to be governed. The Act contemplated our doing so, the Act contemplated our stating with what population any portion of that territory should become a province. We did not do that, we acquired the territory without setting out any terms and conditions within the meaning that it was necessary to put upon these words in the Act. And while we may have power to govern it as colonies, as provinces of the Dominion, we had no power to constitute a province or to admit that province to the Union, we had no power to make a federal union with provinces that were already united. And so when Manitoba was admitted to the Union, that was so apparent, so obvious to every person who had carefully inquired into the matter, that Imperial legislation was necessary to consummate that object; and then amendments were sought to the British North America Act by the Act of 1871 for the purpose of enabling us to do in the future what we had not power to do at that time, what we had power to do if we had exercised the power when we obtained the admission of the territory, but not having done so, then our opportunity had passed altogether. Now, how is that territory to be governed when it is admitted to the Union? We cannot make terms and conditions that will alter the distribution of power, that is not the meaning of the terms and conditions. The terms and conditions mean the financial terms and conditions; but as to the distribution of power, that is determined by the Act, and the very words which provide that the Queen may by an Order in Council admit other territories, also provides that they shall be not inconsistent with the provisions of the Act. The distribution of power must be the same, the power to legislate on the subject of education must be the same in a province admitted from that territory that it is in a province already within the Union. If a province already within the Union had established separate schools, it has no power to take them away; but the Act does not contemplate applying that rule to a territory. When Ontario decided to adopt the school system it was established by her own act. The system of separate schools established in Quebec was established by her own act; it was done deliberately by the province, and when a province decided to establish a system of separate schools that system could only be got rid of by the act of the province.

Mr. AMYOT. Does the hon. gentleman attach no importance to the promises given by Lord Granville and Sir John Young ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I attach no importance to any one's promises ; I attach importance to the constitution itself. What the constitution decides is to govern us. We have decided at different times that this is the best means of securing the settlement of the country and its contentment, and of avoiding the differences and conflicting opinions on the subject of religion in this Parliament, and I believe we decided rightly. I see no reason why we should change that policy ; I believe it is the proper policy to pursue ; but it is not a compact under the terms of the British North America Act, as the terms entered into with the provinces of Ontario and Quebec constitute a compact. It is a matter of policy, as a matter of policy we have supported it, and as a matter of policy it is attacked by the resolution which the hon. gentleman has presented to the House to-day. If it was a constitutional rule irrevocable by this House the motion of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) would amount to nothing ; but everybody knows that if the motion of the hon. gentleman were adopted it would alter the policy we have pursued heretofore, which I believe we adopted in the public interest. When the people of the Territories or any portion of the Territories are sufficiently numerous to constitute a province, when, in fact, they attain their majority in regard to local matters, and when they propose to set up for themselves, this Parliament has no right to exercise control over them, no right to exercise any authority ; it can give good advice, but it has no right to give commands. But we are not dealing with the future. When the Territories have a sufficient population to entitle them to become a province, they must decide for themselves whether they will have separate schools or not. I have my view as to what will be the best decision for them to arrive at, but I must not impose on them my view as regards the present time as to how they should be governed after they have attained their majority. I think what we have before us is the Act of 1875. Shall we amend it in this particular—shall we go on as we are ? Mr. Speaker, I think we have difficulties enough without undertaking to create more, and I am perfectly sure this will be an additional one if we adopt the amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I am satisfied we would govern this country with less success. We would have additional toad's heads in the witch's cauldron. I do not know what might come of it, but certainly something more serious than we have at the present time. I differ widely with the Government on questions of public policy ; I differ with them on questions of tariff, on public expenditures, on schemes by which large sums of money are expended, on which I believe to be profitless enterprises, and I would like the people to have an opportunity of pronouncing their opinion upon these questions, and of dealing with them before we introduce other subjects, for my personal view is that an expression of public opinion upon them is very important. Talleyrand has said that this world comes before the next, and I agree with that opinion, and I prefer to settle those questions which affect our material well-being at this moment without interfering with other questions that might end in a cyclone.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am sure those who have followed the debate must realize that there is very little left to say, and I shall act accordingly by curtailing my observations. I listened attentively, as no doubt we all did, to the remarks of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) because this is one of the few occasions when we have had the opportunity to listen to the line of argument by which the hon. gentleman will endeavour to support his measure. I gathered from the observations of the hon. member that he assumed that the conferring of powers upon the Legislative Assembly of the North-west was entirely an arbitrary act, that we selected one or more powers, and added occasionally from time to time other powers, and the hon. gentleman therefore thought he felt justified in calling upon us to say what reasons should be given as to why this power, as to education, should not be added. I think, when we examine a little and reflect on the observations already made in the course of this debate, we shall see that it is for the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to establish a reason why we should make the change, and that he is not in a position to ask us why this power ought not to be added. Any one who reads the powers which have been given to the provinces by the British North America Act and contrasts them with the powers which have been given by this Parliament to the Legislature of the North-west Territories will perceive at a glance the difference which exists in the treatment of the two cases, the different provinces as compared with the Territories. In the British North America Act the British Parliament was dealing with provinces having provincial autonomy before the Act of Union, and the distribution of powers was simply to be a redistribution, in view of the fact that this Parliament was to be created and the Federal system to be established. In dealing with the Territories we were legislating from time to time for a country which was to remain, until provinces should be established under the legislative control of this Parliament. And what share did we give to the Territorial Legislature in regard to the matter of legislation ? We gave it a number of powers—a large number of the powers given by the British North America Act to the Provincial Legislatures. But mark the broad line of distinction which was drawn by this Parliament. Matters referring to the constitution of the Territories it was not to be in their power to change, for the reason that the constitution was to be in the hands of this Parliament to change from time to time. A province from the outset had the right of autonomous government. It had a responsible system of government. The Territories were not to have responsible government, they were not to have autonomy in that sense, but were to remain from day to day to be controlled by the Legislature here, and by Orders in Council issued by His Excellency and his advisers. Again, the provinces were to have the right to increase their debt from time to time. But, because of the very guardianship which we have over those Territories, the Legislature there were not allowed to incur any debt. One other important characteristic was to be considered in regard to the Territories while they were to remain in the Territorial condition, and that was in view of the peculiar circumstances of the Territories, the fact that we were inviting there all races, creeds and denominations, there was to be the widest toleration while the Territories existed. That was the corner-stone of the whole; the corner-stone which the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) proposes to remove, on the ground that there can be no good reason given for its existence. As the hon. leader of the Opposition has said to-night: no men knew better than those who were engaged in framing the Act of 1875, the difficulties which sectarian disputes might create in that new country. No one realized better the fact, that in so far as the population was to be gathered into the Territories from the older provinces, it was to be gathered from different races, and from amongst men who had strong lines of difference as regards religious belief. While the population should be going in there, and while the Territories should remain under our control, at least, there was to be the broadest toleration for every belief, and for the races, as regards worship, and as regards language and as regards instruction in the schools. Is it anything new for us to be told to-day that toleration was expensive, and that therefore we should not determine as our predecessors in 1875 determined, that the settlers should be allowed in that country to educate their children according to their religious convictions? Education now is not more expensive than it was then. They understood perfectly that as regards the welfare of these people, and the development of these Territories, there would be nothing so expensive and burdensome to Government as the want of ample toleration everywhere, whether as regards religious worship, religious education, or the language which the people should speak and in which they should legislate. That was the whole Territorial scheme. It was not therefore, an accidental and haphazard manner in which certain powers were dealt out indiscriminately from time to time; but there was a deliberate scheme framed for legislation with regard to the Territories which should—while they were in the Territorial condition—keep them not only under the control of this Parliament, but keep them governed upon principles consistent with the policy of this Parliament, a policy which this Parliament conceived to be the best adapted for the peopling of the Territories. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), after having challenged us to give the reasons why these powers should not be conferred, stated some reasons which would seem in his opinion to have justified a proposal to break up the system of the past. The first was: that while the population of the Territories only consisted of 66,000 persons, a little more than 13,000 of these profess the Roman Catholic belief, and his deduction from that is—if the fact admits of any deduction at all and if the hon. member will apply that fact to his proposal—that because only 13,000 persons have accepted the pledge and the good faith of this Parliament as to the maintenance of certain institutions there, namely, the right to educate their children according to their religious belief, it is a matter of no importance that we should break faith with these 13,000 people. It is just as much a matter of sound policy now as it was in 1875, that toleration should exist there, and that we should extend the broadest invitation to the people of different races and religions to come and settle there with a perfect sense of toleration; and it matters not how many people in the past have availed themselves of our invitation. The bad faith this Parliament would show in repealing a provision of that kind, while the Territorial system existed at least, would be just as great as if the population who availed themselves of our pledge and relied on that system to-day, were only thirteen, instead of 13,000. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) in the next stage of his argument said that it was an expensive thing to keep up a system of toleration, that it was an expensive thing to maintain separate schools. I have suggested to the House that the statesmen who framed the Act of 1875 knew as much, from their experience of the older provinces, about the expense of separate schools as we do now. The hon. gentleman's argument, if anything, was this: that the Roman Catholic schools of the North-west Territories are more expensive than the public and Protestant schools. The hon. gentleman did not complete his argument because he did not complete his facts by showing us what the facts are as regards the schools taken as a whole. He went on further to say that in consequence of the Catholic schools being attended by a smaller number of pupils, the average cost per head of the pupils was greater than in the Protestant schools. Where I thought the hon. member (Mr. McCarthy) did the greatest injustice to the question was, that he undertook to compare the cost, with the cost of education per pupil in the province of Ontario where conditions are as widely different as they possibly can be. Every one knows that sparseness of the settlement in the Territories, the high price which teachers have to be paid there, and other such conditions are peculiar to every community of the like kind. If the hon. gentleman had taken for example the statistics, not of the province of Ontario, but of the province of British Columbia, in parts where the like conditions exist, he would find that he had no word of reproach to utter as regards the cost of the separate schools in the North-west Territories. One of my hon. friends here has furnished me with the figures as regards the cost of education per pupil in the outlying districts of British Columbia, and just observe these results as compared with the results which the hon. member (Mr. McCarthy) read :

That is a comparison with a province where education is economically managed, and managed regardless of the separate school lines which are complained of as having introduced a want of economy in the North-west Territories. But, as pointed out by the leader of the Opposition, within the lines of our constitution, which provides that separate schools may be established and must be provided for there, we know that the regulation of the schools, as regards expenses and as regards management, is under the control of the Territorial Legislature, to-day, and if the schools are expensive under the present system, they are no more expensive than the Territorial Legislature has thought fit to make them. Now, there was one argument advanced by the hon. member for North Simcoe which has already been answered, but with respect to which I wish again to put the view we take ; because it would be a point of the greatest importance if the argument of the hon. gentleman were well founded. The hon. gentleman stated that one important reason why the system of separate schools in the Territories should be abolished, and abolished at once, was that by allowing it to remain we were riveting the system on the future provinces ; and the hon. gentleman relied on the provision of the British North America Act, which says : that nothing in the Act of any province—and he was referring to the provinces which might hereafter be established—should take away or prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have, by law, in the province at the time of the Union. The hon. gentleman's argument, of course, was that if this system were allowed to stand until provinces are created, we would, by force of the British North America Act, be unable to withdraw that system, and that it would be riveted on the provinces. As has been shown by the hon. member for Bothwell, the provisions of the British North America Act relate only to the provinces which were entering into the Union at that time, and to the provinces which were named in the last section of the Act as entitled to be admitted into the Union, and have no relation whatever to the provinces which are to be created out of the Territorial district of the country. That is clearly seen when we come to the British statute of 1871, which, for the first time, conferred the power on this Parliament to create provinces out of our territories, and, as the hon. Minister of the Interior has said, enables this Parliament to decide what the constitutions of those provinces shall be. We claim, therefore, that the constitutional system which was established with regard to schools and with regard to language in 1875 ought to be maintained for the same reasons as those which dictated its creation, and that this condition of affairs should last, at least, while the affairs of the Territories are under the control of this Parliament. What the constitution of the future provinces shall be, in view of the pledges which have been referred to, or in view of any other set of circumstances, will be for Parliament to decide when it decides to create those provinces. I hope, therefore, that the House will be careful to-day not to disturb the arrangement so wisely made in 1875, and which is as useful to the Territories now as it was then.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes while I state my views on this question. I am the more anxious to do this, as a few days ago I paired with a member of the Opposition, and so am not able to record my vote. I do not intend to try to answer any of the arguments which have been offered, or to defend any of the positions which have been taken; I merely wish to state my own position on the question, and to give my reasons for holding that position. If I did vote to-night, I would support the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). One of my reasons for doing so would be that the amendment proposes, as we have heard to-night, to leave this question entirely to the Legislature of the North-west Territories. Now, it has been taken for granted by a great many speakers that if this were done, separate schools in the Territories would be abolished. Of that I know nothing at all; but it does seem to me that if the members of that Legislature are competent to deal with the subjects which are committed to their care, they are equally competent to deal with the subject of education; and, for my part, I would vote to give them that authority. Now, why should this Parliament interfere in this matter at all? I think there is one very good reason, and that is that Parliament has interfered already. Parliament has imposed on those Territories, separate schools, and I think Parliament is the body to remove them. But it is said by some, and this is supposed to be a very strong argument: wait until a province is created. It has been replied to that by those who favour this amendment that if separate schools are allowed until that time, they will be forever fastened on that province by the constitution. That point I do not pretend to know anything about; but it did occur to me, in thinking on this question, that if separate schools were allowed by the constitution to remain in the Territories until that time, then the question of vested rights would be set up. I am satisfied of that in my own mind. Those who favoured separate schools, while they might have no legal right to set up that contention, would, no doubt, set it up, and I would not blame them for doing so. If I were in their position, I would do the same thing; and if the separate schools were allowed to remain until that time, their case would be a strong one. So that, apart from the question of law or the question of the constitution altogether, it appears to me that that is one strong argument why Parliament should act now. Then, it is said by some that, after all, everything that is wanted has, in effect, been accomplished by the Ordinances passed a year or two ago by the Legislature of the Territories. But I would point out that the right of that Legislature to do even that was questioned by those who are in favour of separate schools. A strong position was taken against the power of the North-west Legislature to enact those Ordinances, and the Government have been appealed to to veto them. And right here I want to say this: I give the Government great credit for the position they have taken on that question, and on the question of separate schools in Manitoba. I believe the Premier has done what he said he would do; he has stood by the constitution, and I admire him for doing it. There is no doubt that great pressure was brought to bear upon him to veto those Ordinances, and he has resisted that pressure, because on looking into the matter, he decided that the Legislature, in adopting them, was acting within its constitutional rights. So I give the Government credit for that; and, for myself, I may say that I have confidence that they will act in the same manner in the future. One reason why I would like the Government to act at present on this matter is that the longer they delay the more the difficulties increase. It is said by some—and I admit that there is a good deal of force in the argument—that the rights of minorities ought to be protected. But I ask myself, what are those rights? They are rights to what? And in asking that question I have to ask another, what does the state owe to the minority? To my mind, the answer is: a good, fair, secular education—that and nothing more. Would the minority lose that if this amendment were adopted? I answer no, if the public schools supported in part by the state were confined to their true object, in my mind, a secular education. I hold—I know I differ from some in this—that it is not the duty of the state to teach religion; that it is not the duty of the state to use the funds of the state to inculcate any particular tenets; and I apply that to all bodies. The duty of teaching religion, in my opinion, belongs, not to public schools, or to any schools supported in part by the state, but belongs to parents and churches. But, in any case, we know that the state would not prohibit separate schools. I merely mention this, because it is thought by some that in advocating the passage of this amendment, we say that there should be no separate schools. But the fact of the case is, not that the state would prohibit separate schools, but that the state would decline to aid them. As I said, I have no intention of taking up the time of the House at any length, but merely wish briefly to state my views. I want to say in conclusion that in advocating the passage of this amendment, I am not prompted by any hostility to the Roman Catholic religion or to Roman Catholics. All who know me and know my course in this House, know that, without my saying it; but as there is a feeling abroad in some parts of Ontario tending in that direction, I want to say publicly that I have no sympathy at all with any society which would ostracise a man because of his religion. That is my position. I am perfectly free from all bigotry. I do not ask whether this man or that is a Catholic or a Protestant, but whether he is a respectable fellow-citizen, and I advocate the passage of this amendment, not from any hostility to any sect or body of men, but because I believe it would be for the good of the country. These are my views. I wish to take this question out of the domain of Dominion politics. I would like to see these matters of separate schools and religious matters banished for ever from our policy. I do not know that that time will ever come, but I shall do my part to bring it about; and I would be glad to see the time when our schools would be all public schools and our children not separated into two different sections, but growing up in public schools all over the country. I do not know whether it is possible to have that time come, but I hope it will, and will do what I can to bring it about.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I will just begin with the last words from the last speaker. What rights have minorities? When this Parliament gave a constitution to Manitoba, the minority there, which was Protestant at the time, was protected in a broad and statesmanlike manner. At that time, the minority was comprised of Protestants for the majority was composed of Catholics. Again, when in 1875 these school provisions were introduced into the Canadian North-west Territories Act, the same state of things existed, and, therefore, this Parliament passed those provisions protecting the Protestant minority. But things have changed since. In Manitoba and the North-west Territories the minority has become the majority; and because this change has taken place, the minority has not any longer, as my hon. friend who has just spoken has said, any claims to protection. I was exceedingly pleased with the moderate speech made this evening by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). On the first occasion he brought this question before the House, we all remember the very obnoxious preamble which headed his Bill; and in his speech the hon. gentleman then made was very obnoxious to those who did not entertain the same views. I have since then noticed with pleasure that he has moderated his antagonism, and on this occasion he has been more moderate still, and I join with the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the Government in complimenting him on the very moderate way in which he introduced his resolution. The hon. leader of the Opposition, in the course of his remarks, read a copy of a resolution of proceedings that took place before the Equal Rights Association in Toronto. I have before me a few extracts from the speech which the hon. member for North Simcoe made before the same association in the city of Ottawa about the time it was started, and with the permission of the House I will read a few quotations from it. The hon. gentleman then said:

We have a record for eight months which no political party could boast of in a decade of years and if there are men among us now who want to go back to their old political alliance, I say shame on them. They ought to be satisfied with what we have accomplished in so short a time. What have we accomplished? Go to Manitoba, and what do we see there? Why, that province of Manitoba is going to deal, not only with the dual language question and the iniquitous Act which would fasten it upon them but with the separate schools. Do you tell me that the Equal Rights Association had nothing to do with that? Of course the feeling was there, the grievance existed, peoples minds had only to be directed to it, and the moment attention was drawn to it, the province of Manitoba rose to a man and declared: we want no dual language and away with separate schools. * * * I am glad to notice the Protestant minority of Quebec had waked up, and at an early day I hope to have the pleasure of addressing them in Montreal on that question. They all had their hands full. In Ontario they would have to do with the question of French teaching in the schools; in Manitoba they had the dual language to deal with; and in the North-west they had the same question. As soon as the work had been accomplished, they would then be in the same position to master the same difficulties in the province of Quebec.

This shows the animus that exists in raising this question from session to session. But that is not all. These remarks and those speeches that are repeated over and over again have their echo; and if to-day the people in the North-west Territories, who are anxious to retain their own separate schools, insist on being protected by the constitution, it is just because they are often and often again threatened with persecution. I will only cite as an instance an article that was published in the Moosomin 'Courier,' a paper published in Moosomin, N.W.T. This is entitled: 'One people, one language.' Speaking of Roman Catholics it says:

Are they a superior kind of people from the Protestants that they hold themselves aloof by having separate schools. To private schools, no one can object, but we must emphatically protest against separate schools being maintained by the Government for any denomination other than Protestants. Our motto is "One people, one country, one religion."

When such articles are published in the public press, is it a wonder that a minority so small as this is represented to be by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) should be alarmed and should look to this Parliament for protection, protection which we are in duty bound to give them? It has been contended that the British North America Act, the constitution under which we are governed, does not give us separate schools. It is true the constitution does not impose the system of separate schools, but it protects that system wherever it has existed prior to the entry of a province into Confederation or wherever it is afterwards created by the province. Therefore, I say that according to the spirit of the constitution such a system should exist, because the constitution protects it and, in fact, maintains it and renders it unassailable from the moment it has been established. It is true that there is a provision in the Constitutional Act whereby the constitution of a province can be amended by that province, but I claim that that provision does not apply to section 93, which deals with education, because that section is outside of the series of sections which come under the title "Constitution of the Provinces." The only amendments that a province can make to its constitution would be with respect to such clauses as come under the title of "Constitution of the Provinces." I do not wish to detain this House at this late hour of the night. I had made up my mind to extend my remarks much further, but I am something like the traveller whose satchel was stolen by some other passenger—all the arguments and good ideas that I had have been stolen from me by those who have previously spoken, and, therefore, I am left with nothing fresh or new to be offered to the House.

Mr. DENISON. I had no intention of speaking on this question, and should not have done so but for some remarks of the last speaker (Mr. LaRivière), and I intend to occupy but a short time. The hon. gentleman spoke of the Roman Catholics being in the majority in Manitoba some years ago. It so happened that I spent about a year of my life in Manitoba in 1870, and my recollection of the matter at that time is that the two classes, the Protestants and the Roman Catholics were about equal in number. At any rate we must not forget that up to that time the country had been ruled by the Hudson Bay Company, that it had been ruled as a Crown colony and that there were no rights such as it has been intimated they possessed by the member who last spoke. There was no such thing officially as the French language. Of course many of the people spoke it among themselves, and there was no wish to interfere with them in doing so, but the language was not recognized officially at least. It is true that in the case of rules that it might be necessary the French should understand, they were often published in French, but further than that the Hudson Bay Company paid no attention whatever to anything of that sort. The only rights the French people obtained were obtained subsequent to that, and were obtained through the Reil rebellion, and what followed. The hon. the leader of the Opposition, in reading from some of the remarks of the Hon. George Brown, tried to make a point of Mr. Brown's abandoning his contentions with regard to separate schools because he was in favour of carrying Confederation. No doubt that was a very good reason why the Hon. George Brown should abandon these views, to lose sight of this question in the greater question of bringing about the Confederation of this great Dominion. But this is an entirely different question. The question is not one of making a great Dominion; the question is what shall we do with these provinces we are about forming in the North-west, shall we start them with all the paraphernalia we have in Ontario and Quebec, or shall we start with a clean sheet and allow them to do as they please. As regards the language question, for my part—though it does not come in properly here, but what I shall say now may save me getting on my feet later—I should like to see the mover go even further than he has done, and, instead of leaving it to the people, declare that no other language shall be used except the English language. The reason is because we have there vast empty prairies, the population being sparse. If we allow the French language to be made an official language on account of 2 per cent of the population there is no earthly reason why we should not allow the same right to the German population who represent, I believe, more than 2 per cent. Then if so, the Scandinavians, who are nearly equal to the French in numbers, might fairly come to this House and ask us to give them the right to have the Swedish tongue spoken up there.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. What would you do with the English in Quebec?

Mr. DENISON. I am not referring to Quebec, because the French in Quebec have the right to speak their language by the constitution, and no one is talking of interfering with that. I am talking now about empty prairies, equal almost in size to Europe; and the question is, how are we going to start them out. Are we going to start them out as provinces speaking one language, or as provinces speaking perhaps half a dozen languages? I would like to say that I have received a telegram from Mr. W. F. Maclean, of East York, in which he asks me to state: "If present, I would vote with Mr. McCarthy. I am detained here."

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to say but very few words on this subject. I think the fact to some extent has been overlooked that we are dealing not only with the amendment of my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) but also with the expressed wish of the Legislative Assembly of the North-west Territories. Those who are opposed to the amendment, I think, have carefully avoided any reference to that fact; but it is an important fact, and I think that those who are asking to-night that the representatives elected by the people of the North-west Territories should be allowed the privilege of managing their own affairs in reference to education, as well as in reference to other matters, should not at all events be accused of intolerance. I confess I was a good deal surprised and a good deal hurt to hear the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government, speaking of those who advocate the views that he advocates, as those who are in favour of tolerance, thereby implying that the people of the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and British Columbia, who have not granted separate schools, have been intolerant, and that the people of the province of Ontario who disapprove of separate schools on principle, and who are in favour of the resolution of my hon. friend from North Simcoe, are also by implication intolerant. Now, I confess I was surprised and pained to hear the right hon. gentleman speak in that way. I think that those who conscientiously believe that separate schools are not for the benefit of the people of the North-west Territories, and who think that the people of the North-west Territories ought to have the right to say whether they wish for separate schools or not, should at all events be considered as tolerant as those who desire that separate schools should exist there, and are unwilling to let the people of the Territories decide for themselves. For my part I cannot see that there is any more intolerance in the former than in the latter view. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has spoken of our desiring to make this Parliament a battle ground for sectarian differences, and he spoke of our desiring to settle the question here whether there were to be separate schools in the North-west Territories. Now, surely my hon. friend was unintentionally unfair when he said so, because I am sure he did not wilfully mean to be unfair. There is no proposal that separate schools should be forced upon the people of the North-west Territories. No one is saying by this resolution whether there should be separate schools in the North-west Territories or not. The proposal of my hon. friend from North Simcoe is that the people of the North-west Territories should have the right to decide that matter for themselves, and that the petition of the Legislative Assembly should be granted by this House.

Mr. AMYOT. And deprive the minority of their privilege ?

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that the right the people of the North-west Territories are asking for has been exercised, as the hon. member for Bothwell himself admits, by the province of Quebec, has been exercised by the province of Ontario, by the province of Nova Scotia, by the province of New Brunswick, and in point of fact by all the provinces in the Dominion, because the province of Manitoba, so far, at all events, as the courts have decided, exercises the same privilege legally. Now, I think under these circumstances it is a little hard that we should be described as an intolerant party, or intolerant individuals. Now, one word with regard to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and if he will forgive me for what he may consider an impertinence, I will say that I exceedingly admired the speech that he delivered in the House to-night on this subject. But I wish to join issue with him on one point. He very eloquently told us what in his view was necessary to the building up of a nation ; he thought that in order to build up this nation we should have separate schools in the North-west Territories. His argument went so far as to say that there should always be separate schools there. I see my hon. friend is inclined to dissent. If I am not correct, I will withdraw the statement.

Mr. LAURIER. Go on.

Mr. McNEILL. But I understood very distinctly that his argument was that there should always be separate schools in the North-west. Now, I cannot agree with my hon. friend in thinking that that is the way to build up a nation. In the first place, I cannot agree with him in thinking that the best way to build up a nation is to have our children separated from one another and divided into classes, one being a Roman Catholic and the other a Protestant class. I am quite satisfied that the friendships of childhood, the friendships acquired by children working together in the same school and playing together in the same play-grounds, would in the course of a very few generations do more to cause sectarian feeling in this country to disappear than any other one thing that could be mentioned. I believe that I could point to sections in our own country to-day where the system pursued of educating these children together has done a great deal already to do away with these bitter sectarian feelings which unfortunately in some parts of the country do exist to-day. I would say further to my hon. friend that not only do I not believe that the dividing of children into separate camps in this way is a good means of building up a nation, but I can not agree with him that the policy of depriving the people of the North-west Territories, or the people of any province in this country, of the right to manage their own educational affairs, is one which, if persevered in, would effectually build up a nation in Canada. I think it would be a policy to cause heart-burning, to cause dissension, and thus to cause very great evil in this country.

Mr. DAVIN. I shall not at this late hour discuss at any length a subject which now has been exhaustively discussed. I wish to state, however, what I consider to be the question before the House. I do not think we have before the House the question of the relative merits of separate or public schools ; the question is whether it shall be left to the Legislative Assembly of the North-west to deal with the school question, to deal with what remains of the question as respects the use of the French language in the North-west Territories, which I may say here, as I have said once or twice before, is no question at all in the North-west Territories to-day. Suppose the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) succeeds in carrying his amendment, not one iota of result will be accomplished as regards the use or the disuse of the French language in the North-west Territories ; so we may pass that by as only a bubble question. However, that question has been raised outside this House, and put before the minds of the people, exciting with apprehension the minds of one class of the subjects of the Queen in one province, and filling the minds of another class of the subjects of the Queen in another province, with enthusiastic feeling or enthusiastic passion, more properly speaking, and making them think that they are engaged in a magnificent crusade, breaking down an awful arrangement that menaces the peace, and prosperity, and the very dignity of Canada. Now, the practical question is, whether or not the Legislative Assembly of the North-west Territories shall have power to deal with the schools. I entirely repudiate the assumption of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison), and the hon. gentleman who spoke at an earlier period, both of whom assumed that if the hon. gentleman's amendment were carried, the North-west Assembly would at once proceed to pass legislation doing away with separate schools. I exceedingly doubt whether the North-west Assembly would do anything of the kind, and, therefore, those hon. gentlemen who would vote for the motion of my hon. and learned friend to go into committee and pass these amendments, believing that thus they were doing away with separate schools, I say to them, and I know something of the temper of the North-west and of the temper of the North-west legislators, they may as well spare themselves the pains. It will be very gratifying to a large number of people in the North-west in case this House should decide not to accept the motion of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), to have such an authoritative declaration on the part of the Prime Minister, on the part of the Minister of Justice, a man who can speak on legal subjects with authority, to this effect that even if five, six or ten years hence the Territories should remain in their present state, yet when they come here, they will have the fullest freedom as to whether separate schools shall or shall not exist. Not only has the Prime Minister made that statement, but the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who can also speak on a subject like this with authority, has also made a similar statement to-night, and if on a future occasion this question is brought up, if to-morrow, or years hence we come to this Parliament assembled for the purpose of securing the admission of the Territories in the character of a province, it will not be possible, but that the dicta of those hon. and learned gentlemen shall have great weight.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I merely said that this Parliament would have complete control of the subject.

Mr. DAVIN. I apparently misunderstood the Premier. I understood the right hon. gentleman, as I have stated to the House. We have to consider this question, whether or not the Legislative Assembly of the Territories shall deal with this subject. I made a point of calling on an eminent ecclesiastic, whose recent death I deplore, to talk with him on this very subject; and I stated to him then, what I state here, that I believe that to give the Legislative Assembly of the Territories power to deal with this question would be far safer for the existence of the separate schools than to deprive it of that power. His Grace said to me that if, as regards the schools of Manitoba, they had thrown themselves on the Local Government and the Local Legislature, they would have been better off. I will give the House my reason. I do not think there exists in the Territories any such feeling against separate schools as there is against being deprived of the power to which they believe they are entitled in accordance with the spirit of the British North America Act. It is not merely this Parliament depriving them of this power, but when they are impressed with the idea that they are deprived of that power, not because the wisdom of Parliament suggests it, and that it is well they should be deprived of it, but because of an influence and force used by other branches of our federation, this irritates the Territories, just as it would irritate any province if menaced with the sentiments of another province. With respect to the argument of the hon. gentleman for St. Boniface (Mr. LaRivière), I may mention that Mr. Mercier used the same argument some years ago. He said: Beware as to what you do in the North-west, because we are deeply interested in that part of the Dominion—take care least we do not squeeze you Protestants in the province of Quebec.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I did not use that as an argument at all. I only made that, as a remark when the hon. gentleman opposite was speaking when he stated what should be done in the provinces. I asked what he would do in Quebec, applying his own argument.

Mr. DAVIN. If the hon. gentleman did not use the argument, Mr. Mercier used it.

Mr. AMYOT. No.

Mr. DAVIN. If this argument was never used, what was the meaning of the phrase "look at the minority in the province of Quebec?" The position as regards the minority in Quebec was brought about in accordance with legislation in which they themselves were concerned, and by which they have certain rights and are protected. The minority also in Ontario have certain rights in accordance with legislation in which they had something to say. But what has that to do with the question we have to consider in regard to the North-west Territories, namely: the time has now come to ask whether, looking at the number of our population and their intelligence, this provincial right to say what is desirable as to the character of our school system, should not be placed in the hands of the Legislature. There have been many questions raised here to-night which I would like to answer, if this were the time and the place, questions raised by the hon. gentleman in moving the amendment to the motion of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), questions of vital importance, and I am bound to say that it would be very interesting and might be even instructive to hon. gentlemen if we were to discuss some of those questions. That motion, if I may refer to it in passing, proposes to force on the Territories a denominational system, although the hon. gentleman spoke against that, and deprive them of every right which they claim on this question. The Territories do not want to be told that they must have a certain description of education, one that does not teach them anything about God but simply questions of duty between man and man. If there was time I should like to ask, where do you get the idea of duty if you banish the idea of religion? I do not think we could get the idea of a morality worthy the name unless it is founded on religion. But we must not go into these large questions. It would be interesting also to go into the whole educational question as regards purely secular education on which so much store is laid, and also with regard to the value of the education given in separate schools. I do not know what kind of education is given in the separate schools of the Catholics, or in the separate schools of the Protestants, for I have not had an opportunity of investigating it. But if a real religious education is given by either of them, side by side with a good secular education, I would infinitely prefer it for myself, or for any relative in whom I was concerned, to a mere secular education. I cannot, with any little knowledge I have of the curriculum, understand how any of the great questions that a man of any education has to grapple with, can be met without facing at every step the propositions of religion. You cannot climb the starry spiral of science without on every stair being confronted with the great postulates of religion. You cannot have a thorough education, in my opinion, without its having been also a religious education. But it may be said to me: holding the opinions that you do as to schools where no religion is taught, abhorring, as every man listens to me knows I abhor, these prejudices of race and religion, which so far as I have been able to judge from observation, excite people in proportion to their want of all depth in religion, and to their want of all knowledge of the race that they so spontaneously dislike or hate—if I abhor all that, why is it that I am ready to give over to the Legislative Assembly the power of dealing with the educational question? I will tell you, Sir: We live in an age of a wide suffrage; we live in a democratic community; we live in a time when the people rule; we live in a time when the majority is sacred, and when vox populi is actually vox dei. I do not say I would have preferred to have lived in another age, but finding myself in such a time I must live up to it. I live in a country and at a time where these things prevail, and I represent a constituency to whose opinions I am bound to pay some attention. I know nothing whatever about the teachings in the separate schools. Looking at the men I have seen coming from Protestant separate schools, and looking at the men I have seen come from Catholic separate schools, I find a commensurate and correlative prejudice in the minds of each. I find, as I have found, a Protestant taught to believe, for instance, that anybody holding Catholic tenets was predestined to eternal ruin, and I have found as strong prejudices in the minds of Catholics. I know nothing whatever about the schools, but the chief thing is that I stand, as Mr. Lowell makes one of his characters say: "I stand upon the constitution."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Suppose both should be right?

Mr. DAVIN. Well, now, my hon. friend must not give me riddles at five minutes past one in the morning. The question is simply this: whether or not we should give the Territories the power of dealing with this matter of schools. There is no question about language here at all. The added power would be welcome to the North-west. I shall, therefore, vote for the motion, but in voting for it I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am voting merely to place in the hands of the Assembly the power to deal with this question. I am not voting for or against separate schools, and as I explained to the House, I am not what you would call very strongly in favour of a public school education. Let me correct my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in one thing. In his speech he talked the whole time about the Protestant public schools. Sir, we have no Protestant public schools in the North-west Territories.

Mr. McCARTHY. Allow me to explain what I meant by that. I find that the Act says: the majority may establish a school, and I find that that majority may be either Protestant or Catholic, and consequently I used it in this sense: that if the majority were Protestants, and did establish a public school, it was a Protestant public school, just in that sense, as distinguished on the other hand from the majority who happened to be Roman Catholics and who establish a public school which would be a Roman Catholic public school.

Mr. DAVIN. There are two reasons why it is desirable to correct my hon. and learned friend. The first reason is that under the Act of Parliament and under the Ordinance founded on that Act of Parliament the phrase is incorrect, and the next reason is that the phrase is misleading. It gives the idea that at a public school, Protestant tenets that would be objectionable to Catholics were taught, and that a Catholic could not attend the schools without menace to his faith, whereas in Regina, Moose Jaw, Medicine Hat and Moosomin, there are no separate schools. Yet at all these places Catholics attend the public school, and I have never heard a Catholic in my constituency or anywhere else in the North-west Territories object to anything that took place in the public schools, complain that their faith was interfered with or that anything objectionable either in book or otherwise was heard. I merely rose to state what I consider to be the question on which we were voting. We are not voting on this education question at all; we are voting on the powers of the Territorial Assembly as to whether we shall enlarge these powers or not. That is the sole question, and voting on that question I shall vote in favour of enlarging the powers of the Assembly.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not wish to give a silent vote upon this question. The Bill introduced by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in 1890 had two clauses linked together, one being with regard to the abolition of the dual language in the North-west Territories, and the other with reference to separate schools. On that occasion I supported the Bill, with the intention when we got into committee of supporting the clause with regard to the dual language simply and solely on the ground of economy. It was not because I have any feeling whatever against the French population of the Dominion, or not because I wish to deprive them of any rights; but because I was led to understand that the French population in the North-west Territories understood English as well as French, and that to continue the printing of the ordinance in French as well as English was in my opinion imposing an unnecessary expense on the country. With regard to the question of granting to the North-west Territories the power of dealing with education, I am strongly inclined to respect the stand taken by the Hon. Alex. Mackenzie when the Bill was passed granting the privileges the Roman Catholic minority now enjoy, and I am also in favour of the views expressed by the Hon. Edward Blake on that occasion. For my part, I am not an advocate of separate schools. At the same time, I do not wish by force of law to take from any Catholic minority the right to have separate schools if they desire to exercise that right. I would like very well that they should agree with us to have our children all educated together in the same school; and for that purpose I would quite willingly eliminate anything in the curriculum of our schools at all offensive to them. I would not agree to make the schools absolutely secular schools. I would rather have a continuation of the separate schools as they now exist in Ontario than to have an entirely secular system of education. I believe that in the present age we are altogether drifting too much into secularism, and are not devoting that attention, even in our common school education, to the doctrines of Christianity which we ought to devote. The hon. member for North Simcoe says that we have in the North-west Territories a population of about 66,000. If that Territory contained a population sufficient to have full provincial rights granted to them, I would be quite willing to grant them power to deal with education as well as the power to charter railways, to borrow money, and to levy taxes. If any hon. member in this House thinks that with their present limited population, it would be well to confer that power upon them, I am willing to debate that question with him. In my humble opinion it would be premature. We have been spending large sums of money to try to bring immigrants to that country. Would we not be glad to see the surplus population of the province of Quebec, French and Catholic as it is, go to the North-west rather than to the United States? We would rather see the congested population of Ireland, where there is a very large Catholic population, come to settle in our country, than go to the United States. Our object is to fill up that Territory with population, and as soon as there is the necessary population to be formed into a province, I am quite willing that they should have full power to deal with education and every other question. To those who are strongly opposed to separate schools, and are in favour of granting the Territory the power of dealing with the whole question now, I would say, supposing that the population of the North-west were different from what it is at present—suppose there were 45,000 Catholics and only 15,000 Protestants—would they then as enthusiastically and determinedly advocate granting to the Territory the right to legislate on school questions? I do not think they would. I think they would say that it is better to wait until the country fills up; the population may partake of a different character from what it has at present, and might reverse the very Act that they might now pass. I think that this Parliament, with the experience it has had since Confederation on these questions, is in as good a condition, and perhaps better, to deal with this question than the North-west Assembly. I think we understand the question perfectly, we have made the history of this country on this question, and I think the intelligence of the whole Dominion assembled in this House is quite as capable of dealing with this question in its present position as the North-west Assembly. The hon. member for North Simcoe advanced another argument which, if it were based upon an unquestionable fact, would make me feel disposed to support his resolution; that is, that in voting to continue the present condition of things, we are riveting upon the North-west irrevocably, either on our part or their part, separate schools. But, in opposition to the opinion expressed by the hon. member for North Simcoe, we have the opinion of my respected leader, the opinion of the hon. member for Bothwell, and the opinion of the hon. leader of the Government, all of whom challenge and deny the hon. gentleman's contention. They say there is nothing in the constitution to prevent the Local Legislatures controlling the whole matter when the Territories come to be formed into provinces. Perhaps I hold views on education different from those of a good many. I am not in favour of such an absolutely secular system such as that established in Manitoba; I believe it is wrong to abolish from our schools every vestige of religious education. I find from the statement given to us by the hon. member for North Simcoe that there are in the North-west two hundred and ten Protestant public schools and only thirty-four Catholic public schools. Well, surely the people of the Territories can tolerate that number of Catholic schools until they find what the Territory is going to develop into. The hon. gentleman points out that some of those schools cost more per capita than the Protestant schools. That is not the fault of the law; it is the fault of the system of administration. If the Government were to administer the system so as to grant a per capita allowance, we would not have that condition of things. We are contributing large tracts of land for the construction of railroads for that country, and are doing everything in our power to develop it; and it is to be hoped that the influx of population will be so rapid that it will before many years be entitled to full provincial powers; and when that time comes, if I hold a seat in this House, I will undoubtedly vote to give them all the powers provided for in section 93 of the constitution. My hon. friend said something with regard to the request of the North-west Assembly. There is no doubt that that Assembly have asked to be allowed to deal with the question of schools; every Assembly likes power, and we know there has been considerable trouble up there in the last year or two on this question. But what is the system at present existing in the North-west? It is exactly the system we have in Ontario. Our Ontario readers are the readers that have been established there by the North-west Council as the books that are to be used. If a teacher from Ontario goes to the North-west holding a second or first-class certificate, that certificate is admitted as a certificate of qualification to teach, and if he does not hold such a certificate, he has to procure one. We have virtually the same system. We have two inspectors, a Catholic and a Protestant. The Catholic inspector does not only inspect Catholic schools, but all the schools in his district, and the Protestant does the same. We have not a Catholic inspector paid simply for inspecting 34 Catholic schools, and a Protestant paid for inspecting 210 Protestant schools. They divide the work between them, and inspect them all on one common system. In that regard, the practice is just about the same as in the province of Ontario. I contend that it is the duty of this House to legislate in the direction of peace and harmony, in order to develop rapidly this entire Dominion. That can best be done, peaceably and quietly, by granting all rights and privileges, within reasonable bound, to any class that comes into our country and settles in any portion of it. If we are going to extremes in any direction, we are going seriously to retard the peaceful and successful development of the Dominion. I should rejoice to see thousands of Catholics from any part of the British dominions come in and take up locations in our Territories and develop them, and should be glad to give them the enjoyment of the privileges enjoyed by the Catholic minority in the province of Ontario. You can never drive people out of a conscientious right by legislation. You may gain them over by kindly treatment into a different groove, but you cannot force them by coercion. I do not know of any part of the British dominions in which such a policy has been successful. They tried to coerce Ireland by legislation for eighty years, and the policy has been declared by the best English statesmen to have resulted in utter failure. We do not want to coerce people by legislation. We want to treat them kindly and generously. We want to respect their conscientious feelings and religious beliefs. Whatever you may be able to do by kind and generous treatment, you will never, by means of coercive legislation succeed in accomplishing your object.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to say a few words in explanation of the vote I intend to give. We have now seven provinces in the union, five of which have the undisputed right to control their own education and to every successive province that has been brought into Confederation since 1867, we have given that right. It was disputed in the province of New Brunswick, but the courts ultimately upheld the right of the province to control its own education. It was disputed in Manitoba, but the courts also, in the case of that province, upheld that provincial right. In the North-west Territories, when the Act of 1875 was passed, there was no Legislative Assembly there having power to regulate or control education, and therefore it was quite in order for this Parliament to pass legislation governing that territory. But since then we have given the no Legislative Assembly there having power Legislature. We have given them certain powers within their own control, and amongst those they are dealing with, the subject of education. Whether they are so dealing legally or not, that right has not been refused them, and, in view of the fact that it seems to be an undisputed right of the provinces to deal with the subject of education, and in view of the fact that there is now a legislature there, it does not seem to me out of harmony with provincial rights to cede to that Legislature the power of dealing with this question. It is dealing with it to-day, and it must be dealing with it either in accord with its legal rights or the reverse. If illegally, it ought to be stopped; but if under the sanction of the law, we ought to extend to that Legislature the full rights we have given the other provinces. Some hon. gentlemen speak of this as taking away the rights of the minority. I do not think that assertion is warranted. All we have a right to assume, if we give the power into the hands of the Legislature, is that it will protect the minority in any rights they possess to-day. We all know, as far as I can judge, that the regulations which the Board of Education there has made for controlling education, are of a very liberal character. Therefore, we have the right to assume that there is no disposition on the part of the North-west Assembly to do injustice to the minority. In voting as I intend to to-night, it is not because I apprehend there is any danger of our refusing provincial rights to the provinces after they are fully organized, whether the present leader of the Government be in power or the leader of the Opposition, because I think both recognize what would be the rights of the province then. But I must confess that I agree with the assumption advanced that if we allow usages to grow up for a length of time, in proportion to their duration, they will be difficult to remove. They were given, by the Act of 1875, the right to establish separate schools there. It might happen, afterwards, when we establish a province there, and give the Legislature the full autonomy of a Provincial Legislature, that we could not do away with the order of things then existing. There was one part of the speech of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) with which I disagree, and I am glad to say that, on speaking to him privately, he expressed an opinion that he intended to convey a different impression. I understood him to say that because by the Act of 1875 we gave the right to the North-west Territories to have separate schools, if we allowed that to go on, when we came to establish the province, we would find it riveted upon the Provincial Government by usage, so that it would be difficult, in fact, illegal, to make a change. That was the impression his remarks left on my mind. However, I am glad to notice that the hon. gentleman states that was not the impression he intended to convey. What he meant to state was not that there would not be a legal right vested in this Parliament to give the full power of controlling education to the Provincial Government, when that Government was established there. That would go a long way towards satisfying the minds of many hon. gentlemen with reference to allowing the present condition of things to remain as they are, and, for my part, I would feel that there was no injustice done to the Territories or Council, provided things did remain as they are. But as the question is forced on us now, and as the amendment is in harmony with the principle I have always held of the undisputed rights of the provinces, with the exceptions of Ontario and Quebec, which were governed by legislation introduced and passed before Confederation, and as it is the undisputed right of every province outside of those two, and of every other province that may come into the confederacy, to deal with its own education, I believe they should have that right. Knowing that the Legislature out there is discharging many of the functions of a Provincial Legislature, I think we should give them this right, and put them on a par with the other provinces.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). In order to give an opportunity to an hon. member who has already spoken upon this question, but who desires to answer some of the objections which were brought against his arguments, I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I am not going to trespass upon the indulgence of the House by any lengthened argument. But I would like to put myself right upon a subject that seems to be misunderstood as to the legal question involved, and to answer some arguments put forward upon the general proposition. Now, my hon. friends around me understood me to say—and perhaps I used language that would convey that impression—that, as a matter of positive law, when we created provinces in the North-west, we should be obliged to restrict the power of the new provinces in respect of education by the clause to which I referred as limiting the clause 93 of the British North America Act. Now, Sir, I did not, and I do not desire to convey that impression, and it is only right that I should explain, because it may have an effect possibly upon some hon. members, and I wish to make myself perfectly plain. What I was thinking of was not the dry question of law to which my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has devoted some attention, and upon which the right hon. First Minister has also given his views. That is, that according to the system that we find embodied in the British North America Act, the provinces, the admission for which was provided for in the Act were to come in subject to these general clauses in the Act, and amongst them was this clause No. 1. So when British Columbia was admitted to the Confederacy and when Prince Edward was admitted, the terms embodied in the Order in Council—which, the Act provides under section 146, were to be equivalent to an Act of Parliament—were that all the provisions of the Act not solely applicable to one province. In other words, the general provisions of the Act were to be applicable to the new provinces brought in. At the moment I had not in my mind that this provision applied to provinces created out of the Territories. It may be that the view of the hon. gentleman from Bothwell is right in that respect, and that the clause 2 of the Act of 1871 does not give to this Parliament the power, in creating provinces, to confer any constitutional rights, other and different from those mentioned in the British North America Act. That may possibly be the correct view. I am free to say that I had not that in my mind when I addressed the House. I did not consider it, and I am not prepared to say that it is or is not the proper one. Section 2 says:

The Parliament of Canada, may, from time to time, establish new provinces in any territories forming for the time being part of the Dominion of Canada, but not included in any province thereof, and may, at the time of such establishment, make provision for the constitution and administration of any such provinces.

I understand the hon. member for Bothwell to limit the meaning of this to such questions as whether they are to have one or two chambers and matters of that kind, and not as to the scheme of the division of legislative authority and power.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It refers to the constitution as it covers the first article of section 192 of the Act.

Mr. McCARTHY. I was not thinking of that. These words are very general, "and for the passing of laws for the peace, order and good government of such provinces," and it seems to me they enable this Parliament to enact in the constitution of any province such laws as this Parliament may see fit. I think it is open to that construction, but I have not considered it, and I do not want to express an opinion one way or the other. My argument was, and is now—if we hand this matter over to the control of the Territories there will be no harm done. If the people in the North-west adopt a scheme of separate schools and afterwards apply for admission into Confederation there will be no great harm done to say: Very well; nothing in any law we can give you shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with reference to denominational schools. But, if we do not give them power to choose, if we deny them the right to select for themselves, then, when the day comes, as it must before long, when some part of the Territories will ask for admission and be entitled by their population and position to have this clause enacted, then, this Parliament would be bound to repeal the law, otherwise we should be, as I say, riveting the system of separate schools upon them. This point I think a most important one.

The right hon. Prime Minister, when challenged by the hon. member from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), repelled the assumption that they would not be so bound. He said of course it would be open to Parliament, but the First Minister, as I understood, in his answer to the hon. member for West Assiniboia—perhaps I was wrong, but I should like to be corrected if I was wrong—rather insisted upon the view I am putting, which is that if separate schools are continued until the North-west Territories are given provincial autonomy, they will have the right of insisting upon that being continued when provincial autonomy is conferred upon them.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not say that.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then I fail to understand the views which the First Minister holds. He seems to be on both sides of the question.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not at all. If I spoke ambiguously before, I was not at all conscious of it; but I cannot be said to be ambiguous after the explanation I made to the hon. member for Assiniboia. I appealed to the House to continue the present system while the Territorial system continued, and I declared that in my opinion the whole subject would be open and free to Parliament as to what constitution we would give to the provinces when the provinces were created.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am very glad the right hon. gentleman has explained it in that way, and perhaps I was wrong in my understanding of his remarks. Of course it is an important declaration from the First Minister. Now, the House will have to use its own judgment on this question. What I say is this: that if this question of separate schools is to remain in its present position until we grant provincial autonomy to any portion of the North-west, it will be practically impossible, unless there is an enormous change in public opinion, to deny them what every other province that has joined the Confederation has been entitled to, what Manitoba was entitled to, and what I submit under the circumstances every province would be entitled to. Now, let me draw attention to the constitution conferred upon Manitoba in that regard. I have not got it under my hand, but it will be found on consulting it that when we conferred autonomy upon the province of Manitoba we did it by reference to the British North America Act. What we declared was, that where not otherwise provided for in the Act, all the provisions of the British North America Act should apply to the province of Manitoba, and I think the very same words were contained in the resolutions which were passed at the time British Columbia and the province of Prince Edward Island came into the Union. So that we have got that precedent before us; that was the promise upon which we admitted Manitoba, and looking at the character of the legislation, I do not think there can be any doubt that the same rule must apply when we come to admit the provinces to be created out of the North-west Territories. So much for that point. I might say more, but it would be unreasonable at this late hour to occupy the time of the House by any attempt to criticise this long and very important debate. I desire to say this, however, which I think ought to be said: that I am not the one who is breaking faith in moving the passage of this amendment. Because in 1875, in the condition things were at that time, this separate school enactment was passed, on what principle can it be said that in 1894 the repeal of that clause will be a breach of faith? Surely that is not a fair way to put it. This Parliament has power and authority to revise, and did year after year alter and change the powers and the authorities that were granted to the North-west, and the change in any one of these enactments cannot by any fair-minded man be characterized as a breach of faith. Can any great harm be done to any class of people who have gone in there and who are permitted to deal with this subject in their own Local Legislature? I am not seeking to deprive any person of separate schools; I am not going into that argument. I have my own views about them, and though I would agree with the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) in saying that I would sooner see a separate school system than a secular system, I see no necessity at all for a secular school system displacing a separate school system. I am free to say that, but it does appear to me to be an abuse of language to say that we should not give this power to the people of the North-west, who have enormous powers from us already, who are not abusing those powers, who are quite as intelligent, I think, as the ordinary constituents that we represent here, and to give them power to decide and dispose of this question amongst themselves, can hardly be treated as a breach of faith. Why, the hon. member for West Assiniboia, with the knowledge he has of the people of the North-west, with the knowledge he has of the autonomy of the Legislative Council, tells us that he doubts very much whether the separate school system will be abolished. But is there any reason why, in a matter of that kind, they should not have the power? Are they not quite as competent to deal with their schools as British Columbia was at the time of the Union, as British Columbia is to-day; as Prince Edward Island was, as Prince Edward Island is, and so with the other provinces? When you talk about heart-burnings, and when you talk about peace, do not forget, none of us can forget, or ought to forget, that we have no trouble in respect of those provinces which have complete power over their schools. The trouble that is constantly occurring does not come from those four provinces, but it does come from the province that we are attempting to control and coerce by our legislation here. Nor can we forget that the difficulties that are arising in my own province arise because the people feel there that the separate school system was imposed upon them against their will, and there is continual ferment, and continual agitation, and continual unrest with regard to that subject cropping up at almost every election and on every occasion. Sir, it is because I desire the peace and welfare of the Dominion, because I believe that will be best promoted by giving this power to the proper authorities, by adjourning to the proper quorum the matter belonging to it, that I have moved the amendment I have had the honour to place in your hands.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I ask leave to withdraw my motion to adjourn the House.

Motion withdrawn.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. members for Cardwell, East Elgin and West Durham have not voted.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I am paired with the hon. member for Chambly (Mr. Préfontaine).

Some hon. MEMBERS. How would you have voted ?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I would have voted as I voted on this question on a previous occasion.

Mr. INGRAM. I am paired with the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster).

Mr. CRAIG. I am also paired.

Mr. GUAY. The hon. member for South Essex has not voted.

Mr. MCGREGOR. I am paired with the hon. member for West Middlesex. If I had voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

On the main motion,

Mr. McCARTHY. The other matter I desire to bring to the attention of the House is in regard to the dual language.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Dispense.

Mr. McCARTHY. There can be no dispensing with this matter. Hon. gentlemen will have to vote.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has already spoken to the third reading of the Bill, and, therefore, he cannot move an amendment.

Mr. McCARTHY. Is that the ruling ?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 167) further to amend the Post Office Act—(from the Senate)—(Sir Adolphe Caron).

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and House adjourned at 2.05 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 17th July, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In stating yesterday what measures it was intended not to proceed with, I forgot to mention our intention with regard to the Franchise Bill. It is proposed to drop all parts of that Bill except those parts which are necessary to make provision for the revision of the lists in constituencies as changed by the Redistribution Act. It is intended also, in view of the delays that have taken place, to make provision for further delays in the times for carrying on the revision this year.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 164) further to amend the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons.—(Mr. Foster.)

Bill (No. 165) to amend the Act respecting Dominion Notes.—(Mr. Foster.)

LAND SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAYS.

Resolutions reported from committee (July 16th) respecting the granting of subsidies in land to certain railway companies therein mentioned were read the second time, and concurred in.

Mr. DALY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 168) to authorize the granting of subsidies of land to certain railway companies.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INLAND REVENUE ACT.

Bill (No. 158) further to amend the Inland Revenue Act was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The only thing that is new in this are the words beginning at the fifteenth line, which enable the collector to participate in fines and forfeitures for illicit stills and for distillations outside of the distilleries. Heretofore he did not participate in any of these fines.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS ACTS AMENDMENTS.

Mr. FOSTER moved second reading of Bill (No. 135) to consolidate and amend the Acts respecting the duties of customs. He said: I just wish to take the stage without discussion so as to have the Bill ready for discussion in going into committee at the next sitting.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If preferred the discussion may be taken on motion that the Speaker leave the Chair.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SUPPLY—SUSPENSION OF COL. POWELL.

Mr. TISDALE. Mr. Speaker, at this late stage of the session, were it not for the importance of the matter I wish to bring to the attention of the House, I would not venture to trespass upon the time of hon. members. The matter to which I refer is the suspension of the Adjutant General by the Major General commanding. I feel that the circumstances surrounding this act are such that it is my duty, in my place in the House, to call the attention of the Minister and the House to it again. By way of introduction to the few remarks I shall trouble the House with, I wish to draw attention first to the distinction between the regular force and the active force. The first is a force trained for and making a business of active service, the second is a force made up of men who volunteer for a time from their civil duties, either in Great Britain or here, for the purpose of preparing themselves to defend the country. In the same connection I wish to draw attention to the difference between the volunteer force in Great Britain and that in Canada. In Great Britain the country is thickly settled, the population is large and there is great wealth; the occupations of the officers and men are settled and they seldom change their residences. Here we have a very large country and a sparse population, and the occupations of the people alter from time to time and changes of residence are frequent. I think that the promoters of the Militia Act, under which the whole control of our militia is authorized, wisely took into consideration our circumstances. Properly to discuss this matter of the dismissal I shall read to the House such portions of the Militia Act as relate to this question of suspension. Taking the Statute of Canada of 1853, chap. 11, the Militia Act, I find the first section reads as follows:—

Mr. DALY.

COMMAND IN CHIEF.

Section 1.—As provided by the fifteenth section of "The British North America Act, 1867," the command in chief of the Land and Naval Militia, and of all Naval and Military Forces, of and in Canada, is vested in the Queen, and shall be exercised and administered by Her Majesty personally or by the Governor as her representative.

Section 2.—There shall be a Minister of Militia and Defence who shall be charged with and be responsible for the administration of militia affairs, including all matters involving expenditure, and of the fortifications, gunboats, ordnance, ammunition, arms, armouries, stores, munitions and habiliments of war belonging to Canada;

(b.) The Minister of Militia and Defence shall have the initiative in all militia affairs involving expenditure of money;

(c.) The Governor in Council shall, from time to time, make such orders as may be necessary respecting the duties to be performed by the Minister of Militia and Defence.

Section 3.—The Governor may appoint a Deputy of the Minister of Militia and Defence, and such other officers as may be necessary for carrying on the business of the department; and the duties of such officers shall be prescribed, and their salaries fixed by the Governor in Council.

The 28th section provides:

There shall be appointed an officer who holds the rank of Colonel or superior rank thereto in Her Majesty's regular army, who shall be charged, under the orders of Her Majesty, with the military command and discipline of the militia, and who, while holding such appointment, shall have the rank of Major General in the Militia, and shall be paid at the rate of four thousand dollars per annum in full of all pay and allowances.

The 29th section is as follows:—

There shall be an Adjutant General of militia at headquarters who shall have the rank of Colonel in the militia, and shall be paid at the rate of two thousand six hundred dollars per annum.

(2.) There may be a Quartermaster General at headquarters who shall have the rank of Colonel in the militia, and shall be paid at the rate of two thousand six hundred dollars per annum.

(3.) The Governor in Council shall, from time to time, make such orders as may be necessary respecting the duties to be performed by the officer commanding the militia, by the Adjutant General, by the Quartermaster General, and by officers of the militia generally.

Then section 64 is rather long. I shall not read it in detail, but shall explain it and hand it in.

Mr. MULOCK. No.

Mr. TISDALE. It provides for the control of the militia when on actual service. Now, I read further from the Civil Service Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 17:

50. The head of a department, and in his absence, the deputy head of such department may,—

(a.) Suspend from the performance of his duty or from the receipt of his salary any officer or employee guilty of misconduct or negligence in the performance of his duties.

(b.) Remove such suspension; but no person shall receive any salary or pay for the time during which he was under suspension.

The clauses of the Militia Act that I have read are the only clauses of that Act that relate to that subject, and it will be noticed that nowhere does it provide that the officer commanding, or any of the officers under him, shall have the right of suspension, whereas the Civil Service Act expressly gives that right to the heads of departments. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion—and it is because I came to that conclusion that I feel it imperative that this matter should be brought up here—that the Major General had no authority to suspend the Adjutant General of this Dominion. The clause that I read says:

The Governor General may from time to time make such orders as may be necessary respecting the duties to be performed by the Commandant of Militia, by the Adjutant General, by the Quartermaster General, and by the officers of the militia generally.

These words show, to my mind, conclusively such to be the case, and if there was any doubt, the fact that in the civil service the heads of departments are expressly authorized to make such suspensions, would relieve the matter of any doubt whatever. Now, the fact remains that the Major General did suspend the Adjutant General of the Dominion. It is true the Adjutant General accepted the suspension. In my opinion, he needed not to have done so unless he pleased, but still he showed therein the character of a soldier, and submitted to this humiliation rather than raise any question. I have noticed in the newspapers that the fact that the Minister of Militia ordered the Major General to reinstate the Adjutant General shows that the Minister of Militia recognized his authority to order the suspension. I do not so understand the meaning of the act of the Minister of Militia. I take that to mean that the Minister of Militia, considering, under the circumstances that the Major General ought not to have subjected the Adjutant General to this humiliation, very properly ordered the officer who had committed the wrong, to right it by restoring the suspended officer to his rank. I think, in that, he did wisely, because it was a rebuke to the one and it was a reparation to the other. Now, let us consider the circumstances attending this suspension. I think I have showed conclusively from the law I have read, that the Major General had no authority to do what he did. I venture to say that in the history of Great Britain or of any of the colonies, the act is entirely unparalleled.

The circumstances were these: A general order had been issued, notifying certain active corps that they would shortly be called upon and to hold themselves in readiness, for annual drill. Subsequently, the Minister stated from his place in the House that that order was to be rescinded, and there would be no annual drill. To carry that out, the Major General wrote out a general order in his own handwriting, as the routine of his office goes, and sent it to the Adjutant General to fill in certain formal requisites, sign it, and have it issued. The Adjutant General did his part, and this was on Friday, the day before the official 'Gazette' would issue in which this general order would be published, and if it was not published on Saturday the whole of this active force would remain for another week in suspense as to when they were to turn out. The Major General did not, for some reason—I believe it was indisposition—go to his office, and the Adjutant General kept the order to submit to him, after he had filled in the details, until the last hour of the Friday when he could get it in the official 'Gazette.' Finding the Major General did not come to his office, he sent it in the usual way to the official 'Gazette.' But what was the omission? The initials of the Minister were not on the order. Now, that is the whole reason, as I understood from the Minister's explanation in the House, for the suspension of the Adjutant General. It seems to me that if anybody had a right to find fault it was the Minister, the superior of the officer who suspended the Adjutant General. Now, let us consider for one moment who it was that the Major General suspended. It was the Adjutant General of this Dominion, the officer next in rank to himself. And who is Colonel Powell? Why, he is a man who, forty-seven years ago, I will venture to say almost before General Herbert was born, was serving in the militia of this country. Thirty-two years ago he was appointed to the high position of Deputy Adjutant General, and subsequently to that of Adjutant General; and for thirty-two years he served in that position with credit to himself, with credit to the country, and with great benefit to the active force of Canada. Not only that, but he may be said to-day to be the father of the active force. I remember well the occasion of the formation of our active militia. Until Colonel Powell because Deputy Adjutant General, thirty-two years ago, we had no active militia. The active militia came into existence on account of the dispute between the British and American Governments during the war of secession. We formed isolated volunteer companies, without arms and without any means of drill. At that time there were not ten drill books in the whole Dominion of Canada; there were no rifles but those abandoned rifles that were used in the Crimea. Under these circumstances, Colonel Powell largely had the credit of laying the foundation of our active force, and of producing a force that as early as 1864, and two years afterwards, was able to be sent, on very short notice, to the front. Provisional companies were formed into provisional battalions, because we had no battalions in those days, and these were sent to the frontier to guard it and to prevent international difficulties. From that time to the present, in the time of the Red River expedition, at the time of the Fenian raid, and at the time of our late North-west difficulty, Colonel Powell was one of the most active, best informed, and faithful officers in performing all his duties up to the time of this suspension. Up to this time, no officer of the militia corps, and no man in Canada, has had one reason to find any fault with Colonel Powell, and until this suspension, no general officer, or any other officer dared publicly, at all events, to say anything that would cast any reflection upon Colonel Powell. I say, therefore, that, under these circumstances, even if the Major General had been technically empowered, it would have been an outrage, and I use the word advisedly, to subject to such humiliation an officer of the standing and well-known character and ability of Colonel Powell. Now, I will say one or two words further, because, having brought the matter up, I propose to criticise in a proper way another matter connected with the administration of General Herbert to which, I think, public attention should be drawn. I know there is some misunderstanding as to the position of the Major General commanding the militia in this country. Many think he commands as an Imperial officer. Now, it is true, as stated in the statute I have read, that he must be an Imperial officer, of at least the rank of Colonel, but it is equally true that he derives all his authority as Major General from the Militia Act; therefore, he holds his authority under our Government, and our Government are responsible for his action, through the Minister of Militia, accordingly as I read the law. I say, therefore, that he is just as subject to criticism as any other Canadian officer; and I say that his unauthorized, uncalled-for, and unjust suspension of Colonel Powell, shows that there is a justification for us in criticising him at this time, and I propose to criticise him a little further. I want to say that it seems to me that the first requirement in an officer who wishes to make a success of our militia force, is to make himself acquainted with its surroundings, and with the nature of the force that he is to command. We have had several general officers commanding the militia force before General Herbert came here; and I want to say that while our active militia officers and men are not skilled, and have not had an opportunity to become skilled, nor can they afford to take from their ordinary occupations the time that will make them very skilful, yet they are willing to learn and to obey, and during the whole thirty-two years since the force came into existence, there never has been as much friction as in the two or three years that Major General Herbert has been here. I have read the Major General's reports. I desire at this point to state that I was a volunteer for fifteen years, and I make this statement to show that I know whereof I speak as regards the officers and members of the force. The men are willing and enthusiastic, but the time at their disposal is not the time at the disposal of regular officers and men, it is taken from the busy lives of those who in this country have about all they can do to follow their occupations and take care of themselves and those entrusted to their care. This gentleman seems to forget that fact, that it is not business but duty which our officers and men discharge, that it is not a profitable pursuit but that each man commits a sacrifice; and reading the Major General's reports as to inspections, hearing as I have heard mutterings among the whole force, I have come to the conclusion that he does not properly appreciate the force or does not properly understand the men so as to be able to keep the force on the lines of proficiency. His criticisms are always harsh, his exactions are severe, his demands for minutae in the force are exacting. I desire to say further that a man who properly understands the force and wishes to make a success of his command would always meet the officers and men in a spirit of conciliation, of instruction and of encouragement, and of one of appreciation throughout. It seems to me he forgets too much the distinction that exists between the volunteer force and the regulars. I believe that any officer who fails to appreciate the distinction that exists between these two forces will never be successful. Any commanding officer of the active force, especially in this country, where our people are so busy that militia service is a serious sacrifice of time on their part, at a loss in every case, and when the feeling of duty is the only inducement to enter the service and unless, who is not satisfied with the men possessing such knowledge of arms as to enable them to use them, and such a knowledge of drill as is involved in maintaining simple formations to face the enemy, he will be a failure. He must rely on the intelligence of the rank and file as compared with the intelligence of the trained regulars, instead of trying to make the militia too much after the machine pattern, which is very properly seen in the case of the regulars. I entirely disagree with one proposition which the Major General is endeavouring to carry out, and I am glad to observe that the Minister of Militia has not backed up the Major General in his view, and that is enlarging certain battalions and disbanding others. We must be satisfied with distributing our forces, and therefore the more battalions we have the better, and in this way we will have in certain places entrepots of arms and at all events nuclei for a force properly drilled, sufficient in times of peace to prevent riot and disturbance and in times of war, if they should come, to form rallying points, for we know there will always be plenty of men to take up arms in defence of the country. I am justified in making these statements by the experience of the past. From 1812, when our forefathers had crude arms and no advantages of drill, when they were few in number and scattered, they rallied shoulder to shoulder with the British regulars and were sufficient for the time to drive from our shores the invaders who attempted to conquer the country. During 1837, during the Fenian raid, the Red River expedition, and the recent rebellion in the North-west, our people turned out rapidly and always proved sufficient to meet the occasion and to justify the reliance placed on them. I wish to say, in conclusion, that unless a commanding officer becomes acquainted with the circumstances of the people of the country, makes proper allowances for their circumstances, for the difficulties surrounding our volunteer force, he will never succeed in his command; he will make a failure of his command, and a failure of the force, and he will in the end destroy it. As regards any officer governed by any other principle, the sooner he severs his connection with the force the better for his reputation and for the force of the country.

Mr. HUGHES. In offering a few remarks in support of the stand taken by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), I may be permitted to recite a few facts in connection with the conduct of the Major General commanding the Militia force of Canada. When I first heard of the suspension of the Deputy Adjutant General, I went to the member for South Norfolk, knowing that Col. Powell had been in the service of Canada years before General Herbert had ever seen a uniform, that he was a man who had done more than any other officer in the Dominion to organize the force and preserve the military spirit in this country, and I asked the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) to take the matter up. That was a week ago. However, the opportunity has not arisen to bring this question forward until the present time. The relative positions of the Major General and the Adjutant General have been very clearly pointed out by the last speaker. The Adjutant General is not a civil servant in any sense. It is true, he is under the superannuation regulations, but that is by special arrangement; he is not in any sense a civil servant, but is purely a military officer. The Major General commanding the militia is also a soldier on loan, as the Canadian regulations put it, he being loaned by the Imperial authorities, and he must be an officer of certain rank. Under the Army Act, with which General Herbert should certainly be familiar, or under our own Canadian regulations and orders, there is no authority, direct or indirect, giving the Major General power to suspend the Adjutant General, even though the Adjutant General had been guilty of an offence coming within the law. He has no such authority whatever. If the Adjutant General committed a fault, the General should have placed him under arrest in the usual manner, but to treat him as a civil officer is entirely incorrect under the regulations and orders of the Canadian militia or under the Army Act or under the Queen's Regulations. I took exception when the Minister of Militia read to this House the letter he had sent to General Herbert instructing him to reinstate the Adjutant General. I was pleased to know that the Adjutant General was reinstated and that what we may call a pleasant settlement was made, and that the Minister of Militia took the stand he did; it was a nice gentlemanly way of rebuking the Major General, and it was also very gratifying to the Adjutant General to be reinstated by the authority which had suspended him. But I notice this, that it was an indirect recognition, which I did not wish to see made by the Minister of Militia, of the authority of the Major General to suspend that officer. However, I trust the Minister of Militia, following his own line still further, will refuse to recognize the suspension as a suspension either of pay or dignity on the part of the Adjutant General, and that matters will go on as they have in the past—especially the pay—and that he will not suffer any loss of money for the time he was suspended. I do not wish to find fault with General Herbert in all his doings. I recognize in him an officer who would undoubtedly be a good man in the field. His field ideas are good, and his management of forces in the camp and in the field is excellent. I am satisfied that although we have had many fine officers commanding the militia of Canada that few, if any, have been equal to him in his ideas of field movements. But so far as concerns his management of men, I must say that he is a total failure. We have in this one instance an example of his lack of knowledge and judgment. Suppose it were necessary to suspend the Adjutant General for an offence, what would be the proper course for him to pursue? He certainly should have consulted the Minister of Militia, his superior officer, who was in the city. He certainly should have consulted some of the authorities in connection with the Government of this country whom the law allows him to consult, before he took such a grave step as to place an officer of Colonel Powell's standing and experience under arrest. He did not do one or the other, but simply suspended that fine old officer without a moment's notice. As the matter is, I believe, fairly well settled in connection with the case of the Adjutant General, and as the member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) has said all that is necessary on the subject, I shall now proceed to take a few examples from the past to show that the Major General has not a correct conception of the proper mode in which to handle the Canadian militia. Some time ago Major Manley of the Royal Grenadiers of the city of Toronto was entitled to receive promotion under the Regulations and Orders passed by this Parliament. Major Manley, a gentleman with whom I have had the closest intimacy for a number of years, is mathematical lecturer in one of the Collegiate Institutes. He is a silver medalist of Toronto University, and had been a distinguished member of the Queen's Own Rifles, and when the Royal Grenadiers were reorganized he was selected by Colonel Grassett, the commanding officer of that corps, as his adjutant, a position which he held with honour for many years. When the North-west trouble broke out in 1885, Capt. Manley marched to the North-west as adjutant of his corps, but one of the officers falling sick, he took a company and fought bravely at Batoche, where he was wounded. In the opinion of the officer commanding that regiment, and his associates, Capt. Manley was for years perfectly eligible for promotion, but it suddenly transpired that Major Manley was not considered fit to be promoted to the majority by the Major General. The regulations, I am free to say, provide that as far as practicable, consistent with a due regard to the public service and military regulations, all promotions in a corps shall be by seniority. We will accept, then, the position that there might possibly be some objection to Capt. Manley's promotion to the majority of the corps. We will allow that the Major General had a right to obtain some private or confidential report of Capt. Manley's fitness, but let us see how that should have been met. We find that the following law is recognized, both in our regulations and orders for the Canadian militia, and in the Queen's regulations for the British army, with which General Herbert ought to be familiar :

Whenever an officer is disadvantageously reported on, or when his answers to any of the questions contained in the confidential report, are not thoroughly satisfactory, the particulars of the report are to be read verbatim to him by the officer making it, in presence, when possible, of the inspecting officer and the second senior officer of the corps.

To show that Major Manley had no fear whatever of any confidential report or any private information, after having vainly written to the Militia Department to find out the causes of his non-promotion, he came at his own personal expense to Ottawa, and face to face with the General demanded to know the causes that were urged against his promotion. You would naturally suppose that the first principles of British fair-play would have enabled that officer to know who had been giving that evidence against him, or the charges made against him, but up to this day Major Manley has been denied the first tittle of evidence that has been given against his right to promotion in the corps. I am not here to take the part of Major Manley or of Major General Herbert, but I am here to see that justice is given to the officers of the Canadian militia, who have spent their money and given years of their time in the service of the volunteer force of their country. I maintain that it will never be tolerated by the Canadian people that an officer shall be passed over as this officer was without his being furnished the reasons therefor. I will now show that Major General Herbert is inconsistent. Suppose that there were complaints against Capt. Manley's promotion in the Royal Grenadiers, one would naturally suppose that following up the same line of reasoning, when objections were urged to the promotion of other officers, General Herbert would pay attention to these objections. But, Sir, what do we find? The command of the 63rd Halifax Battalion fell vacant, and almost the entire regiment rebelled against the promotion of the next senior officer to the command of the corps. I am not here to justify the officers and men of that corps in their course, for had I been Minister of Militia at the time I would have followed the same rule as was followed in that matter. But I certainly would have followed a different course in relation to Major Manley's case. In one case, General Herbert paid attention to whatever objections were urged against Major Manley, but in the other case he paid no attention to the objections raised against Major Egan being promoted to the command of the 63rd Halifax Battalion. Recently in the Royal Grenadiers, Capt. Harston was entitled to promotion to a majority. Capt. Harston was another distinguished officer of the Canadian militia, a man who had given much of his time to the invention of a rifle that I am told has met with the approval of many of the best military experts in Europe. He had served with distinction in the North-west rebellion, and had fought well and nobly for the maintenance of law and order in the Dominion. He was Brigade Major to General Middleton during the campaign, a position which ought at least commend him for subsequent promotion in his regiment. He was entitled to promotion, and yet for reasons unknown to Capt. Harston, reasons which have been refused to him, although he again and again demanded them, he was refused promotion in the Royal Grenadiers, and his junior, a non-combatant officer, was promoted over his head. Capt. Harston and Capt. Manley had to accept the only alternative open to them, and leave the force. Here are two distinguished officers of the Canadian militia, after giving their best years and much of their money to the service of their country, turned out of the force by private—I shall not say intriguing, or spiteful reports whispered into the ear of the Major General. At all events these gentleman have not been promoted, and have not been able to see the charges against them. There is where I take serious objection to the conduct of the Major General in the premises. We have another instance, in connection with that same Royal Grenadiers Regiment of Toronto. Another distinguished officer of that corps was Captain Mason. He had served in the North-west rebellion, and was wounded at Batoche, as Captain Manley was. He was a good officer, though no better officer than Captain Manley; but, being anxious to obtain the command of the regiment, supposing that Col. Dawson, the senior officer, had held the command long enough, he retired from the regiment; and the published reason, and I believe the correct reason, for his retirement was that Col. Dawson would not make way for him to succeed to the command. Now, what do we find? Captain Manley is refused promotion, and the majority is kept open for a long time. Then we find that, in defiance of the wishes of the officers of that regiment, Captain Mason is taken back to the regiment and given the position of major in order that he may succeed to the colonelcy. When we find this kind of work going on in the country without any explanation being given to those who have been unjustly treated, and without any opportunity being afforded them to meet charges which had been made against them in secret, those of us who have given many years of service to the volunteer force of this country feel impelled to say that this kind of business should stop. I have spent twenty-seven years in the volunteer service of this country, and I do not propose, as a citizen of Canada, or as a volunteer, to have my rights or privileges impaired by any intrigue or by any private report that may be sent to the Militia Department by any man. What we want is that the facts shall be made public, and that no secret attacks shall be made upon men who have given themselves to the service of their country. There is another instance. A year or so ago General Herbert visited the Prince of Wales Regiment in the city of Montreal, one of the finest old corps in the Dominion of Canada. Whether his stomach was in pretty bad order on that occasion or not I do not know; but he warned that corps that if they did not get a better set of field officers, he would disband the regiment. In order to carry out the dictates of the Major General, Col. Butler, with the other officers of the regiment, induced one of the best officers of the Garrison Artillery, Captain Finlayson, to be transferred to the Prince of Wales Rifles, in order that he might proceed to the majority. Every officer in the regiment of inferior rank to the position to which they wished to promote Captain Finlayson, waived his right to the promotion in order that Captain Finlayson might have the position; and yet the dictator at Ottawa, in defiance of the wishes of the officers of that regiment, refused to allow Captain Finlayson to accept the position of major of the corps; he said that Captain Finlayson would have to serve first as captain in the corps. This gentleman, who has seen service out on the sands of Egypt, has seen no greater service and has no more capacity for service than some of our boys in Canada; and if the comparison were made, I doubt whether many of these officers who were rebuffed by him, would not prove his superiors in every respect. We find the Major General, in the Royal Grenadiers, promoting Captain Hay over his senior officers, while refusing to allow Captain Finlayson to be major in the Prince of Wales Rifles on the ground that he had not served in the regiment as captain, though the officers in the regiment wished his appointment. I am not finding fault with Captain Hay; he is a good officer; I am simply pointing out the inconsistency of the action of the Major General in these cases. Whether he has been acting on improper private reports or not, I am not prepared to say; but I do mean to say that in every case the facts should be made public; and when Captain Manley, Captain Finlayson or Captain Harston, demand an inquiry, they should be given one, and should be met with the facts fairly and squarely, so that they might submit their defence. Another case was this: A non-combatant officer, a quartermaster in the Royal Grenadiers, was promoted major over Captain Harston, one of the best officers in the Dominion; although Captain Harston was entitled to the position, according to the regulations and orders, and also according to his services as a volunteer and a distinguished rifleman. This officer, on being promoted, of course, left his previous position vacant, and we find, not that the younger combatant officers of the regiment were offered the position, but that an outsider was brought in and appointed to the vacancy, a person who had been in the service some years previously, but who, for certain reasons which I will not state here—they were, I am told, not of a very creditable nature, from a military point of view—had retired from his regiment. Now, Sir, if this kind of dictatorship is to go on, the sooner the people of this country let the Major General and those in control of the department know that they will not submit to it, the better for all concerned. There is another matter to which I will take the liberty of referring. When Major General Herbert visited the city of Montreal, he took occasion to censure the Prince of Wales Regiment very severely. In fact, the rough, bitter and harsh side of his tongue has been given to the volunteers on almost every occasion on which he had the opportunity. As the hon. member for South Norfolk has properly pointed out, he fails to recognize the sacrifices which our Canadian militia are making in the service of their country. But, Sir, we find that on a recent occasion, on meeting the 65th Regiment of Montreal—and I am not saying one word against the 65th Regiment—he went out of his way to commend that regiment in a very marked manner. I stand here, Sir, as perhaps the only man connected with the militia force in Ontario, who, in 1885, when the 65th was assailed, upheld the honour and bravery of that regiment; and I have as a relic of that time a letter from Colonel Dugas thanking me for the kind words I then uttered. If Major General Herbert had desired to find parallels for the bravery of the 65th Regiment, he need not have gone outside of that corps itself; for its boys marched to the North-west in 1885 as willingly and quickly as any other volunteers in this country. They performed one of the most magnificent marches, from Calgary to Edmonton, recorded in the records of any regular or volunteer force; and in the only action in which they had any fighting to do, in the battle of Frenchman's Butte, where they faced a savage foe, they behaved themselves most admirably. I say that Major General Herbert need not have looked outside of their own corps to find parallels for their bravery. He could have pointed to the time of the Fenian raids, when the French regiments turned out and did their duty as well as any other regiments of Canadian militia. He could have pointed to 1837, when the rebellion in Lower Canada was quelled by our French fellow-countrymen. He could have gone back to the battle of Chateauguay, when, side by side with the Highlanders of Glengarry, De Salaberry led his men to victory, and gained one of the grandest victories that it is the glory of history to record. Therefore, I maintain that the reference in his address in Montreal to the Papal Zouaves, against whom I have nothing to say, was in very bad taste. I would have objected just as strongly had he, in criticising the Royal Grenadiers of Toronto, commended them as the descendants of the glorious and valiant sons of the Prince of Orange. There is another little matter of which I would like the Minister of Militia to take note. I understand that, contrary to the regulations requiring annual drill of the militia force, the 65th Regiment has been ordered into barracks at St. Johns, Quebec. Instead of performing their drill, as the country corps have to do, in camp, this regiment has been ordered into the barracks of the military school at St. Johns. All I have to say is this, that the rural corps of this country are not treated fairly, and are not going to stand it. We do not object to any favours or privileges granted to city corps, we do not admit it is perfectly proper they should be drilled every year, what we do object to is that the policy instituted in the old days, when our good friends of the Opposition managed the military affairs of this country, is being carried out—the policy of gradually disbanding the rural corps and establishing a small standing army. That policy will not suit this country. I intended saying something on the militia estimates in connection with our volunteer force, and may as well do so now. What I maintain is that the permanent corps is not properly managed. Every year, when this enormous sum of $500,000 is being voted, we are plausibly told that the permanent corps was established for the purpose of furnishing training schools for the militia. They are in this country either as a standing army, or a police force or for military schools. As a police force, they are not wanted, for we have lots of policemen, and in any event one-half of the number would easily do. As a standing army, the spirit of the nation will not perpetuate it. We do not want to saddle ourselves with a large standing army, such as the countries of Europe have to support. One-half the number would be ample as a standing army. As a military school force, their number is twice too great, and the expense could be easily reduced more than one-half. Let us look at the question from the point of a military school, the only one on which it can possibly commend itself to the people. We find that during the last year for which the report is issued, there were only two officers in the whole broad Dominion who took long-course certificates and eight non-commissioned officers and privates; and I may say that when you find non-commissioned officers or privates going in for any class of certificates, you may set it down, nine times out of ten, that it is in order to have an easy time during the winter and not necessarily for any military advantage that may accrue to them or the force afterwards. I find that fifty-nine officers took short-course certificates in the year, and one hundred and seventeen took special course certificates, which may be obtained in seven days. The special course certificate, I do not deem worthy of consideration at all, from a view-point of cost, because an officer trained at home simply goes down, spends a few days in barracks, and gets a certificate. Now, we find the cost, taking all the classes, long and short course and special course, officers, non-commissioned officers and privates, sums up $507,850 for three hundred and seven certificates, or $1,380 for each certificate, which is rather dear to pay for the whistle. But when you come to drop out the special course certificates, we find it costs $1,968 for each certificate. When we come to consider only the officers, leaving out the non-commissioned officers and privates, we find the total cost per officer amounts to $3,022. When you come to take the long and short course certificates only, we find they cost some $8,000 each per year. That is something entirely out of the way. But I may be asked what is my proposal.

My proposal is this : let our young men have an opportunity of attending these military schools as in former days. Let them go there as cadets, irrespective of rank, for if a captain does not know his drill, he should not, because he struts around with a sword, be treated differently from a private. Both should be on the same footing. If that were done and if this system of billeting all those who attend these schools and providing for them in barracks, were done away with, you would find that we could easily, at one-half the cost, have four or five times as many trained officers as we now have. I can easily remember the time when in almost every volunteer corps, not only the officers, but the sergeants and the corporals, and frequently two or three privates in the ranks, held military school certificates, entitling them to command a company. I can well remember the time when British officers who were coming through, and had occasion to inspect these corps, pronounced, according to reports, not one, but half a dozen regiments as capable of passing muster at any inspection. You will find in the reports of 1869 up to 1872 and onward when we had any number of military cadets holding commissions in our force, that British officers have pronounced these regiments superior in drill and rifle practice and equal in every other respect to any regiment in the British service. We could not have that repeated to-day, and the reason is we have attempted to build up a system of training officers which has proved altogether unsatisfactory, and the real aim of which is to fasten on this country a standing army and gradually abolish the militia. If one-half of the rank and file of these schools were dismissed or allowed to retire—they change every year, anyway—there would be a saving to this country of $300,000. Let me not be misunderstood, I would not necessarily dispense with the services of one single officer now connected with these schools. Every officer would still be retained, but in place of being there simply as a military officer, I would retain him as an instructor of the officers and men who would go to these schools to perfect themselves in military knowledge. If this change were carried out we could train ten times the number of officers for commissions in our militia corps that we do now, and, allowing for all expenses we could put from $250,000 to $300,000 into the treasury of this country. And I maintain, Sir, that thirty or forty thousand volunteers annually well drilled would be infinitely superior to a couple hundred of permanent corps, men having no interest in the country almost except to draw their regular daily pay. Now, Sir, there is just one other question and I have done. I have listened patiently during this session to the nonsense—I will not call it by any harsher term—spoken on the trade question and other questions by members of the Opposition, and I have never complained. I have shown an exemplary spirit of patience. And when I do inflict myself upon the House it matters very little to me how some members on the back benches of the Opposition receive me. I purpose following what I consider to be the right course in this matter, and I shall take my own time in dealing with these questions.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. How many votes did you get last night ?

Mr. HUGHES. I hope to have you with me the next time. I have recently read in the militia reports of the dismissal—I shall not say retirement—of Col. Lazier, of the 15th Battalion of Light Infantry in Belleville. When this announcement appeared it caused no great surprise. We have already had the Major Manley incident, the Harston incident, the Mason incident and the Finlayson incident, and the Elliot incident and others. We had heard the General's speech to the 65th, and we had heard of his intention to disband a number of these old regiments or amalgamate them. The country would hardly have been surprised at anything. Even if we had waked up some morning to find that the Minister of Militia had been placed under arrest by the Major General, I do not know that it would have surprised us very much. However, Col. Lazier of the 15th Battalion was dismissed. The papers in connection with this case have been placed in my hands, and, as they are very long, I shall not read them all, but shall go over them briefly in order that we may get a summary of the quarrel. It is known that Col. Lazier has long taken an active interest in militia affairs. He may have his faults : I should like to see the man, especially the military man, who has not. But he worked his way up from the humblest position in the battalion until, for a number of years he commanded it, and commanded it well. I understand that there are few city corps, and certainly no rural corps, better fitted out in all respects than the 15th Battalion. I understand, Sir, that in all the details of a regular army taking the field, Col. Lazier through his enterprise and energy, and through the enthusiasm with which he has inspired the people of Belleville, has secured the fitting up of this corps. In the spring of 1893, he was asked to fix a date for the annual inspection of his battalion. He fixed the 23rd June, as it had been usual for the inspection to take place early in the season. He was informed from the district office that it would not be convenient to have the inspection at that time. Being perfectly willing to accommodate the militia authorities, he then postponed the inspection until the 6th October following. You may remember, Sir,—if you do not others of us do—that about that time the people of Belleville gave a reception to the Prime Minister and a number of his colleagues in the city of Belleville. For some considerable time before the date of that reception, the drill shed was placed at the disposal of the Citizens' Committee by

Col. Lazier and his officers. Not thinking for a moment that a request to have his inspection postponed would be denied, Col. Lazier took it upon himself to give the drill shed to the Citizens' Committee for this reception and banquet to the Premier and his colleagues, and asked for a postponement of the inspection. And I may say here, Sir, that there were precedents for asking the postponement of inspection. Now, I shall briefly run over the correspondence, because that will explain the situation better than anything else. On the 28th September, 1893, Col. Lazier wrote to Col. Cotton, the Deputy Adjutant General of the district, as follows:—

SIR,—I have the honour to request that the date fixed (6th October next) for the inspection of the battalion under my command may be postponed till the 27th October, as I find it will not be possible to get the regiment in anything like creditable shape for inspection before that time.

I have the honour to be, &c.

The Deputy Adjutant General replied as follows:—

In reference to G. O. 25 of the 14th April, 1893. This regiment has had notice of inspection since date of above G. O. The application is forwarded for consideration.

W. H. COTTON, Lt.-Col.,
D. A. G. 3.

KINGSTON, 30th Sept., 1893.

Then comes in the Major General, who point-blank refuses to allow the postponement to the 27th. Lieut.-Col. Lazier followed the matter up with this letter to the Deputy Adjutant General:

I wrote you hurriedly this morning on receipt of your telegram, to catch the morning mail.

The matter of inspection stands in this way:

The drill had just fairly started in after the summer holidays when application was made for the use of the drill shed and premises for the demonstration in honour of the Premier, his colleagues and our member, Mr. Corby.

Never imagining for a moment that an application to postpone the inspection under the circumstances would be refused, I discontinued drill for a fortnight to allow of certain repairs and improvements to be made to the drill hall and for the demonstration. We have just fairly started the drill again and require fully three weeks further time to put the men in anything like efficient condition, which, I presume, is what is aimed at—desired. It would be most injurious to the battalion to insist upon the inspection now, and unfair to the company officers and the men, as I have given them all along to understand that the inspection was sure to be postponed.

I am the only one to blame in the matter if there is blame attachable to any one.

We have a larger number of recruits this year than usual, from the better class of the young men of the city. If we have not time to put them in condition to make a respectable showing it will throw a damper on their present ardour to become efficient.

Mr. HUGHES.

Our outfit is not complete, a number of things required to complete such as helmets, leggings, &c., will not be here before the last of next week at the earliest, and some of my officers are at the World's Fair on leave.

The regimental rifle matches are fixed to commence on the 6th at 9 a.m., and all publication of them made, markers engaged and all arrangements made. I trust it may be seen that the circumstances are such as would warrant a postponement.

I shall be obliged by a reply by telegram.

However, Sir, as Col. Lazier put it, that appeal was in vain. The request was refused and the inspection had to take place. The refusal came in the following note from the Deputy Adjutant General:—

I fail to see why in face of a direct order published in General Orders you should not have completed arrangements for inspection. I cannot take upon myself to accept any of the reasons advanced for a postponement and I regret to have to say that the excuses put forward show a want of proper administration of regimental affairs.

W. H. COTTON, Lt.-Col.,
D. A. G. 3.

BRIGADE OFFICE,

KINGSTON, 4th October, 1893.

I trust that the Minister of Militia will note the tone of these letters all through. This is signed by the Deputy Adjutant General of the district. Now, I may be permitted to read an extract from Col. Lazier's statement:

And I may say just here that as a commanding officer of a volunteer regiment for more years than the Deputy Adjutant General has been connected with military matters at all, that he is not fit, either by training or habit, to be Deputy Adjutant General of any district. He may know something of artillery drill but he knows nothing of infantry and has no sympathy or feeling in common with the volunteer force, never having been an officer in it. He was hardly a success as an artillery officer either, as he ran "A" Battery nearly into the ground.

He has acquired a very offensive habit of speaking to every one he approaches (apparently) on military matters, which may do for regulars who are bound to grin and bear it, but officers of the volunteer force who have to expend their time and money in keeping up the organization will not put up with it. It is not to be wondered at that he could not keep man or officer under him.

The inspection took place on 6th October, as the colonel says, and the drill continued until 23rd October. The pay-rolls were taken up, and instead of being returned next day were kept nearly three weeks, and a number of men who had put in their drill were struck off for pay. Then Col. Lazier wrote the following protest on 23rd October, 1893:—

SIR,—The paymaster has just handed me the pay-rolls taken by you on the day of inspection and returned to him by express to-day. I see you have struck off the pay of the assistant surgeon, the hospital sergeant, the surgeon's horse, and only allow two sergeants per company. I have to strongly protest against any such reduction in the establishment without having received any intimation of the intention to make any change.

I beg to draw the attention of the Minister of Militia to this fact: that other corps than the 15th, when they marched into camp, found some of their men struck off the pay-list, and a number of officers who expected to be paid under the old rule found their pay reduced. I would take the opportunity of further informing the Minister that men who performed their drills regularly more than a year ago, in the 3rd Military District, a district which was far short of drilling up to the quota, have not yet been paid their annual drill money, and the officers of these battalions and companies had to put their hands in their own pockets and pay the men for drilling in the service of the country. The attention of the Militia Department has, on more than one occasion, been drawn to this fact, as has also the attention of the Major General, but nothing has yet been done to set the matter right. Returning to the letter:

The assistant surgeon is a gazetted officer and always in attendance when required. The hospital sergeant has been most attentive to his duties and has been in the regiment since 1866. The surgeon was mounted on inspection, and always turns out mounted when on parade. Three sergeants per company have always been allowed and performed their drill this year as such. I do not see any equity or justice in reducing the pay of men who have performed their drill under the belief and expectation that they would receive pay as heretofore. I enclose you returns showing number of officers and men trained during the year and whom I claim are entitled to pay. The annual drill has been completed. My quartermaster is at Cobourg attending the assizes. As soon as he returns I will have the rifles sent to Kingston for repairs. I am too busy now with my official duties to give the necessary attention to it.

To which Col. Lazier received the following reply:—

You know or ought to know, that the reduction of establishment is by order of Parliament and you in common with other commanding officers were notified through General Orders. I must direct you to withdraw, in writing, your letter of the 25th October instant.

W. H. COTTON, Lt.-Col.,
D.A.G. 3.

KINGSTON, 30th October, 1893.

Now, the general order to which Col. Lazier refers was dated 7th April, 1893, and stated in effect that the establishment for the year had been fixed, and would be communicated to those interested. He received no notification whatever until the following:—

You have not replied to my memorandum of 30th October directing withdrawal of your letter of the 25th October. I must ask you to do so at once. Explanation of the delay is required.

Now, Col. Lazier was under no obligation to withdraw that, and he did not do it. On the 13th April, then, a week after his return home from Battle Creek, Michigan, where he had gone to be treated for an illness, he sent in his resignation. The memo. was as follows:—

After some twenty-eight years' service in the volunteer force I regret that I should be compelled in defence of my own self-respect to retire from the service now after many years' struggling to obtain proper accommodation and equipment for the battalion under my command. The refusal under the circumstances to postpone the date of inspection last year and the consequent annoyance and inconvenience it occasioned first induced me to give any thought to the question of retirement. But the principal and immediate cause of my determination to quit the force is that I decline to remain in the service under the present Deputy Adjutant General of this district. I characterize the whole tone of his correspondence and his verbal intercourse with me and with nearly, if not all, my officers with whom he has come in contact as offensive; so much so far as I am personally concerned that nothing would induce me to remain and be subject to his petty impertinences. When I left home in March, I went to Toronto to consult a specialist about my health, intending to remain there if he advised it. His opinion was that I should go to some Sanitarium, and recommended the one at Battle Creek.

Then he wrote from Battle Creek, asking for leave of absence, and received the following notice:—

The application for leave of absence from Lt.-Col. Lazier, commander of the 15th Battalion, is recommended only on the plea of ill-health.

This was signed by the officer commanding the district. Some three weeks after the resignation of Col. Lazier, he received a communication from the Deputy Adjutant General, requiring him to give an explanation of his leaving the country, although he had previously given the reason in his letter from Battle Creek. He then wrote on 30th April, 1894:

I have the honour to enclose you herewith my letter of the 24th March last, asking for four weeks leave of absence, and your memo. to Adjutant General and his approval. I found it to-day in an envelope with other papers. In reply to your memo. of the 27th inst., that the General Officer Commanding had directed you to call on me for an explanation of my reasons for neglecting to comply with paragraph 118 by leaving Canada for the United States without previous leave, I beg to say that (if you have any such instructions) I have no further reasons to give than what is contained in my letter of the 24th March last from Battle Creek. I have yet to learn that under such circumstances it was incumbent on me to obtain leave from any one before going to Battle Creek as I did, or that a volunteer officer is obliged to obtain any leave before going to the United States temporarily on his civil business.

Now, to cut the matter short, the next notice that he received was that he had been placed on the list of dismissed officers of the militia force of Canada. I do not defend the language of Col. Lazier in all particulars, but this correspondence certainly shows that there is creeping into the force in Canada a dogmatic spirit, an autocratic spirit, which is seeking to enforce the petty discipline of the regular service in connection with the rural militia, which is something that we shall not tolerate. I would simply draw the attention of the Minister of Militia to the case of Col. Lazier, as well as to the other cases that I have mentioned, the case of Capt. Manley, the case of Capt. Harston, and the case of Quartermaster Elliott, of the Grenadiers, and to that of other officers, some of whom have been too fairly treated, and others unfairly treated, as a result of the Major General's conduct as commanding officer of the militia of Canada. I would also respectfully draw his attention to the fact that by placing the rural corps on the list of those not to be drilled for this year, he is doing a great injury to the volunteer force of this country. It would have been much better to omit the drill of the permanent corps, fully two-thirds of whom have nothing at stake in this country, who are not controlled by the same spirit as are the volunteers in upbuilding the force, and in no sense can be compared to the ordinary volunteer force, except in mere routine drill. His proper course would be to drill the volunteers annually, and he could still effect a large saving in money. So far as the reinstatement of the Adjutant General is concerned, I am pleased to know that the matter has received the prompt attention of the Minister of Militia, and I understand he has given an assurance that the Adjutant General will not be considered as having been suspended, or placed under arrest at all. In regard to the other matters, I know they are questions requiring inquiry and considerable research, possibly further consideration, although I trust not demanding a court of inquiry, and I am satisfied they are not going to be allowed to be dropped but will be probed to the bottom, until the officers are allowed to meet the charges made against them, and not be prevented from gaining promotion.

Mr. DENISON. Col. Powell is an old personal friend of mine, and I have the highest respect for him. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) made a statement which I am satisfied Col. Powell would not wish to pass without correction, when he stated that the colonel had served for a number of years in the militia before he obtained the position of Deputy Adjutant-General.

Mr. TISDALE. I said Col. Powell was in the old militia, before the Militia Act was passed.

Mr. DENISON. I accept the correction, because I am sure Col. Powell would not wish it to go forth that he was an old officer of the militia before being appointed Adjutant General, if such was not the fact. We have had a long speech from the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes), in which he made a number of charges against the General, more especially in connection with the department. I, for one, would like to say that we must not forget that the General is a stranger here and it may be popular perhaps to attack him, and he has not a proper opportunity to defend himself. The General is acknowledged in the old country to be an officer of excellent parts. He served through two campaigns, and I am sure ever since he has been in Canada he has endeavoured to do his duty to the best of his ability. He has, I know, improved wonderfully the status of the permanent corps here, and I am also satisfied that he has done a great deal to improve the position of the militia. Every good soldier knows that criticism is in order, and if the Major General is a little sharp in his criticism and even if such criticism is not wholly deserved, it should be accepted by soldiers, and they should not grumble unnecessarily. As to the remarks about Major Manley and Capt. Harston made by the last speaker, I think those are questions which had better be left to the department than taken up and discussed in this House.

Mr. HUGHES. We have had them before the department for the last two years.

Mr. DENISON. I am satisfied that in the case of those two officers the colonel commanding the battalion must have recommended the promotion of those officers, and if so, the blame should attach more to the colonel of the regiment than to the officer commanding the militia. Naturally the officer commanding the militia must be guided by the officers commanding the battalion. He knows that if the officer commanding the battalion recommend certain promotions, for instance, from a paymaster to a major, while the Major General commanding might have a right to object, he would of course not do so without very strong reasons existing.

Mr. HUGHES. But the officers overridden have a right to learn the objections raised against them.

Mr. DENISON. They can appeal to the Major General commanding and to the Minister of Militia for information.

Mr. HUGHES. No.

Mr. DENISON. They have a right to do so, and no doubt they will get all the particulars of the charges.

Mr. HUGHES. They have done so—I repeat my statement. Those officers have taken all these precautions, but their applications have been refused.

Mr. DENISON. However that may be, I am not going to take up the time of the House in discussing this matter; but I merely wish to put in a word for the Major General, who is doing his duty here, and is rendering good service to the militia service of Canada.

Mr. MULOCK. I rise merely to supplement briefly some of the references made by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) with respect to the case of Lieut.-Col. Lazier. I congratulate the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) upon his remarks with respect to the service of the volunteers as compared to that of a regular soldier, and with his description I concur. I am sorry I cannot altogether approve of the spirit in which the criticisms of the Major General has been directed by some of the militia officers, who as members of this House are within their rights in criticising, however severely, any person engaged in the public service. However, I have no reason to commend or support the officer commanding. I presume he is a soldier who will be able to take care of himself, and if not, he well knows how to take the punishment to which a soldier is sometimes entitled. I rise, however, rather to supplement the case made on behalf of Lieut.-Col. Lazier. I having mentioned to the Minister of Militia that on the first opportunity, namely, on going into Supply to-day I would allude to this case. I am glad on behalf of the officer commanding to know that however unfit he may be to deal with his fellow-men, he at least is entirely efficient in the field. We have that certificate from the hon. member from North Victoria (Mr. Hughes), and a high authority he is in matters military, for I remember that during the last few months I read of a bloody engagement said to have taken place in the town of Lindsay, and this incident in Canadian history will ever redound to the credit of those connected with the militia force when it is remembered that an officer, single-handed, escaped from Mrs. Maloney and left with her nothing but the shreds of a coat tail, and I believe the explanation was that this officer was anxious to make the best time possible to the 'Warder' office, so that a rival newspaper might not obtain a "scoop." We will accept that testimony as to the efficiency of the commanding officer, and no doubt the people will rest in their beds securely knowing that however unfit the commanding officer may be to control his fellow-men, he will secure peace, order and good government within the confines of Canada. The hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) terminated the reading of a document with which he favoured the House at the place where, I think, so far as this House is concerned, he should have begun it. It is not fair to try any person on the floor of this House by an ex parte statement. I have had placed in my hands a statement of the rights or wrongs of the case of Lieut.-Col. Lazier. But one story is good until another is told, and while I have implicit confidence in the accuracy of the statement I have received, I recognize British fair-play, and I am not going to assume that any one is absolutely guilty unless he has had an opportunity of proving his innocence, and most of all do I deplore an occurrence such as that of an officer taking advantage of his position in this House to make an unfair attack on an absentee. In saying this I wish it to be distinctly understood that the officer commanding must be held responsible, and every one else in authority in the Canadian militia must be held responsible in a proper way for the fair and proper discharge of their duties. I take this general ground as a member of this House: that whatever wrong may be done, whatever grievance may arise in respect to the administration of the affairs of the militia, the person for us to hold responsible on the floor of Parliament is the Minister of Militia. He is the person towards whom in the first place our criticisms should be directed, and I am sure he will be the last one to seek to evade his ministerial responsibility. Officers may dismiss, and officers may suspend, but ultimately the responsibility rests upon the Government of the day who are supremely accountable, and they in the last instance must bear the full responsibility for all that has taken place. I say, therefore, that the correspondence read by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes), considering where it was read, fell short at the point where it should have been begun, for I am told that after Col. Lazier was dismissed he addressed a letter to the Minister of Militia and received a reply; copies of both letters I will read by and by. I am assuming that the Minister of Militia, as the head of the militia of Canada, is the one responsible to the people of Canada for what has taken place, and in that case I think I can say without fear of contradiction, that Lieut.-Col. Lazier's record in connection with the militia of Canada, has been an eminently patriotic one. I have not the honour of his personal acquaintance. My whole communication with him has been to receive a narrative of the facts in connection with the case—whether correct or incorrect it will be for others to say—and it is a statement which I presume has been handed to other members of the House. If I am correctly advised, Col. Lazier identified himself with the militia of Canada nearly thirty years ago, and gave both time and money to the promotion of the welfare of the service, and more particularly, the 15th Battalion, Argyle Light Infantry. That his connection with the service has not been discreditable is proved by the fact that on all occasions when the country stood in need of her volunteers, the 15th Argyle Light Infantry were always at the post of honour, and when not allowed as a battalion to take part, it contributed its quota as fully as circumstances admitted for the purpose of restoring peace and order in the land. Not only so, but I am told that from the officers of that battalion have graduated some excellent men, who fill prominent positions in connection with the permanent corps of Canada. I am told that for twenty years Lieut.-Col. Lazier was in command of his battalion and that during that period, in season and out of season, he was ever active in promoting the welfare of the battalion, sparing neither his time nor his money, which perhaps he could ill afford, in the discharge of this high and patriotic public duty. I am told, Sir, that with this record, having done what no one will say was wrong, having placed at the disposal of a political party the use of the drill shed; the plans for inspection were disarranged, and friction sprung up, the result being that Col. Lazier tendered his resignation. Having taken this course, the first intimation that he had as to how his tendered resignation was received, came to him by a notice in the official 'Gazette' of Canada dismissing him from the service, and humiliating him in the eyes of the volunteers and in the eyes of the whole people of Canada. I trust that the Minister of Militia will have a satisfactory explanation of this to offer to the House, and I ask him to tell the House and the country: is it the case that an officer of this standing—I do not care what the standing of the officer may be, because if this be the treatment meted out to one, we have a right to assume that the like kind of treatment will be meted out to others—I ask the Minister to tell us: is it the practice of his department, when an officer under such circumstances as these, or under any circumstances, tenders his resignation, that the first intimation he receives, is the official notice that he is dismissed and practically disgraced from the service? If that is to be the rule then there is an end to the volunteer system. No one will wear Her Majesty's uniform in Canada, and be exposed to the risk of degradation in the eyes of his fellow-men at the arbitrary will of—whom it may be, I know not. By such a proceeding you discourage our militia force, and you make it unsafe for any man who values the approbation of his fellow-men to risk his reputation by being a volunteer. I direct the attention of the Minister especially to that point, and I want to know from him: why it was that the commanding officer of Her Majesty's 15th regiment of Canadian volunteers was dismissed without a word of explanation. I had no idea that a man in British territory was entitled to a trial whether he was in a civil or military position, that he was entitled to know who were his accusers and what the accusations were, and that he should have the privilege of being heard in self-defence. That is the common law wherever the British flag flies, and how is it then that this British principle was suspended in the case of Col. Lazier, and that up to this moment he has not been informed of the reasons for his dismissal. Now, Sir, this portion of the correspondence should have been submitted to the House. Col. Lazier states, that on the 6th of June, 1894, he directed the following letter to the Minister of Militia:—

BELLEVILLE, 6th June, 1894.

To the Honourable
The Minister of Militia.

SIR,—I learn with feelings of the deepest indignation of the indignity that has been offered me by the action of the Militia Department in dismissing me from the service without the formality of any sort of a trial or hearing. At no time has any notice been given me of any charge or complaint against me; and I am yet entirely unaware of the reasons for this extreme action. Truly, it is a new species of British justice and fair-play that any man (no matter how great a criminal he may be) shall be condemned without a hearing, or executed without a trial. I have worn Her Majesty's uniform too long, and with no discredit to it, or to the force, to submit tamely to this gross outrage. I have been for nearly thirty years in the service, and nearly twenty years in command of the battalion, and have spent thousands of dollars and no end of time, beside all the great worry and annoyance in keeping up a creditable organization, and I would naturally think that on retiring, to receive the thanks of the department for my services to the force; but instead, I am kicked out without knowing the reason why, and being perfectly sure that there is no good cause for such treatment.

I appeal to you, Sir, as the head of this important branch of Her Majesty's service, to set this grievous wrong right without the necessity of appealing elsewhere for justice.

The following is the reply:—

OTTAWA, 8th June, 1894.

SIR,—I am directed by the Honourable the Minister of Militia and Defence to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th instant, with reference to your retirement from the command of the 15th Battalion, and asking the Minister to see that justice is done you, and to say that the case is now receiving his consideration.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

E. F. JARVIS,
Private Secretary.

Lieut.-Col. S. S. LAZIER,
Belleville, Ont.

I am told that since that answer was sent, numerous applications have been made to the Minister of Militia on behalf of Col. Lazier for particulars of the charges on which he was dismissed; that these applications have been made not only to the Department of Militia, but directly to the Minister of Militia himself; and that up to the date of the letter to me, the 13th of July, no recognition of that reasonable and fair request has been made. Now, is there to be a system by which reports can be made against officers, and acted upon to the prejudice of officers, and those officers, as in this case, dismissed without being tried and without knowing the cause of their dismissal? Surely the Minister will be the first to settle public opinion on that question by declaring that no such practice shall be permitted to disgrace any department he presides over. I feel that there must have been a mistake; I feel sure that the Minister's sense of justice will revolt against this unfair treatment; and until he has a full opportunity of vindicating his action, I abstain from making any personal attack upon him; for I do not wish anything I have said at this moment to be so regarded. I wish what I have said rather to be regarded as an emphatic appeal to him to make known the circumstances that have led to these sad and unfortunate results. Less than this, I feel could not be my duty; and I now await an explanation from the Minister before resorting to any procedure that parliamentary practice may admit of.

Mr. SCRIVER. Mr. Speaker, though, unlike most of the hon. gentlemen who have up to this time taken part in this debate, I hold no position in the militia higher than that of a high private, yet, as the representative of a border county in which two efficient battalions of volunteers have existed for many years, and as the relative of young men who hold commissions in these volunteers, and, if I may be permitted to say so, as a relative of a man who laid down his young life at Batoche in the engagement which took place there, I feel a natural interest in the prosperity of the force. With regard to the incident which has led to this debate, I propose to say very little. All the facts connected with it have been so clearly set forth by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) that I think it must be evident to every man who has listened to his statement that the action of Major General Herbert towards the Adjutant General has been harsh, unjust and unwarranted. I think the hon. gentleman has made that clear by the relations which, under the law, subsisted between those two men. I cannot help saying that I have felt for a good while—because I have given some attention to these matters—that Major General Herbert, with his admitted qualifications in some respects for the position, lacks in other respects those qualifications necessary to make him an efficient and successful head of the volunteers of this Dominion. And just here I might be permitted to express the opinion that the results which have attended the policy which has been followed in this country for many years past, of importing from abroad a military officer to fill this position, has not been so successful as to warrant a continuance of it. My own opinion is that in the ranks of our own volunteers we have officers who are competent from a military point of view to fill the position efficiently and successfully, while in their better understanding of the volunteers and of what is demanded at the hands of the head of the force, they are better fitted for the position than men imported from abroad. I may say that I have watched with interest and close attention the career of Major General Herbert since he has come to this country, and while I am free to admit that he has shown energy, efficiency and capability, he has certainly not shown sound judgment in his intercourse with the volunteers, not only in the incidents which have been referred to to-day, but in other cases which have come under my own observation. I will not detain the House by going into details with regard to these; but I have been compelled to feel that the Major General lacks some of those qualifications necessary for the high position he fills. I think the conclusion come to this year with reference to the rural battalions—a conclusion for which I suppose we may fairly hold the Major General responsible—is unfortunate, especially in the border counties, where, if anywhere, it is important that we should have efficient battalions. The condition of these battalions for some years past has been waning, and there has been nothing in the treatment they have received from the predecessors of the present Major General, or from the Major General himself, to encourage the men who have been making sacrifices in the past to endeavour to keep up the efficiency of these battalions, to pursue that course in the future. I say I regret very much that it has been determined this year not to call out those battalions. I believe it will be a serious blow to their efficiency; and it is mainly to express that opinion that I have risen to say a few words on this occasion.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Mr. Speaker, I think the discussion in which we have been engaged, and which originated with the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), is to a certain extent premature. Col. Powell was suspended by the Major General. Upon his reinstatement, I gave instructions that he should be furnished with copies of the charges upon which his suspension was based. Those charges have been furnished Colonel Powell, but I have not yet received his answer, and not having received Colonel Powell's written statement in reply, the question is one into which I cannot go to-day. As to my having recognized the power of the Major General to suspend Colonel Powell, because I courteously requested him to retrace his action in that respect, I deny that in any sense that is a recognition of the Major General's power to suspend. At the same time, I may say that that is a question in dispute, and that in England an officer similarly situated would have the power to suspend and place under arrest, and that power of placing under arrest, if exercised, would have been a much greater humiliation to Colonel Powell than what took place. I do not think it is necessary for the efficiency of the force that I should come to any decision as to whether the power of suspension exists in Canada on the part of the Major General commanding our militia. When I said that Colonel Walker Powell would not suffer any pecuniary loss by his temporary suspension, I did not intend it to be understood that I have come to the decision that the Major General has not the power to suspend. That depends on whether certain military laws apply to Canada or not, and that question I will submit to those in whose opinion I would have confidence. Colonel Powell has been requested to furnish a reply to the charges, and I expect shortly to have a written report from him, which, if the House is not sitting, I will submit to the Governor General in Council, to decide what further action may be deemed necessary in relation to that incident. Major General Herbert, as has been well said by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison), is not here to defend himself, and as the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has also truly said, after all I am responsible for his actions, and I am willing to assume the responsibility when I endorse them, after full consideration of what has been done. But we must remember that Major General Herbert is, as has been said—though I do not wish to call any man a stranger who wears the Queen's uniform—not intimately acquainted with the affairs of Canada as we are, and has to learn something of the characteristics of the people; but this I must say of him: that he is governed by a sense of duty, that he is a thorough soldier, and that whatever may be said against him, his sole aim in Canada, I honestly believe, is to promote the efficiency of our militia. Whatever else may be said, the career of Major General Herbert as a soldier, has been a distinguished one. He is a man who desires to do his duty, and my intercourse with him has inspired me with respect for his fixity of purpose and thorough efficiency in his profession. As regards some of the charges brought by my hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Hughes), they refer to cases that took place before I took charge of the department. I will take up the cases as he has stated them. The case of Major Manley is one in which I took a considerable degree of interest, and had it been in my power, I think I would have prevented that officer being superseded. I regret that that action was taken, and I repudiate all responsibility for it. However, Major Manley has now retired, and I do not think he is anxious to have his name brought up in connection with this matter. In the case of Captain Harston, it is reported to me that his supersession was due to a reduction in the establishment, under General Orders of the 19th August, 1892, but not satisfied with that information, I have officially conveyed, through the Deputy Minister of Militia, to the Major General, a letter from Captain Harston, demanding the reasons for his suspension, and I have asked that a full explanation be given. Captain

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron).

Harston will be furnished with a copy of whatever communication I may receive, and that also will be a subject for the approval or condemnation of this House, on a future occasion. Captain Hay was promoted upon the recommendation of the colonel commanding the battalion. As a general rule, I believe that promotions should go by seniority, but there may be cases where it would be very undesirable to rigidly enforce that rule. I think the gallant colonels who have addressed the House today, and even my bellicose friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) will admit that there may be occasions when it would not be for the efficiency of a battalion to carry out rigidly the rule of seniority. The appointment of Colonel Mason was made in the regular course of seniority, and was in accord with the recommendation of the officer previously in command of the battalion.

Mr. HUGHES. I made no objection to the promotion of Major Mason to the command of the battalion, but to his being brought back to that regiment in an informal way and made a major over the old officers.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I am not aware of any irregularity in bringing back Major Mason from the retired list. I understand that he had formerly been an officer in the regiment, had accompanied it to the North-west, had distinguished himself there for his bravery and efficiency, had been wounded in an engagement, and, by the unanimous desire of the regiment, came back again. All these events, and his appointment as major, occurred under my predecessor, and I am not as familiar with the facts as I would wish to be for the information of my hon. friend and this House. As regards Captain Finlayson, and this also occurred under my predecessor, my information is that he was brought back from the retired list in consequence of an application made to the Minister of Militia by the officer commanding the Prince of Wales' Regiment. As regards the promotion of Colonel Egan, that also took place under the administration of the Hon. Mr. Bowell. He was a well-qualified officer, and was promoted to the command of the 63rd Battalion in the regular course of promotion by seniority. As regards some of the statements made by my hon. friend from North Victoria respecting the amalgamation of certain battalions in Montreal, I really do not see why that should come up here. Nothing has been done in that regard. I may say that if the volunteer officers misled Major General Herbert as to their views and wishes, and then changed their minds, they could not expect the General to change his. The officers in command of the two battalions in Montreal consented to the amalgamation, and Major General Herbert recommended that amalgamation to me, but I refused to carry it out, because, after full consideration, I did not think it in the interest of the force or of the battalions in question. I did not wish to see a historic battalion like the Prince of Wales' wiped out, and its name forgotten, by an amalgamation with another corps. But the officers commanding these regiments should not go behind Major General Herbert's back. They should not, having given consent to the proposition, seek, by underhand means, to retreat from the course they had assumed, and which they led General Herbert to suppose was the proper course. That is not soldierly conduct on the part of these gentlemen. As to the case of Colonel Lazier, the facts are these: When the general orders were read to me some time ago, among the cases was the dismissal of Colonel Lazier. I then asked for an explanation, and as the hon. gentleman has brought the case up and given it publicity, I have no hesitation in giving a summary of the facts. All the facts will be furnished to Colonel Lazier, and we will see how he can answer them and what the officer commanding the district will say in reply. I may say that I am personally unknown to Colonel Lazier, and that this is not a case in which Major General Herbert and Colonel Lazier have come into antagonism. Major General Herbert has only met Colonel Lazier once, and that in an unofficial manner. Colonel Lazier's dismissal was carried out in consequence of the complete disorganization of the battalion under his command, which had arisen from his neglect of his duties. A year ago, during the session of 1893, at the request of some of the officers of the battalion, I wiped out a large amount of arrears which existed owing to the deficiencies in equipment, and in other respects, and started that battalion on a new career. And, notwithstanding that, it is reported to me that large deficiencies exist in the clothing, arms and accoutrements, though the regimental stores were completed ten months ago. The regulations and orders for the militia have not been carried into effect. No books or records of regimental funds, or Government stores have been kept. The caretaker of the regimental armoury has not been paid, though an allowance for the care of arms has been drawn. When called upon by the Deputy Adjutant General to account for his conduct in this regard, Colonel Lazier acted in an insubordinate manner and refused to reply to official communications from the Deputy Adjutant General. On the reporting of these facts by the Deputy Adjutant General, Colonel Lazier was reported for dismissal by the Major General commanding. I have this to say to the militia officers of Canada; if they want the militia force to be kept up they must be submissive to discipline. The mere fact of a man being twenty or thirty years in the service does not justify him in bearing himself towards his superior officer in an insubordinate manner. Colonel Lazier ought to have been all the more submissive to discipline from the fact that he was an old and experienced officer. I have had the privilege of seeing old and much more distinguished officers than Colonel Lazier, men who have served in the regular army, and have observed them in their intercourse with General Herbert. I have seen how they have borne reprimand, and the respectful way in which they bear themselves though they may think they are not in the wrong. Instead of writing to the Deputy Adjutant General, as he did, and using such expressions as "petty impertinence," if Colonel Lazier had taken the trouble to communicate with the Major General, an investigation would have taken place, and the fullest justice would have been done him. He should have set an example to the young officers of his regiment of subordination to discipline. If that is not done, we cannot maintain a militia force. I trust that Colonel Lazier's case will do good instead of, as the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has suggested, doing harm to the militia force. The members of the militia force are under service. The privates are sworn in for a period of years, and the officers are there under obligation to carry out their duty under the Militia Act and the rules and the regulations of the service. They have got to live up to their obligations or retire from the service, for we are not going to have a mob and pretend that we have a militia. The work of the militia is not a camping-out like a Knights of Pythias excursion, and we want the distinction to be understood. No one can be more leniently disposed than I am, no one has less wish to hurt the feelings of any man than I have. It was no pleasure to me to see a gentleman whom I had never met dismissed from the service, but the information furnished me was such that I did not believe I was justified in reversing the decision of the Major General in the case. Colonel Lazier will be furnished with all the charges against him by the Deputy Adjutant General—

Mr. MULOCK. You are going to try him now that you have dismissed him.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I do not know what course we may take, but we will take the course that will be most favourable to Colonel Lazier, consistent with the rules of the service. He will not be handicapped.

Mr. MULOCK. Suppose it should be found that all these charges that have been made to the Minister upon which this officer has been dismissed are untrue, what would the action of the department be? The officer, in his communication says there is no reason for his dismissal, that there is no foundation for the charges made against him. Surely he should have had a trial before he was dismissed. What is the practice of the service?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Such a case has never come before me, and I cannot say what the practice is. But if it should be satisfactorily established that this gentleman had been unfairly treated, I should set him right, as I did in the case of Colonel Powell. I do not think a man can fly in the face of all authority, and then, because he is a person of some local importance, claim immunity from the consequences of his act. I do not think it would be possible to maintain any efficiency in our militia if that principle were adopted.

Mr. MULOCK. You take the ex parte statement as final.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I do not think you expect a civilian at the head of the department to override the action of the Deputy Adjutant General and the Major General commanding in that case, particularly as a prima facie case of insubordination on the part of the officer was shown. My hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) has referred to the rural militia in connection with the annual drill not going on this year. I thought that, in view of the fact that we were expending a very large amount of money to furnish the militia with the new rifle, the House had approved of the annual drill being done away with for one year. I have not heard of any fault found with this action, directly or indirectly. I wish my hon. friend to understand, and, in all justice to the Major General commanding, I must say that the Major General takes a warm interest in the rural battalions, and has frequently laid before me plans for the promotion of the efficiency of that branch of the service. I am sure that everything he can do to promote the welfare of the rural corps will be done. He has proposed to me a scheme, which we are thinking of carrying out, of drilling the permanent force all in camp at Levis, and giving the non-commissioned officers of the rural corps an opportunity to drill with them, which would be far more useful than a mere ten days' drill in camp. A great deal has been said on the subject of the militia force, and a wide field has been traversed, especially by my hon. friend from North Victoria. I can only say that I cannot agree with him as to the permanent force. I think they are productive of a great deal of good, and I think it is a mistake to say that they are such a great cost to the country. I am confident that if the officers and non-commissioned officers will avail themselves of the opportunities offered them, they will get a good training, in the schools of the permanent force, and the first step towards it has been taken by the regulations adopted a short time ago by which there are no promotions of provisional officers. Until recently, a man might be raised to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel, and be still a provisional officer, and never have obtained a certificate. But that has been abolished, and now no man can rise above the lowest rank of officers until he has passed his examination and obtained his certificate.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron).

qualifying him for promotion. I think that will have a good effect and will induce our officers to attend those schools of instruction which have been established for the benefit of the Canadian militia.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before this subject is disposed of, I want to say a word or two. I am not disposed to quarrel with the doctrine laid down by my hon. friend the Minister of Militia that if you are to have a militia force in this country, they must be subject to strict discipline, and must be made to understand that they must render proper obedience to the constituted authorities. There he is quite right, and I will add this, that of the two faults, I am inclined to think that it is better that the officer in command of the militia should err rather, perhaps, on the side of severity, than on the side of indiscriminate laudation, and that Major General Herbert, or whoever else happens to be in command of our force, is here for the purpose, so far as in him lies, of making that force efficient, and in doing that he may be very likely to tread on a good many people's corns. Nor should we be too severe in censuring his proceedings until we have very full information as to the rights and wrongs of any particular case. But the Minister of Militia made a statement just now with respect to Lieut.-Col. Lazier as to which we might be better informed. I do not know that gentleman any more than himself, but he has been subjected to, perhaps, the gravest penalty that can be inflicted upon an officer of his standing in the militia force, he has been publicly and ignominiously dismissed from the service. Of course, the charges the Minister of Militia has made are very grave indeed. He has stated that this officer, if I followed him correctly, had refused to acknowledge any communication made to him by the Deputy Adjutant General of his district; and, I think, he also stated that there were considerable deficiencies in the regimental accounts, and the books were not properly kept.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think the Minister said that.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I have no personal knowledge whatever of the matter, but I will read again the charges.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. However, if I am generally correct, that is not necessary.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Yes; you are correct.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Now, the point to which I want specially to draw the attention of the Minister, is this: As I said, this officer has been subjected to the most severe penalty, which it is in the power of the Government to inflict. I am no more than my hon. friend acquainted with the precise methods in which these penalties are inflicted in the regular service, but I should have thought that before that step was taken, some sort of court or inquiry would have been held, or some proceedings taken, and Col. Lazier given an opportunity, or at any rate warned that if he did not avail himself of the opportunity to clear himself, dismissal would follow. I did not understand that anything of that kind had taken place in this particular instance.

Mr. MULLOCK. He had no notice sent him, and was not informed of the charges.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. However that may be, I should think that the Department of Militia, or the officer in command, should have been able to say that these things were officially communicated to Col. Lazier, and that reasonable opportunity was given him to reply, and that he was informed of the consequence of his disobedience before the final step had been taken, although the position of our militia officers and that of those in the regular service, are not exactly analogous. I think no officer would be dismissed from Her Majesty's service or from the English volunteer force, without some such step having been taken. As I understand, the Minister of Militia in this case has acted entirely on the report made to him, and no communication directly from Col. Lazier has reached him. That is a point on which I should like to be advised. That is my understanding of the explanation of the hon. gentleman, that so far as he was concerned no statement whatever from Col. Lazier had been laid before him, but that he was informed that this officer had not responded to the communication made to him by the Deputy Adjutant General. Is that the case?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). That is correct.

Mr. MULLOCK. The Minister of Militia read the charges from a paper. Might I ask who the author of those charges is? Who is the writer of the paper that the Minister read from?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). That was a summary of the reports of the Deputy Adjutant General of the district, Col. Cotton.

Mr. O'BRIEN. With regard to the case of Col. Lazier, I think we ought to have some information as to what is the proper course to pursue in a case of that kind, because it seems to me that however objectionable, however worthy of condemnation, the conduct of Col. Lazier may have been, a final penalty should not have been inflicted without some sort of inquiry. I cannot understand the case to have been one of such extreme urgency, or to be attended with any such peculiar features, as to render it necessary to act without an inquiry. But I rise chiefly to say a word with regard to the Major General. While I think his action with reference to Col. Powell was, perhaps, utterly without justification, yet I desire to say, as an officer of the force who has had a pretty long experience in the force, that we have never had an officer at the head of it who has worked so hard and so zealously, and with so much intelligence, and with such a thorough appreciation of the conditions of the force, and of all the circumstances attending it, as the officer who at present commands it. It is all very well to say that a man must know all about this country, and all about this force, and that if he does anything which is contrary to our preconceived notions, he is necessarily in the wrong. I think that our force, and those officers in it who have its interests most at heart, will be only too glad to court criticism, and to ask a man who knows something about a force in a much larger sphere than ours, in what way his knowledge can be utilized to remove the evils which we know exist, and I am sorry to say that in our force, after all that can be said in its favour, there is a great deal that requires correction. I, for one, am only too glad to have the officer at the head of the force direct his ability and his knowledge to the correction of those evils. I say without any fear of contradiction, at any rate from those who have had any personal knowledge of the General, and of his manner of dealing with the force, that we have had no officer who has shown the same industry, and the same thorough knowledge of the duties that he had to perform, as General Herbert. And I will also say that his criticisms, and the changes that he has effected, have not been those which would naturally occur to a mere soldier, but they are also directed to affairs of administration. The result of the changes has been not only to promote discipline and to promote efficiency from a military point of view, but also to promote economy, something which hon. members of this House will regard as of great importance. I know that General Herbert has directed his attention to this point, and has endeavoured to prevent, even in the most minute details, anything like waste or useless expenditure of public money.

EXPENDITURE OF THE DOMINION.

Mr. CHARLTON. As this question with regard to the dismissal of Adjutant General Powell is finished, I wish to place, after a few remarks, a resolution in your hands with regard to a matter that will be of interest to the general public of Canada at the present moment, a matter that should be of interest to that public at any time. We have been discussing during this session at various times the increase in the public expenditure, and we have considered the condition of business affairs in Canada at large. The Government, at the opening of the session, declared their intention to relieve the country of a large number of the public burdens. They brought in the tariff, intended to lessen those burdens, to ameliorate the condition of the people, and the changes in the phases of that tariff from that time are well known to us all, and it is a question whether we have seen the last of those changes up to the present moment. We have since then had submitted for our consideration measures which will involve large additional expenditures, and the country in the face of the fact that we must face a declining revenue and a deficit this year, and probably next year, takes deep interest in questions of public expenditure, and the tax-paying people of the country, at least, will feel averse to this increase of burdens, unless such increase is absolutely necessary. I wish to point out to-night, before placing a motion in your hands, Mr. Speaker, that the increase in the expenditure of Canada, in the customs taxation of this Dominion, has been abnormally large, large beyond justification, and that this increased expenditure and the reckless management of our finances has placed Canada in the position where it is, in the highest degree, difficult to attempt to assume new burdens, and where it is still more difficult to attempt to remove from the shoulders of the people burdens that now rest on them. For these reasons, I propose to briefly review the financial history of Canada, in its broad and salient features, since Confederation was perfected in 1867. I propose to divide that portion of the history of Canada into three periods. The division is a natural one. The first period is from 1867, with a Conservative Government in power, to 1873, when a Reform Government took charge of the affairs of the country; the second period is during the time when a Reform Government managed the public affairs, namely, from 1873 to 1878; and the third period is from 1878, when the Liberal Government was defeated, and hon. gentlemen opposite occupied the Treasury benches, down to the close of the financial year 1893. This review, I may say at the outset, and by way of preface, will show, what is incontrovertible, that the management of public affairs during the first period under Conservative rule has been extravagant, the increase of expenditure large, and evidence of want of care and thrift in the management of financial affairs abundant, while, if the second period is compared with either the first or the third period, it shows results in a high degree favourable to the Government of that day, and commendable as regards that Government.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock I was about to make a comparison, first of taxation by customs; second, of expenditure in detail for the three periods already referred to, namely: the period from 1867 to 1873; the period from 1873 to 1878, and the period from 1878 to 1893. And, first, with regard to the taxation from customs. The amounts received from customs taxation in 1868 was $8,578,380. In 1873, the amount was $12,954,164, an increase in the period of five years of $4,357,784, or an average annual increase for that period of $871,556. For the second period, from 1873 to 1878, the customs taxation for the first year, 1873, was $12,954,164, and for the end of the second period in the year, 1878, $12,782,824, or a decrease in the customs taxation during that period of five years of $171,340; an annual average decrease of $34,268 for the second period, against an annual average increase of $871,556 for the first period. Then, for the third period, commencing 1878, the customs taxation for the year 1878 was $12,782,824, and for the last year, 1893, $20,954,003, or an increase during that period in customs taxation of $8,171,179, or an annual average increase of $611,412. Thus it will be seen that from the first period, from 1868 to 1873, under Conservative Government, the increase of customs taxation averaged $871,556 a year, and for the second period, under Liberal administration, from 1873 to 1878, the decrease in customs taxation averaged $34,268 a year; and for the third period under Conservative administration, from 1878 to 1893, the customs taxation increase averaged $611,412 a year. These figures are suggestive, Mr. Speaker. They show that the burden of taxation under this head diminished under the Mackenzie Administration, and they show that the burden of taxation under this head increased rapidly under Conservative administrations, both those preceding and those succeeding the Mackenzie Administration.

Next, with regard to the expenditure. The expenditure chargeable to Consolidated Fund was, 1868, the end of the first year after Confederation, $13,486,092; for the year 1873, the year in which Mr. Mackenzie took office, and for the expenditures of that year he was not responsible, it amounted to $23,316,316, or an increase of expenditure during this first period, from 1868 to 1873, of $9,830,224, an average annual increase in the expenditure of $1,966,044. Now, Mr. Speaker, when we contrast this with the expenditure under the Mackenzie Administration you will notice a marked check in the tendency to increased expenditure in this second period as compared with the first. Commencing with 1873, the first year of Mr. Mackenzie's term of office, the expenditure, as I have stated, was $23,316,316, and for the year 1878, the last year of his administration, the expenditure was $23,503,158, an increase of $186,000 in the period of five years, or an average annual increase of $37,368, as compared with an average annual increase of $1,966,044 for the previous period of five years. It may be said, and it may be urged very justly too, that a comparison taking the year 1873 and the year 1878, is not a strictly accurate one, because Mr. Mackenzie was not in office during the whole of the year 1873, and his term of office extended beyond the close of the fiscal year 1878. If this view of the case is considered of importance, naturally the calculation as to the actual increase in the expenditure during Mr. Mackenzie's administration would vary these figures but slightly, and would still leave a contrast highly favourable to the Mackenzie Administration. Mr. Mackenzie came into office on the 8th November, 1873, and he left office on the 10th October, 1878. He occupied office seven months and twenty-two days of the financial year ending on the 30th June, 1874, and he was responsible for the whole of the financial year of 1878. He left office, and his successors occupied office during eight months and twenty-one days of the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1879. Now, the Supply Bill of the Mackenzie Administration for the year ending 30th June, 1879, only three months and ten days of which they occupied the Treasury benches, was $23,669,000, and when we consider that when Mr. Mackenzie came into office in 1873 he had made the actual expenditure for that year $23,316,000, although the Supply Bill was $23,685,000—reducing the expenditure as compared with the Supply Bill $368,000—and that in no case during his term of office did his expenditure exceed his Supply Bill, I think I am warranted in saying that the Supply Bill, amounting to $23,669,000 for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1879, would have been found sufficient by the Mackenzie Government had they remained in power. If that is correct, the actual increase of expenditure during the Mackenzie Administration would have been $352,684, or slightly in excess of the amount as shown in the comparison between the years 1873 and 1878.

Now, when we take the controllable expenditure under the Mackenzie Administration, we find that the controllable expenditure in the year 1873-74 was $8,324,176. The controllable expenditure in 1877-78 was $6,542,510, so that the Mackenzie Government during that five years secured a decrease in the controllable expenditure of $1,781,566, or an annual average decrease in the controllable expenditure of $356,313. This is a record that no Administration of the affairs of Canada can show except the Administration of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie. Now, I propose to ask the House to look for one moment at the conditions under which this reduction in the controllable expenditure was secured by the Mackenzie Administration. This reduction was secured in the face of the fact that while the interest on the public debt in 1872 was $5,209,205, in 1877-78 it was $7,048,883, or an increase during that period of $1,839,678. Now, the charge is often made that the Mackenzie Government largely increased the debt, and that the increase of the debt, measured by this increase in the interest, was a proof of recklessness on the part of that Government in its administration of the fiscal affairs of the country. On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, the Mackenzie Government, in adding to the public debt of Canada, were simply compelled to carry out the obligations entered into by their predecessors, and were responsible for expenditures upon capital account to the extent only of a little over $100,000, the sum spent on the St. Peter's Canal. With that slight exception, all the large increase of debt during the time of the Mackenzie administration was caused by the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway, which was not half completed when Mr. Mackenzie came into office; by the expenditure on the enlargement of our canal system, which was in progress and largely unfinished when he came into office; and by the expenditures on the Canadian Pacific Railway. These and other public contracts for which Mr. Mackenzie was not responsible, but for the carrying out of which he was responsible as the administrator of public affairs, account for the entire increase of the debt during his administration, except for the paltry sum of $100,000 to $200,000. Still, in the face of all this, so great was the economy with which he managed public affairs that he actually reduced the controllable expenditure during his term of office by the sum of $1,781,566.

Now, we will take the expenditure for the third period, from 1878 to 1893. The expenditure in 1877-78 was $23,503,158, the last year for which Mr. Mackenzie was responsible. In 1892-93 the expenditure was $36,814,152, an increase of $13,310,894, or an average annual increase of $889,393. These figures do not need to be enlarged upon; they tell their own story; in the taxation by customs an enormous increase in the first period, an actual decrease in the second, and an enormous increase in the third; expenditure on Consolidated Account—a very great increase in the first period, a trifling increase in the second period, and an increase of over $13,000,000 in the third period. These figures, I say, do not need to be enlarged upon, and they illustrate most eloquently the truth of the assertion I make, that Mr. Mackenzie's Administration was an economical, prudent, honest administration, and that the other administrations, the one preceding and the one succeeding the Mackenzie Administration, were the reverse. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said before you left the Chair at six o'clock, the question of the management of the finances of Canada and the policy of the Government with regard to the expenditure of money which the people of this country have to contribute in taxation, are matters of great interest to the people. The people pay the taxes; they foot the bills. The money may be squandered; the Government may vote millions for this purpose or that; they may expend large sums of money to advance their own political interests, or to enrich their favourites; they may indulge in foolish investments. All these things they may do; all these things they do; all these bills must be footed by the people at last. Every dollar of expenditure, whether the money is carefully expended or lavishly expended, or fooled away, the hardy taxpayer has to pay; and the taxpayer is beginning to realize that he has a direct interest in this matter, and he is beginning to scrutinize with greater closeness than heretofore what the character of the Government is.

The tax-payer in making up his mind, if he is an intelligent investigator as to the financial character of the Government and as to its financial policy, would very naturally make comparisons with the fiscal affairs of other countries. Now, in making these comparisons as a taxpayer myself, I have often been struck with the great disparity that exists and has existed between the expenditures of this small country, with its 5,000,000 inhabitants, and the expenditures of the larger country to the south of us; and I have compared, and will compare to-night, the expenditure of Canada with the expenditure of the United States during different periods in the history of that country, to show how striking the disparity is between the expenditures of that country and our own. I would first take that period in the history of the United States when its population corresponded almost exactly with ours at the present time—the year 1800, when the United States had a population of 5,308,000, probably 300,000 in excess of ours at this moment. The expenditure of the United States in that year was $10,813,000, or a trifle more than one-fourth of the present expenditure of Canada. In 1820 the United States had a population of 9,600,000, nearly double the present population of Canada, and an expenditure of $18,285,535; or, with double our population they got along with one-half the amount of our expenditure. In 1840 the population of the United States was 17,059,000, and the expenditure $24,314,000; or, with three and a half times our population, they got along with two-thirds the amount of our present expenditure. It was not until the decade ending with the year 1850 that the expenditure of the United States crossed the line of our present expenditure and exceeded it. In 1850 the population of the United States was 23,191,870 and the expenditure $40,948,383; or, with a trifle less than five times our population, they got along with 12 per cent more than our expenditure. Now, these are very striking comparisons. They illustrate perhaps why that country has progressed so rapidly. They illustrate the fact that that country has hitherto been a country with a light burden of taxation and a light burden of expenditure; and if we, in our infancy, with 5,000,000 people, are spending four times as much money as the United States expended under similar circumstances, we may justly say that the comparison is most unfavourable to ourselves, and that it illustrates and proves the assertion that our management of our finances has been reckless and imprudent. Now, I would also point out the condition of things that exists in that country to-day compared with the condition of things that exists in Canada. I propose to take the total expenditure of the United States, and deduct from that the abnormal items which it will be necessary to deduct in order to make a comparison between their case and ours. I would deduct from that expenditure the charge for pension, the charge for military schools and the charge for naval expenditure, and I will deduct from our own expenditure the corresponding items, and will then see how the balance corresponds. In 1893 the total expenditure of the United States was as follows:—

UNITED STATES.
Total expenditure	$459,374,887
Pensions.....	$159,357,557
Military.....	49,641,773
Naval.....	30,136,084
	239,135,414

Balance..... $220,239,473

Now, our own expenditure last year was $36,814,052. Out of this we paid:

Pensions.....	$90,309
Military expenditure	1,419,745
Ocean and river service.....	193,349
Mounted Police	615,479
Total	$2,318,882

or, after deducting these items from our expenditure, to make it correspond with that of the United States, after deducting their expenditure on pensions and the military and navy, we find an expenditure in this country of $34,495,230, against an expenditure of $220,239,473 by the United States. Or, considering that they have thirteen times our population, that shows an expenditure of $2 per head in this country, against $1 per head in the United States, with its enormous interests and its expansion up to this time. That, I contend, is a comparison in the highest degree unfavourable to Canada. It shows that, eliminating from the expenditure of this country, the items corresponding with pensions and military and naval charges in the United States, the expenditure in Canada is $2 per head, against $1 per head in the United States. What are the reasons for this disparity? I may allude to three or four of them. We have a habit of building post offices and other public buildings in little towns like La Prairie—little places of 2,000 or 3,000 inhabitants, whereas, in the United States there are no public buildings erected except in large cities, where they are absolutely necessary. Then the United States has not the same number of interior ports of entry, of which we have a great number. In this country little villages, scattered along railways, are made interior ports of entry, without the slightest justification, and only to reward political favourites by furnishing them with places of collectors, tide-waiters, &c. with sub-collectors, &c. Then the United States has fewer civil servants than we. We load up our service with three or four times as many clerks as we require, at the same rate as our own, would have 3,809. Yet they have only 440, or a trifle more than we, although they have 67,000,000 inhabitants, in all probability, as compared with 5,000,000 in Canada. Further, in the United States there is no superannuation law, whereas, we have one which costs us $200,000 or $300,000 a year of our revenue. Having gone over these general grounds, I propose briefly, in conclusion, to make a few comparisons in the growth of expenditure in certain of the public departments, the expenditure in which may be termed controllable expenditure. Let me take, first, the administration of justice. The population of this country increased probably between 1878 and 1893 less than 20 per cent, probably about 19 per cent, but 20 per cent is an outside figure. I shall show the increase in dollars and the increase in percentages in each of the expenditures I intend to cite, and I wish it to be borne in mind, in each case, that I compare them with an increase in population in round numbers of 20 per cent, during the period with which we are dealing. The cost of

is as follows:—

1878.....	$564,920
1893.....	736,457

Increase, $171,537. Percentage of increase 30 per cent, against an increase of 20 per cent in the population, which we will find to be very moderate indeed. The expenditure on ARTS, AGRICULTURE AND STATISTICS.

1878.....	$ 92,365
1893.....	258,635

Increase, $166,270; percentage, 180, or nine times faster than the increase in population.

FISHERIES.

1878.....	$ 93,262
1893.....	482,381

Increase, $389,119; percentage of increase, 417, or about 21 times that of the increase in population.

QUARANTINE.

1878.....	$ 26,340
1893.....	101,954

Increase, $76,610; percentage, 287, or fourteen times greater than the increase in population.

INDIANS.

1878.....	$ 421,503
1893.....	956,552

Increase, $535,049; percentage of increase, 126, or six times greater than the percentage of increase in the population. And I suppose that this large increase can be partly accounted for by the fact that it costs us $46 out of every $100 we spend upon the Indians to pay the officials who spend the money, indicating the same degree of prudence, care, economy and thrift, as is substantially shown in almost every department of our public service.

LEGISLATION.

1878.....	$618,035
1893.....	867,231

Increase, $249,196; percentage of increase, 40 per cent, or double the increase in population, which is very moderate, under the circumstances.

MILITIA AND DEFENCE.

1878.....	$ 618,136
1893.....	1,419,745

Increase, $801,609; percentage of increase, 129, or six times that of the increase in population.

PUBLIC WORKS.

1878.....	$ 997,469
1893.....	1,927,832

Increase, $930,363; percentage of increase, 93, or five times faster than that of the population.

SUPERANNUATION.

1878.....	$100,588
1893.....	263,710

Increase, $157,122; percentage of increase, 147, or seven times faster than the increase in population.

EXCISE.

1878.....	$215,024
1893.....	387,673

Increase, $172,649; percentage of increase, 80 per cent, or four times faster than the percentage of increase in our population.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES GOVERNMENT.

1878.....	$ 18,199
1893.....	276,446

Increase, $258,247; percentage of increase, 1420 per cent, or seventy-one times faster than the increase in population.

MAIL SUBSIDIES AND STEAMSHIP SUBVENTIONS.

1878.....	$257,534
1893.....	413,938

Increase, $156,404; percentage of increase, 60; or three times greater than the increase of population.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT.

1878.....	$ 823,369
1893.....	1,367,570

Increase, $544,201, percentage of increase, 66; or somewhat more than three times greater than the increase of population.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD.

1878.....	$ 5,964
1893.....	24,249

Increase, $18,285; percentage of increase, 306; or fifteen times greater than the increase of population.

MISCELLANEOUS EXPENDITURE.

1878.....	$ 62,968
1893.....	284,478

Increase, $221,510; percentage of increase, 359, or 17½ times greater than the increase of population.

MOUNTED POLICE.

1878.....	$334,748
1893.....	615,479

Increase, $280,731; percentage of increase, 83, or four times more than the increase of population. Now, these perhaps are dry figures, Mr. Speaker, but they must have some little poetry for the people who have to pay the bill. Under these various items, the total expenditure was as follows:—

1878.....	$ 5,256,424
1893.....	10,384,272

Increase, $5,127,846; percentage of increase, 97, or five times more than the increase of population. Gentlemen opposite have increased the expenditure to the extent of five millions of dollars under these heads, and they have increased that expenditure practically five times faster than they ought to have done, and five times faster than they would have done had they administered the affairs of this country with economy, prudence, and care, that characterized the administration of our affairs under Alexander Mackenzie and his colleagues. Now, Sir, the purpose evidently is not to retrace our steps, not to correct the course we have been pursuing but to keep right on. We had that purpose made manifest in the policy announced by the Government this session, in its proposition to establish a fast Atlantic service, and for this purpose, to add $750,000 a year to the burdens of the people, with the prospect of increase for making more efficient the Pacific service and the possibility of a large increase, because the amount may be found to be inadequate. I do not propose to detain the House longer than is absolutely necessary. I wish to place in as bald and as colourless a manner as possible before the House and the country the facts that I have been dealing with. While I say that I believe it is necessary in the interests of the country that they shall call a halt, I fear they will not do so. I beg to move:

That all the words after the word "That" be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—"the amount of taxation by Customs duties in Canada was $12,782,824 in 1878, and was $20,954,003 in 1893: an increase of $8,171,179.

That the expenditure of Canada on account of Consolidated Fund was $23,503,158 in 1878, and was $36,814,052 in 1893; an increase of $13,310,894.

That the expenditure on account of Administration of Justice, Arts, Agriculture and Statistics, Fisheries, Quarantine, Indians, Legislation, Militia and Defence, Public Works, Superannuation, Excise, North-west Territories Government, Mail Subsidies and Steamship Subventions, Civil Government, Adulteration of Food, Miscellaneous and Mounted Police, amounted to $5,256,424 in 1878, and to $10,384,272 in 1893, an increase of $5,127,846, or 97 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON.

That while the increase of the population of Canada from July 1st, 1878, to July 1st, 1893, did not exceed 20 per cent; the increase of Customs taxation for the same period was 63 per cent, and the increase of expenditure for the same period was 56 per cent.

That this House expresses regret that the increase of Customs taxation and of expenditure should have been permitted to reach a ratio three times greater than the increase of population since 1878; that the controllable expenditure should have been permitted to reach a still higher ratio of increase, and that no inconsiderable portion of the annual expenditure has been absorbed by grants made for party or political purposes, and not in the public interest; and that this House expresses the opinion that the enormous annual expenditure places a burden upon Canada so serious in amount that strict honesty and rigid economy in the future management of the finances of the Dominion should be practiced, with a view to lessening the public burdens.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman moved this motion with any idea that he would inveigle me into a long discussion upon the financial condition of the country at this period of the session and of the year, I fear he is doomed to disappointment. There was a time when the hon. gentleman had a cooler season and a more convenient opportunity. When we make the Budget address and go into an exposition of the financial position of the country, is the time when an argument with reference to these points my hon. friend has brought up, would be particularly opportune. But the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, whenever the Budget is introduced, forget the real object of a Budget speech, and the real line of criticism of a Budget speech, and they immediately switch themselves off on to a long, heated and unprofitable discussion upon some one of the numerous commercial fads which from year to year they have alternately fathered and alternately buried. I can scarcely concede to the hon. gentleman, in view of the occasion he has chosen, that he means anything serious by projecting such an amendment as this upon the House. He says he is only actuated by a desire to place all the facts before the House and the country; but my private opinion publicly expressed is that I have scarcely ever listened to what purported to be a statement of the full facts in which there were so many fallacies, and a mere continuous one-sided presentation of figures that could be gleaned from the Public Accounts. The only object, it seems to me, the hon. gentleman had was to play to the galleries, and to place an ex parte statement before the country in the expiring hours of the session. I have sufficient faith in the clear-headedness and thoughtfulness of the people, to allow his statement to go out and be dissected by the electorate, without accompanying it with any lengthy exposition. He discredited the sincerity of his desire to make a cool and unimpassioned criticism, by his assumption that everything the Liberal-Conservative Government did in its first period of Government and in its second period of government was bad, and that everything the Liberal Government undertook to carry out was good. It also throws suspicion upon the sincerity of an advocate when he starts out to view two sides of a question with a predisposition to believe all that is against him is wrong, and all that he espouses is right. I will only touch upon one or two of the fallacies in his general argument, and there was none greater—and it will serve as a specimen of all—than his attempt to compare the expenditure of the United States in the year 1800, with a population somewhat greater than we have to-day, with the expenditure in the Dominion of Canada in 1893, with its population of some 5,000,000, and he tried to create the impression that because a people living in 1893, numbering 5,000,000, in the conditions which surround the business of nation building and nation maintenance, spent more than a people living in the year 1800, with the conditions and the circumstances surrounding civilization and the business of nation building at that time, it was an argument entirely to the disadvantage of the country making the larger expenditure in 1893. I do not think it is necessary to do more than mention those circumstances to show the utter fallacy of the argument. Why, look at the United States of America in 1800, with its limited extent of territory, with its 6,000,000 or 7,000,000 of people, and look at Canada, in 1893, with a territory 3,000 or 4,000 miles wide, with a broad strip of country along that whole width, and every mile of that country to be fed and cared for by the various services which a Government undertakes. Why, there is a presentment of the case which shows the utter fallacy of his position. How many railroads were built and run in 1800 by the Government of the United States? How much of a protective service, how much of an ocean and river service, how much of all these varied expenditures which grow and develop as civilization grows and develops, were undertaken by the United States in 1800? How many are due and cared for now? A comparison, to be fair, must cover two periods of time in about similar circumstances, with about a similar extent of territory, and with a similar sparseness of population. Now, I have shown the unfairness of the hon. gentleman's argument, and yet he would feign put that before the electorate, expecting them to be impressed by it. He evidently thinks them as superficial as himself, and I pity them if they do not think a little more deeply and a little more widely than he does. He seeks to put an argument like that before the electorate with which to curse his opponents and help himself and his party. Now, there is another point that he takes. He says—it is implied in his whole argument—that if your expenditure increases in greater proportion than your population, you are in a dangerous position. Well, there are a great many countries and a great many people in a dangerous position, if that rule is to be their condemnation. You will find many a family whose expenditure very often increases the least when the number of the family is increasing the most, and their expenditure often becomes greater when the increase in the family has entirely stopped. An increase of expenditure, growing out of the wants and needs of the family, becomes greater because of the circumstances and necessities which surround older persons with larger wants. It is exactly so with the business man, it is exactly so with the country, and it is the merest fallacy to pretend that a country is necessarily in a dangerous position when its expenditure is increasing faster than its population. Now he went over a number of expenditures in different departments, and showed that the increase was great, and that the expenditure at the present time was much larger than it was in Mr. Mackenzie's time. Granted that it was; that is no argument, one way or the other. The only fair way of pointing an argument would be to take the amount of money which was expended upon any service in 1873 and take the results that were accomplished by that money in 1873, then take the money that was expended upon that service in 1893, with the results that were accomplished with it in 1893, and then you will have the elements for a fair comparison, and in no other way can you get the elements of a fair comparison. The value of the work done in proportion to the amount of money expended on it is the test, and not simply the fact that in one year the expenditure upon a certain service was two or three times greater than it was twenty or thirty years before. The hon. gentleman condemned himself by the departments he took up, because he took up departments after department in which there was formerly a small or no expenditure as the departmental work was not born in his time, or it had not grown and extended. Take the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The expenditure in 1893 was much greater than in 1873 or 1874. Certainly; but how much more area is covered to-day than then, and how much greater work is done to-day than then. You have first to prove that the extension of the work and the lines on which it was extended were foolish and hurtful, or, at all events, useless, and that, therefore, the expenditure of money was useless. But has this been proved to be the case, that the better patrol of the coasts, the improved lighting facilities, the increased protection of the fisheries, the hatcheries, and the artificial methods which civilized countries now always bring to the aid of nature in the reproduction of fish, that all these extensions are of no use? If you do not prove this, you fail to establish your argument entirely, because you cannot have these services unless you pay for them, and the hon. gentleman has only exposed the poverty of the service in Mr. Mackenzie's time, and the richness of the service in 1893, unless he establishes these other points, when he declares that we expend more money than they did. Take the Agricultural Department. A few paltry thousands were spent in 1873-1874. What did they do? They simply paid some officials. But to-day, as regards agricultural interests the influence of the department is spread over the whole country. It has its experimental stations in every province, it is doing the work of disseminating the results of its experiments amongst thousands of our farmers. All this is an extension, and the fruits of the work are seen in the more intelligent interest manifested by the farmers in agricultural work, in the more intelligent methods they are pursuing, in the great expansion of dairy work that is taking place in this country, which is our boast, and which is one of our highest hopes for the future. The hon. gentleman referred to the Indians, and he said that because in Mr. Mackenzie's day the Indians cost so much, and a larger sum has been expended since, therefore there had been extravagance. How many Indians are taken care of now as compared with then; what is their condition now as compared with then? Hon. members must take all these matters into account. Take quarantine. The hon. gentleman, in his haste to put facts before the House, took one year's expenditure on quarantine during Mr. Mackenzie's time, a year when there was no cholera, and no signs of cholera, and he compared it with the year during the present Administration when the cholera scare was upon us, and when very large expenditures were being made. That is the way the hon. gentleman took when he essayed to make what he termed a cool and impartial statement of the finances of the country. I might go through the whole of his remarks in a similar fashion. I will take, however, only one or two more. From 1873 to 1878, the sinking fund averaged about $600,000; to-day it averages nearly $2,000,000. The hon. gentleman in his cool and impartial criticisms of the financial condition of the country forgot to mention in connection with that expenditure that the Conservative Government lays up about $2,000,000 a year against the debt, while the Mackenzie Government laid up only between $400,000 and $600,000 a year. The hon. gentleman said that taxation went down. Yes, it did—the Customs taxation. Why? Because trade sank almost to a vanishing point, and if you obtain the revenue mostly through the customs-house, and the amount diminishes by nearly half, the Customs taxation must go down; but the burden of taxation is just as heavy on the people who live in that impoverished state. But the cold facts of history are these, and the electorate can read them; and when the electors consider the administration of public affairs during Mr. Mackenzie's time, and look at the Public Accounts, they will find that an increase in debt occurred to the extent of $40,000,000 during the five years of the Mackenzie regime, and that during the last five years we have been in power there has been an increase of less than $7,000,000. They will find that while we have increased the debt actually $5,000,000, as was explained two years ago, a large proportion of the increase of that year was due merely to book-keeping, setting aside what was considered an asset before, but what was really a valueless asset, as regards certain bonds; and if you bring the expenditure down to the last four years of the Administration, it will appear there was an annual advance of $1,000,000 in the debt, as compared with $8,000,000 a year during Mr. Mackenzie's time. These are cold facts, and the electorate will need large explanations to get rid of them and accept the argument of the hon. gentleman. I could continue my remarks on the same line, but I do not propose to follow this matter up with a long argument; if the hon. gentleman wants to go into the financial condition of the country, absolutely or relatively, let him take occasion to do so at a period of the session when the House is fresh, and bring on a debate, and we on this side of the House will accommodate him with all the discussion he wants. That is the time this subject should be dealt with. But if the hon. gentleman's arguments were worth a fig, the effect of this condition of things would be shown in the history of the country, and in no department more conspicuously than in our public credit; and yet the credit of the country to-day is sound and safe, and 3 per cents, which were sold but a few years ago at 92 and a fraction, and we thought we had a most excellent loan, were sold within the last five months at 97½, coming close up to par. It is impossible that a course of conduct described by the hon. gentleman and characterized by recklessness, would not weaken the credit of the country. I ask whether it has weakened the credit of this country? My answer is that it has not. The hon. gentleman has to go back to Mr. Mackenzie's time, when the watch-dog of the late Government was alive and well, with one hand on his sword and the other trying to do a little public work now and then—his sword for the purpose of keeping off hungry supporters, in order that the increase of the public debt should be only $40,000,000, and not $80,000,000. Mr. Mackenzie was there, and yet the public debt was increased by $40,000,000. Mr. Mackenzie has gone, and I warn my hon. friends that if ever they get into power again, with no man like Mr. Mackenzie at the head of affairs, trowel in one hand and sword in the other—a flashing sword—when they get a much more pliable man there in the shape of the leader of the Opposition, a man more kind-hearted, who will find it hard to say no, they will find that during a period of five years they will not be satisfied with $40,000,000 addition to the debt, but it will run up much further. The probability of this may be found in the contemporary history of the Liberal party, and that history can be read in every province which has had a Liberal Government during the last five years. You may go from Nova Scotia to Manitoba, and you will find in all those provinces where Liberal Governments prevail, rapidly increasing debt, rapidly increasing expenditures, revenues which are stationary and are derived mostly from the Dominion Government. Read Nova Scotia under Mr. Fielding, read New Brunswick under Mr. Blair; read Prince Edward Island under Mr. Peters; read Manitoba under Mr. Greenway, and read—I know you don't want to read it—but just read a little of the history of Quebec under Mr. Mercier, and you will have the characteristics of contemporary Liberalism; and contemporary Liberalism believes in reckless expenditure, increase of debt, and total disregard to anything but the political side of it, and expenditure to keep them in power and to bring the elections out in their favour. I put to this House, and I put to the country this one fact: that if ever there is a Liberal Government in the near future it will be a Government of Mr. Fielding and Mr. Peters, and Mr. Blair and Mr. Greenway, and the contemporary Liberalism of the country aided and abetted by that radical in Liberalism, Mr. Mercier of Quebec. Put all these gentlemen together to fill the Treasury-benches, and then woe to the country, she may put on sackcloth and ashes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. Finance Minister of late has developed a most amazing fondness for scripture metaphor.

Mr. FOSTER. It is my early training.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Whether he does so on the principle attributed to a certain personage, whom we may not name in this House, and who is said to be very fond of quoting scripture or not, I will not pretend to decide. But, Sir, it comes with rather ill-grace from that hon. gentleman to talk of the stationary revenues of Liberal Governments when we have to-night the subject before us, not of a stationary revenue—I wish it was—but a decrease of $2,000,000 or thereabouts on the revenue for the year terminating on the 30th June, 1894. It comes ill from that gentleman to talk of the increase of the public debt, when in the teeth of this certain deficit of last year, and in the teeth of an almost certain deficit for the present year, the hon. gentleman and his colleagues are bringing down a proposal to incur railway indebtedness to the tune of four or five million dollars, for objects scarcely one in a dozen of which will contribute in the slightest degree to the general prosperity of the people of Canada, but which are in point of fact bribes to this or that constituency, or to this or that particular individual or corporation, whose favour it is desirable to secure. If I were to compute the land subsidies which we have been granting, the sum would be very considerably more than that. I have not had the advantage of listening to the whole of the hon. gentleman's remarks, but I can guess tolerably well his line on one or two matters which I heard him take up. The hon. gentleman made a point of the fact that my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) had been comparing the expenditures of the American people when they numbered six or seven millions, with our expenditure when we numbered three or four millions. I will not go back to the beginning of this century. I will go back to a period well within the recollection of living men. If the hon. gentleman wants to know where we stand, and how we compare with the expenditure in the United States let him go back to the year of grace 1845, when the United States were a people of over 20,000,000, when the United States had a navy and an army to maintain, when the United States had a diplomatic service and a number of other expenses with which we have nothing to do, and he will find then that in the federal union beside us 20,000,000 of people administered the whole of their affairs, with an expenditure of $22,000,000, as against an expenditure of $37,000,000 for four and three-quarters of millions in Canada to-day. Sir, I make the hon. gentleman a present of the entire of our subsidies, and how does the matter stand? Why, Sir, the matter would stand, that the federal affairs of 22,000,000 of Americans forty-five years ago, cost one-third less than the federal expenses of less than 5,000,000 Canadians do to-day. One of the worst faults of which the hon. gentleman and his party has been guilty is this: that a villainous system of legalized plunder of which they are the authors, has contributed to debauch the public mind to such an extent that all regard for honest economy and prudence has disappeared. One of the greatest evils, one of those things which are most prejudicial to the future welfare of this country, is that so soon as you so far delude the public mind as to induce the people to suppose under any conditions that taxation per se is anything but an evil; that moment you remove one of the best safeguards for economical administration. And when you go a degree further, and when you make it as those men have done: the interest of a large and important class of the community to push forward extravagance, to become the nursing mothers of corruption in every shape and way, then, Sir, you do indeed sow the seed and prepare the ground for just such a harvest of extravagance as my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Charlton) has been calling the attention of the House to. I say that the expenditure of $37,000,000 for a population of less than five millions of people under the circumstances we are in, would be a most extravagant and unwarranted expenditure if the whole of that money were raised according to the most approved system without taking one single farthing out of the pockets of the people beyond that $37,000,000. But when you come to recollect that over and above costing the people of Canada an annual expenditure of $37,000,000 and a taxation of $30,000,000 a year, that the hon. gentleman and his friends, besides, have conspired with the parties I have referred to, to exact another $30,000,000 a year out of the people of Canada and distribute it among a few hundred favoured individuals who have the privilege of taxing the people at large in consideration of contributing to the funds by which these men are enabled to retain power; then, Sir, you see in its full proportions the enormous character of the expenditure to which we are committed, and the enormous folly of which the people of Canada are guilty, when they were induced by promises—not one of which have been fulfilled, promises which remain on our records, promises which are now known to every man in Canada to have been falsities—to engage in the most absurd system for a people circumstanced as we are that ever I believe was invented on the face of the earth. Now, Sir, the hon. the Finance Minister says: It is a fallacy to state that it is a misfortune if expenditures increase out of proportion to our population. Well, Sir, I do not wonder that a native of New Brunswick, where the population has increased sixty-three souls in ten years does entertain that idea. As this is to a great extent a Maritime Government, and as to my sincere regret the other Maritime Provinces are in a like position, we can understand that the controlling minds in the Government cannot afford the doctrine to spread: that it is a misfortune to Canada that expenditure should increase out of proportion to population. The hon. gentleman talked of the amount accomplished in 1893 by the expenditure he has incurred, and no doubt when he was talking of that he had in mind such transactions as the expenditure of half a million dollars on the Tay Canal, with a revenue of $186 a year, and a further annual charge of two or three thousand dollars to keep that precious work in repair. Probably when he talks of the amount accomplished by the expenditure in 1893 he had in his mind the expenditure we had recently investigated on the Curran bridge structure, as it is called—begging the Solicitor General's pardon—where we successfully accomplished an expenditure of about $450,000 for a work which it is sworn should not have cost $200,000. Sir, the hon. gentleman says there are expenditures which are foolish and useless. Sir, I agree with the hon. gentleman, and it would be hard to find better illustrations of foolish and useless expenditures than those which were accomplished under the circumstances to which I have alluded. I think the hon. gentleman alluded to the Department of Immigration and Agriculture. Well, Sir, it is interesting to look at the records of that department, and see what they accomplished, according to their own statements. According to their own evidence they brought 886,000 people to settle in Canada within the ten years from 1881 to 1891, at a cost of about $3,000,000 to the people of Canada, and, we have the evidence of the census to show that when we came to count noses, of the 886,000 scarce 150,000 remained in Canada. That, if the hon. gentleman likes, is an expenditure which is foolish and useless. He boasts that the dairy interest has developed. The hon. gentleman has developed the dairy interest by the process of taxing the farmers on every tool they use in that most valuable branch of agriculture. He claims that an intelligent interest has been created in politics by reason of the experiments pursued by the Department of Agriculture. Well, Sir, I agree with the hon. gentleman for once. An intelligent interest in politics has been created, particularly among the bulk of the farmers of Ontario, known otherwise as the Patrons of Industry; and if the hon. gentleman will take their platform, if he will read their platform, if he will discuss their platform, he will see that these intelligent farmers who have been taught by hon. gentlemen opposite to take such an intelligent interest in politics dissent totally and at every point from every doctrine which the hon. gentleman and his friends have been expounding for the last fifteen years. The hon. gentleman is also proud of their management of the Indians. Well, Sir, I think those who look at the sums we spend for Indians, and who look at the amounts that go into the pockets and the mouths of certain white hangers-on of this Government, will see that from a certain point of view there is a great deal to be said for the expenditures on Indian account. Where the hon. gentlemen would have stowed away a great many of those interesting individuals who appear every three or four years for the purpose of assisting the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, I do not know, unless they had the North-west and the Indian Department to keep those people in clover and at a sufficient distance, I suppose, from awkward investigations till the time came round when their services would be wanted again. The hon. gentleman was good enough to say that in Mr. Mackenzie's time the taxation had diminished until it was almost at a vanishing point, by reason of the loss of receipts from customs. Well, Sir, under circumstances to which I have alluded before, under a world-wide depression which Mr. Mackenzie had nothing to do with and could not control, the customs receipts ran down from $15,361,000 to $12,795,000, being a reduction of a little more than $2,500,000 in the space of four years; and in order that the House may see how just was the hon. gentlemen's criticism, I may remind them that unless I am greatly mistaken, in one year, that is to say, between 1893 and 1894, the hon. gentleman has succeeded in effecting a reduction in the customs receipts of about $1,900,000. I think he will find that that was seeing the Mackenzie Government and going one better. I do not see that in any year during the term of office of the Mackenzie Government, the losses amounted to any more than that sum; and certainly in the four years' term they amounted to very little more than the hon. gentleman has achieved in the last year. What he may succeed in achieving in the present one he knows best; but I would warn him for his own sake that while I have not the slightest objection to his denouncing deficits in any shape or form, he will find that it is a very awkward game to play at before he is another twelve months older. The hon. gentleman talked of the increase of debt during the time of the Mackenzie Government. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman was not here, and I presume he knows nothing of the circumstances under which that debt was incurred; but if he will take the trouble to examine his own predecessor's budget statement of 1873, and the amount of indebtedness which Sir Leonard Tilley agreed to impose on the people of this country before he left office, he will find that of that $40,000,000 of debt, not one million was fairly attributable to the Government of Mr. Mackenzie. Mr. Mackenzie inherited from his predecessors certain obligations against which he had protested in the strongest possible terms when his remonstrances might have been of service, but which, for the credit of the country, he was forced to carry out when he took office. If all the obligations to which the Government preceding Mr. Mackenzie's had pledged the country before leaving office had been carried out on the basis of their estimates, there would have been deficits of $4,000,000 a year, for which they had made no sort of provision whatever. It lies ill with the successors of such a Government to reproach the men who were obliged to face the engagements that Government had left behind them unfulfilled, with the fact that in carrying out those engagements a debt of $40,000,000 was been incurred. The hon. gentleman is fond of cold facts. Well, Sir, it is a cold fact that at the present time, under the management of himself and his colleagues, the average growth of the population of the Dominion of Canada, a new country, with an almost boundless expanse of new territory, has fallen below the average growth of population in the most densely peopled countries of the old world. That is a very cold fact, and a very disgraceful fact. It is owing to the policy of these gentlemen that at the present time one in every three of all the able-bodied male Canadians between the ages of twenty-one and fifty years is found in the United States. It is also owing to their policy that in the Maritime Provinces, to which the hon. gentleman particularly belongs, there is scarcely one county out of ten which has even maintained its ordinary natural increase, not to speak of immigration. But the hon. gentleman takes great credit to himself that the credit of the country is high, or that the rate of interest at which we can obtain money is lower now than it was sixteen or seventeen years ago. Sir, the hon. gentleman very greatly indeed underrates the intelligence of the farmers, and of the people of this country generally if he supposes that they are not perfectly aware that there has been an enormous fall in the rate of interest all over the world in that time—that the rate of interest in England has fallen nearly 20 per cent, and in the world at large probably 40 per cent, and that we have barely obtained our share of that fall. But, Sir, I do not rise so much for the purpose of reviewing all these matters as for the purpose of protesting against that most foolish doctrine, which seems to have got possession of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, that because the credit of this country is good, because we are still able to borrow money on reasonable terms, therefore, in spite of all that we know and see, it is wise and prudent for us to go on increasing liabilities without making any provision for them—to go on heaping up debt without paying any regard at all to the enormous burdens their policy has placed upon the people of this country; and he knows, whether it be principally to owing to causes which they cannot control or not, that we are at this moment confronted with the fact that while we possess in the North-west a country which, if wisely governed and wisely administered, ought, long ere this, to have been the home of many hundreds of thousands, if not of millions of prosperous people, yet, most unfortunately, the hon. gentleman's policy has conducted us to an almost standstill in that country; that we are making no growth in it; that all the enormous expenditure we have incurred for the purpose of development has, up to this time, been thrown away. I would hope against hope that by and by we will succeed in reaping some return for the enormous sacrifices which Canada has been called on to make; but I believe no adequate return will ever be made to the people of Canada for the enormous amount that they have sunk in the North-west, and the enormous yearly charge they are compelled to bear, and the enormous sacrifices of other kinds they have made, until such time as the hon. gentleman opposite or the people of Canada—for it is hopeless to expect anything of hon. gentlemen in that direction—have made up their minds to adopt a rational system of taxation, and ensured that from this time forth the resources of the people of Canada will be honestly used for the benefit of the people collectively, and not for the benefit of a few score hundreds of favoured individuals.

Mr. INGRAM. I should like to ask this simple question. Out of the $38,000,000 that this Government expend, can my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) show where he can reduce by a single dollar that expenditure.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) did not vote.

Mr. AMYOT. I paired with the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Godbout), otherwise I would have voted for the good government of the country.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Restigouche did not vote.

Mr. McALISTER. I paired with the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Colter). Otherwise I would have voted against the amendment.

THE JUDICIARY OF QUEBEC.

Mr. GIROUARD. Before you leave the Chair, Sir, I would call the attention of the leader of the House to a promise he made last Thursday, when the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) brought his charges against certain judges.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did promise the House the other evening, in consequence of the way in which the statement respecting the charges against some of our judges was made, that I would consider the subject carefully and read the observations which the hon. member for L'Islet made before he submitted to the House his written accusation, and that I would then make a statement, at an early date, as to what the Government proposed to do in the matter. Immediately afterwards I received a telegram from Mr. Justice Bossé, in which he says: "I trust you will have a full investigation into Mr. Tarte's charges and put an end to slander on the administration of justice." I also received a communication from Mr. Justice Davidson, on account of his name having been mentioned on a previous occasion, in such a way as to bring it before the House in the same connection. Mr. Justice Davidson says that he begs to inclose for my perusal documents which will refute, on the highest authority—the authority of Mr. Justice Jetté—the statements which were made concerning him. I do not know that I need to read the correspondence between Judges Jetté and Davidson, but I will read to the House the concluding letter from Judge Jetté, which is dated 13th July, 1894. It is addressed to Judge Davidson:

I see by the newspapers that Mr. Tarte, although pressed even by his political friends, has not yet decided to withdraw the charges he has made against the judges. As to what seems to be stated against you, allow me to say, that I cannot understand that any importance can be given to so ridiculous a statement. The charge seems to be, although vague and indefinite, that your signature to the Interim Report of the Royal Commission was affixed under dubious circumstances. What these circumstances may be is not stated. Now, if those who believe that there can be anything in that statement, would only reflect for the moment, they could remember that it is distinctly stated in my printed report, that this Interim Report had been fully decided, many days in advance between you and Judge Baby, that it was submitted to me by both of you, and discussed as much as I could, in the state of weakness I was in at that time, and that I finally decided not to concur in it, and wrote you giving my reasons for so doing.

Any unprejudiced mind will easily find evidence in those facts that when you came to my house the day before presenting that Interim Report it was entirely drafted and completed and it could not have been changed afterwards. The following sentence in the closing remarks of my report, leaves no doubt as to that fact and it is worth citing here:—

"Moreover, after having seen the draft they had prepared, I found that it was impossible for me to concur in it."

How can it be pretended after that there was any mystery in your signing this Interim Report, fully decided in advance to which my concurrence only was refused? I am fully convinced that the Minister of Justice, who has respect for the judiciary, will not consent to degrade it by granting an enquete on such ridiculous and baseless charges as those insinuated against you. In order that you may be informed of the position I have lately taken in this matter, I enclose a copy of a letter I sent to—

Naming an hon. member of this House.

—on the 4th of July instant.

The House will remember that there were three classes of charges made by the hon. member for L'Islet. The first were charges connected with the administration of justice, and were made in a way, as I claim, so exceedingly vague that they ought not to form, according to my impression at that moment, ground for inquiry by this House. I beg to say that that view is fully confirmed by reconsideration of what the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) said to the House, and by examination of the authorities dealing with this subject, and my view with regard to these accusations is that they ought not to form the ground of any inquiry by this House, that the accusations made are unworthy of consideration by this House, having regard to its own dignity and its relations to the administration of justice. But I have addressed to the hon. member for L'Islet a letter, because, it seems to me that while the charges made were not, in their present form, such as the House ought to entertain, the duty would devolve upon me of ascertaining whether there could be any foundation for them. I have ventured to inquire of the hon. member for L'Islet in these terms:

SIR,—Referring to the charges against certain judges in the province of Quebec which you laid before the House of Commons on the 12th instant, on the motion that the House should resolve into committee of Ways and Means, I have to ask whether you can and will furnish me with particulars of your accusations. I do not refer to the charges relating to travelling expenses or to the complaint as to one of the judges not residing at the place of residence designated for him, but I refer to all the charges other than these, made by you.

My reason for addressing you this letter is that I shall feel obliged to state to the House, if I should be called on for any opinion, that what you have laid before the House, in connection with this subject, does not warrant the House in proceeding on your accusations, notwithstanding the desire of the judges concerned that an investigation should take place.

At the same time, if the accusations are made specific by you, in response to this letter according to the usual requirements in cases of impeachment, and according to what appears to be the established practice in such cases, I propose to transmit your accusations to the accused judges and to lay before the House the charges, together with the answers from the judges, for such action as may appear to be required.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). What is the date of that letter?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is dated the 14th July. I have received, likewise, a letter from Mr. Beauchemin, the gentleman who was referred to as one of the firm of Beauchemin & Malette, by the hon. member for L'Islet the other evening, and as having made charges some years ago against Mr. Justice Tellier, and who was referred to as having received no satisfaction from me in response to the communication he had addressed to me. This is a letter of some considerable length, and I do not intend to detain the House with it. It is sent in by Mr. Beauchemin, who is a Queen's Counsel, and who states that the hon. member for L'Islet has not the slightest authority for having used his name in this connection.

Mr. TARTE. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Perhaps it is proper that I should read it rather than give my own construction of it. It is written in French, and I will render it in English, if hon. members will bear with my translation. I will submit the original :

ST. HYACINTHE, 13th July, 1894.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON,
Prime Minister and Minister of Justice,
Ottawa.

SIR,—We read in "La Minerve" of this morning that the member for L'Islet brought before the House yesterday afternoon certain charges against some of the judges, amongst them the Hon. Judge Tellier of the district of St. Hyacinthe. Among these statements on the subject of Judge Tellier we read this phrase, so little conclusive, "some years ago some accusations were presented by Messrs. Beauchemin & Mallette" altogether vague as is the phrase it has evidently not escaped without a hostile motive as much against us as against the judge. Now we protest against the use that Mr. Tarte, without our authority, makes thus of our name on the subject of accusations against Judge Tellier. We have never authorized Mr. Tarte to bring forward any accusations against this gentleman. Some years ago some misunderstandings arose between the judge and us, but the public had nothing to do with them. Since then these things have been settled amicably, and since testimony has been given with respect to our charge, since it has appeared well to have made use of us in connection with the judge for this district, it may be appear equally good, without doubt, to hear the answer. Now then we declare that we have taken an active part for the Conservative party in all the elections that have taken place since the judge ascended the Bench at St. Hyacinthe. The honour has been done us of counting us among the chief Conservatives of this district. We have taken part in the deliberations of all the committees that have chosen the candidates, and never, absolutely never, directly or indirectly, has Judge Tellier "sought and asked candidates in opposition to the party he combatted before accepting the position of judge." There has never been a question in our deliberations as to what aid Judge Tellier might give us in the elections, and we are convinced that any temptation offered to him in this sense would have been most severely repressed. We affirm that he has extended his delicacy so far in this regard that he has totally abstained from making even the slightest allusion to politics, under these circumstances so ardently agitated.

It is a matter, within our knowledge generally conceded in this district, that the most impressive respect is felt for Judge Tellier's impartiality, his integrity and the soundness of his judgment and his legal learning. It is a proverb in the courts that pleaders who have been unsuccessful have twenty-four hours to curse the judge. Often they exceed this short period, and Mr. Tarte is indeed availing himself of this privilege. If on our side anything has been made use of for the purpose of confirming the accusations which have been made, we regret it assuredly, because we believe the public has nothing to gain by it, but, on the contrary, it appears that there is much to be lost by such statements being made.

A statement has been made by Mr. Justice Ouimet, which I have not by me at the moment, but denying the accusations which were made with respect to him, and stating that he is ready to submit to any inquiry regarding them that the House or the Minister of Justice may make. I observed that the charges were of more than one kind. I have given my view with regard to the vague charges of injustice, partiality, &c., which have been made; but there were other charges which relate to the drawing of public money in pursuance of the right which judges have in the province of Quebec to certain travelling allowances. As to that, I have to say that these charges certainly do not demand the action of this House. The accusations were made for the first time, to my knowledge, on Thursday evening last. These sums of money are drawn from the banks in different parts of the country, by the judges, but the audit of their accounts rests with my department, and probably with the Auditor General, also, but certainly with my department. It is, therefore, the duty of the officers of my department, when a statement is made that a judge has drawn travelling allowances unduly, to ascertain what the distance is that the judge has travelled, what length of time he has been absent from his home on duty, and what the amount of the allowance ought to have been, as compared with the amount drawn; and I have directed that an investigation shall be made most carefully into the facts upon which the accusation of overcharging for travelling allowances, was made. I have ascertained exactly the sums which were drawn by the judges whose names were mentioned in that connection, and it remains only for me to ascertain the dates at which they held their courts in the several places where they are alleged to have been performing their duties as judges outside the districts in which they live. But I think a grave injustice was done. I am sure involuntarily, by the hon. the leader of the Opposition in respect to Judge Tellier and Judge Ouimet. I have not had time personally to examine the particulars with regard to Judge Ouimet, but I think a good deal I have to say will apply to him also. The hon. leader of the Opposition, I think, unconsciously, did a grave injustice to those judges in saying that in view of the number of days for which they drew pay as being absent from their district there was cause to demand an explanation, because it was physically impossible that the number of days for which they drew money should have been consumed in the discharge of judicial duties outside of their places of residence. I do not allude to this matter for the purpose of renewing the controversy, but in order to make an explanation that I am sure the hon. leader of the Opposition will be glad to hear, because I think it will be a correction of what was in his own mind when he rose to discuss the question the other night. The allowance which I have mentioned for judges in such cases, is not really a travelling allowance, although it is called so, but it is a living allowance for the judges who are absent from their district discharging judicial duties in another place. But what appeared to strike the mind of the leader of the Opposition as demanding inquiry above all else, was this: that when you take out Sundays from the year, and holidays on which no courts would be held, and the vacation, there were not so many working days left as the learned judge had drawn $6 a day for. But what I wish to call the attention of the hon. gentleman and the House to, is this: that a judge is certainly entitled to draw the allowance for Sundays and holidays, if he should be absent from his district on those days if, for example, the judge of the district of St. Hyacinthe, or the judge living in Sorel, should be called to Montreal to discharge judicial duties on a Thursday, and he should be obliged to remain there over Sunday, and into the next week, he would be clearly entitled by law to draw his living allowance for the Sunday, just as well as for the Thursday, Friday and Saturday, and the same if holidays intervened, and there is a further explanation as regards the vacation, that while the vacation lasts probably sixty days out of the year, those sixty days are for some one or more of the judges working days in the city of Montreal, and one or other of those judges whose names have been mentioned have actually been sitting in Montreal doing Chambers work during vacation; and I am informed that the Chambers work is carried on in the city of Montreal, sometimes by judges from their own districts, all through vacation, when not only Chambers work, but summary cases are disposed of by them. There is a further provision which my hon. friend will remember, that with regard to certain duties on which the judge is absent, he shall be allowed not less than three days' pay, notwithstanding that less time than three days may have been consumed. The words which I refer to are these:

To each of the judges of the said Court of Queen's Bench, for attending any other court, for each day he is absent from his place of residence, $6. To each of the judges of the Superior Court, attending, as such, any court held at any place other than that at which he is directed to reside, for each day he is absent from his said place of residence, $6.

Then, the provision which I referred to about the three days' pay is at the close of a proviso, reading thus:

Provided that any judge of the Superior Court, required to attend, as such, the Court of Queen's Bench, appeal side or criminal side, elsewhere than at his said place of residence, during the whole of the term, shall receive the same allowance as a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench performing the like duty; but this provision shall not apply to a judge of the Superior Court attending the Court of Queen's Bench, appeal side or criminal side, for a part only of a term, or for the purpose of disposing of cases already heard; and in the two cases last mentioned, the allowance shall be $6 for each day's absence from his place of residence—except that three days' absence at least shall always be allowed for.
